Constitutionally, the provinces are responsible for ensuring the well-being of children through their social services and welfare programs. The federal government helps the provinces in this area by transferring funds through the Canada Assistance Plan and Established Programs Financing, for instance.

The federal concept of family benefits for children goes back to 1918, when amendments to the War Income Tax Act introduced the tax exemption for children. Later, in 1945, the family allowance program came into effect, thus proving that Canada recognized its obligation to educate its children. This program was intended as a mechanism for the government to supplement family income by relieving families of part of their expenses for the care and education of their children.

Since the introduction of family allowance, a number of changes have been made to adjust them to the requirements of families in need. Today, the federal government pays nearly $2.8 billion in family allowance to more than 3,500,000 families, for 6,500,000 children. The benefits are paid every month, usually to the mother, In 1991, the monthly benefit was about $34 per child.

Federal support for families goes beyond family allowance, however. There are a number of benefits for children, most of them provided in the form of tax credits. The Child Tax Credit Program aimed at low-income families is another major source of support for these families.

Since it came to power in 1984, the government substantially raised the ceiling of the credit by increasing it by more than 50 per cent—more remains to be done, but this is at least a good start—so that the actual benefit rose from $367 per child in 1984 to $585 in 1991. In 1988, the federal government introduced a supplement to the child tax credit for children up to six years of age. The supplement is $207 per child.

The government has also taken other steps to support the incomes of families with children. For instance, the implementation of a series of measures concerning goods and services will on the whole improve the financial situation of families with incomes below $30,000. These measures include an improved tax credit which is paid quarterly. The maximum value of the credit is $190 per adult and $100 per child.

We are also helping parents to use types of non-parental care that are not too costly. When they file their income tax returns, families can deduct up to $4,000 for child care expenses—work-related, of course—for children of pre-school age and up to $2,000 for children who are going to school.

Mr. Speaker, under the Canada Assistance Plan, which provides for cost-sharing with the provinces, the federal government helps fund eligible provincial expenditures for welfare and social services. In 1991-92, these expenditures will total $6.3 billion. Through this program, the government estimates it will pay about $250 million for child care.

The federal government intends to increase its support for child care through its National Strategy, which will deal with a number of issues that have an impact on children.

Families with new born infants will receive additional support, following amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. These amendments provide for a system of maternity, parental and health benefits. More specifically, fifteen weeks of maternity benefits during the period before and after the birth of the child; 10 weeks of parental benefits for natural or adopting parents—this is a new measure introduced by our government—for either the mother or the father; and 15 weeks of health benefits.

Under the new unemployment insurance system, the claimant will be able to receive benefits—up to the maximum amount for each type of benefit—as long as the cumulative period of special benefits does not exceed 30 weeks.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of outside pressures or constraints, a family may cease to function normally.

Since families are the basic unit of Canadian society, the federal government is concerned about these problems and wants to find ways to help families keep functioning effectively. It also knows that the public sector is in a position to provide substantial help, either directly or indirectly, to families experiencing a crisis. A number of federal initiatives designed to provide this type of support were launched recently.

One of our priority concerns is the issue of child sexual abuse and family violence in general, and we are trying to provide assistance in this area.

Mr. Speaker, it is incredible that a society as advanced as ours, a society that is pluralistic and democratic, still tolerates violence against women and children. Yesterday we saw on television how a man who was obviously very distressed was holding his ex-spouse hostage. The same man had kidnapped his young child a few weeks before. It was done in desperation, I agree, but it is intolerable just the same.

Mr. Speaker, why, despite the measures I just mentioned, are there still so many poor families who are unable to get out of the poverty cycle? How can their needs be met? Should there be a guaranteed minimum income? Someone in my riding told me the other day that if instead of giving them a tax credit or a cheque in the mail, we gave parents food stamps, maybe then children would no longer go to school hungry.

Mr. Speaker, there is so much more to say, but I agree with hon. members that child poverty and child sexual abuse must stop now.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROTECTION OF CANADA'S ECOSYSTEMS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena), seconded by Mr. Caccia moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of preserving and protecting in its natural state at least 12 per cent of each of Canada's ecosystems.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for seconding the motion. The motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of preserving and protecting in its natural state at least 12 per cent of each of Canada's ecosystems.

With the assistance of Kevin McNamee of the Canadian Nature Federation, an amendment will be proposed by my hon. friend, Mr. Martin, to clarify the shared responsibility so that it would read:

—12 per cent of Canada by working co-operatively with the provincial and territorial governments and assisting them to complete the protected area networks by the year 2000.

It is important that that kind of clarification be made, and I accept it as a good, proper and helpful amendment.

I trust that this amendment is such that the motion will be put to the House and passed today, perhaps by all-party consent. It is crucial that the dormant political process be invigorated by an all-party resolution which will lead to at least protecting 12 per cent of Canada before the end of this century.

Canada's total lands are 9,922,000 square kilometres and our 34 national parks total 182,272 square kilometres. Our provincial and territorial parks, ecological reserves and wilderness areas of which at this moment there are 1,160, total 138,000 square kilometres, substantially less than what is presently in our national parks system.

Of those 1,160 such protected sites at the provincial and territorial level, there are only 43 designated as wilderness areas for a total of 8,680 square kilometres. If you add up all the so-called protected areas, which is 6.3 per cent of Canada or just over 320,000 square kilometres, and take out the national, provincial and territorial parks which allow logging, hunting, mining and other kinds of activities, that total drops to just 254,000 square kilometres or 2.6 per cent of our national land base.

A federal task force many years ago confirmed that an opportunity to set aside lands and complete our national parks system will be gone by the year 2000, due almost entirely to land alienations, roads, electrical transmission lines, hydroelectric facilities, forest harvesting, mining, urban sprawl, and all of those other land uses to which the lands of this huge country are put.

In 1979, some 12 years ago, cabinet approved the goal of setting aside and establishing one park in each of our natural regions. There are 39 terrestrial natural regions and 29 marine natural regions in Canada. The existing 34 national parks represent 21 of the 39 land regions or 182,272 square kilometres which is 1.8 per cent of Canada.

All this area is not protected. For example, logging is going on at this time by Daishowa Canadian Forest Products in Wood Buffalo, Alberta, our largest national park and in the Northwest Territories.

The plans to complete five new national parks by 1995 will leave 13 to be completed in the five years between 1995 and the year 2000. I think I can aptly demonstrate that the government is going to have to allocate more substantial person time, and perhaps more substantial capital in order to achieve realistically the completion of our national parks system within the next nine years.

Canada now has 213 endangered species that are either in danger of becoming, or are already extinct. Twenty species were added this year, including some of the most noble creatures that have ever existed on this continent such as the grizzly bear, the polar bear and the Peary caribou. These are now also endangered and up to this moment neither the provinces nor the territories have taken steps to deal directly with recommendations made by biologists in terms of those three species. Clearly these include the establishment of protective zones and a dramatic reduction in pressures on them from both industrial activity and human activity.

Within the green plan we see the promise to, by the year 2000, establish three national marine parks between now and 1995 and three more by the year 2000, including the South Moresby Gwaii-Haanas Marine Park, Saguenay and one other, leaving some 21 marine natural regions unrepresented beyond the year 2000.

Many people ask where the 12 per cent figure comes from. It comes from international scientific consensus, as is found in the 1987 Brundtland report, the World Commission on the Environment and Development. In chapter 6 we find:

> Nearly 4 per cent of the earth's land is managed explicitly to conserve species and ecosystems and all but a small handful of countries have national parks.

One then goes on to chapter 6-18, point 72 which points out:

> Since 1970, the networks have expanded in extent by more than 80 per cent, around two-thirds of which are in the Third World. But a great deal more remains to be done; a consensus of professional opinion suggests that the total expanse of protected areas needs to be at least tripled if it is to constitute a representative sample of Earth's ecosystems.

So there you have one of the most extensive world wide reports ever done, and done by a United Nations body chaired by Prime Minister Brundtland, which has concluded that at minimum, we should set aside 12 per cent.

This report was endorsed on September 29, 1988 by Canada's present Prime Minister. In his remarks before the United Nations we find in about the middle of his speech, the following:

> The world is facing an environmental crisis of unparalleled magnitude. Nature is sending us an urgent message that we ignore at our peril. The signs of this crisis are all around us— shortages of timber, exhausted soil, desertification, depleted fish stocks, seals dying in the North Sea, beluga whales washing ashore in the St. Lawrence river. Some even maintain that we have reached a point where the survival of mankind is at risk.
> Prime Minister Brundtland, Chairman of the World Commission on Environment and Development, has said that the threat to our environmental security is "second only to nuclear war".

Those remarks by our present Prime Minister were picked up by the two past and the now present Ministers of Environment. We find in the published green plan, which was released here in Ottawa December 11, 1990, a section called Section 3, Special Spaces and Species, and an allocation of $175 million over the next six years for protecting unique ecological areas. It takes as a goal, and I quote: "To set aside as protected space, 12 per cent of Canada." It goes through some of the points I have been covering, such as the need to establish five new national parks by 1996 and to negotiate agreements for the remaining 13 parks which are required to complete the terrestrial parks system by the year 2000. Many people have asked me and I am sure have asked other members, what does that commitment mean? Is it deliverable? And what are those areas that are still unrepresented? Very few Canadians realize that it is scientifically recognized that there are 13 natural bioregions, 39 natural systems in Canada, and that only 21 of those 39 are presently represented in our national parks system, such as our first park, Banff National Park created in 1885.

I quote from the January 31, 1991, letter from the Minister of the Environment on these very points:

> As you know, Environment Canada's recently released Green Plan provides for the establishment of at least five new national parks by 1996 and for the negotiation of the agreements for the remaining 13 parks by the year 2000. It also provides for the establishment of three new national marine parks by 1996, with an additional three by the year 2000.

It goes on to say:

> Within the next few months, my department also plans to release a follow-up action plan setting out specific strategies and target dates for establishing national parks within each of the 18 unrepresented natural regions.

That was in January and they have not yet been made public.

Here are the terrestrial regions that are still unrepresented, regions that have active park proposals: Region 15, Bluenose Lake; Region 17, East Arm; Region 27, Churchill; Region 36, Banks Island; and Region 37, Baffin Island.

Regions with currently inactive park proposals are Region 16, Wager Bay; Region 21, Mealey Mountains; Region 24, the Torngat Mountains.

Regions with representative areas that are identified natural areas of Canadian significance, but in which further study is required before a park proposal can be identified are: Region 3, Fraser-Chilcotin Junction area and the Churn Creek area; Region 7, the Spatsizi Plateau and Mount Edziza areas, Kluane/Aishihik area, Yukon River/Ogilvie Mountains area; Region 14, the Long Point area and Little Limestone Lake area; Region 22, the Richmond Gulf area; Region 25, Leaf Bay area and Nastapoka Islands; Region 38, the Bjorne Peninsula area and Bathurst Island.

The regions with regional studies that are not yet complete are: Region 2, the Strait of Georgia Lowlands in British Columbia; Region 20 the Laurentian Boreal Highlands basically running from Ottawa to Quebec City; Region 23 the Whale River region; and Region 28 which is northeast of Churchill, known as Southampton.

Quebec is a particular case that I know you would be interested in, Mr. Speaker, because the Whale River region which is now being studied is the area that is being proposed for flooding by the Great Whale hydroelectric project known to many people as the first part of James Bay II. The flooding from James Bay I and James Bay II is a staggering 25,834 square kilometres, 2 per cent of the entire land base of the province of Quebec. Six times as much land will be flooded by this one project as is protected in all of the federal and provincial parks in that entire province. It is really quite staggering the amount of work to be done on both provincial and national parks strategies, to say nothing of the 12 per cent in our second largest province.

The first debate and vote there ever has been on 12 per cent and on the national parks system took place in this House on February 5, 1990, and that motion said the following:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national parks system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development, (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones

Sadly, that was not about to pass through this Chamber. Since that time there have been various suggestions that the wording could have been clarified at least in terms of the 12 per cent. That is going to be done today by Mr. Martin, my friend on environmental matters, to give the House an opportunity to express itself morally on an issue that is truly one of survival.

There are few if any biologists that I have spoken to in the years since Brundtland who disagree that 12 per cent should be the floor—hardly the ceiling but it should be the floor—because we are losing right now about 20,000 species per year that are becoming entirely extinct, entirely related to the activities of humanity. As we lose those species, most of them are being lost in tropical areas because of the proliferation of life in the canopies particularly of jungle areas.

As I said earlier in my remarks, we have lost 20 species in Canada and 20 have been added on to the endangered species list in our country, great creatures such as the grizzly. I mean, how is it possible in a country like ours? There isn't even one area where grizzlies are specifically protected in a sanctuary in the whole of a great country such as this, a country that is massive by the standards of anywhere else in the world. Even the United States has 8.1 per cent of its land base protected, due in large part to states such as Alaska where 37 per cent has been set aside in perpetuity in their national park system.

Even poorer countries in these years leading up to and post-Brundtland have adopted this concept, with a real understanding of the benefits, both in terms of speciation and biological diversity. They also realize some of the things that can come with that for poorer countries such as Tanzania, which has set aside 17 per cent of its land base to protect the larger mammals that are resident there such as lions and elephants that people want to see, but also to protect their grasslands and some of the unique species they have there.

I am prepared to listen today, hopefully later this morning, to the minister but also to my colleague so that we have an understanding that there is a responsibility for the territories and for the provinces. There is also a very large and leading responsibility for the federal government to get on with the job of isolating those areas, in a land use sense, that are the vital core areas for various species.

We are continuing to see various migratory bird species—we have about 11 right now—that are in real difficulty because of loss of habitat, loss of core feeding areas along their flyways so that as they are coming north or going south, there are huge areas where they are either short of feed or having to operate on reduced feed.

It is very important that all of our biological systems be linked so that travel ways for animals and plants permit them to have an opportunity to continue to migrate within the natural systems, and also that birds and other beings and creatures such as insects have the kind of environment about them that they require in order to get about and to survive on this planet.

There has been ongoing spin as well put to the debate that the federal responsibility may be almost done, that we are at 1.8 per cent, and by the time we get to 3 per cent, that would basically be the federal responsibility. I do not opt into that proposal because, as I pointed out in my remarks, the provincial and territorial systems as they stand are considerably smaller now than the existing federal system. In the only really large national survey, which was done in 1987 by Gallup, 96 per cent of Canadians support strong government action to protect wilderness.

In that year Canadians spent $5.1 billion on wildlife and park-related activities. It has gone up substantially each year since, both among Canadians and among visitors to our country. Canadians when asked a very simple question about environmental issues, certainly to a majority, but to an ever-increasing majority, look to Ottawa, not to the provincial or territorial capitals for leadership in particularly the designation and protection of species and of lands.

So my hope is, through this debate and through the amended wording, to make clear that this is a shared responsibility. Although the provincial responsibilities are large, they have not been doing them. I use as an example the studies that are going on in the Whale Region by the federal government now that, should James Bay I and II proceed as planned, an area six times as large as everything that is protected in Quebec would be flooded by that one project.

Clearly in terms of the definition within politicians' minds at the provincial and territorial levels, I think the federal government and all the parties in this House have a very big job to do to convince our provincial and territorial colleagues that they must work hard to provide add-on lands and programs that are suitable to dealing with those who live in those areas so that they can in fact find benefits from these kinds of land designations, which are often ballyhooed as being something that causes a loss of jobs. That is hardly the case when one looks at the studies that have been done, not just throughout North America, but in other jurisdictions. Governments have planned properly for those land designations so that aboriginal people, nearby communities and people who had residual occupations tied to those lands, are not unduly or unfairly disrupted in their activities.

In concluding, I hope that today's debate on Motion 330, as amended, will be a successful one and that both the Official Opposition and the government will take the opportunity to endorse what I believe is a much-needed moral voice from this House, that we had better get on with this task. If we were given the option now of setting aside Banff National Park with its size and grandeur, I just wonder whether or not we would have the intellectual and moral girth to do so. I hope that today's debate demonstrates that this House has the foresight to start moving to set aside at least the 12 per cent that future generations need to survive and enjoy this country the way we have.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to a motion that is vital to Canada and to our environment, and I want to congratulate the hon. member for Skeena on the speech he just made. The Liberal Party wholeheartedly supports the campaign to protect threatened spaces and ecosystems. We must complete the national parks network by establishing at least one protected, representative region in each of the 39 terrestrial regions by the year 2000, and in each of the 29 marine regions by the year 2010. Twenty-one land regions are already represented within the national parks system, but to complete the system, an additional 18 parks will be needed.

Even with these additions, Mr. Speaker, only 3 per cent of Canadian territory will be protected, while our target is 12 per cent.

[English]

Therefore, we look forward to the government announcing a strategy for promoting protection of the remaining 9 per cent.

This will entail working co-operatively with provincial and territorial governments to ensure that each of Canada's natural regions is protected. If 12 per cent of the lands and waters are to be protected, areas will have to include not only national parks, but provincial parks, territorial parks, conservation areas and heritage rivers.

This will require significant commitments from provincial and territorial governments, as well as the federal government. They may well need financial assistance. The $175 million tagged in the green plan for special spaces and species will have to be released. The short field season means that any delays now suffered in authorizations and promotion translates into much longer delays as far as the identification of new parks and new conservation areas.

If you will forgive a personal note, Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward this summer to tripping the Taft in northern British Columbia and indeed, in the member's riding. I may even have the occasion, after it is all over, to meet some Liberals in the member's riding. If not, I look forward to meeting a number of NDPers who I can convert.

I mention this because the Taft should clearly be designated as a heritage river. Yet British Columbia and Alberta have not joined the Canadian Heritage River System.

• (1130)

One would hope that this and so many other issues, such as the Banks Island National Park proposal could be rectified as soon as possible.

The member for Skeena was quite eloquent in talking about the absolute need for protecting by diversity another species.

We in Canada have a tremendous responsibility to the world. Indeed, we have a fiduciary responsibility to the world, not only to protect the vast land mass which we have been so lucky to have inherited, but indeed to show leadership to the rest of the world. How can this country stand up in the international forum and speak of the need for other countries to protect their areas, especially the underdeveloped countries, when we in this country have not taken the decisive steps that are required here.

I regret very much that my time is limited. However, it is with unequivocal pleasure for these and many other reasons that I would move the following amendment:

I move, seconded by Mr. Caccia, the hon. member for Davenport:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the expression "12 per cent" and by adding the following words:
> "of Canada by working co-operatively with the provincial and territorial governments and assisting them to complete their protected area networks by the year 2000".

Mr. Friesen: I do not raise this point of order to detract from either the remarks or the motion made by the members but I am just curious about the technicality of having the same member second the main motion as well as the amendment. Is that procedurally—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize because Mr. Caccia seconded the motion moved by the hon. member for Skeena. On a point of order the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the member opposite and I would move, seconded by Mr. Vanclief, the member for Prince Edward—Hastings:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the expression "12 per cent" and by adding the following:
> "of Canada by working co-operatively with the provincial and territorial governments and assisting them to complete their protected area networks by the year 2000"

I really am very grateful to the member opposite.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): During the next few minutes the Chair will consider the admissibility of the motion moved by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

The hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in the opportunity to speak to this motion. I think that the subject matter of the motion is very apropos.

All Canadians need to be constantly reminded that this is an issue that has immediate import on their lives and even more so on the lives of their children and grandchildren if we are going to preserve the country and the ecosystems that are so important to us.

I say the subject matter is always pertinent. I think that the motion itself is redundant because the government has already announced its intentions to do exactly what the motion requires or requests the government to do. Second, the government has already taken action to indicate its intention to proceed with what it has already said it was going to do.

I point out to my friend from Skeena that there is no greater evidence than the announcement that was made two or three weeks ago by the Minister of the Environment. He came out to British Columbia to announce the Fraser plan in which the government is assigning $100 million to reclaim the Fraser. Now I know that is not specific to this motion in that it is not setting aside a new park or protecting a new ecosystem, but it is very urgent in the sense that it is an attempt to restore an ecosystem that is in danger. All I can say is that the action taken by the government and the Minister of the Environment indicates the seriousness with which the government takes the green plan and its intention to fulfil the commitment it has made within the programs of the Green Plan. So I say that the subject is never redundant, but the motion itself is.

It is always easy to speak in generalities on a subject like this. Everybody is in favour of protecting the environment and the ecosystems that are so important to us. It is much more difficult to be specific in dealing with these subjects. It is easy for the dowagers in New York City to speak about protecting the marine park in the Queen Charlottes and so forth.

I remember a debate that was held almost exactly a year ago in this House where we were debating the importance of protecting the environment. The colleague of the member from Skeena, the member for Comox—Alberni, dwelt at length about the environmental issues facing the country and spoke, at length, about Témagami here in Ontario. However, he never once mentioned Carmanah in his own riding. Carmanah is probably the most discussed topic of the environment in British Columbia, but it never occurred to the member for Comox—Alberni that his position on the Carmanah Valley would be very important to the people of Canada, to know whether he really wanted to protect that valley or whether he wanted to see it logged. I am sure he does not want to see the valley logged, but his constituents themselves have asked where the member for Comox—Alberni stands on the subject of the Carmanah Valley. It is easy to speak in generalities. It is much more difficult to be specific about these issues.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not mean to break in on the member's time and I will be very brief. I would just like for the record to recognize that the Carmanah is not in the seat of the member for Comox—Alberni. It is in the seat of the member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Friesen: To be specific, it is the constituents of the member from Alberni who work on the Franklin River project right next door to the Carmanah Valley and I think the member knows that. It is the constituents who are affected, the constituents of the member from Comox—Alberni.

Finally, on this particular topic, I just want to refer to the Brundtland report, the excellent report brought together a few years ago, beginning at chapter 2.

Madam Brundtland says: "Sustainable development is development that meets the needs of present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. It contains within it two key concepts, the concept of needs, in particular the essential needs of the world's poor to which over-riding priority should be given and the idea of limitations opposed by the state of technology and the social organization on the environment's ability to meet present and future needs."

Those are very, very important criteria that she establishes. So I concur with the hon. member from Skeena that the government should take a leadership role in this regard. I believe it already has done so. Canada's green plan clearly states that Canada's long-term goal is to set aside as protected space 12 per cent of the country, a goal that must be shared by the provinces, the territories, private stewards and the federal government, as the two speakers who spoke before may have already recognized.

Furthermore, the green plan contains numerous initiatives that the federal government is prepared to take to accelerate progress to meet this goal. The completion of the country's system of national parks, which is one of the oldest and most renowned in the world, by the year 2000 is an example of the one of the green plan's special spaces and species projects which will contribute to meeting the 12 per cent target.

I am also of the opinion that there is some urgency in this matter because Canada's remaining wilderness is slowly but steadily being engulfed. The federal, provincial and territorial governments must act now before opportunities to create new protected areas are foreclosed forever.

Each government owes it to the next project, the most pristine areas within their respective systems of protected areas for the enjoyment and understanding of this and future generations of Canadians.

I might inject, however, that remarks like seemingly unrestrained logging in parks really do not add to the debate when we never define whether those logging activities are designed to deal with infested areas or over mature areas which are becoming a danger.

We need to define actually what we mean by logging in those areas. It is not good enough to say that there is logging going on.

I am pleased to report to this House that real progress is being made by this government. The Minister of the Environment is working hard with his provincial and territorial counterparts to create new national parks. His short list of priority candidates at this time include Banks Island, Baffin Island, Bluenose Lake, the east arm of Great Slave Lake and Wager Bay in the Northwest Territories, Old Crow flats in the Yukon, the Cape Churchill area in Manitoba and the Torngat Mountains in the Newfoundland and Labrador area.

It would be useful at this time to briefly review the origin of the goal of setting aside 12 per cent of the country. I believe that the 12 per cent figure was extrapolated from sections 1 and 72 in chapter 6 of Our Common Future, the Brundtland report.

This report, which is commonly referred to as the "Brundtland report" proposed a series of actions to halt the extinction of species and the irreversible degradation of ecosystems globally. The report noted that although nearly 4 per cent of the earth's land area was managed explicitly to conserve species and ecosystems, a great deal more remained to be done.

It went on to suggest that the total expanse of protected areas needed to be at least tripled, if it was to constitute a representative sample of the earth's ecosystems. The application of this goal to the Canadian context was pioneered by the World Wildlife Fund (Canada), one of the country's most prestigious non-government conservation organizations when it launched its 1989 "Endangered Spaces: The Future of Canada's Wilderness" campaign.

This 10-year campaign urges governments, industries, environmental groups and individual Canadians to take action on two key points; first, to integrate conservation practices or sustainable development into the management of lands and waters used for resource production; second, to protect a representative sample of the country's undisturbed natural areas so that a minimum 12 per cent of the country's area will be protected as wilderness.

The proposition that at least 12 per cent of the country be protected has generated considerable debate among government agencies, industry and conservation organizations. Many have made the point that there is no agreed upon formula or percentage for determining that a sufficient amount of natural heritage resources has been protected.

For example, whereas the Brundtland report recommends a target of 12 per cent, the UICN, the world conservation union notes in its report, From Strategy to Action of 1989 that if only 10 per cent of the earth's surface was devoted to protection, the trend for species and ecosystem depletion would be stemmed globally.

There are varying opinions about what the percentage figure ought to be. I simply want to underscore the fact that while this subject is always pertinent and never redundant, the motion is redundant because the government is committed to it, and the target should not be a specific percentage. The target should be what is necessary to preserve those ecosystems.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to congratulate the most distinguished member for Skeena for his motion and my colleague for LaSalle—Émard for his amendment.

I cannot say the same about the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley. He twice declared the motion redundant, but found it nevertheless possible and necessary to speak for 10 minutes, thus demonstrating that the essence of the motion is not redundant at all.

Considering the record of the government to which he belongs, there is no motion that is redundant in the field of the environment and conservation.

I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a paragraph from the Brundtland report which reads as follows: "The challenge facing nations today is no longer deciding whether conservation is a good idea, but rather how it can be implemented in the national interests and within the means available to each country." The member for Surrey—White Rock questions the desirability of a percentage and we should not invest too many energies on that question. Certainly it would be desirable to be very flexible on this subject in certain circumstances. But considering the pressures from development and the pressures from population growth, it seems essential that a percentage be set as a goal as a guideline and a percentage below which we should not go. Therefore the percentage becomes a very important policy guideline without which we would have a variety of different standards by continent and by nation, and we would in the end not achieve the goal put forward by the Brundtland report.

Mr. Speaker, in the green plan there is a commitment to 12 percent. The green plan states that 6.9 per cent of Canada's land is currently protected. There is a controversy though on that 6.9 and it has to be put on the record. The World Wildlife Fund in Canada has concluded that roughly 3.4 per cent of the Canadian land meets the required criteria. Therefore the statement made in the green plan by the government does not seem to be supported and verified by the World Wildlife Fund, which is perhaps the non-governmental organization most active in this particular field of conservation.

The debate offers an opportunity to raise some questions in relation to the present government activities and intentions. For instance, will the government, to which the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley belongs, announce a target date for completing the national marine park system? Will the system of national parks be completed by the year 2000, which will then allow us to reach at least 3 per cent of Canada's land area

When will the government announce a strategy for promoting the protection of the remaining 9 per cent?

Another point that ought to be raised in this connection is, when will the federal government provide the financial support that is needed in the territorial governments to assist them in establishing territorial parks so that the achievement of the 12 per cent goal is facilitated. For instance, regional development funds, will the government to which the hon. member belongs encourage provincial jurisdiction to contribute to the 12 per cent goal by contributing funds from regional development funds themselves?

There is also the question of Canadian heritage river systems, which is a phenomenal, positive program, initiated a long time ago and to which unfortunately British Columbia and Alberta do not belong. This is an opportunity to raise the question which goes beyond our jurisdiction as to when will British Columbia and Alberta enter this Canadian heritage river system. The federal government has a certain leverage to achieve that goal.

One also has to bring to the attention of the House the fact that there is in the green plan a commitment to $175 million for our special spaces and species. When will this fund be released? Obviously there will be competition for the use of this fund, and the sooner it is made available the better. We will know also how we can achieve the goal that the hon. member for Skeena and all of us have in mind.

Then there is the unfinished business of the Banks Island National Park proposal. The Park Service has been working on that agreement for some time, actually since 1978. Most if not all of the issues have been settled and what is missing at this stage is only cabinet approval.

When will cabinet find the time and the will to do that? As you can see from the case of this particular site, the Banks Island National Park, it takes years to create a national park. It is not a process that takes place overnight. Actually I would venture to say that since 1984 each and every national park that has been declared by the present government is the result of painstaking and intense work of the preceding government. So here is the opportunity to bring to a conclusion something that was initiated in 1978.

In connection with this motion, we have to make reference to the necessity of including in the National Parks Act the Canadian Landmarks Program. When we debated the act the last time, unfortunately the program was resisted and despite efforts at second reading in the House, it was turned down. Therefore, we are still facing the necessity of raising this point because the Canadian Landmarks Program is not included in the new revised parks policy that is presently being developed.

We would urge the government instead to include the landmarks program because it helps in a variety of ways. It is a way of promoting federal-provincial co-operation; it is a way of stimulating public participation. It is also a very important way of developing public education on the importance and the essence of our publicly owned land, national parks, and the role that they play for the recreation and the enjoyment of Canadians, and for the preservation of course of species and valuable land.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we have here a unique opportunity that the government should seize today by not talking out this bill but by recognizing that the motion by the member for Skeena, as amended, is an expression of public opinion and reflects extremely well a priority in the minds of Canadians from sea to sea to sea. It is one that the government ought to take very seriously and respect, because what we are talking about here, as preceding speakers have already said, is spaces for future generations and a policy decision that has to be made now while it is possible to make it. There are certain continents where this kind of implementation of 12 per cent of a land mass cannot be made any longer. In Canada we still have that opportunity, and we hope that there is enough enlightenment on the government side and that no one will have the talking out of this motion on June 17, 1991, on his or her conscience.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to a very important motion presented by the hon. member for Skeena who is to be commended for having tabled this motion in the House. This motion is useful because it gives us an opportunity to address one of the goals we as a government have included in the Green Plan. Among the Plan's various objectives, Section III mentions the target of preserving 12 per cent of our natural heritage by the year 2000. In fact, the hon. member for Davenport mentioned the budget for this project which totals $175 million. I must say we are delighted to hear opposition members making proposals that are in line with the government's as set forth in the Green Plan.

I know the hon. member for Skeena made the subject a priority on the Environment Committee of which he is a member, and I am sure that all members of this committee will want to consider this question and make recommendations to the government accordingly.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, the motion presented by the hon. member for Skeena regarding the advisability of protecting at least 12 per cent of Canada's ecosystems is a complex one. The federal government is not alone in implementing this objective to protect our ecosystems. The process will also require the co-operation of all provinces, municipalities and interest groups in Canada, including native people and the general public. This is a very complex subject and one that requires the co-operation of all groups in Canadian society. The hon. member says the federal government should set an example and show leadership. That is exactly what we are doing with the Green Plan, with projects at Parks Canada and the network of new national parks that Parks Canada wants to establish in the next few years.

The Canadian Parks Service—as was said earlier—intends to establish a national park for each of Canada's 39 terrestrial regions by the year 2000. At the present time, 21 of these regions are represented. It will take 18 more parks to complete the network of national parks. The Minister of the Environment is committed to creating at least 5 new national parks by 1996 and to negotiating agreements for 13 more parks by the year 2000, which means that we should be able to reach our goal by that time.

An important step in this direction was made when the government's plans for the national parks network were published in December 1990. This paper establishes the status of the parks in each terrestrial region and identifies those regions where new parks should be created. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, with the co-operation of the provinces and the territories, we are preparing an action plan that will determine specific strategies and timeframes for creating national parks in regions where none exist within their respective boundaries. The action plan should be ready this summer. The timeframe proposed by the Canadian Parks Service will, of course, require the support of the provinces and territories concerned, and the co-operation of residents living near the regions, as well as the co-operation of native people when their interests may be affected.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member when he says that the situation is urgent. That is why I am happy to announce that the Canadian Parks Service is at this very moment considering 8 proposals for creating new national parks. The first one is located in Churchill, Manitoba. A feasibility study was started at the end of 1989, supervised by a joint task force consisting of representatives of federal, provincial and local authorities. This study was possible thanks to the active participation of local representatives. Although public consultation took place mainly in Churchill, there were also consultations with the neighbouring community of Gillam, with native bands with an interest in the region where the park is to be located, and other Manitobans. Native bands, especially, are now playing an active role in the evaluation process, and it seems the community in Churchill and native bands will soon be able to decide whether they are in favour of negotiating a federal-provincial agreement on the creation of a national park. If they are in favour, the Canadian Parks Service expects to finalize an agreement by 1991 or the beginning of 1992.

Among the proposals under consideration, five involve regions in the Northwest Territories, where representation is low. In the Western Arctic lowlands region, consultations with the people of Sachs Harbour about the possibility of creating a national park on Banks Island are progressing satisfactorily. Sachs Harbour is the only village on the island, and the community would like to finalize an agreement on the park by the summer of 1991.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that it is time for me to finish. Perhaps I may just take a moment to remind you that apparently, Canada's national parks network covers 1.8 per cent of our territory. When it is completed, it is estimated that the network will cover about 3 per cent of Canada's territory. The hon. member will be glad to hear, however, that when other levels of government that have taken up this national challenge have competed their respective networks of parks, ecological reserves, wildlife sanctuaries and protected areas, Canada will be close to reaching its target of setting aside 12 per cent of its territory as protected areas, as proposed in the Brundtland Report and in Canada's Green Plan.

Mr. Speaker, I think Canada is making great strides towards protecting its rich natural heritage, and I am convinced that with the co-operation of all groups involved, we will be able to—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I believe if you were to test the House you might find that there is unanimous consent for this to be deemed to have passed at the end of this debate. All members, government, opposition and myself have spoken in favour of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give its unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991 be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to conclude the remarks I started the other day. When I was winding up I asked that the government remember not to make the hospitals, the universities and the colleges across this country the battleground with other provinces as they all run around looking for more dollars, trying to see how they are going to exist in the years ahead.

I listened to people talk about the proposed changes to our medical programs when I was in my constituency on the weekend. I know that in my constituency last week they had an open line radio show as many constituencies do. The topic of the conversation was the possible changes to medicare, by putting the responsibility on to the provinces to make sure that the standards were kept.

As I said the other day in my speech, in Prince Edward Island and the smaller provinces, it is going to be virtually impossible to maintain the standards that have been set over the last 25 years because they do not have the resources. They do not have the resources down there to do this, so either the taxes are going to become exorbitant or the services are going to be cut.

I do not believe, as I listened to the open line show, that Canadians are prepared to see these services cut. We must find a better way of doing this. We must, in the months and years ahead, be able to maintain this health care program that is the envy of the world. We must be able to do this.

I believe that the people of Canada are prepared to pay the necessary price to maintain our health care program. I do not believe that the provinces have the resources to pick up these programs. So I ask the federal government to maintain this, to continue this program.

As I said the other day, we have a huge debt to pay, a huge deficit to pay. The people in the smaller provinces are prepared to do their part to pay that deficit, but they can only go so far. There is only so much money.

I realize and I say again, that there are many things that government, federal government in particular, must be involved in. They are medicare, post-secondary education and transportation. I have said that all through the piece. I believe that in a country as diversified, as huge with such a small population as we have, the federal government must keep a presence in these areas. I ask again that we not make battlegrounds between the hospitals and universities.

University tuition fees are going to rise and we are all prepared to accept that to a certain degree. I do not think anybody is complaining that they do not go up as the years go on and the cost of everything else goes up. But when they become so exorbitant that people cannot afford to pay these tuition fees, then we are putting ourselves in a situation where only the elite are going to be able to attend colleges and universities.

We all know that is wrong. We all fought for that and our forefathers fought so that every young person in Canada would be able to attain a university or college education. This has been the goal of the people before us, and it certainly should not change because we are here and are going to change this and drop it back again to the situation where only certain people will be allowed to attend universities.

I ask the federal government to be very careful in this area as it goes along, not to say to the provinces: "Look, we are going to push this off on you because we no longer feel this is our responsibility".

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if this were to happen and we lose, if we start to even water it down is wrong. We talk about unity in this country; unity and disunity come from many different areas, this will be one of them. If there is a lesser medical program in one province compared to another because the provinces cannot afford to pick up the cost, then I am sure that is going to cause more disunity than other things that are causing it today.

I say to the government again, please do not let this become a way of life that we cannot accept. Do not force the people to go out into the streets, as they spoke about the other day on an open-line show, to tell the government that they do not want to lose the medical and health care programs they have.

Do not let the students of this country become segregated. Do not let only the rich be able to attain a university education.

I say to the government that there are ways we can do this. We know there are deficits to pay, but we cannot let this become the total responsibility of the provinces because the provinces do not have the jurisdiction or the tax base to raise further taxes, and people cannot afford to pay it.

The federal government has dipped into the jurisdiction of the provinces and the provinces are now getting into the jurisdiction of the municipalities. There is only so far we can go. I beg this government to consider seriously what is proposed in this bill. Do not let this happen to this great country of ours.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest and wish to compliment my hon. friend from Hillsborough for his remarks. He does leave me with one or two questions. As I listened to him talk about EPF payments, in particular, I would gather that it is his desire and that of his party that there should be no limits on such things as transfers to the provinces, notwithstanding the fact that we have a serious debt problem in this government and in this country to which we must respond.

For example, it seems to be an eminently reasonable notion for the Government of Canada, which is allowing a growth—not a cut—a growth in expenditures of these transfers of 3.7 per cent while at the same time limiting itself to 3.4 per cent, to ask those who are the source of a good part of those financial problems through uncontrolled expenditures to participate in the restraint that will get control of them again.

My hon. friend made reference in particular to higher education. There is no question that in Atlantic Canada we are well universitized. My own province of Nova Scotia has 13 universities. His province of Prince Edward Island which has a little over 100,000 people has a university. New Brunswick, I believe, has four universities. My goodness, with a million and a half people in the maritimes, we have more universities than the province of Ontario with some nine million people.

My question to my hon. friend is this. Can he assure this House unequivocally both with respect to education and health care that the provinces, and our own provinces in the maritimes, are in fact making maximum benefit of those dollars that are there, or is there need for more efficient use of the dollars that are available both in terms of health care and in terms of higher education?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his comments and his questions. I guess this is a debate depending upon whose figures we are looking at when we say that the transfers have gone up. I have figures that say certainly the EPF has been frozen in Atlantic Canada, and Prince Edward Island is going to lose because of that $12 million over the next two years.

There is always room for prudence, there is no doubt about that. We have a lot of universities in Atlantic Canada, and I would hope, as would my hon. colleague, that we continue to maintain those universities in Atlantic Canada. There have been many great people graduate from these universities which are running into problems because of a lack of dollars. Some of the infrastructure has to be refurbished in these places. I believe that the money has been utilized to the fullest in these universities. Certainly there is always room to go and have a look and make sure that it is. I do not think any money has been wasted in this area. If there are better ways to do it, I would be the first one to agree.

Let us not allow these universities to deteriorate to a state where they cannot compete or operate. I would hope that my colleague across would also want to see that happen.

When you come to post-secondary education, especially in Atlantic Canada, we are running into a situation now where the transfer payments have been frozen. The university in my province to which he alluded has said that in September, 1991, the tuition fees will increase by 15 per cent. That is a fair increase for any young person who is at this time looking for a job when there are very few jobs out there. This summer there are very few jobs in the private sector; there are very few jobs in government for university or high school students.

I believe that we always have to look at funding. We always have to make sure it is prudent. But let us not throw it away saying it is a debt that has to be paid. Let us be careful in looking at this, and make sure that if we have to do it somewhere else, let us do it somewhere else. But let us make sure that our health care and our university systems are taken care of.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the hon. member for Hillsborough would find it in his heart to answer the question that my hon. colleague for South Shore just asked him.

I am interested in knowing why there are 13 universities in Nova Scotia and what is the justification. As a member from the province of Ontario, which has fewer universities, I would be interested in knowing the justification for that.

I would also like to pose one other question to the hon. member. Where does he stand on the issue of economic union of the Atlantic provinces? Does he think that might be a viable alternative in the future in order to equalize some of the disparate economic bases we have in this country? Two questions for the hon. member.

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, regarding the first question as to why there are so many institutions, I suppose over the years the demand was there. A lot of people have always liked to come to the maritimes—and still do—to attend these universities. I have no inclination to say they should not be there. If we can have 13 more, I am sure the hon. member for South Shore would only be willing to see them in Bridgewater and Lunenburg. I have no doubt that these institutions have been very successful during the time of their existence. They are very credible universities.

The country began in the maritimes and the university system among other things started there. The labour movement in this country, the union movement, started right in my colleague's province of Nova Scotia. So it is very capable of producing university graduates who are capable of doing many great jobs in this country.

So far as the economic union of the maritime provinces or Atlantic Canada, that is something that has been looked at very seriously by the Council of Maritime Premiers. I am sure it is worth while to see if there are some ways that duplication could be eliminated in this area. I would hope that they are going to look at the whole Atlantic region.

Of course, we have to go back to 1864 when the Fathers of Confederation came to talk to a group of people who were meeting in Charlottetown about not only economic union, but political union in the maritime provinces. It has not come about yet and I am not optimistic that it is going to come about soon. I know that today the premiers of the four provinces are meeting to talk about this very option again.

I would just like to say that Prince Edward Island has produced more university presidents than any other province in Canada. So I think we are very successful. I do not think we need to let this situation deteriorate. If my colleague from South Shore asked me if I thought the money was being used wisely, I would say yes. There is always room to go in and have a look to make sure it is, and I have no objection to that. But I just say to the government of the day; let's not cut it off.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Just a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker. I was interested in the member's remarks but I did not quite hear if he was endorsing the concept of political union for the Atlantic region. I wonder if he might answer that particular point for the House?

Mr. Proud: The hon. member's first question was economic union, and now he has asked me for political union.

No, I am not prepared to look at political union of the Atlantic provinces as yet.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the 1991 budget sets out a plan for economic recovery, a strong solid recovery that would not only put the recession behind us but lead us forward to continuing growth and renewed prosperity. The plan demands that Canadians work more effectively in a partnership for prosperity.

For decades, the federal government has provided large and growing financial support to the provinces. This year alone total federal transfers, including both cash and tax transfers, will reach almost $37 billion. Just the cash portion of the transfers accounts for one-fifth of all federal program spending. These transfers are simply too large to exempt from the expenditure restraint program. The deficit is a national program problem and it demands a national solution.

Most importantly, it should be understood that in slowing growth of transfer payments, the federal government is seeking to encourage all levels of government to realistically live within their means, just as the federal government is doing with its other programs.

Both levels of government will benefit from the budget's initiatives, which will translate into lower interest rates, economic recovery and enhance long-term economic competitiveness. It is therefore in the interests of both levels of government to co-operate.

It should be noted that the 1991 budget had no effect on transfers in the current fiscal year. The 1991-92 transfers were made on the basis of the budget a year ago in February, 1990, which provinces had already factored into their planning.

What this year's budget did was to announce that the two-year expenditure management measures affecting transfers that were put in place in February, 1990 will be extended, unchanged, for a further three years to 1994-95. This gives more than a year's notice to provinces and reasonable time to adjust.

Federal transfers to provincial governments account for 23 per cent of our program spending. They will again total over $37 billion.

They are simply too large to be exempted from efforts to control our deficit. In 1989, Ottawa moved timidly to reduce the growth of federal transfers for Established Program Financing by reducing it to 1 per cent or $200 million beginning in 1990-91. In hindsight, this was far too little.

In cash and tax equivalents, Ottawa pours $20 billion a year into that one program, presumably to support provincial financing of medicare and post-secondary education. Since the transfers are in the form of unconditional block grants, some of the funds may find their way into provincial places unrelated to health and education.

What is far more grating to federal budget makers wrestling with the huge fiscal and political dilemma is the seeming disregard of some provinces for spending money generally, and federal transfer funds in particular.

Some provinces, such as Alberta and Saskatchewan, have come close to matching the federal level of program spending restraint. But Ontario, our richest province and the one largely fueling our inflationary situation, has been increasing its spending over 10 per cent a year and that simply is not fair.

Since taking office in 1984, federal program spending has been held to an average annual increase of 3.7 per cent a year. By comparison, spending by the provincial governments increased on average by 7.2 per cent each year over the same period. Annual provincial spending has ranged from over 10 per cent in one province—and into that you can read Ontario—to just about 3 per cent in some western provinces. Despite requests to the provinces to help out in deficit reduction, federal transfers have continued to increase at an annual rate of 6.5 per cent, nearly twice the rate of spending Ottawa has allowed itself.

The message that was communicated to the finance minister during the period leading up to the budget was that Canadians expect government to bear its share of restraint. In a budget that is tough on governments at all levels, the finance minister has declared war on the deficit. The budget included an array of measures to control government spending, including the passing of a law to place a ceiling on how much politicians can spend; another measure to apply the GST to the deficit instead of new programs, and the establishment of inflation targets, so that the public understands what price stability means.

Also, by saying the deficit is a national problem which needs a national solution, the finance minister is not asking more of the provinces than it is doing itself. Federal and provincial governments have to start co-operating and stop pointing fingers.

The message in the budget is that governments must stop spending more than Canadians can afford. Given the importance of deficit reduction, and as the largest single employer in Canada, the government is introducing a three-year program of wage restraint in the federal Public Service. In taking this step, the government wishes to stress that federal employees are not being singled out for restraint. All Canadians face difficulty during the present period. Every one of us knows individuals who have lost their jobs or are now on lay-off.

In the current situation, the government must also cut back. Pay restraint is particularly important at the provincial and the municipal levels, including education and health services.

An hon. member: Tell us about Ontario.

Mr. Sobeski: Wage and salaries in these sectors account for 45 per cent of all expenditures. Wage settlements in these sectors have been running ahead of inflation and our ability to pay. Some provinces already have introduced programs in their budgets to limit the pay increases for their provinces. My colleague reminds me that Ontario was negligent in its recent budget by not doing that.

This government will introduce unprecedented legislation this year to strictly limit spending increases in all federal programs. A new law will ensure Canadians that higher taxes cannot be used to pay for additional spending. Canadians do not want taxes to pay for more spending. They are telling governments to keep spending under control. Based on comments received from constituents, many Canadians do not believe that government can control its spending. I feel legislative controls are a way to instil confidence that Ottawa will maintain a firm control on its budget.

This law will bring in a major change in the way government manages its spending. New programs will have to be funded within the total legislative ceiling. The government will not be able to raise taxes to pay for new programs. Legal limits on program spending will be imposed for five years. With few exceptions, program spending growth will be limited to 3 per cent a year. This 3 per cent ceiling on spending growth is based on savings anticipated for specific cuts already announced in the budget so that no further cuts will be needed to meet these legislative targets.

Another important budget announcement was the establishment of the Debt Service Reduction Fund which responds directly to public concerns that revenues from the GST could be used to fund new spending rather than reducing the deficit. All GST revenues will go into the new fund and be used exclusively for lowering the deficit and bringing the public debt under control.

According to the budget documents, the GST will produce $16.4 billion for the government in the next fiscal year and $18.3 billion in the following year. It is expected to climb substantially in 1992–93 because of the one time cost associated with moving from the old manufacturers' sales tax, that the parties on the opposite side wanted to keep in place and that the GST replaced.

One time costs include the transitional grant to small businesses. Canadian businesses will receive approximately $2.3 billion to offset the federal sales tax that existed in their inventories. The entire $16.4 billion will be put forward to the annual $42 billion cost of servicing the debt in the current fiscal year. The remainder will come from general revenues.

Again, one message communicated from local correspondents is the concern that the revenues from GST might be used to finance new spending programs instead of to help reduce the deficit. But the decision to legislate spending limits and the decision to earmark all the GST revenues for deficit reduction should ease concerns about wasting that money on new programs.

In a bold move aimed at pulling down Canada's inflation rate to a 20–year low and one of the lowest in the industrial world, the federal government and the Bank of Canada have announced targets designed to reduce inflation to 2 per cent by 1995.

The government said the target is to get the year over year increase in the Consumer Price Index down to 3 per cent by the end of 1992, 2.5 per cent by the middle of 1994 and 2 per cent by the end of 1995.

