Mr. STITT (Selkirk): —and the charge will have to be properly tried before a competent tribunal. Another point I would emphasize is, how can this parliament anticipate all the ramifications of the administration of this act? Good law does not anticipate too much. I do not believe that a legislative body can take to itself a priori the details of administration. I think the law is good law, it protects the individual; all it does is to limit the penalties within reasonable bounds.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I will consider this matter a little further. Subsection (i) can stand.

Subsection stands.

Subsection (j) agreed to.

On section 48—Act to become operative.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the acting leader of the government if he does not entertain a different view from that expressed by his leader, and if he is ready in the absence of his leader to submit this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly not. If this legislation is objected to afterwards possibly someone will take it to the supreme court, but we are not going to do it at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: May I tell the right hon. gentleman more? This legislation is most absurd because it is based on a convention which has lapsed. If you go back to the treaty, and the other treaties in regard to this so-called social legislation, everything is based on instruments which have lapsed. The Prime Minister asked us for a blank cheque and in return he gave us a prescribed note. What is the benefit to the people of this country? Moreover the Prime Minister does not know international law, and he does not know the rules of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: How can he tell us that this legislation is based on international treaties? May I ask the acting leader of the government the same question which I put some time ago on the orders of the day, about the date by which such legislation should have been enacted? He knows very well the three treaties which have been published in extenso in the votes and proceedings and in the orders of the day; I am sure he knows them by heart. He knows very well that in each one of those treaties there is a clause to the effect that each agreement should be put in force before a certain date. The date specified in most cases is long past. Would the acting leader of the government tell the committee that the time specified in the treaties has not lapsed long ago?

If the right hon. acting leader of the government does not understand what I have told him I shall repeat it in the clearest possible language. And if he wishes I shall say it to him in French. Now, sir, here we have social legislation which is going to replace the old order. This is the new order of things. The sun is rising behind the mountains, the old order is gone; this is the new order. I do not say that in an offensive way, because I have the greatest respect for old age, but the old order is gone. Here we are in the new order of things. This legislation is brought in to remedy the social evils of the time. Great legislation! It is brought in to help the unemployed, but it will assist no one who is now unemployed, that is the first characteristic of this legislation. In order for any man to get assistance by virtue of this bill he will have to work forty days.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty weeks.

Mr. POULIOT: I said forty days in order to see if the right hon. acting leader of the government was following me closely. But imagine a poor man who is unemployed and who has not a cent in his pocket; he will have to make a contribution every week for forty weeks before he gets anything under this legislation. Therefore the hundreds of thousands of people who are unemployed will get no benefit from this so called social legislation.

That is the first point. Furthermore, if this legislation is attacked by any manufacturer who refuses to pay his share, what will happen? First the matter will be taken to the superior court of the province; then it will go to the supreme court or the court of king's bench, as the case may be, then to the Supreme Court of Canada and finally to the privy council. How long will it be before this insurance comes into force? This is only election propaganda, and that is why I denounce it. I was the only one to express myself against it, but if it were to come to a vote again I would do the same thing. I am strongly opposed to it, because it is all humbug, deceit and cant. That is all there is to it. I am afraid of the road to Damascus; I am afraid of those people who have Tory souls and Tory minds, and who are bold enough to call themselves Liberals. Liberalism is a mentality, a doctrine, and to be a Liberal one should be in touch with the people; one should know the sufferings of the people; one should not be a despot, with flatterers all about telling anything but the truth. This legislation is a great joke but it is a sad joke; it is too bad to take advantage of the troubles, the misery and the misfortunes of the people for political capital. It is shameful. If there are some people credulous enough to think this legislation will be of any assistance to the poor and humble people of this country who have suffered so much because of the policies of the government, I have the greatest compassion for them. They will get nothing out of this legislation. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here; I regret very much that his ill health keeps him away, but on the treasury benches we have several of his cabinet ministers who have not the courage to tell him that this legislation, which was imposed on him by his election managers, is of no use and will serve no purpose to the common good of this country. That is why I am so sorry about what is happening now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what all this has to do with section 48.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I think the hon. gentleman is in order. This section is quite wide enough to cover his remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Speaking to the galleries.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking to the galleries. I am speaking to the chair and through the chair to all members of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to section 48.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, and my contention is that although it is set out in section 48 that this act shall come into force when assented to, this act—

Mr. MITCHELL: I rise to a point of order. At page 1088 of Hansard for February 21 I find the words, "Section 48 agreed to."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): It is marked here as standing.

Mr. MITCHELL: The discussion is all out of order; the section has been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The section is marked here as standing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am quoting from the records of this house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Our records show that this section is standing.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I thank you for your fairness to all hon. members of this house. I am not flattering you when I say I deeply appreciate the way you are fulfilling your high duties.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The clerk finds that the section has been carried, and consequently this discussion is out of order.

Mr. NEILL: We have not passed the schedules.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We come to the schedules now.

Mr. POULIOT: On the schedules, sir,—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The first schedule has been carried.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have a suggested amendment to schedule 1, if it could be reopened.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald Cape Breton): With the consent of the committee.

On the first schedule, part II, excepted employments.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In subsection (c) of part II employment in lumbering and logging is excepted. It has been represented to the government very strongly that this section should be amended in some way to include the workers in the regular trades such as saw mills, shingle mills and so on. Therefore I move, seconded by the Minister of the Interior, that after the words "Employment in lumbering and logging" be added the words:

—exclusive of the saw mill, planing mill and shingle mill industries.

That is to say, they will be allowed to come under the act. I may say that we realize perfectly well, and no one more than myself, the difficulty about the logging business itself. I should have liked to see some way devised by which the men working in the woods would be able to come under the act, but so far I have not been given any wording which seemed suitable for the purpose. Perhaps it will be remembered that this act is not final. It is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians; it can be amended, and later on I hope some way will be found to include those working in the woods as well. I am moving this amendment in order to take in the saw mill, planing mill and shingle mill industries, which are excluded at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: By this amendment those working in saw mills will be included. Will that take in saw mills running only part time, say during the summer season?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think it is broad enough to cover any saw mills.

Mr. POWER: I should like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that this will not be of very much benefit to those employed in saw mills in eastern Canada. These saw mills operate only from about May to October, a period of approximately twenty-five to thirty weeks. Those are the saw mills operating for the longest period; there are some winter mills which to my knowledge operate for only two months, particularly the small shingle mills near the scene of logging operations. So an employee in such a mill would have to make his contribution for well over two years before he would be entitled to draw any benefit. I quite understand that even then he will derive some benefit under the act, but in eastern Canada, nearly all through Ontario and certainly all through the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick and the maritime provinces, work in the saw mills is a purely seasonal occupation, which does not last much longer than the work of the men engaged in logging. So I doubt very much whether the commission, when it comes to consider this matter—and I understand that the commission, by a system of analogy which was explained to us with some difficulty the other day, may exclude these trades—will be able to include these workers. I think perhaps the minister should make it pretty clear that so far as eastern Canada is concerned the saw mill workers will still be excluded from the operations of the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think that is a fair statement. I should like to see them all under the bill and I have so stated more than once, but it is a very difficult problem to work out. I am hoping the commission will, under the powers given it, look into the matter, make a report, and try to find some way of arranging it.

Mr. NEILL: Would the acting Prime Minister explain a little further just what the objection may be to including logging, as well as sawmill operations, because it is notorious in the west that logging is an all-year-round industry. The Prime Minister indicated that he appreciated that fact, but that he had in his mind the provision of something along the lines of zone regulations. I notice the amendment states that the sawmill, planing mill and shingle mill industries will be affected. I should think the shingle mill industry would involve the cutting of shingle bolts, too. When we refer to the shingle mill industry we raise the doubt as to whether or not the cutting of bolts would not come within the operations of shingle mills. Would the minister explain what led the government to exclude the logging industry?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have tried to explain. The difficulty is that the bill now before us is for the whole of Canada. The hon. member suggests that zones were mentioned. That plan has not been accepted as yet. So far as logging operations are concerned may I say that I should like to see them included, speaking from a purely personal standpoint, because in years gone by I knew something about that industry. Under the present bill we could not include logging in British Columbia without including logging in this part of Canada where it is a seasonal occupation, entirely.

Mr. NEILL: So that this amendment, to use the language of the hon. member for Quebec South, will take in the sawmills in Quebec province which are only seasonal and will rule out logging operations in British Columbia which are distinctly carried on all the year round.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have before me a communication from the camp and mill workers' union urging that every effort be made towards having the workers in the lumber industry included in the bill. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, in many parts of British Columbia this is a steady occupation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: From where is the communication?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The camp and mill workers union, Vancouver.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would not section 15 (2) meet the objection which has been made?

(2) Where it appears to the commission that the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, any class of persons employed in an excepted employment are so similar to the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, a class of persons employed in an insurable employment as to result in anomalies in the operation of this act, the commission may, by regulations either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as may be specified in the regulations,— do so and so. Would that not take care of the situation?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand that that subsection is intended to give the commission power to go into these matters. May I repeat that this measure is by no means final. We have brought it in to cover as many people as possible, but there may be need at a later time to bring about what is suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think that meets the situation. The suggestion reminds me of the story Mark Twain told. He said he had some disease, and the only medical advice he could obtain was that of a horse doctor. The horse doctor said, "Well, I don't know what you have got, but I could give you something to change it to botts, and I could cure that." In the present instance a person would seem to be met with this reply, "Well, you are not under the act, but if you could prove you are an anomaly you could get under it." I do not believe in getting into something by means of an anomaly. If it is right at the present time, and if it is the best consideration of the government that a change should be made, then it should be made. Do not leave it for some fictitious anomaly to be proved later on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the matter was under discussion a few days ago I suggested the Prime Minister should detail the reasons why the government had excluded these various groups, going over them one by one. I understood the Prime Minister accepted the suggestion. I should like to urge that before we proceed further with this section the acting Prime Minister should tell us why these particular groups have been excluded. There must be some reason. Certainly so far no general principle has been laid down by the government. It seems as though they have taken classes arbitrarily, and left out other classes. There must be some reason why large numbers of needy people should be thus excluded. I would urge the acting Prime Minister to give in some detail the reasons for excluding certain classes.

Mr. POWER: As has been indicated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni the terms "sawmill industry" "planing mill industry" and "shingle mill industry" may cover more territory than is anticipated by the amendment. I suggest the term "sawmill industry" covers the entire industry, from the cutting of the tree until it leaves the saw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that unwillingly and unwittingly the government will be bringing in the logging industry. Personally I believe they should, but I do not think it should be done in a left-handed way. If the amendment is left in its present form the commission most certainly will have the right to include the logging industry with the sawmill, shingle mill or planing mill industries.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Having listened to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni may I direct this fact to the attention of the committee: While the hon. member is undoubtedly correct in his representations about the logging industry along the coast of British Columbia being an all-season or all-year round operation, his observations do not apply to the interior of that province. The interior of British Columbia is in the same position as was indicated by the hon. member for Quebec South. They get out their logs in the winter time and do their milling in the summer time. The people who work in the winter time are very often working in the mills in the summer time. The point I make is that the representations made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni do not apply to all of British Columbia; to be specific, they do not apply to the interior of that province.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Before it carries may I say I regret very much the committee has taken so much time in a discussion of this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret hon. members have been splitting hairs. This chamber knows very well the bill will never be put into effect; it is just election propaganda. I believe it is ultra vires and that it is void, and that it would be so declared by any independent tribunal of the country. That is why I have strong objections to the measure. It is a very sad show, when it is made at the expense of the people who are suffering from unemployment and distress. I regret that so much time has been taken up in a discussion of this matter, because it will never come into effect; you may be sure of that, Mr. Chairman. Take my word, sir, when we meet together after the next election there will be great changes, the left will turn to the right. I cannot take seriously any discussion or any hair splitting about any section of a bill which is not seriously placed before the House of Commons. It is only election propaganda, and will serve the purpose only of adding to the arguments of the Tory canvassers during the next election campaign. That is why I strongly oppose the measure. And I am against it for another reason—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I am opposed to it because it is based on international agreements which lapsed years ago. What is the strength of an international instrument which has no life? It is dead. It has been dead for years.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. member wished to speak in this way it seems to me the appropriate place would have been on the motion for second or third reading. However if the amendment is agreed to I would suggest that the section be passed. Then I would ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think the amendment should pass until the promise of the Prime Minister is implemented.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is the hon. member referring to the memorandum?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am referring to the exemptions. Many of us when we go to our home—in different parts of the country will have to make explanations and to give the reasons the government gave. I want to know what they are.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I shall have a memorandum prepared, and shall read it to the house the next time the matter is brought up.

Mr. POULIOT: I am satisfied with the promise that there is to be more serious consideration given to it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MANION: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Amendment stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir George Perley the house adjourned at six p.m.

Friday, March 8, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSING POLICY

Mr. A. D. GANONG (Charlotte) presented the second report of the special committee on housing as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be granted leave to sit while the house is sitting.

Mr. GANONG moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 28 for the relief of Mary Wynifred Bayford Bennett.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 29 for the relief of Lillian Gurden McIntyre.—Mr. White (Mount Royal).

Bill No. 30 for the relief of Minnie Elizabeth Lyons Dafoe.—Mr. Jacobs.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil) (for the Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish the Economic Council of Canada and to provide for the employment of such officers and employees, and for the payment of such expenses as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I would draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to an interview given at Montreal by Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. May I be permitted to preface a question I am going to ask by stating that the interview is based upon a report submitted to the house in reply to a question asked by me some time ago concerning the amount of subsidies in land and cash given to the Canadian Pacific and its subsidiaries by the federal government? In this interview Mr. Beatty denies the accuracy of the statement submitted to the house by the Canadian National Railways through the Department of Railways and Canals. I wish to ask the Minister of Railways whether he has taken cognizance of this interview and whether he is in a position to make a statement concerning it?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yesterday evening the hon. member for Gloucester drew to my attention the interview of Mr. Beatty and therefore I made some inquiries regarding it. The hon. member submitted to the house five different series of questions, and I think each series contained five or more questions, so that there were altogether some twenty-five or more. Those questions related to specific subjects. As the hon. gentleman has pointed out, one of the series referred to land grants and cash aid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and matters of that sort. The questions asked did not refer to other matters to which Mr. Beatty referred in the statement made to the press. The information which we obtained, which was partly supplied through the Department of the Interior, as to land grants for example, was from recognized sources and is in accordance with the statistics as given out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for many years. For example in regard to the 26,000,000 acres of land to which Mr. Beatty refers, on page 12 of the Statistics of Steam Railways in Canada for the year ended December 31, 1933, exactly the same figures are given as those which we gave to the hon. gentleman, or which were given by the Department of the Interior in the returns furnished. Naturally we did not deal with the entire question of money grants or other grants to the Canadian National for instance, to some of which Mr. Beatty referred. But this blue book as put out for many years gives exactly the same figures as those in the return furnished to the hon. gentleman. There is nothing new in the figures, they are the same as submitted to the royal commission on railways. I do not wish to deal with the question further than that except to say that the figures given have been of public record for many years, and no exception has been taken to them as far as the land grants or other figures submitted are concerned.

MARKETING SCHEME FOR FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I have a question to direct to the government based on a telegram received this morning signed by the Vessel Owners Association and the fishermen of Prince Rupert. If any communication has been forwarded to Ottawa opposing the passage of a marketing scheme, they would like to ascertain who the parties are who sent in representations, and also what the possibilities are of the Pacific coast halibut fishermen getting under a scheme before the season opens.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is not in his seat at the moment; that question will stand for answer at some future session.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed from Thursday, March 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto—Mr. Bennett—Mr. MacDonald in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Before we start with the clauses that were left over yesterday I wish to say that the copy of the bill which I have is as printed originally. I noticed that once or twice there was some confusion about the number of the sections. I think it arose in the following way. I ask the chairman to look at page 3 of the bill; about the middle of the page he will find the figure 3 in brackets, and "the remainder of this act may be referred to as follows:" That ought to have been a large 3, because that is really section 3, but they have renumbered them in such a way that it looks as if the one marked 4 is really number 3. The 3 in brackets should be a big 3, and if that were followed the sections below would be correctly numbered. I mention this, although it is a matter for the officials of the house to straighten out when the bill is completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) drew attention to that when we had the bill before us at an earlier stage, and I think it was agreed in committee that the numbers we would discuss would be the numbers as printed in the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. At page 1514 of Hansard I find the following:

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order. At page 1088 of Hansard for February 21 I find the words, "Section 48 agreed to."

The Chairman (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): It is marked here as standing.

Mr. Mitchell: The discussion is all out of order; the section has been agreed to.

The Chairman (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The section is marked here as standing.

Mr. Mitchell: I am quoting from the records of this house.

The Chairman (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Our records show that this section is standing.

Later on the chairman said:

The clerk finds that the section has been carried, and consequently this discussion is out of order.

My point of order is that in the original procedure before you it did not appear that that section was agreed to; what was published in Hansard is only a copy, therefore when you stated as chairman of this committee that section 48 was not agreed to the committee should stand by you, notwithstanding what has been printed in Hansard. Therefore, sir, I submit that section 48 has not been agreed to, because you so stated yesterday in your capacity as chairman of the committee of the whole. May I ask you, sir, to rule in accordance with the statement you made yesterday as chairman of the committee of the whole.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): For the information of the hon. member I may say that it was discovered afterwards that section 48 had been carried. Previously I had gone on the assumption that it had not been carried; when it was discovered that it had, I ruled the discussion out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, what is this discussion about?

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, but if you quoted from the original procedure which was before you and it did not appear on that original that the section was agreed to, I submit that whatever is told you by an officer of the house does not count. Whether or not in fact it has been agreed to is entirely immaterial if it does not appear on the procedure. I take your word to that effect. Therefore, sir, I submit that according to the statement you gave as chairman of the committee of the whole, clause 48 has not been agreed to. Will you kindly give your ruling on that? And if you rule against that contention I shall respectfully appeal to the Speaker for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The only explanation I can give is that from the bill itself it appeared that the clause stood. On the clerk's minutes it appeared that it had been carried, therefore I had to rule as I did.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, you were so nice to me yesterday that I will not insist any more about it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the first clause? I think the first clause that stood yesterday was section 20. You might look and see if there is anything before section 20.

On section 20—Statutory conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: With regard to subsection 4 of clause 20, I have had the question carefully looked into, and I have decided in my own mind at all events that this clause is quite in order as it is printed. Its purpose is to provide that any three days of unemployment, whether consecutive or not in any week, will be counted as continuous unemployment in order to qualify a man for the benefit of this legislation. The man is unemployed this week for three days; next week he is unemployed for another three days, making six days of continuous unemployment. If he is unemployed for three days the following week that makes nine days of continuous unemployment. There is no restriction in this section of the bill to any particular week. Yesterday the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) argued that this section applied only to the first two weeks. I do not read it that way at all. It states:

—any two such continuous periods—

That does not refer only to the first one and two; it refers equally to the second and third or the third and fourth. That is the way I read the act, and that is the way it is interpreted by the officer of the Justice department with whom I discussed it this morning. Further I take it the hon. member for Comox-Alberni argued that because nine days of unemployment is required to qualify in this country while only six days is required in Great Britain, this section should read a little differently. As a matter of fact a man can come under this section, in my judgment and in the judgment of the officer of the department whom I consulted, after having three days of unemployment in each of three consecutive weeks, making nine days in all, or in the weeks that come afterward providing there are at least two such periods in each six weeks. This section is based on the British act. I would refer the hon. gentleman to page 34 of the evidence taken before the royal commission in Great Britain, where he will find the British interpretation of this section, which amply supports this view.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand that if a man coming under this act is unemployed for three days in each of three weeks then he becomes entitled to unemployment benefits in the event of three ensuing then three more days of employment before the next three days of unemployment, or if any period of employment ensues? Is he not then outside the operation of the act?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly not; he comes under it if he has nine days of unemployment. If he works half the time, three days a week, for three weeks he is unemployed for nine days and the following week, if he is unemployed part of the time, he is entitled to claim benefits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the case raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) the other day, that of the coal miners in the Crowsnest pass district, these men have some employment every month in the year and sometimes every week in the year, but it is not continuous employment. As the hon. member pointed out, very often they have three days this week and three days next week, but each week they will have three or four days of unemployment. Do I understand that the interpretation is that as soon as nine days of unemployment have elapsed, as provided under subsection 4 of section 20, at page 11, these men would become entitled to unemployment relief for any subsequent periods of three days or longer which might ensue from time to time during the year?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That number of days would qualify such a man under this part of the act. Of course he would have to comply with the other sections which provide that he must pay in for so many weeks before drawing any benefits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, I am assuming that.

[Sir George Perley.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I understand it three days of unemployment in each of three consecutive weeks would enable the man to qualify under the act.

Mr. NEILL: If the acting leader of the government has made up his mind that he is not going to amend this section I suppose that is all that can be said. He has quoted the opinion of his law department as well as some authority in England. It is peculiar that I should have to stand up here and contradict the right hon. gentleman, claiming as my authority his own leader, but surely the ability and wide experience of the Prime Minister is sufficient to justify me in placing some confidence in his statements. Yesterday I quoted the Prime Minister—I need not repeat the quotations to-day—as saying clearly and definitely not only that there was doubt about it but that it would be necessary to readjust it. Those are the identical words he used. As I say, it is useless to waste the time of the committee, but I would direct attention to one point, in connection with which the minister indicated his willingness to give way yesterday. On the ground that half or a very small moiety of a loaf is better than no bread perhaps he might be willing to take the same attitude to-day. The section states:

> Any three days of unemployment, whether consecutive or not, within a period of six consecutive days shall be treated as a continuous period of unemployment, and any two such continuous periods separated by a period of not more than six weeks shall be treated as one continuous period—

Having regard to the words "and any two such continuous periods" I do not see how this section can be extended to mean any six or ten or twelve periods; the section says any two periods. If that does not limit it to only two and not more than two I do not know what it means. The right hon. gentleman suggested yesterday that he might amend it to read "any two or more." That might possibly help the situation. I do not think it would improve it much, but it would be better and would carry out what my right hon. friend claims to be the meaning of the section.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have discussed that very point. I am not a lawyer, and yesterday I thought perhaps that might solve the difficulty, though the hon. gentleman said it would not be of any help. After discussing the matter, however, it is pointed out to me that the words "any two such continuous periods" apply to the first and second, fourth and fifth, sixth and seventh or any other two consecutive periods. It applies to them all in equal measure, and I was told that the words I suggested yesterday would not make the provision any broader than it is to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then take the case of the railway shop workers who work fairly steadily for three days a week, but not more. We have their first period of three days put in and registered as continuous unemployment under this section. Next week we have three days more unemployment, and the following week three days more. What I want to get very clearly from the acting Prime Minister is that once those three periods of three days each have elapsed, it is construed that the provision in regard to nine days waiting has been complied with and that in regard to each three day period in each subsequent week, the other statutory provisions having been complied with, the man will be subject to unemployment benefit. Is that the interpretation of the acting Prime Minister?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is the way I understand it. I understand that if a man works three days a week for six weeks his period of unemployment will be figured out as eighteen days; they will all be counted in that way. If he complied with the other provisions of the act then he would be entitled to benefit.

Mr. NEILL: Then why did the leader of the government say, according to Hansard at page 979:

> It appears to me that the situation described this afternoon by the hon. member who has just spoken creates some difficulty. I had not been fully advised that there were cases in which there were lengths of time such as have been mentioned here. The hon. member said that for a period of a year men worked only three days a week.... Under those circumstances I should like to look into that subsection a little farther, because if there is a period as long as a year in which men are employed only half a week, obviously there should be some readjustment of the provisions of the subsection.

That is only one expression; the Prime Minister conveyed the same thought on several occasions. Now we are going to tear that all up; I suppose it is a case of the king is dead; long live the King, but possibly the king may come back—I hope he will—and want to know why his wishes or opinions have been disregarded. Personally I pin my faith to his knowledge of the subject. He was the sponsor of the bill; he has studied the matter deeply; he has admitted that this is a condition that had not been called to his attention, and he says some adjustment is necessary.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say to my hon. friend that the question has been very carefully looked into. My hon. friend suggests that he will be more content when the Prime Minister returns, and I may say that I hope he will return at the earliest possible moment.

Section agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Under protest.

On section 27—Determination of questions by commission.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This section stood in order that it might be redrafted, and I have the amendment here. It is moved by myself, seconded by the Minister of the Interior, that section 27 of the bill as printed be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Determination of Questions

27. (1) If any question arises—

(a) as to whether any employment or any class of employment is or will be such employment as to make the person engaged therein an employed person within the meaning of this act or whether a person is or was an employed person within the meaning of this act; or

(b) whether a person or class of persons is or is not, or was or was not, a person or class of persons to whom a special or supplementary scheme under this act applies or applied; or

(c) as to who is or was the employer of any employed person; or

(d) as to the rate of contribution payable under or in pursuance of this act by or in respect of any person or class of persons or as to the rates of contribution payable in respect of any employed person by the employer and that person respectively; or

(e) whether a person was or was not employed in any excepted employment during any period falling within the period of two years specified in the first statutory condition; the question shall be decided by the commission: Provided that the commission may, if they think fit, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer the question for decision to the exchequer court.

(2) In determining any question as to whether any occupation, in which a person is or has been engaged, is or was such as to make him an employed person within the meaning of this act, regard shall be had to the nature of the work on which he is or was engaged rather than to the business of the person by whom he is or was employed.

(3) The commission may, on new facts being brought to their notice, revise any decision given under this section.

(4) The governor in council may make regulations prescribing the procedure under this section.

I believe that complies with the understanding at which we arrived yesterday. Therefore I move, seconded by Mr. Murphy that the section I have read be substituted for section 27 as printed.

Mr. MacINNIS: In this amendment as suggested by the leader of the government I find there is a provision whereby the commission may, if it thinks fit, instead of themselves deciding a question, refer such question for decision to the exchequer court. Then we find in subsection 3:

The commission may, on new facts being brought to their notice, revise any decision given under this section.

As I understand it, after having referred a matter to the exchequer court the commission may, on new facts being brought to their notice, make a decision themselves. I think it would be much better to have the commission make all decisions, in the first instance, without any reference to the exchequer court.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member is desirous of having all these questions disposed of by the commission. This subsection leaves the matter in the hands of the commission. If the commission thinks it can be helped in a decision by referring a matter to the exchequer court, surely the hon. member would have faith enough in the commission to give them authority to do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No; if it carries it will carry under protest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let it pass.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That would be all right, according to that right hon. gentleman—or who soon will be one. It was under subparagraph (ii), as the bill was printed, that the objection was raised yesterday. The condition still remains whereby the commission may, if they think fit, instead of deciding a question refer such question to the exchequer court. I say they should decide all questions, with the exception of questions of law or of interpretation of the act. Under the suggested amendment they may make the decision, or may refer decisions on all the preceding paragraphs, namely paragraphs (a) (b) (c) (d) and (e), which paragraphs do not include questions of law or questions concerning the interpretation of the act. They are questions upon which the commission could easily make decisions. Yesterday we asked that the clause be amended so that the commission could, if they thought fit, instead of themselves deciding any question of law or interpretation arising out of the act, refer such question for decision to the exchequer court. That was the suggestion made.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I remember that; that is what was said yesterday. The suggestion however is not accepted. We feel the commission are given authority, and that is all that has been asked by those people who represent the workers. By the amendment the matter is left entirely in the hands of the commission. They do not have to refer matters to the exchequer court; they may do as they please, and that is the way we wish to leave it.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Contributions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, there is an incidental amendment I wish to make, seconded by Mr. Murphy. This amendment arises out of the change we have made to section 27. Now that we have done away with an appeal we believe section 17 should be amended by striking out subsection 4. Hon. members will note that this subsection refers to what will happen in the event of a decision being reversed or revised. If there is no further provision for an appeal, then there can be no necessity for subsection 4. With that in mind I move:

That section 17 be amended by deleting subsection 4 and renumbering the following subsections to read 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 33 (1)—Civil proceedings by employee against employer for neglect to comply with the act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This subsection was discussed at great length yesterday and this morning I have had the opportunity to give it some further consideration. My view is that it is the duty of the worker to see that the stamps are put in his book. We do not wish to accept the suggestion made by hon. members to the effect that the state should lose the money in the event of an employer accepting the workman's share and not turning it in to the fund. All these contributions are paid by way of revenue stamps. It is necessary that the workmen should do their share towards seeing that these stamps are put in their books at the proper time. If they do that there can be no chance of loss to the workers.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why do we have the section at all then?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is a fair question. However, if the workman does not see to it that the stamps are put in his book, and the employer fails to pay to the fund, the workman will have the right of civil action against the employer.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe that would not be so in practical operation. In a big steel company, for example, where there are 4,000 or 5,000 employees I believe we will find that the books containing the stamps will be kept by the employer during the time the man works for him.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the smaller fellow?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall come to him later. I believe it would be a practical impossibility for these men to come to the office and insist upon seeing that the stamps are placed in their books.

Mr. NEILL: They would just go once.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, that is true; they would go only once. In big firms that is the way it would be done, and I believe the acting Prime Minister will find that is the way it is done in England, too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe the evidence given before the price spreads committee shows that on many occasions the minimum wage legislation has not been lived up to, and that the employee has not been in a position to enforce it. The employer would simply refuse to give the minimum wage, and there have been all sorts of tricks used to get over the difficulty. In those cases the employee has had to conform to the wishes of the employer, or lose his job. I believe it is unfair to place the onus upon the employee.

Mr. NEILL: It is sometimes said that we are very far removed from the common people. I do not believe that fact could be better illustrated than by the argument now raised by the acting Prime Minister. Picture to yourselves men out in the bush, connected with logging camps, coming in to the office and demanding to see their books to find out if the stamps have been put in. Picture them arguing with the boss and quoting section 33 of the act indicating that they are liable to a loss which they do not purpose suffering. A working man, a logger, is supposed to be familiar with a very complicated section of this act, and we are supposing that he will come into the office and demand his rights. If we could grasp the point of view as to what would happen to that man I believe we would make a change in this section. He is to have the whole responsibility of enforcing a law which has been forced upon him—there is compulsory contribution—and he must line up the boss and say to that gentleman, "I do not believe you put those stamps on my book last week; I want proof." The boss would say, "What! Don't you think my word is good? You ought to be a lawyer. We can get along without you; you know too much about the act. We can get along without your services." In the environment of this chamber it sounds all right to say that it is the duty of the man to see that the stamps are put on, but in actual practice it will be impossible for him to do so—at any rate, if not impossible it will be impracticable. And if he tried to do it he would be a marked man.

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry that the right hon. gentleman who has charge of this bill has not seen fit to make the alterations suggested yesterday in connection with this clause. The general fund out of which the insurance will be ultimately paid is of course provided by the state, the employer and the employee, and it is supposed to be an insurance fund. In the clause before us it is assumed that the workman has paid his share, but that the employer has failed to pay into the fund, in which case the employee is deprived of his insurance, and the only thing that is given to him in return is his right to sue his employer in the courts for neglect of duty. I want to emphasize the point made so strongly yesterday by the hon. member for Bow River and others, that the employee should not be penalized in any way for the default of his employer. If he has paid in his share he should have the right to draw from the fund. If there is any individual who has violated the provisions of the act that individual should be prosecuted by the government itself and it should not be left to the employee to take action.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Workmen's Compensation Act is a practical example of the point under consideration. A good many problems would arise under that act if the responsibility were left to the employee to see that the employer discharged his obligation. That responsibility rests with the board, and I think it will be found when this act gets into practical application that the money for the stamps will be deducted from the pay envelope of the employee. That is the way it is done in Great Britain, and a regulation to that effect will be necessary. If you leave it to all these fellows to chase around getting stamps, a good many of them will not get the stamps.

I have had experience with union dues and I know that all the king's horses and all the king's men will not make them do it. It is absolutely unfair to place the responsibility on the employee of prosecuting the employer if he has not complied with the law. I could understand it if the scheme were voluntary; but where you have a compulsory insurance scheme I think the obligation rests squarely on the shoulders of the government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yesterday, in connection with this section, I suggested an amendment which would have fully covered the objections taken against it. The amendment would be to delete all the words in lines 33 and 34 and up to and including the word "he" in line 35, and inserting therefor the following: This shall not be taken as reason for loss in whole or in part of the unemployment benefit to which he would have been entitled under this part of the act, and the commission shall be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount so lost. That would place the responsibility squarely on the commission and it would do the just thing, the obviously fair thing, in relieving the employee of any possible loss of benefit in whole or in part as might now happen under this provision. There are two serious objections to the clause. Both have been dealt with several times in the committee and frankly I am surprised that the government cannot see the reasonableness of the position we take in this regard. Any possible loss could not be great so far as the commission is concerned, a commission on the job, looking after the trust which is in its hands; and the commission might afford a small loss where the employees could afford no loss at all. I dislike moving the amendment, but if the government does not see fit to propose it I intend to move that amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: In section 17, subsection 3, we find that the employer is responsible for the contributions of the employee:

> Except where regulations under this act otherwise prescribe, the employer shall in the first instance be liable to pay both the contribution payable by himself (in this act referred to as the "employer's contribution") and also, on behalf of the employed person, the contribution payable by that person, and subject to any such regulations shall be entitled to recover from the employed person, by deduction from his wages or otherwise, the amount of the contributions so paid by him on behalf of the employed person.

Here we find that the employer is made responsible for a certain act, and if the employer does not fulfil that function the employee is supposed to take action against him. It is perfectly ridiculous.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. As a matter of fact, this clause is put in partially to protect the employee. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman wishes it thrown out altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is all very well to turn a sharp corner like that—I do not mean that in any derogatory sense. I know of no better protection for the employee than the knowledge on the part of the employer that he would be subject to the law if he did not comply with it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: So he is.

Mr. MITCHELL: But why leave it to the employee to take the necessary action? On page 28 of the bill we have the punishments set out, but as the bill stands we are simply asking the employee to do something that the government itself should do.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the employer misuses the fund he is subject to the penalties. That is one of the reasons the penalties appear in the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is as grave a crime for him not to comply with the act in regard to paying in the contribution. You cannot differentiate between misuses of the funds and failure to make contributions under the act. Take the lumber camps, for instance. How will these chaps run around collecting stamps? It seems to me ridiculous to suggest that the employee should be asked to enforce the law for the government.

Mr. NEILL: The Workmen's Compensation Act as it operates in British Columbia affords a good example. There the procedure is to collect a percentage of the pay roll, and an inspector comes along once or twice a year and checks up the books of the company. He says, "There is so much due from the company." I have known of cases where companies were hundreds and thousands of dollars in arrears. The government gets after them, pointing out that the money should have been paid at the stated time. But it was not paid, and when the slump came it was discovered that the fund created by these payments had been enormously overdrawn because these people had not observed their obligations. In some instances they have gone bankrupt and owed the government thousands of dollars. If we had the sample section as in this bill, some man looking for compensation would be told,

"I am sorry you cannot get compensation because the money was not paid over, although perhaps eventually you may collect it from the employer." The Prime Minister did not agree with me the other day when I gave a parallel instance. If I pay my taxes and the government agent to whom I hand over the money absconds with it, all that is required of me is to produce evidence that I paid it to the official authorized to receive it. The government does not come along and say that because the man to whom I paid the money absconded I shall have to pay it again. The absurdity there is apparent, and the case here is similar, only it is worse, because the man in this instance has not an opportunity to see that the money is sent in. If the workmen went into the office to see about the stamps at the end of each week, and if five or six hundred people came into the office demanding to see the actual stamps placed in the book, they would be called bolsheviks or reds. They would be asked who started it. They might say, "John Jones says that under section 33 we are liable to lose our unemployment insurance." The reply would be that Jones has too much to say and presently he is let out. It sounds all right here to say that it is his obligation, but it is different when you get on the ground. Cases have happened repeatedly under the Workmen's Compensation Act where the employer failed to pay over the money or the company went bankrupt, but the men got their compensation.

Mr. HANBURY: Under the Workmen's Compensation Act in British Columbia the workmen's compensation is recognized as the first charge against the assets of any company in default for any reason. If the company cannot meet its liabilities the workmen's compensation is the first charge, even before deferred wages. Under that act the employee has no responsibility whatsoever and the employer himself collects from the employee certain sums which in turn are handed over to the workmen's compensation board, the board accepting full responsibility for the man's injury. In connection with this particular clause, I am sure that the employer himself would much prefer to have the responsibility of collecting the money and turning it over to the board rather than having to be bothered with his employees coming in and asking for stamps, and having to provide stamps for them, and things of that sort. The government could very well put this insurance on such a basis that it becomes one of the first charges against any company, thus giving the employee the insurance to which he is entitled and which he would not otherwise have. It could not be real insurance if there were any question about it, and on the interpretation the government is placing on the wording in this case, there would be question about it.

Mr. POWER: Following up the argument advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, I would point out that the very essence of the insurance principle is that a number of persons combine together to take the risk. If the risk is to be borne individually, as it appears to be proposed under this bill, there is no longer any insurance, so that that most important element of this whole bill disappears; if there is no insurance, it is no longer an unemployment insurance bill. Insurance in any phase of it implies a number of people dividing up the risk, and when one fails to meet that risk, then the others are called upon to meet it. In this case, all those others are represented by the commission. The commission collects from everyone in order to be able to distribute the benefits, and if I understand this article correctly, the benefits will not be distributed to the insured unless each individual company is in a position to make the payments required under the bill. That destroys every vestige of an insurance principle as contained in this measure. The point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is in my opinion well taken, and the government should clearly state in the bill that the commission should be responsible for the payment of the benefits. The government may make any other provision it wishes as to how the contributions are to be collected; that is not of great importance, but the important point is that the commission should be responsible for the payment of the benefits which are conferred upon the individual workman by the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose we will all agree that the British have had a great deal of experience in connection with unemployment insurance acts. The first one was passed many years ago and has been amended several times. There is now before the British House of Commons a bill consolidating the acts concerning unemployment insurance, and I shall read the following section 19 of that bill:

> Where an employer has failed or neglected—
> (a) to pay any contributions which under this act he is liable to pay in respect of any employed person in his employment; or > (b) to comply, in relation to any such person, with the requirements of any regulations relating to the payment and collection of contributions; and by reason thereof that person has lost, in whole or in part, the benefit to which he would have been entitled under this act, that person shall be entitled to recover summarily from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount of the benefit so lost.

That is a stronger clause than the one we put in. I am reading now from the bill as it is at present before the British house.

Mr. NEILL: It is not passed yet.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But it is a consolidation; it is not a new act.

Mr. REID: In Great Britain does the employee lose his benefits if the employer does not comply with the requirements?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The provision reads that where an employer has failed or neglected to do certain things and by reason thereof the employee has lost in whole or in part the benefit to which he would be entitled under the act, that person shall be entitled to collect from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount of the benefit so lost. We are following the British act in putting in this clause.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In Great Britain they have a very strong trade union movement which alters the situation materially. In this country we have no strong trade union movement, especially in those trades where this legislation would apply, and it would be very difficult for an isolated worker to take action. In England the whole trade union movement would stand behind a victimized worker, and go on a general strike rather than permit an injustice. Here the worker has not that protection, and therefore the state or the commission has a duty to protect the welfare of the individual worker.

Mr. POWER: May I point out without being unkind that at the present time we are legislating for Canada, and in the words of a very great statesman, our concern is Canada.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is quite right, but none of us is above learning from the experience of others. That is true of this side of the house at any rate.

Mr. BURY: May I ask the leader of the house whether the British act has in it any provision enabling the commission to sue employers for contributions in default? In this bill there is nothing of that nature, and what I am afraid of is that in the event of such a default, if the suggestion is made that the commission should sue the defaulting employer, the answer may be: We have no power under this measure to sue him; the only person under it who has power to sue in such case is the workman.

Mr. NEILL: Put in the necessary provision.

Mr. BURY: Yes, but it is not there. I am suggesting that there should be in the bill a provision enabling the commission in such case to sue. If there is no such provision, I am very much afraid the commission will answer that under the legislation they have no power to do so. That provision might be added to subclause 2 of clause 31. After the provision in regard to fine or imprisonment there might be some such clause as this:

And in addition the commission shall be entitled to recover from the employer so in default, as a civil debt the amount of contribution so in default.

I submit that to the leader of the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: The commission has power to sue.

Mr. BURY: Where is that provision?

Mr. MacINNIS: Clause 4, subclause 5:

The commission shall be a body corporate having capacity to contract and to sue and be sued in the name of the commission.

Mr. BURY: That is a very general clause; that may not be sufficient. There is a specific clause in relation to the suing of an employer who is in default; that is the only provision in the bill relating specifically to the suing of an employer in default, and it is one which only gives to the employee the right to sue. I still maintain that such general provision as is contained in subclause 5 of clause 4 is not sufficient for the particular purpose which I mention.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am inclined to agree with the remarks of the last speaker. There should be in the bill a definite, specific and mandatory clause dealing with the point raised. But that is somewhat aside from this particular question. Under subclause 1 of clause 33 there is a distinct admission that the employee will be subject to possible loss in the case of a swindling or defaulting employer. If the acting Prime Minister will turn to page 8 and read subclause 3 of clause 17, he will find this:

The employer shall in the first instance be liable to pay both the contribution payable by himself and also, on behalf of the employed person, the contribution payable by that person, and subject to any such regulations shall be entitled to recover from the employed person, by deduction from his wages or otherwise, the amount of the contributions so paid by him on behalf of the employed person.

In the event of the employer defaulting or failing or neglecting to turn in the payments that he has collected from the employee there is in my opinion no sense in penalizing the employee or in asking him to take suit to recover. That is the responsibility of the commission, not of the employee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have tried to explain that the theory of this legislation is that all these fees or contributions are paid by stamps. These stamps have to be purchased beforehand and affixed to the books and so forth in order to comply with the legislation. Therefore there should not be many such cases arise as are provided for in this clause. The idea of inserting it is to follow the British act giving the employee a chance for an action in the few cases that might arise. I must admit that I have listened for a long time to this debate, and I am interested to hear the views of different members on the subject. I have not close at hand the reference I hoped to have with regard to the application of the British act which is exactly the same. I will try to get it, and if the committee wishes I will leave it for a time and perhaps come back to it again to-day. I want to get the reference from the British act, because if they found it all right in Great Britain—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It does not follow that it would be suitable here.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not say it follows, but it is a strong indication that it is wise.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest that if we are going to follow the British act we shall have to make a great many alterations in this, and it would be of great advantage to the employees if we did.

Mr. MULOCK: It is a question of principle, whether these men who have part of their wages kept back for protection in case of unemployment are to be protected if unemployed. To keep part of a man's wages back and have him deprived of his rights under this bill through the neglect of the commission or through misappropriation of funds—because it is not the employer's money but the money of the employee—does not seem fair at all. I protest against the section in this form. I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think there is a misapprehension as to the purpose of subsection 1 of section 33. The reason for this section, as for the similar section in the British act, is to give an additional remedy to the employee. It does not take anything away from the rights of the commission or otherwise to collect from the employer, but in case the employee suffers by reason of the default of the employer it gives the employee an additional remedy which ought to be there for his benefit and protection. My difficulty is that I am not familiar enough with the act to find the section which casts the onus on the commission to collect the premium.

Mr. HANBURY: Is there one?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is in the British act, and I think there is in this. If there is not one such as subsection 2 of old section 20, which provides a penalty for non-payment, there ought to be. Certainly this subsection is put in for the protection of the employee and should remain in; but it should not be his only protection. I am not sufficiently familiar with the act to say whether it is the only protection or not. I suggest that the section stand for the time being and we will find out whether there is a corresponding provision that I think ought to be in the act for the protection of the employee. But I would leave this subsection in.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think that answers the objection, no matter what may be in the British act. The difficulty in this country, is that once an employee sues his employer he ceases to be an employee; that is the practical difficulty. A man is not allowed to stay once he sues his employer. That provision may be workable in England or some other place where the employer has not the same power to discharge his employee that he has in this country, but here it is an absolutely impossible provision, it never will work. The remedy is not worth anything.

Mr. MITCHELL: This afternoon we amended section 27 dealing with the court; that section I imagine was taken from the British act. In analyzing it we found that there were serious objections to it here. Now this comes to the courts again. I see this serious difficulty: assume that the workman has lost, say, $30, he will probably have to pay $50 or $60 or $100 to collect that $30 in the courts.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If he has Sommerville to act for him it will cost him more than that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Great Britain is a compact country, but in Canada we are dealing with half a continent. I do not know any situation in Great Britain that would be similar to that of a man in a logging or a mining camp in British Columbia, or to activities carried on in out of the way places while probably the bookkeeping is at some central point. To ask an employee to go from a camp in northern British Columbia to Vancouver to see that a stamp is stuck in a book every week would be ridiculous.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman, but I have not the reference to the British act, so I suggest that this clause stand, and if the committee rises I shall hope to take up this section again later to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the committee rises I want to point out that in my opinion this clause in certain aspects should be unnecessary and should not be here at all. This does imply the possibility of loss to the employee after he has complied with the provisions of the act, has actually made his contribution, or it has been deducted from his wages. In such case I object to his being held liable for any loss, or it being incumbent upon him to take suit to recover. In this act we are setting up a commission to handle a trust fund, contributions being made to it by the employer, the employee and the state. If there is a failure on the part of any of those to make the contributions called for it should be the duty of the commission to see to it, not the obligation of the employee. And the employee under no circumstances should suffer any loss of benefit.

I wish to put on record a proposal that I have written out to deal with that aspect, in the hope that the government will take it into consideration. I suggest that that clause should read:

> Where an employer has failed or neglected to pay any contributions which under this part of this act he is liable to pay in respect of any employed person in his employment, or has failed or neglected to comply, in relation to any such person, with the requirements of any regulations relating to the payment and collection of contributions, this failure on the part of an employer shall not be taken as reason for loss in whole or in part of the unemployment benefit to which the employee would have been entitled under this part of the act, and the commission shall be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount so lost.

In my humble judgment that is the way that clause should read if it is to do justice to the act and to the employee.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

Mr. PETTIT: I think we are losing sight of the fact that the working man is being paid out of a fund, and he will be paid what he is entitled to notwithstanding any default of the employer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman has not read the act.

Mr. PETTIT: This is merely an additional remedy.

Mr. HANBURY: If the hon. gentleman can prove what he says it will end the argument.

Mr. PETTIT: But I agree with the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) that the employee should not be obliged to take action, it should be up to the commission.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): This section stands for the present.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I wonder if I might make a suggestion before the debate is concluded? It seems to me that the government are right in insisting that the right of the employee to sue for the recovery of any benefit that he might lose ought to be retained. And I believe that the opposition are right in claiming that the onus of recovery ought to lie with the commission. I think the act could be very easily amended to meet both these points if in line 35 the words "the commission" were substituted for the word "he." It would then read:

> the commission shall be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount of the unemployment benefit so lost.

And then add these words:

> and in the event of the commission refusing to exercise such right it shall be the right of the employee to sue for the recovery of such sum.

That casts the onus on the commission to collect the amount, and if the commission refuses it still gives the employee the right to use the courts to see that the act is properly administered by the commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before it stands I would like to point out that under section 18 the governor in council is authorized to provide for this very matter by regulation. So far as I can see it is not in the bill otherwise, but subsection 2 of section 18 provides:

> Subject to the provisions of this part, the commission may make regulations providing for any matters relating to the payment and collection of contributions—

The whole purposes of the act is that the commission shall collect the contributions and have power to enforce them. We are trying to arrive at a fair and equitable conclusion; I want to make the act as workable as possible, though I have not given much consideration to it up to the present. Subsection 2 of section 18 does give the governor in council authority to provide by regulation all that hon. gentlemen are asking for.

Mr. MITCHELL: All but the payment of benefits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, all but the payment of benefits. In subsection 1 of section 33 there is an additional protection for the employee; without question that is the intention of that section of the statute. I agree that probably it will not be very useful, but it is an additional protection and that is why it is put in. But that does not put the onus on him in the first instance to collect the contributions; undoubtedly that onus is on the commission and if it is not there the whole thing ought to be revamped. I do suggest, however, that it is there under subsection 2 of section 18. It may be done by regulation; that regulation may be changed from time to time. It is flexible, and probably that is the best way to do it. No doubt that is what the draftsman had in mind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if this does not contemplate the possible loss of benefits to the employee, through no fault of his own?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Further than that subsection 2 of section 18 deals solely with the question of payments. It reads:

> Subject to the provisions of this part, the commission may make regulations providing for any matters relating to the payment and collection of contributions payable under this act—

That is the manner in which they shall be paid and collected. It does not do away with the difficulty we have raised, of the threatened loss of benefit to the employee in the event of a default on the part of the employer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it is a little wider than that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not want to say so, nor do I want to delay the passing of the act, but I think perhaps we are taking an undue amount of time in connection with this matter. I should like to point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there might be something in his argument if the act were other than it actually is. With the act as it is, with subsection 1 of section 33 imposing upon the employee the obligation to sue his employer as the proper procedure, then I submit to my hon. friend there cannot be anything in the general power given in a previous section. Here is a particular power given to the employee to sue, a particular obligation cast upon him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not an obligation; it is a permissive right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. That is his remedy. That being the fact the general provision to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has referred will not be helpful at all.

I think hon. members are losing sight of the fact that a fund is established under the bill from contributions by the employer, employee and the state as set out in section 17, out of which the employee is to be paid his benefits.

Mr. PETTIT: If we look at subsection 3 of section 17 we will observe that the employer is given the right to sue the employee in case of default. In subsection 1 of section 33 the employee is given the corresponding right against the employer in case of default on the part of the employer. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that the remedy given the employee in section 33 is additional protection for him, for the commission has the right and duty to collect and to sue and be sued.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It would not make for a very happy relationship in either event.

Mr. PETTIT: I agree, but it is a corresponding duty. Whether an additional remedy or not I think with other hon. members that the commission should be the one to take action against the employer and not the employee in case of any default on the part of the employer.

Section stands.

On section 38, subsection (i)—Penalties.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition raised some objection to this subsection, and I have heard him make the same argument in this house in regard to other matters. The right hon. gentleman suggested that no penalties should be prescribed except under the criminal code. I ventured to state yesterday that I thought acts containing similar clauses had been passed while the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister. He challenged me to name one and I was unable to do so yerterday because I had not the papers before me. I have made some inquiries, however, and I find that in 1927 an act was passed which contained the following provision:

> Any by-law of the commission may impose penalties not exceeding fifty dollars, recoverable upon summary conviction, for the infraction of its provisions, and may provide for the imprisonment of offenders in default of payment of such penalties for any term not exceeding two months.

That is subsection 2 of section 4 of the Federal District Commission Act, assented to April 14, 1927.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is in default of payment of such fine.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I quite agree, and I suggested to the right hon. gentleman yesterday that if it would suit him I would insert those words, but he said that would not alter it, and that he did not want any penalties imposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Then in an act providing for the regulation of vehicular traffic on dominion property, assented to May 30, 1930, the governor in council was authorized to make regulations which, among other things might—

(g) Prescribe the penalties to be incurred for the breach of any regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the governor in council; a different body from a commission.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: None of these regulations of the commission have any validity until they have been agreed to by the governor in council. It is the same thing exactly; the governor in council must accept the regulations or they have no force at all. Then I have another act, rather similar to the one under consideration. Yesterday the right hon. gentleman spoke about social legislation, and I think the act regarding old age pensions was one of his pets, as I remember it. That act was assented to March 31, 1927, and it includes these words:

(q) The penalties to be imposed for breaches of the regulations, such penalties not to exceed a fine of fifty dollars or imprisonment for three months, or both fine and imprisonment.

That is exactly the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was laid down by this parliament.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: And parliament is laying down this commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. My right hon. friend does not see my point yet. I am not complaining about there being penalties attached to the violation of the provisions of statutes, but I am saying that this parliament is the body to say what the penalties shall be. What I am taking exception to is the government giving to a commission here and a commission there, to a board here and a board there, the right to define new offences which are punishable by imprisonment, thereby making it impossible for any citizen to know at any given time for what particular offence he is liable to go to jail. Let the government prescribe any penalties they think proper with regard to legislation, but let this parliament say what the offence so punishable is to be, and not some body that may be appointed by this parliament.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In the first act to which I referred it was the federal district commission that was given the power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that is a parallel case. The matter of looking after government property is a very different thing from social legislation of this kind which has to do with workingmen, the payment of their dues and their behaviour before a commission.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: These penalties cannot be fixed by regulation except by authority of the governor in council. That is the provision in this act, and I submit to the right hon. gentleman that it is very much in line with the other acts to which I have referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then my right hon. friend intends to keep the section as it is? I have nothing more to say except that I think he is making a mistake, but it will not be the first mistake that has been made by this government.

Section agreed to on division.

On the first schedule.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yesterday I suggested an amendment to this schedule, and I do not think the amendment was passed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): No, it was not passed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Then perhaps the committee would agree to pass it now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The acting Prime Minister promised yesterday that he would make a statement in this connection.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes; I have the statement here, with regard to excepted occupations. This is a memorandum prepared by Mr. A. D. Watson, chief actuary of the department of Insurance, and Mr. M. C. Maclean, of the bureau of statistics:

Excepted Employments

Stated in general terms, unemployment insurance can only be satisfactorily extended to persons in employments where there is a material degree of unemployment and where the employment is carried on at such places and under such conditions that is it reasonably practicable to adapt a scheme of unemployment insurance with real advantage to the persons insured.

It is rather difficult to know in advance of actual contact with the problems of unemployment in many occupations, especially in a country such as Canada, just how far it may be practicable to go on the start. It is best, however, that the initial difficulties of getting a scheme set up should not be accentuated by bringing in employments which will result in very special problems before the machinery and technique of administration are sufficiently devoloped. A glance at the employments covered by the British scheme of 1911 makes it possible to get a concrete notion of the characteristics of any employment which is fairly easily insurable.

The British scheme of 1911 applied to all manual workers over 16 years of age in the following trades; mechanical engineering, iron-founding, shipbuilding, construction of vehicles, sawmilling and machine woodwork when carried on in connection with an insured trade or of a kind commonly conducted in connection with such a trade, and construction of such works as railroads, docks, harbours, etc. The workers insured numbered about 2,500,000 in the whole of the United Kingdom.

It will be noted that in all employments of the above classes there would generally be—

(i) a more or less fixed place of employment;

(ii) no persons in the occupation working on their own account or on shares;

(iii) a substantial number of workers to one employer;

(iv) a concentration of workers and that not usually in remote places; and

(v) no very marked seasonal fluctuations in work.

Having regard for the administrative machinery of the bill, it will be seen how important these characteristics of employments are. The whole administration centres about the employment office or branch. It is at the employment office that an insured person gets his unemployment book when entering insurable employment and he returns his unemployment book there as soon as he is out of work. While unemployed he will in general be required to register from time to time at the employment office; it is there he will look for information concerning work; and it is there that he will receive the payments of his insurance benefit. There is necessarily a limit to the number of employment offices and branches which can be established, and to be of service insured persons must be relatively near an office.

Furthermore, a measure such as we have in this bill must be enforced both with respect to employers of labour and with respect to employees. There must be no evasion of the requirements of the scheme by either employers or employees. To this end an elaborate inspectional service will be necessary. Inspectors must know where employment is supposed to be carried on, and if the area covered should be too great relatively to the number employed the cost would be prohibitive. In this connection reference may be made to section 34 to get a picture of what will be necessary by way of inspection to see that the act is being properly complied with, and with that picture in mind an examination of excepted employments very generally will show the difficulties of administration which would be encountered from this point of view alone.

Again, some occupations are so highly seasonal, especially in some parts of the country, that if workers therein were insured they would have little or no opportunity to qualify for insurance and obtain unemployment benefit within the normal season.

It was not until 1916 that any enlargement of insurable employment was made in Britain. In that year munition workers and allied trades which would be adversely affected by the termination of the war were brought under the scheme. But it was not until 1920 that the application of the scheme was made fairly general to all wage-earners except persons employed in agriculture, horticulture, forestry, private domestic service and numerous specified employments some of them of a miscellaneous character.

Thus it was only after nine years of experience that the scheme was made about as comprehensive in its scope as the scheme of the bill before the house. By availing ourselves of the experience gained in Britain over the past twenty-four years, it is believed that in Canada it is not a greater experiment than undertaken in Britain in 1911 to start with a scheme about as extensive in its scope as now in operation over there. Likewise, it is believed that it would not be wise to attempt at the beginning to out-run British experience.

In particular, it may be noted that agriculture, including horticulture and forestry, are not yet included in the scheme in Britain. In January of this year the unemployment insurance statutory committee made a report on a scheme of insurance for agriculture. It is clear from that report that new and serious difficulties will be confronted in the administration of such a scheme as recommended. The conditions of wage earners in agriculture in Canada differ so fundamentally from conditions in England that there is no prospect that a similar scheme would be appropriate here. Conditions vary widely in agriculture in different parts of Canada and employment is far more seasonal in some parts than in others. It is in fact only after a most careful survey of the whole Canadian field that a scheme can be devised to meet the needs of agricultural workers. For this provision has been made in section 7 of the bill.

Having dealt at some length with the underlying conditions which make unemployment insurance a practical proposition, and with the difficulties inherent in insuring agriculture, it will perhaps be clear enough the insurance of employment in fishing and logging will require careful and mature consideration. It would be a disservice to persons working in these occupations to bring them under a scheme of insurance almost certainly unsuited to their needs. The seasonal difficulties, especially in certain parts of the country, are most serious.

The insurance of stevedores has given rise to more intractable problems in England than any other class of insured employment. It is intended that the needs of these workers should also be carefully studied before they are either brought under the general scheme or a special scheme. It should be clear that any scheme applied to them or to any other class of workers will on the whole be for their advantage before being made effective.

Coming now to employment in banking and insurance, which employments are also excluded, it is to be noted that even through this long depression banks and insurance companies have not found reductions in staff necessary. By refraining from making new appointments, the natural decreases in staff through retirements, death, marriage of females, and so on, it has generally not been found necessary to decrease staff on account of reduction of work arising out of the depression. It would therefore appear that insurance for such employment would be somewhat analogous to insurance for a fireproof building; the contributions would be required without any material benefit in return.

If in the light of what has been already said, the other excepted employments are considered with care, it will be found that they have been excluded on sound grounds.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is a most unsatisfactory statement. It may be all very well from a purely actuarial standpoint, and it may be satisfactory from the point of view that the government does not desire to involve itself in any obligations. It is highly unsatisfactory however from the standpoint of providing for the needs of the unemployed workers. I believe it is fair and reasonable at this point to recall the circumstances under which the unemployment insurance legislation was brought down. We were practically informed that the government was about to bring in a splendid scheme which to a large extent would solve the problem of unemployment among the workers. I am sure it was a shock to the entire country when the Prime Minister upon introducing this legislation stated it would not touch the needs of any men or women now unemployed.

For me it is an equally great shock to find a large number of excepted classes, thereby rendering the legislation of very little service to those who most need it.

Mr. NEILL: The excepted classes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. We are told the legislation is based upon the report of actuaries. The report is not based upon the conditions found in Canada, but it is based primarily upon—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Theory.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, not theory. It is based primarily upon the original tentative legislation as adopted in Great Britain in 1911.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, no.

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. ARTHURS: And experience since that time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. Had it been based upon experience since that time it would be modified and there would be fewer excepted classes. We go back to the tentative legislation introduced in Great Britain twenty-five years ago. We ignore absolutely the experience of Great Britain in those twenty-five years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is too steep.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is going a little too far.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the acting Prime Minister, in the very memorandum he read to us, has shown that it was not wise for us in Canada to modify and amend the legislation as it has been modified and amended in Great Britain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That it was not wise to bring it up to date.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the hon. member excuse me, while I read part of that which I read previously:

> By availing ourselves of the experience gained in Britain over the past twenty-four years, it is believed that in Canada it is not a greater experiment than undertaken in Britain in 1911 to start with a scheme about as extensive in its scope as now in operation over there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; it was a perfectly absurd statement for the hon. member to make.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the acting Prime Minister mean to say that our legislation as it appears before us is almost as extensive as the British legislation?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is what the memorandum says.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then it is very far from being in accordance with the facts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe I am right, but if I am wrong I am subject to correction. I state the legislation we have before us to-day is based to a great extent on the original tentative legislation of Great Britain in 1911.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With regard to the exceptions, yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; of course, we have introduced legal matters, and so on, to bring it up to date, but with regard to the point under discussion we are back where Great Britain was twenty-five years ago. We are accepting what to them was tentative legislation. In 1916 Great Britain, faced with a serious unemployment crisis, broadened her legislation. Again, in 1920, nearly all the workers with the exception of those engaged in agriculture were brought within the scope of the legislation. Now they are bringing in even those agricultural workers. That is the development which has taken place in Great Britain in the last twenty-five years. But in this country we seem to be satisfied with the first faltering steps Great Britain took. We disregard the experience she has had in these past twenty-five years. While as regards social legislation we may be twenty-five years behind Great Britain, I do not think we are twenty-five years behind her so far as social conditions are concerned. We have just as much need for advanced legislation as has Great Britain.

I would point out, further, that the memorandum read by the acting Prime Minister calls special attention to the differences between conditions in Canada and those in Great Britain. We have greater irregularity in our labour; we have certain seasonal fluctuations; our workers live long distances from public offices. I recognize that these are difficulties. Of course, it would be a great deal easier if we lived in a small compact island. It would be a great deal easier if the greater part of our population were engaged in industrial work. It would be a great deal easier if we had a more equable climate. It would be a great deal easier if we had not the divisions of the nine provinces. It would be a great deal easier if our workers lived in the cities instead of on the far flung frontiers. But then we are not dealing with a situation of that sort; we are dealing with Canada as it is, a Canada in which a great part of the population is still engaged in agriculture and the other primary industries and is likely to be so engaged for a good many years to come. We are dealing with a country that extends between three and four thousand miles; a country in which there are these various provincial difficulties; a country in which the workers are scattered in construction camps, logging camps, mining camps, in the most remote districts. I submit therefore that this legislation should not be brought down to suit conditions as they existed in England twenty-five years ago but to suit conditions in Canada in this year, 1935; and any legislation that does not do that is hardly worth the paper it is written on.

I do not want to go into all the details of these excepted employments, but I would urge the necessity for dealing with those engaged in agricultural work. We have had in the past a very large army who were engaged part of the time in our cities and part of the time in rural work. In fact, I do not know how we could have managed in the past to harvest our crops in the west unless we had had the assistance of large numbers who were for part of the time engaged in logging or construction work or farm work in other areas. Hon. members will recall the excursions we used to have from east to west, but as a result of combines and other machinery, that has not been quite so necessary in recent years. But we still have large numbers who are engaged for part of the time in other work and part of the time in agriculture, and any scheme of unemployment insurance which is to be at all adequate should look after this class of people, and should seek to dovetail one occupation into the other. I do urge that we shall not begin to solve the problem which ought to come within the scope of an unemployment insurance scheme until we look after these people who at least part of the time are engaged in agricultural or horticultural or forestry operation.

I come now to fishing. Admittedly the situation differs widely on the west coast from the situation which we find in the east or in some of the lake districts in the central part of the country. Here again there is great necessity for some provision to be made during off season for those engaged in fishing. It is not always the same kind of fishing; one group of men are engaged in one type of fishing at one season and in another type of fishing in another season. And some are engaged in fishing for part of the year and during another part of the year in the tillage of their own soil. Surely this class of people should be cared for. We have already had a slight enlargement of the scope of the act with regard to lumbering and logging. I do not think I need remind the committee that the conditions vary very greatly in British Columbia from those that prevail in the northern sections of the central provinces and again from those in the maritimes. But logging is one of the primary industries of the country; in the past it has been one of the outlets for the unemployed during a part of the year. It seems to me that anything like a proper scheme of unemployment insurance, adequate to meet the needs of the country, ought to look after all those engaged in that great primary industry.

I will not discuss in detail the occupations of hunting and trapping. These may present a greater difficulty because of the character of the occupation; but certainly hunting and trapping—and I would include prospecting—ought to come within the purview of the unemployment insurance commission. Then there is transportation. We have very large numbers of people engaged in transportation by water in our ports both east and west. Above the main door of this building we find this reference to the sea:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates
> Her gates both east and west.

But so far as this legislation is concerned we are excluding the people that go down to the sea in ships; we are excluding them almost entirely from the scope of our legislation. I would like to refer particularly to stevedoring. Undoubtedly there was a great deal of difficulty with this class of work in England, but they did manage to a large extent to regularize it. It is different with us, because all our ports are not deep water ports. In Montreal the workers are engaged in stevedoring for part of the year and during the other part of the year they find other occupations. A commission charged with the functions which this commission will perform ought to take into their cognizance the whole of the stevedoring business and seek to dovetail one occupation into another. Otherwise what will these people do? Are they to be on public charity for a part of the year—and this through no fault of their own? I think it is absurd. In the deep water ports, where the regular steamers ply, we might succeed largely in regularizing the stevedoring occupation. As it is to-day, however, it is casual work that attracts the unemployed from other parts of the country, and unless the situation is dealt with there will be trouble in the days to come.

I am not at all convinced by what the memorandum states with regard to those engaged in the banking, mortgage, loan, trust, insurance and other financial businesses. What does this memorandum say? It says that owing to the peculiar conditions of the last few years a great many of these people have had to be turned off and that we have pretty nearly reached rock botton, or something of that kind. But that is no reason why those engaged in these occupations to-day should not be looked after. We were told in the earlier part of the memorandum that the underlying principle was that there must be some material degree of employment, regularity of employment. Surely bank clerks and those engaged in insurance companies ought to come under that head. I cannot see, according to the very principles enunciated in the memorandum itself, why these should not be included. Then we come to unemployment in domestic service, where the unemployed person was employed in clubs or in any business carried on for purposes of gain. Again, the same thing applies. Why should people in domestic service not have some protection? I ask the acting Prime Minister why he has not followed the British lead in this regard, whether he would take the trouble before this is passed to study the British act and find out what are its provisions, according to its latest amendment, and adopt these provisions in that regard just as much as in regard to the other clause we were discussing a few minutes ago. The same with respect to professional nurses and probationers training in the hospitals, and teachers of all kinds. Why should not these come under an unemployment insurance scheme? A great many of them have no unemployment insurance schemes of their own. And why not include many of our civil servants who do not come under the superannuation act and hence cannot get any benefit therefrom? Why should not these classes in our community come under the scheme? I can understand that if the scheme is to be on a purely actuarial basis there may have to be a gradation in payments. In fact, I am not at all sure that a flat rate is a fair way of collecting, because there are some who are receiving a comparatively high income and some a very low income. Why should they all have to pay a flat rate? I cannot see the justice of that. If it is to be a pure insurance scheme, the benefits ought to be in proportion to the amounts paid in. We were told yesterday that we ought to be willing to be our brother's keeper. If we are to go on the principle not of an absolutely sound insurance scheme but rather on the more general altruistic basis of the strong sharing the burdens of the weak, why do we not include in this scheme the poorly paid classes in the community or those who are more frequently out of work? In this connection I might as well read to the committee a statement which I promised to submit—a statement received a few days ago from the executive board of the All Canadian Congress of Labour. They are urging that the bill be amended in two important respects:

> First, it is submitted that the rate of contributions provided in the bill as introduced is beyond the means of workers receiving low wages and that the graduation according to age and sex should be replaced by a scale of contributions according to earnings.
> Comparison may be made between the case of a woman earning, say, $125 a month in a railway office and that of a railwayman, who, through demotion due to staff reduction, is earning only $45 a month in full-time employment. It is felt that the requirement to pay a dollar or more per month out of wages which may be as low as from $45 to $75 a month will inflict a real hardship on many workers; it is certain that it will place beyond their reach the protection which they might secure by membership in a labour union, by rendering it impossible for them to pay union dues.

Second, it is submitted that the qualifying period for benefit under the unemployment insurance provisions of the bill should be reduced from forty to twenty-six weeks, at least at the inception of the scheme, in order to make the benefits available without unreasonable delay. Should this change disturb the actuarial basis of the scheme it is felt that the present stressful conditions would warrant temporarily a larger measure of assistance for the fund from the public treasury, it being recognized that such additional assistance would be largely compensated by the reduction in the cost of relieving destitution.

It is not my purpose at this point unduly to labour these arguments, but I wish to put before the committee the seriousness of limiting the scheme as the government has done. Had the expectation of the workers not been so buoyed up, the situation would not perhaps have been so bad. When I was a boy, we used to keep hens and when we heard a great cackling in the henyard, we went out feeling quite sure there was an egg laid. In this case there was a tremendous cackling long before the egg was laid. Now when we come to look for the egg, it is such a tiny peewee of an egg, we hardly know whether it is worth anything or not. In all seriousness, I presume the government is in earnest in bringing down a bill which will help the situation in Canada, but if in our act we adopt a twenty-five year old model, that does not begin to touch the situation which actually faces us. I repeat we ought to face not the situation which they faced in England long before the war, but that which faces us to-day in the post-war period. We should recognize the very serious depression with which we are and may be confronted for a good many years to come.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not claiming that this bill embraces as much as does the present British act, but the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in claiming that this bill goes no further than the original British act that was passed as far back as 1911. A memorandum I have states that it was only after nine years of experience that the British scheme was made about as comprehensive in its scope as is the bill at present before our house. In other words they started quietly and by experience they learned and made changes in their act. That is what we are doing to-day. This bill is brought in for the purpose of covering as many of the people of this country as possible, but it is not final; it is not supposed to be a measure that will not be amended to advantage by succeeding parliaments. I hope it will be so amended; we want to make it as effective as possible, and if the hon. gentleman thinks no egg was laid, he ought to get his glasses enlarged so that he may have a better chance of understanding the matter. He has overlooked also the clause in the bill giving authority to the commission to consider matters of this kind, that is the question of excepted employees. Clause 7 reads:

> In addition to the powers and duties of the commission as otherwise provided by this act, the commission shall, as soon as practicable after appointment, undertake investigations for the purpose of making proposals to the governor in council for—
> (a) providing unemployment insurance for the employments excepted from the operation of part III of this act, or for any of them, either by extending thereto the provisions of that part, with such modifications, if any, as may be found necessary, or by special or supplementary schemes.

In other words, it is definitely contemplated in this bill that it is not a final measure and that the commission shall look into any questions which may be raised regarding excepted types of workers and make recommendations to the governor in council, so that when parliament meets again, this bill may be amended if it is found advisable to do so, or if there is any way in which it can be improved. The hon. gentleman, very wisely, voted for the second reading of this bill which is a good one. It may not go so far as he would like, but at all events it is the beginning of a first class piece of legislation which is for the good of the country. I think he makes a mistake in criticizing so strongly the fact that we are not trying to go too far at the beginning, but want to make our way with certainty as will be done under this bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to make a few comments on the remarks made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I certainly do not like his attitude in the way of making a vigorous endeavour to belittle this bill. I have spoken to a great number of foremen and workmen in industry with whom I am acquainted, and he is not voicing the opinion of the ordinary workingman in reference to this measure. Their endorsation of all its clauses may not be one hundred per cent, but in general the average employee in industry—I cannot speak for those outside it, but I can say something for those inside it—endorses the present legislation.

The hon. member made some comparison of the number covered by the present bill with those covered by the act adopted in Great Britain in 1911. I do not think such a comparison is at all fair. The hon. member knows very well that the 1911 British act covered about 2,225,000 to 2,250,000 out of 15,000,000 employees. The present Canadian bill covers 1,701,834 out of less than 3,500,000 employees. In that particular I maintain the present Canadian bill, which I quite agree might be amended as time goes on, compares very favourably with the first British act of 1911. My hon. friend therefore is entirely wrong if he intimates that the number covered by the present Canadian bill is not much greater in percentage than that covered by the first British act of 1911. The Canadian bill covers a little over fifty per cent of all those employed in this country to-day, whereas the British act of 1911 covered as I said a moment ago, about 2,225,000 out of 15,000,000 workers.

The hon. member also said something about a flat rate of contribution. A flat rate may have some merit or demerit, but so far as I can ascertain only two countries to-day have a sliding or percentage rate based on wages. Those countries are Germany and Poland, in which two countries the rate is made by a percentage of the wages. For instance, in Germany the employer pays three and a quarter per cent and the worker pays three and a quarter per cent on wages. In Poland the employer pays one and a half per cent and the employee pays one-half of one per cent. In other countries with contributory insurance schemes, for instance, Queensland, Austria, Bulgaria, Italy and Great Britain, the rate is a flat rate as is proposed in the bill for Canada. The rate is not the same in the countries I mention, but it is after the manner of the Canadian rate. Therefore the contributions proposed in the Canadian law conform to those of the nine states which have compulsory contributory unemployment insurance excepting Germany and Poland.

Just toward the close of my hon. friend's remarks, he said something about the present bill being comparable to a very tiny egg. The hon. gentleman is wrong in that. Workers in industry in making comparison of the scope of the Canadian bill with that of the bills of other countries find that the proposals made in our legislation compare very favourably with the best schemes in the other countries, and the two best are those in Great Britain and Germany. And further, to the British act, adopted in 1911, there have been twenty-five or thirty major amendments since, as well as minor revisions, and I believe there is a bill before the British house now either adding to or amending the act. I feel that this present bill is a good start. It may not be all we want, it may not be all that is hoped for, but as time goes on we shall watch its operations. I shall do so very closely, and if in my contact with industry and managers and foremen and employees I see that it can be improved, I shall gladly support any necessary amendment in the future. But I feel that the hon. member who claims to represent labour should not take the vigorous attitude he does against this act. What the workingman wants to-day is to get the bill enacted, so that the 1,700,000 odd whom it embraces may sooner have an opportunity to participate in its benefits in the event of their being unfortunate enough to be laid off. I would like to see the hon. member take a different stand and support as strongly as he has recently denounced what certainly will result in a very great benefit to the 1,700,000 people employed in industry and over vocations covered by this measure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest, that I am at this time speaking particularly of those who are excepted under the act. The merits of the act itself I am not discussing at the moment, but I am urging that its scope must be extended if it is to be at all adequate to the actual needs that now exist. With regard to the figures given by the hon. member, may I venture to read a paragraph from a document, which I think members of the house have received, issued by the board of governors of the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare. It is dated February 27, 1935, and is entitled:

A national relief plan, an urgent need.

With regard to unemployment insurance it says:

The proposed measure necessarily excludes, in its present stage, the seasonal and casual employments subject to heavy lay-offs—an estimated number of 860,000 wage workers. In addition, however, to this group and the 1,700,000 eligible for insurance, it should be recalled that Canada has roughly 1,350,000 more persons gainfully occupied—employers, merchants, workers on their own in industry, agriculture, business and the professions, not at all contemplated as insurable. Of these, 728,000 are farmers. Thus 1,700,000 of the gainfully occupied population will be eligible for insurance, and a total of 2,260,000 not covered by any such measure. This means that social assistance for dependents in this great group must be provided indefinitely through other funds and methods than state insurance.

I am pleading that instead of leaving these people on the dole they should be included in an unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): From the document read a little time ago by the acting Prime Minister it would seem that this government in drawing up its present bill had accepted, as far as the British act is concerned, rather the restrictive and conservative aspects than the more up to date clauses. I could submit particulars to the acting Prime Minister, and probably will do so at the proper time, but I have already directed attention to some of the anomalies of the bill, such as the differences as to days of benefit and the number of contributions to be made. But in my view, there is one difference that stands out above all others, and reflects very seriously on this administration. Before the bill goes to third reading I should like to have a statement from the acting Prime Minister as to why the same privilege was not extended under this bill to disabled ex-service men that is extended under the British act. If the acting Prime Minister has read the British act he will realize that under it a person who during two years is in receipt of pension in respect of disability contracted during the late war is able to draw benefits after he has made only ten contributions, instead of the thirty provided for in the case of others. Frankly I regard that oversight, if it be that—I am putting the kindest possible interpretation on it—as an extremely serious one. I think after the reminder,—shall we call it?—that we had last night at the theatre, to which most members of the committee went, of the tragic sufferings that the boys endured over there, we should recognize in all measures, and particularly a measure such as this, a special obligation to them. I am certain that the government must have overlooked this, and I ask the acting Prime Minister to take it into consideration before the bill comes up for third reading. I would like to have the same privilege granted to ex-service men in Canada suffering from disability that is granted in Great Britain.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is no one in this house who has a greater sympathy for the ex-service men than I have. I was in England and in France a great deal during the war, and though a non-combatant I think I know more about the sufferings they endured than most men. But this bill is not intended for the benefit of ex-service men, as I understand. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that we are treating the ex-service men in Canada a great deal better in the matter of pensions than they are in the old country; and I am glad we are. We are also looking after them in other ways through the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And war veterans' allowances.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: So I submit that, while I am sure I have as much sympathy with the ex-service men as the hon. member who has just spoken can possibly have, this bill is not intended for the purpose of looking after them; we are doing that in other ways.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the acting Prime Minister about that class of ex-service men who are not disabled but are thrown on the labour market at this time of great unemployment? They are not receiving the help that disabled ex-service men receive, and on the other hand they do not come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GERSHAW: I was very glad to hear the acting Prime Minister say that railway men who work only three days a week will come under this act and get unemployment insurance. I would like to mention also that I have had several communications from municipal employees, saying that they desire to come under this act. They have no group insurance or retirement plans of any kind. Their salaries are usually too small for them to save much, and I have been asked to mention at this time that many of them are desirous of coming under the act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think they come under the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they are excepted. See page 32.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is true. Well, I think that would be a matter for the commission to take up under the clause we were considering a few moments ago. This bill is only a first attempt to do a good thing, and we do not think for a moment that it is final. The commission will have to consider all these cases.

Amendment agreed to.

First schedule as amended agreed to.

On the second schedule—Weekly rates of contribution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask why the discrimination is made between men and women?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are the same under the British act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am asking the question in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman. There is a discrimination here in the amounts to be asked for from the women and also in the benefits to be paid. I ask the reason for the discrimination. We were told that this legislation is being introduced in order that we may implement the promises made under the treaty of Versailles, but under that treaty we were told there should not be discrimination according to sex. I ask why this discrimination is introduced here.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry that I cannot agree with the word discrimination, but as a matter of fact we all know that the remunerations paid women are not as large as those paid men, and they are not as well able to make contributions as the men are. Therefore they are called upon to make smaller contributions and they receive smaller benefits.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it not true that, as in the memorandum I read a few moments ago, to-day a good many women are receiving more than certain groups of men?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but those are the exceptions. We must go by the general average.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I admit that those are exceptions, but a flat rate is being charged all men even though there are very great variations in the amounts being received, so I cannot see that that principle applies in the matter of discriminating between men and women. Then on the other hand I take it that these amounts are supposed to be equal to the needs of the people, and I submit that when it comes down almost to relief—because that is practically what it amounts to—a woman requires just as much on which to live as a man requires. I do not see how a woman can be expected to live on less, and I do not believe there should be any discrimination of this kind.

Second schedule agreed to.

On the third schedule—Rates of unemployment benefit.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to ask the acting Prime Minister what is the basis of this schedule. There is a daily rate and a weekly rate. Let us take a man working a five day and forty hour week, as many are working at the present time; would he be paid on a weekly basis of $6 a week or $5 a week?

[Mr I. A. Mackenzie.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If he has complied with all the provisions of the act he will receive $6 a week when he is unemployed. Surely there can be no question about that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take the case of the miners who work twenty-four hours a week, while other trades work forty hours a week. Do I understand that their week will be considered a six day week notwithstanding the fact that they work a five day week? There is a differentiation in the schedule.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want an understanding; I want a definite reply.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is the way I read it; that is what it says:

Mr. MacINNIS: I have given some little thought to this matter, and I have come to the conclusion that the weekly rate is paid for a week's time, and that where there are odd days the amounts for those days would be as stated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is it exactly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask the acting Prime Minister if he thinks a dependent child sixteen years of age can be maintained on ninety cents a week.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is a scheme of insurance which has been worked out on an actuarial basis; it is expected that the money received will take care of the money paid out. That is the basis on which this scheme has been drawn up, with these various types of benefits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have only this to say, with the kindliest feeling in the world, that I hope that actuary some day will have to live on these benefits, and I hope the acting Prime Minister will not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very small.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, it is not. It would be very small if my hon. friend opposite had to live on $6 a week for himself and ninety cents a week for a child.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I point out that in England the corresponding amount is sixty-one cents.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have that here also, but the hon. gentleman is not getting away with anything like that. I say the benefits are very small.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say small; I said smart. I think you are smart.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, I think I am, in comparison with this government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the reply of the acting Prime Minister is quite right. He suggests that this is actuarially sound, that it is on the basis of a certain percentage being contributed by the employee, a certain percentage by the employer and a certain percentage by the state. But if the sum total of these three contributions is not sufficient to enable these people to live then it seems to me it is at this stage that we should ask whether or not that basis is correct. I do not see why the state should not contribute double or treble this amount if the scheme as actually worked out does not provide a sufficient living during periods of unemployment for those who are supposed to draw benefits. It is all very well to say it is on an actuarial basis and silence criticism in that way, but we have to get behind that and ask the basis of the actuarial computations. The basis is that the state, the dominion government, is giving very little indeed, and the greater part of the burden falls upon the worker and the employer. Undoubtedly the employer will pass his part on to the general public so that the state, as an organized body, is not contributing very much. The result very well may be that the people benefiting in this way will receive considerably less than the people actually on relief. It is going to be a serious state of affairs if the people benefiting under the unemployment insurance scheme will be in receipt of less than the people who have to depend entirely on charity. It is not going to commend the bill or even its extension to the favourable consideration of the public.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is exactly the one we should take into consideration at this stage. My own impression of this bill is that it is going to have the general effect of reducing relief rates in cities where labour, highly organized, has succeeded in securing a fairly adequate measure of relief. Under this bill the total allowance, provided the full scale is drawn, will be $6 a week or $24 a month for a man. For his wife it will be $2.70 a week or $10.80 a month. He will receive ninety cents per week per child, and if he has three children that will amount to $10.80 a month. Then the total allowance under this scheme would work out at $45.60 a month; that is the total benefit procurable by a family of five in which the father is the sole gainfully employed person. The present rate of relief to unemployed families of five in the city of Edmonton, where labour is well organized, is $53.75, with no contribution being made. In the city of Calgary it is $53.70; in Winnipeg it is $50.99, and in Toronto it is approximately $54. This will give the acting Prime Minister some idea of the possible effect of this legislation. After all what attraction is it going to have for the workers of this country if they find that they have been able to secure as much or more without making contributions as they will be able to secure under this scheme after contributing for two years? Frankly I believe the benefits under the scheme are altogether too low; I think they are quite inadequate to maintain a family in anything like decency.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he does not think the keeping of self-respect is worth a great deal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Undoubtedly.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If they are unemployed they will draw money to which they have a right. It is quite true it will not keep them in any great luxury, but I know many families throughout this country now who are not on relief and who have less than $45 a month on which to live. They are only too happy to keep off relief, because they are independent and keep their self-respect.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if judges contribute to their pensions? I fancy they manage to maintain their self-respect even if they do not do so. I think to-day, when we have conditions existing that make it impossible for a great many people to get work with any regularity, there is no great disgrace in receiving money from the state when the state cannot possibly provide work.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman must not misunderstand what I said. I agree that it is no disgrace; I am not suggesting that. I will ask the hon. gentleman, however, whether he would not prefer to have an amount given him as of right rather than to receive it from the state, even though no one would consider it a disgrace.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of course I would prefer to have it by right, but if we in this house pass a measure providing that if a man cannot get work, through no fault of his own, he shall receive a pension, then I do not consider that he would be incurring any disgrace by taking that pension.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But surely if it enters at all the question of right should entitle the man to live in decency, and if the effect of this bill is going to be to reduce the standard which already is below the level of decency it does not come within the ambit of right, according to my understanding of what a man is rightfully entitled to.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the acting Prime Minister has put himself out of court by his own statement. He asked if it would not be better to have a man receive money by right rather than, as he would suggest, receive it by charity as he does now—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not say by charity.

Mr. MacINNIS: If it is not by right the implication is that it is by charity; we might as well put it plainly. What else can we say? Give me another word to use and I will use it. The position is that after due consideration by charitable institutions, municipal and otherwise, the conclusion is reached that it takes a certain amount of money to keep a family alive, a certain amount of subsistence. Then if the amount received is below the stated amount, the family in question is living below subsistence level or the amount coming to them by right. Surely if we are going to give them something by right—if they are going to live on their self-respect—we should give them something by right, which would afford them a better standard of living than they now receive through what the acting Prime Minister is pleased to describe as charity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not use that word; the hon. member has no right to use it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not use the word "charity"; would the hon. member please withdraw it?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am waiting for the acting Prime Minister to give me a word to use. The implication is there. If they are not getting it by right, then they are getting something to which they have no right. What is the term? What term will you use? They have no right to relief?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly they have.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right, then they have a right to it. Why should the acting Prime Minister say that the people of this country who are receiving relief are receiving something to which they are not entitled? I would like to have him withdraw that statement.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have nothing to withdraw. All of us regret that these relief measures have to be passed, but we agree on the fact that the people must be provided with sufficient food, clothing, and so on, as is being done by relief. Of course the man who has an insurance policy gets his money in a slightly different way, at all events.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not a relief measure at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The acting Prime Minister suggested that the man who drew it without contributing something directly was not maintaining his self-respect. That is the reference to which I object. When I think of men and women I know personally and have known for years, people who have given their best years towards the building of our country—our railroads, our cities— and when I am told that those people can hardly accept help and maintain their self-respect because they have not contributed to some fund or other, I say such a statement must not be allowed to remain unchallenged.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the section is carried may I make this one observation, namely that the discussion which has taken place this afternoon proves once more just how carelessly this legislation was drafted.

Third schedule agreed to.

On section 33, subsection 1—Civil proceedings by employee against employer for neglect to comply with act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry I cannot agree with the argument concerning this subsection put forward by hon. members opposite, and I must ask the committee to pass it as it is. As a matter of fact hon. members will note that section 18 provides for payment to be made by revenue stamps. The governor in council is to prescribe the condition under which those revenue stamps shall be issued and sold. It is the duty of the employers to see that the stamps of the employees are affixed. As I understand it section 33 (1) gives the employee an additional right, namely the right to sue in the event the money is not paid over. Then as I understand it subsection (2) of section 18 gives power to make regulations in connection with the payment of contributions, inspection and everything else that is to be done. Regulations may be made whereby the books may be made available to the employee once or twice a month, and even put the duty on the employer of showing the books. The object is to be sure that the plan is carried out strictly and carefully. The experience in the mother country which has included in its act a section similar to section 33 (1) leads me to the belief that we ought to have it in our act. As provided under section 31 a penalty can be enforced by the commission against an employer, and then under section 33 there is a further remedy which would be hardly necessary if the other provisions were properly enforced. It is very necessary to make sure that the stamps are put on and the collections properly made. I believe that the British legislation has had a similar clause since 1920. The real safeguard is in seeing that the provisions are enforced, and imposing penalties upon those who fail to live up to the provisions of the act. For these reasons I do not see my way clear to accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to protest against asking the working man to go to the court when, in fact, the government should do so. I do not care what the arrangement is in England; I have had some experience in this country in connection with compensation, and I believe we should keep the working man out of the courts. The more we do so the better it will be for him. In my judgment it is unfair to ask an employee to do a job which should be taken over by the government. An employer may break a law under circumstances over which an employee would have absolutely no control, but we say to the employee that he must sue his employer. Manifestly in such event the law would have been broken by the employer.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suggest that the subsection affords an additional right to the employee, because if the regulations are carried out and the stamps placed on the books no difficulty will arise.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry the acting Prime Minister has not seen fit to accept our suggestion. First we take away from the employee the right to make his own contribution. We pass that over to the employer. Then if the employer does not comply with the act we say it is up to the employee to take civil action against the employer to force such employer to do what the act states he must do. That provision is supposed to apply to the individual employee, the man working here or there. But suppose employers in all industries refused to comply with the act; would all employees have to take action or would the commission take action? If the commission would take action in the event of the employers refusing to carry out the act as it affects all employees, why should not the commission take action when the provisions of the act are violated, as affecting one employee? In my opinion all the employers have to do to make the act inoperative is to refuse to make contributions for employees, and let the employees sue.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I am going to move the following amendment:

That section 33, subsection (1) be amended by deleting all the words in lines 33 and 34, and up to and including the word "he" in the 35th line thereof and inserting therefor the following:

"this failure on the part of an employer shall not be taken as reason for loss in whole or in part of the unemployment benefit to which the employee would have been entitled under this part of the act and the commission"

And by deleting the words: "of the unemployment benefit" in the last line of the subsection.

It would then read that the commission would be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount so lost.

Amendment (Mr. Garland, Bow River) negatived: yeas, 17; nays, 22.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was paired with the Prime Minister. I would have voted for the amendment had I not been paired.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was paired with the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards). I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). Had I not been paired I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is not in order, Mr. Chairman. Hon. gentlemen are virtually registering a vote which is not registrable in committee. I am anxious to have my vote registered if that is to be the procedure.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman is quite right. It has not been customary for hon. members to rise in committee and state how they would have voted had they not been paired. There is no record either in Votes and Proceedings or in Hansard of the names of those who have voted one way or the other.

Mr. POWER: On the point of order raised by the leader of the house, may I point out that this same point was raised three or four years ago. Pairs are not officially recognized in this house in any event. So far as most of us are concerned, the pair is simply a gentleman's agreement made by one member with a member on the opposite side of the house, which provides that when one is unable to vote or is absent the member paired with him shall not exercise his right to vote. Personally I have always maintained that my pair is a special agreement with the member opposite and I may declare it or not in my discretion. It has nothing to do with any arrangement made between the whips. On one occasion the question was raised—I forget by whom—and the right hon. gentleman who is now leading the house agreed that pairs were not official and that as a matter of fact it was not the business of the house to deal with pairs. I submit that in a matter of this kind any member who wishes to do so has the right to explain why he remained seated. The reason I remained seated is that I have an arrangement with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) whereby when he is absent I do not vote on any subject which comes before the house. Had I not remained seated I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MANION: I must respectfully differ from my hon. friend, and I will give my reason. I was also paired, but I would point out that if in a vote in committee we were permitted to rise and declare our pairs, as has been done to-day and on a number of occasions recently, it would bring about this extraordinary condition, that the man who happened to be paired and who declared his pair would be recorded as having voted one way or the other, whereas the man who was not paired and who did vote would not have his vote registered.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The men who actually voted would not be recorded.

Mr. MANION: They would not be recorded, whereas those who did not vote because they were paired would be recorded. I was paired, and I will not say how I would have voted, because that would be contradicting the principle I am upholding, but I think that such an extraordinary condition as I point out should not be brought about in this house. My hon. friend from Quebec South, whose mind is always so clear, will agree with me I think that the practice of announcing pairs in committee would not be fair to those who voted.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend, with that artful Irish ingenuity of his, knows very well that if the point of order raised by himself and the leader of the government were well taken there would be nothing to prevent members from rising before a vote was taken and saying, "I was paired with the member for so and so; had I not been paired I would have voted for or against the motion." It would be easy to get around any rule that might be laid down in consequence of the observations made on the other side, and we might as well allow the practice to continue which has existed in the past. It is the first time to my knowledge that the question has been raised with any degree of responsibility behind it, but if it is pressed, then I suggest that we shall be obliged to have a formal vote of the house on the point, because it does bear on the privileges of members.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It certainly does; and if this practice is to be allowed to continue then I shall have to seek the authority of the house in some way to have the chairman register the votes of those who actually vote, because otherwise, as has been pointed out, a grave injustice is done them.

Mr. POULIOT: I was paired, but the member with whom I was paired being in the house, I voted for the amendment.

Mr. ARTHURS: I have been a member of this house for many years and this is the first session in which this question has arisen during my term in parliament. It has been unanimously agreed in the past that votes in committee, according to the rules, should not be registered. Why therefore should those members who refrain from voting have the privilege of registering their ideas either pro or con? That is not the intention of the rules of this house. That privilege has never before been exercised in this house and I am quite sure that many members, probably including myself, were very glad to take advantage of the rule whereby we could record our vote in committee without being reported in Hansard.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Am I allowed to record—

Mr. POWER: I hope that this will not be taken as a precedent to prevent members from recording their pairs in committee at other times. If it is to be regarded as a precedent then we shall have to have some formal decision.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is not a rule of the house. I should be glad to have it discussed whenever the hon. gentleman wishes, but it certainly used not to be the custom for pairs to be declared in committee.

Mr. POWER: There is no rule against it.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is another rule of the house—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman need not say anything more. It has to be unanimous.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is more important than that. I am asking the acting Prime Minister to postpone it because I want to see the printed amendments. I want to have an opportunity of reading the reprinted bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the hon. gentleman wish to have the bill reprinted before it passes third reading?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I suggest that we should have access to the reprinted amendments.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: They are all in Hansard; they are comparatively few.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They are really not worth while.

Mr. POWER: Does that apply to the whole act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Shall we be taking up further social legislation to-night?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We shall take supply, national defence first, and after that, if there is time, trade and commerce.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Salaries and contingencies, $448,640.

Mr. POWER: I understand, when this item was last before the committee, there was some discussion in regard to the unemployment conservation camps being operated by the Department of National Defence, and some hon. members from British Columbia made some observations in respect of the manner in which those camps were being conducted in that province. I should like to say a word concerning the camps in Quebec, but before doing so I should like to assure the minister that any remarks I may make are not to be considered as being in criticism of him or of his department, but are rather by way of criticizing what I assume to be a major policy of the government. The minister is new; he is taking over his position with this policy already laid down and being carried on. He is certainly not to blame for its inauguration, and if we have any remarks to make derogatory to that system I hope he will take them in good part and understand that they are not at all directed at him personally.

At Valcartier there are about 1,700 men who are engaged in a number of different occupations, but according to a return brought down in the house, part of their occupation is that of erecting permanent buildings. On further questions with regard to the nature of these permanent buildings, I was informed that they were to form the nucleus of an arsenal, a place in which would be carried out the manufacture of ammunition, and that the present cartridge factory in the city of Quebec was to be removed to Valcartier. This cartridge factory at Quebec employs approximately sixty-two persons. During the year 1929-30, the payroll was $61,241.05, and during 1933-34 it was $41,038.29. I object to the work being carried on by the population of this camp, on many grounds, the first being that it is a distinct violation of the promises, pledges and even the actual program of the government, to employ hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country at a wage of twenty cents a day. We have been told that one of the principal pieces of legislation to be brought down during this session is a minimum wage measure. May I point out to the minister that it is not at all necessary to bring down a bill of this nature, or to ask the house to ratify a convention made in Geneva, in order to give reasonable wages to men employed in government concentration camps. These men are being paid twenty cents a day, and I believe they are being paid at this rate in violation of a statute of this parliament. I am under the impression that by a statute passed I think in 1930—and I shall perhaps be able to find it later—all employees on government work were to be paid at prevailing rates, which were specified at thirty cents an hour. By what authority and right the Department of National Defence is now paying those men twenty cents a day I have yet to be able to find out, unless it be that by authority of an order in council which permitted the creation of those camps a salary of twenty cents a day was authorized.

But if such were the case, the statute which applies to work on government construction and so forth should have been specifically modified or repealed for the purpose of carrying on this work. May I point out that by one stroke of the pen, by the passing of an order in council, reasonable wages could be restored to those men. The effect on the community would be to raise the general standard of wages throughout, and the effect on the men themselves would be to give them back some of their self-respect which they cannot possibly have if they are confined in camps such as these and paid the niggardly wage of twenty cents a day.

The second point I wish to make is that in connection with this particular camp the men are carrying on work which could be distributed and given to the tradesmen, artisans and workmen of the country. There is in the city of Quebec a very large number of carpenters, masons, men skilled in the construction trades, and we are deliberately setting these married men aside, allowing them to remain on relief, in order to give employment to persons in these camps. I pointed out at the time this legislation was introduced two or three years ago that there might be some justification for this when the works which were being carried on were not permanent or could not be carried out by persons in the community, but there was no justification for taking twenty cents a day men and giving them employment which would take away the bread and butter from the married men of the community. It was in reply to those remarks of mine that the Solicitor General, I think it was, stated that there was no danger of that. In this particular instance we are building an arsenal within fifteen miles of the city of Quebec where there is an ample supply of unionized labour, where persons who have been accustomed to carrying on construction trades would be only too glad to get work instead of remaining on relief. Yet this department is employing seventeen hundred men taken from all over the country and paying them twenty cents a day.

There is another point I might mention, although I do not want to touch on anything that might appear to be sectional. In other parts of the country where military buildings such as arsenals, drill halls, armouries are being constructed, these are being built under the Public Works Construction Act, and the men employed thereon are drawing reasonable rates of pay. Therefore I see no reason why within the district of Quebec we should not be allowed to enjoy the same benefits as do people from other districts. It will be said I suppose that good work was done by men in these camps at the citadel at Quebec and Valcartier, and I will not deny it. I suppose if it had not been for the concentration camp at Quebec citadel the ancient walls and fortifications would not have been repaired. But that does not alter the fact that the repairing of these walls would have given employment to a substantial number of men in Quebec who needed it, other than those now in the camps. I will not deny that there may be some justification for their employment in forestry work, I think in the United States they call work of that kind non-productive. As I understand it, in the United States the men taken care of in this way are employed in forestry operations and sometimes in the making of roads and trails through national parks. But this is an altogether different matter. This is a building the advisability of which is doubtful, being constructed by the aid of a special kind of labour which a great many people in Canada call slave labour; and at the very threshold of the place where that building is being put up are hundreds, aye thousands of married men on relief who are capable of doing this work.

In order to indicate the disapproval of at least of some members of the house of this particular form of government dealing with the unemployed, I propose to move:

That item number 17, national defence, salaries, be reduced by $1.

Some hon. MEMBERS: To one dollar?

Mr. POWER: By one dollar.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member was good enough at the outset to say that he was directing his criticism rather against the policy laid down than against the present incumbent of the office of Minister of National Defence. I am grateful to him for that kindly allusion. On the other hand I do not wish in any sense to shelter myself behind that. He has stated it as his opinion that these single homeless unemployed men whose care the dominion government has taken over should not be paid a wage as low as twenty cents a day. I contend, and the government has contended all the way along, that this payment is certainly not a wage. How did the dominion government come into this position? They agreed with the provinces to take over the care of the single homeless unemployed, to clothe them, feed them, keep them warm, supply them with a small quantity of tobacco in the form of a ration, and give them such facilities for recreation as were possible. The only practicable way in which that could be done was to collect them in camps in the various parts of the country. Some of those camps were taken over from the provincial governments, some were erected by this government. It was therefore necessary for the dominion government to come to a decision as to where the camps should be, and what work the men in them should undertake. It was considered, for I think sufficient reason, that this work at Valcartier, laid out it is true for military purposes, could well be undertaken. In that camp the men were given food and clothing and the other things which I have mentioned, and over and above that provision which the dominion government on behalf of the provinces undertook with respect to the men they also supplied a small allowance of money, but certainly not a wage. The men had to do certain work, which was of a labouring kind. As the assistance of trained artisans was required, key men in the various branches of work were employed at current rates of pay. These key men were taken from the locality, and the key men received whatever wages men in that locality were receiving in these trades. The rank and file of the single homeless unemployed worked with the key men, in some cases under their direction, anyway in gangs which were led by them. The hon. member of course is entitled to his own opinion as to whether or not the policy laid down and carried out was a good one, but it is a policy which has been laid down by this government and it has in the opinion of the government worked out satisfactorily enough to be carried on as such.

Mr. POWER: The justification offered by the minister, that a certain number of men receive prevailing rates, seems to me only to make the matter worse. It would appear then that a few men—which I might tell the the minister were appointed by patronage at the request of political heelers of the constituency—obtained fairly good jobs. The remainder, who were doing just such work as is being done on building jobs throughout Canada, such as making cement forms and the ordinary work of the building trades, were receiving twenty cents a day. I understood the minister to say two or three nights ago that the cost to the government of maintaining these men in the camps was something like $1.30 per day. Am I right? That was exclusive of the overhead of the department, but included the cost of food, clothing and lodging. That plus twenty cents makes $1.50. It would have been a reasonable thing to add a further fifty or sixty or seventy cents a day and give employment to the people of the locality at not much more expense to the country. It would have given a great deal of assistance to the persons most in need of government assistance at this time. I quite agree with the minister that something had to be done for the so-called homeless transient single men, but in order to do something for them it was not necessary to take the bread out of the mouths of the married men in the locality. That is the situation as it exists in the city of Quebec. This is not a non-productive undertaking; this is an arsenal, a building for the purpose of making ammunition. There is no reason why the district of Quebec should be treated differently from any other district. Here again I disclaim any intention of raising a sectional issue. It merely happens that I know what is going on at Valcartier; I do not know what is going on in the other unemployment camps. The men at Valcartier are doing exactly the same kind of work as men throughout Canada who are working on the public works program. That there was an agreement with the provinces to care for the homeless unemployed men, and that two or three or five or six out of each gang are being paid prevailing rates of wages, does not alter the fact that the government is having its construction work carried on at a miserably low rate of wages compared to that which a private individual would have to pay in the same part of the country. This is a bald statement of the facts. I contend that this government above all governments is not justified in reducing the standard of living by lowering rates of wages in order to carry out undertakings which should be paid for the same as any other public works throughout the country.

Mr. SANDERSON: Like the hon. member for Quebec South I want to say at the outset that any criticism I may have to make of the policy of the Department of National Defence does not apply in any way to the minister personally. I do contend, Mr. Chairman, that the minister must take full responsibility for the estimates of his department which he has brought before this committee. I notice that there has been a very substantial increase. At page 25 we find that in administration there is an increase of $41,000. In the non-permanent active militia there is an increase of $6,000, an increase of $54,666 for the permanent force and an increase of $15,470 for the Royal Military college, or a total increase this year of $117,136. I contend that if the minister cannot show good and sufficient reasons for the increase, these estimates should not pass this committee. I want to put one or two questions to the minister, and I hope that when I resume my seat he will at least endeavour to give me an answer. First of all I want to ask what salary the chief of staff now receives, whether he was given an increase within the last two years and, if so, to what extent.

Mr. STIRLING: I am perfectly ready to answer the hon. gentleman's questions, but may I suggest that they should come under the appropriate item. At the moment we are discussing civil government, in which there is a decrease, while the question put by my hon. friend comes under administration. Does he desire to proceed now?

Mr. SANDERSON: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, and that of the committee I would rather proceed under this item. I do not see what difference it makes; the matter must come up for discussion anyway.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the relief camps—

Mr. SANDERSON: Just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Inasmuch as this matter does not come under this item I rule that it should be considered when the proper item comes up for consideration.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that relief camps are not mentioned at all under this item, which provides for salaries and contingencies.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The reply to the hon. member for South Perth, in that case, is simply that the minister had this point raised when he went into the estimates. One hon. member on this side asked if it would be all right to discuss these camps under this item, and the minister acquiesced.

Mr. STIRLING: I am in the hands of the committee. I think hon. members proceeded to discuss relief camps under the first item because that matter might be discussed on several of these items. Certainly they come under civil government to a small extent, but the matter raised by the hon. member for South Perth is in no sense covered by civil government. However, if it is the wish of the committee to discuss everything under administration or civil government I have no objection. Administration will be the next item called.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I suggest to the minister that it is somewhat difficult to know just where to discuss these matters. As I understand it the Department of National Defence are carrying on work which is paid for out of the general vote, which does not appear in the estimates at all. I am rather anxious to know when we may discuss those unemployment relief camps. The difficulty under which we are labouring is that some of this work is being done by the Department of Public Works, some by the Department of National Defence and some by the Department of the Interior. We do want to discuss this relief item and this general vote, this lump sum which the government take annually, and we scarcely know where to find the proper item under which to discuss it intelligently. If the minister will give us an idea of just how he operates in his department with the relief sums that are voted to him, then we can discuss the matter much more intelligently under the proper items as they come up.

Mr. STIRLING: I have not suggested any objection to a discussion of the unemployment camps under civil government, but the hon. member for South Perth asked a question with regard to something that is quite definitely under another vote. That was why I raised the question whether it was desirable to discuss that matter under this item. The last time these estimates were before the committee the whole discussion on the matter of unemployment camps took place on this item of civil government, and I suggest that if the hon. gentleman desires to discuss that matter it might be taken up under this item as well as under any other. The particular matter the hon. member for South Perth brought up, however, happens to come under administration, and not under civil government..

Mr. SANDERSON: I thank the minister for his courtesy in saying that he has no objection to this discussion going on under item 17, and I assume that I am justified in going ahead.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): On relief camps.

Mr. SANDERSON: I will come to the relief camps eventually but I want to talk about something else in addition.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Anything that comes under this particular vote.

Mr. SANDERSON: I put this question to the minister a few moments ago; I asked if he would be good enough to tell me if the chief of staff had received any increase in salary within the last two years and, if so, what that increase amounted to. While the minister is looking that up I would also ask him if any other officers of the staff received increases in pay and, if so, who the officers were and what were the amounts of the increases.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to the chief of the general staff, his salary was increased two years ago from $8,000 to $10,000, less ten per cent.

Mr. SANDERSON: Was the increase made retroactive for some months, at that time?

Mr. STIRLING: No, it was not retroactive. I am informed that no other officers have received increases in the last two years other than those which would follow ordinary promotions.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister informs me that the chief of staff had his pay increased within the last two years from $8,000 to $10,000. It does appear to me that an increase of $2,000 in the salary of any official here in Ottawa cannot be justified under present conditions, and I think that increase never should have been made.

I want to say to the minister also, in all kindness, that I think perhaps the greatest close corporations we have in Ottawa is the staff down at the Woods building. I well remember, and other hon. members of this house will remember also, that when the salaries of civil servants, members of parliament and senators were reduced, the measure which was brought into this house did not include the staff officers in the Department of National Defence. Later on it did include those officers; I am coming to that, but why was that not done in the first place? I have an idea that it was not done in the first place because the staff over at the Woods building runs the Department of National Defence. That ten per cent deduction finally did apply to these officers, but it was only after the opposition in this house and public sentiment throughout the country demanded it. They should have been included in the first place; they never should have been omitted. I want to give a word of advice to the minister, and I hope he will take it in the kindly spirit in which I give it to him. He has come to this department as a new minister, and I want to say that he should keep his eye and a firm hand on his staff over in the Woods building.

There are some things for which the minister must assume responsibility. He was sworn in as a minister of the crown on the 17th day of November, 1934. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, it appears that the new deal was first put into force in the Department of National Defence. I have under my hand a document by which I believe I can prove my statement. The minister must take the responsibility for it, because it is dated December 20, 1934, just one month and three days after he assumed the responsibilities connected with the Department of National Defence. I believe I would do well to take up the time of the committee to place this letter on record. The letter is headed "Department of National Defence, Militia service," and is numbered "M.3-1-8-3." It is dated at Montreal, province of Quebec, December 20, 1934, and is as follows:

Letter 11, 1934.

Officers Commanding,
P.F., & N.P.A.M. Units,
M.D. No. 4.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that all the military districts in the Dominion of Canada received the same circular. The letter begins:

Mess Dress Ties

1. N.D.H.Q. Circular Letter No. 21, 1934, is quoted hereunder, for your information:—

(a) "In view of the many different patterns and sizes of mess dress ties which it is observed are now being worn by officers of the Canadian militia, I am directed to request that all officers may be advised as to the correct pattern and size of mess dress ties and that such steps as are possible may be taken to secure uniformity.

(b) Paragraph 49, Dress Regulations for the Canadian militia, 1932, prescribes a black bow tie, and this paragraph is being amended by—

And this is where the new deal comes in——adding thereto the words 'with square ends.' Ties with pointed ends should not be worn—

I hope all hon. members will listen carefully to this.

—and the edges of the bow should be straight and parallel.

(c) Particular attention should be paid to the dimensions of the tie, which should be about two inches wide at the ends and the length of the tie, in inches, should be twice the size of the collar, namely an officer wearing a 15½ collar should wear—

And this is very interesting—

—a tie approximately 31 inches long.

(Signed) B. W. Brown,
Lt.-Colonel,
A.A. & Q.M.G., M.D. No. 4."

Copies to all officers.

I submit that apparently the minister was the first to issue some of the new orders—the new reform—and this is very interesting. Perhaps the orders should have gone a little farther and the circular should have included something about the size of the hats the officers wear, recommending that the sizes be in accordance with the sizes of their heads.

Mr. ROBINSON: Statesmanship.

Mr. SANDERSON: I ask the minister in all seriousness: under conditions now existing in Canada does he take the responsibility for sending that trash out to the officers of the militia? The thing is absurd. It is ridiculous, and is on a par with what I said a few moment ago—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SANDERSON: —that the staff officers—

An hon. MEMBER: A year ago.

Mr. SANDERSON: I did not say it a year ago, but probably I shall repeat it another year. The staff officers of the Department of National Defence control the minister, the minister does not control them. I hope none of the officers of the Canadian militia will get into very serious trouble if they do not wear the right kind of tie or the right size of collar, and in carrying out the regulations of this overworked staff.

I should like to say one or two words more, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry I have not before me to-night a list of the militia buildings which have been built under the joint supervision of the departments of national defence and public works. Although I have not that list before me I believe it would make very interesting reading for the people of Canada. Since 1930 millions and millions of dollars have been expended in this way; some of the buildings are under construction, in an unfinished state, and some have been completed. These are military buildings. I want to tell the Minister of National Defence that he cannot make a military country out of the Dominion of Canada, and the sooner the government realizes that fact the better it will be for them and the country at large.

Under the items I have before me it would appear that the vote for the permanent force is increased by $54,666 over the amount voted last year. May I say a word about the permanent force. I have not much criticism to make about the rank and file of that force, but I do want to say that with a very few exceptions the officers are what I would call war lords, men who are attempting to create the feeling throughout the country that Canada must be prepared for another war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Bunk.

Mr. SANDERSON: Hon. members opposite are entitled to their opinion, and I am entitled to mine. But the fact that the new Minister of Trade and Commerce says "bunk" makes no impression upon me.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Oh, no.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. SANDERSON: This country came through one war. With the exception of some officers and a few non-commissioned officers of the permanent force, who gave good service, this country sent a civilian army overseas. I am willing to admit that, but I wish to say that had it not been for the young Canadian boys who enlisted and were trained overseas the Canadian forces would not have met with the success with which they did meet. However, I do not intend to dwell upon the war further than to say that if in the next fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, thirty-five, forty or fifty years Canada should be unfortunate enough to be drawn into another war, we will have enough Canadians, men who were very young at the time of the last war, who could very well officer any army of the future. The expenditure of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year to keep up a permanent force, most of whom are brass hats and men who send out circulars such as the one I have read, is a waste of money. Even if conditions were normal it would be a waste of money, but the waste is greater having in view the distress and unemployment common throughout the country.

Many buildings are being erected throughout the country. About $2,000,000 is being spent for an armoury in the city of Calgary, and in other places throughout the country. We had enough armouries in Canada during the war. Perhaps it was fortunate we had the armouries which were built prior to the war by the late Sir Sam Hughes. They were very useful. I will go so far as to say that the armouries which were built came in very handy. But we do not want the country studded with militarism and covered with armouries from coast to coast. If certain gentlemen in the employ of the government receiving $8,000 or $10,000 a year could possibly put over the propaganda, militarism would increase, but I do not think they will be able to do it.

In my opinion there is a great deal of waste in the money spent by the Department of National Defence. I will not say anything about the relief camps, because other hon. members may take up that matter. I do say in all seriousness to the minister, however, that so far as possible he should cut out a lot of the red tape down in his department. The people of Canada do not want it; they expect something else. The minister, I think, has a wonderful opportunity if he will assert himself with the officers and the officials of his department, and instead of the officers running the department and running the minister, the minister should take a firm stand and control those who are under him, and if he cannot control them he should get rid of them. I go further. I say that the staff in the Woods building is overmanned. You cannot get into the place; they are like an army of chocolate soldiers down there. You can hardly get into the door. We do not want that in this country. I am fair enough to say that you must have a certain amount of discipline in a department such as the minister presides over, but there is a danger that you are going too far, and I think perhaps you have got to that point now. This country does not want to be ruled by war lords. I hope the time will never come when this country will be embroiled in another European war. It is all right to have a force for defence, and I am not offering much criticism of the active militia, although I think that a good deal of the money spent on the maintenance of the active militia is wasted and no good results come from much of that expenditure. I do repeat, however, that the money spent on the permanent force could be largely cut out and the service would be better off if many reductions were made not only in staff but in expenses.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before this question was raised on Monday evening I had made an arrangement with the minister to take up the matter, so far as I was concerned, with the head of the department, General McNaughton. I had no particular desire to raise the question in the house, but the question was raised and I gave the house at least a part of what I would have submitted to General McNaughton. However, since Monday evening I have received further information to the effect that conditions in the camps in British Columbia are just as bad as ever and possibly worse. I have before me an item that appeared in one of the Vancouver papers of February 28. I will read this item:

> Twenty-eight relief camp deserters who some days ago were given the option of leaving town or serving three months in gaol after being convicted of obtaining meals by fraud in city cafés, gave themselves up at police headquarters Wednesday night. They expressed their willingness to serve their sentences as they had been without food for twenty-four hours.

The minister says that if a man has a grievance he may take it to the foreman of the camp, and if he does not get satisfaction from the foreman he can take it to the superintendent, and if he does not get satisfaction from the superintendent he can take it to the officer of the district. That may be true so far as the minister is concerned, but it is not true in actual practice. A number of men in the camps have told me that the moment they bring a complaint to the foreman they are branded as agitators and told that if anything more is heard from them they will have to leave the camp. They are dismissed not only on the word of the foreman but on the word of the straw boss on the job. I have before me a note from a young fellow in a camp in Ontario. He complained about the food in the camp and the foreman told him that he was an agitator, and that if he did not like the hash he could get out. But not only did he say that—and the same condition prevails in British Columbia; he also said, "I will see that you do not get any relief in Toronto." When they are sent out of the camp the provincial government and the city of Vancouver are advised to give them no relief, so that they have no alternative but to commit crime in order to obtain food. I was talking to one man who had been in four or five camps under a different name in each camp because he was blacklisted for "agitating" and dismissed from the camps. Now something must be done about a situation like this. The minister says that the provincial government can send inspectors into the camp at any time and inspect it for themselves, but the provincial government dare not send inspectors in because if the inspectors found fault with the camps it is just as likely that the federal government would say, "All right, look after the single unemployed yourselves." That is one of the reasons why the provincial government, even if it were anxious to see that the men are well looked after, will not take any active steps towards inspecting the camps. When we take the matter up with the provincial government they say that it is entirely in the hands of the federal government and that they have no jurisdiction; and when we take it up with the federal government, they in turn say that they are merely aiding the provincial government and not substituting for it because it is a provincial matter. Wherever you turn you are met with refusal to do anything. I think that the first essential in order to get some contentment in these camps is to see that the men in charge, the foremen and other officers, are men who have some of the milk of human kindness in their make-up. The minister says that conditions prevailing in the camps he visited were favourable compared with camps he had worked in. But these men are not in the same position as men working in construction camps. In the first place, they are getting the magnificent wage of twenty cents a day, and that is enough in itself to cause discontent. They have a different psychology from men in ordinary work, and consequently the man who is competent to run an ordinary construction camp is not necessarily competent to run one of these camps; it needs an entirely different type of person. I suggest that if the officials of the department would give a little more consideration to the men in the camps and less time to considering the length of the ties worn at mess, things would go much better than they are going at present. I am convinced that we shall never have contentment in the camps—certainly we shall never have satisfaction to any great extent —unless the minister appoints men who understand the peculiar psychology that exists in these camps, or has an investigation made by an impartial tribunal who will fearlessly report on what they find.

Mr. MUNN: After listening to the minister with a great deal of interest I want to say a few words in reply to the statement he has made. When the hon. gentleman was appointed Minister of National Defence it ran through my mind, "Now we have a practical man who will surely see the necessity of a change of administration in the relief camps, especialy in British Columbia." I am very much disappointed and discouraged to-night to hear him say that in his opinion they are fairly satisfactory. I have a great deal of regard for the hon. gentleman and I must take his word for it that in his opinion the camps are satisfactory, but I do not think he has investigated the matter as carefully as he might have done. I have looked into it carefully myself. I know a good many of these boys, who have worked for me in the logging camps, and as the hon. member for Vancouver South says, conditions in these camps are altogether different from those that prevail in logging and construction camps. In the logging camps and construction camps the men get paid; they are there to make money and the contractors take care of the men, because otherwise they would not stay with them. But here the men are bound to stay. Now I suggest that the same condition could be brought about in these camps and there would be results; there would be something to show for the money that had been spent. For instance, if you put these men on for five hours a day at forty cents an hour, that would be $2 a day and you could charge them for their board. In other words, it would cost you $12 a week. Under the present administration it costs $9.10 and you get nothing done. They are supposed to be working but they are simply pussyfooting, and I do not blame them. But with an additional $3 a week the men would work, everyone would be satisfied, there would be no more trouble, and at the end of the season there would be something to show for the season's work. As it is, you have nothing to show. I agree one hundred per cent with the hon. member for South Perth; the statements he has made are absolutely correct. Not only the Department of National Defence, but I think all the departments of the federal as well as of the provincial governments are overmanned. That is one of the factors that are holding us back. This is going to be tough for some of the people, but if I had my way, a number of highly paid civil servants would be looking for jobs. I am not picking on any particular men; if a man is required, that is all right, but a number of them not only in the Department of National Defence but in other departments are not needed.

I have nothing more to say than that there is too big a spread between $10,000 a year and twenty cents a day; that is the spread between the remuneration of men in the employ of the Department of National Defence. As I said before, I am very much disappointed in the minister. I have a high regard for the hon. member for Yale, who, being a practical man, knows what construction work is, but I think he will agree with me when I say that it is quite a different matter when you have a construction camp for logging or building a railway. In that case you have to take care of the men and pay them, and you will get the work done. In this case the situation is different; you simply have the men there, and in my opinion the way in which these camps have been and are at present being conducted is a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to say a few words on this subject which seems to have appealed very much to hon. members from British Columbia. First, I think some of the statements made by hon. gentleman opposite in regard to conditions in the camps have been exaggerated. In the particular riding which I have the honour to represent, there are from twelve to fourteen camps; I have made a point of visiting them from time to time, and I would say that from seventy-five to ninety per cent of the men there appreciate the service that is being rendered by the department. There is of course an element which one could not satisfy under any conditions. I was present at one of the camps when a young man of about twenty-five years of age came up to the foreman and said that he was leaving; that he was going to take the train out for the east.

The foreman, who was a very fine type of man, talked to him like a father, but the boy turned and said: "I am twenty-five years of age; I have never worked a day in my life; I don't intend to either and I am taking the train." So he checked out. There is, as I say, in those camps a certain percentage of men who do not want work and who do not appreciate whatever might be done by any department of government.

Something has been said about the foremen. I think the foremen in every camp I visited and the superintendent of that division are men of the finest type. They are sympathetic; they give fatherly advice to the men and I think the men appreciate it.

The question of purchasing supplies was I believe dealt with the other day when this subject was up, and the department was criticized for not purchasing certain lines of products from local people. I have gone into this matter very fully, because I live in a district which produces great quantities of the products required by the camps. The problem which we ran up against was that of continuity of supply. It is impossible to expect any official to go around from farm to farm collecting a few sacks of potatoes here and there. When you have thousands of men it is necessary that you have a continuous supply from day to day. When dinner time comes along you must have the meat and the potatoes; you must have food for the men or you will have a riot on your hands. In different parts of the district the experiment was tried of having men collect from the farmers vegetables, and so forth, and in some cases meat. The supply was satisfactory for a very short time, but as I said before, it was found that it was impossible to maintain the supply. Let me repeat that I have found seventy-five to ninety per cent of the men in the camps appreciate the services rendered, and so far as the meals and accommodation are concerned I do not think there is any ground for complaint, because I believe the men in those camps are to-day getting perhaps better food than seventy-five per cent of the people in that district.

I have some criticism to offer, and I agree to a certain extent with some of the arguments advaced by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been told by the department that this system is not permanent. I fully realize and I believe the department realizes, that a change should take place in the matter of wages. We have in British Columbia already what is known as the relief wage on works, twenty-five cents an hour. If the men were paid at the rate of $2 a day and were required to pay for their board, clothing and other necessaries, they might not be as well off, but they would be a great deal happier and would feel better than they do to-day. After going into the question with some of the officials, I believe board of even a better variety than is at present being furnished could be supplied, including all kitchen expenses, at a rate of sixty cents a day. The men could pay sixty cents a day for their board and purchase their clothing from the camp as long as the stock lasted, say at cost, or anywhere they saw fit. If this were done it would be of benefit not only to the men themselves but to the communities in which their camps are located. It would create a sort of pay-roll for purchasing supplies from the local merchants, and I am sure it would distribute throughout the country a certain amount of money that is not being distributed at the present time.

In this connection I have pointed out to the department before, and it was brought to my mind the other day when we were discussing the tourist business, that in the particular district which I have the honour to represent we have a large portion of what is known as the Cariboo trail, which I think I can state without fear of contradiction is perhaps the most scenic piece of road on the American continent. It lacks one thing, and that is the surfacing of the highway. If that highway were surfaced for one hundred and fifty to one hundred and eighty miles, it would bring to this country thousands of tourists and hundreds of thousands of dollars of revenue. But with the surface of the road in its present condition tourists would not undertake to make more than one trip on it, and when they returned home they would tell the people about the condition of that road. My proposal to the department has been—and I repeat it to-day—that we must co-operate in this work. There are camps located all about this highway, and if the thousands of men employed in the camps were paid a proper wage and the provincial government were to furnish equipment and materials, the work could be done. We would thus accomplish two things: we would put the men in a better position than they are in to-day; they would feel like free men, and we would be producing something that would bring a revenue to the country. This work must be done in cooperation with the provincial government. I would advocate that the provincial government furnish all equipment and materials and the federal government the labour. They do not receive a direct benefit from the work performed; but it is only fair that when they have the care of these men and spend large sums of money on the camps, they should do something along this line. The cost would not, as someone suggests, be doubled; it would mean an increased cost, but there would be a return from the expenditure made, not directly to the federal government but certainly to the province in the useful work that would be carried on in the way of improving that highway. Work of this kind could be done not only in that district but in others in which similar camps are located. I should like to leave that suggestion with the department. They have admitted, and we hope it will prove to be true, that this system of camps is not permanent; I believe under the conditions which are improving each day they will not last very long. But in the meantime I should like to see serious consideration given by the minister and his department to the proposal to place these men at a fair wage. I would not call twenty-five cents an hour a fair wage; it has already been adopted in our province as a relief wage. Even if we went a little further and made it forty cents an hour or two dollars for a five hour day I think would be fair. Having discussed this matter with some of the officials and the men I am sure they would be much more satisfied. This might not take care of one hundred per cent of the men, because there are men in those camps who perhaps are not physically fit to carry on this heavy work, and there are some who perhaps could not be made to work unless put somewhere where they can be controlled. But the large percentage of the men will appreciate this, and I think as far as their morale is concerned it is the only way it can be restored. I appeal to the minister and the department to consider this matter seriously.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I notice item number 17 includes salaries. Could the minister tell us what new officials, if any, have been engaged in the department to carry out the construction program undertaken under the Public Works Construction Act? While the minister is obtaining that information I want to say that I quite endorse what has been said by other members with regard to the folly of spending at the present time the large amount now being committed for the building of armouries and arsenals and other military structures throughout this country.

There is some more information that I would like to obtain, and perhaps this is the proper time to get it, to what extent has the staff of the department been increased for the purpose of carrying out this construction. According to the statement filed by the Minister of Finance, up to December 31 the amount expended out of the $2,530,000 allotted to the Department of National Defence was $274,587. There were commitments up to December 31 amounting to $535,824. I wonder if the minister can tell me the details as to how these works are being carried on, the locations of the various camps, the total amount being expended at the various works, and the amount that is now committed of that $2,530,000.

Mr. STIRLING: The first question I think was as to the increase in staff made necessary by the relief work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, by the public works construction program that is being carried on now by the minister's department.

Mr. STIRLING: There have been eight supervising architects and assistant architects; one structural engineer; two clerks; three stenographers, grade two. All of these are at headquarters at Ottawa.

Then the hon. member asked with regard to the items of construction under the Public Works Construction Act of last year. Item 18 was for barracks to be erected in the province of Alberta, at Calgary or elsewhere, and the sum allotted was $1,200,000. The approximate expenditure on that item to January 31 is $79,192.99. Item number 33 was for the reconstruction of the Royal Canadian Air Force station—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister to give as he goes along a short explanation of the work done—for example, at Calgary?

Mr. STIRLING: Item by item?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unless it is inconvenient.

Mr. STIRLING: Item number 18, barracks, in Alberta: A suitable site for barracks and aerodrome was located to the southwest of Calgary containing about 344 acres. Of this about 317 acres are owned by the city and are being conveyed to the crown for a cash payment of $10,000, and 52·55 acres of old rifle range site estimated at $1,261.20. In addition there were certain subdivision lots held by private parties containing about 27 acres which have been expropriated. These have been valued at about $100 per acre, making $2,700. The total estimated cost of site is $13,961.20. The acquisition of this site on the terms stated was authorized by order in council P.C. 1857 dated August 16, 1934.

The proposed works: one barrack building, $165,500; contract awarded to Messrs. Bennett and White, Calgary, at $163,546. One men's mess building, $150,000; contract awarded to Forster Construction Company, Calgary, at $147,250.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If I may interrupt, would the minister say as he goes along what form of tenders these were, whether private tenders or by public advertisement?

Mr. STIRLING: They were called for from firms in proximity to the city.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister means that it was not by public advertisement but by invited tenders?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, a list of firms.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does that apply to practically all the structures that have been erected in Calgary?

Mr. STIRLING: All those so far in Calgary.

Mr. ELLIOTT: None were let by public advertisement?

Mr. STIRLING: No. They are divided into these items that I am just going to read:

One married men's quarters, estimated cost $36,000; contract awarded to R. H. Peach and Company of Calgary at $35,169.
Grading landing field, $128,000; contract awarded to Messrs. Manvin and Owens, Calgary, $128,756.
Extension of city services, $47,000; being carried out by the city of Calgary.
Sewer and water services within the barracks, $110,000, being carried out by the city of Calgary.
Grading sites of buildings, $4,000, being carried out by day labour.
One administration building, $166,500, plans and specifications nearing completion.

And so on for the next six or eight items. Does the hon. member want me to read the whole list?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING:

One stable building, $50,000.
One married officer's quarters, $20,000.
One Army Service Corps depot building, $16,000.
One forage barn, $3,500.
One officers mess building, $125,000.
One mechanical transport garage, $23,000.
One riding school, $55,000.
One guardhouse, $4,000.
Road construction, $20,000.
Gas and power lines, $5,000.
Grading parade ground, $20,000.
Purchase of property, $12,000.
Tree planting and landscaping, $10,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could the minister tell us the dimensions of that $50,000 stable?

Mr. STIRLING: The plans are not completed yet. This is the whole scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In respect to how many of the buildings has construction been begun?

Mr. STIRLING: Suppose I finish the list and then read to the committee the progress report:

Salaries, $12,000.
Architect's fees, $15,000.
Incidentals, $2,500—Total, $1,200,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the estimated cost of all those works?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes. Now I come to what I may call the progress report: The barrack building, Bennett and White, have the contract for $163,546. The approximate expenditure to January 31 was $5,400. The contract for the mess building, to the Forster Construction Company, had not had any money spent on it up to January 31. The same applies to the married quarters' contract to Peach and Company, for $35,169, which has not been commenced. The grading of the landing field, amounting to $128,756, of course was not commenced during the winter. The extension of the city services, work done by the city of Calgary, amounting to $47,000, has been almost completed. The sewer and water system within the barracks, being done by the city of Calgary at $110,000, had cost $15,000 up to the end of January. Then, of course, there was the purchase of the site. The minor services and incidental expenditures to the end of January amounted to $12,766.99.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has just informed my colleague that there were no public tenders requested, that a selected list of contractors were invited to tender on all this work, as I understand it.

Mr. STIRLING: In the neighbourhood of Calgary and Edmonton.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know where they live; I am merely asking the question. As I understand it the department took upon itself the responsibility of selecting half a dozen or less contractors to tender for this work. It was not opened to the public generally by advertisement. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, the practice followed for a considerable number of years was followed in this case. The total sum was divided up into a variety of contracts and they were let through a list, as contractors have been let for many years past.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not going to get into a controversy with the minister over this matter, but my attention has been directed to one of these contractors, a gentleman named Forster. Is it a fact that he should have commenced operations some time ago but has not done so as yet?

Mr. STIRLING: The Forster Construction Company contract was let on the 22nd of January.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the bond been put up for due performance of the work?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How long ago?

Mr. STIRLING: Before the contract was entered into.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But a start has not been made on the construction?

Mr. STIRLING: This progress list I have before me is made up to January 31. I am not in a position to say whether or not actual work has been commenced under that contract, but I can easily ascertain the facts.

Mr. STEWART (Elmonton): I am interested in this gentleman, because he is one of the faithful in Calgary and plays a pretty important part there. Before the estimates of the various departments are passed I intend to make further inquiries about the activities of this gentleman. He is sometimes engaged in contracting and sometimes not, but he has a considerable amount of say in connection with other contracts let in Calgary, particularly the sub-contractors who are doing work for the general contractors. I am very well acquainted with Bennett and White. They are very reliable contractors, and I am quite certain that the department can be assured of receiving full value in anything they may do, because they have had many years of contracting experience. So far as I know they do not belong to my political party, but they did a good deal of work for the department when I was minister.

I do want to say to the minister now that it will be worth his while to watch some of those contractors, and I am interested to know what progress this man Forster is making with his contract. If I am not misled by the information I have been given it will be worth while seeing that he performs to the fullest extent what he agrees to do. As I understand it this is not in any sense a military barracks; it is to house the police force in the province of Alberta, is it not? Is that not the main object of this building?

Mr. STIRLING: Permanent force barracks.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is already in Calgary a very fine barracks or armouries right in the centre of the city. If this is an additional barracks I suggest that it is quite unusual for a city the size of Calgary. There is a suitable armoury building located right in the heart of the city; perhaps the minister knows as much about it as I do. My understanding last year was that this new building was to be the headquarters of the police force for that province. The minister shakes his head; is that not a fact? Surely it is not another armoury? Has the minister some further explanation to give?

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I well recall that last year when this matter was being discussed the Prime Minister explained that the barracks in Calgary to which the hon. member is referring was the barracks of the non-permanent active militia, which for the time being was used by the permanent force of military district No. 13 pending the time when provision could be made for a barracks for that district. This is that barracks, and it is for the permanent force, not for the police. This will enable the non-permanent active militia to resume full use of their own armouries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry that I was misled by the explanation given by the Prime Minister last year; no doubt that was my fault. I fail to understand why a city like Calgary requires another armoury, as we call it, or barracks, when I do not know of another city in western Canada with a building of this sort. The impression I received last year was that probably the headquarters would be moved from Edmonton to Calgary. I well remember that I was confirmed in that impression because the city of Edmonton made a very considerable row over the matter shortly after the discussion arose in the house. I also recall that when this matter was being discussed the Prime Minister intimated that possibly there would not be a definite decision made with regard to the construction of this building, that the money might be used for some other purpose in order to provide relief. I think if my hon. friend looks up Hansard he will find the statement was made by the Prime Minister that nothing was definite about this. I admit at once that it was made after a good deal of discussion over this very matter, but do I understand that the city of Calgary is to have two fine, large armouries? The building located there now is a splendid armoury, of the regulation size, I should judge. Is this new building to house the Strathcona Horse? Of course that force has a splendid reputation and record, but why should it be continued and why should we continue to encourage and build up these forces in times like these and in a country like Canada? That is beyond my comprehension.

If it is definitely decided to go on with all this work, and if this is to be an additional armoury for the city of Calgary, all I can say to the minister is that I think the money might have been expended much more advantageously. One thing is certain, that this will not be relief in any sense, as we understand it in connection with the relief camps; this work will be paid for. I presume the cost comes out of the money voted under the general bill last year, but of course the Department of National Defence is in charge of the work. I do not know that I can make any further protest, but I will say to the minister that he had better pay very careful and close attention to the progress of this construction, which has been divided up in this way and the contracts for which have been let in this manner. Apparently the contractors have been selected and given the various units that are being constructed, with little or no competition except from others who were invited to be competitors. One can come to no other conclusion, and anyone who has had anything to do with public construction knows pretty well that it is not a very difficult matter for these gentlemen to get together and fix the price a building is going to cost. I want to register my protest against this sort of thing. If that is the method by which work is being carried on, either under the public works expenditure or with relief money, then I think the opposition are warranted in registering the strongest possible protest against this sort of thing. If one is to avoid criticism in letting contracts for buildings I would say the safest method to pursue would be that of allowing the general contractors to come in and do their bidding, rather than arousing suspicion by a selection of individuals who may tender on public works.

Mr. STIRLING: I have a clear recollection of what was said in the session of 1934 when we were considering a vote for a barracks—not an armoury—for the housing of the permanent force in this particular military district. It was contemplated that the department would build at Calgary, but at that time a site had not been definitely settled upon. Only a few weeks after the conclusion of the session the decision was made that Calgary would be selected as the site. As the hon. member knows, it is on the flat land above Sarcee camp. He has suggested that the selected list, as he has called it, was so small that there was no competition. I have before me a list of sixteen firms which were asked to tender on the piece of work the Forster Construction Company are now doing. I think he will agree that number of firms would afford a considerable amount of competition. The lowest figure was taken.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How did the government get the names of those firms?

Mr. STIRLING: In the ordinary manner followed by departments of government for a good many years past.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What departments?

Mr. STIRLING: As the hon. member was at one time minister of public works, I believe he will follow me.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, as I was at one time minister of public works I know that is not the way it should be done.

Mr. STIRLING: In this particular instance the Forster Construction Company was up against considerable competition. In a contract of that size it is rather interesting to note that the dollars separating the tenders were not very great. The lowest tender, for $147,500, was that of the Forster Construction Company.

Miss MACPHAIL: It seems we have mixed up expenditures on public buildings—mostly armouries—with a discussion on relief camps. I should like to say one or two things about each. It does seem to me that—I suppose we must say the government, but it has been true of other governments in the past—the government lacks imagination when it comes to expending public funds to provide work. I wish to protest as strongly as I can against the expenditure of vast sums of money on military buildings, arsenals, armouries or whatever they may be. In thinking over the things that Canada needs I would put additional armouries or military buildings at the bottom of the list rather than at the top. I can think of just a dozen other things which could be done. I dare say there would be constitutional objections, but one begins to notice that when governments want to get around constitutional objections they do not seem to have much difficulty. For instance, we could eliminate all level crossings in Canada. Of course that would be preventing people from being killed instead of getting ready for the killing of some more. We could carry out a large program of reforestation, something which is very much needed; and we could eliminate slums and build improved roads where they do not exist.

We could have sanitary equipment installed in homes already built, and could have extension of electrical energy to all houses in Canada. We could do all that. Then if we ran out of jobs we could have vast beautification projects, and could remove much of the man-made ugliness we find in Canada. One does see some very ugly things the removal of which would provide work. While the hon. member for Fraser Valley was speaking these ideas occurred to me. Oh, yes, we could have more post offices. Of course I do not know that we need clocks in the towers of all post offices, but let us have the post office buildings anyway. Then, we could have community halls through grants made by the federal government. Surely we do not have to go on with this stupid business of erecting more military buildings, especially in times like these, in order to provide work.

Now I come to the second point, namely relief camps. I wish I could agree with the optimism of the hon. member for Fraser Valley who thinks we soon will not have unemployment. I noticed only a few days ago the social services gave the number of those on relief as 1,350,000. That being the fact it would not look as though we would be free of unemployment for some time. If the minister insists upon all the expenditures being for buildings, I would suggest that we might build permanent homes for the unemployed, the people on relief. At the rate we are going it would seem that such action will be necessary.

I believe there are two points which may be argued against the camps as they are now conducted, one is that they are almost bound to undermine the spirit of the men. The second is that it is going to help continue the greatest of all our evils, namely the lack of purchasing power. The men in the relief camps are out of the purchasing group; they are not in a position to buy the things which other people want to sell. I think it would be very much better to spend even larger sums of money in public works, and to pay the men wages—not twenty cents a day; if only we could get around to doing something sensible and not spending the money in the erection of military buildings.

When speaking about the work which could be done I omitted to mention the reclaiming of the drought area. That would take a great deal of money and many men would be employed. Why not do it? But I think we are soon coming to the time—and as I sit here year after year I wonder how soon—when we are going to short circuit some consuming power from the central authority direct to the people. I shall name some of the ways in which we could relieve our present difficulties. We could give or—I shall use the word again—short circuit purchasing power, without putting it through production, direct to all the blind in Canada. I suggest that would be infinitely more sensible than building more armouries. We could have a superannuation scheme for all people in Canada who desire it. I am not dogmatic as to the age at which such a scheme should become operative; it might be sixty-five years or it might be sixty years, but I do suggest it should be at a sum upon which they could live comfortably. In that way we could increase purchasing power and absorb into productive industry many of the young men who are in labour camps. It would be better to spend two, three, four, even ten times as much money as we are spending, and thereby absorb these unemployed people into natural public works and natural jobs such as they would have had if we had not gone through these trying days. It would be better to do that than to spend less money and run the chance—and we certainly are running the chance—of having all these people in camps forever unemployable.

Some may ask: Where would we get the money? I suggest there are two ways. One is to tax very severely large pools of money, whether through income, inheritance or business profit pools, and the other would be to draw upon the national credit. A person may again ask: What is national credit? It simply means that the federal government would be doing the trick the bankers have learned to do so well—the making of money out of nothing. Coupled with that would come an increase in the price of farm commodities, through a depreciation of currency. I am better satisfied to make what I believe is a more constructive approach to the problem of relief camps than simply saying that the men running them are not preparing the right menus and so on. I am sure the men running them are doing the best they can, and I believe the minister is doing his best. I do not believe the present Minister of National Defence is responsible for the nonsensical expenditures suggested for military buildings. I believe he is a gentleman, and if he were allowed to do the sensible thing I am sure he would be only too glad to do it. But we have gone along stupidly for so long that if we did begin to do things according to common sense standards the shock would be too great. I can understand why the minister does not get around to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not understand the minister to indicate the proportion of the $2,530,000 to which we are now committed. I refer to the $2,530,000 allotted to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. STIRLING: Of the $2,500,000, roughly speaking, the amount to which we are committed is $1,495,094.33.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Have any of the contracts been let by public tender, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. STIRLING: The building for the Royal Military college at Kingston, $241,950, was let by public tender to Anglin & Norcross.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is that the only one?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it would save time if the minister would let us have, before the next sitting of the committee, a statement showing exactly what contracts have been let. The list of those let by public tender has been pretty well given, I take it, so that that will be rather short. The minister might let us have the expenditure up to the present time so that we shall know how much of that $2,530,000 is still uncommitted.

Mr. STIRLING: I was in process of reading the statement when I was interrupted by other questions. I had gone as far as item No. 18 for the barracks at Calgary and had begun to read item 33 of the Public Works Construction Act. For reconstruction of the R.C.A.F. station at Dartmouth, $15,000 was allotted and authority to execute the work under the direct supervision and control of the officers and employees of the department was granted by order in council. The expenditure to the last day of January was $13,572, so that that is almost complete. As regards item No. 37, the reconstruction of the armoury at Dundas, which was destroyed by fire, the contract was let to C. P. Muntz Limited for $41,290. That has only just been let. As regards item No. 84, which was the one I have already alluded to, the Royal Military College, first a contract was let for the pouring of the foundation walls to Holdcroft of Kingston, $3,281, and that is complete. A contract was let to the Hamilton Bridge Company for the supply and erection of structural steel, and the construction of the mess and recreation building for $241,950, was let to Messrs. Anglin & Norcross. That is the one I referred to as having been let by public tender. As regards item No. 100, the armoury for the Duke of York's Royal Canadian Hussars, that has not yet been let. Tenders have not yet been asked for that, but we are all but ready to ask for them. Item No. 123 is the new photographic building at Rockcliffe for the R.C.A.F., and authority to execute this work, under the direct supervision and control of the officers and employees of the department, was granted by order in council. That building was $37,700. As regards item No. 135, public buildings generally, that was a composite item, of which National Defence was allotted $472,000 and covers a variety of smaller pieces of work, of which perhaps the addition to the Windsor armoury was one of the larger ones, and that was let to R. J. Wilson & Company of Windsor, the contract amounting to $60,490. The addition to the Fredericton armoury was awarded to New Brunswick Contractors Limited of Fredericton, $29,370.

Mr. ELLIOTT: So far as I am concerned, if other members of the committee are of the same opinion, I have no desire to take up the time of the committee troubling the minister to read the statement. I would suggest that he place it on the table so as to give the committee the information which we should like to have. We could look it over and there might be questions which we should like to ask at the next sitting.

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If there is any information in connection with the matter which is not contained in the statement, I should be glad if the minister would be good enough to furnish it at the request of the committee. When he refers to the building at Kingston being let by public tender, why should a building at Kingston be let by public tender after public advertisement and all the rest of the buildings be let by private tender?

Mr. STIRLING: The building referred to there is a considerably larger one.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Larger than any of the others?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is that the minister's reason?

Mr. STIRLING: That is the reason.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was the price of the Kingston building?

Mr. STIRLING: The contract was for $241,950.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And the buildings covered by the balance, about a million and a half, are let by tender without public advertisement—I mean the total of them. What is the principle that governs, if there is a principle? What is it that determines whether it will be let by tender obtained after public advertisement or whether it will be let by inviting a number of people to submit private tenders? The minister is quite in error when he refers to the Department of Public Works as letting large quantities of its building program—or practically any quantity, unless it were an emergency where a work was being damaged by storms—by inviting tenders which were not publicly advertised. I think it is a most pernicious principle in the construction of public buildings, asking various people to submit tenders; it is not in the interests of the public and does not get the best results. Moreover, it makes trouble for the man in charge of the construction, the minister.

Mr. QUINN: Did you hold the same opinion five years ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and I practised it as a policy.

Mr. QUINN: I doubt it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Tell us where we erected buildings of this kind under the policy followed here, if you know anything about it.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member has referred to the difference between this contract which we are discussing and the total of $2,500,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total of what you are committed to.

Mr. STIRLING: I would point out that the total of what we are committed to is divided into a considerable number of contracts, and in some instances the desire was to employ contractors, if they were available, in these localities, and they would employ the tradesmen and people in the localities concerned who required work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that was the desire why not say that tenders will be received from people in the city of Calgary, or in the province of Alberta or of Ontario, or that only local contractors will be allowed to tender?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The former minister, I take it, wants to know on what principle the department decides to call for public tenders, and when it decides to confine it to a few invited friends. Is it decided by the size of the building or the cost, or what is the determining factor?

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. STIRLING: Each case is judged on its merits. I do not think the hon. member really means that a few invited people are asked to tender in connection with a certain building such as we have been describing. I have given one list in which sixteen firms in Calgary and vicinity were asked to tender, and in another instance eighteen. That pretty well covered the city of Calgary.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is true but it does not answer the question. Can public tenders not be called and the advertising, regardless of who the contractor may be, stipulate that local labour must be employed?

Mr. SANDERSON: Before the item passes, I should like to ask the minister whether he would be good enough to give to the committee a list of the relief camps by provinces, where they are located, and the number of men in each camp.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that I read that now?

Mr. SANDERSON: No, so long as it is on Hansard. Will the minister put it on Hansard?

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I might return to the question of the unemployment camps which I was discussing some time ago. Before doing so, I am reminded, on listening to the discussion and on hearing the details set forth by the minister, of a speech made some time ago by a United States senator, in the course of which he exclaimed that they were furnishing certified food for the Louisiana hogs and building palatial residences for the Mississippi mules, whereas the people of the city of New York were going without food and clothing and being allowed to starve to death. Here we are with one-half of the brains of the Department of National Defence being utilized in order to ascertain just how long and wide a black tie must be worn with a mess jacket, and the other half in designing stables in Calgary for the Strathcona Horse, while thousands of men throughout the country are being employed at twenty cents a day to take away work from married men, artisans and labourers who are entitled, if anybody is, to get a day's work from this government. It is a crying shame and a disgrace to our country and our civilization.

But before leaving this subject, I would like to get from the minister answers to two questions. The first is: How does he get away from the fair wage policy, so-called, of this government and of the government which preceded it? I am now quoting from the Labour Gazette. This is the act of May, 1930, the effect of which is stated in the Labour Gazette of March, 1932, to be:

This act applies both to contracts for the construction, remodelling, repairs or demolition of any work for the government of Canada, and to works carried out by day labour, and provides for the payment of "such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed for the character or class of work in which they are respectively engaged; provided that wages shall in all cases be such as are fair and reasonable;" also that "the working hours of persons while so employed shall not exceed eight hours per day."

That is the law. I am not quite sure whether the statute provides for day labour, but it certainly provides for contracts, and I think it provides for day labour on all construction work by any department of government. That is the law of the land. Am I to understand from the minister that there has been a derogation from the law in connection with these unemployment camps, particularly when they are carrying on construction work? I pause to ask the minister for a reply to that question.

Mr. STIRLING: As I pointed out before, we do not have to meet the difficulty to which the hon. member refers, because the unfortunate men who are without work and in the camps which are at present under discussion do not get wages; they receive food, shelter and certain other provisions, and they are given not a wage but an allowance of twenty cents a day.

Mr. POWER: So I am to understand that the answer of the minister is that because it is called an allowance he is permitted to violate the law of this country—

Mr. HANBURY: Because they do not call it wages.

Mr. POWER: —simply because they do not call it wages? This is what is stated in the Labour Gazette:

This act applies both to contracts for the construction, remodelling, repairs or demolition of any work for the government of Canada, and to works carried out by day labour—

And provides for the payment of wages—the government is obliged to pay wages; it is not obliged to get free work. The obligation entered into by the Canadian people with any person who is employed by the government of Canada is that he shall get wages. The provision goes further; it says that those wages shall be at the rate prevailing in the locality; it does not provide and it never was intended to provide that by calling this an allowance or saying it is free labour with a gift of twenty cents at the end of the day, the government can violate laws and repudiate the most solemn engagements entered into with the workmen of this country. I am anxious to find out by what authority this is done. I hate to use a word for which I might be called to order, but if it is simply by the subterfuge of saying that those men are not working for wages, I say to the minister that he is not serious when he tells us that. Those men are as much entitled to be paid as any other category of men. Simply because they happened when the minister picked them up to be in such a position that they could not bargain with him, is he to say: We are not going to give you any wages at all; we are going to treat you as slaves? If any individual, any ordinary employer of labour, tried to do that in any province where there is a minimum wage law, he would be put in gaol—

Mr. HANBURY: There would be a Stevens committee.

Mr. POWER: —or there would be a Stevens committee, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggests. A very large number of persons in the industries which were severely criticized in the Stevens committee were glad to take wages of ten, fifteen or twenty cents an hour. They had never had any wages at all before those factories were established in their communities. Will he allow these sweaters of labour to say: "We are not paying them wages; we are paying them allowances," and thus get away from their responsibility? I think we shall have to appeal to a higher authority than the ministers who are at present in the house. It seems to me that all these radio sermons will have been given in vain if the very ministers in the cabinet are to be able to say: We are not paying wages; we are paying allowances; we will give the men a package of cigarettes a day and let them work eight hours. If that is to be the effect of any minimum wage laws or social legislation that may be introduced in this country under the aegis of these great reformers, I regret it very much, but I think the Canadian people will soon know what to do with such reforms and the advocates of reform as we have them on the other side of the house.

Let me tell the minister what I suspect is the authority he has. I suspect the authority he has for paying these slave wages—

Mr. HANBURY: Allowances.

Mr. POWER: —is the peace, order and good government legislation; the very legislation which was crammed down our throats and passed by closure on the plea that it was to relieve the hungry, poor and miserable of this country is being imposed and enforced in order to lower the standard of living in Canada to a degree hitherto unknown. That is what I believe is the effect of the peace, order and good government legislation and what will ever be the effect of setting up a dictatorship in this country.

I come now to another point. The minister said that the department were spending $1,200,000 in Calgary to put up a military building, erecting a stable for the horses of the Strathcona Horse and a mess room for the officers. Last year they spent at Valcartier camp in Quebec $507,889.35 for, among other things, erecting a building in which to manufacture cartridges for the army in case we ever again go to war. Why should the building for the horses in Calgary be treated so far as labour is concerned on a different scale from the building for the purpose of making cartridges? I cannot see any distinction in principle. I will tell the minister this: neither he nor any other minister would dare go into Calgary and endeavour to justify the erection of a public building with twenty cents a day labour. But he is going to try to do it in Quebec.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The workers in Calgary are organized.

Mr. POWER: Our workers are organized, perhaps, but may not be so vociferous as those of Calgary, and they have not the same support in this house as the workers of Calgary have. Would the minister say that the Seaforth Highlanders armoury in Vancouver is to be erected by twenty cents a day labour? No fear. They would not dare to bring twenty cents a day labour into the city of Vancouver and take the bread and butter away from the people engaged there in the construction trades. Will they do it in any of the cities of Ontario? Will they do it in Belleville, where they are putting up a new gun shed. No fear. Will they do it in Kingston? Will they do it in Gananoque, in London, in Perth? No. But Quebec being a sane, quiet, conservative province, it is easy to say to our workmen: We will treat you well; we will give you an allowance of twenty cents a day. You do not have to be treated like the workmen of other parts of Canada; be grateful to the people who give you the job. My hon. friend says they did not even do it in Montreal, but perhaps he is not quite right, because in fact a large proportion of the men employed at Valcartier come from Montreal; they are not from the district of Quebec. The people from the district of Quebec who are in these camps are those employed in the citadel, and they are neither homeless nor indigent men; most of them are farmers' sons from the surrounding parishes, and it is these people you are using to take work away from the citizens of Quebec.

I think it is only fair that the minister should explain first how he gets away from the so-called fair wage policy, and second what argument was used by him or his colleagues or anyone in his department to bring about the decision that in one part of Canada they should carry on construction works at a fair and reasonable rate for labour and in another part should carry it on with slave labour. I think we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. STIRLING: In regard to the first reference that the hon. member has made, I have nothing to add to what I have already said. We do not pay a wage; we supply food and clothing and certain other assistance, including twenty cents a day allowance. With regard to why work is done in this way in one part of Canada and that way in another part, the work was devised in accordance with the requirements of the different parts of Canada. If there is a considerable number of unemployed men in Quebec as he has said, and there was desirable work to be done in that neighbourhood, the work was so done. In Alberta there is other work available for the single homeless unemployed for whom the dominion government is responsible. So there is in British Columbia; so there is in other parts of the prairie provinces. The men are employed in accordance with the requirements of the district where they are found in considerable numbers.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I would like to ask the hon. member for Quebec South one question. I understand that these were unemployed men who were brought or came into this camp, among whom there may be a few skilled workers. How is he going to use these men for construction work? Sometimes even in the building line men require brains, as they do in legal service. That may seem funny to the house, but it is possible. The difference between the two is that the builders produce something, while the legal services do not produce much, but live off the people. So there must be some brilliant labourers and some brilliant artisans in these unemployment camps. Would the hon. member for Quebec

South tell me how he is going to pay one man $5 a day and another twenty cents a day in that camp and have them in agreement?

Mr. POWER: It will not require any of the brilliance which is sometimes associated with the parasitic trade to which I belong to answer the hon. gentleman. Perhaps my hon. friend misunderstood me. What is going on in these camps is that skilled and unskilled labourers are building an arsenal. I am not urging the government to build an arsenal; as the hon. member for Southeast Grey has said, that is the last thing that is desirable, and it shows a remarkable lack of imagination on the part of the ministers that in this great crisis they can only think of putting up military buildings. But they are spending money to put up an arsenal with the labour of unemployed men. My hon. friend, I know, will feel, as I do, that those men should not be asked to do work which should be done by tradesmen and labourers of the vicinity. I think he will agree with me, now that he understands the question. Apparently he does not yet understand it. I shall have to send to Valcartier for some of those highly skilled artisans that he talks about to explain it to him. But now that he sees what it is about I think he will agree with me. My whole complaint—and I have been complaining for half an hour or more, probably too long—is that we are using that class of labour to carry on public works which should have been done under the Public Works Construction Act; that work of that kind should have been given to the unemployed married men who are on relief in the city of Quebec and vicinity where the work is being done. That is what should have been done; that is the whole point of my argument.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I would remind the hon. member for Quebec South that it takes an artisan or mechanic anywhere from four to six years to learn his trade. Now he is telling us that in these unemployment camps they are using men who just come in there for the purpose of putting up buildings.

Mr. POWER: Don't you use day labourers in your country?

Mr. PLUNKETT: That is not the question. I congratulate the government on their brilliance in finding mechanics in unemployment camps who can construct a building. I never heard of it before. If you engage a man to do a little work around your home, which I hope you will be able to do to help the situation, you will find that there is quite a difference between a skilled mechanic and an unskilled man.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry to say that having given myself to the service of my country I have no home. But there are something like 1,700 men in Valcartier camp, and whether or not they are competent to do the work, the work is being done. They are actually taking one brick and putting it on another, and taking a bit of cement and putting it on; they have a saw mill and are sawing up boards and taking them to another place and hammering them together, and that kind of thing. I do not know whether or not that is construction, but to me it looks like construction. Not only that, but the minister—and he is a good minister, such a good minister that he was selected from all the members from British Columbia to represent that province in the cabinet—this good minister in reply to a question put by me some time ago said they were building an arsenal. He did not say they were building it with artisans from elsewhere; he said they were building it with labour from that camp. It may be incomprehensible to my hon. friend, but that is what he is doing. Now does the hon. gentleman understand?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not said anything with regard to these camps, because the ground has been so well covered by some of my colleagues. I should like, however, to join with them in protesting against these camps being placed under the Department of National Defence. That should never have been done. If we had had a labour department worth anything at all such provision for the unemployed would have been put under the labour department, where it ought to be. It is almost adding insult to injury to place the unemployed under the control of the national defence department. I am not suggesting that much of the work has not been well done; I think it has. In many ways the men are better in these camps than they might be in the congested quarters in which some would be living in the cities; nevertheless it is not a policy that as a country we should adopt in dealing with the unemployed.

Then I should like to join with my friend the member for Southeast Grey in saying that the kind of work which men should be called upon to do is necessary work. I need not traverse the ground that she so admirably covered as to the many projects that are very much needed in this country, this only half developed country of ours; yet we go on making the men mark time, as it were, for they cannot throw themselves with any enthusiasm into most of the work they are required to do in these camps. I also feel that we are under a considerable debt of gratitude to-night to the hon. member for Quebec South for having put the case of the men so strongly. Although we say we are offering them a living, men in this country should have much more than a living. In reality it is not a living, it is only a poor subsistence. I am not going to worry whether they get a sufficient number of ounces of food to maintain them; perhaps they do. But it is a serious indictment of the policy of this country when the hon. member for Fraser Valley says that these men are getting better food than the majority of the people. I think it is a terrific indictment if the majority of the people in Canada are getting worse than they are getting in these camps. But it is not so much the quality of the food or this or the other detail; it is that the people of this country have a right to a full life, and these men are not getting a full life. You say they go into the camps voluntarily. That may be true, but what are the alternatives? As a rule the alternatives are simply two, either crime or starvation; those are the practical alternatives. When these men go out and attempt to carry on in an irregular way they are run in as criminals, but the only other alternative is for them to starve. Under such circumstances they go into the camps voluntarily. I am not so much concerned with whether they are skilled or unskilled, but I think it a serious thing that we should permit men who have spent many years in acquiring a trade to work for twenty cents a day, as I have seen them work in these camps. It is almost as bad to have unskilled men who could make a decent living if they had an opportunity working for the same small amount, call it an allowance if you like.

I am not going further into that matter to-night. On behalf of my constituents and others in this country I want to protest against the enormous expenditures which are being made in Canada for military purposes. We have formally declared that we have abandoned war as an instrument of national policy, yet we are constantly spending large sums in war preparations. I quite freely grant that as compared with certain European countries, even with England, or as compared with Japan our military expenditures are not heavy—

An hon. MEMBER: How about Russia?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Or Russia; quite so. Their military expenditures are heavy. I quite agree that compared with these countries Canada does not spend a great deal, but I submit that in comparison with other expenditures in this country these sums are very heavy. If you put all the expenditures for national defence together, including the militia services, the naval service and aviation, most of which comes under this department, you have a total of about $15,000,000. Then if you take our mounted police, which is practically a military force, you have another $6,000,000. There you have over $20,000,000, and on top of that you have these expenditures being made for elaborate public buildings for military purposes. The case of Calgary has been cited already. We have the barracks for the militia; we are to have a new building for the permanent force and we are told that in addition we need some sort of home for the mounted police, all in our little city of Calgary, and the same is more or less true of some other cities. Where are we getting in this country? Some of us had imagined that Canada was a peaceful country, but this does not look very much like it. We cannot find the money for peace purposes. Why, it was only to-day at noon that I happened to be attending a meeting of the executive of the League of Nations Society, and I found them struggling to get enough money to carry on the distribution of their literature. They receive a net grant from this government of something like $2,000. The government can spend some $20,000,000 in national defence, but the same government throws out a mere $2,000 to an organization that is trying to support the policies of peace for which the League of Nations is supposed to stand. So we have $10,000 given to the national defence department and the allied services for every one dollar given to such an organization as the League of Nations Society. I am not here to point out the excellent work that is done by that society, but I think that is a fair way of looking at our expenditures. We spend enormous sums on national defence, so called, but we spend very little on those constructive measures which might prevent us from ever being dragged into another war.

We have a new minister this year, and I should like to direct to him some questions which I have asked his predecessors and to which I have received no satisfactory replies. Why the expenditure of this $15,000,000 by his department? For what particular purpose is this money being spent? When we consider the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, for example, we ask them why they are spending the money and they tell us of this, that and the other thing which they have in view. I should like to ask, and I think we have a right to hear from the minister, why we need this huge expenditure of $15,000,000 in this peaceful country of ours. Has the Department of National Defence a policy for defending this country? If so I think the house should know what it is. I should like to know whether the minister has met with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I suppose in this case is the Prime Minister, who perhaps is overloaded with other duties and has not much opportunity to devote himself to external affairs. Even at that I would ask if the Minister of National Defence has consulted with the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the general policies of Canada with regard to foreign nations. One of the predecessors of the present minister told me across the floor of the house that the only reason we needed an army in Canada was to keep our own unruly elements in order. I can hardly believe that he was serious in that statement, but if he was we ought to know it. Does it take this $15,000,000 to keep the unruly elements in order? If it does I think a little larger allowance than twenty cents a day would go a long way in dissipating the unrest we have in Canada; I think it would go much further than $15,000,000 spent in repressive measures. But I do not believe that can possibly be the real reason why we have an army and a navy, such as it is, in Canada; I cannot think it is the real reason.

I take it that this is more or less of a hangover from the old days when, for some reason or other, we were under the impression that preparedness was an insurance against war. That was the old idea. Is the minister convinced that that is true to-day? Surely the last war must have convinced every thinking man that those nations which were the best prepared were among the greatest sufferers. Preparedness is no guarantee whatever that we will not be dragged into another war; the contrary is the case. When we are armed we are more apt to be attacked, and sometimes perhaps we are a little more apt to exhibit an aggressiveness which is rather provocative to other nations. There would be no guarantee even if we had a large army that we would be saved from another war.

Now let us come to concrete matters. I think we ought to know who is the possible enemy that Canada is likely to face. I have said to previous ministers that I cannot very well conceive that we are going to fight the United States. I think we would be very foolish to attempt anything of the kind, and I do not think the United States has any hostile feeling towards her northern neighbour. Are we going to fight on the Atlantic or the Pacific? I think we should consider these points. Then may I point out that if we are going to defend ourselves alone, this little army and this tiny navy that we have would be absolutely useless against any large nation. What could we do with our small army and navy, even with the air force, which seems to be growing? What could we do? The next question is, are we going to ally ourselves with some other nation? Are we going to throw ourselves into a defensive alliance with the United States? That has been suggested by some people. It has been said that if Japan, for example, should break loose across the Pacific and threaten the Pacific coast, then the only possible thing for us to do would be to join forces in some way with the United States. I do not know whether these two boats of ours that now convoy the seals from the United States border up to Alaska are supposed to be sufficient to guard our shores against the attack of Japan; I cannot think it. Then are we going to enter into some sort of defensive alliance with the United States? The Secretary of State for External Affairs has never informed us with regard to that matter. I hope that when his estimates come up some hon. members will raise the question. If someone else does not do it I think I shall be tempted to do it myself, because I think we should know. I mention it at this time because it does seem to me that the policy of the Department of National Defence ought to be very closely correlated with the policy of the Department of External Affairs.