In the budget the message was that inflation targets are one of the key steps on the path to price stability. They should give Canadian consumers, Canadian business, labour and investors a better understanding of how quickly price stability can and will be achieved. This should reduce the resistance to lowering inflation thus bringing the benefits more quickly and more easily.

There is no denying the direct link between inflation and interest rates. Our economic history proves it. During the 1950s and 1960s when inflation was low, averaging less than 3 per cent a year, interest rates were low. When inflation surged in the 1970s interest rates soared also. Unless Canadians are told what price stability means and what the result is likely to be, they will inevitably be reluctant to begin adjusting their behaviour accordingly. But if the country was presented with a target of 2.5 per cent for two years from now, Canadian investors, business managers, consumers and employees can begin planning now.

If Canada were to abandon now the objectives of price stability and lower inflation the country would be locking itself into an inflationary future, and would probably isolate itself as a high inflation country in a low inflation world. Even if the rest of the world were not moving towards low inflation economies, Canada could and should adopt price stability as an independent objective.

If we were to target, as a nation, 6 per cent as our target inflation rate, a $100 purchase 12 years from today would cost $200. It would double in price in 12 years, and 12 years after that, it would cost $400.

If we were to achieve a 3 per cent inflation target, the $100 good today would take 24 years to reach a price of $200. Therein lies the importance of inflation targets. If we do not start on it today, the question that will be talked about in this House 25 years today will be: Why have prices quadrupled in Canada but maybe in the United States or in the rest of the world, they have only doubled? If we do not do that, certainly this country will be in major difficulty.

Inflation also creates real problems for wage negotiations. Employers and employees often have quite different expectations of inflation, and this makes it harder to agree on a fair settlement. It is not surprising then that periods of high inflation in Canada are matched by an increase in days of work lost due to strikes.

Let us review an example of the impact of inflation and wages on a settlement. A company expects its revenues will only increase 3 per cent next year. If it raises prices any higher, it may lose sales to lower price competition, so it offers its workers a 3 per cent wage increase.

The workers are sitting back and they expect that the consumer inflation will be 5 per cent. In fairness, they want at least this amount so they can maintain their standard of living. This puts the company between a rock and a hard place. If it gives the 5 per cent wage hike, it could become less profitable and even go out of business. If it does not give the workers what they expect, the result could be a strike which could then mean lost sales and lay-offs.

That is an example of why nobody is a winner with high inflation. It should be acknowledged that there are numerous problems with setting targets. Using the Consumer Price Index as an indicator of inflation is certainly open for debate. There are unexpected price shocks such as an oil price explosion and that could throw inflation off the target set by the government and the Bank of Canada. These are weak reasons for avoiding explicit inflationary and monetary policy objectives.

If we want this economy to be lasting, we need to do a better job of fighting inflation pressures. Our national goal must not be just to control inflation, but to get it down dramatically and then keep it down. In other words, our goal must be to achieve price stability.

The economic and social benefits of price stability are enormous. Lower interest rates are one example of one benefit in achieving that stability. Price stability is vital for Canadian consumers and Canadian companies to compete and succeed in today's global workplace.

I would like to conclude with a statement that a former British Prime Minister of the Labour Party gave in September 1976. James Callaghan said:

> We used to think you could just spend your way out of a recession, and increase employment, by cutting taxes and boosting government spending. I tell you in all candour that option no longer exists, and in so far as it ever did exist, it worked by injecting inflation into the economy. And each time that happened, the average level of unemployment has risen. Higher inflation, followed by higher unemployment. That is the history of the last 20 years.

I close with those comments from the Labour Party back in 1976. Before I sit down, I move:

> That this question be now put.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his speech made several inaccurate statements when he suggested that we in this party were in favour of retaining the old manufacturers' sales tax.

He knows perfectly well that the record indicated our willingness to scrap that tax. We thought it was a bad tax. He knows that in committee we were not supporting the existing tax, and yet he chooses to flaunt this myth in the House in an effort to try to discredit the opposition. It has done such an effective job as evidenced by the polls, that it has left his party in tatters at 14 per cent. I do not want to dwell on the polls. What I want to do is refer to the really shameful charade that he and the Minister of Finance have engaged in with respect to the goods and services tax and the application of the revenue from this tax to this Deficit Reduction Fund, which we all know is the biggest case of paper shuffling we have seen in the Government of Canada for many years.

Would he not admit that in his calculations, when the federal deficit is $30 billion a year—I guess it is down to $30 billion or it might be $31 billion this year—and the revenues from the goods and services tax are less than that figure—about $22 or $23 billion according to the original estimates and they will go up no doubt, because the government I think deliberately underestimated those figures—it is no problem to apply all the funds from the GST to reduce the government deficit? It could be argued that you would have to increase the goods and services tax to reduce the deficit, because the GST is not reducing it, it is just paying part of it.

What the government is doing in this case, I suggest, is creating this phoney fund, this Deficit Reduction Fund, putting the revenues from the goods and services tax into it and claiming that somehow it is not using the GST for other expenses. Does he not admit that that is a bit of a fraud on the people?

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, as a member of the finance committee I sat through the 18 months of GST hearings where we had a number of companies come forward with suggestions. I think the hon. member knows that his party's recommendation in its minority report, after listening for 18 months, was that the finance minister resign. I point that out because I think it is important that all governments, all parties, but particularly, all governments, federal, provincial, and municipal, have to work together to solve this particular problem.

The member is suggesting in his question that, indeed, this calculation may be all smoke and mirrors. I think that is what he is saying, but the bottom line is this. If the government has projected a deficit this year of $30 billion, and if the GST brings in $1 billion additional revenues, then at the end of the year, all things being equal, that budget deficit should be only $29 billion. This is a clear way for Canadians to see that the excess money was used to reduce the annual deficit. They will recognize that.

I know the member over there is disappointed because his party would be sitting there planning how to spend this $400 million that has been reported in the press. The NDP have probably already figured out where it is being spent.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to ask my colleague whether Ontario's budgetary measures on the federal scene, given the fact that the Government of Ontario has made an obligation to double the wage increase that the federal government has done for its own civil servants, that provincial spending is up by 13 per cent year over year, that senior Ontario civil servants will be given bonuses of $11,000 each, and seeing that there is a deficit of $9.7 billion in the province of Ontario, plus a further billion in tax increases, would be likely to have an impact on the kinds of targets the hon. member is talking about? In other words, do we have governments working at cross purposes here in terms of having provincial government budgetary actions impacting on federal budgetary actions and hurting all Canadians. I would be interested in his comments.

Mr. Sobeski: Certainly, many in Ontario are concerned about not only the one year deficit projection of the budget of the New Democratic Party in Ontario, but the projection of that budget extending out of deficits of $8 billion continuing four years from now. The concern that Ontarians should have, and all Canadians, is once you get on that slope when do you get off it?

Back in 1968 when Edgar Benson presented a balanced budget, at that point in time the federal government was paying approximately 12 cents of every tax dollar to reduce the debt, and by 1984 at the end of that reign, it was close to 32 cents of every dollar of tax money going towards the debt.

The hon. member is quite correct, because once you have that yoke around your neck—today it is close to 34, 35 cents.

What has happened in the province of Ontario is that today it is 11 cents of every tax dollar that is spent for debt. If you use the example, going back, that is exactly the predicament that the province of Ontario will find itself in unless they do something tremendously drastic. I am sure that when it goes through their budgetary hearings—and I am hopeful—that the NDP government will listen to the concerns coming before committee just as this government also listens to concerns.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, at the time I moved that this question be put, I neglected to mention that it would be seconded by Mr. Bouchard. Thank you.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I believe that by the procedures in this House, you cannot move a motion under questions and comments, and the motion was not properly put while the member was speaking so he now cannot correct it and put it during questions and comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think you are right, because the motion was not moved with—

The motion moved by the hon. member for Cambridge did not have a seconder and, consequently, is not admissible at this time.

Three minutes left for questions and comments. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the hon. member because the other thing he talked about in his speech was this wonderful policy that he claims the government is introducing. It is frankly not in this bill, so I wonder why he was talking about it. But I guess a speech is a speech. But he talked about this wonderful policy that the Minister of Finance announced in his budget wherein we would pass an act in this House to restrict future government expenditure.

I know the purpose of the bill is to restrain his colleagues in cabinet from their wasting ways in spending money that they should not be spending. I know that is the purpose. But set that aside for a moment. What he was trying to claim by this bill was far beyond that; he was trying to claim that somehow this bill restricted future governments from introducing new programs unless the money was raised in taxes to pay for the programs.

Will he not agree that that statement is patently false and that all a government introducing a new program has to do is introduce an amendment to this particular bill, once it is passed, which will then be an act, and say that this particular program is exempt from the provisions of that act or repeal the whole wretched act and that is the end of it?

In other words, this is no restraint on Parliament at all. This is mere window dressing designed to deceive the people of Canada into thinking that this government has finally done something about the deficit, after seven years of inactivity.

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important on this particular piece of legislation that indeed the government has put a control on the spending side, and not like the United States which introduced a similar bill and also tried to make revenue and spending projections. This is a limit just on the amount of money that can be spent by this federal government.

The concern is certainly because of the track record, because Canadians are concerned, and part of it is that the track record of spending by the federal governments over the past few years has to be looked at. The hon. member represents a party that certainly opened the vault door but could not decide how to keep it closed. It is indeed possible that down the road a government could change the legislation, and that is exactly a possibility.

But I think that this government has demonstrated spending restraint. One of the decisions the Canadian voters will have to make is will they continue to trust a government that has actually put that measure forward, or will they open the doors down the road and let the Liberals allow inflation to get out of hand. Then indeed this country will be in great difficulty 20 years from now.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I could speak on this bill for several hours, and I am going to find it very difficult to restrict myself to the 20 minutes I have.

In the limited time I have, I want to talk about two or three significant things that this bill does. First of all, I want to talk about the whole question of debt because the Conservative approach to debt and deficit reduction is to off-load that responsibility on to other levels of government. They have not curtailed their own expenditures, they have simply said: "We will not honour historic agreements in Canada for transfer of payments."

The Conservatives make a lot about the question of the Ontario deficit, but they do not say that $3 billion of that deficit is because of loss of revenue from the federal government.

The UI increases in Bill C-20 amount to $150 per worker for a worker who is earning only $27,000 a year. That has a significant impact. It is a tax increase on working people, particularly affecting those on low incomes or fixed incomes. It is also a tax increase on small business. Small business has difficulty meeting its increased costs under UIC.

In the meantime, the federal government has withdrawn from its historic responsibility in unemployment insurance.

I will just talk briefly about the effects this is having on my own local community of Surrey. What does this mean? The UIC changes mean that the Surrey municipalities must raise $300,000 more for unemployment insurance premiums this year. That means that the taxes on people's homes have to be raised, and that certainly is not fair to Surrey residents. It means that the school board has to take $1 million out of educational dollars and put it into unemployment insurance that has been the responsibility of the federal government. What does that mean? It means they have had to cut teachers. They have had to cut back on special programs to assist children with learning disabilities. That is not fair to my local community.

What about the Surrey Memorial Hospital? The cutbacks to UIC mean that they have to come up with $350,000 more for UIC premiums. We already have had long waiting lists at the Memorial Hospital. These are now going to get longer because staff have had to be cut and services have had to be reduced. So it has a health impact on people at the local level, and communities like Surrey are forced to bear the brunt.

All the federal government has done is take its responsibility and put it down on the local taxpayer and the local government. Because of its fiscal mismanagement and its fiscal incompetence, it has said: "We can no longer deal with it, we are just going to throw the whole mess to the local government and hope that they or the provinces can."

The curtailment of the Canada Assistance Plan for the three big provinces simply means that those provinces either have to slash money for child welfare, child protection, services to single parents who are on welfare, or they have to pick up the cost.

I think this whole way that the federal government has decided to deal with its deficit problem is going to result in not only a curtailment of services right across the country, but in extreme difficulties at the local level.

I want to spend most of my time talking about health care because in Canada health care has been a source of national pride. It is one of the areas and one of the fundamental ways that Canadians define Canada, particularly as distinct from the United States.

In Canada there are no financial barriers to people seeking medical treatment. The system is relatively efficient and is widely supported. Canadians move within Canada on business, holidays and to seek employment with the knowledge that similar health care standards are met in all provinces and territories. This promotes a national identity and national unity.

Any changes that would result in the erosion of our national programs are not supported by the Canadian public, but what we have seen is a consistent attack on national medicare. This is not a recent attack. This did not start in 1984. This started under the previous Liberal government in 1975.

It put a ceiling on its transfer of payments to the provinces for medicare, the same as the Tories have done now. It arbitrarily put a ceiling on the transfer payments. Then in 1977 it forced the provinces into block funding. The only party who opposed block funding was the New Democratic Party.

In 1982 the Liberals brought in legislation to do away with the revenue guarantee which cost the provinces $4 billion over the next five years and loss of income for medicare. Under the Liberals the share of federal costs or expenditures for medicare went from 50 per cent to 43 per cent and of course, under the Tories it has gone from 43 per cent down to 37 per cent, with projections now in the last week coming out to say that by the end of the five years it will be down to 32 per cent.

The Liberals set the platform. They set the means and the agenda for the attack on medicare, and of course, the Tories were excellent learners. They were even more than good. They learned very quickly and the first thing they did was to start limiting the projected increases under established programs.

Let's look at what the Established Program Financing was. It was based on the increase in gross domestic productivity. In other words, if the economy went up, the transfers went up. If the economy did not expand, the transfers did not expand. In spite of the fact that there was an expanding economy the Tories brought in arbitrary and unilateral legislation to limit transfer payments.

In 1986 when it was brought in, it was to be 2 per cent less than the GDP. In 1989 it was raised to 3 per cent. Last year in 1990 the government froze it for two years and now in this bill it is freezing it for a total of five years. The loss of revenue to the provinces in terms of what they should have received and anticipated receiving for medicare is dramatic.

Provinces like my home province of British Columbia will receive $3.5 billion less for medicare by 1995. Ontario will receive $10.58 billion less.

By the year 2000 there will have been $62 billion taken out of medicare by this federal government. That is not counting the money that was taken out by the Liberals that also affected the base line and has been estimated to probably be in the neighbourhood of $1 to $1.2 billion a year.

What we have is a dramatic erosion of medicare by the federal government. These estimations on the loss of revenue for the provinces have been repeatedly documented by organizations like the National Council on Welfare. The Parliamentary Library has documented it as has the Association of Universities and Colleges. Yet the government pretends that it is not so.

By 1995–1996 there will be no more cash payments to Quebec, and a few years after that to any other province. This means that we will no longer have a national medicare program that can be enforced. We will be going into an Americanized system.

We should be very careful about how we approach this. If you look at the American system, it spends 10.63 per cent of its GNP on health care compared to Canada at 8.62 per cent. They say down there that 37 million people have no health insurance, and another 20 million have inadequate health insurance. That is what is going to happen if we proceed down the path set by this government for national medicare.

I want to spend a few minutes looking at the impact of the cuts on medicare first of all and what the cuts in the transfer payments mean at the service delivery level. The impact is dramatically different on the wealthy provinces as opposed to the poorer provinces. The wealthy provinces still have some financial capability to absorb some of the fiscal cuts from the federal government without dramatic reduction of services. That is not true in the weaker provinces.

In provinces such as Newfoundland, 10 per cent of the nursing staff had to be laid off because of the reduction in money from the federal government. They had no choice. That is a province that is already spending 9 per cent of its GNP on health care. Prince Edward Island is spending 9 per cent. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are spending 7.5 per cent. They are already spending a large percentage of their GNP on health care, much more than the wealthier provinces, which the minister must know. Ontario spends only 5.5 per cent of its GNP on health care. Alberta spends 5.8 per cent, and B.C. spends 6 per cent.

The provinces that are in the weakest financial shape and are already putting out the highest percentage of their GNP on health care have no alternative but to slash medical services in their provinces and close hospitals.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): You always have a choice. Alberta is not the poorest province in Canada, my friend.

Mr. Karpoff: Alberta may not be, but talk to people in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba. Ask them if there is not an impact on their ability to deliver health services by this government's unilateral and uncalled for cuts in medicare.

One of the things we have seen already—

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I cannot prevent myself from raising a point of order. A couple of times the member for Surrey North, who is my critic by the way, has said that the government cut transfer payments. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. We have increased transfer payments every year. We have reduced the pace of transfers, but it is wrong to say to Canadians that we have cut them. We have not cut, and we have all the figures to prove that my friend is wrong.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it is a matter of opinion. I will have to give the floor back to the hon. member for Surrey North. However, before I do, I would like to correct a mistake I made.

Earlier, the hon. member for Cambridge asked that the question be now put. I checked Hansard and realized that the motion had been made properly. The Speaker usually checks by looking the way of the sponsor that the motion is seconded, which I failed to do. So, to rectify my mistake, I am prepared to put again to the House the motion properly presented by the hon. member for Cambridge.

• (1300)

Mr. Karpoff: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the full impact of your ruling.

Are you saying that the question was in fact seconded? There was no one in the House who stood to second it, and the member certainly did not indicate that any member in this House was seconding it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is customary for the Speaker to look over to the party where the motion originated and, usually, someone will volunteer to second the motion. In this case, I did not do so.

So, in all fairness, I have to backtrack and do now what I did not do when the hon. member for Cambridge made the motion. I would appeal to the co-operation of the House on this. The motion was made by the hon. member for Cambridge at the end of his speech. Therefore, I now look to the government side and I can see that a member is supporting the motion.

Therefore I will put the question again.

[English]

—Mr. Sobeski, seconded by Mr. Bouchard, moved that the question be now put.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Karpoff: Just looking at the whole issue of the cutbacks, I think the government has tried to play tricks with the Canadian public. There was a formula in place that said there would be an increase in payments, and all the government has done is they have said: "We are not going to honour that formula; we are not going to honour the formula that had been agreed to, and we are not going to pass on the increases".

It is the same as if you had a wage contract that called for percentage increases over the next several years, and one day the employer came along and said: "We are not going to honour it".

In the workers' pockets there is that much less money, and they can play around all they want but in the provinces' pockets there is going to be $62.4 billion less by the year 2000. That is going to have a tremendous impact on our health care in this country.

I have talked briefly about the impact on the ability of the provinces to deliver health care services. There is a whole range of things that the provinces have started to do. They have cut back on things like eye examinations, on general health examinations; they have laid off staff; they have closed hospitals; they have also started to talk about the introduction of user fees and extra billing. In fact Quebec has a bill before its assembly to do just that for hospital emergency wards.

There have been many finance ministers in the provinces who are starting to say: "Look if you are not going to give us the money, if you are going to continue to cut back on our anticipated transfer payments, then we want the ability to manage our health care systems as we see fit".

The minister of health in this House last week confirmed that by 1996-97 Quebec will be able to manage its health care system as it sees fit because he will no longer be in a position to enforce standards.

This issue of national standards is one with which the government is trying to play games. It says that it can cut back the money and still insist that the provinces meet national standards. These are the standards that Canadians have learned to accept in our health care: universality, accessibility, non-profit administration, comprehensiveness, portability. Once the federal government's ability to enforce these standards on a national basis is lost, what we will have is not a national medicare program, but we will have 12 different jurisdictions all with 12 different sets of standards and 12 different goals, including such things as the introduction of user fees and extra billing.

The federal government is saying that it does not believe this is going to happen, that it can cut the dollars and still insist on the provinces meeting its standards.

I think that is a little bit naive on the federal government's part. This bill says that it will attach other transfer payments. I say to the federal government that at this point in time, in the sensitivity of our relationships across Canada, it is inconceivable that either politically or legally it can sustain the position that it will be able to attach the kinds of dollars from other programs that it is cutting if it is not transferring cash payments under medicare.

The Canadian Council on Welfare I think summed that up clearly in a report that it released last year. It says: "Under the budget proposal, Ottawa apparently intends to withhold federal payments other than payments for health care from the provinces and territories which do not respect the principles of the Canada Health Act once cash portions of EPF run out."

The National Council on Welfare cannot imagine the provinces and territories letting this proposal go unchallenged. The delivery of health care services is within provincial jurisdiction under the Constitution. It is only the federal spending power that allows the federal involvement in this area. It is difficult to imagine how Ottawa could continue to maintain its presence once the money for medicare dries up.

In any event, it is obvious that the final word on the proposed legislation will come from the Supreme Court of Canada rather than the Parliament. We would much prefer to see the federal government reconsider its course of action and make such legislation unnecessary.

One of the things that we have already found out is that the province of British Columbia, joined by other provinces, has initiated court action when the federal government tried to curtail Canada Assistance Plan payments. That is where the federal government simply had to give a year's notice and it failed to do so.

So I do not see how, in a time when national unity is very, very fragile in this country, when we need the co-operation and the goodwill of all of these provinces, how the federal government can, on the one hand, say it is going to cut the money that it is transferring, but it is going to continue to try to tell the provinces what they can do in an area that it does not have any constitutional authority in.

I think we have already seen the indication from the provinces—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A point of order.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise on debate. There was an inaccuracy when the member said that we tell the provinces— and we will tell the provinces—what to do. He is wrong. They have all the flexibility even to put the user fee on if they want.

• (1310)

In other words, I want to correct my friend and say that we do not have the power to tell the provinces what they should do. The provinces have all that flexibility.

Mr. Karpoff: Again, the minister is attempting to mislead Canadians. It is true that technically you cannot order them what to do, but you can impose a financial penalty on them to the point that it becomes impossible for them to do it.

For every dollar they would save or collect by doing something like putting in user fees or extra billing, you take $1 away from them. It is by financial incentive that you force them to do things or not to do things.

It is true, they can commit suicide. They can go ahead and try to introduce user fees. You would simply take the money back. It is technically true that you cannot legislate. There are other sections in the Canada Health Act which indicate that you could make it mandatory. You could impose other penalties on a province over and above the dollar for dollar take-back of money.

It is true that the federal government does have other powers under the Canada Health Act to enforce the standards that it wants the provinces to follow. I notice that my time is up.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct all the inaccuracies in what my friend has said, but I will not have enough time in 10 minutes.

I will just make a short comment and ask questions of my friend. My comment is that Canadians, as it is quite obvious, know that the poor provinces get more money from the federal level than the rich provinces, and he knows that very well. It is based on a per capita basis.

For example, Newfoundland receives about $2,500 a year per person while there is about $965 per person for Ontario. In other words, we treat the poor provinces differently in light of the capacity they have to pay for what is considered the best health system in the world.

My friend knows that very well. He looked, as I did, last weekend at what was said in the United States about the Canada Health Act. It did not say that it will not be good tomorrow. It said: "It is the best in the world today." We have had it for seven years, which means that we did something for it.

The growth in the poor provinces increased faster than in the rich provinces. It is 4 per cent, as opposed to 3 per cent. I could continue with figures for a while, but I want to give my friend a chance to explain to me something he said about the fact that we pay 38 per cent and the provinces pay an average of 62 per cent rather than 50–50 in terms of the cost of the health care system in the country.

I would like my friend to explain to me exactly how and why it has been changed. Maybe I am wrong, but he seemed to say that it was changed by the former government in 1977. How was it before and why is it the way it is today?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to respond to the minister's questions.

First of all, let us make no mistake. All you had to do was watch the last several provincial budgets to know that the poor provinces had no alternative but to dramatically slash their health care services because of the cutbacks in EPF payments. They anticipated receiving payments from the federal government but they did not receive them.

There is no way you can wiggle around and use words. There is $62.4 billion less going into our health care system under your government by the year 2000.

You are correct that the erosion of medicare started under the Liberals. Prior to 1975 it was a 50–50 program. It was shared 50 per cent by the provinces and 50 per cent by the federal government. Then there was a cap put on the federal government's share unilaterally.

As a result of that the EPF was put in place. It was a block funding mechanism which limited the amount of money the federal government would transfer. The minister knows this very well. I am sure he is probably even more familiar with it than I am. It limited the amount of money the federal government would transfer to the provinces by a formula based on expenditures in the previous years, the increase in population and the growth in GNP or GDP.

That formula has been in place except for the time it was tinkered with by the Liberals in the early 1980s and has been totally demolished by the minister's government starting in 1986. The formula was there to transfer moneys to provinces based on growth in the economy. The economy grew and the federal government unilaterally, without consultation and without any concern about the impact that would have on the ability of provinces to deliver health care, changed the formula. Initially it went to 2 per cent less than GDP, 3 per cent less than GDP and then frozen for two years and now frozen for five years.

I am sure next Wednesday, when the minister meets with his counterparts from the provincial health ministries, they will all say to you that the actions of this government have severely hurt their ability to deliver effective, efficient and accessible health care in their provinces.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform my friend that his explanation of the way it worked in 1977 is not exactly correct.

It is not my role to explain what a former government did, but it was not the federal government that decided. It decided to change the formula because it was requested by the provinces. They wanted more flexibility. They wanted to determine exactly what type of care they would provide to their constituents.

In other words, if a province makes the decision to pay the ambulance from Vancouver to the hospital, it can do that. It is within its flexibility. It is not what we consider, as agreed by the provinces, a medical service given by a doctor or a hospital and therefore it could be done by the provinces but the provinces will pay alone.

We transfer two tax points which were used by Quebec, in Ontario to a lesser extent, and in other provinces. In other words, when you say 38 per cent, you should tell Canadians that it was requested by the provinces because they wanted to manage their own systems. They asked for more flexibility. We do not have the right, as we do for the social services, to ask for 50–50. It is quite different and it has to be explained because it is the reason we have good service. We have big principles. Services have to be provided by doctors or in a hospital. They are the only constraints. The provinces can do what they want. It is quite different.

Mr. Karpoff: I would like to congratulate the minister for being in the House while this important debate is going on. We do not normally have the opportunity to get into a discussion with the ministers on these kinds of issues.

On the whole question about the changes in the formula and the flexibility under block funding, it did allow the provinces more flexibility but they requested it based on the fact that they had a formula in place which they thought guaranteed them moneys in the future. They thought, mistakenly, that we would accept this idea of better management and more flexibility of our health care dollars on the understanding that we know now, next year, five years from now and ten years from now what the transfers we will receive from the provinces will be. That was what the EPF was all about.

They took on the role of managing the health care dollar better. They took on the role of flexibility and then they were totally double crossed on the formula because both the Liberals and the Tories, particularly the Tories since 1986, have unilaterally scrapped the formula. That is what has happened with health care in Canada.

The provinces bought into it on the basis that they had a formula that would give them a guarantee. All of a sudden, that guarantee has been worth absolutely nothing.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question to my hon. colleague has to do with unemployment insurance. He has spoken about the increases both to the employer and the employee.

Under Bill C–21, a bill that was passed by this House and sent to the Senate, we would be looking at longer hours to qualify for unemployment. If I remember correctly, my hon. colleague did not agree that we should make it longer hours to qualify.

It was passed by the House and went to the Senate. The Senate did not approve it. Was the hon. member in agreement with not extending the hours and therefore costing both the employer and the employee additional funds? Does he feel that unemployment is a way of life, and not an interim measure when people are unemployed?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, if we get many more Tory governments, unemployment insurance is going to be a way of life for people if the way of life is not welfare. We have seen that dramatically in the last year or two. That is a way of life.

I did not agree nor did my party agree with the cutbacks in the UIC plan whereby the people had to work longer for less benefits.

Furthermore, we did not agree with the fact that the federal government again unilaterally pulled out of its historic responsibility to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund. It simply dumped it on to the employees and the employers, which hurt small business, municipalities, hospitals and school boards in this country.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to debate today Bill C–20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26 of this year.

What is it really? This bill covers a lot of issues that will adversely affect Canadians, but there is one issue on which I would like to focus in light of my responsibility as critic for health and welfare.

Before I get to that, I would just like to indicate for the record that I recognize that this bill will address amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act, Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act.

In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned—I was listening to some of the questions posed earlier by the government side—I would like to remind the House that during debate of Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the government made some assurances that though direct contributions would cease, the government would nevertheless be there to help finance the program in difficult times.

We are in difficult times. We are still in a recession. If I would quote Mr. Wilson as he indicated in his budget papers of 1989, he said: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the unemployment insurance account."

He went on to say on October 22, 1980 through a government senator: "The other place was assured that Mr. Wilson, during a lengthy crisis, would provide money to supplement the UI account."

That has not been seen and I would just like it to be recorded.

I would like to focus, as I said earlier, on what this bill is in so far as the future of medicare is concerned. For me, that future is the end of medicare.

Last night I was in my office past midnight sorting out sheets of newspaper clippings—and I have a lot here—set out before me. There were dozens of stories from newspapers all across this country along with reports, press releases and all the speeches of mine. They all said the same thing. Medicare is dying. Who holds the knife? The government does hold the knife. The knife is a bill like C-20 before us.

In my mind I retraced the steps of this death sentence on medicare from Bill C-69 through two budgets of this government and they rank with the bile of heartlessness. I thought, "How can the government expect to succeed if it destroys medicare?" How can the government expect to save this country if it destroys our sacred national institution?

I believe I found the answer in a reply from the Prime Minister during Question Period on June 4, and the records of Hansard can be checked. When the Prime Minister was questioned about reductions in transfer payments, his reply was a lifeline for a sinking government. His reply hinged on an ability to make the Canadian people accept blame for the inabilities of his government. I quote his response:

> We are all in favour of the most advanced and most modern medicare system and the most generous in the world. But we're going to have to find the money to pay for it. These funds come from taxpayers.

He went on to say that lower taxes and improved services, and I quote:

> Both can't work together simultaneously.

The Prime Minister is trying to convince Canadians that they expect too much and pay too little. There must be a sacrifice and loss, payment for living a lifestyle beyond our means. As two elections will show, Canadians believed in the Conservative government's financial vision and that is sad because the Tory caucus trademark since coming into government has been a social policy by stealth. This is not an original analysis. This is an analysis done by Mr. Gratton Gray in an excellent article published recently in Policy Options.

In other words, this government has carefully disguised as sound fiscal management changes that serve to destroy our social system including medicare.

Recall 32 tax increases in six years. That has been phenomenal. Safety nets so low you fall further before reaching them. Children of poverty—over a million. Free trade, its debacle effect on loss of jobs. Now we are seeing cross-border shopping and hospitals barely able to cope, but everything is the fault of the Canadian public, so the Prime Minister would like us to believe; at the Canadian public have lived beyond their means and expected too much. Now is the time to pay for the misdeeds of decades.

I say it is untrue. There is nothing seriously flawed about our federal health care system. In fact it is one of the best and most efficient in the world. The minister of health earlier this morning during debate has alluded to that. If it is really as good as he said it is, then why is he trying to dismantle it? It does not make common sense.

I should say that the medicare system was recently lauded by the Comptroller-General of the United States who when speaking before a U.S. congressional committee said, and I would like to quote:

> In 1987, Canada's per capita spending on insurance administration was one-fifth that of the United States. Canada spends less because its publicly financed, single-payer system eliminates the costs associated with marketing competitive health insurance policies, billing for and collecting premiums and evaluating risks.

For physician services, Canada spent 34 per cent less per person in 1987 than did the United States. This difference is largely the result of Canada's controls on physician fees. In addition, the Canadian physicians have lower practice expenses for billing and malpractice premiums.

For hospital services, Canada spent 18 per cent less per person in 1987 than the United States.

The same Congressional Committee heard testimony from an American family with a young daughter whose illness was so expensive to treat that they could no longer find a company to insure them. This family was considering fleeing to Canada to become "health refugees". And we want to destroy our medical system, Mr. Speaker?

This is what happens when private insurance agencies control medicare. In the United States there are almost 1,500 insurance companies. The bureaucracy of dealing with these companies—for billing, for payments and communication—consumes much of the time of doctors and their staff.

The Canadian model is cost and people efficient, freeing our health care professionals to do the jobs they have been trained to do.

Yes, medicare is valued, and it is a right of Canadian citizenship, but it is more than that. Medicare is a necessity. It is a national necessity.

If your citizens are not healthy, then your country is not healthy. In the United States there are over 31 million people who have no health insurance and many more who are under-insured. Their lives are mired in fear for their own futures, afraid they will become ill, a fate which often destroys them financially.

Last week in Prince Edward Island the federal finance minister shrugged his shoulders when his provincial counterpart requested more money for services. I would like to quote. "We are doing the best we can", were the comforting words he gave them to take home to health care systems in crisis. "We simply cannot afford the type of escalation we have had in the past."

Well, I would like to put on record that the forthcoming report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, which I believe will be tabled in Parliament before the end of the week, shows the funding for national health care has been more or less stable since 1975 as a percentage of the gross national product. And the gross national product ought to be looked at by Canadians as a measure of our ability to pay. So we must be careful when this government tries to scare Canadians and say we have over-spent.

Sure, we need reforms, but the way to reform is not to kill medicare. The way to treat a patient is not to kill the patient but to truly provide the necessary remedies of genuine reforms.

In real dollars the cost of transfers per capita in 1978–79 was $705 while today the amount is $805. In another three years that figure will drop to $689, according to the National Council on Welfare.

A much more sobering thought is the Council's prediction that transfer payments will stop altogether by the year 2010. That year is really within clear reality, it is soon to come. Others say that is a generous timetable, giving the system fewer years to crash. Meanwhile, if the transfer payment schedule continues as now is proposed by this government, the federal government will save at least $97.6 billion in the next nine years. When we speak of saving $97.6 billion, it sounds terrific.

But the government is not telling us that this is not a true saving for Canadians. The load of this expense will be transferred to the backs of the provinces. Who will pay the taxes? The Canadian people will.

Mr. Speaker, this is political trickery in a real sense. This money will need to be replaced by the provinces if they are to ensure that the quality of health care will be there.

The government accuses the opposition of scaremongering when we say the government is driving Canada towards a two-tier health care system. Those who are watching the government see bills like C-69 now law, and C-20, the bill before us. They see transfer payments being cut and frozen, and what are they to believe? They see this everywhere in newspaper reports. Should we shut our eyes and pretend nothing is wrong? Should we pretend that our hospitals are not closing beds and that our nurses and doctors are not stressed to the limit; that there are not queues for every type of surgery, including surgery in life threatening situations?

Funding for Established Program Financing must increase at the same rate as the Gross National Product, not GNP minus 3 per cent. It is of little help to many provinces, particularly the have-not provinces if tax points are increased while cash transfers diminish. The government does not deny that this is happening, but what it is continuing to deny is that the reality will happen, that medicare will die. I would like to shake this government to come to consciousness to save our sacred Canadian institution.

Listen to one finance minister from Prince Edward Island again. I find it "excellent" to discuss the gloomy situation for medicare. "Every time the federal government cuts money to the provinces it puts us in a bind."

Or take the case of New Brunswick's finance minister, and I quote:

> Federal funding is clearly on the decline and every indication is it's going to continue in that direction. We're having considerable difficulty continuing to live up to the standards required under the Canada Health Act.

Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland already spend 11 per cent of their Gross Domestic Product on health care and higher education, even when receiving equalization payments. This compares to six per cent for Ontario, a have province. How can these have-not provinces be expected to find more money to make up for federal government lapses, I ask?

Without enough money, how can the Canada Health Act be maintained?

In the last federal budget, the government promised to introduce legislation to protect national standards. I thought: well, at least the government is thinking of protecting medicare. In keeping its promise, the government has introduced Bill C-20. Now this is a hollow promise because why should we believe that Bill C-20 will protect medicare? I tell you, when you look at Bill C-20 you will see and recognize the application of financial penalties under the Canada Health Act, to other federal payments to provinces in the event of a breach by a province of the national health standards set out in the Canada Health Act. What it is telling us is that it will even penalize other programs. It will penalize such programs as the equalization payments, territorial financing, grants in lieu of taxes, public utilities income tax transfers, statutory subsidies, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Crop Insurance contributions, the miscellaneous Health and Welfare transfers, the Young Offenders Services, Justice transfers and transportation transfers.

Mr. Speaker, at least over a dozen areas will be even more adversely affected with this Bill C-20. Who really believes the government anymore? They are just buying time. They are cutting away at our social safety net, piece by piece, at their leisure. If the government truly believes in health care, truly believes in protecting medicare, we already have the leverage in the Canada Health Act of today. All it has to do is provide that leverage, that financial contribution that ought to be adequate for its needs. That would be the guideline that ought to be the criterion that Canadians will accept.

Medicare is under the knife and so too is funding for education. The Canada Assistance Plan, unemployment insurance benefits and tax points in return for cash transfers are of little help to the have-not provinces.

In the remaining time I would like to indicate that every day our health care is being whittled away and, to believe the words of the government, "is a luxury" I and other Canadians can afford. Trust is a dear commodity these days, especially trust in light of the government's past actions.

I am an opposition member. This kind of distrust of the government perhaps is expected of me. But let me say that because we are in opposition does not mean that we are opposing this only because we are in opposition. We are opposing this bill because we are reflecting the sentiments of Canadians, as expressed by the National Council on Welfare in its recent publication Danger Looming. Because of time, I cannot quote at length, but the National Council on Welfare is truly concerned.

Cuts are not only hurting medicare. They are directly affecting our children. The situation is so bad that last week, while participating in the largest day care conference in Canada, the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association issued a press release indicating that it calls on the federal government to remove the cap on the Canadian Assistance Program.

In conclusion, I would like to say that Bill C-20 must be defeated. The government must negotiate with the provinces and restore adequate funding for medicare. The government already has the leverage to protect the Canada Health Act. Our medicare system has been enshrined as a Canadian institution to guarantee that all Canadians, irrespective of income, and particularly the poor, have access to health services. It must protect Canadians when they become ill from becoming poor or poorer.

I submit that these are difficult times in our country. The forces of disunity are all around us. Let medicare be the national glue that maintains us as Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care and attention to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North. I have a question for him.

Where can I get one of these wonderful credit cards that the Liberals have, where you can spend and spend and spend and the interest accumulates and the interest accumulates, but you never have to pay the bill?

My hon. friend talks about scare tactics with respect to medicare. I remember 1988, I remember the scare tactics that terrorized senior citizens in my area, about how medicare was going to be destroyed by the free trade agreement. Now what is happening? The Americans are coming up here to study our medicare system because it is so good. Why is it good? It is good because we can pay for it.

This debate is about whether or not we are going to have medicare in the future. If the spending of this government had continued in the uncontrolled manner of its predecessor which left office with a $38 billion deficit, today it would be $99 billion.

My hon. friend talks about unemployment insurance. He decries the increase in unemployment insurance. My understanding of an insurance program is that the premiums are supposed to pay for the program, so that if the pay-out goes up, so do the premiums. In the case of this one there is no question. With Bill C-21, it was the intent of the government to set the premium for three years, but we have had a recession in this country. We all know we have had a recession in this country that has been milder than it would have been had it not been for the measures implemented by this government.

The fact of the matter is the government has a responsibility to manage the UI account. If there had been no change in those premiums, we would be looking at a $6 billion deficit in unemployment insurance by the end of 1992. That is unacceptable. That would be irresponsible on the part of the government. Even with an increase to $280 we are going to be looking at a $500 million deficit which will be made up by the government, as the government committed itself to doing when it introduced Bill C-21 a year or so ago. The truth of the matter is that the rate increase will coincide with the recovery so that the impact will not be as great as my hon. friend suggests.

Does my hon. friend not think it incumbent upon government to spend within its resources or does he believe the way to prosperity in the future is to allow deficits to accumulate, accumulate, accumulate?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to those comments.

Do we believe that we have to continue to spend endlessly? No. Do we believe that we should spend efficiently for the health care system? I said yes. The premise to the question that he makes is expenditure for medicare. That is the topic before us.

Let me go to his question on the unemployment insurance for a moment. Perhaps the member was not listening quite carefully to what I said on that point. The former finance minister Mr. Wilson, indicated in 1989 with the support of the government and Senate in 1990, and I quote again:"The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the unemployment account." Mr. Wilson said again in 1990 through Senator Simard: "Money will be made available to supplement the unemployment insurance account so that the premiums paid by the employers and the employees are not unduly high."

The former finance minister himself recognized that fact. This member refuses to recognize the proclamation of his own former finance minister.

I am really at a loss as to the logic of this government.

I believe premiums would increase if there were a necessity for the Unemployment insurance program benefits to increase, but what is lacking, and he fails to recognize this, is the support from government. The unemployment insurance program is not an ordinary, private insurance program in the country, it is a government program administered by the government and the government must continue to be responsible and play its role if it is going to put its money where its mouth is.

We care about the deficit, and of course we are worried about the deficit, but we are as worried if not more worried about the deficit of lives as a consequence of the dismantling of our medicare system.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member from Winnipeg North.

Mr. Horner: Pretty tough to listen to was it not?

Ms. Callbeck: No, I think it was an excellent speech. I think he had a lot of good comments. It is too bad that the members on the other side of the House would not put some of them into effect.

It is certainly true what he says about the federal government just trying to pass on part of the debt that it has created.

Now the hon. member discussed how he sees the reduction in transfer payments will affect the health system. I wonder if he would take a few minutes and briefly outline how he sees the reduction in these payments affecting the education system. I know in my own province of Prince Edward Island that students now are or will be faced next year with tuition increases of 15 per cent. The student loan programs have not increased since 1984. There is now a 3 per cent fee on student loans, plus the students are feeling the effects of the GST. They even have to pay the GST on books.

I know that in my riding office I have many students coming and looking for summer jobs, jobs they cannot get because of policies that this government has followed which have created a recession in this country.

I would like to hear the hon. member give his thoughts as to how he sees our education system being affected.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for her excellent question. To indicate for the record before I go to her question, the western provinces alone stands to suffer $8.5 billion over the next three years as a consequence of cuts in transfer payments.

Before I touch on the matter of education I should say I was prefacing my earlier comment on the physical and mental health of Canadians that stand to suffer as a consequence of cuts to health care funding. My colleague has identified a health equally important and that is the educational health of Canadians. No doubt in Manitoba alone tuition fees have been increased as a consequence. Scholarship programs have become fewer and universities are truly under the crunch as a consequence of cuts to transfer payments.

The end result will be the lack of necessary economic provisions for the youth of our country. If we are to be truly competitive, as has been indicated in an excellent speech entitled "Do Canadians Really Want to Compete?", we have to be competitive. To cut transfer payments at this time and reduce necessary funding for education there is no doubt that the youth of our country, the strength of the future, the leaders of the future, will stand to suffer.

I beg of this government for that additional reason to withdraw this Bill C–20.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to rise today and participate in the debate on Bill C–20, the act which will among other things freeze the per capita Established Programs Financing transfers, or EPF as it is known, and cut the Canada Assistance Plan, known as CAP, to the richer provinces thereby effectively crippling and possibly destroying our high standards of the education and medicare systems. At the very time when our neighbour is looking at our excellent medicare system and wishing to adopt it, this government wants to destroy it.

It is both my duty and privilege to reflect the views of my constituents in Parkdale—High Park and bring them to the floor of this House. They have elected me to express concerns on federal matters and I would like to begin by answering a question posed by one of my constituents. He asked me: "Jesse, don't you ever get frustrated in the House of Commons knowing that no matter what you say the government will bring in all its members and push through whatever legislation it wants to push through?"

He went on to remind me that there had been debate on the free trade agreement but all attempts by us to amend the bill were blocked. He reminded me that Canadians did not want the GST, but despite the debate in this House and hearings right across Canada, despite the thousands and thousands of petitions tabled in this House and in the other place, and despite the fact that many senators were listening and were ready to block the GST, this government appointed eight new senators and the will of the government over-rode the will of the people.

People in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe have been fighting that for 50 years, and what are we doing? We are going back to what the Soviet Union and the east European countries are throwing out in their political system.

Essentially my constituent was asking me why I just did not give up and let the government run roughshod over any opposition. He implied that Canada had a worse dictatorship than the one he left behind in eastern Europe. He thought it was worse because in eastern Europe under communism at least the people knew they had no hope of changing the minds of their leaders. He came to Canada thinking that the will of the people would be expressed by our parliamentary democracy and had found that it was not always so.

If the new Minister of Finance, a parliamentarian who has shown over the years he takes democracy seriously—I got to know him when we worked together on the transport committee and that is why I say that with all sincerity—takes a good look at this legislation which was drafted by the former minister and if he takes the time to listen to what we on this side of the House bring to this debate, he will do what is best for the majority of Canadians. He will do the honourable thing and withdraw Bill C-20.

There is still time to restore the fate of my constituent in our democracy. There is still time to ensure that high standards in health services and education which Canadians currently enjoy will be maintained.

This bill will reduce the amount of cash transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health. If the reductions continue as this government proposes, according to a statement issued by the National Council of Welfare: "Federal cash payments to the provinces for medicare and higher education will end by 1997."

It also feels this is an estimate based on the best case scenario if the recession comes to an end soon. How can Canadians accept this? Our medicare and education systems are the envy of the world. Our standards of equality of service for all Canadians guarantee that a child born into poverty has the same right to medical care and education as a child born into wealth.

It means that every Canadian has the opportunity to live a healthy life and get a level of education which will enable them to have a good job and a good standard of living.

By reducing the transfer payments, this government is guaranteeing that children in the less affluent provinces will be stuck in a cycle of poverty. Their inability to afford an education will mean they get low-paying jobs or go on welfare. The reduction of federal money for medicare will mean the individual provinces control the health system.

They will inevitably lead to variations in the quality of service available to Canadians. Again, to quote the National Council of Welfare: "We could wind up with 12 vastly different provincial and territorial medicare systems." People in the poorer provinces would have to make do with health care services which are inferior to the services enjoyed by Canadians who happen to live in richer provinces.

Will this mean extra billing and user fees? I think it will. Will it mean that you better not have a premature baby in the maritimes because the incubators are not there? If you have a heart attack in Toronto, will there be a bed for you or not?

An hon. member: Scare tactics.

Mr. Flis: The hon. member says scare tactics. A friend of mine is now waiting for a bed in Toronto for a heart by-pass. If he does not get one soon, he will have to be flown to Saskatchewan and if he does not get an operation there, he will have to be flown to the United States, and that hon. member says: "Scare tactics."

Will Canadians in the north lose their airlifts to large hospitals? This could mean a lot of changes, but the change I am most afraid of is cash and carry medical care.

Canadians who have a post-secondary education and a job will be able to afford medical care. Canadians with grade 12 education or lower and the low paying jobs will not. Cash and carry medical care is not acceptable. I do not want to have to show my credit card before I can get into the emergency unit at St. Joseph's Health Centre in my constituency which is one of the best health care centres probably in the world, but it will not be if this government puts through this bill, Bill C-20.

I do not want to find that one of my constituents is denied medical attention because he or she is poor. I have many of these lining up in the food banks which are getting longer under this government. I want them to have first-rate health care when they need it.

Post-secondary education for the rich and grade 12 education for the poor is not acceptable. Education is an investment in our future, but tuition costs are so high already that it is a struggle for many families to send their sons and daughters to university and community college.

How will they be able to afford a higher education if the federal government cuts funding and tuition skyrockets? They will not. It is plain and simple.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is up. I would just like to end by appealing to the government, please withdraw Bill C-20.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

RAYMOND BISSON

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, last week the many chiefs of Canada chose their new national chief, Mr. Ovide Mercredi. We wish him the very best.

Yesterday, another important election was held.

The Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada, formely known as the FFHQ, elected Mr. Raymond Bisson as its new president. Mr. Bisson, the current president of the Société franco-manitobaine, is becoming the leader of some one million francophones outside Quebec. He works really hard for francophones and is their best advocate, while recognizing Canada's other realities: the majority, the native people and Canadians of other ethnic backgrounds or origins.

I am convinced that Mr. Bisson will do a lot for the development of the French-speaking communities, while at the same time respecting the others. We wish him every success.

PORK PRODUCERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Canada has just won a major trade victory regarding pork exports to the United States. For the first time since the Free Trade Agreement was implemented, in January 1989, Canada has won over the US in a final round concerning one of the trade areas subject to the most heated debate between the two countries, namely shipments of fresh chilled and frozen pork.

This decision by an Extraordinary challenge committee will have positive effects for Canadian pork producers. Indeed, since the countervailing duty levy order will be repealed and the collection of duties stopped, approximately $20 million will be reimbursed to Canadian pork producers. This ruling by the committee reaffirms the benefits of the review system by a FTA binational panel on disputes regarding anti-dumpiong and countervailling duties. A great victory indeed Mr. Speaker, for the 4,300 Quebec pork producers and slaughterhouses, many of which reside in my riding.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, can Canadians have any confidence in the ability of health and welfare to regulate medical devices effectively?