Are we proposing to enter into an alliance with the United States? On the other hand are we proposing to back up Great Britain? There have been suggestions in the last few months that the presence here of certain high officials from Great Britain would lead us to believe that some arrangement was being developed under which we would have a sort of imperial defence alliance. I should like to ask the minister, before he is through with this item, to tell us whether there is any ground whatever for believing that he or any of his officials have entered into any arrangement with Great Britain with regard to national defence. Is our air force to become a unit in an imperial air force? In considering these matters I think we have a perfect right to know whether or not something of that kind is in the wind. Further than that I think the Canadian people would like to know what the position of Canada is going to be if a war should break out in Europe, which is not an impossibility. I remember once mentioning this matter two or three years ago and one of the ministers answered by stating simply that when I referred to war I was encouraging war. To me that is the veriest nonsense. In my view we ought to be open eyed and open minded enough to look at the possibilities. If a war should break out in Europe is Canada to be called upon to go to the defence of the motherland or of some other nations in Europe? That is a question which should be answered. I believe I would be expressing the opinion of what could be called the ordinary man in the street were I to say that if a European war broke out no Canadian troops would be allowed to leave this country to go to Europe. I believe that would be the general feeling. I should like to know whether or not that is the policy which has been adopted by the department, or whether they contemplated that Canada at some future time again might be called upon to go to the help of Great Britain in connection with some trouble concerning which until that time we had had nothing whatever to say.

Then there is the further matter of our relationship with the League of Nations. Any person who has followed closely the work of the League of Nations will know that again and again there have been discussions as to how far Canada would be involved in the event of a war breaking out in which league members were involved. I know that Canada has signed that part of the treaty with some reservations; yet we are part of the league. We would call upon the league to assist us if our borders were being attacked. Have we any responsibility towards other nations? Is it wise that our air force, we will say, should be internationalized so that it might act as a police force and go to the help of any nation finding itself in difficulty? We have never to my knowledge had a frank discussion of such matters in this chamber. Year after year we have come here and voted $10,000,000 or $20,000,000—enormous sums—but we have not inquired what all this money is for. I am not blaming the minister for not hitherto having made a statement on this matter, because he has only recently taken over the Department of National Defence. He is an intelligent man; surely he must have made some sort of survey of the whole situation. That is his department; that is his job. I say that we in this House of Commons are entitled to know something about the conclusions at which he has arrived, and that we should not simply go on voting these moneys for purposes which are very vague indeed.

I have no doubt some of the newspapers will report me as saying that, assisted by the hon. member for Southeast Grey, I made my annual protest against war. Yes, but these matters come up annually, and I am convinced the only way in which we can represent our constituencies and make our contribution to the general welfare is by stating frankly when these matters are brought before the house what we believe. I was present, and I believe a good many other members were present, at the Capitol theatre to see the showing of the picture Lest We Forget. Unfortunately I was not in a position to attend until rather late, but I did see part of the picture. I do not believe anyone could see that picture without being stirred—stirred not because it showed that finally the allies were victorious, not because some of the heroes of the war appeared on the screen and were cheered, but stirred by the thought that in a great modern war the individual is absolutely helpless, that it is all such a waste of human life and heroism. It is all a waste. One is almost obsessed with the utter helplessness of all in it. You saw those poor German boys coming up, and you felt pity for them. "They ought never to have been called to the front," you say? Yes, but our guns were blowing them to smithereens, just as their guns were mowing down our Canadian boys.

An hon. MEMBER: We cannot do anything about it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I hear someone say, "We cannot do anything about it." That is just where I differ from my friend across the way. Surely we as intelligent people must not simply throw up our hands in despair. A year ago I had the opportunity for a few moments to speak to a group of returned men, and I ventured to say to them that I thought their job was not complete until they had established peace in the world. I believe that is true; their job is not complete, and our job as citizens is not by any means complete when we choose simply to sit down helplessly and do nothing while all the time war forces are steadily extending themselves.

I suppose I am as proud as anybody of Great Britain; I think I am, but I am not proud of the fact that so far as we can see Great Britain is simply falling in line with other nations and building more and more ships, thereby adding more and more to her military equipment. I suppose Great Britain has as much right to do that as has France, Germany or other nations; but that is not the point. I hope no hon. member will say, Oh, well, this is being said simply because I am against Great Britain, or something of that kind. That is not the idea. I go back to the atmosphere of last night's picture, and I believe no one could easily get away from the idea that we must rise above narrow nationalism if we are to get anywhere in the solution of this great problem. That is my reaction. We must rise above narrow nationalism and that narrow nationalistic spirit which has characterized us in the past, if we are to find a solution of the great world problem which confronts us.

At this time, when the estimates for the Department of National Defence are before us, I take the opportunity to state that if we simply pass them and year after year say nothing, we are not doing as much as intelligent citizens of Canada should do towards the solution of the peace problem. I do not think we are. I object to that fatalistic idea that the problem is too big for us, that we cannot do anything about it, and that we must sit down and let things go. Of course we say that if some of these times things break loose we will have a few trained men who will be able to organize our forces, drill us and march our boys away to a still greater slaughter than we had last time. I do not think that is good enough. Surely we know enough about science to-day to realize that every effect has some very definite cause. We are learning that in the medical realm; we know that certain germs are responsible for disease. Our social engineers and medical men have worked to get rid of many of the diseases which have harmed us in the past. I would urge that we apply similar reasoning and a similar technique to the great social problem now before us. I do not think that wars come out of the thin air. I do not think that they come, as we sometimes say, using a pious phrase, by "act of God" in punishment for our sins. We know perfectly well that war comes from certain predisposing causes, and we in Canada, though a small country so far as population goes, are surely one country in the world which has very considerable influence. If we are fifth or eighth—whatever it is—among the trading nations of the world, and if we are allied with a great empire on the one hand and neighbour to a great nation, the United States, on the other, surely we are in a position to do something to save ourselves from any such cataclysm as came upon the world back in 1914. I do not think we serve any useful purpose simply by going out and praying, "Give peace in our time, O Lord!" No, that will not bring peace. We have to do it in a more constructive way than that—a much more constructive and more definite way. So I plead while these estimates for the Department of National Defence are under consideration that the minister give us some outline as to what is in his mind, and as to what is in the minds of officials of the department with regard to the purpose for which these funds are being expended. Further than that, if I am not considered too idealistic, I should like to have this chamber devote a little bit of time before the estimates are passed to a consideration of the definite and constructive steps which we might take towards making our contribution to world peace.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the Minister of National Defence be good enough to place upon Hansard a list of the relief camps, by provinces, where they are located and the number of men in each?

Mr. STIRLING: I understand that tables should not be placed on Hansard unless they are read to the house. I had the information in front of me, and for the past half hour I have been ready to read it, but at the present time it would not look as though there would be time to place the information on Hansard. It could not be completed by eleven o'clock. I wonder if it would suit the purposes of the committee if the information were tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By consent it may be done.

Mr. MANION: I wish to say a few words, because it is obvious the committee does not intend to allow the item to pass to-night. As an ordinary citizen I resent the idea that Canada should be painted as she has been painted to-night by hon. members from various sections on the opposite side of the house, in an effort to show that so far as the treatment of the unemployed is concerned we are in a class by ourselves. Listening to this discussion, as I have been listening since eight o'clock, one would come to the conclusion that Canada alone of all the countries in the world has been having some trouble in regard to unemployment. No mention has been made by any speaker on the other side, whether among the Liberals or in the little group in the corner—and they can become more excited than the Liberals on a question of this kind—no hon. member, I say, has admitted that at any time in the last four years the world has been going through a very serious crisis. No hon. gentleman has suggested or admitted that Canada is merely participating in a world wide crisis. But I make this statement, that Canada has come through the crisis better than any other country in the world, and I make no exception to that statement. I do not except Great Britain or any other country. According to the figures given out by Great Britain and by the United States, the two countries with which we most frequently compare ourselves, Great Britain has more unemployment according to population than we have to-day. Her figure is 2,500,000 and her population is four times ours. In other words, on that basis, we should have about 600,000 unemployed, whereas we have been 450,000 and 500,000. And in the United States it is admitted by the government itself that they have 10,000,000 unemployed. Indeed it is claimed by Green of the Labour group over there that the number of unemployed in that country is between 11,000,000 and 12,000,000, which is twice as large as ours, per thousand of population. There have been 30,000,000 unemployed throughout the world, yet Canada has taken care of her unemployed better than any other country.

The hon. member for Quebec South is usually pretty fair, but he is playing good politics; I will not question that. But he attacked us in regard to the relief camps and he called them slave camps. I do not think that was worthy of him. His predecessor of the same race who went to the provincial house used to talk about slave camps and I thought we were rid of that word when he left us, because it is ridiculous. If it is slavery to take boys who are running around getting into mischief, who have nothing to do, who have nothing to engage either mind or hand, and to bring these boys into camps and feed, clothe and shelter them, and give them a little money to spend while they are working in these camps—if that is slavery, then I know of millions of people in various parts of the world who would love to indulge in slavery of that kind.

Mr. POWER: They gave the same excuse when they took the negroes from Africa.

Mr. MANION: And as the Minister of Finance says, they go voluntarily to the camps; they are not driven there. One of my hon. friends from one of the Vancouvers complained bitterly because one of these men had been called an agitator and had been turned out of the camps. He went under an assumed name to five or six different camps and was kicked out of each one. He must have been a rotten agitator and I imagine he was well kicked out. But he asked to get back into the camps; he kept changing his name, begging his way back into the camps, and he must have liked them. I am not trying to introduce politics into this. But because I speak in a firm or fairly emphatic voice I am accused of playing politics, though my hon. friends can talk any way they like and that is not politics. I am merely stating the Canadian point of view when I say that I do not think it is good for this country that anyone should be continually describing conditions in Canada as if we treated our unemployed worse than other countries have treated theirs, when as a matter of fact we have treated ours better. No one can become so excited on this question as the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. One would think that he was the only man in this chamber who was interested in the Canadian people who are unemployed. I make this statement without fear of contradiction, that there is not a gentleman on the other side of the house or on this who is not just as much interested in the unemployed and in the poor as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—no one on either side of the house, either the lady member or any hon. gentleman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANION: Keep your seat; I have the floor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask that that expression be withdrawn. There is nothing I said that warranted such a statement.

Mr. MANION: I have nothing to withdraw. The hon. gentleman has stood up forty times in my hearing and in a loud and emphatic voice talked about the unemployed and the injustice done them. He works himself into a passion, and if he were full blooded he would burst a blood vessel; but he is not a bit more interested than anyone else in the unemployed except to appeal to the group who are unemployed, and appeal in a demagogic way. He is not a bit more interested in the unemployed than is any hon. gentleman either on the other side or over here.

And when he starts talking about peace, can he tell me one person in all this country who suggests anything but peace? Is there anyone in Canada who does not want peace?

There are a few hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house who went over to the front, and I can say that there is no one in the whole world who wants peace more than the men who were at war. Yet the hon. gentleman talks about peace as if Canada were preparing for war. Well, after listening to a lot of this balderdash—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANION: —I have copied down—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I ask for your ruling as to whether that expression used by the minister—balderdash—is parliamentary or not.

Mr. MANION: It is the best I can think of.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask that the word be withdrawn.

Mr. MANION: It is at least better than the word humbug, which is so often used around this house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask that the word be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stewart, Lethbridge): I fancy that the minister did not apply that word to the hon. gentleman personally.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not understand the English language if he did not, and I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: I do not withdraw it, because I apply it to what the hon. gentleman has said in many of his speeches. It is a description that can be given his speeches.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. I claim that the word is unparliamentary and the minister should withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: I submit it is not unparliamentary. It is as good a word as humbug or rubbish, and either one of those words would be applicable to a great deal of what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stewart Lethbridge): I must rule that the minister applied the word to the hon. gentleman's opinions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not a ruling. I appeal against the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MANION: That is the way the hon. gentleman takes his medicine. He sees it is nearly eleven o'clock—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appeal against the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. MANION: I should like to put on record—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have appealed against the ruling of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stewart, Lethbridge): Does the committee desire that I state the case or will the committee vote without having it stated?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think, Mr. Chairman, that once the ruling of the chair is appealed against the rules are plain that the chairman must state the case in writing.

Mr. MANION: If it will save time, I will withdraw the word. I would rather sleep than spend the time in voting. I know how the vote will go. I withdraw the word if it will permit me to put on record certain figures I have here. I was going to give the cost per capita of various countries for defence purposes. Here are the figures:

Canada	$ 1 24
New Zealand	1 50
Denmark	2 18
South Africa	2 20
Australia	2 40
Japan	3 70
Belgium	4 10
United States	5 60
Switzerland	6 00
Italy	8 00
Great Britain and Northern Ireland	9 50
France	14 80

Canada is the lowest in the world. Even Switzerland spends $6 per capita, and I cannot remember from my historical reading when she was ever in a war; yet Canada, with an expenditure of $1.24, is talked about as if she were getting ready for a war. I am sure that all nations are trembling as to what we shall do with this great military power of ours.

We talk about the treatment of our people, and we hear a great deal about the wickedness of capitalism. Well, there is only one country that has tried anything but capitalism and that is Russia. And Russia has had in the last year at least 5,000,000 people who have starved to death.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And they have the biggest air force in the world.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and some of the greatest military defences of all kinds. No one realizes more than I do that there have been some terrible errors committed by capitalism, but decent people of all parties in this country are trying to work out something in the way of a remedy for the condition that exists, and I submit that we should not take the attitude of always belittling our own country. We should not take the attitude that Canada has done so badly, because the fact of the matter is that she has done better than any other country in the world.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 11, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF HON. RAYMOND MORAND, M.D., MEMBER FOR EAST ESSEX

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, owing to the unfortunate death of Mr. LaVergne last week, the office of Chairman of Committees is now vacant. This office carries with it the duties of Deputy Speaker. I move:

That the Hon. Raymond Morand, M.D., member for the electoral district of East Essex, Ontario, be appointed Chairman of the Committees of the whole house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would like simply to say that Doctor Morand has evidently made himself popular on both sides of this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: —a very desirable attribute for the Chairman of the Committee. Doctor Morand is getting to be one of the older members now, as he was first elected in 1925, and I feel sure he will carry out his duties in this office with impartiality and satisfaction to both sides of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): It will be apparent to Your Honour that as far as it is possible for hon. members on this side to make the motion of my right hon. friend unanimous, we are only too ready so to do. The house generally will regard the nomination of the hon. member for East Essex as a very happy one. He possesses the temperament and other qualities which eminently fit him for the position of Chairman of the Committees of the house and Deputy Speaker, and I am sure we shall all have reason to take pride in the manner in which he presides, in his impartiality and his general efficiency.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Probably as far as this section of the house is concerned I have been more closely associated with the hon. member for East Essex than most others, especially in connection with the work of the radio committee. I must say that if he can handle the house as elegantly and harmoniously as he handled that committee—as I think he will—no mistake has been made in his appointment. I feel sure that we can offer him our cooperation and congratulations.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, respecting the additional protocol of 1935 to the Canada-France trade agreement of 1933.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This bill is for the purpose of enacting changes in the arrangement between Canada and France which have been made by mutual consent, and which will appear in the bill itself

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 31 for the relief of Travor Eardley-Wilmot.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EMPIRE TRADE AGREEMENTS AND RECIPROCITY WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. SEGUIN:

Considering the results of the agreements of the imperial conference, held at Ottawa, could Canada immediately put into operation a general reciprocity treaty with the United States without previously obtaining the authorization of the British government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No authorization from the British government would be necessary but in negotiating any trade treaty we must bear in mind the obligations entered into under existing trade agreements.

AUDITOR-GENERAL'S REPORTS ON UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN QUEBEC

Mr. GIROUARD:

Did the auditor general of Canada, in addition to reports tabled in this house, present other reports to the Minister of Labour or to officials of his department, respecting the audit in his department and the control of amounts paid to the province of Quebec following investigations mentioned in reports already produced?

Mr. RHODES: Reports of the auditor general on unemployment relief expenditures are made to the Minister of Finance who transmits a copy to the Department of Labour. In addition to reports tabled in the House of Commons, the following reports were received:

Expenditures on relief works, city of Montreal, 1930 and 1931 acts—report dated July 6, 1934;

Provincial accounts for relief works and direct relief, 1930 act—report dated December 11, 1934.

REPARATIONS PAYMENTS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Have all the cases of reparations claimed by civilians for war damages been heard and passed upon by the commissioner?
2. Are some of the awarded claims still unpaid?
3. If so: (a) how many claims are still unpaid; (b) for what reason; (c) what are the amounts of said claims?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. The final report of the commissioner was dated March 4, 1933, and was printed by order of parliament. It disposed of all claims not heard by previous commissioners or which had been filed to the date of the final report.

2. Yes.

3. (a) 4. (b) Claimants cannot be located. (c) $3,057.64.

ENGINEERING STANDARDS ASSOCIATION

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Is the Canadian Engineering Standards Association in receipt of a subsidy from the federal government?
2. If so, what is the amount of such subsidy?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. The Canadian Engineering Standards Association is a separate corporate body, but in order to coordinate its activities with those of the National Research Council the main committee of the Canadian Engineering Standards Association has been created an associate committee of the National Research Council. This committee receives financial support from the National Research Council on the same basis as other associate committees of the council. The amount varies according to the exigencies of the work undertaken by the committee. The C.E.S.A. also receives considerable financial support from Canadian industries interested in and benefited by its activities.

2. During the fiscal year 1933-34—$2,300.

J. E. LAFORCE

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to a telegram read by the Hon. W. A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, on April 27, 1933, in the House of Commons (Hansard, page 4326), and signed by J. E. Laforce,—

1. Was the said J. E. Laforce then employed in any of the departments headed by the Hon. W. A. Gordon?
2. If so, which one and was it his duty to report to the said minister?
3. If not, did the Hon. W. A. Gordon, or anyone on his behalf, communicate by telephone, letter or telegram with the said J. E. Laforce, before the latter sent the telegram already referred to?
4. If so, when and why?
5. Before proceeding to read that telegram, did the Hon. W. A. Gordon refer to a "committee with respect to this work"?
6. If so, what was that committee, who were the people who formed it, and what was its purpose?
7. Were any of the departments of the federal government represented on such committee?
8. If so, by whom?
9. What was the occupation of the said J. E. Laforce when he sent the telegram referred to to the Hon. W. A. Gordon, and in what capacity did he do so?

Mr. GORDON:

1. No.
2. Answered by 1.
3. No.
4. Answered by 3.
5. Yes.
6. The agreement regarding relief settlement between the dominion government and the province provides, "The province shall set up and advisory committee upon which shall be included representatives of the dominion land settlement branch, the colonization branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the colonization branch of the Canadian National Railway.
7. Yes.
8. J. G. Russell, district superintendent, soldier settlement of Canada, Sherbrooke, P.Q.
9. Colonization representative, Canadian National Railway.

CANADIAN BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. COOTE:

What is the number and aggregate amount of deposits payable on demand in Canadian chartered banks in each of the following classes:—

(a) (1) Deposits under $1,000; (2) Deposits over $1,000 to $5,000; (3) Deposits over $5,000 to $25,000; (4) Deposits over $25,000 to $100,000; (5) Deposits in excess of $100,000?

(b) What is the number and value of deposits payable after notice in Canadian banks in the same size groups?

Mr. RHODES: The answer to this question will be found in the return which was tabled on the first of March.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. SPENCER:

How many parcels of land in the following categories have been forfeited to the soldier settlement board through the inability of the farmer to meet his liabilities since the soldier settlement board started operations (a) soldier grants; (b) homesteads; (c) second homesteads?

Mr. SPENCER: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

NEWMARKET CANAL—CONSTRUCTION

Mr. TUMMON:

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In view of the fact that the fiscal year ends on the 31st of March might I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) when he expects to make an announcement to the house with respect to the government policy concerning the unemployment relief situation for the ensuing year.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The policy to be adopted by the government with respect to unemployment of course has been under consideration constantly. The measure I trust will be introduced in the course of the next few days, and when it is introduced it will disclose what the government will ask from parliament in the way of authority to carry on work in connection with assistance to the unemployed and to the provinces whose primary duty it is to take care of matters of this character.

VAUTRIN COLONIZATION SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) if he has given his final answer to the proposal made by the government of the province of Quebec in connection with the expenditure of $10,000,000 to send young people back to the land, otherwise known as the Vautrin colonization scheme. I saw an announcement in the press the other day in this regard and I should like to ask if the minister has finally concluded not to participate in that scheme.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The Vautrin plan was brought to my attention and, through me, to the attention of the government some weeks ago, following the address made by Mr. Vautrin to the convention he called together at Quebec to consider this plan. Of course I am and always have been agreed that there is a very great deal of room for the activities of all those engaged in colonization in connection with our own people here in Canada. I believe I am correct in stating that such colonization is one of the matters coming directly within the ambit of provincial activity, particularly in view of the fact that at the moment, as for some time past, all the lands capable of being used for this purpose belong to the provinces.

The matter was given very great consideration by me, and my views were laid before the government. I do not believe the dominion government should participate in a colonization plan of this character. Members of the house will remember that assistance was offered and given in a modest way, with no limitation being placed upon the number that could be assisted, but this was not in the nature of a state-aided colonization plan; rather it was a plan that we hoped would appeal to the provinces and the municipalities. To a considerable measure it did appeal to them and was taken advantage of by them. If my recollection serves me right the agreements with the provinces, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, are still in force and the plan outlined was in fact entirely in the nature of a plan to relieve unemployment to the extent that it would place people on the land; it was a relief plan pure and simple. It may be that time will disclose the desirability of the dominion government assisting provincial colonization plans, but at the moment the decision of the government is that assistance will not be given to such a plan as the Vautrin scheme.

ILLNESS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I regret to have to inform the house that the Prime Minister still is not very well and will be confined to his apartment for some time yet. His medical adviser, Dr. R. S. Stevens, has given me the following statement:

> The Prime Minister's recovery was uneventful until Thursday last, when he suffered a syncopal attack. Following this there was some disturbance of cardiac rhythm. This has now disappeared, and his general condition is improving. This, which is not serious in itself, necessitates further rest. The respiratory infection which appeared February 24, with long continued overwork and strain, undoubtedly precipitated his illness.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I hasten to say to my right hon. friend that I am sure all hon. members of this house will learn with very deep regret that the Prime Minister's indisposition is as serious as is indicated in the communication just read. We will all hope, with the acting leader of the government and hon. gentlemen opposite, that by taking the rest which his physician has advised the Prime Minister may have not only a speedy but a complete recovery, and that he may soon be back in this house again. May I say to my right hon. friend that in the meantime if by arrangement with him I am able to do anything to facilitate and expedite the business of the house in the absence of the Prime Minister I shall feel it a privilege so to do. I am sure that in saying this I am only voicing the will and wish of all the members of the opposition to cooperate with the government in order that there may be occasioned as little in the way of embarrassment as possible.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I, on behalf of the Prime Minister, thank the right hon. gentleman for his kind words. I shall certainly see that they are placed before the Prime Minister at the earliest opportunity.

MINIMUM WAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the draft convention appearing on the orders of the day for to-day, and in connection with the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery may I say that I have before me the journal of the League of Nations, and although the convention appears on the order paper to have been passed in the month of June, 1928, I do not find it. May I ask the acting Prime Minister if he would be good enough to see to it that the page number is given when the matter is under discussion?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall see the question in Hansard, and from that I shall be in a position to prepare the answer.

BUTTER PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to put a question to the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley), in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is not in his seat. My question is based on an article appearing in the Border Cities Star of Friday, March 8, and stating that while butter sells in Windsor at twenty-seven cents per pound it sells in Detroit at forty-five cents per pound. Would the acting Prime Minister be kind enough to explain the difference in prices between these two points?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I believe the hon. member has read only a newspaper statement, but although the Minister of Agriculture is not present to-day I shall have him look into the matter.

Mr. BERTRAND: If the statement is accurate may I expect an answer from the acting Prime Minister to-morrow?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No hurry.

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are in my constituency a number of holders of Toronto Suburban Electric bonds I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if recently there have been any negotiations with respect to the interest rate upon retirement of those bonds?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman told me a couple of days ago that he was going to ask the question, and because in the past other hon. members have asked similar questions, I made inquiries about the matter. I find that before the settlement was made as of June 30, 1934, there were outstanding of the Toronto Suburban Railway Company four and a half per cent first mortgage debenture stock on the Canadian register £267,739 and on the London register £272,261. That is an amount which in round figures would total a little more than £500,000. Since then there have been redeemed on the Canadian register, up to March 6, 1935, £253,537 and on the London register up to February 6, 1935, £271,561. This leaves a balance outstanding out of little more than £500,000 of only £10,094 on both registers.

OTTAWA AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one day last week the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) asked a question regarding an article signed by F. J. Savage and which dealt with the Ottawa agreements. I have made inquiry and in reply I would say to the hon. member that the government of the United Kingdom has not indicated to the Canadian government any intention or desire to revise the trade agreements entered into between the United Kingdom and Canada in August, 1932.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

BILL TO LIMIT HOURS OF WORK IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the opposition): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising is not to oppose the second reading but simply to say that I believe the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) wished to say something on the bill on second reading. However what he has in mind to say can, I imagine, be said as well on the motion for third reading, which I presume will not be moved to-day. When the resolution on which this bill was founded was before the house both the hon. member for Quebec East and myself made some remarks concerning it. Anything I might say at this stage will, I believe, have been covered by what has already been said.

Motion, agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members, before beginning my duties I should like to thank you for the manner in which my appointment was received, and for the very friendly words which have been said. My only hope would be that when I leave the office I may carry with me the same friendly feelings.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): I am really happy to thank the hon. members of this house for my appointment.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the discussion I should like to direct the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to a question I asked on February 26, and which is reported at page 1201 of Hansard. Upon that occasion I directed attention to article 19 of the convention, which appears at page 109 of the votes and proceedings for February 8. Article 19 is as follows:

> Each member which ratifies this convention agrees to bring its provisions into operation not later than July 1, 1921, and to take such action as may be necessary to make these provisions effective.

On February 26 I asked the following question:

> Whereas the eight hour day convention appears to have lapsed since 1921 is it the intention of the government to proceed with the bill based on such convention? This is stupendous, but it lapsed fourteen years ago.

The right hon. Acting Prime Minister answered as follows:

> In answer to the hon. member for Témiscouata may I say this matter will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and the question may be asked when the resolution standing in his name is before the house.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: On February 26, Mr. Pouliot asked if the government proposed to proceed with a bill based on a convention which lapsed fourteen years ago.

This argument is based on the wording of article 19 of the convention, which provides that each member which ratifies this convention agrees to bring its provisions into operation not later than July 1, 1921. Such articles fixing a maximum time limit for the bringing into operation of the provisions of conventions, were inserted in conventions adopted prior to 1928 in order to facilitate their entry into force for different countries at the same time. States members of the international labour organization are, of course, free to ratify conventions at their own time, and, moreover, they clearly cannot be obliged to bring a convention into operation before they have ratified it. In conventions adopted since 1928 no such article purporting to fix a maximum time limit appears. The article in question has no application to members ratifying after the named date, and such members are bound by the convention from the date of the registration of their ratification in accordance with the provisions of article 18. In support of this view two facts may be cited:

(a) The constant practice of the members of the organization, many of whom have ratified conventions after the named dates and have been considered as bound from the date of registration of the ratification;

(b) The view taken of the article in question by the international labour conference in 1928 when it was agreed to suppress it as superfluous in future conventions. In 1927 Mr. Morellet, the legal adviser of the international labour office gave it as his opinion that the legal force of articles such as article 19 of the hours of work convention was as follows:

> When a state ratifies after the date fixed by the clause, the clause has no effect for that state; when, on the contrary, a state ratifies before this date, it has the benefit of a waiting period and may abstain from applying the convention until the date fixed.

It might be pointed out that nineteen countries have ratified the convention limiting hours of work since July 1, 1921, the date cited in the article on which Mr. Pouliot bases his case that the convention has lapsed.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman, but at the same time I know that no country is bound by that convention.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Industrial undertaking.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have had representations from small saw millers who have been in the habit of employing men both in the mills and in the woods ten hours a day, and as the work is intermittent I take it it comes under the provisions of this bill and will not be interfered with, or at any rate an adjustment may be made by order in council under section 10.

Mr. GORDON: That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL: The workers employed in restaurants and hotels are not included in this bill. I believe that if the government investigated the conditions in this occupation they would probably find that the hours of labour are longer and the conditions more intolerable than in any industrial establishment in Canada, and I see no reason why these men and women should not be included in the provisions of this bill. Quite recently I went into a restaurant in this city and asked a man how many hours a day he worked and he said he worked 365 days a year and ten hours a day, from eight at night until five o'clock in the morning. If it is essential that there should be an eight hour working day in the industrial structure of the country, I think it is just as essential, and just as practical, for the government to provide that these same conditions surrounding the hours of labour should be enforced in the restaurants and hotels of the country. A large number of workers are involved, and the enforcement of legislation such as this in all these establishments would be comparatively simple; indeed, it would be far more simple in my opinion than the enforcement of the law in some of the outlying districts where this legislation will govern those employed in mines, quarries and industrial establishments. I would ask the Minister of Labour why the government leaves outside the jurisdiction of this legislation so large a body of workers, who in my opinion are vitally in need of legislative action to curtail the intolerably long hours and to improve the conditions that exist in many sections of this particular calling in Canada.

Mr. GORDON: We can all sympathize with the class of workers to whom the hon. member has referred. This legislation however is based upon the convention which was ratified by this parliament and which interprets "industrial undertakings." The bill follows the convention very closely; in fact, throughout it follows the wording of the convention itself. Moreover, it must be remembered that the provinces have legislation which covers the very point the hon. member has raised, and the process provided by the various provincial statutes can be resorted to. It may be that the future will disclose some method whereby this parliament can assist the provinces in working out plans to relieve these workers, who perhaps do not come within the scope of the convention and of this bill. But inasmuch as the bill follows the convention, I am afraid that at present the workers referred to by the hon. gentleman will have to resort to provincial legislation, which covers their situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: The legislation in Ontario governing this class of workers is not worth the paper it is written on. While I am aware that this bill is based on the convention of the international labour office, I would point out that the convention lays down only a minimum; there is no regulation, there is no law, there is no advice to any government as to how far it shall go beyond the minimum fixed by the convention. If I am not mistaken, the hours of labour permitted under the factories act of Ontario are limited to sixty a week. I could understand the minister's position if this were a peculiar industry where regulations would be difficult or the enforcement of the law would present obstacles, but I see no reason why the men and women engaged in this particular calling should not come within the jurisdiction of this act, because the women and girls are more or less defenceless. Indeed, that might be said of the occupation generally. I suppose it is fair to say that the wages paid in the catering business are among the lowest in the dominion. Before this section is passed I think the minister should take into serious consideration the suggestion I have made. I think it would be well to let the section stand until the government can come to a decision to include the men and women engaged in this industry, from one end of Canada to the other, within the provisions of this bill, so that they may have the benefit of the eight hour day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the various provincial acts there are certain specific exemption and exceptions. In the British Columbia hours of labour act, section 6 provides:

> The limit of hours of work prescribed in section 3 may be exceeded in case of accident, or in case of urgent work to be done to machinery or plant, or in case of force majeure, but only so far as may be necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the undertaking.

In one of the communications we have received from some of the business interests I find the following:

We would not like to see a dominion law because in rush periods such as the fishing and the berry season, when there is a heavy, seasonable demand for packages, we find it necessary at times to work some of our men overtime. In British Columbia we can get quick action in the way of procuring permits for such overtime but if legislation came from 3,000 miles away we might be faced with a difficult situation.

Where there are exemptions or exceptions by agreement between the industry and the workers and a permit is received from the board of administration, would this legislation cover such cases as are now protected by legislation in the various provinces.

Mr. GORDON: That is dealt with in section 10.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is wide enough to cover the point?

Mr. GORDON: I think so.

Mr. THOMPSON (Lanark): Will this act apply to cheese and butter makers? Paragraph (b) refers to industries in which materials are transformed, and in my opinion that would include the cheese and butter industries. They of necessity work over eight hours a day. Again, what about the night watchmen in factories and other places of business, most of whom work twelve hours? Will it be necessary for these firms to go to the expense of having two shifts of night watchmen? I suggest that this will demoralize the cheese factories in eastern Ontario if we are obliged to put two cheesemakers on the job during the day. Some provision should be made to exempt night watchmen and men engaged in cheese and butter factories.

Mr. MacINNIS: With reference to employees in restaurants, I do not think that the minister can very well shelter himself behind the convention. As already stated, the convention only lays down broad general principles, and it is not necessary to conform to these principles in enacting legislation for national purposes. Each country will accept the convention as a minimum, but may go as far as it likes in extending the eight hour day law. In regard to restaurants, perhaps they could be included under such industries where articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned and so forth. In restaurants, eggs are manufactured into omelettes and into various other things as well, so that possibly restaurants could be brought under this clause. But we should not forget the restaurant employees, particularly where this work is being carried on by women. The work is arduous where the women are on their feet for long hours in the day and the time should not in any case exceed eight hours a day. Some time ago I made some inquiries into this matter similar to those made by the hon. member for East Hamilton, and I found cases where young girls were working for twelve hours a day. As regards the particular place where I made the inquiry, I found out that the employees have now been put on an eight hour basis. But as the dominion government has assumed the responsibility of putting legislation of this kind on the statute books, we should make it as broad as possible, particularly so as to cover such people as waitresses in restaurants.

If we are not taking these clauses seriatim, I would like to ask whether paragraph (d) referring to transport of passengers by road included taxi drivers.

Mr. VENIOT: I want to draw the attention of the minister to a particular case, and I would like to ask whether in his opinion clause 10 would apply there. Let us take for instance the canning factories, and I refer particularly to the fish canneries in my own county as I am more familiar with them. The employees have to work in those factories very often according to the tides and at times they will have to exceed the eight hour day specified under this legislation. Is there anything to prevent punishment of those exceeding the eight hour day in a case of that kind? The offence is punishable, and as I say these employees very often have to work according to the tides; they may have to work six hours at one time and perhaps eight or nine at another. I understand that under this bill they cannot do so without being subject to punishment for violation of the law.

While I am on my feet, may I draw the attention of the minister to another case? Let us take stream driving. I understand that this comes under this legislation because it is preparatory to the manufacture of lumber; I may be mistaken, it may not come under it. The men have to work short hours some days and very long hours at other times in order to take advantage of a freshet to bring the lumber down the stream. Often the work starting at from seven to ten o'clock in the morning will have to continue until late at night in order that full advantage may be taken of the condition of the water in the river at the time. I would like to know whether this bill would prevent the carrying on of that business as it has usually been carried on in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may be permitted to answer, I think I can visualize what the hon. member for Gloucester has in mind, especially in the bay of Fundy where there are very high and low tides. I think the sardine industry is a case especially in point. The fish are caught at the low water period; they are carried by the carrier to the factory which they reach at about half tide. Then they have to be dealt with immediately no matter what time of the day or night it may be, because decomposition sets in rapidly. Such a case would come under clause 10. The same would apply to spring driving; the legislation is not intended to interfere with that.

Mr. NEILL: Salmon canning?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same thing would apply.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister reply to my question in regard to taxi drivers?

Mr. GORDON: My view is that the legislation would apply to taxi drivers.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Clause 2, paragraph (a) reads:

In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term "industrial undertaking" includes:

(a) Mines, quarries, and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.

In regard to coal mining in Nova Scotia, from my association with the miners' unions, I believe it is a great bone of contention with them whether the eight hour day should apply to what we call "bank to bank" or to the working face. If this were interpreted to mean an eight hour day at the working face, the coal miners of Nova Scotia would really be working about nine hours a day; but if it means from bank to bank, then the eight hour day would probably mean seven and a half hours at the working face. That is what they have been striving for through their unions for many years, and I hope the legislation will be interpreted so that it will mean an eight hour day from bank to bank.

Mr. GORDON: I am not particularly acquainted with conditions under which the coal miners work in Nova Scotia. I would like to be informed as to what agreement the miners are working under at the moment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: In Nova Scotia the eight hour day is statutory and it is an eight hour day at the working face, but the objective of the miners is to have an eight hour day from bank to bank. Probably I use some technical terms unfamiliar to the minister, but the miners are very much concerned about the matter and I would like to see the legislation cover the miners' objective.

Mr. POULIOT: Will this legislation be applied to the printing bureau?

Mr. GORDON: My view is that the interpretation of "industrial undertaking" would not include the civil service.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would it not include such services as are engaged in construction work in connection with maintenance, repairs, alterations, demolition and so forth? Surely the dominion government is not going to be exempted when private employers come under the legislation.

Mr. GORDON: The civil service is now working under an eight hour day in matters like those to which the hon. member for Vancouver South has referred. In all cases where the dominion government is repairing or demolishing buildings or doing anything of that character, the work is always done on an eight hour day basis as covered by the statute.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would like to ask the minister whether he has considered the question of the effect of the supreme court decision as reported in 47 Supreme Court Reports at page 505 in regard to hours of labour. I do not propose to argue the matter, because it has been referred to before and will be dealt with later, but before the clause passes I would like to direct the minister's attention to that decision which is one bearing directly on this question, and it is clearly to this effect:

That the matter of labour in industrial undertakings in Canada, is primarily within the competence of provincial legislatures, but parliament can legislate as to labour in territories not yet organized into, or forming part of, a province and as to labour of servants of the dominion if these are within the scope of the draft convention.

I just wanted to call the minister's attention to the fact that this decision is not referred to in either the radio decision or the aeronautics decision which were relied upon by the Prime Minister as possibly giving jurisdiction. So far it has not been referred to, distinguished or overruled, and of course I take it that it stands. I do not propose to argue the matter at any length, but I wanted to know whether the minister had considered it. Surely this decision, as it stands, makes this legislation entirely ultra vires.

Mr. GORDON: Of course I am not unacquainted with the decision to which the hon. member has made reference. We have either heard in this chamber or read very able arguments made in another place in this parliament by a number of lawyer members of both chambers. I was very much interested in hearing the argument of the Prime Minister, and the very clear and lucid argument of the hon. member for Quebec East, and in reading in the minutes of the Senate the arguments of those who so clearly spread upon the record their views as to whether this legislation is intra or ultra vires this parliament. I do not know that I can add anything to what has been said by those gentlemen. I think perhaps it would do us good as lawyers to read with care the arguments that were advanced. There are many nimble minded men in the legal profession and some I presume in other professions, as well as profound philosophers who have spoken and written about questions of this character. This parliament has, with perhaps some reservations, agreed to the principle which underlies this legislation. I believe that hon. members of this chamber are profoundly concerned, not so much with those arguments, lucid as some of them were, and obscure as were others, with respect to the constitutionality of the measure, but about the great majority of the people of this country who desire the passage of this legislation and who I think we all believe will be very greatly benefited by it and by its proper administration. Therefore while the hon. member for West Middlesex has raised the question of this decision of our supreme court, I can only repeat that I have listened to and read the very illuminating arguments on this point that have taken place in this chamber and in another place during recent weeks. I can add nothing to or subtract nothing from them, I think they have covered the ground pretty well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I asked the minister a question a few minutes ago as to having some uniformity with provincial legislation as far as exceptions and exemptions were concerned. The question I now ask is consequent on that. Take for example an industry in British Columbia, some 3,000 miles from the minister's office in Ottawa; does he contemplate having provincial machinery there which can be appealed to in a moment in case of an industrial accident where an exception specified in provincial legislation can be resorted to, or what does he contemplate to meet an emergency situation of that kind?

Mr. GORDON: Section 10 of this bill reads:

10. (1) The governor in council may also make regulations permitting —

[Mr. Gordon.]

(a) permanent exceptions to the limits of hours of work fixed by this act in case of preparatory or complementary work which must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment, or for certain classes of workers whose work is essentially intermittent;

Then of course section 7 covers other exceptional cases. I had hoped that we would take the sections up seriatim, but since we have not adopted that course I will try to deal with points as they arise. I have given that section a great deal of thought, having regard to just such situations as referred to by the hon. member. I know of cases in various parts of Canada which it would perhaps be extremely difficult if not impossible to bring exactly within the four corners of the bill. When section 10 is under discussion I was going to ask that it stand and perhaps by that time I may have an amendment to suggest, if there is doubt here—and there may be—as to whether or not subsection 1 (a) of section 10 goes far enough to exempt from the operation of the bill some of those undertakings which in the very nature of things would have most difficulty in complying with the requirement of an eight hour day. The danger of course always is that a bill which is reformatory in its character and, we all hope, remedial in the best sense of the word, by providing for exemptions might itself be imperilled or destroyed. That situation must be avoided. I think perhaps section 10 might be amended, placing in the governor in council some further or more definite authority, so that these exceptional cases can be dealt with by regulations which, at any rate until they are shown to be insufficient, will be permanent in their nature, and can be subject to prompt revision to suit conditions or emergencies which might arise, particularly in avocations such as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre suggested. These occur mainly in the northern parts of Canada and are not referable so much to the highly industrialized centres. I will speak to this point again when section 10 is under discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One further observation, because this is very important to us in the far west. Section 10 (b) refers to temporary exemptions. My point is mainly with respect to the machinery which the department would use in making immediate decisions as to possible temporary exceptions made necessary either by accident or by other causes referred to in the provincial statutes. Could the minister for instance contemplate the possibility of using these provincial boards which are now administering eight hour legislation in the various provinces, or would they have inspectors in the various provinces with authority to make immediate decisions with regard to these temporary exceptions?

Mr. GORDON: I believe that the industries that might be seriously affected can be sufficiently identified and are sufficiently well known that all these conditions can be taken care of in the regulations. The regulations of course would be subject to revision from time to time. I can well understand that legislation of this character to be effective must be progressive in its nature. It has to be understood and administered in such a way that industry will not be impeded, and those for whom the legislation was specially passed will not have their position imperilled. There will have to be a great deal of thought given to the regulations, and when we come to section 10 I may suggest that the powers of the governor in council be made more clear with respect to framing regulations applying them to industrial conditions such as those to which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and others have referred.

Mr. MITCHELL: In doing that it must not be forgotten that this act can be regulated out of existence.

Mr. GORDON: I stated that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not like to see those powers there. Take the Lord's Day Act, it was considered a great thing, but the ink was hardly dry on it until, in my judgment, it was made useless by regulations. This act can be regulated out of existence. I have had some experience in connection with the reduction of the hours of labour, and I do not know of any case where long hours are worked to-day in which they could not put up the best argument in the world why such hours must continue. It will take some ingenuity on the part of employers to meet legislation of this description. They will have to sit down and think their way through. The act will not be worth much if the governor in council has the power to except so many people from its provisions by regulation. And what is more important is that the people who frame the regulations shall be sympathetic to the purpose of the act. I believe that in the next ten years we shall go a long way further than the provisions of this act; this merely lays the foundation stone. If we can jump the legal hurdles that have been put up by some people on this side of the house, in my judgment it will be the greatest contribution made by this parliament in connection with social legislation, and I hope the government is successful, and that those on this side will be able to follow in their wake if they are the next government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to say just a word by way of correction of what my hon. friend has said. He has spoken about political hurdles which he says have been put up by this side. This side has put up no hurdles whatever. Attention has been drawn by this side to what appear to be hurdles actually in existence, but that is a very different thing from being responsible for putting them up.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not mean political hurdles, I said legal hurdles. I am not questioning for a moment the sincerity of the men who have come to certain conclusions. But in my judgment, taking a long view of the thing, it is absolutely essential that we should take national action on these very vital questions, if democratic institutions are to be preserved. If we think we can carry on indefinitely in this country with a million and a half people on relief, and place obstacles of a constitutional character in their way, we are just fooling ourselves, that is all. I believe that sincerely; I am just as sincere in that statement as those hon. members who take the position that this measure is what the lawyers call ultra vires. I am not one given to extravagant expressions of opinion, either in this house or back in my own city.

Mr. GORDON: Some call it intra vires.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some call it that, but whether it is ultra vires or intra vires, I think we should press it to a conclusion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Speaking about fooling one's self, I submit it may be only fooling one's self to assume that this parliament has power to do things which the courts may hold it has not power to do. In pointing out that the last word in the question of ultra vires or intra vires is going to be given by the courts, no one is seeking to block any legislation; we are rather seeking to hasten the day when what may be an obstacle will be removed and the proper method of procedure adopted.

Mr. MacINNIS: The only way to hasten the day when the obstacles in the way will be removed is to keep hammering away at the legislation, and very little along that line has been done federally. We have a good deal of social legislation on the statute books of the various provinces; we also have dominion legislation of that kind, but all this legislation is largely a dead letter because the employees engaged in the particular industries dare not draw the attention of the authorities to infractions of these laws. I think that has been brought out quite clearly in the investigation that has been going on here in the last year.

I do not think the people for whom the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was speaking need feel concerned about the rigidity of the act. I feel that it will have to be very rigid and definite, but that does not mean that in its operation that rigidity will be continued. If the employers concerned have proper regard for their employees, with proper understandings and agreements, I think, there will be no difficulty in getting the employees to carry on in any emergency. I speak with some knowledge; I have been engaged in industry and have to had to do with employers. I know that where employees are decently treated and consulted by their employers there is no difficulty at all in getting such employees to carry on in an emergency. There is scarcely a law on our statute books which would not defeat itself if it were administered according to the terms and letter of the statute. That cannot be done. I have in mind particular regulations in regard to street car service in the city of Vancouver, and I presume the same situation prevailed in other cities. I remember that the legislature passed very drastic regulations in regard to the operation of the street cars in Vancouver. We drew the attention of the management to the fact that the street car service could not be operated if all the regulations were carried out, and we had a letter from the attorney general of the province telling us to carry on as we always had done.

The point I wish to make now is that if this law is to be enforced—I have not in mind now the question of whether or not it is ultra vires—it can have application only in those industries where the workers are well organized. In that regard I might say that if the government wish to see the legislation bring forth fruit they should promote organization among the employees of industry in this country. I agree with the hon. member for East Hamilton; I have no fear that the law may become too rigid. We are all reasonable people where our living is concerned, and those engaged in industry certainly are not going to advocate the sabotage of industry if it is carried on by the employers in a reasonable manner, and if the employers do not attempt to take advantage of openings that the legislation may give them.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister could tell the committee how many provinces have legislation along these lines at present.

Mr. GORDON: I believe eight of the provinces have some legislation along these lines. I have not under my hand a review of the provincial legislation, though I could easily procure it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wonder if the minister could give the committee any approximate estimate of the number of persons who will be benefited by this legislation. My impression is that most of the industries, and certainly all the major industries, in the country already have the eight hour day in operation, and I am just wondering to what extent this legislation will be of direct advantage, if the minister has any figures on that point.

Mr. GORDON: I could procure approximate figures, but I would say that on the general horizontal across Canada perhaps 35 per cent would be affected by this legislation. I make that statement, of course, subject to correction. I have seen the figures but I am not able to carry them in my head.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could the minister give the committee a general list, not in any great detail, of the industries in which the eight hour day does not now apply?

Mr. GORDON: No, I have not the figures before me.

Mr. MITCHELL: Before this section is carried I want to refer once more to the hotel and restaurant employees. I think they should come under the provisions of this act. I do not want to go over all the ground I covered a few moments ago, and I am fully aware that the minister does not care to make a snap judgment on the matter, but the reason he has given as to why these employees are not under this legislation is not satisfactory to me. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to let this section stand, to study the matter for twenty-four hours and see whether it is not possible to include this large army of workers who, perhaps more than the organized labour movement, need the advantage of legislation of this description. We know that the average girl goes to work as a stepping stone to getting married, for better or worse, and it is hard to organize them. It is only natural that many employers should take advantage of this fact, and that statement applies to the industry in general. In normal times it is an industry in which the labour turn-over is very high; men go into and out of it as a matter of course, and in my judgment it would be a really constructive measure if the government could see its way clear to include these employees under this act. So I would ask the minister to let the section stand for twenty-four hours in order that he might go into the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I want to endorse that suggestion. I do not need to stress it further; I believe the minister is just as sympathetic as we are, and he knows that the employment of young people—and there are large numbers of very young people employed in restaurants and hotels—for these long hours is detrimental to their general health. It is not a happy condition for the country, and now that we are applying a general eight hour law surely we should make that law apply to hotel and restaurant services. I do not see why those people should be exempted; there is no good reason for it. The fact that they do not come within the socalled interpretation of the labour conventions does not prevent the government providing that paragraph (b) of section 2 should include these employees. They alter, clean, do ornamental work, adapt for consumption, transform materials for use, and so on. I would like the minister to consider this matter carefully.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not think there can be any possible doubt as to the advantage of an eight hour day; as a matter of fact we have had the eight hour day in most industries for some considerable time. In my life time there has been a very great change. I remember that in my boyhood days shipyard work demanded a twelve hour day, and that situation existed in many other industries as well. The length of the working day has a very important effect on the accidents in industry; as to that there is no possible doubt. There are three periods during which accidents reach their highest point. The first is Monday morning, or the morning after a holiday; that is the hour in which most accidents occur. The next is the first hour or hour and a half of the ordinary working day, or from seven o'clock to eight o'clock or half past eight, and the third accident period is the closing hour in the afternoon. If hon. members will give the matter a little thought they will realize that I have stated the facts. Some few men who go off on a week-end holiday, or for a holiday longer than that, perhaps do not spend their time in the best possible manner, with the result that Monday mornings following holidays produced their crop of accidents. Of course I speak about the steel works, machine shop work and work in the rolling mills and forges. There we had first aid equipment, a registered nurse in attendance and an ambulance service always available.

There are other phases of the matter which I believe should be given the attention of hon. members. I do not know whether or not I am in order when I attempt to take them up at this time. There are several classes of workers who could not come under the operation of eight-hour day legislation; certainly fishermen and farmers could not. The farmer's day is never done, at least in certain seasons of the year. We could not control his working hours; no legislation enacted by this parliament or any legislative body could do that.

Then we come to that type of operations in which materials are transformed. Let us for a moment consider blast furnaces. A blast furnace operation is continuous from the time the furnace is blown in until it is blown out. That period of time may be one year, it may be five years, nine years or even longer than that. The fact is that so long as the furnace is in blast the operation is continuous; it operates on Sunday, Monday and every other day and no regard is had for the end of the week, holidays or any regulations which may be made.

Mr. MITCHELL: The eight hour day is used in blast furnace operations, both in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: No. To a large extent the same observations would apply to open hearth furnaces, because those furnaces take the hot metal from the blast furnaces. These are factors which have to be considered, and I assume before we have completed consideration of the bill they will have been given due consideration.

Reverting to the case of blast furnaces, the large blowing engines furnishing the blast to the furnaces are entirely automatic and are housed in buildings well lighted, with tiled floors and kept scrupulously clean, bright and comfortable. The engines are practically completely self-controlled. While the usual working pressure of the blast furnace is about 10 pounds per square inch in the event of a hang-up in the furnace stack, the resistance may become so great as to run the pressure up to 30, 40 or even 50 pounds per square inch. On the other hand, when the furnace is being tapped and the molten metal drawn off, the wind is practically shut off and these big engines then idle along, revolving very slowly. The engineers who attend them are white-collared men with practically nothing to do except when trouble develops. They customarily and, in fact, invariably work twelve hour shifts and have been vehemently opposed to an eight hour shift in so far as they are concerned.

Mr. NEILL: It sounds nice.

Mr. CANTLEY: Those are the factors which have to be considered. I have no doubt that before we have completed consideration of the bill we may make some alterations to provide for circumstances such as I have indicated, and others which I have in mind but shall not refer to at the present time.

Mr. PARENT: A few moments ago the minister said that the passage of this legislation would work to the great advantage of the majority of workers. So far as that is concerned I agree with him, but I am wondering if he has considered the conditions which obtain in some localities. I believe this legislation will help large numbers of workers in urban centres where great numbers are out of employment during some seasons of the year, and where there are more workers available than are now required or have for some time been required by the industries. However conditions are different in other parts of the country.

I live in a part of Canada where there are a limited number of small industries connected with lumbering. I refer to sawmills, wood processing mills, and planing mills. This work is seasonable, there being work for only a certain number of months in the year. Sawmills can be operated only a certain number of months because the lumber has to be sawn early in the season and piled for purposes of drying. In the last two weeks, following the presentation of the bill I have been approached by workmen connected with these lumbering operations, and they have told me that the adoption of an eight hour day regulation during the summer season would not be in their interests. They suggest the minister should consider the matter of leaving optional with the workers any arrangements which may be made between employers and employees towards a ten hour day, or sixty hour week. They suggest further however that it should be left to them to state whether or not the eight hour day would be accepted.

There is a further consideration which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In the constituency from which I come a limited number have work during the busy season, and during that time they collect savings to carry them through the winter season. During the winter season their working hours are very greatly decreased. The present legislation would bind them to work only eight hours a day or forty-eight hours a week in the best season of the year, and I am wondering how they would collect their savings to carry them through the season when work is scarce. During that time they may be unemployed or be employed only fifty per cent of the time. When we reach sections 9 and 10 the minister may feel inclined to redraft the legislation so that arrangements between employers and employees may be optional, and thereby permit a sixty hour week during certain months of the year.

Mr. WHITE (London): I have been interested in the observations of the hon. member for Pictou. So far as I am concerned it is my belief that the twenty-four hour operation is about the simplest with which we have to deal. If two shifts are required to conduct a twenty-four hour operation, then three shifts of eight hours would do the work just as well. In that event however the workers would expect a higher rate per hour so that their wages might be favourably comparable with those they earned on the longer shifts. Therein lies the danger, so far as business is concerned. This change would undoubtedly increase production costs. Provided customs tariffs are maintained at a high level such an arrangement might not hurt us in our own country, but undoubtedly our export trade would be affected.

Representations have been made to me from various sources, and particularly from the smaller communities, and I believe it would be well for the minister to consider what I have said, should he choose to redraft section 10. Then, may I ask him this question: How many countries have adopted the eight hour day convention?

Mr. GORDON: The difficulties raised by the hon. member have been in my mind, and I realize further, that if this law is to prevail there must be a very considerable readjustment in industrial undertakings. In my view it will never operate successfully unless all parties interested, and the government seeking to enforce the measure, deal with the matter with the utmost frankness and unselfishness. If the employers and employees exhibit an attitude of self preservation, with some degree of selfishness, and if the government has no method of control then in attempting to pass the legislation we are wasting our time.

When legislation of this kind is introduced for the first time there are bound to be circumstances which are not covered, but I believe we are acting quite properly if we make a beginning with the confidence that our constitutional position is sound. We do not wish to have the legislation take in too wide a circle only to be confronted with confusion, and the great difficulty of narrowing the circle to where it should have been in the beginning. I hope I shall live to see the day when legislation of this kind will be widened to include every worker in this country, but one of the things we must remember is that when we are embarking on such legislation we had better be sure of the ground we are on to-day, gradually enlarging the circle to take in other vocations and activities, rather than in the words of the street biting off more than we can chew.

Mr. NEILL: Will this act apply to saw mills, logging camps and fish plants?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: To fish plants? I thought the hon. member—

Mr. GORDON: Unless there is an exception.

Mr. NEILL: I thought the hon. member for Gloucester pointed out that it would be difficult to run a fish plant unless they were exempted, because the fish had to be treated as they came in. I have received representations from British Columbia to the effect that it will be very difficult to run fish plants on the basis here proposed. A plant may be idle for a week waiting for fish to come along, and then they come in in large quantities and the men work until the fish have all been treated. I have in mind pilchards from which oil and meal are made. Sometimes the fish do not come in for a day or a week, and then they are brought in in large quantities. And the same in the handling of salmon for canning purposes. As regards the particular company that got into communication with me, I drew their attention to section 2, pointing out that I did not think it would apply to fish plants. If however, the minister assures me now that this provision will apply to these plants then the situation is indeed a serious one, because the fish must be handled when they are fresh, and men who have been idle for a day or two are willing to work extra. It would be disastrous to the salmon and pilchard industries of British Columbia if any other interpretation than that should prevail. Paragraph (b) includes industries in which articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned, repaired, ornamented, finished and so forth. Well, pilchards are not altered, though they are cleaned; nor are they repaired or ornamented, but they might be said to be manufactured. If the minister's statement is given after full consideration of the subject, then I suggest that the section should stand. The government should consider the disastrous effects which the section as it is now is likely to have in British Columbia.

Mr. DUFF: Who asked for this legislation? Have the people engaged in industry asked that this eight hour day be put into effect? Has organized labour asked for it? This is an important measure which affects the lives of all the workers in Canada and of everyone else, whether producer, manufacturer or consumer. In my opinion this legislation is absolutely unworkable. As a matter of fact, employers of labour in this country have got together in the last fifteen years with the result that we have now an eight hour day wherever it is possible. In my business the men work sometimes fifteen and twenty hours and on other days they work only two or three hours, but the men are delighted to get fifteen or twenty hours of work because we pay them time and a half over eight hours. Where the employment is steady, men work only from eight o'clock until five. When I am having my breakfast I can hear the whistles blowing at eight o'clock, and if my window is open, I can hear them again blowing for the knock-off hour at five o'clock. We do not need this legislation. Who demanded it? Is this part of the reform program? If it is it is a pretty cheap method of trying to influence a certain number of votes in the country at the expense of the people. I know, from the way the minister spoke, that he is not sincere about this legislation; he knows it is not right and cannot work out. Why should one class work eight hours a day and others ten, fifteen and twenty hours if necessary? If you could pass legislation that would deal with everyone on the same basis, then I would say, put it on the statute books; but until you can do that, then I say there should be no discrimination. Take the unemployment insurance legislation: why should certain classes come under the provisions of that act while others who have to contribute will not derive any benefit from it? The same applies to this so-called legislation; it is a snare and a delusion, and the minister and his colleagues sitting in the front benches, including the minister from Pictou, know that what I am saying is correct. We are trying to get this country out of the hole and we are willing to spend our money to give the people work whenever possible, but this legislation will put back the hands of the clock. It is not necessary, because for years we have had a forty-eight hour week and an eight hour day, and it is only in cases of necessity that men have worked overtime, and they have got paid for it. I can understand that in the old days the situation was different when people were paid by the day, irrespective of the number of hours they worked. They worked ten or twelve hours and got paid by the day or the month. But to-day men are paid by the hour and for overtime they get time and a half or even double time. I have paid my men on that basis and I am delighted to do so—and I work as hard as they do and often do not get very much out of it. I say, let us get out of the hole first. If we can pass a national law to cover everyone, I am for that law; but I do not believe in stepbairns in the family. Everyone should be treated alike. I know the minister realizes that this legislation will never be effective, and he should move that the committee rise and report progress and let this bill go to the foot of the order paper, not to be brought up until after the election.

Mr. NEILL: I hope the minister will make a statement in reply to the representations I have made in connection with fish plants. If what he has already said represents his attitude I must put on record a telegram I received on February 22, from one of the largest fish plants in British Columbia. This telegram reads:

> Just had opportunity of reading details proposed eight hour day draft convention. Although, in principle, consider eight hour day sound, feel, very strongly, that this company must be exempted therefrom because fishing, fish canning and processing are definitely seasonal and it is utterly impossible to restrict daily or weekly supplies, during season, to ensure performance under requirements of said draft convention since, owing to perishable nature of the commodity, same must be cared for and processed immediately after delivery.
> There is no means of telling what each day or week will bring; each plant must be in position to care for what fish is tendered as tendered; consequently, although every effort has been made in the past and will continue to be made in the future to restrict hours of labour, it is a physical impossibility for this company to assume the conditions set forth in the draft convention.
> The provincial government, in administering the eight hour day legislation, recognizes position of this industry and grant the necessary exemption.
> Furthermore, in our markets, which are largely export, competition is already sufficiently keen and subject to sufficient handicap without still further hampering by rigid eight hour day requirements.
> Shall, therefore, much appreciate your assurance that exemption requested be granted.

At that time the company had not seen the actual bill but only the convention. I immediately mailed them a copy of the bill and said that, so far as I could judge, the definition of industrial undertaking in section 2, while somewhat vague, would appear to leave the fishing industry out of the operation of the bill, and that seemed to me to be not only necessary but reasonable. I received a letter from the company in which the writer said that he had looked at the definition given in section 2 and that it seemed to indicate that the industry would not come within the operations of the bill. It was only intense Scotch caution that led me to ask definitely for a statement from the minister to the effect that it did not apply. The hon. member for Gloucester raised the question in connection with the sardine industry and was told, I thought, that the industry would not come under the bill. It would be disastrous if this provision were held to apply to these fish processing and canning plants. The minister, unwittingly, is not playing fair to the industry when he couches the provision in such ambiguous language, because I thought it was all right and the company in Vancouver—and they have lawyers there—were also under the impression that the industry was exempt. Now the minister says it will not be exempt, and I cannot protest too strongly. At least he should allow the section to stand until the interests in British Columbia are given an opportunity to make representations, because their belief is that they do not come under the bill.

Mr. REID: It has always been the lot of labour to have to fight the employer. I remember when as a boy I saw men working twelve and fourteen hours in the steel mills. The employers of that day said to the labourers, "If you get ten hours a day we shall have to shut down our plants." They were given a ten hour day and later when a plea was made for an eight hour day the same excuse was given—it would ruin industry and cost more. I think this measure should meet with support from every section of the house. It is a step in the right direction. Personally, I am all for this measure, but the reason I rise is just to point out to the committee that if there is a twenty-four hour day operation and a continuous operation in those mills for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, it is the easiest thing in the world to put on three shifts. I am strongly of opinion—and I say this from a labour point of view—if labour had stressed shorter hours instead of higher wages, I believe labour to-day would be in a better position because employers have to provide food, shelter and clothing for those labourers. The reason I rise is to support the bill, and I wish to see it go on to the statute books so that all in the dominion will come under its provisions.

Mr. MILLS: I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster that a big manufacturing company can put on different shifts, but how is this going to apply to small plants? I am thinking in my town of some foundries and mills that are just able to exist and employ five or six hands who are sometimes working ten hours a day. It is going to be a hardship for these organizations to be limited to eight hours a day. I am thinking of a big milling company in a city in my constituency. It has ceased to operate; a man has leased the small mill there and he is operating it ten hours a day. He employs five men; he has never cut those men's wages, and they are well satisfied and want to continue working as they are doing. Would their hours of work have to be reduced to eight?

In regard to restaurants we have in our city a good couple, white people, who are conducting a first class restaurant and who are employing all white labour. I was given some figures just last Saturday night in regard to this. They are paying out over $8,000 in wages a year and this money is all spent in our city; it is not sent away to any foreign country. They pay $150 a month rent for the premises they occupy; their power runs them $100 a month, and their business taxes come to about $115 a year. They have a baker's licence and also a restaurant licence. Their girls work only fifty hours a week, but their boys are working longer hours. These were boys who were working on a farm—

Mr. MITCHELL: How many hours a week are the boys working?

Mr. MILLS: Those boys have a position there at $9 a week. They get their board and room. They are working longer than eight hours a day, but it would be a hardship on those people to enforce an eight hour day because it would drive the business to restaurants run by foreigners. I would like to know how one would keep track of how many hours a Chinese is working. When it is hard for companies to exist, I think it is a poor time to introduce an eight hour day. If all factories were busy and everybody had a position, the plan proposed would be much more workable. As I see the situation, I am not in favour of this legislation at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have heard arguments of this kind all my life, and I think we should get down to earth. If long hours and low wages are the measure of civilization of any country, India and China would be the most prosperous in the world. Let us be frank about the matter. I have heard it said here several times this afternoon: There will be a great deal of difficulty; it will be a hardship to change from these long hours for $9 a week like those the hon. member has just been discussing. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said that he had the eight hour day among his employees. This bill is not intended to deal with the fair employer; it is intended to deal with the unfair employer who will not cooperate, who will take advantage of the good employer and work his men an extra couple of hours a day so as to get the advantage under those conditions.

Mr. DUFF: What if they get paid by the hour?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some do and some do not. Everybody in this country is not paid by the hour. Frankly, I do not think the bill goes far enough. I have before me a copy of World Current History which points out that a six hour day was introduced in Italy this year.

Mr. FAFARD: That was enforced whether they liked it or not.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know that was done under a dictatorship in Italy. This is being done under a democracy in this country. I know there are many who will be opposed to a shorter day, and anybody who has experience with certain men knows that is always the case, but a start has to be made somewhere. This bill should be more comprehensive, and I agree with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough in that regard. There is an important industry, that of distribution, which was discussed in the price spreads committee; I refer to the chain stores, and it is more important for them to come within the confines of the bill than it is for anybody else. The federal government or the provincial governments, whichever win out on the legal aspect of the matter, are going to go a long way further than this legislation if they are to meet the needs of the masses not only in industry but in agriculture. Let us take the case of the United States. If they got back to the production capacity of 1929, there would still be 6,000,000 people out of work in that country. The question that is confronting the people not only of Canada but of the United States is: What are we going to do about the matter? The workmen in their practical way know that the only real advance they have ever made has been in shortening the working day. In Italy by reducing in certain industries the working hours from eight to six they have been able to put 130,000 more people at work. In Canada, if the leadership is not going to come from this House of Commons, I do not know where it will come from. If this house is not going to say to those unfair employers, those employers who take advantage of the good ones, that certain things must be done, I do not know of any other agency that can deal with the matter. The last thing in the world for a member of this house to do is to argue in favour of anybody who would take boys off the farm and make them work twelve hours a day for $9 a week. Let us not shed tears over any such employer. Those are the conditions we have heard brought out in the price spread investigation. This legislation will apply to the Chinese or the Greeks just the same as to the native born Canadian. The intent of it is to see that everybody gets a fair deal, because everybody is equal in the eyes of the law. I do not think it becomes any member to shed tears about a man who works a boy in a restaurant twelve hours a day for $9 a week. That instance used shows all the more reason why we should have legislation of this description.

Mr. CANTLEY: When I referred a few minutes ago to the difficulties of the situation and said that some regulations would have to be made in that connection, I hope the committee did not form the opinion that I was opposed to an eight hour day, because I am not. For more than twenty years our practice was to have a sixty hour week; to-day I believe a forty-four hour week will produce more in the course of a year and under better conditions for both the workmen and the employer than would a longer week. If the committee will bear with me, I shall give one or two reasons why I hold that opinion. In a steel plant the repair gang is an important part of the organization. Under ordinary conditions twenty years ago when the mills ceased work at six o'clock Saturday night, the repair gang of thirty or forty men came on, worked all Saturday night, all day Sunday and all Sunday night to get the mills, hammers, presses and furnaces into proper condition for resuming work on Monday morning. About twenty years ago some men came into my office one Saturday and suggested that Saturday afternoon during the summer months from June to September should be a holiday. I thought the idea was a good one and agreed to it. What was the result? We were able to get our repair work all completed in the Saturday afternoon and Saturday night or by Sunday morning without any Sunday work, which the repair gang appreciated. That also meant a considerable saving so far as the cost of repairs was concerned because Sunday work was paid double time. All needed repairs were completed, whereas under former conditions there very often was not time enough between six o'clock Saturday night and Monday morning to complete the repairs. At the end of that season I decided that a half holiday on Saturday was the proper thing every month in the year, and it has been in effect ever since. To-day more goods can be produced in a forty-four hour week in almost every line of manufacture than in sixty or seventy hours twenty years ago; I think we all agree as to that. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough thinks this legislation is not required. It is required in some sections of the country at least in regard to some operations. There will have to be a good deal done by way of providing for the classes of labour that I referred to a little while ago, and it will be only by trial and error and changes and modifications in the next two or three years to get it working smoothly that we shall finally get the measure in such shape that practically everyone will be in favour of it.

Mr. BURY: I am sure that most if not all hon. members are in sympathy with the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for East Hamilton. But I understand that this bill is drafted for the purpose of implementing an undertaking given by Canada in connection with draft conventions approved by the international labour office at Geneva. I understand that the bill on that account conforms in essence with the draft convention. My hon. friend from East Hamilton says: "But why should not this parliament go beyond the minimum requirements of the draft convention and enact a measure which will include more classes and perhaps go even further in respect to the limitation of hours?" I suggest this to him and to the committee: I understand that one of the grounds on which parliament bases its jurisdiction to pass a measure of this kind is that it is an attempt to implement a treaty agreement, and if it were not, whatever ground or basis of jurisdiction we have would be to that extent weakened. For that reason I suggest that the moment we go beyond that ground we are weakening our position in respect of jurisdiction, and that only by keeping within the limits of our treaty obligations are we safe in respect of our right to pass the legislation, so far as such obligations are a ground of our jurisdiction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the hon. gentleman state, as clearly as he is now stating his case to the committee, in what respect the draft convention—which by the way was not a labour convention from Geneva but comes under the treaty of Versailles—limits the power of this government to include such categories as restaurant and hotel work?

Mr. BURY: My answer is that as I understand the situation, one of the grounds of our jurisdiction to pass this legislation is the fact that as a nation we have undertaken to pass legislation of this kind. That, as I understand it, gives to this parliament a jurisdiction which it might not otherwise have. My suggestion is that if that be so, the scope of our jurisdiction will be limited to the scope of our obligations derived from such undertaking. In other words if our jurisdiction depends upon or is derived from our obligation, to that extent, in order to keep within our jurisdiction so derived, we must keep within our obligation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But will the hon. gentleman show me how we are limited? What is the obligation? Will he read the part that refers to that?

Mr. BURY: Here is the preamble to the bill:

Whereas the Dominion of Canada is a signatory, as part of the British empire, to the treaty of peace made between the allied and associated powers and Germany, signed at Versailles, on the 28th day of June, 1919; and whereas the said treaty of peace was confirmed by the Treaty of Peace Act 1919; and whereas by article 23 of the said treaty the signatories thereto each agreed that they would endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and by article 427 of the said treaty it was declared that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme importance; and whereas a draft convention respecting hours of work in industrial undertakings was agreed upon at a general conference of the internation labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the relevant articles of the said treaty, which said convention has been ratified by Canada; and whereas it is advisable to enact the necessary legislation to enable Canada to discharge the obligations assumed under the provisions of the said treaty and the said convention, and to provide for the limitation of hours of work in industrial undertakings, in accordance with the general provisions of the said convention, and to assist in the maintenance on equitable terms of interprovincial and international trade.

Mr. DUFF: Will my hon. friend tell me in a few words what that means?

Mr. BURY: What I am getting at is that the whole basis of the present legislation is the treaty obligation into which this country entered, and that in so far as that furnishes the ground of our jurisdiction as a federal parliament to intervene in legislation affecting wages, which in general would come under provincial authority, we must confine our legislation within the general scope of our treaty obligation. We could not go beyond the scope of our treaty obligation without exposing ourselves and exposing this legislation in so far as it goes beyond that scope to the peril of impeachment of our right to pass the legislation at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: The last speaker said that the basis of this legislation is our obligation under the treaty of Versailles. What are our obligations under that treaty, according to the preamble of the bill? They are to "endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children." How are we limited in putting that into effect either by the convention of an international labour body or by any other convention or statute? We cannot be limited except by the extent to which we wish to go. That is the only limit, if this parliament has jurisdiction at all. So that there is no ground whatsoever for the argument the hon. member has just made. We are not limited as to the scope of this legislation; we can just as easily extend it. We can bring in or leave out. What we are particularly concerned with is not what has been brought into the bill but what has been left out of it.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough made a most extraordinary statement; he said the bill was not necessary because we now have the eight hour day, and if the eight hour day bill was put into effect it would be ruinous. I cannot follow that logic myself. As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for New Westminster, when legislation of this kind is proposed the argument is always brought forward that if it be put into effect the industries affected will have to close up and quit business. But that has been proved untrue. I ask hon. members how they are going to put back to work some 300,000 heads of families that are now unemployed in this country, and the 20,000 or more who are in camps, if they do not reduce hours of labour? As a matter of fact the people who are working now are supporting those who are not working, and it is only a reasonable suggestion that we should divide the work and let each one support himself. It is just as well that we should have those who are so ready to protect vested interests come forward now and do their bit, because within a very few weeks or months we shall want to know where they stand anyway.

Mr. McPHEE: Owing to the total collapse of the Postmaster General will the hon. member for East Edmonton kindly explain what the hon. member for Vancouver South has been saying to the committee?

Mr. SAUVE: I invite the hon. member to speak for himself.

Mr. POULIOT: I understood the hon member for East Edmonton to say that there is a treaty obligation and therefore we must do this and that. This afternoon at three o'clock the acting Prime Minister read a lengthy answer to a question put some days ago, and in that answer it is shown very clearly and beyond doubt that there is not the slightest obligation upon Canada to stand by that convention. It is merely a suggestion or an earnest wish on the part of the League of Nations; there is no treaty obligation whatever. It is just an occasion for the government to say "we are bound by that," but whether the government says that in a soft voice or in a very loud voice makes no difference; there is no obligation at all upon Canada to stand by that convention. I need not discuss whether this is good or bad, but I look at it from the coercive point of view. Could the league send an army to force Canada to stand by that convention? It could not. The hon. member for East Edmonton knows very well that the league will never send an army to Canada to enforce that convention, so Canada is not bound by it. That appears very clear from the answer given by the acting Prime Minister. Therefore my contention with regard to this bill —I am not discussing whether or not it is good or bad in principle—is that it makes no difference whether or not such conventions have been suggested by the league; this country, as a member of the league, is not bound by them. As my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) said, the best proof of that is that the question will be discussed anew next June. Therefore there is nothing binding Canada in that regard. This is of the utmost importance, because if this country is not bound by that convention—

Mr. DUFF: Have you had your convention in your constituency yet?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is a nomination without a convention. I wonder why this is called a convention. It is more like a formula, a method of procedure, which you may take or leave alone. My hon. friend from Hochelaga says it is an earnest wish, but it is not even a wish; it is just a suggestion. Some members of the government say we are bound by it; such an eminent lawyer as the hon. member for East Edmonton says it is a treaty obligation, but there is no obligation to it. Either it is good or it is bad. If it is bad we should not bother with it, but if it is good it should be enforced. If it is to be enforced that should be done in the proper way. The only means at our disposal to find out if it can be enforced is to ask the opinion of the supreme court, just as we should do in connection with the unemployment insurance bill. Should we speak at any length when we know in advance that this legislation never will be put into operation? Sir, it is just election bait, and I wonder if many electors in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be credulous enough to swallow it. That is all there is to it.

May I suggest that the Minister of Labour and the other members of the government, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the acting Prime Minister, make a decision by themselves in order to show that they are men of good judgment. They are numerous enough to constitute a majority of council, so let them decide that the only way to deal with this matter is to submit the bill to the Supreme Court of Canada now and come to the House of Commons later. If the supreme court says this bill is intra vires I will support it without making any further speeches. If on the other hand the supreme court decide that it is ultra vires of this parliament, then I will respectfully suggest to my hon. friends on the treasury benches that the legislation be dropped. If they take the stand that has been taken by the Prime Minister and the acting Prime Minister we must tell them that they are wasting the time of the house now for Tory propaganda. There are many serious things to consider, such as unemployment relief, and I submit that if they are earnest in their desire for legislation such as this they should have a decision on the matter by the highest tribunal in this country. If they do not do so every member will have the right to say, both inside and outside this house, at any time, that the government are not serious, that they are only trying to fool the people by offering bait of this kind for propaganda purposes.

Mr. COWAN: Just before this section carries I should like to direct the attention of the minister to one other point in regard to the interpretation clause. If the minister will look at the definition of industrial undertaking he will find that it includes the transport of passengers or goods by road or rail. In reading bill 22, which has to do with the weekly day of rest in industrial undertakings, I find exactly the same words except that in the bill under discussion the words "inland waterway" have been left out. In all other respects the interpretation clause is the same. The inclusion of those words in the bill would mean that the sailors on the great lakes would come under its provisions. If the words were left out in error I submit that the matter should be considered, and in any case I believe these sailors should be included.

Mr. NEILL: Is the minister not going to give us his opinion on the question we raised, in connection with the canneries? It is a most important matter.

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps the hon. member was not in the house at the time, but before he spoke on the matter the question was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I think a cannery falls within the operation of this statute under the interpretation of industrial undertakings. I pointed out, however, that under sections 9 and 10 exceptions could be made and would be made where it was disclosed that an industry was in the position that the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre indicated the cannery industry to be in. I thought I made myself clear and I did not think it necessary to repeat my earlier explanation. I may be charged with discourtesy, but I did not intend it in that way.

Mr. NEILL: In my opinion that is not a very strong explanation. It has been said that there are six hundred thousand words in the vocabulary of the English language. Can we not get enough of them to have the bill state exactly what is intended? In connection with another act on Friday we had to trust the whole future of an industry to the question of whether or not it came under the measure. Finally we got it down to this point, that they would be eligible to come under the measure if they could prove themselves to be an anomaly. Let us get away from this indirect system; let us say that this does or does not apply to certain cases. Let us not leave it in the air, and tell an industry that if it can be proved to be an anomaly it may perhaps come under the act. Let us get down in black and white whether or not this measure does apply to a particular industry, especially when it concerns matters of such vital importance as those indicated in the wire I read a few moments ago. I have not left the house since three o'clock, so it was not through any negligence on my part that I did not hear the explanation the minister said he gave to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. The minister now states that a remedy would be found under sections 9 and 10 of the bill. He has stated that canneries would come under section 2, and would be eligible for the operation of eight hour regulations, but he states further that there is provision in sections 9 and 10 for taking the canneries out from under such legislation. If it is abundantly evident, as I think it must be, that canneries cannot be operated under eight hour legislation, why trust to the indirect method of wriggling them out under some regulation yet to be born, under virtue of sections 9 and 10? Why not state clearly under section 2 that the fishing industry shall not be affected by the eight hour legislation?

We turn to section 9 and we are told that somehow they will be able to wriggle out under the provisions to be made thereunder. Section 9 states:

> The governor in council may, in exceptional cases—

There is nothing exceptional about the fishing industry. The condition whereby there is an inability to accept eight-hour shifts is one which exists all the time. However this section states:

> The governor in council may, in exceptional cases where it is recognized that the daily limit of hours of work cannot be applied and agreements between workers' and employers' organizations to increase the daily limit have been made, give effect to such agreements and permit in such cases the said daily limit of hours to be exceeded: Provided, however that the average number of hours per week over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement shall not exceed forty-eight.

The ordinary fish or pilchard plant is not of the type which could readily be brought under the provisions of section 9. There are no organized bodies of cannery employees; they are entirely transient. Certainly they could not make agreements with the employers to which the government could give sanction. The wording of the section could not apply to these workers.

Now we come to section 10, and we find that it states:

> The governor in council may also make regulations permitting—
> (a) permanent exceptions to the limits of hours of work fixed by this act in case of preparatory or complementary work which must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment, . . .

We find the expression "outside the limits," and, mark you, the conditions of making permanent exceptions to the limits of hours of work must be cases of "preparatory or complementary work" which must be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment. In other words, there must be something extraordinary, or something which would occur only very intermittently, such as cleaning out boilers of a plant. Operations of this type would have to be done perhaps only once a month, or once a fortnight. But these operations must be carried on "outside the limits laid down." The ordinary limits laid down in the instance I have in mind, or the ordinary work involved, is that of men going out and bringing in perhaps eight tons of fish to-day and eight hundred tons to-morrow. That catch has to be handled before it goes bad. Those are the ordinary conditions which obtain, and I suggest one could not construe the words "preparatory or complementary work" as applying to the ordinary conditions of canning fish. Therefore I believe that argument knocks out the first part of paragraph (a). Then we find the further expression:

Or for certain clases of workers whose work is essentially intermittent.

That might apply to certain people whose work may be that of putting labels on tins only at certain intervals, but I say a person could not go through a cannery and say, "This class shall work under the eight hour day regulations, and these other chaps shall not." One cannot say, "This class must come under the operation of section 2 of the act, and this chap, over here, can get an exemption because his work is intermittent." A cannery must be operated as a complete unit. The general conditions connected with running a fish plant are such that it cannot be operated under eight hour day regulations, and I defy any hon. member in this chamber to say that he would attempt to do so. If I am correct, why have such provisions in the act? Why pile up trouble? Why pile Pelion on Ossa? Why say, "We are going to place you under the operations of the act, but if you can climb out from under by the strained and drastic interpretation of sections 9 and 10 perhaps you will get the relief to which you are undoubtedly entitled?" Either they are, or they are not, entitled to relief. If it is so that certain classes cannot work under the eight hour day regulations, why not say so frankly?

[Mr. Neill.]

I fully agree with the observations which have been made by hon. members sitting to my left in which they have described the advantages derived from working only eight hours. I know of an instance where a big plant was told that it would be placed under the provisions of legislation passed by a provincial government, that eight hour day legislation was going to be put into effect, and the result was that in that one plant alone nineteen more men were given work. What was the attitude of the employers? They said, "We do not mind, because we get more work in shorter hours." They found they could get better work and that there would be less accidents, as the hon. member for Pictou said, when the men were working only eight hours. How can we help the operation of the act if we compel people to come under its provisions who, nature and common sense tell us, cannot possibly operate under them? Why not leave this section over so that the minister may consider it? Let him get the advice of his friends from British Columbia. A great canning and reducing industry has been developed in that province and surely it is entitled to be heard. Their present belief is that the wording of section 2 does not bring them within the operation of the measure. If it does,—well, at least tell them so and give them twenty-four hours to make their representations.

Mr. HANBURY: May I point out that the legislation in British Columbia provides, in chapter 30, section 11, paragraph 2 (a):

(a) The permanent exceptions that may be allowed in preparatory or complementary work which must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an industrial undertaking, or for certain classes of workers whose work is essentially seasonal or intermittent.

And so on. I would indicate to the minister that in this legislation the word "seasonal" appears.

Mr. GORDON: It will be recalled that earlier in the afternoon I informed the committee that I had had sections 9 and 10 under consideration, with a view to having proposed an amendment enabling the governor in council to make regulations which would take care of the various industrial activities to which reference has been made.

Mr. POULIOT: But this is too much work for the government, and we want to make those regulations ourselves. We want them to be made in the House of Commons so that we may know what they are.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I accepted the explanation given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that fishermen could claim exemption under sections 9 and 10. Looking through the sections however I find that no applications for exemptions can be made except in certain ways, namely by organizations of employers or by organizations of employees. If that is the only way in which subsection 2 of section 10 can be dealt with, then I say it cannot apply because in many sections of the country there are no such things as organizations of employees and organizations of employers. Something else must be inserted in the clause to give the government the right to act upon the application of parties in the business who do not belong to organizations. I trust the ministry will take that point into consideration, because it is an important one.

If the act is made applicable to the fishing industry let me say to the minister and to hon. members of the committee that despite the views held by the hon. member for East Hamilton, and despite the fact that I may be upbraided by him for my observations, the fishing industry will be ruined. The government of Canada passes certain regulations governing the fishing industry. For instance, they fix the season for lobster canning, for salmon canning, and so on. Those industries are seasonal, and I am wondering if during the canning seasons the government is going to restrict the working hours, because if they are they are going to put the industry out of business. That observation applies not only to canning but to other branches of the fishing industry. For instance, the operations connected with dried salt cod are seasonal. The vessels which go to the cod banks may stay away all week, and upon returning home on Saturday the fishermen have to work at nights, and sometimes on Sundays, to unload their vessels. They have to do that, irrespective of hours, to save their catch and place it where it can be prepared for the market. If this legislation becomes effective they could not do so; they would be confined to certain hours of labour and the progress of the industry would be seriously hampered and perhaps destroyed. I would ask the minister if at all possible to give us something definite so far as the fishing industry is concerned. I am entirely in agreement with the principle of the measure. I am for an eight hour day law, but not for an act which will give eight hours a day to a certain class of industry and destroy another industry perhaps more important than the one protected.

Mr. DICKIE: Coming from British Columbia, I must associate myself to a certain degree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in pointing out that it would be disastrous to the canning industry of British Columbia were an eight hour day to be enforced. There is no one in the house more in favour of an eight hour day than I am. I believe the day is coming when we shall have a five hour day; if we are to put the unemployed to work in Canada—and the same is true of the United States—we must reduce the hours of labour. I can quite understand however that at the present time we must move slowly, because we do not wish to hamper those who are engaged in manufacturing for export to other countries. It would be suicidal if we were to make any very drastic reduction in the hours of labour below eight hours. In British Columbia eight hours have been considered a day's work, but the British Columbia government wisely exempted the canning industry, the fisheries and ship yards from the eight hour law. With the ship yards there are many arguments in favour of exemption, but I see under section 10, where work is considered intermittent, they may be allowed to work longer hours. As regards the canning industry, the canning of salmon, I think we should be able to tell the cannery men definitely that they will not come under the eight hour law. They get a lot of fish one day and work from ten to fifteen hours and then they loaf two or three days before getting another consignment. They are a long way from the labour market, operating on the northern coast of British Columbia, and it would necessitate two crews, which they could not afford. I am satisfied from the minister's promise that he will frame an amendment which will take care of this phase of the question. I leave it at that.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that he will put in regulations, or rather he will put in power under which it may be possible to make regulations with respect to the exemption of the fishing industry. But as the hon. member for Nanaimo has pointed out, that is not what we require. What those engaged in the fishing industry are asking for is a definite announcement. A great many people in British Columbia, like the salmon people, have to be financed by the banks, and I doubt whether the bank would finance this industry if they had to trust to its exemption from this legislation under some regulation still to be conceived in the mind of someone not yet appointed. What these people want is an assurance which they can give to the banks, because the bank will not advance money to the industry on any other terms. It is necessary to make certain preparations, to charter boats, hire fishermen and so on, because you do not start fishing on a sudden impulse, as you play golf some afternoon; it takes months of preparation and the expenditure of thousands of dollars for nets, tins and so on. It is not an idle suggestion that the industry would be much happier in going to the bank if they could assure the bank that there was an exemption definitely provided for in the bill rather than the promise that some regulation not yet framed might be drafted.

Mr. POULIOT: Subsection (d) reads:

Transport of passengers or goods by road or rail, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves or warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

Let me submit the railway employees' case. They are often on duty when on a return trip. Sometimes they are twelve, fourteen and twenty hours at a time and it counts for the number of hours they are supposed to be working during the month. The minister knows how the time of railway men is calculated. How will he manage to apply this legislation to railway employees when they are on duty on a return trip? May I ask him to answer that question?

Mr. GORDON: The position of railway men raises of course a difficult question. I have given it a good deal of consideration and I believe that an amendment which I shall have to suggest in connection with the regulations under section 10 will take care of the difficulty, which is an obvious one.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman, but up to now we have heard several complaints from different corners of the house in regard to this legislation, and if there are so many exemptions that it does not apply to anyone, what is the use of passing it? May I tell the government once more that it is most dangerous to bring in new legislation of this kind when it is half-baked. I do not blame the Minister of Labour, and he knows that. But very often such legislation is brought down in such a condition that it is impossible to know what is behind it, and there are clauses which contradict one another. And even this legislation contradicts regulations with regard to fishing. It renders the understanding of the law more difficult than ever. Everyone is supposed to be familiar with the law, because ignorance of the law is no legal excuse. It is very hard to understand all these provisions. I suggest to the minister that he take time to study this legislation by himself. He is a lawyer of considerable experience and he knows much more than the third rate clerks who drafted the legislation. I insist on that. Here is a man who was responsible for the worst piece of legislation, the War Time Elections Act of 1917—something awful—and he was brought into service again for the gerrymander legislation. He is putting his nose and his fingers into this legislation again, spoiling the statute book of this country, wherever we find his fingerprints. I do not want the government to look after that man, who has very badly drafted legislation to his credit, if I may say so, and to call him again to draft this legislation on so-called social order. I would ask the government to let the legislation mature for a time so that it may improve like wine. Wine improves while it matures, and I am very optimistic when I make that suggestion. As it is, it is an awful mess and that is why I oppose it strongly. I am in favour of the principle of it, but I am strongly against the letter, which is so bad. May I suggest to the minister that he kindly take time to study this legislation himself, to see how contradictory it is, and after he discovers this, to clear his conscience by submitting it to the Supreme Court of Canada, who will undoubtedly decide that it is ultra vires of this parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The question has been asked by an hon. member as to why, since the wording of the convention itself has been followed almost entirely throughout the subsections of section 2, the words "sea and inland waterways" were left out, thereby excluding from the operation of this legislation the workers engaged in these two particular industries. It is particularly significant that they should be excluded, when we remember that there are few nations that carry on so large a business on and derive so large a living from inland waterways as Canada. Can the minister explain why these words are left out?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot.

Mr. POULIOT: Here we have a minister, one of the ablest lawyers in this country, who makes that answer. We have not his experience and we want some enlightenment on this bill, which is so badly drafted that even a lawyer of the great experience of the minister is unable to give a satisfactory explanation to the back benchers in this house. We want a satisfactory explanation about it. We have to decide what will be done in accordance with the legislation. If the hon. gentleman who is piloting the bill through the committee does not know the intent of it, how can we vote for it? The situation is most peculiar; no one understands anything about the matter. This reminds me of the time when I was in college and our professor said to us: "When you do not understand something I am teaching you of philosophy and if I feel that I do not understand it myself, it is metaphysics." Well, this legislation must be metaphysics to the Minister of Labour. No one in the committee understands anything about the provision; how then can we vote for it? There are several hon. members opposite who all look well informed; they may be well informed about everything but this. They do not understand this provision; they do not know where it leads. Even the minister who is supposed to throw light on the matter says: "Well, stay in the darkness." Let them call O'Connor at once; let them page him and ask him what is behind this provision. I want information; I am not going to vote for this provision unless I understand its meaning and if we do not know, what will the judges decide when they have to interpret the intent of the law maker when the law maker himself has no intent at all except "win the election"—and we give credit to the government for that noble thought. We are the highest court in this country; we have to pass legislation which will apply to hundreds of thousands of people and is of great moment. We ask for light, but there is none; the sun is hiding himself behind the mountain; it is after dusk and the sun has disappeared.

The Minister of Labour has a great sense of humour, and he understands how ridiculous it is for us to have to argue on legislation which cannot be explained by anyone. Can you tell me, Mr. Chairman, what is behind this provision? You do not know any more than I do. Then let us call for Mr. O'Connor at once. Otherwise, what will the judges say? I see the dignified judges sitting on the bench and saying; "What about this? We do not understand." What will happen? If this legislation stands and is voted upon in this way, the House of Commons will be laughed at, not only by the judges but by every citizen who will see the performance before the court when the latter will have to interpret this provision. The situation is most absurd; it is so absurd that it is incredible. It would take Courteline to describe such a situation. It is incredible that in this house no one knows what a provision of a bill submitted to the house means. In that case let us drop it; let us turn the page and look for something else. Until a satisfactory explanation is given, I do not see how we can proceed any further with this abominable legislation. How will it settle the social evils from which this country at present suffers? No one knows. It is impossible to know. If the Minister of Labour were not such an able lawyer—and I am glad to pay him that tribute—I would say: Well, it has been put into his hands and he does not know. But he is one of the foremost lawyers of this country and he does not know. How then can an ordinary mortal explain the whole matter? All the members of the committee are laughing at the situation. It is ridiculous and I strongly protest against it. I regret the government has hired the services of that man who has put into their hands such awful legislation. I wonder how it will work for election propaganda afterwards. Just a little pin on the balloon and, pouf! nothing is left; it falls to the ground. The minister himself will see that he cannot insist upon the passing of this legislation. I have respect for his experience at the bar, but I see hon. members opposite looking very sad now because the minister cannot explain the legislation. It cannot be explained and they all look so sad. I do not want them to cry, but I do not want them to insist any more upon our passing such ridiculous and incredible legislation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To revert to paragraph (d) of clause 2: the minister was kind enough a moment ago to tell me that he did not know, nor could he explain, why the words of the convention itself "sea or inland waterways" were let out of that clause. Would he accept the inclusion of the words now since they are part of the original convention?

Mr. GORDON: The exclusion of the words "sea or inland waterways" which appear in the convention may have been brought about for a good reason. So far as I am concerned I overlooked the fact that they were dropped in the clause of the bill, and that fact was not drawn pointedly to my attention. Rather than have them included now without having an opportunity to inform myself whether there is some sound reason for having them deleted from the bill when they appear in the convention, I would prefer to have the clause stand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think that would be just as well, and whilst the clause stands, I hope the minister will take into consideration again the possibility of including restaurant and hotel workers and employees in chain stores under the inclusive clauses (a), (b) or (c). Personally, I believe they can all be brought in under (b) under the provisions of the convention. I think the convention itself provides a very easy method by which the government could include the industries to which I have referred. He will find that the very last sentence in article I of the convention reads:

> The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

Therefore this government, having assumed it is the competent authority to legislate in keeping with the convention, should have no difficulty under its provisions in including such industries as have been mentioned this afternoon. I hope they will be taken into consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: It will stand before the committee until it falls before the court.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Eight hours in the day, forty-eight in the week.

Mr. WHITE (London): Because one points out defects in the bill he is not necessarily opposed to it. I am in favour of it, and for two reasons in particular. I think that in the modern intensively operated factory men can exhaust themselves in eight hours of work. Another reason is that it is generally accepted by working people that this bill if adopted will mean that more people will have work. But I am not sure that the bill has been safeguarded properly. I am afraid its purpose may be defeated by the workmen themselves. It contains no provision limiting the hours a man may work. We had instances during war time when factories were working twenty-four hours a day in three eight hour shifts, of men working eight hours in one factory and hurrying to another and working there eight hours more. And they did it for some length of time. At this time such outstanding instances as that may not occur, but consider for example carpenters or painters. A carpenter may work eight hours and then take on contract work or odd jobs after the day's work is done. The same thing may be done by painters. I think the bill should have a clause in it providing that men cannot work beyond eight hours for hire, gain or pay. Of course it would be impossible and undesirable not to permit men to work on their own property, but it seems to me that if the full benefit of the bill is to be obtained that feature will have to be dealt with. I should like an expression of opinion from the minister concerning that.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member raises a very important question. At the moment I would not care to express an opinion on it. If the hon. member would like the section to stand I will give it thought to see what can be done.

Section 3 stands.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Section 2 also stood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, it was carried.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister stated before recess that section 2 would stand.

Mr. MANION: It was carried after eight o'clock.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was to stand for consideration and explanation. The Minister of Railways was here and heard the Minister of Labour state in answer to questions from this side that it should stand.

Mr. MANION: No, I was not here then.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, it was to stand in order that we might have some explanation, notably in regard to the exclusion of certain industries, and also in connection with the leaving out of the words "inland waterways."

Mr. GORDON: During the dinner hour I looked into the question of the deletion of the words "by sea and inland waterways" from the bill. They appeared in the original convention. I have before me and am reading from the article, where it is stated that:

> The provisions relative to transport by sea and on inland waterways shall be determined by a special conference dealing with employment at sea and on inland waterways.
> The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

With respect to transport by sea and inland waterways, two conferences were held, one in 1920 and one in 1929. At these conferences all the member states were represented and it was found utterly impossible to come to an agreement as to limiting hours of labour in transport by sea or inland waterways. This undoubtedly is the reason why it was omitted from the bill. The convention itself was adopted subject to transport by sea and inland waterways being left open to see if the member states could come to a unanimous decision, which as yet they have not been able to do.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surely the minister does not suggest that we in Canada must delay action in the application of the eight hour day to any particular industry until we get unanimous consent from other nations. That would be a ridiculous position to take. We have to take our own steps and be responsible for them. These words were in the convention and were agreed to and accepted by Canada, and this legislation is supposed to be based on a convention which was solemnly signed and accepted.

Mr. GORDON: Subject to what I have just said.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask if the minister has given further consideration to the question of the inclusion of restaurant and hotel workers?

Mr. GORDON: Yes I have, and my view is that by going to the length suggested, and enlarging the convention upon which this bill is based, we would probably strengthen materially the position of those who might seek to have the bill declared ultra vires of this parliament. When we are embarking on legislation of this kind I think we should not adopt a course calculated to destroy the measure itself.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Exceptional cases.

Mr. GORDON: With respect to sections 9 and 10, I listened to what was said by hon. members with regard to certain industries, and their criticism of section 10 particularly. I would like these two sections to stand until I give them further consideration, to ensure that there shall be authority to except industries which by their nature could not operate—as both employers and employees want them to operate, because it is so easy at times to impede an industry—particularly industries such as those to which reference was made before the dinner hour.

Sections 9 and 10 stand.

Sections 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. GORDON: It is my view that there should be a further section added to the bill. I have not the amendment written out, but it will be a short one, having to do with the date on which the bill shall become operative. As the bill now reads it will become operative upon receiving the royal assent. In order that industries affected by the measure shall be able to make adjustments, which undoubtedy they will have to make, I think it would be unwise not to give them some period of time before the penal section might apply. I had not given a great deal of thought to the question how long the period should be. Someone suggested six months; I think that is too long. Probably three months would be ample. If any hon. member has any view to express with respect to that point I should like to hear it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Six months would get us past an election.

Mr. MITCHELL: Three months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister if it might not be worth his while, now that he is not going to have the penal sections of the act come into force for several months, to consider whether in the interval he might not get an opinion from the supreme court as to whether or not the act itself is intra vires. Advantage might be taken of that interval of time to remove all possibility of doubt as to the competence of this parliament to enact the legislation.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think I would care to sponsor the submission of that question even to the Supreme Court of Canada. I entertain the view that in projecting legislation this parliament should not first seek the authority of any judicial tribunal as to whether such legislation is intra vires or ultra vires of the dominion parliament. I may be wrong in that, but I am afraid that if this policy were pursued we would not advance legislation very rapidly through parliament. Perhaps we are on sounder ground if we take the position that if anyone seeks to impeach this measure, then upon the issue being raised we can find out the extent to which we acted within our competence in the adoption of the underlying principle and the bill itself.

Mr. DUFF: Is the Minister of Labour aware of the fact that certain legislative assemblies are introducing eight hour bills? Has that been drawn to his attention? The other day I noticed that in the speech from the throne at the opening of the legislature of Nova Scotia the lieutenant governor stated that they intended to introduce an eight hour measure. Is it necessary for both the legislatures and this parliament to introduce eight hour legislation, or which has power to do so? Has the minister considered that point?

Mr. GORDON: I am aware that a majority of the provinces have legislation limiting the hours of work, and I think there is no insuperable barrier in the way of the provinces and the dominion, if they work in cooperation, making these measures work side by side, or where one fails the other may be applied without confusion. I know of the legislation in the various provinces.

Mr. DUFF: I was wondering, if parliament passes this act, if it would be necessary for the provinces to pass similar legislation.

Mr. GORDON: It might not be.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister tell the committee exactly the process by which he expects this act to be enforced? Will there be an inspection by officers appointed by this government, officers of the Department of Labour, or will there be a special staff set up under the regulations?

Mr. GORDON: My view is that the services of some one or more of the present departments of government might well be utilized in the administration of this act. I am very hopeful that we will find a great majority of employers and employees joining to render this act a useful piece of legislation. Of course in all matters of this kind officers have to see to it that the comparatively small number of employers who might do so—I think I am justified in saying so—are not permitted to do violence to this act and that, if they do so, they suffer the consequences contemplated by the act. That is a matter that will have to be given immediate attention in order that the act may be administered with the least possible expense, having regard to efficient administration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But what I am really trying to get at is this. Suppose an infraction of the act is reported. To whom in the first place should it be reported and, after it is reported, who will take the necessary steps to prosecute and punish the employer?

Mr. GORDON: Section 13 of the act, the penal section, reads:

> Every employer who violates, or fails or omits to comply with any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder, shall for each offence be liable on summary conviction—

That of course means that he will be proceeded against under the summary conviction sections of the criminal code. The law may be set in motion by anyone.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Anyone?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. GORDON: By anyone, I should think. Of course it is the duty of every citizen, although everyone does not discharge that duty to the full, if he knows there has been a breach of a law, to set the law in motion. That is the theory, though sometimes the theory does not work out. In this case a great many people will be interested; the employee, his labour organization, the inspectors of the department, whoever they may be, or some officer of one of the departments that may be available to check up, supervise and see to the enforcement of the act—all these will be interested to see that the act is carried out. At the moment it would be impossible for me to say just who would set the law in motion, but any one of those I have enumerated could do so. Of course the government must see that there are those charged with the responsibility of seeing that the law is enforced.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sorry but the minister leaves the whole position even worse than it is under provincial legislation to-day. As the minister knows, there have been violations of all these laws in connection with factory hours, minimum wages and hours of labour in almost every province in which they have been brought into being. The evidence given before the price spreads committee shows the flagrant violations in both Ontario and Quebec in regard to minimum wage legislation, for example, and no one seems to have had the responsibility of taking action against the offending employers. There is no use in saying that it is left to the employee, because in nine cases out of ten the employee is afraid of losing his or her job and will not individually, sometimes not even collectively, take the necessary action. Therefore I strongly suggest to the minister that this act should provide for an official inspector, or you can call him a public prosecutor if you like, to whom infractions of the act should be reported, who should investigate and, upon finding the reports to be correct, should take action on behalf of the employee. I also think the expenses in connection with administration should be borne by the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will this act be administered directly by the Department of Labour?

Mr. GORDON: The bill itself is silent as to what department of government will administer the act, but I assume it will be administered by the Department of Labour.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will this act supersede provincial legislation already in force in regard to hours of labour, or will it operate concurrently with such legislation?

Mr. GORDON: I think it will operate concurrently.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then in that case would the provincial inspectors act under the federal measure as well as under the provincial measure?

Mr. GORDON: They could act for both without further instruction or authority.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think this act will operate as other social legislation operates; where there is an organization it will work and where there is no such organization it will not work. That has been the case in the past. Where there has been some degree of organization among the workers wages have been reasonable and the minimum wage laws have been enforced; I think that goes for all our social legislation whether provincial or federal. Where there is an organization to look after the welfare of the workers and the enforcement of legislation, it is enforced. After the legislation is on the statute book I think it rests largely upon the individuals themselves to see to it that the terms of the act are carried out. I know that in the locality from which I come we will see that it is carried out.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

SECRETARY OF STATE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Salaries, $289,538; contingencies, $73,655.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the Secretary of State a slip in his pocket which would give us some information to indicate the progress being made in connection with the printing of electoral lists?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, I suppose the answer would properly be given under the items for the printing bureau. However, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that the returns for March 11 showed that of a total of 5,807,577 names on the electoral lists, 4,747,199 were then in type, leaving a balance of 1,060,378 to be put into type. In the ordinary course of operations those names will be put in type at the rate of about 80,000 per day. If we do more night work they could be typed at the rate of 100,000 or 110,000 per day, so that there is no doubt about all lists being in type by April 1, unless some unexpected accident should intervene.

Mr. DUFF: In view of the fact that there is legislation before the house having to do with the weekly day of rest, may I ask the Secretary of State if there is any truth in the statement made in one of the newspapers of Ottawa that the workers in the printing bureau are working on Sundays in the preparation of voters lists? It is said that they work seven days each week, including Sundays. If that condition exists I am sure the minister could not have known about it, because as a member of the church to which I give my allegiance I am sure he would not for one moment permit a condition under which men in the printing bureau worked seven days a week, or more than eight hours a day.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman, the right hon. leader of the opposition and I are members of the same church, and have a due regard for the Sabbath. My information is that in the printing bureau no such work is carried on between twelve o'clock Saturday night and twelve o'clock Sunday night, giving a full twenty-four hours' rest.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the appointment of the commissioner of patents been made?

Mr. CAHAN: No. The commissioner of patents died recently. A bill to be known as the Patent Act was introduced in this chamber, but was subsequently transferred to the Senate. It is now before that body, and before the end of the week I hope it will again be before this chamber. Certainly until that bill has been considered by this house no appointment will be made to fill the vacancy. Meantime one of the oldest and one of the most experienced officials of the patent office is administering the affairs of the office as acting commissioner.

Item agreed to.

International office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works, $2,600.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May we have an explanation of the reason for the expenditure? What is done through this vote?

Mr. CAHAN: Canada is one of the members of the international union for the protection of industrial property. That is a body for the protection of copyrights, trade marks, patents and designs, and under the convention to which we are a party we pay a certain proportion of the expense of the international office maintained at Berne in Switzerland. If the hon. member wishes full details I could give them, but may I state briefly that this is an annual vote. The slight decrease of $250 is due to the appreciation of the dollar as compared with the value of the Swiss franc.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was familiar with the facts the Secretary of State has given, but I should like to know of what value the international office is to Canada. What do we get for the expenditure?

Mr. CAHAN: The convention has been subscribed to and ratified by about forty nations, if my recollection is correct, and from time to time the representatives of the several nations meet at Washington, Rome, or London, England, to discuss changes in the convention for the protection of industrial property. One matter, which will be under a discussion, when the Patent bill is before the house in a few days, is that as Canada is a party to the convention, inventors in Canada have the right to have Canadian patents of invention registered in each of these foreign countries, in which event they obtain the same protection and privileges as were granted upon application for and the grant of such patents in Canada. Similar provisions are in the convention in respect of trade marks. I think it was two years ago that I introduced and there was enacted the Unfair Competition Act dealing with trade marks, which is based on the same convention; and trade marks which are granted in Canada to those doing business and using those trade marks in Canada are by the terms of the convention protected in each of these other countries.

Mr. REID: Are there any major countries that do not protect patents?

Mr. CAHAN: I had in my hand during the present week and was discussing in another place the patent act. I had a list of these nations which protect patents under the convention and it may be that there are some countries, possibly Abyssinia or some of the South American states, which do not give the same protection. However, I have not in mind the names of all these countries and therefore cannot state precisely.

Item agreed to.

Public Archives, $71,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The public archives are particularly valuable, and increasingly so. Why the reduction?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: They are very valuable, but inasmuch as we made very considerable purchases last year we did not intend to spend so large a sum this year.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—
Secretary of State, $6,000.

Mr. CAHAN: This is simply a contingent item.

Mr. DUFF: Will the money paid to Peter White come out of this item?

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. DUFF: Under what item?

Mr. CAHAN: The matter of the suits pending for a return of moneys alleged to have been improperly received in connection with the loss of the Gypsum Queen has not been under the control or direction of the Secretary of State but under the Department of Justice, and I cannot say how the expenses of that litigation are paid. It may be that a supplementary estimate will be required in connection with it, but I have not taken it into account in the preparation of the estimates of my department.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why should there be two separate items, one for National Defence and one under the Secretary of State, in connection with the adjustment of war claims?

Mr. CAHAN: At the close of the war the Department of the Secretary of State was vested with jurisdiction in all matters relating to reparations and the sequestration of enemy property, which included certain war claims. Those claims with regard to reparations have been, I think, completely disposed of and Germany, as the house knows, has ceased making the payments which were to be made under the treaty of Versailles. I am putting in this sum simply to cover any possible contingencies that may arise in regard to past inquiries and matters of that kind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understand that the sum will not necessarily be expended and that there are now no outstanding claims under this vote.

Mr. CAHAN: I made a return to the house, to-day I think, showing that there were two or three contingent claims aggregating less than $5,000, which are outstanding and unpaid. I understand that these are claims of sailors who were on ships that were destroyed by German torpedoes or sunk by mines. These sailors made claims—three of four of them—and since the awards have been made we have been unable to ascertain the exact addresses of the sailors. It is all however within $5,000.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $985,328.

Mr. REID: What is the reason for the increase of $93,328?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): In the first place there is the provision for the restoration of the ten per cent deduction from those receiving less than $1,000, amounting to $15,983. Then, owing to increased pickled fish inspection, it has been necessary to appoint two additional inspectors in the maritimes. Experience has shown the need for increased guardian service and more travelling by inspectors in many districts throughout the country. That accounts for $31,801. During the past few years we have been operating the patrol boat service at the minimum, putting off repairs where possible, and the time has come when this cannot be continued. Increasing efforts at illegal fishing must also be met, and this will involve the use of several boats for longer periods. That accounts for $45,544. This makes us the total.

Mr. REID: Was there any airplane service last year for spotting illegal fishing, and, if so, will the department carry that on this year?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Fish culture, $240,000.

Mr. REID: When is it expected that the report in connection with the propagation of sockeye and other salmon will be published? I understand an investigation into the hatcheries has been going on for the past number of years. Is the minister prepared to make any statement on the matter, or can he tell the committee when the report is likely to be published?

Mr. STIRLING: The report to which my hon. friend refers is expected this summer.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps it is a little out of order to discuss under this item the question to which I wish to refer, but I see no other item under which it may come. I have on the order paper a notice of motion which in substance is that the farm loan act shall apply to fishermen. I am not going to discuss the motion. I am drawing the attention of the minister to it, and I wish that he would take into consideration what it contains. May I say, without discussing the motion itself, that the fishermen under present conditions, especially those which have prevailed during the last four or five years, are unable to renew their craft when and where necessary. If the farm loan act could be so amended that by availing themselves of its provisions they could renew their obsolete craft and be able to carry on to greater advantage the industry in which they are engaged, it would be a godsend to them and would save the fishing industry. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in discussing the pros and cons of the question. I merely wish to ask the minister to consider the matter and see what can be done under the circumstances before the end of the session.

Mr. STIRLING: My recollection is that the Natural Products Marketing Act does cover the products of the sea, the lake and the river.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister has misunderstood me. I am not referring to the marketing of the product. I am speaking of the lending of money to the fishermen on the same conditions and terms as it is lent to the farmers, so that they may replenish their craft which now in many cases are becoming obsolete.

Mr. STIRLING: I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Certainly I shall be very glad to give consideration to the suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Oyster culture, $10,000.

Mr. REID: Does that oyster culture take place on the two coasts or just on the Atlantic?

Mr. STIRLING: The expenditure of $10,000 is required to cover the expenses of the administration of the leasing and experimental farming to develop and demonstrate oyster cultural methods. The cost of administration includes the examination of areas for which applications for leases have been received; to ensure that they are suitable for oyster culture before approval is given, as well as supervision of the development work after leasing. Investigations have proceeded so far as to enable a good lead to be given in oyster farming, which has now become well established and promises to be one of the important industries of Prince Edward Island. So far seventy-nine leases comprising nearly 344 acres have been issued, and 110 additional applications for leases are receiving attention. Ground was offered for leasing in 1931, and in 1933 a start was made in production, ninety-two barrels having been taken and sold from the several areas.

Mr. REID: Is the reserve for oysters that was placed in the Serpentine and Nicomekl rivers three years ago still there?

Mr. STIRLING: The reserve still exists.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How many oysters do we market in Canada in a year?

Mr. STIRLING: Approximately 8,000 barrels in the previous season.

Mr. MacLEAN: Perhaps the minister could give us some more details of the work that is being carried on under this appropriation. I think he stated that seventy-nine leases were granted. Is that correct?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. MacLEAN: Were they all in the Richmond bay area?

Mr. STIRLING: No. The seventy-nine leases are divided over ten districts.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much are oysters worth a barrel?

Mr. MacLEAN: Can the minister give us the number of barrels taken off the government ground last season?

Mr. STIRLING: There were taken and sold from the department's reserved areas 421 7/10 barrels of marketable oysters and 233 2/3 barrels of seed oysters, the latter being sold to the local lessees.

Mr. MacLEAN: Can the minister give us the price that was obtained for the oysters that were sold off the government area, and how they were sold? Were they advertised for sale by public tender, or were tenders invited only from some interested parties?

Mr. STIRLING: They were advertised for sale by public tender, and the amounts were as follows:

Quantity—	Price
64 9/10 barrels	$8 00
105 2/3 barrels	5 00
251 2/3 barrels	4 00
233 2/3 barrels	2 00
722 cardboard cartons with spat attached	0 15

Mr. MacLEAN: Could the minister give us the number of permits that were given to those who took private leases for the picking of oysters? Those oysters, I understand, were picked off the public areas, and permits were granted to the holders of leases. How many permits were granted?

Mr. STIRLING: Two permits were granted to each of the lessees.

Mr. MacLEAN: Only two?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. MacLEAN: That does not seem to agree with the information we have down east, namely, that not only the lessee himself but all of his family who may be interested can obtain permits. I would like to know from the minister if that is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: The information I have at my disposal at the moment is that only two permits are granted to each lessee. The matter can very easily be verified; we can look it up. I have not the information in more detail now.

Mr. MacLEAN: I may have been wrongly informed, but I understand that not only can the holder of the lease obtain two permits, but all those working for him or members of his family can also obtain permits, so that all one has to do is to have an application for a lease and then one can get permits to pick all the oysters he likes off the public ground. I think this is something that should be looked into very carefully, because I know it is causing a great deal of dissatisfaction. The public fishermen feel that public oyster areas should be developed by the department for public fishing, but the department has undertaken to lease those public areas to private individuals. Since the Richmond bay area was known for its famous oysters the public were always allowed to fish off the public beds there. Now the department has started on this policy of leasing, and the greatest difficulty we find is that areas which are producing oysters at the present time are being leased, or, if not, the oyster picked off for private holders. I know the department will deny this, but the fishermen have asked for a royal commission; they have even petitioned the governor general in council to have a commission or someone appointed to go down there and make a thorough investigation of the whole situation. This has been refused by the department. The fishermen are deprived of fishing privileges which they formerly enjoyed. I have on my desk a petition which has been presented in which they say that if the department is going to spend money to bring back the areas for private individuals it is only fair to spend some money to bring back some areas for public fishing. The fishermen would not object much if the department would go out into the deeper bays and rivers where oysters are not coming back satisfactorily and there build up fishing areas for those who obtain private leases, but they do object to leasing the inshore waters in the small rivers and bays and heads of creeks where the oysters are coming back naturally and where they could fish with very little trouble. If the department wants to experiment there are thousands of acres out in the big bays and rivers where they can spend all the money they like in bringing back the beds for the private lessee. But the claim is made, and I think fairly, that the fishermen have an inherent right, handed down from past generations, to fish on the public areas. I know the minister will say: Well, the industry was wiped out and we had to come and reestablish it. The industry was wiped out; now it is coming back naturally at the heads of the rivers and bays, and what we object to is the leasing of those areas where the industry shows signs of natural recovery. We all know that at the present time fishermen are hard pressed, not only in our province but in other provinces where fishing is carried on. In this industry men were formerly able to go out and make a fair day's pay with very little expense. About $10 or $15 will fit out a fisherman for gathering oysters, whereas if he is going into the lobster industry, for instance, he has to spend hundreds of dollars for equipment. The fishermen feel that this privilege has been taken away from them. They have petitioned the department; they have done everything they could to get some attention, to have someone go there and make an independent survey and see if their claims are well founded.

I had to bring up this matter last year. I do not want to be blocking the work of the department, but I think in all fairness to the fishermen of that community the department should have someone go and make a thorough examination on the spot. I know the department will say that they are not leasing areas that are already productive, but the fishermen have the opposite view. They say that no one applying for a private lease will take a piece of ground unless he is pretty sure that there are some oysters on that ground. If he finds there are, then he is willing to take a lease. They also complain that the public areas that would naturally come back are being robbed by private lessees who are given permits to pick oysters off the public grounds to put on their private grounds. So in effect the fishermen are not allowed to fish at all unless they have a lease. This is a revolutionary step on the part of the department and is so entirely at variance with the conditions that formerly obtained that the fishermen are up in arms about it. I would like to put on record a great many statements that have been forwarded to me, and also this petition, but I have submitted a similar one to the minister, and all without avail. I am a voice crying in the wilderness; I get no support from the department or from other hon. members from our province or from the acting Minister of Fisheries, and fail to make any impression on the department on behalf of the large number of fishermen whom I represent in this house. But I submit that their demand is fair and just and that the new minister who is now in this responsible position should give the matter very careful consideration and see that justice is done to these fishermen who are not here to speak for themselves and who have been unable through petition or otherwise to make any impression on the department or the minister.

Mr. MYERS: You perhaps will remember, Mr. Chairman, that last session the same annual complaint was made by my hon. friend from Prince. The hon. member has a monopoly on this subject; there does not seem to be anyone else here sufficiently interested in oyster culture to make a study of the matter so as to be able to answer him. I rise on this occasion with more than usual diffidence because I have not forgotten the severe castigation I received at the hands of the hon. member for Prince last session when this same item was before the committee. On that occasion I was told that I was an inlander, that I did not know anything about fish, and above all about oysters, and I was advised to confine my activities to the growing of potatoes. I can assure the committee that my hon. friend's advice was not lost on your humble servant, and I do not intend to-night to advance any of my own ideas along this line for fear of receiving again the same admonition from my hon. friend. I do not wish to detain the committee more than a few minutes. I only want to say that in my humble opinion as an onlooker from the outside, seeing what the Department of Fisheries has done during the past few years for the oyster industry in Prince Edward Island, I cannot help but raise my voice in commendation of the acting Minister of Fisheries and especially of his able deputy minister for the efficient efforts they have put forth on behalf of the oyster industry of Prince Edward Island. In order that I may be quite clear on this matter I have on this occasion armed myself with a report of a speech that was delivered by a man who—even the hon. member for Prince will not deny it—is one of the leading fishery experts in Prince Edward Island. We have in Charlottetown a very active board of trade. No item affecting the public good escapes their attention—agriculture, business, fisheries, tourist traffic, everything of that kind comes under their purview. They are always very active in finding out what is being done along these lines. In order to inform themselves thoroughly on this subject, to get the best information they could, they invited W. F. Tidmarsh to speak to them, which he did on January 10 last. By the way, let me state a fact well known to the hon. member for Prince. In addition to being an expert in connection with fisheries and everything pertaining to the fishing industry in Prince Edward Island, having been engaged in that industry all his life, Mr. W. F. Tidmarsh is also one of the leading Liberals in our province, a fact which must carry great weight with my hon. friend. At the present time his son is president of the Liberal Association of Queens county, and I believe the father is just as active as ever on that side of politics. I would not be too sure of that, however; he may have had a change of heart since January 10, when the Prime Minister came out with his reform program. Mr. Tidmarsh, along with many other Liberals of Prince Edward Island, may have had a change of heart since then, so it would not surprise me to find him lined up behind the Prime Minister, myself and my colleague when the next election comes along. But without wearying the committee further I should like to quote briefly what Mr. Tidmarsh said to the Charlottetown board of trade on January 10 last:

Commends Department Effort

The effort of the fishery department to restore the oyster fishery is well worthy of favourable commendation.

Those are the words of the leading Liberal of Prince Edward Island.

It has worked in a thoroughly scientific manner. It has erected and operated at Bideford river a small biological laboratory, equipped with necessary equipment, and in it has placed men of scientific and practical knowledge—

And now the hon. gentleman wants somebody to go down there from Ottawa, when right in his own bailiwick they have this biological laboratory containing the necessary equipment, with men of scientific and practical knowledge in charge. Is that not enough for him?

—who are applying themselves solely to experimentation in oyster culture, to demonstrate that oysters may be cultivated on a commercially economic basis.

Several sections of barren bottoms—

That is barren enough for anything.

—were selected in Richmond and Malpeque bays, where the famous Malpeque oyster once thrived. Each bed contains about four and a half acres. These beds were seeded with small oysters. The results have been highly satisfactory.

At the opening of the fishing season this fall it was estimated that approximately each acre had produced eight hundred bushels of marketable oysters. I am informed that the product of these beds is sold on the open market, and the proceeds credited to the beds, so that the commercial value may be ascertained.

Just notice this next paragraph:

Leasing System Beneficial

Areas of five and a half acres of barren bottom may be leased from the fishery department for a period of twenty years, at $1 per acre, per annum, for the first period, and for the second period at a rental to be agreed upon. The lessee agrees to seed the areas within a reasonable time.

This method should meet with general approval.

I believe the word "general" would include even the hon. member for Prince.

It assures a wide distribution of oyster farming throughout the province, keeps the industry in the hands of our fishermen—

I hope the hon. member for Prince will note that.

—encourages competition, stimulates enterprise, and ensures a wide distribution of the monetary returns when the areas become productive.

This industry lends itself to cooperation of the primary producer. Fishermen should be encouraged to form cooperative companies. The combined efforts of a small company of young, energetic fishermen, should in a few years create an industry, under their own control, that would give them remunerative employment for the rest of their lives.

Over-production need not be feared. Epicures through the ages have sought this succulent bivalve and will continue to do so in the future....

I see no reason to doubt that the oyster fishery will, in process of time, become the most important fishing industry in this province.

I have not touched on the technique of oyster culture. Prospective cultivators can get that information by applying to the biological station at Bideford—

Just imagine; they can get all the information with reference to oyster culture at this biological station at Bideford, in the riding of my hon. friend who is objecting to the whole development.

—or by consulting a book entitled Oyster Farming on the Atlantic Coast of Canada, published by the Department of Fisheries.

I have no further remarks to make. Hon. gentlemen will notice that for fear of a second castigation at the hands of my hon. friend I have sheltered myself behind the words of a Prince Edward Island gentleman who has forgotten more about oysters and the fishing industry than the hon. member for Prince and myself together know.

Mr. MacLEAN: In reply to my hon. friend I may say that I am perfectly willing to give him all the latitude he requires, because the more latitude he takes the deeper he gets in. My hon. friend has said that Mr. Tidmarsh satisfactorily explained this matter to the board of trade. I have known Mr. Tidmarsh for a great many years. I have known him as a lobster packer of outstanding ability; I have known him to be interested in the processing and marketing of other kinds of fish, but this is the first intimation I have had that Mr. Tidmarsh is an authority on oysters or oyster culture, and I thank my hon. friend from Queens for that illuminating fact. My hon. friend suggested that Mr. Tidmarsh might have changed his politics following the radio addresses of the Prime Minister. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to wait for some time for that. I think oysters will be growing under the potato vines in his fields before that happens.

The difficulty in this whole situation is that people like my good friend, who would like to know all about the industry but has never taken the trouble to make himself thoroughly acquainted with it, are always butting in and giving advice to the department. As I have said before, some people step in where angels fear to tread. The situation, nevertheless, is as I have stated. I do not wish to discuss this matter from a political point of view, but I want my hon. friend from Queens to understand that it was at the request of myself and others that the biological station was started at Bideford under the Liberal administration. The Liberal policy, however, was to bring back the oyster industry for the public fishermen of that community; we never intended to give a private monopoly to any other class of men, and we stand by that policy to-day. I believe that I am voicing the opinion of hon. members of this house and of the majority of the fishermen of our province when I say that the rights of our fishermen are being taken away under this leasing policy.

With regard to the biological station, the men located there are doing work that has been assigned to them, that is, studying the habits and the propagation of oysters, and oyster culture. They have made certain progress along that line, but I am not here to-night to discuss whether or not the biological station has been of service to the fishermen or the industry; I am here to discuss the right of the fishermen to fish in the public waters around their own shores. If the department wants to lease ground there are thousands of acres, as I have said and as my hon. friend from Queens knows, that can be leased if they want to experiment with building up productive beds of barren bottoms. I will tell my hon. friend, however, that you cannot get a lessee there to spend one dollar in an effort to bring back those bottoms. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always taken the ground that we were endeavouring to make political capital out of this question. On different occasions I have said that I have just as many friends on one side of this question as on the other. The barren grounds are there; if the government want to develop them we have no objection to the leasing of those grounds. If they want to try to build up productive areas there they are perfectly at liberty to do so, but when the department attempts to take the good producing areas and lease them to private individuals, that is where we step in and say something should be done on behalf of the fishermen. My hon. friend says there is no need to have anyone go down to Prince Edward Island and make an investigation because the biological station is carrying on that work now. That is not the case. They are operating under the Department of Fisheries. They may say that they operate under the biological board, but the gentleman who is there is working under the director of the Department of Fisheries, and carrying out the plans they suggest. In all fairness I say a commission should be appointed in accordance with the request of the fishermen. Let them bring in a report, and if they say that the fishermen are wrong in their contention, then I am willing to abide by their decision. If on the other hand they say that the department is leasing productive areas to private individuals, then I say that practice should be stopped, and the barren areas should be leased. Will the minister tell the committee if it is the policy of his department to continue leasing those splendid productive areas to private individuals?

Mr. STIRLING: On application being received, the policy hitherto has been to give consideration to whom the lease should be granted. It seems to me reasonable that the applicant first to be considered should be the one nearest to the area in question, next the people living behind it, and third the people of the province generally. In that way the areas pass into the hands of those who can most easily and most economically work them. The hon. member should bear in mind that this work was begun and is being carried on in close cooperation with the government of Prince Edward Island, and the investigation under Doctor Needler, who is working for the biological board, is being and will be carried on. I should be glad to give careful consideration to the views expressed by the hon. member. It may be that as time goes on reconsideration should be given to the policy hitherto adopted.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to call attention to the fact that there are other oyster fishing grounds in the maritime provinces than those in Prince Edward Island. When I was a boy there was a considerable amount of oyster fishing in the three rivers running into Pictou harbour. We also had oyster fishing at Merigomish bay, Wallace, Caribou, Pugwash and Antigonish bay. However, for some reason which I am not prepared to explain, that fishing has been practically abandoned, and I should like the minister to make some investigations with regard to the waters I have named. If those waters were restocked I can see no reason why we should not again have oyster fishing as profitable as we had forty or fifty years ago. I hope the minister will be good enough to give some assurance that something will be done in this connection.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps the hon. member has forgotten that we cannot proceed in this matter except by agreement with the province. The bottoms are under the control of the provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island cooperation resulted in these investigational works being carried out. As Nova Scotia has not come into agreement with the dominion, so far as oyster fisheries are concerned, the dominion cannot carry out such works there.

Mr. CANTLEY: Surely the minister could ask the government of Nova Scotia to cooperate. It would not take long to do that.

Mr. McLURE: The oyster fishermen of Queens county are in accord with what the department has done in connection with oyster farming. More each year are anxious to obtain leases on the barren areas, and from time to time they request that additional surveys of harbours and bays be made. For instance, at the present time demands are being made to have surveys made of Alexandra bay, Pownal bay, Vernon river, Orwell bay and Pinnette bay, with a view to obtaining leases. I believe last year a statement was made by an hon. member to the effect that these leases were taking away the rights of the fishermen. May I say that there is no branch of the Department of Fisheries which at the present time has such possibilities of development as has the oyster fishing branch. To-day production in Canada is very much limited; we are not able to supply the domestic demand. Oyster farming is carried on on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but the production last year amounted to only 24,659 barrels. This amount was made up of 8,273 barrels from New Brunswick, 10,160 from Prince Edward Island, 3,120 from British Columbia and 3,106 from Nova Scotia. That is not sufficient for the demand in Canada alone, consequently many importations were made. For the information of hon. members I shall indicate the points from which importations came. From the United States 1,094 barrels of oysters imported in the shell were valued at $6,938. From the same country 104,882 gallons of shelled oysters valued at $161,540 were imported. Again from the United States we received 106,117 pint cans valued at $11,145 and 4,701 quart cans valued at $1,896. Prepared or dried oysters were shipped in from China and Japan to the value of about $10,000. The total importations from outside sources were valued at $200,000.

I should like to see the department continue the development of oyster farming, and particularly the development of many of the barren areas in our bays and rivers. Some time ago the control of these bays and rivers was discussed before the privy council, and the decision was made giving the control of the waters to the federal government. Following that the federal government and the legislature of Prince Edward Island entered into a contract by which leases were granted to fishermen throughout the province. I would impress upon the acting Minister of Fisheries the necessity for further investigations, and would urge that further services be given so that our fishermen may engage in this most profitable branch of the fishing industry.

Mr. MacLEAN: I have in my hand a petition signed by the fishermen's committee, the following names appearing: William McKinnon, president; Charles McFadyen, Richard Murphy, Norman Thompson, and Elisworth Gillis, secretary. I shall pass the petition on to the minister, because upon handing it to the clerk of petitions he indicated that because it asked for a grant of public money it was out of order. The committee is now witness to the fact that the petition has been presented to the minister, and I trust that some action will be taken.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou may I say that I was surprised to learn that no information had come from the government of Nova Scotia because in correspondence with the premier of that province I gathered he was ready and willing to consider the matter of cultivating oyster beds on Bras D'Or lakes and East bay. Considerable fishing is now done at those points, and I believe the ground is fertile. I would ask the minister to give some attention to the matter, because I feel sure that Nova Scotia is ready and willing to cooperate.

Item agreed to.

To provide for an investigation into the life history of the Pacific halibut by an international fisheries commission appointed under the Pacific halibut treaty of the 2nd March, 1923, $25,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Would the minister explain how the money was expended last year, and how long the sum of $25,000 has been paid?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not the actual figures for last year, but perhaps it will satisfy the hon. member if I give the estimated expenditure of the same amount this year. Half the cost of the work of the commission is paid by the United States and half by Canada, and that is divided as follows: Salaries, $33,114; vessel operations, $9,286; travel and subsistence, $2,400; office supplies, $1,000; telegrams, postage, freight and expressage, laboratory supplies and equipment, $700; printing reports, $2,400; redemption of tax, $600; expenses of conferences with fishermen, $500. That makes up the $50,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The Canadian fishermen have complained that in this investigation American boats were hired and American supplies purchased, and that Canadian fishermen did not have a chance to tender or to share in the benefits so far as the money was concerned. Has this investigation been done absolutely by American officers on American boats?

Mr. STIRLING: Wherever the work can be done by Canadian boats it is so done, but there are waters off the Alaska coast where larger boats are required than those we can obtain in Canada, and then United States boats are hired.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Have any Canadian boats been hired?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not the actual number of boats hired but undoubtedly Canadian boats have been hired to do the work.

Mr. MacLEAN: Has any demand been received from fishermen in regard to the late season on the north shore of Prince Edward Island, asking that the season start on August 1 instead of August 15 as at present?

Mr. STIRLING: We have received such requests, as well as requests in the opposite direction, and after all the information that can be collected has been considered the department makes the decision with regard to the date.

Mr. VENIOT: Has any decision been made with regard to these requests?

Mr. STIRLING: Not yet.

Mr. VENIOT: The matter is under consideration now?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Marine Biological Board of Canada, $186,000.

Mr. REID: What is the reason for the increase of $11,000?

Mr. STIRLING: The increase is made up as follows: Salmon investigations on Atlantic coast, $2,000; investigation on Nicomekl and Serpentine rivers, British Columbia, $1,000; Investigation on Okanagan lakes, $1,000; mackerel investigations on the Atlantic $200; general survey of lakes and rivers, $1,800; investigation of scallop fishery, bay of Fundy, $1,000; deep sea investigation of conditions affecting movement of haddock and cod, $2,000; extension of courses of instruction to fishermen, both coasts, $2,000. That makes up the total. My hon. friend is aware that the biological board is really a separate organization made up of representatives of the universities doing biological work, but to a large extent it is the scientific division closely connected with the department.

Mr. REID: We appreciate the vote of $1,000 for work on the Nicomekl and Serpentine rivers. These two rivers were once heavily stocked with fish, but they are close to the boundary line and we have had many visitors who have fished in these rivers. The fish have disappeared and I am glad that there is this item of $1,000 for purposes of investigation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the minister give me some information in regard to the biological station which we were told would be opened on the Gaspé coast? Last year or the year before when this matter was before the house the then Minister of Fisheries, now Minister of Marine, led us to believe that a biological station would be instituted in that locality.

Mr. STIRLING: My hon. friend is referring to the proposal to build a station at Gaspé?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: No official decision has been reached with regard to it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Since the minister has been in charge of the department has he received any request from the government of Quebec regarding this matter?

Mr. STIRLING: I do not recollect having received such a request from the provincial government.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is the matter still under consideration or has the idea been altogether abandoned?

Mr. STIRLING: It has by no means been completely abandoned; it is one of the measures that are being considered and the coat is being cut everywhere according to the cloth.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What progress has been made since this matter was first taken into consideration by the minister's predecessor, and what has been the progress since the minister himself has been in charge?

Mr. STIRLING: No recommendation has reached me, so far as my memory goes, from the provincial government, and I have not gone into the matter in detail since I have been acting minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This question was under consideration two years ago—since 1932—and on one occasion it was openly stated by the present Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) that the station would be established in that locality for the benefit of all fishermen in the district, and as well for the fishermen of the north shore. Now we are given to understand that it will be started as soon as possible. When I made inquiries on the first occasion the minister said that nothing had been done but that the matter was under consideration. That was the year before last, and again last year it was under consideration; this year we receive the same reply. I want to put the facts before the committee. Although the station has been promised by the federal government, through the Minister of Fisheries, and although the matter has been under consideration for some time now, the minister at that time having led us to believe that he was in constant communication with the provincial government, there having been recommendations from them and from his officials, nothing has been done in this matter. For the last three years we have been asking for this station and although it was promised it is not forthcoming; it is still in the offing with nothing practical in sight.

Mr. VENIOT: Have any steps been taken by the biological board in the matter of research in the bay of Chaleur for the development of scallop beds in that section of the province?

Mr. STIRLING: Information is not being sought by the biological board at the present time, but of course, as the hon. member will recall, investigational work has been done in the past by the department in that area, and the results of that investigation were then published.

Item agreed to.

To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for a grant to the United Maritime Fishermen, $4,050.

Mr. NEILL: This vote is for a very worthy purpose. Last year when it was being discussed the then acting minister promised me, in answer to a question, that he would grant a similar vote to the fishermen of British Columbia if we recommended a suitable association qualifying in the same way as this one does. Two weeks ago I presented such an application to the minister. I do not think I had a reply but I trust he will consider the matter and possibly put an item in the supplementary estimates. The association I recommended was the largest one in British Columbia, one of long existence and considerable reputation. You have only to look up Hansard to see that the minister defintely said that if we put forward a claim of that kind it would be favourably considered.

Mr. REID: If the minister is considering grants to associations they should all be taken care of. One is not more important than another. Far be it from me to raise any sectional or constitutional cry, but the Pacific coast has been rather neglected as regards assistance to fishermen's associations. I do not need to point out any difference in importance as between British Columbia and the maritimes; one is as important as the other. But if grants are to be given to one, all fishermen's organizations, provided they are functioning legitimately and in good condition, should have their applications for grants favourably considered. I have in mind the fishermen's protective association on the Fraser river at two points, one above and one below the bridge. I believe the active membership is over one thousand, and I ask the minister to give consideration to that association also.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister give us some information on this point?

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member will probably realize that in the maritimes there is one fishermen's association which can speak with one voice for the fishermen there. A practical difficulty occurs to me that on the Pacific coast there is a considerable number of fishermen's associations, and if an application came in from one of them, applications from all the rest should certainly be considered at the same time. This might add to the government's difficulties in making a decision. Of course the door is never closed to the consideration of applications that may come in, but I cannot go further than to say that consideration will be given.

Mr. NEILL: Possibly the minister has answered himself. The reason why there is only one association in the maritimes is the grant given; it has amalgamated them into one and it was used for that purpose. At one time there were scores of these petty associations, and the very fact that such a grant was forthcoming and that by their coming together in one united body they could obtain it, encouraged them to cooperate. As regards any difficulty as to which society or association in British Columbia should get the grant, I do not think the minister would find us petty in that connection. I would suggest giving it for this year at any rate to the largest one, and as the one I recommended happens to be not only the largest but the oldest in that province, dating back I think some twenty years and having a good record as the deputy minister knows, I do not think any of the smaller associations would take exception to that or put up a demand to be considered at the same time. Probably this would result in the formation, as has been spoken of by the minister, of one large association for the whole province; but as the hon. member for New Westminster says, we are not being treated fairly when no recognition of that kind is being extended to British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR

Government of the Yukon territory—

Salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, including surveys, $42,000.

Grant to Yukon council for local purposes, the construction and maintenance of roads and such other expenditures as the commissioner is authorized to expend by and with the advice and consent of the council or any committee thereof; and the accounts with respect to such expenditure shall be subject to examination and audit by the Auditor General as provided by section 22, chapter 215, revised statutes 1927, $60,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the minister give us an indication of the roads on which this amount is to be expended?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): The item of $60,000 is a grant to the Yukon council for local purposes for the construction and maintenance of roads and such other expenditures as the commissioner authorizes by and with the advice and consent of the local council. They are local roads in the Yukon which are maintained by the local council.

Item agreed to.

Dominion lands, parks, etc.—

Dominion lands, seed grain, mining lands and ordnance, admiralty and public lands, salaries and expenses, etc., $90,797.96.

Advancement of forest conservation; national inventory of forest resources; investigation of forest conditions and rates of growth, and development of scientific management methods; forest protection studies, technical and economic investigations of forest industries; the operation of forest experiment stations, demonstration forests; and forest products laboratories; cooperative undertakings in forestry and forest products, etc., $250,000.

Grant to Canadian Forestry Association, $1,620.

Investigation of water and power resources and of international waterway problems, the dominion hydrometric survey and for the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, etc., $165,100.

Amount required to meet expenses of Lake of the Woods Control Board, $7,000.

To provide for the expenses connected with the national parks of Canada, historic sites, care of indigents in the parks, the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in the parks and the payment of their remuneration, $1,105,188.

Administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $35,500.

Costs of litigation and legal expenses, $4,000.

Amount to provide for expenses in connection with determination of location and boundaries of ordnance and admiralty lands in the province of British Columbia, $3,000.

Amount required to cover the payment of retiring leave to officials other than those on civil government, $7,350.

Salaries of revenue staff, $8,856.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the amount of road that remains to be constructed in the national parks area to link up with the British Columbia section?

Mr. MURPHY: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the Big Bend road?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: On the eastern section of the road, that is the section lying between Donald and Canoe river, there are some sixteen miles to complete, including the bridge over the Canoe river. On that stretch a certain amount of work has been done comprising rock cut and a certain amount of grading, but the road from Donald to Canoe river, that is the eastern leg, has been completely graded and surfaced with the exception of some sixteen miles at the northern end. On the western leg the road has been partly completed to a distance of some fifty-eight and a half miles. It is not completed in the sense that it has all been graded and gravelled, but it is in a passable condition. There remain on that section approximately thirty-five miles which require new construction, in other words on which no work has been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the present rate of progress how long will it take to complete the entire gap in the Big Bend?

Mr. MURPHY: The eastern leg, that is the leg for which the dominion government is responsible, could, if funds were made available, be completed this year; but the western leg, which is a responsibility of the province of British Columbia, would it is estimated take practically two years to complete, that is if all the available crews which could advantageously be used were employed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are any of the construction crews, that is in the unemployment camps, being used on the British Columbia end of this particular piece of road?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, last season under the Department of National Defence certain camps were in operation on that road. There are none at the present time, I understand. The work which they were doing consisted in putting that portion of the road constructed by the province into fairly passable shape, clearing out landslides and doing a certain amount of grading. The work on the eastern leg was carried on under the Public Works Construction Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could the minister give an estimate of the value of the work done by the men in the camps?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the figures; that would have to be given by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. POULIOT: As this item includes historic sites, I take this opportunity to thank the minister for the cairn which has been erected at Cabano, in Témiscouata county, in remembrance of Vieux Chemin du Lac and Fort Ingall. And now, sir, may I make a suggestion to the minister? At St. Patrick, Sir John A. Macdonald, a former prime minister of Canada, used to spend his summers. The house is still there. May I ask the minister to see that a memorial tablet is put on that house? It is quite forgotten now, and it should be brought to the attention of passersby.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for Témiscouata is a very astute gentleman, and I could not find it in my heart to refuse the appeal which he has made. I shall be very glad to take it into consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. I can tell the hon. gentleman why I ask that. It is because it has been promised for eight years by the provincial government, but we have nothing yet; therefore I appeal to the minister.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Under the forestry item I notice there is a slight increase in the expenditure contemplated. May I ask if the department contemplates extending the policy of forest experiment and demonstration stations, establishing new stations or extending their activities? I ask this particularly in view of discussions that have been carried on in connection with the drought problem and the possibility of helping to cope with that problem through forestation.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, we have endeavoured in the past four years to extend our field experimental stations, and during the past year we brought a new one into being at Kananaskis in Alberta, in which station woods indigenous to that area can be studied in the field. I think the hon. gentleman has reference more to the service that the forestry department can render in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture in restoring to fertility the drought areas in the west. We have been in consultation with the Department of Agriculture and are at present working in close cooperation with them both from a forestry and from a water power standpoint.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the department any experience in the attempt to grow trees in drought areas? There is a great deal of discussion about that at the present time both here and in the United States, and naturally many of us are very much interested I am asking this because of what I have been observing in the drier areas, and because there is some doubt in my mind as to the possibility of growing trees where drought conditions have become bad. I have seen a good many shelter belts and plantations where trees which had been growing for some twenty years and had become well rooted have died out because of the drought. In view of this I was wondering whether experiments have been carried on in attempting to grow trees as part of the battle against drought, and if so what the results have been. Possibly the experience has been so limited that the department has not been able to form any definite conclusions, but it is a topic of much interest in parts of western Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: So far the forestry department have conducted no experiments along the line indicated. It may be that certain experiments have been carried on at the tree stations at Indian Head or Sutherland in Saskatchewan, but as those two stations are now administered by the Department of Agriculture I am unable to speak as to the results. The Department of the Interior has not carried on any experiments of the kind mentioned.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What was the reason for taking the forestry station at Indian Head from the control of the Department of the Interior and handing it over to the Department of Agriculture, especially as the Department of the Interior has a forestry branch? I have never been able to understand why that change was made. Did it result in any saving?

Mr. MURPHY: I am unable to state whether any saving of money has been made. This change took place I think in 1931. The Department of Agriculture have I believe an experimental farm in that area, and as the activities of the forestry branch of the department were greatly curtailed owing to the transfer of the natural resources, when it was necessary to curtail the personnel and the activities of that branch of the Department of the Interior it was decided after fully canvassing the situation that these two stations could with advantage to the public interest be transferred to the Department of Agriculture. I believe they have been carried on since that time without any lessening of the activities or services to the people of western Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It seems strange that the work of tree planting and tree production, which should be entirely under the control of the forestry branch, a branch that remains under the Department of the Interior, should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture. Clearly the latter department was not performing that service at all prior to that time, and it has not been extended since. Probably the minister is aware that it was the intention to establish a nursery farm in Alberta, but that has not been done. I did not realize just how much curtailment had taken place in connection with this activity until I made application this year to the provincial department in Alberta for some trees, and they informed me that they were giving out trees only for public parks and grounds around public buildings. To separate this particular branch from the forestry branch seems to me a retrograde step. I cannot see what special qualification either the minister or the officials of the Department of Agriculture have for the carrying on of that work that is not possessed by officials of the department in which this branch had up to that time been located. I think the change was a serious mistake.

Mr. MURPHY: If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly he said there had been a cessation of activity in regard to the distribution of trees from these stations. To the best of my knowledge, and I think I am correct, there has been no cessation of the work. It has been carried on since 1930 as extensively as before that time, the only difference being that it is now administered by the Department of Agriculture instead of the Department of the Interior. The employees at both these stations, Indian Head and Sutherland, have been retained. One reason which induced the change was that after the transfer of resources our field staff was practically non-existent, whereas the Department of Agriculture had inspectors whose duties took them over all areas in the three western provinces. That was practically the deciding factor in making the transfer. These men could carry out the necessary inspections and obtain the necessary information along with their other work, so it was thought that they were in a better position to administer these stations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If I may intervene, my recollection is that the government in 1931, in their very proper desire to economize—so long of course as it was true economy—had decided to close the forestry farms at both Sutherland and Indian Head. The minister will correct me if I am wrong.

I remember that the staff at Indian Head were all notified that their services would not be required after a certain day, I think June 1, 1931. Then a great agitation spread over the land. My hon. friend will remember that was one of our very worst and driest and windiest springs, yet when the country was almost blowing away the government was deciding to close the forestry station from which in the past trees had been obtained for planting. It was such an extraordinary move for the government to make that great public indignation arose, which was made manifest in so many ways that the government had to do something rather than just make an about face, so they decided to transfer these farms from the Interior department to the Department of Agriculture. I think that is about the way it happened. Then no extra vote was inserted in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture; these forestry farms were tied up to the experimental farms vote, with a smaller vote than the experimental farms received previously. If that sort of thing can be done without prejudice to the service, my hon. friend deserves a leather medal or something better. That is a feat of which I never heard before, but apparently it is being done, after a fashion at all events. If I am wrong in my recital I would consider it a friendly act if the minister would put me right, but my recollection of what happened in this respect in 1931 is pretty acute.

Mr. MURPHY: It is true that following the transfer of the resources to the western provinces in 1930 the activities which had been carried on in the Department of the Interior came under review, and it fell to my lot to scrutinize carefully every activity which might be continued by the department. It is true, as the hon. member has stated, that certain employees of these stations received notice that their services might be terminated as of a certain day, but not all the employees of those two stations were so notified. I may say quite frankly that it never was definitely decided that those stations should be closed, but rather that all services were studied in order to ascertain those that should continue to be performed by the Department of the Interior, having regard to the public interest, and what services should be performed by the provinces.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We could not expect the minister to put it just as I did, but at any rate that was the effect of the whole business. If all those who were notified had been let out, these forestry farms could not have been carried on. However, the old saying is true; all's well that ends well. I was never particular whether these forestry farms were administered by the Interior department or by the Department of Agriculture, so long as they had the staff and the money with which to do the work. Time has shown that there is just as much demand for the services of these farms as there ever was, and if financial circumstances permitted the people to make more use of them I think there would be a greater demand now because of the devastating winds we have had since 1930.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has the information before him with regard to the quantity of seed produced at the coniferous seed plant in New Westminster to what countries that seed is sent, and if any reports as to the results from that seed have been received from the countries to which the seed went. Further, is any of the seed produced or extracted at that plant used in Canada?

Mr. MURPHY: The total seed collected to the end of 1934 amounted to 46,785 pounds, of which the British forestry commission received 28,259 pounds, New Zealand 17,183 pounds, Australia 677 pounds, the Irish Free State 52 pounds, Northern Ireland 140 pounds, while certain small surpluses above the requirements of these countries were disposed of to dealers in Canada, Spain, Belgium, Finland, Denmark and other countries. I have no report as to the success the various countries had with these seeds, but as they are taking them year after year I judge that the results must be successful.

Mr. REID: Are we using any of that seed in this country?

Mr. MURPHY: The dominion government is not engaged in reforestation, that being a responsibility of the various provinces. I believe we do use small quantities, but they are so small as to be almost negligible.

Mr. GERSHAW: There happen to be in my constituency two national parks, which come under this department, and I find that there have been a great many complaints about the way those in charge of the parks manage them. They are supposed to be antelope reserves, but those in charge appear to have large herds of cattle and large bands of horses inside the reserves; consequently the grass is all eaten down. The neighbouring ranchers are very short of grazing areas, and they find themselves at a great disadvantage as compared with the managers of the parks. Have these managers the sole grazing privileges in the parks?

Mr. MURPHY: I understand that the parks to which the hon. member refers are Wawaskesy and Nemiskam?

Mr. GERSHAW: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Nemiskam is purely an antelope park in which the dominion government have impounded the pronghorned antelope, which I believe is the only herd of its kind so confined in Canada, if not in North America. This area is fenced, and I do not think the cattle of settlers could enter that park because of the very high strong wire fence surrounding it. Wawaskesy, on the other hand, is an open range, and certain settlers have the privilege of pasturing a certain number of cattle on it. The park is now in charge of a caretaker who has the responsibility of issuing the permits and seeing that the area is not overgrazed.

Mr. GERSHAW: The complaint seems to be particularly in regard to the last named park; it is said that the caretaker uses all the territory for his own stock. However, I would like to ask the minister if he intends to have an open season this year for the shooting of antelope.

Mr. MURPHY: This matter was drawn to my attention some time ago and we have arranged to have the inspector of the soldier settlement board investigate the charges and communicate with the municipal authorities in that area, who I believe made the complaint in the first instance. The report has not come in as yet, but when it does I shall take such steps as are necessary under the circumstances. In reply to the last question I may say that no permission to shoot antelope will be given at least for this season.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Just what are the functions of these forest experiment stations? Are they purely experimental or do they include a certain amount of distribution?

Mr. MURPHY: They are purely experimental, carrying on studies of the rates of growth of the various species and in fact the whole science of silviculture.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Any distribution of forest products, then, that is carried on in those branches is under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, that is correct. We make no distribution from our experimental stations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister received any representations in the last year in regard to the taking over of Garibaldi park in British Columbia, and what is the policy of the department in that regard?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, representations have been received this year, as in other years, in regard to the taking over by the dominion of Garibaldi park in British Columbia. If my memory serves me correctly the hon. member placed a question on the order paper which the Prime Minister answered. The answer at that time was in the negative; and the same answer applies now.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it the intention of the government to establish a national park in the province of Nova Scotia, and if so, when and where?

Mr. MURPHY: Representations have been made by the province of Nova Scotia over a period of some months. Following those representations and an exchange of correspondence a survey of the different areas in Nova Scotia was made by an officer of the Department of the Interior, but so far no decision has been made and the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Could the minister state what sites are under consideration?

Mr. MURPHY: Northern Cape Breton, Yarmouth county and Blomidon peninsula.

Mr. DUFF: It is quite evident that the minister or his officials do not know the beauty spots of Nova Scotia. I can understand, of course, that Yarmouth county, and Blomidon, which is in the constituency of the hon. member for Hants-Kings, would come under review, but I must observe that there is a most beautiful situation in the county of Guysborough which forms a natural park. Before the minister makes a final decision I would suggest that he send his officials to that county. In fact if he is serious about the matter I am surprised he has not sent his officials to the county of Guysborough before this, because I may say to him there is no part of Nova Scotia where the beauties are so natural as they are in the particular part which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. MURPHY: From what little I have seen of the province of Nova Scotia I am sure it must contain many beauty spots, and I am certain, too, that the inhabitants of that beautiful province would consider that any area within its borders would be suitable for a national park. May I say however that before a park can be established it is necessary for the province in which the park is to be located to donate the park area to the dominion government. Instructions were issued to our official to inspect the areas the provincial authorities had signified a willingness to donate to the dominion as a national park. If the hon. member feels special attention should be given to the area he has the honour to represent I would suggest that in the first instance he make his representations to the government of Nova Scotia. Then if they are so minded they will make proper representations to the dominion, at which time we could make our inspection. Until that action is taken, however, I am afraid no inspection will be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That did not work in British Columbia.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister mean to say that the province of Nova Scotia made representations to him in which they named three points at which national parks could be established, namely in Yarmouth, Blomidon and Cape Breton? I cannot understand that. I have no influence with the government of Nova Scotia; in fact to be quite candid I am opposed to a national park in that province. It seems to me the minister would be well advised to forget the whole business. We have no need of a national park. We will cut our trees down and sell them under the British empire trade agreements, the marketing act, or some other agreements. We need all the money we can get, and instead of making a playground we want to get work for the people. We do not want parks into which the automobile drivers may drive their cars, have picnics and set fire to the woods of the province. Of course if there is going to be a national park I would suggest that my constituency is the most beautiful in the province, but may I add that my advice would be that the minister forget all about it.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I think there must be some misapprehension in this matter. I am informed on good authority that the provincial government have already expressed their willingness to grant the site necessary for a national park. There is but one site in the whole province of Nova Scotia suitable for such a park and that is to be found on the island of Cape Breton. For the benefit of the hon. member who has just spoken may I say that the whole county of Antigonish coupled with the neighbouring county of Guysborough would not be half large enough for a national park. The hon member seems to be under the impression that all that is required is a kitchen garden. The area required for a national park can be found only in the adjoining counties of Pictou and Inverness, where we could have a national park with all the grandeur and beauty appropriate to such purposes. I cannot say that I am any greater admirer of the local government than is the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough; in fact I do not think either of us thinks very favourably of it. I understand however that they have given the assurance to the originator of the national parks idea that they are ready to grant a site as soon as a selection is made by an official of this department. We hope to have that done this summer.

Mr. DUFF: It is interesting to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South, especially when the hon. member for Inverness is sitting by his side, state that the only place for a park would be in the county of Inverness. The least he might have done would have been to wait until his colleague and deskmate, the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria, was in his seat, because I think that hon. member would have liked to say something. So far as the hon. member who has just spoken is concerned may I say that all he represents is a hole in the ground. Every time a person steps out of a door in South Cape Breton he is scared to death he will fall in the Atlantic ocean. It is surprising to me that the hon. member would come to this chamber and suggest a national park in the part of Cape Breton he represents. It is quite true that my constituency is not as large as I should like to have it, but last year there were some people in this chamber who wanted to make it much larger. For some reason or other however it was left as it has been for the last ten years. Whether or not the government of Nova Scotia is anxious to grant a site, I believe I am speaking correctly when I state that the people of Nova Scotia do not want a national park. We can do very well without it. If the government is going to spend money, let it help the fishermen, the lumbermen or the farmers; let the minister help these people, as the minister who piloted his bill for $90,000,000 through the house only a few days ago is trying to do. Of course, a national parks program is all right when a Liberal government is in power, because in such times we have an overflowing treasury, business is good, we are able to pay off $258,000,000 of the public debt and have a surplus of $85,000,000. In those times we can build post offices in the hon. member's constituency; we can build public buildings in New Waterford, and at such times it is quite all right to talk about expenditures for national parks. It seems to me the hon. member should hang his head in shame when he asks the Minister of the Interior to spend money for national parks in Nova Scotia, particularly when he must know about the deplorable and distressing conditions existing not only in Nova Scotia but throughout the country.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Such a statement as that cannot be allowed to go unchallenged, even if it be made by an hon. member as irresponsible as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough—and I do not use the term invidiously. Nova Scotia is not the worst province in the dominion; it is the best. Not only is Nova Scotia the best province, but the county of Cape Breton is the best county. Apparently the hon. member does not appreciate the importance of having a national park; he does not seem to realize the benefits the fishermen would derive from it. I am sure if he did, having in mind the deep and abiding love he has for fishermen, he would withdraw his opposition to the creation of a park. I should be only too happy if the hon. member would find a place in the counties of Antigonish and Guysborough for a national park, but it is ridiculous to think that because he cannot have a park in his constituency he would go the length of preventing any other part of the province from having one.

Mr. DUFF: I thank the hon. member for South Cape Breton for those kind words.

Mr. VALLANCE: Now that we have listened to a discussion of maritime rights there is another matter I should like to discuss with the minister, and as I gave him notice of my intention undoubtedly he will have the information before him. I note that in addition to providing for national parks the vote provides for expenditures in connection with historic sites. In the town of Battleford, which is one of the oldest towns west of the great lakes and was at one time the capital of the northwest territories, away back in the early days when the Royal Northwest Mounted Police was first established, a barracks was built and attached thereto was seventy-five acres of land. About 1924 or 1925 the mounted police found it expedient to discontinue the occupancy of that barracks. The site of the northwest mounted police barracks is situated about one mile from the old town of Battleford and was at that time within the precincts of the corporation. An application was made to the then Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) on March 24, 1927. Prior to this application it was understood that Bishop Lloyd contemplated asking the government to lease this property to him. In a letter addressed to the superintendent, ordnance, admiralty and railway lands branch of the Department of the Interior, dated March 24, 1927, the town clerk states:

Dear Sir:

It is understood that Bishop Lloyd has decided to abandon the idea of leasing the former Royal Northwest Mounted Police barracks here, and if there is no other scheme of making use of the property, the council asks your consideration of a request that the buildings and surveyed area within the townsite be turned over to the town.

That was March 24, 1927. On July 4, 1927 we received a communication from the same department—there was a letter between the one of March 24 and that of July 4—as follows:

With reference to your letter of the 7th ultimo, I beg to advise you that the application of the town of Battleford to acquire the above mentioned property has been given careful consideration and it has been decided to permit the corporation of the town of Battleford to lease the said property, as recreational grounds, for a period of twenty-one years at the nominal rental of $1 per annum.

That arrangement continued until quite recently, then we find a notice from the present Minister of the Interior, dated August 4, 1934, in which he states:

I hereby give you notice in accordance with the proviso contained in the lease or agreement dated the twenty-ninth day of March, 1928, made between His Majesty the King, represented therein by the Minister of the Interior of Canada, of the first part, and yourself, of the second part, that I, Thomas Gerow Murphy, of the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, Minister of the Interior, intend to determine the said lease on the fourth day of October, 1934, and I require you on or before that date to deliver up possession of the premises, namely, that portion of the town plot of Battleford in the province of Saskatchewan, in the Dominion of Canada, particularly described in the aforementioned lease.

Dated at Ottawa, Ontario, this fourth day of August, 1934.

Will the minister explain to the committee why he found it necessary to cancel that agreement entered into in March, 1928? I should like to know further what is being done with the property. Who now occupies the buildings, and for what purpose?

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member has stated, this property was leased to the town of Battleford under the authority of an order in council, P.C. 2380, dated December 20, 1927. This lease was given for an area comprising about seventy-five acres, together with several buildings thereon, and it was issued to the town for recreational purposes for the term of twenty-one years, from February 1, 1928, at a nominal rental of $1 per annum. The conditions of the lease were briefly these:

1. The lessee to pay the rent as set forth and pay all charges, taxes, rates and assessments during the continuance of the lease.
2. The lessee not to sublet or assign without consent.
3. The lessor to have the right to enter upon the premises for inspection at any time.
4. That the said lands shall be used for the purposes aforesaid, that is, recreational purposes and for no other purpose.
5. The lessee within a reasonable time to repair and keep in repair buildings designated by an inspecting officer to be retained.
6. The lessor may cancel by notice in writing if rental unpaid for thirty days, or for contravention of the conditions of the lease.
7. Manner of notification of cancellation.

The town of Battleford violated the second and fourth conditions of the lease. The second condition was that the lessee was not to sublet or assign without consent, and the other condition was that the lands were to be used for recreational purposes and for no other purpose. The town allowed the late Constable John Guthrie to occupy one of the houses as caretaker and later allowed H. S. Stewart to use the barracks building to keep cattle, horses and pigs for fattening purposes, and also for housing some of his men. The hon. member must bear in mind that this property was to be used only for recreational purposes. Certain information came to the department in regard to the manner in which the town was allowing this property to be used, and we requested the Indian agent, Mr. S. L. Macdonald, to make an inspection and to report, and this was done. I have before me the details of his report. At a later date the Indian agent was asked to make a further report, which he did, and this report I have also before me. In answer to the last question, as to what is being done with the property at the present time, I may say that the lease has been formally cancelled and there is in charge a caretaker in the person of George W. French. The buildings, which have been occupied by certain people to whom permission was given by the town of Battleford, are I believe still in the possession of these people, but notice has been given them to vacate at a certain date.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not think that anything has been done, which would constitute a violation of the agreement, that was not submitted to the department and approved. I have here a letter dated May 21, 1934, but before I go on to read it I think that there is an explanation due me if not this committee as to who George W. French is. I think the minister knows a little more about him than I do. Who is he and why is he there?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I cannot give any personal information as regards George W. French. All I can say is that I believe he is a resident of the district and he is at present caretaker of the property.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the minister does not know who he is, will he tell us who it was that recommended him to take charge of this property?

Mr. MURPHY: The recommendation was made to me by responsible parties in that district.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is all very well for the minister to say that the recommendation came from responsible parties, but this committee has the right to know who these responsible parties are. There was nothing in the whole transaction, from the beginning until the time the minister took action against the town, that was not aboveboard. There was not a suggestion of change or of a breaking of the lease that was not first submitted to the department and agreed to. The minister speaks of responsible parties. Did the town of Battleford suggest that George W. French be the caretaker?

Mr. MURPHY: As regards the statement that complaints were not made by the town of Battleford in regard to breaking the terms of the agreement, of course they would not be made by the town. That is obvious.

Mr. VALLANCE: I did not say that.

Mr. MURPHY: But they certainly did violate the terms of the lease, and I am informed by my officials that the violations of the terms of the lease were made without the knowledge or consent of the department. As responsible minister in charge of the department, when information was received to the effect that the terms of the lease were being violated, I deemed it my duty to have an investigation made, and this was done. As we had no officer in the Department of the Interior to carry out the investigation we requested the nearest Indian agent, Mr. Macdonald, to make the investigation, and this he did. The action followed.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is no use in the minister and me fencing about who George W. French is. If I am wrongly informed, I want the minister to correct me. I have no objection to Mr. French being a Tory, but he is also a relative of the minister.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. George W. French is not a relative of mine.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then let us go back to the agreement. I hold in my hand a letter dated May 21, 1934, addressed to the department, as follows:

Re File No. 80980-5

Former Mounted Police Reserve—
Battleford, Saskatchewan

In reply to your letter of the 27th April I am instructed to say that the buildings have been kept in as good repair as possible, and those marked to be demolished were sold and the proceeds $644 placed to the credit of a fund from which repairs were paid for as required from time to time. There is now the sum of $238.68 to the credit of the account.

So that the committee may be acquainted with just what happened, may I say that there was a large block of buildings in the old northwest mounted police barracks. At one time there were about seventy-five mounted police stationed there. There were the usual quartermaster's stores, barracks, dormitories and so forth. The agreement entered into by the town with the department was that certain buildings should be demolished and that the lumber from them should be used in repairing the buildings that had to be kept for historic purposes. The letter goes on to say:

It is true that the building known as the concert hall was sold to Mr. Quehl and the material removed, the proceeds of the sale being placed to the credit of the fund referred to. The other buildings which have disappeared were treated in the same manner.

The council's reason for this policy was that the material would probably be made away with —the property being so far from town, and much of it was not suitable for repair work.

It is also true that there are some pigs in the large stable, and some cattle in the adjoining shed. These pigs and cattle are owned by Mr. H. S. Stewart whose application to lease the buildings was forwarded to you—

That is to the department.

—on 5th February last and acknowledged for consideration 15th February. Mr. Stewart farms 300 acres of the town lands adjoining the barracks property.

It is also true that Mr. John Guthrie, a former constable of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police is occupying the house formerly used by the superintendent, as caretaker—rent free.

I think the minister will admit that it was agreed when the agreement was entered into with the department that someone should be caretaker. Mr. Guthrie, an old Royal Northwest Mounted Police man, was given the position as caretaker by the town. The letter continues:

As caretaker he receives no pay. I regret to say that he is very ill at the present time and is not expected to recover. He is over seventy years of age and like all the old mounted policemen has served the west well.

May I refer you to a report—

To which the minister also referred.

—on these premises made by Indian Agent S. L. Macdonald, March 12/34, File No. 389-126. This report was made on the instructions of H. W. McGill, Esquire, Department of Indian Affairs at the request of the Minister of the Interior, and deals fully with all matters referred to except the funding of the money for the buildings disposed of and demolished. Copy of this statement is attached.

As the member representing South Battleford in which is situated the old town of Battleford, I merely wish again to raise my voice in condemning, if you like, the Department of the Interior for the action they have taken in this matter. There is no greater historic site in Saskatchewan to-day than the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police barracks, and there is no individual or group of individuals in a better position to take care of those old barracks than is the corporation or council of the town of Battleford. I hope the minister, before he leaves office, will reconsider the stand he has taken on this matter and restore to the old town of Battleford the agreement that was entered into by the late government in 1928. I think the minister himself will admit that it will be just too bad if we are going to allow a property like this to be used as a political football, and I will tell him, whether he likes it or not, that if he does not restore the agreement, every effort of mine will, as soon as the election is over, be used to reestablish the rights of the old town of Battleford in the possession of this property.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member has very well answered himself. He quoted to the committee a statement that certain of the buildings might be demolished, which demolition was carried out, and that the proceeds were to be used for the repair of the other buildings; that certain of the material was sold and that there was a balance remaining of $238.68, which was not used for the purpose of repairing buildings, which has not been turned over to the Department of the Interior, and which remains unpaid until the present moment. Further—and this is what I wish to draw to the attention of the committee—the hon. member has made a plea that this site should remain with the town of Battleford, because it is an historic site and the Battleford council are the best people to administer it. They were given the administration of that area for one purpose only, namely, that it was to be used solely for recreational purposes. They did not so use it; the hon. member admits that himself. Certain of those buildings were used by Mr. Stewart to house cattle, sheep, pigs; stacks of feed were placed on the ground, and of course the grounds would be covered with the litter from the stables in which the various animals were housed. In developing his theme, the hon. member stated that this was an historic site and that the town was therefore the best instrument to be used to perpetuate its memory. I have related to the committee how those grounds were used. I put this question to the committee: Is that a proper and fitting way to use an old historic site—to utilize the buildings for the housing of animals and to have the grounds covered with litter, especially in view of the terms of the lease that the area was to be used for recreational purposes only. I have before me the detailed evidence, the report of the agent as to the condition of those buildings. I do not make any apology for the action taken, and were the matter to be dealt with to-morrow, I would take the same action with the town of Battleford or any other community which had violated, in the manner in which this was done, the terms of an agreement entered into.

Mr. VALLANCE: There are two questions I would like the minister to answer. When I read the letter dated May 21, 1934, addressed to the commissioner of Dominion lands, it contains this paragraph, just as the minister has stated:

> It is also true that there are some pigs in the large stable, and some cattle in the adjoining shed. These pigs and cattle are owned by Mr. H. S. Stewart whose application to lease the buildings was forwarded to you on 5th February last.

Did the minister receive that application, and did he refuse it or what became of it? I would like the minister to read the letter if he has it—and I think he has—in reply to this letter sent from Battleford on May 21, 1934.

Mr. MURPHY: That application never came before me. It may have been sent to the department, but to the best of my knowledge or recollection I did not see it. It may have been sent to the town; the town may have approved it in the first instance and it may have been sent to the department, but I have no recollection of that application ever coming before me, and I am assured by the officials that consent was never given, although apparently Mr. Stewart was in occupation of that building at the time and had been for some time previously.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has already stated that it was because of the occupation of Mr. Stewart of the buildings that he cancelled the agreement. Now he says that the application never came before him.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not what I said.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 12, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

MINIMUM WAGE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked me a question in regard to the page numbers in connection with the journal of the League of Nations which he had before him. I think perhaps the hon. gentleman had the wrong publication. The information which he seeks is as follows:

> In reply to Mr. Pouliot's question on the 11th March, Hansard, page 1704, it might be explained to him that the texts of draft conventions and recommendations adopted by international labour conferences are not printed in the official journal of the League of Nations but are to be found in the official bulletin of the international labour office where, on page 121 of the issue of the 31st July, 1928, he will find the text of the convention concerning the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery.

BUTTER PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand), I have the following information: The following statement gives the daily wholesale jobbing quotations for the week ending March 9 for creamery extras, 92 score butter on the two major butter markets in the United States, New York and Chicago, and the price of No. 1 pasteurized butter on the two major butter markets in Canada, Montreal and Toronto:

Date, 1935	New York c. per lb.	Chicago c. per lb.	Montreal c. per lb.	Toronto c. per lb.
March 4. . .	31½	30	25-25¼	25½
March 5. . .	31⅝	30	25-25¼	25½
March 6. . .	31¾	29¾	25-25¼	25 -25½
March 7. . .	31½	29¾	25-25¼	25¼
March 8. . .	32⅜	30½	25-25¼	25¼
March 9. . .	32¾	31	25	25¼

Ninety two score butter, creamery extras, in the United States corresponds with No. 1 pasteurized creamery butter in Canada. The wholesale price of butter in Windsor is governed largely by the Toronto market while the price at Detroit is governed largely by the Chicago market. The differential in these wholesale prices as at March 8 was 5¼ cents per pound.

The difference in retail prices as quoted from the Border Cities Star of March 8 is 18 cents per pound. If the retail prices quoted are correct the retail dealer in Detroit is evidently securing a much wider spread than the retail dealer in Windsor and the primary producer in the United States is not securing one-third of the alleged differential in the retail prices. It has been impossible for us to get definite retail butter prices in Detroit.

The reduction in creamery butter production in the United States for 1934 amounted to 108,896,200 pounds, of 6·18 per cent. Cold storage holdings of creamery butter in the United States on February 1, 1935, were 18,984,000 pounds as compared with 75,995,000 pounds on February 1, 1934, a reduction of slightly over 75 per cent. As a result the United States has been definitely on a butter import basis during the past few months.

The United States maintains a general tariff on butter of 14 cents per pound.

WESTERN POULTRY MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) on March 6, I have the following information with reference to the vote on the poultry scheme in the three prairie provinces:

Alberta

In favour—		Per cent	Total votes
Votes. . . .	12,635	62.5
Poultry. . .	958,064	63.0
			20,222
Against—
Votes. . . .	7,587	37.5
Poultry. . .	563,367	37.0

Saskatchewan

In favour—		Per cent	Total votes
Votes. . . .	27,749	63.4
Poultry. . .	1,828,692	62.8
			43,761
Against—
Votes. . . .	16,012	36.6
Poultry. . .	1,081,884	37.2

Manitoba

In favour—		Per cent	Total votes
Votes. . . .	6,070	24.3
Poultry. . .	433,800	24.7
			25,001
Against—
Votes. . . .	18,931	75.7
Poultry. . .	1,324,688	75.3
			88,984

In addition to the above ballots the following were received which due to some deficiency cannot be considered valid:

Alberta. . . .	1,407
Saskatchewan..	2,582
Manitoba. . .	1,264	5,253
		94,237

Due to the remoteness of certain small post offices it is possible that a few ballots may still be received, but we have estimated that this number should not exceed 100.

Based upon the number of producers as estimated from the census returns for 1931, the percentage of producers who voted is as follows:

Alberta..	33.3
Saskatchewan..	48.3
Manitoba..	64.2

In reply to the other question by the hon. member for Macdonald, as to whether or not the scheme would be put into effect I should like to say that in view of the fact that the supporters of the scheme appealed for support on the basis that the plan would not be put into effect unless carried by at least 66⅔ per cent of the voters, the scheme will not be put into effect in any of the three provinces.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Railways and Canals indicate when the special committee on railways and shipping will be convened?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, in order that it would not be thought that we were in any way holding up the proceedings of the committee I discussed the matter only a few days ago with some hon. members opposite, asking them when they would like to have the committee meet. As a matter of fact there is not much with which it could deal at the present time. The report of the Canadian National Railways has not yet come down, and I was informed this morning that it will not be down for another ten days. Until that report arrives there is not very much with which the committee could deal. However I shall be glad to call it or to see that it is called at the desire of the members of the committee themselves, for that matter.

ALASKAN HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, one day last week the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked a question regarding a press dispatch which made reference to a bill in the United States Senate regarding the proposed Alaskan highway. The information I have gained indicates that a bill to the effect mentioned was passed by the United States Senate on February 25. It requested the president to negotiate with Canada an agreement for the survey, location and construction of the highway, and to make a survey of the route in cooperation with the dominion government. The bill has not yet been passed by the House of Representatives. The President of the United States has not yet made any representations on the subject.

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 14, I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). The question regarding a press dispatch which the building of a bridge over the North Saskatchewan river at a point called Ceepee on the Jasper highway between North Battleford and Saskatoon. The essence of the question was as to whether or not this project would be included in any government public works program. The minister answered that I would have to await legislation which might be brought down, or that he would make a statement when the estimates for the Department of Public Works were before the house. No legislation has been brought down and no statement has been made. May I ask the minister if he could add anything to the statement he made at that time?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As the hon. member knows, no provision has been made in the main estimates for this work, and the supplementary estimates are not yet prepared. No bill has been drafted under which any provision would be made for this work.

[Mr. Manion.]

CIVIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question asked by me on March 6, and appearing at page 1464 of Hansard, referring to the removal of civil servants. My question was:

How many civil servants have been removed from their positions since the present government came into office by: (a) dismissal; (b) superannuation; (c) death; (d) other causes?

The Secretary of State indicated on that occasion that the term "civil servant" was defined in the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and upon that occasion he quoted the definition appearing in chapter 24 of the revised statutes. I find, however, upon looking into the statutes that while "civil servant" is defined in chapter 24, the Civil Service Superannuation Act, a further definition is given in chapter 22 of the revised statutes of Canada, namely The Civil Service Act. In chapter 22, "civil service" is defined as follows:

(a) "civil service" means the civil positions and employees in and under the several departments of the government of Canada, and in the offices of the Auditor General, the Clerk of the Privy Council, the Governor General's Secretary, the Public Archives, the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, the Civil Service Commission, and all other civil positions under and persons in the civil employ of His Majesty, but not including the members of any commission or board appointed by the governor in council.

I should like the Secretary of State to give a return based upon the definition appearing in the interpretation clause of chapter 22 of the Civil Service Act.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the definition he has quoted would include all temporary employees, whether they be employed only a few days, or otherwise. That is why I called his attention to the section quoted, because I wanted to know whether he wished temporary employees to be enumerated in the return he desired. However, I shall see the return is tabled according to his present request.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has an amendment to move.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill No. 8 to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend section 33 of the bill by inserting the following subsection immediately after subsection (1):

"(2) Proceedings under subsection (1) of this section may at the instance of an employed person be instituted by the commission on behalf of such employed person."

Amendment agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 33—Civil proceedings by employee against employer for neglect to comply with act.

Mr. NEILL: Would you read the amendment that is proposed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): It is moved that this bill be referred back to committee of the whole with instructions to amend section 33 by inserting the following subsection immediately after subsection (1):

(2) Proceedings under subsection 1 of this section may at the instance of an employed person be instituted by the commission on behalf of such employed person.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, in thinking over this matter, which was discussed very fully the other day in committee, I have come to the conclusion that the sections of the act are quite sufficient and strong enough to make sure that the contributions from both the employer and employee are properly gathered in, taken care of and handed over to the commission.

I would draw the attention of members of the committee to the provisions of sections 18 and 34 which should ensure at all times that the necessary stamps will be actually affixed to the books so that the money will be available to the commission. Section 18 gives power to the governor general in council to make regulations regarding the preparation and issue of the stamps. It also gives power to the governor in council to make regulations effecting the payment and collection of these contributions by means of stamps, and power also to make regulations prescribing in great detail the time and conditions under which these stamps may be affixed or impressed. Furthermore paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 18 provides the widest possible power of inspection that can be thought of and for the delivery up of unemployment books and everything of that kind in order to make sure that these stamps are properly affixed in accordance with the law. In fact, the commission can go as far as they wish to make sure that the stamps are placed on the books week by week.

Then if hon. members will refer to section 34 they will see that it provides sweeping powers for the inspectors. I do not see how those powers could possibly be made any wider, and I feel that this section is a great safeguard to the employees in order to make sure that their contributions go into the proper channels.

Then by subsection 2 of section 31 very stringent provisions are enacted for the punishment of any person, whether employer or employee, who does not comply with the act. As a matter of fact, as I read subsection 2 of section 31 the employer would be liable to a fine of $50 or imprisonment in gaol for three months for every offence that he committed under this act; for instance, if he kept back 25 cents of the stamp money that he collected from his employees and did not put the stamps on the books, I take it that for every such offence he would be liable to a fine of $50. So as I see it, there is nothing more that can be done to make sure that this money goes into the proper channels.

Now coming to the section which is under review, section 33, I take it, Mr. Chairman, that anyone who has examined the provisions of the bill which I have cited this afternoon will agree that everything possible is done to ensure the carrying out of the provisions of this bill and the regulations made under it. Fines and imprisonment may be meted out to any employer who does not properly carry out the provisions of the bill. It seems evident to me that the successful enforcement of this proposed act depends entirely upon the carrying out of these provisions, which are so broad and so stringent.

Coming more particularly to subsection 1 of section 33, as I said to the committee the other day, an examination of the debates on the British bill discloses that the working of this provision has been going on in England since 1920 without any serious objection. It would appear from that, that it is seldom necessary for workmen to try to avail themselves of this civil right which is given to them by the British act and by this section. In other words, as I understand this section, if some offence is committed the employer, just the same as the employee, is liable to fine and imprisonment and to all the penalties under this act. The commission must see to it that the regulations are strictly enforced, and then no difficulty will arise; but should one arise, the workman has the right of civil action as well. It is simply right that is given to him in addition to all the provisions and conditions that are inserted in this bill to make sure that the employer turns in the money as he is bound to do.

I say to the committee that I have looked over this bill carefully since the discussion the other day, and in my opinion it is all right as it is, but in deference to the arguments that have been put forward by some of the members of this house it is our desire to make this bill just as free from defects as possible, particularly when it comes to safeguarding the interests of the employee, for whose benefit, after all, this bill is intended. I have therefore talked it over with some of my colleagues and we have come to the conclusion that it would not impair the effective provisions of the bill for enforcing payments if an amendment were made in accordance with the one that was suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when this bill was referred back to the committee for the purpose of inserting this provision. I suppose the amendment had better be moved by the Minister of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Guthrie moves:

That section 33 of the bill be amended by inserting the following subsection:

"(2) Proceedings under subsection (1) of this section may at the instance of an employed person be instituted by the commission on behalf of such employed person."

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Stripped of all unnecessary verbiage, this amendment simply suggests that the employee, under subsection 3, may ask the commission to take action to recover as a civil debt the amount that the employer has failed or neglected to pay over and which he has already collected from the employee. Now, in my opinion this proposed amendment only, in the most meagre and indeed almost utterly minute fashion, meets the objections to which the acting Prime Minister refers. Our objections to section 33 are principally twofold. First, it definitely implies a loss of benefit to the employee in the event of default on the part of the employer to pay over the amounts collected by him from the employee, and we say that under no circumstances should an employee, who in good faith has paid over his contribution, be rendered liable. Once the default has taken place, once the employer has neglected or failed to make payment of the amounts paid to him by the employee, there should be no responsibility whatever on the employee to bring suit; that responsibility should rest solely with the commission itself. So that on both these grounds the proposed amendment fails utterly to meet the claims made by hon. members on this side of the house who have addressed themselves to the discussion of this section. I see no value particularly in this amendment, other than that it does give the employee, after he has suffered a loss to which he should never be submitted under the bill, the right to ask the commission to bring suit so that the commission may recover moneys already due to the commission itself. It is a perfectly absurd provision. The amendment proposed from this side would have cleared up the whole matter, and if the government had been sincere in its wish to protect the interests of the employee and to insist on the obligations of the commission, it would have accepted the amendment we suggested.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I noticed in one of the local papers of Saturday an article which stated that a division was expected on what the article termed the constitutional angle of the measure, referring to this particular bill with respect to unemployment insurance. One of the headings of the article reads:

Report Liberal leader will move unemployment insurance bill be referred to supreme court.

The article itself says:

The government is certain to reject Mr. King's suggested amendment . . .

—giving certain reasons. It goes on to say:

Likewise it was reported that several Liberals intend to speak and also vote against the bill on third reading.

I would not call your honour's attention to this particular article were it not for the fact that I have seen similar articles in the press in other parts of the country, all intended to create the impression that the Liberal opposition is determined if possible to thwart the enactment of this and other measures of social legislation by raising the constitutional issue whenever opportunity presents itself, and that we intend to divide the house on that score on the third reading. Before the bill was introduced at all I did make clear that from our point of view it would be preferable in every way that the question of the competence of this parliament to enact social legislation being introduced should be settled in the first instance by obtaining an opinion from the supreme court. We believed that had that step been taken and a favourable opinion secured we might have proceeded with a greater sense of security in dealing with this legislation, knowing that when it was enacted it would be enforceable. But I took care when the bill itself was actually brought in not to discuss that aspect of the matter more than was necessary, and other members on this side did the same. When the bill was in committee I did suggest an amendment to the effect that the opinion of the supreme court should be obtained. I did that in committee because it was a less formal stage; and I thought it was necessary to have on record somewhere, in a formal way, the view of the opposition as to the desirability of obtaining an opinion in advance if it were possible so to do. But having done that I now feel that I have placed myself on record in a manner which can no longer be open to question or doubt, and it is not my intention to move any amendment on the third reading. I do wish however at the present time to make a statement which once and for all will put clearly before hon. members and the country the exact position of the Liberal opposition towards this social legislation. What I have to say, in order that it may be set forth as concisely and exactly as possible, I have thought well to reduce to the form of a statement which I shall read with care. I wish to make it clear that what I am saying now in reference to this unemployment insurance measure has reference also to the eight hour day bill which we were discussing yesterday and will have reference as well to the bill with respect to the minimum wage, of which there is notice of a resolution on the order paper. Our attitude is the same towards all these measures.

This may be an appropriate moment at which to make a general statement with respect to those measures of social legislation being introduced by the government, which, under judicial interpretation of the distribution of powers between the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures, we believe to be beyond the legislative competence of this parliament.

Where we hold the opinion that it is not competent for this parliament, without previous amendment of the British North America Act or by agreement with the provinces, to enact certain of those measures, we base our opinion upon past judicial decisions, as well as upon judicial opinion. We assert the view we do because it is the view which, until the present year, has been held by the provinces and the dominion alike, and believed to have been unanimously held by members of both houses of parliament.

We are now, for the first time, being informed by the government that it has been advised by the law officers of the crown that recent decisions of the privy council justify the opinion that the legislation in question is within the competence of the dominion parliament, in other words, is intra vires, where formerly it was held to be ultra vires. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has given what, in his opinion, are additional reasons why the legislation should be so considered.

We still believe that in a matter of such importance the best method of relieving uncertainty, of avoiding unnecessary disturbance of business, and of determining jurisdiction in accordance with our national tradition, is by taking an advisory opinion from the supreme court, or by a constitutional amendment. The government must assume sole responsibility for adopting a more arbitrary and uncertain procedure.

The Liberal party approves the principle of the social legislation thus far introduced and desires to see it in operation. We refuse to be manœuvred into a position of opposition to this legislation. We refuse, also, by voting against the legislation, to raise directly an election issue of provincial rights.

The sole responsibility for raising the issue of provincial rights rests upon the present administration by its subordination of constitutional propriety, and the long-run objectives of national unity and cooperation, to considerations of party strategy. We believe the attempt of the government to make a controversy over provincial rights a major issue of the coming elections would, if successful, endanger the unity of the dominion.

All legislation is subject to the determination of its validity by the courts. It is certain that the validity of the legislation in question will be determined by the courts, and, in the last resort, by the judicial committee of the privy council. Its validity cannot be determined by this parliament; neither can it be determined by the result of a general election. Least of all, can legislation that is ultra vires the dominion parliament be made intra vires by either the assertion or the assumption of authority on the part of the government.

If the privy council declares that the jurisdiction in any of the measures submitted rests with the provinces, it can only be transferred to the dominion by a constitutional amendment. It is for this reason that we believe that the government, some time ago, and certainly before introducing the legislation, should have sought a determination of the question of jurisdiction, and, if such were required, obtained the necessary constitutional amendment. We leave it to the judgment of hon. members of this house whether, in the eventuality of the present legislation being declared by the privy council ultra vires of this parliament, the path of constitutional amendment has been made easier by the arbitrary procedure adopted by the government.

If parliament possessed the jurisdiction, we would vote for the measures of social legislation thus far introduced. The position at present, therefore, is that by the conflict between what is now given, as their opinion, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the Prime Minister, and what in previous years was expressed as their opinion, we do not know that parliament does not possess the jurisdiction. That, as the Prime Minister himself has said, can only be determined by the decision of the privy council on the particular legislation. This is the safeguard provided by our constitution against the arbitrary appropriation by the dominion of provincial powers. We propose, therefore, to vote for these measures, subject to this continuing constitutional safeguard, which is implicit in the provisions of our federal constitution, and which cannot, by any form of words, be evaded by the present administration.

May I add that were we to vote against any of these measures, simply because of the belief we entertain on the score of jurisdiction, it would be made to appear that we are opposed to legislation as set forth in the terms of the labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace, whereas, at the national Liberal convention in 1919, the Liberal party accepted in their entirety, in the spirit in which they had been framed, and in so far as the special circumstances of the country would permit, the terms of the labour convention and the general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

For us to oppose these measures would also be to adopt a course at direct variance to that which we followed when the Liberal party was last in office, at which time the Liberal administration had already begun negotiations with the several provinces with a view to the enactment of similar measures, and, I might add, when the Liberal party introduced and had passed through the House of Commons the act respecting old age pensions.

An attitude of opposition to these measures might, moreover, suggest that we were not favourable to uniformity of legislation with respect to such matters as unemployment and other forms of social insurance, maximum working hours, minimum wages, "sweating," and the like, whereas, when in office, we sought to effect a national minimum of industrial standards in the only way, short of a constitutional amendement, which it was believed was possible to effect that end, namely, by agreement between the provinces, effected as a result of conference.

An attitude of opposition might also suggest that we were unfavourable to a constitutional amendment which would permit of the establishment, under federal authority, of a national unemployment insurance scheme, and a national minimum of labour standards. The direct opposite, of course, is the case. We have repeatedly urged that the British North America Act should be so amended as to confer upon this parliament, subject to essential safeguards, the necessary authority to enact such measures of social legislation as may be in the national interest.

We do not propose to permit the adoption by the government of a method which, for the reasons mentioned, we believe will prove to be ineffective to place us in a false position as to our aim and desire to achieve, by the only method which we believe to be effective, a purpose upon which all hon. members seemingly are now agreed. That method we shall yet pursue, and that aim we shall yet attain, when the inadequacy of the method now being adopted with respect to social legislation has been made apparent, and is proven to be insufficient to serve the government's professed ends with respect to its measures of social legislation and, what we believe to be, the government's real purpose in introducing the measures in their present form, at the present time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): The right hon. gentleman has put forward a carefully prepared statement of his case in regard to this bill, but I am not a lawyer and therefore do not propose to discuss that memorandum. But I wish to say this to the country and to my right hon. friend: This matter has already been thoroughly discussed in this house, and the position of the government was put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr.

Bennett) himself in no uncertain terms at the time the resolution was originally introduced. The answer to what my right hon. friend has advanced will be found in the report of the debate of that day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. The debate is closed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may go ahead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I think I should like to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on having so successfully negotiated a very sharp corner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know whether my hon. friend is referring to what I am trying to do for him. I might raise the point that the debate is closed because the leader of the government who introduced the motion has already spoken, but I hope my action in not raising that point may result in my hon. friend having his chance to go ahead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, we will not go into that point of order. The leader of the opposition suggested that the position had been almost unanimous in the house that social legislation of this kind was a provincial matter. I think the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the other day made the statement that I myself had taken that position. Some years ago I acquiesced in the report of the committee on unemployment insurance simply on the ground that the law officers of the crown had stated that the matter was provincial in character; that is all. But again and again I have stated that I thought that any body that had the right to negotiate peace treaties had also the duty to see that those treaties should be enforced.

But it was not for that purpose that I rose at the moment, but rather to move an amendment. Some of us feel very strongly in regard to section 33. It may not be a matter of prime importance, but it does seem to me that it is a matter that involves a very substantial measure of injustice to the employee. The amendment which was carried and has now been incorporated in the bill it seems to me does not meet the situation at all. It merely means that now the commission may act as attorney for the employee, but it still leaves the employee with a possibility of loss through conditions over which he has absolutely no control. Under this bill he is to be compelled to pay a premium, but he may lose his right to benefit, and even under the amended form he must take the initiative and may still be liable to loss. I do not think that is fair. I do not want to traverse the ground that has been gone over again and again in the discussion in committee, but I beg to move:

That Bill No. 8 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it by striking out subsection (1) of section 33 and inserting therefor the following:

"Section 33, subsection (1):

"Where an employer has failed or neglected to pay any contributions which under this part of this act he is liable to pay in respect of any employed person in his employment, or has failed or neglected to comply, in relation to any such person, with the requirements of any regulations relating to the payment and collection of contributions, this failure or neglect on the part of the employer shall not be taken as reason for loss in whole or in part of the unemployment benefit to which the employee would have been entitled under this part of the act, and the commission shall be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount of the contributions which he collected or failed or neglected to pay to the commission."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Out of order.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Baribeau). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the bill is voted on for the last occasion I think it my duty, in view of certain statements I made in committee and certain motions I then proposed, to discuss it once more on third reading. I do not propose to take any more of the time of the house in the matter than is absolutely necessary. The report of the dominion child and family welfare office for December last states:

With all that there is of encouragement in a picture that, for four years, has stood in almost unrelieved darkness, there are still certain incontrovertible challenges—

I ask hon. members to listen to these figures:

—at least 200,000 heads of families, probably more, are still receiving unemployment relief, and over 20,000 able bodied, employable men are in relief camps, with perhaps 25,000 to 30,000 men temporarily engaged in relief works. There are probably 25,000 more single or homeless men idle in their own communities. There are an unascertained number, at least not less than 200,000 youths and girls from, say, sixteen to twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, who are idle, unemployed, and receiving relief either in their homes, or as "single persons."

The agency believes that the cost in cold dollars amounts to something over $1,250,000 a week, and that it continues to exceed the railway deficit. That is an interesting comparison.

Ontario's costs alone exceed $2,250,000 monthly, and the city of Montreal is spending at the rate of $1,400,000 per month. The cost in character and morale cannot be measured.

That was in December. According to that report there were some signs of hope, but when we come to the report published on February 27, we find this:

Though up to early December, 1934, relief totals contrasted encouragingly with those of 1933, since about the third week of December there have been indications of a sharp upward movement continuing in volume until at the end of January some of the largest Canadian cities seem to be in danger of equalling their extreme peak load of February-March, 1934.

It would seem a safe premise that there are not less than 500,000 to 525,000 persons now unemployed, and in receipt of relief, making with their dependents a total of not less than 1,350,000 recipients of public unemployment relief, quite apart from the great load of dependency from all other causes. For example: Old age pensioners, of whom 90,000 received aid, mothers' allowances going to 14,000 mothers and to 40,000 children.

This number will be almost entirely unaffected by unemployment insurance provisions for at least the next two years.

To anticipate any benefits under the bill the employee must not have any further opportunity for the use of his talents, and in addition he must also be in a position to contribute to the insurance fund for the minimum period before he can take any advantage provided in the measure. The welfare bureau points out, further:

The proposed measure excludes, in its present stage, the seasonal and casual employments subject to heavy lay-offs—an estimated number of 860,000 wage-workers. In addition, however, to this group and the 1,700,000 eligible for insurance, it should be recalled that Canada has roughly 1,350,000 more persons gainfully occupied—employers, merchants, workers on their own in industry, agriculture, business and the professions, not at all contemplated as insurable. Of these, 728,000 are farmers. Thus 1,700,000 of the gainfully occupied population will be eligible for insurance, and a total of 2,260,000 not covered by any such measure.

That, Mr. Speaker, constitutes one of the chief objections to the measure. But there are many others. We are told that this bill is the keystone of the arch of the great social reform program, and that without this measure the rest must fall. This is to be the supreme measure, indicating the extent to which this government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister is prepared to go to change the conditions, to reform the conditions, in Canada and thereby curtail the present conditions of misery and poverty in the midst of plenty about which the Prime Minister spoke in his radio speeches.

We are told that this bill is based on the British bill. I say that if it is, then it is based on a bill twenty-five years old. It is a quarter of a century behind, as a matter of fact, in most of its provisions. At this point may I state, in comparison, that the bill before the house provides for nine waiting days before any unemployed benefits may be drawn by unemployed persons. The British bill requires only six waiting days. Then, the British bill supplies unemployment insurance benefits to a widely extended field of people engaged in seasonal occupation. This bill does not apply to any seasonal occupations.

The original British bill sought only twenty-six contributions from the employees, and the present British bill, in spite of extensions which have been made, seeks only thirty contributions. On the other hand the Canadian bill requires forty contributions. One would assume that having this difference, namely the British bill asking for thirty contributions and the Canadian bill for forty contributions, the benefits under the Canadian legislation would be greater and extend over a longer period. But such is not the case. Not only does the Canadian employee coming within the ambit of the bill have to make forty contributions, or ten more than are made in Great Britain, but when such person becomes unemployed he receives only seventy-eight days or thirteen weeks unemployment benefits. On the other hand, the British legislation provides for benefits for one hundred and fifty-six days. That would seem to indicate a very wide difference between the two measures.

Then there is a further point. As I pointed out in committee of the whole the British bill provides that persons who for at least two years have been in receipt of disability pensions for disablements contracted during the late war, and who by reason of such disablements fail to satisfy the statutory conditions requiring thirty contributions, need only prove payments of ten contributions. Under those circumstances they are brought within the operations of the measure. I asked this government to make a provision in the present bill whereby disabled ex-service men might be in a position to qualify with something less than the full number of contributions required from other persons. In other words, I asked the government to carry into this legislation those privileges which have already been recognized in many other fields of parliamentary legislation both here and in the provinces respecting ex-service men. The government has not seen fit to do so. Again I must say I am sorry; I wish they had come part way towards meeting us along some of these lines.

In short, the Canadian bill is limited in its application. It is so inadequate in its benefits, and so rigid in its restriction that it would be the height of absurdity to describe it as a reform measure. There is no element of reform within it. Before I have concluded my observations I believe I shall have proved my statement, and I indicate further that the bill does not provide benefits for the unemployed equivalent to the relief which in most cases they now receive, and without any contributions.

I believe I have shown that workers employed intermittently will not benefit; disabled pensioners will not benefit, and a vast host of occupations are not even included under the operations of the act. For example, seamen, airmen, longshoremen, bankers and insurance clerks, domestic and civil servants, teachers, policemen, fishermen—

Miss MACPHAIL: Nurses.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, as the hon. member for Southeast Grey has suggested, nurses—all these are not included.

An unemployment insurance bill to-day does not meet the problem; it cannot even approach it. As a matter of fact an unemployment insurance bill—this present one for example—will have and can have no effect unless we rise out of this present collapse, then enter another period of employment only to collapse again. That is the only circumstance under which an unemployment insurance bill can bring any real benefit to the great masses of the workers throughout the country.

Then, there is no definite provision in the bill against sickness and invalidity. Every hon. member knows that both of these disabilities are reasons for unemployment; indeed, they are important sources of unemployment. These, under the bill, are left to the provinces. Yet, if the contention as to the validity of this measure be correct, there is no valid reason why provision should not have been made in the bill for extending unemployed benefits to those people who are unemployed as a result of invalidity or sickness. Probably more in normal than in any other times unemployment results from these two causes. As was pointed out by one of the official labour organs only recently, physical incapacity is doubly penalized, because under the bill periods of unemployment due to sickness of the employed person are not counted as part of his unemployed time. They will not be entered up as part of the forty weeks qualifying period. As I said earlier, even the Lloyd George bill of years ago went farther than this measure, did more and charged less.

Where the bill refers to an employee being discharged for "misconduct," and an employee is so discharged, he is disqualified from coming under the benefits of the bill, and I submit that in the absence of a definition, and a very rigid definition, of the term "misconduct" that provision can and will be abused by unscrupulous persons. I can imagine a bullying foreman or a ruthless employer very readily discharging a man and charging that he was guilty of "misconduct" when actually all he had been guilty of was attempting to organize the workers in that particular industry. It is not the first time that men have been fired for that, and it will not be the last time under the present system. Therefore there is in this bill itself in that phase, as well as in others, a wide field for abuse.

I am not going to deal to-day with the position in which my friends to my right find themselves. I have a good deal of sympathy for their viewpoint, but I do find it difficult to understand why, after having proved utterly and absolutely and completely to their own satisfaction that this measure is unconstitutional, that it is not within the legislative powers of this parliament to enact, they propose to support the measure. That is beyond me. But that of course is their business, and I am not quarrelling with them for their attitude because I assume that they are just as sincere as we are in the matter.

I now come to this point, Mr. Speaker. If the benefits under the bill are to be no more than the benefits now procurable as the result of a definite right on the part of the unemployed to relief, then of course this bill falls by the wayside so far as any advantage is concerned. The maximum benefits procurable under this bill for an adult employee who is the head of a family with a dependent wife and three children amount to $45.60 per month. That is the maximum that can be drawn, and that is after the employee has made forty contributions spread over a period of two years, and after he has complied in every way with the regulations.

Now I turn to the present scale of relief in Canada, the relief that is provided for the unemployed as a matter of right by the cities of Canada, with the aid of the province and of the dominion. The city of Westmount, Quebec, pays $46.29 per month for a family of five. That is more than the benefits provided under this bill. The city of Oshawa, Ontario, pays $45.48 per month; the city of Kitchener, Ontario, $49.37; Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, $47.85; Brandon, Manitoba, $47; Calgary, Alberta, $53.70; Toronto, Ontario, $54; Winnipeg, Manitoba, $50.99; Edmonton, Alberta, $53.70; Regina, Saskatchewan, $47.50. Those are hurriedly selected. They cover the chief cities of Ontario, one city in Quebec, and the rest are in western Canada, and in all these cases the present relief allowance is greater without any contribution on the part of anybody, than the maximum benefits provided under this bill. Cannot you see the ridiculousness of proposing a measure like this as a reform measure, as even a measure of relief? I submit to you, sir, that the effect of this measure will be to tend to reduce the amount of relief now being paid in cities to the unemployed, especially in the case of families. It will be used as a lever by which to drag down the scale of relief rather than to help it. That will probably be the chief objectionable feature of the enactment itself.

There is another matter. I have already brought it to the attention of the committee, but I must bring it to the attention of the house now on third reading in order to complete my case.

There are many industries in this country, and some of them coming under this bill, which have now reached the very bedrock limit of unemployment in the industry; in other words, they cannot continue operating with less men than they have now. The depression during the last five years has brought them to that point. In those industries the prospect of unemployment is at its minimum. I was discussing this matter some time ago in regard to one particular industry, which happens to be in the city of Toronto. At the present time its staff consists of thirty employed men. The employer in this case stated that in his opinion he did not think the normal expectancy of unemployment would be more than two at most.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the hon. gentleman please give the name of the company?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, for obvious reasons I have been asked not to do so. The normal expectancy of unemployment in that industry is two at the most. Now I give the figures in that case, and by the way the same results will follow in many of the smaller and more stable industries, especially in the case of industries that are not particularly subject to great fluctuating periods of unemployment. In this particular case the employer's contribution for each employee will in the forty weeks amount to $10; the employees' to $10 apiece; the government's to $4 for each employee, or a total of $24. Multiply that by the number of the men, 30, and you have the sum of $720. That is the amount paid into the commission's trust fund. Now if two of the employees become unemployed, it will be two years, or at least eighteen months, before they will be eligible for the benefits. We will assume that two years from now is here, and that the two men have become unemployed. They may draw maximum benefits only for seventy-eight days, or thirteen weeks. That amounts to 13 multiplied by 6 multiplied by 2, or $156. That is the maximum they can draw, but there has been contributed $720. That leaves a surplus in the fund of $564. Now there are many industries in that position.

But that is not all. Hon. members should remember that during that seventy-eight day period when these two men were drawing relief, the other twenty-eight men and the employer and the state were continuing to make their weekly contributions so that at the end of that period of benefit these two men were now definitely out of unemployment benefits and on "relief," as it is called, of the city because they are no longer eligible to the benefits. You will find that in the meantime the sum contributed has been increased by $218 during that seventy-eight days, so that at the end of that seventy-eight day period there is in the fund as a result of that single industry's contributions a total of $782, and only $156 has been paid out. Of course the plan may be actuarially sound. I have no doubt whatever that it is after giving those figures, but it is actuarially sound in the same way as life insurance companies and other insurance companies are, and in my opinion most of the insurance game on this continent is a grievous racket at the expense of the great mass of policyholders, and some day that will be admitted by this house too. It is even being admitted to-day in places where there is perhaps not so much prejudice in the matter.

Further, Mr. Speaker, since the unemployment benefits under this bill are not as great as the scale of relief now provided in the chief cities of the country and wherever labour is organized, and since it is admitted that the scale of relief now granted is still so low that adequate cultural development is impossible under it, therefore adequate cultural development is impossible under the provisions of this insurance measure. Not long ago I quoted to this house a statement of Ramsay MacDonald's in which he pointed out that in Great Britain and throughout the world there would be millions of workers who would never be employed again, and he called them "human scrap." That is the position in which these people will be even under the operation of this act; they will still be human scrap.

There is occurring throughout this continent and in other countries a new form of sickness which is coming more and more to be recognized by medical men. Some call it "depression shock" and others have different names for it. I gave to the house when in committee a quotation from the report of one of the medical doctors on social work in England, and I was glad to find that his opinion and mine in this regard had been corroborated by the findings of the child and family welfare body of Canada. Let me quote from a recent speech by Miss Charlotte Whitton:

In the field of child health, it is very difficult to form any accurate conclusions because undoubtedly the effects of deprivation and malnourishment are retarded some months or even years in their evidence, beyond the actual time of the occurrence of those conditions which cause them. For instance, some of the most obvious costs of the health aspects of the food blockades during the war became fully apparent only with the adolescence of the children, who as infants, and in the pre-school age, were exposed to the resultant lack of many of the essential foods.

And yet this measure provides for a benefit allowance that will not amount to much more than five cents a meal.

Canadian public health authorities appear unanimous in fearing an accumulation of the deficiency diseases, especially tuberculosis, and in fearing also that these results will only manifest themselves too late for argument, as to the need of careful health and dietary considerations in the calculation of our relief budgets. Many of the health authorities express the belief that malnutrition and similar deficiency diseases exist now and are increasing. . . . As the depression has continued, certain trends are developing that will undoubtedly prejudicially affect the health and wellbeing of the child and family. Hospitalization services on a pay or semi-pay basis are being less utilized, while free hospitalization is facing increasing demands. The same process is taking place in the use of medical and nursing services.

This next passage I direct particularly to the attention of the house with all the emphasis I can because it is an extremely serious feature:

Undoubtedly, however, the gravest effects of present conditions are found in their gnawing corrosion on the structure of home and family life. Probably never before has there been, over a short period of time, such a general lowering in the standards of living throughout the dominion. No home has been immune, and from the wealthiest to the humblest in the land there has been a forced adjustment to meet decreased income. In one, it may have been four instead of five new motor cars a year, and in another the elimination of the quart of milk a day for the children, but a shifting and adjustment have been universal, throwing hundreds of thousands of families and of children on that verge of destitution, fear and insecurity where, we must remember, a portion of our families always cling precariously in the best of times. . . . One of the subtle but quite definite costs of such conditions, especially to a democracy, seems to have been overlooked—the rebuff to courage and initiative and the stunning of independence and resourcefulness involved in a prolonged period of complete reliance on social aid, and complete submission to administrative control over the minutest details of life, during that time. "Pauperization" it has been glibly called in description of some aspects of its results; "loss of morale" in another. Devitalization would not seem too strong a term to apply to a gradual process through which nearly ten to fifteen per cent of the Canadian people receive each week from the public authorities or private charities, minute instructions as to what they are to eat, with the food prescribed in exact rations for fixed periods; just where they are to live and at what cost and under conditions in the arrangement of which they barely enter; whether they are to have wood, coal, gas or electricity; dress and undress in darkness or in light; have new or renovated clothing, and when, where and how much; go to a doctor or clinic for sickness or take some prescribed drug of general value. This entire subversion of a large part of a free and independent people, notable for their energy, courage and resourcefulness, to almost complete regimentation on a basis of mass treatment is to my mind the most serious, the most pernicious, likely the most permanent, but presently the least perceived of all the unfortunate effects of continued unemployment upon Canadian character in the future.

Some hon. members may say, "You are defeating your own case, because here you are seeking to justify an increase in benefits under an unemployment insurance scheme by discussing a condition which has arisen as the result of charity or direct relief." As a matter of fact I am using it to support my claims, because under this bill the measure of benefit will be so low that there will have to be continued the system of rigid regimentation of the unfortunate unemployed so that they may get the largest amount of sustenance possible out of the meager allowances provided them.

Before I conclude I will propose an amendment, because in my opinion no contribution should be sought from the employee until the worker in this country is receiving an average wage at least amounting to the equivalent of the health and decency budget set out by the labour bureau of Canada. That budget surely is low enough in itself, providing as it does for health and decency and not for any luxuries, and it stands at $1,339. Therefore no one earning less than $1,339 should be expected or asked to contribute to any unemployment insurance scheme, whether he is insurable or not. My reasons for that contention have already been given the house. The earnings of all wage earners in Canada are, for males, $927 and for females $560. Think of it. In 1935, in the Dominion of Canada, those are the earnings paid our workers in face of the vast wealth the country has produced and can still produce, with our tremendous resources of material, plant and equipment and our gigantic power reserves. We have the equivalent of 73,000,000 men in electrical power alone, ready to produce goods for the Canadian people; at the pulling of a lever or the pressing of a button, this power is ready to go to work ceaselessly in the production of goods. Yet the average earnings of all men gainfully employed in Canada is only $927. A condition of that kind is a disgrace to any system and to any country. Frankly, the measure as it now stands requiring employees and employers to contribute, means simply, as I have already stated, a general decrease in the immediate volume of purchasing power, lessening to the extent that it extracts contributions, at least for the time being the amount available for the purchase of goods. It takes the funds in the case of the employee directly from the very person who will consume and needs to consume at once.

The principle of noncontributory insurance is being more widely recognized, and it is not the anomaly that some hon. gentlemen would try to make it appear; after all it depends on the extent to which the non-contributory feature is extended and how the funds are to be raised. My proposal to the government is this, that in connection with financing an unemployment insurance scheme and all the rest of this social legislation that is called reform, and which can be reform and of value only to the extent that it increases the mass purchasing power of the people, they should finance the scheme by an issue of currency directly backed by the national wealth of Canada. If they do that, they will succeed in increasing the volume of purchasing power without increasing debt or taxes and without reducing in any sphere the amount available for investment or for the consumption of goods that will be produced.

The United States have been considering this problem for some time, and it may be of interest to the house to know that unemployment insurance in that country without the requirement of any employee contribution was recommended to the president's committee on economic security by its advisory council in a report published on December 16 last. Since that time this proposal has been made part of the president's program. A joint state and federal unemployment insurance scheme without employee contribution is now, as a result of the advice of the advisory council, part of the program of the President of the United States. But I continue the report.

> The survey advocates a federal-state unemployment insurance program, with the imposition of a three per cent tax on payrolls, beginning in 1936. . . . The advisory council rejected a plan providing that employers and employees each contribute to the insurance fund, and by a nine to seven majority accepted the three per cent tax on payrolls on the ground that it would be passed on to consumers and the beneficiary would pay his share on the tax that would be attached to the article he purchases.

And so forth. The unemployed ex-service men of Canada have written to me under date of January 22 as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> At the regular general meeting of this association held on Thursday, January 17, I was instructed to request that when the question of unemployment insurance comes before the house, you will press for this form of insurance to be non-contributory, and that you will solicit all possible support from your colleagues.

I now turn to Great Britain. In 1932 a royal commission on unemployment insurance was appointed in Great Britain and there appeared before that commission the trades union congress general council. In this discussion many references have been made to the trades unions of Great Britain; they have been used as an excuse for certain parts of the bill and they have been used as justification for it. They cannot be used as justification for the contributory feature because the trades union congress general council said this to the royal commision:

> Unemployment is a national and international problem resulting from the industrial system under which we live. The workers are not the authors of the system but the victims of it and, unless the community so organizes its resources as to provide work for every willing worker, the unemployed, as the reserves of industry, are entitled to maintenance. There is no real difference in principle between unemployed workers who are equally available for and capable of work.

Note this.

> It has not been found possible to operate a system of unemployment benefit on an insurance basis.

That is the considered opinion of the trades union congress general council in Great Britain and they so stated it to the royal commission. Their view was:

> The cost of maintenance of the unemployed should become a direct charge on the exchequer.

Just as I am contending.

> The workers' and employers' contributions should be abolished and they should not, except as taxpayers, be burdened with the cost of unemployment.

That makes it clear that the British trades union congress stand for the noncontributory feature. I therefore move:

> That Bill No. 8 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it by striking out the words "every employed person and" in subsection 2 of section 17 of the bill.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): If I understand aright the amendment and also the speech of the hon. member, the effect of the amendment is to make the insurance noncontributory, and for that reason I rise to a point of order on two different grounds. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, paragraph 813, states:

> When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

This is not amending it in any particular; it is amending the whole principle of the bill, the principle of the bill being contributory unemployment insurance. That is the first ground on which I oppose the amendment.

Then paragraph 551 of Beauchesne states, and this is a well known rule in this house:

> It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the Speaker in the chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

If this is noncontributory insurance; in other words, if those insured do not contribute, then the government will thereby have to contribute to a greater extent than is provided under the present bill, and therefore it would be a charge upon the crown and cannot be proposed by a private member. On those two grounds I submit that the amendment is totally out of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On the point of order, it does seem strange to me that this very amendment in these very terms was already moved by me in committee of the whole, and it was not then ruled out of order but was voted upon. The government had a majority of only five on that occasion, and I wonder whether this action is taken because they are afraid of their majority on this occasion.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman should stick to the point of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My point is that since the amendment was allowed to stand as being in order in committee of the whole, I fail to understand why it is not in order now on third reading.

Mr. MANION: It was not questioned then.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It seems to me that the argument of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) is rather extraordinary. If he did move the amendment in committee and nothing was said about it, that does not make it in order according to the rules. Perhaps someone was not listening, or there was a lot of noise in the house at the time, and therefore it was not considered. I support my colleague for both of the reasons given. I claim that this amendment really negatives the whole bill. Paragraph 400 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms distinctly prevents such an amendment being moved. Then in the second place, it is quite evident that the amendment involves a charge on the exchequer of the country. The hon. gentleman himself has said that the government ought to pay a larger amount and the employee should not pay anything; if that does not mean a further charge on the exchequer—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, that is not what I said.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understood the hon. gentleman to say so, and in fact his amendment is such that the employee would not have to pay.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is correct, but the rest is not.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the employee is not to pay then the exchequer must pay more.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not necessarily.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Well, the hon. gentleman has already spoken. If the employee is not to pay anything the exchequer must pay more, which makes the amendment involve a charge on the people of this country. My colleague has already mentioned one paragraph of the rules which prevents any amendment of that kind being made by a private member. Further than that, paragraph 568 says:

> The Governor General's recommendation to any resolution involving a payment out of the public treasury must be formally given by a privy councillor in his place at the very initiation of a proceeding, i.e., as soon as the motion has been proposed for the house to go into committee on the resolution.

Therefore I submit that the point taken by the Minister of Railways is correct and that this amendment is entirely out of order.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I contend that the amendment is quite in order. In the first place it is not contrary to the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill, if we are to follow precedents that have arisen in this house, is that of unemployment insurance. When we were discussing the central bank bill we tried to move an amendment providing for a publicly owned and controlled bank, and we were told by both sides that that was not a principle of the bill, that the principle of the bill was the institution of a central bank. Using the same logic the principle of this bill is unemployment insurance.

Then as to the point that it involves expenditure of public money, the proposed amendment does not say anything of the kind; it says only that as far as the employee is concerned it shall be non-contributory. Where the other contributions are to come from is no concern of the mover of the amendment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACINNIS: I am speaking to a point of order, that is what we are concerned with. It does not necessarily follow that there must be a contribution from the crown. As a matter of fact the contribution should come from production. Consequently we may say, as far as the mover and seconder of the proposed amendment are concerned, that our purpose is that the contributions should come from the employers, or out of industry. For these reasons I contend that the amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given the matter some consideration, in anticipation of an amendment being moved, having followed the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). To my mind there is no question whatever that the amendment is out of order. So far as concerns the first point raised by the Minister of Railways and Canals I do not think it necessary to rule on that, but the authorities are very clear, as all hon. members will agree that no private member has the right to introduce an amendment which would have the effect of augmenting taxes or charges on the people. That is clear from paragraph 551 and following paragraphs of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. The matter is also quite clearly set out in a short paragraph in May's Parliamentary Procedure at page 511 where it is stated that:

> No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of parliament; nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the crown be augmented, ...

It seems clear that if the benefits under the bill are to remain the same the charge upon the crown must be augmented if the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River came into effect. Therefore I rule that the amendment is out of order.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): My views are very considerably at variance with those expressed by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I have supported this bill and still support it because it is an insurance bill. Under it there is to be a three way contribution to a fund, and by reason of such contributions benefits are to be paid from that fund. It is an insurance proposal, presumed, as has been so frequently stated, to be on an actuarial basis; certain benefits in return for certain contributions. The hon. member for Bow River found himself in a rather peculiar position. He voted for the principle of the bill, and by doing so intimated to the house and through the house to the country that he was in favour of the insurance principle on which the bill is based, that he believed in contributions being made towards the insurance fund and under certain conditions benefits being paid therefrom. Then he found himself arguing that upon this insurance measure there should be superimposed relief measures, so that those who are not making any contributions to the fund should be taken in and granted benefits for which they had not contributed. It is I suppose distinctly popular to contend that from this or any fund contributions should be made for the benefit of those who are unemployed and on relief in our country. There is no question in the world but that measures should be provided to take care of those who require relief, who are unfortunately in a position that they cannot sustain themselves and their families. But when one endeavours to attach to an insurance bill relief measures which belong to some other phase of governmental undertakings he is doing something which would defeat the very purposes of the bill. The purpose of this bill is to provide insurance facilities whereby benefits may be extended to men and women employed in industry in this country. Hence the hon. gentleman argues himself into this position, that from the contributions which men who are employed in industry—associated with others, that is the government and the employers—make to a fund, should be taken the relief which is justly due to those who are unemployed and in distress. In other words he says that the men who are paying contributions into an insurance fund, presumed to be on an actuarial basis, should be taxed in order to relieve the treasuries of the respective authorities whose obligation it is to care for them, and the burden placed on the backs of the contributors to this insurance fund. That is a most untenable position. If there is anything that would condemn this bill, anything that would render it absolutely futile, it would be the endeavour to place upon the backs of the men who are employed in this country the responsibility which belongs to the people as a whole.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to a question of privilege. The statement of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley), quite unwittingly I am sure, is not accurate. I did not make any such proposal. I proposed that the employed in Canada under this scheme should be relieved of any cost.

Mr. STANLEY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to make my address. He made a good long speech.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do not make misstatements.

Mr. STANLEY: The hon. gentleman stood up in his place in this house and registered his vote on the second reading of the bill, accepting the principle of the bill. By doing so he pledged himself before this house and the people of the country to support the principle of the bill, and the insurance principle was the principle for which he was voting. But no sooner had he done that than he proceeded to introduce what he considered was a vote-catching proposition. There is no question in the world about that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is pretty cheap. I would expect that from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. STANLEY: My hon. friend has argued himself into that position; not only that, he has voted himself into that position; he has placed himself on record in this house as taking that position, and that is the position in which he stands before the unemployed workmen of this country to-day. I do not think it unjust to point that out. When the hon. gentleman found himself in that most paradoxical position he certainly had to square himself, so he proceeded to try to eliminate the contributions from the men; he proceeded to say that this bill should not be supported, that it should not become law because it is not as good as the British bill, because it is twenty-five years behind the British act. It is true that when the British workman becomes unemployed he is given unemployment insurance. When he becomes ill he receives sickness insurance. When he reaches a certain age he is given old age insurance, and when he dies his widow receives widow's insurance. That is quite correct, and I wish that situation obtained in Canada. But the fact that Great Britain is ahead of us in connection with social insurance and that Great Britain has gone forward in regard to measures of this kind more than Canada has surely is not a reasonable argument why this parliament should not proceed to enact at least the first stage, which is this unemployment insurance measure.

Is there any argument against it? The hon. gentleman very well might have said, "Let us start with this and as rapidly as possible bring in the other measures." He might even have argued that at this session of parliament we should proceed to bring in the legislation which would grant the benefits extended to the workmen in Great Britain. That would have been an argument, but the fact is that we are considering one measure, an unemployment insurance measure, and by our votes in this house we must determine whether we propose to take this first step and provide the unemployment benefits which are contained in this bill. For the life of me I cannot see the force of the argument that because Great Britain gives something more therefore we should not give anything at all.

The hon. gentleman has brought in the question of relief measures. Personally I cannot see that this question arises in connection with this bill. The hon. gentleman also said that this was the sum and substance of the reform program, but he knew very well that he was making an exaggeration that was hardly fair. This measure speaks for itself; it is an unemployment insurance measure based on certain very definite principles which are thoroughly understood by all the workmen of this country. They know exactly what it means; it is a contributory insurance measure against unemployment. The hon. gentleman went a step further and quoted the amount of relief given in various municipalities in Canada, intimating that one city pays so much, another city so much more and so on. That is not the question at all. The hon. gentleman knows that this measure provides certain benefits in return for certain contributions. If he had wished to do so he might very well have argued that the contributors to this fund should be asked to contribute more than twenty-one cents or twenty-five cents a week, and that because of the larger contribution they should receive larger benefits. That argument would have been quite sound from that standpoint but taking this as an insurance measure the principle of the bill is that for this contribution, which is to accumulate in a fund, certain benefits will be extended on an actuarial basis. In connection with these benefits the use of the words "relief measure" I think is unfair. This is not a relief measure at all; this is an insurance measure which extends benefits to workmen in return for contributions they make together with the employer and the state. Whether those benefits equal the amount of relief provided in the city of Ottawa or the city of Calgary is entirely beside the question. That is not the point at all. If Calgary or Ottawa see fit to contribute to the relief of citizens who require relief, that is their own business and that is another consideration entirely. When a workman, by reason of the contributions he makes, is entitled under his contract to certain benefits the question of whether he is wealthy, whether he has saved his money or whether he has spent it does not enter into the situation at all. He has a contract, signed, sealed and delivered, under which he can claim certain benefits definitely stipulated in the contract.

That is a very different thing from a consideration of the relief which is extended to a family who happen to be in dire need and who, as a result, receive certain assistance from the municipality in which they live. A man works week in and week out, month in and month out, and by reason of his contributions he is entitled to certain benefits when he becomes unemployed. That is very plain, and I do not see how the word relief can be mixed up with this question at all. This is an actuarial measure which does not undertake to give a dollar for fifty cents. No insurance measure can do that. The hon. gentleman spoke about various life insurance companies in this country exploiting the public. Those were not the words used, but in substance I believe I have indicated the correct meaning. I know nothing about that particular phase of the matter, nor does it enter into the present situation. This is an insurance measure by which the government of the state handles the finances at a minimum of expense, and pays out on an actuarial basis benefits to those who are entitled under the contract.

Then the hon. member introduced the matter of relief, and spoke about the relief extended under the insurance legislation of Great Britain. If one had the time to go back over the history of that legislation he would have these general conclusions borne out: First, that the 1911 measure was actuarially sound, but that in 1920 upon the return of the soldiers there was imposed upon the measure the question of relief. People who had not made contributions and were not contributors under the act were given relief from the fund. That was a violation of the principle of unemployment insurance. When we read the 1927 legislation we find that much of that difficulty was removed, and if I understand the 1934 measure it would seem to indicate that they have gone back to a straight insurance proposition.

The fact of the matter is that the insurance measure in Great Britain was almost wrecked because they violated the very insurance principles behind the 1911 measure. Had not the treasury of Great Britain come to the relief of the insurance fund to the extent of hundreds of millions of pounds there would have been no unemployment insurance for the workmen of that country. One of the important principles in any unemployment insurance scheme is that there shall be contributions by all concerned, not simply for the purpose of obtaining the money but for the moral support and sympathetic assistance such action gives to the administration of the measure. One of the greatest dangers facing any unemployment insurance scheme in Canada would be the dissemination of an idea that down here in Ottawa there is a bottomless purse, and that all one has to do is to dig in and get his money. That view would wreck the insurance undertaking. If the government of this or any other day conceives the idea that it can pay out under an unemployment insurance scheme moneys away beyond the contributions which should be made, then at that moment it is undertaking to wreck the whole insurance arrangement. There must be behind any successful scheme the moral support to which I have referred. I would emphasize the necessity of undertaking to impress upon the minds of our public men, our representatives in parliament, employers in industry, employees in industry, organized labour unions and others, the fact that this is an insurance measure, that it should be continued on an insurance basis, and that benefits should be paid to the unemployed under the contract contained in the act.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) has attempted to draw a sharp distinction between an unemployment measure and a relief measure. I quite concede that theoretically that may be done, but I should like to impress upon the hon. member and other hon. members that in practice we have a right to judge any particular measure in the light of the unemployment situation now existing. The hon. member for East Calgary said: "If Calgary chooses to make a relief contribution to the unemployed, that is their business," and he says that is a matter distinct and different from any measure which the dominion government may pass. I wonder if it is necessary once more to remind the hon. member what his leader in Calgary on June 12, 1930, was reported as saying:

> This is a new country and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Later on he said:

> After all, no man who has a heart can see the mothers and children without clothes or food without emotion, however hardhearted he may be. What are we going to do about it? I say to you my fellow citizens, my fellow Canadians, speaking to the larger audience, I am convinced this problem has now ceased to be local and provincial, and has become national in its importance.

Then later:

> I propose that parliament shall formulate a definite plan for permanent relief, and that parliament shall deal with this national problem and provide amelioration for the condition in order that next winter Canadian people may not be facing the crisis that is upon us without having a remedy at hand.

That was in 1930. It is now 1935, and we are quite justified in using the Prime Minister's own words, and asking "What are we going to do about it?" Again and again this session hon. members in this corner of the chamber have urged the government to bring down relief legislation. That has not been done nor is there any indication that a relief measure will be brought down.

Under the circumstances I say the hon. member for Bow River is quite right when he suggests that the present measure does not begin to meet the unemployment problem. I shall refer to the figures he quoted from the statement issued by the board of governors of the Canadian council of child and family welfare. It states:

> Thus 1,700,000 of the gainfully occupied population will be eligible for insurance, and a total of 2,260,000 not covered by any such measure.

It seems to me that is a very serious situation. The hon. member for East Calgary states that the bill undertakes to provide for periods of unemployment of men and women employed in industry. Yes, it does provide for some 1,700,000, but it does not provide for 2,260,000. Surely, that is a serious situation. Referring to the figures in the pamphlet already quoted by the hon. member for Bow River, I find the following:

> It would seem a safe premise that there are not less than 500,000 to 525,000 persons now unemployed, and in receipt of relief, making with their dependents, a total of not less than 1,350,000 recipients of public unemployment relief, quite apart from the great load of dependency from all other sources.

That is the situation. The British bill is supplemented by an assistance measure; if this bill was supplemented by an assistance measure some of us would feel a great deal better about it, but no assistance measure such as that now in operation in Great Britain is being enacted, and so I think we have a right in discussing this particular measure to ask how far it covers the case.

People must be kept alive. I think that might be taken almost as axiomatic. We cannot allow people simply to starve, although some of them are coming perilously near that condition. I noticed in the Montreal Daily Star of February 26 this news item:

> Sickness and unemployment have caused nine suicides in nine days in greater Montreal. This was shown this morning in morgue records.

In the next issue of the Montreal Star, that of February 27, there is reported the tenth suicide that of a man who had been unemployed for six months and was in ill health. The coroner rendered the verdict of "suicide while in a state of mental depression." Such tragedies occur among those who are not able to stand the strain, and are some little indication of the suffering and hardship and despair which are being experienced by great masses of our people to-day.

What are we going to do about it? That is what the Prime Minister asked five years ago. He replied that he proposed that parliament would bring in a definite measure, but parliament has not done that during the past five years, and this year again we have no definite measure at all.

My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) by his amendment would suggest that we extend this measure in some way until it becomes equal to the emergency, and that could be done only by what has been called noncontributory unemployment insurance. As I said on the second reading of the bill, I frankly recognize that that phrase, "noncontributory insurance" may be somewhat of a misnomer, although some large corporations who do not insure in the regular fire insurance companies lay aside a certain sum to provide against fire, and they frequently speak of that provision as the carrying of their own "insurance." So we have some little precedent even for that term. But I do not care what term you use. The principle is that in some way or other these unemployed people should be systematically provided for. It is obvious that that cannot be done through an actuarial scheme under which the employee himself makes a contribution. I think my hon. friend from Bow River was right when he pointed out that wages are so very low to-day that this scheme involves a hardship even on those who are at present employed. He was quite right when he pointed out that this measure meets the needs of only a small group of workers, and meets them in only a very, very inadequate degree.

But what about those whose needs are not met at all? That is the important question before us to-day. Personally I regret that the rules of the house do not permit our having a vote on the very important question whether we should make some provision along the line of noncontributory unemployment insurance.

May I point out the enormous losses that are now being incurred through unemployment? Again and again in this house we have had members point out the heavy cost of the strikes that have occurred from time to time and which have to a certain extent impeded industry, but, according to the census figures given by the Prime Minister on Februay 18, strikes account for only ·04 per cent of lost time, illness for 5·74 per cent, temporary lay-offs for 12·56 per cent, and no jobs for 80·26 per cent.

Mr. REID: Is that in this country?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I was quoting from the census figures as given in this house by the Prime Minister on February 18. Basing an estimate on the average income, and on the census figures as contained in the Canada Year Book at page 779, there is an income loss by the wage earners through having no jobs and through temporary lay-offs amounting to nearly $400,000,000 a year. That is an astonishing situation—$400,000,000 a year actually lost through unemployment and temporary lay-offs. I am not so sure that the hon. member for Bow River might not very well have argued that if we could save that $400,000,000 a year we would not need very much in the way of unemployment insurance, and if there was an occasional unemployed man he could very easily be taken care of. The problem is not simply that of taking care of the lost time of a portion of our population. It is a bigger problem than that. It is taking care of the needs of the people during a period of extreme depression when very large numbers are out of work. That, it seems to me, is the responsibility of the state.

I shall vote for this bill, as I did on the second reading, because it seems to me that on balance it is to the good. In so far as it may help a small portion of our people in a very inadequate way, it is to the good, and I suppose to that extent one is justified in voting for it. Further than that, I hope it is, as the hon. member for East Calgary indicates, a first step. It is a certain recognition of responsibility on the part of the government to provide for unemployment. As such I welcome it and I will vote for the bill also because of that consideration, but I want it very clearly understood that those of us who do vote for the bill for these reasons do not believe that it is at all adequate to meet the very pressing needs of our people to-day.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, hon. members in the far corner of the house have to-day, as they did when the bill was before the house recently, made many statements that should be set right before the question is put. I want to refer for a moment to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who spoke of the unemployed who are not covered by this bill. I have in mind, Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said when he was speaking on this bill. On being asked whether this bill would cover those who are not working, and who therefore would not come under an unemployment insurance measure, the Prime Minister said, if my memory serves me aright, that he had in view a measure to alleviate that situation, and in view of that statement I cannot understand why the two members who have spoken from the far corner of the house to-day continue to refer to those who will not be covered by this bill. Representing a large industrial riding, and as one who for a long time has been associated with industry and with many thousands of workers, I believe I can speak for the average worker as much as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who I understand represents a purely agricultural riding. My life has been spent among many thousands of workers. What the hon. member knows about the problems of the worker I do not know; perhaps he knows a great deal but at any rate I represent an industrial riding and he does not. He says that the bill can have no effect at present. Yesterday I remained in Toronto to visit industrial institutions, and I visited five large concerns, primarily to discuss with them the effect of the eight hour day bill; but in the course of my remarks in that connection I discussed also the problem of unemployment insurance. Let me tell the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that they are not speaking for the average worker employed in industry when they denounce the present unemployment insurance bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member will remember I said I was going to vote in favour of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that. I can assure the house that the average worker in industry sincerely hopes that this bill will be enacted as soon as possible, so that a year hence, if he is unfortunate enough to be thrown out of work, he will benefit. I believe that is the attitude of the large majority of them.

The hon. member for Bow River referred to the police, and to teachers and ministers. Well, the position of the policeman and of the teacher is entirely different from the position of the man engaged in industry. I know that policemen have been ill for six months in the city of Toronto and have received pay from the treasury, and I think they should receive it after having served on the force a certain length of time. The same applies to school teachers, and I do not believe that the average clergyman is not taken care of by his congregation if he is ill for a time. But the position of the worker in industry is altogether different. When he is laid off his pay stops.

The hon. member for Bow River used almost every adjective in the dictionary in denouncing this legislation; he used the words ridiculous, pernicious, weak, ineffective, hopeless, ruthless. If he had had the dictionary before him he might have drawn a few more adjectives from it. He tried to denounce the bill by saying that the man on relief receives more than he would under the unemployment insurance provisions. But there is a difference. The man on relief does not receive cash; he receives vouchers for supplies—at any rate that is the way it is in Toronto—for food and clothing and perhaps an allowance for rent. Under the unemployment insurance measure, on the other hand, he will receive cash.

I dislike the hon. gentleman's denunciation of manufacturers, whom he describes as ruthless. I know a great many manufacturers and I can assure you that the very great majority of them are right-thinking, sympathetic men who do not by any means come within the category of the hon. gentleman's denunciation. I repeat, I dislike the hon. gentleman's almost constant hostility to employers of labour. Those who employ large numbers of men deserve support and not constant denunciation; I do not understand why anyone should call them ruthless, and one name after another.

I understood the hon. gentleman to say that no unemployment insurance act is solvent. He is entirely wrong there. The British act, now operating under the amendments made in 1933, is solvent as proved by the fact that it is returning to the British government twelve and a half millions a year to pay off the loan which the British treasury advanced to take care of what was commonly called the dole; and it is expected that within forty years the whole of the five hundred millions or more will have been paid.

The hon. gentleman also tried to compare the British act, with all its various amendments, to this legislation, but he does not appreciate the fact that the British act of 1911 is by no means the same act as the British act as it is in force to-day, because it has been subject to many minor and major amendments. My hon. friend's comparison in that respect is therefore not fair. I would point out to him that the Canadian bill compares very favourably with the compulsory contributory acts which are in operation in the eight countries that have passed such legislation. Only two nations, Bulgaria and Italy, have a lower commencing age limit than is proposed in the Canadian bill; in these two countries the commencing age is fifteen years whereas in Canada it is sixteen. But several other countries that have adopted unemployment insurance legislation have fixed the limit at a higher age.

The hon. member also referred to the conditions of benefit. He said that the Canadian employee has to make forty payments in two years. Well, in Bulgaria and Germany the worker has to make fifty-two payments in two years, so that the Canadian bill is better than either of those so far as that is concerned, and the unemployment insurance act in Germany is generally conceded to be a fairly substantial and satisfactory piece of legislation. He also referred to the period of waiting in Canada, which is nine days. Well, in Poland it is ten days; in Germany, fourteen; in Queensland, fourteen; in the State of Wisconsin, fourteen; under the Nema, electrical interests, plan it is fourteen; and under the Rochester plan, both operating in the United States, it is also fourteen days. So that the hon. gentleman has not been fair to the Canadian people in making that comparison.

My hon. friend also referred to the amount of money to be received by the unemployed worker with a wife and three children, but I would point out to him that what the worker in Canada will receive is greater than the amount paid in any other country apart from in the United States under the Nema and Rochester plans. In Canada the man with a wife and three children will receive $11.40 per week whereas in Great Britain the unemployed worker in the same category receives $7.70. The Canadian bill in this regard is therefore better than other unemployment insurance acts.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Bow River would rather have the system prevailing in countries which do not have compulsory contributory acts. The eight countries that do not have compulsory contributory unemployment insurance, but have voluntary acts, are Spain, France, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Finland and Denmark. In each of those eight countries the manufacturers do not make any contributions; all the contributions are made by the government and by the employees. Personally I am not in favour of a measure of that kind; I am in favour of a tripartite act under which the government, the workers and the company all contribute.

After listening to the hon. member for Bow River I would imagine that he is more inclined to the proposals made by a certain communistic organization that held a meeting somewhere in West York, Long Branch if I remember correctly or one of the towns in that vicinity. They proposed, first, that the act should be non-contributory so far as the workers were concerned; second, that the government should have no control over the act, and, third, that all of the direction of the accumulated surpluses should be under the control of the workers' organizations. They proposed that the payments should be $10 a week for the husband and $2 a week for each of his dependents. Lastly, they proposed that those payments should commence at once and should continue indefinitely until the worker was offered a job that would be suitable to him. An act of that nature would correspond perhaps with what the hon. member for Bow River likely wishes, but such a plan is wholly unsound and thus would be of no benefit to the workers.

In conclusion, may I say that I saw about a thousand of the workers yesterday. All factories are not running to the low capacity that the hon. member believes. I visited one factory that has 550 men and women working in it; they are working full time and are happy. I visited another with 250 employees in it, and so on, and in the five factories I visited I saw more than 1,000 employees. Men and women workers therein want this measure passed. It is an insurance act; it is not a relief act. They want to commence their contributions to the fund, looking forward to the time when they may unfortunately be unemployed, so that at that time they may at the earliest possible moment receive the benefits that will accrue under this legislation.

Bill No. 31, for the relief of Trevor Eardley-Wilmot.—Mr. Bury (for Mr. Bell, St. Antoine).

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

TARIFF OF FEES FOR INSPECTION OF CANNED FISH AND SHELL FISH

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. NEILL Explain.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amending bill is to make quite sure that power does exist under the statute to charge fees for inspection. There is no doubt that under section 18 of the Meat and Canned Foods Act fish and shellfish packed in cans shall be inspected. There is no doubt that under section 26 of the regulations under this act provision is made for that inspection, and there is no doubt that under section 20 of the regulations a fee is prescribed, but there is doubt as to whether there is power in the act to collect that fee. Therefore the purpose of this amending bill is to make sure that the measure contains a specific statutory provision, and that is its only purpose.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding this bill was in committee, at page 1438 of Hansard the minister was kind enough to indicate his willingness to send it to the marine and fisheries committee. The right hon. gentleman who was leading the government at the time, however, suggested that there was no reason for doing so, as it was merely a formal matter, but I pointed out that it goes further than that. The explanatory note in the bill states:

> Section 20 of these regulations provides for a fee for inspection at the rate of one cent per case. The fee is a reasonable one, and at present covers only the cost of inspection.

One reason I should have liked to see the bill go to the marine and fisheries committee is that I challenge both those statements. I say the fee is not reasonable and that it should not be imposed at all. The fee is high, and is not appropriate. Perhaps I am repeating something I have said previously, but the point is this. I cannot find any other raw product or semi-manufactured product in any other part of Canada in connection with which the person who produces the article has to pay a high fee for its inspection. I think an appropriate parallel would be that of lobsters. If the minister is prepared to show that the lobster people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick pay a high fee for the inspection of their lobsters it might be a parallel case, but that is not so. The only inspection that takes place in that connection is the inspection of the canneries, which is carried on by officials paid by the government, so the procedure here is entirely different.

There are three main objectionable features to this inspection fee. In the first place the canneries themselves appoint the inspectors. That statement may be challenged; technically they do not appoint them but practically they do, because they recommend who shall be appointed. Is that not much the same thing? So we have the extraordinary situation of the government deciding that a certain product shall be inspected, in order to encourage its marketing and sale. I quite admit that this is necessary, but then they say to the people who put up that product, "You name somebody to inspect it and we will appoint them." This method is unworkable, as I predicted it would be, for a dozen different reasons. The next feature is that the cannery men have to pay for this inspection. Why? Do the people whose cheese, butter or meat is inspected have to pay a special fee? No, it comes out of the consolidated revenue fund, so why should the cannery men be mulcted to this extent? There is a further considerable tax placed upon them in this way; quite a large quantity of their tinned goods must be opened and destroyed, and that is quite an appreciable addition to the cost of packing. Under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, in connection with other canned foods such as vegetables it is the duty of the inspector to prowl around the cannery to see that sanitary conditions are all right, that the articles put up, vegetables for instance, are fresh and sound, to see that any colouring matter used is correct chemically and so on. Then in his discretion the inspector may open certain tins, but the suggestion of the act is that most of the inspection takes place in connection with the operation of the cannery.

That is not so in regard to salmon canning. The regulations are very strict; they say that out of fifty cases the inspector must take so many, I think twelve. Out of 101 cases he must take eighteen, from 501 to 1,000 cases he must take twenty-four, and so on. They must be taken out of that particular lot offered for inspection, and if the cannery happens to be doing business in a small way, not selling 50,000 cases at a time but drawing out only perhaps 100 cases, the cannery must pay dearly, because the expense is greater in proportion. One tin is taken out of each of these cases and opened, and of course the contents are a total loss. In a cannery putting up 100,000 cases the loss, according to whether he took it out in large or small lots, would run from $6,000 down to $1,100. Then, he has to pay a cent a case, and on a pack of 100,000 cases this item alone amounts to $1,000. I submit that it is an improper tax; it is not a fee. I say it is a heavy tax.

Then further, the statement is made that the fee is reasonable; I say the fee is not reasonable. I figured it out on the amount of salmon canned in British Columbia. Out there five inspectors are appointed, but only three do the work. Those three have power if necessary to call in the other two. They are paid by the case, however, and we may be sure there would not be much danger of the other two men being called in. It is only natural, human nature being what it is, to keep as much of the money in one's own hands as possible. So hon. members will understand that the fees are divided among three men, and in that way they receive sums much greater than those which would be appropriate or even necessary. For much smaller sums we could get men to devote their whole time to the work. The inspectors I have mentioned do not guarantee to spend their whole time or even a considerable portion of it; they simply agree to do the inspecting. In addition they carry on lucrative businesses. I may add there is even the suggestion that they are interested in competitive business. For the moment however we shall let that matter pass. At any rate they are acting as brokers, and are being paid on the basis of so much a case, with the result that their remuneration comes to an amount much greater than is necessary, and much greater than need be paid.

I feel this matter might be more easily debated in committee, upon which occasion the arguments I have advanced might be answered. I point particularly however to the lobster industry and to the industry connected with dry salt herring, and the inspections in connection therewith. Have the people in those industries had to pay for that inspection? No, the government inspector does that work. Then, why should the canneries, which for various reasons seem to be running in hard luck, be singled out to be mulcted first by having an unusually large number of their tins destroyed and then by having to pay inspection fees? I believe they will be quite willing to stand the loss of tins, and possibly it would be proper to ask them to do so, but I do not know why they should have to pay this inspection fee, one which is not paid in any other parallel industry in Canada.

I suggest the minister should consider the arguments I have advanced. They may be combatable—I do not know—but so far I have not heard any answer. I do suggest however that we would do well to allow the matter to go to the marine and fisheries committee.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, before the minister closes the debate may I say that I cannot understand why the fisheries must be subject to all sorts of restrictions, taxes and fees. It seems to me that the officials of the department in the Hunter building must sit up nights trying to find ways and means to discourage the fishermen, the packers and the canners from carrying on their legitimate occupation. Why should there be any fees in connection with canned fish and shellfish any more than with canned tomatoes or canned peaches? Why should the department ask the house to place a fee on canned fish and shellfish? How are they going to make their decisions so far as shellfish are concerned?—because that would mean fish on the shell, not in cans. How could an inspector tell anything about them? Could the minister explain that? I am afraid he is like other ministers who have preceded him; they do not know what it is all about. It is about time we had a shake-up in the fisheries department; that department should not continue to discourage this great industry, one more capable of development than any other industry in Canada. The officials of the department are trying to place all kinds of restrictions and regulations in the way, and the result is that people get tired of it all and will not invest their money in the industry. I say to the minister that there is only one thing to do with Bill No. 26, and that is not to proceed with it, because it is not in the interests of the fisheries. Why should there be any fee on canned fish? It is all right to have officials going around and inspecting them, but even then it is impossible to carry on a proper inspection. I don't object to the fishermen having to take out licences, but I do object to them having to pay a licence fee.

Seven or eight years ago we endeavoured to establish an inspection of pickled fish, and with what result? Inside of two years on the advice of officials in the department the inspectors were recalled. Consequently at the present time we have no real inspection. We have a man who inspects the barrels and who also tries to inspect pickled mackerel and pickled herring, but he does not know what it is all about. If the minister would leave this matter for to-night and get some information from his officials he would learn that in the whole province of Nova Scotia he has only four inspectors to inspect the pickled mackerel and pickled herring. It is all an impossibility, a camouflage, nonsense, foolishness. After all is said and done, if a man who is in the fish business, putting up canned salmon, canned clams or canned anything else, and wishes to ship his product to England or somewhere else, in spite of any inspection the department may make he has to stand behind those fish. All the inspection made by government officials does not mean anything. I have been all through this game, let me tell the minister. For instance, last year I bought a large quantity of pickled fish. The inspector came down and looked over one barrel in the hundred. I inspected more than that myself, because I was buying them and paying for them. Those fish were shipped to the West Indies, but the merchant down there would not take delivery because he said there was something wrong with them. Who paid the bill? Did I come back to the Minister of Fisheries and say, "My customer in the West Indies claims $500 on the shipment"? Did I ask the government to pay anything because a government inspector presumably inspected them? No, I had to stand behind that shipment. I say to the minister that this is all nonsense and camouflage, and that it cannot be done. For heaven's sake let us have people in the department with some business ability, and do not let us continue this camouflage, and this business of trying to collect fees for the inspection of fish which the department cannot inspect.

Mr. JACOBS: It looks fishy to me.

Mr. STIRLING: I am surprised to hear any hon. member advance the view that an inspection of articles of trade should not be undertaken.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that. I said that the man who bought fish should be the man to inspect them, not some official appointed either for political or for other purposes who would not know whether a fish was good or bad.

Mr. STIRLING: I repeat that in the early part of his remarks the hon. member said that in any case the inspection was bad—

Mr. DUFF: No. I said it was inadequate.

Mr. STIRLING: —and should not be undertaken by the department. The inspection to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has referred is one which has been discussed and considered by the trade concerned for a good many years. Various methods of inspection have been attempted; some have been discarded, and others to which reference has been made have for the last few years been carried on, as I maintain, successfully. There is a difference of opinion on the subject; there is a difference of opinion on most of these subjects, and I quite agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that possibly the way to thresh it out and give everybody an opportunity of being heard is for the bill to go to the fisheries committee. I have no objection to that. Everybody will have an opportunity to ventilate his views there, even my hon. friend who does not agree with inspection at all, and after the second reading I shall be glad so to move.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. STIRLING moved that the bill be referred to the committee on marine and fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT, 1932

POWER TO PRESCRIBE FEES FOR FISHERY LICENCES

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Power to prescribe fees for fishery licences.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister explain why there should be licence fees? Why should anybody have to pay to catch fish? Is it not bad enough to have to go out in the storms, wind and fog and everything else without having to pay a licence fee in addition before one can catch fish? What is the idea?

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, fish have been caught under licence for a very great number of years, and the object of this measure is merely to make sure that a fee can be charged as it has been collected all these years under the Fisheries Act. The question arose and the Department of Justice was asked to rule on whether the wording of the act as it then was covered the case of collecting fees. It was thought wise to put it definitely in so many words into the Fisheries Act, and that is now being done in the proposed amendment.

Mr. DUFF: On what particular fisheries will this licence fee be collected?

Mr. JACOBS: Whales.

Mr. DUFF: Suckers perhaps.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a very long list in the report of the Fisheries department. The licences issued are there explained. In the province of Quebec there are 962 licences; in Prince Edward Island, 3,318; in Nova Scotia, district No. 1, 3,918, district No. 2, 6,243, and district No. 3, 4,542; New Brunswick, district No. 1, 1,195, district No. 2, 10,689, district No. 3, 717; Hudson bay and James bay, 5; British Columbia, 15,457. They cover a very great variety of fishing including the small dragger licence, special angling permits, abalone fishery licences, and so on. The fishing is conducted, regulated and supervised under these licences by the department.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand that these licences are for inland fisheries, for trout fishing and the like? They are not for deep sea fishing?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, they cover deep sea fishing. Shall I read the licences for No. 1 district Nova Scotia? Would that assist the hon. member?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know.

Mr. STIRLING: They include lobster fishing licences, permits to can lobster, oyster fishing licences, certificates under sections 53-55, trap net fishing licences, salmon drift net licences, salmon trap net, pound net or weir licences, special angling permits, set salmon gill net licences, gaspereau weir licences, smelt bag net licences, smelt gill net licences.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister mean to tell me that for these licences the fishermen have to pay a fee?

Mr. STIRLING: They pay fees. They are multifarious in number. I have not a list of them here, but they run from 25 cents for an oyster licence to $20 for a licence for purse seine fishing.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think it is fair or right that a lobster fisherman or any fisherman should have to pay a licence fee. I do not object to their having to take out a licence so that the department can have a record of those fishing and the quantity of fish caught, but I do not think it is right or fair that a fisherman should have to pay a licence fee any more than the man who grows cabbages or cuts down trees in the woods should have to pay a licence fee. Why should the men who go out on the Atlantic or on the Pacific or on the great lakes and risk their lives, their boats and their gear have to pay a licence fee to the Fisheries department? I do not object to their having to take out a licence so that the department can compile statistics at the end of the year, although to my mind they are not very valuable, because they are not correct; but I do object, as I always have done, to these fishermen having to pay twenty-five cents or a dollar for a licence, or whatever fee the department charges. I want to protest against this bill as I have protested every other session in this house when the matter has come up. I do not think it is fair that these men who go out in the storms and the fog and the wind and the rain and risk their lives and bring new money into this country should have to pay twenty-five cents or any fee to the government before they can catch fish. I strongly urge the minister not to proceed with this bill but to bring in a measure that will do justice to these men who bring new wealth to this country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Has not that been the case for a number of years, under your government as well?

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely, and I have always protested against it. I have always been opposed to it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I agree with you.

Mr. MacLEAN: Mr. Chairman, I think that this matter goes a little further than appears on the surface. The very fact that this bill is brought in at this time is an admission on the part of the Fisheries department that they have been illegally collecting licence fees all these years. Anyone who looks into the fisheries regulations will see that the department is operating under regulations made by itself and not prescribed under an act of this parliament. If the minister finds it necessary at the present time to bring in a bill to make it legal to collect these fees from the fishermen, it is only fair to assume that a great many of the other acts which the department is doing by regulation are also illegal.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLEAN: That is one of the points I tried to bring to the attention of the house last night, that the Department of Fisheries has no right under any statute of this country to lease oyster areas, and that it is being done under the department's own regulations. I contend that if it is necessary to bring in this bill at this time to legalize the collection of fees it substantiates the claim we have made all along that the Department of Fisheries is prescribing and putting into effect regulations which are not on the statute books and which would not stand in a court of law. I would like to have the minister's opinion on that question. If it is necessary to bring in legislation to cover this specific case, why not bring in legislation to legalize all the other acts of this department for which there is no statutory authority?

Mr. STIRLING: As I have already pointed out, it appears as if these fees, which have been collected for many years, have not been supported by definite words in the Fisheries Act. That is recognized and now it is being corrected. The view expressed by the Deputy Minister of Justice may be explained as follows. The amendments are made to clear up any possible doubt that anyone may have as to the legality of the action taken by the governor in council in imposing fees for certain services. In so far as fees that have been paid are concerned, they have been paid under mistake of law and are not recoverable. I understand that there are no outstanding fees which must be collected, and therefore no litigation is pending in which this doubt can be passed upon by a court. As I have already explained, the fees for these licences have been collected for many years and there is nothing new about the issuance of licences nor the collection of the fees entailed. This is to ratify what has now come to light, there being a doubt as to the wording of the act having previously covered the collection of fees.

Mr. DUFF: In what the minister has read he has admitted that the department has for many years been collecting fees illegally from the fishermen of this country, and his department through him now comes to this parliament and asks us to ratify what has been on its part an illegal act for a great many years. That is precisely what we can understand from the minister's language and from what he has read as handed to him by the deputy of the Minister of Justice. It seems to me, if that is true, that before the minister brings down such ratifying legislation the least he might do is to ask himself, or perhaps to get some word from those who are interested in the industry, as to whether it is the proper thing to charge a licence fee for catching fish, any more than it is right to charge licence fees for growing wheat or potatoes, or cutting lumber, or making clothes. If the fishermen are to pay a licence fee, why should not everyone else pay a fee for carrying on business? Why should not the lawyers have to pay a licence fee to the federal government for charging the government $150 a day, as Peter White or Mr. Sommerville is doing? Why should the poor fisherman, who goes out in storms and winds to make $2 a day, pay a licence fee before he can catch lobsters? The minister has had a good deal of experience with the people of the country and he knows the hardships that apple growers, farmers and fishermen have to put up with. Why should he allow his officials, after stupidly collecting from fishermen for years a fee which they should not have collected, for catching lobsters or smelts, to come now and ask parliament to legalize the illegal acts of his own department? I am serious about this matter. I say to the minister that he should let it stand and investigate the matter and find out for himself what the feeling is among the fishermen in Cole harbour, Halifax county, or in Ecum Secum in my county, or in the county of the Minister of Finance, or down in Cheticamp, in the county of my hon. friend from Inverness, or in Glace Bay, in the county of the hon. member for South Cape Breton, or in the county of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton? Why does he not find out the views of these people? We are much more interested, in this parliament, than are the officials of the Fisheries department, sitting in the Hunter building, to see that justice is done the fisherman, and I say to the minister in all seriousness that he should allow the bill to stand and make a thorough investigation. I do not know how long he will be acting minister—I hope not long; I hope that there will soon be an election so that we may have a change of government and have something done for the fisherman. But whether the minister is in charge of the department for a short or a long period, I say that before legalizing what has been an illegal act in his department for a number of years, he should make haste slowly. He should let the bill stand and investigate the whole matter and inquire from the people who are interested in the business, whether on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, if this legislation is in the best interests of the fisheries.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: When were these licence fees levied on the poor fishermen in Nova Scotia? They were levied under the Liberal government, of which the hon. member was a supporter, and he had ten years in which to protest and make these pious professions on behalf of the fishermen. But he never made any protestations on behalf of the poor, suffering fishermen when he had the opportunity to do so. Now however, when he is in opposition, and on the eve of an election, he makes these pious professions with tears flowing down his cheeks. I say, he had ten years to protest against what was being done, an act perpetrated against the fishermen by the government of which he was a supporter.

Mr. DUFF: You remember Rip Van Winkle, Mr. Chairman. He slept forty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Twenty.

Mr. DUFF: I thought it was forty. At any rate, my hon. friend from Inverness must have been sleeping for forty years.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You are still asleep.

Mr. DUFF: My eyes are open. My hon. friend is not fair to me when he says that I did not protest against these fees while the Liberal party was in power. I did protest while the Liberal party was in power, just as I protested in 1917, 1918 and 1919. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that this act has been on the statute books from the time of Sir John A. Macdonald; it was on the statute books under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and all these statesmen. My hon. friend must have been sleeping all these years if he can suggest that I am only now for the first time protesting against these fees on the twelfth day of March, 1935. He knows that in season and out of season I have protested, when the Liberal government was in power and when the Conservatives were in power. I have always said that the department should not tax the fishermen any more than the government taxes anyone else. I hope he will agree with me when I say that I have protested year after year, whether the Liberals or the Conservatives were in power.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, but there is really no need to hold up the passage of this bill. It has been said that the government are ratifying an illegality. They are certainly not ratifying it, because nothing is being done about the past; the act is not retroactive. But they are taking for the future the power to exact certain fees for fishing licences. It has been suggested that there should not be any such fees and reference has been made to the man growing wheat, and so on. But the man growing wheat is growing it on his own land and not on the public domain. The fisheries of Canada belong to the people and not to private individuals.

Mr. DUFF: They do not belong to the people; they are international waters.

Mr. NEILL: To whom do they belong?

Mr. DUFF: To the world, to God Almighty.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend can settle that with his God, but I am dealing with the rights of Canadians. Within the three mile limit they certainly do belong to the people of Canada and it is not unreasonable that something should be paid for the privilege. If we cut timber on crown property we pay for the privilege. There is another feature. This department is paying very large sums, in trying to protect the runs of fish, and so on. On the protection of the industry from United States citizens and other foreigners, for the conservation of fish and so on, the department spends enormous sums of money far in excess of the fees collected. On the whole the fees are not unreasonable, and I do not think the man who is asked to pay twenty-five cents or even a dollar a year has any great grievance about the matter; at least I have never heard any great complaint. When the commission of which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was the very able chairman, sat in British Columbia, he interested himself in having the fees cut down. The fees there were much higher than they are on the Atlantic and his action was quite proper. But this serves a useful purpose. The fishermen themselves receive an advantage because when you have a licence, you get a number; that number has to go on your boat and so forth. You cannot look after that sort of thing for nothing; it costs money. When somebody is suspected of fishing illegally, there is the number on the boat, and the fishermen can trace it right up to the Hunter building, as someone suggests, and find out who the man is. I often receive complaints about people fishing without licences, and I say: Find the number of the boat and I will trace his pedigree right to the end. I do not think the fishermen have any great objection to this; the fees have been collected for many years, and certainly much more is spent on the fishing industry than the amount of the fees collected.

Mr. DUFF: I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the department spends certain sums of money to develop the fisheries, for fishery guardians and so forth, but my hon. friend seems to forget that where one dollar is spent on the fisheries, twenty-five dollars or more are spent, for instance, on agriculture. If that is the case, why should there not be licence fees for agriculture? Why should a man who grows apples not pay a fee? It is claimed that the fisheries are in the public domain. Does anybody pay a licence fee to snare rabbits?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Of course not. If the Minister of Agriculture were here, I would ask him to bring in a bill to make the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pay a licence fee to snare rabbits, for I understand he is a great rabbit hunter. I object to a good deal of legislation that goes through this parliament, because I believe everybody should be treated alike. Why should the fishermen be picked out as the ones to pay licence fees? The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is the man who was complaining in my presence and in the presence of everyone here that there is not sufficient money spent to develop the fisheries of this country. Yet he is trying to make parliament believe that the fishermen should pay licence fees, because, forsooth, there are one or two or a few men poaching in the rivers of British Columbia or on the Atlantic coast. I do not object to having poachers caught; I do not object to having boats look after the fisheries, but surely the hon. member for Comox-Alberni must realize that millions and millions of dollars are spent by the Department of Agriculture and every other department, whereas very little money is spent for the fisheries. Why should the fishing industry be picked out and the fishermen have to pay licence fees, when the farmers and every other person engaged in the natural industries of this country do not have to pay a licence fee? I do not believe the fishermen should be compelled to pay licence fees unless everybody in every other industry is treated alike. The minister comes here to-night with this bill, only because his officials have found out that for years they have been illegally making the fishermen take out licences and pay fees and they realize that they must pass this bill in order to cover up their tracks.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: If I go to shoot rabbits I have to pay a fee two and a half times as great as if I go out fishing.

Mr. VENIOT: Not to the dominion government.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not profess to be an expert in fish. Whenever these questions come up in the house, I am perfectly satisfied to have the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough lay down on my behalf and on behalf of those who are not fishermen what he considers to be the law. He did refer however to the fact that lawyers ought to contribute something in the way of licence fees to the upkeep of this country. I quite agree with him. There are different kinds of lawyers; there are ordinary lawyers and expert lawyers, those who appear before the committees of the house, and who, as I understand from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, are usually paid very handsomely for their services. I think those gentleman can be assimilated to fishermen, particularly when they fish for evidence as they have done so successfully within the last few years before the committees. I am quite willing that those lawyer fishermen, as I may call them, should be brought on to the carpet and asked to explain what their salaries are per annum and be required to pay a reasonable fee which might go into the coffers of this country to help to lessen the very great deficit with which we are confronted. I make that suggestion to the acting minister, and I hope it will be acted upon. But I would ask him to see that the lawyers are divided, as I say, into fisher lawyers and those who do not fish but only sit on the bank.

Mr. MacLEAN: The question of this bill being brought in arose possibly out of a little incident that occurred right in my constituency of a fisherman being fined for fishing without a licence. He protested the case and it is still before the courts. I imagine that was the start of this legislation and is the reason for its being introduced. The case has been put off from time to time, and although the man has endeavoured in every way possible to have his case heard and a decision given, so far the lawyers on both sides apparently wish to put off the case for the present, possibly awaiting some legislation of this kind. This same gentleman who was fined under the Fisheries Act for not having a licence, submitted a long list of questions which I endeavoured to have put on the order paper to be answered in the house. These questions were dealing with this very matter. One of them was:

Is clause 3 of the Fisheries Act ultra vires of the dominion parliament?

Another was:

What jurisdiction has the dominion over the fisheries in its tidal waters other than regulating and protecting same?

There are some twenty-five questions asked along the same line. I endeavoured to submit those questions, and I was told by the clerk of the house that they were of a judicial nature and could not be answered by a minister. I then sent the list of questions over to the acting Minister of Fisheries and received a similar reply from him. I may say that when I sent the questions over I asked him to refer them to the justice department for their opinion and a ruling. The reply I received from the minister was that the justice department was there for the purpose of advising the government but not for the purpose of giving a legal opinion to a private individual. Therefore in every attempt we made to bring those questions before the house and get an answer, we were blocked.

The other day at a meeting of the fisheries committee I wished to bring this matter up, and I was told by the chairman of that committee that nothing could be brought up there except matters which were referred to it by the house, and that this question had not been referred to it. I believe if we could search the records we would find that this whole legislation developed right in my constituency where this man was fined for not having a licence. He brought his case before the courts and it is still before the courts, and now our friends find that they have been acting illegally in the matter all along and want to rectify it by putting through this bill.

Mr. VENIOT: As we are on the question of fees I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a case that has recently developed in my own county. The department evidently recognizes that until this bill goes through they have no legal authority for charging licence fees for fishing. In this case the department or some local officials of the department stepped in and made a law of their own. Notwithstanding that the department admit that they have no authority to impose a licence fee, and come to this parliament to have this bill passed, the local officials imposed a double licence fee in certain sections of New Brunswick upon smelt fishermen. For instance a man has a net and is fishing for smelts through the ice. He pays his two dollar fee or whatever it is, and when the tide no longer suits there he moves to another section. He does not take the place of anyone else, but a complaint may be lodged that people from one section are moving to another section to carry on the smelt fishing. The local official or inspector of the district makes that fisherman pay a double fee. I know it has been collected without the knowledge of the department. I am not blaming the department for it; it has been imposed by the local inspector claiming to have authority for it under this act, but now we have the admission by the minister that they have no authority to impose even one fee, let alone two. It has been brought to the attention of the department that men refused to pay the second licence fee, and that the mounted police were brought on the ice to arrest them unless they paid it. That has happened within the last three weeks, and I call the attention of the minister to it and I want him to look into it and to reimburse. these fishermen for this second licence fee they had to pay. I have already taken it up with the department; the minister will find my correspondence on file. He will find that this practice was adopted by the local inspector in the hope that by charging a second licence fee he might regulate the fishing. If it was not right for this fisherman to move to another location to fish, why not stop the fishing? Why permit it under a second licence? But evidently the department has no authority to regulate it until this bill goes through.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the hon. member be good enough to give me the name of the person?

Mr. VENIOT: It is not necessary; all the particulars are on file in the department. Ask your deputy; he will produce my correspondence and the complaints received.

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be very glad to have it looked into.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has not yet explained why he is now bringing in a bill to compel fishermen to pay a licence to catch fish, whereas other departments of the government charge no fees. Why is this particular industry picked out? Why are these hard working fishermen compelled to pay fees when no fees are charged by other departments?

Mr. STIRLING: As has already been pointed out, the purpose of the fees is to provide the money required for the regulation of fishing, for the provision of boats that look after the fishing and the various measures that are taken for the benefit of the fishermen of Canada. It has been carried on not only for years but for generations, and it is certainly appreciated by the fishing industry that we should carry on that work and charge licence fees to provide the money with which to do so.

Mr. JACOBS: What do the fees and licence collections amount to in a year?

Mr. STIRLING: They range all the way from 25 cents to $20 a licence.

Mr. JACOBS: But what is the aggregate?

Mr. STIRLING: The total revenue was $39,524.

Mr. DUFF: The minister's explanation has not answered my question. I know the value of having boats on the Atlantic or the great lakes or the Pacific coast to protect the fishermen; I think I am seized of that perhaps as well as he is. But why should the minister collect $39,000 in amounts of 25 cents—two bits; is that the term in the west? —from the fishermen when it is not collected from farmers or apple growers in the Okanagan valley? That is what I object to. Surely the minister does not mean to suggest that fishing is the only industry upon which money is spent for its encouragement or protection. The minister must certainly know, because he is a horticulturist himself, that we vote ten times as much money for horticulture and agriculture as for fisheries—yes, fifty times or perhaps a hundred times as much. The minister cannot get away with the story that it is necessary in order to have those few patrol boats or a few inspectors. Isn't that stupid and ridiculous? For instance in the county in which I live they have one inspector to inspect about 30,000 barrels of pickled herring and mackerel. In the city of Halifax, where perhaps 50,000 barrels come, they have two inspectors, and the minister says that because they have those two inspectors in Halifax, or one in the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance or one in Lunenburg, they have to collect twenty-five cents from Jim Bush at La Have so that he can catch lobsters. If you put the farmers on the same basis, if you put lumbermen on the same basis, or storekeepers, all right; let us tax everyone to death. We are taxed pretty well now; there is so much paternalism and restriction that a man cannot turn around without paying a licence either to the federal or to the provincial governments. I do not know what is going to happen; the result will be that people will not try to do any business; the fishermen will not want to fish or the farmers to grow wheat or potatoes. But when the minister says to this intelligent body, a committee of the parliament of Canada, that it is necessary to prescribe and collect these fees because a few patrol boats or inspectors are engaged, he is not fair to himself, let alone to this parliament. As I said, fifty times as much money is voted for agriculture—and I do not say agriculture should pay a fee; as far as that is concerned I am opposed to all sorts of taxation. But why should the minister let his officials have him bring in a bill of this kind to tax the fishermen? My hon. friend says he is not trying to legalize an illegal act, but he has admitted that the collection of these fees for many years was illegal and now he is trying to legalize it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Under a Grit government.

Mr. DUFF: Sure, and under a Tory government and under a Union government. We have had all kinds of governments in this country, and my hon. friend has supported most of them.

Mr. GOBEIL: You will have to form one of your own.

Mr. DUFF: Well, I think I would do better than my hon. friend would, because I understand that now he is anxious to join a national government. Let me say to my hon. friend from Inverness that the hon. member for Gloucester has reminded me that this fee has been illegally charged by this parliament ever since confederation, so I was right a few moments ago when I said it was done in Sir John A. Macdonald's time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Then why object to making it right now?

Mr. DUFF: Because I am opposed to the fishermen paying licence fees. It is bad enough that my hon. friend should have to pay this government a licence fee of $400; it is bad enough that we have to pay $400 out of the little indemnities we receive for coming here and carrying on the business of the country. Why make the fishermen of Inverness pay twenty-five cents for the privilege of catching lobsters? If my hon. friend wants to pay his $400 let him pay it, but I am opposed to it; I say it is all wrong. Whether it is in connection with unemployment insurance, the eight hour day, a weekly day of rest or minimum wages, unless you can bring all the people who work with their hands and their brains under the arrangement I say this parliament should not pass it, and the same thing applies in this case. Why should the fishermen pay licence fees any more than the farmers or any other class? That is my objection.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Does not that fee of twenty-five cents give them some protection against outsiders coming on to their fishing grounds?

Mr. DUFF: Not at all; the licence fee has nothing to do with it. They have some bug professors down there in the Confederation building who are trying to run the business of this country, but to his credit the Minister of Agriculture would not allow them to look after the egg business. He turned them down, after the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta turned down the proposal. We can have the bug professors, the fisheries inspectors and the apple inspectors, but why should the fishermen be the only ones to pay fees? My hon. friend must admit that while we have perhaps fifty apple inspectors in Nova Scotia the apple growers do not pay a licence fee. It is true that they have to take out licences, but they pay no fees. Why should the fishermen be placed in a different category and on a different basis from the apple growers of the Annapolis valley?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: Then what is my hon. friend beefing about?

Mr. DICKIE: I should like to say a word or two with respect to this matter. I am very much surprised to hear the argument of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough with respect to fishing licences. It is only as a result of eternal vigilance on the part of the fisheries department that we have any salmon on the Pacific coast at the present time. From Alaska to the international boundary we have fishery guardians at every little cove where fish run. If it were not for that fact the fishermen would catch every fish running up those streams in any year, if they could do so. We are protecting the fishermen against themselves. I have never heard very much fault found with the licences they have to secure. They are glad to see that others are licensed, and we are expending ten dollars for every one dollar we get from the fishing industry of Canada. Fishing is not at all on a parallel with the apple industry or any other branch of agriculture. We are spending that money in order to perpetuate the run of the salmon. Without these licences and without supervision, which costs a good deal of money each year, I can assure you that the salmon would have been decimated long ago on the Pacific coast. It is a fight morning, noon and night on the part of those guardians to keep purse seine men and others from going in and scooping up schools of salmon just before they ascend the streams to spawn. As I said before, the present situation is due entirely to the eternal vigilance on the part of the department, and I have nothing but good to say of what has been done by the Department of Fisheries for the fishing industry on the Pacific coats.

Mr. DUFF: I have no objection to supervision of the fisheries; my hon. friend did not get me right. I object to the fishermen having to pay a licence fee.

Mr. DICKIE: The man who sells ice cream pays a licence fee. Everyone pays a licence fee.

Mr. DUFF: Not to the dominion government. In 1922 my hon. friend joined with me in opposing the charging of fees to fishermen on the Pacific coast; he and I signed a report that the licence fees were too high. If he and I had it our way we would have cut them out altogether.

Mr. DICKIE: Certainly they were too high, but I never stood for their abolition. They have been lowered and they are reasonable to-day. I do not hear the fishermen there kicking about them at all.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Salaries, $798,709; contingencies, $92,700.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister explain the increase under contingencies?

Hon. W. A. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): This increase is contained in two items, one of $10,000 and one of $8,000. The increase of $10,000 in clerical assistance is to provide sufficient funds to meet the salaries of temporary clerks appointed as a result of permanent officers leaving the service. The salaries of temporary employees cannot be paid from the funds provided for permanent employees. The increase of $8,000 in sundries is to provide sufficient funds to meet the travelling expenses of members of the headquarters staff.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals, $6,150,000.

Salaries and travelling expenses of officers of the inspection, investigation, audit and the preventive service undervaluation services, $971,708.

Miscellaneous, including printing and stationery; subscriptions to commercial papers; flags; dating stamps; locks; instruments; express charges on samples; legal forms; legal expenses; premiums on guarantee bonds; uniforms for customs-excise officers; laboratory equipment and supplies, etc., $560,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for customs-excise secret investigation service, $15,000.

To provide for the administration of the Income War Tax Act 1917 and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, and salary of $9,000 (less statutory deduction), for the commissioner of inome tax, $2,025,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for the income tax secret investigation service, $10,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister explain the increase?

Mr. VENIOT: Under this heading I wish to direct the attention of the minister to a certain occurrence in my county. I referred to it in passing, without giving details, when the Minister of Justice had a matter before the house relating to the mounted police. At the risk of being threatened with arrest or another suit for contempt of court I shall once more lodge an attack against the mounted police in connection with their enforcement of the revenue laws of the country. Early in the session I placed on the order paper the following question:

Were instructions issued by the Department of National Revenue in connection with the disposal of the vessel Paul T seized for infraction of customs regulations; if so, what were such instructions?

The answer to that question was:

Yes, to destroy the vessel.

Then the second question was as follows:

Were instructions issued by the said department for the disposal of liquors seized on board such vessel; if so, what were such instructions?

And the answer was:

Yes, to destroy the liquor.

I am raising no objection to the destruction of smuggled liquor or the destruction of a vessel conveying smuggled liquors into Canadian waters. I would be the last one who would wish to protect a smuggler. Having been in the civil service for some years I understand the difficulties under which the officials of what in those days was the Department of Customs, now the Department of National Revenue, laboured in order to carry out the revenue laws. Therefore it is not my intention, nor is it to be understood that I bring the matter before the committee with any such intention, to defend those who violate our customs laws. Later in my observations I shall deal at greater length with this phase of the matter.

Turning again to my questions I find that number three is as follows:

Were instructions issued by the Department of National Revenue for the disposal of the stores found on board the Paul T; if so, what were the instructions?

The answer was that no specific instructions were given. If no specific instructions were issued in regard to the disposal of the stores, what authority had the mounted police, acting on behalf of the Department of National Revenue, to take those stores and destroy them before the people of the village of Shippigan? What happened? The vessel was destroyed. Late in the fall of the year she was hauled on to the bank, away from the water and clear of the ice. When the order was issued for her destruction the other vessels surrounded her on the beach, and she had to be sawn in two and afterwards burned. The machinery on that vessel, an auxiliary engine worth $600, they destroyed, breaking it into pieces with a maul. The ship's stores were placed in a house under the protection of the police. Those stores consisted of beef, barrelled beef, canned goods, flour, molasses and so on. Afterwards they were taken out of the house, brought to the beach and destroyed by fire in the presence of a hundred or a hundred and fifty people on direct relief. It is to this point that I draw the attention of the minister. If no specific instructions were issued for the destruction of the stores, what right had the mounted police to do that? I say they had no right to do it. If it were left to the judgment of the mounted police to do what they liked with the stores—and apparently it was—and they in turn destroyed these stores while people prayed that they be left so that they could be used to feed little children who, starving by the roadside, watched their destruction, then I must protest.

Having dealt with that angle of the matter let me now refer to the conduct of the officials who destroyed the liquor. The cargo of liquor was valued at about $20,000. It was taken from the vessel and stored in the home of a mounted police official in the village of Shippigan. Three weeks after the liquor was stored there, supposedly his house was broken into and twenty-eight cases of the liquor disappeared. A search was made, and persons were placed under arrest, or attempts were made to place them under arrest, for having stolen the liquor. The officials never found out who stole it, but there is a deep seated suspicion in the district that the liquor was not stolen by the individuals upon whom they attempted to place the blame. When the loss was discovered the remaining liquor was moved from Shippigan to Bathurst, a distance of sixty-five miles, and stored in a bonded warehouse.

The order for the destruction of the liquor came at a time when ice had formed in the harbour. Instead of breaking open the cans containing the alcohol and dumping it into the harbour, the mounted police dumped the liquor on a dump heap in the town of Bathurst, leaving no one to protect it. At five o'clock in the afternoon—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: When hon. members hear the full story they will not laugh. Having thrown the liquor on the dump heap, some of the bottles were broken and liquor was left in other bottles and in the tin cans which originally contained two and one-half gallons. School children returning from school visited that dump heap and as a result we had the spectacle of little children, some of them under thirteen years of age, staggering in a drunken state through the town because the mounted police had not done their duty and had not taken measures to prevent any person from obtaining access to the dump heap. Their duty was not to destroy it on the dump heap, but to destroy it in the harbour. But having chosen the dump heap I say it was their duty to give some protection and allow no person near the point of destruction until all the liquor had been absorbed into the heap. That is the reason I bring the matter to the attention of the minister.

I should like the minister to understand that while I would support anything having to do with the prevention of smuggling I would not support the conduct of officers of the department who acted as I have indicated in the present instance. The minister or his officials should know that in this instance the dominion government had no legal right to take and to destroy the liquor, nor had they any legal right to order the destruction of the vessel. The vessel never was under seizure by the dominion government. The captain of the vessel indicated that his craft was in distress at a point thirteen miles from shore. He put out his distress signals, with the result that the government patrol boat came to his aid and towed him to Shippigan harbour. He told the officers he had a cargo of liquor aboard. His hatches were sealed, and when the vessel reached Shippigan harbour the captain and his crew were arrested under a charge lodged not by the Department of National Revenue but by the government of the province of New Brunswick, indicating that they were charged with having liquor in their possession which had not been purchased from the liquor commission. The captain and his crew were tried. The captain was condemned and confined to gaol, and the vessel became the property of the provincial government. On an appeal to a higher court the crew were freed and the captain was held responsible. Then the Department of National Revenue steps in and enters a case against the captain for having smuggled or attempted to smuggle liquors into Canada. The first case was tried before a provincial police court magistrate under a summary conviction, but the case entered by the Department of National Revenue was tried before a county court judge and jury, and the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. Their verdict was that the captain was not guilty of having smuggled liquors into New Brunswick. The vessel was beyond the three mile limit, and therefore when seized under the conditions I have described, the captain was not guilty of smuggling. I want to know why, after the charge laid by the department against the captain had been tried and disproved, and the captain had been given his liberty and discharged, the department ordered the destruction of that vessel. It was the place of the provincial government to act. Did the provincial government transfer its jurisdiction to the Department of National Revenue? It has got to the point, Mr. Chairman, where this case is going to become an international one. The vessel was a French vessel, and application is being made to the government of France to intervene in the matter and to bring the case before the authorities in Canada for the protection of its citizens. As I said before, I am not raising my voice on behalf of a smuggler. I am raising it against the manner in which things are carried on, and they are carried on in such a way that the conduct of the officials of the national revenue department has made this an international question.

These are the points to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister, and I hope he will have them gone into thoroughly. I am not blaming his department, but I do say that unless it can be shown that this captain violated the customs laws the Department of National Revenue had no jurisdiction and no authority to proceed in the way they did, and in so acting illegally they have brought about an international question between Canada and the republic of France.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed to hear the recital which my hon. friend from Gloucester has given. If the facts are as set forth I think the captain would have had recourse against the department in the courts, if action was taken within thirty days.

Mr. VENIOT: He could not do it without a fiat, so what is the use of talking?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are responsible for the preventive service police work in connection with the customs and excise laws. However, they are not attached to the Department of National Revenue and are not affected by the vote now before the house. Technically, I do not think a general discussion of this nature is in order. I am always very glad to receive particulars of any case such as has been mentioned by my hon. friend, arising out of the enforcement of the customs and excise acts, and if given particulars I shall be pleased to look into any case.

Mr. VENIOT: I am sorry the minister thinks this is not in order on this item. If I had thought it was not in order I would not have brought it up at this time, but I do not see any other item on which I could bring it up. The department say they issued orders in this case, and they issued them to the mounted police, and the mounted police acted on the orders of this department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. A few days ago I placed on the order paper a question as to banned books, and the reply was given me by the Postmaster General that it was against the practice of the department to give the names of the books that were banned on the ground that it might help to advertise them. That seems to me to be an absurd position and one that I think cannot very well be maintained.

A few days ago I received a complaint from a friend of mine, a university professor, who had ordered some books from abroad. I do not know the names of the books, but when the books came he was informed that they could not be admitted. He asked the reason and the postal or customs authorities would not give him any satisfaction at all. He then asked for a list of the books that were banned, because evidently the postal people had been supplied with such a list by the customs department, but the postmaster refused to give him any information. It seems to me that that is a position that is entirely incompatible with anything like real democracy, and further than that, it places any ordinary citizen in a very awkward position indeed.

Since that time I have had the following document given to me. It is signed by the subcollector of customs and excise divisions, national revenue department, Prince George, B.C., and reads as follows:

> This office has received a package of books from Russia addressed to you, and I beg to advise that only the following of this shipment is permitted entry into Canada, namely; An American Worker in a Moscow Factory; The First Business Accounting Brigade; The Land of Inventors; The Moscow Theatre for Children; Moscow Old and New; Industrial Technical Intelligentsia in the U.S.S.R.; Lenin.
> A card for the duty on same is enclosed herewith.
> The following books which may be returned to the exporters at your expense are: Interviews with Foreign Workers in a Moscow Factory; Soviet Ukraine To-day; German Workers in a Moscow Factory; Bucher; The Man in Uniform; Our Foreign Policy; Ready for Defence; The Results of the First Five Year Plan; Report on the work of the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U.; Religion and the Church in the U.S.S.R.; Youth in the Soviet Union; Kolkozniki; From Stalingrad to Kusbus.
> The weight of these books is two and a half pounds, and the return postage rates are one cent per two ounces book rate or $1.32 for the two and a half pounds, parcel post rate, as quoted by the post office here. Will you kindly advise what you wish done with these and also kindly furnish us with the name and address of the exporters?

Mr. JACOBS: Were these books in English?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: These were apparently in English; I am going entirely by the letter. My point is this. What protection has any Canadian citizen or any importer in a matter of this kind? I am not at all familiar with any of these books, but from the titles I cannot see any very real distinction between the books that are allowed to come in and those that are forbidden. The books in one list are allowed in and the others are not only forbidden but the return postage on them must be paid by the importer. It seems to me that the least that can be done is to inform the public what books are banned; then we should know enough not to import them. But when we are not informed as to what books are banned and we send an order, then find that they are banned and that we are required to pay return postage, it is a very unfair arrangement indeed. Who is responsible for prohibiting this second list from coming in, and on what principle are they banned when the books on the first list are allowed in?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The department has an examiner of publications who issues orders in regard to the books that may be imported, and he prohibits those that are treasonable or seditious or of an immoral or indecent character. I do not come intimately into contact with the literature to which the hon. gentleman refers; consequently I do not know very much about it. The ramifications of the department are very wide and we do not publish a list of the books that are banned, but my hon. friend may come to the department at any time and talk with the examiner and see the list of books prohibited.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think that solves the problem of my friend in the university who wrote me about this matter, nor of the importer in Prince George. It does not solve the problem for a thousand other people, because they have no opportunity of going to the department and finding out what books are banned.

Mr. MATTHEWS: They can go to the nearest collector and inquire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They send their orders from catalogues, and then there comes a letter of this kind, which seems to me to be perfectly arbitrary. Certain books are permitted and others, which from the titles are indistinguishable from those that come in, are banned. How is the importer to know when he is not permitted to see the list of those that are banned?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Before a book is banned it is carefully examined in the department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will give another example. In the last year I have received complaints about certain literature, again from Russia. Several years ago, shortly after I had been in Russia for a few weeks, I stopped in London and ordered a weekly paper from Russia to keep in touch with what was going on there. I have not continued my subscription but was interested at the time. I have no complaint to make because my copy of this weekly paper came through without trouble, but a number of my friends across the country have written me that their copies have been held up in the mails. There is something wrong there; either some over zealous man in the postal service is exceeding his authority or else the instructions given from head office are not sufficiently clear. Coming to my main point, I do think that there ought to be sent out some sort of list of books that are banned so that people will know. Certainly they should not be regarded as breaking the law or be put to the inconvenience and expense of returning books that are banned when they do not know what books are banned.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I can only assure my hon. friend that we do the best we can in the circumstances. Someone has to take responsibility for the class of literature that comes in, and that responsibility belongs for the time being to my department. We are as generous as we can be as we are in all things, and I regret if the hon. gentleman has been put to any inconvenience.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is not personal; I have not been.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Well his friends may have been. I assure him that we will do everything we can to facilitate matters for them so long as the literature comes within the law and is of a class that can be properly admitted. We do not publish the list, but if he will come to the department he will find the officers courteous, kind and willing to do everything they can to assist him.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister explain the increase of $98,500, approximately ten per cent over last year?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It might be cleared up if I answered item by item. The first item is an increase of $12,000, which is explained as follows. Owing to the necessity of having sufficient funds to meet increased expenditure in connection with cartage, travelling and living expenses of relieving officers, removal expenses of officers transferred, overtime, purchase of land; and sundry small items, an increase has been provided in contingencies amounting to $71,577. From this increase of $71,577 deduct the saving in salaries which has been brought about by reduction in staff, (forty-three officers), provisional promotions without salary increase and appointments to positions at lower salaries than paid previous occupants, amounting to $59,577, and this leaves a net increase of $12,000. The second item deals with expenses of investigation, audit, preventive service. The increase here is $55,010 and it is explained as follows. Twenty additional excise tax auditors; two additional stenographers in the audit branch; one cashier and computing clerk transferred from the staff at the port of Winnipeg to the audit branch; four investigators of drawback claims; two customs excise clerks; four typists, grade 2; amount required to meet travelling expenses of additional auditors and investigators of drawback claims, making a total of $71,560. That is the gross increase. From the gross increase of $71,560 deduct the saving in salaries of positions not filled permanently, and the saving in salaries of persons appointed or promoted at lower salaries than their predecessors received, amounting to $16,550, leaving a net increase of $55,010. The next item is miscellaneous, and here the increase is $60,000. The increase in this instance is due to the necessity of providing sufficient funds to cover our requirements in stamps and labels and for the replacement of typewriters, adding machines and cash registers which cannot be further repaired. I would be glad to give the details of this appropriation, but the large items are for stamps and labels, $300,000, and for printing, $100,000. The others are small. That accounts for the total increase of $93,510.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was in error when I said that the increase was ten per cent, because the total vote is $9,731,000. It is practically one per cent and it is a good deal of money. The minister however has explained the increase. Has he any other item than this, or does this complete his department?

Mr. MATTHEWS: We have no other item in the main estimates. There may be one in the supplementaries, but as to that I do not know at present.

Mr. JACOBS: May I revert for a moment to the question that was put to the minister by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? Would he give us the name of the official censor in the department who passes on this literature?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Mr. J. S. Roe.

Mr. REID: There is a case I would like to draw to the minister's attention in connection with the collection of the sales tax as affecting a small brick plant close to where I live. This small plant has an investment of some $15,000 and employs thirty-five men. It has had its books regularly audited for some six years, and every year after the audit it has paid the tax computed by the officials who went through its books. But two years ago the taxing officials said: "We have made a mistake and want to go through your books again, because we believe we should have charged you a higher tax. They made two audits of the books and claimed that the brick plant should have contributed more money by way of sales tax. The company resisted the claim successfully and the matter was dropped. But last year along came officials from the same department saying: "We want to look over your books again; we are going to go through them in another form this time and probably we will find out then what was wrong with the amount which you have paid to the department." This company claims that what has taken place has amounted to persecution; that it takes about four months to make an audit, and that it is impossible to say at the moment what price was charged on the bricks sold, because as a matter of fact many of the bricks were sold on what is called a barter basis, that is, men providing labour or wood and in return getting bricks. But the company is now compelled to go out of business owing, as it claims, to the work of these officials. They say:

> The utter impossibility of a small industry paying up six years' penalties and arrears of sales tax long after the government's own assessment, based on its own audit, had been satisfied, is such that we have no recourse but to go out of business and wind up the company.

Has the minister any information regarding this plant? The name is the Vancouver Brick and Tile Company, and it was located at Sullivan, a place about eleven miles from the city of New Westminster. I feel that the officials have been over officious in this regard and that there is some ground for complaint. Has the minister received any complaints?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have no personal knowledge of this company. I may be wrong, but I am under the impression that there is an interlocking arrangement; and that we have had difficulty in getting at the facts and the proper values. I do not however say that as a statement of fact, but I should be very glad to review this case and talk it over with my hon. friend if he cares to come and see me about it. In that branch of the department we audit the books of 22,000 firms. I cannot undertake to retain in my memory the results of all these audits, but I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. REID: I understand from the company itself that protests were made to the minister's department and also to the hon. member for East Kootenay, and little action was taken regarding their complaint. Now they have gone out of business due to this.

They say that there are about 60,000 invoices to go through and some 300,000 delivery slips, because the output of the plant is sold in small lots. If that kind of thing is going on throughout the length and breadth of this country, I am afraid it will shut down a good many of the plants. I should be glad if the minister would look into the whole matter and give me an answer as to what it was that necessitated three audits by these officials.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I can only repeat that I shall be very glad to review the case. I cannot say anything more about it at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if he will do the same thing in regard to the Shenahan Company of Vancouver? He will recall the correspondence. Will he either review the case or give me an opportunity of discussing it on the supplementary estimates?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I wrote a very complete letter on this subject to my hon. friend to-day and sent it to him by hand. I hope he has received it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not yet.

Mr. BLAIR: There are many complaints that United States firms are taking money out of Canada. I should like to make some inquiries of the minister. How many Canadians have incomes of over $50,000 a year? Hitherto it has always been over 600. This year he has reported that there are 390. I would like to know why there is this great reduction. I would also like to know how many there are in Canada who have incomes of from $200,000 to $400,000. It is felt that companies in Canada in many cases are being bled by Wall street, and some information as to the facts would be of interest; we would like to know if we are maintaining our own with the people of Wall street. It is not the desire to interfere with any individual or mention any names, but the numbers might be given of those with incomes between $200,000 and $400,000.

Mr. MATTHEWS: My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that in Canada there are 390 persons with incomes of more than $50,000 a year. But how many have an income of $200,000 or $400,000, if any, I cannot say. If the hon. member will allow me I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. REID: Have members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police working in conjunction with the minister's department the authority or right to set a valuation on goods smuggled into Canada and charge duty on that valuation? Suppose for instance a man is caught with a bicycle smuggled in from across the line—this is just a hypothetical case —and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police found him with it; in such a case are they permitted by the department to place a valuation upon the bicycle and collect duty on that valuation, or should they take him before the proper customs official in order that a proper valuation may be placed upon it?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Is my hon. friend speaking of the smuggling into the country of a bicycle or any other article and then its discovery by the police?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: In that event I am afraid the article would be seized and forfeited under the law.

Mr. REID: I have two cases in mind that perhaps I shall bring up later. One was in connection with a radio; the man was haled before the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who placed a valuation on the radio and he paid duty on that valuation. I was wondering if that is a common practice.

Mr. MATTHEWS: We would require to have full particulars. There are entries running in number to two million a year in customs and excise. If my hon. friend will give me the particulars he will receive a complete answer.

Mr. GOLDING: Have any sums been collected by the income tax department as a result of revelations before the price spreads and mass buying commission, and if so what is the amount?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that the answer is no; no amount has been collected.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The mounted police from time to time seize slot machines that are being operated illegally. I have a report that many of these machines have been brought into Canada without payment of duty. When a machine is seized for being operated illegally, an order is usually made that the machine be destroyed. Does the minister's department still proceed against the man who had that machine in his possession and collect the duty?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that if the police seize the machine under such circumstances they destroy it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: But do you also collect the duty? The reason it is seized and confiscated and destroyed is because the criminal law is being broken, but that does not affect the Department of National Revenue. If the machine was brought into the country illegally then it seems to me that whoever has it in his possession should be proceeded against for the duty that should have been paid.

Mr. MATTHEWS: In that case he loses the machine, but there is no duty collected.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I ask the minister if that is a fair proposition. These machines have become a menace in various parts of Canada, and the police are having great difficulty in enforcing the law against them. Ostensibly the machines are for selling chewing gum or some other article, but frequently they are changed so as to pay nickels or quarters instead of mints and gum. I understand that many hundreds of these machines were imported illegally, no duty having been paid on them. When they are confiscated by the police as gambling devices they are destroyed. But my point is that they are destroyed under the criminal code, and that should not affect the right of the department to collect the duty that should have been paid. They are brought into the country in the first place as legal machines, but are used illegally. I think any one harbouring a machine of that kind should be responsible for finding out whether the duty has been paid before he takes the machine into his possession.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If they come in legally the duty must have been paid.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think we are at cross purposes as to the word "legally." They are legal machines in the sense that they can be operated legally, but they are illegal when operated contrary to the provisions of the criminal code, in other words, when they become gambling devices. My point is that owing to the difficulty the police are experiencing in controlling the operation of these machines, the department should assist by tracing every machine back to ascertain whether or not the duty has been paid, and if not, fine the individual who is harbouring it. I ask the minister to consider that question and see if his department cannot help the various police forces in Canada in that way. I believe it would restrain those who are inclined to take such machines into their possession if they knew that in addition to losing the machine they may also have to pay the duty.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. MATTHEWS: I can only repeat what I said before; if I have full particulars I shall look into it. We are continually following goods that have been smuggled into the country. But if any machine is brought in duty paid and then operated illegally I am afraid it is not a matter for my department.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I appreciate that, but the report is that most of these machines are smuggled into the country in the first place.

Mr. MATTHEWS: That is just a general report?

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is a general report, and I would like to know if the minister has any information to give the committee in that connection.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have no information, but certainly I will investigate the matter.

Mr. BOTHWELL: These machines are being seized by the police all the time, an odd one here and there, and it seems to me it is a matter that should be looked into by the department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister will recall that when his estimates were before the committee a year ago there were certain questions pending with regard to the powers of the tariff board and certain rulings given by them. Have any fresh disputes arisen which have been submitted to the supreme court since that time?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: It has been drawn to my attention that it is impossible for a person to buy a car in the United States and import it into Canada. I should like to ask if that condition exists to-day.

Mr. MATTHEWS: There is nothing to prevent a person from buying a car in the United States and bringing it into Canada, on paying the duty, so long as it is not a used car.

Mr. DONNELLY: What do you mean by a used car? How long must it be used to become a used car?

Mr. MATTHEWS: A used car is one not manufactured during the current calendar year.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then I should like to place a case before the minister, that of a Canadian citizen temporarily in the United States who buys an automobile which he drives for eight or ten days. Then he crosses the border. Is it possible for him to bring that new car, which he has driven for a week or ten days, into Canada if he pays the duty?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I should like to ask a question in connection with this matter of cars. When I was in Chicago last Easter I saw a Chrysler car advertised for $495. When I came back to Ottawa I saw the same type of Chrysler car selling for something around $900. Will the minister explain the reason for that difference in price? What elements enter into the price of the car in Canada? If that is the same car I saw here in Ottawa I should like to buy it in the United States and bring it here, because I would save about $200 or $300 by doing so.

Mr. JACOBS: I suggest that the minister invite the hon. member to see him in his office to-morrow in order to discuss the matter fully.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the regulations issued to the collectors of customs. In the case to which I am referring a man bought a radio in the United States. It came to the customs in the ordinary way and he paid the customs duty, which I presume was levied according to the instructions issued to the collector at that port. Six months later he received a letter from the collector saying there was $40 more to pay on the radio. It seems to me that when that person bought that radio in good faith and had it shipped in the ordinary way, paying the duty demanded at the time it arrived in the country, he should not be asked to pay an additional sum six months later. I should like the minister to explain how such a thing can occur. It seems ridiculous, but I know it to be a fact. I should like to know if the customs officers can collect an additional duty six months or a year later.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If my hon. friend will give me the name and the port of entry I will certainly investigate.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The port of entry was Prince Rupert. I do not know the name, but I shall be only too glad to secure it, because I know that occurred last year; the man was asked to pay an additional duty six months after he received the goods. If the minister will take up the matter I will secure the information and see him later.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to ask one other question in connection with our old friend gasoline. Some time ago the fixing of values for duty purposes was done away with. In the importation of gasoline from the United States are there any imposts other than the duty of 2½ cents a gallon?

Mr. MATTHEWS: There is the special excise tax and also the sales tax.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Anything else? Is there anything in the way of dumping duty in addition to the 2½ cents per gallon?

Mr. MATTHEWS: That would depend upon the facts of the case, after investigation. If the gasoline is being dumped of course the dumping duty would apply.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Has the minister any record of recent imposition of dumping duties on gasoline brought in from the United States?

Mr. MATTHEWS: There may have been but I could not tell without looking it up. There is no fixed value. No general action has been taken, but there may have been a particular case.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I would be able to get that information by writing the department?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is not clear in my mind yet as to just how the duty is applied on a car imported from the United States. I am a private citizen of Canada; I go to the United States and buy a new car, which I run for five, seven or ten days. Then I come to the port of entry. I want the minister to tell me the duty that must be paid on that car by me, a private citizen, and if there is any difference between that and the duty paid by an importer of cars.

Mr. MATTHEWS: In the instance given by my hon. friend he would pay the duty on the retail list price. In the other case, if my hon. friend is referring to a dealer in cars, the dealer would pay the same rate of duty on the list price less twenty per cent.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then am I to understand from the answer given by the minister that it is possible for me, a private citizen of Canada, to import from the United States a new car that has been used for five, seven or ten days and, on paying the duty, bring it in to Canada as a new car? Can I do that as a private citizen?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes. I think I gave that information to the hon. gentleman a few moments ago. He can do that.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is it correct in practice? Does your department permit that?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The commissioner of customs says we are doing it every day.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not like to mention specific cases, but I know of a specific case where a private citizen of Canada was not permitted to import a car from the United States. I think the minister's officials at least have knowledge of the case. It was a new car, used for perhaps about seven days before the attempt to import it into Canada.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Was this a recent case?

Mr. VALLANCE: Quite recent, yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If the member will give me the facts in confidence I shall be pleased to look into them.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): A friend of mine received a Christmas present from Europe, consisting of a cigarette lighter which cost about 30 cents, or, as the invoice which I have in my possession indicates, one krone and ten ore. He received a letter indicating that the gift had been forwarded to him, and when it arrived at the customs office he was asked to come down and clear it. Before he could get it out of the hands of the customs officials he had to pay $1.76, for which I hold the receipt. How could any customs official arrive at that amount as the duty payable on an article of that value? How do they set their valuations? Is it a dumping duty or some other kind of duty?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A Christmas duty.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like to know how the amount would be arrived at, especially in view of the fact that the invoice was sent with the lighter, and that a receipt was given for the amount paid to the customs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A burning shame.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I do not know what to say about that. I cannot conceive of a duty being imposed such as the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I can produce the receipt and the lighter.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I can scarcely credit so high a duty on an article costing 30 cents. However, there are 5,500 employees in the department, and of course the human element will enter into all matters of administration. Sometimes mistakes are made. But I shall be very glad to look into the matter. I should like to have the document the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I shall give it to the minister.

Mr. VALLANCE: In the opinion of the minister or the officials in front of him, how long has a citizen of Canada visiting the United States and buying a car there to be the possessor of it before it is considered second hand, for purposes of importation into Canada?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot have made myself clear to the hon. member.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not think the minister did.

Mr. MATTHEWS: What I intended to say was this: My officials inform me that if a Canadian goes to the United States and buys a new car, no matter how far he may have driven it, he may bring it in upon payment of duty. He cannot, however, buy a second hand car and import it. Is that clear?

Mr. VALLANCE: That is not the point. Suppose a private citizen of Canada—not a dealer, but a common every day Canadian citizen—goes to the United States, buys a new car and imports it into Canada. Can he do so, no matter how far the car has travelled in the United States or how long he has had it?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Provided it is a new car, yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the minister give me a definition of a new car?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have given the definition twice, but I shall give it again. A new car is a car manufactured in the calendar year in which it is purchased.

Mr. VALLANCE: And imported.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): That would apply even if the man used the car for six months in the United States?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, certainly. If he is in the United States and buys a car this year he may use it for six months over there and then bring it in as a new car and pay duty on it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Suppose he buys in the following December a car made in January, is it still considered a new car?

Mr. MATTHEWS: If it is a new car, that is, if he buys it as a new car.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But suppose it has been used during the year by someone else?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That would be a second hand car.

Mr. TOTZKE: Suppose a car is manufactured in December, 1934, and it is bought from the warehouse in January, 1935, would the car be new or second hand? The car I have in mind has never been out of the warehouse.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am told that that would be prohibited importation.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand it makes no difference what price the private individual may pay for the car in the United States; he must pay the duty on the retail price. He may buy it at the wholesale price, but that does not make any difference because when he comes to the boundary line he has to pay the duty on the retail price of the car in the United States.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Only a dealer may obtain a dealer's discount when bringing a car in.

Mr. DONNELLY: Suppose I go across the line and buy a car for which I have paid only the wholesale price, as shown by an invoice in my possession; when I come to the boundary line I understand I have to pay duty on the retail price. It seems to make no difference when I state the price I paid for the car.

Mr. MATTHEWS: You pay the duty on the fair market value as sold for home consumption.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If I had gone to California last November, bought a car in that state, and came back to Canada this month, I would not be permitted to bring it into Canada, although I had driven it those three or four months?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The hon. member is quite correct.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Salaries, $293,957; contingencies, $33,026.
Inspector General of Banks—
Salaries and contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention of the Department of Finance to disclose to hon. members complete information with respect to the newly formed Bank of Canada, its officers, the salaries of the staff, and such other information as might be deemed to be in the best interests of the public service?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): That is a comprehensive question, involving a matter of major policy. In the past we have followed a policy of marked distinction in dealing with separate bodies, although such bodies may have been set up by parliament. I should say that it would be quite fitting and proper that the salaries of the officers named in the first instance should be disclosed. But the minutiae of the cost of management, the salaries of individual employees, how much ink they use, how much sealing wax and that sort of thing—I do not use that illustration for the purpose of making the question of my hon. friend appear ludicrous, because it is a perfectly fair question; I merely carry it to that extreme point as indicating that the intimate and minute details of the management of the bank would not I think be a proper subject for inquiry and disclosure as a matter of course. That is at the moment my reaction to the question put to me by my hon. friend, but I should like to turn it over in my mind a little further before I give him an official and final answer, because it is a question of policy which should be settled on a basis satisfactory to the house and to public opinion generally, rather than one which should be permitted to become a matter of controversy as to how far we should or should not go in the disclosing of information. I would prefer, therefore, that my hon. friend should not at the moment press for a minute or detailed reply to his inquiry; before the session is over I shall be quite prepared to make a statement as to government policy in the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the salary of the superintendent in bankruptcy come under Finance?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, under another item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The question I wanted to ask is similar to one I asked a year ago, and perhaps it will save time if I mention it now. When the superintendent of bankruptcy was being appointed it was suggested by the minister who was piloting the bill through the house that it was hoped the result of this appointment would be to reduce the cost of bankruptcy proceedings and that the creditors would get a greater percentage of their claims than they had previously been receiving. I was anxious to know if the minister could give me for the past year a statement of these amounts: What were the claims filed, the total amounts of the assets of the bankrupts, and the amount that actually reached the hands of the creditors?

Mr. RHODES: I merely called this item of civil government to-night, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of qualifying the department. I did not come prepared to answer questions with respect to details of bankruptcy, because that item will be called on another occasion, when, if this will be satisfactory, I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend an answer to the question he has put.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. TOTZKE: Has this item any relation to the comptroller of the treasury?

Mr. RHODES: That comes under another item, but I have no objection to my hon. friend putting his question on this item.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is there anything in this vote dealing with the comptroller of the treasury?

Mr. RHODES: Not specifically.

Mr. TOTZKE: That is under another item?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who is doing the work that was done last year by the tariff adviser?

Mr. RHODES: That is an added obligation resting on the shoulders of the remainder of the staff.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We will take note of that.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
To provide for hospitality in connection with visitors from abroad, $5,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Why the decrease in this item?

Mr. RHODES: It is more in conformity with the average amount that is required.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 13, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

[Mr. Elliott.]

Of Armand Renaud LaVergne, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of Montmagny, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

THE LATE ARMAND LAVERGNE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received, through the honourable the Secretary of State, letters from l'Association Nationale des Vétérans and l'Union Conservatrice de Limoilou joining with parliament in the expression of sympathy for the decease of Mr. Armand LaVergne, Deputy Speaker, and I now table these letters to form part of the records of the house.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton) moved:

That the petition of Mania Leizerson Oberman, presented on the 7th instant, praying for a bill of divorce from Samuel Oberman, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY

Mr. J. A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann) moved the first reading of Bill No. 27, (Letter B of the Senate) respecting Canadian Marconi Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. J. A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I believe a full explanation is given on the second page of the bill. Section 1 provides for an increase of directors from nine to eleven. Then, in section 2 the words underlined are new, and are as follows:

And also such other articles as may be conveniently manufactured in the plants of the company.

Then section 3 is explained on the second page of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Will the special select standing committee of the civil service be convened during this session?

2. Will the government during the present session take any action with reference to the recommendations made last year by the select standing committee of the civil service?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, in reply to question No. 1, I would say that there is no standing committee of the civil service. There was a select committee which sat during the last parliamentary session, but no reappointment has been made. With regard to the second part of the question I would say that the government's attitude will be made known when action is taken.

JOUBERT, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. At what date was the post office at Joubert, Matane county, established?

2. Who has been carrying the mail from Sayabec to Joubert since the establishment of the post office, and on what conditions?

3. Who is carrying the mail at present and what is his address?

4. At what date did he sign his contract?

5. How much does he receive?

6. Who recommended him to the department?

7. Did he obtain his contract after regular tenders had been called?

8. If so, what tenders were received by the department?

9. If not, why was he awarded the contract without tenders being called?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. November 15, 1922.

2. J. Gagnon, from November 15, 1922, to September 30, 1934, at $200 per annum, and G. Boucher, from October 1, 1934, to date, also at $200 per annum.

3. G. Boucher, of Sayabec, P.Q.

4. July 13, 1934.

5. $200 per annum.

6. J. H. LaRue, M.P.

7 and 8. No.

9. The Postmaster General, under the statutes, has power to award contracts at $200 per annum or under, without calling for tenders.

WAR BORROWINGS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What were the total Canadian government borrowings for war purposes from August, 1914, until mobilization was complete: (a) amount borrowed in Canada; (b) amount borrowed in Great Britain; (c) amount borrowed in United States?

2. What was the total amount of said borrowings by bond, issued free of taxation?

Mr. CAHAN (for Mr. Rhodes):

1. Taking November 11, 1918, as the date on which mobilization was complete, the total borrowings (net) under war appropriation acts were: (a) In Canada, $1,447,138,558.44; (b) in Great Britain, nil; (c) in United States, nil.

2. $1,339,526,528.91.

PATROL BOAT GANNET ROCK

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Was Captain Nelson removed from patrol boat Gannet Rock?

2. If so, why?

3. Was the notice of his dismissal forwarded direct from the department in Ottawa?

4. Did the department receive any letters recommending the retention of Captain Nelson as captain of such patrol boat?

5. Did Harry Gray, a returned soldier, apply for a position as third man on such patrol boat?

6. If so, why was he not appointed?

Mr. STIRLING:

1. Yes.

2. Inefficient service.

3. The chief supervisor of fisheries for the division was instructed by the department to replace him.

4. One letter.

5 and 6. Mr. Gray's employment was considered but he was not regarded as being qualified for the kind of work involved.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PACIFIC COAST TERMINALS LIMITED

On the question:

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What amount of money was advanced, directly or indirectly, to the Pacific Coast Terminals Limited, situated at New Westminster, British Columbia, by the dominion government of Canada?

2. Did the Canadian National Railways sell, lease or in any way enter into any transaction with the Pacific Coast Terminals of New Westminster, British Columbia, in respect to water front property: (a) if so, of what nature and terms was the transaction?

3. Has any official or director of the Canadian National Railways been also and at the same time a director of the Pacific Coast Terminals Limited: (a) if so, who; (b) if so, during what period of time?

4. Is the government aware of the auction sale of the Pacific Coast Terminals Limited at the court house, Vancouver, to satisfy a judgment secured by the Montreal Trust Company: (a) if so, what action did the government take?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this passing as an order for return on the condition, of course, that we will obtain from the Canadian National Railway all the information we can in the matter because we have not the information in the department and we have to apply to the railway for it. On that condition I have no objection to this question passing as an order for return.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest that at least some of the information asked for should be in the possession of the government.

Mr. MANION: Whatever we have will be gladly brought down, but I was referring to the information which we would have to obtain from the Canadian National Railway.

WEEKLY JOURNAL, "CANADA"

Mr. POULIOT:

1. From August 1, 1930, until now, did the Canadian government subsidize in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly: (a) the illustrated weekly journal entitled "Canada," and (b) another one entitled "Canada's Weekly"?

2. If so, how and through whom was it done and what was the total amount paid in that connection?

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia):

1. How many appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission or by the government since July, 1930, at salaries of $5,000 or over?

2. What are the names of such appointees and what positions do they occupy?

3. What are the names of all civil servants and of government employees outside of the civil service who have been given increases of salaries of $500 or more since July, 1930?

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

Mr. GOLDING:

1. What were the dates of the days for which Mr. Norman Sommerville, K.C., was paid other than the days on which the committee or commission on price spreads and mass buying held public sittings?

2. Who was assistant counsel for the committee and commission on price spreads and mass buying?

3. What was this assistant's remuneration per day?

4. What was his expense allowance per day?

5. What was the total sum paid this assistant for his services and expenses?

6. How many auditors or firms of auditors were employed by the committee or commission on price spreads and mass buying?

7. What was the total amount paid to each auditor or firm of auditors for services and expenses?

8. What were the names of all investigators employed by the committee or commission on price spreads and mass buying?

9. What particular matter did each one investigate?

10. What was the total amount paid to each investigator for all purposes?

11. What is the total cost of this inquiry up to this date?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. What prices are paid in National Defence camps at Spences Bridge and other neighbouring camps for: (a) potatoes; (b) carrots; (c) cabbage; (d) onions?

2. From whom have such supplies been received during 1934 and 1935?

3. Are the prices paid the best available in this district?

AIR SERVICE PROPERTY

Mr. REID:

1. Has the government acquired, any properties or options, either to purchase or lease any land or property for air service purposes, in the province of British Columbia or are any negotiations being carried on regarding this?

2. If so, what properties, options or leases have been so acquired or are at present under negotiation, giving the names of the owners of properties, cost of same, location and terms of leases acquired or in process of negotiation?

SANTO DOMINGO TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I want to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson)—I want to apologize because having received these telegrams only a few moments ago I was unable to get into communication with him before the house opened—if he has received any representations from people interested in the fish business or the potato business or the onion business in Canada calling his attention to the fact that prohibitive duties are being placed on these three articles by the Santo Domingo government?

I have a cable here from my agent in Santo Domingo, a man named Lockie, who wires me that on Saturday the Santo Domingo government imposed prohibitive duties on fish stuffs, also potatoes and onions. He states that the loss to the maritime provinces will be at least a quarter of a million dollars annually, and that the duty on a drum of fish, which as the minister knows is 128 pounds, was formerly $1.30 and is now under the new duty $10.15; the duty on a bag of potatoes was formerly 83 cents and now is $2.90, and the duty on onions is similar. The telegram goes on to say that Pickford and Black have also telegraphed the minister.

I have also received a telegram from Pickford and Black in regard to this matter. As the minister knows Pickford and Black Limited have a line of boats running from Halifax to Jamaica, Santo Domingo and other ports in the West Indies. The telegram from Pickford and Black to me states:

Lockie—

That is the agent at Santo Domingo:

—has wired you in connection with Santa Domingo increase in duty. This will mean serious loss to fishermen Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Magdalen islands. For your information we have wired Minister Trade and Commerce also Finance requesting them to take matter up with Santo Domingo government or through trade commissioner at Cuba or Jamaica. Would appreciate your efforts in matter as one vitally affecting the maritimes as well as Quebec fish industries.

May I ask the minister if he has received representations with respect to these new duties and if he has consulted with the government, and if so what action will be taken in the matter?

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member I would say that a telegram was received this morning from Pickford and Black, but no other communications so far as I am aware have been received. The matter is being given immediate attention by the commercial intelligence branch and I may have something to say a little later, but I can assure my hon. friend that we have lost no time in making inquiry.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

DENIAL OF CHARGES OF IMPROPER METHODS IN NEW BRUNSWICK—ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, during the sitting of the house last evening when unfortunately I was not present, my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) made certain statements during a discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Revenue which cast somewhat serious reflections upon the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or upon that part of the force which is operating in the province of New Brunswick.

I think it will be remembered also that during the last session of parliament, that is for 1934, on the twelfth of March of that year, my hon. friend from Gloucester made two allegations on that occasion in regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, one in respect of third degree methods which he alleged had been practised by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in regard to prisoners, and another charge in regard to certain boats under the control of the mounted police in the harbour of Bathurst. At the time that these were made last session I promised that an investigation would be made in both cases. Investigation was made, but as is customary within the force it was conducted by the force itself. A copy of the investigation was subsequently handed to the hon. member for Gloucester and I heard nothing further about it.

Mr. VENIOT: Not a copy of the investigation about the boats.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then on the fifteenth day of February during the present session the hon. member for Gloucester again made a charge that third degree methods had been practised in the province of New Brunswick with respect to a prisoner of the name of Williamson, and intimated on the same occasion that there were certain other grave irregularities in regard to the seizure of a vessel known as the Paul T. He also intimated on that occasion that he was not satisfied with the investigations that were being conducted, particularly by Inspector Salt, who is the officer in command of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force in the province of New Brunswick, and I intimated to him at that time that further investigation would be held if he so desired. I may say that the investigations which have been held and reported to me in respect of the charges made last session show that the allegations were entirely without foundation.

The allegation made last night was rather more serious perhaps in one aspect than those made previously, and in order that no exaggerated idea of the incident may take possession of the public mind I wish to state that the vessel Paul T was seized under the provisions of the New Brunswick Liquor Act. Subsequently the attorney general of the province of New Brunswick transferred the whole matter to the Department of National Revenue to be dealt with by that department. Under the provisions of the Customs Act it is provided by section 139 that the Minister of National Revenue may order "vessels, goods, vehicles or things forfeited to be disposed of as he sees fit, instead of being sold by public auction." On the 20th of November, 1934, a letter was dispatched from the chief clerk of the commissioner of customs to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the following language:

Sir,—

Re: R.C.M.P. Customs Seizure No. 74293/3596

Referring to the above-numbered seizure of the vessel Paul T and cargo of liquor, you are advised that official advice has been received from the attorney general of the province of New Brunswick that the province waives all claim to the vessel Paul T and cargo, which have been forfeited to the crown in the right of the province.

In view of this confiscation it will not be necessary to formally render decision in the matter.

It will now be in order to proceed with the destruction of the vessel and cargo.

Yours truly,
C. H. Callback,
Chief Clerk,
for Commissioner of Customs.

Acting upon that authority and pursuant to the Customs Act the vessel was destroyed as well as the cargo. The charge is made that in the carrying out of these instructions ship's stores were also destroyed. It may be that there is a technical distinction between cargo and ship's stores, but ship's stores were destroyed. An inventory of the stores was taken at the time and the valuation put upon these stores was $44. I have the inventory here.

Mr. VENIOT: Read it. I want to have it on the record and I think I should have it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is as follows:

1 gallon jug molasses.
1 small jug vinegar.
1 bucket full of sausages.
1 bucket half full lard.
40 cans tomato soup.
5 packages yeast cakes.
5 pound can baking powder.
15 pounds butter.
31 quarts milk.
3 cans peas.
2 cans tomatoes.
19 packages macaroni.
1 bottle vanilla.
7 bottles lemon extract.
6 packages rice.
2 pounds black pepper.
1 pound soda.
1 pound salt.
30 seven-pound bags flour.
4 twenty-four-pound bags flour.
60 pounds white sugar.
8 pounds tea.
6 pounds coffee.

All these goods were six months old.

The value of these stores was put at $44.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will my hon. friend allow me to make my statement? I shall be as brief as I can.

[Mr. Guthrie]

A portion of these ship's stores was condemned as not being in a condition to be used as human food. It was stated also that one hundred and fifty people watched the destruction of these stores and asked that they be given the stores as food. It was stated that these people were on relief but I am informed that there were only fifteen children and three adult people present. The government of New Brunswick must also be included in the record as the statement is made that no person in this locality was on direct relief between May 1 last year and January 1 of this year. I mention these things because I believe an exaggerated idea has gone out through the country with regard to the destruction of the ship's stores. Whether or not these stores were technically a part of the cargo, they were treated as part of the cargo by the members of the police force and were destroyed. This matter has been given prominence in the newspapers and the reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is so high, not only in Canada but throughout the world, that the officers naturally resent any reflection being improperly cast upon the force. They desire to have this matter cleared up at the earliest opportunity.

As he stated yesterday, the hon. member for Gloucester is making his charges on his honour as a member of this house. He has intimated that he will not be content with an investigation carried on at the instance of Inspector Salt, who is in charge of the force in that province. Therefore, the government has decided to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the two charges made last March and the two charges made during this session. For this purpose the government will appoint to-morrow the chief justice of the province of New Brunswick as royal commissioner to make an inquiry into these charges.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege I desire to meet the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). In the first place, let me point out to him that he did not submit to me the report of the investigation in connection with the patrol boats.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have it here and if my hon. friend wants it, I will submit it.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend made the statement that he had submitted to me the report of the investigation which was held in connection with my statement about the patrol boats. I have not received this statement.

In connection with the third degree matter, I think I am justified in asking for a further investigation. In connection with the patrol boats I am prepared to put my seat at stake. I saw these patrol boats tied to the wharf in Bathurst for three days while the sailors paraded the streets day and night with the young girls of the town. I know what I am up against and I am willing to put my seat at stake. I am up against the worst element which could be introduced into the mounted police of Canada. I am up against men who would not hesitate—I say this on my honour as a member—to take a false oath in order to protect themselves. I make this statement boldly and I know whereof I speak. I welcome an investigation by a royal commission but I say to the minister that this investigation should be thorough. I will be prepared to conduct it on behalf of those who are making the charges. Let the minister arrange that this investigation be held at a time when I can be present. I can summon witnesses but I do not intend to engage counsel to defend the statements I have made on the floor of this house. I hope to be there to defend them myself.

Let us deal with the statements I made last night. I made those statements in all seriousness and the minister's remarks have borne out what I said. I did not say how many stores were destroyed, I simply said that they were destroyed without any authority from the department. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) has stated that no specific instructions were issued for the destruction of these stores. I stand by my statement that there were one hundred and fifty people present and I do this despite any statement made by the mounted police of my county. I say that the people interfered and almost prayed that these goods be not destroyed, but their pleas were not heeded. I am not a lawyer but I think the Minister of Justice will agree that the statement that I am about to make is correct. There was no authority to destroy ship's stores or to classify ship's stores as cargo.

The charge of smuggling which was brought against the owners or the captain of the Paul T by the dominion government was dismissed by one of the highest courts of the country. The captain was charged in the magistrate's court with having in his possession liquor not purchased from the liquor commission of New Brunswick. Under this charge he was committed to gaol as he had liquor on board his vessel which had not been bought from the liquor commission of New Brunswick. Under the laws of that province covering the sale of liquor, anyone in possession of liquor on board a craft of which he is in charge and which has not been purchased from the liquor commission is subject to fine or imprisonment. The vessel is also subject to confiscation along with its cargo. The liquor was part of the cargo. I claim that the attorney general of New Brunswick had no right under the law to transfer the jurisdiction of the province to the customs department of the dominion government, and that this action places the dominion in this position, that the question will become an international one and may cost the country fifty or sixty thousand dollars before it is disposed of. For that reason I felt, as a member of this house, that I was acting in the interests not only of my own people in Gloucester but of the dominion as a whole in directing the attention of the government to what I regarded as an illegal act on the part of the attorney general of New Brunswick in transferring the jurisdiction of the province to the dominion by means of a simple letter. Last night when the question was under consideration I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether they had authority to do this and his reply was, "We have nothing to do with it; you will have to go to the Justice department." Now the minister says that the whole authority was vested by the attorney general of New Brunswick in the department of customs. Who is right—the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Justice? I claim, Mr. Speaker, that neither of them is right; they know that they are wrong. Legally they are wrong. I am not a lawyer; I may be what is called a sea lawyer, but I may know more about these regulations with regard to the seizure of vessels than even some of the officials of the Department of National Revenue.

This vessel, let me point out, was a ship in distress. Her foremast was broken in a storm. She had an auxiliary engine aboard and that went wrong, so that she was at the mercy of the winds and the open sea, miles from the shore. Her captain raised his flag of distress, and to show the efficiency of some of the officers in charge of the patrol boat—what was my astonishment, as I sat in the court listening to what was going on, to discover that the captain of the patrol boat could not tell the court what a flag of distress was. He did not even know that. He claimed that the captain of the vessel had never raised the flag of distress, but when he was asked to give his definition of a flag of distress he could not do so.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: Keep order yourself, or I will get the mounted police after you. This vessel, I repeat, was in distress and raised her flag of distress and the fishermen miles away approached her. He told those on board one of the fishing boats exactly what his condition was, as I have described—the foremast broken, split in two, the engine gone wrong. He wanted to be towed into a Canadian port. He had been driven out of his course—I am giving the evidence—and did not know exactly where he was. The fishermen told him that they could not tow him in, but they saw, rounding the east point of Miscou island, a patrol boat and they told the captain, "There is a government patrol boat." The captain waited until the patrol boat came up; he cast his anchor and waited. No attempt was made to hide what was in the vessel, but the captain gave the captain of the patrol boat a description of the contents of his vessel. He was told that there was thousands of dollars' worth of liquor on board; the manifest was produced, the clearance of the vessel was given the patrol officer, and the hatches were sealed. The captain of the patrol boat said, "Yes, you are a vessel in distress; I will take you to the first Canadian port, the port of Shippigan." They took him there and his vessel was tied to the wharf, but he had not been waiting more than half an hour before the local mounted police came with a warrant and arrested the captain and his crew for having liquor in their possession without a permit from the liquor board of the province —not for smuggling. The smuggling case was tried afterwards and was thrown out by the jury, and on that count the captain and his crew were freed.

The Minister of Justice says that my statement against the mounted police is derogatory to the service all over Canada. I differ from him on that point. I indicated, when I made my statement, why I was making the charges. On the floor of the house, speaking from my place, I said that I had every respect for the old mounted police, but I deprecated the idea of there being placed in the force men who are acting in such a way as to bring disgrace to the renowned mounted police of the past. And that is what is happening in my county; that is why I oppose it. The Minister of Justice says that I refused to accept Captain Salt as an investigator. Yes, I refused to accept him as an investigator because, as I stated in my place in this house, in many ways he is not qualified. Let me give an instance, since we are going into it—and I am only dealing with Captain Salt.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I must interrupt the hon. member. I am sure the house desires to give him every opportunity of stating any matter which arises out of the question of privilege, but I would ask him to bear that in mind and stick to the question of privilege raised, without discussing any evidence that may have been given. I do not think that the hon. member should continue along the line which apparently he intends to follow.

Mr. VENIOT: I refer to Captain Salt because in the investigation he claimed that no statement I had made in this house had been justified—I had made false statements. Under these circumstances I have a perfect right to reply to such charges against a member of this house, and I have a right to give the reasons why I cannot accept anything that Captain Salt reports. I claim that he is not qualified to carry out such an investigation. On August 16, 1933 the Prime Minister of this country and myself were guest speakers at a big reception in St. John, and we—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to Captain Salt.

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to give the hon. member every opportunity to state his position, but in a matter of this kind he should not refer to something that happened in 1933 which does not arise in connection with the question of privilege now before the house.

Mr. VENIOT: I made a mistake, Mr. Speaker, I should have said August 16, 1934, after he had made the investigation with respect to the statements I had made in this house. The Prime Minister of this country and myself were guest speakers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: —or rather the principal speakers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: One moment now; I am not saying anything against the Prime Minister. Don't be so touchy. We both spoke that afternoon to about twenty thousand people in the city of Saint John. There was no politics in the matter at all. But at noon of that day a luncheon was going on in the Union club—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member not to speak of matters that are irrelevant. I should be glad if he would kindly confine himself to the point at issue. I am willing to give him every latitude in putting forward his question of privilege.

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to that. On that day at the Union club I was approached by a gentleman, Captain Salt.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the matter with that? I think we had better have the mounted police here. I was approached by Captain Salt. I was with three friends, and I might say we had a cocktail before going into the lunchroom; in fact I had my glass in my hand when a man approached me and tapped me on the shoulder. I looked around; I did not know the man and had never seen him before. He said, "Look here, Peter; you and I are sufficiently well acquainted that I may call you by your Christian name." I looked at him and said, "Who are you?" He said, "I am Captain Salt."

Mr. DUFF: He must have been at sea.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, he must have been at sea. I said "I have nothing to do with you." He moved away, but the minute my three friends had separated from me, he again followed me up and tapped me on the shoulder. He said, "Do you want to know what politics I am in? Ask Premier Taschereau. I am as good a Liberal as ever walked on shoe leather." That is the man who I expect will investigate the charge I made on the floor of the house. I want the minister to bring Captain Salt as a witness now to disprove what I said, and I will bring three gentlemen from Saint John who can prove that what I say is true. Those are my reasons.

As to the royal commission I wish to say this: I said that I would welcome a royal commission. I am sorry that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has stated that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick will be the royal commissioner. I have no objection to the chief justice of New Brunswick, but when the people of my province review the case and find that I am being investigated by the chief justice of New Brunswick, no matter what his standing as regards integrity or probity may be, when it is considered that he and I have been the two bitterest political opponents in the province, I think the people will say, no matter what the verdict may be, that Veniot did not get a fair show. I am not at all afraid of the investigation; I am prepared to stand it, but I am drawing the attention of the Minister of Justice now to what the effect, no matter what the verdict may be, might be in the opinion of the people of New Brunswick when it is considered that the gentleman occupying the high position of chief justice of the supreme court of that province and I have been the bitterest political opponents that can be found there.

In conclusion I would say: Let the minister bring on the investigation, but give me time to prepare for it. Let him not have it at a time when I may be engaged in a contest in the coming election and when I shall not be in a position to summon the witnesses I want to bring. Let him give me the investigation, and whether it is held before the election or after, when I am returned to parliament, if I cannot prove beyond doubt ninety per cent of what I state in the house, I shall be willing to put my seat at stake and retire from public life.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

BILL TO LIMIT HOURS OF WORK IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

The house resumed, from Monday, March 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919—Mr. Gordon (for Mr. Bennett)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. GORDON: If I might have the committee's attention, clause 3 was one that was allowed to stand and probably we will make faster progress if we start with that clause and then take up the other clauses that were allowed to stand. With the consent of the committee I would like to revert to clause 3 because the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have an amendment to move. I believe when the legislation was drafted, a very important article of the convention was omitted from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee, we revert to clause 3.

On section 3—Eight hours in the day, forty-eight in the week.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I move:

That clause 3 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection as subsection 2:

2. The governor in council may define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture for the purpose of determining the employers and the employees to whom this act shall apply.