On the evidence, the answer is an empathic "no". An extraordinary change to health and welfare regulations in 1989 concerning contraceptive sponges has meant that spermicidal products can be sold on the Canadian market without any testing or checks to ensure safety or effectiveness.

We now learn that claims that these contraceptives are 90 per cent effective are far closer to 70 per cent, or worse than any other method of birth control.

Like the Meme breast implant, these faulty products are now on the market because health and welfare overruled its own competent scientists.

Now Canada, according to the World Health Organization, may be the only developed country which does not test or review spermicidal products.

Surely it is time for an immediately public enquiry into licensing and marketing of medical devices in Canada. Anything less betrays the trust that Canadians, particularly women, must have in medical products in the marketplace.

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, resolution 541 of the Security Council of the United Nations condemns the division of the island of Cyprus and the formation of a Turkish Cypriot state. The de-occupation of the northern part of Cyprus and the withdrawal of Turkish troops must be respected and enforced.

Turkey, which received strong international and economic support during the Persian Gulf crisis, should demonstrate its good will by moving toward the termination of the Cyprus problem.

I believe the time has come for the embarkation of a sincere and serious dialogue among Greece, Turkey and Cyprus so as to build a new climate of trust and understanding which would lead to concrete and lasting results.

The war in the gulf has shown that respect by all countries for the basic principles of international law and avoidance of the rise of violence in international relations are of vital importance for security in the world.

NOVA SCOTIA CLAM COMPANY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, six weeks ago the Nova Scotia Clam Company closed its doors and 250 people were thrown out of work.

Yesterday I attended a rally on their behalf at the clam plant site at Auld's Cove. Their message to the company, to the unions and to the federal and provincial governments was simple: "We want our jobs back now".

I hope this call will be heard. We cannot afford to lose 250 more jobs in Highlands—Canso and this company, with the proper support, has a bright future in Auld's Cove.

There is in Japan a promising new export market for its product. The hard lessons of developing this market have been learned. Most important, the workers are there. They are hard working. They are responsible and they take pride in their work. This is not the time for the company or the government to abandon them.

Two things are needed. One is a financial package that will enable the company to continue. This, I understand, is within reach. The other is assured access to the resource to process clams in Auld's Cove.

This is the minister of fisheries' job. He must not dissipate this access and these jobs by approving new licences to process these clams elsewhere, to flood the Japanese market, to foster destructive competition and to snuff out this young enterprise.

ISMAILI RUN FOR CHARITY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the pleasure to attend the ceremonies for the Seventh Annual Ismaili 10K Run for Charity. Over 1,300 runners participated.

I want to thank the Ismaili youth who has been planning this event for over six months and the leadership shown by President Nizar Kanji and many other community leaders, many of whom are from Markham.

The net proceeds of the run, which should exceed $50,000, will go to the North York General Hospital's Capital Campaign. The proceeds from previous runs have gone to such worthy causes as the Cancer Society, the Alzheimer Society, and the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

A special thanks to Apotex Inc., the Canadian owned pharmaceutical company that made a contribution of $20,000.

As I said in my remarks at the event, the Ismaili Muslim community deserves the congratulations of all Canadians for its Outreach programs to all communities. Its sincere caring and sharing is a model for all Canadians to emulate.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in 1986, five years ago, a special all-party committee unanimously urged the federal government to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation, discrimination based on whether a person was a lesbian or a gay man.

The amendment was supported by all parties and the government at the time. This government said that it would introduce such an amendment to the Human Rights Act. The government has shamefully refused to act to this day.

The amendment goes beyond the charter and would guarantee protection against discrimination in the federal private sector and in the federal public sector. There are over 1.2 million Canadians in that group who would be covered by the amendment. There are 100,000 gay men and women in Canada. This is an important protection for those men and women which all parties have agreed they are entitled to and need. The time has come for this government to act.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, today's Montreal Gazette publishes a story headlined "Backbench Upheaval—Tory MPs speaking out against the Government".

The story mentions me and several of my caucus colleagues as if we were some kind of rebels. It also quotes a member of the opposition saying he believes Tory caucus members such as myself must have been hauled over the carpet by the political gods of the Conservative Party.

I have news for the opposition. Freedom and independence for MPs is a goal of this government. It was mentioned in the throne speech, and members of the caucus have taken that as a further encouragement to do exactly what those people who voted for us want us to do.

Canadians want MPs who are neither sheep nor cheerleaders. They do not want blind partisanship. They want instead common sense on the floor of the House of Commons. There is no revolt; just a bunch of members of Parliament over here doing their job.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, over the past weekend 135 residents of the province of Quebec were hosted by the people of Gananoque, a town on the shores of the St. Lawrence River here in eastern Ontario.

The weekend was a good will gesture sponsored by the common people of Gananoque and was dubbed "Between Neighbours". The people of Gananoque who initiated this project have every reason to feel very proud today for proving to Canadians everywhere that the best way to promote unity and understanding among Canadians is by reaching out to each other.

Congratulations, Gananoque, and may the good will which you project between neighbours become a model for all Canadians to emulate throughout the country.

Yes, Canadians do want to remain united, and the best proof we have is seen in projects such as the one demonstrated by the people of Gananoque and their 135 visitors from the province of Quebec over the past weekend.

GOVERNEMENT SPENDING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the people of Abitibi and I wish to congratulate and thank you for your courageous decision to cancel the annual reception at your residence in Kingsmere, which costs approximately $15,000.

This goes to show that our government means what it says, now that we are in a recession. In fact, I urge all federal departments, the Governor General of Canada and the Senate to charge a "user fee" for this summer's festivities. Another alternative would be to immediately cancel summer parties held at taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you on behalf of all Canadians.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are hearing speculation that the Department of National Defence may be returning to a tri-service set-up with three separate basic training facilities.

CFB Cornwallis presently trains recruits for all branches of the military. This avoids the cost of duplication that would arise if each branch had to carry out its own basic training.

Canada has today two streams for new basic recruit training: English at Cornwallis and French at St. Jean, Quebec.

In 1990, Canada graduated only 5,600 new recruits—one-third from St. Jean and two-thirds from Cornwallis—at a cost of $3,200 per trainee at Cornwallis and $5,300 per graduate at St. Jean.

If the cabinet is serious about saving money, it had better look at the $12.8 billion rather than look at the basic training which barely trains enough recruits in Canada.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, a significant motivator in cross-border shopping is gasoline. High taxes on gasoline are having a deleterious effect and are driving consumers southward.

Our retailers in border communities sell gasoline at 56 per cent more per litre than their American counterparts. Approximately 76 per cent of the price difference is attributed to the higher level of taxation imposed by our federal and provincial governments.

A major survey done by Ernst and Young found that 72 per cent of those surveyed had gone shopping in the U.S. in the last 30 days. Gasoline accounted for 36 per cent of the total dollars spent by customers. Of those, 68 per cent said that if gas prices were comparable they would not shop in the U.S.

The fact of the matter is that lower gas prices are luring Canadian consumers south and once there they are buying other retail goods.

In order for us to remain competitive, our federal and provincial governments must take a serious look at taxation of gasoline. A graduated tax approach, an across-the-board tax reduction possibly financed by GST revenue from the underground economy or some other approach all should be seriously considered to help address the whole cross-border shopping issue.

HONG KONG VETERANS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, the belated Japanese apology to the Canadian survivors of Japanese prisoner of war camps is not enough.

No group of Canadian POWs in any conflict involving Canada has endured more pain and brutality in the most hideous and unacceptable circumstances. This four-year legacy of cruel and harsh treatment continues to haunt many and their families today.

The Hong Kong Veterans Association has been pursuing a claim for just and reasonable compensation before the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva for the slave labour they performed at gun-point.

The Prime Minister has told them this is a futile claim and that they should seek redress from their own government, and he is right. However, he is dead wrong when he says there is no money for them.

Their circumstances are special and justify compensation. They and their families should get it now from their own country for which they suffered so much but served so bravely.

KOREAN WAR VETERANS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this weekend I was questioned by individuals in two branches of the Royal Canadian Legion wanting to know if and when Canada was going to recognize our Korean war veterans.

I am sure that these two veterans and all members of this House are pleased with today's announcement that a Canadian volunteer service medal will be presented to our veterans of the Korean war.

Today's announcement was timely as these same veterans will be observing Korea Day at the National War Memorial and cenotaphs across the country on Sunday.

We can look with pride at the Canadians who volunteered to serve with the United Nations, and we must never forget the supreme sacrifice made by the 516 Canadians who died in defence of South Korea.

For 40 years our veterans wanted their volunteer service recognized by their own country. Today's announcement is a well deserved and overdue recognition.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this government found money for a war but nothing for Canadian children.

In 1984 the Prime Minister promised a national child care program as a top priority. In 1986 a child care task force travelled Canada. We were told repeatedly that over a million pre-school children urgently needed licensed care and many were at risk.

The government responded with a token $200 for mothers at home, nothing for day care centres.

In 1990 the Prime Minister chaired a world summit on children urging nations to give every child a better future. Then he came home and cut child care funds by limiting the Canada Assistance Plan.

Today, another generation of one million kids needs child care—87 per cent of these are in unlicensed arrangements or have no child care at all while working mothers are frantic.

When will this government learn, as most European countries have, that child care is an essential service and a social investment?

Let's turf the Tories out and get on with it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

During his trip to Germany the Prime Minister said that he was planning to cut back our forces in Europe, but he would not say by how much.

I would have thought that the proper way to do this would be to withdraw the old policy first and then announce a new one, not to do it bit by bit before we know where we stand.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the policy was announced in Europe to withdraw from there when the government is not ready to tell Canadians what the new defence policy is.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think we should be very clear about the fact that Canada believes in NATO, that it participates in NATO and that it believes its participation in NATO plays a key role in its defence policy.

Second, the geostrategic situation in Europe has been profoundly changed by the dismantling of the Warsaw Pact and the reunification of the two Germany's. As a result, all our allies, including NATO, are reviewing their defence policy in Europe. The government already announced it was withdrawing 1,400 members of the Canadian forces in its 1990 budget. This exercise is now in progress. Furthermore, the government, like practically all its allies, is reviewing its defence policy, and once it has been discussed and accepted by cabinet, it will be made public. The government, the Minister of Defence and several other ministers have made it clear within the last few weeks that Canada will reduce its presence in Europe.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, agree it is time for a new defence policy, because the 1987 policy was based on the Cold War concept, and at the time, we already knew the Cold War was over. It makes perfectly good sense to have another policy. However, we would like to hear from the minister why the government announced a defence policy in Europe without having a new one in Canada, without asking Canadians what they think about the matter. And I would like to ask the minister if and when Canadians will be consulted, before these policies are announced piecemeal as was the case on the weekend.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I realize the Leader of the Opposition should be informed of a number of situations in this country, but I may remind him that I had to answer the same question several times since the beginning of May. I have repeatedly made it clear, as I did in papers released to the public, that Canada would reduce its presence in Europe while remaining a participant in NATO strategy. This is not new. Anyone who wanted to know about these issues was in a position to do so. On the other hand, since Canada is part of an alliance, it is advisable for us to consult our principal allies before defining, in concrete and practical terms, the position of our allies for submission to Cabinet, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my next question is directed to General Masse— I beg your pardon, to the Minister of National Defence and Marshal Foch—

My question for the Minister of National Defence is simply this: In statements made on the weekend, the Prime Minister indicated that the government intended to close a number of military bases in Canada. I want to the ask the minister whether this time the government will take certain precautions and, if it has to close military bases in Canada, it will ensure it has economic strategies to cope with the problems the communities in question will be faced with once these closings have been announced, and that they will not wait until the deed is done to try and find economic remedies.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the Captain of the Liberal Party that that is exactly what I intend to do.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister made a major policy statement on defence regarding our military posture in NATO last Friday. He made the statement after consultation and after having been, I think the term he used was swayed and impressed by the German chancellor.

After three years without a defence policy, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell this House when he will have public consultations and be swayed and impressed with Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as soon as discussions with my colleagues are finished and a decision has been made, it will be made public.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Can the minister give us the assurance that before announcing that certain military bases will be closed, economic impact studies will be conducted, their findings published and viable economic alternatives submitted?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, Canadian bases and their infrastructure must first of all meet the requirements of the Canadian Forces as set forth in a defence policy. That is the primary objective of a base.

Obviously, these bases also have an economic impact on the region, but their primary objective is to serve the Canadian Forces.

Third, it is no secret that there are too many bases in Canada, considering the requirements of our Canadian Forces. Obviously, their number will be reduced, Mr. Speaker.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

When the Spicer commission was first struck, Canadians were told that it was a commission which would listen to them and would report back directly to them, not a reported vetted by the government. Yet today we understand, it is reported, that members of the government have received portions or all of that report before the report has been given to Canadians.

Will the minister responsible immediately table any portions of that report that his government has, or all of that report if the government has it, so that we can keep the faith with Canadians and say that the report of the Spicer commission will go to Canadians first and not vetted by the government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give that assurance. I have not seen the report or any portions of it. Certainly I have no intention to vet it.

I think that this kind of public participation by Canadians is exactly the kind of innovation that we need to achieve, working in close concert with the parliamentary system that has served this country so well for so long.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I would understand from that that the minister says his government has not seen any of the copies of that report. I would again ask him, if that is not the case, if he would table those reports that he has seen.

Today, on another matter, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, along with the vast majority of Canadians, presented the idea once again of having a more open constitutional process. Yet we see the government again creating a parliamentary committee with 10 unelected senators and the same old style that has gone on before.

Will the minister listen to groups like the National Action Committee and many others across this country and Canadians who are saying that this time there must be a more open constitutional process? Will he withdraw his proposal and bring back a proposal that includes Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to withdraw our proposal. I have seen the proposal of the National Action Committee. I was struck that what it was talking about was a constituent assembly for the rest of Canada, something which by definition Quebec would be excluded from.

I could not help but notice the article in The Globe and Mail of Saturday by Lysiane Gagnon reporting on the hon. member's convention in Halifax. It says:

> The NDP held a convention and Quebec didn't come.

I do not want to be in a situation where this country holds a constitutional discussion and Quebec does not come.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that there can be representatives from Quebec. There will be representatives on his parliamentary committee, I assume. Those same members could also be on a constituent assembly.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Andrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I would like to touch on another subject, Mr. Speaker. The government kept the door shut this morning and refused to meet with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. Yet, 52 percent of the population, women, live in fear. Violence against women is still rampant. What does the government intend to do to make this violence socially unacceptable and promote zero tolerance, as we say? Will this government finally realize that what is required is a combination of shelters, public education programs and anti-racist training throughout the whole justice system?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the issue of violence against women is uppermost on the agenda of this government, including many ministers, many whom you saw rising. It is not only the minister of health and welfare who announced the $136 million family balance initiative. It was my colleagues the Secretary of State, the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice, all of whom are involved in bringing forward initiatives including of course the most important one which will be the national inquiry announced in the Speech from the Throne.

I have been discussing it with my colleagues on both sides of the House. We really hope it will help us as a country come to grips with this issue and find real solutions and plans of action which will involve women and the provinces and ourselves to finally solve this problem for all of Canada.

GRANDE-BALEINE PROJECT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of the Environment. Tuesday, in this House, the minister said he was waiting to see what Quebec will decide about the Great Whale project. Quebec made its decision known the very same day: the roads and the project will be treated separately. For a year now the federal government has been making excuses and looking for reasons not to take on its responsibility. Now, it has ran out of excuses. There is no way out. My question is this: In view of Quebec's final decision, will the minister immediately set up a single comprehensive federal environmental assessment on the project as a whole, by that I mean not a split study, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, before going any further in our approach to the environmental assessment of the Great Whale project, we will sound out all interested parties, including the Quebec government as well as the Inuit and the Cree. The hon. member should know that the Quebec decision came precisely after a meeting where Inuit, Crees and the federal and provincial governments all sat around the same table to review the approach to the environmental assessment for the Great Whale project. We said, and so did the Quebec environment minister, that we would prefer doing one single environmental assessment for the whole project. Now, it seems that they maintained their original position. We will see what approach we can take regarding this project, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, all of the soundings have been held. The minister's colleague, the minister of Indian affairs, expressed some puzzlement this morning as to the government's position in terms of James Bay.

• (1430)

Some weeks ago, Quebec's minister of the environment begged Ottawa to support the environmental cause. He said:

> We need the federal government to do its job. I'm puzzled about the absence of the federal government on matters of federal jurisdiction.

That was Quebec's minister of the environment. He is not the only one who is puzzled. The minister of Indian affairs is puzzled. The Canadian people are puzzled.

Will the minister state unequivocally here and now that not only in the case of James Bay but never will the government allow a major project to go ahead anywhere in the country within its jurisdiction without a full public environmental review completed before a shovel hits the ground?

Before this minister or the Prime Minister lecture the Germans about the environment, they had better make darned sure they have clean hands at home.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the member says that some people are puzzled. I must admit that I am also puzzled by the attitude of the member for LaSalle—Émard who would want us to go in there without talking to the Government of Quebec. Only two weeks ago he was on his feet here in the House of Commons saying that this government was intruding into the provincial government's area of jurisdiction in the area of regional economic development. His party was saying that here in the House. He felt that the way of doing productive business in this country was to talk to the other level of government.

We propose to do that business in a way that respects the jurisdictions of every level of government. Our approach in this specific case of Grande-Baleine is based on our environmental concerns and on doing an environmental assessment that is comprehensive. We intend to follow that up, and the member should help us with executing that mandate.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Will the minister stand in this House today and assure the women of Canada that there will be no further substantive cuts both to funding for women's programs and to funding for women's groups?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to reiterate what I told the women's groups that I met last week. There are no further funding cuts to women's programs in this country this year.

The amount, as a matter of fact, is going to rise. Every group has received, if you like, an advance payment of 25 per cent of what they had received last year. The final allocations will be made public to every group before the end of this month.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in light of that seemingly good news, and in light of today's emphasis on women's groups through the NAC lobby with some caucuses in this Chamber, I would like to ask the minister if he would therefore stand and make a further commitment to restore the funding to women's programs and to women's groups to its pre-1988 levels and to index such funding.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, I made that commitment. I met with the president and some members of the executive of NAC last Wednesday. I met with the whole group last Friday. We talked about this.

The commitment is really simple and it can be found in a rather usual place. Look at Part III of the estimates. It is very clear. The funding is there. It will be continued, and I can say that the priorities are also listed.

The priorities are the following. We are very concerned about violence, violence toward women, family violence. We are concerned about those women who are doubly disadvantaged. Obviously some programs in that area will be enhanced. We are also very concerned about the efforts we are making and have been making to achieve over-all equality for women and full participation and access to Canadian society.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, today women from across Canada expressed their outrage that the epidemic of violence against women continues to destroy their lives.

Government members claim to be committed to changing that. They point continually to their recent announcement of a $136 million program to fight family violence, but this announcement is merely a smoke screen for the real actions of this government.

In reality, only one-third of this money will be spent before the next election. Over the same period, programs which support women and children at risk will lose $155 million through the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

In the name of ending violence against women, will the Deputy Prime Minister remove the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan and spend the money for the family violence initiative program before the next election?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by my predecessor last February about the $126 million over four years for the family violence program will be respected. There has never been a question that we will not spend that money.

At the same time, we are working on a strategy dealing with children in light of the commitment made by the Prime Minister at a convention last September. However as good managers we do not spend the money before. We spend the money after it has been decided to spend the money, not before.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the minister of health gives us these vague kinds of responses. The fact of the matter is that according to their own figures they are cutting $155 million to families and women through the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Will the minister of health stand today in the House and make a real commitment to ending violence against women in our society and announce an end to the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is not a Canadian in this country who does not want to stop violence against women. It is not just ministers, not just members of Parliament; every Canadian wants to stop that kind of disaster against women.

It is more than saying what you want. We put in $126 million. We gave a billion dollars in transfer payments to the provinces.

As minister of health I want to continue to work with the provinces. It is what we do and will continue to do. I will meet my counterparts this week in Toronto, and we will look at the problems with the CAP.

However, I will return the question to my friend: Are you ready to help me fight against violence against women?

HOUSING

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Housing.

At the present time, 17,000 families in Toronto are on a waiting list for public housing. Refugees have also been added to this list as potential clients.

I would like to ask the Minister what he intends to do to address the housing issue in the city of Toronto?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have a meeting scheduled with the minister of housing for the province of Ontario. My colleague opposite knows that we have only so many resources available for this, but we are prepared to make any commitment that we can to improve the lot of these people. I can assure him of our commitment to do whatever is possible under the circumstances.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the 17,000 families there are 5,000 seniors and over 2,000 people with special needs.

Does the minister think that the answer he just gave is adequate to provide a roof for this large number of people waiting in the larger metropolitan Toronto area?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows that since 1986 our policy has been to target resources to those most in need, and there have been considerable resources put aside in our housing policy for seniors, for those who have special needs, and we will continue to do this.

However, he knows as well that there is only so much that can be done by the federal government. We seek partnerships with public, private and other groups to assist us in this regard. We will continue to try to show leadership.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister?

When the green plan was announced last December, $250 million was set aside for the Department of Indian Affairs to produce a plan of action for dealing with water and sewage in Canada's poorest communities, the reserves throughout Canada.

Does the minister know that subsequently the Department of Indian Affairs has ruled that hook-ups are the responsibility of individual home dwellers?

In other words the poorest of Canadians, where two out of three homeowners are unemployed and where the average income is $9,000, are expected to pay $10,000 to hook up the sewage system. How does the ministry expect these people come up with the $10,000 to provide clean water and a sewage system for their homes?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. There was quite a substantial amount of money provided specifically for water and sewer to aboriginal peoples.

There have been ongoing discussions with those groups, and particularly in his province of Manitoba. Considering that the base budgets of Indian affairs are 60 per cent administered by the bands, those discussions are ongoing. I think it is that sort of approach that will lead to a resolution of the problem the hon. member raises.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Although discussions are ongoing, the minister does not seem to realize that Indian affairs has taken what seemed to be a nice public relations scheme giving a lot of money to these communities and has carried on as under the old plan, that is to say forcing individual residents to pay for these connections.

The construction season is almost half over. I want assurances from the minister that every effort will be made to increase the construction program so that work begins this summer.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, particularly in Manitoba there have been meetings, discussions between the department and a subcommittee of the Manitoba chiefs. There is scheduled before the end of the month another meeting to discuss exactly the best way to proceed.

I like him look forward to a good resolution to the problem based on the co-operation between the government and the bands.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The government is currently at the bargaining table with the Public Service Alliance. We know that the government has offered zero per cent in the first year and three per cent in each of the second and third years.

Is the minister aware that half the alliance members are women, most are at the lower end of the pay scale, and a freeze on wages in the first year means that these women, already living close to the poverty line, will be taking a cut in real wages? Will the minister tell us what this says about the government's commitment to pay equity?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the hon. member that pay equity stays there, I mean will be implemented. During the course of the last budget we had to make very difficult decisions in a number of fields, including freezing the wage budget which affects all public servants.

I am fully aware that this impacts particularly on employees with lower wages. Also it could in the course of the PS 2000 reform possibly be a threat to our women employees. We have given very strict instructions to our managers to be very attentive to this so that employment equity and pay equity are preserved throughout this exercise.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I hope when the minister says that "pay equity stays there", he does not mean stays there on the shelf.

The minister is expected to table PS 2000 legislation tomorrow. Will the minister assure women working in the public sector that they will not find themselves, under this legislation, faced with a strategic rewards management approach which will really mean: if the boss likes you, you will get the goodies; if he or she does not like you, look out. Will the minister assure women that will not be in his legislation.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the progress we have made during the course of the mandate of this government speaks for itself.

I would like to remind the hon. member of the situation we were in when we came of office as far as management positions were concerned. We only had two women ambassadors; we now have 13 women ambassadors. We had seven deputy ministers; we now have 22 deputy ministers. We had 16 members of boards; we now have 31. We could go on and on.

This government is attentive. We are also the government in the area of pay equity which has set aside $76 million each year to improve on that. We have also paid, something the Liberals never did, $317 million to help improve this. These are real facts.

Oral Questions

NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is clear that the California Public Utilities Commission and the U.S. Senate energy committee are making a co-ordinated attack on Canada's gas industry.

Using the Dominici Wirth amendment—and there are other demands which would prevent Canadian gas producers from getting the same price in California as their American counterparts and which would extend U. S. power over Canadian pipelines—they are trying to break the sanctity of contracts and the commitments in the free trade agreement.

The Alberta government is taking steps to stop this. What is our government prepared to do?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are two points.

First of all, the California Public Utilities Commission has been holding hearings in an attempt to reopen contracts that exist between Alberta and California shippers and suppliers.

Alberta primarily, but western Canada has been a very good supplier of natural gas to California back to 1961. The Dominici Wirth amendment to the national energy strategy which was proposed by the Senate committee is written in such a way that it is targeted directly, we feel, to Canadian pipelines.

We have made representations directly to the U.S. government. I have made them personally to the Secretary of Energy, Admiral Watkins. Our embassy in Washington has been very fully informed and is constantly advising both the executive as well as Congress of our objections.

We feel that this is a violation not only of the contractual obligations of both parties, but is also not in the spirit of the free trade agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Forty thousand members from the Khalsa Dabar Sikh Temple in Mississauga, Ontario have had to resort to court action in an attempt to secure for their priests the same rights that a directive from the Quebec region immigration office guarantees to all priests: specifically, that their immigration request for a credible basis refugee claim be presented without an interview or hearing.

Since the minister, in referring to those priests, said "They are at the end of the process; they should just get out", will he tell this House if he read their files before he decided to interfere in an ongoing case?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out, this case is before the courts and it would be improper for me to comment on it at this stage.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, he has already commented on it.

The correspondence between the Ontario region office and the lawyers for the priests indicate that neither the national headquarters nor the regional headquarters had an awareness of the files before the minister decided to make his statements public. Moreover, those priests have at their disposal at least 12 more administrative procedures before refugee hearings.

How can this minister now expect that any of them will get a fair hearing anywhere in Canada or elsewhere when he makes judicial pronouncements without jurisdiction and without ever having seen the files?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is the member who held a press conference. I noted in his press conference on that very topic before the action was started six most glaring misstatements which he made to the people of the community in question.

All I can tell the hon. member is that the cases he is referring to were refugee applicants. We have a refugee determination system that is probably the most generous in the world. That process is one at arm's length from the minister and is following its proper course.

If he wants me to interfere politically in a system that is at arm's length from the minister, my answer is: Thanks, but no thanks.

TAXATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and is with regard to a meeting that he had last week with his provincial counterparts in Prince Edward Island.

At that meeting they brought in a process aimed at giving the provinces the power to set their own income tax levels independently of Ottawa.

My question is in relation to this.

The minister has stated that he does not have a problem with a system that maintains a degree of simplicity and does not complicate the present system, but he has also reportedly said that if this new system or new method, if we do move to it, is just a question of optics where it creates the impression that provinces have greater tax autonomy.

Are we looking at real change for the right reasons, or are we looking at change merely for the sake of change which will or could add some confusion to the already confusing mess the taxpayer presently faces?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was no such power granted as the hon. member suggests. What we did was decide to deal with this issue through the release of a discussion paper.

As the hon. member knows, since 1962 there have been federal-provincial tax agreements which have provided for a great degree of harmonization and co-ordination. It is clearly the objective of both levels of government to ensure that there will be that continuance of harmonization and co-ordination.

The provinces want to have more flexibility in terms of personal income tax. It is for that reason they have asked the federal government to engage in discussions about new tax agreements that could be in place consistent with the policy of co-ordination, harmonization, transparency and simplicity.

It is with that spirit that we will engage in a public dialogue to see whether in fact we can improve the system.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Some organisations, like the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada, formerly known as FFHQ, have serious concerns about changes that could be made to official languages.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister give a commitment to this House and to the Canadian people that no constitutional changes will be made by this government which might compromise the language rights of our minorities?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer by outlining what this government and our Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, have done over the years to protect language rights. We have promoted the linguistic duality of this country by consistently standing for the rights of linguistic minorities outside and inside Quebec.

What we have done since 1984, is a good indication of our position in the future.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

In view of the acrimony, the bitterness, the conflict, and in fact the discontent caused by legislation such as Bill 178, Quebec's sign law, as well as Saskatchewan's and Alberta's legislative decisions which reduce the status of French in their respective provinces, will the minister confirm that his government has no intentions of making provinces or territories responsible for minority language policy or its implementation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat for the hon. member in English what I just said in French.

We have always been very staunch defenders of minority language rights: French outside Quebec and English in Quebec. That is a commitment we took a long time ago. We have acted on that commitment. It is a commitment that we maintain and it is a commitment that we will respect in years to come.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

At this morning's meeting of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women concerns were expressed at the erosion of our national health care system, yet last week the Group of 22 asked for the abandonment of national health care.

Further, the minister of health said in response to a question that in regard to medicare Quebec will by 1996 "be able to manage as it pleases" .

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether his government supports the position of the Group of 22 and the minister of health, or will he assure this House that there will continue to be a nationally financed medicare system with national standards?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have answered outside the House questions with regard to the very useful deliberations by the Group of 22, prominent Canadians such as Allan Blakeney and others among them.

I think it would be premature for any of us now to comment in detail upon the particular proposals that were brought forward by this wide ranging group of constitutional experts.

I think it is entirely helpful that serious, concerned, informed Canadians representing a broad cross-section of youths are turning their attention to ways in which we can reform this federation. There will be opportunities for members of this House and of the other place to do that more actively and consistently in the fall if the House agrees to establish a joint committee of this House and the other place, which is the means by which we have an opportunity to respect the parliamentary traditions of the country in a way that would allow the province of Quebec to take part in those discussions.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister of health. I am not surprised after that response that the women of Canada are worried out their health care system.

Will the minister of health assure us that at the federal-provincial meeting of health ministers on Wednesday in Toronto he will make no federal constitutional proposals that health become exclusive provincial responsibility? Will he ensure the ministers of health that the federal government will restore federal cash payments so that we can once again have a medicare system from coast to coast to coast that meets national standards?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my friend asked a question about the health care system in Canada. He knows very well that even the Americans consider that we have the best system in the world. They have not said that we had in 1984; they say we have the best system of the world today. The reason why is because this government has provided the necessary resources to the provinces to manage that health care system.

What we will do, with the ministers of health, is find a way within the periods where we are in terms of restriction in resources to give the best services to Canadian men but particularly women, children, senior citizens, and so on.

I am proud to say that what this government has done for this health care system has been done so well that even all countries in the world come to Canada to see the way we work.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE CANADA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

For several months now our Correctional Service prison guards across the country have been threatening to strike this summer over low wages, reduced staff levels and insufficient training.

Can the minister tell this House what his department intends to do if prison guards do strike? How will he ensure that public safety is not jeopardized and when will he begin to address these concerns of prison staff?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the negotiations are in the hands of the President of the Treasury Board. I have every confidence in Correctional Service Canada that the employees will act in an appropriate manner.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, the government can afford to spend $3 million on new uniforms so that guards will not look as institutional to prisoners, but the government does not seem to want to spend the money to address valid concerns of prison guards. I ask the minister how and, just as important, when will he address the concerns of Correctional Service employees. Will he abstain from brinksmanship and will he commit to address their wages, increase staff levels and improve training programs so that CSC can fulfil better its own mandate?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my hon. friend raised the issue of uniforms. First, they are cheaper than the old ones. Second, they are being phased in and, third, they were agreed upon in consultation with the unions.

KOREAN WAR VETERANS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I am sure that all members of this House appreciated the announcement made earlier this day that Canadian veterans of the Korean war are going to be eligible to receive a Canadian Volunteer Service Medal.

The announcement, however, did not mention the veterans who are no longer with us, those who were either killed in action or have subsequently died. I would like to know from the minister if their relatives or next of kin are going to be eligible to receive the medal on behalf of the deceased and, if so, how they would go about applying for them.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note that some 26,000 Canadian men and women did volunteer to serve with the United Nations Canadian troops fighting with the United Nations in Korea some 40 years ago. I am delighted the government, with the support of almost all, in fact maybe all hon. members in this House, supported the issuance of a volunteer medal for their service there.

I might mention that there is a process by which deceased veterans, the next of kin of the 516 who died over there or their families, can now apply. It follows a normal order of eligibility. They can apply through a process that will be made public very shortly.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. For many months, I have been trying to get preventive withdrawal of pregnant workers in federally regulated businesses included in the Canada Labour Code. So far, I have received the co-operation of Conservative, Liberal and NDP members in this House, with the exception of the Bloc québécois. Could the minister tell the House today whether the government intends to take this issue seriously this year?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to thank the hon. member for Abitibi for his interest in this matter. As the hon. member is aware, the Canada Labour Code contains a number of measures to protect workers, including pregnant and nursing women. I am currently consulting with groups representing these women and with employers, and I expect that this fall I will be able to table the appropriate legislation.

Routine Proceedings

POINT OF ORDER

MOTION M-330

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order following debate this morning surrounding Motion No. M-330 presented by the hon. member for Skeena.

My understanding from the debate this morning is that there was a broad consensus here in the House on its content. There was also an amendment proposed by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, seconded by the member for Davenport, relating to this motion.

Members for Timiskaming and Surrey—White Rock—South Langley also participated in this debate, as did the member for Davenport, of course the member for LaSalle—Émard, and the member for Skeena.

After consultation, if this meets with Your Honour's approval and with the consent of the House, I would propose, seconded by the member for LaSalle—Émard and of course seconded by the member for Skeena, the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of preserving and protecting in its natural state at least 12 per cent of Canada by working co-operatively with the provincial and territorial governments and assisting them to complete the protected area networks by the year 2000.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, not only do we agree with the minister, we want to congratulate all members of this House on taking an initiative that reflects, I am sure, the desires of all Canadians. We second the motion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister, the member for LaSalle—Émard and the rest of the House for their consideration of this important environmental resolution.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, unlike the other parties, we did not have a chance to consider the various elements of the motion, and we would like to reserve judgment. Consequently, without prior consultation, we cannot give unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member for Shefford correctly, he said that he preferred to reserve his consent. It is true that we did not have a chance to consult the hon. member for Shefford. If you agree, I and my colleagues from LaSalle–Émard and Skeena could consult the hon. member for Shefford and get back to you as soon as possible on the matter of unanimous consent.

[English]

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is agreed that the matter be reserved for a few minutes to give an opportunity for consultation with all members.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House today the first report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations. The report deals with the mandate of the committee and some procedural aspects of the committee's work.

I would point out for the benefit of House leaders that it has been customary over the last couple of decades for the first report of this committee to be concurred in by the House. I would look into this over the next two days or so.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present that has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It is signed by residents of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

UNITEL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that has been certified correct under Standing Order 36. The petitioners urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

They also urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties and to hold local hearings in their community before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first petition is from a number of farmers from the province of Saskatchewan who are concerned about this government's attack on the Canadian Wheat Board.

They call upon this government to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection under the Canadian Wheat Board Act as wheat has.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, as well I have a petition from a number of Canadians who are concerned about Unitel.

They urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service. They also urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted severely by deregulation.

They are concerned about the future of rural Canada.

SPRUCE FALLS POWER AND PAPER

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the 3,523 residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically the town of Kapuskasing and surrounding municipalities, on the subject of the possible implementation of the Amos plan at Spruce Falls.

If this plan is implemented it will result in the loss of 1,200 direct jobs and an estimated 5,000 to 6,000 indirect jobs. Such a development would devastate the local economy, jeopardize the ability of municipalities to function effectively and cause a mass exodus of skilled labour in the region.

Therefore the petitioners are asking the Parliament of Canada to support the Spruce Falls Power and Paper.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have petitions with respect to the taxing of books, which is a tax to impose ignorance. They continue to protest the GST because taxing books is a terrible mortgage on our future. It unduly affects the sale of Canadian books and magazines. Book purchases by our schools and libraries have decreased by 10 per cent.

The petitioners wish to bring to the attention of this House that some foreign publishers have refused to ship books and materials to Canada because these book sellers are required to become Canadian tax collectors. Bureaucracy may be flourishing under the GST, but the flow of reading material is not.

They call on this government, which has said in its Speech from the Throne that it wants to obliterate illiteracy, improve education and ensure having a better educated population, to withdraw its tax on goods and services and to reinstate postal subsidy on community newspapers and Canadian magazines.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition in which the undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services which were cut on January 15, 1990, maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislated mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the western world.

This petition is signed by many people from Allardville, New Brunswick all the way through to Kitchener, Ontario.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from petitioners throughout Canada, particularly in Quebec as well as in Ontario, who petition Parliament to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

I would like to add that this has already been done in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, VIA Rail seems to be almost gone but not forgotten.

I rise on behalf of a number of petitioners from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland who ask that the government consider restoring the VIA Rail services, maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote services so that Canadians can rely on a good and effective transportation system.

UNITEL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I stand to present a petition today signed by a number of residents from Chilliwack, Nanaimo, Vancouver, and other areas throughout B.C.

The petitioners are very concerned about the application by Unitel Communications now before the CRTC. They are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in the long distance telephone market.

Furthermore, they urge the minister to hold local hearings in rural and interior communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition which has been signed by a great number of people from British Columbia. It deals with the government's 1986 promise to take whatever measures necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination.

The petitioners note that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has called for this and that three provinces and one territory have put such protection into their Human Rights Acts.

They therefore call on the federal government to follow through with the promise made in 1986.

UNITEL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from throughout the province of British Columbia and in the city of Toronto.

The petitioners express their belief regarding the Unitel application that full consultation among all parties affected by any changes in the long distance local service relationship must take place prior to any action.

Further, the CRTC hearings on the Unitel bid must be integrated with the development of an over-all Canadian telecommunications policy. In pursuit of that, they urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid and further urge the minister to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted severely by any deregulation and imposition of higher tolls on rural Canadians.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of quite a number of petitioners from almost every province and territory who are asking Parliament to take action to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

They mention that the House of Commons mandated the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in 1985 to prepare a report on equality rights. This was supported in 1986 but the government has not yet acted.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission has consistently called for such an amendment and recently stated that government inaction called into question the commitment made four years ago.

We call on the government to honour its commitment in this regard.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands. They call upon Parliament to pass a bill to make it an offence to desecrate or otherwise destroy the flag of Canada.

An hon. member: How many is "numerous"?

Mr. Milliken: The parliamentary secretary has asked me how many is "numerous". If he would give me answers to the questions I have put on the Order Paper, I would be pleased to answer his. I will be pleased to tell him that in this case it is something over 60 signatures.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present petitions calling upon this House to include the right to freedom from discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in the Canada Human Rights Act.

I would point out that the subcommittee on equality rights of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs supported a report supporting this; that there are provinces and territories such as Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon that have such protection; and that it is time now for this House to take a stand and ensure that sexual orientation is in the Canada Human Rights Code.

I also have the duty and honour to present a petition from my constituents in Yukon. Whereas the government has refused to extend to public sector workers the full rights to collective bargaining and the federal government wants to contract out jobs rather than use the skills of the public sector workers, these petitioners call upon Parliament to protect the collective bargaining rights of public sector workers and reject the imposition of wage controls and the further contracting out of jobs from the public sector.

PROTECTION OF CANADA'S ECOSYSTEM

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, after consultations with the member for Shefford and the other parties, I would like to repeat the motion that I put to the House a few minutes ago with one change. I would like to suggest that the motion be seconded by the member for Prince Edward—Hastings of the Liberal Party who I understand from conversations I have had with the member for LaSalle—Émard has a special interest in this issue.

I would be more than happy to suggest that the member second this motion. Of course it is also seconded by the member for Skeena. Unless otherwise spoken, the member for Shefford also gives his consent to this motion.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): May I repeat that we agree with the minister on this matter.

Mr. Fulton (Skeena): I would also like to thank the minister, the member who just spoke and my friend from Shefford.

Mr. MacDougall (Timiskaming): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have great concern about passing motions when they deal with the entirety of this country and rural parts when we talk of an over-all approach of 12 per cent.

I just hope there is going to be a great deal of caution to ensure that where the 12 per cent is going to take place, it will not jeopardize those regions of the country that develop and need the jobs in order to survive.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do understand that despite this piece of advice the hon. member is still giving his consent.

• (1520)

The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. minister. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Question No. 7—Mr. Duhamel:

For each fiscal year since 1987–88, (a) what is the total of all cash funding allocated by the government for educational purposes (primary, secondary, post-secondary, (b) what is the breakdown by program (c) what is the description of each program?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, since I was so fast to answer the question put to me by the parliamentary secretary a moment ago—I gave the answer within 10 seconds—I wonder if he would tell the House when he can provide an answer to the question I put on the Order Paper on February 13, over four months ago. It would be most appreciated if he could prevail on his colleagues to get an answer to that question, particularly when the House is going to adjourn at the end of this week for a long summer recess.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend needs to take a lesson from this. I put to him a very clear and concise question which he was able to answer immediately and therefore he understands the difficulties we are having with his at the moment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all remaining questions stand?

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and on the motion of Mr. Sobeski (p. 1799).

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I wish to inform the House that after my colleague from Parkdale—High Park completes his intervention, we will be moving in accordance with the Standing Orders to split our time, 10 minutes and 5 minutes of questions and answers.

While I am on my feet I am wondering if I might direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader with regard to future business of the House for today, particularly the business which will follow after the consummation of the vote at six o'clock this evening. Does he intend to proceed with a continuation of Bill C-20, or does he wish to debate the provisions of the Draconian bill, better known as Bill C-11?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I want to indicate to the House and to my hon. friend that yes, indeed, if it is necessary to continue debate on Bill C-20 after the vote this evening, we would intend to do just that.

Should Bill C-20 collapse prior to ten o'clock, or should people not be rising to enter the debate prior to ten o'clock, we would be more than happy to carry on with what we hope would be a speedy debate on Bill C-11.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, when I was on my feet prior to Question Period I was debating Bill C-20 whose title reads: "Budget Implementation Act, 1991, Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act." It would be more appropriate if it were entitled: "The Destruction of Canada Act", another one of the government's bills which is destroying the very fabric of this country.

I have the honour and the pleasure of representing Parkdale—High Park, which is representative of our beautiful country. In this riding I have the more fortunate Canadians who live in homes with swimming pools, three cars in the driveway, ravine lots, you name it. I also have the less fortunate Canadians who are paying most of their income for rent and have very little money left for clothing and food. Some of these people, to make ends meet from month to month, do have to line up in food banks to get additional food for the children. I then have all of the other constituents on that spectrum.

Whoever created us or got us on this earth built into the life span of everyone an equalizer. That equalizer is death. Unfortunately, prior to death many of us do require some kind of medicare or hospital care. I think in everyone's opinion, that kind of care and that service should be equal to everyone.

Before Question Period we heard from a Conservative minister from Quebec, stating that he does not care if an ambulance drives a patient from Quebec to Vancouver, that is the province's choice. Well, when my constituents have to be driven one mile to the hospital by ambulance, I want that ambulance service to be there. I do not want it reduced or cut because this government is reducing its transfer payments.

My constituents have a fairly good health care service. In the west end of Toronto we have the Runnymede Hospital chronic care which looks after people well into their 80s, 90s and 100 years. I have the honour of going in and celebrating people's 100th birthdays thanks to the care they are getting in this hospital.

I have the Queen Elizabeth Hospital in my riding which provides first-class care for the handicapped who are able to lead their lives in a very dignified and respectful way.

Last Friday I had the honour of going to my riding to help open the Frank O'Leary Health Clinic for citizens 55 years and over, a community health centre where people can drop in in a relaxed manner. Not in the riding but serving Parkdale, we also have the Parkdale Community Health Centre, a drop-in centre. Centres such as these help take the pressure off the emergency wards of health centres and hospitals and that is as it should be.

Last Sunday I participated in a fund raising event in High Park to help raise funds for St. Joseph's Health Centre in my riding. What pleased me was that people came from Parkdale, High Park, Baby Point and there was no distinction between rich and poor. There was no distinction between the people who have the swimming pools and the people who can barely make ends meet month to month. They were all out there as a family helping to raise funds for St. Joseph's Health Centre because the federal government is cutting further and further and, as a result, the provinces are giving less and less to the health centres and to the hospitals.

St. Joseph's Health Centre has a community health case clinic. It has a community mental health clinic. There is an emergency ward. There is a family life program. There is a family medicine centre. There is a pre-natal screening program. There is the women's health centre. There is also our Lady of Mercy chronic health care where I spend every July 1 helping these shut-ins celebrate Canada Day.

That is why I say that the constituents in my riding are fairly well looked after, but they are getting very concerned because they already see cutbacks as a result of reduced transfer payments.

I mentioned the shut-ins because sometimes we forget about them on Canada Day and since we are leading up to Canada Day weekend. On this weekend I visit the hospitals, the senior citizen homes and I visit all of the people who cannot come out to the parks or the streets for celebrations. So I go to their bedside and I present them with a Canadian flag and I wish them a happy Canada Day.

Hopefully, our health services will be such that these people will be able to celebrate more and more Canada Days with us.

With your permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to wish all the shut-ins across this country from coast to coast to coast a happy Canada Day, especially those who will not be able to get out on July 1 weekend.

In the government's obsession to reduce the deficit, it has threatened our entire way of life. By reasoning that if it spends less and less money, it will be able to take what is saved and apply it to the deficit, this government has ground our economy to a halt.

Imagine a situation where the Minister of Finance would say to the Prime Minister: "Mr. Prime Minister, when you fly to Hong Kong, instead of chartering a plane for $100,000, could you please wait two hours and fly on a regular flight?" One hundred thousand real dollars would have been saved.

This is real money which could be applied to the debt, but it is not hospital money, nor education money. Bill C-20 is not going to save money, not real money. By reducing the amount of money transferred to the provinces for post-secondary education, tuition will go up.

When tuition goes up, the chances of the average person getting an education, a job and paying their own way goes way down. This government is putting into motion a cycle of poverty and lack of education which terrifies me.

Before coming to this House, I spent 28 years in education, as a teacher, vice-principal, principal, supervising principal and as co-ordinator of special education of students with handicaps. I worked with adolescents, in psychiatric treatment facilities, in hospitals and so on, so I know just how important it is to get an education.

Education is not a luxury. It is a necessity. Money spent ensuring Canadians get a post-secondary education is the best possible investment we can make for the future of this country.

The federal government has a duty to take the money it collects from taxpayers and invest it wisely. Investing in equality of opportunity, the opportunity to get an education and the opportunity to get medical care, is a good investment.

I urge this government to reconsider this bill. I urge the minister to take a good look down the road. I am a little disappointed that so few Conservative members are taking part in this debate, but I think they know if they stand up to defend this bill they will lose the next election. They know it and that is why they are sitting quiet on their hands, refusing to debate this damaging bill.

Projections to the year 2000 show $100 billion in federal support will be taken out of the provincial medicare and education systems. As the flow of federal cash is taken out, the federal influence over both areas is reduced. When that day comes universal medicare will be dead. Access to education will be beyond the reach of all but a few.

If changes must be made, they must be as a result of federal-provincial negotiations. They must not be imposed unilaterally by the federal government with no thought of the consequences for the provinces and the people I described earlier. Minimum standards must be maintained in all provinces and territories, and only the federal government can ensure that that is done.

If the government backs away from the leading role it has played for so many years, in the beginning it will be at the expense of the poorest people in the poorest regions. It will not take long, however, for all regions to begin to suffer and for all Canadians to feel the consequences.

This is not my Canada. My country is one of equality of opportunity where every person has the same basic rights. There is time to change. There is time to get off this destructive path and get back to being a country with one of the highest standards of living in the world.

There is still time to preserve our post-secondary education and medicare systems, and I urge the minister to listen to Canadians and do the right thing: withdraw Bill C-20.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure today to participate in debate on this bill. I realize the previous speaker, the member for Parkdale—High Park, questioned why there were so few Tories getting up to speak in defence of this bill. There is one Tory standing right here who has absolutely no trouble defending this bill, and I am in fact proud to do so. Not only am I proud to do so this year. I was here last year when Bill C-69 was put through the House, a bill that further restrained spending a year ago, and I do not have any hesitation in standing up and supporting government restraint.