That is a provision which was in the convention, which was not carried by the draftsman into the bill and which we think ought to be in it.

Mr. DUFF: Before this subsection is discussed further I wish to read a telegram I received from Truro this morning. It reads as follows:

Dairy industry Nova Scotia wishes exemption from eight hour day legislation.
Dairymen's Association of Nova Scotia.

I shall say only a word because my throat is very bad. The Dairymen's Association of that province comprises thousands of dairy farmers. I call the attention of the minister to the fact that they are opposed to this legislation.

Mr. GORDON: I shall have an amendment to present to clause 10 which will take care of the situation that the hon. member mentions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister of Trade and Commerce give us the terms of the convention to which he refers?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. gentleman has the draft convention—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —at page 10, near the top, he will find this provision:

The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

So that we have followed almost in express terms the provision of the convention in this amendment.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to protest against the low voices in which the ministers are replying to the questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is a matter in which I am vitally interested, and I want to hear the replies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Shall I read again the provision from the convention?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, we will read it in Hansard.

Mr. CHURCH: This eight hour day is an eight hour day or it is not an eight hour day. In the first place it applies only to a little over half the industries of the country. This is a form of Christian socialism, of the Kingsley - Keble - Shaftsbury - evangelical type and should be enforced without any provisos or restrictions or governor in council's orders or anything else. The act should have teeth in it to ensure it being obeyed. Federal officers should be charged with the enforcement of this law. We pass so many acts of parliament with absolutely no provision for enforcing them. We passed the Alien Labour Act but it was practically null and void because no action was taken to enforce it. The enforcement of a federal law is left to the attorney general of a province. If we are going to make this everyone's business instead of the business of some specific federal officer we shall not get much relief under this act. The city of Toronto has had an eight hour day law since 1919, it has taken the dominion parliament sixteen years to catch up. I should like to see the government go further and apply a five day week as a trial for one year to its own employees together with shorter hours so that the work may be divided up to aid unemployment, for simply as a matter of arithmetic that would make employment for more men, and a great many soldiers who are out of work. The more provisos you added to this bill the more difficult will be its enforcement. I see enforcement is going to be left with the provinces; in the larger municipalities it will be directly under the municipal police. In the city of Toronto sixty-five per cent of the police officers are almost exclusively engaged in regulating traffic, with the result that they have little or no time to go after evaders of federal laws. After all, these provisos providing for regulations by the governor in council in the interpretation of the act and the penalties would only serve the purposes of the opposition in their efforts to wreck this measure on the grounds of unconstitutionality. That purpose seems to be uppermost in the minds of the opposition, as in the case of the unemployment insurance bill. Unfortunately in this country the courts are subservient to the legislatures. I want to see this act enforced, and I do not want to see it made so wide as to prevent it being enforced. I believe we should have put into it a section 13, because this section has to be read together with the penalties that are to be enforced. In case of prosecution the lawyer for the defence may find loopholes through these orders in council. I believe this act should be enforced concurrently by the province and the federal authority. The federal power should do something to enforce its own social laws, not leave their enforcement to an outside authority. It is the function of government to care for the health and welfare of the people. We have learned of many cases of long hours and sweatshop conditions showing that the question of working hours is in need of immediate overhauling. Such conditions as we have learned of should no longer be tolerated in this country. Many large corporations, when a case is brought against them in the police court, will be able to plead just such an amendment as this, with the effect of weakening the whole section. We know that many of these large corporations can engage lawyers to protect them in breaking the law. We should have an eight hour day act, but it should be free from any provisos, riders and restrictions so that objection cannot be taken when a summary conviction is made in the courts. It should be a summary conviction and there should be no appeal, and it should apply uniformly in all parts of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In connection with the point I raised, the minister quoted the convention as follows:

> The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

But in his amendment he provides that this shall be done by the governor in council. I submit that in this country parliament itself is the competent authority, not the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not necessarily, but I urge that position; parliament is here the competent authority, and if there is any definition to be introduced it should be introduced in the act itself by this parliament, not left to the judgment of the governor in council, where it can be so readily amended to suit the convenience of certain big corporations. I think this parliament is the competent authority and ought to deal with the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe that the competent authority in such cases is the province. Anyhow I would be against the governor in council; I agree with my hon. friend that it cannot be the governor in council.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On division.

Mr. MacNICOL: In this part of the chamber we could not hear what was being discussed.

Mr. POWER: Come down to the front benches; that is where you should be, anyway.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In my opinion this amendment is but one further step towards making the bill of very little use. In the first place it never was of very much use, because over the great field of specialized industry to-day, where labourers are organized, the eight hour day is already in operation. In some industries, as hon. members have said, the hours are even shorter than that. Now we propose to establish the eight hour day, as a matter of law, with the possibility of forcing industries which have dropped below that level to revert to the provision for eight hours of labour. Furthermore this measure is based on a convention as old as unemployment insurance legislation. It is based on a convention which was drawn up at a time when eight hours was not the prevailing time of labour, and when periods very much in excess of that were common. It was not uncommon for men to work nine or ten hours. The eight hour day convention was ratified by the nations. Not necessarily due to that convention but rather because of economic conditions and the organization of labour, industries in various nations of their own volition adopted the eight hour day principle. I contend that to-day we have long passed the time when eight hour day legislation will do what it is intended to do, or will have any real effect upon the distribution of employment among those who need it.

Yesterday I gave some figures showing the appalling state of our country so far as the volume of unemployment is concerned. That that volume is likely to increase rather than to decrease is well known to any person who has any knowledge whatsoever of the development of modern science. I need not again direct the attention of hon. members opposite, who in the past few years have learned much about these questions, to the fact that the development of modern machinery has so rapidly displaced manual labour that even if we were to return to the productive activity of 1929 we would not, as has already been stated, be able to employ half of those now unemployed. It may not be remiss to remind hon. members of this fact. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, in Great Britain, has admitted that there will be a tremendous number of unemployed and unemployable workers.

If work is to be the basis upon which a man is to secure the necessities of life, and if it is to be the basis of unemployment insurance, then obviously it is incumbent upon us as a parliament to pass legislation sufficiently drastic to enable the employment of the unemployed in useful and remunerative work. We cannot do that by passing an eight hour day law; we might approach a solution of the problem by passing a six hour day law. Let me point out that even passing legislation fixing the minimum hours of labour will not be sufficient and will not completely remedy or solve our difficulty. It may alleviate it, and it would enable the distribution of the available amount of labour over the widest possible field.

It is only within the last comparatively few years that these great scientific changes of the significance of which many are now so complacently unaware have taken place. In Canada to-day there is enough steam power already developed to do the work of 15,000,000 men. The greater part of that energy is developed on the railways. Then there are two other forms of energy which have come into existence in our time, one of them the internal combustion engine, which revolutionized agriculture in every country in the world, and the other electrical energy, about which we know very little other than the fact that it has brought about an immense displacement of man power. The result is that in the United States of America about 115,000,000 man power is represented in electrical energy alone, already in active production of services. In the whole world there is a man power of about 1,500,000,000 represented in electrical energy. In Canada we are, in one respect, in a happy position in that so far as our potential power to produce electrical energy is concerned we rank among the first of the nations. So far we have only scratched the surface of that potential energy; as I speak it is running away to the sea in almost untold volumes. Last year we had a development available for production purposes of, roughly speaking, 7,500,000 horse power. One horse power of electrical energy can do the work which it would require ten men to do, therefore we have in Canada in that one form of power the equivalent of nearly 75,000,000 men. That means that, through that type of energy, with a population of less than 11,000,000 we could do the work of 75,000,000. Obviously with the development of artificial energy there will be a constant displacement of man power. That that displacement has already developed to an enormous extent can be seen by facts disclosed by investigators who have been working in economic and sociological work. For example, James L. Davis, formerly Secretary of Labour of the United States, has said that whereas a few years ago in the boot and shoe industry one man doing hand work could produce 100 pairs in one year, to-day the machine produces 1,800 pairs in a year, and only one man is required to operate it. He goes on to draw the following conclusion:

> Taking into consideration the equipment available for the production of boots and shoes in the United States to-day that country could produce in 17½ working days the entire year's requirements of boots and shoes.

What will the men do the remainder of the time? It is true they will produce some for export, but in view of the technological changes in the boot and shoe industries of all nations such export trade will not take up the slack.

Then, what about the men in the coal industry? In the United States, as in Canada, they can produce in six months one year's supply of coal, thereby leaving the men idle for six months, and giving them no work. In the motor industries the most extraordinary changes have taken place. I am glad to mention the motor industry at this time, because when we emerged from the war we found that in a technical sense Canada, Great Britain and the United States were potentially richer than when they entered it. We were richer because of scientific developments during the war years which had terrifically increased our productive capacity. The production of automobiles and radios served for a time to take up part of the slack. Rapidly, however, technical changes in both these industries had the effect of displacing them as fast as, in the first instance, it had employed them. I find that since 1922 in the motor industry 1,400 per cent more cars are being made with ten per cent fewer men. In the Buick plant of General Motors the daily production in 1923 had increased from 625 cars to 1,000 cars, despite a reduction of 5,000 men. To-day 30 men can do the work which required 100 men in 1914.

In the steel industry to-day seven men can do the work which 60 used to do in casting pig iron. Two men can do the work which 128 men used to do in loading pig iron. One man can do the work which 42 used to do in connection with the open hearth furnaces. Then, in the brick industry it used to take one man eight hours to make 450 bricks, while to-day a machine has been developed which in one hour will produce 40,000 bricks.

So we pass on from modern miracle to modern miracle. In the rubber tire industry 40 men to-day can do the work which formerly 100 men could do. So far as the internal combustion engine is concerned no estimate has yet been made as to the increase in the potential productivity of man. We find that in Saskatchewan alone there are 41,104 tractors and combines which in the three prairie provinces have, as I have shown on previous occasions, displaced about 100,000 harvesters, and these machines have taken off even greater harvests and higher bushelage of grain. In our own railways an interesting picture is drawn, and one worthy of consideration. While thirty years ago it would take one locomotive, with six of a crew, to move 1,200 tons of freight a certain distance in from sixteen to twenty-four hours, with two stops for coal and water, the modern K-1 type of locomotive, with five of a crew, can move 7,500 tons of freight in from four to six hours, with no stops for either coal or water.

Between 1913 and 1928 the railway mileage of Canada increased by 40 per cent, and the ton miles of freight increased by over 100 per cent, and yet we employed 1,667 fewer men to handle 40 per cent more line and over 100 per cent more freight. There is no use in talking, because those are the facts; they come to the attention of anybody who takes the trouble to look into the thing. Therefore I ask the government, why eight hours? Why not six hours? Yes, Mr. Chairman, continually and progressively we shall have to reduce the hours of labour as the scientific attainments of man develop and continue to displace labour. There is no use in not facing this fact. It has to be faced, and we have reached the stage now where we have to reorient our whole thought with regard to the future, which involves largely the problem of the displacement of man power by the introduction of modern energy and the machine. I recommend to the government most strongly that they take into consideration the passage of a law for a six hour, not an eight hour day. It is not going to be enough to plead the constitution or to plead that the convention ratified calls only for an eight hour day. This government has protested that it is going to bring into effect legislative reforms which will revolutionize the injustices of capitalism and provide work for the unemployed. The eight hour day legislation will not provide one additional day of labour under present conditions.

Mr. RINFRET: I have only a word to say about this legislation, and this may be the proper time to say it, although my remarks do not apply to section 3 but to the bill generally. I will present them in a very few words.

When this legislation was before the house a few days ago a number of members mentioned particular industries in which it would not be easy to apply this law on account of special conditions of work. I wish to bring another such case to the attention of the minister, that of the longshoremen. I have had representations made to me by longshoremen in Montreal pointing out, in the first place, that their employment is seasonal, lasting only a few months in the year, and, in the second place that their work is intermittent according as the ships come into the harbour and varying with the quantity of cargo. Some of these men tell me that in one week they will work fifteen hours and in another week from fifty to sixty hours. I do not want to stress the point because it is very clear; it is similar to the point made in other cases which were brought to the attention of the committee on Monday when this bill was before it. I just want to ask the minister if there are in this bill provisions under which adjustment will be possible in cases such as this, so that longshoremen who work only a few hours in one week may work an extra number of hours in another week in order to establish an average. Perhaps the minister will be kind enough to take heed of these remarks and let the committee know whether that will be possible under his bill.

Mr. GORDON: There are a great many instances where special conditions prevail, and under the bill as drafted it has seemed to me that clause 10 is not sufficiently clear. When we reach that clause I shall have an amendment to suggest which I think will take care of such intermittent work as my hon. friend mentions and industries of that kind, and which would probably be impeded if the bill passed as it is now drafted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, a general discussion perhaps might have taken place on the second reading, but in any case clause 3 contains the principle involved in the entire bill and I should like to make a few general remarks with regard to it.

It is gratifying that at last an attempt is being made to bring Canada into line with the minimum standards as proposed by the I.L.O. sixteen years ago.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the I.L.O.?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The International Labour Organization. It is too bad that Canada, so far as these regulations are concerned has been among the backward countries of the world. I hold in my hand a chart as presented from time to time by the international labour office, showing the progress of ratifications in the various countries, and if any of the hon. members received these charts I am sure they cannot be very proud of the position which Canada holds.

I regret indeed that the scope of this legislation is so limited, and I do trust that the government will not attempt still further to limit its scope as might be done by the amendment now before the committee. I would like to suggest that the evidence given before the price spreads commission would point to the need of including in this legislation not merely those engaged in strictly industrial pursuits but also those engaged in commercial pursuits. There are employees of the chain stores who are working very long hours indeed, and it seems to me we ought not to allow this parliament to close without making some definite provisions safeguarding the hours of work of people in certain establishments.

We have been informed by some of the members of the official opposition that there are constitutional difficulties in the way. I can see that perhaps that may be so from the legal standpoint but I urge that such difficulties could readily be overcome. I am going to venture to suggest certain means which would appeal to me as a layman by which if necessary any government that was in earnest about this matter might bring the provinces into line. I would suggest that, for example, there should be no tariff concessions to any industry that does not operate under fair conditions with regard to hours, conditions of work, wages and the right to organize. I think that would have a salutary effect upon the interests that are to-day receiving very decided protection from this country, and if that could be put into force in these central provinces where manufacturing is so largely located, the provinces would not hesitate to take such action by way of concurrent legislation that would bring them into line. Again I would say that where there is a will there is a way.

Further than that, and I may say that in this matter I have not consulted with any of my legal friends—I was afraid to do so for fear they would raise all sorts of obstacles and difficulties—I think there might be a prohibition of exports from any province that refuses to fall into line.

I suggest that if such a provision were brought into force even the industrially highly organized, central provinces would hesitate very much to offer any great objection to such measures. I think that if they could not export to any other province they would gladly fall into line. Surely trade and commerce comes under dominion jurisdiction. Further, if I had any authority in the matter I think I would go a little further. I would suggest certain changes in the Bank Act which would refuse credit to those industries which would not conform to such regulations as those now before us.

Mr. POWER: What would you do with the bankers themselves?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have discussed the bankers on other occasions. I think it would be quite possible so to alter the Bank Act as to make it impossible for banks to extend credit unless the corporation seeking credit had conformed to certain standards.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Nationalize the banks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) says that he would nationalize the banks. Of course, that is our policy but perhaps that is looking a little too far into the future.

Mr. POWER: My question is: What would you do in order to coerce the bankers into following out your views?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We would threaten to revoke their charters. We can alter the Bank Act at any time. I think the banks should be as amenable to the law as any other institution. I get a little weary of that doctrine of what might be called the divine right of the bankers. As I have said in this house before, the bankers have no more inherent right to their charters than has a pedler to his licence. I think the threat to revoke those charters would bring about speedy action.

Another method occurs to me, that is to make any infraction of these regulations a criminal offence. My lawyer friends may shake their heads but we have in the criminal code laws against unlawful assembly, against fighting duels, against prize fights, against blasphemy and against gaming in stocks.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Gaming in stocks?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am using the correct term, it is gaming in stocks. We have all sorts of laws covering offences against property and persons. Why not extend these? For example, here is one clause of the criminal code which I picked up almost at random. Section 249 reads:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, being legally liable as master or mistress to provide for any apprentice or servant, unlawfully does, or causes to be done, any bodily harm to any such apprentice or servant so that the life of such apprentice or servant is endangered or the health of such apprentice or servant has been, or is likely to be, permanently injured.

In my judgment it would not require any very great revision of such a clause as this to enforce the eight hour day, especially in those industries which require considerable exertion on the part of employees. In this connection I should like to read a paragraph from a report which was presented recently by Leon Henderson and Isador Lubin. This report was drafted for the perusal of the President of the United States and the N.I.R.B. before the renewal of the automobile code. What applies to the automobile industry in the United States applies to the automobile industry in Canada, and similar conditions exist in many of the heavy industries. Just in passing may I point out that last year General Motors earned a profit of $94,000,000. Legislation of this kind should protect the employee. What situation does he face? This report is summarized in The Nation of February 20, 1935, as follows:

> The outline was given in the lengthy newspaper summary of the report published February 8. The industry needs young men; it needs a surplus of them. So it drums up its recruits from all over the country. They came by the tens of thousands before the depression, not knowing they would be discarded at forty. They bought homes and automobile stock on the instalment plan. They were fooled by the glittering high figures of hourly wages, and they stormed the employment gates. One by one they were sucked into the factories, and taught to speed up. Before the depression the speed was a new high record in industrial production, but since the depression it has had to be accelerated. It now is screwed to a pitch relatively few human beings can endure. That does not matter to the employers, other workers are waiting at the gates.

This matter is directly related to the bill now before us. It is an almost intolerable thing to work eight hours under the conditions which to-day face many of our workers. The account continues:

> The industry draws them in, drives them for long hours, then shuts down and lays them off according to its needs. The report does not give a clear picture of how much the average employee earns in the average plant. It is enough to say that in a test examination of 500 men 380 earned less than $800 last year and only 35 earned more than $1,200.

These figures should be considered in connection with the profit of $94,000,000 made last year by General Motors. The article continues:

> When the plants reopen young men are taken back. The older ones, not told they are on the scrap-pile, apply and apply for reinstatement, and not till they see most of their former colleagues reemployed do they realize that they are done for. Wages are paid on a gang and bonus system which promises a premium for inhuman speed, but the men do not know how much they are to receive until they collect their pay envelopes. Often the gang and bonus payments are changed, the inhuman speed being accepted as a normal speed. The men stand for hours on end at their belts, unable to pause for a drink of water or to visit a convenience. Their foreman has over them the authority of a Roman galley commander. He can collect petty graft. He can dismiss them. He can write on the dismissal card, "do not rehire," without giving reason, and if he does it will be hard for that man to find work in any other plant.

If an investigation were held in Canada I think it would be found that very similar conditions prevail. Some of these have come to my own personal attention. Unfortunately no investigation of this kind has been held in Canada and we have to quote from the experience of those just across the line. Many of our plants are owned by the same people that own the plants in the United States and industry in this country is carried on by methods very similar to those in that country.

I wish that we had the opportunity of moving an amendment in the direction of a thirty hour week but since this bill is in the form of a ratifiication of a convention, I understand that such an amendment would be ruled out of order or would be considered undesirable. The government is basing the constitutionality of this measure upon its being a ratification of the terms of a treaty and perhaps it would not be free to accept an amendment. Nevetheless, I feel that such action ought to be taken.

The hours to be worked should be related to the amount of work to be done. Only last night I gave some figures showing the enormous number of people who are unemployed. A computation based on the census figures shows that we are sacrificing in lost time something like $400,000,000 a year. Under these circumstances, and with nowhere to place the goods that are already being produced, it seems to me only reasonable that we should still further limit the hours of those who are at work so that there will be enough work to go round. And in so limiting the hours, I insist that we ought to keep up the same rate of wages now paid to individual workers; otherwise our action would be no solution of the economic problem. We want to have greatly increased purchasing power, and that could be secured by limiting the hours of work and at the same time maintaining the rate of pay.

I suggest that we should limit the hours not merely for humanitarian reasons but as one step towards the solution of our modern economic problem. I had not known that my hon. friend from Bow River was going to take the line that he did, but I should like to follow somewhat along the same line for a few minutes in an attempt—possibly re-enforcing the position taken by my hon. friend—to impress upon the committee the necessity of still further reducing our hours of labour in view of the situation that confronts the world to-day. Power engineers tell us that through power driven machinery we have added to human muscles the muscles of nine billions of additional men, enough to increase the present population of the world five times, all ablebodied males. Mr. Howard Scott, the technocrat, promised $20,000 a year to every family on the basis of a sixteen hour week. That may have been an exaggeration, and undoubtedly he did not have the data at hand to make careful computations. But recently, in the summer of 1934, the Brookings institution issued a study, America's Capacity to Produce. This takes for granted the "general pattern of commercial organization then prevailing" and shows that American production could not have been expanded by more than nineteen per cent in the year 1929. In another study, America's Capacity to Consume, the Brookings institution states:

> At 1929 prices a family income of $2,000 may be regarded as sufficient to supply only basic necessities.

And it goes on to point out that sixty per cent of the total number of families are below this standard. It would seem to me to be clear from these two studies that we must admit that under the present system we cannot produce sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living. Taking the present competitive system with all the handicaps under which it is labouring, we cannot produce enough to go round, to supply the necessities of life. So I suppose that under these conditions we shall have to continue to work long hours. A moment ago I heard an interjection from my hon. friend from Southeast Grey with regard to the farmers, and I quite admit that to-day under present conditions the farmers are working long hours, and if they receive low prices they must work long hours—altogether too long. But I take issue with some of my farmer friends who believe that this sort of thing must continue. If the farmers had decent prices for their produce they would not have to work so long. If they were properly organized, as the manufacturers, the bankers and many others are, they would not have to work such long hours; they would make themselves felt both in the industrial and in the political field. But they are not so organized. I might quote a retort given some years ago in this house by my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin. One of the farmer members was urging that it was essential that the farmers should work very long hours and my hon. friend suggested that if the farmer would use his head a little bit more he would not need to work so much with his back. I think that is true The trouble is that in the past the farmers have not used their heads to organize and for that reason they have not been able to demand relatively as much of the income of the country as they should have as a class.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the hon. member think that the farmers could regulate their hours of work by legislation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hours of work on farms have been regulated in other countries for a good many years. Only the other day I heard my hon. friend from Peace River, himself a farmer, make the statement that long years ago when he was in Scotland the hours of labour for agricultural workers were down to eight a day.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not stay there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: But I am speaking of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What can be done in Scotland or in England can be done in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Were the cows milked during those eight hours?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I urge that it is quite possible on the farm to have two shifts or if necessary three, just as they have in industry.

Mr. FAFARD: You don't know a thing about farming.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend says I don't know anything about farming.

Mr. FAFARD: Yes; you don't know anything about it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I have lived on a farm and I know something of the difficulties that face the farmer, and under present conditions undoubtedly he must work very long hours. But even in farming, if the income of the country were properly divided, and if the farmer had at his disposal the labour saving machinery which he should have, it would not be necessary for him to work the extremely long hours he now does. That is my point.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You would need mechanical cows.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I spoke a few moments ago about two studies made by the Brookings institution. Another study has recently been made in the United States, the national survey of potential product capacity. This study objectively surveys on the one hand productive machinery with its possibilities and on the other the needs of the people. I quote from an article by Stuart Chase in Harpers of February:

....The National Survey of Potential Product Capacity financed by the federal government, released the summary of a report prepared by sixty technicians over a seven months' period. Its conclusions indicated that the total flow of goods and services, valued at over 90 billions in 1929, might have been expanded to 135 billions without technical difficulty had the existing plant been operated at approximate capacity. One hundred and thirty-five billions of consumers' goods and services, evenly distributed, would have been sufficient to give each family the equivalent of about $4,400 a year. This means a possible increase of some 45 per cent, or more than twice the margin of the Brookings report....

I believe that the conditions in Canada are very similar to those that exist in the United States, and if their productive capacity, under proper management, might afford $4,400 to each family, I think it is quite possible for us to have something comparable to that in Canada. In commenting on these reports Mr. Stuart Chase shows how, under a planned system designed to produce for service, this minimum could readily be increased. He refers to the wastes in shoddy goods and adulterations by sabotage, obsolete plants, by withholding of new inventions and processes, by useless competition. There seems to be no limit to the possibilities.

Yet in the same number of Harper's, J. D. Bernal of Cambridge university ends an intensely stimulating article on a pessimistic note.

The present direction of economic and political forces holds out no hope that physical science can realize its possibilities or even escape from being used for the destruction of the world that it has helped to create. If science is to help humanity, it must find a new master.

That is the situation we find at the present time—great possibilities of production and yet under our present arrangements the impossibility of our securing the advantage therefrom.

When we come to a measure such as the one before us, we in this corner find ourselves in a rather difficult position as to how to vote. As I pointed out with regard to the unemployment insurance bill, these measures were brought forward as part of a great reform program that was designed to solve our difficulties in Canada. Viewed in that light, I think we must admit that such measures are hoplessly inadequate and as such I would almost feel like rejecting them; yet as I come to face the individual measures, I conclude that would hardly be right. An eight hour day is better than a twelve hour day, and some of our industrial workers at least until recently have been working on a twelve hour day. So I must admit that this is a little bit of improvement on that and as such it ought to be welcomed.

Further, the government must be given credit for tackling this problem that previous governments have sidetracked for a good many years. I am not particularly interested in the special legal and constitutional aspects of the question; I am interested much more in the actual conditions under which throughout all these years our workers have been forced to live. Therefore, in so far as this is a recognition of the responsibility of the government to implement the terms of the Versailles treaty and in so far as to a limited degree it does help the situation, I feel I must vote in favour of it. But let it be remembered that this is no solution of our problems, and if it were possible at this time, instead of an eight hour day I would gladly bring in an amendment, urging a thirty hour week.

Miss MACPHAIL: I listened with great interest to the very able speeches delivered yesterday and to-day by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and to the equally able one just completed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Both of those hon. members are gentlemen in whom I trust and respect for their ability, social outlook and integrity. But really as a representative of agriculture I cannot seem to agree with the position which they are taking at the moment. I quite realize that as mechanical energy or inanimate power, whether it be internal combustion engine or electric power or steam power or whatever it may be, increases, manual or animate labour will decrease, and I believe the day will come when we shall have a six hour day. But as a representative of agriculture and not so much as that, but as one who comes from a long, long line of agriculturists—and I say this because I sit in the same corner with those much respected colleagues of mine—I cannot at this moment seem to want a six hour day for industrial workers when we have something that runs well over twelve hours during the summer season and at least twelve hours a day the year round for our agricultural workers. I do not want the farmer to work from twelve to fourteen hours a day; I do want him to organize; I do want him to use his intelligence, and may I say that I have great respect for the good sense and intelligence of our farmers. I want him to use it in the best possible way so as to eliminate much of this toil; but as one who knows something about the matter—and a good many members are just as well aware of it as I—the farmer works so hard that at the end of the day he is not able to think, and at this time he is too poor to buy the magazines and newspapers which would acquaint him with the tremendous strides that have been made in the field of scientific development. We all know how true this is, and when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, much as I respect him, talks about two or three shifts on a farm when the farmer with himself and his family working themselves nearly to death cannot break even—and after all it is to-day we are living in and this bill is being passed to-day to regulate hours of labour which are going on from this time forward—the farmers could no more think of putting on double or treble shifts than flying to the moon, because no matter how they work, under present conditions they cannot break even. They know just a little bit more about hard work and about saving than any other large group of people; they are an admirable class in the national life of Canada, and I think it is not going too far to say that they are the bedrock of our whole national life. Therefore, although I hope for an eight hour day and I would be glad to welcome a six hour day—indeed I am so lazy that I would welcome a four hour day instead of fourteen as we have it in this house—I feel that we have now altogether too much disequilibrium between the country and the city.

To-day I listened to a psychologist and a very able one at that, discussing what they are doing for the children in the schools in the cities. I thought at once of the country school children who have not anything like the same opportunities. The same is true as regards all country life; there is at present very little of the best in education concerning the higher standards of living and the desire which we all have to wear clothes that we like. There is less chance of all these things in agricultural life to-day than there is even in the ranks of those on relief. Some of the figures quoted last night by the hon. member for Bow River for those on relief would sound like a fortune to the farmers in my constituency. That does not mean that I want the people on relief to have less; I do not. It means that I want the people in my constituency to have more. But as their representative, I cannot sit silent in a group where no other person has taken the position that until we can have higher prices for farm products, until we can have a lessened burden of interest rates, until we can have some markets for our products, either at home or abroad, we should not advocate six hours for labour; I cannot sit and listen as I have sat and listened this last hour without entering a very vigorous protest. When we tried to have the administrative costs of the farm loan bill borne by the government the Minister of Finance was not even friendly about it; he thought it was rather a terrible thing to ask. What are the farmers getting out of this much talked of reform program? They are getting the chance to avail themselves of the Bankruptcy Act, which other people have had for some time past. They are getting the chance of a loan from the $90,000,000 fund, at a rate of interest which will probably be at least five per cent and may be five and a half per cent. But the government would not think of bearing the administrative costs. Yet we can do all these other things; this relief, which is a terrible way of treating our economic ills, psychologically wrong, wearing the people down, undermining their morale—I dislike it exceedingly; I want to see everyone who is ablebodied and can work set to work. But instead of having some people work fourteen hours a day and others six hours a day it would be very much better to follow the suggestion, first made, I think, by the hon. member for Macleod, at any rate by someone in the house, that we have a national superannuation fund and superannuate everyone at the age of sixty or thereabouts, giving them some comfortable amount, say $50 a month, or more if that is not enough, and let farm and industrial workers share together in it on a basis that is equally fair to these great groups.

It has taken the government a long time to get around to an eight hour day. Fifteen years ago it would have brought great benefits. But once again governments have done what all governments do, brought in legislation so late that it no longer fits the needs of the case. The same is true as to the minimum wage.

[Miss Macphail.]

But at the bottom you have a group like the fishermen and the farmers, who are hardly organized at all, and they have to pay all this increased cost—because there is no use blinking the fact that such legislation as that for a minimum wage, an eight hour day and unemployment insurance put additional weight on the backs of the already burdened unorganized primary producers. That being so, it is about time this house said that, much as we want to avoid direct relief and save people from dry rot—because that is what it amounts to; much as we want to see that everyone who is able to work has work, and not too much of it, instead of having it all easy on one side and hard on the other we had better try to get a well rounded program that will make it possible for the primary producers to enjoy some of the advantages of this age of invention and of electric power.

For the moment I conclude with this—it is a queer sort of thing to be talking about on the discussion of an eight hour day bill—that farmers to-day farm women as well as farm men, are terribly overworked. They are unable to get medical attention; I know and you know that they simply cannot pay for medical or dental care. They are dressed poorly; they can not afford such small recreations as picture shows; many of them were not running their cars last year. They are burdened with low prices and high costs, with tariffs, with high interest rates, and they are burdened as we all are with a financial system that is completely wrong. I believe that what is physically possible should be financially possible, that some day we shall come to our senses and make it come true that in a land of plenty and an age of plenty there will no longer be anybody destitute. I want us to reach that state as rapidly as possible and in such a way that both the industrial worker and the farmer shall enjoy its benefits. But as we advance towards that condition we must remember that we have many groups in this country, and in enacting legislation such as this our program should be a balanced program. The farmers were here first; they were the pioneers who cleared the land and opened up the west; let us not now serve them last.

Mr. MULLINS: It is very interesting for me to listen this afternoon to the statements made here. As I look over the house and see practical farmers smiling at the advocacy of a six hour day by my late spiritual adviser the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I cannot understand it. How can farm work be confined to six hours a day, and what use is it to talk about two shifts for milking?

Mr. GOLDING: It can't be done.

Mr. MULLINS: I am in agreement with the hon. member for Southeast Grey when she states that it is one thing for a man to propose a theory for the reform of some business condition where he has had some actual experience, and it is another thing for a man to propose a theory for the reform of a business in which he has no experience though he may have some measure of ability. I ask the practical farmers whom I see before me if the statement about six hours a day and the sending out of men to come to my farm to organize the workers is right and in the interests of this country? It is absolutely wrong, and I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will listen for a few minutes to what I have to say. I see before me as I stand here practical farmers whom I know personally, such as the hon. member for Lanark; I venture to say there is no mortgage on his farm, and that if he finds it necessary to work early in the morning or late at night he will do it. I see another, the hon. member from Elgin who put these delicious apples on our desks—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MULLINS: I venture to say he is a practical farmer. I saw a smile on his face as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was talking.

Mr. MITCHELL: Tell us about the eight hour day.

Mr. MULLINS: I have owned a farm in western Canada for over fifty years. If a farm is worked properly and practically there is no better asset for a man who has the ability to operate it. But when preachers, doctors or professional men begin to teach practical men they make a mess out of it, nine times out of ten.

I have here a speech that was made in 1870 by a practical man who went to the United States following the civil war, when conditions there were like our present conditions. I remember quite well that when my grandfather in law crossed over into the United States the American dollar could be bought for fifty cents, and farm products were selling at very low figures, much lower than to-day. We bought butter at ten cents a pound, chickens at twenty cents. But conditions change; they right themselves, With the permission of the house I should like to read part of this man's observations because I believe they will give some idea of what was happening at that time:

Our country is filled with the idle and unemployed and the great question asked for an answer is, "What shall be done with these men?". "What shall these men do?" To this there is but one answer—

And I give the same answer to-day, because there can be no other answer, "Go and get these men out of the camps. Put them on the farms."

They must cultivate the soil. Farming must be rendered more attractive. Those who work the land must have an honest pride in their business. They must educate their children to cultivate the soil. They must make farming easier so that their children will not hate it; so that they will not hate it themselves.

The boys must not be taught that tilling the soil is a curse and almost a disgrace. They must not suppose that education is thrown away upon them unless they become ministers, lawyers, doctors or statesmen. It must be understood that education can be used to advantage on the farm. We must get rid of the idea that a little learning unfits one for work. There are numbers of graduates of universities and colleges who are performing a hundred varieties of menial services. They are willing to do anything that is not regarded as work, anything that can be done in a town, in a house, in an office, but they avoid farming as they would leprosy.

It is a thousand times better to have common sense with education—than education without sense.

The western country offers every opportunity. Yet we are crowding men into camps; we are putting men into camps where they are getting all the luxuries which could be given, and luxuries costing all kinds of money. At the same time the united farmers of Manitoba, an organization to which I belong, are asking to have the camps disbanded. With 1,500 men in my constituency in Riding Mountain national park, Clear Lake camp, I ask, too, to have those camps disbanded and the men turned loose. Let them go to the farms for their work, because the farmers are offering them employment and will accept them. However those men will not go, and how can we expect to get them when conditions such as I am about to indicate, exist in the camps. I have before me an article showing the conditions at Clear Lake camp, and I read it for the special benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who at one time in this chamber had something critical to say about this particular camp. These men are fed three times as well as we old pioneers of western Canada were fed. We knew no such conditions as those under which they are living. I see a smile on the face of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell); I know that he has in mind just exactly what I have in mine. I say these men are fed the very best. Here is a letter which has come from the camp:

To the Editor of the Tribune:

Sir,—Every once in a while we hear a complaint emanating from the minds of some of the less grateful of our unemployed. It was rather refreshing therefore, for me to receive a letter from my boy recently, who is at camp 8, Clear Lake, which in part says:

"We arrived at the main camp 7.15 and had supper. Boy, what a meal! Everything from soup to nuts. We were in a dining room that seats about 200. After the eats, we received four horse blankets each. They are like Jimmie's scout blanket.

"From hence we got back on the truck and proceeded to camp 8, where we are now parked. It is a new bunk house, and is it snarky? They keep the fires going all night; someone comes in every two hours and stokes up; the place is real warm. We have upper bunks; they are singles. There's lots of room to hang coats, and a big shelf above the bed.

"We breakfasted in the third relay. The food is wonderful. They had porridge—

I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to get this, so that he will know just what they are doing up there in the camps.

They had porridge, pancakes, syrup, bacon, prunes, bread, buns, biscuits, etc., etc.

"So far we have not got our clothes, but expect them soon.

"There's a nice gang here.

"I've just finished putting up a few more shelves. Right now I am lying on my bed. In one end of the room someone is playing a banjo; at another end several mouth organs are in full blast.

"What little look we did get of the country was wonderful. It is all spruce trees and hills. It certainly is beautiful.

"I'll write you more when I've been to work and seen what that's like. Theres' about 20 of us loafing around the bunk house right now. It certainly is a wonderful bunk house; it's like a palace.

"Oh, Oh, now everybody's singing, so I guess I will have to join in.

And this is signed by M. Davis. If we are are going to take men out of the cities and place them in that sort of environment I do not know how we will get them back on the farms. I would not want to go back on the farm if I were in a place where they had their boxing matches one and two days each week, their hockey matches one day in the week, and all that sort of thing. Would hon. members in this chamber want to go back on the farm? I know that prices for agricultural products are low, but I would remind hon. members that only within the last ten days cattle have sold on the stockyards at Toronto for 7½ cents a pound. I am sorry the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) is not in his seat because some time ago he referred to a 19 cent cow. At the same time an hon. member sitting next to him sold a cow for $40, and had the cheque in his pocket. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) sold ten cattle for $420, and had a cheque in his pocket for that amount. These men are practical farmers, and are making a success on their farms. I know the hon. member for West Elgin is feeding a barn full of cattle which will make him a lot of money. I say the farm offers every inducement, but unless these men go out of the cities and back to the land they will be charges of the government, we will have them as wards, and we will have more talk about a six hour day and things of that kind.

I know that there is something wrong. What is wrong is this: the farmer receives nine cents and the consumer pays thirty cents. I want that fault corrected. I know there is a blank spot in the centre, but if time permitted me this afternoon and if I were given an opportunity to go into the matter more fully I could tell what is wrong. Do you think a farmer is wise who goes to the yards of the packers and permits those packers to do the purchasing? That man does his own trucking and helps to ruin the railways. I ask the intelligent men in the chamber this question: Did the farmers do that in your boyhood days? Do hon. members recall the time when in western Ontario they had fairs where the farmers showed their cattle, and where the cattle buyers would buy them? Did the cattle buyer go into the hands of the packer, and let the packer set the price? The buyer who is employed by the packer has a killing sheet handed to him every day. He buys for the packer and when the product goes to the packing plant he is responsible for the outcome of his buying. Now I ask the farmer if he is wise to put himself into the hands of the packer under those conditions. The farmer himself is wrong in the methods he is using and in the methods in which he is doing business. I ask him to go back to the old days when the cattle buyer went on to the farm, as my hon. friend from Assiniboia and my hon. friend from Ontario mentioned; they sold right on the farm and the money was paid to them there. In those days the farmer was successful, but now he puts himself into other hands to be controlled as to price. I did not intend to take up any time this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, but when I heard the statements made about working six hours a day I could keep my seat no longer.

Go back to the land and operate it in a practical way. The best inducement in the world is offered in the great outdoors of the three prairie provinces. Handle it right. Take your coarse grains and feed them to live stock, and do not be subjected to the exploitation of the different elevators by selling them your coarse grains. No man can make money by selling his coarse grains in that way. No, Mr. Chairman, feed your coarse grains to live stock and drive them to market on four legs. That is the only way. I see the hon. member for Yorkton; I remember when that town was prosperous, when there were hundreds of thousands of dollars paid out during the summer, but they have neglected the live stock industry. I do not intend to talk about live stock any more, but I hear hon. gentlemen talking about medicine and legal and constitutional questions and I could not help saying a word. The practical end of farming is live stock. I have always stood behind that and I stand behind it still. The live stock are now finding a place, and the packers instead of going down the stock yards leisurely have to step up now.

We have a market in the United Kingdom that should be developed, but I have not time to go into that to-day. I may do so later on and then tell you something more about live stock. I stand behind live stock yet, and I will take second place to no man in that respect, although I may be nearing the end of my contribution in regard to them. I have spoken many times about live stock because I have seen what they will do for a farmer who has a well bred herd of cattle, not a common bred herd. No man wants a common bred herd any more than he wants a common bred man. They are of no use; many will be in camp with somebody feeding them, but when the farmer has a well bred herd of cattle, and when he has a farm without a mortgage, he is the happiest man in the world and I defy any man from the cities to be any happier than he is.

I would say in conclusion that the west offers the opportunity, and if we here do our part as legislators to help agriculture get on its feet we can do nothing better for this country because agriculture must be successful if this country is to succeed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately the people of this country are divided into various classes and sections according to their various economic interests. Some of us are in parliament representing certain interests, and others represent different interests. Theoretically I suppose we are here to represent all interests in this country, and so far as I am personally concerned, so far as representation of that kind tends to the equal distribution of the total produced wealth of the country I am quite willing to cooperate with any group to that end. I am always willing to cooperate with the farmer because I am satisfied that we cannot have a proper social order with the farmer left out of it, any more than we can have a proper social order with the industrial worker left out of it. Those are the two wealth-producing classes in the community, and they are the two most exploited classes in this country to-day—in fact the only classes that can be exploited. It is for these people that we who sit in this corner of the house are trying to legislate.

The bill that is now before the house is in my opinion one of the most important parts of the so-called reform program, because if we pass this bill I think it is the one that will soonest come into conflict with provincial legislation. I think we should be clear in our own minds as to whether this is going to supersede provincial legislation already on the statute books. I know that in my province the employers are very anxious that the other provinces which have no limitation of hours legislation at the present time should have legislation of that kind in order that there may be some semblance of fair competition between the various industries in the different provinces. We should know first of all whether or not this legislation is going to supersede legislation already on the statute books of the provinces. That has not yet been made clear. If it is going to supersede provincial legislation, I think we should be very careful to see that the legislation we are passing now should not be less stringent than the legislation we now have in any province. I am not quite sure but I think that possibly British Columbia has more advanced legislation so far as the limitation of hours is concerned than any other province in Canada, and I do not want to see legislation passed here that would supersede legislation in British Columbia and be less stringent than what we now have in that province. I do not think any member coming from British Columbia would want to see any such legislation as that.

The amendments that are contemplated have a tendency in my opinion to take away from this legislation a great deal of its potency and effect, and consequently for that reason I am opposed to them.

I believe, with the hon. member for Bow River, that the time has come when we must recast many of our ideas in regard to social and economic matters, and that is as true of the problems of the farmer as it is of the problems of the industrial worker. The farmer also has been caught up in the industrial machine, if you like, by the use of machine power, and if he is going to live on the land as a producer of commodities and have a wide sale for his products he will have to change his methods of production to conform to the social conditions that arise. There is no getting away from that.

We have in the past heard too much about this industry or that industry not being able to stand shorter hours or higher wages or better working conditions, but I say Mr. Chairman, that an industry that cannot stand good working conditions for its employees should not be in existence at all. If the community needs that industry we should run it on such a basis as to give to those engaged in it a reasonable and decent standard of living. When we say that this or that industry cannot stand conditions that would provide a decent standard of living all we mean is that that industry cannot be carried on profitably with the management it now has. We have to make up our minds whether the industries that are essential to the life of this country are going to be left in the hands of private individuals to be manipulated in their own interests, or whether we shall see to it that those industries function in the interests of the great masses of the people of this country. That is the problem facing us to-day. It was possible at one time to leave those industries in private hands; it was possible as long as a market could be found for their production, but we have now come to the stage where a market can no longer be found, and consequently if the community is going to keep up its standard of living it has to take hold of the means of production and operate them itself for the community. If my friends have any better solution for the problem than that I am quite willing to hear it. Nothing has been brought forward as yet to show that it can be done in any other way. It seems to me that we have to stop thinking about industry and to begin thinking about the human beings who make industry possible. The trouble in the past was that the governments of this country gave all their consideration to industry and gave no consideration to the people of this country who make industry possible.

Let me say a few words in connection with the farmer. I think the first thing the farmer will have to realize is that he is taking part in the production of a social product. When I say that he is taking part in the production of a social product I mean that he is no longer producing wholly and solely for his own family and himself, producing the things that he consumes on his farm. He is producing for a world market, and between his farm and the ultimate market must come hundreds of people who take just as much part in the production of the product as he does. The disposal of his product would be impossible if these people were not taking part. I see an hon. member to my right shaking his head, but the shaking of a head is not going to get over the difficulty. Wheat is grown upon farms of western Canada but it is sold and consumed in Great Britain, in China and in France. The wheat is not wholly produced until it has reached the ultimate consumer. Everyone between the farm and the mills in Great Britain, China or wherever the wheat is finally consumed takes just as much part in its production as does the farmer. They are essential to the production and if that process did not take place the wheat would stay on the farm. The shaking of a head will not get over that.

Wheat cannot be produced to-day without agricultural machinery. This agricultural machinery is not grown on the farms. It comes from the bowels of the earth, from the smelters, the factories and the machine shops of the cities. Considerable transportation is required before it reaches the farm. Our whole city organization is bound up with our farm organization. The farmer has two alternatives facing him; he must undertake cooperative production and distribution or go back to serfdom. These are the alternatives facing the farmer to-day. You can talk as you like about the improved conditions of the industrial worker and the people living in the cities; you can state that the only solution to our problem is to go back to the land. But let us examine these things. The difficulty facing the farmer to-day is the fact that he cannot find a market at a profitable price for what he produces. As a matter of fact he cannot find a market at any price. If the farmer is going to sell he must sell to people living in the cities. He cannot sell to people who are producing the same things as he is producing. If we put the unemployed in the cities back on the farm and have them producing as well, then the farmers will be more and more unable to sell what they produce. Instead of their condition being improved, it will become worse. These things might as well be faced realistically. We are living in a social organization which requires the efforts of everyone in many different states in order to make production possible. If this is the case as far as production is concerned. then it must be the case as far as distribution is concerned if we are going to benefit by the improvements which have come about through inventions of one kind and another.

I should like to know how it would benefit the farmer to have a twelve hour day in industry. Would it benefit the farmer to have lower wages in industry? The result would be that he would be able to sell less than he sells now. He can sell only to a prosperous city population; he cannot sell to an impoverished city population.

The hon. member for Marquette has referred to the wonderful conditions existing in the unemployment camps. He quoted from a letter written by a boy in one of these camps, but I want to point out that that letter was written the first evening the boy arrived at the camp. I am not just sure of the conditions at his home when he was so pleased to be given four horse blankets. I would rather have blankets made for human beings. Horse blankets may be all right for horses but I would feel more like a human being if I was living like other human beings. If there were not sufficient human blankets, to use that term, to go around, then I might be satisfied with horse blankets but as long as somebody else had more blankets than he knew what to do with, I would not be satisfied with horse blankets. Any boy who is satisfied with horse blankets is not going to amount to much.

Mr. ROSS: Where did he say those horse blankets were used?

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Marquette was reading a letter which he had received from somebody in the camp and it stated that they were used there.

Mr. GORDON: They were used when he was riding on a truck.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not my understanding of what the hon. member said.

An hon. MEMBER: You are mistaken.

Mr. MacINNIS: Possibly I am wrong. Then he stated that there was a hook or nail furnished upon which he could hang his coat. I wonder if they had no hooks and nails at home. Did he just throw his coat under the bed? Perhaps they may have been so short of blankets at home that he had to wear his coat in bed.

I should like to give the farmer members some information which may possibly throw some light on the difficulties facing the farmers of this country. I should like to quote from a daily bulletin issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, which is under the Department of Trade and Commerce presided over by my hon. friend the minister (Mr. Hanson). This bulletin gives the gross value for 1933 of the cotton textile industries as $58,461,000, an increase of $13,000,000 or 28 per cent over 1932. The number of employees, salary and wage, engaged in the industry in 1933 is given as 17,885, an increase of 1,067 or six per cent over 1932. The salaries and wages paid amounted to $13,222,000, an increase of $61,000 or one-half of one per cent over 1932. The salaries and wages paid to a greater number of employees were very little more than they were in 1932. Let us compare the salaries and wages paid with the profits. The value added by manufacture was $28,671,000, an increase of $5,509,000, or 23 per cent over 1932. At a cost of an increase of one-half of one per cent in wages this industry was able to increase its profits by 23 per cent. Possibly this is where the farmer should look for some of his difficulties. I am not at all convinced that any of our social insurance measures will get us very far in the direction of improved social conditions, because I feel that so long as the life energy of the individual is a commodity on the market it will be sold just the same as any other commodity is sold. When the demand is great the price will go up; when the demand is low or the supply is more than the demand the price will go down, regardless of what may be done. The peace treaty, I understand, provides that the labour of the individual is not to be regarded as a commodity; but no matter what the peace treaty may say, I contend that so long as the present system continues, the labour of the individual, his life energy, will and must be regarded as a commodity. The peace treaty was signed in 1919, and I have before me the report of the board of conciliation that heard the grievances of employees of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1933.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman try to keep to the section.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps I am departing a little from it, but I do not think I am doing so to any greater extent than has been done this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given too much latitude.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, Mr. Chairman, when you curtail the latitude you have been giving I wish you would begin with somebody else. In regard to the twenty per cent cut which the railway companies were asking for, the board of conciliation, the majority members being Judge Gibson of the superior court of Quebec and Mr. George C. MacDonald, chartered accountant, made this statement:

> The bearing that the general economic situation has upon the proposed twenty per cent cut is that railway labour, like all labour, manual, professional or clerical, is a commodity which fluctuates in value; when the values of commodities generally, including other labour, have fallen in terms of money, it is but reasonable to contend that railway labour also should be entitled to less remuneration in terms of money.

In other words, if railway employees are to sell their labour they must sell it on the same terms as other workers sell their energy, at its cost of production. Coming to the eight hour day, it seems to me that this house should be very careful not to pass legislation that would supersede, if it will supersede, provincial legislation and be of less consequence in improving the conditions of human beings than is the legislation already on the statute books of the provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is nearly time that someone discussed the section of the bill, and I am probably the first speaker this afternoon who will do so. We have gone all over the lot from social credit to raising bulls, and apple sauce—at any rate, it has developed into apple sauce since we have started. We have heard the point of view of those who claim to represent the farming interests and we have heard the point of view of those who claim to represent other interests.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have heard the two opposing points of view of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, on social legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: There may be twenty points of view of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and that might go for other parties as well. But what I am concerned about is that this legislation when it passes shall have the widest application possible. We have heard many things said this afternoon, almost given as statements of fact, from the point of view of farmers and from our other points of view, but I think we must all agree that the policy set in motion by this legislation is a logical development of world opinion. It is a conclusion that has been arrived at by many nations which in their composition are almost akin to our own. The nations that have dealt with the problem of the hours of labour include Albania, the Argentine, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia and Denmark. There are others that I might enumerate. In this legislation therefore we see an attempt to move in the direction of world opinion. This movement on the part of the dominion government brings into practical application the dream of those people who are interested in the tremendous growth of science as expressed in industry and agriculture, and if my farmer friends thought it through I think they would find that their problems are much the same as the problems in the city. After all, the modern city is a reflex of the industrial age; it is an outgrowth of it. The boys have not left the farm because they wanted to do so but because they have been driven off by the machine. Therefore the problem of mass production must be faced, not only in industry but in agriculture.

An hon. MEMBER: When are you coming to the section?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am coming to the section, and when I am through I think I shall have made a more intelligent criticism of it than some others I have heard. I have not heard one speaker this afternoon discuss the section. The government proposes an amendment to section 3 in conformity with the convention:

> The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

I have no objection to an amendment of that kind if in their judgment it is necessary in the practical application of this bill, but I would offer this suggestion. When they found it necessary to propose that amendment why did they not carry the same principle right through the bill so as to bring its provisions generally into conformity with the recommendations of the international labour office? We find there a recommendation with respect to the limitation of the hours of work in inland navigation, and section 1 of the recommendation reads:

> That each member of the international labour organization should, if it has not already done so, enact legislation limiting in the direction of the above declaration in the treaties of peace the hours of work of workers employed in inland navigation, with such special provisions as may be necessary to meet the climatic and industrial conditions peculiar to inland navigation in each country, and after consultation with the organizations of employers and the organizations of workers concerned.

I see no reason why such a policy should not be followed in this bill. I think it is fair to say that there is no dispute as to the jurisdiction over the men in inland waters. I know of no provincial government that is legislating in this direction with regard to the conditions under which these men work, and I offer that suggestion to the government. It does not seem likely that they will get through with the bill this afternoon, and I think they might take into consideration the possibility of relieving the intolerable working conditions that prevail on many of the ships that ply on the great lakes. Notwithstanding the opinions expressed this afternoon, my mind is fixed on the necessity of reducing the hours of labour in industry. It is a fair thing to say that since I have been a member of this house, when legislation has been brought down that reflects the genius of the farmers' organizations of this country to meet the difficulties that confront them, I have lent my aid and wished them godspeed. Notwithstanding opinions to the contrary; notwithstanding opinions that might have been expressed to the government recently, this legislation has the endorsation of every responsible labour organization of every kind and character in the dominion. I refer to the ratification of the convention of the international labour office of 1919 held in the city of Washington.

The other day I dealt with the chain stores in this country and the opinion was expressed that we could not legislate in regard to them. I would point out that there is a draft convention concerning the regulation of hours of work in commerce and offices. That would bring within the orbit of legislation by the federal parliament such institutions as have been investigated by the price spreads' commission which is completing its labours at the moment. I want to be quite frank about the matter. As regards hours of labour in restaurants, hotels and so forth, an exemption is made by this convention, but I see no reason why the government should not move in that direction and ratify this convention of the fourteenth session of 1930. It deals with:

> (a) commercial or trading establishments, including postal, telegraph and telephone services and commercial or trading branches of any other establishments;
> (b) establishments and administrative services in which the persons employed are mainly engaged in office work;
> (c) mixed commercial and industrial establishments, unless they are deemed to be industrial establishments.

It exempts, as I have said, certain other people that I thought the other day should be included within the provisions of this measure.

I am not going to speak until I am blue in the face of the influence of the machine on the individual within the confines of our industrial structure. One could go on and discuss that almost indefinitely. Neither am I going to discuss the question whether national credit will solve the difficulties of the farmer. What I am most concerned about is that when this bill finds its place on the statute books of this country, it will be as broad in its application as possible and will go as far as the conventions and recommendations of the international labour office, which after all is said and done is its driving force, will permit it to go. I appreciate the fact that at the moment the federal government finds itself possibly in difficulties in connection with too broad an application of the measure, but what I would like to ask the minister to do is to see to it that the bill, when it is finally passed, goes as far as the conventions and ratifications of the international labour office permit it to do, so that it may bring its benefits to as many as possible of the people engaged in industry and commerce.

Mr. GOLDING: I have just received a telegram from one of my constituents and I feel I should bring it to the attention of the minister and the government. It reads:

> Would strongly urge your support for exclusion of creameries and cheese factories from provisions of eight hour law in interest of producers. Any increase in operation costs will bear heavily on farmers as we cannot control butter prices to secure higher return.

That is from Mr. Barber who runs the butter factory and creamery in our town.

Another communication to which I would like to direct attention is from the canning factory in one of our villages. It reads:

> In regard to the proposed legislation dealing with the eight hour day, and forty-eight hour week, we fear that this legislation will work hardship on our particular industry. Most canning factories are located in small centres of population, and, due to the peculiarities of our business, we experience heavy deliveries of produce one day, and comparatively light deliveries on other days. This is due to climatic and other conditions, and with this problem to meet it is almost impossible for us to secure sufficient help for two shifts. Even if this were possible, we do not see how we could arrange a regular eight hour working day. We trust that this bill will have your careful consideration, and that you will bring this matter to the attention of the government.

I do not want to prolong the debate. This legislation is being introduced and put into effect by the government and they will have to assume responsibility for it, but I want to bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Exceptional cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I move by way of amendment that clause 9 be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

> The governor in council may in exceptional cases where it is recognized that the daily limit of hours of work cannot be applied and agreements between workers' and employers' organizations exist, give effect to such agreements by regulation and permit the said daily limit of hours to be exceeded; provided however that the average number of hours worked per week shall not exceed forty-eight; and provided further that in case such an agreement made prior to the coming into force of this act embodies the basic principle of eight hours as the daily period of employment, the provisions of such agreement relating to the hours of employment shall, notwithstanding anything contained in this act, continue in force unless suspended by the governor in council.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who suggested this amendment?

Mr. GORDON: The matter was brought to my attention first by some of the railroad brotherhoods. Then it was brought to my attention through the officers of the Department of Labour that there were throughout Canada a large number of industries where organized labour had, through their properly constituted representatives, made agreements with their employers. Those agreements were entered into I trust voluntarily in all cases, and I think the great majority of them embodied the principle of the eight hour day. The agreements to which I make reference are agreements presently current and in force. It was my judgment, and by me recommended to the government, that such agreements should not be lightly disturbed. But if it appears to the governor in council that any of those agreements do violence to the basic principle that underlies this bill, such agreements can be suspended. I think that is the only sound method to follow. It is my judgment that if we passed the section in its original form we should immediately be confronted with disturbance in industry by reason of agreements that are in force, entered into voluntarily between the parties concerned. So long as the basic principle of the eight hour day prevails it is the judgment of the government that those agreements should not be disturbed, but they may be suspended by the governor in council if as I have said it is made to appear that they are in conflict with the principle underlying this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: All I say is that if that amendment is adopted you might as well not pass the bill. I have had some experience in negotiating agreements. What is to prevent some company organization from being constituted to defeat the ends of this bill?

Mr. GORDON: To do what?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some company union entering into an agreement to defeat the object of this bill. The bill has a wide application. I know something about the declarations of organized labour on the eight hour day. I think that in fairness all organizations should have been consulted. Take the railroad industry, you have the four running trades, then the machinists, the stationary engineers, the maintenance of way men, the car men, all organizations connected with the railroad industry. They should all be consulted, and so should all the other labour organizations. No amendment should be made to the bill to suit the wishes of two or three organizations, especially when it defeats the eight hour day, the object of the bill.

Mr. GORDON: It does not do anything of the sort.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, it does. It says it shall "continue in force unless suspended by the governor in council."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Presently existing agreements where the eight hour day is the basic principle are to be continued in force until suspended by the governor in council, so that we do not upset all the existing conditions.

Mr. MITCHELL: The other day the government said they were giving industry three months to adjust itself. Even where there are not agreements in existence there must be a great deal of alteration and change before this bill can apply. Why should any one company be treated differently from industry in general? I can say very frankly that the great majority of men employed in the railroad industry in Canada are not in favour of this amendment. Knowing that I think it is only fair that I should say it.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is this legislation going to affect the help in charitable institutions? I mean cooks, engineers plumbers, carpenters, who are kept on steady employment?

Mr. GORDON: My view is that the class of employees that the hon. member has in mind could not be said to fall within the interpretation of industrial undertakings. I do not think they would come within the four corners of the bill or of the convention.

Mr. HOWDEN: Charitable institutions by and large are not money-making institutions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not industrial at all.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is hospitals I have chiefly in mind; they have a staff of engineers, plumbers, carpenters and decorators, and if these men are to be affected it is going to have an unfavourable effect on hospitals, and cause an increase in rates to sick people. They are not included in it?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: The first half of this amendment or a little more is the same as section 9 as it now stands. Section 9 in its present form provides that:

> The governor in council may, in exceptional cases where it is recognized that the daily limit of hours of work cannot be applied and agreements between workers' and employers' organizations to increase the daily limit have been made, give effect to such agreements and permit in such cases the said daily limit of hours of work to be exceeded: provided, however, that the average number of hours per week over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement shall not exceed forty-eight.

This amendment also gives the right to the governor in council, where agreements exist between workers and employers, to give effect to such agreements by regulation. Why then the necessity for the remaining part of the amendment, providing further for the case of an agreement made prior to the coming into force of the bill? This also has reference to agreements made prior, agreements now in existence. Although the basic principle may be the eight hour day it may operate so as to allow certain employees to work much longer than eight hours. If we are to have an eight hour day act any number of sheltered employees in any organization should not be allowed, by agreement with their employers or otherwise, to get away from the provisions of the act. I think that the committee should oppose this amendment.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Mr. SPENCER:

How many parcels of dominion lands have been relinquished by soldier settlers since the soldier settlement department started operation?

Mr. GORDON: The answer is as follows: Number parcels dominion lands relinquished by soldier settlers not available. Total number soldier and civilian settlers in which lands including dominion lands have reverted to department, 13,012.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. BERTRAND:

1. What portion of road in Ontario, if any, was recognized as Trans-Canada highway by the dominion government?
2. Was it done by order in council?
3. If so, on what date?
4. Was there an order in council passed recommending a dominion contribution of 50 per cent towards the cost of the construction of any portion of Trans-Canada highway in Ontario: (a) in 1933; (b) in 1934?
5. If so, what were then the amounts contributed by the dominion government: (a) in 1933; (b) in 1934?
6. Towards what part of highway in Ontario known as Trans-Canada were these amounts paid?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Under relief legislation since 1930, the dominion has contributed to the province's expenditures on the following roads which have been designated by the province as Trans-Canada highway:

(a) Ottawa valley section, from Renfrew—Nipissing, Pembroke through Mattawa to North Bay.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

(b) Thunder Bay section from Schreiber to Nipigon, through Port Arthur and Fort William to English river.

(c) Western section from English river through Dyment, Dinorwic, Dryden, Kenora to Manitoba boundary.

(d) Hawkesbury—Pembroke.

(e) Vicinity of Arnprior and Braeside.

2. Works undertaken on the above sections of the Trans-Canada highway under the various relief acts, with the exception of those carried out under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, were approved by orders in council.

3. The orders in council authorizing dominion contribution to the above mentioned Trans-Canada highway construction are as follows: P.C. 2853, November 14, 1931; P.C. 310, February 13, 1932; P.C. 1022, April 30, 1932; P.C. 2344, November 13, 1933; P.C. 1023, May 17, 1934; P.C. 573, March 28, 1934.

4, 5 and 6. The dominion contributed towards the cost of work carried out during the fiscal year 1933 on sections (a), (b) and (c) above mentioned, 60 cents per man-day of work, the amount of the dominion contribution on these sections being as follows: section (a), $262,500; section (b), $300,000; section (c), $307,500. The dominion also contributed on a 50 per cent basis to work carried out during the calendar year 1933 on sections (d) and (e) above mentioned, the amount of the dominion contribution being as follows: section (d), $171,469.67; section (e), $1,209.01.

The agreement entered into with the province of Ontario under the provisions of the Relief Act, 1934, provides, amongst other things, that the dominion will pay to the province 50 per cent of such expenditures as may be approved by the dominion for highways designated by provincial order in council as part of the Trans-Canada highway, exclusive of the cost of administration and of acquisition of lands. Under this agreement dominion approval has to date been given for the building of 8·4 miles of Trans-Canada highway from Keewatin west at an estimated cost of $255,000, dominion proportion 50 per cent or $127,500 for which accounts have not yet been received.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BANFF, ALTA., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the total amount of money laid aside for the public works program in Banff and district?
2. Would this program include the construction of an administration building, the laying out of a golf course in connection with the tourist camp, the road to Mount Norquay ski camp and the summit of Stony Squaw mountain?

3. At what rates of pay to the workmen were these propects to be carried on?

4. How many men have been employed on each project and for how long?

5. Has the work ceased on any of them?

6. If so, on which project and for what reasons?

PORT ARTHUR GOVERNMENT TERMINAL ELEVATOR

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Is the federal government terminal elevator at Port Arthur still being operated by the government?

2. If not: (a) to whom was it leased; (b) when was it leased; (c) what were the terms and duration of such lease?

3. Did the government cease operating this public terminal elevator and lease it to a private concern?

4. If so, for what reason?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Return tabled herewith.

COAL PURCHASES IN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. DUFF:

1. What are the names of the companies from whom coal was purchased in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in the years 1934 and 1935 to date?

2. What quantity was purchased from each company?

3. What was the price paid to each company either f.o.b. cars at mine, or if delivered, state where and at what price?

4. What tonnage of coal was purchased from the United States in 1934, and at what price?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a few questions to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). I have these questions written down in order that there may be no mistake in the report of Hansard. Will the minister lay on the table of the house copies of the evidence and the report of the investigation held in Bathurst in 1934, into the allegation that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had practised the third degree on a prisoner? Also copy of the evidence and report on the allegation that the patrol boats had lain for days at the wharf in Bathurst while smuggling was going on in the vicinity. Also a copy of the contract between the government of New Brunswick and the federal government in connection with the transfer of the enforcement of laws in that province to the Department of Justice through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Also a copy of the names of the provincial police of New Brunswick who were transferred from that force to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when the latter took over the enforcement of provincial laws. Will the Minister of Justice lay on the table the decision of the appellate branch of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in the matter of appeal in the case of the captain of the Paul T seized under the liquor law of New Brunswick in which certain questions were raised which may materially affect the investigation now proposed, and in which His Lordship, Chief Justice Baxter took part? Will the minister inform the house from whom he received the information that no person in Shippigan was on direct relief between May 1, 1934, and January 1, 1935?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): These questions can go on the order paper in the ordinary way.

Mr. VENIOT: Then I will present this document to the clerk of the house.

EX-SERVICE MEN UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the order in council just tabled by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) with regard to the setting up of a committee to investigate the special situation of ex-service men who may be unemployed, may I ask the minister if it is the intention of the administration to submit the report of this committee to the house during the present session?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Yes, that is our intention.

PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) what progress has been made with respect to the application of the Pacific coast halibut fishermen to come under the marketing scheme. If they are to come under this scheme, I should like to know if it would be possible to have them brought in before the end of this month as fishing starts on April 1. I am told that they cannot be brought under the scheme but other industries have been taken care of and I should like to have an answer to my question.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) was good enough to give me notice of this question. The scheme has been given consideration by the dominion marketing board; has been submitted to the Department of Justice with respect to the legal aspects; certain changes in the scheme have been referred back to the petitioners for their approval and certain other changes, if any are made by the Department of Justice, would have to be referred back to the petitioners for their approval. Copy of the scheme was submitted to the secretary of the United Fishermen's Union of British Columbia to give them an opportunity to make any representations they wish to make. They were given until March 15 to make representations. No opposition to the scheme has yet been received and it is expected the board will deal with the scheme early next week. It has been handled or dealt with in the same way as other schemes submitted.

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) if the government has received any intimation from the price spreads commission as to when its report will likely be presented?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard anything about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might it not be well to inquire so that the house may be informed as to when the report will likely be received?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to know myself when it is likely to come in. If I get an opportunity I will inquire from the chairman and see whether he can give us any idea when it will come in.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

BILL TO LIMIT HOURS OF WORK IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919,—Mr. Gordon (for Mr. Bennett)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a letter addressed to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Fontaine) which I have been asked to read to the house in the absence of the hon. member. This letter is in connection with the working hours in certain industries such as the canning industry. The letter is dated February 26, 1935, and reads as follows:

> The convention applies to all industrial undertaking which of course includes all manufacturers. While we approve these regulations for the industry in general, on behalf of the canning industry we feel that certain provisions of these regulations would not work out satisfactorily in our industry, and would cause in some instances very serious hardship to the growers who are furnishing the raw products to our industry, as many factories are located in centres of a small population, and owing to the nature of our business whereas we may have heavy deliveries one day, and light deliveries another day, due to climatic or other conditions, we feel that it is pretty nearly impossible to secure sufficient help to work two shifts in these centres.
> Also taking in consideration that all produce pertaining to a canning industry is perishable in a great many instances within few hours, therefore it is necessary that this produce be taken care of regardless to the hours we may have to do so, other than this it would be a total loss to the growers.
> We also had instances where during the rush of the season the rain held farmers from harvesting their crop causing the factory to have to close up or work just few hours during that time, and was then necessary for the factory to work long hours to catch up again, or otherwise the grower would loose his crop. Owing to the fact that most canning factories are only a seasonal operation, we feel in this particular respect that there should be some special provisions to work hours necessary to handle farmers crops without any injury to the help.
> We trust we have made ourselves plain and that you may see your way clear to take this matter before the house.
> Respectfully yours,
>
> St. Hyacinthe Canning Factory.
> (Signed) J. H. Logan.

A letter enclosing a copy of this letter was sent to the Prime Minister. I put this letter on record so that these people will have their wish known to the house.

Mr. GORDON: I move that section 9 as redrafted stand; I want to give it some further consideration.

Redrafted section 9 stands.

On section 10—Regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 10 is one to which a good deal of study has been given and we desire to make some amendments. In order to clarify them we have had a new section 10 drafted. I therefore beg to move that the section as at present printed in the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

10. (1) The governor in council may by regulation except any or all employment in any industry from the limits of hours of work fixed by this act, whenever he is satisfied that,

(a) the work of the employees must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment because it is preparatory or complementary, or that,

(b) the work is essentially intermittent in that,

(i) the worker is not continuously occupied during the hours of employment, or

(ii) the work is seasonal in its nature, or

(iii) the work is of such a character that it must necessarily be performed in variable periods of employment, or

(iv) the work in its nature is subject to intervals of discontinuance or variations in supply of raw materials, or that

(c) there is an exceptional pressure of work;

Provided that fair and humane conditions of labour in the matter of hours of work prevail in respect of such employment; and provided further that in the case of exceptional pressure of work the regulation shall be temporary.

(2) If any organizations of employers and workers concerned in the employment affected by any regulation made under this section exist, such organizations shall be consulted.

(3) Whenever it is practicable the maximum of additional hours shall be fixed by the regulations and in any such case the rate of pay for additional hours shall not be less than one and one-quarter times the regular rate.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would let this new section stand over. It is so long and complicated that it is utterly impossible for one to grasp its scope by hearing it read even a couple of times. As I have heard portions of it read, it may go a long way to meet some of the objections I have raised, but I should like the minister to let it stand. It says something about "where it is possible"; that is rather difficult to understand in regard to fixing the maximum of additional hours. What does "additional" mean? Suppose in the fishing industry they work four hours to-day and want to work twelve hours the next day so that you have the equivalent of the eight hour day. Does the word "additional", carrying time and a quarter, apply on the second day to all the hours in excess of eight, or would it only apply to all the hours over forty-eight in a week? It makes a substantial difference. Apparently the purport of the amendment is to equalize the hours. If they have to work only a few hours to-day, owing to the fact that the fish are not coming in, they will work longer to-morrow. Now if the suggestion is that when they work four hours to-day and twelve the next day, under these circumstances, all the hours beyond eight on the second day must be paid for as time and a quarter, then there will be a hardship not only on those who are running the plant but also on the employees, because there will be a tendency for the plant on the second day to say, "We will not work over eight hours to-day because it will be too costly", and they might simply refuse to take the fish, with the result that men who have gone out on their own to get the fish will not be able to sell them.

Mr. GORDON: I think the regulations can take care of the situation suggested by the hon. gentleman. What he suggests is the intent of the law and I believe that is the proper interpretation to place upon it. If they worked four hours to-day and twelve hours to-morrow the time and a quarter would not apply.

Mr. NEILL: Would not?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think so.

Mr. NEILL: What about letting the section stand over?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This morning I received a long telegram from the dairy companies in Edmonton, protesting against coming under the act. They do not desire to come under the provisions of the act at all As I understood the minister the other day, the act is wide enough to make provision for labour such as is performed for the dairy companies. Was I wrong in that?

Mr. GORDON: The amendment to section 10 will take care of that. It vests in the governor in council authority to make regulations so that the law can be adjusted to the dairy industry, and this I think is very important.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has asked that this section be allowed to stand seeing that it is so complicated. It is quite impossible for anyone who has not read the amendment to follow all its implications. I cannot, and consequently I am unable to discuss it intelligently. It appears to me to be so farreaching as possibly to nullify the eight hour day law, and I cannot agree to it without having studied it. I would ask the minister to hold it over.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think the hon. gentleman need be worried about the destruction of the bill because of this amendment. The proposed amendments are designed to enable the governor in council by regulation to exempt in any industry such activities as cannot be strictly adjusted to the eight hour principle. That is the substance of the clause as redrafted. I hardly think it is sound to say that the clause as redrafted will work any such havoc to the bill as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say that it would; I said that it might. The wording is very strong; it is to the effect that the governor in council may by regulation exempt any and all occupations from the effects of the eight hour day bill. The point I wish to raise is that the workers in the industry, for whom this legislation is ostensibly put on the statute books, have no say in its organization or management, or in the way in which it works. Consequently the employers may say that such and such is not feasible or possible; yet if an effort is made in conjunction with the employees by bringing them into consultation, such an outcome might be made possible. So I do not think it will work any hardship on the government or parliament to leave this clause over until, say to-morrow, so that we may see the amendment in Hansard and have time to study it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Anyone who has made a study of the conventions of the international labour office does not need to read the amendment; it is all there. I am not saying that the clause should not stand, but to anyone who has read article 6, this is strictly in accord with that article of the international labour office convention. I suppose the government feels it is necessary to make the clause read in that way. Article 6 reads:

> Regulations made by public authority shall determine for industrial undertakings:
> (b) The temporary exceptions that may be allowed, so that establishments may deal with exceptional cases of pressure of work.
> These regulations shall be made only after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, if any such organizations exist. These regulations shall fix the maximum of additional hours in each instance, and the rate of pay for overtime shall not be less than one and one-quarter times the regular rate.

As I understand the amendments as they were read, they were more or less in conformity with article 6 of the convention. If many men who work overtime in industrial organizations are granted time and a quarter by the laws of this country, this will put a great deal of money into the pockets of our workers.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. HANBURY: There will be less overtime.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be quite true. The clause covers compensation to workers. Notwithstanding opinions to the contrary, I have always held that the workers must organize in order to secure the full fruits of legislation on their behalf, and I have said this many times: If you think by giving three cheers and dropping a ballot in the box, your troubles are all over, you are just fooling yourself.

Mr. HANBURY: Wait until after the election is over.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not talking about bed time stories; I am talking about practical things. In Great Britain and other European countries where labour organizations are powerful, naturally they had a great deal to do with drawing up these conventions which are all predicated upon the views of the workers themselves. If this legislation in its practical application gives an impetus to the organization of workers so that they can meet their employers—and I am not one of those who think employers and employees cannot sit down together and iron out their difficulties, because I have had some experience and I believe they can—the amendment will be a really constructive effort and will aid in bringing employees and employers together.

Mr. NEILL: The amendment may be all that the hon. member for East Hamilton says, but we do not know. I defy anyone to hear it read twice and be able to decide accurately whether it covers any particular industry or branch of such; not even a clever lawyer, let alone the average layman could do that. So far as I can judge the redrafted clause without having an opportunity to study it carefully, meets a good deal of the objections I raised the other day. As regards its application to the operation of canneries and fish plants, I should like to study it further.

Another point is this: there is an attempt to make it almost too comprehensive. It is sometimes a mistake to try to cover almost everything that can possibly arise, for when you finish you will find that you have left out the one thing you should have provided for. It is like a will. A man plans everything for his children and grandchildren, leaving out a provision for the very thing that does happen and that he could not foresee. I sent over to the minister a copy of the provision in the British Columbia law which has been in existence for eleven years, and which so far as I know, has not produced any friction.

It has the merit of being simple and I believe comprehensive also, but I suppose it would be too simple for the man who drafted this bill.

I want to make this one other point: I know the minister has had telegrams, because I have had copies of them, from the British Columbia Canners and pilchard men who protest very strongly at the idea of their being under this legislation. They point out, as the minister knows, that obviously their industry is highly seasonal and the commodity very perishable, subject to weather variations which no one can foresee and various other conditions of that kind. That is quite true. What they ask is, not that they shall have an opportunity of making representations and coming under the somewhat involved and uncertain procedure of the proposed clause 10, but to be exempted altogether under clause 2. In some industries near the border line, it might well be a matter of debate whether they should or should not be exempted, and in these cases I freely admit that it is for the minister or the governor in council to exercise judgment. But in this case there is no doubt; no one can say that there is any doubt that the fishing industry cannot be run on an eight hour day basis. It would be equally absurd to put the agricultural industry on an eight hour day and say that you can get out under clause 10. That clause states among other things that you have to consult organizations of employers and employees. In many of these industries there are not organizations or what would be considered by the government as organizations. Would it be half a dozen men in the particular factory or plant or some organization calling itself some kind of a union in British Columbia, with probably no interest at all in the merits of that particular industry? The clause also states that the maximum additional hours shall be fixed. Supposing there is a big run of fish coming in, have they to apply to Ottawa and say that such and such conditions prevail at this plant in this district; that under the weather conditions they could not get in with their fish yesterday and there is a heavy run today? Have they to apply to Ottawa, because the clause speaks of the power of the governor in council, to fix additional hours—and of course you can do anything if you take long enough to do it? But they cannot be fixed in that way and a business cannot be run by applying to Ottawa three thousand miles away. Here is a condition that prevails on Thursday and when they ask for relief, the reply comes back the following Tuesday. For instance, there is a steel plant with an excess of orders; that would be an unusual condition, but everyone present knows and, still more, everybody connected with the fishing business knows you cannot run it on an eight hour day basis. Then why play with the subject? Why suggest that it can be so run? Why not give them now the exemption which must be granted eventually? Otherwise delay is caused, and delay in the fish business means money and a great deal of it, because once the fish gets past its best, there is a heavy loss. Away out in some remote place where there is not even a radio service, they have to apply to Ottawa for an additional number of hours which may vary to-day from those of last week. It is on those grounds that the cannery men and the fish reduction plants ask that their exemption shall be definitely provided for in the bill, so that they may not have to trust to the, so to speak, day to day application. Of course it says "permanent exemption" but further on it say "wherever it is practicable the maximum of additional hours shall be fixed...." Can you fix them weeks or months ahead? It would have to be done day by day as occasion arose. You could not say that on a certain Tuesday of next month or three months hence so many additional hours should be permitted. It is for these reasons that these men ask that they be exempted finally in the bill itself.

Mr. MacNICOL: The amendment may cover the subject matter of one or two questions I had intended to ask, in order to get a clear conception of some phrases in sections 9 and 10, but as I could not hear all that was read, perhaps if I ask the minister now he will answer what I have in mind.

I am concerned about the promptness with which the governor in council will reply or attend to requests from industries for the privilege of changing the schedule of hours. I can quite see circumstances that would result in serious loss as far as employment is concerned if a speedy reply were not given to such a request. I have in mind some half dozen schedules used in various groups of industries. In group No. 1 they work from 8 to 12 in the morning and from 1 to 5 in the afternoon and on Saturdays from 8 to 12 in the morning, making a forty-four hour week. Group No. 2 works from 7.20 to 12 in the morning and 1 to 5 in the afternoon and on Saturdays from 7.20 to 12 making a forty-eight hour week. Group No. 3 work from 8 to 12 in the morning and 12.30 to 4.30 and do not work at all on Saturday, a five day week of forty hours. Group No. 4 work from 8 to 12 and 1 to 5 for five days, and on Saturday from 7 to 12 a week of forty-five hours. Group No. 5 work from 7 to 12 and 1 to 5 and five hours on Saturdays making a fifty hour week. Group No. 6 work from 7 to 12 and 1 to 5.45 for four days, eight hours on Friday and do not work on Saturday, making a forty-seven hour five-day week.

I should like to ask a question, particularly in relation to groups 1, 3, 4 and 5 which work from forty to forty-five hours a week. If the management of such companies or groups wish to increase their schedules to forty-eight hours a week will they, working less than the 48 hour schedule, have to get an order from the governor in council to do it and if so will it be possible to obtain that order promptly.

Then I have in mind one or two other conditions in connection with great industries. Section 7 does give certain relief in case of urgency, and section 9 applies to the same matter. I have in mind a company receiving a rush repair order to turn out, say a new line-shaft or to make a large gear, for the want of which, employment in the whole plant is subject to disarrangement. In shaft or gear manufacturing companies their schedules are set. At present they are running on a forty hour week. What will happen in such a case where a rush order has to be taken care of? They can put some of the men to work and send the others home to sleep or to rest while others work so that operations can be continuous until the repairs are finished. I would like to know if this bill provides completely for such a case, where twenty or thirty hours or more may be consumed in making a rush repair. That will of course upset the eight hour day schedule, but that schedule can be taken care of in the three weeks allowed under one of the other sections. But what I want to ascertain is, would such a company have to have an order in council to expedite that work, and, if so, whether the order in council would be available forthwith. After all the objects of this bill as I see them are good and among other things are designed to give the workers more leisure time and to increase the number employed. It was said yesterday that this bill would not result in any increase in the numbers employed through a reduction of working time. But anyone who has served in industry a long time knows that the reduction in hours will increase employment; perhaps not in plants in which the machines are of such a nature that they can be speeded up, but certainly in plants in which precision is the main factor the numbers to be employed will be increased.

I have in mind another case, a very recent one, in which a company was asked to produce a large order of motor engine units complete. The competitor of the Canadian company was a company in Dayton, Ohio, and the company had to make up its mind quickly, because the delivery schedules were fairly large. During December they were to turn out twenty-five engines a day, then in January up to the 15th they were to produce one hundred and fifty a day, and after January 15 the number was to be one hundred and eighty-five a day. But every hon. member knows that motor car sales have increased tremendously of late, and in this case the purchasing company jumped the schedule of deliveries to two hundred a day from January 1, and two hundred and fifty on the 15th and on the 18th to four hundred a day. Now men who are capable of turning out engine units are not on tap, they have to be trained. This company so as to retain the business immediately asked the Ontario labour department to permit them to extend the hours of labour and to work in preparation part time on Sundays, and the request was granted. They then proceeded to train men, and took on about one hundred that could be specially trained to mould non-ferrous engine units. The result was that for the first week they were compelled to raise their schedule up to seventy-two hours, but the second week through additional employees they were able to reduce it to sixty hours and for the third week to fifty-five hours and during the fourth week were able to get back on the schedule of forty-eight hours after having trained additional men. I would like the minister to make clear just what a company in that line of manufacture would have to do under this bill, having in mind that the principal object of such legislation is to increase the numbers employed in industry. I could give numerous examples along the same line, but perhaps one answer will cover it all.

Then I have one or two other questions. I have forgotten which clause refers to the three weeks permit for extending hours of labour. Everyone associated with industry knows the pay schedules are not on a three weeks' basis. They are on a two weeks' basis, and it might be advantageous to either reduce the period to two weeks or extend it to four weeks. I have no doubt that in the administration of the act some relief will be given in this regard, because after all length of pay schedules has some bearing in this connection. I should like the minister, however, to indicate clearly just how an order in council can be passed quickly enough to permit rush work to be carried on as I have indicated.

Mr. GORDON: If the act goes through with the amendments which will follow the one now under discussion it will not come into force for a period of three months after the date of assent. In the interval the governor in council must make these regulations. I do not think the hon. member who has just taken his seat need have any fear with respect to the schedules of pay to which he has made reference, so long as they do not do violence to the eight hour day principle. Regarding those rush orders and the exceptional pressure of work to which reference has been made, it will not be necessary in each case for those concerned to come to Ottawa in order to secure permission to go outside the main sections of the bill. Under the amended section power is given to make a regulation which will cover cases of exceptional pressure of work in all industry. If occasion should arise when there is a rush order such as the hon. member has suggested, there will be no necessity of coming to Ottawa because the regulation will be there, covering an exceptional pressure of work, and the regulation will exempt that industry from the operation of the bill. I do not think any difficulties will arise in connection with those matters to which the hon. member has made reference.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister allow a question? Does not the amendment say that the governor in council must be convinced of these facts? That involves placing the facts before the governor in council in each case, does it not?

Mr. GORDON: I think not.

Mr. CHURCH: I have read the proposed amendment to section 10 and I fail to see how it improves the section. In this country there is altogether too much in the way of contracting industries outside the provisions of statutes. This amendment gives the employer and employee the right to contract themselves out of the operations of the statute. I contend that there is altogether too much law about this act. If we are going to do something practical about an eight hour day we should cease being lawyers and think of the work done in the last few months and the revelations brought out here in Ottawa by one of the select committees of the House of Commons. We should cease pussyfooting in connection with these large corporations, mergers and combines in restraint of trade in this country, that can go to whatever government is in office and have orders in council passed. I sat in opposition as a private member and I am speaking to-day as a private member; after all is said and done, a private member who represents three hundred large and small industries in his riding is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electors of that riding. I represent many working people and a large number of industries, many of which are going to find the cost of operating their plants increased as a result of this legislation. The same thing applies to chain stores to whom this act will apply. In connection with drug stores, the chain drug stores will have to increase the number of their employees and, consequently, their cost of operation, while another store perhaps next door and all the small retail stores will not be affected by the act at all. The employees in that store can work twenty-four hours a day in competition with the chain store or those who have to close.

For some seven years I was a police commissioner of the city of Toronto; for some seventeen years I was a member of the city council. We had the eight hour day; when my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was a member of the council, we applied the eight hour day to all city services, including the police and fire departments. For many years the police had only one day off a month; to-day they have one day off every week, and the white collar workers of the city have had a seven hour day for forty-five years and a half-holiday from noon on Saturday.

This principle of permitting individuals to contract themselves out from under the operation of particular statutes is a vicious principle. When I was in opposition I condemned government by order in council, and I have heard other members sitting on this side do the same thing. If we want to do something practical, in view of the revelations that have been made here in the special inquiry, let us either have an eight hour day or not have it. I regret that we have had to lean on the League of Nations in order to bring in this measure. In the city of Toronto we put it through in connection with the estimates. The League of Nations is all very well in its way, but it is only for those who cannot help themselves. Every time we introduce a statute in this parliament to improve the condition of the workers we are met with the same objection; hon. gentlemen opposite refer to the British North America Act and say the proposed act is ultra vires of this parliament. They are very fond of raising the constitutional question. For nine years they sat over here; they had the example of the city of Toronto before them, but they did nothing to give the workers of this country an eight hour day. The day before yesterday the Ontario members representing maritime cities on lake Erie and lake Ontario brought a deputation before the Minister of Marine. What were they asking for? This is a class of casual labour, which is referred to in the proposed amendment; this is casual seasonal labour for the summer and may be excepted by this amendment. The shipping interests on the great lakes are the most determined opponents of this act. They treat the men on some of these boats like cattle. The members representing Ontario maritime cities know the revelations which were contained in a memorandum prepared by these gentlemen.

I should like to refer also to the oil companies, the gasoline companies, the textile industry and the tobacco industry. Those are some of the people who are evading the law. They get over the law; they just snap their fingers at this parliament. Some of our oil companies are owned by United States companies, or interlocked with them, and the way they treat many of their employees in the larger cities is a disgrace. They give them a few dollars a week, mix them up in sports a little and then work them long hours. I know some of them worked twelve and fourteen hours a day, and some even longer. In the shipping business the situation is even worse. In the summer time off the exhibition grounds we often see these sand boats out in the lake, loading sand which is taken to the cities to be used by contractors and public bodies. Many of them work on Sundays, seven days, and the employees work many hours a day. If this amendment goes through I am afraid delegations will be in Ottawa continuously, going over the head of this parliament and appealing to the governor general in council.

I do not wish to criticize this legislation too much, but as I say I am sorry we have had to lean on the League of Nations. To-day the British North America Act is not an act for the living at all; it is an act for the dead. You cannot solve any economic problem in this country so long as that act remains in force. It is the old man of the sea on the backs of the people of this country, and it is a millstone around the neck of this parliament. You can cure no disease in the body politic or the body economic while that act exists. Whenever we attempt to do something we are met with opposition both in this house and on the part of the provinces, and as a result we sit here day after day and accomplish nothing in the way of relieving some of our economic problems. I know that the present government are pioneers in this work. I sympathize with the government in having to draft the act in view of the attitude that is being taken by the opposition at the present time, and also because of the great burdens and artificial barriers that are being placed on business to-day and which make it almost impossible for business to carry on and therefore as I say I sympathize with the government in trying to hold an even balance in connection with this act.

I think it would be far better, instead of having a bill of thirteen clauses, to have written just one clause into the criminal code to effect the purpose we have in view in this act. It need only be a simple thing, like the Lord's Day Act, the Alien Labour Act and others, and once it is written into the code it should be strictly enforced. Of course, the industry of farming should be exempted. The farmer's capital has gone and to-day he cannot make his production costs. He is in such a position that he is to be pitied and sympathized with. We should also exempt a few of the industries dealing with the products of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine. I admit that there are some industries that should be excepted, including our great agricultural industry. But so far as industry in general is concerned there should not be one law for the rich and another law for the poor. This particular section 10 contains some eighteen or twenty subsections and the penalties which we are providing for an infraction of these subsections are just as great for the small man as for the big corporation. Persistent evaders of the law should be treated differently from the small storekeeper. I know that most stores are exempt from this legislation, but some are not, including some of the chain stores. I believe that a civilization that is based on principles such as long hours of labour, sweat shops, and child labour is in need of immediate and drastic overhauling and should no longer be tolerated in this country.

I am sorry that the bill does not go further than it does. No doubt it is a very good bill in many respects, and it is a start in the right direction, but like the Liquor Control Act of Ontario it will no doubt be evaded. This act should have more teeth put into it to take care of these persistent evaders, and we know there are such from the evidence that has come out before one of the committees of this house in the past fifteen months. This act should be enforced by the police court, upon summary conviction, and there should be no appeal from that court's decision. It's decision should be final. Otherwise the large corporations can engage lawyers to argue along the lines that have been used by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this legislation is unconstitutional. I believe that if we are going to do anything in a practical way we should not have a lot of exceptions and provisos put in the statute, but rather have one simple clause inserted in the criminal code. Why, Mr. Chairman, in 1847 England adopted an act, upon the initiative of Lord Shaftesbury, dealing with the sweat shop and providing for a shorter working day, of ten hours, and now, nearly a hundred years after, the Canadian parliament is arguing about excluding some industries from the eight hour day. That act of 1847 was the first parliamentary act of christian socialism, and it was christian socialism based on the evangelical Wesleyan-Oxford movement and principles, and of Shaftesbury and men of that description. Christian socialism is not a thief; it is a policeman, and we want police to enforce this act, or the large corporations will be coming to the government of the day and asking for an order in council to get their industries exempted. This act with all its provisos and exceptions will be taken advantage of by just the very people that parliament intends to have it apply to. They will find a way of evading the law.

The quicker we can write an eight hour day into our law for industry, the better, and it should apply to all industry. Hours of labour and the length of shifts should be reduced. I hope the day is not far distant when this government will adopt the five day week and a shorter working day as a trial for one year, for the thousands and thousands of its own employees. That is the only way to make more jobs for soldiers and civilians. I have been a consistent supporter of this kind of legislation long before I was in this house.

I am sorry to see so many amendments being made to the statute because I do not think they are in the public interest and in the interests of a fair enforcement of this act. I believe that these large corporations I have referred to will find a way of evading the act over the head of parliament by getting an order in council passed. Some industries in Toronto and elsewhere, for instance, can come down here when parliament is not sitting and can get an order in council virtually nullifying what this parliament has done this session. What are we here for? Are the private members just a lot of proxies? We might as well have representation by proxy if that sort of thing is going to be done. Edmund Burke said that government is a practical thing, not something to please the fancy and imagination of ordinary politicians. We are sitting here and we should deal with the merits of the questions that come before us. Should we or should we not have an eight hour day, and if we are going to have an eight hour day should it apply to all industry and to department stores as well. These department stores followed the city of Toronto over early closing at noon on Saturday during July and August. They have had to reduce their hours, and did it voluntarily I may say.

They are not included under this bill because their maximum number of hours is a fair one, but I believe the day is not far distant when we shall have to have less government by order in council and more government by the high court of parliament.

Mr. GAGNON: Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few observations with respect to clause 10. I understand that this legislation is drafted to protect the workmen engaged in general industry, but of course I understand that parliament must make a distinction between Industry with a capital "I" and the small industry that is operated in the rural districts. I happen to represent a farming constituency and I have received a few letters from some small sawmill owners who are very anxious to find out whether they will be subjected to this legislation. I understand that the amendment which is now proposed is drafted in order to meet the exigencies of their situation and will probably afford them relief. I understand that the sawmill owners are carrying on very intermittent operations and that their work is seasonal. They have been working a few hours in a day and for only a few weeks in the year, and of course it would prove a hardship to them if they were subjected to this legislation. Therefore I would respectfully ask the minister whether in his view this amendment he is offering to the house would have the effect of affording relief to the small rural industries.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, replying to the question raised by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) with respect to the small sawmill owner and those other industrial activities which are intermittent and seasonal in their character, they are taken care of within the terms of section 10, and they are also provided for, of course, in the convention itself. Section 10 as at present drafted carries out in substance and in spirit article 6 of the convention, and those seasonal activities will be exempt from the operation of the act. Of necessity they would have to be. You cannot apply, so far as I can see, a horizontal law right across Canada without making exceptions of industries such as have been referred to by the hon. member for Dorchester.

Mr. MacINNIS: My objection to the section passing still stands. As the minister himself has asked that section 9 stand I cannot understand his objection to allowing this section to stand until we have an opportunity of studying the amendments. The section which is being substituted for the section in the bill is a long one and it is impossible to follow it simply by hearing it read once by the mover and once by the chairman. I think the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) has said that this section conforms exactly with article 6 of the convention. Section 10 as at present in the bill conforms exactly to article 6 of the convention. The section sets out that the competent authority may by regulation do certain things. It may make exceptions to be allowed in preparatory or complementary work. It may make regulations covering certain classes of workers whose work is essentially intermittent. It may also make regulations for temporary exceptions so that establishments may deal with exceptional cases of pressure of work. I think the section which it is intended to substitute goes much further than that. It will vest altogether too much power in the hands of the governor in council. As I said yesterday, if this law is within the competence of this parliament it is possible that it will supersede provincial legislation already on the statute books. I do not want to go back to British Columbia after having voted for legislation which is less stringent than the legislation already on the statute books of that province.

Mr. GORDON: If it will shorten the discussion, I can assure the hon. member that the further amendment which I intend to move as section 14 of the bill will take care of the provincial legislation.

Mr. MacINNIS: In view of the fact that all the amendments which have been offered so far have had the effect of weakening the bill, I do not feel greatly reassured to know that there are further amendments to be offered.

Mr. GORDON: The amendment I have just suggested is the very one the hon. member is advocating.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want the minister to understand that I am in favour of the legislation and I want to be able to vote for it when the final vote is taken. I do not want to have to refrain from voting because I do not understand the legislation. I believe that is what should be done by those who do not understand the bill. The minister has asked that section 9 stand and I think he should allow this section to stand until such time as the other section is being finally dealt with.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If section 10 as now drafted and clarified is compared with article 6 of the convention I am sure that every fair minded man will say that it conforms to the convention and does not depart from it in any particular.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what respect does article 6 differ from section 10 as it now apears in the bill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsection 2 of section 10 states that the regulations shall fix a maximum of additional hours. In studying that subsection I gave one interpretation; somebody else gave another and yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) gave still another. We therefore decided that we would redraft this subsection in order to make it abundantly clear that it actually followed the wording of the convention. This was done for the purposes of clarification and not to limit or increase the scope of the section.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have article 6 before me and in my opinion section 10 as it now appears in the bill is exactly the same as that article.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course, we do not agree.

Mr. MacINNIS: We can read it and follow the wording. I should like my hon. friend to assure the committee that the amendment now proposed is no different from section 10 of the bill and article 6 of the convention.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I move that Bill 21 be amended by inserting the following section immediately after clause 13 as clause 14:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as relieving any employer from any obligation under any provincial statute establishing shorter hours of work than those established under this act.

The intention is to take care of those cases where there is provincial legislation so that the hours of labour shall in no case be greater than those now in the provincial statutes when they provide for shorter hours than does this statute.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I move that the bill be amended by inserting the following new section immediately after clause 14 now carried by the committee as clause 15:

This act shall come into force three months after the date on which it is assented to.

The idea is to give industries and employers three months' time in which to adjust themselves to the conditions of the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend not sure the idea is not to get past a general election before the validity of the act can be tested?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am quite sure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We had exactly the same thing in the unemployment measure; its provision respecting payment is not to come into force for a few months. It will be the same I imagine when we come to the minimum wage and other social legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that suggestion is worthy of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have the wording of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are you against the bill or are you for it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We want to get it in force; my hon. friend does not want that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my right hon. friend was a practical business man, which he is not, he would know that a bill of this character could not be put into force immediately upon assent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then why did my hon. friend not have that provision in the bill; why does he come along with his amendment now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because I did not have an opportunity of studying it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You had better keep your good manners.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the hon. member's colleagues then who are at fault not himself?

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to ask the minister if this bill will apply to agriculture, fishing and lumbering as we know these industries down in our part of the country?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. gentleman would be good enough to read the definition of industrial undertaking as given in section 2, I am sure he could answer his own question. It applies to the industrial life of the country and does not apply to what my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. MARCIL: I wanted to make sure.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May we return to section 9?

Mr. GORDON: A little while ago I asked to have section 9 stand because I want to give it further study. The suggested amendment is a very important one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is an amendment suggested to section 9?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. Objection was taken to the amendment yesterday by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) and we wish to study the matter carefully. It is involved and the ramifications are very great. We do not want to do injustice to anyone.

Mr. GORDON: I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

WEEKLY DAY OF REST

BILL FOUNDED ON CONVENTION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION AND TREATY OF VERSAILLES

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to provide for a weekly day of rest in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the weekly rest in industrial undertakings adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of June 28, 1919.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I have looked at the bill and compared it with the Lord's Day Act and with what is provided by the statutes of the different provinces and it does not appear to me that the bill either adds to or subtracts from the law as it is at the present time, and there is therefore no reason why exception should be made to the second reading beyond what I have indicated. It does seem to me that what would better meet the needs of the day would be a bill providing for the certainty of one day's work in seven instead of one day's rest in seven.

Mr. GORDON: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his contribution to the debate.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Industrial undertaking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A slight amendment is proposed to section 2. The section reads:

In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term "industrial undertaking" includes—

(a), (b), (c) and (d), and (d) reads:

Transport of passengers or goods by roads, rail, or inland waterway, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves or warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

The word "roads" in line 21 is a mistake; it should be "road." It is proposed to omit the words "or inland waterway." I move therefore that section 2 be amended by striking out in subsection (d) the words "roads, rail or inland waterway" and substituting the words "road or rail." That would have the effect of correcting the typographical error and omitting the words "or inland waterway."

Mr. MITCHELL: Why are these words omitted?

Mr. GORDON: It will be noted that these words do not appear in Bill No. 21. Yesterday, in discussing one of the sections of Bill No. 21, the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) referred to the convention and made some observations with respect to the omission of these words from that bill. Article 1 of the convention on which Bill No. 21 was founded reads:

Transport of passengers or goods by road, rail, sea, or inland waterway, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves, and warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

The provisions relative to transport by sea and on inland waterways shall be determined by a special conference dealing with employment at sea and on inland waterways.

The countries that were signatories to the treaty, and involved in the adoption of the convention, held two conferences, one in 1920 and another in 1929, with a view to arriving at some decision with respect to including such transportation in the convention. The countries were unable to come to any decision in the matter, and very much the same difficulty arises in incorporating transportation by sea and on inland waters into Bill No. 22 which is now before us. I have gone into it carefully and have come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to incorporate in the bill such transportation in Canada, where we have vast inland waters. In my judgment, and in the judgment of many of those with whom I have discussed the matter, it is not possible.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Period of rest of twenty-four hours in each seven days.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a short amendment to this section, the addition of a new subsection 4.

The provisions of this section shall not apply in the case of persons holding positions of supervision or management, nor to persons employed in a confidential capacity.

It is represented that there are occasions in the railway companies when supervisory officers must, in case of emergency or of accident, do some work on the day of rest, and this is to exempt them and them only.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are exempted already.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We do not think so, and so I am moving that a new subclause 4 be added to clause 3 of the bill. It is in Bill No. 21 that I think the hon. gentleman will find the provision, but not in Bill No. 22, and it was left out by mistake.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that in Quebec a great deal of objection is being taken to Sunday work especially in the paper mills. Many actions have been taken under the provincial law. Does this legislation encourage greater respect for the Sabbath day, or does it allow the law to stand as it is now, because there are many complaints of the kind I have mentioned?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Notwithstanding the opinion expressed a few minutes ago by the leader of the opposition, we believe this legislation will encourage a greater respect for the Lord's day.

Mr. MARCIL: In the paper mills it is contended that there is a class of work that must be done on Sundays and great objection is taken to this by people who have brought charges against the companies under the provincial act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a federal act.

Mr. MARCIL: The Lord's Day Act. Will this supersede the Lord's Day Act or amend it in any way?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would direct the hon. member's attention to the provisions of subclause 3 of clause 3 which states:

This period of rest shall wherever possible be the Lord's day as defined in the Lord's Day Act, chapter 123 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

The intention is that it shall give effect to that as the day of rest.

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

On clause 4—Regulations for total or partial exceptions.

Mr. NEILL: Should the word not be "exemption" instead of "exception"?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It means the same thing.

Mr. GORDON: I think the terms are interchangeable.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Penalty for violation.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I would like the minister to assure me and the committee that this legislation is going to be enforced. In my constituency there is a situation where several mines work seven days a week, three shifts a day, and there are a number of miners working in and around these mines. The office staff including the stenographers have to work seven days a week. There are a number of conscientious objectors there, but when they object they have to do so under their breath, because any man who does not appear on Sunday loses his job on Monday. I do not want to see the employees have to face that sort of thing. I do not think there is in this legislaiton anything that does not appear in the Lord's Day Act, and if it is not to be enforced any better than that act, there is no sense in our passing it. I would like to know if this is to be rigidly enforced so far as it is humanly possible to do so.

Having worked in the mines for some years and knowing something about them, I know there are many jobs that have to be done on Sundays. A mine working three shifts every day in the week cannot timber in the new haulage ways, or cannot break into new crosscuts, or repair machinery while the plant is running; some work has to be done on Sundays. The same thing applies to the roaster, the smelter and the mill. The furnaces have to be kept white hot; there have to be men there on Sundays, but while I appreciate the fact that some exceptions will have to be made, great care will have to be taken to see that there are not too many abuses. I hope the companies will be given ample time to make the necessary adjustments.

Mr. MARCIL: Who will have charge of the enforcement of this law? Will it be the provincial or the dominion authorities?

Mr. GORDON: The enforcement of the law will be of course in the hands of any peace officer, whether he be an employee of the province or of the dominion, and I think it is the accepted and proper constitutional and legal course that the enforcement of these laws is primarily with the provincial authorities, but there is undoubtedly concurrent power in the dominion to see to the enforcement of the legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to move a similar amendment to that moved with respect to bill 21, namely a suspensory clause. I therefore move:

That Bill No. 22 be amended by adding thereto as clause 9 the following:
"This act shall come into force three months after the date on which it is assented to."

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the justification for this? I quite understand that there may be a reason given for such a clause being inserted in the other bill in order to let industry and other interested parties adjust themselves to the new legislation, but why should such a clause be inserted in a bill to enact a weekly day of rest?

Mr. GORDON: I have given some thought to the question raised by the hon. member for Quebec East, and my view is that Bill No. 21 and Bill No. 22 are complementary in many ways. I can assure the leader of the opposition that I did not think he was serious when he made the suggestion he did a little while ago. There is no sinister purpose behind the postponement of bringing into operation these statutes, for the very obvious reason that industry must be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the provisions of these laws. That is the primary reason for the postponement of their coming into force. There is another reason with respect to Bill No. 21, and the same applies to this bill; regulations of necessity must be drawn, and drawn carefully, in order on the one hand that industry is not impeded needlessly, and on the other hand that the principle of the bill, namely, that an eight hour day shall prevail, is not imperilled.

That shortly is the reason why the amendment is sought to postpone the operation of the bill for three months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That last clause will be known as the general election provision.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

BILL TO CONFIRM ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL OF 1935 TO THE CONVENTION OF 1933

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, respecting the additional protocol of 1935 to the Canada-France trade agreement of 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. CAHAN: I intended on the second reading to make a general statement concerning the bill and the tariff item involved so that when it comes before the committee of the whole house hon. members may have a general view of all the provisions. For that purpose I should like to make a statement.

The house will remember that in the session of 1933 I introduced a bill to this house to confirm a commercial arrangement between Canada and France which was signed at Ottawa on May 12, 1933. I had the honour to negotiate at Paris with representatives of the government of France the provisions of that agreement which was confirmed by act of this parliament in the session of 1933. In negotiating that commercial arrangement, between the two countries, I was under certain disadvantages, due to the fact that the negotiations, opened as early as October, 1932, were begun with the government of Mr. Briand, that after the fall of that government I had to initiate the negotiations again with the government of Mr. Paul Boncour, and after that government had fallen I had to resume negotiations with the government of Mr. Deladier, which were postponed until a French commission came to Washington and I had an opportunity to continue negotiations at New York with that commission and at Ottawa with Mr. Arsène Henry the French Minister to Canada in respect of the matters which had been left unfinished in the negotiations at Paris.

In the negotiations at Paris the government of France naturally contended for more favourable terms of admission for French brandies, liqueurs and wines into Canada. Difficulties then occurred arising out of the empire trade agreements made at the imperial conference which had recently been held at Ottawa, because under the agreements then made with South Africa and Australia their wines were given certain preferential treatment, and, under the agreement with the United Kingdom made at that conference, brandies from the United Kingdom had preferential treatment on entry into Canada. After the agreement with France was signed at Ottawa on May 12, 1933, negotiations were reopened between the government of Canada and the government of France through Mr. Arsène Henry the French minister, with regard to more favourable terms of admission for French wines, liqueurs and brandies than were agreed upon in the convention of May 12, 1933. It was therefore necessary for the government of Canada to open negotiations with the government of South Africa and also the government of Australia on the one hand, and with the government of the United Kingdom on the other, before the concession which France then sought could be granted by Canada. Those negotiations proceeded until Mr. Arsène Henry left Canada with certain propositions which were to be placed before the government of France for consideration. Later the Prime Minister of Canada and the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs visited Geneva as representatives of Canada at the Geneva assembly of September, 1934, and on their return from Geneva a protocol forming a supplementary trade agreement between Canada and France was drawn up and signed in Paris by the Prime Minister on September 19, 1934. That new agreement conceded more favourable terms of entry to Canada on French wines, liqueurs and brandies, and it came into force by reason of a provision in the Tariff Act which enables the government of Canada by order in council to make concessions to a foreign country in consideration of equivalent concessions being made in the tariff of the foreign country with respect to importations into that country of Canadian goods.

The present bill is intituled an act rsepecting the additional protocol of 1935 to the Canada-France trade agreement of 1932. The term "protocol" is one employed, I believe, in diplomatic practice to denote an agreement, somewhat less formal than a convention and which usually revises or modifies an earlier treaty or convention. In the present case the draftsman of the bill has deemed it desirable to use the term "additional protocol" rather than the simple term "protocol" in order to distinguish between the protocol as expressed in the arrangement which is annexed to the bill and confirmed by the bill and the notes signed at Paris by the Prime Minister on September 29, 1934, which were published in the Commercial Intelligence Journal issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce dated October 6, 1934, and are therefore quite well known in all commercial circles in Canada. But since those notes were signed and delivered in Paris certain other concessions have been made on both sides, so that the agreement which is now before the house for ratification by this bill embodies not only the concessions made by the notes of September 29, 1934, signed at Paris, but also additional concessions which have been negotiated since that time between our Department of External Affairs and the French government through the present French minister to Canada.

When the notes were signed in Paris it was contemplated that these further negotiations would take place, and therefore when certain other concessions were made by both parties they were embodied in the additional protocol which forms the schedule to this bill.

Certain difficulties had arisen with regard to carrying into full effect the commercial treaty of May, 1933. On June 16, 1934, Canadian wheat had become dutiable under the French general tariff, and the French exchange compensation surtax and the special import tax levied by France were detrimental to the improvement of Canadian trade with that country, the export of Canadian wheat and flour to France in particular being prejudicially affected. The first tariff reductions which were made upon the exchange of notes in September, 1934, were embodied and made effective by order in council P.C. 2420 under section 11 of the customs tariff, which provides that the governor general in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products imported by any such country or countries. If the house so desires I will see that at the conclusion of my remarks a copy of that order in council is laid upon the table of the house for the information of hon. members.

After that exchange of notes the French government by administrative decree extended the benefits of their minimum tariff to a considerable list of Canadian products and accorded definite quotas on a number of Canadian products of classes subject to quota. The French government also reduced the special import tax and cancelled the exchange compensation surtax so far as Canadian goods were concerned. To make that clear may I state that after we had negotiated the convention with France of May 11, 1933, by which our exports to France were admitted under the minimum tariff, the French government undertook to limit exports from Canada to that country, while admitting them under their minimum tariff, by prescribing quotas by which our exports were restricted to certain quantities and certain times. Under the convention of May, 1933, two quotas were recognized, one on lobsters and the other on salmon products. Thereafter, however, due to the difficulties which the French government met in maintaining their currency on a gold standard, they felt impelled to restrict their importations from foreign countries, and they proceeded to make global quotas which restricted to certain quantities the entire imports into France from foreign countries, allotting to Canada a certain percentage of those global quotas. So although our products continued to be admitted under the minimum tariff of France the quantities which could be so admitted were restricted by their quota policy.

I would direct the attention of hon. members to schedule C of the protocol now under consideration. The additional protocol was mainly designed to extend tariff concessions on both sides to cover commodities which it was not found possible to investigate fully in the September negotiations, and if hon. members will allow me I will call attention to those additional concessions. Would it be necessary for me to read them or might I be allowed to place them on the record?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly; put them on the record.

Mr. CAHAN: The statement is as follows:

On the Canadian side the intermediate tariff, less the discounts mentioned, was extended to the following additional French products:—

Number of French Customs Tariff	—	—
Ex 30...	Pepper, unground	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 529...	Lace, nettings and bobinet, n.o.p., wholly of cotton	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
529a..	Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, not coloured imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 535...	Fibres of raffia or of sisal, n.o.p	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
545...	Lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 565...	Embroideries and lace, whether containing tinsel or not, nettings and bobinet, n.o.p	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 568c..	Women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 35 p.c.
Ex 529...	Lace and embroideries wholly of cotton, coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff: 17½ p.c.

A rate of 17½ per cent ad valorem, which is the same as the intermediate tariff rate, was accorded to "Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories" (ex tariff item 529). This item is one on which the United Kingdom enjoys a margin of preference under its trade agreement with Canada and the revised rate was made after consultation with His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What are the principal items?

Mr. CAHAN: Pepper, lace, nettings and embroideries of cotton, fibres of raffia or sisal, and embroideries of flax and then certain other items, women's dress gloves and certain other lines of embroideries wholly of cotton. There were also French products admitted into this country under the intermediate tariff with certain discounts therefrom which I should like to place on the record of the house.

Mr. MARCIL: Did rayon silk figure in these negotiations?

Mr. CAHAN: These are admissions from France and include fibres of raffia or of sisal, not rayon silk.

I want to make it clear that in consideration of the reduced Canadian duties which I have mentioned certain products of Canada were also admitted into France on their minimum tariff, in exchange therefor as shown in supplementary schedule A, as follows:

SUPPLEMENTARY SCHEDULE A

CANADIAN PRODUCTS SUBJECT, ON THEIR IMPORTATION INTO THE FRENCH CUSTOMS TERRITORY, TO THE DUTIES OF THE FRENCH MINIMUM TARIFF

Number of French Customs Tariff	—	—
Ex 16B	Frozen pig livers	Minimum tariff
Ex 49	Lobsters, preserved or prepared (within the limits of the annual quota)	Minimum tariff
68	Wheat, spelt, meslin in grain or in flour	Minimum tariff
69	Oats	Minimum tarifi
70	Barley	Minimum tariff
71	Rye	Minimum tariff
Ex 76	Groats and rolled oats	Minimum tariff
83	Potatoes destined to the French West Indies	Minimum tariff
Ex 115	Resinous products artificially prepared, except synthetic resins listed under item 0376 bis.	Minimum tariff
Ex 168	Wood-pulp, chemical, dry, bleached, treated with bi-sulphite, sulphate or soda	Minimum tariff
Ex 174	Whisky	Minimum tariff
222	Lead	Minimum tariff
224	Zinc	Minimum tariff
Ex 0376 bis	Synthetic resins produced by the condensation of aldehydes with vinyl alcohol	Minimum tariff
Ex 0381	Vinyl acetate	Minimum tariff
0381 bis	Derivatives of glycol, glycol ethylene (irgasol)	Minimum tariff
Ex 462	Insulating board of vegetable fibre of a thickness exceeding 10 m/m	Minimum tariff
Ex 495 C	Pen nibs of gold, including pen nibs for fountain pens	Minimum tariff
595	Casks, empty, serviceable, staves fitted together or not, hooped with wood or metal	Minimum tariff
597	Builders' and cartwrights' wood, shaped	Minimum tariff
600	Wood planed, grooved and/or tongued, etc	Minimum tariff
Ex 602 bis	Canoe paddles	Minimum tariff
603 quater A	Veneer sheets and leaves, etc	Minimum tariff
603 quater B	Veneers and counterveneers	Minimum tariff
603 quater C	Other wares of wood	Minimum tariff
617	River boats	Minimum tariff
617 bis	Collapsible canoes with hull of rubberized tissues	Minimum tariff
620 N, 1	Footwear of all kinds with uppers of rubber or other material, single or double, rubberized and soles of rubber or other material glued or attached in any other manner	Minimum tariff

These include the French items Ex 49, Ex 68, Ex 222, Ex 224, which were included in the former treaty of May, 1933; Ex 115 and Ex 462. Under certain items of the French tariff in the former treaty Canadian products were subject to maximum duties less certain discounts as shown in schedule B to this bill. They are now placed, not on the maximum tariff with a discount, but upon the minimum tariff for all purposes.

In addition it will be found that with the concessions made to France by Canada this rate of 17½ per cent ad valorem, in item Ex 529, which is the same as our intermediate rate, becomes a fixed rate for France for lace and embroideries wholly of cotton, coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories (Ex tariff item 529). This item Ex 529, is one on which the United Kingdom enjoyed a margin of preference under its trade agreement with Canada, and this reduced rate in favour of France was made after due consultation with His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

A change was made in the tariff classification of non-sparkling wine in the Canadian tariff (Ex 163). The concession of the intermediate tariff which prevailed under the agreement of May, 1933, was continued, less a discount of 63·63 per cent on all non-sparkling wines containing not more than 23 per cent proof spirit. Under the previous treaty the international tariff was restricted to non-sparkling wines containing not more than 23 per cent proof spirit, other than sparkling wines intended for sacramental use. This reduction of 63·63 will also extend to wines for sacramental use containing 26 per cent proof spirit. These wine concessions I shall detail with more particularity later.

On the other hand, on the French side, the concessions accorded to Canada by the exchange of notes of September 29 have by this official protocol been extended to include the following which are found in schedule A:

Item No.—
83	Potatoes destined to the French West Indies	Minimum tariff
ex 115	Resinous products artificially prepared except synthetic resins listed under item 0376 bis	Minimum tariff
ex 168	Wood-pulp, chemical, dry, bleached, treated with bi-sulphite, sulphate or soda	Minimum tariff
ex 0381	Vinyl acetate	Minimum tariff
ex 495C	Pen nibs of gold including pen nibs for fountain pens	Minimum tariff
595	Casks, empty, serviceable, staves fitted together or not, hooped with wood or metal	Minimum tariff

In addition maple sugar and maple syrup, ex 91 and ex 93 of the French customs tariff, imported into France by the French Tobacco Monopoly for use in the preparation of tobaccos, were exempted from internal taxes.

These additional French concessions have already gone into force provisionally by administrative decree.

Now referring back to article 1 of the protocol, by this article Canadian products classified under twenty-eight items or parts of items of the French customs tariff are accorded the benefits of the minimum rates in place of the general tariff rates of France which were previously applicable to nearly all of them, and in order that this comparison may go on the record I am presenting the following table showing each of these items in the French maximum or general tariff which formerly applied of so many francs per 100 kilos, and the minimum tariff of so many francs per 100 kilos which will now apply. By reading that table in tabulated form it will be perfectly clear as to what are the reductions made in favour of these products.

The following table sets forth the general tariff rates as compared with the minimum tariff rates which now apply to Canadian products:

Item No.		General tariff Francs per 100 Kilos.	Minimum tariff Francs per 100 Kilos.
ex 16B	Frozen pork livers	200	100

†Not including internal taxes.

‡Includes licence tax.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Were the items shown in schedule C under the general tariff or the intermediate tariff prior to this protocol?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 9 of the bill he will find schedule C. I could give him the general scope, but perhaps it will not be necessary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; it will be in Hansard.

Mr. CAHAN: I will have that schedule C put in Hansard. It is as follows:

SUPPLEMENTARY SCHEDULE C

French products subject on their importation into Canada, to the intermediate tariff rates less discounts as hereinafter indicated based upon percentages of the rates payable by virtue of said intermediate tariff or subject to the same rate as the British preferential tariff

Number of Canadian Customs Tariff
Ex 17	Cheese— Roquefort, Camembert, Pont-l'Evêque, Bleu d'Auvergne, Munster	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 30	Pepper, unground	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 85	Mushrooms, canned, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 25 p.c.

	(c) in bottles containing one-half pint each or less (old wine measure)	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
	(d) in bottles containing over one quart each (old wine measure)	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 178	Advertising and printed matter, on paper or cardboard, printed in France, in the French language, describing and accompanying French products	Same rate as British preferential tariff.

SUPPLEMENTARY SCHEDULE C—Continued

French products subject on their importation into Canada, to the intermediate tariff rates less discounts as hereinafter indicated based upon percentages of the rates payable by virtue of said intermediate tariff or subject to the same rate as the British preferential tariff

Number of Canadian Customs Tariff
Ex 197 Ex 198	Cigarette paper, gummed or not, in rolls	Intermediate tariff of Item 197 less a discount of 10 p.c.
Ex 199	Cigarette paper, gummed or not, in tubes, booklets or packets	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 529	Lace, nettings and bobinet, n.o.p., wholly of cotton	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 529	Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff: 17½ p.c.
529 a	Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 535 a	Fibres of raffia or of sisal, n.o.p.	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
545	Lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 p.c.
Ex 565	Embroideries and lace, whether containing tinsel or not, nettings and bobinet, n.o.p.	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 p.c.
Ex 568 c	Women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length	Intermediate tariff less a discount of 35 p.c.

For instance, Ex 17, cheese, Roquefort, Camembert, et cetera; this item is now subject to the intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 per cent while formerly the discount was 10 per cent. Ex 30, pepper; this is a new item and it is placed in the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. The next item is mushrooms, canned; formerly this appeared in the intermediate less a discount of 20 per cent, it now has a discount of 25 per cent. Item Ex 141, candied chestnuts, is a new item to which the intermediate tariff applies with a discount of 10 per cent. Ex 156, liqueurs, was previously under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 10 per cent. Ex 156, Cognac brandy and Armagnac brandy; formerly this item was under intermediate tariff but it is now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. Ex 160, alcoholic perfumes, et cetera, were previously under the intermediate tariff; they are now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 33·33 per cent. Ex 163, wines of the fresh grape of all kinds, not sparkling, imported in barrels or in bottle; the first division of this item was previously under the intermediate and it is now under the intermediate less a discount of 63·63 per cent. The next division of the item was previously under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate less a discount of 63·63 per cent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How would that compare with wines from Australia or South Africa?

Mr. CAHAN: I shall have to ask for advice with regard to that. The next item is 165, champagne and all other sparkling wines. The four divisions of this item were previously under the intermediate tariff; they are now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. Ex 178, advertising and printed matter, is now given the same rate as the British preferential tariff. Ex 197, cigarette paper, was formerly under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 10 per cent. Ex 199, cigarette papers, in tubes, was formerly under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 10 per cent; the discount has been increased to 15 per cent. Ex 529a, lace, nettings and bobinet, wholly of cotton, was under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. The next item, lace and embroideries, was previously under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate tariff with a fixed rate of 17½ per cent. Item 529a, lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, not coloured, was under the intermediate tariff; it is now under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 15 per cent. Ex 535a, fibres of raffia or of sisal, was on the intermediate tariff less a discount of 10 per cent; it is now on the intermediate tariff less a discount of 20 per cent. Item 545, lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, et cetera; this item was previously under the intermediate tariff less a discount of 10 per cent and it is now under the intermediate less a discount of 20 per cent. Ex 565c, embroideries and lace, whether containing tinsel or not, nettings and bobinet; this item was previously under the intermediate tariff and is now under the same tariff less a discount of 15 per cent. Item Ex 568c, women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length; this item is now allowed the intermediate tariff less a discount of 35 per cent.

I remember a very amusing incident in connection with the negotiations in Paris. I found that women's kid gloves were given preferential treatment in the agreement between Canada and Great Britain and I could not concede any discount from the intermediate rate being allowed in favour of France. However, I understand that the French experts have since gone into Great Britain and have found that these gloves are not manufactured in that country. Therefore, Great Britain is not entitled to any preferential treatment in connection with this item, and this fact has been admitted by the authorities of the British board of trade.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to know whether French wines, brandies and liqueurs are going to be admitted into Canada at a cheaper rate than they were before?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member has been following the schedule C he will see that the rates are being reduced. Perhaps I might give the explanation which will have to be given sooner or later. The difficulty in connection with the importation of French products is the fact that the prices in Canada seem to be high is due to the rate of exchange between Canadian and French currencies. France has remained on the gold standard while at the present time in international exchange we find that our currency in terms of gold has depreciated by about forty per cent. The result is that the Canadian dollar expressed in terms of gold now represents about sixty cents in gold of the old standard. It sometimes runs around fifty-nine cents but I am taking sixty cents as the average. The result is that the French product which we formerly bought and paid for with a dollar of our currency by the purchase of exchange on France is now bought and paid for with our currency computed at a depreciation of forty per cent. What I bought before at a certain price in French francs now requires sixty-six and two-thirds more in Canadian currency to pay for the same product bought at the same price in francs in France. I had this brought home to me when my wife told me that she was making some purchases of toilet and dress articles in France. She said the price in French francs was exactly the same, but when she paid for them in Canadian currency she found that the price in Canadian currency had increased as forty is to sixty, that is, by two-thirds, which is sixty-six and two-thirds per cent. So that those of us who occasionally purchase French wines may not hope, despite the present reduction in the tariff on French wines, to purchase French wines in Canada at the same low price expressed in Canadian currency as we did before the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar in international exchange.

Articles 3 and 4 of the additional protocol serve merely to apply to the additional commodities mentioned in the supplementary schedules (a) and (c) the same provisions as apply under the trade agreement of May 12, 1933. Article 3 of this additional protocol is clear. It provides that:

The natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from Canada, enumerated in supplementary schedule A to this additional protocol, and the natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from French customs territory, enumerated in supplementary schedule C to this additional protocol, shall, on their importation into the territory of the other party, enjoy the most favourable rates accorded to any foreign country, that may arise from modifications made in the tariff classification as a result of administrative or legislative action or of conventions entered into with other countries.

The result is that, in respect of these schedules, if France makes any larger concessions by way of reducing her tariff in favour of any other foreign country Canada will enjoy the advantage of these concessions; and if Canada, in negotiations with any other foreign country, grants a lower rate of duty to any such foreign country, these reduced rates automatically apply to French products.

In article 4 the same reductions apply with respect to the French colonies and it is provided that:

The natural or manufactured products, originating in and coming from French colonies, "assimilées" and "non-assimilées," countries under French protectorate, and territories under French mandate, enumerated in supplementary schedule (C) to this additional protocol, shall enjoy any other more favourable tariff rate which Canada may accord to the same or simiar products of any other foreign country.

I have already clearly indicated to the house in previous discussions that some of the French colonies have tariffs of their own. The tariffs of some of them are assimilated to and are the same as the tariffs imposed by France. The tariffs of others of them are not assimilated to the French tariffs but are tariffs which prescribe rates that differ from the rates imposed by France on importations into France.

I call attention to the fact that after we had negotiated the convention of May 12, 1933, which provided for quotas on our exports of lobster and salmon and salmon products to France, a very large number of quotas were imposed by France for the purpose largely of maintaining France's position on the gold standard. On January 1, 1934, after the previous trade arrangement had been ratified by this parliament, France put into force a greatly extended list of quotas—in fact, a general system of quotas—and a number of these quotas have interfered very considerably with the Canadian export trade to France. It was deemed advisable therefore to secure a clear provision in this additional protocol whereby the quotas allotted to Canada could not be decreased below a certain proportion.

The terms of article 5 relating to quotas, which are expressed in schedule E, were drawn in collaboration with the French government experts who have control of the administration of the quota system in France, and this article 5 closely follows in terms, though not in respect of the definite quotas, the commercial treaties that other countries have recently made with France in which such other countries have been accorded similar concessions under the French quota system.

The quotas which are expressed in schedule E are expressed as percentages of the basic global quotas, so called. The basic global quota is the quota for the entire importation into France of the particular product, and out of that total importation into France from all countries Canada is allowed a certain quantity. In order that the house may have before it a statement of the quotas which have been allowed under this protocol, I would ask permission to place on Hansard a clear statement, because this will be very important indeed for those who are exporting from Canada to France. In the fourth quarter of 1934 certain quotas were allotted, and in the first quarter of 1935 there are other quotas allotted. They are expressed in metric quintals. The metric quintal is equivalent to 220 pounds avoirdupois. The total quotas for 1935 on common and manufactured woods are only eighty per cent of the quotas of 1934, that is the Canadian allotments have been reduced.

As this is important, perhaps the house will allow me to place these quotas on Hansard, where hon. members will be able to follow the figures more closely:

Fourth quarter of 1934

	Quintals
Cheese	306
Frozen salmon	375
Canned lobsters	1,375
Fresh apples and pears	5,280
Cornflakes	15
Common wood	3,410
Tomato ketchup	60
Lead	7,310
Patent leather	60

First quarter of 1934—Concluded

	Quintals
Calf leather	14
Manufactured wood	5,900
Automobiles	800
Ice skates	10
Barley	1,200
Insulating fibre board	125
Agricultural machinery	333

First quarter of 1935

	Quintals
Cheese	300
Frozen salmon	1,125
Barley for brewing	1,000
Apples	10,340
Sweet biscuits	28
Tomato ketchup	56
Lead	7,300
Insulating board	139
Patent leather	60
Calf leather	13
Agricultural machinery	311
Veneers	50
Automobiles	800

The total quotas for 1935 on common and manufactured woods are 80 per cent of 1934 quotas. The Canadian allotments are 0.12 per cent on common wood and 9 per cent on manufactured.

The metric quintal is equivalent to 220 pounds.

Article 6 of the additional protocol refers to schedule F. These commodities by reason of their special character did not require that the quotas should be established on a global basis, and the French government therefore agreed to establish for the Canadian products specific quotas which are found in schedule F to the agreement. These items are four in number; they were included in the treaty made in May, 1933, but now the following quotas are fixed for Canada:

Schedule F

Number of French customs tariff	Additional quotas	Quintals
Ex 347 bis A	Porcelain insulators without parts of metal	30
Ex 347 bis B	Porcelain insulators with parts of metal	50
524 bis K	Electric heating apparatus including electric stoves	100
Ex 524 bis M	Vacuum cleaners and parts thereof	10

Article 7 of the additional protocol is one of the most important for Canada, and I shall read it in full:

Article 7

In the event that the system of temporary admission of wheat into France is modified or abandoned, and that suitable facilities are not provided whereby wheat, the produce of Canada, would retain marketing opportunities in France equivalent to those now enjoyed, the French government recognize the right of the Canadian government, with regard to the advantages conceded by the present additional protocol in respect of wines, liqueurs, cognac and Armagnac, specified in supplementary schedule C to this additional protocol, to take whatever measures they may consider advisable, provided that these measures shall not constitute a discrimination against France as compared with any other foreign country.

Since December 1, 1929, there has been in France a domestic milling quota which as at present applied makes it compulsory, subject to certain provisions to which I shall hereafter refer, to use one hundred per cent of French domestic wheat in wheat flour produced in France for home consumption. Due to this regulation, Canadian wheat except when admitted under the "temporary admission" system to which this article 7 refers, may be imported into France for purposes other than human food, such as seeding, animal feed, industrial use, et cetera, in which cases a special licence must be obtained by the importer and the wheat must be thoroughly denatured by colouring at the customs port of entry. There has been practically no demand in France for denatured foreign wheat, as the domestic product has filled all the requirements of that market, and therefore for practical purposes the result is that all Canadian wheat imported into France has to enter under the "temporary admission" system.

The French "temporary admission" system permits the refund of customs duties paid on importations of foreign wheat, upon the exportation by the French miller of a corresponding quantity of French wheat in the form of flour. For instance, a French miller imports 1,000 bushels of Canadian wheat under a "temporary admission" permit, and he deposits or is debited under this arrangement with the amount of the customs duties on the wheat which he has imported into France. If thereafter, within a maximum delay determined by the law, the miller exports a corresponding quantity of French flour, the amount of the import duty deposited in respect of the importation of foreign wheat is refunded or credited to the miller in France by the customs authorities. This privilege of exporting domestic flour to compensate for importations of foreign wheat was granted at the request of the French millers, who have claimed and continue to claim that a certain proportion of foreign wheat must be blended with French wheat to obtain certain grades of flour which are required in France for domestic use. Foreign wheat so imported is of a class corresponding to our hard wheat in Alberta and Saskatchewan, which is not produced in France. Hon. gentlemen will remember that on a previous occasion I drew the attention of the house to the fact that France in the very year I think in which I negotiated the treaty of May, 1933, produced within its own country more wheat than was produced in all Canada, but they did not produce in France proper the equivalent of Canadian hard wheat. They have, as I pointed out to the house on a previous occasion, been importing Saskatchewan wheat and planting it in colonies of northern Africa which belong to France. They found in the first year that from Saskatchewan seed they produced a hard wheat; planting then as seed again their own product, they produced a very good hard wheat in the second year; but I was told that in the third year the wheat so produced begins to lose its quality of hardness and to become a soft wheat which is not as good for mixing for domestic use in France. The foreign wheat imported into France under the "temporary admission" system becomes according to French law "nationalized"; that is, legally assimilated to French wheat, and may be mixed with French wheat in any proportion for milling purposes regardless of the quota.

The concession afforded to Canada on wheat, namely the French minimum tariff, was undoubtedly a valuable one to this country, and from the Canadian point of view it was very important that the principle of this "admission temporaire" should not be abolished in respect of Canada. That became the subject of these later negotiations. From the French point of view the concessions accorded on French cognac, and liqueurs and sparkling and non-sparkling wines, our Canadian tariff items Ex 156, Ex 163 and Ex 165, were also important for the extension of the French wine trade in Canada, and so in this additional protocol it was agreed to make the Canadian tariff concessions on French cognac and liqueurs and sparkling and non-sparkling wines conditional upon the maintenance by France of facilities under which Canadian wheat would retain its present marketing opportunities in France. That is the purpose of article 7 which I have just read, and which in the view of the government establishes a very important principle.

Article 8 deals with another matter. It reads:

> The increase in the rate of the import tax provided by article 32 of the law of March 31, 1932, shall not apply, as long as the present additional protocol remains in force, to products originating in Canada, in accordance with the terms of the decree of September 29, 1934.

The application of the French special import tax of four per cent on semi-manufactured goods and six per cent on manufactured goods affected detrimentally our competitive position in the French market. When I had the honour to negotiate in France on behalf of the Canadian government for the trade agreement of May, 1933, I urged very strongly that these special import taxes of four and six per cent should be removed or reduced. I was unable at that time to obtain an agreement to that effect, but the French government gave assurances that they would give favourable consideration to the Canadian representations, but it was then claimed that it was impracticable to remove these import taxes at once, since manufactured products of French origin had to bear at various stages of manufacture a turnover tax of two per cent, and were therefore at a disadvantage compared with imported foreign goods which paid an import tax at uniform rate of two per cent regardless of their degree of manufacture. In view, however, of the concessions which have been made to other countries Canada pressed for equal treatment with the United Kingdom, Belgium and Italy, which had been accorded a rate of two per cent. The effect of this article 8 is to afford to Canadian goods the rate of two per cent instead of four and six per cent respectively which had formerly been imposed, and thus places Canadian goods on a footing of equality with those of the most favoured nations in this respect.

Article 9 deals with maple sugar and maple products. The trade agreement signed on May 12, 1933, conceded to Canada minimum tariff rates on maple sugar and maple syrup. The effect of article 9 in this additional protocol is to secure a further concession by exempting maple sugar and maple syrup, when imported for use in the manufacture of tobacco, from certain internal taxes which are levied on sugar in France. The main internal tax, which is now cancelled, is a consumption tax of 85 francs per one hundred kilograms, about 2½ cents per pound at the present rate of exchange. A refining tax of 2 francs, and a surveillance tax of ¼ franc per one hundred kilograms are also cancelled but taxes levied internally in France will nevertheless apply to maple sugar and maple syrup if imported for uses other than in the preparation of French tobacco.

The French decree of December 5, 1931, mentioned in article 9, authorized the government to limit by quota the importations of foreign sugar, and the other decree mentioned, that of October 8, 1934, limited to 32,000 metric tons the quantity of foreign sugar that could be imported in the period between October 8, 1934, and October 15, 1935. Article 9 exempts Canadian maple sugar and maple syrup imported for use in the preparation of tobacco from these quota restrictions. If maple sugar and maple syrup are imported from Canada into France for any other purpose there is an annual quota fixed for Canada of 1,000 kilograms or one metric ton.

As to article 10, on certain articles of clothing for children, by order in council No. 2838 of November 12, 1931, the price was fixed at $8 and $9 per dozen. The French government contended that the values so fixed under the authority of that order in council were much in excess of the true market value of the articles, and it was accordingly agreed to reduce the value for duty under section 43 of the Customs Act to $4.50 per dozen, or about one-half. With respect to cherries "glacé" the value for duty had been fixed by the Department of National Revenue at 8 francs per kilogram, and the French government contended that the market price in France did not exceed 6·5 francs per kilogram, and it was accordingly agreed to reduce the value for duty by twenty per cent.

Little need be said by me with respect to the remaining articles 11, 12 and 13. A feature of the negotiations which, though not set forth in the articles of agreement, will result in considerable advantage to Canada is the cancellation of the exchange compensation surtax on Canadian goods. By a French decree of November 12, 1931, the French government imposed an exchange compensation surtax ranging from seven to twenty-five per cent ad valorem on imports from specified countries whose currencies were then depreciated as compared with the French franc. It was stated that the purpose of these surtaxes was to countervail the indirect exchange bounty resulting from the depreciation of certain foreign currencies from their legal parity. Articles which are exempt from French customs duty under the French minimum tariff, such as wheat, for which a world market exists, are not subject to this surtax in France. On December 10, 1931, an exchange compensation surtax at the rate of eleven per cent ad valorem was imposed on all goods imported from Canada. Canada's competitive position in the French market was thereby rendered more difficult. In 1934 the French government cancelled the exchange compensation surtax on goods imported from the United Kingdom, the Irish Free State, Norway, Finland and the U.S.S.R. Now, as the result of this exchange of notes, the French government has exempted all imports from Canada from the operation of this exchange compensation surtax, placing Canadian goods in a better competitive position in the French market.

I have endeavoured as best I could, Mr. Speaker, to state generally the purposes of this additional protocol which is now before the house for ratification. If when the bill reaches the committee any further information is desired I will endeavour to obtain it from the experts of the department and present it to the committee.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Before the bill is given second reading I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) a question. Perhaps he will recall that at one time I had a question on the order paper in regard to the French treaty, and I suggested that when this protocol was before us for ratification I might discuss the matter, which had to do with certain conditions arising out of the former treaty. When the bill is in committee I assume that it will be taken for granted that we may discuss the treaty of 1933 and some of the conditions that have arisen out of that treaty.

Mr. CAHAN: Clearly the discussion will be opened wide.

Mr. BROWN: In that case I will reserve any remarks I have to make until we are in committee.

Mr. CAHAN: If the house permits I will move that we go into committee of the whole on the bill and then move that the committee rise and report progress, so that I may not go into these details until hon. gentlemen opposite have had an opportunity of reading the explanation I have given in summarizing the terms of the protocol itself.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 2—Additional protocol approved.

Mr. CAHAN: Without discussion and without division I will proceed to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask when my hon. friend intends to go on with this bill?

Mr. CAHAN: I should be quite willing to go on to-night, and it is possible that the acting leader of the government intended that I should go on, but as I began to go through my notes in preparation for this afternoon's discussion, it seemed to me that there should be some delay in order that hon. gentlemen who so desire may read the explanations I have given so that they may be in a position to discuss with greater clarity the particular sections of the protocol.

Mr. COOTE: To-morrow?

Mr. CAHAN: I would ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Post Office supply to-night?

Mr. MANION: I think so.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: And what else?

Mr. MANION: We will have to take up something else if the Post Office estimates get through, but I think they will take up the evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Post Office—outside service—

Salaries and allowances, $15,169,603.

Mail services, including mail service by air, $14,002,450.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,084,600.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a few questions of the hon. the Postmaster General. How many post offices have been closed from August, 1930, to date?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member be kind enough to ask me another question; I shall give him the information later.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Could the hon. Postmaster General let me have a detailed statement of the dismissals and appointments made in his department since the day he has taken charge of it?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If I understand correctly the hon. member's question, he wishes to know how many postmasters have been changed?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes, sir, in the first place.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There were 800 changes made.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many new post offices have been opened?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Has the hon. member another inquiry to make, while I look up the information? We have the information for the year about to expire, but we have no record for each of the previous years. I understood all the dismissals were included in that—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the dismissals were made in different ways. Oftentimes the minister went about it like a dentist who practises painless tooth extraction. He would not always tell the postmasters that they were ousted for political partisanship; sometimes he would close the post office and then open another one across the street, on the ground that better accommodation was necessary. In other cases, he would first close the post office and open another one a short distance away and thus it did not appear as if the office was closed on account of political partisanship.

Threatening letters were also sent to postmasters in order to frighten them. There were a great many who were alarmed and sent in their resignation to the minister before the department took action. It is most important to know the number of dismissals and I must say to the Postmaster General that I should like to have these particulars. I do not want to ask him questions to which he is in no position to reply, but it seems to me that a minister may be compared to a bank. At a general meeting, the board of directors is supposed to give the shareholders such information as may be asked for concerning their administration during the preceding years. It is true that the other day I gave notice to the hon. Postmaster General that I wished to obtain information in connection with the dismissals, but gave no further particulars. If the hon. minister were kind enough to let me have that memorandum which he showed to me a few minutes ago, I might bring down the number of my questions to ten or so, perhaps, and the matter could be disposed of in much less time.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am exceedingly sorry. Had I better understood the question asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member, I might have given him the information.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Of course, it is always unpleasant to deal with dismissals and at all times it is irksome to lay stress on that particular subject.

The minister was kind enough to let me have a short while ago, a memorandum showing the number of dismissals, by province and for each year, made between the 7th of August, 1930, and the 28th of February, 1935, for political partisanship and other reasons.

Would the hon. Postmaster General have any objection to hand over to me a copy of that memorandum or to let me keep the one I now have.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly, not.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): May I keep this copy?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly, you may keep it as a gift from me.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am quite thankful to the honourable minister; according to that list I find that quite a number of dismissals took place from the 7th of August, 1930, to the 28th of February last. The total number of dismissals, per province, is as follows:

	Political partisanship.	Other grounds.	Total.
Nova Scotia	129	55	184
New Brunswick	81	37	118
Prince Edward Island	8	2	10
Quebec	297	124	421
Ontario	12	47	59
Manitoba	12	18	30
Saskatchewan	13	17	30
Alberta	2	21	23
British Columbia	..	7	7
Total	555	327	882

In the province of Quebec, there were 297 dismissals for political partisanship, in other words a larger number in the province of Quebec than for all the other provinces put together. I already told the honourable minister that my criticism is not levelled at him particularly but rather at the Conservatice members of the province of Quebec and at those who are entrusted with the dominion patronage on behalf of the Conservative party in that province. They are the ones to blame for so many dismissals and to a certain extent the Postmaster General can wash his hands in that connection.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): And also because of the precedents. It has been so for the last forty years; the number of dismissals was always larger in the province of Quebec than in the province of Ontario.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It ill behooves the hon. minister to refer to precedents, because if, from 1922 to 1930, the Liberal party made a few dismissals it was in order to redress the wrongs that had been perpetrated by the Hon. Louis-Phillipe Pelletier and the other Conservative ministers. And, in this connection, the story of the Conservative party, in so far as the post office department is concerned, from Sir Adolphe Caron to the Hon. Louis-Phillipe Pelletier is by no means a pleasant one to recall. It is regrettable indeed that the minister should have allowed the axe to fall on the head of the unfortunate victims that the Conservative members as well the defeated candidates in the province of Quebec led to the block.

I find that the dismissals for political partisanship in the province of Quebec were far more numerous than elsewhere. And what is more distressing than that is the fact that, in a great many cases, political partisanship was given as the reason for the dismissal when there was none at all. The honourable Postmaster General knows very well, for instance that, at Notre-Dame du Lac, he gave instructions to suspend action upon receiving certain information which I gave him in connection with a complaint lodged against the former postmaster. Unfortunately it was too late, the transfer having already been made. I must give him credit for his readiness to act on that occasion but the fact remains that the stand taken at the time by the Conservative party was disastrous.

I shall not insist on what took place in the other provinces, but it should be interesting to see in what constituencies of the province of Quebec the axe was wielded with greater efficiency: in Argenteuil, 2 dismissals for political partisanship, and three for other reasons, total 5. In Bagot, 2 for political partisanship, one for other reasons; total 3. In Beauce, 3 for political partisanship, 1 for other reasons; total 4. In Beauharnois, 1 for political partisanship. In Bellechasse, 10 for political partisanship, 1 for other reasons; total 11.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Since 1930. Since five years.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since 1930, yes.

Berthier-Maskinongé, 8 for political partisanship, 1 for other reasons; total 9. In Bonaventure, 45 for political partisanship, 4, for other reasons; total 49. In Brome-Missisquoi, 2 for political partisanship and one for other reasons; total 3. In Cartier, 2 for other reasons. Chambly-Verchères, 2 for other reasons. In Champlain, 3 for political partisanship, 2 for other reasons; total 5. In Charlevoix-Saguenay, 10 for political partisanship, 5 for other reasons; total 15. In Châteauguay-Huntingdon, 0, 0. I must congratulate the hon. member for that constituency on the fact that he apparently is broadminded on that question at least, though he may not be in other respects. Chicoutimi, 2 for political partisanship, 1 for other reasons; total 3. Compton, 6 for political partisanship, none for other reasons; total 6. It would appear that postmasters in Compton are really honest, since the only thing they can be reproached with is their political faith. Dorchester, 10 for political partisanship, 10 for other reasons; total 20. Drummond-Arthabaska, 8 for political partisanship, other reasons; 1. Gaspé, 46 for political partisanship, 16 for other reasons; total 62. Hochelaga, 0, 0. Hull, 2 for political partisanship, other reasons 1; total 3. Jacques-Cartier, political partisanship 1, other reasons 1; total 2. Joliette, other reasons 3. Kamouraska, political partisanship 7, other reasons 5; total 12. Labelle, other reasons 1. Lac Saint-Jean, political partisanship 16, other reasons 2; total 18. Laprairie-Napierville, 1 for political partisanship. L'Assomption-Montcalm, 6 for political partisanship, 2 for other reasons; total 8. Laurier-Outremont, other reasons 1. Laval-Deux-Montagnes, political partisanship 5, other reasons 3; total 8. Lévis, political partisanship 5, other reasons 2; total 7. L'Islet, political partisanship 5, other reasons 1; total 6. Lotbinière, political partisanship 7, other reasons 2; total 9. Maisonneuve, other reasons 9. Matane, political partisanship 7, other reasons 3; total 10. Mégantic, political partisanship 3. Montmagny, political partisanship 10, other reasons 3; total 13. Mount Royal, other reasons 1. Nicolet, political partisanship 5, other reasons 2; total 7. All of which is very sad. So much so seeing those figures do not paint a true picture of what actually happened.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If the hon. member will permit me, I am giving an account of the present fiscal year, and not of the four preceding years. I was willing to give the information asked for by the hon. member, but I do not want him to think it extraordinary if I do not have at hand all possible information regarding the affairs of my department for the last four years. I am ready to answer questions in regard to the year on which I have now to give explanations.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The minister must not get mad.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not at all, I say it with great calmness.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): For the moment, I am giving a review of the minister's career which will be crowned in a different world, probably in the red chamber.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Not in a better world.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not mean that, because the atmosphere is sometimes duller in the Senate than in the House of Commons. Anyway, it is the crowning of a career, because the Senate gives certain benefits to its members.

Mr. MERCIER (Saint-Henri) (Translation): He is a lucky bird.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is a reward for political services; the minister has rendered great services to his party and he deserves a reward.

Now I am reviewing the report of dismissals made by him during nearly five years. I do not want to say that all those dismissals happened in one year, but he made a lot more secretly. I want the minister to understand that very often dismissals have been recommended for political partisanship without sufficient proof; in those cases, he closed post offices and opened others a little farther. Would the Postmaster General have any objections to give me a report in regard to post offices that have been closed, like the one he gave me in the case of postmasters who have been dismissed?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is pretty hard to supply the hon. member with all the information he wants. Really, I cannot understand what he means when he says that I closed post offices in order to open other post offices a little farther down the street and this was a camouflaged way of dismissing postmasters for political partisanship. I have no information on that point, neither here nor in the department; I do not think there were many such cases. If there were any, they must have been exceptional cases.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is very simple: I want a statement, by provinces and by electoral districts, of post offices that have been closed and, on the other hand, of post offices that have been opened, since August the 6, 1930. The minister should have no objections to have such a statement prepared if he has not got it now. Is he ready to give me that statement?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, surely, as soon as possible.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Thank you. The officials should be in a position to prepare such a statement in a very short time, and it seems to me that I could get that information next week.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): When I said "As soon as possible," I thought the hon. member would understand that I would give him the statement before next week.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I think we will finally get somewhere. If the minister would act in such a way that the tears, which he has occasioned in many a family by dismissing postmasters, could be forgotten—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Weep over yourself.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): There is another thing. I mean the transfer of post offices on account of changes in location. Would the minister be kind enough to give me information in regard to transfers of post offices under the pretext of bettering the location?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Surely, with pleasure.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I thank the minister. We want information on the following points: first, a list of post offices that have been closed since he has taken charge of the department; secondly, a list of the new post offices that have been opened and, in the third place, a list of post offices where the location has been changed, from August 6, 1930, to the present date, by provinces and by electoral districts.

According to the list here, the minister has dismissed a total of 882 postmasters since August 6, 1930. How many has he appointed since August 6, 1930? How many has he appointed since that date as permanents or as temporaries?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): They have all been replaced.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am ready to show the greatest courtesy possible, and the greatest patience towards the minister; experience has shown that his colleagues who have answered me properly have had no difficulties with me; but if a minister begins to play the smart Alec with me, he will have trouble; and I am giving a formal warning.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have been answering quite naturally.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Answering naturally and not answering properly are two different things. I want to know how many dismissals have been made by the hon. minister. There are 882 here, that is an answer. Now, I want to know how many postmasters the hon. minister has appointed permanently or temporarily; that is a very clear question.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Since 1930?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot give an answer to-night, because I am not called upon to account for my administration since 1930. The hon. member will admit that I cannot bring all the files in my department to the house in order to answer any questions that might be asked.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the elementary points relating to the administration can be discussed right now and ought to be discussed while we are on the estimates of the Post Office Department. I would understand perfectly, if it were a special case, if I were asking, let us say, for particulars on the Sully post office, that the minister would say that he has not the file at hand. He would probably send for it; there are officials here who have nothing to do; there are others in the gallery; he would send them to his office to get the file in order to answer my question. I do not know if things were going on like that in Quebec, but here in Ottawa, it must be different, because I want that information and things will not go in such an easy way. When I ask the minister for the number of appointments made since 1930, it is a very simple question. He ought to keep a kind of ledger of his dismissals and appointments in order to be able to say what he has done since 1930 in that regard. I am asking a very reasonable question. The minister is not here to have his 1930 estimates passed by the house; they were passed in that year and I will shorten my remarks in order to give him a chance to pass his estimates to-day. I am asking a very serious question. What has been done since 1930 in the matter of appointments of postmasters? I ask the question and I am expecting an answer. It seems to me that, in the mass of papers he has before him, he could find that information and tell me how many postmasters he has appointed since 1930, permanently as well as temporarily.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We have not here all the information since 1930. To answer the hon. member for Témiscouata I must first deny his statement to the effect that I was hiding something. The dismissals were made after inquiries or charges made by members who claimed that they were personally aware of political partisanship on the part of the postmasters. Others were dismissed for ill-administration and I had to replace them. A few post offices were closed. Some of them were reopened in the public interest after representations were made to the department.

Now, with the best of intentions, I will ask the hon. member for Témiscouata not to ask me to follow the methods employed by the premier of Quebec or the government of Quebec, when the estimates are under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, we are here in Ottawa and I will deal with the Postmaster General as I would with any of his colleagues, English or French. When a member seeks information of such a reasonable nature, he has a right to get an answer. Perhaps I could alter my question; I could ask the Postmaster General to give me the number of the last appointment he has made of a postmaster; is it the four thousandth postmaster he has appointed? The appointment must bear a number, is it 4,000 or 5,000? How many did he appoint, in round numbers? Is it 5,000 or 6,000? That is what I want to know.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Four days were required to prepare the list the hon. member has in hand. The hon. member does not seem to realize the amount of work his questions impose on the department. We have not that information here. We have to get it from the different branches. The hon. member will admit that it is impossible for me to supply, off hand, all the information. Two or three days would be required to get the exact answer to these questions. I know the hon. member wants a reliable answer that will give him the information he is seeking.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, a moment ago somebody said "Hear! hear!" If the hon. members who come here for the first time and have no knowledge of parliamentary customs, would wait a few years before teaching others, it would be so much the better for them. First of all, they could learn French and they would realize that it takes some time to become acquainted with parliamentary customs.

I could help the minister to answer the question I have just put to him by referring him to certain answers of his which are found in Hansard of May 12, 1933, page 4950, and according to his own words, he had dismissed but 783 postmasters when he had appointed 3,035. What I would like to understand is how he could appoint 3,035 men when he had dismissed only 788. It is unbelievable, it is a mystery, it is a thing I have yet been unable to understand.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member does not take into account the dismissals, the deaths, etc.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The dead? Very well. All the postmasters are not dead. Many are quite old and have occupied their post for a long time. Some died from grief on account of the ill-treatment they received.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In Ontario, a great many people are dying just now.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Has the Postmaster General appointed any new postmasters since the 12th of May, 1933?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not quite catch the drift of the question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Since the 12th of May, 1933, has the hon. minister appointed any new postmasters?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have not the figures here.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many did he appoint last year, in 1934?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I promised the hon. member, very graciously, I think, that I will bring down the information asked for. He was kind enough to take my word a moment ago, so far as the list of dismissals was concerned. I promised to bring down that list and the one he is asking for just now.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): When?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As soon as possible. The hon. member knows what I mean by that.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Have you any temporary postmasters just now?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A few.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many, approximately?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): 7 or 8.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Has the Civil Service Commission made many appointments in the last two years, since 1933, or have most of the appointments been made by the minister?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Most of them have been made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Even now?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): From $3,000 up, the commission looks after the appointments?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is the number of postmasters receiving less than $3,000 greater than the number of those getting more than that amount.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There are 12,033 postmasters; of that number, 11,213 receive less than $3,000.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many get more than $3,000?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): 690, no, 820.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): So, many postmasters receive more than $3,000?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Above $3,000, the appointment is made by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Such has been the practice for the last two years.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): And under $3,000, they are appointed by the minister?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Without consulting the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, in that case, has the minister not made more appointments than the commission?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Possibly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I want an answer from the minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, likely.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am asking the minister whether he did or not, whether it is true or not. I am not asking him whether it is likely or not. The minister knows what he is doing. He is a sensible man, and when he affixes his signature in approval he very well knows how many appointments he ratified. I am not asking him whether it is likely, but if he actually affixed his signature many times a year for the appointment of postmasters.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I signed as many times as there were appointments to be made.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many times did it happen?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I cannot remember.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Last year?

Some hon. MEMBERS (Text): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I would ask hon. members to keep order. As I was saying a moment ago, it does not befit newcomers to dictate to us in this house; let them get older before doing that; if need be we shall tip them over, and that will do them good. We shall take our time.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not recall the particulars.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is too bad. The hon. minister says that he has this information, but these are things that he should foresee. His officers should tell him that it may be the first question put to a minister when he presents his estimates to the house and asks for more money to administer his department during the coming year.

It is elementary. The hon. minister who has been Leader of the Opposition in Quebec and who has had great experience ought to be able to supply this information at once to the house, in order that the members may know what he has done since he is Postmaster General. If the hon. minister were a new member, if it were the first time that he was in charge of estimates, he might say that he forgot it, but he is a man who has great experience, who has long been in public life and he does not even know how many appointments he has made; he does not remember. Did he make so many that the number of new postmasters cannot be figured out? And is the number of postmasters who were dismissed also incalculable? Sometimes children can count up to a certain number then they cannot go further. Is the hon. minister afraid to give the house the number of appointments and dismissals that he made? It is a very serious thing.

If the hon. minister says: "I shall give you the information in two, or three, or four days," very well, I will take his word; he will only be two or three days late, and that is all. He had time to think it over. The other day, he presented part of his estimates to the house and he had no difficulty. We let him pass some of them in order to discuss the rest today; but again he comes with empty hands and he makes promises. I am sure they will be better kept than those made by his leader in 1930.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The hon. minister dismissed in all 882 postmasters, either for political partisanship or for other reasons. Have all their places been filled?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Then, he appointed 882.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly, those who have been replaced.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Then he appointed at least 882 and he need not dig into his files to find that out.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I protest against my hon. friend's assertion. Hansard of two years ago says that we had thousands of appointments. There are so many that the hon. minister does not remember the number.

Now just another question. Can the hon. minister tell me whether Mr. Laurent, who has the contract for the carrying of parcel post in Montreal, holds a permanent or temporary position?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Temporary.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a fact that Mr. Laurent has the largest contract throughout Canada for the carrying of parcel post or mail.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not think so.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then who has the largest contract?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Throughout the country?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We have one in the Yukon whose contract is much larger—at White Horse.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Largen? You have one in the Yukon; but besides that one, is there any other whose contract is larger than that of Mr. Laurent?

Mr. SAUVE: (Translation) There is the Canadian Transfer in Toronto. There is at Montreal—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a fact that Mr. Laurent has the largest contract throughout Canada for the carrying of parcel post?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg your pardon?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am asking the hon. minister if it is not a fact that Mr. Laurent, at Montreal, has the largest contract throughout Canada for the carrying of parcel post.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, on account of the importance of Montreal.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then why is he still temporarily employed instead of being permanent?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The matter is under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How long has Mr. Laurent been holding this temporary position?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Three years, I think.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is it not a fact that he has had it since 1930?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, possibly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then it would be five years.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not quite.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister is not serious. Here is a man who has a contract for the carrying of parcel post, the largest throughout Canada. He is supposed to carry and he does carry parcel post throughout the city of Montreal; it is an enormous contract. He is not permanent, but only temporary. I am asking the hon. minister why he is not permanent and he replies that the matter is under consideration. That is not a serious answer. I am going to ask the hon. minister what is the amount paid each year to Mr. Laurent by his department and how much he has received since 1930. Does the hon. minister refuse to answer?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We have not before us this information concerning Mr. Laurent in particular. We have the cost of the different services, urban and rural mail, but I have not the information concerning Mr. Laurent in particular.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Would the hon. minister tell me what amount was paid to Mr. Laurent during the last fiscal year?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If my memory serves me well, I think it is $27,000.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Will the hon. minister give me before the middle of next week, the total amount paid to Mr. Laurent, each year, since his appointment?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is understood? The minister says yes, does he not?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, certainly.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I strongly protest against such dealings. It is not reasonable to give such a large contract to an employee without appointing his permanently.

Now may I put another question to the minister? Has Mr. Laurent secured the contract pursuant to the calling of tenders? And if so, was he the lowest tenderer?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, because it was a temporary contract.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, Mr. Chairman, you understand why Laurent is temporary. He has a temporary contract because the hon. minister would not ask for tenders for the most important parcel post carrying contract throughout Canada, a contract of $27,000, as he just said himself. Mr. Laurent is temporarily employed, he has a temporary contract because the hon. minister would not call for tenders, and he will not call for any even now. That is why Mr. Laurent enjoys such benefits. The hon. minister is not reasonable; there is no sense in that.

Now may I ask the hon. minister up to what amount he may grant contracts for the carrying of mail without tenders?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think I mentioned it last year—$200.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, you see how it is. I shall not dwell upon it any longer. I do not want to stir all these unfortunate things of the Post Office Department. The law allows the minister to grant a contract for the carrying of mail up to an amount of $200, without tender. That is for the small parishes. But in the largest city of Canada, a friend, a political favourite, has a contract of at least $27,000 a year—and I am sure it is more, it will prove to be more—a contract of $27,000 a year without tender. The minister flouts the law by leaving this man in a temporary position. He cannot make him permanent without asking for tenders, but he leaves him as a temporary employee in order to keep on protecting him to the prejudice of those who could tender at a lower price than the one he is getting. This is a question of public interest. How do we know that the Postmaster General would not save several thousand dollars a year and would not have done so since 1930, if he had acted according to the law and called for tenders for such an important contract.

I am not surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the Postmaster-General, with his apparent good nature, with his genial and unctuous disposition, should make an attempt to sidetrack the issue when one expects a direct reply from him. It is a tactic of his and when he comes in the house without the papers required to enable him to answer any serious and timely questions that may be put to him concerning his own department, it is because he will rather not answer or enlighten the country as to what takes place within his department.

I already had the opportunity of pointing out to him the fact that quite a large amount, a sum of over $27,500, had been paid to a man for mail boxes made from stove pipe. The pipe itself was worth around 50 cents while the manufactured product was, at the most, worth 75 cents. And yet, he gave the order to that man without calling for tenders, and he had the boxes made from stove pipe. The Postmaster-General knows what I mean; I refer to that contract awarded to Amédée Lesieur.

Mr. SAUVE: 10,000 boxes.

Mr. POULIOT: 10,000 boxes at $2.75; that makes $27,500.

Mr. SAUVE: $10,000.

Mr. POULIOT: The Postmaster-General should not say that when the Hansard shows that the price of each box was $2.75. If the minister is not satisfied with that statement, I shall show him the very page of Hansard. Besides, I have in my room upstairs a photograph of the stove pipe transformed into a mail box. The hon. minister is laughing at that! There is nothing to make light of; it is a sad affair!

No tenders have been asked. We have here a former furniture dealer in Montreal who comes to the minister with a tale of woe. He says: "I have here a wonderful invention, a stove pipe which I can change into a mail box. And I will sell that box at the price of $2.75 to your department." I ask you to note, Mr. Chairman, that Amédée Lesieur was not the inventor of that famous box with a raising door, a lowering door, as well as a door that opened on the side. That famous discovery had been made by another individual, but the former took it to the Postmaster General. In a memorandum submitted to his colleagues, the members of the government, the minister stated that, owing to that wonderful invention, that is the door opening at the bottom, at the top and on the side, it was important to give encouragement to such a genius. What happened? At that time, no patent had been secured as yet. Not only that, but the patent had not even been applied for at the patent office. The department still had thousands and thousands of boxes that were in perfect order and of a far better construction than these boxes. But the Postmaster-General bought Amédée Lesieur's mail box. He did not purchase only a thousand of them, but 10,000; just think of it, 10,000! Ten thousand at $2.75 each! Which means that out of that sum of $27,500, there was an obvious robbery of $20,000 on the part of either Amédée Lesieur or the man who was with him. We frequently urge upon the government to include in the estimates certain sums for important things, and we are told: "The country cannot afford it; we have no funds". But you had to make a gift of $20,000 to Amédée Lesieur. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) gave a detailed account of the transaction and, last year, he again referred to it. We were unable to get a satisfactory reply from the government. We have here another instance of money wasted to the extent of $20,000. I shall not insist on other expenditures, no less absurd than this one, made by the Post Office department. And at a time when the employees complain of being unable to secure justice, when they can scarcely make ends meet, one sees how spongers, such as the one I just mentioned, manage to grab $20,000 from the government through changing a stove pipe into a mail box, and that with the approval of the hon. Postmaster General, in whose eyes, a gift of $20,000 on a $27,500 transaction is quite right.

At that time a man wrote to me saying that if he were given the contract to manufacture boxes of that kind with stove pipe, he could produce as many as the government might require, not at $2.75 but at 75 cents a box, which price would leave him a profit of 25 cents a box. You see how it is. If I speak to the minister, he will say: "It might be like that, it might be not altogether like that." There it goes and people say: "He is a good fellow." Are there not in the county of Two Mountains voters who need the $20,000 that have been given to Amédée Lesieur? Are there no voters in Témiscouata, in Gloucester, in Provencher, in Rimouski, in Essex or anywhere else who need these $20,000? They are poor, they have greater need of this gift than Amédée Lesieur. It is shameful.

There is one more thing I complained about last year and about which I complain again this year. I wonder why Mr. Anderson is not retired. I have great respect for old men when they are useful. But he is harmful. He is entitled to his pension. He is there simply to lick the boots of all the ministers. He is absolutely useless. I think it is time to send him home to smoke his pipe. I would be all the more pleased to see him go so that he could be replaced by Mr. Saint-Germain, who, though modest, is an excellent official. It is high time to get rid of Anderson. There are other elderly men in the civil service. I have great respect for them. Some of them are indispensable, but let us get rid of those we can spare. Mr. Anderson would not be on the street; he is entitled to a substantial pension and his retirement would allow the promotion of a modest official who is loyal to his chiefs and who could render much greater service than the present incumbent.

I also say to the minister that it is sovereignly unjust of him not to appoint a deputy minister in his department, which is one of the most important departments of the government. I have no recommendation to make as to individuals, but I say to him that he has been guilty of a grave injustice towards the man who is actually filling the post of deputy minister without drawing the salary thereof, although he has borne the responsibility for a long time. It is unjust. I do not share the opinion of those who think that the man who replaces a deputy minister with satisfaction should receive an increase of salary without an increase of status. I am not at all in favour of that, for the deputy minister is the assistant head of the department, that is, he is directly responsible to the minister for the administration of the department. I regret that it should be two departments presided over by my French Canadian compatriots that have been so long deprived of a deputy minister. It seems to me that a minister should have sufficient authority to say to the Prime Minister: "The act entitles me to a deputy minister; give me one." I cannot conceive of an English speaking minister waiting years, as my two French speaking colleagues have done, without thus reproaching the Prime Minister. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to submit these appointments to the Privy Council, but on the other hand, each minister, the hon. Postmaster General and the hon.

Minister of Marine should say to the Prime Minister: "Appoint a deputy minister to my department; if you do not render justice to my department, I say good-bye and I give up my responsibilities." If the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine had thus spoken to the head of the government they would have been listened to. It is time that these appointments be made. Appoint whomever you like, but appoint someone and let him be a competent man. It seems to me that it is much more important to appoint this deputy minister than to create throughout the whole country irresponsible commissions. At the present time we have no responsible government. We are governed by individuals who have no responsibility towards the representatives of the people, and very often when we ask a minister if such and such a commission is responsible to him, he is hard put to reply as he does not know himself.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may not be here when the resolution concerning the appointment of an economic council will be submitted to this house, but I can say right away that, to my mind, it is ridiculous to create an economic council, for we have one already under the British system of parliament; we have had for centuries. It is nothing else but the cabinet. The departments cover all branches of material activities of the nation, commerce, banking, industries, railways, everything. This means, Mr. Chairman, that each ministry must be directed by competent men. To get them, one must rely on the merit system; you must tell the employees: Having been faithful servants, you are entitled to a promotion, you have a right to expect that your services will receive a reward proportionate to the good you have done for the country. That is, Mr. Chairman, the British parliamentary system which has been maintained for centuries. In the course of the last few years, what have we seen? You have boards which in most cases have no designation: the "Marketing Act Board," this board, and that board. And I am told that we are to have some other boards, irresponsible boards.

Let me say not only to the hon. Postmaster General, for in this case they should appoint a deputy-minister in his department, not only to the Minister of Marine, who also has no deputy-minister, but to each member of the government: Either the ministers of each department are or are not efficient. If they are efficient, we have no need of an economic council; if they are not efficient, let them resign at once. There is no other way out.

Is it the intention of the government to appoint new men, burned out brains, dreamers who will submit plans as ridiculous as those that have been recently refused by the three western provinces in connection with the marketing of poultry and eggs.

Mr. Chairman, what I regret, is that the government does not seem to realize the strength of our present system of government. The government refuse to assume any responsibility. They rely entirely on irresponsible individuals. Mr. Chairman, I protest strongly against such a policy, a policy that makes Canada similar to Russia. The right hon. prime minister has declared publicly, in Montreal, that he was following, to a certain extent, Litvinof, Strachey and other prominent communists, taking advantage of the experience of the French revolution and of the Russian revolution in presenting this so-called social legislation. Let the government come back to common sense. Since our French-Canadian ministers often mention Cartier and Macdonald, let them act according to the principles followed by those statesmen. Let them follow the principles of Gladstone, of Disraeli, of Campbell-Bannerman, of Baldwin, of Blake, of George Brown, of Laurier, of Borden, of all those great political men who have written history. When in a department, there exists a vacancy as important as that of deputy-minister, the ministers should fill that vacancy, were it only to render justice to the loyalty of the employees who have a right to the salary set by law. But this is not all: it is false economy to prevent an employee from obtaining a well earned promotion so as to save a few dollars. The salary is not set by the ministers, it is set by law. The law says: There must be a deputy-minister in each department. Why this delay on the part of the Postmaster General? Instead of reading memorandums from conservatives asking for dismissals of good postmasters, why did he not study the law relating to the nomination of deputy-ministers? An injustice was committed by the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine when they refused to appoint their deputy minister sooner. If they want an economic council, let them first apply the law of justice, let them respect the terms of the law relating to the appointment of deputy-ministers. Let them be mindful that the creation of an economic council does not bring us still nearer to Russia than any other government legislation.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that in 1932 an agency was organized through which used stamps are sold to the public. I wish the minister would give us some explanation of the operations of this agency and why it was established.

Mr. SAUVE: It was established to provide stamps for philatelists.

Mr. VENIOT: Used stamps?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. VENIOT: What does that agency consist of?

Mr. SAUVE: The financial superintendent in control and a small staff.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that only about $139 or $140 has been received from this agency. There is a rumour which I think should be straightened out. It is rumoured throughout the country that unused stamps which are sold for such small amounts are being traded around the country and providing immense profits to those fortunate enough to be friends of the government and able to get hold of them. Up until 1932 new issues were not sold through an agency, they were sold through the department; and if my memory serves me aright, in some instances amounts of $15,000, $20,000 and $30,000 were realized by the officials and paid into the treasury of this country. At the present time any profit which might be gained through the sale of these stamps does not come to the government; all the government receives is the small amount it gets from the agency established by the financial branch of the department. I want an answer to these questions.

Mr. SAUVE: I do not understand what the hon. member means. I never heard anything about immense profits and I have never received any information in that connection.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to direct the minister's attention to certain questions which have been asked and the answers he gave thereto. The first question was whether or not the department maintained a philatelic agency at Ottawa, and the answer was yes. The next question was:

If so, what was the cost of operating the said agency in each of the fiscal years, 1931 to 1934 inclusive?

The answer was:

Prior to September 13, 1932, the work was done by employees who were also engaged in other duties, and no separate record of salary cost was kept.
September 13, 1932, to March 31, 1933, $5,007.64; April 1, 1933, to March 31, 1934, $9,828.

The minister now says that he knows nothing about this matter and I should like to know where he got the information with which to answer those questions. The next question asked was:

What was the total revenue derived from the philatelic agency during each of the years 1931 to 1934 inclusive?

The answer given was:

Fiscal year 1930-31, $42,269.65; 1931-32, $38,891.83; 1932-33, $56,250.60; 1933-34, $54,813.31.

Information was given at that time but the minister now tells the committee that he knows nothing about this matter and does not understand what I am talking about. It is queer that the minister can stand up and tell me what he has told me to-night when he has given these answers.

Mr. SAUVE: The philatelic branch has had a revenue of about $50,000 this year. It sells all stamps at face value.

Mr. VENIOT: Do I understand that that is the cost, or the revenue?

Mr. SAUVE: That is what it takes in.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did the minister not give that answer when he was asked before? That figure does not agree with the figures given in the answer I have quoted. The figures given in that answer do not even average $50,000 a year. I should like to know why this agency was organized for the sale of used stamps. Why should not this business be carried on as it was before by the officials of the department instead of giving an opportunity to outsiders to make a profit for themselves? Why was this done?

Mr. SAUVE: About $50,000 was taken in this last year and the hon. member knows perfectly well that it is growing every year.

Mr. VENIOT: What is growing every year?

Mr. SAUVE: I understand the hon. member is referring to stamps sold through the philatelic branch.

Mr. VENIOT: I am talking about used stamps sold to philatelists. Up until 1932 these stamps were sold by officials of the department, and the profits came to the country. Since 1932 these stamps have been sold through an agency which makes a large profit at the expense of this country. Why are these used stamps sold through an agency instead of being sold direct by the department and the profits accumulated to the credit of the dominion, as was done when I was Postmaster General?

Mr. SAUVE: They are not sold through an agency unless you call the philatelic branch an agency.

Mr. VENIOT: Then why was this answer given in Hansard? Why deceive this house? Why not give us the truth? I am not blaming the minister but the policy adopted by the government of running this department, not in the interests of the public but of certain friends who are making graft out of the Post Office department to-day, by establishing an agency to sell these stamps which in the past brought a revenue. To-day that revenue is nil, but those handling these stamps are making a fortune. That is the statement I make. Let the minister have an opportunity to consult his assistant so as to be able to answer the question intelligently.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: If you have no more respect for the minister than that, he ought to get out of your company and resign.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Gloucester knows French well enough—

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Yes; I will be pleased to get an answer in the French language.

Mr. VENIOT: The reply in French will be satisfactory to me and will be easier for the minister.

Mr. SAUVE: I know what the hon. member said in French.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Gloucester has laid against the Post Office Department a charge that is both exaggerated and unfounded. May I tell him that I am most surprised at his statement and, specially, at the way he treats the Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I treat you right.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Gloucester claims that there is no proper control in the department, specially so far as the stamps he spoke of are concerned. If the hon. member for Gloucester, who not only has some experience in the administration of the department but has the habit of making extraordinary statements, will only formulate a definite charge, I promise to look into it immediately. If there is graft in the department—

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I did not say that.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member has insinuated something to that effect and I want to answer the charge.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say there was graft in the department but that the policy followed since 1932 favoured graft for parties outside of the department. I am not accusing the department of graft.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will the hon. member for Gloucester give details?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I did give you the details.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): They are not complete enough. It is but an exaggerated statement, words inspired by passion without any serious foundation.

Mr. MULOCK: Were there any supercharge raised stamps, from five to six cents, of the air mail, sold to stamp collectors or vendors or purchasers, whatever the minister likes to call them? If so, how much did the department receive, and were they accounted for? The stamps I refer to are those which were printed upside down by mistake.

Mr. SAUVE: I will obtain the information and give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. MULOCK: Do I understand that the minister is leaving this particular item open until he is in a position to answer the question? I would ask the minister this further question. Does he know what price these stamps are selling at now to stamp collectors in the country?

Mr. SAUVE: If the hon. member will put the question on the order paper I will answer it.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think that we should be required to place a question of that kind on the order paper. The Postmaster General's estimates are now before the committee and he can answer the question. He is quite right in declining to answer it to-night, seeing that the question has been raised for the first time, and therefore he should have an opportunity to look into it. I do not want to push him to-night, but so long as that answer is not given I do not think that these estimates should pass. That is the point I make. The Postmaster General, speaking in French, said that I was not treating him right. I have sat on this side for four sessions and have listened to the minister's estimates going through. I have had millions of reasons to criticize the Postmaster General's estimates, not only in a general way but in detail, and when the hon. gentleman, reviewing my attitude in the last four years, can get up and say that I am not treating him right because I want a definite answer to a question which interests the public as a whole concerning what to my mind is one of the worst principles ever established in the Post Office Department, namely, allowing outsiders to make a profit on the sale of stamps which should go to the government, then I say that he cannot appreciate it when he is properly treated, and from now on I will reserve to myself the right to criticize him as severely as I feel he should be criticized. I have not criticized the Postmaster General; I have endeavoured to have his estimates go through. I know the responsibility that rests upon his shoulders; I know what a difficult department he has to administer; I know that he represents the largest vending and revenue department of the government of Canada; I know that he has from thirty-five to forty thousand men under his supervision, and I know how difficult it is to administer the department without having undue criticism hurled at him. For this reason I have refrained from criticizing the minister. But when it came to my notice within the last day or two that this transaction was put through in 1932, I felt it my duty not to criticize the minister severely but simply to point out that this had been done and to find out the reasons why it had been done and why outside parties should have been allowed to participate in the surplus revenue that should have come to the Post Office Department. I think the minister has gone out of his way to-night in stating that I have treated him unfairly in handling the question. When I was Postmaster General I stood here for twenty-one days with my estimates held up, but I found no fault with the opposition for the action they took because I was able to meet them. I was able to answer every question that was put to me; I was able to meet and answer every attack that was hurled against me; I stood by my guns and I refused to give in even when the opposition in the dying hours of the attack, after twenty-one days, thought I could no longer go across to England and sit as the first Canadian who ever sat as president of the world postal union, and when they offered to compromise and withdraw their dogs I refused to accept the compromise. If I were to show toward the minister the same disposition that his friends displayed towards me during my tenure of office, he would never get his estimates through the house.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): All right; go ahead.

Mr. VENIOT: What have you to say about the matter? You are not the minister and you know very little about what is going on in the house. Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, for addressing the hon. gentleman directly and not through the chair, but he had no right to interfere. The biblical injunction is that when you are struck on one cheek, you should turn the other. I want to say that I never turned the other cheek, but I fought straight from the shoulder. I have every sympathy for the Postmaster General. I know his department is not allowed to be run to-day in the way it should be run; I know he is not the master of that department. In my time I would brook no interference in the internal working of the department from any member of the government, not even from the Prime Minister under whom I worked. He knew enough, in carrying on the business of the country, to allot to each minister his department and to rely upon each minister to be able to conduct it properly. That is not the situation to-day, and proof of that is to be found in the fact that for the last two years there has been no deputy postmaster general. Why? If rumour that is circulating is true, the position is being kept vacant for the appointment of a Conservative member of this house who fears that he will not be elected in his constituency in the next election.

An hon. MEMBER: Name him.

Mr. VENIOT: No; hon. gentlemen opposite can name him better than I can, because some of them, as I understand the matter, have been pushing his application to the fore. There is just now a little row in the Conservative party to see which one of two or three should get the position, and not one of those gentlemen whose names are mentioned is fit to fill the position of assistant deputy or assistant to the assistant deputy of the Post Office Department, because they do not know the first thing about it. I want to appeal now to the government: Name your deputy minister according to merit; do not go outside the department and take in to place at the head of that important department a man who knows nothing about it. Name a man according to merit; such men are to be found in the Post Office Department. There are in it members of the civil service the equal of whom cannot be found on the whole continent of America, and I say that after having had four years experience with such men. There are in that department men the equal of whom cannot be found in any other civil service on this continent; there are there men whom the United States and France take the trouble to consult in regard to the method of administering their departments of mail service. Yet those men are not advanced; they are held back and their being held back is a threat held over their heads.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You cut their heads off; what are you talking about?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not cut off one head, but I would be only too pleased to cut off the heads of men like my hon. friend when the time comes, because—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You never will.

Mr. VENIOT: —there are many empty heads that should be cut off.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): All right; start with yourself.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me appeal once more to the government: Grant to the service the money that it deserves; do not hold that position open any longer. This may be only my own opinion that I am expressing, but I take the responsibility for it as I do in everything else that I may say. I say to the government of to-day: Should the fortunes of war in the coming election go against them and your humble servant is called upon to fill the position he once filled in the government of another day, if a deputy minister is appointed from outside the service, I will cut his head off five minutes after I take office.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why?

An hon. MEMBER: Political patronage.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not a question of political patronage; it is a question of fitness for the position, because if you appoint a man from outside the civil service he would ruin and wreck that department inside of three months. That is why I stand by the principle of promotion. I want promotion in the service. I carried out that principle when I was at the head of the Post Office Department, and I want the present government to carry it out and to appoint men from within the service and not to give such positions to political heelers.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I do not wish to derogate from the glory of the former Postmaster General. I notice he has a beautiful rose in the lapel of his coat and I think all that is needed now is a laurel wreath to deck his brow. All I wish to do at present is to find out what is the practice of the department in the establishment of new post offices. In certain districts in the west there are localities very much in need of new post offices. What are the factors that enter into the establishment of new offices? How many miles apart must they be? What estimated revenue and what number of people in the locality are requisite to the establishment of a post office? What is the factor as to operating cost, and outside of all the factors I have mentioned are there any mitigating circumstances that might justify the department in establishing a post office in order to give service to people who find it very hard to have to go twenty or thirty miles to the nearest post office already established?

Mr. SAUVE: It would depend on local conditions and needs.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The condition of the people or the condition of the Post Office Department?

Mr. SAUVE: Of the locality.

Mr. COOTE: In view of the fact that the government is introducing a minimum wage bill, is the Post Office Department taking any action to increase the salaries of some of the lower paid postmasters?

Mr. SAUVE: Postmasters are paid on commission.

Mr. COOTE: The commissions paid I think are inadequate. What is the minimum salary for a postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE: A minimum of one hundred dollars a year.

Mr. COOTE: And what commissions does he receive?

Mr. SAUVE: Seventy per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Up to what point?

Mr. SAUVE: Seventy per cent on the first thousand dollars.

Mr. COOTE: Has there been any change in the salaries paid to postmasters in the last two years?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. COOTE: Were they not reduced a few years ago? Are they not affected by the salary deduction?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes, over one thousand dollars.

Mr. COOTE: Is any action contemplated to increase the remuneration for rural mail carriers? Have the government any intention of changing the system under which these men are engaged?

Mr. SAUVE: They are paid by contract. My hon. friend will admit that it depends upon the contract.

Mr. COOTE: Will the government consider bringing them under the minimum wage legislation?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. COOTE: Then may I ask, if not why not? Are not these men entitled to be brought under that legislation?

Mr. SAUVE: Because their payment is on a basis of tender, not salary.

Mr. COOTE: Not the postmasters, they are paid by salary, not by tender.

Mr. SAUVE: Postmasters are paid commissions.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What does it cost to operate an ordinary rural post office in the west?

Mr. SAUVE: A minimum of one hundred dollars a year plus the cost of the mail service.

Mr. COOTE: Is there a permanent postmaster in charge of the post office at Moose Jaw?

Mr. SAUVE: Moose Jaw is in the charge of the district director.

Mr. COOTE: Is the district director at the same time in charge of the district and acting as postmaster? Is he filling both jobs?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Can the minister give any reason why he is filling both these jobs? Should there not be a postmaster appointed for Moose Jaw?

Mr. SAUVE: It is a new departure. A new organization has been adopted.

Mr. COOTE: How long has this man been filling both these positions?

Mr. SAUVE: Since October.

Mr. COOTE: Is it the intention to appoint a postmaster as well as a district director?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. COOTE: This man is to continue to do both jobs?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Is he paid a salary as postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE: He has a staff for the purpose.

Mr. COOTE: Is the salary paid to him as postmaster or as district director?

Mr. SAUVE: The range of salaries has been increased by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. REID: Last year I drew the minister's attention to the fact that some sixty householders in a district within a mile of the post office at New Westminster who have no mail delivery had to put up boxes seven or eight blocks away, although the district all round them is served with a house to house delivery. I am making an appeal this year on behalf of those householders. Surely if the district surrounding them can be given a house to house delivery there is no reason why this district should not have it. There are about sixty householders and the district is growing fast. I know the statement has been made that before there can be house to house delivery there must be sidewalks. It may be true that sidewalks should be constructed in low lying districts, but the district of which I am speaking is one of the highest areas in the town, and if it rained forty days and forty nights one could still walk with dry feet there because it is not only on a hill but is also very gravelly. I see an increase in the estimates of some $9,600, and I make an earnest plea on behalf of these people. They are well within the city limits, and I do not think the excuse that it would require one extra postman should be considered sufficient for refusing a service that is long overdue. I ask the Postmaster General what can be done about it this year.

Mr. SAUVE: I shall have an inquiry made immediately and will inform the hon. member what it is possible to do.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The minister, I presume, has some authority over the housing of the post office employees throughout the country. I notice in the third line an item of $1,084,600 for miscellaneous, including provision for compassionate allowances to employees injured in performance of their duties. I refer to conditions existing in the Prince Rupert post office. I have already stated on the floor of this house that a respectable farmer would not use that building as a barn. It is cold, it is insanitary, it is a fire trap, and when it is about twelve above zero the people have to go home. I appeal to the minister that he should use part of that million dollars to safeguard the health of those employed there. I have made this plea for them the last three or four years, but I am afraid the minister does not realize the conditions that exist there. Naturally the poor employees themselves cannot complain, because they would take the chance of being discharged, but I make the complaint and ask the minister to look into it and see that something is done to safeguard the health and the life of those employed in the Prince Rupert post office.

Mr. SAUVE: Surely.

Mr. MITCHELL: Could the minister tell me the subsidies paid the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific for carrying the mails?

Mr. SAUVE: There are no subsidies.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then what are the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific paid for carrying the mails?

Mr. SAUVE: They are paid by the car mile.

Mr. MITCHELL: But I want to know the amount. I know they are paid by the car mile, but what is the total?

Mr. SAUVE: In 1933-34 the Canadian National were paid $2,752,951.41, and in the same year the Canadian Pacific were paid $3,412,744.69.

Mr. MITCHELL: Could the minister tell me why the people's own railroad, with so much more mileage, should get less than the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. SAUVE: The amount paid the Canadian Pacific is greater because the trains of this company operate through districts more densely populated than the districts through which the Canadian National operates.

Mr. MITCHELL: The thought has passed through my mind, and I wondered if the government had taken it into consideration, of pooling the amounts paid the two railroads and dividing them equally between the two companies.

Mr. SAUVE: I do not think that would be practicable.

Mr. MANION: I have heard that question asked many times; I have asked it myself, and in addition to what my hon. friend the Postmaster General has said in regard to the density of population there is another very good reason why the Canadian Pacific happen to have more business in the carrying of mails than the Canadian National. As Minister of Railways I am naturally interested, and I am told that the Canadian Pacific, being the older system, having been the only system as a matter of fact up to 1900 or 1903, and having not only the denser traffic but also the older contracts, naturally has continued those contracts because there has been no good reason advanced for taking them away, since the contracts have been properly carried out. I think that has a good deal to do with the fact that the Canadian Pacific has that advantage. Yet another reason is that the Canadian Pacific, with its ocean services on both Atlantic and Pacific, furnishes a through route, and naturally that must be taken into consideration to a certain extent.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Has any decision been taken with regard to the appointment of a postmaster at Iberville.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not yet.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I suppose it is still under consideration?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I see an item of $6,545 for the post office at St. John. Would the hon. minister explain it?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): For the building?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): No, for the post office at St. John.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): For the employees' salaries then?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): What is the postmaster's salary?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): $2,200, or exactly $2,040.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Could the hon. minister tell me how much the cleaning cost last fall?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is under the minister of Public Works.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): May I ask the hon. minister to quit his laconism for a while and give us some details or try to justify what I consider to be an injustice which he has committed when he dismissed Hector Hudon as mail carrier in St. Pascal? After an investigation, he kept him in his position, and if I am well informed, it was during his trip to Egypt—I wouldn't call it his flight to Egypt—that the matter was settled to the detriment of Mr. Hudon. Upon his return I saw the hon. minister, I explained to him the facts the best I could and I was very astonished to hear, last December, that without a word of warning on his part, the contract had been taken away from Mr. Hudon, after an investigation which proved absolutely nothing. If the hon. minister would refer to his files, I think he would find a letter from Father Langlais, parish priest of St. Pascal, strongly protesting against the stand taken by the department.

I understand that it would rather be for the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) to answer this question, because he was acting minister when the hon. minister was visiting Egypt. At any rate if the minister would give some explanation, I would be very glad, because I cannot see anything fair in this dismissal.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is a matter of opinion. Everything has its bright and its dark side. Some held that it was fair to leave this contract to Mr. Hudon, while others thought it was unfair. There were representations from both sides, from Mr. Hudon's friends and from his opponents. The latter were complaining about his conduct, and after having weighed the evidence, I came to the conclusion which has just been referred to by the hon member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard). It is true that I received a letter from the parish priest expressing certain opinions; other people expressed different views. I respected them all, but finally had to make a decision myself.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to see the hon. solicitor general in his seat. Perhaps he remembers this case which I consider extremely unfair. The minister hesitated a long time and he states that there were reasons pro and con. I would like to know what may have been the reasons to justify this dismissal. There are many against it, but I do not see any for which they should have dismissed Hector Hudon, a mail carrier who was doing his work quite well. They have never been able to prove anything against him in the performance of his duties. Outside of his duties he had, it is true, an automobile accident, but that has nothing to do with his contracts with the government. I even believe that the mail carriers may, outside of their work, mix in politics, without being liable to be dismissed.

This man had secured a contract for the carrying of mail and he fulfilled it very well. Absolutely nothing was proved against him, but they deprived him of a position upon which he relied for a living. He was fulfilling his task admirably. It is not a case of political partisanship. He has the support of all the citizens including the parish priest and barring none. The first time the case was brought up, I know that the hon. minister thought that the circumstances were in favour of Mr. Hudon, since he maintained him in his position. But I repeat that in the absence of the Postmaster General the acting Postmaster General who is the hon. Solicitor General thought that he could do better, I suppose, than the Postmaster General and he ordered a new investigation. Afterwards he asked for new tenders and virtually proclaimed the dismissal of Mr. Hudon. The case was left in abeyance until the return of the Postmaster General, who, after having recovered from the fatigue of his long trip, was able to take the matter under consideration, and, finally, in December, without a word of warning and without giving anybody a chance to weigh the circumstances, Hudon was dismissed. I consider that it is absolutely unfair and I challenge the minister to deny the facts at any time, on any public platform, or elsewhere. I even invite the Solicitor General, who is well known in our district, to come to St. Pascal and discuss this case before the people. I believe he will realize that never so great an injustice has been done in a county by the Post Office Department.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Atlantic ocean, Pacific ocean, local services, $2,312,258.26.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was going to ask the minister if he would mind allowing this item to stand for the present. I think perhaps time would be saved by deferring some of the discussion in regard to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall be very glad to allow the item to stand.

Item stands.

British and foreign news service, $15,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give us some particulars with regard to the service that is rendered for this amount?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is Reuter's news service, which has been in the estimates, under contract, for many years. The item has been reduced in recent years from $25,000 or $30,000 to the present figure of $15,000. The vote is the amount of a contract under the terms of the present agreement with Reuter's Limited, dated May 31, 1933, for a period of three years. The contractors agree to transmit from Canada, by cable, for distribution in the United Kingdom an average of 7,000 words monthly, or a proportionate number if the cable rates change, of Canadian news calculated to promote and maintain interest in Canada and Canadian activities; and in addition to maintain its present cable service, and to furnish a service of mail news calculated to promote and maintain interest in Canada and Canadian activities, such news to be distributed by mail throughout the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the West Indies and England. For the purpose of carrying out this service the company will maintain in Canada a special representative who will devote his whole time to the preparation and editing of such news articles, and so forth. It is a very old established service, and it is reported to me that they have sent out a good deal of information under this agreement.

Mr. JACOBS: Not tainted with politics, I hope?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope not.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister has not been there long enough to say whether it is or not?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do know that that was a criticism levelled at the service at one time, but how far it was justified I cannot say.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask who the person is who is disseminating this news?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does my hon. friend mean the person in Ottawa?

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Since the death of Mr. Grange, his brother in law, Mr. McDougall, has carried on this service.

Item agreed to.

Commercial intelligence service, including miscellaneous expenditure in connection with Canada's trade, $696,251.

Mr. SPENCER: Is this the item under which a large amount of advertising was done a year or two ago?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I think not.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $380,428.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This item is generally allowed to stand until all the matters in connection with grain have come before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think my hon. friend is referring to item 276 dealing with the Canada Grain Act. We are not taking up the Canada Grain Act item to-night. The vote now under consideration is for the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. SPENCER: Might I ask the reason for the decrease in this vote?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principal reason is the reduction in the staff of the census bureau. The services of a large number of those engaged for the 1931 census are no longer required.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs, $195,000.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Will the minister tell us the reason for the increase?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principal reason is the increase in service at different points. The high commissioner has recommended that an increased service be given to the fairs in the United Kingdom. The amount required for that particular item is $52,000.

Mr. REID: Are the displays conducted all over the old country or are they conducted only at one particular point?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are distributed around different points as the opportunity arises. It is not always known in advance just where a display may be made; this depends upon what the requisition may be.

Mr. BOTHWELL: This applies only to fairs outside of Canada?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Item agreed to.

International customs tariffs bureau, $3,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This amount is required to provide for Canada's yearly contribution to the international customs tariffs bureau. We make a great deal of use of that bureau. It is located at Brussels and was founded as a result of a convention signed there in 1890 by thirty-nine countries, including Canada. The bureau distributes to the various states supporting it the amendments which may be enacted from time to time. In order to maintain this bureau the countries are assessed according to their respective volume of trade. At the outset Canada was placed in the third class trade position and the average contribution was 3,106 gold francs, or about $600. In 1929 Canada was advanced to the first class and her contribution was raised to 6,833 gold francs, or about $1,319. The amount is increased by ten per cent to provide for the superannuation of the bureau employees.

Item agreed to.

Motion picture bureau, $40,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister kindly explain the functions of this bureau?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This bureau was organized in 1917 and operates as a branch of this department. One of its functions is to circulate throughout the world motion pictures and photographic material designed to disseminate information about Canada's natural resources, industries, et cetera, and through this means encourage the development of trade. The bureau acts as a central organization for the production of technical and instructional advertising in the form of films and pictorial matter. The bureau cooperates with the provincial governments, the national railways and steamship lines and other agencies for the production of pictorial matter in connection with the dominion's welfare and progress. The bureau cooperates with the motion picture industry in matters pertaiing to the welfare and progress of the dominion.

Item agreed to.

National Research Council, $400,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I noticed an item in the press about a month ago to the effect that Doctor Tory's period of employment by the department was about to expire. Has the government come to any decision as to the retention of his services for a further period?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The matter has not even been considered. I think it should be explained that Doctor Tory was employed under a contract for a stated period of years at a stated salary. He is not like any other civil servant; he is there under a special arrangement as the hon. gentleman well knows.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister give us the reason for the increase?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The national research council is doing a very excellent work in the developing of the natural resources of this country. Because of the reduction of revenues in the immediately preceding years it was not possible to give them all the money they required and cuts had to be made last year and the preceding year. This year they asked for a substantially larger sum than $400,000 but I am bound to say that the best I was able to do for them was the lump sum of $400,000. The officers of the department allocate that amount to the best advantage possible. In view of the condition of the revenues and the immediate outlook it was felt that this was as generous as the government could afford to be. We are very sympathetic with them in their requirements but we could not go quite as far as they asked. They should have about $500,000 a year.

Mr. SPENCER: I am not criticizing the increase; I wish it could be a good deal more. The research council is doing splendid work. Is anything being done in connection with the establishing of a standards board such as they have in the United States?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid I shall have to make inquiry as to that and let the hon. gentleman know. I am not very familiar with the technique of the department.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give us an idea as to some of the worth while things this council has done during the last year or so?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An elaborate report is made every year. I have not a copy under my hand at the moment but I shall be glad to see that one is sent to the hon. gentleman. I am sure he will find it to be very interesting reading.

Item agreed to.

Weights and measures inspection service, including the international bureau of weights and measures, $314,396.

Mr. GARDINER: I direct the attention of the minister to a prevalent complaint in Alberta with regard to the weighing of coal. I understand that the coal is not weighed at the pit mouth but on the cars by the railway companies, and there is complaint of shortage of weight with regard to almost every car. Inasmuch as this comes under the jurisdiction of the minister's department I should like to have him investigate the matter in order to see that the railway companies weigh the coal properly, because we are satisfied that proper precautions cannot be taken to weigh the cars and then take off the tare to determine the actual amount of coal in the car. By this method a shortage occurs, with the result that the companies who retail the coal have to sell to consumers less coal than they should. They sell a short ton instead of giving full weight in order to make up the deficiency. I am informed that the railway companies do not stop the cars on the scale but run them over the scale slowly, and this is responsible for the shortage. Will the minister take action in this regard, because the complaint is prevalent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to assure the hon. gentleman that his remarks will be fully noted and a proper check-up made. The department itself checks the scales, but the method of operating the scales is quite another matter. However, his remarks will be referred to the director of weights and measures and proper action taken in so far as we have jurisdiction. With respect to the modus operandi of the railways, I shall also be glad to have their attention directed to the hon. gentleman's remarks. That is as far as I can go in that respect.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think that will be far enough. Three or four years ago I brought the matter to the attention of the minister's predecessor but no effective action was taken. In view of the fact that this complaint is widespread in Alberta I think that the minister should look not only into the matter of testing the scales but also into the method of their operation to see that the scales are managed in such a way that those who buy coal will get their full weight.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will undertake that the full jurisdiction of the act shall be enforced; that is as far as we can go.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It has been rumoured in the press that certain recommendations will be made by the price spreads commission in connection with weights and measures. Might it not be advisable to have this item stand?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly, if it is the wish of the committee. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the department itself, in view of what has appeared in the press and what has taken place in the committee and the royal commission, has been investigating the desirability of tightening up the whole act. I have had it under my personal review and am of the opinion that the act, which has been in force many years under all governments and neither revised, consolidated nor brought up to date for a considerable time, should be revised in certain specific respects. The whole position is being kept very much in view.

Item stands.

International bureau of exhibitions, $2,300.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a new vote. Will the minister give a short explanation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a new item and the amount is required to provide for Canada's contribution to the International Bureau of Exhibitions in accordance with an order in council, P.C. 787, dated April 18, 1934. Perhaps I had better read the order in council:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 23rd March, 1934, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing, in concurrence with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue, as follows:

1. The convention relating to international exhibitions, and the protocol of signature, signed at Paris on the 22nd November, 1928, on behalf of the government of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, were approved by the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada on the 6th and 8th March, 1933, respectively;

2. It is provided by article 33 that "the present convention shall be subject to ratification";

3. It is now deemed advisable to proceed to the ratification of the convention and of the protocol of signature in respect of the government of Canada.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs therefore, in concurrence with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue, recommends that the Secretary of State for External Affairs take appropriate steps to ratify the convention and the protocol of signature in respect of the government of Canada.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

Perhaps I should also read a letter which was addressed to the Canadian minister in France, the Hon. Philippe Roy, by the president of the Bureau International des Expositions. This letter is dated Paris, December 29, 1934, and reads:

Sir,—I have the honour to send you herewith, five copies of the report of the sixth session of the Bureau International des Expositions held at the end of October in Paris.

As your excellency may see in the preliminary note—page 9 of the brochure—the order of the day comprised, among various questions, those regarding: the universal exhibition of Brussels 1935, the aviation exhibition of Stockholm in 1936, the exhibition of technical arts in modern life, of Paris, 1937, and the exhibition of popular arts of Berne, planned for 1939.

The council had moreover to attend to the election of its president, and of a vice-president and to choose the countries represented on the classification commission. Lastly, the budget for the next fiscal year, 1st of April, 1935-31st March, 1936, has been approved, as well as the amount of subscription for the adhering states. From the list on page 54 of the brochure, it appears that the contribution for your country, for the said fiscal year, amounts to: 421 francs x 35 = 14.735 francs.

I take the liberty of drawing your attention to the fact that Canada has not yet paid its dues of 13.834 francs for the present fiscal year 1934-35.

I would be very grateful to you if you would forward to your government the enclosed copies of the report, with the request that they be communicated to the proper organizations that might be interested in the exhibitions.

This is our contribution under the convention which was entered into in 1928 and ratified by the house in 1933. The obligation is to pay Canada's share. This is our share.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is this an annual amount?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose it is as long as we remain a party to the convention.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38 to amend the Railway Act (Rates on grain).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am now asking for leave to introduce is one which would amend the Railway Act so as to give to British Columbia the same terms in the matter of freight rates on grain and grain products for domestic use within that province as are given to the other provinces of the dominion. In other words, this bill will make applicable the same freight rates on grain and grain products westward from Fort William to the Pacific coast as are now in existence from Calgary or Edmonton eastward. These rates were fixed by statute, first in 1897 and again in 1925.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MINIMUM WAGE

APPROVAL OF DRAFT CONVENTION ADOPTED BY GENERAL CONFERENCE, INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice, for Mr. Bennett) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention concerning the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its eleventh session in Geneva on the 16th day of June, 1928, reading as follows:—

92582—110½

Draft Convention Concerning the Creation of Minimum Wage Fixing machinery

The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,

Having been convened at Geneva by the governing body of the international labour office, and having met in its eleventh session on 30th May, 1928, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to minimum wage fixing machinery, which is the first item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a draft international convention, adopts, this sixteenth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight, the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace:—

Article 1

Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention undertakes to create or maintain machinery whereby minimum rates of wages can be fixed for workers employed in certain of the trades or parts of trades (and in particular in home working trades) in which no arrangements exist for the effective regulation of wages by collective agreement or otherwise and wages are exceptionally low.

For the purpose of this convention the term "trades" includes manufacture and commerce.

Article 2

Each member which ratifies this convention shall be free to decide, after consultation with the organizations, if any, of workers and employers in the trade or part of trade concerned, in which trades or parts of trades, and in particular in which home working trades or parts of such trades, the minimum wage fixing machinery referred to in article 1 shall be applied.

Article 3

Each member which ratifies this convention shall be free to decide the nature and form of the minimum wage fixing machinery, and the methods to be followed in its operation:—

Provided that,

(1) Before the machinery is applied in a trade or part of trade, representatives of the employers and workers concerned, including representatives of their respective organizations, if any, shall be consulted as well as any other persons, being specially qualified for the purpose by their trade or functions, whom the competent authority deems it expedient to consult;

(2) The employers and workers concerned shall be associated in the operation of the machinery, in such manner and to such extent, but in any case in equal numbers and on equal terms, as may be determined by national laws or regulations;

(3) Minimum rates of wages which have been fixed shall be binding on the employers and workers concerned so as not to be subject to abatement by them by individual agreement, nor, except with the general or particular authorization of the competent authority, by collective agreement.

Article 4

Each member which ratifies this convention shall take the necessary measures, by way of a system of supervision and sanctions, to ensure that the employers and workers concerned are informed of the minimum rates of wages in force and that wages are not paid at less than these rates in cases where they are applicable.

A worker to whom the minimum rates are applicable and who has been paid wages at less than these rates shall be entitled to recover, by judicial or other legalized proceedings, the amount by which he has been underpaid, subject to such limitation of time as may be determined by national laws or regulations.

Article 5

Each member which ratifies this convention shall communicate annually to the international labour office a general statement giving a list of the trades or parts of trades in which the minimum wage fixing machinery has been applied, indicating the methods as well as the results of the application of the machinery and in summary form, the approximate numbers of workers covered, the minimum rates of wages fixed, and the more important of the other conditions, if any, established relevant to the minimum rates.

Article 6

The formal ratifications of this convention under the conditions set forth in part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and in the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace shall be communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 7

This convention shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.

It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretary-general.

Thereafter, this convention shall come into force for any member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Article 8

As soon as the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, the secretary-general of the League of Nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization. He shall likewise notify them of the registration of ratifications which may be communicated subsequently by other members of the organization.

Article 9

A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Each member which has ratified this convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this article, will be bound for another period of five years and, thereafter, may denounce this convention at the expiration of each period of five years under the terms provided for in this article.

Article 10

At least once in ten years, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision or modification.

Article 11

The French and English texts of this convention shall both be authentic, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read is the result of a draft convention submitted by the labour department of the League of Nations and which was approved on June 16, 1928, by the eleventh session held at Geneva. It is called a draft convention concerning the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery, and the approval of this house is now sought of the provisions of this draft convention. While this draft convention was passed in 1928 and submitted in due course to the various nations which make up the League of Nations, it was not formerly introduced in this house nor has a request been made heretofore to parliament for its approval. I may state for the information of the house that the convention has already been approved by the following countries: Australia, Chile, China, Colombia, France, Germany, Great Britain, Hungary, the Irish Free State, Italy, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, South Africa, Spain and Uruguay.

I fancy it is unnecessary for me to give any historical résumé in regard to this matter. This draft convention is in a similar position to the other conventions which have been hitherto submitted for approval at this session of parliament. The convention as now submitted follows, I think, exactly the language of the draft convention. If approved by parliament a bill will be introduced with the idea of carrying out the provisions of the convention. If the convention is approved there will be an interval of twelve months before it can be brought into operation under its terms. If approved and ratified by the act which I propose to introduce, then it is registered at Geneva and, after due ratification and notification, becomes binding throughout the Dominion of Canada.

As the house is no doubt aware, in many of the provinces of Canada at the present time there exist minimum wage laws. I think this applies to seven of the nine provinces; the only two in which such laws are not now in force are Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. New Brunswick has already passed a minimum wage act, but that act is not to be brought into force until it is proclaimed, and I understand that it has not yet been proclaimed. But in the seven other provinces there are different minimum wage laws in force. The effect of the approval of this present draft convention and its subsequent enactment into law will be to supersede the provincial laws in respect of minimum wages. The authority of this parliament with respect to such a matter is I think undoubted, having regard to the fact that Canada became a party to the treaty of Versailles and to the covenant of the League of Nations; and under section 132 of the British North America Act this parliament is empowered to carry into effect such a convention and to impose it upon the rest of the dominion.

There will be in the bill—perhaps I should not mention it now, but I do—a saving clause in respect to the minimum laws in any of the provinces which provide rates in excess of any minimum wages which may be provided under the dominion act. If in any province higher wages are authorized than those provided in the dominion legislation, the higher wages will still prevail. I think that is the only explanation needed of me at the present time, and I move the approval of the house of this resolution.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With the principle of a minimum wage in industry we on this side of the house are in full accord, and I am pleased indeed that in most of the provinces of Canada, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has just said—and I believe that they are the authority to deal with this question—such a provision is in force.

I do not desire to repeat in any way the arguments which I presented when another draft convention was laid on the table of this house for approval, but I wish to place before the house an aspect of the question which I have not dealt with in any way and which I believe is of the most serious importance. The government bases its claim for jurisdiction in this matter, as well as in the other draft conventions which have been submitted, on the treaty of Versailles and more particularly on the labour part of that treaty and on our adhesion to the League of Nations and our membership in the league.

I need not say that I have always been a strong supporter of the idea of the League of Nations. I supported it before it was established; I supported it when it was introduced in this parliament in 1919, and I have always supported it since. I am a believer in the principle of collective security for the establishment of peace in the world, and I do not think I am disclosing any secret in saying that so long as I was a member of the government of Canada I always worked to have our country accept the principles of the league. Indeed, on the question of the acceptance of the optional clause which bound Canada to accept the decision of the international court of justice —it was optional—Canada led the other countries of the empire in the acceptance of that clause, and I had the honour to speak for this country at one of the conferences in London which dealt with that matter. Even last week it was my privilege to address a large audience in my own city in defence of the ideas and the principle of the League of Nations. I have had the honour of serving as president of the League of Nations Society in Canada for the last two years, having only recently resigned, because I thought that in justice to the society as well as to myself I ought to have my full freedom in the discussion of certain matters connected with this question of the League of Nations.

I submit—and I am sorry to say so—that the new theory, the new doctrine which has been accepted by the government and which is being set forth for the purpose of transferring jurisdiction from the provinces to this parliament on certain matters is a blow to the prestige of the league and its work in this country. We entered the league and voted for the treaty of peace, the covenant of the League of Nations, and the international labour office, as I said, in 1919. Canada accepted that because of what was then stated was her obligation as a result of our joining these international bodies. What was stated at the time with regard to this section 405 of the treaty which the government claims gives jurisdiction to this parliament on the question of draft conventions? This is not in any way a new matter. In 1919, when the peace treaty was before the House of Commons, various documents explaining the many matters included in the treaty were at the same time laid on the table of the house. I have before me sessional papers for 1919, the special session which was held just for the purpose of approving the treaty, and there was laid on the table and printed by order of the house a certain report by the British delegates to the peace conference. I wish to draw the attention of the house to what they said in their report with regard to this very matter of draft conventions, and I quote from page 8 of the report as contained in the sessional papers of 1919. When section 405, the present section, came before the delegates of the peace conference, there immediately arose trouble because of the situation of federal states. The United States delegates of course had an important standing at the peace conference. President Wilson was there with his associates, and this is what the British delegates said:

The American delegation, however, found themselves unable to accept the obligations implied in the British draft on account of the limitations imposed on the central executive and legislative powers by the constitution of certain federal states, and notably of the United States themselves. They pointed out that the federal government could not accept the obligation to ratify conventions dealing with matters within the competence of the forty-eight states of the union, with which the power of labour legislation for the most part rested. Further, the federal government could not guarantee that the constituent states, even if they passed the necesary legislation to give effect to a convention, would put it into effective operation, nor could it provide against the possibility of such legislation being declared unconstitutional by the supreme judicial authorities. The government could not therefore engage to do something which was not within their power to perform, and the nonperformance of which would render them liable to complaint.

The commission felt that they were here faced by a serious dilemma, which threatened to make the establishment of any real system of international labour legislation impossible. On the one hand, its range and effectiveness would be almost fatally limited if a country of such industrial importance as the United States did not participate. On the other hand, if the scheme were so weakened as to impose no obligation on states to give effect to, or even to bring before their legislative authorities, the decisions of the labour conference, it was clear that its work would tend to be confined to the mere passage of resolutions instead of resulting in the promotion of social reforms with the sanction of law behind them.

The commission spent a considerable amount of time in attempting to devise a way out of this dilemma, and is glad to be able to record that it ultimately succeeded in doing so. Article 19 as now drafted—

That is section 405.

—represents a solution found by a subcommission consisting of representatives of the American, British and Belgian delegations specially appointed to consider the question. It provides that the decisions of the labour conference may take the form either of recommendations or of draft conventions. Either must be deposited with the secretary general of the League of Nations and each state undertakes to bring it within one year before its competent authorities for the enactment of legislation or other action. If no legislation or other action to make a recommendation effective follows, or if a draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the competent authorities concerned, no further obligation will rest on the state in question. In the case of a federal state, however, whose power to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, its government may treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only.

Further on they said:

Though reluctant to contemplate an arrangement under which all states would not be under identical obligations, the commission felt that it was impossible not to recognize the constitutional difficulties which undoubtedly existed in the case of certain federal states, and therefore proposed the above solution as the best possible in the circumstances.

In another house, an hon. gentleman who was responsible for the enactment of the law ratifying the treaty in 1919 said: How would the Americans act? They would certainly ratify those draft conventions and act as a nation, and not merely send those draft conventions to the various states. He was in error. This section 405 was drafted just to meet the case of the United States, Canada and other federated states situated in similar circumstances. The Prime Minister said: Yes, but there is in the article mention of the discretion which may be used by the federal member of the league. Yes, there is a discretion, but not a discretion to do what is being done by ratifying these conventions in this dominion parliament. This is what the discretion is:

In the case of a federal state, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only,—

No legislative action is required.

—and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

The above article shall be interpreted in accordance with the following principle.

That is, there is this discretion that the federal state may treat this merely as a recommendation though it is a draft convention, but when it does not treat it as a recommendation, there is another part of this section that applies, and that part states:

In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention—

And so forth. So that the discretion is either to treat the draft convention as a recommendation or to accept it as a draft convention and to ratify it only if the consent of the competent authority to deal with it is first obtained to do so. The Prime Minister said, a former Prime Minister: But Canada is a nation, and we have the right to act as a nation. Yes, Canada is a nation, I am pleased to see that recognized even by those who did not like it when steps toward nationhood were being taken. I am proud to say Canada is a nation. But Canada is a nation as a federal state. Canada consists not only of this parliament but of the nine provincial legislatures as well. It is Canada as a federal state that is the nation, in exactly the same manner as the United States is a nation, although it consists of forty-eight states which are autonomous and upon whose powers congress cannot encroach; in exactly the same way as Brazil is a nation, as the Argentine republic is a nation, as Australia is a nation. But they are all federal states. And the fact that we are a nation does not give us the right to encroach upon the autonomy and the jurisdiction of the various provinces which form part of our confederation. No hon. member in this house who at that time agreed to enter the League of Nations did so with the idea that this would have the effect of changing the constitution of Canada, that it would have the effect of taking some powers from the provinces and transferring them to the dominion parliament. Every government that has been at the head of affairs since 1919, every Prime Minister, every minister of the crown who has dealt with this matter has taken no other attitude than the one I am taking now. Even the Supreme Court of Canada took the same stand. In another house a gentleman who has been Prime Minister and who is one of those responsible for what took place said, "I was wrong when I said that." He even said that the Supreme Court of Canada was wrong in 1925 when they gave their decision. Well, Mr. Speaker, if those gentlemen were wrong, if the government of Canada was wrong in 1919 when they told us what the obligations were that we were assuming, we accepted everything under a pretence, which I will not say was false, but which amounts to a breach of trust towards those who in good faith accepted the solemn statement and declarations of the statesmen who were speaking for the people of Canada at that time.

The radio and aviation judgments have nothing to do with this question of a draft convention for international labour. They were based on special treaties which were entered into with various other nations. If we accept this theory of the government what does it mean? Every year three or four gentlemen leave Canada to go to Geneva to attend a labour conference. I have here the names of all the delegates to the labour conferences since 1921. There is nobody for whom I have more respect than my good friend Tom Moore, who is head of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. There is always a representative of the employers also, he is usually a manufacturer from Toronto or Montreal, sometimes their legal representative. And the government is represented either by one of the officers of the Department of Labour or by Doctor Riddell. They are all good fellows, but has it ever entered the mind of any Canadian that Mr. Tom Moore, or Paddy Draper, or a manufacturer of Toronto should go to Geneva and by simply assenting to or taking part in the passing of a draft convention concerning hours of labour or minimum wages or anything in the world would have the power to transfer from the provinces the jurisdiction given to them by the British North America Act? Nobody has ever dreamed that such a state of things could exist. Do you see what tremendous importance and responsibility those delegates to the international labour conference would have if the doctrine of the government is accepted as the right one?

There is more than that. Since the establishment of the international labour conference Canada has been a member of the governing body. The eight greatest industrial nations of the world had a permanent seat on the governing body, Canada being one. In 1922 I had the honour to go to the meeting of the League of Nations with the late Mr. Fielding to represent Canada, and as a labour conference took place immediately after I represented Canada at that conference. Then there was a movement to exclude Canada from the governing body, passed unanimously in the committee which dealt with the question. I opposed the report of the committee before the full conference, and I had the pleasure to get a unanimous vote rejecting the report of the committee and retaining Canada on the governing body. Since then Canada has continued to sit on the governing body until this year, but this year Canada is replaced by Russia. Of course being a member of the governing body gives prestige to a nation. The resolutions and recommendations and draft conventions that come before the conference are always prepared before the conference takes place, and the members of the governing body have indeed an important part to play there. But Canada is there no longer. Draft conventions which might be brought before the international labour conference by the governing body, of which we are no longer members, but of which Russia is in our place,—whether we here accept these conventions or not is not the question at all—would have the effect of giving to the parliament of Canada jurisdiction and power which the British North America Act does not give to this parliament. Can this be contradicted or denied? I do not think it can. And I think that you will agree that this is a serious matter, a most serious matter with respect to the prestige of the league and of the international labour conference in this country. In point of fact newspapers that have always criticized the League of Nations, always criticized our membership in it, are taking advantage of this new position to criticize further and to discredit what Canada is doing there and to say that its constitution is being changed at the behest of men coming from all parts of the world. Of course I do not admit that it is right. I do not think the position taken by this house is right, and I humbly submit that it will not be accepted by the courts. I think we shall come back to the constitutional status of Canada as it is, until it is changed in an orderly way, and not simply by assuming a jurisdiction which is not ours.

Now I see my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He used rather vehement language in regard to my stand on this matter the other day, rather passionate. I do not blame him for that, but he is certainly wrong when he takes that stand. He is not alone in taking that position; I have heard other gentlemen say, "Well, what has the constitution to do with it? When we are facing difficulties we must look after the human constitution" and so on. That is soap boxing at its worst. Certainly human measures must be adopted; we all must do our best to achieve reforms, but they must be achieved in an orderly and proper way and not simply by saying, "We are the strongest; we are going to do it whether or not the constitution says so." And, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman speaks in this house as he does; if he speaks his mind openly in various parts of the country as he does—and he does well to do so—it is because he is protected by the constitution. The constitution is our safeguard. I cannot understand gentlemen who protest against the prevailing order of things in the world being impatient with regard to the constitution, and being willing to have it set aside if they do not like some of its provisions. I am with them when they ask that changes should be made, but I ask my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre what is the use of the committee, to which has been sent his resolution, if we simply say that we assume responsibility, that the constitution need not be changed but that we are merely taking these steps by our own will and our own action.

I agree with my leader that before these measures were introduced in this house there should have been an understanding with the provinces. Not only is that the only legal and rational way; it would have been also the only courteous way, but instead the government are taking a position which will invite trouble, as I am sure they know. They ought to have the opinion of the courts with regard to the matter. The Prime Minister says he does not like references to the supreme court, that they do not amount to anything and that we should avoid them. Well, would it surprise you, Mr. Speaker, to learn that last year, not when my right hon. leader was head of the government but in 1934, no less than three references were submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada? I will mention them. There was a reference as to the constitutionality of the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act. There was a reference as to the constitutionality of section 110 of the Dominion Companies Act, and there was another reference with regard to the legality of certain provisions concerning the tariff board. If these three references could be made last year in connection with matters a good deal less important than those now submitted to the house, why not take the same course with regard to these questions? We cannot refer to what takes place in a committee, of course, but the deputy minister of justice gave it as his opinion that the reference to the courts should take place afterward by way of an action instituted by some interested party, and then the courts could pronounce as to the validity and legality of the act. I submit that this should not be the situation. When matters so important as these, in connection with which industries will have to change their methods, readjustments will have to be made, and large expenditures of money may be necessary, I think the constitutionality and validity should be tested first rather than after the measures are placed on the statute books of the country.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of the principle of minimum wages. I am even in favour of this draft convention so far as it applies to dominion works or to those parts of Canada which are not part of any province. So far as the rest is concerned, I am in favour of it but it is for the provinces to deal with, and I have no hesitation in saying that those who are in favour of these measures will see before long that the position I take is the correct position.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this measure, as in connection with the other social measures that have been introduced, I welcome the action taken by the government in attempting to honour our obligations under the peace treaty. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has asked why I have urged that a committee consider how we may best revise the British North America Act. Let me say that it must be nearly ten years since I first brought in a resolution to this effect, which resolution was sharply turned down. A few years later I again introduced a resolution along the same lines, and at that time the government promised that we would have some sort of action in the way of a conference on the matter between the dominion and the provinces. That, however, never took place, so this year I again urged that action be taken. I think it would have been well if years ago we could have had a decision with regard to the best means of amending the British North America Act, so I do not think the hon. member who has just spoken can very well say that I have been indifferent to that aspect of the matter. But it is a good many years since we first gave our solemn obligation to do something with regard to such matters as those we have before us to-day. I think the hon. member for Quebec East will admit that times do change and things do move on, and that social changes greatly change even legal interpretations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My legal friends may say no; that is a pose with them. After the gold case in the United States I think we all began to understand a little more clearly that political exigencies as well as a completely changed condition do make necessary changes in legal interpretations. A few years ago in Canada our supreme court decided that women were not persons under the terms of the British North America Act. That might have been quite clearly and properly the strict legal interpretation; I am told by my friends that it was. I think, however, that the great majority of the people of Canada welcomed the decision of the privy council that under changed conditions women could have a place in the Senate. We cannot forever be tied down by interpretations given many years ago. The fact is that we live in a new world under changed conditions and in some way or other we must attempt to meet those changed conditions. The hon. member for Quebec East rather suggests that I have been guilty of soap boxing when I have not paid too great attention to the letter of the law in such matters as the one before us. Well, I should like to say to him that in my judgment the constitution was made for Canada and for the Canadian people; the Canadian people were not made for the constitution. I believe that is a sound principle.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And it seems to me that under those circumstances some effort must be made to enable us to live—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Change it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are trying to change it. Meantime, we must live. The hon. member for Quebec East was for a good many years a member of a government that made no effort to change the constitution.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not changed yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but the hon. member made no effort to change it, and the government of which he was a member made no effort to implement the terms of the peace treaty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the hon. member read the report which was printed following the interprovincial conference?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He must have seen that I made some efforts there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was a very weak effort, one not worthy of the hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not as strong as those of my hon. friend of course,—but I did my best.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would not say one is doing his best when he is content to accept a very narrow interpretation of our rights under our constitution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I never accepted any narrow interpretation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the trouble with the hon. member for Quebec East is that he is so sincere in his beliefs that he assumes all the rest of us must, of necessity, concede that his interpretation is right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We must never agree.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are other interpretations, and I fancy the hon. member for Quebec East is exaggerating a very great deal when he says that such a convention as the one before us is, in effect, a change of the constitution of Canada.

I shall illustrate by reference to another matter, altogether. During the last few years we set up an imperial conference for which there is no provision in the constitution. At that imperial conference certain agreements were made which resulted in certain tariff changes, and those tariff changes were agreed to by the government before they were submitted to parliament. Possibly the hon. member for Quebec East will argue that those imperial agreements really changed our constitution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all; we are within our jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He might argue as I have suggested; I am glad he does not. But I submit it is fundamental under our constitution that the people ought not to be taxed, without their consent and tariffs are of the nature of a tax.

An hon. MEMBER: They had to be ratified.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear the hon. member suggest the reason; they had to be ratified by parliament. Very well; I do not think the obligations we undertook at the time of the Versailles treaty were undertaken with the understanding that we would comply without ratification. I take it that the resolution now brought before us is a ratification by this parliament; that is all it is. I say this because I do not believe the hon. member for Quebec East is at all right when he suggests that the obligations which we undertook at Versailles, in connection with the Versailles treaty in any respect whatever had the effect of changing our constitution. He would seek to frighten us by the idea that since Russia has now taken our place in the council of the league, what Russia determines in conjunction with other members in the council might have the effect of still further altering our constitution. Nothing done there will be binding upon Canada until it is ratified, and the whole problem is as to whether or not we have the right to ratify. It is not a problem of changing our constitution at all. I do not believe the hon. member for Quebec East has been at all right in suggesting any result as serious as that.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

The question is as to whether we wish to ratify the convention. The nations signing the peace treaty recognized very clearly that there could not be permanent peace without the establishment of social justice. I fancy that all of us would agree with that general principle. But if we are to have social justice I believe it becomes necessary for us to have something like uniform international standards. We are recognizing that to a certain extent in connection with our monetary affairs. The world becomes a chaos unless we have something like uniform monetary standards. It would be quite impossible for us to maintain our Canadian standards of labour if Japan, Czechoslovakia or some other country were allowed to compete with us while their workers were condemned to very low standards of living. It is obvious that if we are going to have free competition such as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) would like to have, in order that that competition should be fair we would require something like uniform standards. So even the hon. member for Weyburn would be driven to accept something of this nature.

Mr. YOUNG: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I take it, then, that unless Canada is to fall far behind other nations we must seek in some way to implement our treaty obligations. The hon. member for Quebec East has stressed the fact that we are a federal country. Well, child labour was continued for a great many years in the United States under exactly the same plea—state rights. It required the new deal introduced by President Roosevelt to get rid of child labour. There are ways of overriding even these so-called state rights, rights which in actual practice frequently mean that certain individuals or certain groups who have personal or corporate interest in maintaining low standards and retarding progress are, under what they call state rights, able to make an excuse for perpetuation the existing state of affairs.

I realize that in Canada we have difficulties. But if this country is to be preserved as a federation we must have uniformity along certain lines. We have one set of tariffs which apply to all of Canada. In the west we have felt that for a good many years, because of the high tariffs which have been granted to eastern manufacturers, we have been very unjustly treated. We are told however that we could not very well split up into regional divisions for purposes of tariffs, although I would say in passing that the present government has attempted to do that very thing so far as seasonal tariffs are concerned. They have imposed fruit and vegetable tariffs on the people in the west long before they have been placed on the people in the east. On the whole however I believe we have thought that we ought to have uniformity in tariff arrangements. If that be correct then surely we ought to have some sort of uniformity in the conditions under which the manufacturer produces. I suppose it is thirty years since I heard a manufacturer in my own city complaining that we could not possibly introduce provincial minimum wage laws so long as the manufacturers in Montreal were paying their employees much lower wages than were being paid in Winnipeg. There is a good deal in that argument. Therefore we cannot have effective minimum wage legislation until it is standardized throughout the various provinces.

The suggestion has been made that already we have minimum wage legislation in those provinces. We have; but with the exception of one province such legislation is confined to female labour; it is not a general minimum wage scale. My labour friends have always been a little bit afraid of minimum wage legislation because they are afraid that the minimum wage may become the standard wage. I take it that there is some little danger along that line, but notwithstanding this I feel that on the whole minimum wage legislation is a move in the right direction.

Another question arises as to the basis upon which we are to calculate the minimum wage. This offers a real difficulty. Usually it is calculated upon the basis of what is sufficient to support a man and his family in decency. The average family is considered as being one consisting of three children, but it is known to all that we do not have average families. Some workers are not married, others have one child, others two or three children, while others may have six, eight, ten or fifteen children. There is no "average" family and if we provide a minimum wage based upon some hypothetical average family we will not be providing for the needs of actual families. Several years ago I supported a motion moved in this house by one of the Quebec members to provide for something in the way of dominion-wide family allowances. I think such allowances would be reasonable and would be a more just way of providing for the actual needs of families in this country. That motion was thrown out. I realize that there are certain theoretical objections to such an arrangement as some people think that the providing of family allowances would mean the subsidizing of very large familes, which would be disastrous. On the other hand, I would point out that when the standard of living rises, the size of the family usually decreases.

It seems to me that we should make it a crime to employ people in this country at less than a decent wage. Of course this legislation will put this matter within the criminal code, though I would not object to its being placed there. We make it a crime for a man to ill treat his horse by not feeding it properly or by treating it cruelly, but, so far, it has been quite proper for an employer to give his employee less than will enable him to live according to a decent standard of living and rear his family in decency. It seems to me that anything tending to make it impossible for employers to act in this way is a move in the right direction. I have not seen the bill so I cannot speak as to its terms but I hope that it will provide for a standard high enough to make it possible for every Canadian to live decently. Until such time as we get a change in our constitution or until such time as we get a new interpretation of our constitution I think the government is well advised to introduce legislation of this kind and have Canada placed side by side with some of the other more progressive countries in the world.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it seems necessary that I should make a statement in order to meet certain criticism which appeared last year in the public press and which I think was due to a misapprehension of the views which I entertain. The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the question referred to it as to hours of labour and other matters I do not think has been clearly understood or expressed by certain speakers in this house and in another place. Referring to article 405, paragraph 5 of the treaty of Versailles which deals with labour matters, on June 10, 1925, Mr. Justice Duff said:

> It seems very clear that the duty arising under this clause is not a duty to enact legislation or to promote legislation; it is an undertaking simply to bring the recommendation or draft convention before the competent authority.

That was the opinion given by the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference made to it by the government of the day. My personal opinion is that I do not think that opinion of the supreme court is likely to be overturned when read in connection with the question submitted to it. This is simply the personal opinion of one who has been a student of the British North America Act for a period dating from fifteen years after its passage during which time I have found it necessary to refer to the decisions of the courts on its various provisions and apply them as best I could. There was an important reservation in the decision of Mr. Justice Duff. He said:

> No question is submitted as to the duty of the member arising under the succeeding clauses of the same article in the event of the competent authority or authorities giving its or their consent to the recommendation or draft convention; and upon this no opinion is expressed.

In my opinion, dealing merely with the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, they do not impose upon Canada an absolute obligation to enact legislation with regard to the hours of labour. Speaking from memory only, I believe that when the treaty was being framed it was suggested that the decisions of the delegates sent by the constituent members to the labour office should be binding upon their governments. I believe at one stage the British delegates were in favour of that, but the great body of opinion was that the delegates to the labour office should not be empowered, when framing conventions dealing with matters of special importance to labour, to override the authority or discretion of the governments or the parliaments which they represented at the labour conventions. I do not think there is any foundation for the suggestion of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that we are bound to adopt recommendations and draft conventions which are submitted to the governments of the various members of the league.

If any obligation arises it arises after the parliament of Canada or the legislative authority of any other member has ratified one of these conventions. Does not the ratification of the convention create new obligations for the parliament which has ratified it? There is nothing in all that I have read in connection with the negotiations leading up to the treaty of Versailles and in all I have read with regard to the formulating of these conventions at the labour office that even suggests that the framing of the convention or the framing of the recommendations limits the discretion of this parliament in its dealing with the convention after it has been brought before parliament. Therefore in my opinion parliament to-day is exercising a free and unrestricted discretion in discussing this draft convention, with an absolute discretion as to whether it will ratify it or not. If parliament to-day, by this resolution, authorizes the ratification of this convention and, pursuant to that authority, the government of Canada on behalf of Canada files with the office at Geneva its ratification, the convention having been duly signed and, in the ordinary parlance, sealed and delivered by Canada, then only the question arises with regard to the obligations of Canada which are created by its act of ratification and signature and delivery of the convention, so sealed and ratified in its name.

Now, with regard to the obligations arising under the convention after it is ratified by Canada, grave differences of opinion have appeared. That was not a matter which was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada in the hours of labour case. That decision which I have noted of Mr. Justice Duff, now the chief justice of that court, reserves that question as to what obligations would ensue from the ratification of one of these labour conventions. That question has never heretofore been before the parliament of Canada; it has never been before the Supreme Court of Canada; and as to what decision will be reached when that question comes before the Supreme Court of Canada, each of us may make his own individual predictions.

In the practice of law for the greater part of half a century I have been called upon from week to week and month to month to advise as to what the law of the country is; but in giving an opinion as to what the law is on new questions of law, counsel is often called upon to predict, from his study of the law and his study of past and contemporaneous decisions, what a majority of the supreme court will find when the question is argued before it. There will be such predictions as the ex-Minister of Justice indicated in respect to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States where five justices decided one way and four gave an opinion to the contrary. On almost any nice legal question that arises men differ, and honestly and conscientiously differ in the opinions which they express on the bench as elsewhere.

It seems to me that the question that will come before the court when the proposed legislation, which will be framed on this convention with a view to carrying it into effect, is finally enacted, involving the obligations which Canada assumes by ratifying the convention, will necessarily include the issue as to the competence of parliament to carry into effect and fulfil the obligations which it has assumed, because there is no doubt that we shall assume obligations by ratifying this convention. By one clause of the treaty of Versailles the obligations which we assume may be referred to the permanent court of international justice to decide whether we have carried them into effect or not. That clause, as to our duty, even goes further than a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. The Supreme Court of Canada will decide with respect to the legislation which we enact as to what is its effect and as to whether it is in the competence of the parliament of Canada to enact the specific legislation which the government has in view and will bring down to the house within a few days.

With regard to that legislation I think it is just possible that grave differences of opinion may arise as they have arisen in this house. No one could have a more implicit confidence in the good faith and sincerity of the ex-Minister of Justice than I have, after having watched his career for some twenty odd years. On questions of civil law, of constitutional law and international law, while I may differ from him, I have not the slightest doubt as to his sincerity and good faith in giving expression to his opinions. And more than that, I do not think that in giving his opinion he is consiously moved by political or partisan motives or considerations, because I think he has reached that status where in giving his opinions on pure questions of law, whether constitutional or civil, he will inform the house of his real views. But there are differences of opinion which are likely to arise. Professor Berriedale Keith, in 1928, in volume 1 of his work, states one view, and it has been the prevalent view in Canada up to the present time. It is found in the second edition of "Responsible Government in the Dominions," page 580, from which I quote the following:

> The second point is whether under the treaty of peace the real obligation is not to bring a convention before the authority which can consent to ratify, and this authority is the parliament of Canada. This is ingenious, but it is not the natural interpretation of the treaty of peace provisions, which in point of fact were deliberately inserted to meet the case of federal states where the central authority has normally not a general power to deal with issues such as concern the labour organization under the treaty of peace. No doubt if Canada should ratify by executive action, then the dominion could legislate, but, despite the legality of such a course, it would normally be unconstitutional.

I infer from this that Professor Berriedale Keith, is of the opinion that if a convention such as this is ratified by authority of the parliament of Canada, then it is quite possible that legislation may be introduced to carry it into effect, which would be unconstitutional in the sense of overriding the powers of the provinces, which have been constitutionally vested in them by section 92 of the British North America Act.

Further, in the decision made, as reported in 1932 Appeal Reports, by the judicial committee of the privy council in the radio case, I cannot find an opinion to the effect that, as regards international agreements made by Canada independently of the empire, such as the agreement then made, which was one between Canada and the United States, Cuba and I think Mexico, the effect of Canada engaging in such a treaty necessarily brings that treaty under section 132 of the British North America Act. Such an opinion may be there, but I have read that case many times and I have not been able to find it in the four corners of the radio decision given by the judicial committee of the privy council.

Fifteen years after the passing of the British North America Act, we were told in one of the best schools of law that I think has existed in Canada, that section 132 of that act arose in this way. Prior to the time of the passing of the act it was not necessary for the imperial parliament so called, to ratify all treaties by legislation. Treaties were made in the name of Her Majesty, and such treaties when once made in the name of Her Majesty and ratified by the filing of the documents of ratification relating to the treaty or convention, were binding on the governments of the United Kingdom and all colonial and other governments associated in the British empire. Many of those treaties did not require specific legislation by parliament to carry them into effect. In so far as, when once ratified, they could be carried into full effect by executive authority, they were so carried into effect without confirmation by the imperial parliament, and the imperial parliament was called upon to pass confirming legislation only in so far as such legislation was necessary to carry such treaties into effect by reason of the fact that they directly affected trade and commerce or property and civil rights within the United Kingdom or its dominions. When those who composed the conference in which the British North America Act originated met together and when they subsequently consulted in London with the authorities there, it was then suggested that inasmuch as a certain autonomy was being given to the new Dominion of Canada, its parliament in lieu of the British parliament should be competent to carry into effect by legislation throughout Canada those treaties affecting Canadian interests, which were made in the name of the empire by Her Majesty, that is to say, treaties regarding which it was necessary to enact legislation to carry out their provisions and to give them full effect. Therefore that power was given to Canada under section 132, and inasmuch as the aeroplane treaty was an imperial treaty, the judicial committee of the privy council gave full effect to the legislation which had been enacted by the Canadian parliament to carry the provisions of that treaty into effect. But we always believed in our younger days that the parliament of Canada under the peace, order and good government clause had a legislative competence beyond that which has since in more recent years, been recognized by our courts. The intention of the so-called fathers of confederation was clearly enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald in the confederation debates of February 8, 1865, when he said.

> We have deliberately adopted a system different from that in the United States. We have strengthened the central government. We have given the central legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on it not only specially and in detail all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred on the local governments and local legislatures, shall be conferred upon the central government and legislature. We have thus avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of the present disruption of the United States.

Furthermore, on the introduction and discussion of that bill in the imperial parliament, the intention as it was then understood by the fathers of confederation was clearly expressed by the Earl of Carnarvon who had charge of the bill in the imperial parliament, and this is what he said concerning it:

> The real object is to give to the central government those high functions and sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the provinces, and at the same time to retain to each province an ample measure of municipal liberty and self-government.

He added:

> I ought also to point out that the residue of legislation unprovided for in the specific classification will belong to the central body.

In the early days we accepted those pronouncements as being a fair, full and complete enunciation of the purport of the provisions of the British North America Act. Since that day much has occurred. When under section 92 the provinces were given exclusive jurisdiction with regard to property and civil rights, property and civil rights I am convinced had a comparatively narrow interpretation in the minds of the men who drafted the provision and inserted it in the 13th subsection of section 92. Those men would regard property and civil rights first as civil rights such as had been conferred on the province of Quebec by its civil code, and in other provinces such rights as relate to property, personal and real, the transfer of property, the devolution of estates and all matters of that kind which were in the minds of men who lived in those days close to the soil, may I say, closer than we live at present. But successive decisions of the judicial committee have given widely extended scope to the term "property and civil rights," wider I think than was ever contemplated by the framers of the British North America Act. Decisions of the courts, like the opinions of people in the course of time swing like a pendulum. This recent decision in the radio case shows a disposition on the part of the judicial committee of the privy council to go back to the original view as to the jurisdiction of parliament under "peace, order and good government," and with regard to the vesting in this parliament of these legislative powers which are not specifically vested in the legislatures by section 92. Therefore you find, as I said, a backward swing of the pendulum, and a disposition to discover in the British North America Act wider powers for the federal parliament under section 91, and more restricted powers for the provinces in dealing with matters of property and civil rights. That being so, and reading the radio decision in that light, it seems to me that the judicial committee of the privy council said that that radio convention was a convention which did not come under section 132, and that therefore the legislation introduced to carry it into effect could not be sustained under section 132. At least that is my personal reading. But they did say that the time has come when we must go back and re-read section 91 and find out what was the real import and intention of the enactment of that section and its subclauses. They did find in section 91 under the general powers given to the parliament of Canada, authority to enact legislation relating to radio communication, although it applied generally and affected interests throughout all the provinces from sea to sea. I think in so doing the judicial committee was perhaps getting back to a clearer perception of the purposes and intent of the framers of the British North America Act. If that interpretation is followed it is now probable that the judicial committee may find within the purview of section 91 ample power to deal widely and generally throughout Canada with hours of labour.

But neither you nor I nor the Speaker may now make a final prediction in regard to that decision.

There is, however, one other aspect of the question, and I think when this matter comes before the higher courts some consideration will have to be given to it. Let me return. Whether or not parliament approves of this convention is in my opinion entirely within its own discretion. When parliament has approved, and legislation is introduced to carry it into effect, the enactment of such legislation is entirely within the discretion of this parliament. But when that legislation comes before the higher courts the question will arise as to whether in view of the fact that the acceptance of such conventions was provided for by the terms of the treaty of Versailles, and a particular convention having been submitted and ratified by Canada, the obligations incurred by ratification of that particular convention may not be regarded as arising or growing out of the treaty of Versailles, which is an imperial treaty. In other words whether this particular convention, the approval of which we have in view, having been ratified, and all the obligations under it having been deliberately assumed by the parliament of Canada, and in view of the fact that the convention arises out of the treaty of Versailles, then whether it will not by virtue of such close relationship to the treaty of Versailles be regarded by the courts as an imperial treaty which comes under section 132. Those of you who would like to read a lengthy dissertation on that aspect of the case, will find in the Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law of November, 1934, and February, 1935, a very helpful article by C. Wilfred Jenks. Mr. Jenks, I believe, is one of the counsel engaged by the labour office at Geneva, he comes from a very distinguished family and has had a rather brilliant career. He takes up and champions in these two successive volumes the idea that when once a labour convention has been ratified by the Canadian parliament, and legislation has been enacted to carry it into effect, the convention thereupon, by reason of its relationship to the treaty of Versailles, has all the effect of an imperial treaty and is covered by section 132 of the British North America Act. I think some lawyers will find some suggestions in Mr. Jenks' disquisition in regard to the competence of parliament with which they may find it difficult quite to agree. But there are the two issues. This convention once being ratified and carried into effect by a bill enacted into law for that purpose, it seems to me that two issues may arise; first as to whether the act of itself is within the general powers conferred upon the parliament of Canada by section 91, especially the peace, order and good government clause, which confers upon parliament legislative jurisdiction in regard to all matters not specially vested in the provinces, and secondly as to whether that convention when so ratified and carried into effect by legislation is in reality and in effect an imperial treaty by reason of the fact that it has grown out of the treaty of Versailles, and was in, even then, in the contemplation of those who framed and ratified the treaty of Versailles, that was undoubtedly an imperial treaty which falls within section 132 of the British North America Act.

I doubt if it is possible to predict with certainty how five members of the judicial committee of the privy council will decide, whether unanimously, or three to two or four to one. But as I have been criticized somewhat in the public press and by others with regard to some statements which I have made previously on the British North America Act, I take advantage of this opportunity to state to the house in a very incomplete way the general views which I entertain. They are not political or partisan; they are simply views which have grown out of my experience as a student and as a lawyer during the last half century.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (East Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt in my own mind that my legal friends in this house, probably in all parts of the house, will characterize my intervention in this debate under these circumstances as the action of a fool wading in where angels fear to tread. We have heard two very learned dissertations on the law and expositions of the constitution. I confess very frankly that in regard to the observations of my learned and hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) who has just taken his seat I find it exceedingly difficult to determine whether his opinion to-day is what it was in November last.

Mr. CAHAN: It is exactly what it was in November.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is comforting indeed; my hon. friend says it is exactly the same. I recall that in November last, in speaking of this matter, the hon. gentleman spoke with a great deal more assurance and certainty than he did this afternoon. I was a little amused, as a matter of fact, as a layman, as one of those stupid laymen who are more or less incapable of appreciating the intricacies of legal matters or problems, to hear him say "Decisions of the court swing like a pendulum." I thought it was heresy. Well, Mr. Speaker. I have been taught during some twenty-five years in this parliament, listening to very eminent legal men debating the matters of difficulty and complexity that come before this parliament, that decisions of the court are so sacred that one has no right even to question them, and if one does call them into question, being a layman, he simply rules himself out of court and his arguments are not listened to.

I am not so concerned at this time, Mr. Speaker, with narrow legal quibbles about this matter. I was a little disappointed in my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who ended an otherwise very excellent speech in presenting his viewpoint by referring to the arguments on the human side as soap box oratory. I do not think he meant it; I think on reflection he would not repeat the statement. If ever there was a time in the history of Canada and in the history of every civilized country, particularly in western civilization, when it was necessary to view these problems from the human side, that time is now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but in the absence of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I think the hon. member is misconstruing what was in his mind and what he said with respect to soap box oratory.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot say what was in the hon. gentleman's mind; I am merely dealing with what he said, addressing the remark to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was referring to the hon. member's form of public address on occasion; he was not referring to his speaking on human subjects.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to quibble about it, but it was then that he charged the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with injecting the human side, which he said was more in keeping—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He took care to say that he took the human side of these questions very strongly.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to allow the right hon. gentleman to distract my attention from the whole matter with a quibble of that kind; we will let the matter drop and let Hansard speak for itself. If I am wrong I shall be glad to make amends to the hon. member for Quebec East. I said I was sorry to see him take that attitude at the end of what was otherwise a very excellent speech from his standpoint. I say, Mr. Speaker, and apparently I carry the judgment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this, that at this time we as a parliament have every right to look at the human side of this question. The subject matter of this discussion is the ratification by this parliament of a conference held under the treaty of Versailles. The gravamen of the whole matter, I suppose, could be included in these words:

> Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention undertakes to create or maintain machinery whereby minimum rates of wages can be fixed for workers employed in certain of the trades or parts of trades (and in particular in home working trades) in which no arrangements exist for the effective regulation of wages by collective agreement or otherwise and wages are exceptionally low.

My hon. friend the Secretary of State, obviously speaking for the government, says—

Mr. CAHAN: I must object to that. The views of the government on this matter have been given both in the Senate and in this house. I stated at the outset that I was giving my personal views of certain issues of laws, in view of such misrepresentations as have been made by others—by my hon. friend—without regard to veracity or accurate quotation. Therefore I deemed it best—

Mr. STEVENS: We will let that word "veracity" go; I just call your attention to it in passing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CAHAN: Very well, we will let it go.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am under the painful necessity again of recalling that the hon. gentleman was one of those who gave very learned dissertations also on the question of cabinet solidarity. Now he says that although still a member of the cabinet and still enjoying the emoluments of office, he is giving his own personal opinion. That is rather a nice admission and somewhat comforting, I must say. However, the hon. gentleman does say, whether he speaks for himself or the government, "Does ratification impose any added obligation on parliament?" The question of jurisdiction, he says, will arise after ratification is given. I ask the present acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) who is in his seat, Is the government playing fast and loose with this resolution? Does it mean or does it not mean it? That is the question that concerns me. I am exceedingly interested in this matter and I am prepared to do anything in my power to ensure the passing of this resolution and the carrying of it into force, but I do not wish to be cajoled into supporting this or into supporting the government in this measure only to be told later on by the Secretary of State or some other member of the government that the measure is one that was passed as a matter of form, but that whether or not any obligation is imposed upon parliament will have to be debated at a later date.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, the question was asked directly as to whether the government was sincere in its intention. I had the honour to move the resolution and, as the mover and as a member of the government, I state that the government is entirely sincere and desires the passage of this resolution and to carry it into the fullest effect.

Mr. STEVENS: For that I certainly thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and I accept his statement at its full face value.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I mean at its full value. Now, sir, the approach that I take to this question is this. This country is faced with a condition which is puzzling members of provincial governments and provincial legislatures, it is puzzling leaders of labour, it is most disturbing to employers of labour and it is a question which is disturbing the minds of many hon. members in this chamber. That condition is the variety or the vagaries of minimum wage laws in this country, and the question as to how this country as a whole, how this federation, how this Dominion of Canada is going to conduct its economic affairs in a manner equitable to employers and employees when in one province we have a rate of minimum wage far below the rate in another province, and when we have a condition whereby it is a simple matter to move an industry from one province to another, because of these various vagaries in the law regarding rates of wages and control of labour. That is a very important question to-day. It is agitating the public mind from one end of the country to the other. It is not a subject which in my opinion should be made the topic of narrow legal discussion. On the contrary I would have expected that the legal gentlemen in this parliament, and particularly great leaders like the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), whose legal knowledge and experience no one questions, would have lent their ability, their knowledge and effort to find within the compass of the British North America Act some reasons, some justification, some support for parliamentary action in this matter, without necessarily doing violence to the matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I endeavoured to do.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. member be kind enough to retain his seat; I neither said a word nor interrupted him when he was speaking.

I find in the British North America Act, in its very opening paragraph, in its first words, what to my mind is the basis of this whole matter and should be the spirit, or shall I say—yes, the spirit—in which we interpret the whole act. If a preamble means anything at all, then it is to give direction to thought when interpreting the individual clauses which follow. This is what I find:

Whereas—

And I shall insert one or two words, to make it modern and clear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends titter. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) titters. Well, I say for his purpose and for his enlightenment that I shall insert the words "Ontario and Quebec" where the act uses the word "provinces", and I do that in order to make it more clear and bring the matter concisely to our attention.

Whereas the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:

And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British empire:

And so on. In other words, the very basis of the British North America Act is this: First, there is the principle of unity, the desire to unite together, and secondly united on the express desire of these four provinces. The provinces themselves initiated the movement to unite. They asked to be united, and they were united. They further expressed the view that such a union of these four provinces, and of course those which entered later, would conduce to the welfare not of the dominion as a whole but to the welfare of the provinces.

Anything which conduces or is calculated to disunite this dominion must be considered to be at variance with the intention of the British North America Act. I ask parliament now to pause and consider this. What is there that is conducing or tending to disunite the provinces of Canada more than this inequality in provincial regulations covering matters common to the whole dominion? In this particular instance we refer to labour conditions. The labour conditions on the Pacific coast, in view of the minimum wage laws, are as my hon. friends know on a much higher basis, and higher rates are paid than obtain in Ontario, Quebec and elsewhere. The minimum wage law in Quebec is at variance with the minimum wage law in Ontario. I am not going into any comparison in an effort to indicate which is which, which is better, which is higher or which is lower, but I shall state briefly that they are at variance one with the other. With what result? In the first place we have this result, that there is a competition among manufacturers and industrial leaders to have their factories where they may obtain labour at the lowest cost. In the treaty of Versailles to which this parliament gave its adhesion, its support, its ratification there are words indicating that one of the things sought was to achieve a condition throughout the world whereby variations in social status, labour conditions, pay and so on would be brought into a more equitable and more even position.

Surely if we were sincere in our adherence to the treaty of Versailles, then we ought to do everything we can in this country to set our own house in order and to put our own affairs in harmony with the principle involved. It was indicated in the treaty of Versailles that one of the causes of war was the variation in social conditions of different countries. It is set forth in that treaty that it would be desirable so far as possible to remove such social variations, in order to prevent a recurrence of the great war. That is a most laudable object. If in Canada we are unwilling frankly to face conditions obtaining in this country, and if we are unwilling to set our country in order then I say we cannot claim to be very sincere in our adherence to the principles set forth in that treaty.

I am sorry the hon. member for Quebec East is not in his seat, because I wish to direct a few observations to him. He made the statement that we were taking powers away from the provinces. I would not defy or challenge, but I would invite hon. members of the legal profession in this chamber to show just where we are taking powers from the provinces. If they wish to turn to the judgment of Lord Atkin, of the privy council, they will find his words as they were given in connection with the case P.A.T.A. v. Attorney General for Canada, appeal cases, 2 D.L.R. pages 11 and 12. I ask hon. members to follow these words because I believe they are peculiarly applicable and significant at this time.

If then the legislation—

The Combines Investigation Act—

—is authorized under one or the other of the heads specifically enumerated in section 91 it is not to the purpose to say that it affects property and civil rights in the provinces.

In other words, in the powers specifically set forth in section 91 there are powers at variance with the property and civil rights provision of section 92. Then it goes on:

Most of the specific subjects in section 91 do affect property and civil rights but so far as the legislation of parliament is operating within the enumerated powers there is constitutional authority to interfere with property and civil rights.

In other words, no one can challenge the right of parliament as to any legislation that is included within the specific provisions of section 91 on the ground that it interferes with property and civil rights. I think that is clear and not disputed and the learned justice states that. But there are what are known as border-line matters which are not specifically provided for. Down through the years the tendency has been for the provinces to enlarge the powers granted under property and civil rights and to challenge the right of parliament if in the exercise of its general powers it is presumed to invade their interpretation of section 92.

An obligation rests upon parliament to give effect to a treaty into which it has entered and to legislate in the matter. There has been a tendency to disunite this country economically and socially through the vagaries of these laws and there is imposed upon parliament a fundamental and underlying duty to legislate in these matters unless they are specifically and directly excluded. I can see nothing in the British North America Act which specifically states that they shall not intervene in this matter.

We listened to a very learned if circuitous dissertation upon section 132. Even a high school student knows that this country was not exercising its treaty making powers in 1880 or thereabouts. While it does not state specifically the powers of Canada to-day it cannot be said that the language is therefore faulty because we did not have treaty making powers in 1880. There does not seem to me to be any question but that it was intended by the British North America Act that where Canada had entered into obligations with the peoples of the world or other parts of the empire, then the Canadian parliament must exercise its powers to give effect to the obligations so entered into.

I am not a lawyer but I remember reading a very learned argument by Alexander Hamilton. It would repay any Canadian to read these arguments of Alexander Hamilton. He was trying to work out and did work out for President Washington some very remarkable laws which he brought within the constitution of the United States. There was one principle which he fastened upon, and I should like to outline this to the house. I look upon Alexander Hamilton as being one of the greatest Americans, not only of his time but of all times. He said that where the constitution gave congress certain power as a federal body it was implied that congress had the right to enact laws which were necessary in order to carry that power into effect. I have not given the beautiful and chaste language which Alexander Hamilton used, but any hon. member who is interested can get this from the library. This was his argument in support of the establishment of a state bank in the United States. It was argued that congress had not the right to create a corporation, that that right rested with the states. Alexander Hamilton said: You have the right to control finance, you have the right to issue money and there is an implied right to erect a corporation to give effect to these matters. He argued that the federal authorities had that right, and the law was passed. That argument has been the foundation in a large measure of much of the interpretation of the constitution of the United States, and it is very apt and applicable to the Canadian situation to-day.

If the Canadian parliament is entrusted with the power to preserve unity or, as was stated a moment ago, peace, order and good government; if it is to give effect to international obligations, which it must do if it is to be an entity; if parliament is clothed with that responsibility then surely it must claim the right to pass the necessary legislation. My chief complaint in regard to this measure is that it was not ratified before. Perhaps I can claim exemption from blame in this respect, because in 1920 I seconded a resolution which was moved in this house asking for the ratification of labour matters. It is interesting to read the opinion of the late Mr. Doherty, who was then Minister of Justice. He spoke against the resolution which Mr. Burnham introduced and which I seconded yet I have in my hand a copy of some of his statements which shows that in his opinion power rested in this parliament under section 132 to do those things which were then asked to be done and which were similar to what is now being asked. I think this convention which was passed in 1928 should have been ratified long ago.

I say to my colleagues in this house that one of the causes of the problems facing parliament to-day is the fact that parliament has failed to occupy the field properly given to it by the British North America Act. I shall give a very striking illustration of this. Under subsection 2 of section 91 there is a very specific power granted. This section reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—
> 2. The regulation of trade and commerce.

I know that legal gentlemen will say: Oh, that is all right but the courts have given decisions on this and that. I say to them and I say to parliament that that is one of the reasons why we are embarrassed to-day. We have had these adverse court decisions and parliament has never seriously attempted to occupy the field which is included in the term "the regulation of trade and commerce." We have tacitly left the domestic field to the provinces; we have interpreted that as meaning that we should deal only with extra-territorial or international trade and as a result there has grown up in this country the belief that we have not the power. We have failed to occupy the field, and there is in economics an old doctrine that if a field of activity is not occupied by one party and another party does occupy it, that party gets a vested right in the field. And so the provinces to-day—and I am not quarrelling with them for it—are claiming rights under property and civil rights, which properly come under section 91, subsection 2. Had this parliament, twenty, thirty, forty or fifty years ago set itself to the task of reasonable regulation of trade within Canada there would be no challenge of its rights at the present time. But it has never attempted to do so. It has kept away from it, and now we are faced with these adverse decisions and objections and arguments. I submit that in this matter of the regulation of trade and commerce within Canada, on this question of the social and industrial relations of the citizens of Canada, this parliament has a duty to perform; and instead of debating as we did in the early part of this session, day after day, technical matters with hairsplitting legal arguments pro and con—and to-day we have had two learned speeches from hon. gentlemen in this house, who gave this view or that view—instead of having such arguments, I say, if we could only enlist for one session of parliament the cooperation of the legal gentlemen of this house in trying to work out these matters, we could make some progress and have a successful issue of many of these problems.

I do not for one moment suggest that we should disregard provincial rights. I think that in the past there has been too great a tendency to approach these questions in an attitude of exclusiveness—the attitude that we have certain rights which we are going to exercise, and that we shall disregard the provinces. These provinces, all of them, are administered by human beings like ourselves; and I believe that if an approach were made to the provinces in a proper attitude, in a friendly spirit, in a conciliatory manner—and I know that some of them do recognize that this is a problem that must be faced and dealt with—I say that if we approached the provinces in a spirit of cooperation, with a desire to solve these problems in a spirit of harmony, we should make progress. That, sir, I think is important.

My hon. friend from Quebec East referred to the delegates to the conference of the league. He said that if we pass this legislation there will be a tendency in the future for delegates to the labour convention under the League of Nations to arrogate to themselves the right to vary or amend the constitution. I do not think there is any danger of that. I know that most of those who have been to the labour convention since it was inaugurated, representatives appointed by the right hon. gentleman opposite and representatives appointed on this side, are serious-minded. earnest, honest and reputable citizens of Canada, and I cannot conceive of any delegation such as would be appointed by a responsible government of Canada doing anything of that kind. They do come before us or present through the government the findings of the international labour convention. That is what they go there for; that is what they are sent there for. The international labour convention weighs these problems, studies them and comes to certain decisions. Will anyone question the soundness and advisability of the decisions regarding, for instance, international trade in narcotics? A great deal of good has been done in that respect. I fancy that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews), if he were speaking now, would tell the house that much valuable assistance has been given the officers of his department in dealing with this very perplexing problem, one of the most human of all problems. And this arose out of the labour convention. There are other matters of similar importance. This one is peculiarly appropriate at the moment. Here we are faced with this problem in Canada—the vagaries and differences that exist; and surely it is our duty, if we can possibly do so, to harmonize these differences in Canada so as to bring about an understanding one with the other so far as the provinces are concerned. Let this parliament, as the constitutional body to do it, take the lead and assume the responsibility, and in due process of performing its duty bring about a better condition and at the same time discharge a very solemn obligation which we undertook at the time of the signing of the treaty of Versailles.

The hon. member for Quebec East referred to another matter. He spoke in rather emphatic language, with a warning to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) about soap box oratory and a few other things, and he said that the constitution is our safeguard. Of course it is. The inference from that language is that anyone who takes a view such as I now take is playing with the constitution, disregarding the sanctity of the constitution. I am just as jealous of the constitution of Canada as the hon. gentleman is, but no harm will ever be done the constitution by a frank discussion in this house, or by searching through it for powers in order to give effect to legislation which we think is good for the people of Canada. There ought to be a little more of the positive and a little less of narrow legal interpretation of the constitution, a little more effort to find within the confines of the constitution the power to do those things that will be in the interests of the people of the country as a whole, instead of throwing legal obstacles in the way. And the time for such an effort is now.

[Mr. Stevens.]

We still have a million and a quarter or more of people on relief. I am not saying that as a reflection on anybody; the reflection is upon us all. But there are a million and a quarter people on relief, and this is one of the measures, one and only one, and I might say one of the minor measures, that might be adopted towards the solution of that problem. Surely therefore it is time the house addressed itself in a positive spirit towards these things rather than in a negative spirit of legal interpretation—I endorse the phrase of an hon. member over here, and I say that we should have a human interpretation of these matters.

I am not going to detain the house at greater length, though there is much more that I might say. I wish, however, to refer to one thing more. The hon. gentleman said among other things that the house was being deceived, that when the treaty of Versailles was passed the house was told that any measures that were brought forward under No. 405 of the treaty would be subject to the proper constitutional body in the country, and he said that that was particularly provided for Canada and other federally organized states. And I think the Secretary of State repeated that. The inference was that by bringing this measure in, the house was being deceived. Well, in September, 1919, Sir Robert Borden, who represented this country as the senior delegate from Canada, and as Prime Minister of the country, returned from the deliberations with regard to the treaty and gave the dominion certain views in an official way. From these observations I will quote very briefly:

Side by side with the covenant—

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is the quotation from?

Mr. STEVENS: It is from a statement made by the then Prime Minister in this house in September, 1919. The exact page on which his remarks appear I have not got; I am quoting from page 335 of Hansard of March 10, 1920, a speech which I delivered on that date, but the quotation is in small type showing that it is properly inserted in this particular part of my speech. I would have taken the trouble to get the original, only I did not think it was necessary to do so. Sir Robert Borden said:

Side by side with the covenant stand the provisions of the labour convention.

I just pause there. Side by side with the covenant of the League of Nations, of the treaty of Versailles, stand the provisions of the labour convention. That was the first intimation this house had of the attitude of the dominion government of that day—and parliament accepted that attitude—of the relation of these labour conventions to the treaty of Versailles, and what this house might expect in its attitude and obligation toward them. Sir Robert Borden continued:

It was my privilege to attend the earlier meetings of the commission which framed the articles on that subject now embodied in part XIII of the treaty. At one of these meetings the preamble of the labour convention was framed. It is as follows:

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; an improvement of those conditions is urgently required; as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work.

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries. . . .

Holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply so far as their special circumstances will permit.

This language was given to this house by Sir Robert Borden when he returned from the drafting and the passing of the treaty of Versailles, and I invite the house again to listen to these words:

Conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled.

I say that the conditions, the sense of injustice, of inequity of things and the hardship and privation suffered by workers to-day in Canada as well as elsewhere—and one has but to turn one's eyes to the United States to see this condition in perhaps its worst form—are, taking them from a world-wide standpoint, quite as serious to-day as they were when these words were penned and when they were submitted to the house.

An improvement of those conditions is urgently required—

No one will doubt that. Those were the words given to the house when this treaty was first brought here in 1919.

—as for example, by the regulation of the hours of work.

And so forth. So I conclude with this, that in my opinion the house should support the government in passing this legislation. We have the assurance of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), for which I again thank him, that the government not only intends to have this convention ratified, but it believes in the position it assumes in doing so, it has a right to pass the legislation that is demanded thereunder, and it intends to implement the power that this will invoke and to give at least this measure of security to the workers of Canada, in the hope that it will be productive of greater harmony and concord throughout this country socially and economically.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if anything were needed to make it perfectly clear that the position which the opposition have taken with respect to the government's so-called social legislation is the correct one, namely, that it would have been advisable to obtain in the first instance an opinion from the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether it is within the competence of this parliament to enact the various measures of social legislation that are being brought down, it would be found in what we have witnessed in this house this afternoon. I have no desire to enter upon another long discussion of the constitutional aspects of the question. The debate, to which we have listened this afternoon, has, in that particular, been largely a repetition of arguments that have been presented before. It is true that, in what both the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) have said, we have had important and very valuable additions in the way of opinion with respect to points that will come up in controversy. But of one thing there can be no uncertainty whatever, and that is that so far as the question of the competence of this parliament is concerned in presenting for enactment measures of this kind, with any hope of their enforcement, there is the gravest possible doubt.

I much less wish to enter into what appears to be an irreconcilable family quarrel among hon. gentlemen opposite; but I think I should point out that what there has been of controversy, of difference of opinion, in the house this afternoon, has not for the most part been between those of us who sit, sir, to your left as an opposition and hon gentlemen who sit to your right as the government and its supporters, but that the sharpest and most acrimonious differences of opinion we have witnessed in parliament this year have been among hon. gentlemen opposite. What we have been, I shall not say privileged but, forced to witness is in the nature of what evidently has taken place in the cabinet when these very measures have been under consideration. It is quite apparent from what the hon. member who has just taken his seat, the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), has said, there was a very serious difference of opinion between the ministers of the crown when these matters were under discussion, and that he held one view and that some of his colleagues held another. In that regard, just in passing, may I draw attention to the fact that the hon. member addressed his question as to the competence of parliament to enact this legislation and what was intended to be done about enforcing it, to the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley), but he was replied to not by the acting leader but by the Minister of Justice. That is a significant fact, one to which attention should certainly be drawn. It is quite apparent that however the forces have been divided, they have been divided in a very real way. Indeed one has only to look at the correspondence which passed between the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time my hon. friend's resignation was accepted to see that the Prime Minister told him then in no uncertain language that he was putting forward in the cabinet at that time views which could not be entertained by his colleagues, that he was raising with respect to legislation hopes in the minds of the people of the country which there was no justification for raising, and that he was at fault in so doing. If that has been the kind of thing that has been going on in the cabinet with respect to this social legislation, is it any wonder that after hon. gentlemen opposite have had some six months in which to try to reconcile their differences, we on this side, when all this social legislation is suddenly brought before us, should feel that at least there is need for a little more in the way of careful consideration of the authority of parliament before proceeding too far with these enactments.

May I ask this question: is it going to help to bring about the great objective which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat says he has in view, which members of the present government say they have in view, that the country now knows that in this parliament itself there is difference of opinion not only between hon. gentlemen who sit to the right and those who sit to the left of Mr. Speaker, but a cleavage in the ranks of the government itself and its supporters? There could be no more obvious evidence of the uncertainty of the whole situation. The government has proceeded to build its house on the sands of controversy and dissension, instead of seeking to construct it upon the rock of constitutional authority, right and power, which admits of no uncertainty.

May I also say to my hon. friend that when he speaks about parliament itself deciding what it shall do in these matters, and taking upon itself not merely to enact legislation but also to interpret it; when he speaks about viewing the constitution as something which is sacred and therefore to be regarded with a degree of reverence, it must be remembered that under the constitution this parliament is only one branch of government. There are three branches of government under the constitution, each of which has a distinctive and known jurisdiction and obligation. Parliament is the legislative branch; it enacts the laws. There is the executive branch for the carrying out of the laws, and there is also the judicial branch for the interpretation of the laws. We in this parliament may discuss the matter from now until doomsday, but we cannot give to any law enacted here, and make it hold, an interpretation other than that which the courts will finally place upon it. That is known.

I shall not say what I think must have been in the mind of my hon. friend when he tried to indicate that the ex-Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Quebec East was more concerned with the legal view of things than with the humane view. In so saying, he was simply playing to the gallery, he was simply indulging in claptrap.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was taking a course which as a member of this parliament, and knowing the hon. member for Quebec East as he knows him, was wholly unworthy of him; for he knows as well as I do, and every other hon. member of this house does, that no more humane man lives in this dominion than the hon. member for Quebec East. The member for Quebec East was very careful when speaking here to say in the clearest language possible that he was in sympathy with all this legislation because it was humane legislation and because he believed in the principles of it; but he wanted to see the legislation enacted in a manner which would give it a place which was beyond all doubt upon the statutes either of this parliament or of the legislatures of the country. Now if a battle is to be waged through this country upon the motives of men, in which one individual or party is going to claim a monopoly of all humane thinking and acting, some gentlemen are going to be very considerably disappointed, because so far as humane sentiments are concerned I think it is apparent to all, that members of this parliament, irrespective of party, are interested in seeking to better the conditions of their fellow men. However much I may differ with most hon. gentlemen opposite I believe there will be found in their breasts just as much of the milk of human kindness as is to be found in the breast of the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Something has been said about national unity and the uniformity of laws. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce voiced condemnation because years have been allowed to slip by without these conventions being ratified. He has, I should have said, condemned parliament for not having ratified these conventions. He said that away back in 1920 he moved for the ratification of some measure, some convention, or so I understood him. May I say to my hon. friend that if his words are in the nature of a condemnation, it is a condemnation of himself and the government of which he was a member for nearly four years? This is not the first session of this parliament, it is the sixth; my hon. friend was for five succeeding sessions a member of the government, of which he now no longer is a member, and in every one of those sessions he had opportunity to insist that these conventions be ratified. Why were they not ratified? Evidently because my hon. friend was not then prepared to take the stand he now wishes to take on the eve of a general election. We are beginning to find out many interesting things as we approach the moment of an appeal to the people. The actions of public men will be judged not by the views they present at the eleventh hour but by the views they have stood and fought for year after year through the whole of their lives.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You had nine years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We had nine years, yes, and during those nine years we advanced steadily forward in social legislation.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You went forward crab-fashion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not going to repeat what I have said previously. I think the record of the Liberal party in the matter of labour legislation is well enough known in this country not to require special emphasis now; its record in the enactment of social measures and the nature and extent of them are very generally known. But I ask my hon. friends: What about the past five years? Every time they seek to stress the argument that these measures should have been enacted nine years ago, they doubly condemn themselves for not having enacted them within the last five years. Some of these things were not possible years ago, as they are to-day and have been since 1930. Times change, conditions change, new problems come to the fore. When the last Liberal government was in office it was dealing with post-war problems and the condition of the country as it had resulted from the war, questions that to the exclusion of others had to be dealt with immediately. This is an age in which social problems are being dealt with in all quarters of the globe, and it is natural they should come up in this parliament at this time. We on this side from 1930 until this present year, over and over again directed attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that then was the time for them to bring about a conference between the provinces and the dominion with a view to settling the question of the legislative competence and authority of parliament on matters of social legislation; that during this parliament was the time to bring about a conference which would obtain the agreement of the provinces to many of these measures, and above all the time in which, if the British North America Act required amendment as we say we believe it does, that amendment should be brought about. But that step has not been taken, and the result is that to-day we are exactly where it was indicated five years ago parliament would find itself, unless some immediate step were taken to have the British North America Act amended and authority given parliament to enact measures of this kind.

When there is mention of the desirability of uniformity of minimum industrial standards there is as I see it no division of view among hon. members of this house. We may have individual differences as to the particular point at which a given standard should be placed, but generally speaking I think everyone in this parliament holds the view that uniformity of labour standards, constituting a national minimum, is a desirable thing, not only within one country but, if it can be obtained, throughout the world. Indeed, that is the whole objective of the labour office and conference of the League of Nations. We are all united as to the desirability of uniformity in minimum standards. The whole question of difference between us is the question of method. Until this year we have always assumed that the provinces were the bodies that had the legislative competence to pass minimum wage laws, eight hour day legislation and other measures of the kind. If we were not of that opinion, and if the provinces were not of that opinion, how is the fact to be accounted for that all the provinces of Canada have enacted legislation of that very kind? The very fact that you have the provincial statutes filled with social legislation is evidence of the fact that the provinces have regarded that subject as coming within their particular sphere. But as they have legislated, it has become obvious that there are differences in the laws of the different provinces. I am not so sure that some of those differences have not arisen out of the differences in economic development and the resources and the nature of the industries in the different provinces. In great industrial provinces like Ontario and Quebec the situation is bound to be different from the situation in the prairie provinces, and conditions in the maritimes and on the prairies are bound to be different from conditions in British Columbia. As time goes on industrial standards will come more and more to find the one level, but I submit that you are not going to bring about the level that is desired by adopting in this parliament a course which is arbitrary and unconstitutional, when all the while there is before you an obviously right and simple course to follow. What we on this side have been contending for is the course that we believe in the end will be the surest, safest and swiftest course in bringing about uniformity of legislation. The provinces can be brought together in agreement not only with themselves but also with the federal government on these matters. The social conscience is awakened at this time as never before, and there will be a desire, I am sure, in any great conference of the provinces and the dominion properly constituted and conducted to harmonize the views of all parties on these questions of minimum standards in industry. Our view all along has been that this was the step that ought to be taken first.

I believe there will be found agreement between the provinces and the dominion as to the desirability of amending the British North America Act first of all, so as to give to ourselves the power to amend our own constitution and to this parliament the right to legislate on certain of these matters of social legislation to be very clearly defined. But when that question is being fully discussed, I believe it will be found to be inseparable from the whole question of the financial relations between the dominion and the provinces. I believe that what will be as necessary as agreement between the provinces and the dominion in matters affecting the amendment of the British North America Act will be very careful consideration of the financial relations between the provinces and the dominion, which will result in the dominion assuming some of the obligations that to-day belong to the provinces or giving to the provinces certain rights with respect to sources of revenue which at the moment they may not have. I believe the two subjects will be found to be interrelated and intertwined; but I do also submit that we will not hasten the day, and we will not make the situation any more secure, by taking a step in this parliament which, instead of seeking to bring the provinces and the dominion into closer relationship, is raising a question of difference between them.

That brings to mind what my hon. friend has just said about unity in Canada. One of the strong objections, I think, to the manner in which the government is proceeding with this legislation is that it is tending to divide this country instead of to unite it; it is tending to emphasize differences between the provinces and the dominion. Indeed, the whole underlying danger of the situation is that, as the result of political discussion during a general election, it may raise all kinds of controversy in connection with provincial rights versus dominion rights. Well, if we have that sort of thing added to all the uncertainty that exists in the country, and in the world to-day, I am afraid we are going to be much further away from national unity at the end of a political campaign, whatever may be its results, than we have been at any time heretofore.

Once more, in view of what we have heard this afternoon from the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), who gave us the benefit of his wide knowledge and experience with regard to these questions of constitutional obligation and law, and from the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, who gave us the difference of view that existed in the government and what he put forth as the point of view he thought should be made to prevail, I would hope that even yet the government might see the wisdom, while in no way ceasing to go on with the enactment of these measures, of referring one or more of them to the supreme court for an opinion before an endeavour is made to put them all into force in this country. I do not say that with any desire to impede the enactment of these measures, or their operation subsequently, but I do say that if you have an eight hour day law put into force, immediately some injunction will be issued against the enforcement of some essential provision, the case will be tested in the courts and the effective operation of the legislation will be held up. Then if an adverse decision is given, immediately you will have another test case with regard to the minimum wage legislation, and the same thing will happen in regard to these other pieces of social legislation that have been introduced. The result will be that neither labour nor capital, neither the employer, the employee or the public, neither the business man, the merchant nor anyone else will know where he stands or where he is likely to be with regard to the laws of the country. That is a very dangerous position in which to put a country when conditions are as serious as they are in the world at the present time. That can be avoided if hon. gentlemen will take the one step I have all along been urging; and may I point out that they have made the way very easy for themselves. As we were told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) yesterday, he is allowing three months before his eight hour day bill goes into effect. The Prime Minister has told us that it will be some considerable time before an attempt will be made to assess any dues under the unemployment insurance act, and that all that will be attempted in the first instance is the creation of the commission. I have no doubt at all that we shall find the same amendment, as to delay in enforcement, placed in this act with regard to minimum wages, allowing another three months or so to elapse before it will come into operation. Then there is the amendment in regard to the day of rest, which means another three months or so in that case. Within that period of time any one or all of these measures could be referred by the government to the supreme court and an opinion obtained, just as was done with respect to the other measures mentioned this afternoon by the ex-Minister of Justice. If the court says the enactment of these measures is within the competence of parliament, then I think everyone will be tremendously relieved and will do the best he can to see that the decision given is upheld. If however the step suggested is not taken, I venture to say we will find the validity of every one of these acts contested in the courts. The controversy will run from the local courts to the supreme court, and from the supreme court to the judicial committee of the privy council. A year or two hence, we will probably find ourselves in the position where all the government's social legislation has been upset, with the result that the whole business of legislation will have to be begun de novo.

I believe what we have witnessed this afternoon is quite sufficient to justify every word I have said by way of observation upon rather than of criticism of the remarks of hon. members opposite, and certainly is sufficient to justify the attitude the official opposition has taken from the beginning with regard to all this social legislation.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I feel sorry when I hear the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) endeavouring to justify the position taken by his party regarding the measures brought forward by the government. Although I have only a few moments to speak if I wish to conclude by six o'clock, I should like in those few moments to state that it was rather unworthy of the right hon. gentleman to make the reference he did to the question asked this afternoon by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). My colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) moved the approval of the convention, and it was quite proper that he should answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I asked the acting leader of the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, but perhaps the right hon. gentleman does not know that as a rule during debate I do not answer questions. The answer my colleague gave is absolutely correct. The government is quite sincere in its social legislation, and purposes carrying it out in every possible way to a successful issue.

I should like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that he is endeavouring to fight the government but at the same time support its legislation. How can any man take that ground and expect the people of this country to believe he is in earnest?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce who was fighting the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Only a few days ago the right hon. gentleman read a long statement in regard to the position of the Liberal party, and when he had finished I was not quite sure which side he was on. No person can tell. The right hon. gentleman said:

> The Liberal party approves the principle of the social legislation thus far introduced and desires to see it in operation.

Then he goes on to say that it should be referred to the supreme court. Well, the right hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that in legislation of this kind a reference to the supreme court would be only a pious reference, and would have no binding effect. Legal actions could be brought all the same and the cases could be carried through to the highest court in the British empire. If the right hon. gentleman really wishes to have social legislation why did he wait all these years? Why did he not put it into effect? He makes the statement that the Liberal party during the time he was in office had had negotiations with the several provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So we had.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, you had, time and again, but never got anywhere with them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Old Age Pensions Act is the answer to that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He made no arrangements with the provinces towards having a change in the British North America Act, despite the fact that in many of the provinces there were Liberal administrations. This government has had two or three provincial conferences in which we were unsuccessful in seeing eye to eye on the question of amending the British North America Act. To-day the government is acting, whereas the government led by the right hon. gentleman opposite did nothing but say that through all those years they were considering the matter. They were in favour but they had not the courage to put their views into operation.

The right hon. gentleman cannot run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. How can he reconcile being opposed to the action of the government and at the same time favour the legislation? One day he takes one side and another day he takes another. One moment he votes against the government and the next he votes with the government, and on the very same measure. I submit that his position is untenable and that he cannot maintain it. He should give the present government credit for having the courage to bring down social legislation and doing everything it possibly can to have such legislation work properly and for the comfort of our people.

I believe I have said all I wish to say. The matter has been debated at length and some very interesting points have been brought out. I do not suppose it will be necessary to take a division, as the right hon. gentleman seems prepared to vote for the resolution. Yet he stands up and criticizes the government for bringing in the legislation he favours. Why has he not the courage to stand in his place and offer the government his congratulations upon its courage in putting through reform measures?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): He would not say yes and he would not vote no.

Motion (Mr. Guthrie) agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the bill not to be introduced?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no bill yet.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata (Translation): Mr. Speaker, l'Illustration of to-day's date contains the following article:

To-day, the house established three records: this afternoon, for speed; this evening, for weakness and imbecility. The weakness, alas, was that of Hon. Arthur Sauvé, whose estimates were voted. The imbeciles were those who, for two whole hours by the clock, with incredible meanness, vented criticism and attacks on the Postmaster General. First, Mr. Pouliot went after the minister with might and main and attacked him with the utmost fury.

The Attack

In justice to Mr. Pouliot, let us say that, while his attacks were the most violent of those showered on Mr. Sauvé, they were the most intelligent, the most methodical and, therefore, the most formidable.

To write that an imbecile made the most intelligent attack, one must have reached the depths of stupidity. That such a person should use the word "imbecile," I care very little; but when he adds that an imbecile made the most intelligent attack, he perpetrates a grave insult.

If I catch him at it again, I will amuse the house with the strange tale of the knife and the no less strange one of the Nelson column.

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, apparently my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) is leading the house at the moment. I rather hesitate to ask him the question I have in mind. However, I think I should have it immediately of record. The other day I asked the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) if he could give the house some information as to when we might expect the report of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. In this evening's Ottawa Journal I notice an article which no doubt appears in other evening papers. This article is headed:

Stevens' Program on Price Spreads Presented.
Abolish Rebates Exceeding Total of Five Per Cent.
Suggests Application of Dumping Duties in Domestic Trade to Overcome Special Prices to Mass Buyers.
Would tax Salaries Over $10,000 and Regulate Set-up of Firms.

Hon. H. H. Stevens, former Minister of Trade and Commerce, has presented his recommendations to the price spreads commission to establish fair and just practices in the marketing and distribution system of Canada.

I should like to know whether the government regards this commission as a judicial body or whether it is a publicity bureau. Can the government give any information to the house as to when we may expect to have an authentic report of the commission's work? I should like to know also whether the commission can be advised in the meantime that parliament has certain rights and privileges and should be informed of the work of bodies of this kind before the general public is so informed.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman asked his question of the acting leader of the government, who responded that he would inquire of the chairman of the commission and that he might be in position to give some information at an early date. I think it will be necessary for the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) to make the reply to the questions asked by the right hon. gentleman. Nevertheless I think it is the view of both sides of the house that this commission is in its character a quasi-judicial body, but it would appear that there are bureaux of publicity outside of the commission from which reports are emanating to the public press.

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT

BILL TO CONFIRM ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL OF 1935 TO THE CONVENTION OF 1933

The house resumed from Thursday, March 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 32, respecting the additional protocol of 1935 to the Canada-France trade agreement of 1933—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was receiving its second reading I indicated that I had some statements to make with regard to certain conditions which had arisen under the operation of the old treaty, and the minister in charge of the bill indicated that it would be acceptable for me to make these statements at this stage of the bill.

I think it is generally agreed that if we are to recover world trade and eliminate restrictions on trade, it can be done only by way of treaties such as this. These treaties should be devised to facilitate trade rather than to act as restrictions, as certain of them seem to have done. It may be that the minister will be able to give a satisfactory explanation of certain conditions which have arisen. These treaties are supposed to confer a benefit upon Canada in two different ways: first, by allowing a greater volume of exports to the country with which we have made a treaty, and, second, by permitting the receiving of goods from that country at a lower rate of duty, thus conferring a benefit upon the people. There would seem to be some indications that the French treaty is not satisfactory from the latter point of view.

I have in my hand a letter which was addressed to Mr. McGregor, registrar of the Combines Investigation Act, by a firm styling themselves Drug Agencies. It would seem that before this treaty came into effect this particular firm was buying certain pharmaceutical preparations in the open market in France. They claim that they are now unable to do this because of article 9 of the French treaty, which reads:

> Either of the high contracting parties may require that goods imported into its territory and coming from the territory of the other, shall be accompanied by a certificate of origin delivered in conformity with the laws of the country of origin; provided, however, that a presentation of the certificate of origin shall be obligatory in the case of importation of pharmaceutical specialties, toilet articles and articles of perfumery. Such certificate shall be issued or delivered by the competent authority in the country of origin and shall be visaed by the consular or other authority of the country of destination.

I had on the order paper a question which I withdrew asking whether both parties to the treaty were insisting upon certificates of origin. At that time I had not read this article, and it seems that it was optional with either country to ask for the certificate of origin except with respect to pharmaceutical preparations. Now the complaint is made by those who have brought the matter to my attention that this particular article was introduced into the treaty at the request of the Canadian government. Of course the fact that it is here indicates that both parties have agreed to it. But I cannot understand why special emphasis should be laid on pharmaceutical preparations unless for the reason suggested by those who are making the complaint, namely, that the Canadian government wished to give to certain interests a monopoly of the importation of these preparations. It appears that certificates of origin are granted in France by the chamber of commerce; that is the body that has been delegated to give these certificates, and I understand that they will give them only to the manufacturers of these preparations. The result is, as complained, that they can no longer be bought in the open market and that certain interests in Canada have therefore a monopoly in the handling of these preparations. It is claimed that about seven hundred different articles come within this category. I know that the argument is advanced that it is necessary to have the certificate of origin in order to protect our own country against importations from other countries via France. On the other hand it might be supposed that the French government would require these certificates of origin in order that France might have all the benefits of the treaty to which she is entitled. But in actual practice the price of these pharmaceutical preparations has been increased by reason of the situation that prevails.

I listened with interest to the explanation which the minister gave yesterday to the hon. member for Bonaventure with respect to the price of wines and liquors, in which he indicated that the depreciation of the Canadian currency was responsible in large measure for the increase in price. It is quite possible that this may be one factor in this particular problem, but it would be interesting to know whether the fact that under the operation of the treaty as it now exists the particular firms interested have a monopoly in the handling of these preparations is not also a factor in the increased price, because it seems to be generally admitted that the price of these preparations has been increased.

The statement is made in a letter which I have here that under the French treaty these same interests now handling these preparations made an application to the former government to have a clause similar to article 9 of the treaty inserted, but it was refused at that time. If any light can be thrown on the subject we shall be pleased to have it, because it does seem that the consumers of these preparations are not getting the benefit which we should expect they would be entitled to under a lower rate of duty as provided for in the treaty; and if the effect has been, as it would seem to be, to restrict the trade to a few individuals instead of throwing it open to the general public who might wish to buy goods in the open market in France, then it would appear that the treaty is not working out as we should like.

Another instance has come to my attention, and though it may not have so direct a bearing on the French treaty, nevertheless it is connected with our trade with France. The complaint is made that importations of beeswax are coming from England under the preferential rates and that a large part of these importations comes from France and the French colonies. According to certain statistics received by the British trade commissioner in Montreal in April, 1934, it appears that Great Britain receives two-thirds of its imports from France and French colonies. The man who makes the complaint says that he is now no longer able to buy beeswax direct from France because of the higher rate of duty. I find, on looking over the treaty, that this article is not mentioned. At any rate, this man complains that he can no longer obtain beeswax direct from France and that Great Britain is being given an unfair advantage under the agreement with her, since a good deal of what she ships to us is imported from other countries. Personally I am not very much exercised as a rule over the fact that we are getting quantities of goods at a lower rate of duty, but if there is no reduction in the price and our revenue is suffering at the same time, this may be a matter to be looked into. Perhaps the minister has some explanation to give in regard to some of the statements I have made.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman gave me no notice of his inquiry with regard to beeswax. My memory is not sufficiently accurate to say whether beeswax was one of the products from France brought in under the preferential duty. If I remember rightly it is not included, and if beeswax is not included in the Canada-France treaty I do not quite see how the government of this country can make arrangements for the merchant, whom my hon. friend is representing to-night, to purchase in France what the French merchants are not willing to sell to him. Possibly they send their large supply to Great Britain, and it is distributed from there throughout the other parts of the world.

Mr. BROWN: The complaint is with regard to the higher duty coming from France.

Mr. CAHAN: If a man buys directly in France and brings the article in here from that country, then it comes under the terms of the French treaty, and if that beeswax is not on the intermediate tariff or the intermediate tariff less a discount, he cannot bring it in under a lower rate of duty from France. He therefore finds it to his advantage undoubtedly to buy in the English market and to bring it in from there. As to whether all the beeswax bought in England is produced in England, I cannot give my hon. friend definite information. If it is a matter of sufficient importance into which the Department of Trade and Commerce might inquire as to whether any prejudice is thereby effected to the Canadian importer of beeswax, I cannot say definitely.

On the other question as to article 9, it is obvious that in any trade treaty between Canada and France in which preferential rates are given in Canada on the one hand to French products and in France on the other hand to Canadian products, there must be some way devised by which when goods are imported into this country it may be ascertained that the products are really French, and that products going from Canada to France are Canadian. Therefore, as usual in such treaties, provision is made with regard to giving certificates of origin. In this connection article 9 states:

> Such certificate shall be issued or delivered by the competent authority in the country of origin and shall be visaed by the consular or other authority in the country of destination.

We have not in this country any governmental authority which is authorized to give certificates with regard to products exported to France, and therefore the French have agreed to take certificates from those who produce these products in Canada, provided that the certificate so given by the producer in this country is visaed by the consular officer of France in Canada. Therefore if there is a sale of lobsters or salmon from British Columbia to a French importer, those who conduct the trade in Vancouver for instance, give certificates, which are then verified by affidavit or statutory declaration usually, and those together with the export documents are visaed by a French consular officer. On the production of those certificates and the French visa at the French port of importation, the products are passed by the French officials. On the other hand goods imported into Canada from France are accompanied by a certificate of origin. This certificate is given in France under the authority of the French government, an authority which has been delegated to the chambre de commerce which is extremely desirous of ascertaining that the goods so exported are really French products. In connection with this article 9, a special clause is inserted:

Provided, however, that the presentation of a certificate of origin shall be obligatory in the case of importation of pharmaceutical specialties, toilet articles and articles of perfumery.

France depends to a very considerable extent upon her exports of these specialties. Her pharmaceutical specialties are produced under government supervision and the perfumery production of France is very large and is exported to almost all foreign countries. I know, in visiting the ports of South America or Central America or Mexico, that one will find such French articles are on sale in those countries to the extent of constituting almost a monopoly. The French government therefore insisted upon the inclusion of this proviso in article 9, upon the ground that they wished to prevent misrepresentation in regard to pharmaceutical specialties, toilet articles and articles of perfumery which did not come up to their standard, and which when they went abroad ruined the reputation of the French production in those articles, which reputation it had taken years and very considerable expense to establish in the consuming countries of the world. Therefore, to prevent what I might call bootlegging in connection with those articles, to prevent false representations being made in foreign markets with regard to them, the French government insisted that there should be certificates of origin produced from the French authority as to the French origin of those articles in order that there might be no misrepresentation in the consuming country. That proviso I can assure the hon. gentleman was introduced at the request of the French government. In respect of importations into Canada from France of pharmaceutical specialties, toilet articles and articles of perfumery, the French government insisted upon a certificate being given to the French manufacturers or producers that those articles which are exported to Canada under the preferential rates are manufactured or produced in France. Perhaps those who have made representations to the hon. gentleman are more interested in the illicit trade which exists in France and every other country in pharmaceutical specialties, articles of perfumery and so forth rather than in the purchase of the standard articles concerning which the French government has exercised such great care. However the decision of the customs branch of the Department of National Revenue has been that perfumeries, whether produced in Italy or Switzerland or Belgium or some other country, if they have been bootlegged into France, cannot come into Canada as French products unless a certificate of origin is given as provided in article 9. That is all the explanation I can give to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BROWN: I do not just follow the minister's logic. If the preservation of the purity of these articles was as important to the French government as he indicates, they would see that no certificates of origin were given except to those who exported the standard article. There would be no necessity for putting it in the treaty; we would have expected them to attend to it on their own account. The fact that special emphasis has been laid upon it in the treaty raises the suspicion that it was inserted at the request not of the French government but of the Canadian government to protect certain monopolistic industries.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say that was the reason given, that they wished to preserve not only the purity of their products coming within these special classes but also to preserve the reputation of their products in foreign countries, because throughout the world France has a reputation for those articles. Whether the French government could have found other means of preventing the illicit sale of pharmaceutical articles which are not manufactured under government supervision I cannot say, because I have nothing to do with the administration of French affairs. But one thing is sure, that the means which they did take of insisting on the insertion of this proviso in article 9 have apparently been very effective in preventing the export from France to Canada of low standard products of these three classes, of which the French government does not approve.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the minister tell us when this article 9 first appeared? Was that clause not in the old treaty? Article 9 is in the 1922 treaty. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, as you were in the house at the time this treaty with France was first introduced by the present opposition, that I took a very decided stand against the treaty from beginning to end. This treaty is not improved a great deal. I will admit that there are some improvements, but not many. The old treaty was cluttered up with lists of two hundred articles specially mentioned as articles that we could ship to France but we never have made one of them. I object to some of the clauses in this treaty as much as I ever did. It has not been changed; the old treaty remains the same; these are additions to it, and I am not going to sit here and allow it to pass without making a protest. The minimum clause still remains, and that works a hardship on us. We made that treaty in good faith, and when we made it the minimum clause was there and our wheat went to France subject to a duty of ten cents a bushel. Under the treaty they had the right to raise that minimum tariff to anything they saw fit, and before long it was put up to a dollar, which was prohibitive. I say that a treaty made on that basis is wrong.

There is another feature. The goods that we take under this new protocol from France consist of what? Take a glance at them. They start with Rocquefort cheese and Camembert cheese. The next item is pepper, to which I have no objection because I think it is needed for certain purposes. Then we have canned mushrooms, candied chestnuts, liqueurs, cognac brandy and Armagnac brandy. Fine. Now let us take a look at the list of stuff that we can take from France. Mind you, the duty on these articles is reduced very materially. Let us see what they are and whether the constituents of the hon. member for Lisgar are going to be much affected by them. Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton; fibres of raffia or of sisal; lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton; women's dress gloves of kid, elbow length. For the life of me I cannot understand how it is that on luxuries on which we should collect the duty is reduced. Of course the hon. member for Lisgar is glad to see a reduction of duty, provided the reduction gets to his people. But imagine his people buying that class of goods! They work so hard they are not using any embroideries just now. My contention is that articles of this kind should pay duty and pay it through the nose; people using articles of this kind should pay for them. In my judgment the minimum tariff is an improper basis on which to make any treaty with any country. We can do without their trade if we cannot trade on better terms than that. If we wanted to change the tariff we could not do it unless we got their permission, but they could change it to our disadvantage. The only way that we could alter anything was by abrogating the treaty, which we were forced to do. Just think of that.

There are some other things I object to in this treaty as affecting my constituents. I would ask the minister how it comes that such a great reduction is made on cheap wines. My county is interested in wine manufacture. There is not a farmer in my district who has not a vineyard; in that district thirty thousand tons of grapes are grown in a year, and half of them are pressed into wine. I know one plant that pressed eight thousand tons of grapes. My people in three counties are dependent upon that; it is the best crop they have. I should like to know why a reduction of fifty per cent is made in the duty on French wines. Are we encouraging the growing of grapes in France? Is that the proposition? Not for me. I am encouraging the growing of grapes at home; that is what I am interested in, and that is why I am speaking on the subject.

Mr. BROWN: I had no intention at this point of discussing rates of duty on articles coming from France; I expected we should come to that later. I am simply making the point that wherever these reductions are made they should at least go to the people, and not lead to the establishment of what seems to be a combine. Certain vested interests, certain monopolists, seem to have secured the privilege of dealing in these pharmaceutical preparations. As far as the general principle of a tax on luxuries is concerned I am in perfect agreement with the hon. member for Lincoln. I would go perhaps much further than he would in putting taxes on liquor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some pointed questions have been directed to the Secretary of State by the hon. member for Lincoln without reply.

Mr. CAHAN: I was waiting until all the questions had been asked; I thought there was perhaps some altercation between the hon. member for Lincoln and the hon. member for Lisgar. Reductions have been made on the duties on French wines, I have no doubt in order to create an approach to an equilibrium between Canada's exports to France and France's exports to Canada. With regard to sparkling wines, in 1930 the exports of champagne to Canada in bottles containing more than a quart were valued at $418,871. In 1934 that dropped to $79,519. The total imports of sparkling wines from France dropped from $585,930 in 1930 to $111,159 in 1934.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does not the minister think the depression might have had something to do with that?

Mr. CAHAN: No doubt the depression had something to do with it, and the depreciation in Canadian currency as compared with the gold franc undoubtedly had something to do with it also. Nevertheless it was a fact, and to a very large extent Canada depends upon the French market for the export of its wheat. To preserve that market for wheat the government, through the Prime Minister, negotiated this protocol with France whereby our export of wheat to France is maintained under conditions fairly satisfactory considering the fact that on the average France produces nearly as much wheat as all Canada. But in return we have made a reduction in the duty on sparkling wines imported into Canada. The hon. gentleman was referring to the old treaty, in force prior to 1932, which contained a large number of articles which were never imported into this country.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understand that perfectly, but I was comparing the two treaties.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the committee might have misunderstood my hon. friend, because those articles were eliminated in the treaty of 1932. There is no article contained in the 1932 treaty to which we give any preference to France that was not included at the express request of someone in Canada who had an interest in procuring imports of that product from France or, on the other hand, who was interested in producing in Canada and exporting to France an article which was placed by that treaty on a better preferential basis in the French market. I cannot weigh the balance as between the producer of grapes in the Niagara peninsula and the producer of wheat in the prairie provinces. That is not for me to adjudicate; that issue is not mine to decide.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We are still working on a minimum tariff on wheat, are we not?

Mr. CAHAN: It is the only tariff on which we can work.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They can increase their duty on wheat again within six months, if they wish, without abrogating this treaty.

Mr. CAHAN: No, there is a clause in this treaty which provides that if they limit or restrict the special rights we have for the exportation and sale of wheat and flour, we have the right at once to abrogate the privileges granted to certain French products including wines. We must expect to give concessions if we are going to export our wheat. In round figures our exports of wheat to France have been as follows:

	Bushels
1930	6,698,000
1931	18,807,000
1932	17,184,000
1933	11,261,000

Then it was reduced, because after the old treaty had been in operation for one year they imposed greater restrictions upon the importation of wheat from Canada which the Prime Minister sought to overcome in negotiating this protocol. Our export of wheat to France in 1934 dropped to 7,899,000 bushels and it was proceeding to drop still further. Therefore, in order to preserve what we have in the way of a wheat market in France and to increase that market to the greatest extent possible, certain concessions have been made to France in this treaty. That is all I can say in reply to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend from Lincoln quite satisfied now?

Mr. CHAPLIN: With the explanation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not at all.

Mr. BROWN: I was just wondering if the hon. member for Lincoln remembered the discussion about bronze powder when the former treaty was under consideration.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, and I also recall that a gentleman came to this house and said that bronze powder was being exported from this country to some other country. Every year I have carefully looked through the records but I have found no trace of any such exports. So what was said about bronze powder does not count any more with me to-day than it did then. I happen to know something about it; I use it, and I never bought bronze powder made in Canada from anyone in Canada in my life.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I noticed that when speaking on this bill the Secretary of State mentioned that negotiations had been delayed for some considerable time because of some of the clauses in the Canada-United Kingdom agreement. Can my hon. friend tell me how long negotiations were delayed on that account?

Mr. CAHAN: I really cannot say. The matter was taken up, I think, soon after the treaty of May, 1933, was confirmed by an act of this parliament. Some negotiations ensued, first with regard to wines with Australia and South Africa and I think also with Great Britain in regard to brandies. I suppose those negotiations were conducted by the Department of External Affairs and I am sure that weeks and perhaps some months may have elapsed while correspondence was taking place. I remember that the commercial agent of Australia in Canada took some part, and then I think reference had to be made to the Australian government again. As to the exact date when consent was received from Australia and South Africa I cannot give accurate information, except that as soon as that consent was given the revision of the French trade agreement was taken up. This revision was discussed with Mr. Arsène Henry just before he left Canada, and I think he took with him to France some definite suggestions for the consideration of the French government. Mr. Arsène Henry was here during the Jacques Cartier centenary celebration, and it was just after that the Prime Minister left for Geneva. The Under Secretary of State, and I believe one or two of the officials of the department, accompanied the Prime Minister, and there the protocol which was subsequently embodied in the agreement now before the house was drawn up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any trade agreement other than the present one which, either in the form of a treaty, an agreement or a protocol, has been negotiated during the past year?

Mr. CAHAN: The right hon. gentleman will have to put that question to the acting Prime Minister, because I am not the official negotiator of treaties for the government. Perhaps out of turn I had to do simply with the negotiation of the Canada-France agreements. Perhaps no other member of the government could be so easily spared from his duties in Ottawa as I could be. At any rate it took three months with the help of the French experts for me to go through all the items found in the agreement of 1932, I did my best. Then later, in view of this experience I was informed as to the attitude of the French government respecting wine and wheat, the depreciation of Canadian currency, and the direct surtax levied on Canadian imports and I was authorized by the Prime Minister to open up conversations with Mr. Henry before he left Canada. I did that. Thereafter the negotiations were carried out and concluded in Paris by the Prime Minister of External Affairs, and his official assistants.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the minister, despite his modesty, is entitled to most of whatever credit there may be coming to the government for the negotiation of this protocol. Those of us who are familiar with negotiations of the kind and know something of his services will realize that the minister did work very hard in the early stages of the negotiations in connection with the agreement, and I believe any credit coming to the government should go chiefly to him.

Listening to the minister, I have been most interested in learning of the difficulties which were encountered because of the United Kingdom-Canada agreements. I believe those difficulties bear out what hon. members on this side have been saying. Those Imperial conference agreements as drafted have stood in the way of the negotiations of agreements with other countries. It is quite clear that Australia has had to be consulted, Great Britain has had to be consulted and other parts of the empire have had to be consulted before the government could negotiate any trade agreement, even one as small as the one now under consideration. Coupling with that the fact that, within the past year, no other trade agreements have been negotiated, it would clearly indicate that the provisions of the United Kingdom-Canada agreements are presenting real difficulties. It is not long since we heard some talk about possible reciprocity in trade between Canada and the United States, but it now would look as though those negotiations too have fallen through. If they have, I have not the slightest doubt the greater part of the difficulty has been that of getting over the handicaps which the United Kingdom-Canada agreements have placed in the way of negotiations between this country and the United States. From the discussion we have had on this particular measure at least that much is clear.

One other point is apparent—in fact, quite as apparent this evening as it was from what we witnessed this afternoon—namely that as between themselves hon. gentlemen opposite are not much happier over their trade agreements than they are over their social legislation. It looks as though the function of the opposition, so far as opposing is concerned, or at least so far as discovering limitations is concerned, has to all intents and purposes been usurped by a large section of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CHAPLIN: May I say to the right hon. gentleman that the old French treaty was more of a stumbling block in the way of the negotiation of any other treaty than anything which has ever been known in this country. Under the treaty which was made with France, seven or eight or nine other countries were given all the privileges contained in the French treaty. I refer to the most favoured nation treatment. We could not make any decent treaty outside until that treaty was abrogated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was hoping I might bring my hon. friends opposite together. It would seem as though I had succeeded.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think the right hon. gentleman has given due credit to the persuasive powers of the Prime Minister. Certainly in company with Doctor Skelton he did take up these negotiations in Paris, and was successful in alleviating or remedying certain occasions for irritation which had arisen between the two countries. It was of immense advantage to Canadian trade that this surtax should be removed. It was of very great value to Canadian trade that the French exchange depreciation tax against us, amounting to about eleven per cent, should be removed. Those were removed.

With regard to differences of opinion which prevail as to the views held by hon. members on this side of the house, I trust I am not lacking in generosity or in consideration when I say that if the leader of the opposition will carefully listen to what his supporters and colleagues are saying with respect to his own program and his enunciation of his views pronounced during the present session I am sure he will find more surprising differences of opinion prevailing on his side of the house than ever prevailed on this side.

Mr. DUPUIS: I object.

Mr. CAHAN: If, for instance, the views of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, which were pronounced with such a marked degree of emphasis a few evenings ago, and in which he stated that he was in favour of the issue of $425,000,000—was it not?—or $450,000,000 of paper currency—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Accurate as usual—wrong in both cases.

Mr. CAHAN: What was the amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Look up Hansard and find out.

Mr. CAHAN: It was away up in the hundreds of millions anyway. If those are the views of the right hon. leader of the opposition I may tell him that on his own side of the house and among his most ardent supporters there are graver differences of opinion than I have ever heard expressed on this side between my colleagues in the government or between members supporting the government. In this life we must expect, when going through the stress and strain to which we have all been subjected, that differences of opinion will develop in the minds of men. Perhaps it is fortunate that they are not always in agreement, and that out of the variety of experience of those who compose this chamber there finally results that unanimity with regard to public policy which is necessary for the advancement of the country, whether it be the unanimous view of the opposition or the unanimous view of the government. It is only through discussion that we find ways of compromising our views and reaching that unanimity of opinion which we may present and effectively carry into operation. I am not astonished when I see differences of opinion. The right hon. gentleman this afternoon made some rather sinister observations with regard to the views I had expressed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the contrary, if the minister will look at Hansard he will find that they were kindly remarks, so intended and so expressed.

Mr. CAHAN: Nevertheless when put in opposition to views expressed by another hon. gentleman the criticism was evidently intended to have a similar effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was quite the opposite. I classed my hon. friend with the hon. member for Quebec East and said that both of them had made valuable contributions. I expressed admiration for what my hon. friend had attempted.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no right to enter into a discussion but if the hon. gentleman will read the report of what I said this afternoon he will see that there is no great divergence of view as between myself and the other members of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that after this I shall have to pitch into my hon. friend instead of seeking to uphold him.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend will reflect I think he will realize that there is very little difference between the views expressed by his colleague, the hon. member for Quebec East, and himself and those which have been expressed on this side of the house. The only difference I can ascertain is the opinion that all legislation should be delayed until parliament is unanimous in the belief that it can be carried into effect by competent legislation. Legislation cannot be held up in that way. I am digressing from the point but I assure the hon. gentleman that he will find just as great a divergence of opinion on his side as is said to prevail on this side.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to know if preference has been given to the wines of France and Australia because of representations made to the government by the wine drinkers of Ontario that the wines of this province are inferior to those of France and Australia?

Mr. CAHAN: I have never heard any expression of opinion with regard to the inferiority of Ontario wines.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

European war—

Naval, militia and air forces after the war, $42,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I notice the amount is the same as last year. How much of last year's vote was expended?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The expenditure in 1933-34 was $41,839,830.90, and to December 1, 1934, $31,487,860.24.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When will the peak of expenditures be reached?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is expected that the peak has been reached under the existing legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that approximately $100,000 was authorized, I believe by order in council if not by legislation, as compensation for the members of the pension tribunal. If the minister has the information before him I should like to know the amounts paid to the various individuals.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not that information before me. The amounts have been decided with the exception of the amount to be paid to Doctor Morrison. This matter is in abeyance for the time being as he has another situation and some adjustment will be necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was the basis of compensation the same as that in connection with the members of the old federal appeal board?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As far as I know it was. The members of the pension tribunal got about $10,000 each.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the so-called disputed cases I understand that as a result of representations made a year ago the Skitch case has been finally settled. I am informed, although not officially, that the Ouellette case has been settled during the last few weeks. Has any disposition been made of the four remaining cases?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There were five cases in the series mentioned by the hon. gentleman. The Skitch case has been settled. The widow of Mr. Skitch has remarried. The Canadian patriotic fund had made certain advances to her and they were repaid. The widow received $1,256.92 as adjustment of pension up to the time of her remarriage. In the case of Arthur Smith the judgment of the federal appeal board was that the applicant was suffering from valvular disease of the heart, pre-enlistment, aggravated by service in France. A pension award has been made in connection with this decision and an arrangement has been arrived at for Mr. Smith's examination by a specialist and for assessment of the amount of pension to be paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When was that made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That has been made very recently. With respect to Andrews, the decision of the pension appeal board was that he was suffering from a hip condition, pre-enlistment, and arrangements have been made for his examination in order that the disability may be assessed. As regards Ouellette, this has resulted in Mr. Ouellette's receiving an award of $4,494.56, half of which was paid to him last month, and the balance will be paid shortly, subject to any adjustment for relief which has been paid. With regard to Tom Kane, the commission have implemented the judgment of the board by authorizing the payment of pension from the date it was discontinued to date of the soldier's death in November 1929, less the amount of gratuity paid the widow. The adjustment is being paid to the late Mr. Kane's widow.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a very satisfactory statement. There is one other case in the same category—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is the Fox case.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No judgment has been given by the exchequer court. The action in the Ontario courts was apparently withdrawn by Mr. Fox's solicitor at Mr. Fox's request. The solicitor is in touch with the department; in fact, this afternoon he was in asking for further consideration to be given the matter, which is being done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad indeed to hear that. If the minister gets the same considerate treatment with respect to Fox as he has obtained in the others, it will have been a very satisfactory disposition of these matters.

Mr. ROSS: I wish to make a few remarks in general in regard to pension matters. In the first place I commend the work of the acting chairman of the present pension commission. For the first time, I think, the returned men feel that they have a sympathetic hearer on the board, and when I use the word sympathetic I do not mean that a pension will be granted in every instance but I do mean that since the present chairman came to the commission we have had patient and fair dealing in all these cases, whether a pension was granted or refused.

In discussing this matter I suggest that there are three presumptions in regard to pension cases which we must take into consideration. The first presumption is that there are a small minority in this country and even in this house who believe that the returned man has received too much, that he has been too well treated. The second presumption is that this country and this parliament have always been anxious to have generous treatment given the returned man. But there is a third presumption that, in spite of this general wish on the part of the people and the parliament of Canada, there has been a certain antagonism from the beginning of the pension organization up to the present time. I wish to discuss what I regard as the obstacles that were encountered from 1921 to 1923 and 1924. Those of us who were interested then in pension matters will remember that we had to deal with what I might call threats made by certain officials of the pension board. Those returned men who were getting a small pension received a threat during those years that unless they commuted their pension they would have it reduced or eliminated altogether by the medical examiners and the pension representatives of that day. There are certain men who commuted their pension and who do not yet know that they can return to the pension status under certain conditions. A second obstacle was the poor assessment that was made, and even to this day there is no systematic way in which the pension is estimated and disability allowed. If the procedure of the insurance companies were followed instead of having these nineteen different percentages, then each case would be fairly decided. In those first years these two factors caused a good deal of disagreement and discontent and the result was that an appeal court was formed. That court functioned for a time, but as soon as it began to give decisions favourable to the returned men the pension board immediately sat upon it and arranged a procedure and adopted methods to be followed, and in consequence there was antagonism between the two boards.

Those of us who sat on the different committees in those years will remember that owing to the difference of opinion, that antagonism which existed between these two bodies, the returned men did not receive just and fair treatment. A strong demand was then made for changes and the Ralston commission was appointed. This brought to light a great many injustices and the result was the legislation of 1928. The proposals were brought to us in the committee by the legion and other interested societies and they were adopted. The hon. member for Red Deer and I were the only two opponents of that legislation. We pointed out that it was impracticable and would lead to greater confusion. We asked that the pension board should be increased and that travelling quorums should be appointed, and that the hearing of these cases should be in public. They proposed the appointment of tribunals; they proposed the appointment of pension advocates; they proposed an appeal board. The result was that the legislation broke down absolutely and the sufferers were the returned men.

While this parliament and the people of Canada desire to have generous treatment given the returned men, there have been from the beginning certain obstacles that have prevented the men from receiving that treatment which it was intended they should get, and in consequence the 1928 board has been done away with. We proposed that the appeal court should be resorted to by the returned men, but what happened? Instead of being used by the returned men it was usurped by the pension board, and every case decided favourably to the returned men was at once appealed, even before the decision was handed down. Some twenty-four or twenty-five thousand cases have been passed along, kicked around from one body to the other. Death has reduced the number to some extent, and men have gone down to their graves without that generous treatment which this country intended they should receive, and this because of procrastination, because of the impossibility of these boards functioning properly, so that a great deal of money has been misspent. If that money, instead of being wasted as it was in the years that have gone, had been given to the applicants this country would have been dollars ahead and these men would not have suffered as they have done.

Then we come to the 1931 legislation, and again an obstacle was put in the way. What has been the result of all this? Instead of a returned man receiving favourable, generous treatment, he has not been treated fairly. Clever young counsel were employed by the pension board against inexperienced pension advocates, and in nearly every one of the cases the returned man lost out. The only benefit that I can see from this legislation is that parliament has passed measures by which members of organizations have received remunerative positions while the returned men have practically lost out.

I come now to some other factors which have also worked against the returned men. They were up against it from 1921 to 1923; they were up against it again in the legislation of 1928 and 1931; but when we come to 1933—and I do not want anyone to think I am talking in a partisan way because these things have happened under both Liberal and Conservative governments—the result was murderous. In that year the men were cut off wholesale, their pensions being reduced or limited. How was this done? I want to bring these matters before the present chairman because I believe we have a sympathetic chairman of the commission and a sympathetic minister. In 1933, files away back in the years gone by were searched by somebody, and if certain statements could be found there, the man's pension was reduced or eliminated. I do not want to take up the time of the committee in discussing a great number of cases, but I shall give one that is significant. A man was pensioned for epilepsy. In 1933 a search of his file was made and it was found away back in the file that he had made a statement that he had a headache when he was a boy eleven years old. It was held that his epilepsy commenced then. The man had never had a seizure. He was examined in Canada; he took his training in this country and reached England without any seizure whatever. Yet on that statement his pension was cut by forty per cent. I have searched his file. The man disputes this statement, but even if it is true that he did make the statement, it is contrary to the act that his pension should be cut down. I want to draw the attention of the committee, the general public and the returned men to section 11 which states:

> No deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him at the time at which he became a member of the forces.

I want now to discuss an even more marked case than that. In 1933 a man had his pension reduced because he was said to have had pneumonia prior to his enlistment. He had served two or three years in France. According to that section his pension could not be reduced, nevertheless it was reduced. I do not doubt glaring mistakes have been made, but these should not be charged up against just cases which come within the act.

The question of marriage cases has been dealt with and a decision will be given. Then we come to the question of the immorality cases. I wonder whether the committee and the general public remember the promise given that men would be generously treated, yet a case was brought before the board where a woman had her pension cut off in 1920 and it remained cut off for fourteen years simply because some jealous or other person made a statement against her character. That sort of thing has happened in five or six cases in my constituency and vicinity, although it is contrary to the provision of the act which reads:

> The pension of any female pensioner who is found to be a common prostitute or who openly lives with any man in the relationship of man and wife without being married to him shall be suspended, discontinued or cancelled.

Yet not one of those cases in which the pension has been cut off on the ground of immorality comes within the terms of section 39. Someone goes into the woman pensioner's house and finds a man's coat there, and her pension is cut off. There were three children, but of course their pension was continued. In this case a pension was cut off for fourteen years from a woman whose husband was killed in France and who is left with three children. I do not know how the decision was reached, because it was contrary to the act. It must be proved, first, that the woman is a common prostitute, or second, that she is living as the wife of a man to whom she has not been married, and in not one of those cases were those conditions fulfilled. The returned men are awaiting the decision in the marriage case. I think it was a great interference to disturb a marriage that had been in existence for fifteen or sixteen years, putting a name upon the returned man's wife because she could not produce a certificate of her first husband's death which had occurred twenty years before.

The compassionate benefit of doubt clause has been practically ignored. I will agree that the department have treated cases in accordance with that clause, but the pension part of it has been absolutely ignored. I would like to draw the attention of the committee and of the returned men to four factors in the great war in which compassion and the benefit of the doubt should be given. The men who served one year in the war at the front saw a certain amount of hardship, but only those who served four years at the front can really describe what the men went through. There are four conditions I want to bring before the chairman and before the new minister. The first is the conditions on Salisbury plain. Anyone who lived through those conditions knows that eighty per cent, yes ninety per cent of the men came out of there with bronchitis, and they had not recovered from that when they were suddenly thrust into the gas attack in April. The pension experts tell us, following the United States decision, that any person who suffered from gas would not have tuberculosis or would not have a tendency to tuberculosis. In fact the United States decision was that it helped to cure a case tending to tuberculosis. But unfortunately their statistics are based upon experiences which followed the use of almost, one might say, perfect gas masks through which the men suffered very little and where they recovered. The Canadian statistics cannot be made up, because our men who went through that first gas attack endured it when there was no protection and are in ninety per cent of the cases lying in Flanders field, and those who survived and came home I contend are liable to any pulmonary trouble that you can name. After gas masks have been provided and protection is perfected, the statistics are very different as with figures for those who endured a gas attack without any protection or help.

Then I want to take the third case. Those who were in the Somme went through conditions that no people in this country know much about. The men who served the first year and came home did not have the experiences of men who served the second, third or fourth years. When men lay in mud in the Somme valley, as they did for eight days, came back and slept in the Albert mud fields and brick yards for a night or two, and then went back for their three days' rest only to return to the mud fields again, they went through an experience from which any disease might result. Then, fourth, was the Passchendaele field. When we of the Canadian corps went into Passchendaele there was a record there that the force that preceded us did not get fifty per cent of their wounded out of that ground. I have walked on those duck-boards, and the men who went in by daylight could see those bodies that were almost as sleepers under the duck-boards. Any men who went through a month of that and could come back and be the men they were before would be supermen. They are liable to any form of breakdown of their system.

Now in deciding those cases, and having regard to the benefit of the doubt, I can say without hesitation that no man who went through either the first year on Salisbury plain, or the first gas attack, or the Somme experience, and lastly through Passchendaele, could do so without some effect on his system. In these cases I think some consideration should be given to the experience instead of trying to cut pensions down. And in future consideration of cases there should be nothing of the kind which I quote now. Here is a returned man who has had an operation. He has adhesions. He has had them for a year or two. What do you think of this record put on his medical sheet? This is given by one of the surgeons. Just following an operation you may have adhesions, medical men in this room will agree, but when these adhesions keep on for a year or two years I do not think it deserves such a report as this on the man's sheet:

> Think this man with the greatest security can get out and do the hardest of labour without the slightest ill effect, and it will help the pain.

What chance has that man before any board, with that entered on his sheet, signed by the surgeon of the department? Statements supposed to have been made by a man preceding enlistment should be checked up with the greatest diligence. Here is a man who says:

> On my sheet is the fact that I have had pneumonia, that I had arthritis, but I never was sick in my life before my enlistment.

[Mr. Ross.]

If the statement is there it should be shown and proven, because I followed it in one case and I could not find anything to justify any such statement. It seems that these statements are passed down as one board follows another. They are simply copied from the previous record without ever going back of it. I think the pension board should study these things thoroughly. I will give you four or five cases. Here is one man noted as having had pneumonia in 1902, as having had rheumatic fever in 1911, and his pension is reduced forty per cent. The man says he never had them. Here is a case within my own knowledge. The man has tuberculosis to-day. He was run over in France by a gun limber loaded with live shells weighing one or two tons. He had served two years, and never had a sign of a cough or lung affection of any kind until he was run over by this gun limber. Then he is home with tuberculosis and they find that some time previous to his enlistment he had pneumonia. They reduce his pension in spite of the section that I read in which it is provided that any previous trouble should not be counted in the reduction of his disability. Here is another: they wrote to the man and said, "Before your case comes on we want a little bit more evidence." I have two or three letters which contain this phrase: "We want a little bit more evidence." What kind of evidence? The man's comrade is not believed; anyone connected with him is not believed. There is only one way he can get it, and that is from the record of the hospital in which he was treated in France or in England; yet, when that is searched for, it cannot be found. That is where the man could get his evidence. If the records of these hospitals were produced they would show the medical men who attended him, and the nurses; but the man has to suffer because the record is lost. See how it works against a good man. I have had this in hundreds of cases: A man who is at the front comes to us in the ambulance and says: "I don't want to go back." He has a temperature, and the regulations say that if he has a temperature for three days he must be evacuated. But this man says, "I don't want to go back." We put him in a rest station and try to treat him. He comes out recovered and goes back to the front; he comes back again and again, he goes to the front. The record is absolutely lost or destroyed, but every week a return is made from the ambulances of the men and their complaints. Yet they say: "Go and get a little further evidence."

Here is another case: they say, "Investigate carefully all records of the Calvin Company." But the Calvin Company is long out of business and most of those who were connected with it are dead. The captain of the boat on which the accident happened is dead. The man cannot possibly get the evidence, but the accident on the boat is the reason he cannot get his pension for another accident that happened in France.

I hope I have made this clear. I am saying it perhaps for the last time. I shall give a summary of these things, but first I want to read a letter. May I say I saw this thing through from the beginning to the end, having been among the first in and the last out of France, and I did think that my medical experience there would be worth something. I received a copy of this letter:

> It is with considerable diffidence that I write, but the situation is urgent and demands public support.

This is not written recently, but I want to show the house the situation.

> Such action before now has compelled parliament to act. Brigadier General Ross has questioned in the house decision given against the tubercular and disabled soldiers in many instances by the pension board.
>
> Parliament exhibits a curious apathy to the question.
> No one in Canada is better qualified to give an expert opinion on this question than Brigadier General Ross—

I shall not read any more of that or it might be said I read it for my own benefit. But here is the thing:

> During the war time Canada in a more or less hysterical manner stated the returned soldiers would be looked after and the service rendered would never be forgotten.

Has it been so? I say emphatically it has not so far as our sick are concerned. Listen to this:

> If a man on his enlistment was passed as fit by the medical officers then this country cannot morally refuse assistance if tuberculosis has developed within a reasonable period after his discharge from the service.

The writer of this was not then on the pension board, but he is a member of that board to-day and I have not seen any more generous treatment being given our returned men. Here is a case of which I have personal knowledge. In the battle of Loos we had about seven hundred gas cases. Due to the fact that our treatment had been prepared we evacuated from the front line only twenty-six of the seven hundred, and this man was one of the twenty-six. Hon. members will agree that this man would not be expected to improve as the years went by; I know that to-day he is in a chronic condition, but here is his experience with the pension board. In 1923 he obtained a pension of fifteen per cent, which continued until 1926, when it was increased to twenty-five per cent. In 1927 it was increased again to forty per cent and in 1928 to fifty per cent, where it remained until 1933. To-day that man is an absolute wreck, but in 1933 his pension was reduced to thirty per cent. Can that be justified? Can any reason be given for such action? His pension was gradually increased to fifty per cent, but in 1933 it was reduced to thirty per cent though to-day he is thirty per cent worse than he has been at any time since coming home.

I think I have given enough illustrations, and I should like to make certain proposals in this regard. I think the time has come when these permanent medical officers should be exchanged. These officers have given opinions; very often a man has had a decision given against him. He comes up for a re-hearing against the same officer, and these officers are not big enough to change their opinions even though the condition may be progressing. So I think the time has come when these permanent officers should be moved. Let them be sent to some other stations; let the men from those other stations exchange with them. It is impossible to get these men to change their opinions no matter how bad the cases may be. Then again I think we have been just a little too ready to take these ex-service men from the eligible pension list and put them under the veterans' allowance. I think they deserve a little better treatment than that. I have mentioned four factors, and I think it will be agreed that any man who has been affected by one, two, three or all four is to-day in such a condition that age should not be counted. I would wipe out the age limit in regard to those returned men; I would make them total disability cases whether they were forty, fifty or sixty years of age. How can anything be determined by the age of the man? In 1923 I heard the then minister of pensions say, "We have reached the peak, and in about two years these pensions will begin to decrease." Why, we have not reached the peak yet; so long as there are any of these men left they are going to suffer from their experiences.

Let me say openly that I cannot understand why the chief medical adviser of the department is also a commissioner. Is it reasonable that a man who has given a decision should sit as a member of the board reviewing that decision? The thing is ridiculous; the chief medical adviser should not be a commissioner. Perhaps I should be a little more lenient, Mr. Chairman, but if you had spent four years with these men and had seen how they suffered—and you must remember that some of them did not know what suffering was until they returned home—you would feel as I do. I may not appeal to the house again for fair treatment of these men, but I hope my experience has been worth something to them. I have refused to take any job, because I believe it my duty, after I have seen them go through so much, to back them up in their demand for the fair and generous treatment they were promised.

Mr. ARTHURS: I have no desire to delay these estimates, Mr. Chairman, but to a certain extent I must endorse what the hon. member for Kingston City has said as to the unrest among the returned men and what they think of the treatment they have received in the past. I have been fortunate enough to have been on every pension committee appointed since the war, I think, and we have always done the best we could, but sometimes, as the hon. member has pointed out, the best does not seem to be any too good.

In the early days following the war pensions were very readily granted and the greatest trouble of hon. members of the house was that it was thrown up to them that George Jones and Dick Smith had pensions which they did not deserve. That was the main complaint in those days. As time passed and the memories of the war faded, however, the contrary became the case. For many years we had at the head of the pensions board a man who was almost universally disliked by the returned soldiers. He was a gentleman of whose personal integrity I have nothing to say; undoubtedly he was an honourable gentleman, but he was said to stand so upright that he was in danger of falling over and injuring the back of his neck. He does not occupy that position now.

Another complaint has been voiced by the hon. member for Kingston City, and it has been a prominent complaint on the part of returned men's organizations for some years. It is that our chief medical officer was not likely to change his opinion in favour of an applicant for pension. I feel as my hon. friend feels that the appointment of the chief medical officer as a member of the commission perhaps was not a very wise move. We all know that cases have arisen from time to time in which the decisions of the board have been entirely contrary to the purpose of the act. Section 11 of the Pension Act distinctly states that a man who went to France apparently physically fit and who saw service in an active theatre of war should have no charge made against him with regard to his eligibility for pension. That is to say, any disease that he might have had before enlistment should not count against him unless—and I think the hon. member for Kingston City forgot this exception—it was a case of misrepresentation or deliberate fraud. I have known men who went overseas after passing not one but perhaps two or three examinations in Canada; they passed further examinations in England and did their duty in France, and yet because a man had measles when he was only two years old he is stated to be ineligible for pension, or if in fact he is getting a pension it is reduced. One instance in particular appealed to me. I have in mind a man whom I know well and who at present is totally blind. He saw service in France, and has been in hospitals in Canada. He applied for a pension. The statement was made that he responded to a Wassermann test—hon. members know what that means—and that his disability was a result of venereal disease. He has taken an affidavit that he never had any disease of that kind, nor did his people so far as he knows. I believe the man is honest. He was told that if he said he had the disease he would receive a pension for aggravation, but when he says he has not he cannot get the pension. I believe there are many cases similar to the one I have described which should have the sympathetic consideration of the commission. Perhaps in this house and throughout the country there is an element who think enough has been done for the returned soldier, but I am quite sure they form only a negligible portion of our population. I believe the people desire that every returned man who is eligible for pension shall have at least that compensation to which by law he is justly entitled.

Mr. SANDERSON: To a great extent I concur in the observations of the hon. members for Kingston City and Parry Sound. I was under the impression that before the last amendments to the Pension Act were made one of the great stumbling blocks in connection with giving justice to ex-service men was the fact that the onus was on him to prove that his disability was due to war service. It was impossible to present that proof. I would say, not in any spirit of criticism—and I want the minister thoroughly to understand that—that in the many cases with which I have been connected I have not known of one in which the ex-service man received the benefit of the doubt when consideration had been given to the question whether his disability had been due to war service. So long as that condition prevails justice cannot be given to ex-service men.

I believe a great deal of the difficulty now experienced by ex-service men applying for pensions is due to what happened in the days immediately following the war when the men were returning to Canada. Every soldier was tired of war and anxious to get back into civil life. That is where a great deal of the difficulty originated. Thousands and thousands of young Canadians returned from France and were discharged without any examination. To a great extent the fault was that of the soldier, because he wanted to get away from the army and back into civil life. Perhaps in many cases soldiers did not wish to admit there was anything physically wrong with them, and for that reason examinations did not amount to anything. In the years which followed, however, disabilities appeared in some of the soldiers who had been discharged. The statement was then made, "Well, when this man was discharged he was physically fit and his file did not show any disability." I believe to a great extent that is the difficulty with which we have to contend to-day. The hon. member for Kingston City made some observations regarding medical sheets and files. I know many applications have been turned down because the files did not show the applicant had been in a hospital or even that he had been wounded or gassed. I have always contended that those refusals were ridiculous, because files were lost overseas. There was a war on, and in many cases no records were kept where men had been gassed or wounded. After a lapse of five or ten years, these men having since come back to civil life, nothing can be found on their files. That is the difficulty, and because of it I submit that in every case the returned man should receive the benefit of the doubt. He does not receive that benefit to-day, and in this observation I am not criticizing the pension commission. Perhaps they are more or less confined within the four corners of the act, but there should be more flexibility in its application; the humanitarian view should be taken. Speaking broadly I believe the Dominion of Canada has treated her ex-service men as well as has any country which participated in the great war. That however is no reason why injustices and weaknesses in the act should not be remedied and the proper amendments made. I fully expected that amendments would be brought down during the present session, and I regret the minister and the government have not seen fit to do so. I hope that at the next session of parliament, no matter what party is returned to power, amendments to the Pension Act may be made. I have no desire to delay the minister's estimates. I could mention four or five cases which have come under my observation within the last few months but I shall not take the time of the committee any more than to emphasize this point, that soldiers discharged at the end of the war showing no disability have found difficulty in proving their cases.