For too long in this country, for too long in this city, for too long in this Parliament when Liberals were in office, no member of the Liberal Party stood up and said to the government: "Restrain your spending, cut it back, stop it from increasing, don't spend it here, don't spent it there". In fact, one particular case comes to mind to show the foolishness of Liberal governments of the past. Where were the members opposite? Why didn't they stand up and speak?

There was a trucking company that went out of business because it was bankrupt, potentially bankrupt, and what did the Liberals believe? The Liberals believed that if this small trucking company was allowed to fold nothing would move between Toronto and Montreal because there would be no way of transporting the goods between the two cities. In total absence of any comments from the members opposite while they were in government, the Government of Canada gave $29 million to a trucking company only to see it go bankrupt anyway. It is that kind of nonsense that preceded us and causes us now to bring forward this particular bill, which of course is a further restraint on spending that we had last year.

What is all in this bill and in just what direction is it going? Before I get to that I would like to talk about some of the things we did last year. There are some very serious steps we took last year which we are continuing this year. Certainly one of the things we did in last year's budget, which I think was a very positive step, was the tax back provision of various government programs to high income Canadians, whether they be family allowance or Old Age Security recipients.

Another thing that does not get an awful lot of press nowadays, because I guess it is something the opposition does not want to give us credit for, is the special tax we placed on large corporations. Various large financial institutions and banks cannot use the tax system to avoid paying a minimum amount of income tax. This was in last year's particular bill that I am mentioning.

Of course, the other thing we did was to stop or slow down the growth in transfers to the provinces. I find that a very positive move.

I sat here today during Question Period, an hour ago, and listened to members of the opposition talk about what I perceived to be their restraint on spending, their thoughts on this year's budget and where they would be going if they had their way.

There were demands that the government increase funding to the Canada Assistance Plan, open-ended funding, versus restraint to three provinces, one of which I happen to be a member of Parliament for. Yet opposition members say: "give them all the money in the world, all they ask for". That was one of their questions.

Another question rather facetiously asked was about why we were spending $126 million over the next four years on violence to women? Why didn't we bring it forward and spend it over two years so that we would have it all spent by the time the next election rolled along?

Of course, the reason we did not do that is because we do not spend money based on next election programs. The other fact of course is that if we did they would be saying: "the only reason you are spending it over two years is because there is an election coming and you are trying to get it in in advance of the election". That is not the way we operate.

They also demanded more money for housing. Even though we have substantially increased funding over the six years devoted to social housing, there they were demanding more money for housing. They were complaining about the defence spending cuts that we are presently undertaking in Europe. They were looking for more funding for Indian bands even though we have substantially increased funding for Indian bands over the last number of years. Of course they were objecting to the restraint on wages we put on the Public Service. Then they asked for unlimited funding for health care programs. It was attitudes like that, Madam Speaker, that if their spending patterns had carried on from 1984, we would now have a $96 billion or $98 billion deficit instead of the one we have.

That is the attitude that Liberals and NDPers bring to debate. It is amazing that after six years of looking at the serious financial problem we have, there has been no change in their outlook. Their cure to all of the problems of this country is simply to spend money. Well, I am one who is proud to stand in this House and say I do not agree with that cure; in fact, some of the cure might be better achieved if we didn't spend quite so much money.

What have we done? In the February 26 budget we asked we asked many Canadians to share further in the fiscal restraint that the government started on.

We know, and I certainly hear it from many of my constituents, that there are already Canadians who have made some very important sacrifices in the name of restraint. We also know that there will be a reluctance on the part of many of those to accept further requests for If we took no steps to deal with this worsening debt and fiscal situation that we have in Canada, the deficit would be much higher than forecast over the next five years. In fact, it would be so much higher that an additional $215 billion would be added to the public debt—$215 billion that my constituents cannot afford, $215 billion that the children and future children of my constituents cannot afford, and I would hazard to say that is the case for all Canadians.

What have we got? We have come up with a bill that does some very specific things. I can use some words which I think probably reflect what we are trying to do here, words of Mr. McKenna in a speech that he gave back on February 21 of this year. I would like to quote from an article in The Globe and Mail of February 28. It says: "Each government would be required to produce a four-year balanced budget. No leader could buy popularity today with the dollars of tomorrow. The leaders of the sixties and seventies have placed a first mortgage on the future of Canada. The leaders of the eighties and nineties are placing a second mortgage on the same asset. There is no equity left. We must once and for all put an end to the suffocating debt load we are placing on the backs of our children."

I like what Mr. McKenna had to say and I think that this particular bill goes in the right direction, to stop today's government and future governments from simply spending money for the sake of it.

What is in this particular bill that has the opposition so terribly concerned? Certainly one of the things is restraint on federal transfers to the provinces, and yes, they are being restrained. I find it interesting that here in the province of Ontario that with our new provincial government is spending money like drunken sailors. I would like to share with you just what the Government of Canada is proposing for the health care system and the various other things.

When the Government of Ontario brought down its budget a couple of months back, it indicated that the reason it had a $9.8 billion deficit was because the Government of Canada was reducing its payments to the province by some $3.4 billion. That is rather far from the truth, Madam Speaker. What has basically happened is that over the last six years, since 1984, the Government of Canada has increased the transfers to the province of Ontario by some $3.2 billion, which on an annualized basis meant that the increases were running at about 7.5 per cent per year, year over year increase.

The province of Ontario is saying: "Well, yes, but you should have given us more. If you take their number, we should have given them, according to this, twice as much". Can you imagine trying to justify to my constituents why we are increasing the transfers to my province at the rate of 15 per cent a year? When we are living with a 5 per cent inflationary environment, my constituents would certainly not accept us increasing transfers and thereby allowing other governments to increase their spending at a rate of 15 per cent a year.

Now, if they don't agree with the fact that it should have been done over the last six years and say it should have been done all in the last year, you have to understand that what the province of Ontario is suggesting is that the Government of Canada should increase its transfers to the province this year by some 45 per cent. I do not know in whose mind 45 per cent would be an acceptable number.

An hon. member: The socialists.

Mr. Soetens: I guess the socialists might. Unfortunately for us, we have a socialist government in Ontario. But fortunately for Canada we have a Conservative government in Ottawa because they are not getting 45 per cent more from us this year or any year while I am here, I hope, so that it is very clear.

What have we done this year? We are increasing transfers to the province of Ontario, contrary to all that rhetoric that comes from Queen's Park and from some of the opposition seats. We are increasing transfers to the province this year by about 2 per cent.

An hon. member: How much?

Mr. Soetens: About $220 million, not some small sum. That is a rather significant sum. When in fact we in Ottawa are holding our spending quite successfully, we see no reason why other provinces and other levels of government should not do the same.

I stand here to say that in this particular bill that is in front of us, we are restricting the rate of increase in our transfers to the province. However, I say quite clearly that I support that restriction without any hesitation. Canadians across this country are calling on all governments to improve efficiency, to tighten up the rules under which government money is spent, and I think this is exactly what we are doing with this bill.

Now, some will argue on the opposite side—I heard it on Friday, I heard it today—that because of this restriction in the transfers that we are giving to the provinces, the federal government will lose its clout; that it will lose its ability to enforce the Canada Health Act, to enforce the rules and regulations under which the services will be delivered because there is no money that it can use, shall we say, in a sense to attach penalties to provinces if it is not transferring any money to them.

Of course you know that the second part of this bill very clearly deals with some revisions which give the Government of Canada power to attach financial penalties to transfers other than those that would be attached to health care transfers, so that we could use any sort of financial transfer that we have to a province to in fact penalize the province if it set out to restrict the government's ability to have proper services provided by the various funds that we are transferring.

There is another item that is in here which personally I might suggest does not go far enough, particularly when it deals with MPs. We can maybe discuss it in the context of the wages that MPs and senators are going to receive.

As you are aware, the Government of Canada has announced—and this bill goes further to implement it—that members of Parliament salaries will be fixed too. As you are aware, there are already two bases under which this is fixed. One is 1 per cent less than the consumer price index, and the other I believe is 1 per cent less than the industrial average wage in Canada. Now there is going to be a third restriction, and that basically will say that MPs cannot receive more of an increase than we grant to the civil service.

As you are aware, based on some of the news reports that are going on right now, the civil service is negotiating a salary increase but the government has said that for this year there is no additional money. It appears that they will get 0 per cent this year, 3 per cent next year and 3 per cent the year after that. So this bill basically says that MPs and senators will receive that amount of money or less if the Consumer Price Index is lower.

I think you will find that Canadians have been calling on members of Parliament and senators to participate in this restraint measure, and you can see very clearly by this particular item in the legislation that we are doing that.

I might suggest that there are some Canadians who would support the idea of looking at the tax-free portion of the allowance that members of Parliament and all politicians across this country receive. That might be an interesting subject for a private member's bill.

I would suggest that clearly members of Parliament and senators are participating in the restraint that we have been asking the rest of the civil service here in Ottawa and across Canada to participate in.

Having said that, I do have some concern about the civil service salaries. Yes, they are being restrained, and they have been restrained for the past four or five years. If I listen to many of the federal civil servants who live in my riding—and I have had a chance, particularly this weekend, to talk to a number of them—I can sympathize with their point. They are being asked in a period of 4 and 5 per cent inflation to accept a 0 per cent increase this year, when for example last year they got less than the provincial civil service, or in fact probably less than the civil service in my municipalities. There are a lot of civil servants who are saying: "For the last four or five years, we federal civil servants have been asked to bite the bullet much more severely than any other level of civil service". From my observation that is correct. I wish we had more money to give them. They probably work harder or work as efficiently as any civil servants, but the fact of the matter is we do not have any money. There is a choice in the matter, and that is to be laid off so that we have money to give more to those other civil servants who still have jobs.

I am not sure that is necessarily the appropriate step. I do not think we should simply be slashing staff for the sake of slashing staff. I do not think we should be slashing staff so that we can say to other staff: "Well, we got you a salary increase". What we are saying in this circumstance—and it is a very appropriate circumstance—is that the federal government has a problem: "We all have to tighten our belts. Your contribution to this will be an absolute restraint on your wage increase". I support that, even though I understand how difficult it may be for many of those people who are caught by that.

Further in this bill there are a number of other items that are affected. The Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act is being affected. There are many public utilities across Canada that would pay income tax and that tax is transferred to the provinces. What we are doing with this particular piece of legislation is capping the transfer of that tax to the provinces. Principally, it is Ontario and Alberta that pay the bill on this.

It is coincidental that in Alberta they passed a piece of legislation that in fact stopped that transfer from going all the way through to the municipalities. They certainly agree with the gist of what we are proposing with this kind of legislation. They have implemented steps that are much more severe than that which we are proposing.

Also in this particular bill are changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. When the present Government of Canada came to office in 1984, the Unemployment Insurance Act was operating with a tremendous deficit in that we were paying out substantially more in the way of benefits to the unemployed than we were collecting in the way of premiums from those who were employed.

It is an insurance scheme and the Government of Canada said: "Just a minute, if you are going to have this kind of a scheme, and if you are going to have this kind of a plan, it certainly has to be self-financing". Over the last number of years we implemented a program to make the unemployment insurance fund totally self-financing. As you are aware, now the Unemployment Insurance Act has again become non-self-funding. Of course as many members of the opposition would echo, unfortunately it is not paying its way because there are many unemployed people now who are unable to make their contribution.

What we are doing with this particular bill is increasing the premiums being paid by the worker from $2.25 per $100 of insurable earnings to $2.80. On the part of the employer we are increasing it from $3.15 to $3.92. The intent of that is to make the plan self-funding. It will not all be done in the immediate step, but over a period of about a year it should make it self-funding.

What does that do? It stops it from going into a deficit. It stops future contributors to the unemployment insurance fund from having to pay interest on the debt that the unemployment insurance fund has. That kind of step is appropriate because, unfortunately, if previous Liberal governments had not spent their way out of office, we would not have the problem today of trying to raise all kinds of money simply to pay interest. On the unemployment insurance fund, we are saying that we are not going to allow a debt to be accumulated, and therefore future contributors will not have to try to earn first the interest to pay that fund before we carry on any further.

Those are some of the highlights of what is in the legislation and they are certainly very positive steps.

Just so that it is understood that there is some light at the end of the tunnel, I thought I would quote from an article from The Ottawa Citizen, which appeared on June 13, a column written by Marjorie Nichols.

I would like to read a couple of paragraphs from her column. The first paragraph reads:

> The budgetary deficit numbers actually distort the fiscal truth. In fiscal 1984–85, the Liberal budget deficit was $38.3 billion, of which $16 billion went to pay for "groceries"— federal programs and salaries.
> In fiscal 1991–92, by contrast, the Conservative deficit will be $30.5 billion, all of which is interest charges on the national debt.

Members would be happy to know that at least 85 per cent of that interest is on debt which was there when they were in office.

So I hope I have shared some important aspects of this particular bill. I am proud to stand here and say that I support this bill in spite of all the catcalls from the other side.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I wanted to zero in on a couple of particular comments that the member had to make. He talked quite eloquently about how the Public Service now has to bear no wage increase and yummy, yummy, we as members of Parliament earn substantially more than the $19,000 a year which a large number of women in the Public Service earn as well as those who are out on the high seas performing rescue operations at great danger to their lives. Those tens of thousands who earn less than $19,000 are going to be frozen in exactly the same way as members of Parliament who earn close to $100,000 per year.

I am wondering why the member who has just spoken thinks that is fair. I am also wondering why he thinks it is fair that senior managers in the Public Service earning upwards of $100,000 get bonus and increases equivalent to the increase in the CPI but people earning less than $20,000 get no increase this year.

I cannot help wondering why he wants to tie the increases of members of Parliament to the increases of public servants, rather than having a special wage restraint package for those who are earning substantially more than the 68,000 public servants who are earning less than the poverty level income in this country.

Does he really think it is fair that 68,000 people, whose income is already below the poverty level, should earn less next year? Does he think the price of bread is going to go down? He might, at the same time, want to comment on the fact that he did refer to the federal Public Service receiving wage increases substantially below the rate of inflation for five years now and substantially below other workers in the public sector.

What he forgot to mention was the fact that those wage increases are even below increases in the private sector and that increases in the private sector in many communities are up this year and are pushing the price of goods and services up this year. Both people who will get no increases live in exactly the same communities and pay exactly the same prices as those who are getting substantial increases in the private sector.

Would he care to comment on any of those points?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to try to cover some of the points that were raised.

I did not hear the member say that she would support this bill because it had restraint of MPs salaries. It would be interesting to see whether she will rise in this House and say she supports at least that portion of the bill, because I have not heard anybody opposite really get to that point.

She talked about all these high income senior management people in the Public Service. I did not hear her mention that in the budget we had announced that 10 per cent of them were going to be losing their jobs. She also talked about the wage increases. I did mention that the people in the federal Public Service have received less money than their counterparts in the provincial Public Service. I find that unfortunate and very difficult, but because other governments in Canada, particularly in Ontario, choose to spend money faster than I think appropriate does not mean necessarily that we should follow the same patter.

Mrs. Catterall: Well how about the private sector?

Mr. Soetens: Having said that, if a province in Canada were in a serious fiscal straitjacket, as the federal government was in, I am sure it would find that all of its Public Service would also be capped.

• (1600)

Of course, finally she yells out: "Well, how about the private sector?" I might point out that in the private sector those companies that do well give their employees increased pay. Those companies that are in the process of going broke or not making any money either lay off their employees, freeze their salaries, or even cut their salaries.

In our situation there are no employees faced with the imminent loss of jobs because our company, the Government of Canada, is closing. We have not forced job sharing on any of our employees, as is happening in the private sector. We have not cut anybody's wages in the federal civil service, as is happening in the private sector, and we certainly have not closed any doors, which is happening in the private sector.

So when the member opposite yells out: "Well, how about the private sector?" I thought I would point out that there are some factors concerning the private sector which she ignored in her presentation.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, it gives me dubious pleasure to speak to Bill C–20. Ten or 20 minutes is not near enough time to denigrate the actions or the policies of this government.

I am going to, from time to time, quote from Premier Bob Rae's speech in Halifax because I know my colleagues in the Liberal caucus from northern Ontario are very interested in what Premier Rae has to say. I know the members opposite, and even the Japanese, are very interested in Premier Rae.

I want to quote from his speech in Halifax because I think it was a great inspirational speech for, not only New Democrats, but for Canadians had they heard it, so I want to be sure to cite several quotes from Premier Rae. He said: "Let's build something together. Let's build something positive together instead of this absolutely futile cut and cut, cut and slash, cut and withdraw and cut and then express surprise that the country seems ill at ease. Why the hell wouldn't it be ill at ease with that kind of leadership and that kind of approach".

The present Minister of Finance says: "We are staying the course. We set a course in 1984 and we are staying that course".

What a circuitous course that has been, especially since 1988. It is difficult to stay a course when at first you practice to deceive. There is a sudden rebirth or change on behalf of the government. We need only look at 1988 when the course was very, very different from the present course of this government.

I take a look at the Tory—I will not call them promises because they certainly were not promises, I am not sure what they were. The Tories were talking about $12 to $16 billion that they would be able to spend across this country. All of this money was within the budget. It was already in the estimates. It was taken care of.

Some of those promises included: "Free trade will mean lower prices for Canadian consumers, better jobs and greater opportunities". The Prime Minister said in Prince Edward Island, as late as October 1988, that: "In the future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians." We know that turned out not to be true.

He then said: "We will continue to pursue policies to make equality of opportunity a reality for all Canadians by expanding the training and skills, upgrading programs of the Canadian Jobs Strategy". That was in 1988. In 1991 we cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

He continued: "Social programs will be strengthened. We will have more millions of dollars to fight illiteracy and combat drug abuse. We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking and every undertaking on federal lands to a full environmental impact study". Another promise certainly broken.

The issue here is not broken promises, but the suggestion that this is a course that we are staying.

The course has changed very dramatically since November 1988. There is a new course being followed by this government, which suddenly has been converted by Reverend Ike, James Baker or whomever. The government has said: "This is the course on which we are going to stay now. It is all about deficits".

We say in Ontario, and federally, that there are two ways of dealing with a recession. I can talk about the anatomy of my own constituency. The Ontario government says: "We would rather fight than switch. We do not want this Operation Desert Storm with the province of Ontario, the country of Canada or the constituency of Sault Ste. Marie".

Transfer payments have been cut. They have been capped at the worst possible time, and I cite statistics from one of the hospitals in my community. The provincial government has given a 6 per cent increase across the board to hospitals. It is conceivable that they could receive as much as 11 per cent depending on the services. Yet, the hospitals tell us: "That is not enough".

Inflation is 6.4 per cent in hospital services. As a result, even with this increase by the provincial government, there are still beds being cut in the hospitals in my community. I am sure there are cuts across this country in hospitals.

We say: "We cannot increase the transfer payments to the provinces". The province of Ontario has tried, and even with that attempt, there are still dramatic cuts in the medical system of this country.

This government is not transferring payments. It is transferring responsibility, and there is the major difference. It is squeezing what it can out of the provincial government, which has no recourse. All the other governments in this country have chosen to swim with the stream as opposed to swimming against the current.

It is the only government with the fortitude to swim against the tide and attempt to help people when they most desperately need it. That is now in the midst of a recession.

We talk about UI and the increased payments for employees and employers. The suggestion is that this is a safety net. When you most need the UI system, as my community did in a 16–week labour dispute, just try to get what you think is rightfully yours from the UI system. Even when you think you have won a settlement or an appeal or even when you have won a Federal Court ruling there is a possibility that this government will take you to court over a ruling, that it will go to the Supreme Court of Canada to ensure that you will not get UI.

It was the audacity of this government to add insult to injury in the midst of a strike or labour dispute when the workers received vacation pay which they so desperately needed. The government continued to say: "We are going to continue to take UI premiums from your vacation pay even though you cannot collect UI". This was ironic at worst and tragic at best.

The UI system is fraught with inconsistencies. It is nigh on impossible to extract old moneys from the very upper levels. I have no quarrels at all with local UI offices. However, the higher you go the more difficult it is to extract any funds that workers, after having worked for 25 or 26 years and never having collected a red cent from a system they thought was there to protect them, thought they deserved to get.

This process of appeal goes on and on. Six and eight months later we are still proceeding with appeals.

There are communities at stake and quite naturally I speak for my own. This government says we have to cut the deficit, and that is good. We have to cut expenditures, and that is good. We have to cut transfer payments, and that is good. We have to cut eligibility for UI, and that is good. We have to cut VIA Rail, and that is good too. We are cutting inflation, and that is good too. We have to wrestle inflation to the ground. We have to maintain a high Canadian dollar, beyond the belief of everybody, including the allies of the government.

Nobody believes this high dollar policy is sensible or practical or makes any sense economically, fiscally, or any way. It is literally draining the lifeblood of the manufacturing base of this country. The Algoma Steel Corporation in my community talks about if the dollar was lowered we would have a chance. We would have a chance to sell some steel in the U.S. markets. But in the very next breath they say that even with a lower Canadian dollar the free trade agreement precludes us from selling steel into the United States.

The present penetration of U.S. steel into Canada is now about 15 or 17 per cent. That is five times what it was before the free trade agreement. A lower Canadian dollar would help, but it is not the sole solution to a major problem.

Cut all of these things. Cut the deficit, cut expenditures, cut transfer payments, cut eligibility, cut VIA Rail, cut inflation. But is it good when you cut a community off at its knees, bring a country to its knees? Does it profit a government to do all of these things if, in the end, there is nothing left to cut? There is no industry, there are fewer businesses, there are fewer employed, there is less tax to be collected. Even if the government's policy was sound, we are doomed to destruction. Everything is great, all of these things are wonderful, but if there is nothing at the end of it, what good have you done? You have wreaked economic disaster upon the country.

When the final cut is in, and that is all this has been, everything that comes forward is a litany of cut, cut and cut, and very little has escaped the swath of the cut.

So what then? What about a year from now if its policies have worked, and there is nothing. There is a vacuum in many constituencies, not only Sault Ste. Marie. It may have won a battle over inflation, but it has won a war over the people of many communities in this country.

If I could digress for just a moment to mention the GST. The revenue minister says Canadians are overtaxed. The finance minister said no, they are not overtaxed. Many of the backbenchers on the government side say yes, they are overtaxed. The revenue-neutral GST collected $400 million more than anticipated in the first three months of 1991. Canadians say: "Thank God it is a recession. The amount would have been doubled if there were good times". There is some suggestion by many members from the government that we are over-taxed. Well, give everybody a break. What better time than in a time of recession? Give them a break. Say: "We are going to cut this down to 5 per cent, and we can still get ahead with our preoccupation with deficit reduction". You could cut it to 5 per cent and make some people happy. Be positive. That's all Canadians are looking for. A little bit of positive initiative from this government.

It may denigrate what the Ontario government has done, and it suggests, before the budget, when are the New Democrats going to come forward with their promises? They are not carrying through with any of those promises. So when they brought forward the budget and came through with some of the promises and some of the spending, it said they are spending too much. Well, you can't have it both ways.

What does the government want? Does it want the promises or does it not want the promises?

My community is very, very thankful and grateful for the initiatives that have come forward from the Ontario government. Twenty-five million dollars has come into our community and they are happy. And the only people who are unhappy in Toronto are the folks on Bay Street who finally got an opportunity to demonstrate, and we are happy for them. They got out of their offices, where they have been cooped up for all those years, and said: "We are going to demonstrate". And it was great to see them.

And how about "Fax Floyd"? "We are going to fax Floyd and tell him we don't like the budget". Well, I think the Treasurer of Ontario had a great answer, he is more concerned about the people who don't have fax machines.

So we are happy that some people are upset. And just this past weekend I read where some of the folks who don't like the budget have rented an office in downtown Toronto, no doubt a very expensive office, and said: " We are going to stay here and fight that Ontario budget until the New Democrats are gone". Again, that points out the illegitimacy of what these people are saying. Certainly the poor people of this province couldn't rent a room in downtown Toronto and try to turf out this government, because they couldn't afford it. They would have to meet in somebody's basement somewhere, which is probably better, at any rate.

Of course, I had mentioned when the Prime Minister went to Japan that he got into a cab and the first thing the cab driver said in Tokyo was: "What about that Ontario budget? Isn't that terrible!" He didn't mention anything about the federal budget but he was preoccupied with Bob Rae's provincial budget. Surprise, surprise. It seems that everybody is preoccupied but I am not so sure the people of the province are that preoccupied. I know the people in my constituency are not that concerned. And if they were concerned I am sure they would be calling my office, as they do with many other complaints, but one of them has not been the Ontario budget or the deficit.

It has created work in the community and in the province. We appreciate, we really do appreciate, that the deficit is a problem. But we cannot fight that deficit right now, we cannot afford cuts in transfer payments. When hospital beds are being closed, cut out of hospitals, when there are layoffs, fairly substantial layoffs in education, despite the increase of transfers from the province to the municipalities, one just cannot afford it, it is impossible. Because, as the finance minister said, there is only one taxpayer. And if the federal government continues to squeeze at the federal level, it comes out at the other end, if we want to try to maintain services. There is only so far you can go with a cut-and-run mentality.

I suggest that Canadians are willing to pay their share, even more than their fair share, when the time is right. The time is not right at present. This kind of budget is the wrong budget at the wrong time. We have a couple of choices; cut and run, as this government is doing and taking away federal presence across the country.

I had the privilege the other night of speaking to the At and East, a topic about which I knew very, very little, until I stayed here for three or four hours and listened to other speakers and found out the illegitimacy, the illogical reasoning behind it, that it would cut out $35 million in subsidy and preclude $40 million in revenue.

Somebody just made the decision and said: "Well, we have to cut somewhere. Let us take a look at this At and East, it has been round since 1966. There is a good one to cut".

So the choice is, cut and run, or stay and fight. I think this government has cut and run and has removed federal presences across this country. The Ontario New Democratic Party has chosen a different path and I believe it is the appropriate path.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend for Sault Ste. Marie. I must say he leaves me somewhat bewildered by some of his remarks.

Before I raise a couple of questions—and I will be brief—I just want to correct something he said. He quoted the Minister of National Revenue as saying that Canadians are overtaxed or taxed too much. Perhaps he was not in the House when the minister corrected the record.

The remarks the minister made were with respect to the gasoline tax. He felt that Canadians were over-taxed or "taxed to the limit", I believe is what he actually said. He did not say that in general. He made it perfectly clear in the House. If my hon. friend was not here to have the record set straight, I do it for his benefit now.

I could comment on so many things that my hon. friend said. I think he had the same speech writer as the hon. member for Surrey North earlier. They should be jointly put up for the Governor General's award for fiction for some of the things they had to say.

One of the two questions I specifically want to ask him has to do with the Canadian Jobs Strategy. He laments the cut in this budget of $100 million related to the Canadian Jobs Strategy. I recall over a year ago touring this country with some of his colleagues on the C-21 committee when time and again, day after day as we went from city to city, I heard them say that the Canadian Jobs Strategy was a waste of money. They said that the training provided was a waste of time and energy and it did not contribute to people at all. Now that there is a 3 per cent cut in the budget, all of a sudden it seems that the views of the NDP on this have changed. I wish he would explain the apparent contradiction.

The second thing has to do with the business of taking things to court. If I understood my hon. friend correctly, he is lamenting the fact that the government sees fit to use the courts to set things right. I believe his own party has initiated actions in the courts against actions of this government with which they disagreed. Is he suggesting that it is only proper to use the courts if the action is against the government, or would he want to suggest that all Canadians have the right to see that justice is done and that indeed the legislation is carried out as it is supposed to be?

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, as far as the Minister of National Revenue is concerned, I think he is on record as having clarified his statements day after day after day. I know when he was concerned about the traffic over Sarnia-Port Huron, he said: "Well, if there is too much traffic on the bridge, let us build another bridge", which dismayed just about everybody, especially the senior staff with him. I am not surprised that the minister would say something that was quoted verbatim and then the next day spend a great deal of time trying to clarify it.

The member does not cite any particular members with respect to the Canadian Jobs Strategy. Although he is a very honourable man, perhaps he might misquote some of my colleagues in those committee hearings that were held across the country.

I suggest that if training moneys are strategically spent, they can be well spent. I can understand that they can be misplaced. I have seen that situation in my own riding. It is very difficult because I have not had a hands-on approach to that situation until very, very recently. It is very difficult to have the federal and the Ontario government to complement job training programs. I think that is an extremely important initiative.

The one that really upsets me that the member talked about is the court system. Out of context what he suggested—and I am only talking about a very narrow focus to my concern—was the Federal Court had suggested that the workers had won at an appeal stage, a referee stage. They won it at an umpire board. They won at the federal court fair and square. Everybody said: "These workers deserve UI payments". And the government said: "Well, we do not care about all of those rulings. We still want to ensure that you do not get it, that we are not convinced that this is appropriate".

I do not have the time to give the background of it, but it was absolutely appalling. What they wanted to do was to divide 4,000 steelworkers into 2,000 that would get benefits and another 2,000 that would not. This effectively pitted one group of workers against another one, partner versus partner, colleague versus colleague, co-worker versus co-worker. It was an abomination of a system.

Let me finish the story, Madam Speaker, because eventually we won the case. We harassed and cajoled the federal government: "Look, this is something you have to do". And it told me: "Okay, we will pay the workers, but you cannot tell anybody. If you make an announcement, we are going to take it back". The very audacity of saying: "Okay, we will pay you, but let us pay it out quietly, okay? We do not want the news to spread because maybe a worker in another riding might hear about it and he might want it too". I said: "No deal. We are announcing it and, if you want to pull it back, that is your business". They did not.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I note the hon. member in his very capable speech spared us the usual rhetoric that we get from members of his party. In that respect I want to congratulate him. I think it was a most worth-while contribution to the debate, and in large measure we can agree with what he said and his criticisms of the government's policies.

I particularly want to indicate agreement with his criticism of the cuts that the government has instituted and the lack of any imaginative method of dealing with the problem of the federal deficit which the government has created through its own inactivity over the last seven years. I know that he would agree with me that had the government shown a bit of initiative early in its mandate, it would not find itself in the position that it is in today where it is having to meet interest payments in excess of $30 billion a year.

Having said that, I know that the hon. member shares my concern that a very large national debt is the thing that has put the government in its present position where it has to make these staggering interest payments. He knows as I do that the Government of Ontario, which I know he supports, has recently announced a program that is going to put the province of Ontario in precisely the same position in another four years. I believe the recent budget announced in Ontario, which had no new programs in it, increased the deficit to such an extent and proposes to keep it increased to such an extent over the next four years that it will in that time double the provincial debt.

Does he not agree that the disastrous policies pursued by the Conservative government for the last seven years are exactly the same policies now being pursued by the socialist government in Ontario? Does he not think he should be critical of that government for pursuing such shortsighted and really silly policies?

Mr. Butland: I thank the member for his positive comments. No doubt his questioning was facetious because I know that there is not rhetoric spouted at all to the left of the member.

The Liberals both provincially and federally have no reason to comment whatsoever. At least I give them their due. We know members opposite know what course they have, at least for these couple of years, but we are never quite sure what is the position of the party which the member so capably represents.

• (1630)

You compare New Democrats with this government's fiscal policy. Where were you? You created this mess. You are the authors of this mess, and these people are merely continuing what you initiated.

An hon. member: A double standard.

Mr. Butland: Again I go back to the policy of the Ontario government. We started off with a $3 billion deficit, and just to keep the status quo, we had to get up to a deficit of $9 billion. And you are criticizing us for that. You are saying that is terrible. So on one hand you say that is terrible, and yet on the other hand you are saying there is nothing new about it, that we should have created some new, positive initiatives. Well God forbid if we had gone to $11 billion or $12 billion. What would you have said then?

The Liberals always want it both ways. They say they do not like it this way and they do not like it that way. We know what you like, let us go down the middle, that is what you like.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Center—Aboriginal Affairs; the hon. member for Edmonton South-East—Passes for convicted persons; the hon. member for Eglington—Lawrence—Taxation; the hon. member for Halifax—Port of Halifax; and the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—The Environment.

Resuming debate. I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the debate today reminds me of an occasion a couple of weeks ago when I was out speaking to a group of people who had immigrated to Canada in the last six or seven years. They were from all over the world. They were from Iran, Ethiopia, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Cambodia, Vietnam, and they were telling me they were having a hard time understanding why we have a government that keeps destroying things instead of building things. That certainly is the most appropriate way of describing this bill. Fiscally, socially and culturally, this bill continues the program of destroying much of what is good about this country, much of what we are proud of about Canada, much of what makes us the envy of the world.

I am reminded as well of Lucy and the football. You know, we see the cartoon every fall in Peanuts where Lucy holds the football. Charlie Brown is supposed to kick it. She promises him every year that she is not going to pull the football away. He is not going to fall flat on his face or his back. And every year he falls for it and every year she pulls the football away. It seems to me that is the kind of promises we have had out of this government for the last seven years. It seems to me that with every budget we have had more intense rhetoric about the deficit and the debt, while the deficit and the debt continue mounting, despite relatively prosperous economic times for the last half dozen years.

In every budget, every throne speech, we have promises about getting rid of the deficit and debt. We all have to handle a little bit of pain so that that can happen, and in the end things are going to be better for our children.

Madam Speaker, it never seems to happen. The deficit does not seem to go down and the debt keeps going up. And yet we still have to handle a little bit more pain, a few more cuts, to the point where we are losing some extremely valuable programs in this country. We are also losing our ability to be strong and competitive in the coming decade and in the coming century, and to be a prosperous, healthy, fairly egalitarian and just society.

Canadians have said very clearly that what they want is strong national programs, national standards across Canada from sea to sea to sea, because after all, that is what this country was built on. Let us have a nation from sea to sea to sea, where people enjoy common standards, common benefits, equality regardless of where they live in the country and where they are socioeconomically.

We have to ask the question: with all this pain is the government saving money? No, it is not, it is just transferring government spending to other levels of government. I have sat at the other end of that spectrum. I have sat at a municipal council. It is happening all over the country right now where the pain and the hurt of your people becomes evident. So even if the senior levels of government are cutting back on health care and social services, deinstitutionalizing to save money, it is the community which ultimately ends up with people sleeping in the streets and sleeping in garages overnight. The community ends up providing the food banks, the emergency shelters and the extra little bit of money to help people make it through to the end of the month without starving. So we do not save money, we simply transfer it to a level of government that is least able in fact to carry out these programs.

Cuts in transfer payments and federal revenue sharing are changing a structure of the country, changing a structure of the Canadian federation through the back door. More of the spending obligations are being transferred to provinces and municipalities where the ability to pay for programs is less than it is at the federal level. The national ability to set standards and criteria is being diminished entirely.

Medicare payments, social service payments and the ability of local communities and provinces to deliver child care are being cut because the government is not meeting its contract. It is not meeting its obligation to share those costs and all we are doing is hurting the poorest, the most disadvantaged and the poorest regions of our country. We are not hurting governments, we are not hurting politicians, we are not hurting bureaucrats. It is people who are being hurt; it is the one million children living in poverty in this country, the same children who, when they are poor, suffer twice as many deaths from accidents, traffic accidents, homicides and suicides as do children of wealthier families. These are also children who drop out of school at four times the rate.

This bill before us, cutting the federal government's share of our social obligations across Canada, is going to make those statistics desperately worse. Children are going to be poorer, women are going to be poorer and people with disabilities are going to be poorer. The poorest parts of our country are going to be poorer because they are the ones that can least afford to provide the services that people need.

We talk about medicare. Americans are up here looking at our medicare system. I heard one speaking on television just last week saying: "We are up here to find out what you are doing because you are able to deliver medical services to all your people better than we are and cheaper than we are." They are paying far more for medical services in the United States and there are 30 million Americans who have no medical coverage whatsoever.

Unemployment insurance. Well, we are told we have to bear some of these difficulties because we are fighting inflation. Then what the heck is the government doing increasing the unemployment insurance rates by over one-third since the beginning of last year, if it wants to fight inflation? Why is it telling the same people who are being told they are not going to get any salary increase this year that they will have to pay $204 more if they are earning approximately between $35,000 and $40,000. They will be paying $204 a year more for unemployment insurance. They will not get an increase in their salary but they will be expected to pay more to the government for unemployment insurance.

This is entirely contrary to promises made by the Minister of Finance when he said that the government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times. Well if this is not difficult economic times I do not know what is.

We had 1988 election promises that benefits would go up and premiums would come down and exactly the opposite has happened.

An earlier speaker this afternoon said that none of us in this House had addressed the question of restraint on member of Parliament salaries. I do not think there is one of us who does not agree that if there is restraint we should start with restraint on ourselves. But that is not what the government has done. Those people it has appointed to very highly paid positions, sometimes over $500,000, are still getting their increases while women and other people earning under $20,000, and most earning under $20,000 happen to be women, are getting no increase from this government this year.

In this bill, the government very carefully did not make its own salaries subject to the wage freeze this year, the freeze that it is imposing on the other quarter of a million people who work for the people of Canada. It will come in next year when it is talking about a 3 per cent increase, not this year when it is talking about a wage freeze.

The government very nicely protected itself from the same restraint it is imposing on everybody else.

I want to close with one thought. Perhaps what the government should think about is getting people back to work. What would happen if those 1.5 million people who are unemployed were not drawing unemployment insurance or social services in their local communities but were working and paying taxes. What would even a 1 per cent drop in the unemployment rate do for our deficit in this country?

Instead of restraining spending like this, destroying medicare, destroying unemployment insurance, destroying our social programs, what this government should be doing is concentrating on getting people back to work and contributing financially to the debt and the deficit reduction.

Perhaps then we would see some solutions to our problems instead of continually exacerbating and expanding problems for the majority of Canadians, such as the continuing growth of disparity between those who are rich and those who are poor to the point where some who have will be able to get good medical care and some who have not, will not.

This is a disastrous bill that touches all those things that link and hold this country together in a sense of common purpose. It is a disaster for Canada, and the results will be in effect long after this Parliament is not.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I listened with care to my hon. friend's remarks even though I was outside for part of the time.

It seems to me there is a fundamental difference in the philosophy on that side of the House and that on this side of the House. The philosophy over there is that creating work and creating jobs are the same thing. You put as many people as you can on the government payroll, and then you let the circle of expenditure go along.

Unfortunately, what that philosophy did for this country was get us in the financial mess that we are trying to clean up on this side of the House. When that government over there left office, it was spending $16 billion a year more than it was taking in, notwithstanding the national debt and the interest on the national debt.

This government, along with most Canadians, believes that unfortunately you have to pay your bills. If the government of the previous party in power had had that philosophy, perhaps we would not be in the situation we are in. The opposition talks about gutting medicare. It talks about cuts, cuts and cuts. Guess why it is there. It is there because we have $43 billion of interest to pay annually on the national debt.

Thirty six cents of every dollar collected by the Government of Canada goes on interest charges. If we do not get a handle on that, where will that leave us in the future? If spending had continued under this government as it had under the last government, which left a $38 billion deficit, today the deficit in this country would be $99 billion.

What programs would we be able to support with that amount of money? Indeed, would we have the authority to run the country? Would the International Monetary Fund have come in and taken over?

Does my hon. friend not think it is an important thing for governments to act in a financially and fiscally responsible manner? Does she think it is okay to endlessly allow deficits to grow and mortgage the future of our kids with debt charges and a national debt that could never be brought under control?

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I certainly do. That is why I condemn this bill and this government for its fiscal policies which will deliberately put 12 million people in this country out of work this year.

Is having people unemployed any way to bring down a debt and a deficit? The government has done everything. The member opposite has exactly outlined why we charge this government with fiscal irresponsibility. He stands there and admits that 36 cents out of every dollar is going to pay interest on the debt and then wants this country and this House to believe that this government is responsibly managing the finances of the country of Canada.

At least eight years ago when there was a deficit it was to provide programs for Canadians. It was to keep people working. It was not just to pay interest on a debt which the Conservatives have allowed to more than double since they came into office over seven years ago.

We do not build the strength of this country and our ability to be economically strong by diminishing the health of Canadians, by diminishing the opportunity of children to have a good education so that they can prosper and contribute to this society in the long term. We do not do that by letting children go hungry, by letting people go homeless and by letting people have health care only when they can afford to pay for it.

The member opposite has obviously forgotten that there was a time in this country when people had to decide whether they could afford to take their child to a doctor, whether they could afford to have an operation that was needed to save their lives. Those were the days before medicare. Those are the days I remember when I was a child and those are not days that I want to see in this country for my grandchildren.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, before the fat cat from South Shore made his phony intervention my colleague from Ottawa West was completing in a very thoughtful manner her analysis of this bill which reads: an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

Behind these harmless looking words there is some very dangerous substance that ought to be put forward and explained to the Canadian people.

This bill, I submit to you, reveals the real cruel agenda of the Progressive Conservative Party with respect to its long-term intentions in this country and, in particular, with its intention on medicare and post-secondary education.

To make it worse, it has the ability through the budget speech of last February to couch its language in a small l liberal manner so as to make it appear actually what it is not, to make it appear as something liberal and progressive. However, when given the chance to analyze this bill more closely, one can see that it hides something profoundly regressive and something that no backbencher of the Progressive Conservative Party would dare to defend on the hustings at the next election.

It is so well put that it has to be put on record once again what the well-known Canadian writer, Gratton Gray, wrote in Policy Option very recently when he spoke of this government's social policy by stealth. He said:

> The social policy by stealth relies heavily on technical amendments to taxes and transfers that are as difficult to explain as they are to understand and thus largely escape media scrutiny and public attention. It camouflages regressive changes in the rhetoric of equity in an attempt to convince Canadians that tax increases are tax cuts and that benefit cuts are benefit increases. By further complicating an already complex labyrinth of taxes and social programs, the stealth style of policy-making confuses the electorate and so insulates itself from criticism. The Conservatives record on social and tax policy constitutes a variation of Newton's third law of motion. For every positive action there is an equal and opposite negative change. As a result the goal of a fairer, simpler and more rational system of taxes and transfers remains as distant as ever.

It could not have been put better in describing the bill before us, Bill C-20.

Who is hit by the measures proposed in this bill? Who will suffer under it? Obviously, it will be the people who are least able to defend themselves, those working at minimum wages, the family led by one parent, those who are on low fixed incomes, all the people whose well-being depends on the capacity of having access to adequate health care. They may not be affected today, nor perhaps next year as the charts would reveal, but just give it a little time, two, three, four, five years from now. What kind of Canada will emerge as a result of these measures when they are fully implemented downstream?

It will be a patchwork of Canadian health and post-secondary educational services whereby the provinces which can afford it perhaps will be able to maintain certain standards and others will gradually fall behind.

Who will benefit, as the member for Ottawa West has pointed out so well? Those who will benefit will be the fat cats in our society, the rich people who will be able to insulate themselves from the impact of this measure. In other words, it is a classical example of Progressive Conservative policies put into place and disguised behind fancy language, using actually Liberal language. That is what is so annoying about this particular approach.

I would like to draw the following to your attention. Between now and the year 2000 as a result of this bill, $97.6 billion in federal support will be vanishing, putting a squeeze on both medicare and post-secondary education. This is almost $100 billion. To be more specific, the forecasts that have been carried out show that the last federal cash payment for medicare and post-secondary education, when it will still be available in certain have-not provinces in the year 2008, will be $238,000 to the Yukon. In the following year not one cent of federal cash would go to any province or territory.

In the case of Quebec, the cash payment will disappear by the fiscal year 1996–1997. Madam Speaker, you may want to remember that on the hustings during the next election campaign.

Cash payments to the province of Ontario will be gone by the fiscal year 2002–2003.

As for the rest of the provinces and territories, they will lose all federal cash for medicare and for post-secondary education a few years after Ontario. That is the picture that emerges when this measure will be in place a few years downstream.

Therefore, the question is to imagine how Ottawa could maintain its legislative presence with the five principles of medicare once federal funds for medicare have dried out. What will happen is that Canada will become a hodge-podge of provincial and territorial programs with different medicare systems, and everybody unto himself.

The changes proposed in this bill have the potential to undermine the full range of federal transfer payment programs. To this point I have dealt with post-secondary education and medicare.

The federal government, as a result of this bill, if and when it wants, will be able to withhold transfer payments from equalization payments to territorial financing, to grants in lieu of taxes, to public utilities income tax transfers, to statutory subsidies, to the Canada Assistance Plan, to crop insurance; to payments in education with respect to official languages, to miscellaneous health and welfare programs, to young offenders services, to justice and to transportation.

It is impossible, even in the limited time available, not to make reference to the fact that in the budget speech the Minister of Finance announced that he was soaking employers and employees by an amount of an additional $2 billion by way of increased premiums, this at a time when unemployment is in the area of one and a half million. In that budget document we were not able to find one reference to measures to relieve unemployment, to deal with unemployment, to establish policies to create jobs. Would you not expect, at a time when one and a half million people in Canada are unemployed, that the budget speech would address the situation of the unemployed, that it would attempt to kick-start the economy in the badly hit regions so as to provide relief?

That is not what has happened. Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is over. I will therefore have to restrain myself from indicating how the Government of Canada is squandering taxpayers' money with its ill-conceived defence policies, particularly by insisting on maintaining its troops' presence in Europe at the present time. That will be for another occasion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we will be resuming debate now, I would like to advise the House that the first 12 hours are now completed so all speeches are to be 10-minutes with no period of questions and answers. Resuming debate.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, with the limited time before us now I would like to restrict my remarks to just one area of the legislation that is before this House today. By restricting the area on which I wish to speak I do not mean to minimize the other important aspects of the legislation, mainly as it affects the amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act, or to minimize the effects or my interest in the changes as they affect the role of unemployment insurance, that will be taking effect if and when this act passes.

Those changes will greatly affect the amount that small businesses in this country will be forced to pay to support the unemployment insurance plan and also the tremendous increase—I think it is approximately 24 per cent—that every employee who is lucky enough to have a job in Canada today will be forced to pay in order to supplement the unemployment insurance fund. That fund was, up until this period of time in the history of Canada, the responsibility of the government. It is a responsibility which the other side of the House has chosen to ignore. It has placed the burden of the responsibility for insuring wages in this country squarely on the back of every employer and every small businessman in the country when they can least afford to pay for those increases.

I would like to address another very critical issue that this legislation is bringing forward and how it affects the national health program in Canada.

We are all involved today with the constitutional debate and the unity debate. We all know that section 92 of the Constitution Act gives the responsibility for the delivery of health care to each province in this country. As in education and in other areas, the responsibility for health and the delivery of a system of health care within Canada is strictly on the provinces. Through transfer payments in this House, we take federal tax money and give it to the provinces. As a result of giving these funds to each province in this country, we can then set conditions on the availability of those funds. As a result we in effect have usurped the responsibility for the delivery of health care in Canada from the provinces and because of the restrictions we place on the transfer payments, we have taken over responsibility, but not complete responsibility.

If a province chooses not to accept those funds, as we saw a few years ago, then it can carry on with its own delivery of health care. With this method of transfer payments we could very well establish within this country several types of health care delivery systems. This is contrary to the very essence of what we in Canada have come to understand and accept as a universal plan for medical care for every Canadian who lives in Canada.

I am amazed, as I listen to this debate, that we have not yet addressed one of the key problems that will be created as we diminish and lessen the amount of transfer payments to each province. The people who built this country are going to be affected. I would like to speak about how it is going to affect the senior citizens of our country.

There are some of us in this House who are gradually approaching that age when we will become senior citizens. I do not refer to you, Madam Speaker. I refer to some of my colleagues who circle around us.

I want to talk about how it will affect seniors. What right has this government or any government—whether it is this government in power today or any future government, which I assume very much will be a Liberal government, or any provincial government in this country—to interfere with the fundamental right of all citizens? It is a right that has not been given but one that every citizen in this country through their dedication—some who have come to this country by choice and some who have worked in excess of 40 years—has earned. It is not a privilege. It is an inalienable right of every citizen in this country to expect a universal health delivery system that is not subject to any restriction.

Let me rephrase that. It is the inalienable right of every citizen in Canada to be able to accept and expect a universal health care system that is not subject to any restrictions whatsoever. I think it is the responsibility of a federal government to ensure that this federal system of health delivery maintains that important aspect.

Now the people who are put in jeopardy, as my friend from Toronto just said, are the people who can least afford to pay for that service, the poor of the country. I want to talk about, in my remarks today, the elderly, the senior citizens of this country. We should not even be discussing the fact that in the future, they may be responsible for the payment of what is called a "user fee" to pay for the costs of health care within this country.

In 1988 and 1989, there was $23.9 billion spent in Canada by the provincial governments for health care. Tax transfer—and that is a subject for debate today and the subject that this government is trying to cap—was $6.6 billion, federal cash outlays were $8.2 billion, municipal spending was $0.6 billion, and private spending was $14.8 billion. That all totals up to the tremendous amount of $54.1 billion spent on the delivery of health care in this country. I think the federal government has a responsibility to ensure that this money is not only spent wisely, but spent frugally, with care for the responsibility of every citizen in this country.

I get very upset when I hear that money in health care is being wasted—and I think about the $500,000 that just recently went to some United States agency for one individual. The federal government should show leadership in health care, especially for our senior citizens. It should ensure that funding for a health care program in this country be spent with some wisdom. It should ensure that within this country of 10 provinces and two territories Canadians are not subjected to a user fee or hospital fee and that money that is collected is spent for the best interest of every Canadian.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comuzzi: I thank you for the opportunity of making those remarks on behalf of the senior citizens in Canada. I am sure they will look very seriously at what this government has done at the next federal election. They were promised that their benefits would not be touched and we had the clawback. They were assured by this government that the medicare would not be touched and now we have this bill before this legislature. So on their behalf I speak today, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, as did my Liberal colleague, I want to limit myself in my participation in this debate to a specific area, and that has to do with transfers to the provinces. I will not concern myself with the changes that are going to affect medicare or general social programs through cuts in Established Programs Financing, as well as the Canada Assistance Plan. I would like to make a few observations on the issue of Established Programs financing as it affects post-secondary education.

I am sure you will recall that when this government first came into office our concern at that time was that the provinces were not delivering their fair share of funding to the universities as compared to what the federal government was doing. At that time they were arguing that we should have assured levels of financing for the universities, that there should be a guarantee of provincial participation and that some effort at negotiations should be entered into in order to bring that about.

The issue has become dramatically more important, as others are beginning to recognize. Almost everybody now is beginning to recognize that the real creation of wealth comes from the mind, from creativity and from innovation. In that context there are two significant components to economic development as all recognize now; education and training on the one hand, and science and technology on the other.

We are at a stage where it is perfectly clear that we must enhance our national literacy, our national education and our national training in order to bring about the kind of economic development that will put Canada into the 21st century.

Unfortunately, as we look at what has been happening since, we cannot be encouraged. At this stage of the game we observe that the changes in the funding mechanisms that were brought about in 1977 with the Established Programs Financing let loose the provinces from their responsibilities of paying a fair share, then estimated at 50 per cent for post-secondary education. The Liberal government at the time not only changed that formulation releasing the provinces from their obligation, but as a result of changes which were described as the six and five per cent change and other changes brought about by the Liberal government, some $5.7 billion was not delivered to the post-secondary system. Even when this government came into office, the university system was feeling the pressures already from under-funding.

What has happened since? In 1986 this government passed Bill C-96. This was the first attack by the Conservatives after vigorous attacks by the Liberals which set the escalator of the Established Programs Financing at the change in the Gross National Product, minus 2 per cent. That cost the system a considerable bundle of funds, but to make matters worse, in 1985 Bill C-69 was passed. This bill increased the deduction from the rise in the Gross National Product that would be delivered to Established Programs Financing so that we would have the change in the GNP minus 3 per cent. Not only that but with Bill C-69 the Established Programs Financing was frozen for two years. Now we have Bill C-20 which escalates the attack on the university system. Bill C-20 freezes the Established Programs Financing for another three years.

The effect of this is $13.8 billion in accumulated loss which has been brought about by legislation and budgetary action by this government at a time when almost everybody says that education is of immense importance. The government in the throne speech described a number of educational goals, not the least of which was to double the number of graduates in science and engineering. It said it was going to increase by four-fold the number of workers who were trained. It said it was going to abolish illiteracy. It said it was going to increase the number of graduates from high school.

The government uttered all these platitudes about how important education was and the Prime Minister said he was going to make every effort to make it possible for every young person in this country to have the educational weapons necessary for economic survival.

Yet time after time after time since his government has been in office, just as did the government before, it has cut its commitment to post-secondary education. This in spite of the fact that people have become convinced of the importance of education, including post-secondary education, to the extent that 93 per cent of Canadians agree that the federal government should maintain and not cut its role in the financing of post-secondary institutions.

Two-thirds of those polled supported increased funding for post-secondary education. Yet this government persists in substituting words for actions and causing severe damage to the system.

All one has to do is look at Memorial University. It is cutting programs and cutting staff. You can look at the University of Calgary and the University of Alberta where they are cutting staff and programs. You can look at Mount Royal College in Alberta. My God, because of the increased costs of tuition and living, there is a food bank for students. All over the country libraries are deteriorating and students are lacking access to the system. A special program for access to engineering at the University of Manitoba is going to be cut because of under-funding. Tuitions are being increased by 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent per year to the extent that students are now constantly paying out increasing proportions of the cost of post-secondary education while the contribution of this federal government decreases steadily.

This is supposed to be a government that understands the importance of knowledge to our future economic growth. This is a government in which a member can stand up and say: "Oh my God, I talked to some young people and told them they are going to have a $15,000 debt which they are going to have to pay when they grow up because of the actions of their parents." What the member did not say last week was that those young people to whom he was talking are unlikely to be able to afford that $15,000 because there will be no jobs. It means that the deficit is going to increase.

The deficit increases for a number of reasons, but not the least of the reasons is the failure for adequate economic growth. If you do not have people who are earning an income and you have to pay social costs, then you are going to have an increasing deficit because you are not going to have the revenue from the wage earners or the corporations. After all, in this modern, economic context, the Canadian situation is such that if we do not change things pretty quickly, the deficit is going to grow and grow because nobody is making any income or many profits to pay those taxes.

The reason for this is that this government has not understood that you have to do something to control the deficit, but you had better mobilize the resources, the human capabilities and the opportunities that people need for learning in order to make the economy grow so that you can eliminate that deficit.

Bill C-20, as with so many actions of this government, takes the wrong path. If this government continues in power we are doomed to more and more words while more and more damage is done to a post-secondary system which will be unable to meet the challenge because this government has failed not only that system, but our people and certainly our children.

Mr. Hockin: Questions or comments, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. The first five hours have elapsed. We are now on debate.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I guess the minister has forgotten about the Draconian, undemocratic process you have instituted in this House which does not even allow us to talk at any great length about the serious issues that face this nation. We just all have to talk in very superficial terms.

While it is a privilege to rise in this House and talk on behalf of my constituents of Mount Royal and on behalf of a lot of people across this land, I do so today with a great deal of concern and regret for a government action which is so regressive and found in this Bill C-20, a bill to implement the 1991 budget. It is a bill which is trying to remove this government from its area of traditional jurisdiction and traditional responsibility and, in particular, increasing the pressure on our already strained higher education, health situation and health education and programs under unemployment insurance.

Certainly, I meant to include the medicare system of our country. It is doing so by limiting provincial transfers until 1995–96. This is a very tricky, hidden way to to impose a social structure that is totally against the Canadian way of life. The debate goes to the very heart of what this government is doing wrong as it undermines the fundamental social contract of this land. It abandons our goal for a much more just society in the name of the deficit, which is important.

The choice of action this government has taken ignores the principles of the Canadian approach of pursuing the twin pillars of economic opportunity and social justice that have always been the hallmarks of Canada and the Canadian way of life.

The Canada that has been so renowned around the world is being struck. This is why Americans are now studying our health care system, which is far less costly than theirs and serves all our people, while their system does not even serve 37 million of their total population. Yet this government seems bent on demolishing this fundamental fact of Canadian life.

We see every day in the streets of my Mount Royal riding, in the community centres, in the food banks, the images of hunger, the images of great social needs going unmet, of middle and upper income executives who no longer have a job, whose self image has been destroyed, whose sense of self–worth has gone down the tubes because of this government's unenlightened approach of dealing with this deficit. Yet, this government goes merrily along and introduces bills and takes steps like today's saying: "We cannot do any more. Our hands are tied. The deficit is far too important. We would love to help, we just cannot afford it". I say the question has now become: "We just cannot afford not to help". This government does not understand that it takes economic measures as well to make the deficit shrink.

Noel Alexander, the president of the Jamaica Association in my riding, brought to my attention that 67 per cent of the unemployed Jamaicans in Montreal are young people between the ages of 18 and 25, a figure that disturbs me no end.

Thousands of jobs have been lost in my riding since the free trade agreement was signed with the United States, in textiles, in clothing, and in food processing. The high dollar and the high interest rates have closed many, many more plants. This government goes right ahead at this time of great recession without any care. It has destabilized this whole population.

It has introduced a goods and services tax. The Department of Finance now tells us the Minister of Finance did not have a clue as to what he was doing. He has indicated that the GST has collected in the last fiscal quarter $400 million more revenue than was estimated. That is $400 million on a base of $1.8 billion, which this government has collected. That is 25 per cent more money than was anticipated out of the pockets of Canadians. No wonder they are having problems. No wonder they are going to cross–border shopping. No wonder they have no money to buy food and have the normal lifestyle we expect as Canadians.

All during this time, new Canadians have been coming into our riding, new Canadians have been coming in across this country, notwithstanding the fact that there are long waiting lists, and Al–Mashat got in first. Like any other people, they want desperately to work and earn their fair share of the Canadian dream. However, the recession has erased the few jobs that were left and the students entering the summer job market are in a very sad way. The government has cut over 15 per cent of the funding in my own riding that was to help people find summer jobs.

Look at what is going to happen to tuition fees, taxes on books, all kinds of costs that are inherent in having an educated population.

The story of poverty in my riding I am sure would shock many members of this House but it is repeated right across this country. There are literally thousands and thousands of people living below the poverty line, either the working poor or those on social assistance; thousands and thousands of people, I would add, who have no sign of hope from this government: single mothers who number in the thousands, seniors who rely on sponsored in–home health care or just plain meals because their needs exceed their means.

Food banks are serving many more people than they used to serve in Montreal, in my riding and across this country. Children are increasingly having to go to school hungry and rely on food programs at school for meals. No, this is not the 1930s.

The message today is that this government is so set on using the back door approach of technical bills like this that rarely set off alarm bells or newspaper headlines to severely undermine the kinds of social policy principles from health care to education that have always been the cornerstone of this country's social contract.

That is really what concerns us, that is why we will not be supporting this bill and that is why the government should not be cutting the debate short. The population out there can start putting some pressure on those dinosaurs across the way so we can get some things done.

We are talking about a federal government that is making these very Draconian cuts, but worse it is making them now in a very familiar, sneaky, smoke and mirrors, hidden way. As my friend from Winnipeg North Centre, who made an outstanding speech in this House, said: "The language is there that makes it look good. The language of fairness, the language of concern and the language of good management. The government knows the language".

It knows it so well after seven years of practice but it is too bad it does not start to live up to the language that it uses. The substance is just not there. The real programs and the real dollars are not behind the words.

Canadians should know what this government is doing. We are debating here very dry, very unexciting, very technical changes. It makes closer inspection of government's rosery rhetoric all the more important.

I could give all kinds of figures which would blow our minds. They would certainly upset the population just as much as Bill C–69 did. In that case the government also did not allow enough conversation or enough exchange.

Here we are seeking to undermine the Canada Assistance Plan, extending the capping on day care, on matching funds, on disability payment and on welfare payments. This is actually an attack on poverty. That is what we have out there. We are undermining equalization programs, our medicare system and our post–secondary educational system. Add to that the increase in unemployment insurance payments for employers and employees and the government not accepting its part of the responsibility.

This government is moving out of its traditional domain. It is doing the wrong thing at the wrong time, particularly at this very sensitive time with the constitutional uncertainty that is going on out there.

As we travelled across this world in our duties to learn about other countries and to exchange what can be done as the world becomes a little village, the question I am constantly being asked is: "What is wrong with you out there? You are destroying yourselves. You are destroying this country that millions and millions of people want to come to. You are structurally changing this country, fiscally, socially and culturally. You are destroying it. You are destroying the dream of millions of people".

I was in Hong Kong at the refugee camps that the Prime Minister so glibly talked about. There are tens of thousands of people in those camps who are anxious to get into Canada. They are sleeping in a bed that is the size of a queen size bed stacked three rows high. Yet, here we are tearing down everything that these people want to come to.

What is the matter with this government? It needs its goals re–examined. It needs to understand this country. I would like to take government members and dump them in central and eastern Europe, in Asia and India. They might come home, count their blessings and kiss the soil which this land is all about.

Bill C–20 is cutting provincial transfer payments on health and education. It is taking $338 million of federal money from health and education programs in 1992 and 1993 and a massive $2.3 billion out of our hospitals, medical clinics and post–secondary institutions over the next five years.

Anyone who has a brain, who has gone out there and opened their eyes knows that the country has two weights, if they look at the demographic studies. We are bringing in immigrants because our people are not repopulating this society. As a result we have a youth bulge coming up. At the top we have an aged bulge. The aged need health care delivered from the home, all kinds of housing needs and all kinds of support needs. What are we doing? Cutting back hospital care.

I would say that the tax increases this government is trying to tell us are tax cuts, what it is trying to dump on the provinces, are totally unacceptable. It has used the back door, squeezing the provincial coffers and, as I said, it is trying to sell us on the fact that tax increases are tax cuts and that the benefit cuts are benefit increases. It tries to confuse the population and insulate itself from the criticism that it justly deserves.

We are saying: "Look". We are saying to the media: "Start talking about what is going on out there, get the population up and angry, and let these people know what is going on. The programs it is cutting are totally unacceptable".

I will finish in one minute. I would just like to end up by saying that we are asking the government to protect medicare, to protect the ability of those with little means to attend to their education. Don't add to the line-ups waiting at hospitals, don't make people have to travel to look after their health, don't penalize the disabled or victims of violent crime. That is part of what is in this bill, if one really reads it carefully. It is totally unacceptable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows that it is not with my permission but with everybody's permission. I am just trying to adhere to the rules as they are.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate, although the subject is a painful one. To those of us who listen to Canadians, it is clear the question is not just what will happen as a result of the legislation introduced by the government, it is a matter of attitude, and for the vast majority of Canadians, a matter for concern.

I spent the weekend in my riding, and people asked me whether unemployment insurance funds would be able to respond to the needs of a society that in certain regions of our country is experiencing unemployment rates of more than 30 per cent. Who can guarantee this, Madam Speaker, now that the government has decided employers and employees will have to pay the bill?

When we visit the elderly, they, like those of us who are getting on in years, say they want a health care system like the one we have had for decades in this country. It is very hard to answer these questions, Madam Speaker, because if it only depended on government financing, the ability of the Government of Canada to pay the bills, perhaps we could say: Well, even if times are hard across the country, there is a serious commitment on the part of this government to ensure that in the future, every effort will be made to provide the same security Canadians have known for the last thirty, forty or even fifty years.

[English]

When people ask whether the Canada Pension Plan is going bankrupt, whether or not unemployment insurance is going to remain as a fundamental protection for Canadian men and women in the work place, when people discuss what they see happening in a number of provinces with nurses and doctors, with hospital administrators concerned about the future of medicare, it is very difficult for a member of Parliament or anyone who is sensitive to these issues to be very reassuring.

I wonder if at some point as we progress in the consideration of legislation, not just this particular piece of legislation but other legislation that is being brought forward by the government, if we could have a new statement on the intent of the government. What is its ideology?

Many people in this country voted for the government on an early issue in the 1984 election of jobs, jobs, jobs. Now we are faced with the loss of jobs, jobs, jobs. In 1988 many people voted for this government because they were convinced that, as the government put it, its people were the best managers, it had the people who could best deal with the very, very onerous task of trying to govern this country, to find sufficient funds to maintain fundamental programs and to maintain some balance between debt and income.

Deficits are not at an all-time high; they are staying at $30 billion. Our debt is at $400 billion.

I believe Canadian people have a right now to hear from the government as to what is its vision of this country in the 21st century with respect to an aging population. What assurances is the government prepared to give now similar to what Canadians were told to expect in 1988, that some of the social programs were sacred trusts?

Very few people in Canada remain naive about the problems of trying to finance the operations of federal, provincial and municipal governments. That being said, if this government is to continue on its program of changing very dramatically what Canada is all about and how Canadians can feel secure in their country, not just in terms of the Constitution but in terms of their health, loss of employment and their retirement, there is something dramatically the matter.

We have heard about competitiveness. We are talking about changes in the economic system and our trading partnerships with Canada and the United States. We know what is happening in Europe. We recognize the emerging giants coming out of Asia. There is a great deal of effort being put forward by the government in convincing Canadians that we can no longer afford the kinds of programs we used to have and that people felt secure about in terms of unemployment insurance, medicare and the Canada Pension Plan. If that is the case, then I believe it is incumbent upon this government to demonstrate its courage and its conviction that it does have a plan to deal with these kinds of programs moving into the 21st century.

I would like to issue a plea today on behalf of Canadians that the government come forward and tell Canadians what they can expect. For many years it was gospel in this country that if one was sick one received medical services. If one was out of a job, one received unemployment insurance. If one grew old one was not only eligible for the old age pension per se but also, for those who had participated in the work force, the Canada Pension Plan. Those were tenets, principles of Canadian life and part of what makes us different from most other nations in the world.

Surely all of us in this place have a responsibility to tell Canadians where we are going and what kind of a Canada we are going to have for the sick, the elderly and people who have made their contribution to our society.

Madam Speaker, the time has come to review the Unemployment Insurance Program, for instance. The government and the ministers responsible for introducing legislation on unemployment insurance last year gave Canadians, including workers, the assurance that substantial programs would be provided for training and retraining.

With the advent of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we were promised adjustment programs, and if those programs had been in place, there would certainly be a very substantial number of Canadians who would be eligible for those programs. Whether we are talking about Toronto or my own riding of Acadie—Bathurst or Western Canada, there are men and women who wonder where they should go to take advantage of training and retraining programs. Where do they go to find a job or prepare for finding a job, when they were laid off because a plant or business closed down?

The current constitutional crisis, Madam Speaker, is probably a matter of concern to the vast majority of Canadians as far as national issues go, but on the strictly personal level, there is no doubt that Canadians are worried about a rapidly changing situation. And that is why, Madam Speaker, I would not be surprised that pretty soon—in fact I was expecting to hear in the Throne Speech some echos of a Conservative vision of what Canada would be like at the end of the twentieth century and at the beginning of the twenty-first.

However, if that is not to be, I hope that we will not waste all our energy on the constitutional question, important though it may be, because if we want to renew the confidence of Canadians, we will have to chart a course that will make them feel secure.

• (1740)

It seems to many Canadians that the damage has been done in terms of public confidence in our programs which for many years were the foundation of confidence in this country for those people who were the most vulnerable.

I do not think it serves any useful purpose to simply berate the government or say it should not have done it. Those things have now occurred. I would like the government to address the question directly, rather than indirectly or obtusely, as to what it is going to do. For example, is the government considering a guaranteed annual income? Is it going to scrap a number of support programs and look at innovative, creative new ways to deal with people.

In closing I would say I hope, and I think I speak for many Canadians, that we will hear soon what the new vision of the Conservative government is with respect to medical care in this country, with respect to the Canada Pension Plan and with respect to unemployment insurance, and what kind of generous and caring government and country Canadians from all parts of this great nation can look forward to as we move to the end of this century.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak against Bill C-20 along with the rest of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party because we are concerned that the government has taken the tactic of reducing the national deficit simply by transferring the burden of program cost to the provincial governments. It is very much like somebody who gets into financial trouble and then goes out and robs the grocery store. He simply transfers his financial problems to the owner of a grocery store and so we are not actually reducing the financial problems of Canada or dealing with them.

What the federal government is doing by this legislation is not reducing the problem at all. It is simply transferring the burden of the federal deficit which was caused by federal policies of both the Liberal and Conservative governments over the last several decades to the provincial governments. We are seeing that the provincial governments are transferring those problems down to local governments, as my colleague from Surrey North indicated, or down to individuals in the case of people who are sacked from government jobs and who are seeing their salaries and benefits cut. We are simply transferring the problems which were created by the federal government down to the people who can least afford to bear them in this country.

That is not the way to deal with your problems. What this government should be doing is addressing its own problems head on rather than transferring them to other levels of government.

We are dealing with a bill which extends the worst provisions of Bill C-69, which was passed earlier, by extending the capping of various federal transfer programs for an additional three years and creating even more problems for provinces which have the responsibility to deal with programs such as health care, social services and post-secondary education.

What options do those provinces face? As I said before, they can either absorb the cuts themselves and run into debt or they can pass it on to local governments, which are the creatures of those provincial governments, or to individuals. There have been examples of both which my friend from Surrey North described. He described the Liberal government in Newfoundland which has cut back on health care services as a result of what this federal government has done, cut back on hospital beds and fired about 10 per cent of the nurses in the province of Newfoundland in order to absorb the cuts that the federal government has passed on to that province.

Who is bearing the burden of the cost of federal deficit cutting? It has been passed through those levels of government and right down to those individual citizens of Newfoundland, the people who can absolutely least afford to bear those costs.

It is interesting to see the different reactions of the Tories when they examine what the Ontario government is attempting to do in order to shield its people from the worst impacts of the recession and when they comment on what is happening in Newfoundland.

They seem to look positively at what is happening in Newfoundland when a government sacks its employees and when the government cuts back on its social, health and education programs. This seems to be a satisfactory method of dealing with that kind of issue for the Tory government.

Ontario says: "We are here to serve the ordinary people of Ontario. We are going to shield these people from the worst impacts of the recession so that when the recession is over and when economic recovery returns, they are going to be better able because they will be better educated and they will have better health care. They will be better able to get back into the work force and begin to live productive and effective lives again." This government attacks that method of dealing with the problem.

What the government of Ontario has done is dealt with the problem head on. It said that the buck stops here. We have to deal with it and we have an obligation to defend our citizens against the worst impact of this recession which, by the way, was a recession that this Tory government created. If it were not for the high interest rate policy, the high dollar policy and the trade policy of this federal government, many of the provinces would not be dealing with the kind of serious economic problems they are dealing with right now.

It is interesting that Ontario has taken the tactic it has, because Ontario feels, very much like Tommy Douglas used to say, that the economy is here to serve the people and that the people are not here to serve the economy. Mr. Douglas used to say that the people were the most important thing the government has to deal with. They were the responsibility of government.

I would like to congratulate Ontario for the way it has dealt with the problem. Once this recession is over and once the economic problems are over, and that will probably come with the end of the Tory government, the people of Ontario are going to be better prepared to go back and create a new and good economy for Canada. I think Bob Rae's government has done what any responsible government would have done in this country. I think he is going to be able to deal with the spending problems when the economy recovers in that province, because his people will be better equipped in every way to deal with those problems.

I think the real tragedy in this whole situation is that social programs are the programs least responsible for our deficit problems. Things like medicare, post-secondary education, unemployment insurance and welfare are the least responsible programs for Canada's deficit.

I would like to refer to a column that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on March 13, 1991. It was a column by Frances Russell in which she points out that there are Statistics Canada studies which indicate that the responsibility for the current $400 billion debt can be divided in a number of ways. For example, she says that 44 per cent of that $400 billion debt is due to corporate welfare programs which have been passed by this and by the previous Liberal government, tax forgiveness program which both the Trudeau and the Tory government have passed.

Another 50 per cent of the deficit, she says, quoting the Statistics Canada study, is caused by the interest rates compounding on the interest rates compounding on the original sums which resulted from the problem of those corporate giveaways of the last 20 to 25 years.

Ms. Russell says in her column that only 6 per cent of the deficit can be attributed to, and she has this in quotes, "living beyond our means or out of control government spending which are Tory code words for social programs."

So it is not the social programs in this country that are responsible for the debt which we have accumulated over the last 20 years. What is really responsible for the debt is the corporate giveaway programs which have been extended to corporations and to the wealthy over the last 10 years by both Liberal and Tory governments during that period.

It is interesting to see how the economy affects different people in Canada. My wife was talking to a hairdresser here in Ottawa just a couple of days ago. That hairdresser is a single parent with a child.

• (1750)

She works eight hours a day. She works hard. She is good at the work she does and she is paid at the absolute minimum wage. Also, because she is a single parent head of a family, she has to budget fairly carefully. She has found out that when her income comes in and she compares it to her expenditures, the expenditures exceed the income by $70 a month. That is careful budgeting when you are budgeting down to $70 a month.

Madam Speaker, you are asking me to wind up. I have a 20-minute speech here and 10 minutes allocated.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is only 10 minutes at this time.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): If I may ask the House just to conclude my remarks, I would just like to wind up because the impact on this woman is pretty dramatic. She went to the welfare agencies in Ottawa and she was told that in order for her to make up that $70 through welfare she would have to quit her job and then they would give her enough to meet her expenses.

What kind of a country do we have here? What kind of a policy does this Tory government have when people who are good at their work are working hard, have families to raise and are careful with their expenditures, end up having to be told to go on welfare in order to survive in this country? That is the kind of policy that we are dealing with under this Tory government.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-20, whose purpose is to amend four important Acts of Parliament, namely: the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, the Parliament of Canada Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and, finally, the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Madam Speaker, the debate this afternoon arises from the Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance on February 26 this year. I thought at the time, and I still do today, that this budget was bad for all Canadians. This budget did nothing to get Canadians out of a recession that was created by the unsound policies of this Tory government. In fact, the same economic policies that were responsible for this recession may be found in the latest Budget, and that is why I object to a bill that implements these policies.

Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech by the Minister of Finance on second reading, and I would like to repeat some of the remarks he made. First of all, the minister said that the government had, and I quote from Hansard, June 11, 1991, "—embarked upon a course that places less reliance upon government and taxpayers' pocket books."

Madam Speaker, the minister has a short memory, because two days earlier, at the meeting of federal and provincial Finance ministers in Charlottetown, he said Canadians were taxed to the hilt. He seems to have forgotten that middle-income Canadians are paying $1,500 more in taxes since the Conservatives came to power in 1984. The course chosen by this government is not one that will lead us to a just society, far from it. Earlier I saw the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) in the House. Bill C-20 which we are discussing this afternoon provides for a 24 per cent increase in premiums to be paid by employees and employers.

Madam Speaker, we know perfectly well that in Canada, at least 75 per cent of our businesses are small and medium-sized businesses. This means that these businesses, which are the foundation of our economy, will have a hidden tax to pay as a result of this 24 per cent increase. That is how the government tries to get us out of a recession that was created by its own policies: an excessively high dollar, high interest rates and, the icing on the cake, the GST, as a result of which the government collected $400 million more after the first three months it was in effect.

So, you can see the kind of position this government has put us in, not only with the May 26 Budget, but with all its economic policies since 1984.

Madam Speaker, before the Free Trade Agreement was signed, the government had promised that training courses would be offered to the workers who would loose their jobs to facilitate their reentry into the labour force. Three years later, we are still waiting for these courses, Madam Speaker. What has this government done since the Free Trade Agreement was implemented to ensure that adjustment programs are available to help the people who lost their jobs because of this agreement and the technology transfers flowing from retrain and find a new job? Nothing yet, Madam Speaker.

At the time Bill C-21 was passed, the government promised that $800 million would be allocated to manpower training. How much of these $800 million were spent, Madam Speaker? They are back today with yet another bill penalizing the workers and the work providers with a 24 percent increase in UI premiums. As we can see, Madam Speaker, there is still no training available and the unemployment rate is still very high, but the government is maintaining its high dollar policy anyway.

It is no wonder, Madam Speaker, considering this high dollar policy, the high interest rates and the GST, that Canadians go cross-border shopping on week-ends. The reason is simple: it is because of these economic policies. The government keeps helping companies, first with the FTA and now with these economic policies, to get established south of the border, and encouraging Canadian taxpayers, an incredible number of Canadians to go south. Statistics show, Madam Speaker, that billions of dollars are flowing out of the Canadian economy and in the American economy.

Did the government think about that when it came up with the free trade project? Did they think about a monetary policy that would have made it possible for Canadians to live well in their own country instead of moving south, Madam Speaker?

I see I have very little time left, but I would like to use this time, Madam Speaker, and I know my colleagues will take advantage of the prolonged hours to pursue the debate on these points, because I think that, in terms of economic policies, the Canadian people has had it up to here—I had another expression in mind but you would have called me to order for using unparliamentary language. Nevertheless, I think it is important to carry on with the debate.

I have been here for an hour, and not once has a government member risen to speak on this issue. What are you waiting for, to tell the Canadian people that your economic policies do not work? It is time to give a thriving economic policy to Canadians, especially the young people, so that they can find work and stay in their country instead of going south, to the United States.

Madam Speaker, it is an everyday occurence now to see people going shopping in the United States and companies moving south of the border because of the economic policies of this government.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Madam Speaker, as I will demonstrate, this bill shows very clearly the bad attitude of the government. It also shows a rather deceitful way of governing the country. It is an attempt by this government to hide the truth as regards the points that were emphasized.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps it might be easier for the honourable member if, together, we agreed that it is 6 o'clock. I will recognize him again after the vote.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the motion of Mr. Sobeski (p. 1799).

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I began briefly a few minutes ago talking about this particular bill, C-20. I indicated that during my address I would show that the government had a bad attitude toward the governance of Canadians generally. This is demonstrated by some of the things it is trying to do. This is a very sneaky way of going about the business of trying to govern the country. It is also trying to hide the truth.

What is this Bill C-20 all about? It is about transfer payments, and clearly it is about the extension of the freeze on health, education, the Canada Assistance Program. However, it also involves a number of other programs that are particularly important to Canadians and to provinces: health, education, Canada Assistance Program, equalization, and I could mention several others.

It is also a bill that is extremely mischievous because it uses a stick approach. It is really the law of the jungle.

I want to quote from a research report that has been done on this. In this particular bill, which controls the transfers of massive amounts of moneys to provinces and to territories of Canada, we have a mechanism where, if the government chooses to do so, it could withhold funding in a number of areas. I think it is important to mention all of those areas. The equalization payments total about $8.4 billion. Territorial financing totals over a million dollars. Grants in lieu of taxes total $344 million. Public utilities income tax transfer payments total about $280 million. Statutory subsidies total about $36 million in 1991. The Canada Assistance Plan, as I mentioned, totals $6.4 billion. Crop insurance totals $207 million. The Official Languages in Education program totals $243 million. Miscellaneous health and welfare moneys amount to $170 million. Young offenders services amount to $158 million. Justice totals $77 million and transportation totals $69 million.

If the government, with the passage of Bill C-20 chooses to do so, and I quote: "It will be able to withhold transfers to offending provinces and territories" through these programs that I have just mentioned. That is why I have indicated that it is a mischievous piece of legislation that is extremely misleading.

It is also a piece of legislation that goes further in extending the ideological agenda of the government because it penalizes the poor provinces such as Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the Atlantic provinces. The weak will get weaker, and much, much weaker unless things change and they change quickly.

Let me give an example of where it is particularly brutal.

[Translation]

It is in the field of education. I have talked several times about the administrative rate of 3 per cent that is levied on student loans. Those students are poor, of course, otherwise they would not borrow money if they have any. As far as assistance to students is concerned, I have already mentioned that the criteria have not changed since 1984, even though the inflation rate has gone up 30 per cent and even more. There again, the students have paid a lot more than they should have. It is unfortunate.

They also talk about the GST on books and learning material that students need.

[English]

With respect to the goods and services tax, I want to bring to the House's attention material I have received from a colleague and friend from my constituency. He brought this to my attention to allow me to share with others a very, very serious repercussion relating to the goods and services tax, and I want to quote from this material. "The effect the goods and services tax has on at least one series of books is as follows", and I am quoting from the material he has received from the publisher, an American publisher. The publisher says that: "Canadian orders will be priced under 'Other countries'"—notice that—"rather than the former pricing under 'the U.S. and Canada'".

The publisher explains that this is the result of high administrative costs connected to compliance with the Canadian GST that became effective January 1, 1991. Canadian members must also pay the 7 per cent GST tax on all orders shipped to Canada.

The publisher says: "We will add this 7 per cent to the invoice we send to the Society, and the Society should instruct members to include the 7 per cent GST in their payment to the Society".

The publisher points to high administrative costs in connection with the goods and services tax and, as a consequence, is raising the prices to Canadian customers. These price increases range from 14 to 19 per cent.

This is an example of not only the 7 per cent goods and services tax on education, quite apart from everything else that has been happening, but another administrative cost that has been added on in order to respond to the additional costs of administering this particular tax.

I find this shocking and I find it most unfortunate because the government has always said that it is simply 7 per cent with very, very slight administrative costs.

I have indicated that this bill attempts to control the transfer of moneys. Education and health has been hit in a massive kind of way.

From 1986, when the government started tampering with the formula, to 1995, the date to which it has extended the freeze, we are talking about $30 billion less for health and education, $30 billion. That is quite apart from all of the additional costs that I have mentioned, the 3 per cent administrative fee, no change in student aid criteria since 1984, the goods and services tax and those additional fees that have been added on, no increases in training or retraining, and of course, the limitation of growth in research and development. I could go on. I have mentioned that student debt is growing out of sight, tuition fees increasing at an alarming rate. This government has really botched it this time.

It is unfortunate because it could have corrected a number of things. When one looks at what it has done with the economy—the $30 billion deficit, the $400 billion debt, despite the fact that it had a revenue base of $70 billion in 1984, and now it is in excess of $130 billion—you wonder where the money has gone.

It brags about its 3.8 per cent growth limitation. Of course, it has done that. It has off-loaded it to the provinces which off-load it to the municipalities, to the hospitals, to the colleges, to the universities, to the young men and women out there who are trying to train and become educated so that they can contribute fully to Canada, to our competitiveness as a nation.

I am really concerned that the government has stuck it again to the poor, to the poor provinces, to the students, clearly the handicapped, and many, many other Canadians.

Increases in unemployment insurance premiums are another example of a sneaky, sneaky approach to governing because it increased the premium to employees and to employers by over 20 per cent. It is an indirect kind of tax.

• (1840)

We have not looked at that sufficiently, because we would find massive increases to Canadians throughout this country.

I therefore ask the government to do the truly honourable thing and withdraw this bill immediately.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in this country today, there is a lot of concern over unification. This is a country that seems to have an ongoing debate with respect to the Constitution.

There are other factors besides the Constitution that unify this country. There is some real cement outside the Constitution that keeps us united. Part of that has been a concern by Canadians for all the regions of this country.

We are a country made up of regions and we are a country that is spread out geographically over a large area. This country is a very large nation.

Historically we have found that in order to keep this country together, in order to keep a high standard of living for all Canadians, we have had to implement certain programs and certain policies. Not the least of those programs have been health and education. It is Canada that led the way. Saskatchewan started with the health care program, and the country followed. What we have is a situation where this government is transferring the responsibilities that it has taken in health and education to the provinces.

The reason for national programs in the first place was that certain provinces were unable to provide the same level of health and education that other parts of the country could provide. What we are seeing now is a reversion, a stepping back to that period of time.

When we transfer these responsibilities, we are again going to see certain areas of the country suffering far more than they already suffer. We have already seen health care cuts in Newfoundland. In my province of Saskatchewan, we have seen some major cuts in health and potential cuts in other areas.

Unless a government is going to look after the needs of the poor, the sick and the young, a country will not be healthy. The only government in this country today that has decided to look after those areas of our society has been the government in this province of Ontario under Bob Rae.

The NDP government has received a lot of criticism for its recent budget and for the direction it has taken. It has taken a direction that is different than the federal government and different than any provincial government, but it has decided and it has committed itself to maintaining as high a level of education, of health care and support for those people who need it as it possibly can.

Granted, it is in a better position than many provinces, but it has chosen a different path. It has been the New Democratic Party, over the history of this country, which has chosen a different path. We have chosen a path of committing ourselves to those people who are less fortunate and also to providing opportunities for all Canadians, not just a few.

If this is going to be a country that will stay united, if it is a country that will remain committed to itself, it is essential that we have a viable health care system and a viable educational system. Simply, what we are debating today is a further dismantling of that system.

Unless we proceed to change this attitude, this continued backslide is going to cause more problems with unity in this country than any constitutional change ever did. There are questions this government has to answer that it has been failing to answer. It must justify to Canadians why it is taking this attitude. Why has this government decided to abandon health care? Why has this government decided to cut back on educational transfer payments? Why is it doing these things? Why is it forcing provinces to make some very difficult decisions with respect to hospitals, with respect to nursing care and with respect to education?

The areas that are suffering the most are the areas that can least afford it. We have in this country today large rural areas of Canada which are suffering in many aspects. There are problems with transportation, there are problems with postal services which have been cut. This is a government which has made some vicious cuts in the postal service and is planning to make further drastic cuts. In fact, the government has indicated quite publicly that it wishes to see the postal service privatized. The postal service is now in the business of making money, not providing a service to Canadians. Rural Canadians suffer from that.

In the province of Newfoundland, Memorial University has just recently cut a program that was being sponsored by the university to provide required services to many of the small communities in Newfoundland. It was an extension service of Memorial University which has now been cut. There are something like 700 or 800 small communities in that province. Memorial University, with its extension department, was providing an educational service on a practical basis, where the need had arisen. With the cuts the Clyde Wells government has made, and with its own priorities, which I would suggest are not in the best interests of Newfoundlanders, it has affected that province and those small communities. We see it time and time again.

In my province of Saskatchewan, I have spoken many times on the difficulties that rural Canadians are suffering and the effect it is having on communities. It is also having an effect on the urban centres as well. Certainly the city of Moose Jaw is suffering as a result of programs of this government. No place in the province of Saskatchewan is immune.

What we really need is a government that is going to commit itself to providing essential services to Canada, not on a profit-sharing basis, but on a cost per service basis, a basis that is going to guarantee that all Canadians, whether they live in Toronto or whether they live in Watrous, Saskatchewan, or wherever they live, will be guaranteed a level of service. They need to know they can send their children to school and that there will be opportunities for them to attend university, and that the educational system will still remain as a high institution. As well, they need to know that the health care system will remain the vital institution that it still is today, although it is starting to slide.

I want to close by saying that the onus is on this government to stand up and provide its justification for the direction it is taking this country. It should provide answers for the direction in which it wants to see rural Canada develop, because it is making no comment with respect to that.

I think that Canadians would like to see some members on the government side let us know exactly where they stand with respect to this program, with respect to rural Canada and with respect to the regions of this country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate today, because the bill that we are discussing is Bill C-20 which implements the recent budget restrictions on transfers to the provinces and it is an extremely important bill from the point of view of federal-provincial relations. It is also very important from the point of view of the operation of hospitals, medical facilities generally and educational institutions across this country, very particularly in my riding of Kingston and the Islands where the second largest employer is Queen's University at Kingston. There are two universities, the other is the Royal Military College. It will not be affected by these cuts since it receives its funding directly from the federal government. Kingston's hospitals and Kingston's universities feel the pinch as a result of the proposed changes contemplated in this Bill C-20 and I wish to register my very strong objection to what the government is doing in this case.

I would like to refer to the recent report by the National Council on Welfare which outlined the history of EPF cuts in the last few years, particularly since this government took office. The report is unchallenged by the government. We have had no evidence in any of the speeches given by government members today that would indicate that the report was in any way inaccurate. Perhaps to make clear what is going on, I would like to review some of the items in that report.

In 1986 the government announced that EPF entitlements would no longer grow with the economy as they had done previously but would be held to economic growth minus two percentage points. In 1989 it changed that two to three, so that the EPF entitlements would be held to economic growth minus three percentage points. In the 1990 budget, the government announced a total freeze on EPF entitlements for two years. That is for the two years following that 1990 budget, and after two years the EPF entitlements would increase at the rate of the Gross National Product minus three percentage points, in other words, the old rate.

In the latest budget, and the reason for the bill we have today, the government announced that the freeze on entitlements would continue through to the end of the 1994-95 financial year, and after that the formula of GNP minus three would again apply.

The effect of this freeze that has been imposed is effectively to deprive the provinces of very significant sums of money. I want to look at the chart provided by the National Council on Welfare which indicated the size of the cuts.

I want to point out that in 1986-87, normal EPF entitlement in Canada amounted to $16.8 billion. With the cuts that were imposed in that year, $10 million was given up. By 1991-92, this year, $4 billion a year has been foregone as a result of the changes that the government has introduced. In other words, the provinces are receiving $4 billion less than they would have received had these changes not been introduced.

By the financial year ending March 31, 1995, that figure will have more than doubled to $9.2 billion, a very very significant decrease in the federal contribution to provincial programs in education and health.

I suggest that it is becoming a disastrous chain of events.

Now I want to refer to the stealth with which this government has acted in this matter. The hon. member for Mount Royal in her most able speech earlier today indicated how stealthy and sneaky the government was being in its dealings with the public.

Mr. Volpe: Sneaky anyway.

Mr. Milliken: I think stealthy also applies but it is pretending that the benefits are increasing. I have an example of that in an answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other day in this House. He was being questioned by our most capable deputy leader, the member for Hamilton East. I would like to read the question if I may. I think it is clear on its own, from page 1202 of Hansard.

> Is he aware that as a result of his government's cuts this year, the provinces will be deprived of financing equivalent to 10,000 hospital beds across the country? Is he aware of the fact that at least 10,000 Canadians will be made to wait this year for health care because of his government's cutbacks to the provinces?

The minister answered:

> Mr. Speaker, as usual the member for Hamilton East is wrong.

It shows how little the minister knows about the facts. He went on:

> Money given to the provinces this year is more than it was last year, except that the way we provide the money could be different.

It certainly is different. He is not providing the money. There is a cut and the figures provided by the National Council of Welfare indicate there has been a cut. I can indicate the figure that is shown on its chart is $4 billion less than the provinces would have received had the government not made the changes that it did in the 1986, 1989, 1990, and 1991 budgets.

I think the record is a disgraceful one. It is a disaster. Surely the purpose of education in our country, post-secondary education in particular, is to equip our talented younger people with the skills they need to carry on effectively in the workplace. We have a pressing need in this country for scientists, for persons with scientific skills of a tremendous variety, and persons with high levels of education in a host of fields. We have ample evidence to support that in the fact that there are job opportunities for these people across our country.

At a time when there is a demand for better training and better educational facilities across Canada, the government is bent on reducing the opportunities for those educational institutions to expand and to provide better services. The effect of the government cutbacks is exactly the opposite.

In my own province of Ontario the significant reductions in the ability of universities to deliver programs has been very marked. I do not have the figures here today but I am sure I am stating the fact when I say that the payments to universities for their operations have not kept up with the rate of inflation. The universities across Ontario have been faced with major cutbacks in all kinds of areas in order to continue to pay a reasonable salary to their employees.

It is safe to say also that university salaries have not been overly generous. There have been significant cutbacks in the ability of the universities to pay those salaries. Services have been reduced. Class sizes have increased very significantly.

Recently I attended a function given here on the Hill by the University of Toronto. When I mentioned that in my years at Queen's University I had attended a class with 15 or 20 people in it, I was told what a surprise that was because such classes are a great rarity in Ontario these days. University classes are usually 50 and 60.

That is only because of the cutbacks. It is not because the universities have grown tremendously since those times. They have not, but what has happened is the universities have been unable to afford to maintain staffing levels. They have had cutbacks in staffing levels, in personnel, in the classrooms, in the maintenance of their buildings and in their ability to keep up campuses and staff them properly. I suggest that part of the reason for those cutbacks is this government's attitude as exemplified in Bill C-21.

I wish the government were more far-sighted in its approach to this problem. I do not understand why it feels that given its boasts about trying to help research and education in Canada it would engage in this kind of thing and then make the statements such as those made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other day. Certainly it is true that the provinces are receiving, in dollar terms, slightly more this year than they did last year. However, it is much less than they would have received had the government not announced the freeze in the budget of this year and last year.

To suggest that they are receiving more and, therefore everything is rosy is misleading. It is wrong, it is incorrect and the minister knows it is wrong. He knows he should not make such statements and indeed he should come back into this House, apologize for his statements and withdraw this bill at once.

While I am on my feet may I say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question.

An hon. member: No.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the government saying one thing and doing another.

Time and again we have seen the Prime Minister, his ministers and members of his caucus standing up and saying how important post-secondary education is to Canada, how important it is to educate our youth, how important it is for the growth of our economy that we have a well trained and well educated population.

They say it with a very concentrated, serious look into the television camera here in the House of Commons, and give the impression that they really do favour post-secondary education. They then go and introduce bills, such as Bill C-20 which continues the cuts to the provinces for post-secondary education. They are doing this at a time when the universities in the provinces are increasing their tuition fees. They are doing this at a time when they have cut the moneys available for summer employment for students. They are doing it at a time when jobs are very difficult to obtain, when the rate of unemployment is extremely high.

What will be the result? The result will be, putting all of these policies of the government together, that fewer and fewer people will be able to go to university. The fees will be higher as a result of these cuts that the federal government is dishing out to the provinces. Students will not be able to earn their way to universities with jobs in the private sector or the public sector because the jobs just are not there and the federal government is cutting its support of those programs.

What else is being cut in this bill? Another example of the government saying one thing and doing another. Some people call this sort of politics the politics of rhetoric, the politics of smoke and mirrors where you try to give the impression with that very serious Prime Minister look that you are really in favour of health care and post-secondary education. Then you cut them in another measure another day.

It is the same with health care. The government speaks very highly of its commitment to our health care system—one of the best in the world. It was one of the best in the world, the Canadian medicare system. Here it is, once again, cutting these programs.

If we look at the amounts that the federal government was originally expected to contribute to the provinces under the EPF program—which is the program through which the federal government helps the provinces with respect to post-secondary education and medicare—in 1986 and we look at what in fact it is doing as a result of the bills to cut these contributions starting in 1986, we will see that between 1986 and the year 2000, as a result of this legislation and other similar pieces of legislation, the federal government will have taken away $97.6 billion from the provinces. This is almost $100 billion. Well, $100 billion has to mean a lot to provinces which must find moneys to support their universities, their hospitals, their medical research centres and so on.

For government members to say that this will not mean anything or to give us the impression that they are not really cutting but increasing funding is a fraud on the Canadian population.

The government is trying to pretend that because the amounts in dollars are increasing that it is not cutting. In fact, the provinces, the universities and the health care institutions were led to believe that they were going to get a certain amount in the years 1990–91 and 1991–92 and so on. However, because of bills like this they are not going to get those amounts of money. They are going to be left holding the bag, so to speak.

What is also very insidious about this type of legislation is that the more the federal government cuts the more it aggravates the regional disparities in this country. Under the EPF formula when the federal government redistributed money to the provinces for health care and universities, it was assuring by those moves that the Atlantic provinces and other provinces of Canada—Quebec, Saskatchewan and so on—that are not as wealthy as Ontario and B.C. would have equivalent institutions. It was assuring that no matter where you lived in Canada, you could be assured of hospitals, health care and universities that were of a high standard.

If the federal government takes away the money as it is doing in this bill, it is saying that if you live in a rich province like Ontario—and I say that relatively speaking, because Ontario is also suffering a very serious recession right now— you have better health care facilities and better universities, because there is a lot of industry and a lot of development in Ontario, but if you live in Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia, and you have to rely to a much greater extent on provincial resources, how can you keep up? That is a result of this Bill C–20.

So far I have only spoken about the cuts to health care and to post–secondary education, university education. By the way, post–secondary education also includes the community colleges and the CEGEPs in Quebec, not just universities.

The bill also breaks another promise of the government, and one that I was very closely involved in. That promise concerns the premiums which must be paid for unemployment insurance. When the government introduced its famous Bill C–21 to cut unemployment insurance benefits a few years ago and to transfer some of those benefits into training programs, when it did that the minister made a commitment that unemployment insurance premiums would remain the same for three years, for 1990, 1991, and 1992. At the same time the government withdrew the federal contribution to the unemployment insurance fund which was a very large amount. Under the law, as it then was, if the rate of unemployment went above a certain percentage—I believe it was 6 per cent—then the federal government was obliged to pay for the benefits as a result of the increased unemployment.

With Bill C–21 the government cut out entirely the federal government's contribution, meaning that the entire unemployment insurance fund would have to be supported by the contributions of employers and employees. At the same time, it said: "We are going to freeze contributions by employers and employees to $2.80 per $100 of income, and that would stay the same". However, what did we see in the budget this year and what are we asked to approve in this Bill C–20? The government broke its promise and now, just one year later, it is increasing the premiums which are an additional tax on employers and employees.