Since the depression, if we choose so to describe it, a condition which has been world-wide in its scope, when thousands of men have been out of work, ex-service men receiving or not receiving pensions who are unemployed and depending more or less on charity find their condition of disability aggravated. The suggestion to reduce the pension of an unemployed soldier is in my mind quite wrong. The hon. member for Kingston spoke about this matter. Undoubtedly the state of mind of a man who is unemployed, especially if he has a family dependent upon him, will aggravate a disability. Such cases should receive the sympathetic consideration of the pension board. This country spends considerable money for pensions. There are some people, not very many I am glad to say, who think that perhaps the ex-service men have received all the consideration they should receive. I agree with the hon. member for Kingston City who has reminded the committee that when the war was on those who enlisted to go overseas were promised definitely that if they were spared to come back they would be taken care of, if they were disabled they would be pensioned and if they were killed their families would be taken care of. I think it is the duty of this parliament to see that the promises which were made to the men who enlisted in the great war are carried out to the very letter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I assume that every hon. member receives a great number of complaints from returned men as to the manner in which the Pension Act is administered. I come from a constituency in which there is a large number of returned men but I must confess that I have not followed the administration of this act very closely. As far as the business of the house is concerned, my colleague the hon. member for Red Deer represents us in this corner in connection with pension matters. We have turned over to him a great many cases and have left it to him to work out the details of the amendments which might be brought before the house. I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Kingston City in urging that the returned man be given the benefit of the doubt and granted not only fair but generous treatment.

Mr. HOWDEN: Anything I may say in regard to this matter will be said simply as a civilian doctor, I not having had any military experience. The state of affairs to which the hon. member for Kingston City has directed attention undoubtedly is a blot upon the social life of this country which probably will not be erased until the last overseas casualty has passed on. One of the things which has caused much unhappiness and dissatisfaction among the returned men is the fact that a great many men in rather good circumstances are receiving extensive pensions from the government which they probably do not need. Another phase of the matter is the fact that many men were invalids before they entered the army. It is true that these men were accepted by the examining boards, but they never did one day's service. I have met a number of such cases and undoubtedly they create dissatisfaction and unhappiness among the bona fide men, many of whom are wrecks to-day. I have in mind one old fellow whom I attended for many years prior to the war. This man has had bronchitis all the days of his life. He was accepted and went to Great Britain where he continued to have bronchitis. He came back to Canada and has been in the hospital on and off ever since. His overseas service has nothing whatever to do with his bronchitis. I have personal knowledge of other cases where men are receiving substantial pensions for overseas service when in fact they are just as healthy as I am. On the other hand, men who died in misery and agony, undoubtedly the victims of overseas service, had been unable to obtain a five cent piece by way of pension. It is not always easy to say whether or not a man's condition is the result of overseas service, but if a man has risked his life for his government and his fellow citizens, it seems to me that the least a government can do is to give him medical assistance and treatment as long as he lives, whether or not his illness may have been caused by overseas service.

The hon. member for Kingston City has referred to the staff of medical men. I think it would be a mighty good plan to do away with these men because they are such a hard-boiled bunch. Once it is decided that a man is not sick, in their eyes he can never be sick again. I think the best thing the government could do would be to get rid of these permanent medical men and rely upon the ordinary medical practitioners to give the returned men the justice which they deserve. Any medical man who has any sensibility is disgusted with the way these things are handled. Many men appeal to us who are simply wrecks, and whether or not their condition is due to overseas service, it is the duty of this country to make some reparation for the disabilities they suffer as a result of the service which they have given to the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have the marriage cases been discussed as yet?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could the minister make a statement with reference to the situation now prevailing in connection with the marriage cases which were discussed in the committee on February 13 of last year? I should like to know the number disposed of and the number yet to be disposed of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before answering that question let me say that I appreciate the discussion on this subject which has been led by the hon. member for Kingston city. I have no doubt that many hon. members do not know the magnificent record of the hon. member. He was in charge of the entire medical arrangements of the Canadian corps and was responsible for the evacuation of the wounded. Wherever returned men gather they recognize the work he did and the great sympathy he has for them at the present time. One point which he brought out impressed me, as I am sure it impressed any hon. member who has first hand information. The hon. member referred to the conditions which prevailed at Salisbury plain in 1914 and 1915, at Ypres at the time of the gas attack and at the Somme. I cannot speak personally of the conditions at Passchendaele, but I have heard that they were just as bad or perhaps worse. Any man who faced the conditions at Salisbury or the other places in my opinion would not be in the same condition of health as when he went in, even though he did not receive an actual wound. It is not the ones with actual wounds that give difficulty, because there is not much trouble with respect to a man who has an arm or a leg off; it is the cases referred to, men who have possibly got along fairly well but who suffer from the strain and stress of life. I am confident that this is so, and I think that more and more of these cases will come to the fore and will have to be dealt with as sympathetically as possible.

I noted what the hon. member for Kingston City said with regard to the loss of records. That undoubtedly is a point that comes up frequently in the search for the medical history of some of the men. He also said—and others have voiced the sentiment—that sympathy has been in evidence since Mr. Justice Taylor took over the chairmanship of the board. I express my acquiescence in that view. Since I have been in charge of the department I have had repeated instances of the personal interest and sympathy which Mr. Justice Taylor has in these cases. I have had a very wide experience with pensioners in my practice of medicine, and I have never yet seen a man with a pension who I thought should not have it. You will see in the papers and you will hear from time to time that so and so has a pension which he does not deserve any more than someone else, and yet in a number of these cases in which I have been the medical attendant I know that the men have had serious troubles, deepseated, underlying and not evident to anyone passing them on the street. They were in receipt of pensions, and so long as they were quiet they got along well and looked well. But they could not have stood hard work; they would have gone down hill and died. Sometimes people are rather thoughtless in their attitude to those receiving pensions. My personal observation has been as I have stated; I have never seen anyone getting a pension who I thought should not have it. I think that as a general rule things are going along much better under Mr. Justice Taylor.

I have made notes of the suggestions put forward by hon. members and they will certainly be given every consideration. With regard to the marriage cases I do not know that I can do better than read, although it is rather long, a statement given me by the chairman of the pensions commission with regard to them:

With reference to the number of cases which have been dealt with where the validity of the pensioner's marriage has been questioned, I beg to submit the following figures. These figures only include the cases which have actually reached the pay branch to date, and might be supplemented, perhaps, by fifteen or twenty other cases which have been dealt with, but have not actually reached the pay branch. In all 632 cases have arisen which might be classified as follows:—

(1) Granted: 160.

In these cases the commission have acknowledged the validity for pension purposes of the marriage in question, and the pensioner has been so advised.

This item would include a number of cases where the commission has obtained, or been supplied with, additional information which has cleared up the problem.

(2) Not Granted: 98.

These are cases in which either by the admission of the parties themselves, or by material already on the pensioner's file, or after a hearing before two commissioners, it has been decided that the marriage cannot be recognized as sufficient for pension purposes.

These include cases where pensioner has admitted that he never went through a marriage ceremony; cases where former spouses of one of the parties have been located, and ascertained to be living at the time of the marriage to the pensioner, without any action having been taken to dissolve the previous marriage; cases in which the time has been very short between the separation from the first spouse and the contracting of the second marriage, and in which it would be impossible for any presumption of death to arise; and an odd case in which the pensioner has asked us not to make further investigation. Other cases might be included in this number, but the ones I have mentioned are the principal ones.

(3) Investigating: 81.

These are cases in which we have asked the pensioner to submit further evidence; or to put in the form of a statutory declaration statements which may only have been made to us by letter, or in which we, ourselves, are trying to get the necessary information apart from the pensioner. I think every assistance is being afforded pensioners in this class of case; and the commission is even going to some expense in a number of cases, in order to assist the pensioner to get the necessary information. In addition, pensioner is being notified in each case that the district pensions advocate in his district will give him every assistance possible in the way of supplying any further information that may be required.

(4) Awaiting Opportunity to Appear before the Commission: 54.

Some of these are cases in which we think the marriage of the pensioner cannot be recognized for pension purposes, but before cancelling the additional pension for his wife, we have given him an opportunity of appearing before the commission. Unless the facts are apparent from the file itself, or from the admission of the pensioner or his wife, we are not actually cancelling any additional pensions without first giving the pensioner an opportunity of appearing before the commission. In most cases of this kind, the additional pension is being continued until after he has a hearing. In a few cases, where the upholding of the marriage seems to be next to impossible, we have, in the meantime, suspended the payment of additiona pension until the hearing.

Other cases which might be included in this class are those where we think, perhaps, the pensioner can best substantiate his marriage problem by attending, and giving evidence, before commissioners, instead of supplying affidavits. A number of hearings have been ordered in such cases, because the commission through it would give the pensioner a better chance of retaining his additional pension for his wife; and also in cases where we had to consider the question of recovery of payments already made, and we wanted to inquire into the good or bad faith of the pensioner in procuring payment of additional pension for a wife; or as to whether he was guilty of any fraud or deceit.

(5) No Decisions Rendered: 239.

This number includes approximately 115 or 125 divorce problems where the validity of the pensioners' marriage depends upon the validity of a divorce obtained in the United States. These cases will probably all be settled by two or three general decisions. In many cases the circumstances are identical, but I have not yet given them final consideration; in other words, they were left to the last. They will be considered as a class as soon as the other cases are reasonably disposed of.

The balance of the cases in which no decision has been rendered are cases which have not yet been reviewed and written up for my consideration. Mr. Wilson, departmental solicitor, is working continually on these cases, and it will not be long until they are all disposed of.

In nearly all of the cases where it has been found necessary to discontinue additional pension for wife, we have not cut off the additional pension for children, but continued to pay it under section 22 (4).

Generally speaking, the commission has adopted a principle that we will not recover moneys overpaid in connection with these marriage cases unless we decide that the overpayment was caused through fraud or deceit on the part of the pensioner. Fortunately, the number of cases where there has been fraud or deceit is not large.

New cases are arising from time to time which contain marriage problems, which the commissioners in the board room have thought it necessary to refer to me. Since the 1st of August, last, 250 cases, approximately, have been so referred, in addition to the number which were awaiting consideration upon my arrival. I think I might safely say that another six weeks or two months should see the marriage problem pretty well out of the way, except for cases that may be awaiting hearings before commissioners; and the cases which are arising from week to week.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this the last item in the minister's estimates?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is another one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are two or three hon. members who would like one item to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There will be a supplementary item for 1934-35 on which I suggest any discussion might take place.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I would like to say one further word on this matter, because what I had in mind has been pretty fully expressed by other hon. members who have spoken, particularly by the hon. member for Kingston City.

In common with, I suppose, every other hon. member, and especially with those who like myself have been associated with this work for a number of years, I have had brought to my attention a great many individual cases in which pensions have been refused or reduced and the applicants have felt themselves aggrieved. I shall not bring any of these cases before the committee at this time, for I believe no good purpose could be served by my doing so, but I must say that in a number of these cases I found myself utterly at a loss to understand the action which brought about this situation. It seems to me that ordinary common sense, let alone ordinary humanity, would have dictated a different and more generous policy.

As I conceive the matter, the great problem lies in this, that perhaps above all other laws the success of this one depends upon its administration. You cannot legislate to meet individual cases, and in almost every instance the plight of a particular applicant will depend almost wholly upon the discretion of the pension commission or those who serve under and act for it. That is inevitable, because it is a law which above all others deals with humanity and naturally suffering humanity, varying in kind, in degree, and every case must be dealt with on its merits. This is what makes it so peculiarly important that the administration should be carried on by those who not only are intelligent and fully conversant with the subject, but have a really sympathetic and understanding attitude. That becomes more and more imperative as the years go by, because more and more it is becoming impossible for any new applicant to bring forward definite and convincing evidence, and the common sense of the commission must be exercised in deciding whether, in view of all the circumstances, the overwhelming probability must be that the application is worthy of consideration. It seems to me that we are faced again with the fact, that the most deserving cases are always the most difficult to prove. The man who from the beginning has made application or has camped on the doorstep of the department every time he has had an ache, is the one who can be taken care of; but the man who above all others deserves consideration, the man who without making application has done his best to carry on under his own steam despite disability, until the crushing weight of that disability and of increasing years makes it impossible for him to do so, finds through his own meritorious action that there is a gap of evidence which makes the proof of continuity almost impossible. I believe in those cases above all others the administrative bodies, the commission and those serving it, should temper their justice with a good deal of discretional humanity.

There is just one other point I would like to make, and it is by way of support of a suggestion made by the hon. member for Kingston City, who knows whereof he speaks, namely that the medical officers at the various points should be changed around from time to time. In common with many others I have had cases come before me from time to time where men applied for a reboarding, and I must say that usually a reboarding has been granted. But when the reboarding takes place before the same medical examiners who made the former examination, human nature as it has been exemplified in many of these cases is such that there is almost an overwhelming disinclination on the part of the examiners to admit that they might possibly have been mistaken the last time. It seems to me that it would be all to the good from the standpoint of justice and of getting a fresh viewpoint, a fresh angle, a fresh application of medical skill, if the reboarding could take place under some medical officer who had had no former connection with the case, who would consider it without bias and have no former decision to hamper his present consideration. I believe such a move would go far towards bringing about justice in some cases and removing dissatisfaction in many more. Where I have had cases reboarded perhaps three or four times, the third or fourth time the men appeared before the medical examiner the first remark made was this: "Oh, you are back here again, are you? What do you want now?" Well, it is impossible for any man to get a satisfactory examination when that is the attitude of the examining officers even before the examination begins; the man might just as well stay at home. I shall not go so far as to suggest, as was mentioned by someone, that we should scrap the whole examining body and put in fresh men on the ground that although they may have benefited by years of experience, there has occurred a hardening of the mental arteries which later renders them useless. But I would suggest, from my experience as a result of any obesrvations I have been able to make, that in the case of reboarding, in the case of a second or third or fourth examination of the same man, he should have the benefit of at least a change of physician, a change of attitude, an examination by a medical officer who, coming fresh to the consideration of that particular case, would be unhampered by any previous decision on the same man or any preconceived opinion arising therefrom.

Before I close, I must in justice say this—and it has been one of the most pleasurable parts of pension work during the last months—that the men appreciate the changing attitude of the administration during the past months and under the present chairman. I received just the other day a letter from the legion bodies in my part of the country, with whom I have had a certain amount of contact for a good many years, and for the first time they did not ask for anything and made no complaints. They wrote to inform me that the situation and the feeling had materially improved, almost to paraphrase the words of the hon. member for Kingston City—and they used almost the same expression—not so much that there had been many increases in pension, not so much that a few of the applications formerly refused are now receiving consideration, but because of the manner in which the applications are being received. Instead of simply a curt note, "application refused," they receive a courteous notice informing them not only that it has been refused but why it has been refused, in many cases convincing them that the application had not the merit which they thought it had, and in others giving the reason and the meaning behind the evidence which had made proper consideration impossible, thus giving them a reasonable chance to strengthen their case and bring forward the evidence necessary to making it complete. I wish to pay that tribute to a gentleman whom I have never met, the present chairman, but with whose work I have had some contact, as well as having some knowledge of the attitude of the returned men in my part of the country at least in relation to the present administration. They do not think it is perfect, but they do believe it is steadily improving. With increasing experience and its application in new administrative methods—and possibly with some amendments that may be necessary, although at the moment I know of none; I think administration is the important thing now—with that experience sympathetically applied I believe we shall be able finally to close for all time what has been a rankling grievance on the part of a section of our citizenship who I think above all others should be considered. I certainly hope so. I can say this perhaps with the greater freedom and force because I am not a returned man, but have had contact with the returned men and have to some extent had their confidence. I believe that should be our attitude not merely on sentimental grounds but on the grounds stated so forcibly by the hon. member for Kingston City, having regard to the fact that the experience through which they have gone in many cases must have burnt out their power of resistance and left them a prey to disease and premature old age. We hope that with this sympathetic and understanding administration we shall be able to meet the situation more fully than ever before to the end that that rankling sense of injustice may be removed.

Item agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Empire settlement scheme, including grants authorized by the governor in council, $34,250.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the increase in this vote for?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): This has to do with the empire settlement scheme agreement, entered into I think in 1926 or 1927 between the British government and ourselves, whereby young British lads were brought to Canada. Under the terms of the agreement, within a period of time which brought them to the age of twenty-five, I think, they were entitled upon having saved $500 to obtain a loan from the dominion government of $1,000, from the province of $250, and from the British government of $1,250, making in all $2,500. Several young chaps are entitled to these loans; some of them were entitled some three years ago. I have seen a number of them and have urged upon them that they would be well advised not to start to take on obligations. A person having saved $500 in farm work is doing pretty well. Up to the present we have not had to advance money to any of these boys, but enough of them are entitled under the agreement to take advantage of the loan if they persist and it would come to the amount asked for. I am hopeful, however, that none of them will undertake such obligations, because I know what it means.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that the reason for the increase in the vote?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, that is the reason.

Item agreed to.

Soldier and general land settlement—

Amount required for soldier land settlement advances, for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff, performing investigations for the war veterans allowance committee and Farmers' creditors Arrangement Act, $1,162,400.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): There is a matter I wish to take up with the minister under this item. It is in connection with an order in council, I believe it was, passed about 1933, under which soldier settlers who paid a certain amount of money were given credit for an additional amount, I believe double the amount they paid.

Mr. GORDON: That was by statute.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I have had it brought to my attention several times, both by letter and by interviews with returned men, particularly in the dried out areas, that the men have not been able to pay anything in recent years because they have not had any crop. They want to know how they stand in regard to that provision in case they have a crop this year—whether they will get the same credit. In other words men who have a crop and are paying something get a credit on their loan, whereas those who have no crop are not getting any benefit whatever. What will their position be under that legislation in case they are able to pay something in the future?

Mr. GORDON: It was not by order in council but by legislation. Under that legislation if they get a crop and are able to pay something this year they will get credit dollar for dollar on the amount paid in.

Mr. VALLANCE: During the legion convention held here I think last year a resolution was passed asking that where a returned soldier say in any of the western provinces, who already had some farm land acquired other land through the soldier settlement board, which took security on all his land, including that of which he was in possession before he went to the war, this previously owned land should be freed from encumbrance because of any indebtedness to the government through the settlement scheme. Has the government given any consideration to that?

Mr. GORDON: The resolution to which the hon. member referred has not come pointedly to my attention, although it has been under review by offiecrs of the department. I shall be glad to make myself more familiar with the resolution, and if it appears that there is hardship by reason of the attitude of the board, and it is possible to correct it without statutory amendment, I shall be very glad to take such action as seems proper.

Mr. VALLANCE: The answer of the minister is indefinite. It is remarkable if the resolution has not been forwarded to him; it is more remarkable that, if it has, the minister is not more conversant with it. It seems to me that some legislative action should be taken to relieve this situation.

Mr. GORDON: It may seem strange, Mr. Chairman, but I have not had the resolution under my review. I know that I went through many of the resolutions passed last year with the representatives of the soldier organizations, but at the moment I cannot remember having dealt with the resolution to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have a copy in my office. I did not anticipate that these estimates would be on to-night or I would have had it here.

Mr. GORDON: I have no doubt it was passed.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has the figures as to the collections in British Columbia for the year 1934.

Mr. GORDON: The soldier settlement collections in British Columbia for 1934-35, to March 7, 1935, not including prepayments, amounted to $108,847.98 in cash, and the bonus that resulted from the payment of cash was $101,463.53.

Mr. REID: How does that compare with 1932?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I have not the figures for 1932.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to send them to me?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, I will prepare a statement and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information as to the number of properties sold by the municipalities last year?

Mr. GORDON: In 1934 there were 141 properties in British Columbia sold by the department. Of course these were reverted properties.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice that this item includes advances under the British family schemes, recoverable from the British government. How much of this item is being used for that purpose, how much is being spent on this British family scheme to-day, and are any families coming in under that scheme now?

Mr. GORDON: No, there are no settlers coming in under the scheme, and there have been none for some years past. These are British funds that we are administering, including insurance and things of that kind, and of course this money is recoverable from the British government under the terms of the agreement.

Mr. VALLANCE: The whole item amounts to $1,162,400. How much is repayable by the British government?

Mr. GORDON: The breakdown of that item is as follows:

Advances—
Soldier land settlement, $393,800.
British government, $10,000.

Administration cost—
Soldier land settlement, $447,600.
General land settlement, $233,000.
Investigations for other departments, $28,000.
Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and relief investigations, $50,000.

Then there is provided $3,913.28 for losses under the British family agreement. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that when the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act came into force the services of the staff of the soldier settlement board were made available to those administering that act, for appraisals and matters of that kind. So, while that added to the work of the staff, I think we were fortunate in having these men available without adding to the cost of the civil service.

Mr. VALLANCE: The other day I directed the attention of the minister to a condition existing in northern Saskatchewan in connection with these British settlers. I should like to ask the minister, if he has the information there, how many British families were settled under this scheme, how many are still in Canada, how many have asked for deportation and how many have been deported.

Mr. GORDON: As at December 31, 1934, the number of active settlers under the British family scheme, with loans, totalled 1,825. There were four families who had repaid their loans in cash and eleven families who had repaid their loans by sale agreements, that is, tripartite agreements. There were 1,323 families who had withdrawn from 3,000 family scheme after contracting loans; 180 families who had withdrawn from the scheme before contracting loans—that is, they never really got started—and three families who did not receive loans at all. Of the total number that came out under the scheme 135 families were deported. I do not use that word "deported" as the term is usually accepted; they just did not fit in and asked to be returned to Great Britain.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the minister the information as to how many asked for deportation that were not deported?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I have not the exact figures in that regard. I can say this, however, and I think I carry the percentages correctly in my mind. With respect to all people who were returned to Great Britain since August, 1930—and I do not refer only to this scheme; I include all Britishers—92 per cent first became deportable and then requested the department to return them to Great Britain. The other eight per cent were returned under orders of deportation. It has not been the policy of the department to be influenced too readily by pressure brought to bear for the return to Great Britain of Britishers who came to this country before 1930. At times some are prone to ask for return to the old land, and upon investigation it is found such people could get along if they tried. We do not encourage anything of that kind. The department does not like to see them return because while in some respects it may be true Great Britain offers more in the way of social insurance, or it may be that men wish to get back to their friends, yet we take the stand those men should have thought about such matters before they came here. I discourage action being taken because I harbour the view that this country presents great opportunities for anyone who wishes to take advantage of them, despite the fact that we hear it painted in rather gloomy colours.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I again refer to the people in northern Saskatchewan about whom I spoke the other day. They were brought in under the three thousand family scheme. It is unfortunate that most of those people were put on abandoned soldier settlement lands, and they never had a chance from the beginning. They have utterly failed, they are now destitute, and the information I receive is that their application for deportation has been refused. When this scheme was first suggested I pointed out the danger that these settlers coming into the country had not a ten per cent chance if they were placed on deserted soldier settlement lands, lands upon which the soldiers had not succeeded. I bring the matter to the attention of the minister because I have learned these people have asked for deportation. They cannot possibly make good, and I should like to know if it is a fact that deportation has been refused.

Mr. GORDON: The departmental officials in the locality in which these settlers lived have made investigations. The hon. member is not quite right when he states that they—I believe they are about a half dozen in number—have not made any payments. My information is that one of them paid something over $1,100. The fact that they were settled on reverted soldier settlement lands does not by any means indicate that those lands could not support families.

Mr. VALLANCE: They could not support immigrants.

Mr. GORDON: In any scheme, whether it be one affecting returned soldiers, a three thousand family scheme or any other land settlement scheme there is bound to be a considerable percentage of failures. The families who came to the western office, and to which reference was made in the house a few days ago, asked to be deported. Even if they had a proper case for deportation they are beyond reach of such action. I am told the British family scheme originated in 1924 and 1925, and they have been in this country more than five years. There is no fund upon which I could draw for purposes of returning them to Great Britain, even if it were desirable to do so. Of course there is no law which would justify my taking the action they suggest. I am not at all alarmed, because if we get fair climatic conditions in the coming season those people will take heart again.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Is the interest paid under the original soldier settlement scheme still standing at the rate of six per cent?

Mr. GORDON: Five per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I should like again to refer to some circumstances I mentioned previously. I believe it is unfair to expect the returned soldiers in the dried out areas to be content to have this back interest charged against them, while the man who was fortunate enough to have a crop in the better districts got some relief by way of cancellation of half his interest, in the event of his paying the other half. It seems unfair to charge the interest against these men who have not had crops for the last two or three years.

Mr. GORDON: They will come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. McKENZIE Assiniboia): I do not think that will be satisfactory. In my view the government should consider doing something for these men by way of cancellation of a portion of the interest.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There are three or four aspects of the matter about which I should like to speak, but as it is almost eleven o'clock I should not like to begin to-night. Possibly we could continue at another time.

Mr. GORDON: Very well.

Item stands.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

Bessborough.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1934-35

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1935, was presented by Right Hon. Sir George Perley (Acting Prime Minister), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

ESTIMATES, 1935-36

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates—Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act—for the financial year ending March 31, 1936, was presented by Right Hon. Sir George Perley (Acting Prime Minister), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SAUVE

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), during the discussion of the Post Office estimates on the 14th instant, called my attention to rumours of immense profits being made through the sale of stamps by the philatelic section of the department. To prevent misunderstanding may I be permitted to quote from Hansard, pages 1723 and 1724. The hon. member stated:

> Up until 1932 new issues were not sold through an agency, they were sold through the department; and if my memory serves me aright, in some instances amounts of $15,000, $20,000 and $30,000 were realized by the officials and paid into the treasury of this country.

The hon. member added:

> At the present time any profit which might be gained through the sale of these stamps does not come to the government; all the government receives is the small amount it gets from the agency.

To this I replied, as reported on page 1723 of Hansard:

> The philatelic branch has had a revenue of about $50,000 this year. It sells all stamps at face value. . . . They are not sold through an agency unless you call the philatelic branch an agency.

Further on the hon. member for Gloucester said:

> To-day that revenue is nil, but those handling these stamps are making a fortune.

I then replied to the hon. member that if he wished to make a direct accusation of graft in regard to the sale of stamps, I would immediately look into the matter. The hon. member replied:

> I did not say there was graft in the department. I said that the practice of the department led to graft to people outside the department but not in the department. I am not accusing the department of graft.

The hon. member added as reported on page 1725.

> I want a definite answer to a question which interests the public as a whole concerning what to my mind is one of the worst principles ever established in the Post Office Department, namely, allowing outsiders to make a profit on the sale of stamps which should go to the government.

From the foregoing it may be inferred that the hon. member has clearly stated: That since 1932 the government has been deprived of some revenues by the fact that a philatelic section has been organized in the Post Office Department; that people outside the department have made immense profits through the sale of such stamps, and that the establishment of this section is "the worst principle ever established in the Post Office Department."

Since the hon. member claimed that he was not satisfied with the answer I gave on February 20 to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the further explanations given during the discussion of the estimates, I promised to make a further inquiry into this matter. I wish now, with the leave of the house, to read a memorandum which will clarify the whole situation.

Prior to 1932 postage stamps sold to collectors were handled by the postage stamp division staff which also supplied all postage stamps to post offices. In view of serious criticisms made of the department that philatelists could not get proper information concerning stamps sold to collectors and also because the department seemed to be losing considerable revenue from this source, the work of the philatelic sales was organized in 1932.

No sale of unused stamps has been made under the philatelic section nor by the department since the philatelic section was formed, at more than the face value of the stamps.

In order that such work would be efficiently directed, this section, which forms an integral part of the organization of the department and is manned entirely by departmental employees, was placed under the direction of an official who had proper knowledge of such work and who could deal effectively with questions raised by philatelists. Since the organization of the philatelic section sales to collectors have averaged between $50,000 and $60,000 yearly and in the present year are expected to attain the highest figure in their history; the sales this year to date indicate a revenue of approximately $70,000.

Under the previous method of handling sales to collectors the average per annum was approximately $8,000 and the highest sale attained prior to 1930 was $30,000 in 1929. The revenue accruing from these sales has increased nearly nine times over any revenues received up to 1927 and has more than doubled under the present system the highest receipts prior to the formation of the philatelic section. The average sales for the past three years have been more than five times the overhead cost to the department, including salaries of the employees.

The department does not attempt to provide continuous sale of used postage stamps. A small quantity of such stamps is made available through preparation of these stamps for sale by an employee. When such stamps are available they are sold in numbers not greater than ten stamps of any one particular issue to one person, in order that collectors generally may have the privilege of obtaining them when possible, instead of allowing the whole supply to be bought in by dealers.

As shown in figures given in answer to a question asked in this house this year, the revenue for the last two fiscal years totalled $155 from the sale of used stamps. Practically all used stamps sold to the public are sold by stamp dealers who obtain their supplies, not from the Post Office Department nor from any post office official, but from supplies salvaged from private sources. The Post Office Department does not deal in stamps having a known enhanced philatelic value, nor does it charge a premium on any stamps it sells. It sometimes happens, however, that stamps sold by the department at face value subsequently increase in their philatelic value, which has no relation to their value as postage.

The department has no official information regarding the prices at which these stamps are selling now to stamp collectors in the country, nor does it concern itself with such prices. The Post Office Department does not conduct its philatelic sales through any outside agency. All sales of stamps of any kind to collectors and dealers are made through the philatelic division of the department. All revenue from these sales is deposited to the credit of the receiver general of Canada on post office account, and becomes an integral part of post office revenue. There has been no deviation from this rule at any time.

In the statement that I have just read to the house the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) also will find the answer to both questions asked by him and appearing on page 1854 of Hansard of March 14, in the French version and on page 1724 in the English.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. MICHAUD:

What was the total cost to the dominion government for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in New Brunswick, in the years 1932, 1933, and 1934?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1932..	$212,501 91
1933..	395,941 20
1934..	356,864 86

Note.—The figures set forth above include all expenditures during the respective years shown for:

(1) The enforcement of federal statutes, including those connected with the preventive service.

(2) The enforcement of provincial statutes and the Criminal Code.

(3) The R.C.M. Police assumed the duties of the enforcement of the provincial statutes and the Criminal Code in the province of New Brunswick, and also the duties of the preventive service, from the 1st of April, 1932.

(4) The following amounts have been received or will be received shortly from the New Brunswick government, under the terms of the agreement:

1932..	$ 75,000 paid
1933..	100,000 paid
1934..	75,000 paid
1934 (Outstanding and to be paid shortly)..	25,000 and which should be deducted from the total costs above quoted.
	$275,000

CANADIAN LEGATION—PARIS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What is the total amount paid to the Hon. Philippe Roy, Canadian minister to France, from January 1, 1931, until now?

2. During that period, did he spend anything for entertainments?

3. If so, what is the total of that expenditure?

4. What was the total cost of the Canadian legation in Paris for the same period?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. The total amount paid to the Honourable Philippe Roy, Canadian minister to France, from January 1, 1931, to the 31st January, 1935, for salary, allowances and travel, was $99,956.63.

2 and 3. Expenditures for entertainment were made from the allowances granted to the Canadian minister at Paris. In addition, there has been paid from the vote for the Canadian legation at Paris, an amount of $498.96—the expenses of Dominion day reception, 1st July, 1934—Jacques Cartier celebration.

4. The total cost of the Canadian legation in Paris from the 1st January, 1931, to the 31st January, 1935, was $342,222.92.

CANADIAN LEGATION—TOKYO

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What is the total amount paid to the Hon. Herbert Marler, Canadian minister to Japan, from January 1, 1931?

2. During that period, did he spend anything for entertainments?

3. If so, what is the total of that expenditure?

4. What was the total cost of the Canadian legation in Japan for the same period?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. The total amount paid to the Honourable Herbert Marler, Canadian minister to Japan, from January 1, 1931, to January 31, 1935, for salary, allowances and travel, was $101,901.03.

2 and 3. Expenditures for entertainment were made from the allowances granted to the Canadian minister at Tokyo.

4. The total cost of the Canadian legation in Japan from January 1, 1931, to January 31, 1935, was $328,522.01.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. What is the total amount of income tax collected by the government in the year 1934?

2. What is the amount collected in that same year in the province of Quebec?

3. What is the amount collected in that same year in: (a) Montreal; (b) Westmount; (c) Outremont; (d) Verdun?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. Calendar year 1934, $61,608,732.29.

2. Calendar year 1934, $19,493,345.46.

3. (a) Not available.
(b) Not available.
(c) Not available.
(d) Not available.

Statistics not maintained in such a manner as to give information requested.

NEW RICHMOND AND HOWATSON'S POINT, QUE. WHARVES

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Public Works to abandon the departmental wharf at New Richmond, Quebec, and if so, for what reason?

2. In deciding to ask parliament for an appropriation for a deep water wharf at Howatson's Point, Bonaventure county, did the department take into consideration the advantages of Woodman's Beach and the money already expended there by the department?

3. What was estimated as the cost of making New Richmond wharf available to coastal steamers, and what amount is contemplated to be expended at Howatson's Point?

4. Will this work be done by contract, and is it intended to utilize creosoted timber, and sheet iron piling, and to what extent?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. There has been no decision made to abandon the wharf at New Richmond.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Estimated cost of repairs to and strengthening structure $25,000; dredging channel 150 feet wide, 15 feet deep at low water $170,000; it is estimated the maintenance of the channel would be costly.

(b) $38,800.

4. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes, creosoted timber for sheathing below half tide.

RUISSEAU LE BLANC, BONAVENTURE, QUE., DREDGING

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Have Cummins Company completed their dredging contract at Ruisseau Le Blanc, Bonaventure county?

2. How much dredging has been done and at what cost?

3. Is any further dredging contemplated at this place or any other point in Bonaventure county?

4. If so, where?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No. Work to be commenced in spring of 1935.

2. None.

3. No further dredging contemplated at Ruisseau Le Blanc, and no decision yet made as to dredging at any other point in Bonaventure county.

4. Answered by No. 3.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL DENLEY—PAY AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. TOTZKE:

What is the amount of pay, command pay, allowances or other remuneration received by Lt.-Colonel W. E. Denley, Officer Commanding Prince Albert Volunteers, at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, since his appointment?

Mr. STIRLING: Pay, annual drill, $26; command and training allowance, $214.75; care of arms, $80; postage, $45.

ALBERTA AND MARITIME COAL SHIPMENTS TO CENTRAL CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

What amount of coal in tons was transported: (a) from the maritime provinces to central Canada and the head of the lakes; (b) from Alberta to central Canada by rail or rail and water, from 1921 to date?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

(a) Shipments of coal from mines in the maritime provinces into Quebec and Ontario, 1921-1934:

Year	From Nova Scotia	From New Brunswick
	(short tons)
1921	887,701	14,055
1922	1,408,050	63,028
1923	1,533,046	32,113
1924	1,644,735	22,302
1925	811,075	4,199
1926	1,965,645	2,680
1927	2,298,175	9,010
1928	2,382,145	101
1929	2,372,293	215
1930	1,893,679	383
1931	1,746,137	98
1932	1,588,980	1,048
1933	2,005,577	891
1934	2,894,415	11,075
Total	25,431,653	161,198

(b) Shipments of coal from Alberta mines to Ontario and Quebec, 1921-1934:

Year	Short tons
1921	11,530
1922	21,937

*PERSONS ON RELIEF AT SHIPPIGAN

Mr. VENIOT:

Will the Minister of Justice inform the house from whom he received the information that "No person in Shippigan was on direct relief between May 1, 1934, and January 1, 1935."?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I received the information from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But I fancy that what is required is where the original information came from?

Mr. VENIOT: No, that is satisfactory.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—TELEGRAM TO J. E. LAFORCE IN 1933

Mr. POULIOT:

1. From where and on what date was addressed the telegram of which five lines were read by the Hon. Minister of Labour on April 27, 1933, Hansard, page 4326, first column?
2. To whom was it addressed? (Address in full.)
3. Did it contain anything besides the five lines read by the Hon. Minister of Labour?
4. If so, what was it?
5. Did the Hon. Minister of Labour or anyone on his behalf or any employee in any of the departments then headed by the said hon. gentleman meet Mr. J. E. Laforce before the latter sent the telegram already referred to?
6. If so, who, when and where?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Montreal, April 27, 1933.
2. Honourable W. A. Gordon, Minister of Immigration, Ottawa, Ont.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. No.
6. Answered by No. 5.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. What was the total number of unemployed male persons between the age of 18 and 65 in the province of New Brunswick, on July 1, 1933; January 1, 1934; July 1, 1934, and January 1, 1935?
2. What was the total number of persons in New Brunswick receiving a direct relief on July 1, 1933; January 1, 1934; July 1, 1934, and January 1, 1935?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

PAYMENTS TO GUSTAVE MONETTE

Mr. BRADETTE:

What amount has been paid, in taxable costs and fees, to Mr. Gustave Monette, solicitor, of Montreal, by each department from 1930 to date?

PAYMENT TO JEAN PENVERNE

Mr. BRADETTE:

What amount has been paid, in taxable costs and fees, to Mr. Jean Penverne, solicitor, of Montreal, by each department from 1930 to date?

ASSISTANCE TO COAL, GRAIN AND STEEL INDUSTRIES

Mr. CHURCH:

What sums were spent annually by way of bonuses, subventions, subsidies or stabilization funds to assist: (a) the maritime or Alberta coal industry; (b) on grain; (c) on steel and iron, from 1921 to 1934?

SOLDIER PENSION CASES OUTSTANDING

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many soldier pension cases were standing at the beginning of each year from 1921 to date?

2. How many cases were settled yearly in the same period?

3. What are the number of cases outstanding now that have not been completed?

4. Has any time limit been placed on when the balance are to be finally decided by the pensions appeal board?

MILITARY EXPENDITURE 1920 TO 1934

Mr. LAURIN:

What sums were expended by Canada for military purposes in 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BANK OF CANADA—OFFICERS, EMPLOYEES AND BRANCHES

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

For a return showing—

1. The centres where branches of the Bank of Canada have been opened.

2. The names of all employees of such bank in such centres with total salaries in each case.

3. The names of all officers and employees of such bank at headquarters in Ottawa, with total salaries in each case.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would ask that this motion stand until the Minister of Finance is here. I am not quite sure whether the government has control of these matters or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

BANK OF CANADA, ASSETS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

For a return showing all orders in council passed during the last six months with reference to the formation of the Bank of Canada and with reference to any assets assumed by such bank on commencing business.

ARICHAT, N.S., WHARF

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all payrolls, accounts, costs, and other documents, in connection with the construction of a new wharf, and cost of removing old wharf from the site at Babins Hill, Arichat, Nova Scotia, during the year 1934.

[Mr. Bradette.]

RICHELIEU CORPORATION

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of all correspondence or other documents, in the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other department, passing between the said department or any of them or any of the officials thereof and E. A. D. Morgan of Montreal, or any other persons on behalf of the Richelieu Corporation, from January, 1932, to date, regarding a subsidy to the Richelieu Corporation for equipping boats for the export of cattle.

BONAVENTURE COUNTY, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS PURCHASES

Mr. MARCIL:

For a statement showing how much creosoted timber and steel sheet piling has been used by the Department of Public Works in Bonaventure county since August, 1930, to date; showing quantities and cost at each place and where such material was purchased in each case.

WESTERN POULTRY MARKETING

Mr. VALLANCE (for Mr. McPhee):

For a return showing the disbursement of the sums of $10,000, $20,000 and $20,000 advanced by the government of Canada to the co-operative organizations in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively, in connection with the recent vote in these provinces regarding the poultry marketing scheme, showing: (a) the names of the parties by provinces to whom the said sums were disbursed; (b) the amount received by each (c) to whom the disbursement of said sums in each province was entrusted.

MONTREAL RELIEF WORK

Mr. GIROUARD:

For a copy of the report made by the Auditor General of Canada, dated July 6, 1934, concerning expenditures on relief work, city of Montreal, 1930 and 1931 acts; and also copy of the report made by the Auditor General of Canada, dated December 11, 1934, concerning provincial accounts for relief work and direct relief, 1930 act.

MOUNTED POLICE—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of the evidence and report of the investigation held in Bathurst in 1934 into the allegation that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has practised the third degree on a prisoner.

Also copy of the evidence and report on the allegation that the patrol boats had lain for days at the wharf in Bathurst while smuggling was going on in the vicinity.

Also copy of the contract between the government of New Brunswick and the federal government in connection with the transfer of the enforcement of laws in the province of New Brunswick to the Department of Justice through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Also a list of the names of the provincial police of New Brunswick who were transferred from that force to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when the latter took over the enforcement of provincial laws.

Also a copy of the decision of the appellate branch of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in the matter of appeal in the case of the captain of the Paul T, seized under the liquor law of New Brunswick.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the last of the enumerated documents I beg to say that so far as I can ascertain there is no copy of any judgment of the appellate branch of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to be found. The only suggestion I can make is that my hon. friend apply to the registrar of the court, who may be able to furnish him with a copy. All the other documents will be produced.

Motion agreed to.

LOG BOOKS—GOVERNMENT PATROL BOATS

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of the log books of the government patrol boats doing patrol work in the bay of Chaleur and strait of Northumberland for the years 1933 and 1934.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to say that the only returns I desire are in connection with the patrol boat under the jurisdiction of the mounted police. I am not concerned with the fisheries patrol boats. This morning I was asked by the Department of Fisheries what I required in that respect, and I make this clear so they will not have to do any work in this connection. With that amendment I would ask that the motion pass.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend understands, of course, that those log books are on the vessels doing patrol work. Copies will be obtained at the earliest possible moment and they will be laid on the table.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it not a fact at the end of the year the log books are deposited with some department here, either the Department of Marine or the department having charge of these police officers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was informed this morning that they are on the boats.

Mr. VENIOT: That is a queer place to keep them.

Motion as amended agreed to.

DUNCAN REPORT—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. MYERS:

For a copy of all correspondence between the premier of Prince Edward Island and the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance of Canada, during the years 1927 to 1930, inclusive, in connection with the request of the province of Prince Edward Island for further implementation of the Duncan commission report.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP COMPANIES

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all contracts between the dominion government and all steamship companies operating from the Pacific coast, where said companies receive public moneys either by way of subsidy or by contract for the carrying of mails.

MR. ALBERT RIOUX

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of order in council appointing Mr. Albert Rioux as representative of debtors on the board of review for the province of Quebec in virtue of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

MINIMUM WAGE

BILL FOUNDED ON CONVENTION ADOPTED BY INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION AND TREATY OF VERSAILLES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for minimum wages pursuant to the convention concerning minimum wages adopted by the international labour organization in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace, and to enable Canada to discharge the obligations assumed under the provisions of the said treaty and of the said convention.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting relief, and to provide for such payments out of the consolidated revenue fund as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ILLNESS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Yesterday I had a talk with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his room, and I think everyone in the house will be glad to know that he is much better.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: His medical adviser, Doctor R. S. Stevens, has handed me the following statement dated this morning:

The Prime Minister had further disturbance of cardiac rhythm on Monday and again on Wednesday of last week. There has since been no recurrence and the rhythm is now apparently under control. Apart from this his progress has been without incident and is considered satisfactory. However, the necessity for further bed rest still exists.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY

ALLEGATION CONCERNING STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO INSPECTOR DAWSON

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). I asked for a return of all papers, correspondence and reports of inspections made of Kingston penitentiary by Inspector Dawson, together with interviews by Inspector Dawson in the same institution, between February 1 and July 1, 1934. I noticed that the Minister of Justice quite properly said that in bringing down the return all proper reservations would be observed in regard to confidential documents and information in regard to prisons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That should be "prisoners", not "prisons."

Miss MACPHAIL: It is "prisons" in Hansard. I find in reading the return that it deals only with interviews between Inspector Dawson and one convict, No. 3242. It is so exhaustive that it includes medical sheets and temperature charts. It stops abruptly on April 8, although on April 9 Inspector Dawson interviewed convict No. 3033 in the lecture room of the administration building at Kingston penitentiary between 11.40 and 2.15 p.m., and in the interview he used abusive and profane language in regard to myself, and said that after he had finished his inspection I would not be able to lift up my head in the House of Commons again. The information was supplied to me by convict No. 3033 who has served his full time, who is now at large and who is prepared to swear to this statement in any inquiry.

[Mr. Gordon.]

There was a great deal of correspondence about this statement of Inspector Dawson between the prison officials in Kingston and the department here. I want to ask the Minister of Justice where the correspondence is. I think one could not say it applies to prisoners. I may be under the suspicion of the Minister of Justice but I am scarcely a prisoner.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I produced the file which was handed to me as a complete file, but I shall make inquiries. I have never heard of any report of an interview between inspector Dawson and prisoner No. 3033. If there is such a report I will produce it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED PRESS INTERVIEW GIVEN BY POLICE OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). Has his attention been called to an interview given by Detective Inspector Zaneth and appearing in the Montreal Herald of March 14. The interview is as follows:

Concerning charges of destroying food—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member should read the interview. He has a perfect right to refer to the matter and then ask the question of the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to ask the minister if he has any knowledge of the matter, and if he has not I can give him the information. The inspector gave an interview to the Montreal Herald respecting certain matters which had taken place in this chamber regarding the destruction of food at Shippigan. Has the minister had notice of the interview? If not I could give him the information it contained. I would ask him whether or not he would look into the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the first intimation I have had but I shall make an inquiry as early as possible.

Mr. VENIOT: I could supply the minister with a copy of the interview, if he wishes to have it.

CONSCRIPTION IN GERMANY

POSITION OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON ACTION TAKEN BY GERMAN GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has the government a statement to make regarding the situation in Europe arising out of the action of Germany?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say the Canadian government have noted with anxiety the announcement by the German government of its intention to re-establish its military forces and to revive compulsory military service, contrary to the provisions of the treaty of Versailles. It is regretted that this unilateral action has taken place on the eve of promising efforts to deal with the whole European arms question, including the revision by agreement of the treaty restrictions on German armament. The Canadian government will continue to follow the situation with care.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY CONCERNING LEGISLATION TO BE PLACED BEFORE PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, coming to domestic affairs, may I ask the acting leader of the government if the house has now before it all the government intends to bring down by way of social legislation, not including of course such legislation as may be based upon or introduced in consequence of the report of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying? I include in my question the measures of which notice has been given on to-day's order paper?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): No, I believe there are one or two further measures which at the present time I am unable to explain. Then, in addition, there will be such measures as are based upon the report of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying.

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, has the acting leader of the government had any intimation with respect to the time the report of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying may be presented?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was Thursday last the right hon. leader of the opposition asked me the same question, and in reply I said I would make inquiries. I have spoken to the chairman of the commission and he tells me that they are at present drafting their report. However he cannot yet say when it will be completed.

STATEMENT CONCERNING PRESS REPORT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): While I am on my feet I may refer to the reference made on Friday evening by the right hon. leader of the opposition. At that time he had before him certain articles appearing in the press and purporting to give particulars of commission findings. I need hardly say we regret very much that the report should have appeared. I do not know how such reports get out, nor do I know whether or not they are authentic. The commission is an investigating body and is in no way under the direction of the government although appointed by order in council. I believe all of us would agree that the proceedings and findings of the commission should not be made public until they are laid before parliament.

CORRECTION—MR. CAHAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, inadvertently on Friday evening I believe I did an injustice to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Speaking from memory I stated that in an address in this chamber he had favoured the issue of $425,000,000 in paper currency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You were $5,000,000 out.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member upon that occasion shook his head and asked me to refer to Hansard in order to obtain more accurate information. Upon referring to Hansard I have found that the hon. member suggested $430,000,000, and not $425,000,000. But in referring to such a vast sum I trust the discrepancy in the figures did not do the hon. member any great injustice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All for the sake of accuracy.

IMPORTS FROM U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the government a question asked on February 22 and appearing at page 1091 of Hansard. The question is under the heading "Imports from U.S.S.R." It is now almost one month since the inquiry was made. Then later, on March 4, I asked the government when I might expect an answer, and upon that occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) told me he would have the matter looked into and would answer on the following day. I find that when I asked the question on February 22, the Prime Minister replied "Stands as notice of motion." I should be very thankful if the right hon. acting Prime Minister would answer the question.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I would suggest that the hon. member put his questions on the order paper; if he would do so I believe they would be answered more quickly. I had intended replying before, but there was nothing on the order paper which would bring it to my attention.

Mr. POULIOT: That is why I do it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suggest to the hon. member that the next time he might put it on the order paper. However, the answer to his question is that this order in council, No. 463, has been laid on the table of the house and the information contained therein is available to the hon. member. Nothing has been done since that order in council was passed which alters in any way the position as therein set forth.

Mr. POULIOT: That is no answer; it is just a reply.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPRESENTATION OF EMPLOYEES RESPECTING EQUIPMENT CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). Would he be good enough to inform the house if the government have come to any decision in regard to its policy in the purchasing of new equipment for the Canadian National Railways, whether it will be built in the Canadian National Railway shops by the Canadian National Railway employees, or be given to private companies?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision arrived at. In fact, the matter has not been considered further since the hon. gentleman asked the same question the last time.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): There is a matter that I would like to bring to the attention of the government. There is likely to be a large demand for copies of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I have already had requests for copies of that act. I think everyone will understand that those who are not lawyers will have some difficulty in understanding the act with the various amendments that have been made this year and last year, and I would suggest in view of the widespread interest in this act that the government should have it printed with all the amendments in their proper place so that the ordinary layman can read the act as amended with some understanding. I would also suggest that it be furnished without cost to members of parliament, who usually have to pay for these acts when they forward them to their constituents. Will the government give consideration to my suggestion?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The suggestion will be taken into consideration.

COMPOSITORS STRIKE, LONDON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I have received a protest from London Typographical Union No. 133 over the signature of John McLean, president of the union, and John Christie, secretary, with reference to an item on page 102 of the Labour Gazette of February, 1935, where it states that this strike in connection with the newspapers in London has been concluded in favour of the employers. I would ask the minister to see that that be corrected because the strike is still an active strike. Within the past two weeks committees from the union have been in conference with the employers, and as the Labour Gazette has a large circulation in that part of the country the item conveys a false impression to the disadvantage of the men involved in the dispute.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter just came to my attention a few moments ago, and I have just now been handed the answer to the question raised by the hon. member for East Hamilton, which with the permission of the house I shall read. It is in the form of a letter, signed by the Deputy Minister of Labour, and addressed to John McLean, president of the London Typographical Union No. 133, to whom the hon. member made reference. The letter is as follows:

Ottawa, March 18, 1935.

Dear sir,—The Department of Labour has recently received through Mr. J. F. White, M.P., and Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, M.P, the protest over the signature of yourself and Secretary Christie in regard to an article appearing on page 102 of the February, 1935, issue of the Labour Gazette concerning a strike of members of the International Typographical Union who were employed by the London Free Press and the London Advertiser

It is observed from your letters that the statement appearing on page 102 gives the information that the strike has terminated in favour of the employers. It is noted also that you desire to correct this statement and to emphatically say that the strike has not terminated. In support of your contention you point out that within the last two weeks a committee from your union has had meetings with the managers of the newspapers concerned and that negotiations are still in progress whereby an amicable settlement is hoped for.

In this connection I believe that if you will again refer to the article in question you will find that it does not bear out your protest, certainly not to the extent indicated in your letters. While the article does show that the strike has been recorded as terminated, that reference has merely to do with the departmental statistics. It will be observed that this particular reference shows clearly that the strike has not been called off or definitely terminated by the union involved. I am quoting hereunder the full text of this item:

"The dispute involving sixty-four members of the International Typographical Union and two daily newspapers in London, Ont., which commenced on March 1, 1934, the employers having refused to negotiate and sign a renewal of the union agreement, is recorded as terminated, the strikers having been replaced from time to time. The dispute has been added to the list in a previous paragraph of those in which employment conditions are no longer affected but which have not been called off or definitely terminated by the unions involved."

This particular strike was carried for ten months as in effect, and as it appeared from information available that the strikers had been replaced the dispute was recorded as terminated in line with the general practice of the Department of Labour in such matters. This practice, I may say, is in accordance with the recommendations as to the method of compiling statistics of industrial disputes adopted at a conference of official labour statisticians called by the international labour office at Geneva in October, 1926.

I regret very much indeed that any misunderstanding has occurred in this respect, and I may assure you at once that in following our ordinary policy it was certainly not the intention to do any injustice to your local union. I am pleased indeed to know that negotiations have recently been resumed, and I desire to express the hope that the outcome will be satisfactory to the parties concerned. You are of course aware that the conciliation service of this department is readily available if desired.

I may add that your suggestion that the article to which objection has been taken emanated from or was influenced by the employers is of course entirely incorrect, as no communication has been received in the department from the employing companies on this subject.

Yours truly,

W. M. Dickson,

Deputy Minister of Labour.

John McLean, Esq.,
President,
London Typographical Union No. 133,
London, Ontario.

ILLUSTRATION STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) if he is considering establishing another demonstration farm in the upper end of northwestern Saskatchewan that is in that part of northern Saskatchewan that lies north of the North Saskatchewan river?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice that he was going to ask this question, only in a slightly different way. No such request has been received and it is not intended to establish an experimental farm there. If the hon. member means an illustration station—

Mr. McINTOSH: I do mean that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I will make further inquiries as to whether or not that is planned because I just received notice of the hon. gentleman's question on coming into the house.

FISHERIES ACT, 1932

POWER TO PRESCRIBE FEES FOR FISHERY LICENCES

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Perhaps the minister will pardon me if I put a question to him on the third reading regarding the construction of a biological station on the Gaspé coast. I was not here when this bill was discussed on a previous occasion, but I should like to say that I know that the previous minister took this matter up with the Bishop of Gaspé and much correspondence ensued between the department and His Lordship with a view to having a biological station established on the Gaspé coast. I would like to know from the minister if any progress has been made in that respect, and if so to what extent.

Mr. STIRLING: I remember that correspondence has been carried on in that regard, but I am afraid that at the moment I am not in a position to advise the hon. member what the situation is. I shall be glad to look into it and communicate with him.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

EXTENSION OF PENSION PROVISIONS AND DISTRIBUTION OF FINES AND PENALTIES

The house resumed from Friday, February 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 9, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act—Mr. Guthrie—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 2—Payment of amount specified in charge.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): When this bill was under consideration on the former occasion the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) proposed an amendment to section 2 to change the lettering from (e), (i) or (j) to (e), (j) and (k). Was an amendment carried to that effect? The point is that the bill is correctly drafted. We have verified the lettering of these subsections and both the hon. member and myself were in error in the former discussion. As the section now appears it is correctly printed and should be passed in that form.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 is initialled as passed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there an amendment to the effect I have indicated?

The CHAIRMAN: There is no sign of it here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then it is all right.

On section 2—Application of penalties.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This also was passed. The same change was suggested at the top of page 2, where the same subclauses are similarly lettered. The present lettering is correct.

Mr. REID: I had in mind, when the bill was under discussion before, a question in regard to moieties. I asked whether moieties were paid to the officers and the minister said they were not. May I ask whether they are paid to informers who may not be members of the force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. Moieties or rewards —I am not sure that they are moieties exactly—are paid under the statute both in connection with excise and with customs, but not to members of the force.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Officers' pensions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth asked for an approximate idea of the cost that would be involved in the proposal. As nearly as can be computed, the cost in respect of officers would be $425 and in respect of men, $438.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, assuming that four officers and six men are entitled. That is a very liberal assumption because so far as we know there are only two officers and one man. There was a suggestion that the word "Canadian" should be stricken out in the first line of subsection 8. The reason is that in the Militia Act, which was passed some years ago, the word "Canadian" is not used, and to bring this act into conformity with the other the word should be omitted. The committee will remember that the forces serving in South Africa were not distinctively Canadian forces, but formed part of the British force. It is merely technical but I move that the word "Canadian" be stricken out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Constables' pensions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "Canadian" in the first line of subsection 5 should be omitted. I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Widows' and orphans' pensions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was asked by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, in regard to both 6 and 7, what would be the cost to the treasury. There will be no cost in regard to either. I have a memorandum which I have just received to the effect that there is a time limit of six months to allow a member of the force to elect whether he will pay into the fund or not. It has been suggested by the commissioner that six months may be rather short to communicate with all and he suggests eight months. I move that in lines 9 and 17 the word "six" be substituted for the word "eight."

Amendment agreed to.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

BILL TO LIMIT HOURS OF WORK IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

The house resumed from Thursday, March 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the league of nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919,—Mr. Gordon (for Mr. Bennett)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When this bill was previously before the house in committee last week it was passed with the exception of section 9, to which an amendment was proposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was section 10 passed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. A new section 9, embodying and overriding the existing provision, was at that time submitted to the committee. But objection was taken to it by certain members, including I think the hon. member for East Hamilton. Further consideration of the clause was postponed, and since that time a conference has been held between my colleague the Minister of Labour and myself, and interested parties, at which an arrangement has been arrived at. So I desire to withdraw the clause which was submitted as an amendment to clause 9 and to substitute therefor a new clause 9, the first portion of which is in the terms of the bill as printed and the latter portion of which is the amending portion. I should like to observe to the committee that this new clause 9 is based on article 5 of the treaty which I propose to read into the record:

Article 5

In exceptional cases where it is recognized that the provisions of article 2 cannot be applied—

Article 2 relates to the question of working hours.

—but only in such cases, agreements between workers' and employers' organizations concerning the daily limit of work over a longer period of time may be given the force of regulations, if the government, to which these agreements shall be submitted, so decides.

The average number of hours worked per week, over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement shall not exceed forty-eight.

The proposed clause 9 will read as follows:

9. The governor in council may, in exceptional cases where it is recognized that the daily limit of hours of work cannot be applied and agreements between workers' and employers' organizations to increase the daily limit have been made, give effect to such agreements and permit in such cases the said daily limit of hours to be exceeded: provided, however, that the average number of hours per week over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement shall not exceed forty-eight;—

The following is the overriding proviso:

—and provided further that in case such an agreement has been made prior to the thirty-first day of December, 1934, between a railway company and any employees' organization which embodies the basic principle of eight hours as the daily period of employment, the provisions of such agreement relating to the hours of employment shall, notwithstanding anything contained in this act, continue in force for a period of one year from the thirty-first day of March, 1935, unless suspended during such period by the governor in council.

The idea being to give a full year to the railway companies and the unions relating thereto having agreements with the railway companies to adjust their differences in the meantime. I may say that this is concurred in unanimously by the labour unionists there present.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) moves that clause 9 as submitted be deleted and a new clause 9 be submitted.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this amendment is carried, a statement made by the minister who has just moved the amendment recalls to my mind that within the past few days I have received quite a number of communications from railway organizations. When he states that railway organizations were in favour of this amendment, I presume he refers to just a few that are affected by it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; we think we mean all those who have any interest in it.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume the minister refers to the organizations that are affected by this amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would go further than that. We have had other organizations who are interested in the amendment as well as those the hon. member mentions.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know then how many railway organizations have stated to the government that they want an amendment of this character. All I know is that I have had communications in quite large numbers from railway organizations protesting that a forty-eight hour week is far too long a week in view of the large number of railway workers who are at present out of employment. We are going to give one year to the railway workers to adjust themselves to a forty-eight hour week, and the same thing applies of course to the companies. That is rather too long a time. At present when there are such large numbers of railway workers out of employment, who are anxious to find useful and productive work,

I would much sooner see the time allowed for the change to be much shorter than the twelve months stated in the amendment. After all the number of railway employees affected by this legislation must be extremely small.

Second. I have an objection to this class of amendment I object to selecting one form of labour out of all the others and making special provision for it. I do not see why railway employees should be singled out for special legislation as contained in this proposed clause. There must be other classes of employment where men may be affected, and we are merely opening the door here for exemptions under the bill which may be requested by other employees or employers who may be affected in exactly the same way as the railway workers are by this measure. Consequently, when we are attempting to pass legislation of this character, there should be equality in it, and there is not equality the moment we attempt to legislate for one industry and we do not legislate for others in exactly the same way. I realize that it may take time to adjust the position of certain classes of railway employees so far as hours of labour are concerned. The hon. member for Bow River informs me that under the bill as it reads at present they have three months, and with a large number of railway employees in the running trades out of work at the present time, when a man with twenty years seniority is probably wiping an engine or is not employed at all, or, as I know in similar instances, when such men are on government relief work, three months is a fairly reasonable time to allow railway employees to adjust themselves to the provisions of the forty-eight hour week.

Mr. GORDON: When the amendment was first suggested as an amendment to clause 9, it was made apparent that some time would have to be given in order to permit industry to adjust itself to the provisions of the bill generally. Then representations were made by organized labour, railway labour, the trades and labour congress of Canada, and discussions were held as late as this morning with the all-Canadian congress of labour. The various chairmen of the brotherhoods, some of which have many members who since 1928 have had difficulty in getting the work they would like on our railways, were consulted and the matter was gone into with great care. I recognize the dangers I have already pointed out in the debate of making a series of exceptions to a bill of this character, because of the ever-present danger of excepting the bill out of existence, if I may put the matter in that way. But it must be borne in mind that for many years past railway workers in the running trades have arranged their agreements with the railway companies on a mileage basis. The various agreements—and there are many of them—have been worked out on that basis during probably the past twenty-five or thirty years. Generally speaking the agreements have been satisfactory. I know that since 1928, by reason of various factors that have entered into the transportation business in Canada, a considerable percentage of railroad employees have been let out of the service or put on very short time. That is deeply to be regretted. Some of the factors causing that condition are beyond the control of any parliament or any railway company or any labour union. But the fact remains that the arrangements entered into voluntarily between the brotherhoods and the railway companies have grown up over a long period of years, and in the running trades have not been based upon an hourly schedule of work, but rather on mileage. These agreements are extremely complex, they are as complex as the transportation system itself. Having grown up over that long period of time, the representatives of all parties, both the railway companies and the brotherhoods and the labour congress, recognized that it was physically impossible to readjust within a shorter period than twelve months, agreements that would probably have to be entirely changed to an hourly basis rather than a basis of mileage or a combination of both, because it seemed to be the desire of those with whom I and my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce consulted, to spread this labour as far as possible amongst those railroad workers qualified to do the work. After the conference this amendment to section 9 was generally agreed to. Many drafts were made of the section in order that the difficulty which confronted us might be solved. Now, if it appears within a period of a year that these adjustments over the transportation system cannot be brought about, or if for any other reason the agreements are not adjusted in such a way that the greatest good will result to those most entitled to benefit, then hon. members will see that the amendment gives power to the governor in council to cause the suspension of the agreements or any one of them in the meantime. I believe that the amendment is the best that can be fashioned to prevent great confusion in the change-over from the present system to a system of employment that will fall within the principle and intention of the legislation.

Mr. EULER: Are we to understand that this amendment meets with the practically unanimous approval of the men concerned and of the employers also?

Mr. GORDON: Their representatives, yes. They were present at the conference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is our understanding.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Before the bill passes—I think this is the last section?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I would ask the minister if he would consider having the amendments reprinted for third reading, as suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) in connection with another bill? This is a complicated bill, the amendments are strung over four or five different Hansards, we would have to pack a whole grip full of them around to explain the bill properly.

Mr. GORDON: I think the suggestion is a good one. I shall take what steps are necessary to have the bill reprinted with the amendments.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

ORGANIZATION OF BODY TO COORDINATE WORK OF DEPARTMENTS AND TO INVESTIGATE AND ADVISE UPON SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish the Economic Council of Canada and to provide for the employment of such officers and employees, and for the payment of such expenses as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The object of this resolution is to establish a body to coordinate the work of the various departments of government and make more effective use of the ability and energy of the higher civil servants now in the employ of the dominion. I need hardly tell the committee that we have among our civil servants a large number of very high class men, men who are well-educated and capable in various directions and who at the same time have an appreciation of the best methods and commonsense ways of dealing with things. They are students perhaps in the first instance, but the fact of their having been connected with the government here has given them other ways of looking at these things. They have a special knowledge of our economic problems, and we believe the setting up of this economic council, will, as I said, enable us to use their energies to better advantage, and will also save time and labour for members of the government of the day and especially of the Prime Minister. For this reason this economic council is placed under the Prime Minister.

It has been evident for many years that the ministers of the crown have too much detailed work to attend to, and that the Prime Minister especially under our system has far more to do than any one man should have. Many years ago when I was first a member of the government of Canada we talked over this very question of the organization of the civil service and the work that was imposed upon members of the government, and the Borden government of that time decided to investigate this question. We looked around and picked out, we thought, the very best man that we could find in the world at that time to come here and give us advice on the subject. That man was Sir George Murray, who had been for many years the secretary of the treasury, the permanent head of the treasury in Great Britain, and who as everyone in this committee knows is the chief civil servant of Great Britain and their doyen. Sir George Murray spent quite a long time here and made an exhaustive report which contained very many useful suggestions. Among other things he was very definite in his statement that ministers of the crown and especially the Prime Minister undertook too much work and that it would be better if we followed a little more the system in vogue in the mother country of allowing the civil servants and the secretaries of the ministers to deal definitely with more questions than they were permitted to deal with here at that time.

Unfortunately the war intervened and, as was the case with many other matters, this report was lost sight of, so nothing has ever been done about it. That was twenty-three or twenty-four years ago, and since that time the work of government has vastly increased. My right hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite who have belonged to the government, as well as my colleagues on this side, will agree with that statement. More and more the government are being compelled to take cognizance of business questions and other matters which interest the country as a whole. Of late the newspapers have been referring to this, particularly since the Prime Minister has been under the weather. No doubt the Prime Minister's illness is due in large part to the heavy work he has had to carry on in the last four or five years. The newspapers have been commenting on this fact and drawing conclusions from it, with which in quite large measure I agree. It is believed that more assistance should be obtained from the permanent civil servants, and the bill I hope to introduce later on is intended to meet that situation to some degree.

This economic council can be given any work to deal with or any question to consider which the Prime Minister thinks it would be wise to have them look into. For instance, I fancy that everyone here will agree with my view when I say that perhaps one of the most difficult questions the world has to face to-day is the overgrowth of our cities, the fact that, naturally enough, people drift into the cities. That is due to the attractions of the cities, the bright lights on the main streets, the cinemas, the street cars and so on.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The high tariff.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the hon. gentleman must have an obsession on the subject of high tariffs, but I do not think that takes people into the cities. I wonder what remedy can be found for this situation.

Mr. McINTOSH: A change of government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman suggests a change of government. I would expect him to say that, because he has no other solution to suggest; he keeps harping on the one string. Why not suggest something else?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a very good solution.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, from the point of view of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McINTOSH: And of the people.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have no doubt it would suit the hon. gentleman very well but I would feel sorry for the people if that happened.

At all events, Mr. Chairman, that occurred to me as an example of the type of question that might be referred to this council, the finding of some solution which would lessen the number of people in the cities and keep a larger number on the land, not for the purpose of raising wheat or some other commodity for sale but for the purpose of making a living on the land, as our forefathers did and as the habitants of Quebec do at the present time. I fancy that would be a fair question to submit to this council which will be set up under the act I propose to introduce if the committee accepts this resolution. This bill has been preceded by a resolution because there is a small expenditure involved. That expenditure, however, really will be insignificant, since it is expected that those who serve will do so in an honorary capacity, and the functions of this economic council will be purely executive and not in any way administrative.

I fancy it is a platitude, Mr. Chairman, to say that the most pressing problems of the day are economic. We have provided for research in the natural sciences; some years ago we established an industrial research council, which is located in a fine new building in the lower end of the city. But I think we may say that the next few years can be more profitably employed in research into economic science. It is true that of late years a great deal more attention has been given economic investigation. In many countries there are private agencies carrying on such investigations; in some countries wealthy men have endowed this research work under various foundations, and as we all know this work is being rapidly extended. In addition there have been governmental organizations of various kinds to deal with economic questions. During the last three years there have been full dress debates in this house on this subject, and I believe the last resolution dealing with it was introduced by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). I should like to congratulate the hon. member upon considering the matter as he has done and giving it so much study. This is an important matter and I believe all hon. members are grateful to him for bringing it up. When the resolution to which I have referred was under discussion in January last, speaking at the conclusion of the debate the Prime Minister said:

> I do suggest to the hon. gentleman that the purpose he has in mind has been served, and while congratulating him and the other members of the house on the contribution they have made as to the value of scientific knowledge being applied to the nation and its affairs, as scientific ideas are with respect to the transaction of ordinary business by the various concerns carrying on the trade and commerce of the country, for those reasons I think the resolution might be withdrawn.

It would appear the hon. member for Red Deer agreed to the withdrawal of his resolution. We now have before us another resolution having for its purpose the betterment of conditions to which the hon. member referred.

Perhaps at this time I would do well briefly to review past policies and future requirements for the strengthening of our governmental machinery. Research falls into two sharply differentiated categories (a) research in natural sciences and (b) research in social and economic sciences. The purpose of this measure is to promote the latter aim, and is done if not wholly at least largely through the use of statistics. The term "statistics" has been defined as a science which treats of the measurement and interpretation of social and economic phenomena both as a whole and in separate manifestations.

A government is broken into various departments, each with a more or less specific function, and I submit that there is need for coordination and an omnibus point of view in economic policies. For the coordination of research in the natural sciences, the National Council of Industrial and Scientific research has been established. Similarly, on the economic side, which involves entirely different legal powers and technical methods, the coordinating problem was fundamentally attacked in 1918 when the Dominion Bureau of Statistics was set up.

In passing I believe it is only fair to say that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has done first class work and must receive commendation from every person who has to do with it. This bureau supplies statistics which are absolutely trustworthy and available for every person. The policy of statistical research was inaugurated as the result of an inquiry made in 1912 by a royal commission. To-day however I submit to the committee that it is essential for us to go further and work from a wider and all-embracing viewpoint. This, we are doing in the present measure.

I believe between twenty-five and thirty countries have now set up bodies of this kind. They may be divided into two broad types or categories, namely those having more or less definite executive functions and those created for advisory purposes alone. These bodies are of various types, some being purely consultative and some having almost unlimited executive functions. The Economic Advisory Council of Great Britain was constituted in 1930 for advisory and research purposes only. It is given authority "to advise His Majesty's government in economic matters, to make continuous study of developments in trade and industry, and in the use of national and imperial resources. . . and of all aspects of national, imperial and international economy with a bearing on the prosperity of the country."

An economic advisory council is primarily an agency for inquiry and report. It is desirable to emphasize the point that it is not an agency for determining policy; policy must be determined by the government. It is not an agency for administration; administration must be the work of departments and commissions and does not fit in well with the central purpose of the advisory council, namely that of inquiry. While it should contribute towards a more considered and ordered planning of governmental affairs, is it not an agency for controlling the economic activities of the nation.

I have some references before me which, with the permission of the house, I should like to place on Hansard. These are extracts from reports which have been made regarding this particular matter. I find that in 1931 Sir Arthur Salter, who is director of the economic and financial section of the League of Nations, was consulted by the government of India with regard to the creation of a new economic organization in India. I quote the following from his report:

> The period since the war has witnessed the development of what may prove to be an important adjunct to the machine of government throughout a large part of the world in the form of advisory economic councils and committees. These vary considerably in functions and in form; but they present certain common characteristics and seem to respond to a widely felt need in the post war world. The state's action in connection with the national economic life has almost everywhere become more extensive and more complex. Whether in the increased range of state control, or the construction of new and more complicated tariffs, or the institution of systems of prohibition or licence or state encouragement for some form of monopolies, the government has almost everywhere accepted more onerous and intricate duties.

I shall not read the whole of these observations. Skipping a portion of them I read:

> The purposes vary largely, however, from country to country, and, with them, the form of organization. No system effectively serves them all.
> (a) The existence of a council composed of those with experience in every main sphere of the country's economic activity, established under legislative authority and, under varying forms, in effective contact with the government, often helps to secure greater coordination and unity of national policy. This is a real need because whatever the administrative organization of a particular government, most specific economic problems tend to cut across departmental frontiers.

That is to say, hon. members are aware that questions may arise which hold the interest of three or four departments of government Some way must be found carefully to consider the views of these various departments. Then to continue:

(b) The new institutions may in several ways lead to an improvement of the statistical and commercial intelligence machinery which is available for the purpose of following the development of events and thought, both at home and abroad, and which thus affords a basis of statistical and other facts for the examination of current practical problems.

The report continues:

(c) A third, and usually more prominent, purpose which is served, is that of securing the investigation of special economic problems, of current importance, by the best qualified experts including both economists and persons with business and other practical experience. This purpose is well illustrated by the British Economic Advisory Council.

In 1928 the Liberal Industrial Inquiry in Great Britain brought out a report entitled "Britain's Industrial Future" which contains a chapter warmly endorsing the idea of what is termed "An economic general staff." I quote from that report:

The problems of modern government have become more numerous and more technical. Parliamentary time, to an increasing degree, is occupied by questions which are primarily economic rather than political in the older sense of that word. Government departments have been subdivided and new administrative bodies have been brought into existence, not because of any bias towards bureaucracy, but by the sheer pressure of evolution in an industrialized nation. No matter how firm the determination of any government to avoid interference with industry, it finds itself called upon to remove difficulties from its path or to assist it. In any case, it is driven to recognize that in modern conditions its policies necessarily affect industry.

Nevertheless, the cabinet has no body of skilled advice on which to depend. The result is that troubles ahead are not anticipated, and, when they arrive, solutions to meet them are hurriedly improvised. Or, if competent commissions are appointed to study them, their reports come too late. Ministers and departments of state are necessarily concerned in the main with daily events and with the task of carrying on. The big problems of economic policy are only theirs when they are becoming ripe to be the subject of actual administration or legislation. It is, therefore, a vital need for a modern state to create a thinking department within the administration, which shall warn ministers of what is ahead and advise them on all the broad questions of economic policy.

As the problems of government become more technical, expert knowledge on them must be at the disposal of the government. It is not the duty of experts to decide matters of policy. But it is the duty of those who are responsible for important decisions to make the fullest use of expert analysis and of expert statements as to the results which may reasonably be anticipated from this line of action or from that. It becomes more and more clear to the student of affairs, and indeed to the public, that many of the mistakes and blunders made by governments are due, not to ill-will or prejudice, but to sheer unpreparedness and ignorance. A list of the major problems which governments holding office since the war have had to face illustrates the need of systematic thought in advance of executive decisions. There have been problems of a new kind as well as of unforeseen magnitude.

I omit the next clause, and would quote this paragraph:

Many of them are inter-departmental; and it has not been clear whose duty it is to exercise initiative or foresight. What is clearly required is that the cabinet should have at its disposal the best advice based on the fullest knowledge, and that the country as a whole should know that economic tendencies are not merely being recognized when some crisis occurs but that they are being constantly watched and studied, so that the government of the day may have a chance of averting difficulties and of meeting them with adequate measures.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask what the right hon. gentleman is reading from?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear me; I am sorry. I am quoting from a report entitled "Britain's Industrial Future" made by the Liberal Industrial Inquiry in Great Britain in 1928. I have read those extracts to the committee because they show that this question has been receiving most careful thought in the old country, and I may add in almost every other country in the world. I submit for the consideration of hon. members these extracts that I have read, setting forth what seems to be a self-evident situation, and we hope that the arrangements that are proposed in this bill will help to meet these problems.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that with these preliminary observations the bill requires little explanation. When we go into committee upon it, I shall be glad to answer as fully as possible any questions that are asked. Although it is perhaps not in order to discuss the details at this stage I may say that the proposed bill sets up a council of fifteen, under the Prime Minister, recruited from three categories: (a) government officials; (b) representatives of organized economic bodies, and (c) experts. It may be that a good deal of the work of the council will be done by special committees created ad hoc which can work simultaneously on different problems allotted to them. This will make it possible to keep down the numbers of the council and to secure participation in its work by men who might otherwise not have the time to spare for a number of detailed inquiries.

The machinery which is in this way going to be provided will, we all hope, solve for some time to come what has undoubtedly developed into a prime need of government, that of keeping abreast of economic thinking in general and of being continuously equipped with the materials required in the formulation of its broader economic policies, and of having more definitely recognized machinery to that end. The plan outlined, we believe, by a combination of the pertinent features in other plans will avoid pitfalls which have been encountered elsewhere. Some of these attempts at economic councils have not worked out elsewhere as we would like to see them work out in Canada.

As I said before, this proposal involves a minimum of new machinery and expense. We believe it is an effort in the right direction and that it will produce good results. This suggested council, it seems to me, is important also because of the stimulation which it is hoped it will afford to private economic research; that is to say, private economic research will be encouraged to go on as well; and it is important also in view of the opportunities it will hold out to the universities and to students of economics at large for an understanding and a liaison with those who are on the council, and for thus uniting and pooling the results of economic thinking throughout the dominion.

It is expected that the cost of the council will be comparatively little. The services of the council proper will be honorary, and only a small clerical staff will be needed. Most of the work will be done by experts, who will be brought in temporarily in connection with the subcommittees to which I have already referred.

If this bill becomes law it is the intention to call the council together as soon as possible, and to undertake a program which will not only deal with broad and general economic trends but will also tackle a number of specific economic problems.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Chairman, to give the committee an idea at not too great length of the purpose of this proposed legislation and of what we hope will be accomplished by it. When we are in committee on the bill and hon. members have the bill before them I will endeavour to make any further explanations that I may be asked for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to wait until I see the bill which is based on the resolution before saying very much in regard to the proposal itself. I might say just a word or two now arising out of the remarks of the acting leader of the government, inasmuch as they give what purports to be the purpose underlying the measure, and to a certain extent provisions of the measure itself.

As to the purpose of the economic council which it is intended to create, I gathered as I listened to my right hon. friend that it was first of all proposed to be in the nature of an advisory body which would be able to assist the Prime Minister in the discharge of his onerous duties, and that it would come under the direction of the Prime Minister himself. There seemed to be the other purpose, which is that of research—a body that would be concerned primarily with research into social and economic questions—and as such would be made up of or avail itself of the services of members of the public service whose efforts and work would be supplemented by experts from outside.

Both purposes I think are not only worthy but necessary ones at the present time. I think there is need, in connection with the Prime Minister's office, of provision for more effective advisory assistance to whoever may be holding the office. I think also it is necessary at this time that some body should have as its special duty the work of research into economic and social questions. What I am in doubt about is as to whether these two functions can best be combined in the manner evidently intended in the bill that is to be introduced.

The acting leader of the government has said a word about my possible sympathy with and understanding of some of the duties of the person, whoever he may be, holding the office of Prime Minister. May I avail myself at the moment of such experience and knowledge as I had while in that office, to say just a word on this very proposal. What I think is not generally realized with respect to the Prime Minister's office is that it is the only office in which a minister of the crown finds himself isolated without assistance such as is to be found in other departments of government. The Minister of Railways, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, any other of the ministers of the crown when they are appointed to office find, on entering upon their duties, a highly trained staff immediately available. There is a deputy head who in most cases has been familiar with the work of the office for years, there are important heads of departments; and there is the complete staff which is necessary to carry on the work. But a Prime Minister goes into an office in which there is no one and he is expected to be able to deal with questions of government relating to practically all departments, and to deal with great questions of state from day to day and, when parliament is in session, from hour to hour, and he has no one in his office to whom he can turn to assist him in that particular work apart from those who are referred to as his secretaries.

I would point out that the work of a private secretary to the Prime Minister ought to be much the same as the work of private secretaries to other ministers. It should not be work which will combine the duties of a deputy head, of the secretary of a department, and of expert advisers in different branches; it should be confined to those immediate duties which we commonly associate with the work of a private secretary. It seems to me that the handling of a Prime Minister's correspondence and the necessity of arranging for interviews, to say nothing of also interviewing persons who come to see the Prime Minister on various questions, are of themselves sufficient to absorb all the time which two or more able and efficient private secretaries can give. But over and above that which is a part of every day routine, the real work of the Prime Minister himself is with the larger questions of government which are related to world affairs and the affairs of different departments of state, and in that regard he is totally without the kind of assistance which other ministers have in their departments.

What is really needed in connection with the Prime Minister's office is the appointment of two or three highly trained and able men who possess qualifications and might be in a position to serve as advisers to the Prime Minister on the questions that are certain to occupy most of his time. Of these questions, undoubtedly social and economic problems will be one of the most important. But I doubt very much whether it will relieve the Prime Minister of the heavy duties of his office to have added to his other obligations that of being responsible for the work of an economic council which will be composed of fifteen persons, some of whom are in the civil service and others who are brought in as experts from without. A body such as that might more appropriately, it seems to me, be brought into relationship with the department which now exists for the purpose of research. At the moment the national research council is giving its time primarily to scientific research; but why there should not be arranged, as a branch of that body or an allied body the kind of organization that is here suggested, I cannot see. I have in my hand a copy of the Research Council Act—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the leader of the opposition think that the type of research carried on by such a council as is proposed would be different from the type of research carried on by the National Research Council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not as to the machinery and organization required. In my opinion all research demands the same kind of qualities, and I think that the machinery or kind of organization found most effective for research in one—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But one is deductive and the other inductive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both require highly trained intelligence and those habits of research and processes of reasoning that are cultivated by men whose time and thought are given to study. They are different qualities of mind from those required for administrative work, but research into economic and social questions in what it requires of processes of reasoning is to my mind altogether similar to research in any other branch, whether it relates to medicine or any of the natural sciences or any other branch of knowledge. It is a branch of knowledge. I do not say that the same laboratories will be used. In connection with social science, the laboratory may be the country, the methods of study or research are the same. They are the methods of minute and detailed investigation with deductions therefrom. The methods followed in postgraduate study in the great universities include in some instances these very social questions and are wholly similar. The phenomena are different and the scope of inquiry may be different, but the methods of work are very much the same.

I favour the idea of a council or some organized body that will be engaged in research on social and economic questions, but I think it will function much more efficiently as part of the national research organization which has already been formed. I do not say that the officers need necessarily be the same. Let it be organized on its own. But to form a council and make it a body which the Prime Minister of the country must be responsible for will, I think, add tremendously to the Prime Minister's obligations instead of relieving them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to interrupt the leader of the opposition, but he has wide experience in organization work of this kind. I was going to ask him whether such a body could not be more closely related to the bureau of statistics which already carries out considerable special work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I was going to say was this, and the remark of my hon. friend bears out what was largely in my mind: If I were asked what would most assist a prime minister to-day in his onerous duties of government, I would say give him the opportunity to select two or three men in whose ability, judgment and discretion he has every confidence, have one of those gentlemen an adviser on social and economic problems and another to deal more particularly with state affairs that concern different departments of government and require the bringing together of the work of different departments in connection with matters on which the prime minister may wish to have the benefit of wider knowledge and advice, and allow those gentlemen to have a responsibility for using the public service in the way that will best serve the office of the prime minister. If the question is one of research into some matters of statistics, it should be possible for the prime minister to call upon the Bureau of Statistics to do whatever is needed for the government in connection with reports on statistical matters. If it is research into some other economic question, for example, the extent of wheat production and problems relating to wheat, it ought to be possible for the prime minister to call upon any department or group of officials of government to undertake that work. But I believe the work will be more effectively done, not by seeking to have one group or council which will have to deal with all classes of questions that may come up, but rather by having the machinery such that at any moment any particular branch of the public service may be drafted in to perform a special duty, supplementing its efforts by expert opinion from different sources.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me for a moment? I am very anxious that we should see eye to eye in regard to the machinery for this council, and I may say, in regard to the last remark made by the leader of the opposition, that as I understand the matter, the problems of various departments will be dealt with in that way and that what we may call ad hoc members will be taken on for the purpose of discussing and reporting on any particular question that has to do with Trade and Commerce or Agriculture or whatever department it may be. I think he will find the bill is all right in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course I am discussing the matter in a very general way and without any knowledge of the provisions of the bill. It may be that when we see the bill, some of my remarks will not be applicable. But what I am seeking to give to the committee at the moment is just the result of the remembrance of conditions as I experienced them when in office and as I believe the present prime minister has experienced them since he has been in office. To add to the present Prime Minister's many duties that of being responsible for the work of an economic council is not going to lessen, it is going to increase his duties, and for that reason I think any such action would be a mistake. But for this house to provide the Prime Minister of the country with two or three highly trained men in whose judgment he has confidence, who can be the instruments to help to bring to him the information that is needed with respect to great problems of government and who will be recognized as having authority to utilize the public services generally to that end, something of that kind would be of the greatest possible benefit. My right hon. friend is familiar with the position held in England for example by Sir Maurice Hankey. If we had in connection with our public service a gentleman holding a position similar to that which Sir Maurice Hankey holds, attached to the prime minister, a gentleman in whom the prime minister and ministers of the crown generally would have great confidence, who on behalf of the prime minister would be continually cooperating with other ministers of the crown in the assembling of material on matters that relate to great questions coming before the ministry for consideration, and who would be recognized as having authority to command the assistance of the public service generally, I believe such an official could be of tremendous help. But I do not believe a prime minister is going to be materially assisted by our increasing machinery for which he will be responsible. Where he will be assisted in a very real way is by giving him the aid of two or three men in whom he has every confidence, who will not be regarded as secretaries, who will not have the duties of stenographers, but who will be men of highly trained minds and intelligence and able quickly to assemble and to assimilate the material which is needed for a discussion of public affairs. That would be the step which I believe would be most helpful to a prime minister.

As to the other function—and I think the two have to be kept separate—of research into social and economic questions, I am wholly in favour of some small body in the public service being responsible for seeing that that kind of work is carried on continuously, and in accordance with known and proper methods, and of giving to a body of that kind an opportunity to add to its numbers from time to time with respect to the different questions that may come up. But I think such a body as that would be much better associated with a national council such as already exists, than it would be with the prime minister's office.

There is one other observation I should like to make at this moment, and it is this: I do not know what is contemplated in the way of appointments or staff, but while it may be alright for this house to consider the matter of machinery, and the provisions of a bill to meet the ends suggested, it would not be expedient before another parliament is elected for any appointments to be made to a body of this kind. The essence of the value of any advisory body is the degree of confidence that those who are responsible for its work may have in those who compose its membership. If the purpose of this bill is simply to enable the government to select out of different departments those who may be its particular favourites at the moment and to award them positions which are to continue for the next few years, then I say that the government is making a mistake in attempting anything of that sort.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is not a still more important question the character of the investigations that they are to be directed by the government to undertake?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is equally important, but there again that is a matter of ministerial responsibility. If this bill is intended to take away from the government its responsibility for the investigation of social and economic problems and to place that responsibility on the shoulders of some group to be specially named for the purpose as an economic council, then I think it will be but another step in the way of getting away from ministerial responsibility and I would not be in favour of it. I am not sure that the measure may not tend to have that effect. As we all know, throughout the world to-day there is a tendency for governments to relieve themselves more and more of responsibility, and more and more to place responsibility on selected bodies for the purpose of relieving governments of some of their duties in public matters. If the measure is so intended I would think it inadvisable to have it enacted. A measure of this kind might more appropriately have been brought in at the first session of a new parliament rather than at the last session of an old parliament. But as it is coming at the last session of an old parliament, then so far as appointments under the measure are concerned they should be left until after a general election, when whatever administration may be responsible for carrying on the work of the government will have opportunity of appointing those for whose appointment they will have to be responsible and in whose judgment they will wish to have every confidence.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: At this stage and without knowledge of the bill itself I shall speak very briefly; I shall not attempt to deal with what might be termed the machinery or the details. The suggestion itself I welcome in principle; that is, I welcome first the recognition by the government of the principle that economic and social problems are worthy of much greater and more concentrated study than has been given them up to the present, and second the principle that this can best be done by giving at least a degree of responsibility to a body of men to carry on that work. From the discussion so far I am not sure what will be the real form or functions or purpose of this body. It has been suggested that one of its chief functions will be to assist the Prime Minister. Well, I am in the fortunate position that I have had no experience as prime minister, and never shall have any—

Mr. MANION: Why not?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: —but I have watched prime ministers in action, and I am satisfied, and I think it will be a sentiment agreed to throughout the entire house, that undoubtedly some assistance should be given to relieve any prime minister of the growing burden of detailed work which now rests upon his shoulders. I have not always seen eye to eye with the present Prime Minister; that could hardly be expected as I have always come into the house by defeating one of his supporters. At the same time I think I express what we all feel when I say, first, that we deeply regret the Prime Minister's illness and his absence, and second that we recognize that in large measure that absence has been forced upon him by the fact that for the past four or five years he has been trying in all sincerity and in all courage to do two or three men's work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Anything which will take some of that load from the shoulders of any prime minister will be all to the good.

But as I conceive it the principal purpose in the formation of such a body as is proposed goes much further than that, unless indeed the function of advising the Prime Minister be interpreted in its widest possible sense. The Prime Minister is of course the head of the government, and advising the Prime Minister is in effect advising the government itself as to matters of major policy, placing before the government through the Prime Minister information necessary to enable that government to come to wise conclusions. Viewing the matter in that wider sense I assume that the function of advising the Prime Minister does include almost the entire functions of an economic council. It would be difficult for me to divide those functions into the two classes suggested, advisory and research. Advisory, certainly, but based upon what? Based upon the most intensive research into the problems, upon the widest possible knowledge and the most comprehensive study of the entire situation. I can conceive of no advice which would be worthy of the name unless it was preceded by and based upon that intensive research into the social and economic questions which I understand would be the first and primary duty of such a body. I shall not comment on the suggestion that has been made that to a large extent the body proposed by the present resolution will simply be an interdepartmental body to correlate the activities of various departments and coordinate the information which will be found therein. That would be a most useful function, but far from meeting the necessities of the case. However as that will come up in considering the bill itself, when the machinery will be discussed in more detail, and the method of appointment and principle of representation upon that council may be understood more clearly, I shall reserve comment upon that phase until that time.

I should like however to indicate very briefly some considerations which were before me and those who agreed with me when this matter was brought before the house on former occasions, because as the acting Prime Minister has said this is a matter to which I have given some consideration. Indeed I think I have had the honour of introducing the suggestion in concrete form into the house on several occasions. I am glad to see those suggestions are bearing fruit. I may say at once that I am not so vainglorious as to believe that this bill is being introduced because I made the suggestion; at the same time there is a satisfaction in seeing that at that time I was interpreting public opinion and outlining a need, and that that need is now recognized in the house as well as throughout the country.

As to the work which might be done by such a body, the subject is so vast as to be approached with some trepidation, and touched upon only superficially in any address; and I have no intention of making an address at this time. I have on other occasions stated most of my general opinions on the subject. I listened with much interest when the acting Prime Minister mentioned one of the problems which might be referred to such a body, that of the trend towards the cities and the relative depopulation of our rural areas. While I agreed with him fully as he proceeded to indicate that the question of moving men into small self-supporting holdings in the country might be one subject of research, I thought if this were as far as the economic council would go in studying that problem it would fail utterly in its function.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the hon member permit me? That is only one point—

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Oh, quite; I have no intention of suggesting that the acting Prime Minister limit the inquiry into the problem to that somewhat superficial aspect. I suggest that a study of that question must embrace most of the economic troubles that beset this nation, because you have to find out not only some way of distributing the surplus population from the city, but why there is this trend. The cause will be found to embrace the relative standards of living and the entire question of our industrial and distributive system, and to involve the whole subject of education and the varied opportunities which are afforded people in the rural and urban areas. I was disappointed—perhaps not disappointed but to say the least, surprised—to hear the suggestion that that trend might be stopped were a change of government to take place. Any such suggestion shows a very shallow knowledge of the situation, because that trend has prevailed under every government and in every country. It was taking place with just as great acceleration in the nine years preceding 1930 as in the four or five years since; it is dependent on no special government being in power, and is far beyond any question of party politics. Its causes go far deeper than that; they go to the very roots of our modern civilization, our industry and our agricultural system. I venture to suggest that in connection with that very problem the economic council would be obliged to investigate a subject which I think above all others should be investigated, the distribution in a proper way of that which we can produce and the relationship of finance and other factors to that distribution. This opens up a very wide field, and that is why I have in mind something perhaps a good deal more permanent and a good deal more important in the future than is visualized by the acting Prime Minister in this beginning. I quite realize the fact that the last session of parliament prior to an election is no time to set up wide and extensive machinery of any kind which might take over functions hitherto either unperformed or considered governmental. May I say at once that I only welcome this as the acorn from which a much larger tree may grow. I should like to see—and I hope this will be the germ—not a body composed mainly of departmental officials but a body truly representative of the problem itself, a body as permanent in its nature as the national council on technical and scientific research.

I am not going to compare those two problems. The acting Prime Minister has well said that economic and social research and all the problems related to that question are far more important and deserving of far more attention on the part of any government than are the problems of scientific research. The acting Prime Minister did not go quite that far, but that was the suggestion. I have said before, and perhaps it will do no harm to repeat it, that while technical and scientific research is carried on in many branches and in many places under private enterprise and initiative, because the results of that research may be reflected in increased profits, increased dividends or increased comforts to those engaged in the research, in the case of the corporations or firms carrying it on, properly speaking this question with which we are now dealing is one which affects primarily the state itself, society as a whole, not one individual particularly or primarily, not one firm or corporation, but the state as such. The solution of these problems would be reflected not necessarily in increased profits or dividends but in higher standards of living and better living conditions for the people as a whole. That means that there is only one body which should become primarily responsible for making that research possible; that body is the state, which represents all the people and society as a whole.

[Mr. Speakman.]

I must confess, though I speak always with deference because of my more limited experience, that I cannot agree with the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition that this council should be made a branch, as it were, of the present national council on scientific research. I agree entirely with the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River; indeed I think I have made that suggestion myself, that while in one sense the problems are similar, there is a vast difference between the two. It is a question of knowledge and research and of the application of knowledge which has been obtained, but the methods are different, the subjects are different, the very bases are different. I agree at once that somewhat the same type of mind is required, that type of mind which, regardless of whose toes are trodden upon and regardless of how many existing prejudices may be upset, will search and delve until it reaches the truth and will bring in conclusions based upon that truth. I agree that the true scientific mind is required in both cases, yet I do suggest that the training of the mind and the objective are wholly different. More than that, the very basis is different. When you are dealing with scientific and technical research you are dealing with factors which may or may not be known but which, when found out, are tangible, immovable and certain; they are exact. In the realm of economic and social science you are dealing with something intangible, in regard to which differences of opinion will exist; you are dealing with questions on which at present few men agree. We have different schools of economic and social thought, and I may suggest that some of those schools of economic thought, some of those who are seeking a remedy for our present ills, hate each other worse than they hate the common enemy. So long as you have that frame of mind you cannot have the exact, scientific attitude brought to bear upon the problem which is essential.

Moreover I believe that the nature of the problem itself is so important and its scope so tremendous that it well deserves a separate establishment known and honoured as the national council of economic research, with its attention diverted to no other matters and with full power to carry on its activities. Further may I express the hope that we will see in this country not a body which will usurp the authority of parliament—I have never suggested that such an economic council should have the executive authority to put its findings into effect—but a body speaking with authority based upon knowledge, and after all upon knowledge alone can true authority be based. I hope this will grow out of the present proposed legislation. I hope we shall have a body speaking with authority and taking the responsibility of advising the government as to what policies would be most beneficial. Naturally any government and any parliament must take the responsibility of putting into effect and enforcing those policies. I am not suggesting in any way that the rights and responsibilities of parliament and of the government should be upset or usurped by any such body, but I am suggesting that governments and parliaments to-day are functioning, passing laws and taking action often on a basis of either ignorance or inexact and inaccurate information, and I believe this would do something to remedy that condition. I am not worrying just now about the welfare of any party, because I think after all that is a very trivial matter. I am hoping that out of this legislation as time goes on and as the idea develops, takes root and is accepted, as I believe it will be accepted, with acclamation—and the wider its spread and the deeper its roots the greater the acclamation—we may reach that point which we must reach or our problems will not be solved, that point when in parliament and out of parliament we can discuss these social and economic problems, which are of such overwhelming importance, on their merits, on a basis of knowledge and without the interjection of partisanship and political feeling. Perhaps that is too much to hope for, but at least it would take away some of the stigma and some of the stain of partisan politics if that information were at the disposal of the house and the government which must take the responsibility for introducing the legislation.

Perhaps I need say no more just now; after all this is only the resolution stage and I cannot tell, nor is it right for me to anticipate, to what degree and in what measure the legislation itself will bear out what I have said. In closing, however, may I say that I welcome this move because I see in it the adoption of a principle, the germ of an idea, which although it will be small this session, for good reason, perhaps may grow until it will form one of the most dominant and important factors in our modern civilization. The scope of the work to be done is enormous and the number of subjects to be investigated is legion. As I close I would suggest also that this is not merely a matter of searching out statistics and facts, important and all essential though those may be. I yield to none in my admiration of our bureau of statistics, which I believe to be one of the most efficient in the world to-day, much of its information being useless because no use is being made of it. But if this were only a matter of delving into statistics and stating and correlating known facts, it would be but a barren move. Eventually we have to place on such a body the responsibility for the drawing of deductions and the correlating not only of facts but of opinions, and the responsibility for at least trying to think out something we have never thought out before, namely, what is going to be the final effect on the public weal of those different lines of isolated action. We have in Canada a number of outstanding illustrations indicating the need for a body such as I have described. I am not going to refer to that bete noir of the house, the transportation problem, nor shall I refer to many other matters. I should however like to mention one basic problem which may have caused more trouble for Canada than any other: I refer to the two divergent and conflicting policies which have been followed in Canada ever since western Canada was opened up. One policy encouraged by governments and by all who were interested in development was to make of western Canada a huge wheat exporting country. The western country was developed on that basis, and apparently every political party—and I am not now blaming the parties—parliament itself forgot that when accepting this as a paramount and foundation policy they were making of the west an agricultural country dependent upon huge exports for its existence. Side by side with that we attempted to build up within Canada the conflicting policy of a self-supporting industrial system. I submit that these two policies are mutually destructive; you cannot have both. Perhaps the source of some of our greatest troubles in making trade agreements and trade pacts and in getting reasonable tariffs, find their root in the fact that parliament went in two different directions, attempted to establish two different lines of policy, one of which was subversive of the other. You cannot have a country producing huge quantities of agricultural products, quantities normally in excess of its domestic needs, and at the same time have a self-contained industrial country which is not prepared to import the goods which must be accepted in exchange for the farm produce exported.

Again I am not suggesting that such a council should assume the responsibilities of parliament or of governments, but I do suggest that had a council been established many years ago and been given authority to make effective recommendations, the power to go into the facts and point out what would be the results, the power to give guidance to parliament in what I consider was at that time a foolish and mutually destructive course of action, it might have prevented much of the disturbance and trouble we now find in Canada. One party in this chamber I am afraid cannot shake the finger of scorn at another, because the same policies have been followed by each and by parliament as a whole. Further than that, those policies have been supported by the people as a whole who thought they could visualize the ideal of a huge exporting country on the one hand and a self-contained industrial country on the other.

I suggest that is the kind of work which an economic council properly constituted and properly functioning might well perform. It could make suggestions to parliament and to government as to real lines of governmental and state policy which would result in reasonable balance and reasonably happy functioning. To-day one of the problems has been suggested by the acting Prime Minister, but the basic problem, that of making use of the abundance we can produce, to my mind lies at the root of our difficulties. This problem should be studied and examined impartially and free from partisanship or prejudice, so as to ascertain whether or not we may solve what has become not only a problem but a menace to ourselves and to civilization.

Mr. POULIOT: The resolution provides for the appointment of an economic council. I say we already have one, because when I turn to page twenty-five of the parliamentary guide I find that we have first, the Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Secretary of State for External Affairs; second, Minister of Justice and Attorney General; third, Solicitor General; fourth, Minister of Finance; fifth, Minister of Railways and Canals, who is also in charge of tourist traffic; sixth, Postmaster General; seventh, Minister of Public Works; eighth, Secretary of State; ninth, Minister of Pensions and National Health; tenth, Minister of Marine; eleventh, Minister of the Interior and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; twelfth, Minister of Labour, Mines, and acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization; thirteenth, Minister of Agriculture; fourteenth, Minister of National Revenue; fifteenth, Minister of Trade and Commerce; sixteenth, Minister of National Defence—and we have those very able men supported by a brain trust composed of three ministers without portfolio. First we have the acting Prime Minister, then a former Prime Minister of Canada who is now leader of the government in the Senate, a man who is considered throughout Canada as a very able person, and third, another privy councillor from Prince Edward Island. Then, in addition to that we have another brain trust; there is the Canadian Minister to Washington who during the campaign of 1930 was the political adviser to the Prime Minister. Since then very often he has come to give his advice to the Prime Minister. In fact all this social legislation was inspired by him and was enunciated in his famous speech before the Canadian club at Ottawa. Therefore I wonder if the government will dispense with the services of such an eminent political adviser and replace by an economic council a man who is also an expert in the advertising of manufactured products. I wonder if the government would dispense with the services of such an eminent gentleman; I would be sorry for the government because he seems to be a genial adviser. I am pleased to note that the faces of the hon. members on the treasury benches are adorned with smiles. I know they are relieved; I know that this legislation means the former political adviser to the Prime Minister is now a thing of the past, and that he will be bound to remain in Washington, especially when questions are being asked about his travelling to and fro.

Then, in the various departments we have deputies and assistant deputies. These are men of great knowledge and wide experience. At times however the ministers are so well informed that they can dispense with their deputy heads. We find this happening in the Department of Marine and in the Department headed by the Postmaster General. These gentlemen have such wide knowledge of their respective departments that they can dispense with the services of their deputy heads. I would say however that every department is supposed to have a deputy head; that is in accordance with the law. It is a law which was good enough for Cartier and Macdonald, for Laurier and Borden and for Mr. Meighen. It was good enough for Mr. Mackenzie King, my right hon. leader. But now we come to this: We need an economic council. The government is eating soup for dessert because all the legislation on which the government should have had the advice of its economic council is already before us, and we have not had the benefit of the economic council's advice upon the social insurance measure, for instance, the eight hour day, and all the other legislation that is now before us. Either that legislation is good or it is bad. If it is good, and I suggest that only for the sake of argument, we do not need that economic council. If it is bad, why was the legislation drafted before the economic council was formed? We are still living in a fools' paradise. I am sorry to have to say that, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot understand how the government can go on with this proposed legislation.

One hon. gentleman, I do not know whether it was the acting Prime Minister, my right hon. leader or the hon. member for Red Deer, has said that this economic council is being formed as a measure of relief to the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Témiscouata has repeatedly in this house, and he has said it particularly to the Solicitor General, who is now listening, that the leader of the government should be given time enough to think by keeping away from him all those flatterers who make him waste his time by asking for favours. These good-for-nothings should not be allowed to approach him, in order that the Prime Minister may have sufficient time to think of matters of state. I have repeatedly urged that in this house, and I have urged it upon my hon. friend, and I ask him now to create a barrage between the Prime Minister and those who are making him waste his time by their visits.

It is not at all necessary for the government to have an economic council. May I quote from a book that was written by a French academician a long time ago, in 1909, His name was Emile Faguet, and the title of the book is Le culte de l'incompetence—The cult or the worship of incompetence. Here is what this author says at page 59 of this book:

Il—

That is the legislator:

Il devrait être très informé, non pas tant de ce qui est dans les livres,—quoique encore il dût avoir des connaissances juridiques assez étendues, pour ne pas faire, ce qui arrive à chaque instant, exactement le contraire de ce qu'il veut faire—que du tempérament et de l'esprit général du peuple pour lequel il fait des lois.

Le législateur idéal, ou simplement suffisant, doit donc connaître les inclinations générales de son peuple et les dépasser et les dominer, puisqu'il a pour mission en partie de les satisfaire, en partie de les combattre.

This resolution provides for an advisory council. In the time of Cartier and Macdonald—I will go further back to Lafontaine and Baldwin and say that we have had great men in this country, Lafontaine and Baldwin, Cartier and Macdonald, Borden and Laurier, my right hon. leader, and the right hon. leader of the government in the Senate. All these were able men and they did very well without the assistance of any economic council.

Advisory? Why should this council be advisory? Why should the leader of the government receive any advice from people who are hair-splitters most of the time? There is no reason for such advice. May I bring to the attention of the right hon. acting Prime Minister, who is a graduate of Harvard and a well read man, this fact, that in the eighteenth century there was a strong tendency towards agnosticism in philosophy, but for some years now that tendency has been transferred towards the economic life of nations, and we now have a lot of cranks in the universities who are more interested in the solution of a theoretical problem than in the welfare of the people. Naturally there are exceptions, but there are many of those people I speak of, and we have to censure strongly some chancellors of universities, like one in Montreal, who is also the president of a great railway company. He tolerates in that university professors of economics who are socialists and communists and are teaching socialism and communism to the youth. The same thing is going on in Toronto university. The university I referred to first was McGill of Montreal, and the chancellor I referred to was Mr. Beatty, who does not object to some of the professors there, although they belong to highly respectable families, teaching socialism and communism to the youth. One of them is the son of a very great and a very intelligent man. I am in favour of freedom of speech but it is most dangerous to the welfare of the community and the future welfare of this country to allow those cranks to teach socialsim and communism to the youth. Why do we have so much trouble now in economics in this country?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: The acting leader of the government said that the object of this resolution was to establish a body to coordinate the work of the various departments and to make more effective use of the ability and energy of the higher civil servants now in the employ of the dominion. The civil servants at large are doing very well, provided that the minister is equal to his function. He adds that they, the higher civil servants, have a special knowledge of our economic problem. Is it not the business of the government to have that special knowledge? They may direct the ability and energy of the civil servants along a certain line in order that they may make the best of the government's policies; but the special knowledge of our economic problems should be in the possession of the cabinet. The right hon. gentleman added that it would save time and labour to the government. It will save labour on the part of the government. But they must be ready to serve. If they are not satisfied with their task they have only one thing to do, and that is to resign and leave it to men who are not afraid to work. The ministers of the crown, he said, have too much detailed work to attend to. There is an easy remedy; curtail that detail work. It is a simple remedy, and it is because it is so simple that they will not accept it; they want something complicated. Let them direct their ability and energy to the welfare of the country. The right hon. gentleman referred to Sir George Murray, who had been the secretary of the treasury in Great Britain, and his advice to the Borden government twenty-three or twenty-four years ago. The fashion has changed since then. He continued: More and more the government are being compelled to take cognizance of business questions and other matters which interest the country as a whole. This is what we call in French vérité de la Palice. It is most elementary that the government should take cognizance of business questions and other matters that interest the country as a whole; that is why they have been sworn as ministers of the crown and attend sittings of the council. The acting leader of the government said further: The Prime Minister's illness is due in large part to the heavy work he had to carry on in the last four or five years. I do not deny that he has had a good deal of work, but everyone will agree with me when I say that he has had no system, and that is why he is exhausted now. No one compelled him to make long journeys to get a degree in the United States or in any province. It was tiresome and exhausting, but the higher the degree the higher the fever. It was not part of the duties of the Prime Minister; he was supposed to stay here and look after the business of the state. I am sorry that he is ill, but if he exhausted himself travelling to and fro it is because no one on the other side, not even a doctor, gave him the very sound advice that he should stay in Ottawa and attend to his duties as Prime Minister instead of doing as a wandering Jew.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The overgrowth of our cities is one problem which has been mentioned by the acting Prime Minister as a reason for this new legislation. Is there not a select standing committee on industrial relations and another one on agriculture? This matter could be studied at any time by either of these committees. There is no necessity to appoint such an economic council. The right hon. gentleman adds that one question that might be referred to this council is the finding of some solution which would lessen the number of people in the city and keep a larger number on the land—mark you this is most important—"not for the purpose of raising wheat or some other commodity for sale"—the farmer should not be on the land to sell his products; these are words which have been used by the acting leader of the government—"but for the purpose of making a living on the land, as our forefathers did and as the habitants of Quebec do at the present time." If they do not sell their commodities how can they make a living for themselves on the land? How can the farmer remain on the land if he grows commodities and does not sell them? It is most absurd, so absurd that it will take an economic council to devise a plan which will enable the farmer to stay on the land, to grow commodities which he does not sell. It is a most extraordinary thing, and I am sure that the idea was put into the right hon. gentleman's head by someone who wants to get on that economic council. The right hon. gentleman adds: "The functions of this economic council will be purely executive and not in any way administrative." We have already the executive council, which is the aggregation of ministers sitting in council. It is a part of our system along with parliament and the judiciary, and this will be done away with and will be replaced by an economic council which will have executive functions. It is easy to see that it will save time and labour to the government; it will do the work of the ministers. He adds that the purpose of this measure is to promote research in the social and economic sciences and that "there is need for coordination and an omnibus point of view in economic policies." It reminds me of the differences that exist between the former Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State. I wonder whether the function of this so-called economic council will be to conciliate such divergent views in order that all gentlemen who do not share the same views will be put into an omnibus—an omnibus point of view in economic policies. It is a liaison body between all those on the other side of the house who have divergent views; it is a matter of diplomacy. The acting Prime Minister quotes Sir Arthur Salter. That is a great concession to the group to my extreme left. Sir Arthur Salter may be a great economist, but his views can be considered in Canada not by way of application but only by way of comparison, because while he may know a great deal about problems in Great Britain, he knows nothing about ours. Therefore how can he apply his views? The right hon. gentleman adds that if this bill becomes law it is the intention to call the council together as soon as possible, and to undertake a program which will not only deal with broad and general economic trends but will also tackle a number of specific economic problems. The old order is gone; it is replaced by the new order as announced over the radio, but as soon as this economic council is formed, the new order will become the old order again and we shall have another new order created by these superlegislative brains. Are we to change like that all the time? Is this government's program a moving picture, changing several times a week? This is most absurd; there are no fundamentals in it. The government is very weak and needs some stimulant in order to carry on until we are bound to have an election. But it is very queer that in all the acting Prime Minister has said, there is not a single sound reason for creating such an economic council.

Now I come to what my right hon. leader has said. He says that the Prime Minister goes into an office in which there is no one, that is no staff, and he is expected to be able to deal with questions of government relating to practically all departments, and to deal with great questions of state from day to day and, when parliament is in session, from hour to hour, and he has no one in his office to whom he can turn to assist him in that particular work apart from those who are referred to as his secretaries. Then he observes that over and above every day routine the real work of the Prime Minister himself is with the larger questions of government which are related to world affairs and the affairs of different departments of state, and in that regard he is without the assistance which other ministers have in their departments. I am very sorry, but with that part of my right hon. leader's remarks I cannot fully agree. Did he mean that there should be a duplication in the Prime Minister's office of all the services that are in the other departments? Take for instance the bureau of statistics which comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce. The information that is gathered by that bureau is available to every hon. member. I have nothing but eulogy for the excellent work which is done there; I am just a back bencher and I can get that information quite easily. I do not see why the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition has not the same opportunity, because the information is available to all of us. Therefore the Prime Minister or any hon. member can ask the bureau of statistics for any information which is necessary for him in his work, and I do not believe in any duplication of a service of that kind.

Then my right hon. leader says that to form a council and make it a body which the Prime Minister of the country must be responsible for will add tremendously to the Prime Minister's obligations instead of relieving them. Well, if it is a body for the Prime Minister, he must be responsible for it, and I am well aware that very often the Prime Minister has been advised by irresponsible persons. But there is enough of this and we cannot sanction it by a bill. We cannot as members of parliament give irresponsible assistants to the Prime Minister; I strongly object to doing so. The Prime Minister should be responsible for his staff just as any minister is responsible for his. Then my leader continues to the effect that for statistics it should be possible for the Prime Minister to call upon the bureau. He does not say it should not be possible. It is possible for the Prime Minister; it is possible for everyone. Then my leader says: If it is research into some other economic question, for example the extent of wheat production and problems relating to wheat, it ought to be possible for the Prime Minister to call upon any department or group of officials of government to undertake that work. It is possible for the Prime Minister to do so; it is possible for him to have that information at any time. Therefore, why create such an economic council? My leader says that to provide the Prime Minister with two or three highly trained men in whose judgment he has confidence, who can be the instruments to help to bring to him the information that is needed with respect to great problems of government and who will be recognized as having authority to utilize the public service generally to that end, something of that kind would be of the greatest possible benefit. That may be true. At the present time Mr. Finlayson is acting as super-secretary to the Prime Minister; he was appointed through the estimates. There are two ways to get the men referred to by my leader: either by submitting a request to the civil service commission or by inserting their names in the estimates. This is a very easy way to do so and I do not see why the government does not proceed in that manner. If the Prime Minister needs more assistance and is not satisfied by that already given to him by Mr. Finlayson, let him put a name or two into the supplementary estimates asking that the House of Commons ratify the appointment of such men, and although such a proceeding is not regular, although they should be regularly appointed by the civil service commission, I would not raise an objection because I think the Prime Minister should have all the assistance that he requires to fulfil his duties. But on the other hand I do not see the necessity of such an economic council as is proposed by this resolution.

The hon. member for Bow River made a distinction between an inductive and a deductive body. The research bureau according to him is doing some inductive research. I wonder if I am quoting him correctly, and if I do not I shall be obliged to him if he will tell me. It is rather experimental than inductive work that is being done now by the research bureau and the hon. member knows that very well. Why make such a distinction between the inductive and the deductive? He knows very well that he is splitting hairs when he makes that very subtle distinction. On the other hand the new economic council will be a deductive body, a body doing deductive research. That is all right, but that work should be done by the government. That is why the cabinet meet; the deduction from the facts submitted to the government should be made by the cabinet ministers themselves when they sit in council. That is how they should frame their policies in connection with the business of the country.

I heard with a great deal of pleasure the hon. member for Red Deer mention something about the importance of facts. I have already told my hon. friends to my extreme left that they should be more interested in facts than in economists. Now they accept that suggestion in part; they do not accept it in full. They would like to have men in their statistical bureau doing the whole work for them in order to save them time and labour. That is what is suggested, because if I heard the hon. member for Red Deer aright, he said that someone should draw the conclusions from the facts gathered by the bureau of statistics. But that work should be done by the hon. member himself, as it should be done by the Prime Minister and his colleagues. When they ask information from the bureau of statistics they get facts and figures upon which they have to form their own judgment and draw their own conclusions. This is what a government is for; that is the idea of responsible government.

Then we are quite late in following other people's fashions. The brain trust was the fashion in the United States some years ago, but Mr. Moley was thrown overboard and later General Johnson, the head of the NRA, met with no better success. There is no longer a brain trust in the United States; President Roosevelt is getting rid of them. As the experience in our neighbouring country has been so unfortunate why should we follow that example now? In this house there are 245 members; representing every province and different parts of each province and each party. Members of all parties have the opportunity to meet members of the government or their leaders in caucus and there express their views freely, and to my knowledge members have often succeeded in changing the views of the leaders. This is the way that members of the cabinet can keep in touch with the members, and through them with the country at large. This is how it has been done ever since we have had responsible government. Not only that, but the ministers represent each province; they gather in council and discuss matters. The Prime Minister is the head of the Department of External Affairs, but he is more than that, he is the head of the government, the superhead of every department; he is interested in the good administration of each department. He may get information through his ministers who gather it from every province. Furthermore the government can get information through this house. There are select standing committees, and committees appointed to study special matters, and information may be gathered by such committees from competent witnesses. The Prime Minister is the captain of the ship; he is responsible for the ship and for its crew and for the passengers. He has at his command these many sources of information—members of the house, officials of the departments, the ministers; therefore this so-called economic council is most superfluous and I will never agree to vote any sum of money or vote for any law to provide such relief for a moribund government.

There is a point on which I fully agree with my right hon. leader. He said that, as we all know, throughout the world to-day there is a tendency for governments to relieve themselves more and more of responsibility and more and more to put it on special bodies for the purpose of relieving them of their duties in public matters. That was putting it very mildly, but it is true just the same. The conclusion my right hon. leader arrives at is that if this measure is so enacted he would think it inadvisable that it be enacted. I fully agree with my leader in that connection; I do not at all see the utility of this so-called economic council. All the government's social legislation has now been submitted to the house, or will be, except two measures. We know what it is all about. I do not see why we should bring in strangers and outsiders, people who have no responsibility at all, to advise the government; the government should be advised first by the members, then by the ministers; the ministers should advise the Prime Minister, the head of the government. If things had been done that way for the last five years it would have been much better and the government would not be in the jam they are in now. If the government had dispensed with all those intruders and that so-called brain trust the country would not have suffered as it has. Therefore, sir, I strongly object to this legislation. I consider it a farce. In my opinion its purpose is only to give a sinecure to some people who like to split hairs, who are not serious but are dreamers and cranks and a curse to this country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall take only a few minutes, I hope. Someone has said that it is very foolish to criticize the architecture of a building without having first seen either the plans or the building. In other words to criticize before it is half-built is unlikely to lead to a right judgment. To criticize a bill when it is not even before us in skeleton form would seem equally unwise. Yet, judging by a remark dropped by my right hon. leader, there is a feature I do not like at all about this proposal, that is there are to be twelve or fifteen members of this "brain trust" as my hon. friend called it. If that is so I do not like it at all. As anyone knows who has had experience in getting experts together, I do not care how expert they are, if you have fifteen experts you will have fifteen viewpoints and in the last analysis whoever is being advised has himself to take the responsibility of acting. This looks to me like an admission on the part of the government that they have not sufficient statecraft within themselves to administer the affairs of this country in these trying times; they have to call in people from outside. Well, they have done that on many occasions, but they were frequently unfortunate in their selection of advisers. If I thought this plan would give them two or three good advisers and lighten the burden on the shoulders of the Prime Minister there would be something indeed much to be said for it. He has been carrying a stupendous burden, but there is nothing in this resolution to indicate that it is going to lighten his burden any more than that of other members of the government. As I understand it, it is an advisory body for the entire government, to be composed of some twelve or fifteen members. It seeems to be something in the way of a little Canadian pup begotten by the big Rooseveltian mastiff, a little NRA of our own.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the trend.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is getting pretty well shot up down there, I understand; the mastiff himself is going bad. Why trail in at this time imitating our neighbours, big and wonderful as they are? They have demonstrated the weakness of this sort of thing. There are other ways of strengthening the government; probably the electors will have something to say about that.

Mr. SANDERSON: You mean of changing the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I would not like to be so unkind as that. I have had the privilege of acting under more than the one prime minister, both in the west and here, and I know what a ghastly grind it is, even on the ministers, but ten times more on the prime minister. If they keep at it long enough it will be only a matter of time until they break down, with the limited amount of expert confidential counsel available. I am one who puts the highest value possible on expert technical testimony, technocrats if you like; technical men I think are indispensable. But they often lack practical experience. I do not care how technical one is or how advanced he may be in the technical world; if he has not tried it out in reality in everyday affairs sometimes his technical knowledge will lead him astray, so he needs both the technical and the practical experience to be on sound ground as an adviser. If the aim of the resolution and the bill to be founded on it is to provide two or three advisers for the Prime Minister it should be possible to get two men with some technical knowledge, of course, but better still some common sense, some knowledge of statecraft, some knowledge of public sentiment, some knowledge of what will likely go and what will not go. I imagine any minister would like to have advisers of this type, as well as the Prime Minister.

There are two ways, as I see it, of carrying out the purpose of this resolution. My right hon. leader suggested that it might be done by having two or three technical men to assist the Prime Minister. That does not seem to meet the wishes of the government, but though they have been known to change their minds it occurred to me that it was no use waiting until the bill came down to make suggestions; I might better assume that the bill is going to provide for a large number of advisers, some twelve or fifteen. Still I would suggest that the government carefully consider the other proposition of having two or three real good advisers, and not only advisers but assistants, who will help ease the terrible strain on the shoulders of the Prime Minister, no matter who he may be. That would be comparatively inexpensive; that is what has been done in the old country for many years. The idea of under secretaries in Canada has been mooted many times; that does not seem practical in this country, but this suggestion might be a substitute for that system, and it would help out tremendously and it would be inexpensive.

If it is desirable to have twelve or fifteen advisers why not do what has been done in the Department of Agriculture, not only by the present minister but by previous ministers as well? The minister calls his staff together, or he calls together farm organizations throughout Canada to meet in Ottawa. I think one of the first acts of the present Minister of Agriculture was to hold a conference with the various provincial ministers of agriculture, to take counsel with them. But you do not need a bill for that; you do not even need a vote in the estimates. On the other hand a vote in the estimates would provide for two or three experts without going through all this hullabaloo, but I think there is a reason for this more spectacular course. The government do not want the simple way; they want all the publicity they can get now, and I think perhaps they need it. The government want to pad out their rather meagre "reform" manifesto, and everything counts. This will be one more step to be tabulated off on their fingers, but this is going to cost too much, especially if we are to have a large body instead of the two or three advisers I suggest. The Prime Minister will have the burden, if he is the chairman of the body, of reconciling their differences. I do not know who will be the chairman, but whoever he is he will have to marshal the views of the other fourteen members, consolidate them and present them to the Prime Minister.

I am merely dealing with these points now because I may say quite frankly that if this measure goes through I will not want anything better on the platform than to describe the admission of the government that they have been unequal to the task of governing Canada, and that they are calling in an outside body for aid. So I am not making these remarks for political reasons at all; I should like to save the government from themselves, and I think this is the time to do it. We have seen what has happened in other countries—the NRA for example—and we know what we have heard about technocrats. When this depression overtook us we had the views of every expert and statistician in the land within two or three months, and ever since they have been telling us the way out. In nine cases out of ten they have been wrong; the situation has been quite different from what they evidently anticipated, and they have had to back up and start all over again. So I have no very great hope in regard to this body of fifteen, since that has proven to be the case. They will be marshalled together from all parts of Canada and they will thresh out their differences. I have gone through that process more than once in a small way, and in the last analysis I found that I had to bear the responsibility and burden of working out something from the multitude of views brought before me.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, this will cost a good deal of money, and we have no money to spare to bulge out the staff at this time and call together these unnecessary large gatherings. As my right hon. leader indicated, the burden of being chairman of that body, or of being responsible for it, will take as much out of the leader of the government as it will save him. If you can get fifteen men together without some of them being freaks I tell you you are a good chooser. The danger will be that one or more freaks will be chosen; they are the people who will assert themselves. Some of our Major Douglases and what not probably will be on this body but of course good men also. When I make these remarks I am not attempting to belittle the responsibilities and labours of a prime minister. There is no one, unless it is my own leader, who knows better than the Prime Minister the need of good, straight, honest outside advice by two or three men of common sense, horse sense if you like, and perhaps some technical knowledge. Such advice is of tremendous help, and I should like to see something done to make that advice available to whoever happens to be prime minister, because I am conscious of the need of it. Any further remarks I have to make, Mr. Chairman, will be deferred until I see the bill.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to make a few remarks on the resolution that has been debated this afternoon and this evening, but first I have a question or two to ask the right hon. gentleman who is piloting the resolution through the committee. I should like to ask what will be the extra expense to parliament and the country when this economic council of fifteen is established?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I explained this afternoon that the expense will be very small. The bill will provide that these men will act in an honorary capacity. I do not think any estimate has been made as to what the expense actually will be, but I can have some estimate prepared and give it to my hon. friend when we are in committee on the bill itself.

Mr. McINTOSH: You cannot give an approximate figure at the present time?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I say that the time to discuss a matter of this kind is when the bill is in committee.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then we will leave it at that, and we will expect that information later on. Now I have another question to ask the right hon. gentleman. This afternoon he spoke of the secretary of the British treasury, Sir George Murray, who came to Canada when Right Hon. R. L. Borden was Prime Minister. My right hon. friend did not give the year. May I ask him now exactly what year he was referring to?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think it was either 1912 or 1913.

Mr. McINTOSH: You are satisfied that it was 1913?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was either 1912 or 1913.

Mr. McINTOSH: I wanted to know, because in discussing a measure of this kind it is important that the man leading the government should know all the details. They constitute a good foundation of any resolution.

Now there are just two or three thoughts I have to express, and I do not intend to delay the committee very long. We were told this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman leading the government that the work of this economic council of fifteen members will be first to correlate the work of the various departments of government and second to get more physical and mental energy on the move. Having told us that the council to be set up was to be made up largely of civil servants, he pointed out that the name economic council was to be given to the newly-established body. If we are to have as a foundation of this economic council some of the experts of the different departments I should think the name civil service council would be more applicable than the name economic council. Apparently the civil servants are to be robbed of any credit in respect of name to be derived from the measure, and a new name is to be given. However, that is not very much to bother about. We will wait until we see the different clauses of the bill, when it is brought down to find out why this aspect of the matter was overlooked.

May I say it is not necessary to have an economic council to get the work of the different departments better correlated. It is not necessary to have an economic council to get more work both physically and mentally out of the different departments of the government. I should think that that correlation and that accomplishment of more work could be got just as well by the cabinet of the day led by the Prime Minister. The machinery is there; why not organize it? Why have the country pay for more machinery? Why not organize what you have and get one hundred per cent efficiency out of it? If that were done it would be absolutely unnecessary to have this measure.

I agree with the hon. member for Melville when he states that the very idea of adding to the bureaucracy of this country and adding greater financial burdens to the different provinces and the country as a whole will be all the argument necessary in western Canada to show and prove that the present government has lost the confidence of the people largely because it cannot meet effectually and efficiently the problems which confront the country with the machinery at their disposal. That is the situation.

One more thought: The suggestion was made this afternoon that the Prime Minister has become incapacitated and has got into his present condition of ill health because of too much work. I am one who wishes that the Prime Minister may be in a condition as soon as possible to return to his parliamentary duties. We need a real leader at the head of the government, a man with plenty of energy and ability. The Prime Minister is possessed of these two qualities, therefore I say that the sooner he is back the better for parliament and for Canada. May I say that if the Prime Minister has broken down—if any prime minister would break down under the load of government he would be called upon to bear at present—the fundamental fact is that when any one man tries to run the country as prime minister entirely apart from his cabinet, the probability is he will break down. Greater cooperative use should be made of all the elements and members of the cabinet. Every man should be asked to do his duty departmentally. If that were done the load of the Prime Minister would not be as heavy and, in the present instance, the breakdown might not have occurred. Further, not only should there be more cooperation among members of the cabinet, not only should there be more solidarity, more correlated effort and more individual activity which would have the effect of releasing the Prime Minister from many of his duties and responsibilities, but there should be more organized effort in his department, and perhaps in every department of the crown. If that were done I believe the Prime Minister could give more attention to the serious part of government and thereby give a more efficient lead to the party in power, irrespective of which party it might be.

One more thought, and then I am through. When the matter was under discussion this afternoon the right hon. gentleman placing the measure before the house and explaining it touched upon the trend to the cities from the country. He said the bright lights were one cause, the cinemas another, the street cars another, and so on. These are only the external causes.

Mr. POULIOT: Stop the street cars.

Mr. McINTOSH: The right hon. gentleman did not go into a detailed analysis of the real problem; he left out the basic part of the picture. Because of that one hon. member to my left said, "Why not admit high tariffs as a cause?" High tariffs has been one of the causes which have led to the drift from the country to the city. They surely are. Any person who reads the history of the last fifty or sixty years will see that the trend is from the country to the city, and if he analyzes that economic trek he will find out sooner or later that the cause is really in the high tariffs which have been placed upon the primary industries in Canada, and have had the effect of bankrupting those industries to such an extent that the people on the farm do not choose to remain there, simply because they cannot get a decent living. Many of them are on relief to-day. As I said, when the matter was before the house one hon. member to my left asked, "Why not accept high tariffs as one of the causes of this population drift?" That is one view of the question. Following that remark I suggested, "Why not change the government?" The hon. member for South Perth a while ago asked a similar question. When I made the suggestion the hon. member for Red Deer took a holier-than-thou attitude with regard to it and soared into the clouds, delivering a kind of lecture to any person who would have the temerity to talk about tariffs and a change in government. He made out that he had something deeper, wider, longer, and more important in every way to tell the house.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was referring not to tariffs but to the Liberal party.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member states he was referring to the Liberal party. Well, as I was going to say a little later the contact between hon. members opposite—in a word, the Conservative party—and the hon. member for Red Deer was clearly demonstrated to-day. He withdrew his former resolution, and now we find the government taking action upon it. The two are uniting in the establishment of this economic council. May I say, or may I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Red Deer is out after a position in the present government? Is he trying to get one of those velvety chairs in the cabinet or brain trust of this government?

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty mean.

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not know whether he would be accepted or not. We do know the resolution he moved was withdrawn, and now the government has accepted the principle of it. I should think that establishes a point of contact between the two parties, and no one knows what may come forth in the future. History might repeat itself. I would say to the hon. member for Red Deer that if he wishes to lecture anybody he had better lecture himself and the members of his own party—

The CHAIRMAN: Please address the chair.

Mr. McINTOSH: —since he and others of his group stood up in this house and voted for high tariffs. He has voted for high tariffs in his own province, and to-day he gets up in this house and discusses a resolution of this kind without even mentioning the important element, namely, high tariffs. I do not think that will be very popular in western Canada. I know it will not be popular in Saskatchewan at all events.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. member for Red Deer is no more correct in his diagnosis of this resolution than he was on the poultry and egg pools, then he is very far astray indeed. I understand that he takes the attitude that he knows more about the marketing act than the Minister of Agriculture himself, and more about the egg pool and more about the poultry pool, and I am wondering whether the Minister of Agriculture is taking it for granted that it was because of the hon. gentleman's identification with the marketing board policy that the thing was put out of business in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba and in Alberta—given a knock-out blow, as it were.

These, Mr. Chairman, are a few rambling remarks that I wanted to make on this resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: They are rambling to a certain extent because the impetus that was given to them came, as it were, from a rambling member of this house. In conclusion I would just say that in my humble opinion the trend to the city from the country is almost entirely due to high tariffs, and until those restrictive tariffs are modified, Canada's national and international trade will remain at a low ebb and the drift to the city will continue.

Mr. LOUCKS: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he rejoices in the fact that the marketing act was, as he says, defeated in western Canada?

Mr. McINTOSH: It is not necessary to answer that, Mr. Chairman, because apparently the vote in Manitoba and in Saskatchewan and in Alberta shows that the people there are rejoicing over the result. So what more do you want?

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that the members of the cabinet have so much work to do that they feel feeble and exhausted and need some outside assistance. If they are feeble and exhausted on account of their labouring pains may I suggest to them that they take beef, iron and wine. It is an excellent tonic and will make them strong and well. But besides that, instead of a brain trust, they should use brain food.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, if all the hon. members who wish to speak on this resolution have done so, I should like to say a few words in reply to what has been said by the hon. member for Melville and also by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

The hon. member for Melville, I was glad to note, thinks that this is really a reform measure and one that is brought down for the purpose of bettering the condition of the people. I hope when he goes out into the country and speaks to the people, he will inform them accordingly. I was also rather surprised to hear him say that you could not get a council together of fifteen men without having some freaks. I would like him to rise and tell me who was the freak in the last Liberal government, if it is true that you cannot get fifteen men without having one freak.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is too modest to name himself.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The right hon. leader of the opposition referred to Sir Maurice Hankey and the work that he has done in England. I knew Sir Maurice Hankey very well when I was over there during the war as high commissioner, and a very splendid executive he is. He is a civil servant in one sense of the word I suppose, but he acts as secretary to the cabinet. Contrary to our method here they keep minutes of the cabinet meetings in England. We do not do that here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You could not.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not catch that. I want to inform the right hon. leader of the opposition and the committee that although Sir Maurice Hankey fills a very important position over there, at the same time they have an economic council as well. With the right hon. gentleman's argument, that the Prime Minister should be provided with one or two specially selected men to help him in his arduous duties, I am in entire agreement, but I am not prepared to say that these secretaries could absorb the duties to be performed by this economic council.

The right hon. leader of the opposition also stated that in his opinion the scientific and industrial research council might take up this work. I do not agree with that at all. I consider that the work to be done by this economic council is entirely different from that which is being done by the scientific research council. I am not criticizing in any way the work that is being done by the research council at the present time, which I am told is very useful and helpful, but it is an entirely different type of work and requires a different type of mind. The scientific research council is concerned with investigations and experimentations. That is their job. The duty of this economic council on the other hand will be to apply the information that has been gathered by that other council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The council is to consider everything that is being done in the way of improvement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But in the last analysis it can be applied only by parliament.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I know that the council is only advisory, but it could review all the information in connection with mechanical and scientific progress that has been obtained in the last fifty years and consider how it could be used to better the conditions of the people. So it seems to me that they are two entirely separate and different kinds of duties, and I hope that the right hon. gentleman upon further consideration will feel that way himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, may I say one word before this resolution carries? Broadly speaking I do not share some of the general criticisms of this resolution which have been voiced by some of my colleagues on this side of the house. I have always believed in a general way, and have so stated many times on the platform, in the principle of an economic council, but while I say that I want to make some reservations. I do believe that if there is any value whatsoever in an economic council, that value should have been seized upon by this government in 1930 immediately after they came into office. But as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Témiscouata we have had this administration composed of some seventeen ministers proceeding on their way for four and a half years without taking any advice whatsoever from any outside party, and now, just on the eve of an election, they seek to buttress up a very weak position by the creation of this economic council. It is well within the knowledge of every single member of this house that the trend of the world in the last five years has been towards the creation of boards and commissions and tribunals and economic councils.

An hon. MEMBER: Bureaucracy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is the new despotism, the new bureaucracy. If I may venture into the unsafe realms of prophecy, I would say that just as the tendency of Canada and other nations in recent years has been to detract from and impinge upon the fundamental authority of free democratic parliamentary institutions and create all the boards and commissions we have seen—the tariff board, the marketing board, the radio commission, and all kinds of tribunals and boards of trustees—so in the future those who will succeed us in this and in other parliaments will I believe have to fight to reassert once more the fundamental authority and responsibility of parliament, and abolish all these evils of bureaucracy.

I am supporting this resolution. I believe if there is any advice that any government can obtain from any outside body of economists in these days, that advice should be freely asked and freely given and freely taken advantage of.

I understand from the remarks of the acting leader of the government that this economic council is to consist of fifteen members with the Prime Minister as chairman. It will probably represent all the varied commercial and business activities of the nation. I wonder what authority this body will have. Unfortunately for the sponsors of the measure they will not be here to dictate to the new body which is to be created under this legislation. But suppose my hon. friends opposite were in power when this body commenced to function—

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): They will be; don't worry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That lies beyond the kindly veil of the future. Would this economic council have authority to deal with the most important questions confronting Canadians? There are two things to-day which are completely unscientific. In the first place, our tariff structure is altogether unscientific. Would this council have any authority, seeing that hon. gentlemen opposite have themselves created the tariff board, to investigate the tariff structure of Canada and make recommendations to the cabinet?

Mr. McINTOSH: Apparently not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The second most unscientific structure in Canada, a structure which has been built up sectionally over the years, is the freight rate structure. Would this council have authority to make specific recommendations to the government with respect to changes in the Canadian freight rate structure? The third point is this. We have a marketing board, or rather nine or ten marketing boards. Would the council have authority to interfere with the jurisdiction of the marketing board in the marketing of natural products? Again, by far the greatest problem in the dominion to-day is the immediate solution of our difficulties in connection with the debt. What about the debt structure and the coordination of financial responsibilities and of dominion authority with the various provincial authorities? Would your economic council have power to-morrow to investigate the assets, revenues and expenditures not only of the federal structure but of all the various provincial structures in Canada and to make specific recommendations to the government?

The argument used by some hon. gentlemen in regard to relieving the administration of responsibilities does not seem to me to carry weight. I am strongly in favour of the creation in Canada, no matter what government is in power, of a system of under secretaries to the ministers of the day, who shall be trained to study all questions of the hour and who will directly—not inferentially or indirectly—relieve the tremendous responsibilities that devolve on those who are charged with public office. I believe that sooner or later you must devise a system along these lines. So that so far as relieving the responsibilities of the Prime Minister or of any minister of the crown is concerned, I do not believe that the argument for an economic council is a weighty one. If my right hon. friend will assure me that he will summon without emolument, as the measure seems to indicate—only expenses will be required—the most brilliant men to study the great questions of income and outgo with respect to the expenditures of the government, to study the great questions with regard to our railways and our freight rate structure, to study questions with regard to the tariff, and then to make recommendations in an advisory capacity to the cabinet, leaving the final authority and direction to parliament, then I think I can see some merit in the suggestion made in the resolution. But I agree with my hon. friends who have spoken, that this is only one more step in the mad race towards despotism and bureaucracy which the government has been running since 1930; and some day those who succeed us will be very glad to come back and restore to parliament complete control over the destinies of the Canadian people.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Resolution reported.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that the resolution be read the second time.

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in. Sir George Perley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39, to establish an economic council.

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

OFFICE OF PRIME MINISTER

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Civil government—
Salaries, $24,904.

Mr. POULIOT: Does this cover external affairs?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): No, that is another item.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I suggest, in accordance with the views expressed by my right hon. leader, that there should be a larger amount for the office of Prime Minister to include the salary of two supermen who will form an economic council. If these two supermen were appointed we might vote $10,000 for the two; I have no objection. I suggest to the acting Prime Minister that it would be a pleasant little surprise for the Prime Minister to have the item increased. The vote as it stands is $24,904, which is an increase of $100 over last year's estimate. Why does he not make it $34,904? That would include $5,000 for each of these two supermen. If he has them in view it would be a very pleasant surprise and I am sure it would be highly appreciated, and may I suggest that he bring back the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson from London and Mr. Herridge from Washington and appoint them as an economic council. It would not be necessary to insert a large amount in the estimates; it would be only for their travelling expenses, because they would serve without remuneration. May I suggest that to the acting Prime Minister. I am sure they would accept the job, because they feel they are very lonely where they are. They hear bad news about the Tory party in Canada and they would like to be here in order to be able to control what is going on in this country. Washington is far away; Mr. Herridge did not come to Ottawa last week, and Mr. Ferguson is so far away in London it would be nice for the acting Prime Minister to decide this matter by himself in a generous way. This would meet with the approval of the country because their return would mean the defeat at once of the government.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—
Privy Council, salaries and contingencies, $44,894.

Mr. POULIOT: The Prime Minister is president of the privy council and all the ministers form the privy council. May I suggest now for their benefit, pleasure, enjoyment, for decreasing their responsibilities and increasing their energies, as my suggestion has not been accepted for the benefit of the Prime Minister alone, that the economic council come under this item? The amount for salaries is $39,894, a decrease of $5,520. Why not have that economic council under this item? I offer that suggestion to the government. When the vote on the resolution was put by Mr. Speaker, I was opposed to it; I said: "on division." But now I suggest that the government make the appointment regularly in the estimates and that is what I suggested in my previous remarks. May I suggest that they do that instead of increasing the number of statutes? We are fed up with legislation; we have too much of it here. It is said that ignorance of the law is no excuse, but it will have to be an excuse because it has happened in the house that the responsible minister did not know what the law he was piloting through meant. Surely this is a good excuse for anyone outside the house not to know about the law. May I suggest to the acting leader of the government to bring Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Herridge back to Ottawa to form, without any remuneration, an economic council to assist the privy council?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it my suggestion which is carried, Mr. Chairman?

Item agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Civil government—
Salaries and contingencies, $148,856.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I simply wish to suggest that we do not go into External Affairs to-night except to get an item passed in order that we may bring on this department some other day when we shall be able to discuss everything connected with it. This item is just for civil government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why not go on with the department?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Because we promised that Agriculture would be taken up to-night.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Put them all through.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is the civil government item, but I did not propose to go on with External Affairs to-night.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret to be unable to comply with the suggestion or request of the acting Prime Minister. Let us look at the orders of the day. The first question is about the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, High Commissioner for Canada in London. It reads thus:

1. What is the total amount paid to the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, high commissioner in London, from the date of his appointment until now?
2. During that period, did he spend anything for entertainments?
3. If so, what is the total of that expenditure?
4. What was the total cost of the high commissioner's office in London from August 1, 1930, until now?

This question is dated March 1 and to-day is March 18. Therefore there is no reason why we should not have that information right now about Mr. Ferguson and his expenses for entertainments. I have gone through "Canada," the weekly paper in London, and I see that he gives dinners to seven hundred, eight hundred, fifteen hundred guests in that city. It is like sardanapalus. It is always a feast there; it costs the country a great deal of money, and I would like to know how much it costs before voting a cent for him. That is the first point.

The second is that I asked two other questions, one about Mr. Roy, the minister at Paris, and the other about Mr. Marler, the minister in Japan. Both those questions were answered to-day. Contrary to custom I did not get a copy of the answers. Although the answers were sent to Hansard, I was busy; I could not copy them by hand, but I thought it was a discourteous act on the part of the acting Prime Minister not to give me an additional copy and not to give one to the press. There was only one copy which was sent to Hansard. It seems impossible to get the information. I waited until to-day and I was sure I would get it to-day, because I know the unfailing courtesy of the acting Prime Minister.

Now we come to Bill Herridge. What is the question about him?

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. POULIOT: The Canadian minister at Washington. This is the question:

1. What was the total amount paid to the Hon. W. D. Herridge, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Canadian Minister plenipotentiary at Washington, from June 1, 1931, until now?
2. During that period, did he spend anything for entertainments?

3. If so, what is the total of that expenditure?
4. What was the total cost of the Canadian legation in Washington from June 1, 1931, until now?
5. Since his appointment as minister plenipotentiary, did the said Hon. W. D. Herridge leave the Canadian legation at Washington?
6. If so, how many times and how long each time?
7. During the same period, did the said Hon. W. D. Herridge spend some time in Ottawa?
8. If so, how many times and how long each time?

Those are very plain questions and I would like to have an answer; it would be only fair to have one. We have those ministers wandering to and fro and we cannot get any information about them. The little magazine "Canada" is filled with descriptions of G. Howard Ferguson's entertainments. There is the Maple Leaf tour; there are invitations to duchesses, counts, countesses, earls, lords and ladies; there are feasts and celebrations, and all this costs a great deal to the country.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If I might be allowed to interject a few words, the questions regarding Washington and London had reference to two different departments; Public Works as well as External Affairs were involved. Therefore the answers to those questions are prepared through the Secretary of State. As far as I know, they will be ready I think probably to-morrow, but this estimate has nothing to do with either Mr. Ferguson or Mr. Herridge. It is the civil service here in Ottawa. We shall give the hon. gentleman every opportunity to discuss both Washington and London as long as he likes when the time comes. Of course if he wishes to do it now we cannot avoid it.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman; he is very courteous and I appreciate it. But the first question about Mr. Ferguson was on March 1, and the other about Mr. Herridge on March 5. I shall not insist but one thing I regret is that when the estimates come the ministers are not ready. For instance last week the Postmaster General brought his estimates on and had nothing ready. In response to questions, he said: "I shall send you the information afterwards." I accepted that answer from him because the Postmaster General has not had the experience of the acting Prime Minister. They are two different men. The acting Prime Minister has served in very high capacities, as high commissioner in London, and as acting Prime Minister since this government has been in power. But it was most unfair to members of this house that the Postmaster General should tell us that we would get the information we wanted after his estimates were passed. It reminds me of the story of the commercial traveller who said: "I don't feel well; my stomach—oh, something there." He was asked: "What is the matter?" He replied: "I was on the train; as I was hungry, I bought a banana, and after I had eaten it I found it was rotten." So with the estimates of the Postmaster General; he wants us to swallow them first, and afterwards we find they do not taste very nice. I hope that the acting Prime Minister will not follow that example.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Publications, $32,197.60.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the reason of the increase?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The increases are included in items as follows:

Advertising and publicity, clipping service, $600.
Newspaper and radio advertising, $1,000.
Mats for press service, $900.
Photography and lantern slides, $800.
Supplies and materials, metal stencils, ribbons, $825.
Mimeograph stencils, $100.
Mimeograph paper, $1,000.
Printing, $600.
Stationery, $150.
Envelopes, $850.
Transportation, postage and express, $300.
Travelling, $3,000.

Item agreed to.

International institute of agriculture, $12,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the minister not prepared to take up item 48 to-night?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Item 49 is the next.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the explanation of the reduction?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The increase last year was due to exchange, and there had been some arrears in exchange: $12,000 is the normal amount.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What was the last year that the department sent a representative to Rome?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been a representative there every year. Usually the British representative is instructed to act as our representative, but last year there was a representative from the Department of External Affairs, Mr. Macdonald.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does this cover the representative to go to Rome to the wheat conference to set our quota for wheat?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, this has nothing to do with that.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I note that this item was $8,500 until last year, when it was raised to $15,700. This year it stands at $12,000. What is the cause of the change?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been no change in the amount. The change is in the sum paid here from year to year, due to exchange.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely the minister does not intimate that exchange would make the difference between $8,500 and $12,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the records here except for the last two years, but my information is that there has been no change here for the past two or three years other than that due to fluctuations in exchange.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I have the estimates for last year, showing this item as $8,500 for 1933-34 and $15,700 for 1934-35, and now for 1935-36 it is $12,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that there has been no difference as far as the sum itself goes, and that the difference is due to fluctuation in exchange. The amount we pay is not based on our currency.

Mr. DONNELLY: When exchange was against us and our money was low in value, in 1931-32 we granted $13,500. Next year it was down to $10,000. Will the minister tell us exactly what this money is used for?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This money is for assembling the information sent in by the different countries that are members of this institute. Rather than each country itself gathering information from other countries of the world there has been set up an international institute to collect it and pass it on to the countries that contribute to the cost of the institute.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is the institute at Rome?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where is the headquarters?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Rome.

Item agreed to.

Contributions to empire bureaux, $21,535.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What are these empire bureaux?

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The empire bureaux do work for the British empire very similar to the work done by the international institute for the world. The work of the empire bureaux is to collect information from the different dominions within the empire, results of research work or statistical information. This is sent out to the various dominions, and to make it possible to carry on this work of collecting and disseminating this information each dominion makes a certain contribution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are these purely agricultural statistics and information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Purely agricultural.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): How many of these bureaux are there?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Ten.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Where are they located?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In different parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Could the minister give us any information as to the type of material or information that has been gathered by these bureaux during the past year, for instance? Is it scientific or statistical?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Both. One instance is the research work on animal nutrition at the Rowett Research Institute, Aberdeen, Scotland. They carried on research work, including an investigation of the value of feeds for live stock, and the information obtained was passed on to the bureau, whence it was disseminated to the different dominions. This prevents the duplication of work, and the same procedure is followed in connection with experiments on plant mycology and other work. Then if research work is done in Canada it is passed on to the empire bureaux and disseminated to the other dominions.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister tell us where these bureaux are located in addition to Aberdeen?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The list is as follows:

The Imperial Institute of Entomology, London, England.

The Imperial Mycological Institute, Kew, England.

The Imperial Bureau of Soil Science, Rothamsted Experimental Station, Harpenden, Herts, England.

The Imperial Bureau of Animal Health, Veterinary Research Laboratory, New Haw, Weybridge, England.

The Imperial Bureau of Animal Nutrition, Rowett Research Institute, Aberdeen, Scotland.
The Imperial Bureau of Plant Genetics (Herbage Plants), Aberystwyth, Wales.
The Imperial Bureau of Plant Genetics (Crops other than Herbage), Plant Breeding Institute, Cambridge, England.
The Imperial Bureau of Fruit Production, East Malling Research Station, East Malling, Kent, England.
The Imperial Bureau of Animal Genetics, University of Edinburgh, Scotland.
The Imperial Bureau of Agricultural Parasitology, St. Albans, Hants.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I should like to ask a question concerning this matter, from the Canadian point of view. I understood the minister to say that if we obtained information of a similar character we supplied it to the other dominions. I have in mind that we have various scientific institutions throughout the country, both dominion and provincial, and I am wondering how that information is correlated and who becomes responsible for forwarding this information to these bureaux for world wide distribution. Has the minister in mind any instance in which Canada has contributed information recently?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort). There are representatives of the bureaux in the Dominion of Canada; the reports of any research work considered worthy are presented to them, and it is their duty to pass them on to the empire bureaux. The same situation applies in the other dominions. This prevents duplication of research work.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Who names those representatives in this country?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Here in Ottawa?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have had some little experience with the activities of the bureaux in London in connection with mining and scientific research in that direction, and I am bound to doubt the usefulness of this procedure. We spent a good deal of money to obtain information from outside the empire, and very frequently I came to the conclusion that a good deal of this information was of very little value to us, for climatic and other reasons. In other words, to put it plainly, what has been found effective as a curative or remedy in the old country is not always effective in Canada, and I am bound to say that I question whether or not this expenditure is worth while. I am not particularly well informed with regard to the Department of Agriculture, but I believe it is mighty well equipped to carry on its own investigations. I know this money has been spent in other years; there is nothing new about it, but I doubt the advisability of continuing to send sums of money outside of Canada for these purposes, not only in connection with agriculture but also in connection with other lines of research. We were able to make an arrangement with the United States and Great Britain under which each country undertook the responsibility for research in certain lines, following which the information obtained was exchanged, but that had to do with fuel research and kindred matters. Just consider one matter mentioned by the minister, research carried on in Scotland in connection with the scientific feeding of animals. I am bound to think that will not be very valuable to the Canadian agricultural industry, and I suggest to the minister that he look into the matter carefully and see whether or not real value is obtained for the money expended.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Following the remarks of the hon. member for West Edmonton may I ask the minister if we have any similar interchange between the United States and Canada, for instance, where conditions are more comparable in many respects?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no such organization set up in either country, but we are in constant communication with the United States in this regard. For example, Canadian scientists are often asked to attend conferences in the United States at which they review the results of research work conducted during the year, and similar conferences are sometimes held in this country. We are more in direct contact with the United States and for that reason it is not considered necessary to have such a bureau set up.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Is there a pretty close working relationship between the international institute and these bureaux? There would appear to be some possibility of duplication, and from the standpoint of gathering and sending out information I was wondering if the institutions under these two items work closely together or if there is any relationship at all between them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So far as possible their work is very well harmonized. Of course the first institute has to do entirely with agricultural statistics, while the last item has to do purely with empire work.

Item agreed to.

Entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests, $380,128.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What steps are being taken by the Department of Agriculture to take care of the grasshopper menace still facing western Canada? Press reports indicate that the district east of the Red River is most infested with eggs. Is the department in touch with the situation, and so far as possible will conditions be remedied?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The entomological branch submits the information, in connection with the grasshopper menace, that the area seriously affected is about one-half the size of the area affected last year in the three prairie provinces. However, in that area the results of the surveys show that as intensive a campaign will have to be carried on over the smaller area as was carried on last year over the large area. It is interesting to note that the poisoned bait used last year to fight the grasshoppers turned out to be ninety per cent effective, so far as records show. It is interesting to note, further, that the officials of the entomological branch of the federal Department of Agriculture are responsible for demonstrating that sawdust used with an equal quantity of bran is as effective as one hundred per cent bran, and reduces the cost by about fifty per cent. This method is now being used in other countries. This was an important contribution, particularly in view of the large area affected and the extent of the fight which had to be carried on.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will there be cooperation between the provinces and the federal government?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Do I understand from the minister that the possible area of infestation is reduced two-thirds this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In Manitoba the area is the same as it was last year. In Saskatchewan it is about one-third as much, and in Alberta it is one-half. Manitoba remains the same this year as last year.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Who is carrying on the work formerly done at Treesbank by Mr. Norman Criddle? Is that station still carrying on operations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Doctor R. D. Bird is now in charge.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister tell the committee the effect climatic conditions would have upon the curtailment of the spread of grasshoppers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The drought condition of last year was ideal for the spread of the grasshopper menace. For that reason it is all the more gratifying to think that we had a great measure of success in combating the difficulty.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why is it that in many districts where no poison is used there were less grasshoppers than in districts where poison was used?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They were starved to death.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): As the grasshopper menace is becoming such an important problem in western Canada surely the minister would have some information indicating what we might expect by way of overcoming the difficulty, or effecting some great measure of control. Has the department any encouragement to give? For the last four years I have been in a grasshopper infested area, and I should like to know if we may expect relief.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The periods of infestation run in cycles of about eleven to fifteen years, but our information is that where the campaign is carried on strictly according to instructions the kill brought about by the poisoned bait is about ninety per cent effective. We have the best information in the world upon the subject.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has any investigational work been conducted to ascertain whether or not there is a destructive parasite calculated to remove the grasshopper menace, or has any work been done along that line? Last year I remember seeing an excellent piece of work done I believe by this branch, when it sent out a type of fly calculated to destroy the wheat stem saw fly. I saw the parasites being released, and I was wondering if other destructive parasites could not be found which would destroy grasshoppers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grasshopper is a native insect and the parasite used to fight the grasshopper is also a native. These parasites are present but as yet have not played a very effective part in the fight. Certain destructive diseases of grasshoppers are also present. Quite a number of dead grasshoppers could be seen last year killed either by parasites or by diseases. On account of the conspicuous nature of the parasite one would be led to believe that they may have been chiefly responsible for killing the grasshopper, but investigations showed that compared with the deaths brought about by the poisoned bait the number caused by parasites was very small.

Mr. BROWN: Has the department any information regarding a plague—I do not know whether it is in the nature of a poison or a fungus—affecting elm trees in New England, and has it considered the possibility of its extending to Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is the Dutch elm disease, which is not yet present in Canada. Every precaution is taken to watch all avenues by which it might come to this country from the United States. All the elm tress brought into this country as nursery stock are carefully inspected, so as to make certain the disease will not find its way into Canada. Our officials are fully conversant with the steps being taken in the United States to combat the disease, and our information is that up to the moment we are free of it.

Mr. GERSHAW: No doubt most hon. members have seen fields totally destroyed by grasshoppers. We do know, however, that fields have been destroyed by other insects, such as cut worms. Is the department doing anything to control pests of that kind?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Cultural methods of control are used. I believe in the present year about 15,000,000 acres are in danger, but the best method known to combat the difficulty is that of using cultural methods, namely finishing the summer fallow work at a certain period and not disturbing the land after that time. The hon. member for Willow Bunch asked a question I have not yet answered. Would he give me details of the area he has in mind?

Mr. DONNELLY: In the year 1920-21 I had a farm in the Weyburn district, and for two years we combated the grasshopper, put out poison each year, and the grasshoppers devoured the whole crop. The next year we did nothing because we had plenty of rain. What I rose chiefly to ask the minister was in regard to the vote last year of $350,000. How much of that was spent on the grasshopper campaign? How much went for salaries of individuals in connection with the grasshopper campaign, how much went for materials, and how much went to the different provinces? I would like some details of how this money was spent in connection with grasshoppers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Has the hon. member reference to our vote or the money of the provinces?

Mr. DONNELLY: To the vote of $350,000 last year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): About $30,000 of our vote was spent in the grasshopper campaign, $25,000 of which was from the entomological branch, $2,000 from the seed branch and $3,000 from the experimental farms branch.

Mr. DONNELLY: Was that $25,000 for salaries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For salaries for officials and travelling expenses and wages for labour used in the work.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Does part of the money under this vote go to the seed branch and part to the experimental farms branch?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): There is no part of this vote used for supplies for combating the grasshopper?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): And no contribution is made to any province from this vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): This department simply makes a survey and then makes a report?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And gives technical leadership to the campaign.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): In the survey made with regard to grasshopper eggs, where was the most danger found in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In Alberta it runs from Nobleford to Mazeppa, and from Countess north to south of Huxley. In Saskatchewan there is a bad area, a small area, east of Bracken; also east and west of Saskatoon; north from Herschel to Senlac. There is a comparatively small area north of Yellow Grass, an area around Moose Jaw, and an area north of Redvers. Those are the chief areas in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What about Manitoba?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In Manitoba it is almost entirely in the south. There are two bad areas almost directly south of Winnipeg, east and west of the Red river. It is rather difficult to read the areas from this map but I shall be glad to send it over to hon. members who have asked about the areas.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are these charts available in the department to individual members?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is there any danger from grasshoppers in the wooded country in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are approaching that territory, but there is no danger there as yet. Last year they worked just up to the edge of the area in the centre of Saskatchewan at Rosthern.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, etc., also grant of $17,010 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $393,200.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: According to a press dispatch the minister has stated that the class A fairs will have their grants restored to their former proportions. Was that report correct?

Mr. DONNELLY: How much of this vote goes to seed fairs and how much for seed control?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The amount of $39,000 is for seed fairs and field crop competitions.

Item agreed to.

Fruit, including grant of $4,500 to Canadian horticultural council, $464,280.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the minister if this council is still acting as a political organization, or is it now functioning independently?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As far as my information goes, this body has never acted as a political organization. Some of my own supporters think it acts as a political organization against us, and I have no doubt my hon. friend's colleagues feel the same way so far as they are concerned, but so far we have found this body very helpful in giving advice, and not in any way a political body.

Mr. VALLANCE: Looking back over past years since 1931 I find there is an increase in the vote for the Canadian horticultural council.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. VALLANCE: I understand that the vote has been increased but it is not set out specifically in connection with this item for 1931-32 or for 1932-33.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At one time the grant was $8,000. Then it dropped to $5,000, which with the ten per cent cut made it $4,500. I believe in one year it was in the supplementary estimates that it was passed.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have the 1933 estimates for the fiscal year ended March 31. Probably that is the year the minister refers to when he says it was in the supplementaries, because it does not appear in the general estimates.

Mr. HOWDEN: How is this money expended, apart from the vote for the horticultural council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The money is used largely for inspectional services. A good deal of it comes back to the government, however. The general divisions are: Inspection, estimated vote for the next year, $402,489; markets, transportation and warehousing, $17,991; administration, $43,800. That makes $464,280. The estimated increase in inspection is $30,727; markets, transportation and warehousing, $5,500; administration, $3,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: I understand the minister to say that a large part of this money is returned to the government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, as high as $100,000 in some years.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the national dairy council get a grant out of this vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Neither out of this nor any other vote.

Mr. DONNELLY: A good deal of this money is paid for inspection work. How much did it cost for inspection of apples last year and what did the government receive back in the way of fees? In other words, is the inspection service self-sustaining?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not self-sustaining but it does pay a reasonable part of the cost. It would be almost impossible to obtain precisely the information the hon. member has asked for because a good deal of the work is part time; some of it would be devoted to the inspection of cars of apples, and part of the time on the same day would be devoted to other inspection. However, it pays a considerable part of the service; well over half, I should say.

Item agreed to.

Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions, $1,628,302.

Mr. TOTZKE: How are the grants allotted to the various fairs? In previous sessions I have referred to the grants given to class B fairs. In the past this has been more or less a close corporation. Unless a fair had been getting a grant there was no opportunity of its coming within the classification. Is that still so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Special consideration has been given, apart from that, to large areas that had not been served with fairs and which could not apply on the basis of entry that applied to places that had held fairs over a period of years. It is not a close corporation; if it can be shown that the work warranting this assistance can be done it is given sympathetic consideration, and probably a grant may be given.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is a certain standard set which must be reached before a fair can get the grant? Is that a fixed standard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, it is not fixed in any arbitrary way. We did feel that it was essential to set some standard, and any fair that comes up to that standard is eligible for the grant. But in regard to fairs that do not come up to that standard, consideration is given each specific fair and the grant made on that basis.

Mr. TOTZKE: But there is a standard to be reached.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is an increase of $110,000. Is this due to importations of live stock brought in by the department in the past year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is for 1935-36.