As I have said, this government continually says one thing and does another. I do not know how it comes to the conclusion that Canadian citizens are stupid enough not to see these things. But they are not stupid. They see through the smoke and mirrors game of the government and that is why the government is at 14 per cent in the polls.

The people of Canada are not stupid. They do not believe the Prime Minister when he gets up and makes pious statements on television that he believes so sincerely in education and health care and he is going to do this and that. They have come to the point where they do not believe the government any more. The government has no credibility. Yet it still gives us these kinds of bills, asking us to approve cuts that government members have made speeches on to the contrary. We are not going to support this bill. What we are trying to do in this debate is bring the attention of the Canadian public to this because we know that we cannot reverse the government's point of view alone. With all the opposition parties in this House, we are unable to touch that government. It will not listen to us, even though we were elected by a large number of Canadians. What we are trying to do by these televised debates is tell the Canadian people what is being done to them by this government. Hopefully, the Canadian public will rise up and with great public outcry condemn this government, and maybe they can turn back this bill.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was first elected to this House, in his very first speech in the House, he declared: "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country".

Less than a decade later, Canadians are painfully aware of the awful reality of those words of the Prime Minister. Canada today is a nation at a crossroads. This government has been driving this nation relentlessly toward its vision of a new world. It is a corporate vision.

Bill C-20, which we are debating here today, seeks to limit federal expenditures to the provinces in the areas of health care, post-secondary education and income assistance. This bill is an instrument of that government's vision. It is a vision where progress is measured in corporate terms rather than in social terms. It is a vision that does not consider the value of community. It is a vision which few Canadians share.

It is a centralist vision of a Canada where the regions are being sacrificed, slowly but surely, in favour of the fat cats in Ottawa and Bay Street. Almost 60 years ago the social democratic movement way back in the 1930s, the Dirty Thirties, was formed at that time because of a growing distrust of this centralist vision of Canada. It grew from a coalition of prairie farmers, of British Columbia dock workers, of people from all walks of life, who said to the government of that day and that time: "Enough is enough". Almost 60 years later, we are continuing to fight these same battles, this time to save those kinds of social programs and regional programs that we fought so long and hard to implement over the years.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, we talked about it a few days ago in the House, this government simply does not understand the concept of community, it does not understand the idea of regions, it does not understand people. As my colleague that spoke just prior had so eloquently stated, that is why this government is so unpopular with the people of Canada. That is why it is hell-bent for defeat in an election.

Understanding the concept of community means supporting the very things that this legislation is looking to dismantle. It means supporting our universal health care system, it means supporting those unemployed workers put out of work by this same government's economic blunders.

In British Columbia, which is the province that I hail from, and particularly in my riding in the interior of B.C., in the Okanagan—Shuswap, forestry workers and mill workers have been sidelined by this government's past policy of high interest rates, of an artificially high dollar, of a made-in-Canada recession, and in particular, to its complete and utter capitulation to the United States with regard to the 15 per cent softwood export tariff.

In some areas of my riding, up in the Sicamous-Malakwa area, unemployment approaches upward of 40 per cent. This government has completely neglected those people. It has completely misunderstood the need for job creation and the implementation of job retraining programs that this legislation just completely disregards. Understanding community values means adequate funding for municipal and provincial RCMP services.

It means supporting rural post offices where people gather each day to share stories. It means supporting regional job creation programs that will put unemployed workers back into production. It means adequate funding for post-secondary education so our young people will not have to leave their own communities in order to seek job training or higher education.

We have a real challenge ahead of us. These are tough economic times, nobody will argue that point. As this bill before us demonstrates, this government's response to that kind of challenge is to attack Canada's social programs, our first class medical system. Its response is to steal $100 million out of the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program which was a regional job development program that really worked and helped get people back into the employment lines.

Its response to that challenge is to opt out of the funding for unemployment insurance programs and shift that burden on to the backs of the workers and the small business community through this kind of legislation that increases the premiums that those businesses and workers have to pay.

The government's response to the economic challenge of today is to cap the extended program funding to the provinces which will essentially starve the provinces for funds in order to maintain quality standards for health care and education.

Over the next five years, we determine as a result of this particular legislation that it is going to cost British Columbia and the taxpayers of British Columbia over $911 million to maintain the funding that is being stripped away from this kind of legislation that the federal government wants to implement.

We ask the government to recognize the increased need for assistance to the provinces, particularly those provinces hardest hit by this made-in-Canada recession. What is its response? To extend the 5 per cent cap on the Canada Assistance Program, forcing the provinces to bear the extra burden of income assistance payments?

The government hides behind the argument that it is simply broke. It argues that it has to tighten its belt. It argues that the nation's debt is out of control. If it is out of control, it is so because of this government's economic policies and not in spite of it.

In 117 years, going way back from Confederation to 1984, the total accumulated debt was $187 billion. Since 1984, that debt has more than doubled. During eight years of this government's reign, that debt has doubled to over $389 billion. It has been eight years of Tory rule and more than double the accumulated debt since Confederation.

Was this growing debt ever mentioned during the last election? Not a word was mentioned. Not a peep. The Minister of Finance, who was back during that time, said that the country was in great financial shape. He promised what added up to $20 billion in election promises: child care programs, nuclear submarines and increased support for social service programs. As soon as the government was elected, then we suddenly find out that the country is in the poorhouse.

Rather than maintaining the programs that the government promised, what does it do? It cuts. It takes out the broad axe and it cuts programs like VIA Rail, Canada Post, the RCMP, the CBC, national health care programs, unemployment insurance programs, post-secondary education funding and research and development funds.

All the time, not a loophole was closed in the tax write-offs of corporate Canada. I could go on in great detail about the need for real tax reform, which this government seems to completely ignore with this type of legislation.

Let me summarize by saying that if a test of a government's economic policies is a measure of the gap between the privileged and the less fortunate in this country, then by any measure this government has failed the test and failed it utterly.

This government has been an unmitigated disaster for Canada. It has lured us into a trade deal we did not want. It has bludgeoned our national programs. It has created its own made-in-Canada recession. It has driven jobs and people out of the country. It has with a single roll of the dice taken us to the brink of our own demise and it is time we got rid of it.

As the quote has said, and I have repeated it before, it has no vision and when there is no vision, the people perish.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, after hearing many of these very eloquent, articulate and erudite speeches on the troubles that this government has visited upon this poor nation, I wonder whether I can meet the standards set by my colleagues.

Certainly when we talk about Bill C-20 one can only speak with outrage. With a bill such as this we are eroding some of the basic programs, the large educational, medicare and social programs which have become the hallmark of this country and we are doing it in such a surreptitious fashion with a bill which seems so inconsequential and technical as to almost be overlooked.

We have seen all hon. colleagues in this House over the course of this day debate, bring and underscore all of those elements which can only be described as so negative as to be corrosive and erosive.

What does this mean for federal-provincial relations in this country? It means, as some of the colleagues from my caucus have pointed out, that the government has turned its back on a pro-active role for Canada at a time when our country cries out for a government that is active in the direction of bringing people together, joining regions together and bringing provinces to the table.

What does our government do? It says no, the most important issue is one of balancing books, ensuring that the budget be reduced in terms of its public debt and reducing the dragon that has resisted all attempts over the course of the last seven years, the deficit.

Under the guise of ensuring that the deficit comes under manageable control, the government is abdicating all responsibilities of nation building, bringing people together and ensuring that all Canadians have a stake in this country. They can only ensure this stake, live and materialize it, if they see that all of their hard-earned income, sacrifices, and commitments to their communities, provinces and fellow Canadians result in the kinds of programs that give them access to Canadianism and to a patriotic involvement in medicare, education and those standards that define us, both by our aspirations and by our achievements, those standards that give each and every one of us in this country and elsewhere an indication of what we stand for, both from the point of view of youth and from those who are not as young.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I speak to someone who is more than interested in some of the figures that I draw to your attention. By the end of this decade 14 per cent of our population will be in the area we call seniors. With an aging population, what are we doing? The government says it is going to establish the kinds of cuts and restraints that will ensure that people who fall into that category of seniors, those people who may not be so fortunate as to have access to the kind of jobs that will provide them with a standard of living to which they have become accustomed and through no fault of their own have seen eroded, will not have sufficient funds at their disposal.

We are going to abdicate our responsibility to Canadians who have contributed to this country by sweat of brow, by dint of participation and by a desire to ensure that the political format, the economy and the social structure be such that they take care of each and every one of us, one and all, at a time when we need them the most.

One of the tragedies of today is that the cuts in the EPF financing put at greater risk many of those seniors who rely on their Canada Pension Plan contributions and Old Age Security which combined, assuming that individual Canadians were able to participate fully in the previous program, will give them very little more than $900 a month, on an eroding basis. That $900 a month in the city of Toronto will get them very, very little. The cost of living in a city like Toronto when one takes into account the amount one has to pay for rent and then for a food basket, leaves very little for anyone who falls into the category of seniors.

What are we doing as a country? As I said earlier on, we are turning our backs and abdicating our responsibilities to those people who contributed mightily to the creation of a system upon which they can no longer draw. It is almost criminal that I would have to introduce this example. In Canada we have many Canadians who come from other countries. Fully 8 million Canadians do not have their origins in this country, and they are proud Canadians nonetheless. They have contributed to the wealth of this country. They continue to strengthen its social and cultural fabric, but they still have ties, cultural and spiritual ties elsewhere.

The countries that spawned them still recognize contributions. I might cite one. The country of Italy contributes to former Italian residents. They are Canadian citizens and Italy contributes to them and to their well-being; in this country over $250 million annually in pensions, $250 million annually. Italy infuses a quarter of a billion dollars into our economy because those people simply exist.

Our government taxes them to the tune of better than $50 million. In other reciprocal arrangements with Italy and other countries, our government does not even transfer one-half of that tax on those pensions alone. Those citizens represent for us an enormous wealth just by being here, with this infusion of cash that comes in. It allows the government not to give the attention it should to the plight of citizens, because it knows there is a quarter of a billion dollars annually coming from a generous foreign authority. It knows it can draw a further $50 million from such revenues.

It has become even more lax in terms of accepting financial responsibility for the benefits of its citizens. Those citizens, like so many other seniors, are subject to increasing property tax and increasing provincial taxes, and then have to be subjected to a GST of 7 per cent.

We have seen what has happened. GST has driven hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the border looking for a better bargain for their hard earned cash. Those seniors do not have such an opportunity. We, as members of Parliament, as a Canadian government, turn our backs on those who need us most. Who speaks for them if not those members of Parliament from this side of the House who point out all of the deficiencies of a bill such as Bill C-20? I compliment my colleagues who have done such a great job in pointing out all the pitfalls.

I also compliment them for pointing out that all of those issues that relate to the unemployment insurance program, which we fought so dearly last year prior to the implementation of Bill C–21, are now beginning to show all of the nefarious components that we predicted and that the government denied. Over the course of this last year, the Minister of Finance has seen fit to increase by 24 per cent the premiums charged on those who do work.

Very few of us are taking the government to task for withdrawing from the plan completely in the first place and still putting an extra burden on workers and employers who are still fortunate enough, despite the government's economic program, to be in a situation in which they can either provide work or work.

What has the government done in that regard? In my own city of Toronto, which used to be one of the richest places in Canada, the unemployment rate is higher than that of any two Atlantic provinces together. If you are unemployed you do not care what part of the country you come from, you are unemployed. There is no income, no food on the table for your family, no extra income, no disposable income to stimulate other economic activities by spending.

What happens? This government abandons both students and unemployed with its SEED program. On the average in the city of Toronto, $14,000 per riding is expended on the SEED program.

I can only say, along with my colleagues, that the priorities established under C–20 are absolutely skewed in the wrong direction. If anything, more of us should be outraged at the profanity that is being perpetrated by this government. We should say no to C–20 and no to some of these financial programs which the government wants to force on us.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. colleague from Eglinton–Lawrence for his most articulate appeal. I fear, however, that this appeal falls on deaf ears.

Mr. Weiner: No way, we heard every word.

Ms. Clancy: Ah, yes. The minister says he heard every word. The hon. minister has been hearing every word lo this two and a half years. The hon. minister, however, has not managed to change the course of government policy in this direction, thus leading to, among other things, a variety of wiener roasts across the country, but we will let that go unsaid.

Mr. Weiner: Just came from Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Where they had another wiener roast, yes.

Mr. Arseneault: Oh, that is not nice.

Ms. Clancy: Is it not?

Mr. Arseneault: No.

Mr. Weiner: Take the high road, Mary.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am advised by my hon. colleague over here to take the high road. I think he would agree with me, however, that it is hard to take the high road. It is particularly hard to take the high road when you are an Atlantic Canadian and when you see what has been done deliberately, barefacedly to the four provinces clinging to the coast of Canada during the past seven years of this government.

I cannot count the number of times I have stood in this House and argued, cajoled, orated and pleaded with this government to stop turning a blind eye to what is effectively an increase in human misery in the Atlantic provinces.

My colleague from Eglinton–Lawrence mentioned that the unemployment rate in Toronto was more than two Atlantic provinces put together and those are shocking statistics. However, the 20 of us on this side of the House who represent Atlantic Canadian ridings can tell the House that numbers like that have been a daily occurrence for far too long in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and in Prince Edward Island.

The cuts to Established Programs Financing pour salt on a wound that may already be fatal. There are two areas I want to talk about in the short time I have available to me tonight on this very important bill. The two areas are health care and post–secondary education.

Regarding health care, today in The Ottawa Citizen the president–elect of the Canadian Public Health Association says that his association research shows that reduced federal funding will mean a loss of $3.3 billion in health care money available this year and a loss of $30 billion by the end of 1996.

Thirty billion dollars. I do not know about the rest of you but I have great difficulty encompassing that figure. I cannot really get my mind around it. The figure is too large. So what can I get my mind around? I can get my mind around the fact that the cuts to Established Programs Financing put forward in this bill by this government are dealing a death blow to health care in Atlantic Canada, in Canada in general but in the four hard-pressed provinces of the Atlantic more so than anywhere else.

I will come back to health care, but I also want to talk very briefly about post-secondary education, again in the Atlantic provinces. I do not know how many times I have stood in this House and cajoled and pleaded and berated on behalf of the Atlantic universities. I have some experience with the Atlantic universities. I was a faculty member at three different universities over the past 10 years. I was a part-time faculty member at that. Believe me, part-time faculty members know just how poorly paid faculty members can be. It is so bad indeed that at the medical school in Halifax, doctors have to pay to practise as well as to teach at Dalhousie medical school. That is how hard-pressed our medical facility is in Halifax.

We have a number of universities in Atlantic Canada. I happen to have graduated from two of them, Mount St. Vincent University, the only women's university in the British Commonwealth, and Dalhousie University which bears one of the proudest names for its professional schools in particular in this country.

I have served on the boards of governors of both those universities as well as teaching at both of them and having been a student there. On top of that I was President of the National Board of the Alumni of Mount St. Vincent University. Therefore, I am fairly familiar with the workings and the financial exigencies faced by those universities. Believe me, the cuts to Established Programs Financing are putting a crimp in the style of those universities which could be fatal to their future health.

In the Atlantic universities now we have the oldest physical plants, the lowest faculty salaries and the highest university tuitions.

My colleague from Eglinton-Lawrence mentioned the fact that the SEED grants were down this summer. Down they are. With tuition rates as high as they are in Atlantic Canada, with the cuts across the board—and I am thinking particularly of Nova Scotia right now—both provincially and federally, the jobs for young people, for university students this summer are few and far between.

Let me illustrate. A relative of mine is opening up a business in Halifax which will hire six or seven people. Two weeks ago he held interviews and 400 young people showed up for the interviews—400. My young cousin, who is beginning this business, was depressed by the fact that he had to say no to at least 393 of the people who showed up looking for jobs. People who want to work, people who need to work so that they can pay the extra high tuitions that have to be charged to keep the Atlantic universities going. And what is there for them? Precious little.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are telling me I have a minute left. Perhaps I can wrap into that one minute all the pleas, all the cajoling, all the berating and some of the insulting that I have done over the past two and a half years since I came to this Chamber. During that time I have had the pleasure of representing the people of Halifax and the pain of watching what deliberate government policy has done to them. So I say to the minister present, to the members present on the government side of the House, think about what you do. We are a part of this country too. We are citizens of Canada, equal and proud and with as much right to the joys and the benefits of Canadian citizenry as anyone. We resent most highly the way your policies have dealt with us and with our part of the country and we want to remind you that this resentment will not go unmarked.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on the budget bill, Bill C-20. I participate because I profoundly disagree with the economic and budgetary policies, not only of this government, but of successive governments, in fact, going back in this country to Confederation.

We happen to live in one of the most privileged corners of the globe. We have a relatively small population, with a relatively high level of technological experience and infrastructure yet, as we look around our country today, we see how we are increasingly squandering our heritage.

I think any budget, including this budget and this bill, must satisfy three tests: first, what does it do about the inequality of wealth in this country? We have a country which, despite our wealth, has one of the worst records in the industrial world for a spread between rich and poor. Over a million Canadians suffer serious chronic poverty, many of them children, most of them women. Over the last six years; in fact, one can reach back into the seventies under successive Liberal and Conservative governments and find that we have increased that spread between rich and poor. This budget, this legislation, fails the test of what it can do for equality of income in Canada.

The second test is how a government, in this case the federal government, uses the power of budget and uses its economic policies to insert progressive social and environmental policies into the marketplace. It now appears that virtually all of us believe that the market has its place, the market is a very efficient tool for the redistribution of certain economic considerations and for developing a certain aspect of our wealth.

But I think all of us agree that the market fails to consider social and environmental factors in its decision–making. It is the responsibility of government and of Parliament to insist on certain social and environmental values, for example, the right of collective bargaining, fair standards in the workplace, pay equity, an end to discrimination, environmentally sound policies. This budget erodes the relatively inadequate policies that we already have.

Speaker after speaker has drawn the attention of this House to the abject failure of this government to take its responsibilities seriously for the maintenance of social and environmental standards: the shift of responsibility to the provinces, the erosion of our health care, the inadequate support for poverty groups and for women's programs in this country, the complete failure to take an effective lead in preserving our environment. This budget fails that test.

The third test is whether this budget contributes to the creation of wealth, how we as a country earn our living. We just had the advantage of going to Halifax 10 days ago and visiting the shipyard. I know from my own constituency in Victoria the state of the shipbuilding industry in this country. It has been allowed to collapse under the neglect of Conservative and Liberal policies over the last two decades.

We look at industry after industry. Liberal policies turned the fishing industry over to private companies and this government failed to respond to the disaster in the fishing industry on both coasts. We look at the destruction of the agricultural industry across Canada, the free trade agreement with its destruction of the manufacturing industry. Almost every industry and the way we have to earn our living has been turned over by this government to the marketplace, a marketplace which is increasingly owned by the United States, and other foreign capital, whose interest is not Canadian, whose interest is only in making a dollar for foreign investors.

As a result, our ability to earn our living is fast seeping out of this country. The government in the Speech from the Throne pays lip service to education and research. It says this is critical to make us competitive. Yet where is the money? Where is the leadership? What is the government doing? Zero. This government is failing future generations of Canadians in failing to ensure that education, training, and research in Canada is of first quality. It is a national responsibility that this should happen, that education, training and research should be given top priority. It is the only way in which we can compete in the future, and it will not be enough for the government to make nice statements in the Speech from the Throne. This government, in this bill, and in this budget, has failed Canadians.

Where do we go from here? We look at where the government has spent money. I am the defence/disarmament critic for our party and I have the budgetary estimates for defence. Let us look at some of the things it has chosen to spend money on. It cut programs for seniors, for women, for children, for prevention of crime through social development, it cut programs across the board that will help the ordinary people of Canada.

But look at some of the things it does spend money on. This year, in my own constituency of Victoria, the estimates provide $1.597 million for a new cadet dining hall at Royal Roads, and nearly $1 million for additional cadet quarters. For projects in other parts it is going to spend over $16 million for new facilities for Canadian Forces maritime experimental and test ranges, $241,000 for new jetties, $695,000 for a new officers' mess, $3.7 million for programs in Kingston, Ontario, a naval reserve armoury, $1 million for a naval reserve division in London, $4 million for Moose Jaw, and nearly $8 million in Chilliwack, one of the bases that is said to be up for closure.

There is spending in area after area. There is $1.2 billion being spent on maintaining troops in Europe years after the cold war is over. For equipment which can only be used in Europe, for practical purposes, over $1 billion has been committed by the government in this year's spending estimates. In area after area, this government has its priorities backwards.

In the New Democratic Party, we say that it is time to give the people a voice in how the funds are to be spent. If you went to the people of Victoria, Mr. Speaker, and asked them whether they wanted to spend $2 million on a cadet mess at Royal Roads, they would say no. Sewage treatment is more important in the Victoria area. Education and training, support for universities and community colleges in our area is more important. Support for health care and health facilities in our area is more important. Even customs facilities are sorely neglected by this government. Public parks in the area are sorely neglected by this government.

It is time we had a fundamental change in how this country is governed. For too long, we have been governed by parties whose essential responsibility has been serving the corporate sector which is now primarily owned outside our country. It is time we had a change, a new government and it is time the people of this country spoke out and said: "This budget is wrong. This legislation is wrong. We demand a change."

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, this bill is probably one of the most aggressive pieces of legislation ever introduced by the Government of Canada.

It should be known as the "bond and gag" provinces bill. That is exactly what it does. If we were to use a nautical metaphor, perhaps they are pushing the provinces to the end of the gang plank with a blindfold over their eyes. It completely restricts and inhibits the provinces for operating programs which people have been used to for years.

I am thinking of programs of not only health and education. The government started by cutting back on Established Programs Financing. What it means in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador is the closing of hospital beds. Provinces such as that depend heavily on federal transfer payments to operate hospital beds and classrooms.

They depend heavily on those transfer payments. When those transfer payments are cut back, one of two things has to happen. Either the province has to increase its costs because it is limited in the amount of tax revenue it can collect or it has to shut down classrooms and hospital beds. That has happened in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador as a result of the regressive and restrictive acts of the Government of Canada.

Beds have been closed and classrooms have been closed in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. I should say too that this comes at a time when this country supposedly is entering what is known as the information economy, in which knowledge and education are more important than ever before.

In a province which has the highest employment rate of anywhere in the country, the young people who want a chance at a job, an occupation and a good way of life are restricted from getting that at the very time when that opportunity means more to them than ever before. That is the effect of the policy of the government. It is not just the last budget. The last several budgets have consistently restricted the growth of Established Programs Financing to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Now the government has said: "If as a result of the cutbacks we have made in transfer payments for health services, you institute additional costs on the people who receive those services, that health care and that education, and if provinces such as Newfoundland and Labrador institute additional costs, you are going to be penalized. How are you going to be penalized? You are going to be penalized in the most severe and restrictive way you can imagine. We can cut any transfer payments to you as a province."

Any program that the Government of Canada now enters into with the province of Newfoundland and Labrador as a result of Bill C–20 can be cut. If that government were to try to maintain the level of services that were previously offered by increasing costs, which it would have to do as a result of the cutbacks of Established Programs Financing, it would be penalized by equalization payments being cut.

The province of Newfoundland is trying to increase those equalization payments. Equalization payments can be cut by the Government of Canada if the province of Newfoundland dares to institute costs which simply maintain the level of services that people are getting at the moment.

What else can be cut besides equalization payments? Grants in lieu of taxes can be cut. The community of Goose Bay is probably not unique in Canada.

It is one of those communities which does not have an established, strong private sector. It depends very heavily on the Government of Canada facilities in that town. There is an air force base in Goose Bay and about 2,000 people owe their living directly or indirectly to that. The municipal government depends on that as another community would on Abitibi or the Iron Ore Company of Canada or MacMillan Bloedel.

The Government of Canada in Goose Bay is in exactly the same position as a major corporate taxpayer and the Government of Canada transfers every year to the municipality of Goose Bay a great deal of its budget, the budget it, at the municipal level, uses to provide normal services to the people who live in that community.

If Bill C–20 goes through, grants in lieu of taxes can be cut. If the province of Newfoundland dares to increase costs to maintain a level of services, the Government of Canada can now cut out the grants in lieu of taxes to Goose Bay and every other similar community in Canada.

What else can they cut?

Native people, the Inuit, the Innu who live in Labrador depend for their education, their health services, their post–secondary education and for many of the services in their community on federal–provincial agreements between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador because the Government of Canada transfers to the province of Newfoundland an amount equal to what it pays per capita on average to a native person anywhere else in this country. It transfers every year to the province of Newfoundland that amount for providing services to native people.

If Bill C–20 goes through and if the province of Newfoundland and Labrador has the temerity to increase costs in order to maintain a decent level of services, grants for native funding to Newfoundland and Labrador can be cut.

What else can be cut?

Many women who want to enter the work force are single mothers. Seventy per cent of all post–secondary education students, part time, are women. Many of those, probably the majority, are single mothers. Why do they want an education? They want an education because it is the only passport they have to success.

What happens to their children while they go after that passport? They must have day care.

If Bill C–20 goes through, the Canada Assistance Plan, which is the main vehicle for providing day care to those who have children and who yet want to take advantage of post–secondary education, can be cut automatically and arbitrarily by the Government of Canada if the province of Newfoundland and Labrador dares to increase its costs in order to maintain services because of the cutbacks of the Government of Canada in Established Programs Financing and other budgetary items. If it does that the Government of Canada has the right under C–20 to cut back the Canada Assistance Plan.

This is bad enough anywhere in the country. It is doubly worse in rural areas or in single industry towns and which are well away from urban centres, but in northern Canada it can be even more disastrous.

I have just cited the example of Goose Bay, a community of about 8,000 people which could be severely affected if grants in lieu of taxes are cut.

I thought that the Government of Canada had realized that it simply cannot treat everybody in this country equally. There are some who are stronger and there are some who are weaker, there are some who have a strong private sector and some who have a weak private sector. There are some who have well developed economies and there are some who have less well developed economies. If you treat everybody the same across the board, then those who are far away and remote suffer more than others do.

I thought the Government of Canada had realized that because in its policy on the taxation of northern benefits it showed some understanding. I would say that the policy now of this present government is more generous and more comprehensive than the policy under the previous administration. All we were able to do was maintain the lack of taxation of northern benefits. The present government has instituted a wider and more generous program. I thought it understood the special needs of northern Canada, but it obviously does not.

Under this particular bill, under this most regressive piece of legislation we have ever seen, it has the right to cut payments to native peoples, payments to students, payments to patients in hospital, payments to single mothers and payments to all those who are disadvantaged wherever they live in Canada, in cities but more particularly I am thinking of those in remote areas.

This bill cannot be allowed to pass. Those of us in this Chamber must do everything possible to stop it. We must say now, to all those Canadians who are listening across the country that it is time we had a revolution like the one we had on gray power when the government tried to tamper with pension payments. We saw a movement among the people in this country which forced the government to cancel that particular initiative. The same force must be used here, the same political power must be used here.

If this legislation goes through, it will give the government an ironclad grip, unmercifully bearing down on the economic future of young and old alike, all Canadians no matter where they live, in urban or in rural communities.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–20 is part of the continuing and sorry saga of Tory cutbacks in federal transfer payments to the provinces. If there were no cutbacks at all, there would be no need for this bill, no need whatsoever. It would be business as usual. The government would continue as a full partner in medicare.

According to this government, the purpose of the bill is to provide the government with the power to enforce provisions of the Canada Health Act. With the government getting out of medicare in just a few years down the road, it would soon have no say in the operations of our national health scheme.

The Tories, and this is their line, have brought in this bill ostensibly designed to punish provinces which do not live up to the Canada Health Act. This is the Tory way of saying that we care about medicare. Do not believe it. Do not believe it for a minute. Do not believe it because there is a good chance that this bill, if it ever became law, would be thrown out by the courts.

Under our Constitution, the administration of health care is the sole prerogative of the provinces, and the provinces certainly will not let go unchallenged any law that would punish them for the way they run their health schemes.

The federal Tories have had a say in medicare since they assumed power in 1984, but only because they provided cash. Once the cash is gone, so goes the say in running medicare, Bill C–20 or no Bill C–20; it is as simple as that. In other words, this bill is a sham and it is a fraud. If the government really cares about medicare the way it says it does, then I say this: fund medicare. It is the proper thing to do. It is the only thing to do. It is exactly what the Canadian people want this government to do. Fund medicare and fund it properly. Medicare is a source of pride for all Canadians. It is one of the high points of our civilization. It provides us with one of those wonderful differences between ourselves and Americans. The Americans are deeply jealous of our system, deeply jealous of medicare. They wish they had it, and they wish they had responsible politicians who would give it to them.

Canadians were shocked when they heard a report from the National Council of Welfare the other day. The report said: "Soon medicare will be effectively dead as a national health insurance system." This does not come from a partisan political party, it comes from an advisory group to the federal government itself, and a highly respected group at that.

According to the welfare council, if the current trend continues, these cash payments to the provinces will first disappear in the province of Quebec just five years from now. The last payment, according to the current trend, will occur in the fiscal year 2009–2010, and that would be to the territory of Yukon.

If this happens, what would be the result? According to the Welfare Council—we will pick a group which is not partisan on this issue—it says, and I quote: "Without substantial federal cash payments, regional disparities would be magnified and people in poorer provinces would have to make do with health care services which are inferior to the services enjoyed by Canadians who happen to live in richer provinces".

The people of my province, Manitoba, understand that. They know that if they are left to finance medicare on their own, they would not be able to afford the kind of health care scheme that richer Ontario could sustain. If that were to happen, in a sense Manitobans would be turned into second-class citizens. That, to me, is totally unacceptable. To me there is only one kind of Canadian citizen, and that is a first-class Canadian citizen.

I believe, to my very core, that Canadians will punish any political party that does not give its full support to medicare and that is why I believe that they will defeat this government at the first opportunity. Canadians also have this warning. They warn anyone to beware of politicians who advocate putting medicare in the hands of the provinces. It is a warning because it is just a code word for getting rid of medicare. Those politicians know very well that the smaller provinces cannot afford the kind of medicare that we have become accustomed to.

What have we become accustomed to? Have we become accustomed to a scheme, to a national program that we really cannot afford? Not on your life. On a comparative basis medicare is a bargain. It is a bargain, particularly compared to what is available in our big neighbouring country of the United States of America. We Canadians spend only 9 per cent of our wealth on medicare, and from that 9 per cent of our wealth we receive full coverage.

What is the case in the United States? It spends 12 per cent of its wealth on its national health scheme. Under its scheme almost 40 million Americans have no health coverage at all, and another 100 million Americans have only spotty coverage. Think of it. We spend 9 per cent for full coverage while Americans spend 12 per cent of their wealth and they have poor coverage.

One other thing, and this should always be driven home, we spend no more as a percentage of our wealth on medicare today than we did 10 years ago. That is an absolute fact.

I want to say a few words about post-secondary education. I want to mention post-secondary education because these cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces also affect federal support of our colleges and universities. Federal funding has made it possible for huge numbers of Canadians to go to college and university without having to pay exorbitantly high tuition fees. That is another of those wonderful differences between ourselves and Americans. Any cuts in the area of post-secondary education are very worrisome to me, and I would say very worrisome to most Canadians. I say that because of the real link between poverty and the level of education.

The Welfare Council printed a graph which shows very clearly the link between poverty and the level of education. This graph shows that almost 20 per cent of family heads with an elementary education live below the poverty line and 60 per cent of Canadian individuals with elementary education live below the poverty line. How does that compare with those who have gone to university? About four per cent of family heads with university education live below the poverty line and about 12 to 13 per cent of those with university education live below the poverty line. That is the link between post-secondary education and poverty and it is something that we should not tolerate.

The Tories talk about increasing competition around the world. How are we going to compete in this global environment if we cut back on education?

This bill should be defeated and it should be defeated now because it is simply a continuation of the erosion of federal support of medicare and post-secondary education.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to rise tonight to discuss this bill. It is a bill which furthers the off-loading of federal responsibilities on to the backs of the provinces and, as in the case of other matters, the backs of municipalities as well.

In Saskatchewan we are only too aware of the results of the off-loading of federal programs on to provinces and municipalities. In fact, thanks to the efforts of members of the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association the matter of RCMP funding was reviewed and readdressed by this government. RCMP funding is something that would devastate the funding base of Saskatchewan's smaller communities. Thanks to Mayor Carlson in Melfort, who headed up the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association negotiation team, and representations by numerous members of Parliament in this House the issue was readdressed by this government.

We can only hope that the government will also be reconsidering the moves that it is making in terms of off-loading for education and health care spending as well.

Certainly, the off-loading restricts the provinces in their ability to do other things. Those other things are within their own area of responsibility, such as funding infrastructures within the provincial boundaries to ensure that we have good quality facilities for the delivering of education and health care, and also the structure of sewer and water systems in the provinces, highway systems in the provinces, and the other structures that we rely on for improving our quality of life.

A province like Saskatchewan, significantly rural in nature, relies heavily on that collective support base from the province and the federal government. The support base helped, during the CCF years in Saskatchewan, to deliver the electrification period to the rural areas. Without that we could not fly over Saskatchewan today and witness the bright dots of light all over that province.

It also means that if the province has good funding for education and health care it can support the other areas of economic concern which are the direct responsibility of the provincial governments.

I speak specifically here, coming from Saskatchewan, of agricultural issues. I personally would like to see the federal government take more responsibility for agricultural matters. I do not believe that the provinces should have the level of responsibility that they are being forced to accept for agricultural issues. Certainly if the funds were available to adequately finance education and health care then the provinces would be freer to fund such programs as the crop insurance and income insurance programs which have been developed recently. I am also quite critical about the agricultural support program that exists today.

I am very proud of the work done by New Democrats at our recent convention in Halifax, held just a weekend ago. Party members from all across Canada attended a national convention in Atlantic Canada. One of the main resolutions coming out of that convention was one dealing with farm policy on the prairies. It was very pleasing to me to recognize the unanimous support of Canadians from across the country for our agricultural policy.

I would like to bring parts of it to the attention of the House, because I think there is nothing more important than communication, sharing information and understanding. One of the things that impressed me about our convention in Halifax was that Canadians from broad, diverse backgrounds got together to discuss issues, the Constitution among them. This agricultural policy was developed by people who have an interest in shipbuilding, mining, real estate, teaching, small and medium sized businesses, and people who just have an interest in people in general.

The delegates to the convention recognized that GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, a joint program supported by the federal government and negotiated with the provinces, did not return the cost of production to the farmers. They felt that it was very important for the government to develop programs that would do that. The delegates looked very closely at the way the GRIP was being administered and said: "This certainly off-loads federal responsibilities on to the provinces". It was another one of those programs which was tying the hands of the provinces for funds which they should not have had the responsibility for.

The federal government funds a piece of the program, but the producers, the farmers within that province, do not have access to those funds unless the provinces agree to support the program as well and kick in a certain amount of funding for it.

In Saskatchewan we are now seeing the provincial Conservative government being forced to harmonize the provincial tax system with the federal government's GST. They are saying it is because they have to support this federal government agriculture program financially.

Therefore, off-loading has really hurt the people of Saskatchewan. I do not have to tell them, but I tell members of the Conservative Party here in the House that the people who just a few months ago were not paying any tax on restaurant meals or children's clothing are now finding that they have the 7 per cent GST and now a brand new provincial 7 per cent tax being added on to those items and in the near future to all services—mechanics fees', accountants' fees, lawyers' fees and those sorts of thing which were not previously taxed either by provincial or federal government.

When this group of people looked at the agricultural policy, they felt that there were some very important things that had to be dealt with. The New Democratic Party has now developed a support program for agriculture, supported by members of the party from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island.

The resolution of the party is very specific. It asks that any agricultural program not down-load the costs to the territorial or provincial governments and to the farmers. It also asks that any program be based on the cost of production and not some artificial numbers that the government or someone else comes up with. It has pay-out levels capped at a reasonable level. In other words, in order to prevent the large farmers from getting the lion's share of any dollars available on support programs, they are evenly distributed to ensure that the small and medium sized producers get more, I would say in this case, than their fair share of the support dollars available. More important, the policy supports the marketing of all grains and oilseeds through the Canadian Wheat Board and would like the name of the Canadian Wheat Board changed to the Canadian Grains Board, indicating that the export marketing of grain would include oilseeds as well as grains.

Certainly the policy supports the reinstatement of a two-price wheat policy in Canada, the policy that this government implemented in order to help lower the price of breads in Canada because we would be able to bring in lower priced wheat for milling. In fact anyone who has bought bread in Canada knows that the change in the two-price wheat system has only been to the detriment of the farmer and not to the benefit of the consumer.

Our policy also suggests and demands that we continue the interest-free, cash advance program on a permanent basis and that it establishes a market assurance program in which farmers would be paid for unsold grain at the end of the crop year and storage would also be paid for that grain. Finally, the program would have to be sensitive to environmental concerns and to the need for sustainable production.

There is a great need for strong agricultural policy in provinces like Saskatchewan. We cannot deliver those types of programs if the hands of the provinces are restricted by federal policies tied to the off-loading of funding.

It is time this government and its supporters rethink the way in which they are looking at this type of government control over spending and develop much fairer programs that are much more inclusive for the Canadian population.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity tonight to express my views on Bill C-20, an act which extends the government's cap on Established Programs Financing.

As members know, this bill already reduces the federal government's commitment to the federal cash payments that go to the provinces for education and health. It also invokes the increase in unemployment insurance premiums which were announced in the last budget among other things.

This government has been talking for some time about the need for Canada to be internationally competitive. I do not think anyone quarrels with that objective, but certainly a government is judged or should be judged on its deed and its policies, not on its words and on its rhetoric.

In 1991 the former finance minister said that the world economy continued to grow more fiercely competitive. I want to quote what he said. He said that the fundamental problem is that our underlying ability to compete in the world marketplace has been falling behind that of our trading partners.

I commend the government for recognizing the problem, but I certainly condemn it for doing nothing about it. In fact, this government continues to bring in policies that have a negative effect on the institutions which train, educate and prepare our future work force for the challenges of international competition.

How are we going to compete in this fiercely competitive, international, economic environment if our work force is not equipped to compete?

This legislation that we have before us this evening continues the cap on the federal transfer payments for health and education. Right now universities are already feeling intense pressure from the federal government's cutbacks to date. We should be encouraging Canadians to attend post-secondary institutions. Instead this government is making policies that have a detrimental effect not only on the quality of the education experience, but on the financial capability of young Canadians to afford this necessary education.

I look at my own province of Prince Edward Island where just recently the University of Prince Edward Island announced that it would have to raise tuition fees 15 per cent. Student loans have not increased since 1984. Students are also feeling the effects of the GST. They even have to pay the GST on books. They have also been inflicted with a 3 per cent administration fee on student loans. These policies are all detrimental.

To tell you how it affects these students, I want to quote what one student has to say. A 21-year old honours physics student from the University of Prince Edward Island was quoted in an Island newspaper to have said: "I blame it on Mulroney. He really put a damper on higher education. He has been cutting grants left and right, freezing funding to the provinces. It is no wonder".

This government's policies are causing a deterioration of our education system both in quality and accessibility. It is not just the students, the educators, and the opposition members of Parliament who are concerned about this government's lack of support for education. The report by the National Council of Welfare released earlier this month expressed concern about the ability of the less prosperous provinces in our country to shoulder this increased debt that the federal government is pushing on to them.

Another report concluded saying that their continuing fear is that economically disadvantaged people in all areas of this country, as well as Canadians from the less prosperous regions of our country, will be denied equality of opportunity if the federal government continues the present trend.

If one looks at the per cent of the Gross National Product that each of the provinces contributes to health and education spending one sees very quickly that the eastern provinces will be at a distinct disadvantage as the federal government reduces its commitment to education and health.

In my province of Prince Edward Island health and education spending is equivalent to 10.5 per cent of the GNP, whereas the average in Canada is a little over 7 per cent. What it means when we pay 10.5 per cent of the GNP as compared to the average of 7 per cent is that the burden of educational funding is much greater for provinces like Prince Edward Island. The impact of the decrease in the federal financial commitments is much more on this region than on any others.

In other words, what I am saying is that provinces with larger and stronger economies will have less difficulty raising that tax revenue than those with smaller economies.

If this type of government policy continues, there is no doubt that it will lead to regional discrepancies in education quality and inaffordability. It will mean that students in a more prosperous province which can afford to maintain and increase its level of educational funding will have a greater opportunity to succeed than students in a less prosperous region.

The long and short of this is that many of our young people will not receive the training, the education or the skills that will be required to compete in a highly competitive global market.

I have talked about the future, but I want to speak for a couple of minutes about what this bill will do to our present ability to compete. Certainly small business today is considered the engine of the economy. Roughly three out of four new jobs are created by small business. You would think that if a government wanted to put people back to work and stimulate the economy, it would bring in policies to help small business.

This government does not do that. In fact, it brings in policies that hinder small business. In this bill before us tonight, we have unemployment insurance premiums that will be increased 24 per cent. This increase becomes effective July 1 and this extra expenditure follows a record of bankruptcies of approximately 77 per cent last spring.

I think that one of the most frustrating aspects of this government's lack of policies for small business is watching as the government afflicts its attack on small business, knowing that small business is not the corporate elite. We are not talking here about the jet set, the executive lifestyles, the Bay Street society, the private clubs or the yachts in the harbour. We are talking about the farmer, the fishermen, the tourist operator, the corner bakery and the antique dealer.

Many of these people live in my riding, and they spend a lot of time, effort and energy in their work. Yet, this government continues to inflict more taxes, more paperwork and more reasons to reduce its work force than to expand it.

I want to conclude by asking this government to withdraw this bill. By doing that, it will help to ensure that our work force will receive the education, the skills and the abilities to compete in this very fast-changing, global economy. Also, it will help to ensure that we build a strong, competitive, Canadian economy.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak to Bill C-20. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this legislation deals with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and federal post-secondary education and health contributions.

Since 1977, the federal government makes contributions to health care and post-secondary education through the transfer of tax points and cash payments. Federal support for health and post-secondary education was supposed to keep pace each year with overall economic growth. Unfortunately, since 1986, support has been reduced as result of a series of decisions made by the Tory government, ostensibly to reduce the deficit. If this trend continues, according to the latest report by the National Welfare Council, the entire amount transferred in cash for health and post-secondary education under the 1977 fiscal arrangements would disappear in a matter of years.

Furthermore, if federal support continues to be cut, Canada will be faced with 12 different provincial and territorial systems instead of the national medicare system we have now, which varies very little from one end of the country to the other. If balkanization occurs, we will probably see a return, in many regions, to extra billing and hospital user fees, something the 1984 Canada Health Act had practically wiped out.

[English]

Bill C-20, the Budget Implementation Act, is to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, Parliament of Canada Act, Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

This is a very regressive bill. It will affect the fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government, all provinces and the territories and the federal government.

It can affect areas of health care, child care, welfare payments, taxes, grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities, aboriginal grants.

It will affect farmers in the sense that they can cut back on crop insurance. It will affect students in post-secondary education especially and an area that has not been mentioned too much today, listening to the debate off and on, official languages and education. It will affect the young offenders services by the possibility of those transfers being cut to provinces.

It could affect legal aid programs and last, but not least, it could also affect transportation grants to provinces and municipalities.

That is one area that I am very concerned with also, seeing that it could very well affect moneys that are destined to airports for their operations. I have the Shilo airport in my riding which is in much need of funding at all times and cannot afford to be cut.

When we talk about Bill C-20, I mention that it does affect the UIC and the unemployment insurance provisions within this legislation reverse the government's promise to help finance the program in difficult times.

If we go back a little bit and we look at the 1989 budget, the then finance minister pledged and I quote: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build up in the unemployment insurance account."

Given the extremely difficult economic times now faced by Canadians, the need for the government to contribute to the fund is quite obvious. I find that very amazing. I guess down east we would not use the words "broken promises". We will be very outright and use another word which is not allowed in this House, but we are very concerned with the way and the direction that this government is going in at this point in time.

When we look at the bill in its entirety, I guess the biggest chunk of it has to do with cash payments from medicare and higher education. One of the areas that we should look at is the report recently published by the National Council of Welfare. They they seem to substantiate their information. I will just read a quote here from one of their press releases. It says here and I quote: "federal cash payments from medicare and post-secondary education will disappear within a few years unless new fiscal arrangements are negotiated with the provinces and territories."

Looking at that report, and I notice that a number of my colleagues used that report for the basis of their speeches today, I should point out to those who are listening that the National Council of Welfare is not a Liberal organization. It is not a Conservative organization. It is non-partisan. It is a group of individuals mandated to advise the minister on matters pertaining to welfare, to the Health and Welfare Act and whatever. It is a group that is there to advise the minister. What are they actually saying? One of the things they are saying is that if the cuts continue, we could end up with 12 vastly different provincial and territorial medicare systems; we could end up with extra billing; we could end up with hospital user fees—we saw that in the past; we could end up with wholesale closures of hospital beds. In fact one of the statistics that is mentioned indicates that with these cuts there are going to be about 10,000 hospital beds closed across Canada.

Coming from Atlantic Canada, there is certainly an issue down home, and that is the question of regional disparities. According to the National Council of Welfare, regional disparities are going to be increased. So it certainly is a concern for me and for members from Atlantic Canada.

If I could quote from this document, Mr. Speaker, on page 6 it says: "Without federal support, poorer provinces would be left with essentially two options, neither of them appealing; they could either raise provincial taxes to intolerable levels to support health and higher education as they now stand, or they could eliminate all but the barest of medical and educational services."

What we are going to end up with and what the council is trying to warn us of is a system for the rich and system for the poor. We could be going back in history, back to medieval days, if we want to use those terms.

On the weekend I had occasion to meet with a number of my constituents off and on, and at that time one of the questions they posed—and I have been getting this question quite often—is: What is going on up there in Ottawa; what is wrong with this government; can it not see the light up there? This bill is a continuance of that. They cannot understand how a government could be so cold and callous in introducing these types of bills.

This bill in itself, this Bill C-20, is a blatant attack on rural Canada, it is a blatant attack on all of Canada and it is certainly not acceptable to most citizens in Canada. It is going to force provinces such as mine, New Brunswick, to make some tough decisions, and they have already been forced to make tough decisions. The people of New Brunswick recognize that the province of New Brunswick, the government that is in power at the present moment, is forced to take these decisions because of the government in Ottawa cutting back on these fiscal arrangements.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, at a time when Canada is going through a critical period in its history, the government must take steps to promote national unity and reduce regional disparity. However, if the federal government keeps reducing cash payments, regional disparity will only get worst. Residents of provinces that are less well off will then have to make do with health services and post-secondary education that are lesser in quality than the kind enjoyed by Canadians in the richer provinces.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would urge all members to vote against this bill.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Markham seems to have finally figured out where he stands on this bill. Perhaps I can offer him some further thoughts before he begins.

I would like to stay and hear what he has to say, but first of all I would like to associate myself with—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to perhaps test the generosity of my colleague over there. We worked on the finance committee together and have a very good friendship and chemistry and so on, and perhaps it was an oversight of yours, Mr. Speaker, but I thought I was going to start speaking now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It was really no oversight, I just thought I would give the hon. member little more time to prepare. The hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. Manley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to associate myself with a number of remarks that were made in this House on a very similar issue, and I would like to read them into the record because this previous speaker in this House dealt with the issue of how the federal government funds health care and post-secondary education in co-operation with the provinces.

These remarks were given in the context of changes in those arrangements that were being proposed by the federal government of the day.

> The government had large revenues in earlier years; it established a number of programs and forced its will on provinces; it invaded the provincial fields of education and medical care. But now it does not have the money nor the will to control its spending so that it can continue to finance its obligations and responsibilities to these programs. It now wants to shift the problem over to the provinces, it wants to shift the deficit problem which has built up to such enormous proportions at the federal level down to the provincial level.

He goes on:

> This is no time for confrontation and it is no time for unilateral action. This is a time when we need co-operation to nurse the tender relationship which exists between the two levels of government.

These remarks were made on March 23, 1982 by the member for Etobicoke Centre, currently the Minister for International Trade. He goes on to say a few other things to which I would like to refer:

> We have a problem here which is partly financial, the government has a major deficit problem. This has been building up over the past 10 years and I think the government must deal with the problem. However, there is a very clear question as to how it should be addressing it. Should it be addressing that problem from the standpoint of unilateral cuts, throwing the problem of the deficit onto another level of government, or should the government be addressing the problem in its own house?

He goes on:

> The government does not seem to realize that there is only one taxpayer who pays the taxes for the federal government, for the provincial governments, as well as for the municipal governments. That taxpayer does not care where the service comes from, he wants the service. That taxpayer wants to see the service provided to meet his needs. This is why we have such a cynical attitude toward government today. This government is showing utter contempt for the taxpayer by doing that sort of thing. Therefore, we must rethink this whole system, this system of federal-provincial relationships, so that we do not have such unseemly squabbling between the two levels of government over which one gets credit and which one pays at the end of the day. Governments must get together.

That is the end of the quotation, but the member for Etobicoke Centre, currently the Minister of International Trade, the former Minister of Finance who brought in the budget which contained these changes to the EPF arrangements, was exactly right. He was exactly right. It was not the time then, it is not the time now, it is never the time in a federation like Canada for governments to act unilaterally on fundamental matters that go to the relationship between governments.

The problem that we have today which this bill tries to address is only partly a financial problem. I think we would be wrong not to recognize that there is a financial problem and that it needs to be dealt with. The fundamental problem we have here goes beyond that. What are the basic things that Canada consists of? What is the nature of the social contract that exists which binds us together as Canadians? Why is it that we have a nation stretching from east to west against the normal pull of geography, with a very unlikely combination of people, which has managed to stay together for almost 125 years?

What are the kinds of commitments that we make to one another each time we pay our taxes, each time we go to the polls and vote? What is it that we are saying to one another? I suggest that we are saying something not just about where we were born or what our citizenship is, we are saying something about the nature of the relationship we expect between ourselves as individuals and our governments.

I want to look for a moment at the provisions that have been introduced in this budget relating to unemployment insurance. Again, I would like to quote the member for Etobicoke Centre, who presented the 1989 budget in which the concept of changing the unemployment insurance fund so that it was entirely funded by employers and employees was introduced.

He said: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the unemployment insurance account".

I am not sure that anyone has noticed, but we were in a recession from the second quarter of 1990 which continued until the time this budget was presented. Surely to goodness this is when it is inappropriate to raise premiums, to use the minister's words.

Look at what was done six days prior to the 1988 election when, of all things, the economy was not in recession. In 1988 the economy grew almost at 5 per cent. What did the employment minister at that time do? On November 15, 1988, six days before the election, she announced that employer and employee premiums were to be cut and weekly benefits were to be increased. That, at a time when the economy was in a period of rapid growth, was absolutely disgraceful.

What happened a few short months after that? An overheated economy had to be cooled down by a policy of high interest rates, following a year not only in which unemployment insurance premiums had been reduced, but in which income taxes had been reduced and in which monetary policy according to the governor of the bank himself was perhaps unduly relaxed just before an election. We go into 1989 and interest rates have to be increased. What was the effect of that? By the second quarter of 1990 we were in a recession.

The Minister of Finance, as he soon became and as he was not yet back in 1982 when he gave those remarks which I began with, was talking about a cynical attitude toward government. He had seen nothing at that time. Cynicism is now the order of the day in Canada. I suggest that the kinds of things that this government has done with tax policy, with unemployment insurance and with transfer payments, are at the heart and root of much of the cynicism we have in Canada today.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to mention a few facts because I think some of the statements made tonight are not necessarily factual.

Let me just talk a little bit about some comments I have heard just in the past few days. Most people or certainly a good number, when we talk about transfers to the provinces, seem convinced that we are reducing the dollar amount. Let me make it very clear that we are not. The dollar amount over the years since we have been in government has gone up by billions and billions. Our plans are that the dollars will continue to go up. Let the record show that dollars are being increased. The percentage increase is less, but it is still up.

Thanks to perhaps the media and the opposition parties one would think we were slashing the CBC by several hundred million dollars. Not so. Our total subsidies to the CBC will be between $800 million and $900 million this year, and they are going up.

I think our record on restraint has been, in all honesty, quite remarkable. Our average increase in spending for almost seven years is about 3.6 per cent or 3.7 per cent. Compare that to the provinces over the same period. Their average increase is about 7.2 per cent. Regrettably Ontario is leading the pack. Under the Liberals the average increase was a little over 10 per cent. Now we have a new government there and the increase planned by the NDP government is something over 14 per cent, if you can believe that.

We have taken moves on privatization: Air Canada, Petro-Canada and de Havilland. These were all moves which neither of the other parties would ever have supported. We have made some very difficult decisions quite recently in terms of much needed restraint. The public servants' level will be frozen this year. There is a commitment to reduce the layers of management in the bureaucracy. The commitment includes the termination of 10 per cent or at least 475 executive jobs.

Rather than me as a member of the government party going on and on about a number of these accomplishments, I would like perhaps to take a different route to get this in a better perspective.

I would like to make some quotes from an article in The Ottawa Citizen last June 13 written by Marjorie Nichols of The Ottawa Citizen staff. This is clearly an impartial reporter and a woman very respected, certainly on Parliament Hill. I will start with some of her quotes:

> Historians in pursuit of causes for the calamitous decline in popularity of the federal Conservatives need look no further than the public relations disasters of their fiscal policies.
> Instead of distributing the fiscal facts to their taxpayers, the Tories succumbed to their fatal weakness: the need to put a "spin" on reality.
> The facts are that this country has its debt under control and its spending under the most stringent restraint in the western world.

This is not Bill Attewell speaking; this is Marjorie Nichols. She continues:

> Yet, the perception persists of a nation managed by a gang of irresponsible spenders in a nation teetering on the edge of bankruptcy.
> In truth, the Conservatives have succeeded in their seven years at the helm in reversing the country's fiscal direction.
> The Government of Canada is now running a program surplus of $13 billion. Next year's surplus is expected to be $20 billion.
> To put it another way, if it were not for interest payments on the national debt, this country would be running a huge cash surplus.
> Program spending is all government spending except for payments on the accumulated debt, which now totals about $400 billion.
> The Tories have literally reversed the country's fiscal picture by adding $30 billion annually to the credit side of the country's ledger.
> The Liberals during their last years in office were borrowing to pay for government programs, a situation that can be likened to a taxpayer using a Visa card to pay for groceries and rent.
> The Tories have turned around the entire fiscal mess that they inherited. Instead of borrowing to buy the groceries, they are now paying off their Visa card.
> The budgetary deficit numbers actually distort the fiscal truth. In fiscal 1984–85, the Liberal budget deficit was $38.3 billion, of which $16 billion went to pay for "groceries"—federal programs and salaries.
> In fiscal 1991–92, by contrast, the Conservative deficit will be $30.5 billion, all of which is interest charges on the national debt.
> Instead of bragging about its fiscal management, the Mulroney government decided immediately after the November 1988 budget to try to persuade Canadians that the national debt was about to make the sky fall all over Canada.
> Then–finance minister Michael Wilson kicked off his doomsday campaign in his February 1989 budget speech.
> "We, as Canadians, have a serious problem," Wilson told the Commons—"our large and growing public debt. In the time it takes to present my budget, that debt will grow by $3 billion."
> The Tories also exaggerated the national debt by including nearly $100 billion in bookkeeping accounts that bear no interest debt. Things like future public service pensions.
> It was scary stuff. And the government's sales campaign was a rip–roaring success. Every Tory with access to a microphone stoked the fires of fiscal doom with verbal kindling.
> A major attraction of the Reform party—perhaps its major attraction—is its pledge of fiscal frugality. Leader Preston Manning runs around the country promising to cut 15 per cent of all federal public service middle managers.
> The marvel is that Manning is attracting crowds with such absurdities. There are 50,000 fewer public sector jobs in this country than when the Tories took over. And federal spending has increased by an annual average rate of only 3.7 per cent, an achievement unmatched anywhere.
> Common sense has now overcome the Tories, who have begun telling the unvarnished truth about the state of the nation's fiscal affairs.
> Like others, I was skeptical when the prime minister appointed Don Mazankowski to serve as finance minister. Mazankowski is a former small–town businessman with no economic expertise.
> It appears, though, that the Mazankowski appointment may turn out to be a brilliant stroke. The opposition has not been able to lay a mitt on the straight–talking, straight–dealing former car dealer from Vegreville, Alberta.
> Trying to pin "Maz" to the carpet in the Commons is a task akin to pinning jello on a bulletin board.
> Canada's fiscal future is bright. Trouble is, Canadians do not know it because of the Tory spin doctors.

I have laid it all out there. That is the end of her quotes. Clearly, we have a big communications job ahead of us. We have taken more difficult decisions in the past three years than any government took in the past 50 years. Making decisions for the long-term good of Canadians has its price. It is easy to make short-term decisions, handing out money here and there. I am very proud to have been a member of this government. We expect to go onward and upwards as we get that message out.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know why it took the member 15 or 20 minutes to prepare to read a column by Marjorie Nichols. If he did anything more in his talk than that, I did not catch it.

Ms. Nichols has many good qualities, especially the fact that she was born and raised in Alberta. I do not think she has ever passed herself off as a financial analyst.

The "ungetaroundable" fact for the member is that during six good years in the economy those opposite have added, I think, $210 billion to the national debt of the children, the parents and the grandparents of this country. Paragons of fiscal responsibility they are not. I know the members think that compound interest only began in 1984. It did not. It began way back in the never, never land when unfortunately deficits began to creep into our national practices.

That has to stop. On that I fully agree with the member and those opposite who talk about fighting the deficit. Every time one of them gets up they tell us: "We have been fighting the deficit". As I say, the facts are that the former Minister of Finance has added more red ink to the ledgers of Canadians than all of the other finance ministers in Canadian history, during six good years of the economy.

Mr. Speaker, before you say I am not speaking about Bill C-20, I would ask members to reject this bill for, among others, the following reasons.

It will effectively limit the access to a post-secondary education for many people. It maintains the freeze on the growth of the Established Programs Financing transfer payments until 1995. I am sure that many members have already dealt with those issues and I will not reiterate what has been said.

The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1977 provides for federal support for health care and post-secondary education in two ways: transfers and federal grants based on domestic productivity. In an attempt, albeit not a very good one, to make those EPF transfers equitable to all regions the value of the tax transfers was fully equalized.

It is estimated that the EPF entitlements for 1991-92 will top $20.4 billion, according to the National Council of Welfare. It seems like a lot, an awful lot. However, if we look at the amount the federal government actually contributed to those programs in 1977-78, in 1991 dollars total EPF spending came to $16.4 billion. The 1990 budget froze all EPF entitlements for two years. After that the funding formula for federal grants was set at gross GNP minus 3 percentage points beginning in fiscal year 1992-93.

Now if that was not enough, the 1991 budget told us that the EPF freeze will remain in effect until 1994-95. This brings me to Bill C-20, a bill which legalizes this form of financial terrorism against the provinces and the ordinary people of Canada, the people who do not live in Markham—at least as far as I understand the incomes of the people who live in Markham.

If the bill is passed and its provisions implemented, the federal government will be denying Canadians $97.6 billion worth of services and resources provided by health and post-secondary institutions until the year 2000.

This would have been paid out to the provinces if the growth rate had averaged 7.5 per cent a year and the Tory government had not decided to stick it to the provinces. Even more disturbing to health and educational groups such as the Canadian Federation of Students, the National Council of Welfare, and the Canadian Association of University Teachers is the value of the tax points turned over to the provinces. The value of those tax points will likely increase by 8 per cent a year since the Tory assault on the EPF began.

As cash transfers rise, federal contributions gradually become an afterthought, so much of an afterthought that by the year 2005 the federal government will no longer fund EPF programs directly, only through tax transfers. I say: "Shame".

The effect on post-secondary education has been staggering. Anybody who has attended university recently or helped pay for the higher education of a son or daughter knows that both the federal and most provincial governments have abdicated responsibilities in that regard.

Let me mention somebody who graduated from university only a year ago. When he enrolled as a freshman he paid roughly $1,500 for tuition and books. Four years later in 1990 he paid over $2,000 just to walk on campus in the final year. At the ripe age of 23 this person is in debt to Canada Student Loans for $11,000. That is just for a bachelor's degree. He, like the vast majority of other students, would not mind paying a higher price for higher education in Canada. The tuition hikes would ease over-crowding of classes, purchase more academic resources and personnel and pay for capital initiatives.

However, as we all know, the provinces have not seemed to take a very active interest in post-secondary education, a responsibility granted to them under the BNA act of 1867. Tuition hikes have by and large only covered the losses on annual provincial operating grant cuts.

Under the mandate of the tax transfers agreement the money raised is not ear-marked for post-secondary education. If the provinces had been spending what they were supposed to on higher education we would not have the situation today where so many universities and community colleges are understaffed and inadequately equipped.

We have had several commissions of inquiry including the McDonald inquiry and they have all called for the federal government to play a more active role to ensure a national standard of post-secondary education is met. Indeed, did not the throne speech speak about national standards.

In the age of globalization a renewed commitment to quality higher education has never been more important. Constitutionally the federal government could be well within its rights to undertake this because we are substantial contributors to the operating grants of post-secondary institutions and are therefore entrusted to ensure that the national interest and common good be served.

In my view post-secondary education is not merely another service to be paid for mostly out of tax dollars. It is about as important an investment as society can make. We only have to look at the economic miracles of the Pacific Rim where countries have invested enormous sums of money in education and R and D. Those countries did not become economic powerhouses by accident. They made the initial investment and now it is paying off for them handsomely.

I say this for the benefit of my friends opposite who hold people on this side of the House in disdain for our supposedly irresponsible spending habits. It is well known that any economist can tell you that a society is only as good as its ability to compete. Look at Singapore. Look at Taiwan. Look at Japan. If there is anything that is going to get us out of this recession and out of this mundane cycle of booms and busts and into the realm of a truly prosperous society it will be a solid commitment to higher education with emphasis on quality and accessibility.

Recently I have been attending high school graduations in Edmonton. I have been asking myself where these young men and women, full of ability, energy and brains, are going to find the jobs, the careers that we need, they need, and the whole country needs. I hope it is clear that the federal government must not abdicate its responsibility for education and training.

What has this government opposite and its provincial counterparts done instead? They have cut, they have slashed, and—to speak figuratively—they have burned. In 1977 dollars general operating grants to universities and colleges have averaged $5,426 per a full-time student in 1978. In 1988 those grants averaged $4,492, in 1977 dollars, per full-time student according to Statistics Canada.

Why is it so hard for those opposite to understand why we cannot compete with many other global economies? Post-secondary education cannot be described only as a better future for our children. It is the key for a better future for our entire population. If we cannot have a strong economy, we cannot afford our social programs.

How do we get it across to those opposite that it is essential to have a strong economy before our pensioners, disabled communities and others will be able to get the social benefits they need. However, the Tories want to fritter away this responsibility just like they frittered away so many others.

Bill C-20 will ensure that the federal government has no way of maintaining national standards in higher education such as the Canada Health Act ensures that certain health standards are met. The quality of education will not remain the same in every region, I am sorry to say. In fact it is a sure bet, as the member for P.E.I. indicated earlier, that some provinces will have better standards than others; the wealthy provinces will have better standards than the poorer ones.

The provinces are ill-equipped to take on that responsibility with their current taxation bases and powers. If there were ever an attempt to destroy co-operative federalism, Bill C-20 will certainly help to get the job done. The former finance minister is not doing our country any favours with this bill. He is simply ensuring that Canada is reduced to a collection of 10 little fiefdoms to hog tax credits.

I would like to close with a scenario for those opposite. It is estimated that under the EPF funding formula this bill will usher in, health care and higher education will gradually become things of the past to the federal government.

According to the National Council of Welfare per capita EPF federal payments to the provinces will actually be below the initial amount paid out in 1978. By 1995, the federal transfers to provinces will equal $689 per person. In 1978 dollars, it equals $705. In short, it seems to me that this bill is an exercise in nation busting and harmful to Confederation.

I wish that some of those opposite would get up and defend the bill. How can our children be proud of a nation that does not care enough to provide satisfactory training and resources to help catapult our country into the big leagues of competitiveness. If the government insists on making higher education inaccessible to those without high income, so be it. Let us have the $15,000 annual tuition fees we see in the United States.

At the very least, quit the charade that the federal government is actually participating in a national strategy on post-secondary education.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate today and to put on record some of the views of my party and I, but not a pleasure because of the subject matter we have to speak on tonight.

We are debating Bill C-20, legislation to implement some of the budget items tabled in this House on February 26. We are just now getting around to the legislation actually to implement some of those measures.

It is remarkable for people at home who are perhaps watching on television to see what a government can do with six pages. This legislation has six pages. It is remarkable just exactly how much a government can do to attempt to destroy what has been done to date and to tear apart much of what we have come to see in the country in terms of how our federal government has worked with the provinces in trying to develop both our post-secondary education and our health care systems which are major parts of this bill.

Part of the legislation amends another piece of legislation with a very lengthy title, but essentially it is legislation that lays out the fiscal arrangements by which the federal Government of Canada transfers funds to the provinces for both health and post-secondary education.

What we have learned through the budget and obviously the legislation to implement those measures is an ongoing withdrawal by this government from the field of helping Canadians in terms of health and education. It is clear that our universities, our colleges and our health care institutions are threatened by this government.

Why is it doing that? It is my belief—and I believe that a lot of Canadians feel this—that this government does not believe in health care. It does not believe in education in this country. The way we have attempted to achieve this has been through legislation by which the federal government shares with the provinces the funding for many of these important measures.

It is clear, if we take a look at any of the advanced economies in the world today, that those economies which have developed are those that have invested funds in education, post-secondary education, and have developed health care standards as a right.

It is clear that this legislation will give this government more of an opportunity to withdraw from that field than it has ever had before.

I ask why. Frankly it was a relief last week, I believe it was, when the finance ministers met in Charlottetown. I hope they had an opportunity to visit Province House, as I did once before, to see where Canada started. Maybe the Prime Minister, if he has not visited Province House, should go there and get a little dose of nation building. It is very sobering to be there and recognize where the fathers and now the mothers of Confederation really started to talk about our country. It was a relief to hear for the first time in some time a finance minister—and I am talking about the finance minister from the great province of Ontario—speaking out for average Canadians, for people who need protection, for Canadians who need the health care and post-secondary education we are talking about to build a better Canada.

It was a relief because of the legions of Tory and Liberal finance ministers we have had to put up and listen to for the past number of years display their litany of ways in which to trash government, to trash some of the innovative programs that have been developed in this country. It was a relief to hear a finance minister talking about people and the kind of services that a government can deliver to people.

All we have to do is to look at that litany and that record, that tragic record we have had from previous governments, both Conservative and Liberal. I think in particular about the legislation we are dealing with right now, the legislation that talks about the transfer of funds to provinces for health and education.

I am thinking primarily of changes that were made in 1977 when we went to a block funding formula where the federal government in essence gave a blank cheque to the provinces to spend those transfer payments as they wished.

In my province—and I have mentioned this before in the House—there are many who alleged that Socreds paved highways with health and education dollars.

What is important is what should have been in this bill, what should have been part of Bill C-20, an amendment to the previous legislation that would have compelled the federal government to show clearly to Canadians that when it transfers its tax funds, our tax funds, Canadians' tax funds, to provinces to spend on health and education, that is where those funds are spent.

That is an important principle missing from this bill. It should have been in there. I would hope, certainly in the future, that whatever government it is will consider introducing legislation to that effect. That is the vehicle by which a federal government speaking for the nation, for the country, for all of its people, sits down and works with its provincial colleagues to develop the kind of education and training programs that can ensure in our country we are a leader and we are entering the competitive world the new trade minister talks about and that we can have a revolution in the health care from the cradle to the grave. We need a cradle to the grave system of health care now more than we have ever needed it before. With this kind of legislation we are not going to have the opportunity to do that, be it this party that forms the government or obviously government members opposite who have no interest in doing this. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, if there is one piece of legislation that is the plank in the Tory destruction of Canada's social programs it is these six pages that we are debating tonight. It is frightening what this government can do in six quick pages.

I hope that the government members will see the light of day, vote against this legislation, and help us build good education and good health care in Canada.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, during the last election Liberals attempted to warn Canadians of what they could expect from another four years of Tory rule. Those predictions seem now rather prophetic as we have seen this government's decision manifest into the hardships that are being suffered by Canadians in 1991.

Before the House today is Bill C-20, the latest chapter in the Tory guide to social Darwinism. Medicare, post-secondary education and unemployment insurance were sources of hope for the poor and security for the middle class. Bill C-20 marks the end of that hope and security for so many Canadians.

Ironically, Canada is regarded as the last hope for medical refugees from the United States. We have all seen recently the U.S. congressional hearings which depicted the tragic circumstances of people whose children will die because they have been cut off by their insurance company and cannot afford the treatment their children need to stay alive. Canadians to date have been spared that kind of tragedy by a more humane system of health care that was established and improved upon by a series of Liberal governments over several decades.

This government has been relentless in its assault on the institutions that have benefited all Canadians and have in the past attracted so many people from around the world.

Recent ministers of health and welfare have tried to defend this government's underfunding of medicare by accusing the opposition of trying to frighten the elderly, the sick and the poor. It is the elderly who will have to worry about whether or not their local medical establishments will have the funds to provide the constant care they need. It is the sick who have to spend several days on stretchers waiting for one of the few beds not already closed for lack of funds. it is the poor who cannot escape the waiting list for cardiac surgery by travelling to the United States and paying for treatment out of their own pockets.

For many of these people it is too late to be frightened. They put their trust in this government only to find that their trust has fuelled their own misfortune. Many of these Canadians now feel that in 1988 when they buried their ballots in the box they put medicare on death row.

The ministers of this government have tried to relate their financial decisions to those of ordinary homemakers. I know, however, of few homemakers who would not spend whatever money was necessary to buy medicine for their children. I know of few parents who would not take time off work to take their child to hospital. I suspect that few, if any, homemakers would cancel their health insurance, disability insurance or dental plan to take out frivolous ads in newspapers. This government will underfund medicare by another $338 million this year, but it is determined to spend $3 billion on advertising, public relations and consulting.

This government is spending money on cosmetics to hide the scars of budget cuts. Canadians know that if it is a choice between your health and this government's image, the ad agencies always win out.

This is hardly, as this regime claims, putting Canada's finances in order. The excuse for cuts is always the deficit. But the deficit never goes down. It is $12 billion higher this year than the former Tory finance minister predicted in 1985.

If you are looking for answers, look no further then the unemployment rate. We have 1.5 million unemployed. This government's response to high unemployment is to put an even greater burden on employers and workers by increasing the UI premiums. They have made it even more difficult for small business to maintain their work forces.

We all remember the Prime Minister saying in the last election that the best social program is a job. Canadians now realize that their best social program is taking away the Prime Minister's job. For those who are looking to universities and colleges to improve their job opportunities, this government has erected new financial barriers. Tuition fees are being propelled upwards by Tory cuts to transfer payments. There is a new student loan surtax and the GST was slapped on to books, perhaps to discourage Canadian students from reading about our inefficient tax collection system that squanders billions of dollars year after year.

If the Tory student loan surtax remains and Canadian tuition fees continue to rise at their current rate, it will not be long before the poor and middle-class Canadians will face the same despair as the millions of Americans who cannot afford to become qualified and employable.

Indeed, this government's concept of order has bankrupted countless Canadians. These Canadians are financially bankrupt because this government is morally bankrupt. It would rather spend public money on its image than on the essential needs of ordinary people.

Nearly every institution that is distinctively Canadian has been under attack by this government, from the pillars of our social structure, medicare, education, unemployment insurance, to Via Rail, CBC, Air Canada, Petro Canada and Canada Post. Everything is up for sale.

Bill C-20 is not a defence of the Canada Health Act. With each passing moment, the federal government's commitment to health, education and jobs continues to dwindle under the guise of fiscal restraint and economic impetus. The Tories are meticulously plotting a course set forth by the free trade agreement. Bill C-20 is simply another example of how the Tories' sacred trust has been foreclosed.

It is rather like a cruel parent, starving the child and then discussing punishment when the child shows signs of malnutrition. Canadians now realize that if the institutions of medicare, post-secondary education and unemployment insurance are to be salvaged, this government must not survive.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful this evening for the opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-20 which, as others before me have explained, is a bill to amend certain statutes in order to implement the February 26 budget.

The bill extends the limits of federal transfers to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing Act introduced in last year's budget for another three years to fiscal 1994-95. The bill amends the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act in order to restrict payments to provinces for certain privately-owned public utilities. And the bill amends the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for an increase in premium rates. It is easy to be confused by the technical language in the statutes cited, unless one strips away the legalese to get down to the bare bones of what this government is actually doing with this legislation.

What this government is doing with Bill C-21, and with its misguided February budget, is asking the poor, the sick, the unemployed, the university students, the weaker regions of this country to pay for its colossal fiscal mismanagement.

Bill C-20 is a betrayal. It is a betrayal to the commitment by this government to workers and employers not to increase UI premiums until 1992 and to assist with the cost of the UI program in difficult economic times. This commitment was made as recently as the budget of 1989 and the legislation Bill C-21, which modified the UI program.

Instead, with this bill, the Minister of Finance jacks up UI premiums a full 24 per cent, in the middle of its own made-in-Canada recession. This premium increase is a direct tax on jobs and will increase the already too high unemployment rate.

Bill C-20, is a betrayal of this government's commitment to higher education, a commitment that was made as recently as the last throne speech, a commitment it says is vital to making Canada internationally competitive in a global economy.

This bill is a betrayal to universal medicare and national health standards. It is a betrayal to the form of co-operative federalism that has made our national health care system work.

What the government is doing with Bill C-20 is withdrawing large sums of federal support to provincial governments for post-secondary education and health. The minister of health earlier today claimed that the government was only slowing down the increase in these payments over the next three years.

Schedule VI of the recent Nova Scotia budget tells a different story. Estimated federal transfers under the Established Programs Financing component of the Nova Scotia budget are expected to fall from $351.9 million in 1989-90 to $331.3 million in 1991-92, a decline of nearly $21 million.

From fiscal 1982 to fiscal 1994-95, the cumulative impact of these transfers is expected to reach $1.5 billion. The provincial budget states, and I quote:

> Declining financial support from the federal government for programs and services in Nova Scotia has placed increasing pressure on provincial own-source revenues to make up the shortfall.

As a consequence, this year's budget has continued the practice begun last year of cutting back on basic health services to Nova Scotians, limited growth in programs, including health education and social services to 2 per cent; lowering the age limit on dental insurance for children; reducing the permitted frequency of eye examination coverage; closing and consolidating schools; raising the cost of seniors' drugs from $3 to 20 per cent on each prescription.

We can and we do argue with the government of Nova Scotia about its spending priorities. We can disagree and we do with its targets for lowering its own deficit. We know that the provincial government in the last 10 years has mismanaged its own finances. But we cannot argue with the fact that the cutbacks in provincial transfers which this bill will authorize will translate into lower basic services for those who need them most.

Indeed, the National Council of Welfare in its report on funding for health and higher education, appropriately called Danger Looming, has suggested that the federal government's plan to extend the freeze on Established Programs Financing could mean the end of medicare as a national program within five or six years. As the government withdraws its financial commitment to national health care standards under the National Health Act, it reduces its coverage, it reduces its leverage on provinces to encourage compliance with the basic medical principles of accessibility, comprehensiveness and portability. It undermines the very foundation of a program which has been a source of pride for all Canadians: our universal health care system.

The government says not to fear. Although it is taking away the carrot of federal transfers to provincial governments to encourage their compliance with the National Health Act, with Bill C-20 it is giving itself a big stick. This bill will allow the government to punish a province which attempts to resolve its fiscal difficulties by eroding its own health care services, difficulties which in the poor provinces such as Nova Scotia are being caused by the cutbacks in the federal transfers by this government. What this bill will do is to punish that province by withdrawing federal payments under any act of Parliament or agreement with that province undertaken before or after this legislation. That is what section 23.(2) of Bill C-20 authorizes.

This astonishing provision will mean that the government will be able to attack transfer programs to provincial governments under the equalization payments formula, under territorial financing, under grants in lieu of taxes paid to provincial and municipal governments by the federal government instead of paying taxes on federal or diplomatic property. It will be able to cut into statutory subsidies, into federal-provincial agreements, into programs not related to national health care in order to impose its standards on provincial governments for programs which it is unwilling to finance itself.

At a time when we are facing increasing tensions between the federal and provincial governments, a provision such as this is a red flag, it is an act of federal-provincial war by the federal government on provinces. It is absolutely incompatible with any attempt by a provincial government to try to provide a comprehensive or co-operative federalism in an age in which we need co-operation between federal and provincial governments on basic services.

What it will also mean is that the poor will pay twice. They will pay through the reduction in the federal transfers to provincial governments designed to pay for the services that they consume and they will pay through the discipline which the federal government will impose on those provincial governments which cannot pay for these services out of their own resources.

This is a terrible bill. It is a bill which all members of this House should denounce, including those on the government side, and which should begin a correction in a wrong-headed fiscal stance by this government and a restoration of sanity and co-operation in the management of our nation's finances.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today on Bill C-20, although there is not much pleasure in the bill itself. As I stop and think about it, it is a bill that is going to very much restrict funding and post-secondary education by the federal government, it will have drastic effects on health care, again by contributions of the federal government, and it certainly is bringing a burden on the unemployed and increased premiums to employers here in Canada.

I have to stop and think, how did we really get where we are at today?

The Conservative government was elected in 1984 with all kinds of promises. We heard promises to reduce the deficit and promises to bring our financial picture in line. Seven budgets later, we are in a position where, basically, we have increased taxes 81 per cent plus the GST. We have increased expenditures almost 50 per cent. We have a deficit that is well over 100 per cent greater today than seven budgets before. We have some 30-odd tax increases plus the GST.

I heard members on the other side of the House say: "It was because of the Liberal government". There is a time when some people must accept responsibility. Eight years of Tory reign and no responsibility is pretty sad in this country. But we have arrived because of a supposed group that has abilities in business. They have really come down to the point of, financially, putting this country in very difficult straits.

When the government talks about 40 cents out of every dollar being used to pay the debt, it is the debt that it built. It is the debt that it has incurred over the seven budgets. Mr. Wilson is so far away from his projected targets he gave in 1984, it is absolutely ridiculous in this country.

However, it is interesting to look at Bill C–20 today under that light because it is the first time, the second time, the third or maybe the fifth, well, numerous times this government has not been able to deal with reality. It has, this time, totally abdicated responsibility in health care, responsibility in post–secondary education and responsibility in unemployment. It is now turning it over to other people to manage. It increased taxes by 80 per cent and it is now turning over everything to the provinces, to businesses and to individuals to pay those debts.

What does Bill C–20 mean to the people from my riding in Essex—Kent? Well, certainly, it means on the surface that many students who really desire to go on to higher levels of education will not be able to do so. I think of my children, I think of the children of every member in this House, I think of the children of every person in Canada, their opportunities at post–secondary education are restricted drastically by this bill.

What it means to universities is that, unless the provinces pick up extra payments, there is absolutely no way they will be able to continue the service that they are presently giving.

What does it mean to health care? It means that many lower income families, many seniors, many others across this country are going to have to stop and think: "can I afford the medical costs that I may have to incur". It is going to separate a society of those with funds to be able to pay the health care system and not worry about the extra cost to the doctor, and the weaker part of our society.

This government supposedly presents itself as a caring group who is running a very caring society. Well this is just exactly opposite to what that caring society means.

Post–secondary education, health care and unemployment have traditionally in this country been strong, Liberal policies and the Tory government have torn them down.

As I stop and think, my colleagues from the New Democratic Party have criticized the Liberal Party, however, they never once said or brought the real point forward, that these are Liberal policies, policies which Liberal government after Liberal government after Liberal government have encouraged in this country so that we can be a successful society.

The problem that I see right now is that we are on a course in which there really is no solution if we continue downstream.

The Prime Minister made it very clear that we must be highly educated. We must use science, research and development in order to gain the skills required to compete in the 1990s and beyond. How on earth does this Bill C–20 support that concept? It is just the exact opposite. It means the young people in my area, the young people across Canada, will not have those benefits.

When we stop and think about it, the government has put all of this under the guise of deficit reduction. As my colleague from Mississauga pointed out a little earlier, it is very important to understand that deficit reduction occurs when businesses are healthy, when the economy is running very well, when we have employment across the country.

What has the government done in order to resolve those problems? The GST, losing jobs in Canada. Free trade, losing jobs in Canada.

What have they done to make a healthier society? Increased the value of the dollar, increased interest rates to put the small businessman, who is the chief employer in this country, right to the wall. I have seen policy after policy after policy in the last seven years do nothing but tear the country down and tear the country apart.

Certainly, this measure, this bill C–20 goes further. It stops universality in programs. It tears our educational system right to the roots and it leaves us in a situation where we ask: "What next?"

I have to say that, as I have walked through my riding and walked through areas of Canada, solutions are coming from people. Let's have a new election.

It is very clear to me, the policies that are coming down right now are certainly unpopular, are certainly not ones that are acceptable to the Canadian public. I would ask this government to change the direction, look at the prosperity of the country, look at how we can compete, how we can survive and not divide Canada further.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you that there is no doubt in my mind that when this bill comes up for my vote it is not going to get it, in case there is any doubt in anybody's mind.

I will tell you why. I have had very little difficulty in making up my mind on this. I want to explain to people just what is this disgusting, despicable Bill C-20 that everybody is talking about tonight? What does it do? How can one bill do so much damage to upset so many people? How can it?

It is very inoffensive. To describe it, it says: "Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991". Aha, the budget of February 26, 1991.

It says it is going to amend certain statutes. There are two statutes which bother me, and I want to talk to them this evening.

The first one is the statute entitled the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act and the second one is the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I want to take a mythical couple in my riding. I can either put them at one end of the riding in Old Perlican, Grates Cove or Bay de Verde, beautiful little fishing villages in one end of my riding, or I can put them in the other end of my riding, the north end of my riding, up in Wesleyville, Valleyfield, Brookfield, Lumsden, Newtown, Templeman. I can put them in any of these places.

Let us take a couple and apply Bill C-20 to them and see how it is going to affect them. I want to say at the very beginning these are the people who in 1988, when I was going around campaigning with my opponents and other members of other parties, were listening to what we had to say. They were hearing the then sitting member from the party across the floor, the government party, saying: "Don't worry, be happy. Do not worry about all of this free trade business, this fear-mongering that Mifflin and his crowd are doing because nothing is going to happen to unemployment insurance. Mr. Crosbie and the Prime Minister have given their word that nothing is going to happen. It is in the newspapers. Do not worry about that. Do not listen to those scare-mongers. When they say if you vote for this government and this free trade business, you are going to find yourself in a position where your credit card will be checked before your pulse is checked".

I never said that myself but that term was being used. I thought it was rather scary. Some people were saying that it would never happen, that it was scare-mongering and that no government would ever do that to its people. They said: "We have a system that if it was not there we would try to invent it. So because we have it we would not dare, even contemplate, getting rid of it".

The cost of education came up. There was no direct relationship between what was happening and the present cost of education but I think people, even then in 1988, knew that the cost of education would certainly not decrease and in all likelihood, as everything else had in the past four years, it would probably go up.

I want to mention the couples again in either end of my riding, put them in their mid-40s, give them three or four children, they are a working couple. Here is how I think it will affect them. I have to go back now and describe what this means in terms of money to the province I represent, the province of Newfoundland.

We do not have a very large budget in Newfoundland. The point is that half of that budget comes from the federal transfer payments in one way or another. We are very grateful to the government for that, I am not suggesting that we are ungrateful people. However, when practically half your budget comes from a certain source and that source has been cut dramatically then you are in trouble, particularly as it affects the three areas of unemployment insurance, post-secondary education—university education in other words—and health.

What can be more important to people of all ages?

In 1990 there was an announcement in the budget of that particular year that there would be a two-year freeze in federal transfer payments and that this freeze would cost Newfoundland $19 million in 1990 and $34 million in 1991-1992. That announcement was just last year. Nothing else had happened. That is what it would cost the province of Newfoundland.

In the last federal budget—and this is what we are talking about now, the effect that Bill C-20 has—the freeze was extended for another three years. If you take this freeze plus the freeze before, plus all the other freezes of the federal transfer payments and all the other various transfers to the province of Newfoundland, in the past six years since this government has been in power it will have cost Newfoundland a half a billion dollars by the end of 1992. In 1991-1992, this fiscal year alone, it will cost Newfoundland about $150 million. That is shameful. This is a very serious matter.

I have talked in general terms about the cost of education. What is our future in this country if we cannot afford to educate our children? What is the future? We know now we are behind the eight ball. We are behind the curve when it comes to the Europeans and the Japanese. We do not have our people educated properly. We are not going to improve the situation by increasing the cost of tuition, which is one of the results of Bill C-20, which we are going to effect this evening.

Let me talk about health right now.

Mr. Weiner: How is your health?

Mr. Mifflin: My health is fine, how is yours? I expect it won't be as good after this vote is over, I can assure you. Here is what is happening to health. Whatever we have now, 15 years from now, if you look at this, we are not going to have anything left.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to take you to this couple again. There is in one end of my riding a hospital called the Wilkinson Hospital. It is a very adequate hospital and the couple visit, their children visit when they are not in university and paying the higher tuitions, and usually they have mothers and fathers and they visit as well.

Mr. Speaker, you are cutting me off a little early, I think. As a result of these cuts that hospital's services have been reduced, and the same for the hospital at the other end of the riding, the Brookfield Hospital near Wesleyville. Now, instead of going to those local hospitals, they have to get in their car and drive for one to two hours in all kinds of weather. It is extra inconvenience, extra gas, extra everything.

Those are the two points. The third point is that the individual was told that he would not have to pay any more in unemployment insurance. In those days he was paying $1.95 for each hundred dollars earned. He is now paying $2.80. That is an increase of 50 per cent, that is 50 per cent more. That does not sound like very much when you talk about 85 cents or 95 cents, but if you add that up plus what the employer is going to pay, which has gone from $2.73 to $3.92 per hundred dollars, it adds up to $2 billion—$2 billion.

Where is the fairness in that? In 1985 this same government said: "We don't want to increase by 11 per cent because it might hurt the economy, it may hurt small business", at a time when the economy was booming. Now when we are in the middle of a recession, the economy is far from booming and this government doesn't mind increasing 24 per cent from last year and 50 per cent from the year before".

Where is the fairness? Where is the consistency? Where is the heart? Where is the heart?

I would like to finish on a positive note, if I can. If there is anything that I will have done with great gusto it is, when the time comes to vote on this despicable bill—and I can assure you that I will be joined with great glee and enthusiasm by my colleagues—to say no, no, no to this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the motion standing in the name of Mr. Sobeski. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) I have been requested by the chief government Whip to defer the division until a later time. Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at three o'clock p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): To correct the record you mentioned the government Whip but he is not here. It was the opposition Whip who asked that the vote be deferred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You are much better looking than the government Whip anyway.

It being ten o'clock, in accordance with Standing Order 38 a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you for the opportunity to raise a very important matter on behalf of not only people in Winnipeg and Manitoba, but across this country.

Last week I had the opportunity to raise in this House the question of federal funding for the Mother Earth's People's International Pow-Wow. It may appear at first glance as being just another opposition politician looking for money for another group in his constituency. However, we are going through a transformation right now in the aboriginal community which is very, very important for all Canadians to understand, particularly all members of this House. They have come in times of desperate need and, in many ways because of poverty, unemployment, housing and welfare issues, are still in times of tremendous need.

There is a transformation among the leadership which is permeating the youth of this country, making them a much more positive force in our society than any of us would have seen five years ago.

Last week we saw the election of a new Chief of the Grand Council for Canada for the Assembly of First Nations, a chief who will represent the aboriginal peoples of this country in a fine fashion. He will negotiate in good honour on behalf of his people.

Immediately after that, the aboriginal cultural society held the pow-wow which I was very proud to attend. It was held at the Convention Centre in Winnipeg over the weekend and it attracted thousands of participants from across North America and some other continents. It was also an event attended by thousands of people from around Manitoba.

In seeking funding, and the Assembly of First Nations was very modest in its proposals, not only does the federal government not fund it, which is the choice of any government, but the federal government refused to meet it. The only response it received from the Department of the Secretary of State was a curt letter which said in part: "A project such as this would normally be eligible for funding under the social and cultural development component of the Native Citizen's Program. Unfortunately, as you probably know, this particular component was adversely affected by the budget and it was terminated as of April 1, 1990."

In other words, the sad fact is that the federal government no longer has space in its programming for the needs of aboriginal peoples in our cities.

Public servants, if they are so inclined cannot even find a method of supporting groups such as this. So here we have the sad spectre of the largest gathering in the city for a pow-wow, perhaps one of the largest pow-wows in the history of this country. We have a new minister responsible for constitutional negotiations in this country speaking in this House sometimes in eloquent terms about the need for greater aboriginal participation, and at the very moment when those two interests could have been brought together, the interest in favour of aboriginal peoples and the Constitution, and a chance to have participants get together, have a great time and share a culture, many of whom were sharing it for the first time, the federal government turned away from them and refused to even meet.

I rise here today to call upon the House to review the position of the federal government. I ask that the cabinet consider its position of not funding programs such as the Mother Earth's People's International Pow-wow and meet with it as soon as possible to arrange financing.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to emphasize the successful initiative by the Aboriginal Cultural Society, which organized the Mother Earth's People's International Pow-wow, held in Winnipeg on June 14 and 16.

[English]

Nearly 500 chiefs from across Canada were reported to have participated in the pow-wow which featured a children's program, an arts and cultural show and elders' forum.

The organizers of this forum have approached the federal government for financial assistance and I am pleased to be able to report today that the hon. Robert de Cotret has approved assistance in the amount of $10,000.

[Translation]

The Aboriginal Cultural Society is to be commended for its efforts to reduce social tensions between natives and non-natives in Canada, especially at this critical moment in our history.

The government acknowledges that the issue of native constitutional reform has not been settled. It acknowledges, as the Prime Minister said, that much remains to be done.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a number of serious challenges, as a nation. We are being called upon to help build a country that more accurately reflects what we are as a nation and what we hope to be.

Any reflection on Canada's future must include an analysis of the place of native people in our country and the fundamental role they have to play. The federal government intends to make them active participants in these discussions. Mr. Clark has discussed with native leaders how this could be achieved.

[English]

Consultation with, and participation of, aboriginal peoples in any process which will lead to a major change in their place in Canada is fundamental. This government would not seek to have the Constitution amended to define the role, place and rights of aboriginal peoples without having ensured that their views were heard and fully considered.

This government is committed to working to ensure that the Canada being built for the 21st century will include a new relationship with aboriginal people.

PASSES FOR CONVICTED PERSONS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, further to a question asked on May 29, the National Parole Board and the Correctional Services of Canada have embarked on what many people believe is a very dangerous experiment by allowing a convicted serial rapist out into society on an escorted temporary absence.

Larry Takahashi is no ordinary criminal. He was once considered a model citizen until police came to question him in 1983. He had to be subdued with tear gas before the officers could arrest him.

Edmonton police estimated that during his trial in 1984 he was responsible for well over 100 sexual assaults. He was charged with 138 counts of sexual assault but after evidence was called on only 14 cases, the other victims were sent home and their cases were, in effect, dropped. He was sentenced to three consecutive life sentences on the 14 charges, plus an additional 73 years in prison.

Correctional Services of Canada and the National Parole Board are not as convinced of his threat to the public as are his victims, the judges and a battery of psychiatrists which has him pronounced a danger.

He has been granted escorted temporary absences from Mountain Prison in Aggasiz, B.C., on a monthly basis since July 1989, I understand. On several occasions he and a convicted murderer played a nine-hole round of golf at a nearby country club with only one unarmed escort in tow, more of a caddy than an escort.

Because the Solicitor General appears to be more committed to rehabilitating criminals, and we all believe in that, he seemed to dissociate himself from his responsibilities as Canada's top law enforcement officer.

It was not until May 31 that he agreed to an immediate review of Mr. Takahashi's pass privileges. The National Parole Board issues absence permits for those serving life or indeterminate sentences, the violent career criminals. In 1988–89, the Solicitor General's department's annual report revealed the National Parole Board received 311 applications for temporary absences from these types of convicts. A total of 277, or 89.1 per cent of the applications were approved.

Absence permits are officially granted on three grounds: compassionate leave, the funeral of a family member; family contact for special events and occasional exposure to the community; and administrative leave, court appearances. I do not believe a round of golf would meet any of those criteria. Does anyone?

Any review of Takahashi's absence privileges should include a psychiatric assessment by the same team of doctors that examined him prior to sentencing in 1984. In the team was Dr. Herbert Pascoe, a renowned psychiatrist who has helped set standards in the assessment of criminal minds. He described Mr. Takahashi as a unique sex offender: "Cunning, calculating, highly intelligent who terrorized women for sport where most rapists are motivated by vengeance or primordial satisfaction."

If Dr. Pascoe concludes that Takahashi's criminal disorder has subsided to the point where he does not pose an unreasonable threat to women, people might be convinced that he should receive strictly controlled pass privileges. Until then, public safety is unreasonably at risk with Takahashi on the loose for whatever reason.

There are instances when a violent offender has convinced the entire judicial establishment dealing with his case that he is a dangerous person with little hope rehabilitation. In dealing with these people, the Solicitor General is primarily responsible for protecting law-abiding citizens from convicted offenders. In the case of Larry Takahashi, it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, and I think to your constituents and to all of our constituents, the Solicitor General has ignored that responsibility.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member opposite for Edmonton Southeast, I also share his concern about the inmate that we have been talking about because he is housed in my riding at present and has resided there for I am not just sure how many years and the escorted leave that he was on was in my riding as well.

I might add that the protection of Canadian society is the highest priority of the Solicitor General, the Commissioner and staff of Corrections Canada. However, in Canada, as in most western countries, judges' sentences lead to an eventual return to society for the majority of inmates.

To facilitate this inevitable return, the Correctional Service of Canada and the National Parole Board have developed a gradual, controlled and supervised release program for releasing inmates into the community. Risk is the prime criteria in any decision they make concerning the release of offenders. After discussions with the Solicitor General, the Commissioner of Corrections Canada directed that an independent review of Mr. Takahashi's case be conducted by an independent forensic psychiatrist. The result of this review will be provided to the National Parole Board for consideration in any subsequent Parole Board reviews.

At the present time, I am advised that Mr. Takahashi is not receiving further escorted temporary absences.

TAXATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to a question I raised with the Minister of National Revenue on June 4, 1991, referring to the minister's admission that Canadians were grossly over-taxed, I just wanted to add a few more items perhaps for comment from the parliamentary secretary.

From 1984 to 1989, to bear witness and evidence to the fact that Canadians are being over-taxed, the government collected 66 per cent more on income taxes for a grand total of $25.457 billion while personal incomes during the first four years increased by only 36.5 per cent. In fact the amount of disposable income increased by only an average of 7.2 per cent per annum over those years.

At the same time, from 1984 to 1989, the government collected 34 per cent less in corporate taxes in 1989 than it did in 1984, while the corporate profits before taxes increased during the first four years to 41.2 per cent and, after taxes, by 54.4 per cent.

What those figures tell us is that from the point of view of competitiveness, corporate Canada should at least have been able to absorb the government's strategy or stated economic policies designed for greater competitiveness. Instead, what happened is that we saw the taxation increased and increased and, in fact, under this 1991 budget the government has indicated that it will raise an additional $1.4 billion in 1991–92 in tobacco taxes alone, a further $1.14 billion in 1992–93, a further $1.03 billion in 1993–94 and a further $980 million in 1994–95.

For all that kind of collection of taxes on that one item, tobacco, we do not have a government that has given us an indication of any kinds of programs that are going to deal with the health problems associated with greater tobacco consumption.

Yet, we have a government that says that what we need to do is to become more competitive. That same government, from 1984 to 1989, increased income taxes as a share of federal revenue by 9.03 per cent and it decreased corporate taxation by 34 per cent.

The minister responsible for that, former finance minister Michael Wilson, acknowledged that the tax reforms initiated in 1987 were "the wrong policy for the wrong time because what they did they did stimulate the economy" when the economy was already strong, thereby encouraging higher interest rates. The net impact of those interest rates, according to the member for Mississauga South, then chairman of the finance committee, was: "climbing interest rates represent a cash transfer by the government from the relatively poor to the relatively well off."