Mr. VALLANCE: This minister gave the house some information two weeks ago with regard to the plebiscite in connection with the poultry pool. From what source was that money taken?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is from the vote under the marketing act, a separate vote.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has the minister's attention been called to the prices of both hogs and cattle in the United States as compared with Canada? A year ago we were reminded of this frequently at a time when the price was lower in the United States. Now it is considerably higher. Our cattle are going to Chicago now instead of to the old country. I do not think that any live hogs have gone to the United States but bacon will be shipped if prices keep up. I have no recollection of the United States having an Ottawa agreement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are very considerable shipments of cattle now from this country to the United States owing to the fact that their cattle prices are so much higher than ours, high enough to take care of the very high duty they have placed against our live stock. The increase in the price of their live stock chiefly their fat live stock, is due to a number of causes, and perhaps the first is that there is a great area which has been affected by drought in the United States, extending from the Canadian boundary. In October I drove from Regina straight south, and along an area of over 800 miles in the United States, due north to due south, there was no green vegetation of any kind that could be seen, and that extended in some places from 400 to 500 miles on either side of the line. The effect of the drought was so bad that the American government took very drastic steps. After investigation they felt that it would not pay them to ship fodder and other feed for live stock over the great distances that would have to be traversed, and they took steps to slaughter some of the cattle on the ranges and purchase large numbers, having them canned for use as far as possible among people on relief. As far as my memory serves me, the percentages are these. In Montana, the Dakotas and some of the other northern states the number slaughtered was as high as 51 per cent; that is, one animal out of every two slaughtered. Some were left where they were slaughtered and were disposed of there. The others, as I stated before, were converted into canned meat and so on, and a good deal of this is still in storage in the United States. Other states slaughtered as much as 47 per cent; in Oklahoma, further south, the quantity slaughtered was 41 per cent. This will give the committee a good idea of the very large number of cattle slaughtered, the proportion being over one-half in some of the states.

I am speaking now from memory, but the total sum of money expended by the United States federal government in purchasing those cattle was, so far as I remember, more than $108,000,000. More than 8,000,000 head altogether were slaughtered, and of that number, in the neighbourhood of 1,450,000 odd were slaughtered on the ranges. There were two factors connected with the matter: one was that as a result of the drought there was a shortage of feed which raised the price of feed for cattle in the United States. On the other hand at that time cattle were very cheap there, and the farmers feeling that they would continue to be cheap and also being affected by the high price of feed, did not feed anything like the number of cattle they did in previous years. That is why prices have gone up in the United States as they have, and it is believed by the best authorities in that country that prices will stay up until well finished grass cattle come on the market. Even after that, there should be a considerable increase in prices due to the necessity of restocking those dry areas, particularly if this year is not as dry as last.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend knows drought conditions on the Canadian side were almost identical with those in the United States, only not as large an area was covered. The effect upon our market would be the same with all this poor stuff thrown on it last fall as it would be upon the United States market. The converse would be the same; the effect upon the United States market would be the same as that upon the Canadian market so far as a great deal of this poor unfinished stuff is concerned. Therefore I do not think my hon. friend's explanation is worth very much. Conditions were the same on both sides of the line, but the disparity in prices in favour of Chicago was very considerable in regard to both cattle and hogs. Perhaps some other factors that do not occur to me enter into the question, but for the moment the factors that the minister has mentioned would not in themselves be sufficient to explain the disparity.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was another factor working in Canada. The area affected by drought was nothing like as large as that in the United States; only a few thousand head of cattle in Canada were destroyed to be used otherwise than for human consumption. But during the past four or five years, that is since 1929-30, the United States government put up the tariff against Canadian cattle, and because that outlet was denied to our cattle, our surplus increased very greatly. This last year I believe we slaughtered between 350,000 and 400,000 head more than we did in previous years, the farmers holding their cattle hoping that some action might be taken to allow them to enter the United States and avail themselves of that market if it might rise, and the old country market, which was practically the only one available and had reached very low prices, might also rise. But because cattle were low in price and feed was high, there were few cattle put on feed in Canada in comparison with previous years.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Have exports of cattle across the sea ceased entirely?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have practically stopped of beef cattle.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then my hon. friend must have had a pretty good object lesson of the advantage of the United States market for Canadian cattle as compared with the overseas market which is at times a very unreliable and fluctuating one.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think very many people have had any doubt that the United States market has always been the natural market for our live stock.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I suppose there were a certain number of cattle taken off the western market this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort). Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): By arrangement with the provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort). Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): With the dominion making a certain contribution.

Coming back to the fairs, I was wondering whether the minister could give some information regarding the success of the regional fair policy. I intend to make just one comment in respect to it; I have watched the operation of one such fair. In attempting to establish regions around a central point, no matter how well you try to handicap the inside area, the outside areas further away do not seem to be able to enter sufficient stock to bring their prize list up to a point where they can make enough to have winnings really to pay their way. With transportation quite uncertain, the experience that we have had has been that it takes tremendous amount of persuasion to bring some of these people from outlying districts into a regional fair to compete as a region. Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee just what success these regional fairs have been having and what the policy with respect to them is going to be in the coming years?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As the hon. member for Macdonald has stated, it is difficult to make a fair adjustment between the advantage to those near where the fair is held and that to those in more outlying districts. The success depends pretty much on the natural location of the fair selected as a regional one as to other smaller communities, villages, that are around it. It also depends a great deal on the type of the exhibition board. In some cases where the exhibition board of the regional fair take a highly personal interest in it, they can work up a great deal of competition. In that way we think it is very valuable in comparison with the old system of fairs that took place for many years and finally reached the point where they had a cut and dried prize list and did not have to put much individual effort into the work. It is rather difficult to make comparisons because conditions have been so abnormal, but I would say that on the whole the expression of opinion from those who have taken advantage of regional fairs has been very valuable as to how they work out the regional idea in their own districts.

Mr. BROWN: There is a report that our cattle going to the old country have been found suffering from disease. Has the department any information on that question?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When the restrictions that were placed against our cattle were removed at the time of the Ottawa conference agreements, so far as female stock, especially that which was to be used for dairy purposes, was concerned, we agreed with the United Kingdom that any animal which they felt was not suitable, not of high enough quality to be used for breeding purposes, could be slaughtered. In addition to that however—and perhaps this is what the hon. member has in mind—some few months ago there were shipped to the United Kingdom dairy cattle that were not in proper physical condition to ship and that were not good specimens of the breed or anything like a good advertisement for our live stock in the old country. We advised the exporters a number of times that it was necessary to take steps to prevent the shipment of those cattle, because we had reports from the old land, with reference to one shipment especially, that if further shipments like that were made there would be danger of an embargo being put on lest disease from these animals should spread in the old country. As to the last shipment, about which there has been something in the press, the reason given for the slaughter of those cattle was chiefly that they were not of sufficient high quality for breeding purposes. The female stock are tested here for tuberculosis but not other diseases.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister say whether or not the cattle reported in the press to be diseased and unfit for breeding purposes were examined by competent veterinarians before they left Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For general disease yes, but the only specific test I understand was for tuberculosis.

Mr. VALLLANCE: Can the minister inform the committee if all the space that was required for cattle offered for export to the British market last fall was available?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We had no information as far as I know from any individual that there was any considerable lack of space. There were some isolated instances of inability to get space; one was from the vicinity of Biggar, where I believe there were two or three carloads. Mr. Clark, I believe, wrote me in connection with it. I believe one of the chief reasons in that case was that he did not give as definite a commitment, as was required, as to when he would want to ship. From the reports that came back I think it might have been better if there had been even less space available, because on the shipments as a whole I understand there was a substantial loss.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is any attempt made by the department to control or distribute the space that is available for cattle exports to the British market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first year and a half that this government was in power the space was partly arranged for by the Department of Agriculture. During that time we asked the steamship companies or their agents to reserve certain space up to two weeks before shipping, so that if there were shipments from western Canada or outlying points they could get space. They advised us also upon request of the number shipped, and the individual farmers shipping them, just to assure that there would be no cornering of the market. I think that is what the hon. member has in mind. However, in 1931 it was felt, and I think reasonably so, that on account of the Department of Trade and Commerce being in direct communication with the steamship lines in connection with the subsidies and work outside the dominion it was better that they should take the work of filling boats and getting space.

Mr. VALLANCE: I had a case drawn to my attention last fall from Lloydminster, probably the minister will remember it. This individual had shipped cattle to the Scottish market the year before, and had intimated through Mr. Campbell that he would want space in late October or November. He had his cattle ready, quite a large number, and then found that space was not available. The excuse given was that in the previous year quite a number of exporters had lost considerable in the British market and they were given a preference for the space. I would like the minister to correct that statement if it is wrong, or to verify it if it is right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not remember the case, but if the hon. gentleman will let me have particulars I shall be glad to follow it up. I have followed up a number of such cases, although the matter did not come under my jurisdiction, and the information, which I was able to verify, was that it was difficult in many cases to have the person who wanted to ship his cattle give a definite time sufficiently far ahead, even two weeks ahead, when the cattle were to be shipped.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there any working arrangement between Mr. Campbell of Montreal and the department as to the disposition of space on boats going to the British isles?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not with this department. That work is handled entirely by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is, there is a working agreement between one department of this government and Mr. Campbell?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot say whether they have a working agreement with him with reference to space or not. There is not between this department and Mr. Campbell, nor was there, outside of what I stated, when this department had charge of the work.

Mr. GERSHAW: This is a large item, and I would like to draw attention to the fact that the grants to fairs are given to fairs in the larger cities, but under present conditions a great many farmers, in fact the average farmer, finds it impossible to get to those cities to visit the fairs. Therefore it seems to me that the smaller fairs should be more liberally treated.

I should also like to know what percentage of our cattle are exported, and if the price received for that exportable surplus sets the price for all cattle in Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Answering the last question first, my answer would be no. My information, which I have every reason to believe is accurate, is that on the whole during the past two or three years the cattle shipped overseas have brought less than similar cattle sold in the domestic stock yards.

With reference to grants being increased to fairs in the smaller centres, we have increased grants more in such centres than in the larger ones, for the very reason the hon. member suggests. At one time the grant to fairs in the larger centres was $5,000; that was cut practically in two, I believe, while we gave some additional grants to some of the smaller fairs. This year there has been an increase to B fairs to $1,800 plus $200 for defraying expenses of judges, and $500 for regional fairs, plus $500 if used for junior farm work, which is a greater increase in proportion than to the larger fairs. I agree entirely with the statement of the hon. member that we cannot afford not to encourage the smaller fairs which are more available to many farmers than are the larger ones.

Mr. GERSHAW: What roughly is the percentage of cattle exported?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The number of cattle exported is between fifty and sixty thousand. The number slaughtered at inspected packing plants is somewhere close to 800,000 I believe, and that is considered to be about half the number slaughtered in Canada, so the percentage would be very small.

Mr. BRADETTE: The minister mentioned just now the necessity for killing off live stock in Canada and the United States. Last summer in our section we had a bumper hay crop, and we were expecting to get fairly good prices. But we were told that the federal government had put an embargo on the shipment of hay to the United States in order to keep the price fairly low for farmers in western Canada. I would ask the minister if that is true.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am glad my hon. fried has raised that point, because there has been a good deal of misunderstanding about it. In the first place, due to a shortage of feed in the United States, they took the tariff off hay and straw going into that country provided it went into the areas which have been affected by drought, where feed was necessary, but only when it was imported through certain agencies. So the tariff was not taken off except under very specific conditions. Representations were received from western Canada that a shortage of hay and straw and feed for cattle was expected there; there was also an expected shortage in the province of Nova Scotia. For that reason it was felt desirable that exporters should be licensed to export hay and straw from this country so that in Canada we would not suffer from any shortage of feed and the people who bought hay and straw in this country would have to pay a price equal to that at which it could have been sold for export. With the exception of the first five or six or perhaps ten days, though I think for a shorter period than that, when there was some misunderstanding in reference to this matter, no person who had an order was refused permission to ship either hay or straw out of this country. So I do not feel that any person was adversely affected, except that possibly certain buyers felt that there would be a very excellent market in the United States, and at the beginning, before the situation became well known, they did go through the country stating that they did not know whether they would be able to get the feed out of Canada, and I believe they did persuade some farmers to sell to them for next to nothing. Any cases that came to our attention were followed up, and so far as we know no person suffered hardship in that connection.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is it true that the federal government helped the provincial government feed the cattle in the dried out areas? Is it true that the federal government, through their own agencies, bought some hay or other fodder in the eastern sections of Canada and shipped it to the west?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So far as feed goes the federal government has not absorbed any of the cost. We have absorbed some of the freight cost in connection with moving cattle out of these areas. My information is that no hay has been bought in eastern Canada and shipped to the west. The freight rate would make the cost prohibitive.

Mr. HOWDEN: With reference to exporting cattle to the British market I should like to ask the minister if the department has taken any steps or is taking any steps to improve the grade of cattle in this country and if the department exercises any control or restriction over the cattle exported to the British market. I ask these questions because I have observed an article written by Hon. D. G. McKenzie, Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba. Last summer Mr. McKenzie made a trip from Churchill with a shipment of cattle for the old country. I believe the trip was entirely successful and the cattle arrived at Liverpool, or whatever their destination was, in good condition. Mr. McKenzie went on to say, however, that the cattle were of such an inferior grade that they did the exporting of Canadian cattle a great deal of harm on the British market. Some of his consultants over there, men in the live stock business, told him there was a very good, steady market for Canadian cattle of either the beef or dairy type at about £20 per head. That, I presume, is about $100, which seems a reasonably good figure for cattle today. I have risen in connection with this matter because I thought if this were true it would be well worth the while of the stock interests of this country to improve our stock on the one hand and to see that no poor cattle were allowed to be exported, on the other hand.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That matter has been given consideration each year. We realize that many of the cattle that have gone to the old land have not been of the quality we might have wished, and have not been a credit to the best cattle in this country. The first year in which I looked into this matter personally I was given some very interesting information by Mr. Brown, who at that time I believe was purchasing well over seventy-five per cent of all the cattle we were exporting. He purchased and paid for them on this side of the water, and his emphatic opinion was that while if we shipped all top cattle they might bring more than the cattle we did ship, every person did not want to buy top cattle. He said he had a cargo of perhaps five hundred head consisting of two or three different grades, and that there was always some person on the market wanting a lower grade, another wanting a little better grade and another wanting a choice grade. I know Mr. McKenzie's views very well; I had a visit with him in Toronto shortly after his return. What he said is perfectly true; we would get a better price for our cattle if we shipped better cattle, but investigation has shown that we get a substantial increase in price over there as compared to what we would get here, for some of our very commonest cattle.

Mr. DONNELLY: I would like to ask the minister to explain to the committee why on the English market our bacon obtains practically the lowest price of all the bacon offered for sale on that market, and why, with our steadier supply—and we must have a steadier supply because we are shipping more—the price is not better in relation to the bacon of other countries.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are a number of factors that contribute to the lower price. In the first place we cannot ship a steady supply. The hon. member knows that, in western Canada perhaps more than in the east, the farmers have certain farm practices, depending upon the season of the year and the best time to have pigs born. The result is that the great majority of the pigs are born during two periods in the east and one period in the west, so there is a gap that naturally results and which could be avoided only by giving some assurance to the farmers that during that period a premium would be paid for their hogs. For example, in 1934 there was one very large distributing house in the old country that had worked up a large trade in Canadian bacon. They found themselves in August, September and October, and particularly in August and September, unable to obtain a sufficient supply to meet the demand they had been able to create. That was due to the fact that with the prices here compared to the prices over there, due to the practice of having pigs come at a certain season of the year there was a gap in the supply.

I agree with the hon. member that this is one of the most important problems confronting us to-day in connection with the bacon industry. In wheat we have no such trouble, because there is always a supply available. The only way I can see to overcome that situation in regard to bacon is either to have the packers combine and say they will pay a certain premium to eliminate that dip, or for the farmers themselves to combine and work out some scheme, such as a very small levy to be used to set up a fund, so that when that time comes they can keep the supply going forward that we have led the people over there to believe would be sent forward. I do not think that could be considered a bonus; it would be contributed by the farmers themselves and would be more a process of levelling up.

Then my hon. friend referred to the fact that our bacon brings a lower price than other bacon marketed in the old country. One reason for that is that Canada is a country with varying climatic conditions. Another reason is that people have gone into the business of raising pigs without having raised them in the past, and they are not as expert as they should be at finishing them or at getting the best type. Many of them sell their pigs when they are underweight, thereby leaving smaller sides. In the old country there has been a surplus of smaller sides, and for that reason we have not been able to put over as uniform an order as otherwise we would have done. Also the bacon finishing is not evenly done in different parts of the dominion. I make haste, however, to correct any impression I may have given that our farmers have not made the very greatest efforts to improve the quality of our bacon. The fact is that in the last three years the quality has improved from fifty-one per cent to sixty-one per cent in selects. Another factor has been that in the last year in particular there has been a shortage of feed not only in western Canada but in Ontario. That shortage has put many farmers in a position whereby they could not finish their pigs as well as they might wish, and they had to get them off early.

There is a great demand in Canada, too, for choice bacon, and this demand has to be met. When the market in the old country was opened up, giving us an advantage and an opening for the marketing of a high percentage of our high quality bacon, some of the supply had to be taken from the market we had established here. I can assure the hon. member, however, that we are very closely in touch with the situation, and for further assistance we have appointed a special officer who, before going overseas, visited the packing plants in Canada. He has gone to the old country and has done very excellent work in examining large shipments of our bacon which have gone over there, and has reported back as to the weaknesses, indicating how our product has fallen short of the requirements of the old country.

To standardize the quality of bacon sent out of Canada we have passed regulations whereby only inspected bacon may be exported. That does not mean that every piece of bacon is inspected, but it does mean that the standards are well known to the packers. Certain boxes or bales are inspected, and if we find there is a tendency to ship bacon below standard, very severe penalties, going to the extent in extreme cases of the cancellation of licences, may be imposed.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the government grade our bacon which is shipped out, and are the top grades shipped? In other words, is the best grade kept in Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are three grades of Canadian bacon, practically only two of which are shipped, as the third is negligible. Our information is that the bacon shipped is in accordance with the grades. It is difficult to define the grades because of the different practices obtaining in the different packing plants. To get anything in the way of uniformity of standard it was necessary to have a number of meetings of the packers. The result was that they investigated more carefully than they had done before the practices of curing bacon. They visited each other's plants, and the result was that it was discovered one plant which as a rule may not have had as high quality hogs as other plants was turning out a more uniform product. For that reason their product was more acceptable. I believe one reason for their success was that they had machinery similar to that used in Denmark. The result of the meetings was that various packing plants changed their methods of processing, so that to-day we believe we have a much more uniform type of product for export. The packers are frank in their admission that that has done more than anything else towards standardizing our product.

Then, in reference to grade, careful consideration was given to the desirability of having our bacon gain the best reputation in the old land. It was felt the best procedure would be to set a very high grade. The officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce in the United Kingdom and some of the officials of the Department of Agriculture who had visited the United Kingdom, together with people who had marketed their products over there, were of the opinion that if we put only the very top grade on the market, and that if we exported only the best quality of our bacon, we would get a certain result, but that if we sold a large quantity of our second grade the tendency would be a discrimination against Canadian bacon. All these points have been considered very carefully. We feel that on the whole what we have done has been in the best interests of our bacon market. There is, however, a great deal still to be desired in getting across a uniform product with a uniform finish and in a steady flow. No effort is being spared to achieve that end.

Mr. DONNELLY: The impression seems to have gone abroad that our packers are shipping out an inferior quality bacon, and that they set the price for hogs in this country by the price they obtain in the old country. Naturally that is a lower price. Some people have the idea that that is the reason a lower price is being paid in Canada for hogs than should be paid.

I should like to ask the minister what has become of a certain variety of hogs which was brought from Sweden only a few years ago; I refer to the Landrace hogs which were brought to Canada. How many did the minister buy; what has been the increase in number; what price did he pay for them; where are they now; and are they registered? Further, I should like to have a general idea of what is being done with them, and if any tests have been made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We expect that about next Saturday there will be an increase; I know, because I was out looking at them to-day. Sixty-seven of these hogs were purchased in Sweden. Negotiations were first conducted in Denmark, but the people of that country apparently did not seem anxious to ship hogs of that quality to their competitors. Our officials finally proceeded to Sweden and in that country were able to make satisfactory negotiations to have a shipment of the hogs sent to Canada. So that there would be no danger of bringing any disease with these animals, instructions were issued to have them quarantined at Quebec for six months. After that time they were brought to the experimental farm at Ottawa, where they are now There are fifty-one females at the experimental farm, and it is our intention to have them thoroughly tested. Their gains will be watched, and an accurate record of the feed given them will be kept until they reach a weight of about 220 pounds. They will then be slaughtered and their carcasses valued in points, figured on a certain number out of a possible hundred for a perfect carcass. Perhaps the outstanding difference between these pigs and our own Canadian Yorkshire or white pigs is that the pigs imported have smoother shoulders. Their sides run more smoothly into the shoulders than obtains in the average Yorkshire pig. They are also deeper, on the whole, and their heads are smaller. The aim is to have the side form the greatest possible proportion in the weight of the whole pig. Although great improvements have been made in the matter of increasing the length of the Yorkshire pig, that length has been achieved at the expense of the ham, while the shoulder has been left practically the same. It will be of interest to know that in both Denmark and Sweden the only selective process is brought about by actual feeding. Prize winnings at exhibitions do not mean very much. That is why last year we started throughout Canada testing stations for the same purpose. Some of these pigs that have been imported from Sweden have thirty generations of tested ancestry behind them. Many were imported from Denmark to Sweden, and Sweden has made a very scientific job and keeps a very scientific record. So we feel we got the very best pigs possible.

I know the question in the hon. member's mind is, when will they be distributed? None of them will be distributed until they all have been put on test to see how they respond to the climate and the feeds of this country. We may carry out our crossing experiments with Yorkshires. They may be sent out in groups throughout the country. Many of those who opposed this importation because they had been successful breeders of Yorkshires now are among the strongest advocates of the course we took in bringing over this shipment. We are not doing anything in a haphazard way. Every care will be taken to test them before they are distributed.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the laid down cost of these pigs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The whole shipment landed in Canada cost $6,040, including all expenses.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I understand that there has been some grading of hog or bacon carcasses on the rail. What success has that met with?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have been carrying on for some time experimental work in testing carcasses on the rail, and last year we decided to carry out this work more extensively, starting first at Peterborough and Kitchener. It was on a voluntary basis; that is, a farmer would notify the officials whether he wanted his pigs graded on the rail or not. The result has been that practically every person there now wishes his pigs graded on the rail. They feel that by so doing they get the exact value of their pigs.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): There has been no opportunity of testing the value of rail grading so far as export is concerned?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, grading for export is entirely independent of that.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The minister mentioned a moment or two ago the grants made to the A and B class fairs.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The grants to the B class fairs have been increased to $1,800 and an additional $500 has been made available for competition at these fairs for junior farmers, boys and girls and junior farmer clubs.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Is the regional fair grant discontinued?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the regional fair grant is still continued. This is in addition.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is it not a fact that an investigation which took place into the Landrace hog in 1909 and 1910 found that the Yorkshire hog was in many respects better than the Landrace and better even than the cross bred? It was found that it took more to feed the Landrace hog per pound of pork produced than either the Yorkshire or the cross bred, that the bacon on the prize animals came from the Yorkshire instead of the Landrace or from the cross between the two, and that in practically every respect the Yorkshire was the superior hog to the Landrace for bacon purposes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been no investigation in this country as to the Landrace hog and the Yorkshire hog because this is the first time there have been Landrace hogs in this country. We cannot say yet which hog is most suitable for our climate and our feeds. Perhaps what the hon. member has in mind is that some years ago Denmark used to import large numbers of the large white or Yorkshire hogs from the United Kingdom. They used them to get their pure bred sires and for one cross with a view to improving their bacon. As time went on they made investigations purely from a dollars and cents point of view, and they have now entirely quit the importation, or practically so, of these large white hogs, and are now using not only for bacon purposes but for breeding stock ninety per cent I would say of Landrace hogs. That I believe is our best answer for the shipment here.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): This item includes live stock. I understand that a considerable number of stallions and bulls have been brought from the old country. I would also like some information regarding the bull loaning policy that has been carried on by the department for the last year or so, but as it is eleven o'clock perhaps the minister would allow this item to stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 19, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): On February 19 last the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) asked if I would table correspondence passing between the government and the province of Ontario concerning the trans-Canada highway and also any correspondence relating to the amount finally arrived at for the monthly grant in aid. I now desire to lay the correspondence on the table.

PRIVATE BILLS

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris) moved:

That the petition of the Portage la Prairie Mutual Insurance Company, praying for the passing of an act to amend its act of incorporation, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 35, for the relief of Stuart Lewis Ralph Henderson.—Mr. Moore (Châteauguay-Huntingdon).

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY

DENIAL OF ALLEGATION CONCERNING STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO INSPECTOR DAWSON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) made an inquiry of me in regard to a return which I had submitted a few days ago respecting certain reports of Inspector Dawson of the penitentiary branch. The hon. member stated that while the return went up to April 8, 1934, on April 9 Inspector Dawson had an interview with prisoner 3033 in the penitentiary. I have made a pretty full inquiry in regard to this matter since yesterday, and I find that Inspector Dawson went to the penitentiary to make an inspection and report respecting a certain matter which had been referred to him. After he had concluded his inspection on April 8, an interview was requested by prisoner 3033 and it is during the course of that interview I think it is alleged by the hon. member for Southeast Grey that certain aspersions were made against her character as stated by her yesterday. I can assure her that there is no foundation for the report. The inspector himself made no report on this interview. When inspectors or superintendents visit a penitentiary, they have a large number of requests for interviews, but they do not make specific reports in regard to them. However Inspector Dawson has assured me most definitely that during his interview with prisoner 3033 the name of the hon. member for Southeast Grey was never mentioned by him or by the prisoner, there was no comment whatever in regard to her, and I can assure her on the word of honour of the inspector that there is no foundation for the allegation which she has made.

BORSTAL SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Justice when we may expect the legislation foreshadowed in the speech from the throne in regard to the institution of the Borstal system in the penitentiaries of this country?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I expect the penitentiary estimates may be up some day toward the end of the week or some day next week and I shall then be prepared to make a statement regarding the matter.

THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois): I understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is going to bring down his budget very soon. In his absence may I ask the acting Prime Minister whether it would not be possible to have a French copy of the budget speech ready for publication as soon as it is delivered? I am sure that the French newspapermen and their readers and the whole French population would appreciate that.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): No one would be more anxious than I to have the French version ready at the same moment as the speech is delivered or the matter discussed. But I would explain to the hon. gentleman that the preparation of the budget is always a very exacting labour, and hurried at the last moment, and it is with the greatest difficulty that the printer is able to prepare the English version and have it in proper shape to bring down here. I think I am correct in saying that the French version never has been ready at the same moment as the English. I shall inquire and see if anything can be done about it, but that is the situation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has been giving his whole time to this for the last few days, and he will not be in his seat to-day, I think. He asked me to say that the budget will not be ready on Thursday, but he expects to deliver it on Friday.

Mr. RAYMOND: I do not like to contradict the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) but I may remind him that the Hon. Mr. Robb used to deliver a French copy of his speech on the budget at the same time as he delivered the English copy to the newspapers.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I shall make inquiry on that point.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROTEST OF GRAND TRUNK SHAREHOLDERS AGAINST APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS WITHOUT CONSULTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Has the government received any representations from the bondholders of the Grand Trunk Railway in London or from a representative thereof, protesting that they should have been consulted, under their statutory rights, as outlined in section 31, Grand Trunk Act, 1862, and Grand Trunk Act, 1873, to vote for or agree to auditors, and further protesting against the passing of Bill No. 20, as passed by the House of Commons on March 5, 1935, until they were so consulted and had an opportunity to express their wishes regarding the appointment of auditors?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman was courteous enough to advise me this morning that he was going to ask this question, so I looked into the matter thoroughly in order to have a proper reply, because of the importance of the subject. Because of that importance I intend to read my reply, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding, as it may perhaps be transmitted to London.

Two communications have been received, not from bondholders, as stated by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), but from former preference shareholders whose stocks were declared of no value by the Grand Trunk board of arbitration, 1921. One was received by the hon. the Speaker, and the other by the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris), as chairman of the railway committee of the house. Each made representations in the terms referred to by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

The correspondents were informed that the appointment of auditors of Canadian National Railways had nothing whatever to do with any controversy concerning the alleged rights of former Grand Trunk stockholders, the auditors being appointed by parliament each year, as required by the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933. They are not company auditors, but auditors for parliament.

As to the voting rights of former shareholders, attention was directed to the fact that section 4 of the Grand Trunk Acquisition Act of 1919 reads as follows:

> Provided that concurrently with such guarantee of dividends and interest upon the present guaranteed stock and the present debenture stocks, respectively, the voting powers at meetings of shareholders of the Grand Trunk now vested in or exercisable by the holders of the said stocks respectively shall cease and determine absolutely.

This proviso was also incorporated in the formal agreement between the London Grand Trunk management and the Canadian government.

Mr. DUFF: I would like a copy of that.

Mr. MANION: It will be printed in Hansard, if that is satisfactory.

PAYMENTS TO AUDITORS

RETURN SHOWING AMOUNTS RECEIVED FROM THE GOVERNMENT BY CLARKSON, GORDON, DILWORTH AND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I wish to draw attention to certain inaccuracies in a return tabled in this house on March 12, 1935. The return required was one showing amounts paid by the government of Canada or any department thereof to the firm of Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth and Company or to any member of the said firm during the fiscal years 1929-30, 1930-31, 1931-32, 1932-33, 1933-34, and from the end of the fiscal year 1933-34 to date.

The return tabled indicated only the amount paid by one or two departments of the government, whereas I think it is a matter of public notoriety, if not official information, that this firm has been engaged in work in connection with the price spreads committee, and has received considerable sums of money for that work.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the return was submitted as I received it from the several departments. The hon. gentleman called my attention privately to the fact that it did not contain any payments made by the price spreads and mass buying commission. I immediately requested full information in order that I might submit a supplementary return. I have not yet received complete information. So soon as I do I shall present a supplementary return.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED PRESS INTERVIEW GIVEN BY POLICE OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): Yesterday I drew the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to an interview given by Detective Inspector Zaneth and he said he would look into the matter. I wonder if the minister has a statement to make to-day.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have asked the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to make inquiry and to report to me. I telephoned him at three o'clock and he had not yet the information.

EXTENSION OF PENSION PROVISIONS AND DISTRIBUTION OF FINES AND PENALTIES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MINIMUM WAGE

BILL BASED ON DRAFT CONVENTION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION AND TREATY OF VERSAILLES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for minimum wages pursuant to the convention concerning minimum wages adopted by the international labour organization in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace, and to enable Canada to discharge the obligations assumed under the provisions of the said treaty and of the said convention.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This resolution is largely a formality which becomes necessary by reason of the fact that I assume there will be some expenditure from the public treasury involved in connection with the minimum wage bill which I hope to introduce as soon as this resolution is passed. The resolution is presented only to comply with the rules of the house in case any expenditure should become necessary in connection with the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any remarks which I intend to make will be made when the bill is before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I asked the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) if the so-called convention was published in the Journal of the League of Nations, and he referred me to another publication, of the labour bureau. Would the minister be kind enough to read to the house the paragraph of the publication on which the resolution now before the house is based? It contains only four or five lines.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This resolution is based on the draft convention as reported in the official document issued by the international labour office, at page 149.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but would the minister be kind enough to read that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the long resolution which was on the order paper. It was considered by this house three days ago and adopted. The resolution was printed in the orders of the day.

Mr. POULIOT: I know, but may I ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to read those four or five lines from the booklet he has in his hand?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know which four or five lines my hon. friend means. I shall be very glad to read them if he will tell me.

Mr. POULIOT: If the minister will be kind enough to loan me the booklet I will read them to the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Very well, I will send it over.

Mr. POULIOT: I will take very good care of this precious booklet, which contains the draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the international labour conference at its sessions from 1919 to 1932. The work of thirteen years is condensed in this booklet, which costs 1s. 6d. or about 40 cents. This is the booklet, but it does not contain the reference given me by the acting Prime Minister, who referred to another small, very thin publication in which the matter of minimum wages is dealt with in four or five lines. The right hon. gentleman has enough legal experience to know that this draft convention does not bind us. I thought he had in his hand the official publication of the international labour bureau. This is a draft convention; it is a formula, just as I have said. I thank the Minister of Justice for once more confirming what I have said previously, and for his kind cooperation.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask when the bill will be ready for distribution?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The moment the resolution is passed.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am pleased you have it ready.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Guthrie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 40 to provide for minimum wages.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

FURTHER PROVISION FOR CARRYING ON RELIEF MEASURES, MEETING FINANCIAL CONDITIONS AND MAINTAINING CREDIT OF DOMINION AND PROVINCES

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting relief, and to provide for such payments out of the consolidated revenue fund as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one word, Mr. Chairman, and I will be through. Some time ago from the Montreal Star I quoted an excerpt from a speech by the right hon. Prime Minister with regard to the newsprint industry and the blank cheque legislation. I believe I am in order now in referring to that matter again. The quotation was as follows:

Mr. Bennett, with a chuckle, told the audience that he had had one satisfaction the other day, when representatives of the pulp and paper industry of Canada had come and asked him whether if the provinces of Quebec and Ontario request that the government do so they would make effective one of their laws which the Liberals opposed—he had the satisfaction of their asking the government to do that which Mr. King asked his followers to vote against—"and I listened while Mr. Taschereau and Mr. Hepburn asked us to make it effective in their interest—those are some of the compensations of public life, remarked the premier.

Here I have a letter from a very distinguished gentleman, a noble son of the good old province of Ontario, the Hon. Mitchell F. Hepburn, dated Toronto, Februay 28, 1935. The letter reads:

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

In reply to your letter of February 26th, I desire to make it very clear that the only correspondence I had with Prime Minister Bennett was contained in a telegram dated November 7th, which telegram was sent following representations of members of the newsprint industry who desired a conference with federal authorities. You will note that I stated that details of application of any federal policy would be open to consideration and approval by the Ontario government. No mention was made of applying the blank cheque legislation as contained in the peace, order and good government act, which I oppose in principle, nor, as far as I can ascertain, in the industry itself in favour of application of provisions of this act.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

You will therefore note that the extract from the speech of Mr. Bennett appearing in the Montreal Star, which reads:

The quotation I have read follows, and the letter continues:

... if correctly reported, indicates clearly that he did go beyond the construction I intended to put upon the contents of the telegram itself. You will further note that no representative of the Ontario government appeared at the conference in response to the invitation extended by Prime Minister Bennett.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

M. F. Hepburn.

Jean-François Pouliot, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

That is the first part of it. Now, sir, let me read the telegram which was sent by Mr. Hepburn to the right hon. Prime Minister and which was tabled by the Secretary of State on February 15, 1935, in sessional paper No. 160:

1934, November 7.

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

I believe situation of newsprint industry now makes it advisable for manufacturers to discuss problem with you.

The Ontario government will support a policy of federal action to remedy the industry with details of application open to consideration and approval.

And that is signed by M. F. Hepburn. This is not complete, because Mr. Taschereau was mentioned by the right hon. gentleman as well as Mr. Hepburn. I have before me a flat denial given by Mr. Taschereau along the same lines as the one given by Mr. Hepburn. It reads as follows:

(Translation):

Province of Quebec
Office of the Premier
Quebec, March 16, 1935.

Mr. J. F. Pouliot, K.C., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

I have your letter of the 12th instant, to which I hasten to reply.

As the file produced by Hon. Mr. Bennett shows, I neither wrote nor telegraphed to him regarding his interview with the paper manufacturers. I have never, in any manner whatsoever, either directly or indirectly, approved the blank cheque given him by the House of Commons.

You are not unaware of the fact that I have been in very active touch with the paper manufacturers in an effort to find a solution to the problem existing to-day, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, and to remedy a situation that threatens to become disastrous to the paper industry.

In the course of an interview at Quebec with some of the manufacturers, it was suggested that Mr. Bennett be asked to prevent the export of paper to the United States unless it was sold at a certain price which would be sufficiently remunerative to the industry. I was asked to telephone to Mr. Bennett, at Ottawa, to ask him if he would receive a delegation. I did so immediately, and Mr. Bennett told me he would receive the delegation at a date which has now escaped my mind.

I understand that the representatives of the industry did go to Ottawa. I took no part in the interview the delegation had with the Prime Minister of Canada.

I think the above sufficiently answers your inquiry.

Sincerely yours,

L. A. Taschereau.

Therefore the assumption by the right hon. Prime Minister that he had the support of the premiers of Ontario and Quebec was all wrong. I shall not say much about it, but I am complaining about the condition of the lumberjacks in the province of Quebec and the conditions of all those people who have suffered since the blank cheque legislation was passed. I shall have more to say later, but shall simply place these letters on record at the present time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, respecting relief measures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

ORGANIZATION OF BODY TO COORDINATE WORK OF DEPARTMENTS AND TO INVESTIGATE AND ADVISE UPON SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, to establish an economic council.

He said: I made an explanation yesterday regarding the purpose and intent of the bill, and when we reach the committee stage I shall be glad to endeavour to answer any further questions which may be asked.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. POULIOT: I would object to anyone but you, Mr. Chairman, being appointed chairman of this council.

We have no information about that. The right hon. acting Prime Minister states, "Well, it will not cost much; it will not cost much." They say the radio commission was not to cost much, but it costs a million dollars each year. They say it effects great economy, but it is only a disturbance to the listeners over the radio. It may be a cheap proposition, and it may not cost much as the right hon. gentleman has said, but the people have to pay taxes for it. We know that some salaries are increased. May I ask what the salary of the chairman of this council will be?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Prime Minister is to be the chairman of the council, and actually he will not receive any remuneration for so acting.

Mr. POULIOT: Here I object to it. If the Prime Minister is chairman of the council he cannot support himself. I say this is a most absurd proposition. Here we have a council set up to assist the Prime Minister, and yet we find that the Prime Minister is chairman of that council. So far as I am concerned that seems to be the most foolish thing on earth. We have the Prime Minister supporting himself. He will be the legs and the head of the council. The acting Prime Minister must know about this, and I must say I am strongly opposed to it. The bill provides crutches for a moribund government. If the government has no information, then the only thing it could do would be to attend a correspondence school or subscribe to the Columbia lectures, and in that way get some information about economics. When we ask them questions we find that sometimes they are like fence posts; no answers come from their mouths. I know they are not children. Truth comes from the mouths of babes, but from the mouths of the ministers comes no information. Why? It is because they do not wish to have any information and because they are kept up by patronage and other silly things, rather than giving their time to the business of the state. Every person must strongly object because people find this condition most ridiculous. We have a flood of boards; in fact it would seem that we are to have a soviet government in Canada, a government by irresponsible men who will dictate the policies.

Yesterday we heard a great deal about statistics. I wonder if the acting Prime Minister knows how those statistics are compiled. He may receive information from the bureau of statistics and then do his own thinking upon them. Then, if the Prime Minister cannot act the chairman would be, ex officio the acting Prime Minister. I wonder how he could do his work without the assistance of that council. I am sorry to have to make these observations because I realize he is older than I am, but I know any member other than a cabinet minister could dispense with the council. When they ask for a steak is it necessary to have someone cut their meat, in order that they may have a mouthful which would not choke them? They are just like children; they do not know how to work, and they must have some people to cut their meat, just as children would have. What a spectacle before the country! Here we have a government, it has been said, of supermen, men far above the average. But they cannot do anything for themselves. They have to be run about in the wheel chair of bureaucracy. They need a tutor and a guardian. Tutors and guardians are only appointed for children who are not of age and for those who cannot attend to their own business. But here we have a government of supermen, semi-gods, and they are asking for relief; they complain that they have too much work to do. I sincerely hope from the bottom of my heart that the acting Prime Minister and his colleagues, some of whom are able men, will not insist on this measure. They know that it is absurd. We have had enough of this stuff. We have had enough of those people who try to put false ideas in the heads of the ministers who form the government of this country. Who will take this government seriously when they submit such a bill as this to the house? I am sorry for the acting Prime Minister. I know that he does not need my sympathy because he is an able man, a superman, and therefore needs it much less than others, but why should such a burden be imposed on him?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I say in reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks that he need not be sorry for me. I would say to him that when he gets to be Prime Minister he will not be bound to keep this council if he does not wish to. He need not call it together at all unless he wishes.

Mr. POULIOT: I enjoy very much the atticism of the right hon. acting Prime Minister. I have great respect for old age and I shall not reciprocate, but may I ask him a question? Will the Prime Minister be responsible for this board mentioned in clause 2?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Prime Minister is the chairman of the board but there will be regulations for the conduct of its business and the carrying on of its meetings.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The Prime Minister is not bound to attend every meeting of this council, of course. A vice chairman can be selected to take his place.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand also that the acting Prime Minister will ex-officio be the acting chairman of this board.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Prime Minister will be chairman, and the regulations under which the council will act will provide for a vice chairman or someone else to preside at meetings in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT: That is unfair because if the Prime Minister is absent there will have to be an order in council appointing the right hon. gentleman as acting Prime Minister. There is now an order in council to the effect that whenever the Prime Minister is absent he is to be replaced by the right hon. gentleman from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley).

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, but the hon. gentleman knows very well that this may not continue. Someone else may take the Prime Minister's place in his absence.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry I did not catch a word of what the right hon. gentleman said.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I say that the hon. gentleman assumes that I shall continue acting as Prime Minister. There is no ground for that assumption whatever. After this bill is passed and this council is set up there may be some other gentleman who will act in the absence of the Prime Minister of the day.

Mr. POULIOT: On that point I quite agree with the right hon. gentleman because there will be a turn of the tide at the next election, but just now I take this view. At present the right hon. gentleman is acting Prime Minister. He is so either in virtue of an order in council which has been passed recently or in virtue of an order in council which was passed some time ago providing that whenever the Prime Minister was unable to attend to his duties he would be replaced ipso facto by the right hon. gentleman. Therefore the right hon. gentleman is the acting Prime Minister. That is my humble opinion and I am sure he will not deny it. Therefore if he is acting Prime Minister so long as this government is in power, I do not see how another vice chairman of the board could be appointed because if this legislation is necessary, if it is necessary for the government to have such an economic council, and if the Prime Minister is to be chairman of that board, the acting Prime Minister will be superseded by the vice chairman, which is absurd. It will mean that the acting head of the government will play second fiddle on the council, and that is why I object.

I think that those who have drafted this bill have been most inconsiderate of the acting Prime Minister. When he now jeers at me I shall reciprocate by paying a tribute to his high office and his high character. I regret very much that this bill is so unfair to him. May I ask any one of the seven ministers of the crown whom I see before me to propose an amendment to this bill providing that in the absence of the Prime Minister the acting Prime Minister will be chairman of this council? I think it would be most heartless of them to refuse to accept my suggestion, which is made in good faith and out of regard for the right hon. gentleman who leads the house at the present moment. I see on the government benches over there supporters from the province of Quebec. I shall not name them, but some of them are fond of speaking about the respect that we must have for the Prime Minister. It seems they have no regard at all for the acting Prime Minister, a man from their own province, the only member of the government from that province who has been acting Prime Minister of Canada. I regret very much that they are so hard upon him, and I strongly protest on behalf of the members from the province of Quebec against this injustice that is being done to the acting Prime Minister by his Tory colleagues from the province of Quebec.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the remarks of my hon. friend require an answer. I do not understand what he means at all. He is very solicitous about the acting Prime Minister, but there is nothing in this bill to hurt me. Moreover I have been able to look after myself even before I knew the hon. gentleman from Témiscouata.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just one word. I would not like to disagree with my hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) but I think it is glorifying this bill to oppose it in this way. I do not think that there is anything in this bill. It is like the rest of the program of reform, and the quicker we pass it the better.

Mr. POULIOT: May I sum up everything I have to say in one sentence, Mr. Chairman, and that is that this legislation is most absurd and it will not be swallowed by the people of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Council.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How does the government propose to elect the persons referred to in subsections (b) and (c)? Will this be done at the request of the organizations concerned or does the government propose to undertake the responsibility for the nomination of all persons?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is provided that these appointments shall be made by the governor in council. I need not tell the hon. gentleman that when the time comes for the election, every effort will be made to get first class men. The government will take such steps as they consider necessary to select such men.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Duties of the council.

Mr. IRVINE: Before this section is carried I should like to suggest that the responsibilities of this body be increased. I am very glad that the government has made a move towards the appointment or the creation of a body that will do some thinking. I do not say this to be critical of the administration as I think this administration is perhaps as good as any other. For a long time I have held the view, as have many other hon. members, that we should have a body to do some real economic planning for Canada and I assume that this is the beginning of such a body. Section 6 sets forth the duties of the council but I do not think it goes far enough and I propose to move an amendment to add a clause (f), which will read:

Recommend to the government policies calculated to distribute the goods and services which either are now available or which may be made available as the result of our increasing productivity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If it is possible, I should like to have some order from the hilarious gentlemen to my right. Perhaps they are celebrating to-morrow's dinner in advance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are celebrating this bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are celebrating C.C.F. policies.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). During this session there has been the closest unanimity in matters of legislation between the official opposition and the government.

Never before in my experience in the House of Commons have I observed such anxiety on the part of the opposition to support proposals made by the government. This is an extraordinary illustration of the condition to which the party to my right has, shall I say fallen or risen? I do not know into which category they should be put. They talk about an alliance between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the government but let me assure them that they have always been far closer to the government than have this group. For example, they are so anxious to pass this particular legislation that they are ready to shout it through committee. On the other hand, we propose to improve it because it bears only a most distant resemblance to the suggestions which have come from this corner of the house in regard to such a council. We never envisioned such a ghost of a council as this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is a shivering wraith.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) speaks of it as a shivering wraith but he seems more than anxious to support it and have it pass the house.

I think something should be said about this measure as it seems to be merely setting up a sort of Prime Minister's brain trust and I am not at all sure that a brain trust of the character likely to be selected by the governor in council of the present administration will produce anything more than what the Prime Minister requires them to produce.

An hon. MEMBER: An echo.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Precisely, an echo. We have had an illustration of this in the great country to the south where a brain trust has been operated and directed by just the type of mentality as one would anticipate will be directing this council. I think this will be the case whether the Conservative party is to have the direction of it or whether my friends to the right happen to come into power. A very frank report has recently been made upon the operations of the National Industrial Recovery Act. This report was prepared by the research and political division of the NRA and, therefore, has the imprimatur of authority upon it. The meat of the report is contained in seven lines, totalling ninety-five words, which appear on page 24 of the report. These seven lines sum up boldly and devastatingly the effect of the NRA and the results of the actions of the brain trust in that country. I quote:

Note that although payrolls in December, 1934, were only about 60 per cent of the total in 1926, dividends and interest were 150 per cent of their total in 1926. In short, the income enjoyed by those who received dividends and interest was 50 per cent higher than in 1926, even though the national income has declined nearly 40 per cent since that date and volume of production has declined by one-third ... clearly the recipients of profits have not failed to enjoy their proportionate share of the increase in industrial recovery.

That is taken from the official report of the operations of the NRA. It is very clear that in spite of the ballyhooing which has taken place in the press and the radio speeches which have been delivered, the NRA, directed as it is by a capitalistic minded government, has been directed with the idea of sustaining the profits of the few to the extent which they could be sustained and of passing on as little as possible to the masses. That that has been the result is proven by this report. I therefore suggest this thought to the committee, that any such economic council as is now being proposed under the guidance and direction of those who would continue the existing system, can mean in the long run just precisely the result that has already been shown in the United States in its attempt to do the very same thing with the system.

I could go further afield as I have done on another occasion and produce similar illustrations of the futility of attempting to regulate or direct capitalism by any economic council of any kind whatever. In short, the fruitfulness or usefulness of an economic council will depend entirely upon the policy behind its creation, the policy for which it is established. I contend with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that the primary policy that should be the very basis of every activity of this economic council should be to ascertain first the potential productivity of the country, something concerning which we have no accurate information; to correlate those facts; to ascertain the total consumption of which the country is capable if real demand were satisfied, and to bring those two functions into harmony so as to make it possible for the Canadian people to consume the maximum quantity of what they produce. If that be the purpose of the council, then indeed it may be fruitful, it may justify the not overly enthusiastic praise of the hon. member for Red Deer yesterday when he said that he was glad to see that the proposal made by him on behalf of this section of the house was at last bearing fruit. As I heard him say that, it occurred to me that he was in the position of a gentleman who had planted a McIntosh Red and was now reaching out his hand to collect a very sour and very small crabapple. That is just about what this economic council appears to be in the light of the suggestion made from this corner. We never envisioned such a thing as a prime minister's committee; we want a national council that will undertake to discover in an effective way the productive powers of the country and then advise as to how best the maximum consumption by the people of Canada may take place.

While I am on my feet, may I suggest that the idea of having this council tied up to the Prime Minister and his department shows a great weakness. This council should have complete freedom of action without direction or interference from any authority other than that which is laid down as a matter of definite policy to be pursued, a definite objective to be obtained, such as the one which has been already outlined by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. To tie up such a committee for example to the national research council would also be a mistake. May I pause here just momentarily to take issue with the leader of the opposition? There is no relationship whatever between the character of research that such an economic council as this might do and the character of research that is carried on by the national research council. One is deductive and the other inductive as I suggested to the right hon. gentleman yesterday. In the one field of research we experiment; we take for example the livers of one hundred dogs and treat them in different ways in the hope that we may find out something. We do not know before we start what the result will be; in that type of natural scientific research we have not necessarily the faintest conception as to what the result will be, but we just keep on experimenting, trying to find something. We may have an objective, and very often find something entirely different from that which we set out to find. This type of economic research is research that is based on the ascertaining of definite facts that will be admitted. The facts having first been admitted, conclusions are to be drawn by bringing those facts together in certain order or fashion and arguing to certain conclusions. The basis for economic research must be and will continue to be almost entirely statistical and therefore factual. The strength therefore of your statistical bureau will to an extent determine the success of the work of such an economic council as this is to be. I would suggest to the government in closing on this point that there are two matters to be taken into consideration: first, the general policy to which this council should devote its work and, second, the strengthening of the one body that can make this work possible, the research council itself. The last clause of this bill provides for the tabling of reports each year by the secretary of the council, but the wording of that clause is altogether too slack. It states:

> The secretary shall prepare an annual report to the minister with regard to the work of the council during the preceding year, which report shall be tabled in the House of Commons.

In my opinion the acting Prime Minister would be well advised to add the words "and findings" after the word "work," so that the house would be advised from time to time, as we are justified in requesting to be advised, as to the result of the research undertaken by this body on the questions it investigates during the year. I suggest most strongly that the amendment of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin should be supported by the government and carried by the house.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I regret very much that I cannot see my way clear to accept the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). As the hon. member for Bow River has been the one who has explained the purpose of this amendment, may I say in the first place that it delights me to be able to agree with him in one of the remarks he made, and that is that he does not accept the view put forward by the leader of the opposition. I do not myself agree with the leader of the opposition and I told him so yesterday. There is this one point fortunately on which the hon. member for Bow River and I agree, and that is that there is no relationship whatever between the problems of scientific research and those of economic research. Therefore I consider that the suggestion put forward yesterday by the leader of the opposition that this council might be an adjunct of or in some way tied up to the council for scientific research is not a practical one. The hon. member for Bow River has made some explanation of his views on that subject, and I agree that it requires an entirely different type of mind to consider scientific problems from what is required to consider economic questions.

With that reservation I find myself in disagreement with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). This is an advisory council. I tried to explain it as fully as I could yesterday. It has no executive or administrative functions whatever. The work of the council will be on such subjects as may be delegated to it or on which it may be requested by the Prime Minister to report. Its object is to enable the Prime Minister in regard to the many problems he has to face, to have at his command a body to which he can make requests for inquiry and report about any matter of government or public interest which he thinks advisable to refer to them and regarding which they may be able to help him.

The hon. member for Bow River has referred to the NRA of the United States. But this is not that type of legislation at all. The administrators of the NRA were given great authority, and administrative functions of much importance, but the council here proposed is to have nothing of that sort. The hon. member for Bow River expressed the opinion also that this should be an independent national council with authority to consider such problems as it wishes—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He urges that this council should have freedom of action to consider any problem on which it chooses to make representations to the government. But that is not the type of body that we have in mind at all. The government itself is the best judge of what problems it should submit to this council for consideration and report. My hon. friends opposite are fond of saying over and over, to keep up their courage, that they will be in power after the next election—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If that be so, they will find this body a great help to them, but they certainly do not wish to give to it the functions of the government. It should have no independent functions.

There is nothing further that I wish to say on the subject except to reiterate what I said yesterday, that this council is to be purely an advisory one; and to put anything in the bill which would suggest that they should have power to take up questions of their own volition and report and make recommendations to the government regarding methods of policy is something with which I would ask the committee not to concur.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to say a few words in support of the proposed economic council. I am surprised that hon. members opposite should treat an important measure of this nature with so much levity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a business man I cannot help but feel that such a council as this will be a great support to the government.

An hon. MEMBER: They need it.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. MacNICOL: That is all very well, the present government will be here next year to make use of it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You are a false prophet.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hon. members opposite, although receiving this resolution with so much levity, have not ceased to indicate on numerous occasions that they are willing to pass clause by clause without discussion important measures each clause of which should be considered carefully by those who occupy seats in this house. Every member is sent here to give his best attention and his considered judgment to whatever matters come before him, but, Mr. Chairman, there has not been either good attention or considered judgment given by my hon. friends opposite to several of the important measures that have come before the house this session, including this one.

The proposal for an economic council is not a new one. Hon. members opposite seem to indicate by their actions that they think it is something new, but the proposals to establish an economic council were not considered in other houses with the levity with which hon. members opposite have treated this resolution. In Germany an economic council was set up in 1919, in Jugoslavia in 1921, in Poland it was considered about the same time but it was not carried into effect. Both Spain and Portugal established economic councils in 1924, France in 1925, Italy in 1930 and Great Britain in 1930. Surely all those great nations did not consider a matter of this kind something to be laughed at and passed without any discussion. Those are great nations, and they must have considered that such a council would be of benefit in promoting industry and providing employment. It is that function of an economic council in which I am interested; if it does not provide employment by promoting industry I am not interested in it, but I am interested in anything which will promote employment. Hon. members on the opposite side know as well as do hon. members on this side that one of the main purposes of our being in session to-day is to promote employment—

Mr. POULIOT: We hear you, but we do not know yet what you propose to do.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member keeps on talking on everything as much as he has talked this session, as a general authority on every subject that comes up, this house will never get anywhere.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, we are going together.

Mr. MacNICOL: Also I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that I do not interrupt him when he is talking and I would like to receive the same courtesy from him.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1931 the United States government under President Hoover appointed a Senate committee to consider this same subject. The United States Senate is composed of big men. It is one of the greatest second chambers in the world. It has more legislative authority than any other second legislative chamber in the world. That Senate committee considered for some time, the subject of the establishment of an economic council, and made a thorough and exhaustive survey, inviting to appear before them the most outstanding business men in the United States, the leading agriculturists, professors, labour men, and leading men in all walks of life. After debating for several months they recommended to the government that an economic council should be appointed. Whether that recommendation has been carried out I cannot now say definitely. What they did say was the objective of such a council:

> We propose a national economic board, appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with preliminary advice from various national organizations. The members should represent special types of expert knowledge rather than special economic interests. They should include men expert in finance, scientific management, labour relations, economics, and agriculture or agricultural economics.

Now if such a board is constituted with good intentions, as I believe is intended by this government, I cannot see how anything but benefit could result. All hon. members of this house give their best judgment, or they should, to the proposals that come before them for legislative action, recognizing that one of the principal purposes of governmental action is to provide employment for the citizens of the country. Having that in mind I cannot see how anything but benefit can result from any government enrolling in support of the cabinet the ablest men obtainable from outside to give advice as to ways and means of providing employment for the citizens. Yet here we have this proposal received as if it were a joke. I deplore that attitude. As an ordinary business man I feel that members of this house should get down to the purpose for which they are here, and legislate in the interests of our people. Certainly calling "Carried" to everything that comes up merely in order to get it through so that the session may be ended, in the expectation that there will be an early election, is not their purpose here. I will tell hon. gentlemen that the people of Canada are carefully scanning what goes on in this house; they are listening to what is being said here and they are not at all in accord with the attitude of the opposition who call "Carried" to most everything that comes up. Hon. gentlemen opposite will learn soon enough that there is to be an election this year; I am not a prophet but I will tell them that when the bell rings they will have a merry dance throughout the country.

In his remarks the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) became more or less mixed up; he started comparing this measure to the NRA. I spent some time in Washington when the NRA was up in congress; I also had conferences with a number of leading members of congress and of the senate, and I can say that this economic council is not at all an NRA matter, so why try to draw a red herring across the trail in order to promote opposition to a bill which I believe will be of some considerable benefit to the country. I am happy indeed to support this measure; I feel confident that when the government enrolls in its support or rather as a source of advice and information the able men it undoubtedly has in view, to meet with members of the cabinet and others on questions of business, of employment, of agriculture and of commerce, some good will be done which will benefit this country.

Mr. IRVINE: Just before my amendment is carried, Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that I am not arguing that there is no benefit to be expected under the bill as proposed. I think we all will be quite ready to admit that a body that studies, investigates, reports and advises upon questions relating to the general trend of social or economic conditions or to any social or economic problem of Canada, and that authorizes investigations in that behalf is a body that will be of service. Further it is provided that this body shall make recommendations to promote and coordinate social and economic research within Canada; that it shall make representations to coordinate the activities of a social or economic character of the several departments of the government of Canada. That is all to the good. The body also is to make recommendations as to the organization of statistics as the basic data required for social and economic investigations, and to publish such reports and findings as may be considered to be in the public interest.

These things are all to the good, but I do not think they are good enough. The acting Prime Minister points out that the idea the government have in mind is very different from the idea proposed in the amendment I moved; he says that the body the government envisage is of a different type from the body indicated in the amendment. That may be so, in which case I am not as interested in the legislation as I otherwise would be. But even if my amendment suggests a body of a slightly different type, if it is a better type perhaps the government might be persuaded to change their mind. I should like to see one government sufficiently broadminded to enlarge its legislation in line with a suggestion by a private member, if that suggestion should be a little better than the suggestion of the government, and I think this is a little better, not because I moved it but because the great problem of Canada is what it is and because of the fact that due to our failure so far to solve that problem this is the greatest thing before the people of Canada to-day.

I think we ought to settle what is the objective of this body. I disagree with the acting Prime Minister when he indicates that it is a prime minister's problem that is to be solved. It is not a prime minister's problem with which we are dealing. I have no objection to any prime minister who may be in office having at his disposal and command all the technical assistance that he requires; I think he ought to have that assistance in the performance of his specific duties, but presumably we are making provision for the appointment of a national council to deal with the national problems of this country, the problems of the people of this country, and in my opinion such a national council will fail in its real service to the people and will not be worth the cost of its maintenance if it is merely the echo of any government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair. I think if he will read what I said he will find that I made no suggestion that this should be a prime minister's council. Rather I suggested that it should consider the problems put before it by the prime minister, which are the problems of the people of this country that we are all anxious to solve. Therefore I would ask the hon. gentleman to change what he said a bit, because I never suggested that this should be a prime minister's council.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall be very glad to change anything that may look like misrepresentation, because I assure my right hon. friend that I had no desire to misrepresent him in the slightest degree. I think perhaps I should have said that the interpretation of the council's functions as given by the acting Prime Minister appeared to me to reduce it to nothing but a prime minister's council.

May I make that point clear in this way. Supposing this legislation is passed in its present form; the Prime Minister, whether he be the present right hon. gentleman, the leader of the opposition or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as soon as he takes office becomes chairman of that body, and immediately the council is tied to the policy of the government in office. If it should happen that the present Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition should be the chairman of that council then the very first thing the council will have to do will be to find policies that do not disrupt the policies of the government. Policies that might save this country might have to disrupt the government, but if the Prime Minister has been elected on the basis of maintaining the capitalistic order and his advisory council comes along with policies adverse to that idea, then immediately they are against the spirit and will of the government of the day and no attention will be paid to their work. Indeed, they will not do any work along that line; all their energies will be devoted to trying to find some way of dealing with capitalism as it is without making any changes which might be warranted by the economic facts. I am contending, Mr. Chairman, for a council that will be free to advise on the facts that are at hand, and to advance policies based upon those facts, whether or not they be acceptable to the government of the day. I do not say the government should be compelled to accept the findings of the council, but I do say those findings should be made public, and the data upon which the findings are based should be known to everybody. A government which refused to accept the recommendations should accept the responsibility entailed therein. Otherwise I do not believe the council would be of very great service to the Canadian people.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I remind the hon. member that subsection (e) of section 6 provides that the council shall publish such reports and findings as may be considered to be in the public interest.

Mr. IRVINE: That was the point upon which I was making my claim, namely, that provision is already made. I do not wish to be understood as advocating that the deliberations and recommendations of the council should be obligatory upon any government.

On the other hand the council should be free to make whatever recommendations the facts at their command warrant; they should be free to make the recommendations public, and then the government should take the responsibility for accepting or not accepting such recommendations. I believe firmly that if a carefully selected council, such as is here suggested and as will no doubt be appointed, were commissioned to find a way to distribute to the people of Canada the goods which those people can produce, such council could find a way to do it. It could, if it were left alone. Until we do have such a council and proceed on a basis of fact rather than on a basis of party tradition we will not find a solution for the problems with which we are confronted to-day. I would urge that the government change its mind in this regard. Such a change would ensure a better council than is now indicated; certainly it would not be a worse one. I do not see any common sense in a government taking the position that it will receive no suggestions from any outside people, and that the bill must go through exactly as it appears on its introduction, no matter how many improvements may be suggested. The government would not be harmed, indeed it would be helped, if the bill were improved as hon. members in this corner of the house have suggested. I again urge the leader of the government to reconsider the decision he has indicated to the house, and to allow hon. members at least to vote on the measure according to their individual ideas and not on party lines.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words concerning the bill, not because the explanation given by the acting Prime Minister lacked anything, but because I have been surprised this afternoon when I have listened to hon. members opposite ridicule the measure. I am in entire agreement with the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) who spoke only a few moments ago. We have before us a bill which hon. members opposite are attempting to ridicule out of court. Other bills which have been brought before this chamber and have been described as measures of progress and reform—the unemployment insurance bill, the eight hour day bill, and various others—hon. members opposite have tried to destroy, by declaring them unconstitutional. This measure they cannot prove unconstitutional, so they attempt to ridicule it out of court. If I may say so—and I am speaking as seriously as I have ever spoken in this chamber—to my mind this bill, far from being worthy of ridicule is the best measure we have introduced. I make that statement in all sincerity. The government has introduced progressive measures which may not have been as satisfactory as hon. members opposite or some hon. members in the third party might have desired. In that class we had the unemployment insurance bill, the eight hour day bill, and so on. No matter what may be said about them the fact remains that they were progressive measures, and were in line with present day world progress. I say the bill now before us is just as much in line with world progress, or even more, than the proposals contained in any other bill.

I remember, sir, that which apparently hon. members opposite seem to forget on all occasions, namely, that this world has been going through a period of crisis the like of which has never before been known. We have been going through an economic hurricane which has never been equalled. To-day that is but a platitude; every person admits it. Changed conditions require changed laws. The rest of the world absorbed that idea long before this; according to my information thirty-nine countries have instituted bodies similar to the one suggested in this measure. I admit quite freely that the bill may not make perfect law. After all, no government bringing in a measure expects perfection at the first attempt. I have no doubt imperfections will be found in it, and I have no doubt that some of the suggestions offered by hon. members in the third party, members who take a more constructive stand than do hon. members opposite—because their stand is entirely destructive—may ultimately be found necessary. I am free to make that admission. I must say, however, that some hon. members in the third party are destructive to a degree which does not serve them well and is not worthy of their ability. The hon. member for Bow River is notably one of those. He has an acute mind and a fine gift of speech, but I must say to him in a friendly spirit that the last few times he has discussed measures in this chamber he has adopted a destructive attitude not worthy of him and one which I believe will in the long run do him harm. For example, I will illustrate what I mean. To-day he finds fault with the whole bill because it is not perfect. I admit it is not perfect. I suggest that perhaps no two hon. members of the house would draw a bill in exactly the same language. But we must remember that the hon. member took the same attitude in regard to the unemployment insurance bill. Because it was not satisfactory to him and because it did not embody certain ideas which he thought should be incorporated he voted against it. He and two other hon. members opposed the measure; I refer to the hon. members for Témiscouata and Labelle. I do not criticize them for voting against the measure; that is their privilege. I must say, however, that at a time like this, the position taken by the hon. member for Bow River, namely, that if he cannot have a bill passed one hundred per cent as he thinks it should be he will vote against it, is not worthy of his ability. I mention these points in a friendly way, and merely make the observation that his action does not constitute constructive criticism nor is it constructive in any way.

Hon. members opposite do not pretend to be constructive. In the last four or five years they have never pretended to be anything but destructive. For six sessions—and on many occasions they have referred to the fact that we have had six sessions—they have done nothing constructive. Their whole attitude has been one of fault finding and destructive criticism—nothing else. I do not expect better from them, but I do expect better from the hon. member for Bow River, a man of great ability and one who, for his own sake, I suggest might exercise a little more constructive effort, if he wishes to have legislation passed as he would like to have it.

The reason I felt impelled to speak was that I consider this to be one of the most constructive measures any Canadian government has brought forward. To-day we have such problems as unemployment—and I am laying aside the railways problem for the moment. Not only in Canada but in the world as a whole is there any problem which so urgently requires solution as that of unemployment. All hon. members would like to bring about a solution. If any hon. member—and I do not care who he might be—brought forward a solution of the unemployment problem, I believe I should support it, irrespective of the other members in the house. But so far, having read as widely as I am capable of reading, and having sought the ideas of other people, economists and others, I have not yet seen a solution for this very serious, critical and vital problem of all countries. We know that there is no solution at present because all countries are to-day suffering from it at least as severely as we are. The United States has twice as many unemployed as we have, and Great Britain more than we in proportion to population, and all the other countries of the world are faced with the same problem, and to a greater degree in proportion to population than we are. Then let me suggest that a group of men such as is proposed in this bill, if they are given a problem such as that to consider, if they give their best brains to it as fifteen men of this type will do, may well succeed in bringing forth a settlement of such a vital problem to this country and to the world in general as unemployment.

There is the question of international trade. We all know that there has grown up economic nationalism throughout the world, which was really the basis of the calling together of the economic conference held in London a couple of years ago, and which really accomplished nothing. But there are methods by which economic nationalism may be decreased, and methods by which international trade may be increased.

There is the question of international debt, the question of interest payments which have been repudiated to a great extent by many of the countries which took part in the war. And finally perhaps the most urgent question of all, and one which is in a sense bound up with unemployment, is the question of the distribution of the products which we can produce in this country and which are produced by other countries. The countries in the world to-day have the ability to produce, if they could get down to business, more of food and clothing and shelter than is required by the peoples of the industrial countries of the world at any rate. But all the countries of the world have failed in working out anything in the shape of a method by which these products can be distributed. My hon. friends in the third party have taken a very strong atttiude on this question, and rightly so. I have done it myself out in the country, and all of us I believe, the best brains in the country, our best industrial brains, our business men and economists, must endeavour to work out some solution of that problem of distribution of the products of the farm, the factory, and the forest, which we are able to produce in the vast abundance of to-day.

May it not be that this economic council which we are setting up by this bill will, by sitting down and thinking over these problems, and studying them as members of the government have not time to do, bring forward some solution for even one of the problems I have mentioned, and I have only touched the fringe of the many problems that can be dealt with by such a council.

This council is for economic research. It has already been pointed out by some speakers that there are two types of research. We have to-day a scientific research council which is conducting research along scientific lines, by experiments in laboratories and so on. But the council that is proposed in this bill is an economic research council, a council which will study social and economic laws with the object of solving those problems which have arisen because there is something wrong in the whole social and economic system of Canada and other countries. It has been pointed out by the right hon. gentleman who introduced this bill that this council is for the purpose of inquiry and report, for the purpose of advising the government and advising this parliament and indeed the people of this country. It has no governing authority. This same type of advisory council has been established in nearly all the progressive countries of the world. I made it my business while the debate was going on to look up a list of the countries which have established some such council as this. Germany has what they call a federal economic council; Italy a national council of corporations; France and Belgium, a national economic council, and Czechoslovakia, Spain, Japan, Chile, China and even Russia have some such council as this which we are proposing to set up. My hon. friends laugh. Some of my hon. friends in the far corner sometimes point to Russia as one of the proofs of failure in this country. I think Russia at any rate has had the sense which apparently the official opposition and some of my friends in the far corner do not seem to have, of setting up an economic council of this sort. Great Britain since 1930 has had an economic advisory council, and its purposes have been described as follows:

> To advise His Majesty's government in economic matters, to make continuous study of developments in trade and industry and in the use of national and imperial resources ... and of all aspects of national, imperial and international economy with a bearing on the prosperity of the country.

That is exactly the purpose of this council. It will study the problems which the government of the day or parliament desires to submit to it.

The United States has a council of economic research. It is a private body, supported by private donations. Altogether there are 39 different countries of the world which have established such a council as this. Surely then it is not a strange thing that Canada should be the fortieth country to do it. Surely we are not to be ridiculed and laughed at if we set up a council which 39 other countries, most of them greater in population than us and many of them richer, have already set up. Here is a council to be composed of seven government officials, five men from economic bodies, and three experts.

May I just say here, as one who has been in this house for a great many years, that I do not believe this parliament or this government or previous governments have made sufficient use of the very outstanding ability which we possess in the civil service of this country. In my opinion we have talked too much about the boundless ability and brilliance of the civil service in other countries, such as England particularly, and in that way unconsciously we have belittled our own civil service. I want to say here publicly to-day that in my opinion our civil service is equal to any civil service in any other country of the world. We have in this country a civil service which during the imperial economic conference held in Ottawa in 1932 so ably organized the arrangements and work of that conference that it was stated by those who attended it that never in the history of imperial conferences had the organization been so ably done. That is only an illustration. All of us can name able civil servants. We have able deputy ministers, and heads of branches of departments who are outstandingly able men, leaders in their particular field. Then is it a mistake to take seven of these well qualified officials, say the head of the statistical branch, deputy ministers and experts, and put them on a council and ask them to work together instead of working as they do at present more or less in opposition to each other? Is it a thing to be ridiculed that we ask seven of them to link up their activities with those of three heads of economic bodies, labour unions, if you like, and manufacturing associations—I am giving these thoughts just as they occur to me, Mr. Chairman, just thinking out loud—and assisted by three experts? Is the government to be ridiculed because it has had the wisdom to do what thirty-nine other governments have done? Surely my hon. friends opposite have not thought over this sufficiently or they would not take the attitude of endeavouring to kill this proposal by ridicule, just as they have endeavoured to kill by constitutional argument a number of the other reform measures of the government. Over and over again as the government has brought forward its reform measures they have shown that they are opposed to them and they have tried to make them look ridiculous, but they have finally voted for them, except the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who had the courage to vote against the unemployment insurance measure. And they will not vote against this measure. They are trying instead to kill it by kindness, to behead it by ridicule. Their attitude is: We are all for this, but we want to chop off its head. That is not killing, according to their point of view. I trust that my hon. friends will be able to see as clearly as I do the importance of an economic body such as this, which it has been found well to set up in thirty-nine other countries of the world, Canada making the fortieth. I suggest that they do not take the attitude of belittling an organization such as this which can certainly do no harm, and to my mind must inevitably do some good for the people of this country and for the government and parliament of Canada.

Mr. POWER: The observations of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) who preceded him should really I think cause us on this side of the house some perturbation. During the last three or four months every time that any hon. gentleman opposite stood up it was to tell us that we had never offered anything but criticism of the government, but in this particular instance we are being chided and verbally chastised for not saying anything, and we are being told with all vigour and eloquence for which my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is famous that we are not doing our duty by the country. I think the hon. gentleman will admit upon reflection that he has been somewhat unfortunate in the instances which he gave to show the need of this economic council. He said that we had a grave problem of unemployment but it seems to me that we had that in 1930. Nobody said in 1930, "I will call an economic council in order to solve unemployment." A suggestion was made that we should call a conference of premiers but the reply to that suggestion was, "Not conferences but action."

Mr. MANION: We had four conferences of premiers.

Mr. POWER: The answer of those now leading the government was that they would cure unemployment. That was the answer given in 1930, and I think the Minister of Railways will admit that as recently as last January it was stated publicly on behalf of the government that unemployment would be cured before this government went out of office. I would point out that they have not very long to go and they had better hurry. None of the reform measures which has been passed by my hon. friends has been of any value in providing a cure for this problem. None of these measures has provided alleviation or even a palliative.

[Mr. Manion.]

Another perhaps more striking instance was given. It was stated that this economic council was to be set up to deal with international trade. What has become of blasting? It was stated from one end of the country to the other that we were going to blast our way into the markets of the world. We did not ask for an economic council, that was to be done by the government. Canada first was the cry. In 1930 the people elected not an economic council but a blaster.

Mr. HANBURY: A red-blooded one.

Mr. POWER: I should not like to talk to the minister about being red-blooded. Anyway, it is not St. Patrick's day.

Mr. EULER: The Irish stick together.

Mr. POWER: If we do not stick together, no one will help us.

In referring to international trade and unemployment, my hon. friend was good enough to say that all countries—I assume this includes Canada—failed in the solution of these problems. I take that to be an admission on the part of the government that they who were to settle these two most important questions which confronted the people in 1930 have failed. How are they going to remedy a situation which they have not been able to improve? According to the Minister of railways, they are going to remedy it by setting up an economic council.

Mr. MANION: No, I said they were going to study it.

Mr. POWER: The economic council is going to study these matters. Surely when hon. gentlemen opposite came into office in 1930 and stated that they had a cure for these things, they must have studied these questions. Is this studying to take place only after decisions have been arrived at, only after legislation has been introduced and passed and only after the country has been committed to a definite course of action?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is the general elections.

Mr. POWER: The government may have some use for it between now and the general elections. For instance, it may be necessary to summon Sir Herbert Holt to tell them about the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Or Beauharnois.

Mr. POWER: It may be necessary to summon Mr. Beatty to tell the Minister of Railways what to do in connection with the railway amalgamation. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is not present, but I suggest that in connection with bacon and hogs there is a gentleman named Sir Joseph Flavelle who might be of great use to him. He could pump salt water into things and then say, "To hell with profits." He would be a mighty good man. There are a great number of experienced men in Canada upon whom the government could call for assistance.

The hon. gentleman referred to the civil service but I do not think he needs an economic council to make the civil service work. We all know that we have very good deputy ministers. By the way, in passing may I say that the government might name a couple of deputy ministers. This would help to raise the efficiency of the service. These jobs have been kept open for three or four years in order that at some time or other the hopes of certain hon. gentlemen sitting behind the government may be fulfilled. And, incidentally, perhaps the civil service may be improved. During the course of his remarks last night, the hon. gentleman who was leading the house stated that the civil service must be put to some use. I do not know what there is to prevent the ministers from making their people work. If they cannot do that, perhaps we can find some on this side who could make the civil servants work.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No good.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) means that it would be no good to try to make the civil servants work or that we are no good, but I think we can leave that to the judgment of the people in his province. We will not enter into any controversy on a question of fact which cannot be definitely settled in this house.

We were told that other countries of the world have economic councils. We find that this council was first invented in Germany and it then spread to Italy. They now have one in Russia and from there it is coming to Canada. We have nazi-ism, fascism, Soviet-ism and—what is the word?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Toryism.

Mr. POWER: The former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) once had a name for it but I shall not repeat it. It is very easy to fool the people some of the time. Barnum did this when he ran his side show. His fat woman was never quite as fat as the people believed she was. He had a six-legged calf but most of the time it was supported by a stick of wood and a piece of superfluous cartilage. He had a two-headed pig which was nothing but a hog with a wart on the side of its head. But people did not mind this, in fact they liked to be fooled. I think this is the attitude they are taking with respect to this government. There should not be any great objection to their being allowed to run their time but the fact remains that they have introduced an inadequate unemployment insurance bill, to which we have not objected seriously. They have introduced a piece of economic inanity, a sort of Lord's Day of rest bill, and some useless minimum wage and pension legislation. We now have this one.

I am sorry a man of the ability of the Minister of Railways says that this is the most important legislation. I do not think he really meant to say that it was the most important; I shall not ascribe that language to him because I do not think it would be fair to do so. But if it is considered by this government to be in any way important that they are going to take from this house power which they already have to call into consultation with the Prime Minister ten or fifteen or twenty or thirty men in order that they may confer with and advise him as to the economic questions of the day; if that is to be considered one of the important reform measures, I really feel sorry that good friends of mine sitting opposite, hon. gentlemen for whose ability, knowledge and common sense I have a very high respect, are forced through the exigencies of politics and the circumstance that they are on the eve of an election, to support such legislation as this and to endeavour to cram it down the throats of the people of Canada in the manner of a Barnum sideshow.

Mr. HACKETT: I am always delighted to hear the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) especially when he talks in the lighter vein; he has that capacity for saying things in a way which rather tickles the imagination if it does not thoroughly convince the judgment of those who listen to him. His remarks this afternoon are in his best form; I think we can all admit that they were amusing. He has omitted however to tell us whether or not he intends to support this legislation.

Mr. POWER: It does not matter.

Mr. HACKETT: He has omitted to tell us whether he considers that study, investigation and report upon questions relating to social and economic conditions in this country are matters of importance and whether these questions should be investigated seriously and continuously by the best brains at the command of the country. If he is against this legislation, of course he is entitled to his opinion, but if he favours it, he has failed to communicate his intention to the committee. I fear that a wave of levity has overtaken his friends either as the aftermath of the celebration of a great festival or in anticipation of another one which I am told is in the immediate offing. I would ask my hon. friend seriously, because he is capable of being serious, whether he does not consider that these questions are worthy of study, and if they are, can he suggest a body more capable of giving them serious consideration and of giving the country the benefit of this study than that which is indicated in the bill? It is all very well to be amusing, to be entertaining, but at times the people who have their eyes upon us expect that we should be serious and devote our attention to serious matters.

My hon. friend suggests that because all ills have not been cured, no effort should be made to cure them. I may remind him that it was that policy and its practice which sounded the knell of the administration which he followed for some years. I feel the people of this country are interested in governments and in men who will strive, and in measures which will give an outlet to the energies and ingenuity of the Canadian people in the solution of the great problems which confront us. I would not do my hon. friend the injustice of suggesting that he was serious when he attempted to brush aside these tremendous problems with a reference to Barnum and his circus and by comparing Barnum to those who are now seeking and seeking seriously a remedy for the ills which are upon us.

We are confronted with an election. I do not know that that need be an opportunity to indulge ceaselessly in levity. The people will determine as they have done in the past, and the party and the men who are entrusted with the confidence of the people will constitute a government to carry out as best they may the difficult task which falls upon governments. Should my hon. friend be called to office, I am confident that he would then welcome the assistance, guidance and inspiration of a body of men such as that which is indicated in the bill now before the committee. Unless my hon. friend and those who surround him are willing to say that there is nothing in the principle which underlies this bill; unless they are willing to say that the bill is entirely frivolous and worthy of contempt, then I ask them to support it or vote against it, but not treat parliament as one eternal joke.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It gives me great pleasure to continue the St. Patrick's day celebration started by the Minister of Railways. I am sorry that he was a day late. I thank him for the faint praise with which he has damned me; I thank him most sincerely for the gifts that he bore me on fluent tongue. May I assure him that I appreciate the compliments coming from him, and envy him his rhetoric and invective. I envy the spirit and passion with which he can join in a partisan debate when it suits his purpose so to do. I have enjoyed the heights to which the Minister of Railways has risen at times. It ill becomes him to point a finger at myself or at others for having been guilty of denunciation of any measure, for there is no other hon. member in this chamber who has ever equalled him in bitterness of invective.

Mr. MANION: I did not use the word "bitter" at any time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not oppose this bill and have not done so; what I have pointed out is that it was a pallid ghost of what we in this corner had sought, and no possible mistake can be made in the statement that the government in bringing in this legislation did not introduce it in accordance with the recommendations that had come from this corner of the house. When the stream of irrepressible and ebullient verbosity of the Minister of Railways flows on, one is swept away by the torrent of words in which he engulfs his opponents, and while fluency is one of the qualities that I admire most in him, I have a sensation of drowning as I listen to him. But may I suggest that his illustrations were not well chosen. This bill is not patterned after the German method. It would not be so bad a bill if it were. Nor is it patterned after the Russian method, in spite of what the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said. It is not patterned on any European model at all; it is patterned definitely after the Japanese model. May I give to hon. members of the committee the set-up in Japan for precisely such an economic council:

> Symptoms of a state of crisis became noticeable in Japan soon after the end of the war; the increasing population, which made an extension of production and social welfare work necessary, brought economic problems into the foreground and made it appear desirable that persons of experience in these matters should participate in the life of the state.

This government is just becoming aware now of the fact that someone else beyond the government should participate in the life of the state.

An economic council was consequently appointed for the empire in 1924—

We are now in 1935.

—by imperial decree No. 70 of April 1st. Unlike the German Reich economic council, which, as a then unique attempt to establish an organic economic organization, aroused much interest and indeed gave rise to imitation in other countries, the Japanese imperial economic council was dependent, as one of the first economic institutions, on the prime minister. At the request and on the instructions of the ministers for agriculture and for trade and for finance—

It is even broader than this measure.

—and not therefore on its own initiative, it was to give opinions with regard to questions affecting the furtherance of national economy. It is, indeed, empowered itself to put forward proposals—

Which this proposed council is not empowered to do.

—with regard to matters within this sphere. This provision might, in practice, be interpreted in such a manner as to extend its rights further than the law suggests; it would be of interest to examine its activities in this direction.

I suggest that the government would be well advised to reconsider its position in this matter. A Review of the Economic Councils in the Different Countries of the World, by Doctor Elli Lindner, published by the League of Nations, points out that the economic councils in existence fall into two groups, the first group comprising those of France, Germany and Italy, which, being formed on the basis of a wide representation of economic circles, have an effective influence on national economic policy. They possess the right of initiative, and cooperate in preparing bills of an economic character before they are submitted to parliament for approval. Now that is quite a different sort of thing from this proposal. This is an emaciated, stupid, silly modification; it is a fleshless skeleton, nothing but a skeleton. When the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and others try to put a little flesh and muscle on it and develop a mind in it their suggestions are received only with lectures from the treasury benches and a torrent of words that bear no relation whatever to the facts or show evidence of study of the problem. The report continues:

There is, however, a fundamental difference between the French and German economic councils and the council of corporations. Whereas the two former bodies confine themselves to strictly advisory functions, the Italian council of corporations can in certain circumstances take decisions, though its powers are, generally speaking, limited by the right of veto held by the prime minister.

The second group, which is much the larger, includes a number of various bodies consisting of economic experts or representatives of various professions invited by the government—

As in this case.

—or by a member of the government to give their opinions on questions affecting the national economy generally or on special questions a study of which is of particular interest to the economic life of the country.

This bill belongs to the latter group. Now, while there have been economic councils of these two types in operation for many years, none of them has succeeded in solving the problem—not one of them. And they will not do so, because the directional policy in every single case has not been of a kind calculated to lead to a solution of a problem that cannot be solved under the present capitalist system. I am quite willing that the government should seek advice. I am glad it is providing itself with a crab apple since it does not want a Delicious or a McIntosh. But let it not delude either itself or the country; this economic council will not solve the problem, because the direction of it inevitably will be of the character of the government itself, and it will direct its efforts towards the stabilizing of conditions as they are in so far as they can be stabilized. That is, they will keep everything of the present system that they possibly can keep and make it operate. But it is a futile and vain attempt to make the unworkable work and is bound to fail, just as every economic council although long established has failed. But I welcome it because, if it is properly constituted, if it is composed of men of the type of mind I hope it will be, it may in time result in directing the attention of the government to the blind alley in which it finds itself.

Mr. CHURCH: Clause 6 is the most important clause of this bill, as it relates to the duties of the council. The people of this country are paying to-day for thirty years' neglect of this problem. The government has brought down a most important bill for social and economic reform. The proposal for this legislation came from the Conservative opposition away back in 1923 in connection with the question of a national coal supply. To-day I have a return showing that 2,800,000 tons of coal were moved last year from the maritime provinces to central Canada as a result of that proposal. Then this policy came up again some years afterwards, in 1928 and again in 1930, and what did the government of that time do? I shall read their reply to a question which I asked the government on March 13, 1930, with reference to an advisory economic committee along the lines of this bill. I asked:

> Will the government consider the appointment of an advisory economic committee for Canada to deal with economic questions?

And the reply of the Prime Minister of the day was:

> This and kindred subjects are receiving the attention of the government.

But they received no attention whatever, with the result that hundreds of millions of dollars were voted to the Canadian National Railways. Had that policy been adopted back in 1928 millions and millions of dollars would have been saved to the taxpayers of the country in over-capitalization and over-government. Looking over those years we see that no study was made of the question of unemployment, seasonal, technological or cyclical; no study was made by any federal, provincial or municipal body of the inroads being made by science and the machine on the employment of labour. The same thing is true of the housing question. Public works were constructed that had no economic value; some of them will never pay the fixed charges or the debt charges on them. Our natural resources have been given away; during the past thirty years our natural resources of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine were given away in a haphazard manner and the people are suffering for it to-day. Then look at the power situation—a country so rich in power as Canada, with forty-two million potential horsepower and only seven million developed, and no effort looking to a national hydro power policy. No study at all was made of these questions, nor of the inroads into the earnings of our steam railways made by motor buses and truck freight traffic.

When we look over these problems we see the necessity of a body such as this, Mr. Chairman, and I appeal to the opposition to help the government pull the country out of the mire. I do not think we should depend on the federal government to do everything. Canada's national economic problems are not going to be solved by majorities in parliament; they call for wide national sacrifices and the support not only of the government of the day and the opposition but also of churches, boards of trade and all public bodies. While this body is advisory, if its services are properly utilized it may result in untold good to the people of this country, who have become aware as never before of the economic abuses that are carried on here. It has been argued that parliamentary control has been so successful in education and finance, so why not extend it to banking and commerce, unemployment, housing, agriculture, imports and exports, radio and everything else from Dan to Beersheba? In the past we have had government commissions and departments multiplied to an unparalleled extent, not only in federal but also in provincial and municipal affairs, and I believe one of the principal problems that should be taken up by this council is the coordination of the problems of our various federal, provincial and municipal governments. If they only accomplish that task, so that we need not rely on some body away over in Geneva to solve our problems, they will do a great work. Some of these difficulties have been met by the municipalities themselves by way of contract; I refer to the problems in connection with fair wages, minimum wages, eight hour day, the elimination of sweat shops and child labour.

It seems to me that the principal fault of our parliamentary system under the British North America Act is that so far as our parliamentary institutions are concerned Canada is well on the way to being upside down. I think this council should consider parliamentary and constitutional reform such as will enable this country to solve its own problems. The question of the constitution of Canada is a matter to which I think the government should give very careful consideration. In the past we have derived very little benefit from some of our commissions because they have been top heavy with university professors and economists. If we want to do something practical we will have to rely on others than economists. Political economy is all right in its way, but it is not an exact science like medicine, chemistry or biology. These scientists argue from facts; the economist does not do so. He gives his opinion, and the opinions of economists are as far apart as the poles. So I hope this council will include some practical men; I think in reality it should be a brain trust to help solve some of the problems of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine. Professors are all very well in universities so long as they stick to their last, but many of them give advice on matters with which they are not familiar, and we have had a great deal of advice of that type. I think it would be better to get some practical business men together with the permanent officials, because when all is said and done the backbone of any government is the permanent staff, who carry on work that cannot be carried on by anyone else.

This council might well take up the question of what is to be done in regard to suitable employment for boys and girls of high school age, say up to eighteen. No study of that question has been made by any body so far as I can find out. I think they might study, investigate and report as to what should be done, in conjunction with the provinces and the municipalities, to solve that problem. To-day the youth of our country are suffering as never before. The commission might also make a study of industry. Low wages in Canada have been proved to be the cause of much crime in this country. Many children who are working in factories should be in schools, and the records show that most of our young offenders are underprivileged children, many of them from poverty stricken homes, who have been undernourished and handicapped and who have never had a chance or a steady job. So I think this body might make a report on what might be done along that line.

I believe another matter which might be taken up by this council, together with departmental officials, is the question of the evasion of our income tax by big business supermen, and trusts and high finance, in relation to unemployment. A commission in the United States studied this problem on Wall street and found that such evasion was retarding industry and trade in that country. The commission found that this led to starving industry and to very serious unemployment and was the cause of many of the evils from which that country was suffering. In my opinion income tax returns should be made public and I hope that when this council is set up it will go into that question. The brain trust in the United States, in attacking that problem, did more to help unemployment by exposing big business than was done by any other agency. In my opinion this council could do no better service than to recommend the publication of all income tax returns. We publish the facts and they are an open book in connection with sales of real estate and chattel mortgages and bills of sale, so why should we not publish the facts in connection with some in this country who are hoarding wealth and evading the payment of income tax with their financial manipulations. I believe that is one of the most important things that might be dealt with by this advisory body. There has been some talk of a union government in this country. In my humble opinion we had enough of that kind of government. Further, I believe the coordination of our two railways is impossible; I think with expanding trade and the end of the depression the national railways will become a great asset to Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I believe this to be the most important matter to come before parliament this session. There are those in this country who, having seen the economic waste that has gone on in connection with our resources, have laid the blame on our parliamentary and constitutional system. I think one of the most important matters that might be taken up by this advisory body would be some recommendation as to the reorganization of our parliamentary and constitutional system so as to bring it more up to date, in order that we may deal with some of these economic problems quickly in a practical and modern way. At the present time the British North America Act, as we have it, is a danger to the well being of the country. I do not think we should pass on problem after problem to different public bodies, which piles up delay after delay; we should have a quick, modern way of solving our difficulties. It is this situation that prompts some Canadians to long for a dictator in this country; they see the evils which have been apparent to parliament for many years, with parliament doing nothing to check them. I might refer to the terrible condition of agricultural and railway workers and those in the mines, as well as those in industry. We as a parliament must not forget that these citizens have invested their lives in these industries, but to-day they are suffering because of the selfishness of some of those who are styled big business. If we are to have a brain trust now let us have some proper investigation, something like the investigation of Wall Street by the United States senate. Let us have an investigation in the same way of St. James Street, and the way big business has been responsible for some of the very evils that we hope to cure through legislation of this kind. Let us have a real inquiry. If the investigation I proposed in 1923, 1928 and 1930 for an economic council for Canada had been made there would have been no Beauharnois deal. The natural resources the Lord gave us in the St. Lawrence river and in the Ottawa river were intended not for the barons of St. James Street, but for all His creatures in the country. When I proposed that we should have an inquiry in connection with the national coal supply I was told by the head of the National railways, right in the committee which had been appointed, that I was proposing a bargain lunch counter system of freight rates to carry the coal from the maritimes and Alberta to central Canada.

In 1923, 1928 and 1930 I asked the government of the day to appoint a body such as is now suggested, and we know what the reply was at that time. They did nothing, despite the fact that such a council had been appointed in England in the fall of 1928, and the present measure is patterned after their act. Clause 6 of this bill is almost the same as one of the clauses in the British act. The fact that they did do this is one of the chief reasons why the mother country has recovered faster than any other country. Look at what they are doing by way of supplying themselves with food. Some time ago they could not in a year produce more than a month's supply at one time, but to-day they are going over every lot and every farm in England and are making a great effort to increase their food supply to the point where they will not be dependent upon outside countries as much as they were. The farmers of Canada will not enjoy the market they used to have in the old country. They investigated the coal and steel industries, and as a result a report was made to the British parliament in 1928. Effect was given to the report; they did not do as we do in Canada. When our officials make a report it is pigeonholed. Their report was adopted, and all sections of the country, including the church, boards of trade and labour organizations have got together to pull the country out of the mire. That is what we need in Canada, and what we would have had if the suggestion made in 1928 had been adopted by the government of that day.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the house should thank the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and also the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) for changing the proceedings from a farce to a serious consideration of an important problem. This measure should receive serious consideration. If any person does not believe it should be given serious thought then I suggest that person should oppose it and should not attempt to ridicule it.

Why is there a necessity for an economic council? Why do we find governments in many countries appointing councils of this kind? That is one of the first questions we should ask ourselves. To my mind the answer is this: In the past, because of certain conditions, private interests were able to take care of the economic and social conditions within a country. During the last few years, however, and particularly since the beginning of the depression, private enterprise has fallen down and is no longer able to take care of the economic matters which at one time it attended to. Private enterprise always had at its command technical advisers, economic advisers, financial advisers and men qualified to give other kinds of advice. If governments are to be called upon to do the work which at one time was done by private enterprise, then governments will have to have officials at their command. Because the government of Canada, like the governments of other countries, have so many problems to consider, I believe they should have experts at their command who would be able to give sound advice. Some hon. members, and particularly the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), referred to the many problems confronting Canada—unemployment, railways, transportation, trade, and finance. The suggestion was made that we should try to find a solution for these problems. In my opinion the mistake made by the Minister of Railways and Canals and by other hon. members is that of believing that these difficulties can be solved one by one. As a matter of fact these different problems are not causes; they are effects. They are conditions which have arisen out of the fundamental basis of our whole economic and social life. When you have solved unemployment you have solved at the same time the problems of trade, transportation and finance. They are linked together and one cannot be solved without solving the others.

There is only one problem which has always confronted the people of the world, and it is that of deciding how best to provide themselves with food, clothing and shelter; that problem settled we find that others fall into line and are merely detail. The problem of providing food, clothing and shelter has confronted the human race from the time of its first appearance on earth up to the present day, the only difference being that to-day we have within our grasp or at our command the means to solve the problem once and for all. I believe it was the Prime Minister who said some few years ago in this chamber that at that time—and of course the same condition obtains to-day—there was in Canada industrial equipment sufficient to meet the needs of 25,000,000 people. To-day our population is only a little more than 10,000,000 people, and I submit that if we have the equipment to supply the needs of 25,000,000 people it should be somebody's business to find why we cannot use our wealth to meet the needs of our citizens. If the economic council will do that, then surely it is worth while. I must say however that I would be opposed to an economic council of which the present Prime Minister would be the chairman, not because I have not a high regard for his ability, integrity and honesty, but because I feel that during the last five years he has dominated his cabinet, possibly to the detriment of legislation which has come before us. I am sure that in the same way he would dominate a council, particularly one made up in greater part of civil servants.

The point was made that we had never made use of our civil service. As a matter of fact we have never made full use of any of our resources, and if this economic council could show us how to make use not only of our civil servants but of our natural resources, our industrial equipment and our man power, both mentally and physically, then the legislation would be worth while. I would suggest again that the government consider seriously the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. Although as drafted it may not meet with their approval I believe they should hold it over and ascertain whether or not they could bring down an amendment which would be more to their liking and would also meet the purposes for which the amendment was intended.

Mr. COOTE: To-day it is common to hear the statement that the problem of production has been solved. That of course is only a comparative statement, but the efficiency of the productive system is so far ahead of our methods of distribution that it seems to me there is every reason for saying that the problem of distribution is the greatest one facing us to-day. In my humble opinion there is no reason why the government should not accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). Our scientists and engineers have gone a long way in solving the problem of production. In Canada we have over eight million horsepower of mechanical energy installed in factories and power houses. Coupled with splendid labour saving machinery we have now a production system with power behind it which is equal to the power of eighty million slaves, to work for this nation of ten million people. We can produce goods in abundance, food, clothing, and shelter for more people than we have here, and yet we continue to endure this condition of poverty in the midst of plenty.

In 1929, so we have been told, we entered upon a period of depression due to the fact that we had produced too much. Surely it should not be necessary to say anything more than that to convince the government and members of this committee that this problem of distribution is the great one facing us. I remember four years ago the president of one of our banks said that the depression was caused by overproduction, and he was followed a few minutes later by the general manager who said in his speech that the way out was to work harder. Now if this depression was caused by overproduction, we all know surely that we cannot get out of it by working harder and producing more. Surely the only solution is greater consumption. There is the important problem facing us. How can we get that system which will enable us as a people to consume what we now produce? I say again that is the greatest problem facing us, that of finding a better system of distribution, and I do not see why we should not state in this act that one of the duties to be undertaken by this board, which is to be called an economic council and is to advise the government, shall be to consider this problem of distribution. I certainly hope that the government will change their attitude and accept the amendment that has been offered by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the vote take place without saying a word in support of the amendment which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). The bill as it stands is distinctly a step in the right direction, and I shall take pleasure in supporting it, but I do not think it goes far enough. It does not really meet what is probably the most important situation facing us, and that is the problem of purchasing power, and that I believe was the idea of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin in putting forward his amendment. No doubt the bill is being introduced to-day for no other reason than that of the extraordinary situation in which this country now finds itself. We are wealthy in the matter of goods and services, but financially we are poor. There is certainly a contradiction. It seems to me that we have been thinking too much both in the past and in the present in terms of money. We do not think sufficiently in terms of goods and services. The very fact that to-day we have on the one hand such vast quantities of goods everywhere, and the possibility of producing so much more, while at the same time we have more poverty throughout this country than we have had for many years, should be a challenge to every thinking member of this house. We have an army of somewhere around five hundred thousand people unemployed, and we are keeping to-day at the expense of the federal government no less than one million people on relief. These are some of the reasons no doubt why the government has introduced this legislation and I congratulate them upon doing so. I do feel, however, that if they refuse to accept the amendment now before us simply because it has been proposed by a private member of this house, they are making a great mistake.

May I remind this house that whatever is physically possible is or should be financially possible, and that is one of the problems that the amendment suggests should be considered. The condition in which we find ourselves to-day, with this vast amount of poverty, is largely the secret of many of our other problems. The railway problem, for instance, is largely brought about because of a lack of purchasing power on the part of the people. If people had purchasing power they would travel a great deal more than they do to-day, and would provide freight and express business for our railways, and we would not have the railway deficits that face us every year. Just about twelve months ago the railways of Canada put on reasonable rates from western Canada to the east, and they had to put on several extra trains to accommodate the people who wanted to come east. The people wanted to travel in any case, and they did travel then because they could travel at much lower rates.

The health problem again can be laid largely at the door of poverty. When people are in poverty they cannot get the necessaries of life, with the result that they are forced to adopt a lower standard of living, and ill health often develops. Crime also can largely be laid at the door of poverty because everybody recognizes that poverty is the mother of crime.

Mr. IRVINE: Poverty is the greatest crime of all.

Mr. SPENCER: As my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin says, poverty is the greatest crime of all. Again, the lack of trade to-day is not because we cannot produce or consume or because we do not want to consume; it is simply because we have failed to bridge the gap between production and consumption. As the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) so well said, it is a problem of distribution to-day, not a problem of production, and it is because too much of our legislation has been directed towards ways and means of producing more, and not of distributing more, that we have failed up to the present time. If we would look after the consumers, instead of taking so much pains with regard to the producers, the producers would certainly be able to look after themselves.

I hope the government will change their mind with regard to this amendment. If it is not worded just as they would like, I trust they will propose an amended wording so that the amendment of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin can be accepted. It would be a great mistake indeed for the government to turn it down.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, we certainly have no objection to considering suggestions coming from any part of the house, and my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) is not giving us sufficient credit when he suggests that we do not pay enough attention to things proposed by a private member. As a matter of fact I consider that the purpose that is sought to be achieved by this amendment is covered by paragraph (a) of clause 6, which is very broad indeed. I have read it over very carefully again, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that this clause and the others in the bill give ample authority for investigation and report upon any question which the Prime Minister may request the council to look into. In other words, paragraph (a) of clause 6 is quite broad enough to enable the Prime Minister to have an investigation and report upon the particular subject to which my hon. friend refers in his amendment. We prefer not to specify any particular questions which we think ought to be examined into by this council. I say to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that as far as I am concerned I do not think there will be any doubt that the question referred to in his amendment will be one of the matters in connection with which this council may well be given authority to inquire.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 13; nays, 31.

On section 7—Meetings of council.

Mr. COOTE: If this council is to be of any use to the government this section should be changed. Surely the council should meet more often than twice a year; I think it should meet at least twice a month. In such case the Prime Minister would be aware that he had such a council and would give it certain matters to investigate. If it is to meet only twice a year he might forget that he has a responsibility to charge them to investigate certain matters.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think my hon. friend need worry, as this council will meet as often as is desirable or necessary to enable it to carry out its work. Special committees and ad hoc members will be appointed from time to time for different purposes. The council is to consist of seven civil servants and eight persons from outside and it was thought desirable that it should be stated that they must meet at least twice a year. This section is not for the purpose of limiting the number of meetings.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 8—Special statistical investigations.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister explain what is meant by "investigations under the Statistics Act"?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The intention is that this council shall have the benefit of the work of the dominion statistician. These words may be superflous and if the hon. gentleman thinks they should be left out I shall consider the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think they had better stay in because the Statistics Act gives the power to direct an investigation and to undertake the necessary examination.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The council will have the benefit of the assistance of the dominion statistician in accordance with the act under which he works.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Annual report.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that certain words be added after the word "work". I have no objection although I think the point he has in mind is covered by subsection (e) of section 6.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps the acting Prime Minister is right, but I think it would be advisable to add the words "and findings" after the word "work".

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have no objection.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I move that section 11 be amended by inserting the words "and findings" after the word "work" in the second line of the section.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Expenditures.

Mr. McINTOSH: When this matter was being considered last evening I inquired as to the cost of this council. Has the minister this information which he promised to furnish when the whole house was in committee of the whole?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am informed that the annual cost will be $25,000 or $30,000.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

He said: This is now the fourth time I have introduced this matter into the house by way of a bill. The first year I came here I introduced it by way of a resolution. I have no apologies to offer to the house and to the country for keeping at this matter for four years; indeed, I intend to carry on with the fight as long as I am a member.

Long ago I came to the conclusion that it is within the House of Commons that this matter, the fight that British Columbia has in connection with the equalization of freight rates, should be fought out.

It is not my intention again to go into every phase of the question, because I am of opinion that after some four years perhaps enough has been said regarding the various rates and the rate structure without again taking up the time of the house in connection with them. However I would like to take a few moments to touch briefly on the history of the case as it affects the province of British Columbia.

Shortly, the situation is this: British Columbia at the time of confederation was a crown colony. Portions of railway systems had been constructed in Eastern Canada, but no outlet or access to the Pacific coast by railroad was then in existence. British Columbia at that time had her own customs and excise and was under the British crown a self-governing colony. As an inducement for her to give up those privileges and to join with the other provinces in order to complete this country as a dominion, she consented to do so on the understanding that railway connection would be given her and also that she would be placed on an equality with the other provinces so far as transportation was concerned.

The dominion government then had surveyors map out a route into British Columbia and they selected what is known as the Yellowhead pass route. The Canadian Pacific Railway were induced—and I am just stating the facts briefly—to undertake to build that railway into British Columbia. They however put their own surveyors on the work and decided that they would take another route which they declared was some one hundred and forty-two miles shorter, and known as the Kicking Horse pass route. After the railway was constructed, the rates into that province were set and the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time took the stand that as some difficulties had been encountered in regard to the construction of that road, necessitating heavy blasting of rock and so forth, they were entitled to charge higher rates than were being charged in other parts of the dominion. It must be remembered that at that time the Crowsnest pass rates were in existence. The people of British Columbia felt greatly incensed at the attitude of the Canadian Pacific, because they had been given to understand that they would be placed on an equal basis as to rates with the people of the other provinces. It is without prejudice that I say this: The attitude of the Canadian Pacific themselves in those early days largely brought about the construction of a second road into that province. British Columbia in 1909 or 1910 decided that something had to be done to counteract the power of the Canadian Pacific Railway and to give that corporation some competition by way of another railway in an endeavour to bring the rates down. So we had constructed from Edmonton to Vancouver another line which now is comprised within the Canadian National railway system. When the railway was being built, the people of British Columbia were taking care that they would have control of the rates and as matter of fact were considering inserting the rates in the act, but they did not go so far as that. However they saw to it that in the Railway Act passed in the session of 1909-10, the government of British Columbia would control completely the rates of that railway. But what happened? Just after the line was completed, the dominion parliament passed an act to the effect that that railway was for the general good of Canada, and at one fell swoop, shall I say, took away the railroads laid down by British Columbia and placed them under the board of railway commissioners. That very briefly is an outline of the history of the matter. I am not going to take up the time of the house with every little detail because I have many other matters to speak of, and as I said before, many of these facts have been placed on the records of previous years. The board of railway commissioners, might I point out, was presumably set up as a safeguard for the people; that is fairly evident I believe, because the railroads themselves required no safeguards as to rates. The railroads could set the rates, but as a safeguard so that the railroads would confine themselves to reasonable rates, a board known as the board of railway commissioners was set up, and I think I am correct when I state that that board was set up with the view principally of protecting the people from both railroads and not the railways from the people.

I am of opinion that the time has now come to review the board of railway commissioners. We have had put through this house an act to bring about compulsory co-operation in both railways. If I may use that term, and there is no doubt that competition in rates to capture traffic has been to a certain extent, if not entirely, eliminated. When one considers that in the neighbourhood of $330,000 annually is paid out to that board, that competition has largely been eliminated, and we are living in the year of our Lord 1935, under changed conditions, I think it would be well for this parliament to consider whether the board of railway commissioners is fulfilling as useful a function as it did when it was first set up.

The three most important factors in connection with the cost of railway service are construction, operation and maintenance. I am not going into the question of finance and all the intricacies of railroad management; I speak simply of the three principal items determining the cost of railway service. I have stated many times, and repeat briefly without going into minute detail, that in British Columbia construction costs were lower than they were in many other parts of eastern and central Canada; and also in that province they have lower operation costs and lower costs of maintenance. I repeat that, because it does annoy one to be told by some people that the railroads there have the mountain grades to overcome. We have, as is well known in British Columbia, the lowest grades in the whole dominion, especially through the Yellowhead pass from Edmonton, over the Canadian National, the maximum grade being seven-tenths of one per cent. I say again that the construction costs, the operation costs, and the maintenance costs of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National in the province of British Columbia are comparable with the low costs on the prairie and much lower than in parts of eastern Canada, especially over the Laurentian range.

British Columbia has paid very dearly for the mistake made by the Canadian Pacific in taking the Kicking Horse pass route. Although the Canadian Pacific received large grants of land and large subsidies as well to meet their contention that they had these difficulties to overcome, rates were set having in view the grades on that line at that time, and those rates have been maintained right up to the present day and have cost the people of British Columbia many millions of dollars more than they ought to have paid. I stated last session and I repeat that British Columbia can never look for any redress from the board of railway commissioners unless greater powers are given that board and drastic changes made as well. I pointed out last year that it was useless to go before that board. In spite of that, however, I was willing to try out the board, and so made an appeal to them asking that feed grains and mill feeds be carried to British Columbia at the same rate for domestic use as for export. Without going too deeply into the matter I may say briefly that the board relied in its judgment almost entirely on past judgments, at least the majority judgment did. The question was raised at the outset of the appeal whether I had any right to be there, inasmuch as the question had been decided some years ago. Right at the start the railway companies objected, saying this was the same appeal, and they asked the board not to listen to it. They said there would be no end to it if this case were again opened up. But the application I had before the board of railway commissioners was not entirely the same as the former one, because I was asking only that feed grains and mill feeds be carried into that province at the same rate as that charged on the same commodities for export.

To show how difficult it is to interpret a statement of the principles that should guide the board I am going to read the order in council, P.C. 886, passed in 1925, from which I ask hon. members if they would not form the opinion that very wide powers were given to the board to equalize rates. It says:

> The committee are of the opinion that the policy of equalization of freight rates should be recognized to the fullest possible extent as being the only means of dealing equitably with all parts of Canada and as being the method best calculated to facilitate the interchange of commodities between the various portions of the dominion, as well as the encouragement of industry and agriculture and the development of export trade.
> The committee are further of the opinion that to give effect to this policy, and considering the submissions made by counsel and important trade organizations representing different provinces and localities in the dominion as to the disadvantages that would be suffered by such provinces or localities by any partial or incomplete consideration of the freight rate structure, a thorough and complete investigation of the whole subject of railway freight rates in the dominion should be carried out by the board of railway commissioners, the body constituted by parliament with full powers under statute to fix and control railway rates.
> The committee are further of the opinion that as the production and export of grain and flour forms one of the chief assets of the dominion, and in order to encourage the further development of the great grain growing provinces of the west, on which development the future of Canada in large measure depends, it is desirable that the maximum cost of the transportation of these products should be determined and known, and therefore are of the opinion that the maximum established for rates on grain and flour, as at present in force under the Crowsnest pass agreement, should not be exceeded.

The ordinary layman reading that would, I think, be inclined to believe that wide instructions were given to the board of railway commissioners to equalize freight rates and for the conduct of that inquiry. That is why I stated at the beginning of my address this evening that if the province of British Columbia is ever to obtain any redress from the board of railway commissioners, drastic changes will have to be made in the Railway Act, and it would have to be stated explicitly. Otherwise, from the experience I have had and the judgments which have been rendered, I am convinced that the board would go through the act with a fine tooth comb to see if they could evade the question so far as the people are concerned. I was told last year, I believe by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), that the House of Commons is not the place to fix railway rates. I quite agree that if one brought into the House of Commons the whole railway rate structure of this dominion there might be some kind of a mix-up. But I say this, and I say it from experience, that parliament could not do worse than what is in existence at the present time. I ask any hon. member to look at the various rates in existence from one end of this country to the other and then consider whether parliament could have done any worse than the railways and the board of railway commissioners have done. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not asking parliament to fix all freight rates; we are asking parliament to give British Columbia what has been denied that province since 1886, and what was given the other portions of this dominion. We are not asking for anything unfair; we are not asking for lower rates than are given other provinces. We are asking for the same equal treatment that has been accorded the other provinces and surely that is within our rights; surely that is not unfair. We are asking this from the court of last resort, the highest court in the land, which is the parliament of Canada.

I am going to quote just one or two rates to show what I call the hodge-podge of railway rates in this country. One could devote a whole evening to these rates, but I am going to quote only a few. I want first to show the house the penalty British Columbia has to pay when it ships produce east as compared with other provinces when they ship the same produce west. If British Columbia wants to ship butter to Calgary or Edmonton the rate is $1.49 per hundred pounds, while if Calgary or Edmonton want to ship butter to Vancouver they pay only $1.37 per hundred pounds. What is the reason for the difference? Then take eggs: British Columbia produces great quantities of eggs; so does Alberta. But when we ship our eggs to Calgary or Edmonton we are charged $1.13 per hundred pounds while if Calgary or Edmonton ship eggs to us they pay only $1.10. The same situation exists in regard to fresh beef; the rate from Vancouver to Calgary or Edmonton is $1.13 per hundred pounds while the rate from Calgary or Edmonton to Vancouver is $1.10. Cattle shipped from Vancouver to Calgary or Edmonton pay 57½ cents per hundred pounds while cattle going from Edmonton or Calgary to Vancouver pay 56 cents per hundred pounds. It would be just as reasonable if the railway companies charged their passengers one rate from Calgary or Edmonton to Vancouver and another rate when returning from Vancouver back to Calgary or Edmonton. No railway company and no government would stand for any such differences in passenger fares, but the different freight rates I have quoted have been in existence for many years.

One might go on and show just how much more British Columbia is paying than is being paid by the other provinces, and I would point out that British Columbia should receive greater consideration from the eastern provinces because, as is well known to every hon. member from British Columbia at least, that province buys most of its manufactured articles in the protected east, but it is compelled to sell all its own commodities on a world market. But no consideration has been given that province in connection with the shipment of such commodities as butter, eggs, fresh beef, cattle and so on. I am not going to raise any question of the east against the west or the west against the east, nor am I criticizing the eastern provinces; but I would point out that all the rates in the eastern provinces are far lower than the rates in the west. I will mention just one or two. The eastern carload rate for a two hundred mile haul is 15 cents per hundred pounds; the less than carload rate is 30½ cents. In the west those rates are 20 cents and 51 cents, while in the Pacific section they are 23 cents and 59 cents. I have a whole list of such comparisons but I am not going to put them on record because it would take too much time. Looking over that list, however, one must come to the conclusion that the eastern provinces and central Canada certainly enjoy far lower rates than those in force in the province of British Columbia. After all, Mr. Speaker, provided that conditions are the same and that maintenance and construction costs are roughly the same, mile for mile should not we in the province of British Columbia have the same rates as apply in other parts of the dominion?

I have heard some criticism in regard to the Crowsnest pass rates, for example. I do not think the government however would assume the responsibility of removing those rates, which were set by statute in 1897 and reaffirmed by parliament in 1925 with some changes. It is unfortunate that in 1925, when the change took place, those rates were not extended to British Columbia, but I do not think this or any other government would care to assume the responsibility of saying the Crowsnest pass rates were too low or unfair. There they are, and I claim that we in British Columbia are just as much entitled to those rates as are the central and eastern provinces. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that one of the things wrong with our railways is that the passenger system is too costly. I believe a large part of the railway losses in this country occurs in connection with the passenger traffic. The railways were built primarily for freight, but the freight end of the business has not been developed as it should have been. I do not believe any hon. member would suggest that passenger rates should be raised; no, the tendency is to lower them in order to induce people to travel. The same principle should apply in connection with freight. To-day the railways are complaining of competition from other methods of transportation. I think they are going to have even more competition of that kind. They are experiencing it now on the great lakes, and in various parts of the country they are suffering from the competition of the trucks. I predict that if railway rates to British Columbia are not lowered, once the highway is completed from the prairies to British Columbia we will see long lines of trucks hauling wheat and other produce between these points because they can do it for much less than what is charged by the railways. Two years ago they tried moving apples from the Okanagan valley by trucks; last year many carloads of apples were trucked along the highway from Okanagan valley which in past years had been handled by the railways. Why is that being done? It is because the railways refuse to alter or lower their rates. The consuming public are not interested in the intricacies of freight rates; what they want is cheap service and if the motor trucks can offer them a cheap service that is the kind of transportation they are going to patronize.

Coming to the export rate to British Columbia, which is twenty cents per hundred pounds for export, might I point out that while on the surface it would appear that this is comparable to the rate to Fort William, it is really still much higher than that rate. During the hearing of the matter I challenged the railways to prove to the board of railway commissioners that the export rate on grain was a losing rate. I take the stand that the rate of twenty cents is a paying rate, and if that is so, why should the people of British Columbia who want to use wheat have to pay twice the rate charged on other grain that is hauled in the same trains by the same engines over the same tracks and in charge of the same crews? There is no reason for it at all. The railway companies have always dodged the issue when confronted with the statement that the export rate is a paying rate. The hauling of wheat is one of the major traffic items of the railways, and this might interest some hon. members: During the past few years the great bulk of Canadian wheat has been going out through Pacific coast outlets. In 1933 over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat went through the Pacific coast outlets while a total of only 83,000,000 bushels went out through all the eastern Canadian ports. I received these figures to-day, and to me they were most interesting. Of the 83,000,000 bushels shipped through the eastern ports over 6,000,000 bushels were from the United States. The exact figure for the Pacific coast ports is 100,587,923 bushels and for the combined eastern ports including grain from the United States, 83,675,534 bushels. I believe these figures will indicate the trend of the grain traffic to-day.

May I point out to hon. members that wheat can be shipped cheaper via Panama than through the eastern ports. I believe the railroads would find it to their advantage to give more encouragement to the use of Pacific coast ports. In my view the system of our freight tolls is antiquated; that statement was made many years ago before we had truck and other competition. The whole system should be revamped by a practical commission with a view to encouraging the service and to the selling of more railway service to the community. The commission should have in mind, too, the possibility of offsetting truck competition, because, as I have pointed out, if the railways do not go out to meet truck competition their revenues will become smaller and smaller as the years go by. Will the railways and the government stand by and watch the competition grow, a competition which in the end will leave very little freight traffic for our railways?

Since 1920 four changes have been made in the export rates to British Columbia. No change has been made in the domestic rates.

Mr. MANION: Except in regard to feed grains.

Mr. REID: Yes, except in regard to feed grains, but only temporary. Now that the minister has mentioned feed grains I should like to point out something which happened last year and which I believe will serve to indicate the arbitrary attitude taken by the railway companies. Tariff 145 designated certain grades of wheat which would be carried at a rate of 30½ cents per 100 pounds. Mill feeds were left out, and they should not have been left out. There is in Cloverdale a cooperative association composed of farmers, an association which buys as cheaply as it can and returns profits to its members. That association bought two carloads of burnt wheat unfit for human consumption. When it was brought to Cloverdale it was distributed among the members of the association, and the numbers 5 and 6 feed rates were charged. About a month later the railway company sent in a bill for $112 per carload indicating that burnt wheat was not under the tariff. It is true that burnt wheat might not have been mentioned under the feed grain tariff, but hon. members will realize that it could be used for no purpose other than that of feeding stock. As a matter of fact it is not very palatable even to poultry, but poultrymen will buy it because it is a little cheaper. I have mentioned these facts so that the minister may know the attitude of the railway companies, may realize how arbitrary—or shall I use the word unreasonable—they can be at times. Surely they must know that burnt wheat is only feed wheat, and could be used for no other purposes. Whether or not they have changed the rate by this time I am not sure.

On the order paper we have legislation to deal with minimum wages. It is all very well to have a minimum wage rate so that the workmen will be operating on a better basis, but so long as the province of British Columbia is subjected to these inequalities, in the matter of freight rates, so long as it is being soaked, shall I say, more than the other provinces, the wage changes will not be of very great benefit to that province. What reason can there be for charging a certain rate on a certain article going in one direction and another rate for the same article going in the opposite direction? I know the railway companies can give excuses; they are very good at that. It is marvellous to behold the manner in which they can quibble, as any of us who have had occasion to combat them could testify.

During the hearing of the appeal—and I ask the minister to take special note of this—the commission were asked why the rate was so low from Fort William to the eastern ports, and the reply was that the rate was low because of water competition. The rates for domestic purposes were kept low so as to endeavour to capture the trade. However when I asked them how it was that they had a rate of 25 cents per 100 pounds for domestic purposes as against an export rate of 34½ cents from Fort William to Montreal, they had no answer to make. They had been arguing that the export rate had to be lower so as to induce traffic, and that the domestic rate was considerably higher. Here was an instance however where they had lowered the domestic rate to 25 cents per 100 pounds while the export rate remained at 34½ cents. As I pointed out, a man could very well buy a carload of feed presumably for domestic purposes at 25 cents per 100 pounds, and ship it at the export rate, but if the reverse had been the order, the export rate at 25 cents and the domestic rate at 34½ cents, he would not have been allowed to buy the car on the export basis, and use it in the province of British Columbia. No answer was forthcoming in that connection. It is also very interesting to note that the rates were lowered to a considerable degree from Fort William to eastern points due to the fact that the milling companies were beginning to use their own boats. These interests, which had been encouraged by the railway companies and were given many concessions, were now stepping out, shall I say, to carry their own products on the great lakes. They were the ones who caused the low freight rates which existed on the great lakes last season.

I shall reserve any further observations until other hon. members have spoken. I should like however to repeat this question: Why should we in British Columbia be called upon to pay for the heavy losses entailed by the railway companies on steamships, hotels and other investments? I declare the export rate of twenty cents pays. If it does not pay I see no reason why the poeple of British Columbia should be asked to carry the loss. The fact that grain is going through the Pacific ports is to the great advantage of the railways despite the fact that the export rate to Vancouver and New Westminster is a little higher than the rate to the east.

This is the fourth time I have introduced this subject. It is not a political matter, but it is one which affects the whole of the province of British Columbia. We are not jealous of the maritime provinces, we wish them the best of luck, but when one notices in the estimates for the present year a vote of almost a million dollars for concessions to the maritime provinces in the matter of freight rates one wonders just how long we in British Columbia will have to cry before we get justice. That is all we are asking. We are not asking for a rate lower than that enjoyed by other provinces; we are not asking for anything unfair; we are asking only for treatment equal to that enjoyed by the eastern and prairie provinces. I would ask the minister, therefore, to take what I have said into serious consideration, and I should be particularly pleased if this year he would allow the second reading to pass and let us go into committee on the bill. I have pointed out repeatedly that it is useless for us in British Columbia to appeal to the board of railway commissioners, and I cannot make that statement too emphatically. That is the actual record. They themselves have quoted case after case, dating from 1917, and they have taken an attitude against any change in past judgments; they have said, "These judgments have been rendered against you, we are very sorry that we can do nothing for you in the matter." So long as these judgments remain and so long as this is the attitude of the board, then I contend that it is useless for us to make any appeal to them. I submit that parliament is the place where the injustice should be righted; it could be righted by this bill and changing the act, and we should then have what the east has enjoyed for many years.

I would ask the minister this question. Why is it that in the Railway Act the words grain and flour cover all grain and grain products, whereas when it comes to shipments to the Pacific coast the railway companies distinguish between export grain and domestic grain? I think the word "grain" should be applicable throughout the dominion. It is our view that this phase of the matter should be looked into.

I am not going to discuss the question of the losses sustained by the railways, nor shall I consider the question whether this is the proper time to make the change. In 1925 the railway companies used the argument then and said that they could not make any change because it would mean a dead loss to them if they did so; they opposed any changes in the export grain rates. Well, the Panama canal and the ports of Vancouver and New Westminster have opened up since. The rates were changed with respect to export in 1925, and what happened? The grain traffic has grown considerably. I submit that if we are looking for markets and for a more equitable adjustment as between different products in the country then one of the first things that should be done is to see that grain products are carried equally mile for mile under similar conditions throughout the dominion. I appeal to the government.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I congratulate my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) on the gallant fight he has put up in connection with the equalization of freight rates in the west, and I support him most heartily. I am not going into the details of this matter; I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house. The hon. member has set forth the arguments and given the details. We know why the rates have not been equalized. I am not prejudiced against any of the railways, but the fact is that in consequence of the mistake made by one of the railways—it is not necessary to be more specific than that—we cannot get an equalization of freight rates to-day. There is a very simple remedy available; there are thousands of railway men in Canada who could tell you what should be done. This afternoon I heard a good deal about a proposed economic council, and the chances are that when the council is established one of the very first things it will submit to this government, or whatever government is in power, is that the heavy hauls should be over the Yellowhead pass. It seems to me that an arrangement should be made whereby the Canadian Pacific instead of hauling heavy freights up and down the hills, should go through Yellowhead pass, where there is a decent grade. If that were done millions could be saved in transportation in that direction alone. We do not need to go to an economic council for that information; ask any railway man, whether Canadian Pacific or Canadian National, and he will tell you. that.

I cannot understand why not only the members from British Columbia but hon. members on all sides of the house from Alberta to Saskatchewan should not support my hon. friend in the appeal he has made, and I say that for this reason. They have feed grain to sell, and our climatic conditions are favourable to feeding not only poultry but stock. Give us an equalization in freight rates, give us a reduction in the domestic rates, and then the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan will have a market for their feed grain, which they require to-day.

That is all I have to say. I congratulate the hon. member on the fight he has put up, and it is not a political fight. He lives in the Fraser valley where he can see the conditions, and I can appreciate them too although I do not live there. I hope that other hon. members from the west will lay aside their prejudices and assist us, to see whether we cannot obtain a reduction in domestic rates.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I do not intend to discuss this question at any great length to-night. It has been a live subject and a very important one in British Columbia for many years. Let me say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Munn) that the members on this side from British Columbia advocated the lowering of the freight rates long before he ever entered this house, and there is not one hon. member from British Columbia to-day who is not in favour of it to-day.

Mr. MUNN: I have listened to the hon. member several times and have not heard him advocate it.

Mr. BARBER: The hon. gentleman has not been here long enough.

Mr. MUNN: I have been here long enough to know that.

Mr. BARBER: Let the hon. gentleman read Hansard. This is my tenth year in the house, and I do not believe there is a member from British Columbia who has not supported it during that period. One of the first members from British Columbia to take up this fight on behalf of British Columbia, which was the basis of the contention before the board of railway commissioners, was the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). When a special attorney was sent here by the Oliver government of British Columbia to fight the freight rates, that hon. member was the man who handed over his file and all the information he had, together with a promise of assistance on behalf of British Columbia. And we have followed in close cooperation with him. The only objection I have made has been to the method of obtaining the reduction. I would refer my hon. friend opposite to some of the statements made by his friends in 1925, statements by his own leader and by the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler). If my hon. friends will refer to Hansard they will find that both these hon. gentlemen at that time said that the proper body to deal with freight rates was the board of railway commissioners. The former Minister of National Revenue went further and said that if we could not get justice from the board then it was up to us to change the board. I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster in regard to the commission. I will not say that they have not dealt fairly with this matter, but I suggest that they are not a sufficiently judicial body, and I believe that many of these questions might better be taken before two or three judges of the exchequer court. If some arrangement could be made whereby, instead of appealing to this body, we could appeal to such judges to decide the case, I think the results would be more satisfactory. The question must be decided. Are we to undertake, in this house, the adjustment of the freight structure of this great country—a tremendous undertaking. I agree that the time has arrived when some adjustments must be made. During the last ten years great changes have taken place in our transportation systems, and I think it would be in the interest of the railway companies as well as the people to have a full inquiry. To carry traffic at a lower rate might get back some of the business the railways have lost to the truck lines.

As I said before, I do not intend to make a speech on this matter. I am sure that there is not a member on this side, either from British Columbia or from any part of the west, who is not in favour of the principle of lower freight rates. I had not the privilege of appearing personally before the tribunal which heard the appeal in this matter, but before leaving for the west I did appear and left with them a written argument asking for the inclusion of mill feeds in the reduction in rates on feed grains. Mill feeds are necessary to the dairymen of the Fraser valley, as they must have bran, shorts and chop. I can assure the hon. gentleman that for a number of years we have advocated lower freight rates to British Columbia and we still feel that it is necessary in the interests of the stockmen of that province that a reduction should be made. As to whether or not this reduction should be down to that of the export rate, is a question which will have to be decided but at any rate there should be a reduction on mill feeds to equal that given on feed grains. With these few remarks I hope I have cleared up the suggestion made by the last speaker that we, on this side of the house are opposed to a reduction in the domestic rates on grain. We are for a drastic reduction.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who introduced this bill (Mr. Reid) stated that he wished to reply, so I should like to know if he intends to allow this bill to go to a vote to-night. If that is his intention I can finish my remarks at one minute to nine o'clock, but if he desires to make a reply, I shall have to go into the question more fully.

Mr. REID: I said that I would like to leave the remainder of my remarks until later. I was reserving that part of my statement in case the government turned down the bill. If the government is going to do that then I feel it incumbent upon me to reply to the minister.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman will have to reply because the government cannot accept this bill. It is obvious to anyone who gives much thought to the matter that the government could not accept this measure. Hon. gentlemen opposite are boasting that they expect to have their party in power after the next election—

An hon. MEMBER: No question about that.

Mr. MANION: I think that is a futile boast. Let me say to them that in supporting a bill of this sort they are laying up trouble for themselves if they should be so fortunate as to come back to power after the next election. Any government, whether this one or any other, that attempts to make freight rates in this parliament will be occupied with nothing else but the making of those rates. Members from all sections of Canada will be presenting bills and we will have in this parliament a log rolling contest of the most exceptional kind. Hon. members from Quebec, from certain portions of Ontario, from New Brunswick and British Columbia will be wanting special rates on pulpwood. Hon. members from the prairie provinces will be asking for special rates on their grain products, and hon. members from the hay raising sections of Canada will be asking for special rates on that commodity. It is obvious that parliament cannot undertake to fix freight rates for the Dominion of Canada. In 1904 the board of railway commissioners was set up for the purpose of dealing with freight rates. Whether that board is a perfectly functioning body to-day is another question. Without wishing to reflect upon it in any way, I do not say that it is, but that is a different question. The matter of the reformation of the board of railway commissioners is an altogether different question from that of this parliament deciding to make freight rates. The opportunity to appeal from the ruling of the board has always been open to anyone. At the present time my hon. friend is appealing from a ruling on this question and that appeal will come up in due time before the present government. In spite of the fact that this privilege has been open to all during the years, no government has changed or altered a judgment of the board. At certain times different governments have referred back certain questions to the board and asked that they be reconsidered.

The parliament of Canada has not the proper machinery to deal with this most complicated of questions, so parliament has always taken the attitude that it cannot make freight rates. The hon. gentleman, in what has been a fair speech in a general way, has to-night asked this house, the members of which are not familiar with freight rates, to pass upon the judgment of the board of railway commissioners.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Weights and measures inspection service, including the international bureau of weights and measures, $314,396.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): When this item was up on Thursday evening last, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) suggested that the item should stand in view of what might be contained in the report of the price spreads commission. As it is apparent that that report will not be down for some time it is felt that the item should not stand any longer. On the same occasion the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) made some reference to car loadings of coal in the prairie provinces, and as a result of his observations and interrogation, a statement has been prepared by the weights and measures branch with regard to that particular matter. This statement I desire to present to the committee.

In the matter of discrepancies in the weight of coal shipped in cargo lots from the Alberta mines, it is suggested that this is essentially a railway matter and will be taken up with the railway commission. As a matter of fact this trouble has been given a good deal of attention by the weights and measures service. As a result of complaints in 1924, the weights and measures inspectors in Calgary and Edmonton were instructed to arrange with the railway officials to check-weigh a number of empty freight cars in the coal service, and from this check it was shown that the root of the trouble lay in the inaccuracy of stencilled tare weights, caused by repairing and strengthening cars, by refuse, including coal dust left in the cars, and by rain, snow and ice. The results of these tare weighings were sent to the railway commission in 1925 and 1926 for their information and action, and these checks were made annually for a number of years as the only thing the weights and measures branch could do to try to improve the situation. The work proved effective, for in March, 1930, out of sixty-one cars checked at Edmonton and Drumheller, all but two cars showed errors of only three hundred pounds and less, which the railways consider correct, and since then the department has not received a single complaint.

The officers also check-weighed a number of loaded cars and asked consignee to return unloading weights, and on eight shipments only relatively small errors were reported, only two being over five hundred pounds. In two cases there were errors of 1,250 pounds and 5,330 pounds on two 30-ton cars, and this error was definitely traced to inaccuracy on the part of consignee in unloading in small lots, a factor that should not be overlooked and one which would not be corrected by net loading. This demonstrated that if reasonable care were taken, freight car loading and weighing would give reasonably accurate results, and it would seem to be a matter for the railway commission to order the railways to exercise such care, since the railways are under their exclusive jurisdiction. If then such reasonable care were enforced, there would seem to be no need for net loading, as to do so would involve heavy expense to the mines in installing costly scales and elevating machinery for net loading purposes.

The inspectors at Edmonton and Calgary are again being instructed to arrange with the railways to make another check-weighing of empty cars at the Edmonton and Drumheller mines, and as soon as these results are obtained, the matter will again be taken up with the railway commission. The railway scales are not in question. They are inspected yearly by the weights and measures inspectors by means of a 60,000-pound test car.

Mr. COOTE: It was very difficult to hear everything that the minister said. Might I ask him how often these cars are weighed so as to obtain their tare weights? That is not done every time a car is loaded, is it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The weighing of the cars is under the authority of the railway commission. I understand that under their orders this is supposed to be done every two years, but the scales on which the department tests the weights of the cars are inspected every year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the minister for some explanation with reference to the item of $1,100 for the service between Ile-aux-Coudres and Les Eboulements?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What particular information would the hon. gentleman like to have?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to know whether there is a contract at present in force for this ferry boat service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a contract dated June 25, 1934, and the duration of it is until June 30, 1939. This is a joint contract between the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Post Office Department, and Alphonse DeGagné.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was the contract awarded in 1934 in the month of May? If my recollection is correct, last year no amount of money was voted for a subsidy for that ferry boat service, because the predecessor of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had refused to grant a subsidy for it. I wonder how it is that the contract was started in the month of May if no subsidy had been provided.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am instructed that no service was performed in 1932 and 1933, but in 1934 tenders were called for and Alphonse DeGagné was the successful tenderer. An order in council was passed on May 13, 1934, awarding the contract to him. Tenders were called for on March 26, receivable up to April 30. Six tenders were received. There was an amount of $786 in last year's vote.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So last year this man received only $786. Does this vote cover only part of this contract? Will he receive something else from the Post Office Department?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This $1,100 is all he will receive from this department. The balance I presume will be received from the Post Office Department.

Mr. REID: Could the minister tell us if these large items for the Pacific coast are for mail, or are they for mails and subsidies for lumber?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not all for mail; some of these ships carry mail and some do not. The first one, British Columbia and Australia and/or China, is a lumber subsidy. Mail is not carried.

Mr. REID: Would it take long to go down the list? I am interested, as I have a bill before the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): British Columbia and Australia and/or China is a freight service. British Columbia and South Africa is a subsidized freight service. The Canada, China and Japan service is of course the Canadian Pacific mail service. Canada and New Zealand is a mail service. Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte islands is a general service with mail.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What companies handle that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte islands service is handled I believe by the Canadian National.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not anxious to hold up a number of items, but there is an item relating to steamship subsidies that I am greatly concerned about in connection with some advances made to the Richelieu Corporation in 1933. I do not think this is just the time to discuss the matter, as there is litigation pending which is likely to terminate in the course of the next two weeks. One of the members who is very much interested is not here, and I would appreciate it if the minister could see his way clear to give us an opportunity to discuss the matter at a later day—I suggest after the criminal trial is finished, which, as I say, I expect will be within the next two weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite appreciate what the hon. gentleman has in mind, and I am very desirous of accommodating myself to his wishes. I do not know that the criminal trial would have any bearing on any debate or statement here, although possibly I am not fully advised on that point. But there are some supplementary estimates to come; could we not proceed with this item with the understanding that the question which my hon. friend desires to discuss could be taken up on the supplementary estimates? As a matter of fact there is no item in this whole list of steamship subventions that is really pertinent to the subject matter which my hon. friend has in view; there used to be one which would have been appropriate. But I should think there would be ample opportunity to discuss the matter under the supplementary estimates or even under the relief act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I am concerned about is that an opportunity be given when my hon. friend is here—and he is here most of the time—to discuss this matter. I hold no brief for the people who are accused, but as they have a trial pending within ten days or two weeks and as they come from another province than that in which they are being tried.

perhaps a discussion now would not be well timed. As long as the minister makes the statement, which is perfectly acceptable, that we shall have an opportunity of discussing it at a reasonable time—

Mr. DUFF: Carried.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You wait. As far as the supplementary estimates are concerned my hon. friend knows how they go through, sometimes at the last moment. I would not want it deferred until the very last, but if the minister could see his way clear to give us an opportunity under the relief program that would be satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member's position is I think quite clear, and I will give an undertaking now. There is one supplementary estimate for the current fiscal year under which I will undertake that he shall have an opportunity to discuss the matter which he has in view; or I will arrange that he may discuss it under the relief act—one or the other of those two items. Meantime I should like to make progress with this large item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That arrangement will be quite satisfactory. I am greatly obliged to the minister for that assurance.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): In connection with the China and Japan service, I understand that representations have been made from the timbermen's association and also from the associated boards of trade that when this subsidy is granted for this year it be stipulated that certain boats shall call at Prince Rupert on their way to the orient.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that arrangements are being made for eight calls per annum at Prince Rupert on the outward voyages if reasonable cargo offers, and if reasonable cargo offers I have no doubt arrangements can be made for a call inward.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Civil Government—

Salaries, $402,692; contingencies, $45,948.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the item is carried may I ask the minister to give an answer to some questions which I proposed when his estimates were last under consideration? I suggested then that we might very well have some outline of the policy of the department. I think almost every other department has a certain well defined policy. The minister has no doubt had an opportunity of reading the questions which I then asked. They were not asked in order to embarrass the department, but I think we have a right to some knowledge as to the general policy of this country in matters of defence.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): The policy of the government with regard to the Department of National Defence is identical, so far as I know, with the policies adopted by governments in the past. There should be a department to take charge of the defence of the country. There should be a force, represented by the three branches of the service, capable of undertaking the defence of the country should the country's boundaries be in jeopardy. That force is divided into the naval service, the militia service and the air service and it is composed of the permanent and non-permanent forces. The permanent force is a small, highly trained, extremely efficient body of officers and men which in times of peace largely acts as a training force for the non-permanent active militia. The non-permanent active militia is composed of the various branches of the militia service, the air service and the naval service, and it is an entirely voluntary body of men whose payment by the country is simply that payment which reaches them for the period of training each year. They go out for their training and the recompense which they receive is but small. The expenses, therefore, to which those non-permanent units are put are very largely paid by the officers of those units, to whom in my opinion the country owes a considerable debt of gratitude. They give their time, their interest and their service, and we have but to look back to the outbreak of war in 1914 to see the test to which the defence forces of Canada were put. The plans which had been made, somewhat modified year by year, were put into operation and these skeleton forces were rapidly expanded into such bodies of men as were capable of joining the contingents of other parts of the empire in the war into which unfortunately we were cast, for the protection and security of the country.

I do not know that in any way the Department of National Defence has changed what has been the policy of the department in this country for many years past. It has to see to it that the forces at its disposal are kept up to the mark; that at least an attempt is made to keep abreast of modern developments in the conduct of punitive expeditions, and it has to maintain a service of efficiency which will stand the test when the testing time comes. In addition it fulfils another duty, that the force should be distributed throughout Canada in the military districts in such a way that if called upon by the provincial governments in times of stress and strain, through civil disturbances within their own boundaries, they can render such assistance as may be necessary to support the police forces of the country. The Department of National Defence, therefore, is retained and upheld for these two main purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any close, steady cooperation between the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. STIRLING: There is that cooperation which exists between and throughout all the departments of government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister suggested that prior to the last war there were certain general plans in existence. Is there any definite plan with regard to any future war that might break out? Is there a plan ready for the defence of Canada in such an event?

Mr. STIRLING: There are the necessary plans under which the forces would be called upon to operate in the event of trouble breaking out. Those plans of course cannot be described in public. They exist; they are relied upon, and they are modified as events take place.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the event of a European war is it the present plan of the department that our forces could be mobilized and thrown into the war zone in Europe? Is that in contemplation at the present time?

Mr. STIRLING: No, Mr. Chairman; I should not say that is in contemplation. Certain forces of Canada were drawn into a European embroglio some eighteen or nineteen years ago. The plans were sufficient for that at that time, and we must assume that the plans would be sufficient for Canada to undertake whatever share the government and the people decided she should take if the occasion arose.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does any representative of the Department of National Defence sit on the imperial council in London?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any sort of arrangement with regard to what might take place in connection with the air force in the event of hostilities breaking out in Europe?

Mr. STIRLING: No, not in the sense that I gather the hon. member has in mind. There is an exchange of officers, two in number, between the imperial army and the Canadian militia forces; there are two of our officers in England and two imperial officers in Canada. They might be called liaison officers, and in addition there are a certain number of Canadian officers of each branch of the service, I believe, continually undertaking courses in England, but there is no definite Canadian representative on any defence council of the empire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then there is no definite arrangement under which the Canadian air force would become a unit of the imperial air force?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister think that in the event of war in the Pacific Canada alone would be able to defend the Pacific coast from anyone who might invade Canada or bombard our ports?

Mr. STIRLING: That is rather a large question, Mr. Chairman, to which I do not know that I am capable of giving a definite answer. In the last war the Pacific coast was not attacked. I do not know that I am in a position to say, or that the hon. gentleman could give an opinion, as to whether Canada's defence forces would have been adequate for the purpose if that coast had been attacked.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not speaking of the last war; I am speaking of any future war. I take it that the task of the Minister of National Defence, so long as we have a department of national defence, is to make adequate military provision against attack. I ask him, as the responsible head of that department, whether he considers that our forces on the Pacific are sufficient, unaided, to defend the west coast of Canada from any attack.

Mr. STIRLING: I think that would depend entirely upon the strength of the attack.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, that is quite obvious; I would scarcely need to be told that. I do say however that we have an exposed coast in the west. According to the minister we are spending a large sum of money in the hope that through military means we may be able to defend ourselves. Some of us are not very enthusiastic about that method, and we are not at all sure that it is the best means of maintaining ourselves in a state of peace. However I take it that the fact we have a department of national defence and are spending about $15,000,000 on it presumes that as a country we are confident that we are adopting the proper way in which to defend ourselves. Does the minister contemplate that the forces at his disposal will be sufficient to defend Canada in the event of any material attack on the west coast?

Mr. VALLANCE: Obviously no.

Mr. STIRLING: The force which would undertake the defence of the Pacific coast would be distributed in such a way as to do its very best to effect that end. The extent of the defence which could be undertaken of that or any other part of the country is closely connected with the amount in dollars voted by this committee for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the moment I am confining my observations to the matter of national defence, and I am assuming that we are not spending these moneys for any nonsensical reasons. We have an extensive coast line in the west, and two little vessels to defend it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is enough.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone says that is enough. In the judgment of the minister is the force sufficient to enable us to defend ourselves in the event of a serious attack on the west coast? I believe my question is a reasonable one.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not believe I could add anything to what I have already stated. The forces at our disposal on the west coast would do the best they could, and the success or failure of their efforts would depend on the strength of the attack made against them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the size of the force?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Two by four.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I refer to the naval forces available.

Mr. STIRLING: Two destroyers and one mine sweeper.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the air force available?

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if the hon. member would be content if we discussed the air force when we reached the vote for aviation.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very well. Following up my earlier questions may I say that my thought is this: If I am at all right it is surely obvious that with our very small naval force, supplemented by the air force available, Canada would find it quite impossible to defend herself against any serious attack along the west coast. That being so, may I ask whether there are any definite plans by which the British navy or the American navy would come to our defence?

Mr. STIRLING: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. ROSS: I am pleased to hear the discussion which has taken place on this item. The remarks I should like to make may have some bearing on following items in the estimates, but perhaps it would be convenient to complete my observations at this time. During the last few days I believe that as citizens we have been compelled to give more serious consideration than has been given in the last twelve or fifteen years to the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Hon. members should consider these votes and ask themselves what we have reserved for the $9,000,000 or $12,000,000 or such sums as have been voted in the years following the close of the last war. The vote has increased from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, $11,000,000 and so on. I believe it is quite in order that hon. members should ask what we are getting for these large sums of money, and whether we are getting what we should have at the present time.

Some time ago I spoke about the nature and the extent of the next war. The result has been that there has been an increase in the estimates along the lines I suggested. We note an increase in the estimates for the air force, amounting to about $700,000. Undoubtedly history has shown that we have always been preparing for the past war, not for the future war. Following the continental wars and the wars of the American independence we put all our time and consideration upon improving the infantry. Following the South African war we directed our energies to an improvement of the cavalry and the mounted infantry. Since the close of the great war it may be that we have been going a little too far in the development of artillery. In other words we are constantly preparing for the war that is past, not for the war that is likely to come.

If I had my way there would be no more wars. I have had as much experience in war as any hon. member of the house. Possibly more. The old British army without a doubt has outlived its day and has gone. What a splendid history it had! Beginning under adverse opinion it worked its way into the affections of the people, the parliament and even its enemies. When the army of Marlborough returned from its great wars and victories the men were treated as plagues. In England they were looked upon as pests, despite the fact that they had only recently returned from their glorious victories. Following 1763, when through the acquisition of colonies Great Britain became an empire, the suggestion was made that there be a standing army to be used to garrison the outposts of the empire. The people in parliament treated that army as another plague, and the cry of "down with the standing army" was raised. Mercenaries had to be hired to do the work, and the service given was altogether unsatisfactory. Again in 1815 the British army returned home after its glorious victories, having saved the empire and perhaps the whole of civilization. Again they were treated as plagues and pests. After 1815, however, the empire was greatly enlarged by acquisitions of considerable extent, and accordingly a force had to be raised and maintained. What treatment did it receive? Instead of being retained at home practically the whole army was banished to foreign service and had to undergo great misery and suffering. In Australia it lived in a state of wretchedness. In Cape Colony, now Cape Province, it was almost abandoned; in the tropical countries yellow fever almost wiped them out, eighty per cent of the force vanishing each year. In the West Indies, where we are told there is a delightful climate, the army lost forty per cent of its number. In Minorca the army was sent without bedding and meat was omitted from the ration. In Burma in 1824-26 it marched through the jungles without vegetables, milk or meat and only one out of seven of that army returned. I am giving this historical illustration to show what the army has gone through and what splendid service it has rendered to the empire. Here was an army in terrible condition, passing through cruel suffering in the Crimea, and for the first time the British public began to realize its responsibilities. For the first time the people of Great Britain began to see that they were responsible for that army and for the conditions under which they served, and for the first time British soldiers returned from victory to be decently treated by the British people and the British parliament. The army has had a wonderful history, and I bring this up because I want the house to realize how much the empire has owed to the army in the past, what splendid service it has given and what a record it has made for the British people. British soldiers entered a country on every occasion as an enemy, and invariably came out friends of the people into whose country they went. In South Africa the British army marched through the whole field without one complaint from the citizens of misbehaviour. The Peninsular army marched from the Pyrenées up to the channel and returned home without a complaint from a single citizen.

This is the army we have been proud of, but its day is gone. It has left a great responsibility, however, upon the people of the British empire, upon the people of Canada, that of seeing that similar conditions do not prevail in the future. If another war should come, which God forbid, let us see to it that those who go first shall not be left in the position of those who went first in former wars. One hundred thousand were completely wiped out for lack of preparedness; one hundred thousand lives were practically sacrificed in order to afford time to make preparations so as to meet the enemy. Consider what we are doing. What I am about to say is not intended as criticism, though perhaps we have been indifferent. The old army is gone. We have remnants of it going around yet; we have an infantry parading with rifles, which are as obsolete to-day as the bow and arrow when you remember that there are machine guns. We have the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery in Kingston without horses; and yet they include swords and spurs in their equipment. If you want to realize what is really important so far as service goes I would ask you to read a part of the report of the Department of National Defence. Let us read that report and ask ourselves whether we are satisfied with the conditions which that report discloses. There is no question whatever that the air will be of greatest importance in future preparations. I would refer the committee to page 76 of the report for this year, though there may be some changes, and I would ask the minister whether in his opinion an increase of $700,000 is sufficient for preparations. At page 76 we have the different types of machines set out:

Siskin.—Single seater fighters of a type which has been withdrawn from service in the Royal Air Force as obsolete. The last Siskin was purchased in January, 1931.

Atlas.—An army cooperation type now being withdrawn from service in the Royal Air Force. Although not up to date, this type is satisfactory for army cooperation training. The last Atlas was purchased in December, 1928.

Vancouvers.—These aircraft were originally purchased and used for civil government work but have now been modified for service purposes.

Training types:

Fleets.—A two seater training type suitable for ab initio training.

Moth 60.—A light two seater training type now obsolescent.

Avro 621.—A two seater training type which has been adapted for army cooperation training.

Courier.—An obsolete type but retained in service for air firing practice.

Tomtit.—A two seater type used for practice purposes.

Other types are mentioned, such as Fairchilds, Bellancas, Fords and so on, and there is this footnote:

These aircraft are rapidly becoming obsolete, although a number are still suitable for civil government operations. A few are suitable for training purposes.

If the minister says that he is satisfied with what this report discloses then I do not think that this house should be satisfied. If we are to have an air force, and it is one of the three I consider necessary, then it should be properly equipped, and it is the duty of the members of this house and of the citizens of this country to see that the force is properly equipped. No doubt the minister will discuss this matter, and I am sure he will agree with me that the present state of affairs is not satisfactory. I want him to tell me whether he really thinks that an increase of $700,000 is adequate. Every member of this house and every citizen in the country, I have not the slightest doubt, will advise him to get after the air force and introduce modern types—that is, if we are to have a defence force as more than something to play with, if it is at all necessary, and if this vote of $9,000,000 is not to be lightly passed over without proper consideration. It may be, with these dark and threatening clouds overhead, that we may change our whole equipment and our whole policy, and on this point I will speak later.

Leaving the air force for the present, let us see what the situation is so far as the sea is concerned. Again we have nothing but the splendid recollection of the wonderful British fleet. How these names have stirred us from boyhood up, the names of great sailors who have made the British empire what it is. But the battleships of the earlier days are gone; their usefulness has ceased. Speeds of twenty and twenty-one knots an hour are no longer adequate; to-day they are building the nine and ten thousand ton cruiser with a speed of thirty and thirty-one knots. But after all, is that the important part of the defence force? I am sure that the hon. gentleman is sincere, but just think of the great Pacific coast absolutely without any defence. We have two or three little cruisers there, and as soon as any trouble arises you will have to bring them in behind a rock or under cover somewhere. If trouble arose between any other two nations this country would suffer. What is practical sea defence to-day? It is no longer battleships or cruisers, it is the submarine. The history of the last war shows the important part played by submarines. I hope the committee will grant me a few moments to give a picture of what happened during the last war.

In August, 1914, we lost 40,200 tons of shipping through the action of submarines. In July, 1917, we lost 364,000 tons by this means. During the period of the war 6,692,000 tons of British shipping were sent to the bottom and at the beginning of the war we had only 20,000,000 tons. We were finally losing more ships than it was possible to replace under any policy of shipbuilding. If we are going to have naval defence, the only defence I can see will be of any use to us is that furnished by submarines. The cost of this type of defence is very small when compared with the cost of training infantry, cavalry and so on. Lloyd's estimate that during the war we lost 5,861 vessels with a tonnage of something like 13,233,172, a figure greater than the one I have given.

I do not wish to detain the committee, but there is a point or two I should like to bring to its attention. If we are to have defence, I think we should spend the money on something which will be up to date and let the rest go. I should like to make two or three proposals. I suggest that the future policy of defence should not be left in the hands of the three or four permanent officers who compose the council. No one knows whether they ever meet and no one knows what propositions are considered. I think this council should include some public representation. The future war will not be a matter of bullets and powder, it will be a matter of industrial activity.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Chemistry.

Mr. ROSS: That is industry. We have heard a lot about councils to-day, but I think the one spoken of this afternoon is going to work out. I believe civilian representation on the defence council would be of great assistance.

There is another objectionable matter in connection with the permanent forces. These forces are made up of a number of young men and in my opinion they should be encouraged to make permanent homes. Yet when they want to get married they are told that they must wait their turn. A man may have to wait about fifteen years in order to get a place. I say to this council that they should cut out the swords and the spurs, eliminate these antiquities and let the men of the permanent forces marry when they will and give them an extra allowance when they do marry. If this is done I think we will have a better force, as the men will appreciate this.

Men have been permitted to rise in the permanent forces step by step and retire when they have reached the limit of superannuation or pension to enter into competition with other people in civil government appointments. There are men with thousands of dollars of pension occupying civil government positions paying salaries of eight, nine or ten thousand dollars. The same thing happens with great war pensions. Men are receiving pensions of $180 a month and occupying other government positions. This thing should be evened up. When a man has a substantial pension I think he should be satisfied and not try to occupy another position.

I should like to refer to another matter in connection with the forces in the north. These men are out of contact with their families. A short time ago a young man from my constituency who was in the signal corps alone on Camsell river disappeared, it being supposed that he was drowned. He had a life insurance policy amounting to $2,000, by which $1,000 was left to his mother and $1,000 to his father. In addition he had about $200 in the bank. It has taken every cent of the money he had in the bank as well as some of the insurance money to get his estate settled up. The department insisted that the insurance policies should be sent up north in order that his estate might be settled. I am mentioning this simply as something which may concern other boys who are in the north in the flying or signal corps. This boy was an only son and the parents have been put to considerable expense in having his estate settled. I hope the minister will see that in future cases the department will be fair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to go back to the point I was discussing just before the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) rose. I quite agree with the hon. member that spurs, swords and that sort of thing are obsolete, and that undoubtedly from the standpoint of defence the air forces are the ones that will be used most in any coming war. But it seems to me that war itself is or ought to be obsolete; that arms have been shown to be no real defence and that we are to-day simply playing with this whole business. I am not so much concerned about the expenditure of the $15,000,000, although that is a large amount and it might very well be used to much better advantage, but I believe this expenditure of $15,000,000 not only is very largely a waste of money but so far as other nations are concerned, tends to be provocative and at the same time to lull us into a sense of false security. We have undoubtedly come to a position in the history of the world when no one nation can stand alone and hope to defend itself against all comers; yet that is practically the position which the Minister of National Defence is taking, that in a vague sort of way we have to have the army, the navy and the air forces to be able to defend ourselves effectively. That is an altogether fallacious way of looking at the matter; it belongs to an earlier age and not to the situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

We have had references again and again to the strength of the British navy. That may have been all very well in the old days, but I would point out that that strength is not what it once was. At one time Great Britain thought she ought to be able to have a naval strength equal to that of any other two countries. Those claims have had to be surrendered. More recently she thought she ought to be equal in naval power to the United States, to any one other naval power. Those claims too can hardly be maintained. It is only within the last few months that the old idea of the ratio of five, five, three, as between England, the United States and Japan, has been challenged, and with the disarmament conference practically dissolved, we do not know what may happen in the future.

I spoke a few minutes ago about the Pacific. Anyone who knows anything at all about the strength of the Japanese navy must recognize that if anything happened in the orient—and the Japanese may easily break out at any time—our western coast would be exposed to one of the greatest navies of the world, and I do not think anyone can say that Canada alone would be equal to defending herself. Then it is not at all clear that in such a contingency we could rely upon the British navy. That is why I ask whether any arrangements are being made by which we could have cooperation with the United States navy; for I would point out, as is recognized even by many of the British authorities to-day, that Canada's interests on the North American continent are essentially different from those of Great Britain, and as one of the Pacific powers we shall have to deal with the situation on the Pacific. I think we have a very considerable advantage in being a neighbour to a great nation, the United States; yet I would be one of the last to suggest that we should come to depend upon them and be gradually absorbed into the great United States republic. But let us look at the situation: if trouble broke out between Japan and either the United States or Canada, these two nations would be drawn in together; that is a real situation to-day.

There was a day when we felt we were simply colonials and could more or less depend upon Great Britain and would have to follow her lead. With all due respect to the United Kingdom, I think most of the people of this country think of Canada as an independent nation within the boundaries of the commonwealth of British nations, but do we propose simply to follow the British lead? We have really no voice in the determination of the war or peace policies of Great Britain. She may become involved in Africa, India, the far east, and then without our having had any participation in the perliminary arrangements, we may be asked to assist. Canada did assist in a military way back in 1914, but personally I am of opinion that it would not be so easy now as it was in 1914 to rally the Canadian people to send troops to Europe, and that not through any disloyalty to the British empire, but because a new idea has come to our people as it has to a great many of the peoples of the world. I would say this, that one of these days unless we throw ourselves into some sort of imperial conference in which we shall have a real participation and can have a real voice—and this few would advocate—we shall be faced with a situation where we may be called upon once again to back Great Britain and we may refuse to do so. Great Britain will, without our having had any participation, present us with a fait accompli. Then what? Can we depend upon the sentiment of the Canadian people? Personally I do not think so, and under such circumstances it would be only fair for us now to say frankly to Great Britain: We do not propose at any time to throw ourselves into a European war. I believe that would be the sentiment of two-thirds of the Canadian people to-day. Surely it would be fairer for us to intimate that to Great Britain at this time than to wait until she is in a tight pinch and then fall back and refuse to give her help. Those are considerations that should be fairly laid before our people and definitely decided upon.

When the great war was over, I take it that the vast number of people had come to the conclusion that war was a failure; that war settled nothing whatever. War was waged against Germany, war has given us in place of the kaiser, a Hitler, and in place of the bureaucracy the Nazis—no very great improvement. War did not settle the affairs of Europe; European affairs are in as great a turmoil to-day as they were prior to the war of 1914. There are imminent dangers both on the continent of Europe and in the far east. War has settled nothing. The warring nations after the armistice got together and decided that they would try to secure peace through some other means than armaments. Then came the treaty of Versailles and the setting up of the League of Nations. Well, the last few days have I presume disillusioned a great many people with regard to the security to be obtained through the League of Nations. We have seen the German nation through Hitler absolutely repudiate the Versailles treaty, and of course we are all indignant over that. But let me point out that Germany is correct in her contention that she was not the first to repudiate the Versailles treaty, that the allies failed to live up to their obligations under it. When Germany laid down her arms, she laid them down on the express condition that the other nations would proceed to disarm. That the allies have not done. We might as well frankly face this situation. Hitler may be as bad as most of us think him, but at the same time we must admit that the development of feeling that has taken place in Germany in the last few years is quite understandable on account of the treatment we have accorded her. I do not want to go into that question in any great detail, but lest anyone should think I am expressing merely a personal opinion, I picked up from my file an article written by Lloyd George and appearing in our papers of September 19, 1932. In this article he has this to say:

> There were four men primarily responsible for framing the treaty of Versailles, which terminated the greatest war in human history. M. Clemenceau, President Wilson, Signor Orlando and myself.
> It not only recast national boundaries in two continents, but it sought to inaugurate a new reign of peaceful adjustment in international disputes by substituting machinery of justice for mechanism of force.

That was the purpose, an effort to substitute the machinery of justice for the mechanism of force. I submit that in the estimates which are before the committee to-day we are still clinging to the idea of the mechanism of force. Nearly every nation is doing the same, although we did dream for a little while of substituting the machinery of justice. He goes on:

To carry out this idea practically, we imposed upon Germany, who was accused of trampling by organized violence on international right, the most ruthless destruction of its peccant armaments.

When the German delegates displayed natural hesitation about accepting these conditions, which reduced their fatherland to impotence in an armed world, Clemenceau wrote them a letter on behalf and at the request of his colleagues, assuring the Germans that their disarmament would be treated as a prelude to steps for general reduction of armaments by the other nations.

This pledge is also expressed in the covenant of the League of Nations. It was accepted by all the signatories of the treaty and ratified by their senates.

Two out of four who drafted that solemn undertaking have passed away, Clemenceau and Wilson. Signor Orlando and I remain.

Now I ask the committee to listen to this:

As one of the two survivors, I have no hesitation in accepting the German view that the victorious nations have shamelessly broken faith on the question of armaments. I should be surprised to hear that my co-survivor, Orlando, took a different view of the turpitude of the victors in this respect.

That is strong language, but it is the language of one who knew the situation, and it is substantiated by the text of the treaty itself. He said:

I have no hesitation in accepting the German view that the victorious nations have shamelessly broken faith on the question of armaments.

Then he went on:

The Germans revolt against unscrupulous agitators and designing militarists. Statesmen of the fatherland have for thirteen years shown a degree of patience, forbearance and restraint which is worthy of the great people they represented. Throughout this period the bond they entered in an hour of crushing defeat was being enforced relentlessly against Germany and her allies, whilst other parties to the contract insolently refused even to discuss performance of their part of the agreement.

Under the circumstances I do not think that we can altogether blame Germany for the action which she has taken, lamentable as we feel that it is. But that simply opens up the whole question of what we are going to do about it. Comparatively few of our Canadian people have taken the Versailles treaty very seriously. Within the last few weeks the present government have been introducing considerable legislation on the ground that it was obligatory on us to implement pledges which we made at the time of the signing of the peace treaty. Notwithstanding that, we have not taken the league seriously. We have been members, it is true, but we hardly ever discuss in this house what the league is doing; in fact the tendency has been more or less to scoff at the league. I confess that for a long time I for one had no use at all for the league. To me it was largely a league of victors, and it was only after other nations, such as Germany, began to come in that it seemed to me that possibly it might be used as an instrument for bringing about peace. To-day I am not so sure whether under the present leadership, and under the present system, we can depend upon the league. In any case I submit that we in Canada have not carried out our obligations as members of the league. For example, article 10 says:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Or again, article 16:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not. . . .

The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking state . . .

These are some very clear cut pledges that we, together with the other signatories, gave at the time of the signing of the peace treaty. We had the matter tested in the case of the incident in Manchuria when Japan, although not formally declaring war, practically engaged in war against China and took part of what was generally recognized as Chinese territory. What did we do? Our representatives rather meekly followed the lead of Sir John Simon in the matter and refused to live up to our obligations, with the result that Japan ultimately took over Manchuria, set up her own puppet state there and to-day is launching still further attacks upon China that seriously menace the peace of the far east. We have not lived up to our obligations under this treaty.

Now I come to the question of the purpose of our army. I asked the Minister of National Defence to-day how far we are prepared for effective action. He said not a word as to our obligations under these clauses of the treaty, not a word. If we are in any sense depending upon securing peace through the league, then it seems to me the only thing we as a member of the league can do is to live up to our obligations. Surely that is a reasonable position to take. But we have persistently refused to surrender any of our narrow self-interest. We have refused to surrender our sovereignty —and not we alone but nearly all the nations of the world—notwithstanding that all history shows that smaller units have had to give place to larger organizations, and that to-day no nation can live into itself.

I must confess I often feel, as I know a great many of my fellow Canadians do, that we must more or less retire into ourselves and escape from entangling alliances with Europe. But suppose we do try to live to ourselves; have we solved our problem? I come back to this question: Are we in Canada to-day prepared to throw ourselves into an adequate national defence scheme? If we alone, without reliance upon the British empire or upon the members of the league of which we form a part, propose to defend ourselves against all comers, then it is surely obvious that our defence is hopelessly inadequate. Instead of spending $15,000,000 I suppose we ought to pour out the money, but I do not think we would be any better off then than we are to-day. Are we going to depend upon Great Britain? If we are I am not so sure that logically the advocates of a contribution to the British navy have not a good deal to say for themselves. If we are going to depend upon that navy it might be well said that we should contribute to it. I say this might be the logical position to take, though personally I cannot believe that our salvation will come about through depending upon the British navy or making a contribution to it.

Are we going to depend upon the United States? I fancy that in case of an outbreak say between Japan and the United States, Canada would be dragged in and it might very well be that the United States would be glad to defend us against aggression. Then is our destiny to be absorbed by the United States? Some of my ancestors came to Canada after the revolutionary war in order to be on British territory, and I cannot very well contemplate political absorption by the United States, much as I should like to see a very much closer economic connection than we have to-day. But are we going to depend upon the United States? Is there nothing ahead but international anarchy?

When I brought up this matter a year ago it was the acting Minister of Immigration, if I remember rightly, who rather rebuked me. He decried this talk about war, but there has been war in the past and I submit that if the predisposing causes remain there will be war in the future, and we cannot very well read the dispatches of the last few days without recognizing that war in the not remote future is not an improbable thing. Most Canadians want peace. When I brought up this matter the other night the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) delivered a regular tirade against me, and spoke as though I had been lecturing the house. Nothing was further from my thoughts. I am not intending to do that now. The Minister of Railways spoke as though we could take it for granted that we all wanted peace. I think most of us do want peace; I think most hon. members opposite and most of the Liberals want peace, just as we in this corner and most of the citizens of Canada want peace. There is an occasional man, however, who seems to hanker after war. About a year ago I noticed in the press that Colonel Cockshutt had this to say:

> These have been rather dark days for soldiers, but the glorious days will come again. . . . Europe to-day is in a turmoil, and Canada's men of war may yet be needed. The spirit of the empire still lives.

I hope that is not characteristic of the attitude of a majority of Canadians, but I do urge that we are not going to get peace simply by wishing for it or praying for it; we will get world peace only as we definitely adopt those measures which will bring about peace. By relying upon the expenditure of $15,000,000 we are only deluding ourselves as to our security.

I think perhaps one thing ought to be fairly well taken for granted, and that is that Canada should not be committed to war except with the consent of the people.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Then we will not need a navy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the people would consent, but I think the hon. member who has just interjected a remark will agree with the principle that Canada should not be committed to war except with the consent of her people. This does not seem so very radical when we remember that Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in that rather famous Hamilton speech of October 10, 1927, said:

> If ever the time should come when the spectre of 1914 should again appear I believe it would be best, not only that parliament should be called, but that the decision of the government which, of course, would have to be given promptly, should be submitted to the judgment of the people at a general election before troops should leave our shores.

That seems not an unreasonable suggestion; I think that is fairly sound. I know there would be dangers in anything like an election or a plebiscite, but there are dangers whatever way we look. By signing the Kellogg pact, we have renounced war as an instrument of national policy. Am I right in interpreting that to mean that no Canadians should be forced to leave Canada's shores? Possibly most of us would like to take that position, yet a merely negative policy will get us nowhere. I am urging that if we are serious about this matter we must either throw ourselves much more definitely into individual national defence, which I think is hopeless, or else we must more definitely strive to develop the collective system of security. In civil life we have set up our courts and our boards of arbitration. Cannot we do more of that sort of thing in international affairs?

I admit that this problem is very complicated. It is a problem of the ages. People keep asserting that we always have had war and we always will have war. Ah, the wars of the past were comparatively small, local wars—until the last great world war, but I think it is recognized by everyone that any future war must be on a very extensive front and that it will be far more devastating than anything we have known in the past, even the world war. It would seem as though we, as rational beings, should at least attempt some action that would prevent further disaster. Only to-day I received a letter from a French mother in the province of Quebec begging me as an individual to do something to save her children from ever being dragged into another war. She had been reading the papers for the last two or three days, and she asked that something should be done. Surely these appeals by our Canadian people, the fathers and mothers across this country, cannot go unregarded.

I want to emphasize this point, even if I have to repeat it again and again. I do not think that by passing defence estimates, by maintaining the military, naval and air strength that we have to-day, we are doing anything effective to defend this country. I am one of those "impossible idealists," if you like to use that phrase, who believe that by this physical force upon which we have depended in the past we can no longer be sure of defending our people or this country. The world war proved convincingly that war is futile. The other day someone on the other side of the house, I think it was the Minister of Railways, was rather inclined to imply that I was not sympathetic enough to the returned men who fought in the last war.

Mr. MANION: I did not make any statement of that kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to think the minister did not make that statement, and I quite readily accept his word. I want to state that some of us do admire the heroism of the men who fought in the last war. I have met a great many hundreds, yes thousands of them, and I believe the returned men are among the foremost in stating that they do not want to go to another war. They do not believe that through war we shall obtain permanent peace. Can we not work out the implications of statements of that kind? I have ventured to delay the passage of these estimates for this length of time—Perhaps I should not admit I am delaying their passage—because I believe this matter is of tremendous importance. It seems to me there ought to be a more complete discussion of the whole situation. Perhaps it would be more fitting if such discussion came under the Department of External Affairs, but we cannot separate the two. The Department of External Affairs might be expected to determine our policy, but we must remember that under this vote we have the army through which we would execute a policy that involved military action. For that reason the two departments cannot be separated.

My purpose in opening the discussion has been to call attention to the inadequacy of our present defence, the inadequacy of any military defence under the existing world conditions, and the absolute necessity of taking more seriously our obligations under the league. We must come to realize that it is not sufficient merely to be a member of the league. If we are to have security we must pursue the long and arduous task of gradually developing a certain peace technique; we must work out constructive policies which may involve the scrapping of many of our old narrow nationalistic and militaristic ideas.

These may have to go, but the future of our country and of our children is at stake. I urge that we do not delude ourselves into thinking that we are safe because we pass an estimate for $15,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and I listened, too, to his discourse only a few days ago regarding what we should do towards establishing peace not only in Canada but in the rest of the world. To-day he has indicated what we should do to protect ourselves. I do not think any hon. member would expect a vote of money sufficient to protect our great mileage of coast line and the mileage of international boundary between this country and the United States. As the youngest member in His Majesty's loyal opposition in this House of Commons I believe I am speaking for the younger generation in Canada when I say that if Canada is called upon to defend herself she can depend upon the boys and girls of this country to do their utmost in her protection. I do not make that statement boastfully, but rather to express the view that we would in her actual defence be only too proud to emulate the splendid qualities of the young men of 1914-15.

To-night I do not wish to say anything further regarding war and the view taken by the alarmists of the present situation. I sincerely trust that the situation is not nearly so serious as it appears to-day. I have risen to ask a question of the minister regarding one of the most serious wars with which we are now confronted, namely the war against hunger and starvation, a condition with which many people in the Dominion of Canada are faced. Some few nights ago the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) asked the minister to place on Hansard the number of relief camps, by provinces, and the number of men employed in each. Would the minister give that information to the committee?

Mr. STIRLING: I laid that statement on the table the following day.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was not aware of that, and must thank the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have listened attentively to the speeches which have been made concerning war. Having served in the last war I believe I may speak with some practical experience. Upon many occasions I have observed that the next war in Europe, so far as we are concerned, must be cash on delivery. Notwithstanding that fact, however, I believe we must come to earth and view the matter from a realistic standpoint. I am a staunch supporter of the League of Nations; I believe in its development and, if necessary, in the maintenance of an international police force. As Canadians however we must get down to earth and find out where we fit into the world structure. If we may judge from the amount of the expenditure now involved the world has not much to fear from this dominion so far as the development of a warlike spirit is concerned. Our fortunate geographic position places us in a position where we are not called upon to make enormous expenditures for armaments. If we were situated as are New Zealand or Australia, in the cockpit of the next war in the Pacific, quite possibly we would have to take an entirely different attitude in matters of defence. Whether we like it or not Canadians must make up their minds where they fit in, so far as the Pacific question is concerned. We must decide whether we will go along with the Anglo-Saxons and maintain those ideals for which we stand, or whether in the event of war in the Pacific we would remain neutral.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has indicated that we cannot wish ourselves out of the situation. We will have to take a realistic viewpoint, as the Australians have done. The population of Japan, that small island in the Pacific is growing very rapidly, and that country feels it needs an outlet for its surplus population. Should they take it into their heads to cross the Pacific and attempt to settle some of their surplus population in Canada, I should like to feel that we would be secure. I believe the next war may begin something like smallpox; you do not know where it is coming from or when it is going to strike. I should not like it to be said that I am advocating the development of our war services, but I should like to have careful consideration of our position not so much in relation to Europe as in relation to the Pacific. No one has supported more strongly than I have the devolpment of the League of Nations as a practical and driving force towards the maintenance of world peace. We must remember however that we cannot divorce ourselves from what is going on around us. As the nation with the fifth greatest trade in the world I believe Canada is most fortunate to be more or less sitting in the laps of Great Britain and the country to the south of us. Our defences are not at all in conformity with the position we occupy in world trade. Our good fortune lies in the fact first, that we are fortunate in our geographical situation, and second, that we form part of the commonwealth of the British empire.

At the moment the people of Australia are recognizing the gravity of their situation, and I believe we must consider carefully our position. I believe any hon. member who passed through the last war, as I did, would not wish another one, and in that stand I believe they would be supported by the Canadian people. However we must be practical about the matter and take into consideration the attitude of the predominant world forces towards the defence of those institutions which have been developed after much sacrifice.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is now clear that the treaty of Versailles was an iniquitous treaty. and that war would inevitably result from it unless it were modified. The treaty was based on vengeance. It sought to put the whole blame on one nation though it is now historically admitted that one nation was not wholly to blame. The allies tried to make Germany pay an impossible sum by way of reparations, and then would not receive payment in goods. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has pointed out, they made very definite promises to Germany but did not keep them. That is to say, we the allies smashed the treaty of Versailles all to pieces to suit our purpose, and we cannot very well now suddenly work up a lot of righteous indignation and say that nations which we regarded formerly as our enemies are now showing signs of becoming once more militant. We indeed have sown the wind and almost surely we shall reap the whirlwind. I think the great and ever-increasing cause of war is the bitter competition or struggle for ever diminishing markets. We want to dispose of the weight of goods which each nation is seeking to sell in what are called the markets of the world, though no one knows what that means or where those markets are, and notwithstanding the fact that the people in each country would like to enjoy the goods which they are making such strenuous efforts to sell abroad. In my opinion we have, in the great mass of the unemployed in this country and elsewhere—here it is comparatively small seeing that our population is small—a tinder box. The unemployed have little hope in life, no hope of adventure, no hope of being able to move, no hope of having a variety of food, clothing and entertainment, so that war might seem an interesting thing to them. After all there would be food, clothing and shelter, and some certainty of death at the end. That I know is a terrible statement to make, but I believe there is a good deal of truth in it. Unless the economic problem is solved in each nation or by all the nations cooperating—and in my opinion it will be solved largely by each nation individually—so that the goods which we have in such abundance can be made available to the people of the country, allowing for international trading in those commodities which one nation needs and another wants, then I say that war is inevitable. There are two methods of distributing goods, one is to change the economic system within the country itself, and in my opinion this involves far-reaching monetary changes. The other method is provided by war. If war were declared to-morrow, within forty-eight hours we should be doing the very things which we now say we cannot do; we know very well that the moment war was declared we could move all the goods and services required and we should be able to finanace the moving of those goods and services. To put it in other words, we should then discover that real wealth is the basis of wealth tokens or money. I am apprehensive. I wish I could be as lighthearted about the whole matter as the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) who seems to think that anyone is an alarmist who talks about war. I do not think he is reading the signs of the times very well if he comes to that conclusion, because the signs are ominous, the real remedy for war lies deep; it lies in justice, economic justice within the nations and between the nations. I believe we could do a lot within our own nation. I agree with someone who said that Canada has not taken her work in the League of Nations very seriously. Once I had the privilege of attending a meeting of the League of Nations and I heard an address by the Great German, Stressmann, I had to wait for the translation before I could know the words he used, but though I did not know the language he was speaking the power of that speech and the spirit of it reached me. It reached me though spoken in a different tongue. He pleaded with the world and with Germany to avoid the very condition that has developed since. He saw it coming clearly and tried to persuade the world to avoid it, but it seems very difficult for us to avoid the things that we ought to avoid.

I do believe in the collective system. I think that the League of Nations if given the moral support of all the nations could do great things. I believe in an international police force; that I think is necessary. It is the only sort of army to have at all and it should be sufficiently strong, acting for all the nations, to bring the aggressor into conformity with the ideas of all.

May I give a quotation from a speech delivered by Field Marshal Sir William Robertson in London, England at a chamber of commerce banquet on November 8, 1927. In this speech he said:

> Again, we no longer agree, without qualifications, that the best way of preventing war is to prepare for it. Instead of preventing war, we know that preparations are apt to precipitate it.

And again:

> War has become, in short, a wholly detestable thing; is almost, if not quite, as disastrous to victor as to vanquished; and consequently many people condemn it as a failure, hate the very word war, and demand all-round measures of disarmament.

While the amount of money we are voting is not large compared to the military budgets of other nations, if the methods it provides for are not adequate in protecting us against the danger that threatens, then even the amount voted here, something approximating $15,000,000, could be spent to very much better purpose in the dominion at the present time.

Mr. REID: Has the minister the information regarding the name of the firm that supplied the tobacco to the relief camps?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not yet been able to ascertain the name of the firm that supplied the tobacco but I would call the attention of the committee to the result of the investigation I made with regard to the potatoes which the hon. gentleman kindly sent across the chamber—potatoes brought from one of the camps at White Rock. He made some statements with regard to the contract under which these potatoes were supplied. I obtained a copy of the contract and ascertained that tenders were called for from thirteen different firms and people of whom four were individual farmers, and of the rest one was a farmers' exchange and one the Pacific Coast Growers' Cooperative Association. The contract was let to the lowest tenderer, which was F. R. Stewart and Company, and the price for the potatoes was $25 per ton. My hon. friend gave second hand information that F. R. Stewart and Company paid certain farmers of his acquaintance sums ranging from $3.75 to $5 per ton. I am quite ready to believe the hon. member's statement but I think the committee will agree that it is quite impossible to find out what successful contractors paid to the farmers from whom they bought potatoes. A letter was written at that time by the Pacific Coast Growers' Cooperation Association and I should like to quote one paragraph which touches upon the difficulty of continuity of supply. It reads:

> The growers of this association wish me to convey their thanks and appreciation for being given this opportunity of tendering on relief camp contracts as well as for past business.
> We regret however that these contracts call for six month period which means this organization being only in its infancy and not having all facilities intact for handling long term contracts, we feel in justice to the government and all concerned it would be much better for us to cooperate with some wholesale house. If this should be a cold winter vegetables will have to be placed in storage in order to take care of your out of town camps, and if we tendered and our contract was accepted it would mean you would have to pay increased prices to take care of storage.

I suggest that if this association takes this view, there is really little likelihood that individual farmers would be in a position to tender direct.

In connection with tobacco furnished in the camps, the hon. member will recall that in giving the component parts of the $1.30 cost per man per day, it was stated that one and one-third ounces of tobacco was issued each week to the men. It was found that when a certain kind of tobacco was furnished to the camp the men would ask for other kinds and the consequence was that instead of the actual tobacco being issued each week, so many cents were given to the men so that they would have the opportunity of obtaining the kind of tobacco to which they were accustomed.

Mr. REID: I am glad the minister has made this statement, because I was very careful to have my figures correct. The minister stated $25 per ton was paid and the superintendent of the camp told me the the price was $24. I think it would be very easy to ascertain that the wholesale price for potatoes in the Fraser valley was $5 per ton. This was for No. 1 grade and in many cases it was impossible to make a sale. In connection with the continuity of supply, I pointed out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that the former government of British Columbia purchased from the individual farmers when they were looking after these camps. The cost per meal has increased a few cents under the dominion government as compared with the cost per meal under the provincial government which purchased supplies from different farmers. Investigations at that time proved that there was no difficulty in obtaining supplies in that district.

In connection with tobacco, I inadvertently gave the wrong company. The company referred to should have been the Macdonald company and not the Imperial. The contract was originally for forty cents and was gradually increased to seventy cents per pound.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have listened with great interest to the speeches of the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) and Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I should like to ask the minister if consideration has been given to the request that a suitable patrol station be located on the Pacific coast in case of attack from the orient. I know this request has been made by different chambers of commerce and associated boards of trade pointing out the strategic positions of the different localities.

Mr. STIRLING: A request of this nature has been received from Prince Rupert. Consideration has been given to the matter but so far it has not been decided to divide the stations on the Pacific coast. I do not mean to say that it may not be done in the future.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 20, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 33, for the relief of Ray Leitman Aronoff.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

GOLD EXPORT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Gold Export Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. What was the total cost for medical attention for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force, in each of the three maritime provinces, during each of the years 1932, 1933 and 1934?

2. What are the names and addresses of the medical attendants for the three maritime provinces, and the amount paid each, for each of the years 1932, 1933 and 1934?

BANK OF CANADA—ASSETS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What were the total assets of the Bank of Canada when it opened for business?

2. What were the various amounts of such assets under headings of: (1) dominion gold; (2) bank gold; (3) securities; (4) Canadian government account; (5) assets of any other nature?

Mr. RHODES:

1 and 2. In so far as the government is in a position to give the information, the answer to the questions will be found in the statement of assets and liabilities of the Bank of Canada published in the Canada Gazette on the 16th of March, supplemented by the following:

The amount of gold held as security for dominion notes in circulation, transferred to the bank was $69,455,439.44, valued at $20.67 a fine ounce.

BANK OF CANADA—GOLD FROM CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. When did the Bank of Canada open for business?

2. How much gold was taken over from the chartered banks of Canada?

3. At what valuation?

4. How much gold was left with the chartered banks?

5. Can the chartered banks dispose of such gold at present market values?

6. Who decided how much of the bank gold should be left with the chartered banks?

7. Was an order in council passed with reference to this?

8. On what basis was the amount fixed?

9. What was the number, if any, of such order in council?

Mr. RHODES:

1. On March 11, 1935.

2 to 9. Section 28 of the Bank of Canada Act requires that every chartered bank shall transfer to the Bank of Canada all gold coin and bullion owned and held by it in Canada. The transfer is made at the present standard value fixed by the Currency Act. The Bank of Canada Act provides that any profit resulting from the sale of gold transferred to the bank, or resulting from any change in the monetary standard, shall be paid into the consolidated revenue fund. It is provided, however, that if the governor in council is satisfied that the gold at the time of transfer was held against liabilities elsewhere in Canada, the profit shall belong to the chartered bank. The governor in council has not yet taken action under this provision.

BANK OF CANADA—NOTES ISSUED

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. To what total amount have notes been issued by the Bank of Canada?

2. In what denominations have such notes been issued?

2. $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500 and $1,000.

BANK OF CANADA—SOLICITORS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Has the Bank of Canada appointed any particular firm as solicitors or legal advisers for the bank?

2 If so, which firm?

3. What are the terms and conditions in regard to salary, etc., on which such firm has been engaged?

Mr. RHODES:

1, 2 and 3. The Government has no information.

MAIL SERVICE—L'IMMACULÉE CONCEPTION—ST. ALEXIS, QUE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Were tenders called for on January 4th last by the Post Office Department for the mail service between L'Immaculée Conception, St. Alexis de Matapédia, and St. Alexis station?

2. If so, were any tenders received, from whom, and at what figure?

3. Has any contract been awarded?

4. If not, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. No.

4. Matter is still under consideration.

(Translation)

ADVERTISING BY RADIO ON SUNDAYS

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the government received a request from the Federation of Catholic Workmen of Canada asking that advertising by radio be prohibited on Sundays in Canada?

2. If so, has any action been taken to give effect to this request?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.

2. The matter was immediately referred to the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission.

FARM MORTGAGE INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. LAURIN:

What was the farmers' mortgage debt from 1911 to 1921, and in 1931?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BISHOPTON, QUE., RELIEF CAMP

Mr. LAFLECHE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, in the possession of the Department of National Defence, regarding the relief camp for unemployed at Bishopton, Wolfe county, Quebec, since the opening of said camp to date.

Mr. LAFLECHE: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

JOLIETTE, QUE.—PUBLIC WORKS CONSTRUCTION

Mr. FERLAND:

For a copy of all documents, contracts, tenders, correspondence, paylists, and accounts with respect to certain works done in the city of Joliette pursuant to the Public Works Construction Act, 1934.

BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if any applications for loans have been made to the Bank of Canada by any of the provinces and, if so, what provinces have made such applications?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I would not be in a position to answer that question even if such applications had been made, but so far as I am aware there have been no applications.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a complaint to the leader of the government. I introduced a resolution urging that consideration be given to the employment of white Canadian seamen on subsidized ships. That resolution was adopted by this house on January 28; it is now March 20, but so far no action has been taken in regard to it. I would urge upon the leader of the government that something be done to have this matter considered in committee and disposed of.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): May I ask to what page of Hansard my hon. friend refers?

Mr. REID: I do not know the page, but the motion passed the house on January 28.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). Owing to the fact that a large portion of the potato crop in the province of Prince Edward Island and the other maritime provinces has not been marketed as yet, requests have been made to the railway authorities for a special rate to enable this crop to be moved in the next two months. I should like to ask the minister if any representations have been made to him and if he would be good enough to use his influence with the railway board to endeavour to have this rate put into effect?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Of course as the hon. gentleman well knows the matter of railway rates is entirely in the hands of the railways and the board of railway commissioners. I shall gladly draw his remarks to the attention of the railways, at any rate, because they would be the first to deal with the matter. I believe I have had some letters in this connection from certain organizations, and that I have already drawn the matter to the attention of the railways. While I am on my feet I might point out to the hon. gentleman that the same request comes from all sections of the country in connection with commodities other than potatoes. Each section that has a surplus, or thinks it has, expects a special rate on that particular product, and I am continually receiving letters of this kind from various sections of the country. All I can do is forward them to the railways for whatever action they may see fit to take.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY

ALLEGATIONS CONCERNING STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO INSPECTOR DAWSON

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Before the orders of the day are called I want to refer to a statement made yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). On March 18 I made a statement in the house which is to be found at page 1786 of Hansard to the effect that Inspector Dawson interviewed convict No. 3033 in the lecture room of the administration building at Kingston penitentiary between 11.40 and 2.15 p.m., and that during the interview he used abusive and profane language in regard to myself and said that after he had finished his inspection I would not be able to lift up my head in the House of Commons again. The information was supplied to me by convict No. 3033, who has served his full time and is now at large, and who is prepared to swear to the statement in any inquiry.

I was not in the house when the Minister of Justice replied yesterday, though I was in the house just a few moments later. Of course I was not in at the correct time, and I am not in the least blaming the Minister of Justice for the fact that I was not here. He said in part:

While the return went up to April 8, 1934, on April 9 Inspector Dawson had an interview with prisoner 3033 in the penitentiary. I have made a pretty full inquiry in regard to this matter since yesterday, and I find that Inspector Dawson went to the penitentiary to make an inspection and report respecting a certain matter which had been referred to him. After he had concluded his inspection on April 8, an interview was requested by prisoner 3033 and it is during the course of that interview—

I want to refer particularly to the next sentence:

—I think it is alleged by the hon. member for Southeast Grey that certain aspersions were made against her character as stated by her yesterday.

I repeat what I said previously; I stated that Inspector Dawson used abusive and profane language in regard to myself. Honour lies within; my character is in my own keeping. I am not even concerned about what Inspector Dawson thinks of it, or anyone else for that matter. Then the Minister of Justice went on to say:

I can assure her that there is no foundation for the report. The inspector himself made no report on this interview.

That is interesting. I asked for three copies of the new penitentiary rules and regulations, which I have not received as yet though I understand the superintendent of penitentiaries wrote a memorandum in that regard last Saturday. Here was an interview that lasted for hours but no report has been made concerning it. I quote again:

When inspectors or superintendents visit a penitentiary, they have a large number of requests for interviews, but they do not make specific reports in regard to them.

However Inspector Dawson has assured me most definitely that during his interview with prisoner 3033 the name of the hon. member for Southeast Grey was never mentioned by him or by the prisoner, there was no comment whatever in regard to her, and I can assure her on the word of honour of the inspector that there is no foundation for the allegation which she has made.

May I say frankly that I do not accept the word of honour of Inspector Dawson, I shall tell hon. members why. For many years I have been interested in the reform of our penal institutions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Miss MACPHAIL: Very well, I shall make those remarks later.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not continue, it is all right. Go ahead.

Miss MACPHAIL: —to the end that they would reform prisoners, since 73 per cent of our prison inmates return again to imprisonment. Particularly have I been interested in penal reform that the public might be protected against embittered men who have gained their release and constitute a grave menace to society. With that in mind I visited Kingston penitentiary. I had been making a speech at Queens university on Friday, February 15, and in the late forenoon of February 16, I visited Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, and particularly when she is speaking on a matter of privilege. She will, of course, have the very widest ruling in the matter, but after all I should like to know what the question of privilege may be; it has not yet been raised. Would the hon. member kindly come to the question of privilege.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is difficult to state the question without showing why I do not accept the word of Inspector Dawson.

Mr. SPEAKER: After all, if that is the point upon which the hon. member has risen, I believe she should so state, and set it out without going into further detail. I am sure the hon. member, in view of the wide experience she has had in parliamentary matters, will realize that she is not entitled to make a speech on the matter at the present time. I am sure, moreover, that she has no desire to do so. Therefore I would ask her to be good enough kindly to state the question of privilege.

Miss MACPHAIL: I could not hear the last part of your observations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said that I would ask the hon. member to be good enough to state the question of privilege. The hon. member has not the right on an occasion such as this to set forth the reasons why she does not believe so and so. If she wishes to state she does not, well and good, but she should not give any further amplification. I must ask the hon. member kindly to state the question of privilege, and to confine her remarks to that.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should think that when the Minister of Justice states that no statement was made regarding me in abusive and profane language, and when I believe such a statement was made, on a matter of privilege I should be permitted to state why I hold that belief.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then, what is a question of privilege?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is none so far.

Mr. SPEAKER: As yet I do not know what the question of privilege is. After all, a question of privilege is a matter of some concern to all hon. members. So far as my rulings are concerned may I say that they will tend to allow the very widest possible explanation from any member rising to a question of privilege. However there must first be a question of privilege. The hon. member made certain statements in the chamber a few days ago; she must have had good reasons for doing so, and I believe she placed those reasons on Hansard. If she wishes to make any correction in her previous speech or in the remarks made yesterday by the Minister of Justice but in her absence, she is privileged so to do. Otherwise I suggest she should not deal with the matter in a general way.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not intend to deal with it in a general way; but if a member of the civil service can go to a penal institution in this country and make statements regarding me which I am attempting to place on Hansard, and which as the minister explained yesterday, on the word of honour of Inspector Dawson were never made, then surely on a question of privilege I have a right to read into Hansard an affidavit by one who says these statements were made. Have I that right?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. SPEAKER: If that is what the hon. member is coming to, then I have no objection. I must say however that in her observations up to this time there was no indication of that. Further, it will be understood that the rule is being relaxed somewhat if we accept statements made by people outside the house in regard to a matter of this kind. With all due deference to the hon. member for Southeast Grey may I say the matter is one which might very well be discussed on the vote for penitentiaries appearing in the estimates, or on some allied item. I believe the discussion would more properly come under that heading. However that is only a suggestion, and if the hon. member thinks she is still personally involved, and that either her character, her action in the house or what she has placed on record has come into question, I think any further explanation she might desire to make would be permissible.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is what I was attempting to do when Mr. Speaker prevented me. I do not want any special privileges in this chamber, nor do I ask for any special advantage so far as the interpretation of the rules regarding abuse are concerned. I simply want equality with other hon. members. On my visit to Kingston penitentiary on February 16, 1935 I, in the presence of Warden Allen saw convict 3242 at the request of his brother, who is a high official in one of the British colonies. His name is prefaced by the appellation of "Honourable" and the initials C.B.E.— or some such initials, are affixed. At his request I asked Warden Allen to allow me to talk in the presence of Warden Allen with convict 3242, whose case was so exhaustively discussed on the floor of the house last year.

An hon. MEMBER: She knows all the convicts.

An hon. MEMBER: Name.

Miss MACPHAIL: I will explain later. When convict 3242 was brought in by Warden Allen he asked me if I knew—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member said she was going to read some statutory declaration. Again I respectfully submit she should not go into all these details with regard to conversations with one convict or another, or with some other party outside this chamber. If the affidavit bears upon the statement she made the other day I shall rule that it is quite in order.

Miss MACPHAIL: Very well; I shall leave further discussion until the estimates are considered and at the present time put on Hansard the affidavit to which I have referred, which was made to-day. This affidavit is made by ex-convict 3033. I must say the matter is not by any means dropped, and I am at a loss to understand what a question of privilege is.

[The Speaker.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Miss MACPHAIL: This is the affidavit:

City of Ottawa,
County of Carleton,
Province of Ontario.

In the matter of a visit by Inspector J. D. Dawson to Kingston penitentiary on April 6, 7, 8, and 9, 1934.

I, Alfred George Hall, psychologist, of the city of Toronto, county of York, province of Ontario, make oath and say:

1. That between the 21st day of April, 1933, and the 27th day of February, 1935, I was convict No. 3033 in Kingston penitentiary, county of Frontenac, province aforesaid.

2. That on or about the 2nd day of April, 1934, a number of convicts discussed with Chief Trade Instructor J. W. Tweddell, the serious conditions existent in the penitentiary, the said Tweddell immediately reported the discussion to Warden W. B. Megloughlin, M.C., who at once interviewed the said convicts in the presence of the said Tweddell, and Chief Penitentiary Clerk L. H. Milard and other ranking officers and the said convicts repeated the statements previously referred to and were informed that a high official of the penitentiaries branch was about to visit the institution to investigate a complaint and that on the occasion of said visit the matter discussed by them would be laid before him.

3. That I was by a considerable number of the convicts requested to present their complaints to the said high official.

4. That on April 7, 1934, I addressed a communication to Inspector Dawson requesting said interview.

5. That at approximately 11.40 a.m. on the 9th day of April, 1934, I was escorted to the lecture room of the Administration building by Guard Sands and there met Inspector J. D. Dawson, who enquired the nature of the complaints referred to in my letter of April 7th. These complaints were discussed and Inspector Dawson declared his views thereon to me. He then enquired if I knew or had had conversation with convict 3242, to which I replied that the man had introduced himself to me on the preceding day whereupon Dawson produced certain material, records and letters relating to the said convict and declared him to be the greatest criminal in Canada and the most unmitigated liar. He then proceeded to read to me parts of what purported to be a copy of the record of said convict and produced a document said to be in the handwriting of convict 3242, supposed to be a letter intercepted between the said 3242 and Miss Macphail, M.P., and in further comment said:

(a) This man is Miss Macphail's informant in penitentiary matters. He is the man who informed her about the Lloyd case at Stony Mountain.

(b) Quoting his actual words, he further said—

I hate to say this:

"Aggie made a God damned fool of herself in the House of Commons, but when we are finished with her she will never be able to lift up her head in the house again."

I immediately informed Inspector Dawson that the nature of his conversations would be reported. We then discussed the whole question of athletics in the penitentiary, convicts writing privileges, the inclusion of sport news in the prison bulletin and the teaching of trades to convicts. The interview concluded at 2.15 p.m.

6. Immediately on returning to the main prison I sought an interview with the protestant chaplain, Major Kidd, M.A., M.C., and at about 3 p.m. advised him of the nature of the conversation I had just finished with the said Dawson and particularly in respect to his attacks upon Warden Megloughlin and Miss Agnes Macphail, M.P., and I requested the said Major Kidd to immediately communicate with Warden Megloughlin therein.

7. Major Kidd and Warden Megloughlin conferred in the matter and certain actions which are a matter of departmental record were taken therein.

8. That in a letter to the Hon. the Minister of Justice dated July 26, 1934, and a statement dated August 9, 1934, the subject matter of the Dawson conversation was referred to.

9. That on the 2nd of June, 1934, the superintendent of penitentiaries refused to interview me and I was so informed by the aforesaid warden who at the same time informed me that he had been refused information as to what transpired in the interview between Inspector Dawson and myself on the 9th day of April, 1934, and I was then requested by the warden to prepare a minute of the interview of April 9, which minute, marked "For the information of the warden. Personal. Prepared at his request" was handed to him on June 11, 1934, and that the conversations of June 2, 1934, and June 11, 1934, between the aforesaid warden and myself took place within the hearing of and in the presence of other ranking officers of the penitentiary.

Alfred G. Hall.

Sworn before me a commissioner, etc., at the city of Ottawa, county of Carleton, province of Ontario, this 20th day of March, 1935.

A. G. Troop,
Commissioner and Notary Public.
Ottawa.

That is Mr. Troop of the law branch.

That evidence you may say is the evidence of an ex-convict. That is true. But he has made an affidavit. He is to-day a free man, and if the statements made in that affidavit are not true he can be prosecuted, and it is the business of the government to prosecute him.

Secondly, as I said before, I am not interested in the fact that it refers to me. It reflects equally on the honour of every member of this house. It just happened to be me. Surely it is a serious thing that conditions were as they were in Kingston. It was just approximately one month before the fire that an interview two and a half hours long took place between the inspector and one man representing the convicts or a number of the convicts. That interview was not reported and there is no record of it. Last night at twelve o'clock I sent the following wire to Major Kidd, M.A., chaplain of Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. member to order.

Miss MACPHAIL: There is only one way in which all these things can be settled, and that is by a wide-open investigation conducted, not by the people accused, but by people who are impartial, and I ask for that.

ST. ALEXIS, QUE., MAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I would ask the Postmaster General kindly to look at question No. 12 on the order paper and then say if he considers that this which I hold in my hand is an answer to that question.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): I answered that the question was under consideration.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General read over again question No. 12 on the order paper of to-day and tell me whether he considers that his answer is sufficient?

Mr. SAUVE: Certainly.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED PRESS INTERVIEW GIVEN BY POLICE OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, referring to a matter that was mentioned in the house the day before yesterday by my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) in regard to an alleged interview with Inspector Zaneth of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which appeared in the Montreal Herald of March 14 last, I beg to say that upon making inquiry I have received the following report from the officer commanding "C" division:

Inspector Zaneth informs me that he was rung up by the Herald reporter who said, "Have you heard that there is going to be a royal commission and that the Hon. Mr. Veniot said that the mounted police destroyed a boat and some food?" Inspector Zaneth replied that he did not know anything about it. The reporter then asked if the mounted police would destroy anything like that in the course of their duty, and Inspector Zaneth replied that no destruction of any goods would take place without the order of the department concerned. That was the whole of the telephone conversation.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

FURTHER PROVISION FOR CARRYING OUT RELIEF MEASURES, MEETING FINANCIAL CONDITIONS AND MAINTAINING CREDIT OF DOMINION AND PROVINCES

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, respecting relief measures.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is read a second time I wish to say a few words only because this matter has often been discussed in this house and we had a debate upon it on the motion for going into supply a couple of weeks ago. I wish, however, to make my attitude with regard to this bill quite plain.

On the previous occasion I stressed the necessity for federal help in this matter, and in that spirit I may say that I welcome this bill, without going into the details of it. The necessity for federal help in the matter of relief is universally acknowledged, although people differ as to the form it should take. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact which has perhaps been signified to him already, that in the city of Montreal not very long ago the present mayor took the stand that if federal help was not available he would not attempt to carry on, and he considered it absolutely essential on account of the unemployment situation existing in the city of Montreal that proper help should be available from this government. He also pointed out that he considered that for the last month the help that had been given by the government was not sufficient.

The present bill is similar to previous bills. It authorizes the government to do things but it does not specify exactly what the government is to do. It is carrying out the policy of a blank cheque, which policy has been discussed before. During the time when I was acting in the dual capacity of mayor of Montreal and member of this house I voted against my hon. friends on this side because I considered that the federal government should do its part in meeting the relief situation. As to how the government does its part is perhaps a matter for discussion in the committee stage. I am quite willing to support this bill but I regret that it is another blank cheque. It not only enables the government to do everything it pleases but it enables the government to do less than it should. I would prefer if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) would indicate what the government intends to do for the municipalities in the different provinces in the way of relief. I have no doubt that this bill will pass but I think the minister should give an explanation as to how he intends to use the bill for the few months he will be in office.

The question of delays comes up every time the relief situation is discussed. I do not intend to revive that issue to-day as the minister has always been very insistent that his department was not responsible for the delays. The Quebec government takes the same position as do the Montreal authorities who disclaim the accusation that they are slow in producing their accounts. Inasmuch as the government is expected to pay a certain sum I do not see why it considers it necessary to wait until all accounts are checked before making payments. After all, the provincial governments are solvent as are most of the municipalities. If there should happen to be a delay in checking accounts I think it should be possible to pay a city like Montreal a certain amount on account. I am sometimes reproached for having been at the head of the administration of that city, it being said that I should not discuss these matters. I think it is just the other way around. Whatever public opinion may be as to how the city was administered during the two years I was mayor, I think everyone will admit that I have acquired considerable experience in municipal matters. I say to the minister that it is very embarrassing for the administration of a large city like Montreal to have to wait months before it receives payments from Quebec and Ottawa. The city has lost considerable in interest because of payments which were not received in time. This has added considerably to the burden which the city has to carry.

I do not wish to speak any longer on this matter as I expressed my opinion during the debate two or three weeks ago on the motion to go into supply. I repeat that I do not like bills of this kind which are not precise in their text and which allow considerable leeway to the government. We seem to be indulging more and more in government by commissions and by orders in council. Practically every bill which has been before the house this session calls for a commission. We are drifting more and more away from the system of parliamentary representation; we are giving to commissions the work which should be done by the representatives of the people. In this instance no commission is contemplated but the government is reserving the right to do what it pleases, to increase or reduce the amounts to be paid for relief to the different provinces.

I consider that the unemployment situation is primarily a federal obligation and I think the government should be in a position to discuss in detail the policy which it intends to follow. I think it is a good policy to construct public works in order to provide employment and the government has had the endorsation and approbation of this side of the house in its hope that by a new policy of reforms it will create employment for a larger number of people. I contend that public works which are not needed provide only an artificial means of meeting the unemployment situation. The only cure will be through a return to normal conditions, through an expansion of trade and a recurrence of industrial activity. This is such a common sense truth that it is not necessary to stress it. No matter how many public works may be constructed throughout the country there will always be a certain number of unemployed in the larger centres. This will be so until there is a return of normal conditions in this and perhaps in other countries. In the meantime the government cannot escape its responsibility. This bill indicates that it is quite willing to meet that responsibility but I repeat that the minister should indicate in a more precise way what the federal government intends to do and to what extent it is ready to meet its obligations.

My remarks are not inspired by any political thoughts. I realize as well as any hon. member and perhaps better than most the extraordinary difficulties connected with this problem. However, if there was a time when the federal government should not shirk its responsibility, it is the present. The situation is very serious as many municipalities have practically given up hope of meeting the expenses which will be incurred in this respect. Even Montreal with its policy of heavy taxation will be able to meet only the immediate deficit in the municipal budget. The city will not be able to carry on if the government comes to its assistance in only a half hearted manner. It is not a question of limiting the amount, it is a question of meeting the difficulties as they present themselves. Therefore I will approve of the second reading of this bill in the hope that when we discuss the matter more fully we shall get a very detailed and precise statement from the government as to its intentions.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): With one part of the speech delivered by the previous speaker (Mr. Rinfret) I am heartily in agreement. I think that the present unemployment situation puts too great a burden on our municipal authorities. At the present time many of the municipal bodies are almost breaking under the load which the unemployment situation places upon them. I think that the situation as it exists to-day may be called normal; we may have to wait a long time before we return to conditions as they were seven or eight years ago. The municipalities at one time were expected to take care of indigent cases within their own boundaries and as a result of the unemployment problem having assumed the vast proportions it has, it has become almost impossible for the municipalities to carry the enormous burden. Even when the present opposition was in power I suggested that unemployment had become so acute a problem as to have become more or less a national burden, and that the federal government should undertake the responsibility. For after all the municipalities are not in the least degree responsible for unemployment within their own borders, and if the causes of unemployment are national in their scope then the federal government ought to assume full responsibility for the situation. I believe that the added burden placed on municipalities by the federal government last year was a mistake, and I hope that before the bill is finally adopted in this house we shall have a statement from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that the government intends to a very large extent to relieve the municipalities and if possible the provincial governments as well of the burden which they are carrying at the present time.

Another aspect of the question is this. I think it is a fact that every member of this house, irrespective of party, dislikes the idea of giving this form of relief to men and women, to those who are dependent on the public authority for relief. I think that parliament ought to get down during this session to something fundamental to deal with the unemployment situation, something more fundamental than the granting of this form of dole, which is the worst form of relief one can possibly think of. In my opinion the conditions in which we find ourselves at the present time are by no means abnormal, because conditions that have been in existence for a period of five years may be regarded as having become normal. We shall probably within the next few years at least be obliged to take care of quite a large number of our people in this country by means of relief, and I should like to see the government of the day, whatever government is in power, take the question seriously into consideration and find for these men and women more useful ways of spending their lives than by waiting for the government to hand them relief. I should like to see our men and women absorbed in some town of useful and productive activity. My main purpose in speaking is to try to obtain from the government some promise, some pledge that they will make it easier for the civic governments to proceed in the giving of relief to those who come within their jurisdiction, because many of our municipalities to-day are on the verge of bankruptcy. If they are forced to go the way the city of Vancouver is going and the way the city of Hull proposes to go in the near future, if they are forced into a condition similar to that which now exists in Montreal, the financial capital of the dominion, whose authorities say that they cannot afford to maintain the unemployed within their borders, and if as I believe the unemployment problem is a federal responsibility, then I submit that the federal government should assume that obligation.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I had hoped that as part of the reform program which the government have introduced this session there would be some new methods suggested of dealing with the problem of unemployment. I particularly object to the present method because it places on the municipalities the onus of taking care of the unemployed. Every time I have spoken on the problem during the present term of parliament I have objected to this attitude both of the present government and of the former government. The policies which determine the possibilities of employment for our people are determined by this parliament, by this cabinet, and the municipalities are perfectly helpless in the matter. They are victims of bad policies which are initiated or allowed to develop through action or inaction in this house. Our policies in regard to trade and commerce, tariffs, immigration, railway rates and particularly in regard to the whole question of money and credit—these are the things that determine the chance of the people to get employment; and because of bad policy in connection with all these various matters we have the present condition of unemployment.

There is no good excuse for unemployment in a new country like Canada. The municipalities are helpless to do much in the matter; the provinces are really helpless, and the responsibility rests on this house. It is a national problem that should be dealt with in a national way. If it is the considered opinion of the government that they will not care for it except through unemployment relief or the dole, then the government should provide the dole. I do not believe in taking care of unemployment in that way. As I say, in a new country like Canada, undeveloped and with great national resources, with numbers of workmen the equal of any in the world, there is no excuse for unemployment. We have it because of our own stupidity. But why should this parliament inflict on the municipalities this task of taking care of the unemployed? I notice in this morning's Citizen that the cities, being unable under the present financial system to cope with the problem, have gone so far as to instruct the police to prevent people from moving in. According to the Citizen the mayor of Ottawa has issued to the chief of police the order that if families are not bona fide residents of Ottawa they will be ordered out of the city. I quote that to show the point to which our cities have been driven. After four years of taking care of the unemployed by the present method, the cities are being forced into bankruptcy, and I say that with a full realization of the conditions. There are several cities in Canada—I will not name them—which I think are virtually bankrupt to-day, and certain provinces are almost in the same position. They have had to be helped by the federal government and the reason they are in that position is, as I have stated, that wrong policies have been initiated in this parliament. I should like to see parliament take a determined stand on the matter. Let us say that it is the responsibility of the federal parliament to deal with the problem of unemployment. It would not be quite so bad if by legislation we did not go so far as to prevent the cities from doing one of the few things that they perhaps could do to deal with this question. We make them financially responsible for taking care of the unemployed, but the only sources from which they can get the finances to do it are either the citizens by taxation or the banks by borrowing. We will not allow them to create a little money of their own; section 138 of the Bank Act imposes a fine of $400 on any one except a bank who issues money or substitutes for money. When that act was being passed through this house a year ago some of us discussed this question for an hour or two in an endeavour to have that section deleted. It prevents some of the municipalities from issuing a certain amount of municipal scrip which otherwise I think they could do and so provide in some degree for the unemployed, but by legislation we prevent them from going even that far. So that the only method at their disposal of taking care of the unemployed is by raising money either through loans from the banks, or taxing their ratepayers, and in many cases the rate of taxation has become so high that it has destroyed the value of the property on which it is levied. Personally I can no longer sit still in this house and see this burden imposed upon the municipalities and the provinces without voicing my protest.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I shall not attempt to follow the argument of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) or the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) because they both profess economic doctrines which are a complete denial and reversal of accepted doctrine in Canada at the present time. I shall however direct a few remarks to the observations of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). He has put forward in a mild and bland way the suggestion that the federal government should contribute large and definite amounts to the maintenance of the unemployed in the cities. I have no quarrel with the method or the manner of his presentation, but is not his suggestion this, that this parliament should pour untold treasure into the laps of the civic adminstrations, there to be spent without let or hindrance and without control of those who are supplying the funds? I venture to suggest that the hon. member for St. James would not care to see the administration of the cities and the spending of the money controlled by the federal authority. He is, I believe—and I have no quarrel with him on this point—a pronounced and avowed believer in provincial rights, and would resent any encroachment by the federal authority whether by control or by direction, upon provincial or municipal policy in the expenditure of money. Many people believe that the administration of some cities, and in particular of the city of Montreal, has not been beyond reproach, and many believe that some of the financial problems that confront Montreal to-day are to some extent due to unskilful administration of the affairs of that city. Therefore it does not seem to me reasonable that the federal treasury should be asked to contribute large amounts to the requirements of Montreal unless it were to have control over the disbursement of those moneys, and I doubt very much whether the hon. member for St. James would be willing to concede that control.

After all, unemployment results from the fact that people cannot find work in the production of goods which may be sold. For a time there was great industrial activity in our cities; it has now subsided, and for the last four or five or even six years there has been a dropping off in employment. There has been some revival in recent months, but I doubt very much whether any one who looks into the figures carefully can find reason to hope that all the unemployed can again find gainful occupation in the industrial life of this country. It seems to me that loss of equilibrium is fundamental to the troubles that we are now experiencing, and that until a policy is initiated which will put the people who are now dependent upon the dole where they can provide for themselves food and shelter and clothing, we are bound to be afflicted by the ills resulting from unemployment. The hon. member for Macleod did make a reference to the abundant resources of the country, but those resources are not open to development by men who are out of work and are being fed by the municipalities and the provinces aided by the dominion. Until colonization becomes definitely and exclusively the prerogative of the dominion, in which event our constitution would have to be amended accordingly, we must look to those who exercise control over that department of our national life to reestablish this equilibrium. So long as people are permitted to remain in the cities and receive weekly allowances more or less adequate to their requirements, so long will this disequilibrium continue. I believe that a solution could be found by taking back to the land numbers of those who have come into the cities from the rural districts. I have said frequently in the house that I do not advocate sending these people to remote parts of the country, but a few acres in settled districts could be made available at moderate cost to those now unemployed in the cities. I believe that if this housing plan of which we are hearing so much, and which is now occupying the attention of a special committee of the house, were amended to provide small homes in the old and settled districts at low prices, a definite step would be taken towards solving this problem. Paying out money to feed people from day to day, when there is but slight chance of the majority of them becoming again self-sustaining, seems to me to be a policy which does not lead to permanent relief. I therefore again suggest to the minister that the provinces be made to understand that unless they are willing to abandon their prerogative as regards colonization, and unless the cities are willing to make over the administration and control of relief to the federal authorities, permanent assistance from the federal treasury should not be anticipated.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I cannot see my way clear to support the second reading of this bill, for reasons which are very few but very definite. This parliament was elected in 1930 on the statement and the assertion that unemployment had become a national problem, that it was a problem that had become so wide in its scope that it was a matter for the dominion parliament to deal with and a question for the dominion parliament to solve. I am opposed to the second reading of this bill because after five years of administration no relief program and no program to solve unemployment as yet has been placed before this parliament and the people of Canada. Indeed a blank cheque, instead of being a program, is a confession of failure, an admission that there is no program. I quite realize that the first year a measure of this kind was proposed in this parliament the government may have had some measure of justification for pleading that they had not had time to deal with such an important question as unemployment, but this has been going on for five years. This is the fifth session in which a measure of this kind, a blank cheque, has been presented for the endorsation of parliament, and it comes just at the end of the time fixed by statute for the duration of parliament.

Well, I do not think the government are justified in introducing such a measure this year. We were hoping, as some hon. gentlemen said, that in this reform program there would be a measure to deal with unemployment, but I think everyone will agree that in no bill that has been introduced this session and that has been called a measure of reform has there been anything that could in any way alleviate the serious unemployment which is distressing the country at the present time.

My other reason is also very definite and very simple. The same clauses against which we have always protested, including that clause having to do with peace, order and good government, which gives the government the right to do anything whether or not it is in the statutes, are included in this bill, and I do not think that at this time, after the government have been at the head of affairs for more than the usual term of office, we would be justified in giving them this power to do anything, whether it is or is not already in the law. So far as I am concerned I confess that I have not a sufficient degree of confidence in the government to entrust them with that power.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it would be very distasteful to me to place myself in any position as a result of which it might be represented that in any sense I opposed the voting of money for the relief of the distressed and unemployed people of Canada, and certainly I do not intend to take any such action. At the moment I rise not to discuss the policies or lack of policies which have resulted in the present condition of unemployment but to refer more particularly to the question raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), as to the method of relief which should be adopted at this time, especially with regard to the municipalities.

I think it will be admitted even by hon. gentlemen opposite that what has been done already by the government in the way of what is called reform legislation can have no possible bearing on the question of curing unemployment. What has been done—I do not like to use the word—is more or less trivial in the effect it can have on the present situation. It can have no great bearing at all on the question of curing unemployment. The unemployment insurance bill, while laudable in its intention, it must be admitted will not help in the slightest degree the people who are now unemployed.

It has been said that there is some improvement, that there is more employment in the country than there was previously. In some degree that may be true; speaking of my own city I think perhaps there is a little more employment than there was a few months ago, although I believe that in the last few months we have been slipping in that respect, if I may use that term. But the fact remains that to-day in that city—and I do no suppose it stands alone in that respect—we are spending more money for relief than we ever spent before. The reason, I think, is that people who for the last two or three years have lived on their savings, now find themselves without means and under the necessity of applying to the municipality for relief.

As I said at the outset I am not going to discuss the policies of the government, or whether or not they are entirely responsible for the condition in which we find ourselves. I do agree, however, with the hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), that in the last five years there has not been developed any definite plan for the cure of unemployment or any definite, systematic plan that can be recommended as having been successful in the distribution of relief. I agree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for Macleod that the care of the unemployed has become more than ever a national duty. Speaking for my own city, and I believe for a good many other municipalities, the burden of relief is becoming heavier than the municipalities can bear, and I think it has become a matter not only of right and duty but almost of absolute necessity for the federal government seriously to consider taking over if not the entire burden of relief at least a very much greater share than they have assumed up to the present.

My hon. friend from Quebec East has objected to the bill on the ground that it again grants a blank cheque. We on this side have always disagreed with that procedure, and I am not retreating from that position. If there were any justification for again giving the government a blank cheque, however, it might lie in the fact that in the mind of the government to-day there is some intention of taking over a greater share of the sums required for the relief of the people in the municipalities, and relieving the municipalities to a greater extent than is being done at the present time. I am quite sure the minister will, and certainly I believe he should in his explanation, tell us a little more about the government's intention concerning the proportion of relief they propose to undertake on behalf of the municipalities. I have risen for this purpose, namely, to say that the government should do something to help the municipalities—and for two reasons. In the first place, as has been said before, the matter of unemployment has become of national importance. The people in these municipalities are not simply citizens of Kitchener, Montreal, Quebec or any other city, but they are citizens of Canada. For that reason I say it becomes the duty of the government of Canada to assist those municipalities. Secondly, I would call attention to the absolute impossibility of some of those municipalities continuing longer the contributions they have made in the past.

If the minister has not already considered the matter I would suggest that he consider seriously having the federal government relieve the municipalities, if not entirely then to a much greater extent than obtains at the present time, of this burden of taking care of the unemployed.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, for several years past possibly at some risk of criticism I have supported the government on their relief measures, even when they have asked for blank cheques, because I have realized that the unemployed had to be cared for. The government was functioning in very difficult times, and had its hands very full. However, now that the government has been in power for nearly five years, and after the radio speeches delivered by the Prime Minister I had hoped we would have before us at this session some policy other than that of recommending a blank cheque for this particular purpose. Possibly the minister will have something to say on the matter, and I shall be interested to hear his observations. I would intimate however that at the present time we have no definite plan before us, nor have we any indication that the government has any other way of meeting unemployment than has been followed during the past years.

During the first year the government, in cooperation with the provinces and municipalities, put into effect an extensive public works program. I am sorry that policy was not continued. I suppose it was withdrawn because they felt the debt created would be too great. I submit however we must recognize that if we are financing undertakings really needed for the public welfare, and if we recognize that an asset is always produced to offset a liability we should not hesitate to proceed with public works which are really needed. On the one hand we have the raw material and on the other an over supply of labour.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). His observations always hold great interest for me because I believe he and I take an entirely different view of most matters which come before the house for consideration. He is of the opinion that if the provinces would give up to the federal government their right to colonization, and if the federal government would carry out an extensive program of colonization, placing people who have left the country back on the farms, all would be well. May I remind the hon. member there are very definite reasons why people have left the country to go to the cities. I believe the main reason lies in the fact that on the whole the standard of living is much higher in the city than it is in the country. Furthermore agriculture in Canada to-day is possibly at the lowest ebb it has been for generations. Surely the hon. member could not have noticed the prices which have obtained for some years past for farm products. He must realize that when wheat is selling below cost, when prime steers are selling as low as $12 or $16 per head, when sheep are selling at $1 each, when dressed carcasses of prime lamb are selling at $2, when butter has sold as low as from six to twelve cents per pound, and when eggs have sold as low as four cent to six cents per dozen, it is impossible to expect to put people back on the land and keep them there. Especially is that true when we realilze that other prices have not dropped proportionately. Further, if the provinces gave up their rights to colonization surely they would have to give up their rights to the land they control, something which would involve practically the giving up of their provincial rights. Surely we could not expect them to do that.

On other occasions I have drawn attention of hon. members to the fact that while we have unemployment in industry we have an over-employment problem in the country. If farming could be put on a paying basis, when most farms in Canada could quite easily use the help of an extra man, I believe we might take up the slack of unemployment, and would be adopting one of the means of curing at least for the time being the unemployment problem.

I would remind the house that the mechanization of industry and the use of solar energy constitutes one of the reasons why we have unemployment. A few days ago an hon. member stated that in Canada we have 8,000,000 horsepower created by waterpower. That would mean that we have the equivalent of eight man slaves behind every man, woman and child in the dominion. The effect has been that we have been able to produce quickly and in enormous quantities the goods we require. A further effect has been that of transferring work from the shoulders of man to machinery. We must recognize therefore that we cannot solve the problems of the future as we have solved those of the past, by producing more and consuming less.

I suggest there are ways and means of taking up the slack of unemployment. For instance I am told on very good authority that if we took proper care of our forests we could easily employ all the men now idle for some years to come. May I remind the minister that the problem is to a great extent one of purchasing power rather than of unemployment. We have unemployment because we have a glut of goods. In other words, the richer we are in the possession of goods the more unemployment we have, because people are not wanted to produce more goods unless the goods already produced are moving to consumers.

Some weeks ago the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) suggested another way to solve unemployment, namely, the pensioning of people who have reached the age of sixty years. We find that people try to continue to work until they are seventy, seventy-three or possibly seventy-five years of age, while on the other hand we are at our wits' end to take care of the younger generation of people between the ages of twenty and thirty years. Surely it would be only common sense to pension off the older people who are working only to have security, and many of whom would be only too glad to accept a small pension for an assurance of security, and thus make room for the younger generation. I believe our problem is to a great extent one of deciding how best to make use of the vast quantities of goods and services which can be produced so easily to-day. As was stated a few days ago the problem is not one of production, but one of distribution. In my opinion there is never sufficient money paid out for the cost of the production of goods to enable those goods to be bought; in other words, there is never sufficient total cash in the country, taking the cash in the pockets of the people, plus all deposits drawable by cheque, to equal the price of the goods offered for sale, and therefore it becomes the duty of the government to monetize the national credit and make up this deficiency. This would enable the people to live on a much higher standard of living. It would begin to move the goods and services of which we have now such a glut, and would create a call for more. It would also call for more people to be employed, and the situation would be entirely changed.

A dole as a dole is wrong, and should be discontinued. If we have public work to do, it should be done, as long as we have the raw material and the people who want to do it. I am sorry that the government has not put forward some other proposal this session to meet this very aggravated situation. I believe we have to look at it in a way entirely different from that in which it has been viewed in the past. We are not going to solve the problem simply by suggesting that people work harder and produce more but at the same time consume less. That recommendation was perfectly all right prior to the machine age, but is entirely wrong to-day.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised a moment ago to hear my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) oppose our legislation on the ground that he thought this government had not the right to do anything of the kind. He was opposed to this legislation for the reasons that had already been given against this policy of giving the government a blank cheque. But this same member for Quebec East was some time ago in Quebec alongside the premier of the province praising the principles and the unity of the Liberal party, and stating that the Liberal party was fighting just one fight in both the provincial and the federal arena. Has my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) forgotten the legislation which the Liberal government in the province of Quebec is trying to pass in the provincial legislature? I have before me Bill No. 15, which has already been presented to the legislature of Quebec and is now awaiting its second or third reading. It is entitled, the Needy Unemployed Aid Act, 1935. What does the second section of that bill say? It reads as follows:

The lieutenant governor in council shall have power to do or authorize such acts and things and to make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may deem necessary or advisable with respect to the steps to be taken with a view to remedying unemployment, and—

May I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the following words:

and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing terms, he—

That is the lieutenant governor in council.

—may, for the same purposes amend, suspend, repeal or add to any provisions of previous Unemployed Aid Acts or to any other act of the legislature.

In other words, if this bill which I have in my hand goes through the provincial legislature, the lieutenant governor in council will have the right to amend any legislation already passed, to repeal any legislation or to add any provisions of previous unemployed aid acts, or to any of the acts of the legislature of the province of Quebec. I think this is more than a blank cheque.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If!

Mr. DUPRE: Does my hon. friend agree with that measure?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. DUPRE: I take it that on this question my hon. friend from Quebec East does not agree with the Liberal government of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Since my hon. friend has asked me a question I suppose I may answer it. The minister who is in charge of this bill, when I talked to him about it, stated that this clause would never be passed.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not agree with the hon. member. I will agree that this projected legislation has stirred up public opinion so much in the province of Quebec that the Liberal government of the province has not dared up to now to go through with it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But you are going through with this.

Mr. DUPRE: That Bill No. 15, however, is still on the order paper of the legislature of the province, and all we have is the declaration of the Minister of Public Works for the province, the Hon. Mr. Francœur, who states at the present time that he does not know what he will do in regard to this legislation, but that he has not bound himself to withdraw the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about yours?

Mr. DUPRE: That is not all. The second paragraph of section 2 of Bill No. 15 reads as follows:

The lieutenant governor in council may likewise authorize the Minister of Public Works to enter into any agreements or arrangements with the government of the dominion or with any municipal corporation of this province, or with both, having for object the relief of unemployment.

Here may I draw attention to the fact that there is no limitation on the amount. Then section 4 of the bill reads as follows:

If required for the purposes of putting into effect the provisions of this act, the lieutenant governor in council is authorized to acquire, by agreement or expropriation, the necessary immovable properties and every immovable right, charge, lease for occupation or emphyteutic lease, constituted rent or other rights affecting such properties.

Again there is no limitation on the amount. Then I come to section 5 of the same bill, which reads as follows:

The lieutenant governor in council may authorize the provincial treasurer to advance or pay, out of the consolidated revenue fund of the province, on the certificates of the Minister of Public Works, the sums which the province of Quebec may be called upon to expend under the provisions of this act.

Again I say to my hon. friend from Quebec East that there is no limitation on the amount. But there is something more. The second paragraph of section 5 reads as follows:

The lieutenant governor in council may, if he deem it expedient for the purpose of paying all or part of the sums required or for reimbursing any advances made, also authorize the provincial treasurer to contract a loan or loans, by means of bonds or inscribed stock issued on the credit of the province.

In other words, if I understand this paragraph well, the lieutenant governor in council may, if he deem it expedient, borrow any amount of money. There is no limitation as to the amount and no limitation as to the rate of interest or the term of the loan.

Then I come to section 7, which reads as follows:

Notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary of any general or special act, every municipal corporation, however incorporated and whatever the law governing it, is authorized:

(a) To benefit from the carrying out of the provisions of this act;

(b) To do and order, by resolution of its council, all things necessary for such purposes;

(c) To contribute towards the expenditure incurred out of its general funds.

And then comes the important part of that section:

(d) To make by-laws for loans by an issue of bonds or debentures or otherwise, without other preliminary or subsequent formality than the approval of such by-laws by the majority of the members present forming a quorum of its council and by the Quebec Municipal Commission and the lieutenant governor in council.

The borrowing power granted by this section shall not affect the borrowing power possessed by such municipal corporation and shall be construed as authorizing one or more loans exceeding the limit fixed by the acts governing such corporation.

If this legislation passes, any municipal corporation will have the right to borrow any amount of money, the only formality necessary being approval by the majority of the quorum of the council of the municipality, by the Quebec municipal commission and by the lieutenant governor in council. It is stated that the borrowing power granted by this section shall not affect the borrowing power already possessed by such municipal corporations.

We have heard one of the authorized voices of the Liberal party raised in opposition to our legislation because of the powers conferred upon the governor in council. I have related to the house the legislation which the Liberal party of Quebec is trying to pass through the legislature at the present session. If this legislation passes it will give the lieutenant governor in council the right to amend, to suspend, to repeal or to add to any legislation already in force and to borrow any amount of money. The right is given to any municipal corporation to borrow any amount of money. In view of this, I think the best thing our Liberal friends from Quebec can do is to remain silent.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) in connection with Bill 41, respecting relief measures. When the Solicitor General rose I had hopes that he would tell the house something about the bill, but he went completely outside the matter. He went to the Quebec legislature and discussed a bill which is on the order paper there. That bill has not been discussed and no one knows what will be the final result. The specimen bill referred to shows that it has been drawn up similarly to the present bill. Section 2 of the present bill reads:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise;—

I am disappointed at not finding in this bill some provision to assist the small real estate owner. If we can help the provinces, the muncipalities and the wheat producers, why cannot we help the small real estate owner who is about to see his property seized by the sheriff or the loan company or the mortgagor? I am against this bill because the amount of $500,000 granted to Quebec is not sufficient. The city of Montreal is expending over one and one half millions each month for relief, and Montreal is not the only city in the province. There are Quebec city, Sherbrooke, Valleyfield and other centres which must ask for relief. Within the next few days there is to be held in Montreal a meeting of mayors of cities throughout Canada. They are meeting to discuss different matters relating to municipal affairs, and afterwards they will come to Ottawa to see the government to try to obtain grants for relief. Why should these mayors undertake a long trip at the expense of the municipal treasuries in order to discuss these matters? They are doing it because they cannot meet their relief obligations and they hope to obtain better treatment. I am against this measure because it is like other measures of the kind which have been passed during the past four years. I think these measures were considered by the people of Canada when they voted in the recent by-elections. The people voted against such measures and yet this year the same thing is being presented. Knowing the sentiment of the electors as expressed in the past, I feel sure they are against this bill, and as a member of parliament I feel it my duty to vote against it.

No limitation of amount is mentioned in the Taschereau bill, and this bill seems to be suffering from the same disease. We do not know what amount is going to be given to the province of Quebec, and until that is known that province cannot put an exact amount in the bill placed before the legislature. The province must wait to see what the federal government is giving before taking definite action with regard to the obligations which the federal government promised it would meet in the elections of 1930.

I submit that this bill offers nothing new. Canada is suffering from unemployment and this problem is not met. At the present time the provinces cannot see just where they are going; they cannot find any rainbow in their sky, they can see only the clouds of misery. They do not know whether the assistance they are to receive from the goverment will be sufficient to allow them to escape bankruptcy and save the municipalities.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I intend to devote only a few moments to this bill, because on looking it over I find that there is nothing new in it. It is copied from the bill of last year, which was a copy of the bill of the year before. The new deal which the people of Canada have been looking for ever since the radio speeches to which they were treated dwindles down as we make its acquaintance. The question of the blank cheque has been argued before in this house, and as the government evidently intends to insist upon it I do not suppose there is much object in taking up the time of the house by discussing a copy of an old measure which has proved to be so unpopular throughout the country in recent years. For that reason I do not intend to devote to it any time. In the province from which I come, since this house met last there were five by-elections, and in every one of them one of the great issues stressed on behalf of the government was its unemployment policy, which hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to defend, which this opposition condemned and in particular its blank cheque feature. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, nor the minister in charge of this bill, nor the Minister of Railways, nor the Minister of Public Works, all of whom come from Ontario and who took part in these discussions, how unpopular the unemployment policy of this government proved during those by-elections, and particularly the blank cheque feature of that legislation. I do not suppose that if this house were to debate the matter for a month until closure was applied, as was done when the measure was first introduced, it would change the views of this government. They tell us that they have changed and are reformers now, but when we begin to examine their legislation we find that it is just the old type of Tory legislation, bearing no semblance of reform whatever. For that reason I do not intend to debate it at further length. I think it is just as iniquitous as the members of the opposition claimed it was when it was first introduced. This government, with its majority will likely pass it. This government and its supporters constitute the only tribunal to which I believe it will appeal. Throughout the country, wherever there has been a chance to vote upon it, the most severe condemnation has been passed on it and I am satisfied this is the only place where it will carry. It will however, carry and for that reason I think we should get along to an examination of some of the reforms which we were promised a couple of months ago. Therefore, though opposed to the bill, I do not intend to take up the time of the house going over straw that has been already threshed two or three times. This legislation has received the most cordial disapproval of electors throughout the dominion whenever they have had a chance to vote on it.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I merely wish to put on record a question which I would ask the minister to reply to. I would refer him to page 2117 of Hansard of April 13, 1934. A question was put then to the leader of the government with regard to the classification of the unemployed. It is a matter of great importance. Yesterday the Minister of Railways blamed the opposition for not offering any constructive suggestion of policy. Now this is a most timely suggestion, which has been offered again and again to the Minister of Labour, and the only reply which I have received was the reply from the Prime Minister who spoke as follows, as reported at page 2118 of Hansard of April 13, 1934:

> The government has done everything it reasonably could do, in cooperation with the provinces and otherwise, to classify the unemployed.

This is a suggestion which has come from the opposition, and until the unemployed are classified nothing practical will be done for their relief. I would therefore ask the minister to be good enough to comply with my request to tell the house what has been done in accordance with the statement made by the leader of the government with regard to the classification of the unemployed. What has been done in that regard from 1930 to date?

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I do not know whether we should continue complaining of the treatment we have been receiving from the government, whose attitude has been—be damned if you do and be damned if you don't. Yesterday I complained that the Minister of Railways and others opposite had chastised us because we did not put up any strenuous opposition to the brain trust bill, and now we have our good friend the Solicitor General—and by the way may I be permitted to congratulate him on his birthday—

Mr. DUPRE: Thank you so much.

Mr. POWER: —blaming us because we support a government which apparently has in mind or has proposed to pass legislation similar to that which his government is introducing in this house. We are damned if we support Taschereau in Quebec and I presume we are damned if we oppose this government in this house. There is only one way out of the dilemma and that is for the government to get out of power and then perhaps we might get that absolution to which our good deeds entitle us and be allowed to carry on the government of the country without being worried by my hon. friends opposite.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) has I think correctly stated the terms of the bill which has been introduced in the Quebec legislature, and may I say that possibly it shows more than anything else the influence of bad example on the public life of this country. But the Solicitor General would seem to blame us for supporting that bill. Speaking for myself alone, though I have high respect and admiration for the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, I would no more support the bill introduced by Mr. Francœur if carried in its present form than I would such a bill introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. DUPRE: That is what we wanted to know.

Mr. POWER: You know now. I will give the Solicitor General some of the reasons why there was at least ample justification for the introduction of such a bill in the legislature. In the first place he is not unaware that since this government has been in power, over five years now, it has never had anything even approaching a vestige of a policy on unemployment. It has kept on repeating that unemployment was primarily a matter for the municipalities, secondly a matter for the provinces and thirdly that grants in aid were to be made by the federal government. But never has it stated definitely what its policy was in the matter. Never has it said how much or in what manner it would give aid to the provinces. The first unemployment measure was a vote of $20,000,000 whereby the municipalities and provinces were encouraged to spend thousands of dollars in many instances on useless public works and to bring themselves to the very verge of bankruptcy. The next thing we had was relief, then we went off relief and went on to public works, and then back to relief; and now we have apparently a combination of relief and public works. No provincial government has been able to say in advance just what policy or program would be followed or would be suggested or would be put before them by this government.

On many occasions, as has been pointed out, this government has threatened to withdraw all manner of assistance, particularly in the way of relief. Provincial statutes, provincial legislation, provincial departments are all interested in the policy which may be laid down by this government. It was absolutely essential that the government of the province of Quebec should be prepared, in case their session finished before the labours of this session are concluded, as it nearly always does, and should have the authority and power and jurisdiction to deal with, let us say, colonization, let us say, public works, let us say, relief. And it was in order to obtain those powers that the bill was introduced. If the Minister of Labour, if the Solicitor General, if any hon. member of this government will definitely say to the government of the province of Quebec what their policy is, the government and legislature of the province of Quebec, now in session, will pass legislation enabling it to cooperate to the fullest extent with this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUPRE: If I may ask a question, what about the right conferred on the legislature by the bill to repeal any act already passed, whether it be about unemployment, or any other act of the legislature?

Mr. POWER: I am sorry if I am not speaking loud enough for the hon. gentleman. I stated that many departments of the government of the province and presumably many statutes on the statute books of the province of Quebec would be or could be affected by proposed legislation in this house, and in order to cooperate in every way with this government it was necessary to prepare so as to be able to meet the wishes of this government with respect to relief. I simply point out that the government of the province of Quebec has not been remiss in its duty. As long ago as January, if I mistake not, it offered to pay fifty per cent of the cost of relief in municipalities—yes, longer ago than that, I think last November. For many days and months no reply came from this government, and finally the offer was absolutely rejected. Only a few days ago the premier of the province of Quebec offered to the federal government to take over the whole cost of relief if the federal government would remit to the province the collection exclusively of the income tax in that province. It is difficult for the province to be prepared to deal with this government when almost invariably action is deferred until the last week of the month of March, just about the time when their powers under former legislation have expired. This year I must congratulate the minister upon the fact that he is five or six days ahead of his schedule but on other occasions the bills were introduced about the 24th, 25th, or 26th of March and we were told, "we must vote this before the last week of March or else people will starve throughout Canada. It is pointed out to me that the session started a week or so earlier this year. But we had reason to expect, and the government of the province of Quebec had reason to expect, that this year the unemployment bill would be something important; it would not be only a repetition of last year's. That is an additional reason for having prepared for it by giving themselves wide powers of legislation. I will tell you why. On January 2, 1935, we heard the following words:

> Therefore, now that the time has come, I am determined to try with all my strength to correct the working of the system in Canada so that present unemployment conditions may be put an end to. When I say I will correct the system I mean that I will reform it, and when the system is reformed and in full operation again there will be work for all.

Consequently no need of this unemployment and relief legislation.

> We then can do away with relief measures. We then can put behind us the danger of the dole.

But what is this except a dole bill? It is nothing else. We were promised that we could put behind us the danger of the dole. Therefore the provinces expect some kind of legislation which will do away with the danger of the dole.

Mr. GRAY: Who made that speech?

Mr. POWER: The speech was made by the authorized—not then authorized, but the gentleman who has since been confirmed as the authorized spokesman of the government. He goes on:

> I am against the dole. It mocks our claim to progress.

This bill that we are asked to pass on, which provides for relief—if it provides for anything at all it certainly provides for the giving of relief, > —mocks our claim to progress. Canada on the dole is like a young and vigorous man in the poorhouse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POWER: I ask my hon. friend the Solicitor General, what does he think of that?

> The dole is a condemnation, final and complete, of our economic system. If we cannot abolish the dole we should abolish the system.

This is the radio speech made on January 2, 1935.

Mr. GRAY: By whom? Name him.

Mr. POWER: I am told by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) that this is a C.C.F. speech. I am not quite sure yet whether the C.C.F. are willing to accept the leadership, though they may accept the principle. It has been pointed out to me that the words are words of the C.C.F. but the music is by someone else.

When this speech was made in January, 1935, the right hon. gentleman who made it must have had something in his mind, he must have had some idea of the manner in which he was going to do away with this dole which is a condemnation of our economic system. And he said so. In a speech delivered in New York on February 16, 1935, the Prime Minister said:

> I would find it impossible to conceive and to develop a scheme of recovery and reform unless I first had definitely decided upon the answer to it.

Therefore anyone and everyone in this country who had been listening to the Prime Minister must have been under the impression that he had some new scheme, some new plan to do away with this dole, this thing that makes the people of Canada look like a young and vigorous man in the poorhouse. We could not believe anything else but that there was something new to be brought down. And now we know what it is.

Yesterday during the course of the debate my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) rose in his place and said that the "brain trust" bill, the bill for the economic council, was considered by him to be one of the most constructive measures any Canadian government has brought forward. Then in dealing with the problems which were to be solved—or rather to be studied, which is worse—by this council, the minister said:

"To-day we have such problems as unemployment—and I am laying aside the railways problem for the moment.

His economic council does not know enough about the railways. They can deal with other things. but I do not know how the railway question will be solved.

Mr. MANION: By the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler).

Mr. POWER: And perhaps the hon. member for North Waterloo will find a good many advisers to tell him how to solve it. Then let us see what else the minister said, because this is worth repeating.

Then let me suggest that a group of men such as is proposed in this bill, if they are given a problem such as that—

That is, unemployment.

—to consider, if they give their best brains to it as fifteen men of this type will do, may well succeed in bringing forth a settlement of such a vital problem to this country and to the world in general as unemployment.

Our fifteen men, including seven civil servants, are going to settle this problem for the world. This is a super brain trust. It is better than the Nazi brain trust in Germany, better than the Fascist brain trust, better than the Soviet brain trust and far better than the brain trust poor President Roosevelt has had to discard.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I do not like to interfere with the hilarity aroused by the speech of the hon. gentleman, but I think he is breaking a rule in quoting in this debate a speech made on another question during the present session.

Mr. POWER: Then I will not quote from Hansard, although I am dealing with unemployment and I think possibly on a point of order it might be possible for me to quote what was said by the hon. gentleman during the debate yesterday. His words were so important that they were seared into my brain and I remembered them. My hon. friend said it was quite possible that this economic council, composed of people who will sit down and think—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman certainly cannot quote from a speech made during the present session.

Mr. POWER: Then I will not quote from it; I will stand here away from it. I pay particular attention when my good friend the Minister of Railways speaks; I remember what he said.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MANION: It will do you good if you remember enough of it.

Mr. POWER: I remember it all. My hon. friend said it was quite possible that this council of fifteen, of whom seven are civil servants, five, chosen by some sort of society and three, other kinds of liars' experts, who will meet twice a year and sit down and think, might solve this problem. The point was that they are to sit down and think as we—and my hon. friend referred to himself and his colleagues—have not been able to do in the last five years. I hope the minister will admit that I have been quoting him fairly; I am told that I have given his remarks almost verbatim. That is something I cannot forget; it is too good. The Prime Minister says we must do away with unemployment; he goes down to New York and says he has all the answers, and now the Minister of Railways says that this country, including the seven civil servants, will be able to think and we will be able to settle this question, as the government would have been able to settle it long ago if they had been able to do the same. I will leave that with my hon. friend. The unemployment question has been hovering over the people of this country for the past five years, and the only solution we have heard is that repeated by the minister to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hovering is hardly the word.

Mr. POWER: Hovering is hardly the word, unless it has some reference to the bad angels who, when the good angels came along, were cast into the nethermost depths of hades. The unemployment question and its accompanying problem, that is to say the present government, perhaps would be in the same position as those bad angels whom the name-sake of our race, St. Michael, was able to chase into those nethermost depths of which I spoke.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Now St. Patrick is at work.

Mr. POWER: No, St. Patrick is not working until next year. I direct the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) to this situation, and I will make him this challenge without being in any way authorized to do so. If this government will bring down any clear and definite program and policy of reform, including a definite demand on the provinces to deal with colonization and public works, asking them definitely what they are going to do about it, then I will guarantee that not only the province of Quebec but every province in the dominion will be very grateful and only too glad to cooperate, as we on this side of the house are now and have been in the past on every occasion when such a bill has been brought down. We said to the government then, as we say to them now: Tell us what you want to do with the money. Tell us what you have in mind to deal with this situation. Tell us if you have any plans, any program or any policy. Give us some limit to the amount of money you propose to use. Tell us in what manner you are going to use the powers for which you are asking, and we will vote all the money you want and give you all the powers you require without further discussion.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): It is a matter of some gratification, though from one point of view I hesitate to say so, that hon. members opposite can deal with this problem in such a fine spirit of levity. It reflects the great deal of serious thought, or lack of such, that has been given by them to this most baffling problem. Speeches have been referred to—many of the speeches made here are thoughts in quotation marks—as to what someone said he could do or thought he could do with respect to unemployment in Canada. Criticisms have been offered, and anyone who is a member of a government can expect criticism. I invite it, because out of the criticism one frequently becomes better acquainted with the problem in hand and perhaps better able to attack that problem and solve it if it is capable of solution.

The first criticism levelled at the government seems to be that the federal state has not relieved the muncipalities and—or the provinces of the responsibility of taking care of those unable to take care of themselves and of providing employment for those who are ready, willing and able to work. Unemployment is not a new problem, by any means; I presume it existed at the beginning of time and I expect it will continue to the end of time. A condition of unemployment existed in Canada twelve or thirteen years ago, and we know that the government of that day under the leadership of the present right hon. leader of the opposition was called upon to outline a plan to help the unemployed, a plan of contribution from the federal treasury which would conform to the limitations placed upon the federal state. At that time it was made abundantly clear that in order to assist or to make contributions the federal state must deal with the provinces, and the order in council passed at that time recited in clear terms the respective responsibilities so far as unemployment was concerned. That order in council stated that the responsibility for unemployment was primarily that of the municipalities, that it was next the problem of the provinces and that only in cases of national emergency should the federal state take a hand towards assisting the provinces and municipalities. That principle was spread on the records of this house not only by the right hon. gentleman opposite but by the then leader of the opposition, the present Right Honourable Arthur Meighen.

Let me put this question to hon. members: What kind of machinery is available to the federal state for the administration of direct relief when there are unemployed not only in the cities but in every little hamlet throughout the country? What machinery is there in the federal state; to whom must we turn and what body must we rely for the administration of those funds? There is only one machinery, namely the provincial and municipal machinery set up by the various units in our country. It would not be possible for the federal government to administer direct relief without setting up machinery which unquestionably would result in quite unjustifiable administration expenses.

Having that in mind, and having also in mind the fact that relief such as that to which I have been addressing myself is primarily a municipal responsibility would the dominion government as has been suggested by hon. members opposite be justified in taking the taxes of the dominion taxpayers and paying 100 per cent of those moneys over to bodies over which they have no control, and in the disbursement of which they would have no say? I imagine all of us are fairly human, and we realize that annually there are municipal elections throughout the country. Each municipality has its opposing local forces, and if the dominion government undertook to supply unlimited amounts of money, and turned those moneys over to the municipalities or provinces without any control, then I am wondering just in what position the treasury would be. How possibly could this country carry on? I have great sympathy with those municipalities the resources of which, by reason of the times through which we are passing, have been subjected to heavy drains. One of the very best safeguards upon which we can rely however is the fact that municipalities and provinces must make contributions towards the fund, and while making those contributions they are zealous to see that the money is properly spent and goes for the purposes for which it was intended. There is no question about that.

I am not going to discuss the attitude taken by the late government respecting these matters. I have heard it said, although I have never been curious enough to consult Hansard, that upon one occasion the right hon. leader of the opposition indicated how little he would give to any province which did not conform to his political views.

Mr. BOUCHARD: You promised us everything and gave us nothing.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Gave nothing, did you say?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I do not follow the hon. member. I have not been curious enough to consult Hansard and to read the statements made by the right hon. gentleman. I must say however that I have heard his observations quoted. I think perhaps he made his statements in a spirit of petulance, and I do not hold it against him, as some people do. However he indicated his attitude. I think probably what he meant or what he would have liked to say, upon reflection, was that he would be extremely careful in handing over federal funds to the provinces, lest those provinces might not see eye to eye with him in the disposition of such funds, or the necessity for disbursements.

In order that there may be no doubt about the attitude the present government has followed, may I state that immediately upon taking office we caused conferences to be held at which provincial representatives and premiers of the various provinces attended. Who better than those men would know the peculiar difficulties with which they were confronted? Remember this, that while the policy of relief is to be commended, because in a large measure we are taking care of those unable to take care of themselves, we must not deceive ourselves in the belief that relief has been effected entirely free from politics. Many times I have had occasion to review the matter from that angle. During the last five years conferences have been called by the federal government at which the provincial representatives were given the opportunity to review their respective positions and to determine the extent to which they could carry on alone and, further, the extent to which the federal state would have to come to their assistance. I do not know of any other method that could have been employed in order to acquaint oneself with the difficulties with which we were engaging ourselves.

Much has been said about the province of Quebec and about the city of Montreal. Let it be understood that in the month of July, I think it was, 1931, when there was an election pending in the province of Quebec, the premier of the province made it clear and plain in public meeting that the province did not want relief, did not need it. There is no question about that, and I am not going to hold that against the premier of the province of Quebec, but there was an immediate change after the election, and the demand was made, and of course relief was given.

Each succeeding year agreements have been entered into with the provinces. It is true that the plans changed from time to time. They were changed on every occasion, changed because the consensus of view of the representatives of the provinces with respect to the best method of dealing with their problems was given effect to. That was clear and plain at each one of those conferences.

References have been made to offers that provinces have made to the dominion. They first offer it to the press as a rule. I get it sometimes a week later, and sometimes I never get it at all, but I read about it in the papers. It is true that offers have been made by the province of Quebec that if the dominion will pay fifty per cent of the municipalities' burdens, they will assume the other fifty per cent. Now if such a calamity should happen that after the next election our good friends opposite should be sitting on these treasury benches and this same offer is made, I prophesy that they will not agree to it. They certainly will not.

There are some municipalities in Canada having an extremely difficult time, but let me say that there are many municipalities in Canada which by efficient and careful administration are taking care of this problem and are willing and able to share their part of the burden because, in addition to efficient administration, they know as Canadians that if an unlimited fund of the taxpayers' money is placed in the hands of those who are not immediately in touch with this problem, that is if you remove it and place it in a detached position, as it were, then there is no end to the demand that will be made on the treasury of this country. I have the greatest sympathy for those who want to work and cannot get work, but let me pause for a moment to say this. I have heard it said and repeated in this house that there are a million people unemployed in Canada. That is not true.

That is a misstatement of what the fact is, in so far as there are dependable figures, and figures with respect to this matter are not dependable in any country in the world. I have heard it said that all these unemployed in Canada are unemployed through no fault of their own. That is not a correct statement, not correct by any means.

Mr. HOWARD: Pretty near it.

Mr. GORDON: Someone says, "pretty near it." But let me say this. There is no one in this house who feels more keenly than I do for the position of the man who wants to work, who wants to discharge his responsibilities, and is unable to get work, and there is no one in this house who is more ready to condemn that percentage who are living on the state to-day and who are not trying and do not want to get work; and make no mistake about it, we have those people throughout the world; that is not common to this country.

Criticisms have been made that the present government has not solved unemployment, has not spent enough money, for it comes down to that. But what country in the world has done it? Take that great wealthy nation to the south of us, and look at the huge sums, the billions and billions of dollars that they have spent, and what is the position there to-day? They are relatively much worse off than we are in Canada; that is admitted by every competent authority. What about Great Britain to-day, with the huge sums that she has spent? Has she solved unemployment? Of course she has not.

Someone says that this bill represents the total of all that the government has to offer with respect to the future regarding unemployment. That is not correct. Before this session ends other measures will come before this parliament, other measures will be presented for its approval or disapproval looking towards providing work for our citizens. But this bill is absolutely necessary for the very reason that you cannot continue along a course for some four or five years with respect to direct relief, because that is really what this bill is designed to take care of, and then stop suddenly at the end of a month or at a certain stated time. That is the real reason why the government is presenting this bill and asking for the approval of the house.

Criticisms have been made by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) with respect to the attitude of the dominion government regarding the situation in Montreal. I thank the hon. gentleman for the moderation of his observations, and I think that he made his speech to-day in a spirit of helpfulness. I do not wish to criticize unduly or even criticize at all the municipal administration of that great city. They have tremendous problems. I am sure if the hon. member for St. James cared to make a confession he would say that when he was elected mayor he was not in office long until he almost wished that he had not taken on the responsibility, and I think certainly he would say that he would not care to go back to it to-day. There are tremendous problems there unquestionably. But the difficulty with which I have been confronted with respect to Montreal is that we could not get from the province of Quebec, Montreal's accounts. Can you imagine a big city which could not get its accounts out for submission to us before seventeen months had passed?

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) laughs about that—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was laughing at the "shame."

Mr. GORDON: I beg your pardon. That was the difficulty in Montreal. I should like to refer to a dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of March 20, 1935. I apologize for quoting from a newspaper as I believe this is the first time I have done so and I do not want to break my record. According to this article, this is what was said by the premier of Quebec in the legislature of that province:

> It was true, admitted the premier, that there were delays in making payments to the municipalities, but such delays were inevitable. There had to be checking of accounts, and this took time.

That is quite true. The article continues:

> Ottawa had insisted that Quebec check all municipal accounts, and the provincial auditor had been obliged to do so.

That is quite true. I continue:

> Was the provincial government now to write cheques in blank without verifying the accounts submitted by the municipalities?

Certainly not. I continue:

> Last year Quebec had paid Montreal three millions, but Ottawa had not done as much.

I hope the premier of Quebec did not make such a statement because I intend to show just what are the facts. I quote from a letter dated July 25, 1934, from Mr. Ivan E. Vallée, deputy minister of public works, to the Department of Labour at Ottawa, as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 23rd inst. transmitting dominion government finance department cheque for $3,000,000 which it is represented is an accountable advance made by the dominion government on behalf of the city of Montreal unemployment relief expenditures.

Hon. Mr. Francœur wishes it distinctly understood that in accepting this cheque no interest obligation on the part of the province of Quebec is incurred, as we have already advanced to the city of Montreal sixty per cent of our share, and are remitting the balance up to $3,000,000 to-day together with the $3,000,000 received from you.

The hon. member for St. James knows that the accounts of Montreal got behind very badly. I do not blame him for this as I think he fell heir to many difficulties when he took over the mayoralty of the city. But the fact is that the accounts got behind so badly that representations were made to the government by both the city and the province. After consultation with my colleagues, I agreed to make an advance to the province in order that the financial position of the city might be eased. I want to make this statement because I still believe that Mr. Taschereau may have been misquoted.

Other measures are under consideration by the government at the present time but what they will contain I cannot disclose to the house. This bill is designed only to preserve the continuity of the agreements until they come to an end. I trust they will come to an end as I hope shortly to convene another meeting of the premiers of the provinces when an effort will be made to understand their present difficulties.

I should like to point out one difficulty which arises when you endeavour to correct unemployment by the erection of public buildings. If the dominion government decides to erect a public building to cost a quarter of a million dollars in a county town, a certain situation arises immediately. The plans and specifications are drawn up and are referred to in the local press. The building is started and for the first week or two the local situation is relieved. However, the news soon spreads all over the county that labourers are being paid from thirty-five to forty cents per hour, whatever the wage may be. Practically every labourer who is receiving less quits his job and comes to town. I have watched this situation for the last three or four years and this is what always happens. I do not know how it can be corrected but it is something which must be considered.

The observations I have made are designed to show the position of the dominion with respect to the agreements at present in force and what I believe to be the necessity for continuation of help to the provinces, in whole or in part, in order to take care of direct relief.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister stated a moment ago that within a month this form of relief could be cut off. Does he mean to imply that that position will be possible because of other measures which may be brought down to deal with the situation?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think the hon. member heard me correctly as I do not believe this form of relief can be abandoned. It may be possible to adjust it in the light of other measures which may be brought down in this house or in the legislatures, but I do not think direct relief could be abandoned entirely within such a short period.

Perhaps it would not be out of place to call attention to the improvement which has taken place in employment in Canada. I think the figures which I shall quote can be relied upon. The unemployment as reported by trade unions as of December, 1932, and January, 1933—that was the peak of unemployment—showed 25·5 per cent of the members of trade unions out of employment. In December, 1933, that had fallen to 21 per cent, and in October, 1934, it had fallen to 16·2 per cent. You can see therefore that there is an improvement with respect to labour as reported by the trade unions.

The bureau of statistics figures are I think very interesting. If we take the low point of the depression, April 1, 1933, based on the 1926 index figure of 100, we find that the low point was 76, and turning to April 1, 1934, we find that it had advanced to 91·3; and if we move to July 1, 1934, we find that it had gone to 101. On November 1, 1934, it had gone down to 100·2, and then there was a recession in January, as usually happens, to 94·4.

Let us take a glance at the figures with respect to employment by industries, because I think it is proper that attention should be called to these matters. There is at times a tendency to be so gloomy and to so spread the gloom on if it suits the occasion, that it is refreshing to take a look at the facts as they are. I would not suggest for a moment that anyone in this chamber would deliberately paint the gloomiest picture for political purposes; that is something that is unthinkable. But there are of course some people in every country who are prone to do things like that. I have very great difficulty in being good humoured when I hear them—and it is difficult indeed to disturb my good humour. But as regards those who in the face of apparent facts continue to foul their own nest, I have very little patience. There are some vocations that provide but few moments of pleasure, but with respect to that crowd, I may tell you that if I were a hangman I would enter into service for a few moments with a great deal of enjoyment.

Let us see what the figures are with respect to industry generally. Industry generally is broken up in this statement. Showing the percentage of those employed in the following industries to the number employed by all industries, as of December 1, 1935, to be as follows: manufacturing, 49·3 per cent; logging, 6·0; mining, 6·0; communications, 2·3; transportation, 10·2; construction, 13; services, 2·6, and trade, 10·6. Taking 1926 as the index figure, we find with respect to manufacturing that on April 1, 1933, the low point, the figure had dropped to 76 per cent. In Logging it had dropped to 35·6 per cent; in mining, 91·4 per cent; in communications, 84·5; in transportation, 74·2; in construction, 54·7; in services, 102·5, and in trade, 107·6. Then we move to November 1, 1934, and we find that the index of employment in manufacturing had gone up to 92·8; in logging to 171·9. You will note that this is after the British empire trade agreements came into force. We find that in mining it had gone up to 121·2, and that also is largely accounted for by reason of Great Britain having taken over Canada's base metals; for theretofore they had been sold in the United States, before an impossible barrier was placed against our copper, lead and zinc in June, 1930.

Mr. MANION: Before the election.

Mr. GORDON: Yes. We find that on November 1, 1934, the index of unemployment in communications had gone down to 80·7; and it had risen in transportation to 83·9; in construction to 111; in services to 114·9, and in trade to 121·3. So that the percentages of increase, as between the low of April 1, 1933, and November 1, 1934, are disclosed as follows: Manufacturing, 22·1 per cent; logging, 382·87 per cent; mining, 32·7 per cent; communications, 4·5 per cent; transportation, 13 per cent; construction, 102·9 per cent; services, 11·1 per cent; trade, 12·7 per cent. In other words there was a general average improvement from the low of April 1, 1933, to November 1, 1934, of 31·38 per cent. For the clearer understanding of the above figures, I would ask that the statement from which I have quoted appear in Hansard.

EMPLOYMENT FIGURES BY INDUSTRIES

(Index figures are based on 1926 = 100)

Industry—	Percentage of employed by all industries Dec. 1, 1934	Index figure April 1, 1933	Index figure Nov. 1, 1934	Percentage of increase Nov., 1934, over April, 1933
Manufacturing	49.3	76.0	92.8	22.1
Logging	6.0	35.6	171.9	382.87
Mining	6.0	91.4	121.2	32.7
Communications	2.3	84.5	80.7	4.5
Transportation	10.2	74.2	83.9	13
Construction	13.0	54.7	111.0	102.9
Services	2.6	102.5	114.9	11.1
Trade	10.6	107.6	121.3	12.7
All	100.0	76.0	100.2	31.38

I would ask that you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 21, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, March 21, 1935.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARY ELIZABETH TAYLOR NICHOLSON

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal) moved:

That the petition of Mary Elizabeth Taylor Nicholson, presented on the 20th instant, praying for a bill of divorce from David George Nicholson, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

SARNIA–PORT HURON VEHICULAR TUNNEL COMPANY

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton) moved:

That the petition of the Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company, presented on the 20th instant, praying for the passing of an act to extend the time for the commencement and completion of a tunnel under the St. Clair river, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. How many postmasters were dismissed during the years 1921 to 1930, and from 1930 to 1935?

2. How many postmasters were dismissed for political partisanship upon the recommendation of the member, from 1921 to 1930, and from 1930 to 1935?

3. How many postmasters were dismissed due to changes of sites of post offices from 1921 to 1930, and from 1930 to 1935?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. From 1921 to 1930	1,147
From 1930 to 1935	882

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS—MELFORT, SASK.

Mr. DONNELLY:

1. How many postmasters have been dismissed or requested to resign, for political reasons, since September, 1930, in the Melfort, Saskatchewan constituency, as constituted prior to the recent redistribution?

2. How many postmasters in the Melfort constituency have been changed on account of a change being made in the post office site?

3. What post offices in the Melfort constituency are affected by these changes?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. (a) Dismissals, 5; (b) forced resignations, 0.

2. None.

3. (a) Dismissals: Meath Park, Strong Pine, Teddington, Hudson Bay Junction; Ethelton; (b) forced resignations, nil; (c) changes in site, nil.

CROSS POINT, QUE., EXPENDITURES

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is the sum of $14,200 which has been authorized for repairs and improvements at Cross Point, Quebec, to be expended by contract or day labour?

2. What is the nature of the improvements, and will creosoted timber and steel sheet piling be utilized and to what extent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. By contract.

2. (a) Reconstructing west training pier, and raising and lengthening landing slip; (b) no; (c) answered by (b).

CARLETON, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Will the work of reconstruction of the wharf at Carleton, Quebec, be done by contract?

2. How much of the $30,000 authorized is estimated to be used for creosoted timber and steel sheet piling?

3. Where is this creosoted timber and steel sheet piling purchased?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. $21,000 for steel sheet piling and other iron in place in the work, including labour for placing; no creosoted timber.

3. Steel sheet piling to be purchased in Canada.

LITTLE CASCAPEDIA, QUE., BRIDGE

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the government of Quebec or any of its departments applied to the Department of Public Works for authority to construct a highway bridge over the Little Cascapedia river in the county of Bonaventure, and if so, has such authority been granted?

2. Has the river been declared to be a navigable river, and if so, by whom?

3. Has the Quebec government concurred in this view, and if not, has it stated its views on this matter?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. The government of Quebec applied for approval of two jetties at the mouth of the Little Cascapedia river but stated no application would be made at present for the construction of a bridge connecting them. Approval of the jetties has not been granted because the government of Quebec has not complied with requirements of the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

2. (a) Yes; (b) engineers of Department of Public Works report that the Little Cascapedia river is a navigable stream.

3. No expression of opinion has been received from the Quebec government regarding the navigability of the river.

HOWATSONS' POINT, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is the sum of $38,800, which the Department of Public Works proposes to expend for a deep water wharf at Howatsons' Point, Bonaventure county, the total expenditure contemplated at that place?

2. What depth of water is it proposed to attain at low tide?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. 15 feet.

NEW CARLISLE, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

1. What work is proposed to be done at New Carlisle wharf, Bonaventure county, Quebec, for which $50,000 has been authorized?

2. Is this work to be done by contract?
3. Will creosoted timber and steel sheet piling be used and to what extent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Reconstruction of wharf for a length of 220 feet.
2. Yes.
3. Steel sheet piling on both sides for the full length of 220 feet; no creosoted timber.

PORT DANIEL, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

1. What is proposed to be done at Port Daniel wharf, Bonaventure county, for which $33,000 has been authorized?
2. Will this work be done by contract, and will creosoted timber and steel sheet piling be used, and to what extent?
3. How much has been expended on this wharf since August, 1930: (a) by day work; (b) by contract?
4. Has a petition been received from the citizens of the locality asking that this work be done by day work; if not, that local contractors be given the preference?
5. If petition was received what answer was given by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Reinforce, reballast and surface landing-head of wharf, 214 feet long, and section 80 feet long towards shore.
2. (a) Yes.
(b) Steel sheet piling on exposed faces; no creosoted timber.
3. (a) $17,590.18.
(b) $20,144.58.
4. A petition was received asking that the work be done by day labour and if not possible, that local contractors be given the preference.
5. The petitioners were informed that as the expenditure involved is over and above the sum of $5,000 the department proposes to call for public tenders in connection with this work.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DRYDOCKING OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE SHIPS AT UNITED STATES PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways and Canals. My attention has been called to the fact that the steamer Canadian Highlander of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine has been drydocked and repaired in an American shipyard, and it is also proposed to have similar work done on the steamer Canadian Britisher. My question is: Why is this work not being performed in the shipyards at Halifax or Saint John?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Or Quebec?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, this matter was drawn to my attention by the hon. member and also by telegrams from a couple of gentlemen interested in the question both from the standpoint of the Canadian drydocks and the standpoint of the eastern section of Canada. I made inquiries, because I was rather shocked to receive the messages. However, I am informed by the management of the Canadian National Railways, who are also, of course, the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that it has always been their practice to have these ships repaired in the Canadian drydocks. At the present time they state however that both the drydock at Saint John and that at Halifax are tied up; they are occupied until dates beyond those which would suit the sailings of these ships. Full cargoes for Australia and New Zealand are ordered for these ships, and those sending the cargoes insist, of course, that they leave on the scheduled date.

Perhaps the best procedure would be to read the telegram sent me by Mr. Fullerton, but I have given in brief the answer made by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I sent to Mr. Fullerton copies of the telegrams I had received, and I had asked him for an explanation. We felt, naturally, that in these days of unemployment the Canadian shipyards should be occupied, unless there was some very good reason to the contrary. His reply dated yesterday, from the city of Montreal, is as follows:

Your telegram of this date. Canadian Highlander was put into dry dock at New York which is port of call for this ship—

The Canadian Highlander is the first of the ships to which the hon. member referred. The telegram continues:

—for two days for survey and underwater painting on account of dry dock at Halifax which is her home port and the only Canadian port at which she calls being occupied until end of April. Britisher will arrive new York—

This is the other ship to which reference was made——on 22nd and requires Canadian government survey, this voyage which will involve docking for twenty-four hours. Our Cornwallis goes in dock Saint John 25th for annual survey and repairs, and dry dock cannot take Britisher until 27th which is too late as she is scheduled to sail from Halifax on 28th and it is imperative that she leave earliest possible date. I am advised that this is first occasion in five years that any of our ships have been dry docked at an American port. This situation arises due to fact that eastern Canadian Atlantic dry docks filled to capacity. Owing to increased volume of exports to Australia and New Zealand and numerous requests from Canadian exporters for prompt dispatch, these vessels must remain as near to schedule dates as possible. It is of course our settled policy to give all of our repair work to Canadian dry docks.

C. P. Fullerton.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that emergency work, or is it merely the painting of the ship?

Mr. MANION: They are resurveys which are ordered by the insurance companies at certain times.

Mr. DUFF: It is the annual inspection, is it not?

Mr. MANION: Yes, the annual inspection; I believe they sometimes call them resurveys. Since receiving these telegrams I have indicated to the management that it appears to me if at all possible they should so regulate the time of the resurveys, or what is termed by the hon. member—

Mr. DUFF: They must take place every twelve months; annual inspection.

Mr. MANION: Yes, it is annual inspection. I have indicated that they should endeavour to arrange the dates of the annual inspections so that they may always use our Canadian docks. The Canadian people are paying a pretty heavy subsidy, by way of deficit, on these boats.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I know of no reason why this inspection could not have taken place earlier. It is an outrage to have these ships going to American ports to be repaired. If the people in control of the fleet had had a little forethought that ship might have been put into order a month ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANTLEY: Before her present voyage, or if application had been made to the classification society they would have granted the needed delay of a month or even three months.

BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may I say that I have before me a bulletin of the federal bureau of statistics dated Wednesday, March 20, 1935, which indicates that in the last eleven months Canada imported 865,000 pounds of butter, of which quantity 530,000 were imported from Great Britain. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom generally imports butter I should like to know from the Minister of Agriculture why they are exporting to this country. Is it due to the fact that the butter is exported in transit, or are they producing more butter than they can consume? In view of the low price at which this commodity is selling this country is very much interested in these figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall accept the hon. member's observations as notice of a question, and shall prepare an answer. It may be that the butter sent in is not for consumption.

GIFT OF APPLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, although I have no desire to express any preference for any particular grade of apples, I think the thanks of this chamber should be expressed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOTT: I submit what I have said is more in order than the discussion which took place yesterday.

WATERLOO, QUE., POST OFFICE

PRESS REFERENCES TO ELECTORAL STANDARDS AND POLITICAL METHODS BASED ON FINDINGS OF MR. JUSTICE FOREST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may I refer to three articles appearing in the press, to which my attention has been drawn and which refer to the administration of the Department of Public Works.

One is in the Montreal Gazette of March 21, 1935, and the heading is "Public men flayed in judge's report—Commissioner finds electoral standards in Shefford county depraved—Deserve ban of opinion—Mr. Justice Forest raps former M.P. and M.L.A. in report on Waterloo post office."

Another appeared in the Montreal Star of March 20, 1935, headed as follows, "Federal and provincial politicians in scandal—Ernest Boivin, former M.P. for Shefford, and Robert Bachand, M.L.A. for riding, roundly castigated by Mr. Justice Forest."

The other is in the Ottawa Journal of this morning, and is headed, "Judge denounces acts in building new post office—Says electoral standards at Waterloo and Granby, Quebec, 'absolutely depraved.'"

Then follow quotations from the report of Mr. Justice Forest. I think I should make to the house at this time a brief statement in connection with this matter.

At the earnest request of the present member for Shefford (Mr. Tétreault) an order in council was passed authorizing Mr. Justice Forest to investigate certain charges or allegations in connection with the acquiring of a site and the building of a post office at Waterloo. Mr. Justice Forest was appointed a commissioner to investigate these matters under the provisions of chapter 99, R.S.C., the Inquiries Act. His report is dated February 8, 1935. It was translated and forwarded to the Justice department for such action as might appear proper in view of the statements contained in the report.

The articles in the press give no indication as to the date when the post office was constructed or these sites acquired. The sites were acquired in September, 1925, and October, 1927, and the building was completed in the year 1929. I think it proper under the circumstances to table a copy of the report both in English and French.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): May I ask the Minister of Public Works to state that the Waterloo of which he speaks is not Waterloo, Ontario?

Mr. DUFF: It was someone's Waterloo.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think that the articles in the press have sufficiently protected my hon. friend from North Waterloo.

GIFT OF APPLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): On a question of privilege, may I ask the leader of the government to extend the thanks of this chamber to the hon. members who have recently distributed apples to the members of this chamber?

Mr. SPEAKER: With very great deference to the hon. member for South Essex, I think he is quite out of order. I called him to order previously with respect to this matter, and I thought that had disposed of it. I do not think it adds to the dignity or decorum of the house to bring up the matter on a question of privilege.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

AIR MAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) if it is true that the air mail service costs his department about $64 for each letter carried?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): If the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville will kindly place his question in writing, I will answer it.

Mr. DUPUIS: I move that my question be passed as an order for return.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): During the discussion of the estimates of the Post Office Department, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked for the following information:

1. A list of the post offices closed since August 7, 1930.
2. A list of the post offices opened since the same date.
3. A list of the post offices the location of which was changed since August 7, 1930.

The hon. member also asked how many postmasters had been appointed since August 7, 1930, on a permanent or a temporary basis.

I now have pleasure in laying on the table of the house the information requested regarding post offices closed, post offices opened and changes of location, from August 7, 1930, to February 28, 1935.

As to the list of permanent and temporary postmasters appointed during that period, it cannot be completed before March 30, perhaps later, even by having the staff work at night. That will give the hon. member an idea of the enormous task he is putting us to, involving the examination of 4,300 files.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

FURTHER PROVISION FOR CARRYING OUT RELIEF MEASURES, MEETING FINANCIAL CONDITIONS AND MAINTAINING CREDIT OF DOMINION AND PROVINCES

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Gordon for the second reading of Bill No. 41, respecting relief measures.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word before the question is put.

Mr. SPEAKER: The reply of the Minister of Labour closed the debate on the second reading.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Gordon), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, I move that you do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Can the minister answer the question which was put to him yesterday with regard to the classification of the unemployed by trade and profession, and can he tell us what has been done in that regard since 1930, in accordance with the statement made by the Prime Minister in April last year?

Mr. GORDON: The question raised by the hon. member receives the attention of the provinces, who send to the dominion returns monthly as to their unemployed, particularly of course with respect to those who receive relief. No body has been set up for the purpose of continuously keeping a classified index of people unemployed, as the hon. gentleman has suggested.

Mr. POULIOT: How could the Prime Minister arrive at the conclusion that something had been done if nothing was done?

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the house figures showing the number of persons receiving relief at the first of January during the past five years? If he cannot give the figures as at January, the latest figures will do.

Mr. GORDON: To answer that question one would have to go into the details of the figures supplied by the provinces. However I will undertake to see that in so far as we have a return or information with respect to the question the hon. gentleman will be supplied with that information, or it will be put on the record without great delay.

Mr. HEAPS: That will be satisfactory. I should like to have these figures because so many conflicting statements have been made with regard to the amount of relief given, that I think a definite statement should be made showing the number of persons on relief on the first of January each year for the last five years. It would be very useful. I wish to discuss briefly the question of relief from the standpoint of the municipalities. During yesterday's discussion on the second reading several hon. members appealed to the government to come to the assistance of the municipalities more generously than during the past twelve months. I do not think there is any doubt that the responsibility which is being undertaken by the municipalities throughout Canada to-day is bringing many of them and some of the provinces as well to the verge of bankruptcy, and they cannot any longer carry the load. We see what is taking place in the urban centres. Montreal is compelled to go to the legislature for power to impose new forms of taxation, which will no doubt be onerous to a large section of the poorer people in that city. In Winnipeg the municipal authority has gone to the legislature seeking methods of imposing taxation upon those who are capable, in their opinion, of bearing an additional burden, and the move is being met with strenuous opposition by people who would be the last to object to carrying a share of the load in maintaining the unemployed. In British Columbia we see the city of Vancouver compelled, through circumstances over which the municipalities have no control, to do something to curb expenditures, and they are reducing interest on bonded indebtedness. I believe that the burden created last year by the present government in reducing grants to the provincial governments has placed a most unfair load on the municipal authorities. I do not think there is excuse for the action of the government in giving a fixed sum to the provincial governments, who in turn must reduce their grants to the municipalities. So far as Winnipeg was concerned it meant one of two things; either they had to reduce the amount of assistance given to those out of work or they had to impose additional taxation. They chose both; they made a reduction in the way of relief and also imposed further taxation on the people. Yesterday the Minister of Labour, in a very apologetic and moderate speech—except for one part, where he said he would like to hang a few dozen people if he had the opportunity—

Mr. GORDON: I do not want to be misunderstood. I said I would not mind seeing a few people hanged, but I did not specify who they were. I only referred to that class of people who were constantly spreading gloom.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Give some details.

Mr. HEAPS: Apart from that remark, the minister's speech was apologetic and moderate. However, he did say that the municipalities administering the funds would realize their responsibility as a result of the reduction of the grant given them by the federal government. Now the minister himself admitted that the municipalities are faced, not with a civic but with a national emergency, and when the emergency is national I think the national exchequer ought to come to the assistance of the municipalities much more generously than is the case at the present time. It can be said truthfully that there is no municipality in Canada that is either directly or indirectly responsible for unemployment among its people. If that is so, if our municipalities are in no way responsible for unemployment, why should a tremendous burden be imposed upon them—municipalities that are almost on the verge of bankruptcy. I do not know whether the federal grant to the municipalities is at present equivalent to twenty-five per cent of the amount of relief given. If the federal government were to give a fair proportion of relief to all municipalities, I do not think that a federal grant of fifty per cent would be at all too much. In fact, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), in connection with the old age pensions the federal government grants seventy-five per cent. Yet if you want to argue the question of responsibility under the British North America Act, it might easily be argued that under that act the whole burden of old age pensions might be considered a provincial and local responsibility.

My purpose in rising at this time is to find out whether the government will not relax somewhat in their determination not to do anything on behalf of those nearly bankrupt municipalities and come to their assistance by giving a much larger contribution to the provincial authorities who in turn will thus be able to hand over a larger contribution to the municipalities and ease their burdens, so that they may be in a position to give a wider form of relief than is being given at the present time. I can assure the minister that the average municipality in this country is just as anxious to see that the funds of the dominion government are administered in an efficient manner as is the dominion government itself. In fact I have sat on several of those bodies that have been charged with the responsibility of handing out government relief, and when the relief is being administered representatives from the federal government have sat in on those bodies to see that the money is properly spent. There is no reason why under present circumstances the same representatives of the federal government should not sit in with these municipal and provincial bodies and see that the federal money is properly and wisely spent. I hope the Minister of Labour and those who are responsible for the Relief Act will at this time state that they are prepared to do something more than they have been doing so far to relieve the municipalities of an almost intolerable burden.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to lend some support to the contention put forward by the last speaker, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I have not changed my opinion since first coming to the House of Commons. The intolerable position that the municipalities find themselves in at the moment is in my judgment a problem that should receive the earnest and careful consideration of both federal and provincial governments. The municipalities are living under a taxation system that was devised to deal with their problems as we saw them fifty or sixty years ago. Old age pensions, mothers' allowances, education and the many other ramifications of social services, including road building as an hon. member suggests, that have been set in motion have in my opinion had too much of the responsibility in connection with them placed upon the shoulders of the municipalities when one considers the system of taxation that is in vogue in those municipalities. Then we come along to the depression which is national in its character, and I have always felt that in a national emergency a problem of this description should be within the orbit largely of the federal government, because it has many avenues of raising money of such a character that the burden does not fall most heavily upon the shoulders of those least able to bear it. We must remember this—and this is an important problem that must be faced in the next few years—that all these added charges have rested squarely upon real estate or, in other words, upon the shelter that is necessary for one living within the confines of an urban centre. I believe we have just about reached the saturation point, when one views the question from what I consider the best interests of our people, of the enormous charges that are being placed upon our real estate. We find in Ontario many municipalities going into default because of the burdens brought about by the charges underlying the relief programs of the respective governments.

There is another more important phase of the question that should be taken into consideration. I have always held the opinion and I have not changed it that if you give a man a sense of ownership of a home it has a stabilizing effect upon the country. These enormous taxation charges upon real estate are absolutely crippling the building and construction industry, and producing a nation of renters instead of owners. Freezing the building trades and checking the normal expansion of housing facilities, must lead inevitably to slum conditions. Taking a long view of the problem I do not think there is any argument about that.

I listened yesterday with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) when he said that Quebec was willing, provided the federal government would do likewise, to assume fifty per cent of the relief obligations of the municipalities in that province. I have before me a resolution that I wish to read into the record and which was passed by my own city council, referring to a similar proposition from the Ontario government. This resolution, which is under the signature of J. F. Berry, city clerk of Hamilton, Ontario, reads:

Whereas the premier of Ontario has publicly stated that the Ontario government would be willing to assume half the relief costs of the province providing the dominion government would pay the other half.

And whereas the burden of relief now being imposed upon the municipalities has reached the point where it has become a very grievous burden and cannot much longer be borne.

Therefore be it resolved that this council place itself on record as approving of the offer made by the premier of Ontario and as urging the dominion government to accept the Ontario premier's offer at the earliest possible date; and that this council join with other municipalities in making representations to this end to the dominion government without delay; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the dominion members of parliament for the city of Hamilton and county of Wentworth.

It might be said that the representatives of these municipalities are endeavouring to get out of what is probably their definite responsibility when one analyses the provisions of the British North America Act. That may be argued with some soundness, but I think hon. members and the provincial governments will agree that in the provision of relief for our people we have reached a stage where an entirely different policy should be set in motion from the viewpoint of raising revenue to provide for those who through no fault of their own find themselves at the moment unemployed. I remember stating in this house three years ago that the proper policy to be followed in regard to this important matter would have been to pay as we go, to carry the whole relief burden out of income, to place the responsibility where in my judgment it rightfully belongs, that is upon the shoulders of those who are best able to bear it. I believe the federal and provincial governments have the machinery to carry out such a policy, whereas on the other hand in the case of the municipalities the whole weight of the burden of debt rests upon land itself with practically only one avenue of taxation. I would like the government, before this bill finally becomes law, to give very serious consideration to the position that the home owner finds himself in, to the position that the municipality finds itself in, to the inevitable consequences of increasing taxes on land and to the question of lending its cooperation to those provincial governments that have suggested cooperative proposals, with the end in view that the load be taken off the municipalities and that the basis of taxation for the provision of relief be placed upon those people who are better able to bear the burden and in avenues of taxation where the responsibility and the weight do not rest too heavily upon the lower paid salaried group in the dominion.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it this bill is being passed in order to provide money for unemployment and farm relief. Coming as I do from a farming community I wish to protest most strenuously against unemployment and farm relief being linked together. In my opinion farm relief has nothing whatever to do with unemployment relief. I believe the people on the farms in western Canada, for example, have been busy for three hundred and sixty-five days in the past year; the people on the farms are not unemployed, and so far as I can see there is no good reason why they should be so classified and why funds should be provided for unemployment and farm relief in order to enable those people to subsist. To my way of thinking unemployment alone should be dealt with throughout the whole dominion; a sum of money should be divided up between the provinces, according to population if you like. For example, if you give the province of Saskatchewan $100,000 a month probably the province of Ontario should receive four times as much and the province of Quebec three times as much because of their greater population. But after this money has been divided among the different provinces in that way another problem arises in connection with the people who are working hard three hundred and sixty-five days in the year but who are getting nothing for their work. These people have suffered a catastrophe, and that situation should be dealt with entirely apart from any other situation, just as we would do if some calamity such as a flood or a fire occurred or, as has happened, if a drought should occur. Money should be granted these people in order to help them out of their difficulties. As it is these people in western Canada have been classified as unemployed, whereas they have been employed all through the year though because of the unkindness of providence they have received nothing for their work.

I have heard hon. members say in this house that in the past year this government offered to take over and pay for farm relief in the dried out areas of western Canada. I want to say that I do not think the government of Saskatchewan or of any western province would object to this government taking over the relief in the province, but they did object to this government taking over only a certain area. Who was to go out and divide the province into the dried out area and the productive area? Who was going to divide it into different sections? Anyone who has travelled over that country knows it would be absolutely impossible to divide any one of the three western provinces into dried out areas on the one hand and productive areas on the other hand. Even if that were done, what would you have? You would have one organization set up by the dominion to handle relief in the drought areas and another organization set up within the province to handle relief outside the drought areas. That would mean one would be competing against the other, an absolutely impossible situation. I do know, however, that this government were told that if they wanted to take over the direct relief for the whole province of Saskatchewan they could do so and welcome, and I do not think the province of Manitoba or the province of Alberta would object if the government offered to do the same thing. They were told more; they were told that if they wanted to do so they could take over the relief in connection with seed grain and feed for the whole province of Saskatchewan, or they could take over both forms of relief, but we say it is impossible to divide the provinces into two parts, one the drought area and the other outside the drought area.

According to press reports we were told by the Minister of Agriculture that the government were going to take over this drought area in Saskatchewan and call it a sort of federal reserve. In other words the people in this area were to be taken over by this government and disfranchised. The government were to take over the schools, roads and everything else; they were to do all the work in the district, and it was to become a sort of federal district, or an Indian reserve. Then I suppose we would have the Minister of Agriculture sitting in his teepee handing out treaty money to these people. All I can say to the Minister of Agriculture, who made that proposition to us, is that those people out there in that dried out area are just waiting for election day, and when that day comes it is not going to be a fight at all; it is going to be a slaughter. It will be Custer's last stand, as far as this government is concerned, because these people do not think they should be linked up with the unemployed. They are not unemployed, and if they receive grants from this government they consider they have a right to that assistance. Why should they not receive grants from this government? For years they have been paying bonuses to industry throughout the dominion. Look at the report of the investigation of 1931. In that year the province of Saskatchewan paid $26,000,000 to the other provinces by way of bonuses to industry because of the tariffs placed on our goods, mind you not tariffs on goods coming into the country but extra prices they had to pay, totalling $26,000,000 which went as a bonus to industry outside the province of Saskatchewan. Why should they not receive $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 or even $15,000,000 a year now that providence has been unkind to them and for the last two or three years they have had to endure hardships and calamities and the terrible conditions we have had in the west?

I object to this bill for one other reason. Under its terms money is also provided for what we call Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. For the last four years both in the house and in the committee I have endeavoured to obtain some statement as to the activities of this government in connection with Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, how much money they have advanced for this gambling in wheat which has taken place on the Winnipeg grain exchange, how much they have lost and how much they have made, but I have been unable to get any such statement. Some say it is not gambling, that it is only speculating; some say it is not even speculating, that it is only supporting the market. Whatever you choose to call it there is only one name for it in the minds of the public and that is pure gambling in wheat, nothing more and nothing less. I want to say that the time has come when we believe that before we grant any more money for this purpose we should have a statement from this government as to where they stand in regard to wheat. How much wheat have they; how much have they bought and what profit have they made? It must be remembered that the government told us that if there was any profit it would go to the pools, to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited and not to the government, but that if there was any loss that loss would be stood by the government. What an enviable position for any man to be in. He has all the money he wants handed over to him by the government. If he makes a profit it is his; if he loses money the government shoulders the loss. Then the pools say, "We are handling it; it is not the government." I cannot understand that at all. I always thought the man who paid for the music called the tune but apparently the government are paying the money while the pools are doing the work and taking all the credit or blame. I fail to see the reason for that situation. If the government are paying the money they are responsible. I think we should have some statement from this government, before they ask us to vote money for this sort of thing, in regard to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited and in regard to the money that has been granted them for speculation in the market, or to support the market or whatever they choose to call it. I repeat that to my way of thinking this is nothing more or less than a gamble. We have estimates with regard to wheat; I do not wish to go into that however, but wish simply to enter my protest with regard to granting money for this work without first having a report of what has been done in the past or where we stand at the present time.

Mr. WILLIS: Mr. Chairman, for a few moments I should like to refer particularly to certain remarks which have been made by hon. members who have preceded me in this discussion. First I should like to refer to the observations of my good friend, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). At the outset he indicated that this government had refused grants to the province of Manitoba for certain purposes.

Mr. HEAPS: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. WILLIS: All right; refusing grants, if you like, to the municipalities.

Mr. HEAPS: I never said that at all.

Mr. SPENCE: Then you said nothing.

Mr. WILLIS: In any event the hon. member will probably admit this much, namely, that he was complaining sufficient money was not placed at the disposal of the province of Manitoba, or the city of Winnipeg, for purposes of relief.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. WILLIS: Yes, I should be glad to listen.

Mr. HEAPS: What I did complain about, and do complain about, is that the federal grants to the municipalities are totally insufficient.

Mr. WILLIS: That is quite the same thing. The hon. member states that the grants are insufficient. I speak as one coming from the drought area of Manitoba, where in every year for the past while in order to carry on we have had to get grants from the federal treasury. While within the past few months I have not received a statement from the Minister of Finance, so far as the drought stricken area of Manitoba is concerned, I will say that that area has never to my knowledge requested money by way of advances from the federal government for these purposes which has been refused.

It is true that there are many who complain; it is true, also, that there are many who think the relief they are receiving is not sufficient, and there are those who are very happy to go around the country and state that the federal government is to blame. May I at this time mention something which in my own constituency I have had to point out thousands of times. The matter of administration of relief is entirely within the hands of the municipalities and the provinces. The amount of feed or the amount of relief of any kind which a man may receive is entirely in the discretion of the municipality in which he lives. They give him what relief they like; they have sole authority. The question of the money available is one which is arrived at through the municipality requesting the province for advances, and the province, in turn, requesting advances from the federal government. May I say that so far as the area with which I am connected is concerned, those advances have never been refused.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg states that the advances made by the federal government are equivalent only to 25 per cent of the total amount of relief. Again speaking only for my own area may I say, without making any mathematical calculation, that the advances are at least 75 per cent of the amount expended. This condition is due to the fact, first, that you have the direct advance made by the federal government, following which we have the federal government loaning one-third to the province, so that the province may pay its share of direct relief. Then, following that we have the federal government loaning to the province the remaining third, which in turn is handed on to the municipalities for purposes of covering the share payable by those municipalities.

In effect the federal government is, first, paying one-third outright, and then loaning the other two-thirds to the provinces for the purpose of paying the remainder of the relief moneys. The province, in turn, hands on one-half of the two-thirds to the municipality, and in consequence the federal government assumes the responsibility for the whole 100 per cent. It pays one-third direct; it loans the other two-thirds,—and if you think the federal government will ever get that two-thirds back I am not in agreement with you.

Mr. HANBURY: Why do they not recognize that in their policy?

Mr. WILLIS: Their reason for not recognizing it is quite apparent. It is apparent that they should not, at this time, because if they recognized that policy they would be called upon every year for continuous write-offs. Consequently the municipalities and provinces have not urged that it be done, because it would increase the amount of relief which would have to be paid.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member know whether interest charges have been met on these obligations?

Mr. WILLIS: They have been met on these obligations according to the statement of the Minister of Natural Resources for the province of Manitoba.

Mr. HEAPS: They are paying their obligations?

Mr. WILLIS: Yes, but there is however still outstanding at the present time, on which nothing has been paid, a principal amount of over $13,500,000.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to ask whether the hon. member thinks any member of the government would subscribe to the statement he makes, namely, that the government do not expect to have returned to them the money that has been loaned to the municipalities.

Mr. WILLIS: Certainly not. Certainly no member of the government would subscribe to that statement, and, further, that is not the exact statement which I made. My statement was my own personal opinion that eventually there will have to be a write-off, and that at the present time the government would be foolish to say that they were going to have such write-off, or even consider it. In addition to that, speaking of the contribution made by the federal government, may I say that that government pays one-half of the reduced freight on the live stock—cattle, horses and equipment—going out of the drought stricken area to the feeding grounds. Then, further, it pays 50 per cent of the reduced freight on those desiring to come back into the area. Then, further, it carries on a program of public works and pays 100 per cent. During the year 1931-32 there was a program of public works carried on for the cost of which the federal government paid 40, 50 or 60 per cent, the balance being paid by the provincial government or by the municipalities.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg points out that a number of municipalities are bankrupt. That is perfectly true. They must necessarily be bankrupt, due to the fact that no taxes are being received. The people who have had no crops cannot pay taxes; therefore the municipalities are bankrupt. May I point out to him however that the tax on the individual has not increased. It may be that the municipality has a greater debt, but it is also true that the taxation upon the individual farmer has not increased. The hon. member for North Winnipeg suggests that in this matter of loans the federal government might very well step in—

Mr. HEAPS: In the matter of administration.

Mr. WILLIS: In the matter of administration, yes. May I say that at the present time there are employed in the area from which I come some three so-called administrators of the province of Manitoba. These three men go throughout the constituency administering relief and making decisions in regard to amounts of relief to be given. If the hon. member's suggestion were carried out the work would be exactly duplicated, because in each case the federal man would have to go with the provincial man and check and double check. But that is not possible. If it were it would double the cost of administration of relief. Therefore it could not properly be done. The question of the administration of relief should be placed where it properly belongs, namely, with the provinces and municipalities themselves. To place it elsewhere would be to upset the whole system of government in this country.

The municipalities have their councils, their administrations which are familiar with the individual farms and localities. They are elected for that purpose. That is why it is necessary that they carry on administration, as they have done in the past. The question as to whether or not the municipality should be responsible for the administration of relief is well indicated by the fact that it has always been responsible for that administration when it has been necessary from year to year. As the relief has increased the jurisdiction of the municipality has not changed. The additional amount has merely increased the work the municipality must do. The provinces, again, must have a responsibility in regard to administration, because the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces, and in each case get their authority from the provincial legislatures. Only the provincial legislatures have control over the municipalities; the federal government could not interfere with them because it has no jurisdiction. Further, it has no method of control.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) spoke particularly regarding relief for the drought area. If I understood him correctly I believe he suggested that we should divide relief by population. He suggested, if I heard him correctly, that we should divide it by population. No system I think could be worse than that. In the province of Saskatchewan, for instance, from which he comes, how would he like to have the same amount of relief administered there as might be administered in one of the maritime provinces where relief was not necessary at all? Relief must necessarily be measured by need, and by nothing else. It must be measured by the needs of the people who are there.

The hon. member also spoke in regard to the classification of the farmer population as unemployed. I think I am correct in saying that that classification is not used. I have seen the documents coming into my municipalities, and they state on the bottom of each document, "For the drought area only." The advance of $135,000 had nothing to do with the drought area. The administration of relief in the drought area is an entirely separate matter, and if the hon. member for Willow Bunch will look up the administration in his own municipalities I have no doubt he will find that that is true.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch says that it is impossible to draw a dividing line to indicate where the drought areas are. But in the province of Manitoba that is precisely what has been done. He says it is impossible, but it has been done there for three years. Also, for his own province of Saskatchewan I have seen the map with the red marks on it indicating drought areas A, B and C, and the present government in the province of Saskatchewan has agreed to that map just as its predecessor did. In the province of Manitoba the lines marking the drought areas were drawn by the provincial government. I had the good fortune to come down with the provincial treasurer and in conference with him the drought areas in the province of Manitoba were defined by municipal boundaries. Drought area A is that in which for five years there has been no crop, and drought area B is the area which has not been afflicted so badly. Therefore the question of division is a very simple one which has been tackled and conquered in my hon. friend's own province, as well as in the province of Manitoba.

Finally the hon. member for Willow Bunch says that this government has been gambling in wheat. There was never a government in Canada which did so much for the wheat grower in Canada as this one has done in supporting the wheat market. I was much interested in seeing John I. McFarland before the banking and commerce committee and in hearing some of the hon. gentlemen opposite cross-examine him in regard to gambling in wheat. It was most amusing. I should rather see that again than go to any funny show I ever saw. My good friend Admiral Duff was one of those who cross-examined Mr. McFarland in regard to puts and calls, options and hedging. That is the difficulty with many people; they cannot distinguish between supporting the wheat market and gambling in wheat. It is true the process is technical. It is difficult to understand unless you have grown up with it at your table every morning. The wheat situation is difficult to understand unless you have lived in western Canada where every day on the street you must be prepared to talk about the price of wheat that day, what it opened at, what it was at twelve o'clock, what it closed at, and what the prospects are. So far as the question of supporting the wheat market is concerned I do not suppose that outside the hon. member for Willow Bunch there is any farmer in western Canada who would not say that the greatest help the wheat growers of western Canada have received from any government was the support given to the wheat market by Mr. McFarland in the way he did. Undoubtedly it is true that if that support had not been given, wheat would have gone down twenty or twenty-five or thirty cents a bushel more than it did. And let hon. gentlemen realize this, that where you have a man with only a few bushels on which he depends for his living, and when as a result of the government's support of the wheat market he receives from ten to twenty-five cents a bushel more than he otherwise would have done, that makes all the difference between him being self-supporting and becoming a charge on the Dominion of Canada. That is the difference, and that is the way it operates. On the other hand, if he is a big operator he is even worse off, because his losses will be greater.

It was interesting to note too that the hon. member for Willow Bunch pointed out in his remarks that Saskatchewan has not received proper treatment in the matter of relief. The actual relief which has been advanced to Saskatchewan is some $20,740,000, and loans have been granted amounting to $38,000,000, which gives us a grand total advanced to Saskatchewan, from which the hon. member comes, of $58,743,000. Those are the advances that have been made by this government since 1930. If you will look at it carefully that seems to be a very large sum of money. But in addition to that, there is the amount which was given to the province of Saskatchewan under the wheat bonus. Saskatchewan grows more wheat than any other province or any other area of similar size probably in the world, and on that account Saskatchewan received a larger share of the bonus. That is important to consider in view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Willow Bunch, who if I remember correctly voted against that bill, which makes it all the worse.

The question of relief, and the question of federal government assistance in the matter of relief, is one which most of the municipalities and most of the provinces and a large number of individuals would like to shoulder upon this dominion government, but may I point this out to the house and the country, that every individual, every municipality, every province and every dominion has its limit of credit beyond which it cannot go, and if we are to continue to play Santa Claus to the municipalities and the provinces, not based on the question of need, then sooner or later we are going to face in this country a situation similar to that with which other countries are now faced. Canada has perhaps the unique record of having paid all its debt according to the letter of the contract, with the result that we have been able to borrow money at as low a rate as two per cent, resulting largely from that splendid record. Some people point to Great Britain as having done well in regard to its contracts. May I point out that Canada has done much better. Great Britain herself has not honoured all her debts to foreign countries in the way that Canada has, and that is one reason why the credit of this country stands so high. The dominion government, due to the fact that the municipalities are spread from one end of this country to the other, is not in the same position to defend itself as the municipalities and the provinces, and I am kept busy going around the country refuting statements that the dominion government has not done this or won't do that, and in ninety-nine per cent of these cases the charge is quite unfounded. The dominion government itself is partly to blame for that because it has been too silent on these matters. It should come out openly and blazon forth what it has done and is doing rather than stand back and receive the criticism which comes upon the individual member who must go around and defend the position of the government.

The advances made by the federal government to Manitoba have been satisfactory, and its advances for the drought area in the province from which I come have been satisfactory. It is not dealing with the administration of relief, and I do not think it should. While I myself have complained in regard to certain small matters of relief by the federal government, I think that by and large the handling of the relief situation in the drought areas on behalf of this government has been nothing less than excellent.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, when the house met at three o'clock I had no intention of taking part in a discussion on this bill but I have been forced into it. I had hoped that a discussion on wheat would not take place at this time. There is on the order paper a resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) which reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish a board to be known as the Canadian grain board—

When that board is established the functions now performed by Mr. John I. McFarland will have to be done away with. I should like to know whether the government is in a position to give to the house and to the country a full statement of the operations of Mr. McFarland in the wheat market. The resolution to which I have referred may be only a red herring drawn across the trail in an effort to prevent a discussion of this very important question, but whether or not that is so I think the house and the country should have a statement of these operations. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) referred to the tactics or antics of some hon. members on this side of the house in the banking and commerce committee when John I. McFarland was before that body. Ever since this gentleman started his operations I have stood out boldly in support of the contentions of the government. I did not believe then that it was in the interests of the grower that the position of Mr. McFarland in the wheat market should be divulged and I maintained that position both in the committee and in the house. However, I think the time has now come when this should be done. We are nearing a general election and I do not think this house should be asked to pass this bill before it receives a statement either by the Prime Minister or the minister now piloting this bill through the house.

I say quite frankly but kindly that I do not think the gentlemen sitting before the minister or the minister are in a position to give this statement. John I. McFarland should be sitting in front of the minister. There are only two men in this country who can give satisfaction in this matter, John I. McFarland and the Prime Minister. It is regrettable that the Prime Minister is not in his place and it seems impossible to have Mr. McFarland occupy a seat in front of the minister. I was hoping that when we reached the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister we would have the assurance of the government that the bill which would be based upon it would be sent either to the agriculture committee or to a special committee. That would enable all hon. members, all growers and all marketers to appear before the committee to give evidence. In my opinion the government would be well advised to give us some assurance that this resolution will actually be brought before the house. If the resolution is not to be proceeded with, then the government should immediately make known their position in the wheat market. I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) will admit that I am reasonable in asking him whether he can give us an assurance that this resolution will be dealt with before the house prorogues.

I realize that the bill passed last year expires on the last day of this month and, therefore, this bill must be passed before that time in order to provide funds for Mr. McFarland to operate. When I saw the nature of the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister I did not expect any discussion of this matter under the present bill. I should like the minister to state if it is the intention of the government to give us the information for which we are asking. Up until the present I did not think it was in the interests of the grower—he is the individual in whom I am interested—to make known the position of the government. As the hon. member for Souris has said I think the government should feel that they should make a statement to the country.

Can the minister tell us how much has been spent for unemployment relief and how much for farm relief? It was rather annoying to hear the hon. member for Souris say that the government did not expect that much of this money would be paid back. I have heard the Prime Minister say the same thing.

Mr. WILLIS: I never made any such statement.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the hon. member did not, the Prime Minister did. He made that statement in reply to a question asked by myself. When the first relief measure was before the house the Prime Minister was confronted with the statement that a note was attached to the application for relief. The Prime Minister said that no such thing existed but he admitted his mistake when he saw the actual form. As I have stated many times on the floor of this chamber, if we do not expect to collect this money, why have those receiving relief carry the burden of worry? There are still some Canadians who worry over their inability to meet their obligations. In conclusion, I hope that the minister is in position to state that he or someone else will give to the committee the true position occupied by John I. McFarland in the wheat market.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, even though I am a member from one of the larger municipalities in Ontario, one which is probably more interested in this particular bill than other municipalities, I would not have spoken had it not been for the fact that economic liberalism has failed to give us any constructive ideas or offer a policy to take our people off the dole and restore Canada to the Canada of Sir John A. Macdonald's day. At that time Canada was a country of property owners, both large and small; it was not divided as now into a country of those who have and those who have not. At that time the entire means of production of the country was not in the hands of five or six people. I want to pay tribute to the government for what they have done since the great disaster which occurred in 1930. If this parliament had followed the example of the British parliament we would have had a united legislature on social matters like this, which would have acted to try to keep our people from relief. We have a war in Canada to-day against unemployment and famine, great masses of the population being on relief. Surely no one will deny that this is as dangerous as any enemy in warfare. When an enemy is at our gates we mobilize our whole military organization and repel the invader; we are united; we present a united front to the enemy. But when we have what is as great a menace to the country, hundreds of thousands of the population on the verge of starvation or in poorhouses through unemployment, we are divided, playing politics, the politics of the ins and outs, as we have witnessed this afternoon. I am surprised especially at my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), who is more or less a sportsman. I spoke in his riding for the late Colonel Rennie. The constituency of East Hamilton is a large industrial one and this government has done a good deal for the people there. I am therefore surprised that my hon. friend should have voted against the second reading of the bill, because industrial society in the country was entirely built up by the Conservative party's policy of protection from 1878 down. What is that policy? It is a protection policy which if brought up to date will remove the working population from the dole, the pension and all that sort of thing. But what have my hon. friends opposite done, those of the official opposition and those to the left of them? Some voted for the second reading and others did not. I had expected that the hon. member for East Hamilton would vote for it, because if there is a riding that owes something to the present government for what it has done in the way of relief it is that riding.

I congratulate the minister on what he has done in connection with relief and unemployment. I know no man who has shouldered a greater responsibility than he has taken on in the last five years, with the exception of our great leader who is not with us to-day, a martyr to overwork. As a former president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities, I can say that the municipalities are having a hard struggle. The minister is doing the best he can to cope with a very difficult situation and I congratulate him. He is a very able minister as well as an able lawyer, and more than that he is a man with a warm human heart. In the past four years he has done a good deal for relief in this country. I remember sitting in this house and hearing the former Prime Minister make statements declining aid to the municipalities with regard to relief which disappointed me at the time. I do not see him here to-day. I was glad to see that he received yesterday such a tribute from his supporters, and it is better for a man to have such tributes paid him when he is living. He is a man who has given a great deal of study to these particular social matters, but I regret that when he was head of the government from 1921 to 1930 he did nothing to deal with the situation. I constantly brought this matter to the attention of parliament. The other day I read various resolutions, which I will not read again, all bearing on this subject, but the right hon. gentleman said that he would not give a five cent piece to the people of Ontario, and that included the riding of East Hamilton. I put certain questions to his Minister of Labour, Mr. Heenan, as late as February 25, 1929. I asked him questions in regard to relief, not only on behalf of the municipality I represented but as one of the former officers of the union to which I have already referred. In 1929 I asked this question:

1. Has the government any plans for providing employment for the great body of the unemployed?
2. If so, what are they and what action will be taken, and when?

Mr. Heenan:

1. The question of unemployment is one for the provincial governments.
2. Answered by No. 1.

On March 5, 1930, after deputations had been here from the provinces and the municipalities, following two years of relief, and having made a request for assistance, this was the question I asked:

1. Has the government any plans for providing useful employment for the great body of the unemployed?
2. If so, what relief will be afforded?
3. Will the government accept the offer of the province of Ontario to provide one-third of the cost of certain forms of relief in connection with the federal and municipal authority; if not, why not?

What happened then? The leader of the government of that day rose in his place and objected to the question; a page of Hansard was taken up with an effort to have my question ruled out of order. There was in South Toronto at one or two missions and in other places a line-up of the unemployed begging for meals, but we were told that that unemployment was a matter for the provinces and the municipalities to deal with. Even Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier never had to face the conditions with which this government has had to contend since 1930. In 1928 I brought the matter to the attention of the house and asked the government to appoint a commission similar to the one that had been appointed in the United States, under the chairmanship of Senator Couzens, who was mayor of Detroit. This committee sat many months at Washington and they summoned to Washington some of the greatest men in engineering, agriculture and the banking system. They studied the question of seasonal unemployment, casual unemployment and technological unemployment growing out of the inroads of science and the machine. When it was proposed in this house that we should have a commission of that kind, what did the government of that day do? They not only refused to accede to the request, but Mr. Heenan actually informed me that there was no unemployment on the index findings, and if any it was a matter for the municipalities. Mr. Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway, at that time made this statement before the Senate committee at Washington:

> It is a dangerous thing to have a large number of unemployed men and women—dangerous to society as a whole—dangerous to the individuals who constitute society. When men who are willing and able to work and want to work are unable to obtain work, we need not be surprised if they steal before they starve. Certainly I do not approve of stealing, but if I had to make the choice between stealing and starving, I would surely not choose to starve—and in that respect I do not think I am much unlike the average individual.

The commission in the United States took evidence from all sources, the railways and other organizations, the municipalities, boards of trade and chambers of commerce, for the purpose of evolving a policy, three years before the depression started.

I wish now to say a word or two with regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in connection with the municipalities. The municipalities have only a limited number of ways of raising revenue, though they render to the federal government many invaluable municipal services in connection with police protection, fire protection and so on. In the case of Ottawa they get a subvention, and the state legislatures of the United States also give the capital cities a subvention. The same is true in Australia. Yet in the industrial centres large numbers of people are out of work, and a considerable proportion of them who own their own homes cannot pay their taxes. The municipalities are finding it very difficult to balance their budgets. I plead with the government now as I have pleaded with them on many occasions to come to the support of the municipalities. The government have many ways of raising revenue directly and indirectly which the municipalities do not have, and I plead with the government of the day to do something along those lines. The government that preceded this one declined to do anything for the municipalities, but the present government decided to give one-third in cooperation with the provincial and municipal authorities.

Hon. gentlemen in the extreme left corner think they are the only labour party in this house. I represent a labour constituency. With my friend the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) and others in the city council I helped to put through an eight hour day, pensions and many other things. Some of this was done in 1909, twenty-six years ago. Hon. gentlemen who sit in the extreme left corner do not constitute the only labour party in the house. The Conservative party in this chamber has done more for labour than has any other party. There is for instance the Workman's Compensation Act, the national policy and public ownership. This party has built up industrial society by its policy of protection, of giving our own work to our own workmen, of maintaining our own markets for our own products. This has been a consistent policy of the Conservative party; it has been applied consistently from 1878 down to the present day to ninety-eight per cent of the people. Where would the agricultural workers who constitute fifty per cent of the population be to-day if we had free trade or semi-free trade as preached on the prairies by some hon. gentlemen in the official opposition and some in the extreme left corner? In those days when Mr. Crerar was in the house, we heard about the plight of the poor grain growers and we heard charges about the elevator combines, and middlemen, grain exchanges, and the transportation combines. The poor grain grower had more to fear from these big interests west of the great lakes than they had from the manufacturers east of the great lakes through the middlemen, the elevator combines, the transportation combines and the grain exchanges. Where was official liberalism at that time? It was lined up with the free traders, the semi-free traders and some of the Progressives who proclaimed that the grain-growing industry was a north south industry and not an east and west industry to the markets of the world. There should be some honour among politicians as among sportsmen, but there does not seem to be as much. You can please nobody; you get no credit for anything. The government receives no credit for what it has done, but I admit that is only human nature. However, if ever there were a government that honestly endeavoured to do something for the working people of this country in this emergency, it is the one that now sits on this side of the house.

We are asked by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who is very fond of dealing with the constitution if our legislation was constitutional. What did the government do in the fall of 1930? They were faced with the British North America Act, that comedy of errors; they could do very little or nothing, but they very fortunately found three or four words "peace, order and good government." It was very fortunate for the working people and for the municipalities that those words were found by a very able lawyer, the Prime Minister, and another able lawyer with him, the Minister of Labour. Many municipalities will agree that they would have been bankrupt had it not been for the clause "peace, order and good government" and the blank cheque. The blank cheque is really not a blank cheque at all. Hon. gentlemen opposite refused to give a five-cent piece for relief. I have before me some fifteen or sixteen pages taken from Hansard of those years, but I shall not read them here. Hon. members can read those statements in Hansard of the questions and answers. Where would the municipalities be; where under those conditions would be the city of Hamilton from which the hon. member for East Hamilton comes? They would not have had one cent for industry or relief in that city had it not been for the money they got through the present Minister of Labour carrying out the policy of this party. At that time it was contended in the house by the ex-Minister of Labour that I was always talking about unemployment; I was told on one occasion that I was preaching blue ruin by persisting in bringing up the question. One hon. gentleman, I think it was Sir Henry Drayton, said that I had need to. I was one of the heads of a municipality for many years and I know a municipality, irrespective of politics, must appreciate what this government has done. As a follower of municipal institutions in this country, I believe that was only a start in the right direction. The government should go over the books and see whether something cannot be done further for our struggling municipalities.

In this particular case I was hoping that we would hear some constructive ideas about handling this problem of unemployment from economic liberalism and from hon. gentlemen in the extreme left corner. I appeal to the opposition and through them to the provinces, to the churches and boards of trade to help the government pull the country out of the mire in regard to this particular problem of relief. Let us not depend upon the British North America Act, the constitution; the people cannot buy bread by depending on the British North America Act; the butchers and grocers will not give them food because of it. The welfare of man in such days of universal want as these transcends the future of any political party, and it is too bad all parties do not unite on common ground to solve our problems free of partisanship. This course has been followed in England. On a social measure private members there were allowed by the government the other day to give their views freely and they were invited to do so. One or two of the ministers got up in the British house and opposed the government bill. The whips were called off and the members were allowed to express themselves freely. Here we are to-day, two hundred and forty-five members sitting in a committee presided over by our very popular deputy speaker, and I say that we as a committee should forego politics and do as they did in England regarding this problem—get down to brass tacks and see what should be done. Every time I hear the opposition talk, they plead the constitution; dissertations on the British North America Act are made by the ex-Minister of Justice and others.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate,

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Interpretation Act.

An act to amend the Representation Act, 1933.

An act to amend the Pension Act.

An act to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

An act to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1926 (French version).

An act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of maturing and callable financial obligations.

An act respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

An act to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa.

An act to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

An act respecting the additional protocol of 1935 to the Canada-France Trade Agreement of 1933.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

FURTHER PROVISION FOR CARRYING OUT RELIEF MEASURES, MEETING FINANCIAL CONDITIONS AND MAINTAINING CREDIT OF DOMINION AND PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill, No. 41, respecting relief measures—Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The very unsatisfactory nature of an omnibus bill such as the one before us has been well illustrated by the nature of the debate, if one may so dignify it, that has taken place.

Mr. CHURCH: May I say that I had not concluded my observations. Hon. members opposite have been very fond of quoting the British North America Act, but they have not suggested any constructive policy whereby our people could be taken off the dole and put back to work. They put me in mind of Mr. Boythorn in Bleak House, and the canary which he fondled on his finger all the time he was shouting his most lurid denunciations. Hon. members opposite are content to sit back and talk about the constitution all the time at a time when people are starving and in a position where some have to go to the poor house. After all is said and done, the duty of the hour is to get the people off the dole and back to work. The reconstruction of our country and a higher standard of living is the object before the party on this side of the house. Industry in Canada, in short, must re-adapt itself to the home market, and this is a most complicated process. It cannot be done by individual effort

We know that in England to-day they are developing their land to the point where they will not have to depend on a foreign food supply. We know that in this country national trade is decreasing, and it would seem that a revival of industry could come only from a greater consumption in the home market. We must push the country forward by planning for a higher economic and social standard, and in this effort we want a united country and the support of every part of it. This is a national work and must have the support of all people. The situation calls for national sacrifices instead of parliamentary repartee and playing the game of the ins and the outs. Church, state, the press and individuals will have to unite and no class or function should be left out. Every person should be in it.

I should like to say a word or two as to what should be done to bring our men off the dole, and place them in a position whereby they may have homes. A short time ago in his budget message the President of the United States said that their people would have to be taken off the dole. He said the policy followed was uneconomic and foreign to their constitution. I believe in this country we could do very much by way of reconstruction. We could do such work as Italy is now doing —reforestation, river improvements, drainage, irrigation, sewers, roads, work on river banks, provision for domestic water supply, harbour work, schools, municipal services, water supply for farmers, house building and work of other kinds. A similar program of work could be adapted to this country and to our circumstances on a third basis, with municipal and provincial authority on a large construction policy, which would be better than the dole.

The dole is only temporary; it is not a final remedy. People want work and that is the only lasting cure. Franchises from the people giving charters to corporations involving the assumption by such corporations of corresponding debts and obligations. These corporations owe a debt to their creator, the public. They should repay this debt to the public from whom they have derived their powers. If they fail in their duty, the community which created them would be justified in stepping in and exercising some control over their future actions.

The Conservative party has always been constructive. It has to its credit reform legislation such as the eight hour day bill and legislation for a minimum wage. This party is equipped by position and temperament to bring better order into Canadian life and industry, and to check the abuses which affect the consumer and the labourer. We should remove some of the unethical business practices, and bring protection up to date, eliminate the abuses to protect consumer and labour, and prevent further burdens and artificial barriers being placed on business. The main problem to be solved in Canada is unemployment. That is the main problem because no scheme of pensions and no scheme of unemployment insurance is a substitute for work and wages and the desire of people to work. Employment is the only real agency by which the nation's wealth can be distributed. Without consumption, production is a mere waste, and work and wages for all is the main agency of distribution. This party was the founder of protection, and it should dedicate itself to solving this problem of distributism and of getting people off the dole and back to work

Agriculture has always been traditionally associated with the Conservative party. As a party we stand for the further development and preservation of the home market for agriculture. Our own markets for our own products, and our own work for our own workmen is our policy. Agriculture is the oldest of our industries from the point of view of employment. It has been content to choose order instead of anarchy, and industry can be made amenable to similar treatment.

The solution of our economic problems calls for large sacrifices. The war made a great difference. The vast amount of voluntary work done and the great outburst of patriotism in times of danger are sure signs in Canada of a national spirit which will help the government to cope with the present dangers. Are we as a people, equal to our problems? For thirty years we have neglected to notice the inroads upon unemployment of science and the machine. A manufacturer puts in a machine for the specific purpose of lowering costs and to enable him to undercut his competitors at home and aboard. The item which is reduced by the machine is labour alone. That is the very purpose of the machine, to put people out of work, and it has succeeded admirably in its purpose. The machine has meant a large increase of female employment and a decrease of male employment. Formerly it was assumed that the labour displayed by the machine would be absorbed in other forms of work, but that is an absurd position for industry to be in because the welfare of man is the first duty of the government and of civilization. I believe that the Conservative party and the opposition should unite to solve the problem of distributism.

The Liberal party of this country to-day represents the last stand of economic liberalism in Canada. It relies on these social measures being declared unconstitutional. It is the party that for nine years had a chance to do something along these lines, but only dilly-dallied. It is the same party which in England opposed the factory acts and free schools, and the liberation of the trade unions. To-day it concentrates its attention in Canada on the tariff and on wider markets, when wider markets are not available. The Liberal party in Canada is an advocate of social reform, pensions, doles, social insurance—all these are in its platform for the higher life, but they refuse to give to this house a plan or platform to grapple with the cause and effects of the social revolution and with those economic factors which deprive men of the bread of their own production and the fruits of their own toil. I believe that free trade and the error of the Liberal party's policies have been to the detriment of agriculture and of industry in Canada. Many children are in factories to-day who should be in school, and most of the young offenders who come before our courts are underprivileged children many of them from poverty stricken homes, who from birth have never had a proper chance.

I believe we should give some credit to the gentlemen who sit in the far corner of the house because in 1928, 1929 and 1930 they did bring to the attention of the government the question of unemployment and they supported a policy of direct relief. But some of them are not consistent and do not vote with the government of the day. I would ask them to remember that the government has done the best it could, faced with that comedy of errors called the British North America Act, a relic of the ox-cart days. Faced with that act I do not see what further they could have done. We are told that we have to suffer all these social evils because of the British North America Act, because certain wise men away back in 1867, whose vision was poor and shortsighted, unloaded the provincial system on us as opposed to the federal system as they have it in England and the United States. A lot of the things we have to-day were unheard of in 1867. There were no joint stock companies in 1867, no telephones, no power development, no NRA., no air lines, no radios, no old age pensions, no social insurance, no eight hour day; nor had many of the great discoveries been made in science, physics and biology, with which we are familiar to-day. Are we to assume that the fathers who lived in the past have left us adequate machinery to deal with the problems that these new discoveries have brought us? As I said the other day, one of the most important things we must do before we can solve any of these problems in a practical way is to have constitutional and parliamentary reform in this country. The greatest problem they have in England to-day is constitutional and parliamentary reform, and they cannot make social progress without it. The authors of the British North America Act did not play bridge or squash or badminton, but they left us this relic, the British North America Act, and as a result the unemployed have to suffer and we can solve no economic or social question. It would be far better for us to face the fact that that act is in need of reform. Unemployment and relief have now reached their peak, and the tide is receding very rapidly. I believe that before spring is over, with a housing and reconstruction policy, the peak of relief will have been passed, and I hope that men will be getting back to work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say to my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Church) that when he did not rise after we suspended our sitting for royal assent, I assumed he had finished his speech. What I began to say was that the unsatisfactory nature of an omnibus measure of this kind has been very clearly illustrated by the kind of debate, if it may be so dignified, which has taken place upon it. My colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) began by speaking of unemployment relief, stressing particularly the plight of the industrial worker and the difficulties that confront the municipalities. Next we had two hon. members referring to the troubles in the dried out areas, this having nothing whatever to do with city problems. The next speaker referred to the wheat arrangement, thus introducing a new topic. In this connection I think we might very easily refer to the loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway which were made several years ago under a measure of this kind. We could refer also to the writing up of the assets of the insurance companies, and we could make mention of the peace, order and good government provisions. Reference might also be made to the financial position of the various provinces. In these circumstances I submit it becomes almost impossible to focus attention upon any one measure and to secure the opinion of the house in that regard. The hon. member for East Toronto has expressed himself as being disappointed with the labour members not voting in favour of the measure. I did not speak on the second reading of the bill, but I think I can say that we voted against the motion for second reading for three reasons. First of all, we voted against the motion because of the inadequacy of the measure to meet the actual needs of the people. No indication is given that there is to be adequate relief, and no mention is made of what the relief works, if any are contemplated, are to be. Next, the bill provides for the exercise by the government of very wide powers, much wider than should be granted by a measure of this kind. These questions have been threshed out in the discussion of similar measures during the past two or three years and I do not intend to repeat the arguments then advanced. Still further, we voted against this motion as a protest against the lack of assumption by the government of anything like responsibility for the national emergency which now confronts the country.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) stated that the administration of relief should be placed where it belongs, with the municipalities and provinces. As I understood him, he implied that the responsibilities for relief lay essentially with the municipalities and the provinces, and that certainly is implied by the preamble of the bill now before us. Under these circumstances I should like to read once more what has been read into the record again and again. I would not do this were it not for the fact that the hon. member for Souris has sought to condone the inaction of the government. I should like to quote from a speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in Calgary on June 12, 1930, as follows:

> But this is a new country, and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Is that true or is it not true? If it was true when the Prime Minister spoke in Calgary in 1930, surely it is true in 1935. The Prime Minister was then asking to be entrusted with authority to carry on the affairs of the country, and he said:

> I say to you, my fellow citizens, my fellow Canadians, speaking to the larger audience, I am convinced this problem has now ceased to be local and provincial and has become national in its importance.

I contend that if that were true in 1930 it is just as true in 1935, and perhaps more so. The Prime Minister was then seeking a mandate from the people. He said:

> I propose that parliament shall formulate a definite plan for permanent relief, and that parliament, as representing the people, shall deal with this national problem and provide amelioration for the condition in order that next winter the Canadian people may not be facing the crisis that is upon us without having a remedy at hand.

After five years in public office he brings forward a measure of this kind, a measure which is inadequate and which we should not be asked to support. In voting as I did, I did not repudiate the action of the dominion government in offering relief. If that were the question before us I would hold up both hands for the motion. What I tried to do with my vote was to protest—I think this is true also of my colleagues—against the inadequate manner in which the government is providing for the needs of the unemployed, and the fact that after five years they have gone back on the solemn pledges made to the electorate in 1930. It is only within the last few months that the Prime Minister in his radio speeches repudiated in the very strongest language the idea of the dole. I agree with the hon. member for East Toronto that we should endeavour to place all our people in constructive work of some kind. That has not been done, and the minister sits silent when we speak of the necessity of a further extension of public works. We cannot get any action from the government, and I contend that we were justified in voting against the motion as a protest against the lack of a policy on the part of the government.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer; it comes under the heading of peace, order and good government. A couple of nights ago we were discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling). In giving a reason for the maintenance of an army in this country, the minister said:

> In addition it fulfils another day, that the force should be distributed throughout Canada in the military districts in such a way that if called upon by the provincial governments in time of stress and strain, through civil disturbances within their own boundaries, they can render such assistance as may be necessary to support the police forces of the country.

We spend something like $20,000,000 upon the military forces of this country and the mounted police, which is a semi-military force. My contention is that if a fraction of this sum were spent upon setting in motion certain constructive forces which would take care of the unemployed we would be much further advanced. Under peace, order and good government we are giving to the government the power to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof. I say again that if the unemployed were absorbed into industry, that if a greater purchasing power were given to the people, it would provide the best means of maintaining and protecting the financial position of the dominion and the provinces. It seems to some of us that the government is more solicitous in protecting the credit of the country than it is in protecting the welfare of the people. Only the other day I had a letter from a friend living in the constituency of Souris. He referred to a district which I knew very intimately thirty or forty years ago. He spoke of the run-down condition of the houses, the outbuildings, the machinery and the interior of the homes, he spoke of the despair and the demoralization of people who a few years ago were prosperous farmers; and his concluding sentence, if I remember rightly, was, "and the young people have nearly all moved away." Now how can we have a prosperous country with conditions of that kind? Someone might very well say that drought is a dispensation of Providence, and that we cannot be held responsible for the climatic changes in the drought area. That is true, but we are responsible for the morale of the people, to see that it is maintained; and the morale of the people can be maintained only as they are given some hope for the future. But so far we have had no clear-cut plan which indicates that the people in these vast areas may have any immediate hope.

I submit that of much greater importance than providing for military and police protection or providing for the maintenance of the credit of this country is provision for the people to live decently. To-day we are in practice trying so to arrange matters that no one will starve. There are occasional instances of actual starvation, and there are more instances of suicide caused by anxiety. But on the whole we are trying to see to it that no one actually starves. But we are keeping tens of thousands of our people on the bare subsistence line and allowing them this subsistence only at the expense of what we have considered a part of their manhood and womanhood—their self-respect. We degrade them by giving them charity. I would ask why it could not be arranged that every unemployed citizen should have a pension as a matter of right, not of charity but as a matter of right. In recent times we have been rather inclined to laugh at the Townsend plan in the United States, where an individual has come out and urged that a very large pension should be paid to everyone over the age of sixty. Probably Doctor Townsend has altogether overdone his proposals along this line, but the fact that he has such a large following is the result not merely of a demagogic appeal but of the realization by the people that the ordinary citizen has certain rights to a decent living.

I am not advocating what has come to be known as the "national dividend" as a part of the social credit scheme, as put forward by Major Douglas. I confess that I do not understand the theories of Major Douglas, but I do say that that phase of it contains a real measure of truth, and because it does it is appealing to tens of thousands of people. Why should the people who have helped to build up this country and are now thrown out of work through no fault of their own not obtain a reasonable pension, if you like to call it that, as a matter of right? Even this afternoon I heard someone refer in rather disparaging terms to the unemployed as if they belonged to an inferior class. I protest against that way of viewing unemployment; I protest against our thinking that anything given in the way of unemployment relief is a form of charity. It should not be so regarded. I quite admit that in the old days under normal conditions when a man was out of work it was usually through some fault of his own; he was shiftless or a drunkard or something of that kind, and naturally the municipality was required to take care of him. But that is not the situation to-day with regard to the great majority of those who are unemployed, and for that reason the burden should not be loaded on to the municipalities. It is not a local matter. The municipalities have had nothing to say with regard to the vast immigration to this country. They have had nothing to say with regard to trade conditions in this country, with regard to the war and its consequences, with regard to the financial arrangements of the country. The dominion government is responsible for these general policies, and that being so I take it that the dominion government should assume responsibility for the effects of these policies. It is not fair now to load the responsibility on the provinces or the municipalities.

It may be thought that in advocating something in the form of a general pension I am simply making an appeal to the gallery. I hope that those who know me will not think so; I hope they will not think, either, that I am guilty of a kind of impossible idealism. Not at all. I say that we are actually giving food, clothing and shelter and in some instances medical assistance, besides light, heat, and requirements of that kind, to large numbers of these people, but we are giving this assistance grudgingly in the form of charity, and that policy is having the effect of creating all sorts of friction between the municipality and the province and the dominion and at the same time demoralizing the people who receive the assistance.

Someone may claim that those receiving relief ought to have contributed to some unemployment pension scheme. Well, we have had no such scheme to which they could have contributed and you cannot initiate such a scheme that will at once meet the existing situation. On the other hand the great majority of those people who are now unemployed and in need of relief have contributed in the past to the welfare of the country, working in our factories, our shops and offices, in our railways and other constructive work. These are the people who are unemployed to-day. Why should we load the whole burden of the depression upon this one group of people? I do not think that anyone in Canada has a right to even a comfortable income so long as these people are on the dole, and much less do I think that any man has a right to enjoy a large income so long as large numbers of our people can subsist only by asking for charity. This question goes deep; it is fundamental in our national life. Is the whole machinery of Canadian government being maintained in order to maintain the status quo, in order that we may preserve a condition under which a few are deriving great benefits while equally worthy Canadians are being not only thrown out of work but thrown upon charity? I submit that after five years in office the government should be held responsible for making provision for the situation which confronts us.

The hon. member for East Toronto rather deprecated the fact that measures of this kind immediately become party measures. We all feel sorry that this is so, and in the newspapers in the last few weeks there has been a good deal of talk of a national government as a way out. Personally I am strongly opposed to a national government such as is contemplated by those who advocate it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.