Yet, the government insists on shifting the burden of taxation, the burden of the deficit, the burden of the public debt and the burden of government expenditures on to the backs of ordinary Canadians' personal income. It should be looking for other solutions.

The GST was not a solution. It is even a greater burden. The minister admitted as much. His department indicated that it grossed more than $400 million more than anticipated.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to respond to the hon. member opposite for Eglinton–Lawrence.

According to figures available from the OECD, Canada's total tax revenues of all levels of government represent about a third of the country's Gross Domestic Product, less than that in France, Germany, the United Kingdom and Italy.

Taxes on corporations at 2.6 per cent of the GDP, and consumption and direct taxes at 13 per cent of GDP are roughly equivalent to those of the other G–7 countries.

The study by Global Economics gives the government high marks on its corporate tax changes. Specifically, it notes that: "On balance, the Tory corporate changes have tended to improve the efficiency of the tax system." As pointed out in the study, this has led to a "pattern of investment and economic activity that is more productive and conducive to economic growth and employment creation".

Furthermore, as the study notes, corporate income tax revenues have grown more slowly than those from other taxes, due to the decline in corporate profits which are 8.4 per cent lower in 1991–92 than they were in 1984–85. Despite this decline, corporate tax revenues have increased over this period by 17.3 per cent.

This increased revenue is a direct consequence of discretionary actions taken by this government to ensure that corporations contribute to our deficit-reduction efforts. These include the base broadening measures of tax reform and the imposition of the large corporation tax.

The Global Economics report also gave the government high marks for its sales tax reform initiatives. To quote: "Over-all, however, on efficiency grounds, the government deserves high marks for finally getting rid of the outmoded manufacturing sales tax and introducing a modern consumption tax."

An integral part of the introduction of the goods and services tax was the enrichment of the sales tax credit to ensure that lower-income Canadians were better off as a result of the reform.

While this has meant an increase in revenues, this has been done in a fair and equitable way. Measures such as the surtax on high-income earners and the alternative minimum tax ensure that high-income Canadians pay their fair share.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, once more I rise to speak on the incredibly important and incredibly crucial matter of assistance from the federal government to the port of Halifax.

I am delighted to see the hon. member for Calgary Southeast who I presume is going to respond to this. Perhaps, I may be overly anticipating the hon. member in his reply, but I would like to put paid to the rumour here and now that the problems in the port of Halifax with most particular reference to the problems of container traffic and the weighing anchor of container companies away from Halifax to Montreal and other points is due to increased tonnage in the area.

This is something that I suspect was invented first by the Minister of Fisheries, has been picked up by the Minister of Transport, by the Associate Minister of Transport and most lately, by the Deputy Prime Minister in response to a question last week.

The president of the last container company to leave Halifax said explicitly and directly when asked: "Why are you going?", "The reasons are twofold: The first and foremost reason was the problem of freight rates between Halifax and Montreal. They were just not competitive." Consequently, we were losing business either to Montreal, within Canada or to the eastern ports of the United States, most of which interestingly enough are serviced by a railroad owned by Canadian Pacific which is, in itself, heavily subsidized and has been over the years by the federal government. The second problem cited by the president of that container company was the unfair tax structure yet again.

We do not ask for a great deal. We do ask for some action. We have asked for years that something be done about the freight rates that are charged between Halifax and central Canada. We have asked again and again and again. What response have we received? One of the responses that we received is Bill C-11, and in its former incarnation Bill C-26, the cancellation of the At and East grain subsidy. This is not the response that Haligonians and Nova Scotians are looking for. We are looking for some true action on the part of this government.

Four-and-a-half weeks ago in this House, the Minister of Transport told me, and I quote, as I quoted before, that he would: "do everything in his power to help the port of Halifax". On Friday last, the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada said: "We take this seriously. We take it as seriously as the member from Halifax does, and we are going to do something".

Several weeks ago I questioned the Associate Minister of Transport, and she, too, said something will be done. Sadly, what those comments remind me of, and what they remind Haligonians who have a sense of history of, were the words of the then King of England, Edward VIII, when he visited the coal fields in Wales and saw the unemployment. He said: "Something must be done".

What he did two weeks later was abdicate his responsibility. This government is abdicating its responsibility in and to the people of Halifax. Something has to be done, not mere words, not fine phrases. Assistance is needed and assistance is needed now for the Port of Halifax and for the people of Halifax.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank again the member from Halifax, who has been most diligent in the pressing of this issue before the House.

As we have said before, the present difficulty facing the port of Halifax is the product of a host of economic factors, most of which are international in scope and largely beyond the power of any Canadian entity to solve. The focus for the majority of the problems lies within the international container shipping sphere, which has excess capacity everywhere. Reductions in importations have precipitated an excess of transportation supply over demand of over 30 per cent in some trades, the most prominent being the European-Canadian sector.

International shipping lines have had to cut operational costs and to make other commercial adjustments in an extremely tight market. It must be remembered, however, that such ebbs and flows are part of the normal cycle of international business and reflect the market economy of world shipping. What is more difficult to accept is the degree to which these business cycles impact upon the interface operations, in this case, Canadian ports and railways.

It has been estimated that the portending departure of Hapag Lloyd from the port of Halifax will cause a short-term loss to the port of between 40,000 and 50,000 20-foot equivalent units, which is a standard container measurement. While this level, which represents some 12 per cent of the port's container tonnage, must be seen as significant, it should be recalled that, between the years of 1980 and 1982, an even larger amount was lost to the port, only to be quickly regained and increased during the recovery period which followed.

This government knows that all those with interest in the port and the Canadian routes must work together to produce a long-term, system-wide approach to intermodal traffic so as to keep our ports competitive. What is needed is the help of all parties to produce a comprehensive and efficient package of intermodal services.

In the longer term, in order to ensure the continued competitiveness of our Canadian ports and routes in a dynamic and difficult market, all parties may need to develop strategic alliances in order to create a competitive position for Canadian ports, and for Halifax in particular. The department is currently listening to what those interested parties have to say and I can assure you that full consideration will be given toward identifying and implementing an appropriate long-term response.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on June 3, I rose in the House and asked a question of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans regarding the need for a full environmental assessment of the Alcan project, as ordered on May 16 by the Federal Court of Canada. On that day, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans suggested that the matter was under review and that an announcement would be made within a reasonable time as to what kind of action the government was going to propose.

The details and concerns that people have had over this project have been fairly well documented, in particular by reports now coming out from retired Department of Fisheries and Oceans scientists whose reports and information that had been released show there is considerable concern over the fish habitat of the Nechako and eventually the Fraser River and many other concerns related thereto, the main problem being the reduced flows due to the Alcan project. I would like to quote from the decision on May 16 in the Federal Court because I think it says most clearly what this government should do and what we hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to announce tonight. I am quoting from the decision:

> I conclude that the Kemano II Completion Project requires an assessment by virtue of the Environmental Assessment Review Process and that the Ministers involved and specifically the Minister of the Environment were under an obligation to arrange for it and not frustrate this by the Settlement Agreement signed in 1987 and finally by the Order of the Minister, confirmed by Order in Council—

That was passed late last year. Most important:

> It is not sufficient to be satisfied with the review, however extensive, performed by the Proponent of a proposal, even in co-operation with the Ministers involved, without a public assessment by an independent panel at which all interested parties may be heard.

It is very clear in the decision what the judge in this case was suggesting. He has thrown out the original Nechako settlement agreement and in particular makes reference to the Order in Council exempting this project from an environmental assessment.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will announce two things tonight: notwithstanding the company's decision on Friday to appeal this decision, an announcement as to the government's intention in that regard and, regarding that, a decision by this government to announce a full environmental assessment of the Alcan project.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member opposite from Prince George—Bulkley Valley and in reply also to a similar question that was asked on June 3, 1991, I am pleased to provide additional historical information on this matter.

By the late 1970s, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans had become concerned that reduced flows being released by Alcan from the first Kemano Project built in the 1950s could endanger the chinook and sockeye salmon populations in the Nechako and Stuart Rivers in British Columbia. The department therefore obtained an injunction requiring Alcan to release more water than it was obligated to do under the 1950 British Columbia Water licence.

When Alcan proposed the second project, the Kemano Completion Project in the early 1980s, and also sought relief in court from the injunction, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans entered into a settlement agreement with British Columbia and Alcan in order to secure longer term protection for the fish stocks. The agreement formalized the release of flows to protect fisheries and required Alcan to provide measures to mitigate the potential impacts on fish and fish habitat.

Before the minister entered into the agreement the department conducted considerable analysis of the potential impacts of the proposed Kemano completion project. The agreement was reached after an independent review panel chaired by the president of the University of British Columbia advised that fisheries experts agreed that impacts on the fisheries could be mitigated. The department applied the principles of its policy for the management of fish habitat providing for no net loss of fish habitat and responsible resource management. In particular the agreement called for a mechanism to ensure that impacts on fish and fish habitat could be mitigated on an ongoing basis. Therefore, if an issue arises that was not initially thought to be a problem, there is a process in place designed specifically to deal with it.

We can see that the settlement agreement was entered into with consideration for potential impact. They were in fact considered extensively. In the understanding of the day when the settlement agreement was signed, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans took what he believed to be the necessary and appropriate steps to ensure that the protection necessary for fish and fish habitat was provided.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons, with amendments.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-236, an act respecting National Heritage Day.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to designate the third Monday in February as National Heritage Day, an important day that would give Canadians a chance to celebrate our heritage and our customs, traditions, architecture and history.

The bill amends a number of formal acts in terms of providing for a statutory holiday and I think, in light of Canada's celebration of its 125th birthday in 1992, it would be a good way to start the year.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INTEREST ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-237, an act to amend the Interest Act (calculation of credit card interest).

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Interest Act to regularize the charging of interest by credit card companies.

At the present time, if the entire balance is not paid to credit card companies at the time that the first invoice is received, interest is charged on every single cent of the balance, right back to the date of purchase of goods in the first place. This creates some unconscionable charges for interest; indeed, I have seen charges well in excess of 1,000 per cent per annum, apparently quite legitimate according to our banking system. I would suggest that this bill be passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-238, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

• (1010)

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill was before this House on two occasions in the last session. The bill attempts to change the Criminal Records Act so that when persons have an absolute discharge or a conditional discharge and conditions have been satisfied they do not carry a criminal record.

It was the original intention of the criminal records provisions in the Criminal Code that criminal records not be attached to people given an absolute discharge or conditional discharge by the court. Nonetheless, the system operates in such a way that even a member of this House convicted some short while ago of a very minor offence and given an absolute discharge bears a criminal record and will for the rest of his life unless he makes a formal application to have that record dismissed.

An absolute ridiculous situation exists and ought to be corrected. I am surprised the government has not already introduced legislation to do so. In the absence of the government acting sensibly, I introduce this bill again.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-239, an act to amend the Criminal Code (review of convictions).

He said: Madam Speaker, I am introducing today this bill to try to correct serious flaws in our judicial system. This bill, if passed by the House, would establish a real and fair judicial review of criminal convictions. This would be achieved by putting in place an independent body called a conviction review commission. This commission would have the mandate to review criminal matters or cases where serious doubts have been raised and would provide an objective, independent, and fair review of those cases.

Had this commission been in place, it is my strong belief that David Milgaard's case would have been heard again by the courts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-240, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (unjust dismissal).

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased at this time to present to the House for first reading an act to amend the Canada Labour Code relating to unjust dismissal.

The bill would provide that no employer may suspend, discharge or impose any financial or other penalty on a person employed by him or take any other disciplinary action by reason of that person having refused to perform an act that he has reasonable cause to believe is prohibited by law.

This would form an essential component of any whistle-blowing legislation. It is not really directly related to the matter of health and safety but rather to those areas where no current protection exists, such as employee assistance in the enforcement of environmental protection laws, public safety in the shipping and storage of hazardous materials and transport of goods across international borders.

It would assist employees and supervisors alike to help ensure the law of the land is indeed upheld.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mr. Guy Arsenault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved for leave to introduce Bill 241, an Act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

He said: I am honoured to introduce this bill to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act (National flag of Canada). The bill provides for the displaying of the Canadian flag on any building in which there is a post office, as well as inside every post office.

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that the Canadian flag is displayed on buildings where a post office is located, as well as inside every post office.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege and duty to present to this House a petition signed by literally hundreds upon hundreds of people who reside on and around Locke Street in my riding of Hamilton West. They object strongly to the removal of the Locke Street postal station.

We say that it is convenient as it is located in the centre of an active, successful community, central to the many businesses which use the service and highly accessible to public transportation.

What evidence do the petitioners have to support their claim? The post office has been located on Locke Street for 48 years.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of 120 of my constituents from the northern part of my riding, from the communities of Lumsden, Newtown, Wesleyville, Templeman, Pound Cove, Badger's Quay, Pool's Island and Brookfield.

These are areas in my riding that while not remote are far removed from urban centres. They rely a lot on television to assist in their cultural life.

They note that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has historically been a key element in the federal government's commitment to cultural integrity and national unity. They are very concerned that the program that epitomizes the cultural background of Newfoundland and the maritimes, Land and Sea, has been cut after 20 years of success in the region.

They humbly call and pray upon Parliament to ensure that CBC programming remains intact, and particularly that the program Land and Sea be restored.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this morning.

The first one talks about the CBC and the cutbacks to the funding for CBC. The petitioners from various places in my riding, the Penticton and Summerland areas, are petitioning Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada.

They have asked the government to re-examine its priorities in terms of decreasing funding for Canadian institutions and its insistence on privatization.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, the second petition is with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

While congratulating the new Solicitor General for extending funding, these petitioners from various places in British Columbia are somewhat critical of the cuts in RCMP funding throughout past years.

They are petitioning Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege, indeed it is an honour, to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from British Columbia.

The petitioners are concerned that the government has cut back on RCMP funding, which has resulted in a number of subdivisions closing down and a curtailment of RCMP police protection for a number of communities.

They are asking the government to continue at least its traditional financial support. Otherwise, it will off-load an awful lot of costs to local taxpayers and erode a very viable symbol of Canadian unity.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by some 46 of my constituents from the communities of Castlegar, Nelson, Revelstoke, Slocan, Salmo and South Slocan. They urge Parliament to reconsider its action regarding the privatization of Petro-Canada.

Among the reasons the petitioners suggest is that Petro-Canada has never really lived up to its full potential in terms of being a leader in environmental action in Canada.

The petitioners would ask that Petro-Canada take the lead as a green energy company helping them make environmentally responsible energy choices.

These petitioners feel strongly. Despite the fact that Parliament has already acted in one respect, they would urge us to take a second look—a famous phrase in British Columbia—and move again to have Petro-Canada fulfil the role that it could and should be playing in the development of our nation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 16 will be answered today.

[Text]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

Question No. 16—Mr. Milliken:

Since Chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada (1988) was proclaimed on January 1, 1989, what has been the total value of money and property forfeited to the Department of Health and Welfare as a result of "designated drug offences" under the statute, and what portion of the said money and property, if any, was paid to any other government or governments, and which government or governments?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada (1988) provides for the forfeiture of property obtained or derived directly or indirectly as the result of the commission of specified offenses under the Narcotic Control Act and Food and Drugs Act. Forfeitures for the calendar years indicated are as follows:

Information is not yet available for 1991.

The amendments require the Department of National Health and Welfare to dispose of forfeited property. Monies obtained from dispositions are deposited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Consequently, monies may not be paid to other governments.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

I hope that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands appreciates that I stayed up late last night to answer this question for him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs) moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, ten Senators to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, for some time, almost a year ago this week, this House and this country have been dealing with the consequences of the failure a year ago to achieve agreement on the Meech Lake Accord. We have all known that there are very profound constitutional questions that have been raised. We know that this time it will be more difficult to deal with those issues than it would have been had we succeeded a year ago. We are not here to lament the past. We are here to try to construct a strong future together.

It is important, I think, that we understand some of the particular challenges that face us now. With the Meech Lake approach, it was possible to take issues one by one in the method that had been set out by the premiers of Canada when they met in Edmonton to agree on the approach that was later involved in that accord. That is now behind us. We no longer have the luxury as a country or as a Parliament of dealing with those issues one by one. What we have to do, and it is far more complex, is find ways in which we can deal with several difficult issues together.

A way of expressing this is to say that this is the Canada round of negotiations. That is meant to make it very clear that the concerns of aboriginal people will be prominent in these issues, that the concerns of institutional reform will be prominent in this process, that other issues which are of particular interest to groups in the country or regions of the country will be prominent in this process.

I think all of us in this House understand that while the other issues are of course of very real importance, a central issue that must be resolved here is the means by which this country, which was founded more than a century ago as an extraordinary partnership between two peoples who then went out to draw others in, can maintain the essence of that partnership so that Canadians whose first language is French and Canadians whose first language is English will choose to live together as partners in this common country.

What this particular motion is about is the terms of reference for a committee. There have been some discussions among parties, and I have been privileged to be a part of some of those discussions myself. There are some disagreements as to needs. I believe there are no disagreements as to the purposes or the ends that we are seeking to achieve here. We are looking for a way in which the Parliament of Canada can carry out its functions to create a climate and consider a series of recommendations that will allow the nation to make substantial progress to achieve profound changes in our constitutional arrangements.

Everyone knows that this country is at a crossroads. There are two paths before us. One is the path of partition. The other is the path of renewal. In the months ahead Canadians will decide which path they want to follow. The choice is straightforward. It is the choice of agreeing to live together or deciding to live apart.

It is a choice that Canadians will make themselves. This dusty document that we call a constitution will never be enough to keep us united. Our country, Canada, will remain united only through the will of its population and the strenght of a consensus. If this will and this consensus do not exist anymore, no constitution will have any significance, not simply because we will not be able to reach an agreement, but because a country is more than a mere legal document. Countries do not survive because they have their names on geographical maps. They survive because they have a place in the soul and the heart of their population.

That reality will never change. But there is another reality which also defines the task before us: It is the fact that, everywhere in the country, Canadians want to be directly invloved in the discussions that will determine our collective future. Canadians want to have a chance to express themselves.

They want to participate in the process which will determine whether Canada will continue to exist or not. That is a legitimate request, and we have the obligation to grant them this right.

We members of Parliament, also have another obligation: We must make of this assembly—of representatives elected by the Canadians—a part of the solution that we are seeking together. We are far from being perfect, as individuals as well as an institution. However, this assembly represents the whole country, and it is the only institution to do so. If someone can claim to speak on behalf of Canadians, it is us, the Parliamentarians. The time has come to speak for Canada and to decide together how to bring about the profound changes that our nation requires.

This is, Madam Speaker, the object of the motion before the House. It is aimed at bringing closer the parliamentarians of the people, and at bringing closer together the parliamentarians from Ottawa and those from the provinces and the territories. This motion is also aimed at enabling Canadians to discuss, to change and to develop together specific proposals for a renewed Canada.

In its Speech from the Throne, the government presented the outline of a four stage process for the renewal of the Canadian pact. It is, in my opinion, the most opened process ever devised to enable Canadians to decide the future of their country.

The first phase of this process is almost over. In the next few days, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future and the Special Joint Committee on the Process for Amending the Constitution will table their reports. These committees have done an excellent job.

The two reports will help the government develop a series of proposals for a renewed Canada. These proposals will be presented this fall. They will be specific in nature and they will also be made public. They will provide for changes in the division of powers, in our national institutions and in our way of dealing with native Canadians, among other things. The Canadians will be invited to review these measures and improve on them.

The mandate of the Special Joint Committee will be to move us from general ideas to specifics, from assertions to solutions, out of the past and on the way to a promising future.

Before setting up this committee, we consulted with the official opposition and the New Democratic Party. As we debate this motion, I want to put on record that this government will consider carefully any serious amendment to the comittee's mandate that could help Parliament carry out its duty.

I would like to outline the primary criteria which governed the establishment of this committee.

First, it must be a committee of parliamentarians, by this I mean a committee made up of people whose present duty is to help Canadians ultimately find a way to stay together.

It must also be, and this is the second criterion, a committee of the people. It will not be the kind of committee that will sit only in Ottawa listening just to the views of its own members or of lawyers and bureaucrats. This committee will travel to Canadian communities to meet the people and ask them to share their views and tell them what they think of our proposals.

Third, this committee will reflect, through its approach, the co-operative nature of the federation it will help renew. For the first time in the history of this country, a committee will the allowed to consult with other committees or groups of legislators in each province and territory.

[English]

These parliamentarians will not meet across the table. They will meet around the table, and they will not simply meet each other. They will be empowered to hold hearings together, joint hearings, in a process designed to make our federalism an instrument of co-operation among Canadians, not division. That unique dialogue can become both a means and an example of the consensus we seek.

I am writing today to the premiers and territorial leaders of Canada to ask for their support. Decisions about their legislatures are for them and for their colleagues to make. However I hope that all provinces and territories will find a way to work with this unique committee of Parliament.

Fourth, the committee will develop special procedures to ensure that the aboriginal peoples of Canada participate fully in the development of Canada's renewal, both respecting general questions which interest them as Canadians and particularly where there is a distinct aboriginal interest.

I have met with leaders of the four national aboriginal associations in Canada to ask their help in designing an agreed mechanism. Most recently I spoke by telephone with Mr. Ovide Mercredi, the new national chief. The language in the terms of reference provides maximum flexibility to create a system which respects the power of Parliament to decide yet recognizes that aboriginal Canadians have interests and have a unique perspective that cannot be met in a normal committee context.

An alternative proposal was to designate certain aboriginal leaders as ex officio members of the parliamentary committee. I considered that carefully. It could create a demand for other ex officio representatives which would have the effect of diluting the position of both the committee and the aboriginal peoples. The model that we are examining gives aboriginals a wide opportunity to influence decisions that ex officio status would not.

I make the point clearly so that there is no doubt. What we are proposing is a system that would not change in the least the capacity of national aboriginal organizations to come as witnesses, but in addition to that right which is open to them and to other Canadians, there would be a particular capacity to have the perspectives of aboriginal Canadians considered regularly and in depth by the committee that must make recommendations regarding the future of our country.

Finally, this parliamentary committee will be given all the flexibility and all the resources it needs to be open, to be inclusive, to be innovative. The committee can create as many subcommittees as it wishes. If it chooses, some of those subcommittees can take on the character of a constituent assembly on particular issues, always reporting back to the joint committee of Parliament.

The committee will be able to authorize whatever radio and television broadcasts it deems desirable. The committee will be able to create new mechanisms, whether they are round table discussions, specific issue panels or innovative communications channels, to make the discussion and the debate as deep, as democratic and as productive as possible.

I believe that this process and this committee form our best opportunity to bring this country together. The committee is both parliamentary and participatory. The committee will meet with its counterparts across the country, a federal-provincial-territorial experiment, which I believe can help renew federalism itself.

The committee will meet in public. The committee will reach out to Canadians from sea to sea to sea. It will be flexible, not rigid. It will be open, not closed. It will be inclusive, not exclusive, and its work will matter. It will be on the basis of the substance and the success of this committee that Canadians will then decide how we give effect to change that can renew our federation.

This committee has the potential and it has the mandate to change the tone and the content of constitutional discussion in Canada. If it meets that potential, it can express a consensus on what changes should be introduced by the Canadian government, on what changes should be introduced by provincial and territorial governments, and on what changes should be approached by all of us working together.

Mr. Lapierre: Not all.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The hon. member who was elected as a federalist and now flies other colours says: "Not all" of us. He will have the opportunity to participate as a member of Parliament—his party does not have the status of a party in the House—in these discussions. We hope that he will take an open-minded approach to these discussions. There are people here who would be interested in his point of view. There are people across the country who would be. We hope profoundly that he will be open-minded enough about the country which has given him so much that he will be prepared to consider the perspective and the point of view of others.

I do not believe it an exaggeration to state that never before in the history of this country has a committee had such a responsibility placed upon it. If this committee succeeds, it can be a central instrument of the renewal and the reform of this country.

Some would propose a different mechanism to bring this country together. A popular and prominent alternative is the constituent assembly. I do not dismiss that proposal, nor do I question the sincerity of those who prefer that option. However, after serious discussion and deliberation, it is our view that that would not be the best choice now. I do not rule it out for the future. Our judgment on those and other options will be influenced both by the recommendations of the joint committee looking at the amending formula for the Constitution as it will be by the success of the committee, the formation of which we are discussing here today.

However, I would like to make some observations concerning the concept of a constituent assembly. First, there is no consensus in the country on how such an assembly would be constituted and how it would work. Even such a prominent proponent of this option as the premier of Ontario recently acknowledged this reality. The breadth and depth of substantive differences in this country are already such, I would have thought, that we should think twice before adding a new difference on a new process which has never been tried.

How long would it take before agreement could be reached on the forum and the operation of a constituent assembly? What new tensions and emotions might that process evoke? Once the forum was agreed, if it was ever agreed, how long would the process take?

Second, it would be less than sensible, it seems to me, to embrace a process which has been rejected by the province whose participation we require to make our Constitution whole. What purpose would it serve? What message would it send if we adopt the very process to achieve that goal which the province of Quebec has ruled out? It defies logic , it defies common sense to attempt to arrive at consensus on the Constitution through a mechanism which from the beginning would leave out those whom we wish to bring in.

The interests of this country are best served by improving this institution of Parliament, not by replacing it. Premier Ghiz said recently: "We have existing traditions and I don't think we should abandon them". Premier Bourassa echoed those views when he said: "Moi, je fais confiance à la démocratie parlementaire".

Finally, as I have argued today, I do not believe the choice of a parliamentary committee implies rejection of the best features of a constituent assembly. Indeed that is what we are trying to do here. We are trying to select the best of both options by adopting special measures to ensure the full and meaningful involvement of aboriginal peoples by putting in place means to encourage joint meetings with committees of provincial legislatures and by mandating this committee to identify and implement innovative ways by which individual Canadians and groups can participate in the work of the committee by these and other means. I believe we have identified and acted upon the best of the parliamentary tradition and the best of the concept of a constituent assembly.

When I look at all the other proposals for a constituent assembly, I overcome my modesty enough to suggest that what I have designed is the most workable proposal that has come forward from any other quarter, although I am naturally prepared to hear other suggestions that will serve all of the interests that we seek, including the capacity for the participation of Quebec.

This committee will require energy, imagination, and the help of Providence as it embarks on its historic task. The tempers of a year ago have subsided but they can flare again. The wounds which many suffered are beginning to heal, but the healing is by no means over. The sense of exclusion, misunderstanding and mistrust which has permeated this country remains, and it must be addressed.

In the eight weeks I have been in this job, I have listened to Canadians from coast to coast to coast. I have gone deliberately to those who have felt left out or mistreated. I have travelled to the north, to the west, to the Atlantic provinces. I have talked to aboriginal Canadians and several of their leaders. I have visited Ontario and Quebec, met with representatives of women's organizations, of the ethnocultural community and others. While Canadians are still angry at how things have gone wrong in our country, they are now looking for ways to help set things right.

I believe the committee mentioned in the motion before the House today can be one of those ways. It will seek the response of Canadians on specific proposals. It will help Canadians get to know each other, to understand, accept and I hope even treasure the diversity which blesses this country, the diversity which has built Canada and made it the tolerant, understanding and free country that it is.

In the months ahead Canadians must reflect on this country, on what it has accomplished, on the peaceable kingdom it has become, and on the bright future it can hold if we hold together. The Canadian achievement is unlike any other, a country that cares and dares, a country where rich provinces help poorer ones, where health care is a right and not a privilege, where the proud boast of our Armed Forces is that we are the best peacekeepers in the world.

We sometimes forget or deny just how special we are. We forget that this country secured its freedom without bloody revolution. We forget that we have maintained our unity without civil war. We forget that while so many others have chosen conquest and empire, Canadians have pioneered the pursuit of co-operation and of comity.

I want to quote Joseph Howe, Nova Scotia's great statesman, but before doing that I want to say that I note, as you undoubtedly will, that he spoke in a different age with a little less sensitivity to gender equality. But what Joe Howe said more than a century ago was: "Brag about your country, boys". Well, Canadians don't brag much, but there are others in this world who know what we should brag about.

When the Japanese want to learn about peacekeeping, they come to Canada to see how we do it. When anyone in the world interested in how people live together in human communities wants to see cities that work, they come to Canada to see how we do it. When Argentina's Mothers of the Disappeared wanted to learn about putting in place an institution to guarantee human rights and how they could secure those human rights, they came to Canada to learn from our achievement. When the brave democrats of the new eastern Europe want to find out about democracy or want to find out about municipal government, or want to find out about how they can build a social safety net, they come to Canada. When Americans want to figure out how to put together a better health care system, they come to Canada. When South Africans, black and white, want to learn about elections that are fair, legal systems that are just, and human rights that are universal, they come to Canada.

As we enter into this phase of this debate we have to ask ourselves: Is everyone else wrong about this country? Is Canada as ordinary and as common and as disposable as some would have us believe? Have we not built something here which is special and which deserves to be sustained?

Canadians need to ask those questions and we need to answer those questions. Canadians need to get to know each other; not to convince each other that their views are right but to come to accept and to celebrate the diversity that has blessed this extraordinary country. We can only build consensus around Canada if Canadians everywhere come to understand why others have priorities which are different from our own.

I remember several weeks ago coming out of a meeting in the West Block on Parliament Hill. I had just been meeting with members of the Alberta caucus of my party and then with members of the Quebec caucus of my party. That is quite a bit for one night.

Mr. Lapierre: Both caucuses, too?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): In my case it is both caucuses and in the case of the hon. member I suppose it is both members.

However, I came out of the West Block and there was a bus full of students. They were shouting at me. That is not as unusual as I would like people to believe, that people shout at me, except that these were friendly shouts. I went aboard the bus and I talked to the students who were there. They were here as part of the Forum for Young Canadians. One young Montrealer said to me: "Mr. Clark, last week I was a separatist, but that was because I had never met anyone from the rest of Canada, and I am not a separatist now".

Too many Canadians have not met people from the rest of Canada. We see each other through filters, which are often false. We keep our distance. We keep our counsel. We should not do that.

The committee this House is considering today will help Canadians reach out to each other and to us, who they have elected, to build upon what is best about this country. Next year Canada will be 125 years old and next year can either be a requiem or a celebration of this country. That choice is one that Canadians will make. Our obligation today is to give them the opportunity to make that choice intelligently, to make it directly, to make it well, and to make it wisely.

It is in that spirit and for that reason that the government has proposed the establishment of this committee which will be the instrument which can carry the discussions, which can have the effect of leading Canadians into a renewed united future.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I am glad to participate in this debate today and my first words will be along the line of the minister's conclusions.

It is quite clear that many Canadians do not realize what is happening in this country. Some would like to break it, while so many around the world would like to come here. That people in this country would no longer believe in its fundamental values and would seek to break it is a source of great puzzlement around the world.

I would like to say, right from the start, that the Official Opposition in this House shares the views expressed by the minister, on behalf of the government, that an objective and just solution to this constitutional impasse must be found quickly. This is why, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I am happy to tell the minister that we are willing to go along with the approach suggested by the government.

On April 21st of this year, our leader outlined the main thrust of an approach aimed at solving Canada's constitutional problems. "It's time for a new Canada Round of negotiations" he said. "We must have a constitutional process and framework, based on principles which will allow for a quick solution to the current impasse, a solution which is faire to Quebec and to the whole of Canada."

The Leader of the Opposition reminded that it was up to the present government, the Conservative government, to make public rapidly its proposal for constitutional reform, so that hon. members of this House and Canadians in particular, could respond to the initiatives put forward by the government.

The Leader of the Opposition promised at the time—and I renew that promise today—that the Liberal Party would work constructively with the other parties in the House to help solve the national unity issue. The Leader of the Opposition, on our behalf, suggested that the government hold a national referendum to give legitimacy to its constitutional reform project. By trying for a large consensus in a referendum, we might help the acceptance of constitutional resolutions by the Parliament of Canada and all ten provincial legislatures.

Clearly, the Leader of the Opposition mentioned the need to act quickly. Why did he propose a fast process? This is because, in our Party, we recognize the deadlines set by Quebecers.

• (1100)

There was, in Quebec, the creation of an extended parliamentary commission, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, which recommended to the Quebec National Assembly the establishment of two parliamentary committees, one to study the consequences of Quebec's separation or sovereignty, and the other to receive proposals for in-depth constitutional changes from the Canadian government and other provincial legislatures.

The Bélanger-Campeau Commission recommended that, after completion of those studies by the two parliamentary committees, a referendum be held in Quebec either on those constitutional offers from the other Canadian provinces and the Canadian government, or just simply on Quebec's sovereignty.

We, in the Liberal Party of Canada, believe that those deadlines are true, are very clear and we want to abide by them, as expressed by distinguished Quebecers who sat on that extended parliamentary commission. It seems very important to us that this constitutional review process be very expeditious.

Of course, we would have preferred that the government of Canada react faster to what was going on and is still going on in Quebec. It is why we looked with some skepticism, some curiosity and even some amazement at the creation of the Spicer Commission, a sort of collective inhibition relief commission which, no doubt, played some role in getting the views, the suggestions, the comments, and particularly, the frustrations of many Canadians. But we were fully aware that that commission did not have the mandate to change the Constitution of this country and to solve the constitutional impasse.

So, several months later, we are also looking forward to see the recommendations, the findings of that commission and we hope that all of these millions of dollars will not have been spent needlessly.

Moreover, we agreed with the establishment of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons, commonly called the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, whose mandate was to study the constitution amending formula, and to achieve better public involvement in the process. But, right from the beginning, speaking for the Official Opposition, we introduced an amendment which would have broadened the mandate of the Committee, because we felt that limiting the study to the amending formula was obviously not the key to the present constitutional frustration or deadlock.

The creation of this new Committee, with its mandate from the government, is really at the heart of the constitutional debate. For that reason, we welcome the government initiative and agree with the appointment of this Parliamentary Committee, because we think it is receiving the mandate that should have been given to the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee in the first place.

Thus, the government somewhat is belatedly assuming its responsibilities. But we are very happy to learn that it finally does, and that it intends to table a concrete constitutional amendment proposal, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested.

We are all the more happy because the minister told us that it will not be a take-it-or-leave-it proposal, but one which could be improved and amended not only by those who will sit on the Committee, but mostly by those who will appear, who will express their views before the Parliamentary Committee. That is precisely what the Leader of the Opposition had requested. Why are we experiencing this constitutional deadlock? Must I recall that unfortunately the last initiative taken by the Tory government was introduced on a take-it-or-leave-it basis? The famous Meech Lake Accord could not tolerate an improvement. And unfortunately, when a parliamentary committee studied the Meech Lake Accord, many representatives of the natives, of the French minorities outside Quebec, of women's movements told us that they could not accept this Accord for because they had their own reasons, that their objection had nothing to do with an opposition to Quebec legitimate requests.

Many of those people who appeared before this committee created to study the Meech Lake Accord and the companion resolution, the famous Charest committee, told us many times that they accepted the five requests of Quebec, but that the Accord included items that were absolutely unacceptable to them and that they felt rejected, cast aside and left out of. this constitutional reform exercice. I have in mind in particular several witnesses representing the various ethnic groups who now make up the Canadian mosaïc which is very different from what it was at the beginning of the century, when the Constitution was written.

Now, all these people told us: We have nothing against Quebec, but this Meech Lake Accord includes elements that we cannot accept because we feel rejected and the Accord will make the Constitution virtually impossible to amend in the future. That is why we cannot accept it.

Now, the reason I say this, Madam Speaker, is to remind members in what context we are living today. That is why it is very important for the constitutional process of the government to be an all-Canadian process this time, and not a Quebece process or one which favours some groups at the expense of others. The Canadian government's constitutional proposal must not only seem to be just and fair for all Canadians, including of course Quebecers, it must be so.

That is why the Leader of the Opposition insisted so much, in his remarks of April 21 last, that this coming round of negotiations be a Canada round. And I am very happy today to note that the minister has just told us that it was the government's intention to make a proposal which would answer both the legitimate aspirations of Quebecers and the long frustrated aspirations of the native peoples of Canada, who insist more and more on having their place in the sun, on being recognized as Natives of Canada and on being treated with justice and fairness as full-fledged citizens of this country.

The government's constitutional endeavour must take into account the legitimate aspirations of the regions of the country. Westerners have for a long time felt that they were incorrectly or inadequately represented at the federal level. So, how is it that today, so many western Canadians insist on Senate reform, on an elected Senate, a Senate better adapted to the needs and aspirations of the regions?

A review of Canadian governments shows that very often electoral forces were such that a Liberal government was represented mostly by members from the center of the country, that is Quebec and Ontario. So, very often, the most important portfolios or Departments were given to members from Quebec and Ontario, since they were few from the west.

Because of this situation, too often people from western Canada did not feel adequately represented by ministers and the Prime Minister. Then, the Conservative Party came into office and for the first time in a long while Westerners were represented by ministers from their own province, their own region, ministers who had important protfolios. These people thought they would be adequately represented at the federal level at last.

However, one of the first measures taken by the Conservative Government was to grant the CF-18 contract to a Montreal company though the lowest bidder was a Winnipeg concern. The western provinces were outraged by this decision and I would say it has marked the Conservative government's decline in the west. For the first time in a long while, they thought they would be equitably represented in the Parliament of Canada. They rejoiced because they were represented by Ministers at last. However, because of the Conservative government's decision the Westerners realized that as long as Ontario and Quebec members would be in force, they would never have an equal opportunity to have their fair share.

That is why Senate reform and a stronger, more numerical and more significant representation of western Canada—and that applies also to the Maritimes—have become so important in the constitutional amendment process that we will be asked to approve in the months to come.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, it is important that in its constitutional approach the governement say yes to the demands of Quebec while answering the aspirations of all the other Canadians who want a Constitution that fully satisfies them.

That is why the Leader of the Opposition proposed a constitutional reform plan in nine points. He first suggested a statement on the nature of Canada.

I listened a little earlier to the Leader of the Opposition's splendid description of our country. Now, his words could well be included in the Constitution to give a true description of what Canada actually is. When the Fathers of Confederation wrote the Constitution in 1867, Canada was not as it is today.

Now, it would be useful and important to have a statement on the character of Canada indicating the will of Canadians to cohabit in a federal State, describing clearly the fundamental principles of how such a State would operate and also listing the values we share as Canadians, our attachment to the two official languages that we consider to be absolutely essential, fundamental, the cornerstone of the Canadian State. We would also recognize this new reality, our reality of today, of a modern Canada in this ending 20th century with the diversity of our cultural heritage. We should also recognize clearly and specifically the place, the role and the importance of the aboriginal peoples in the Canadian society.

We also think that Canada, in its constitutional reform, cannot go backwards. In 1981–82, Canadians gave themselves a Constitution, which finally sits at home, a Canadian Constitution, with a Canadian amendment formula, but also with a Charter of basic Rights and Freedoms which is enshrined into the Constitution and which is also another cornerstone of our Constitution.

Thus, it would be important to tell and reaffirm to all Canadians, because we have seen how strongly they want it, our commitment to the reinforcement and preservation of their rights and freedoms through the Charter. We believe it is essential that the constitutional changes suggested by any government, present and future, cannot and should not reduce the primacy of this Charter. I think that, in all those testimonies, people who came before various parliamentary committees have praised the merits of this Canadian Charter and stated clearly that they want the Charter to have primacy and remain the most important document for the protection and guarantee of rights, which we gave to Canadians ten years ago already.

We believe that, in light of the evolution of the world economy, the time has come to recognize that our federation has to give itself the required economic tools to better compete in the world market. At a time when we have just signed a free trade deal with the United States, at a time when we witness the explosion of borders in Europe and the creation of an economic common market on that continent, it seems essential to us that our Canadian Constitution guarantee the free movement of goods, services and people in all provinces of our country. How will we, Canadians, be able to compete with the great economic nations of the world if we do not have an economic market in our own country?

We think the time has come for us to reinforce the Canadian economic union through the free movement of persons, goods and capitals. We think the time has come for us to abolish all interprovincial trade barriers in Canada.

Of course, it is a decision that the government of Canada cannot make alone. Provinces have to recognize this new reality. We find it rather interesting that three premiers from the Maritimes met recently to discuss this issue. The Bélanger–Campeau Commission in Quebec made a similar recommendation. Moreover, my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, has also proposed a similar approach for the Prairie provinces.

Everywhere, this initiative gets a very favourable response. Now the government of Canada has to take this opportunity to be in the forefront of this change and include in the constitutional talks that are about to begin the means to reaffirm this Canadian economic union which is essential to our country's prosperity.

I am all the more convinced when I say that because I am under the impression that the government is about to make concessions to provinces in some areas. We, of the opposition party, will certainly be the first ones to hope for a better division of powers and to hope that provinces can have, in certain areas, responsibilities that should have been theirs in the first place. If a new sharing of jurisdictions between Ottawa and the provinces is to take place, Ottawa should not only transfer powers to the provinces in this constitutional reform, but also assert the necessity for the Government of Canada to retain jurisdiction in certain areas.

The Official Opposition cannot accept any excessive reduction in the importance, role and mandate of the central government. We are deeply convinced that what is at stake is the prosperity of all Canadians. A thriving Canadian economy depends on a Canadian government endowed with the means and responsibilities to play an economic role.

Of course, we feel that the time has come to rewrite certain aspects of our Constitution concerning the sharing of powers. In 1991, it is not possible to think of the Canadian Constitution the way it was done in 1867. A modernization of our Constitution is in order. Some powers that are now in Ottawa and some shared responsibilities should be reallocated in the best interests of Canadians.

The approach recommended by the Leader of the Opposition is a practical one. Speaking for the Liberal Party, he said that no power should be considered sacred. The Canadian Constitution can be completely revamped. However, that should not be done in order to give a little more or a little less to any level of government, but in order to find the most practical, economic and useful approach for Canadians.

That should be our main goal in our constitutional reform. We should strive to find a sharing of jurisdictions between the Government of Canada and provincial governments that is for the well-being of Canadians. How can we best serve Canadian men and women? Which government is more apt to do the work as efficiently as possible. So, it is from this perspective that we are ready to receive and consider with an open mind all the suggestions that the government of Canada will make in this regard.

We also mentioned that it was essential to remember, during this constitutional reform process, a group of Canadians that we often neglected and that, unfortunately, we even treated unfairly occasionally. I am talking about the native people. We all remember what happened when the Meech negotiations were coming to an end; at that time, we felt very clearly that the Native leaders wanted to be part of any and all constitutional reform. I, for one, was a member of the parliamentary committee chaired by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, Mr. Charest. Time after time, all the witnesses told the committee that they had been forgotten in this round of constitutional negotiations, that they could not accept such a situation anymore and that they insisted on taking part, in the future, in any constitutional negotiations.

Now, the Opposition leader clearly said, on behalf of our party, that it was important that the government recognize, in its constitutional reform proposal, the right of Natives to self-government and that it was absolutely essential to examine the status, rights and claims of the Native people. We think that there is enough understanding and tolerance in this country so that we can establish a relationship on a new basis with the Native leaders; we also think that dialogue and cooperation must be part of the future Canada where we would like to live.

That is why there is a certain feeling of apprehension as we on this side of the House prepare for the proceedings of this parliamentary committee. We are very glad to see the government has agreed to make these hearings public, to have them televised, to have the committee travel across the country and try to meet as many people and as many groups as possible, and that the committee will be able, if possible to have joint sittings with representatives of the various legislatures and territorial governments. We think it is the only sensible and practical solution, at this point.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, Madam Speaker, we are running out of time. We must act quickly. The country's elected representatives, the members of the House of Commons, can and must do a job they were elected to do. That is why we believe that in this particular context, setting up a constituent assembly, although it may look good on paper, is not particularly useful.

We have a constitutional deadlock, and there are deadlines we must meet. That is why although theoretically, we in the Liberal Party might favour setting up a constituent assembly, we feel we cannot afford to experiment with Canada's future. And above all, we cannot accept the proposal made by the New Democratic Party to create a constituent assembly consisting of 50 elected members of Parliament and 50 people chosen by parliamentarians. To have one hundred people travelling across the country and talking about the Constitution would be like a traveling road show and might compromise the constitutional future of our country.

Mr. Gérin: Canada's road show!

Mr. Ouellet: We cannot afford the kind of experiment that might compromise the future of our country. Since we all know that the Government of Quebec has clearly and categorically rejected the concept of a constituent assembly and that it prefers to receive specific proposals from the government, we in the Official Opposition wonder why certain parliamentarians insist on promoting an option that has already been rejected by one of the major players in Confederation.

We feel it is useless to impose a procedure that is not acceptable to one of the major members of our Canadian entity. That is why we prefer the government's proposal, which allows for public involvement and participation through a number of subcommittees to be created by the parliamentary committee.

We also believe it is essential to send invitations to all Canadians who will want to appear before this committee. As we see it, there will be three ways of involving the public, which I think makes more sense that having a constituent assembly that would consist of a chosen few, a restricted elite that would meet in a committee and, on its own, determine what our future Constitution will be.

We do not think that is the right answer. We prefer to involve the Canadian public in three ways. First of all, there would be subcommittees of the parliamentary committee proposed by the government, whose members would represent groups with an interest in constitutional amendments; second, public hearings where individuals and associations will be invited to testify and suggest amendments to the government's original proposal. We feel this approach is absolutely essential.

Finally, the really democratic way to involve Canadians would be to hold a referendum on the parliamentary committee's final proposal. The important thing is to avoid making the same mistake we made in the last phase of the Meech Lake Accord. The Canadian people must be involved in a positive way—from the very beginning, during the process and at the end of the process.

That is why the Leader of the Opposition suggested that the referendum be held after this parliamentary committee finishes its work and that the committee's proposal be submitted for approval to the Canadian people. We feel it is important that Canadians also be given a chance to get involved in the preparations for this new Constitution we want to give our country.

There is nothing as rewarding and patriotic as voting for one's Constitution. I think Canadians are ready and want to express their approval of the work that will be done by the government, in consultation with the provinces and with those who want to improve on the government's proposal.

We in the Liberal Party of Canada believe it is not up to a chosen few, an elite of 50, as suggested by the Democratic Party, to make decisions about our Constitution. It is up to the Canadian people who, in a referendum, will be able to express the views of the majority, across the country and in each of Canada's major regions, on constitutional reform.

These are the tools we have to help us make major strides towards resolving the present constitutional crisis. We think it is essential that, above and beyond political parties and partisanship, the men and women who sit in Parliament—in the House of Commons and the Senate—were together to offer all Canadians a constitutional proposal that is fair and equitable to all Canadians, in Quebec and elsewhere. The needs and aspirations of every one of us must be reflected in this new constitutional proposal, and no one in this country should feel left out of the process. Above all, we must not give the impression we only want to deal with the problems of one particular group or province.

We must deal fairly and equitably—which is the Canadian way— with a constitutional problem that is a concern to us all, wherever we happen to live in this country.

Madam Speaker, in concluding, we may remind hon. members it is essential that the parliamentary committee be as representative as possible. The motion before the House proposes to appoint 15 members of the House of Commons. We think this is not sufficient to adequately reflect the Canadian mosaic.

In this Parliament, we have the good fortune to have members, both men and women, who are more than adequate to the last of representing the interests of those groups that make up our country.

We also have the good fortune to have members in this House who represent the many ethnic groups that came after the first settlers and who are now an integral and in fact a major part of Canada. We think that expanding the membership of this committee to a certain extent would be a way for the parties to reflect this new Canadian reality.

We also have the good fortune to have as members representatives of our native people, and we think that this time, in this constitutional round, those who sit in Parliament for our native people should be entitled to sit on this parliamentary committee.

That is why we suggest that the government increase the number of members to allow for more equitable representation. It is essential that members representing Canada's official language minorities also have a seat on the parliamentary committee. There are more Francophones outside Quebec in Canada today than there were at the beginning of Confederation. This French fact outside Quebec is very important, and I must say I regret that some Quebecers think the French language is the exclusive purview of the Government of Quebec. The French fact goes well beyond Quebec's borders. The French fact in Canada is the best protection we could have against the influence of American culture. French-speaking minorities in the other provinces around Quebec are living proof of the success and survival of the French fact in North America. We must never forget that.

There is another important minority whose existence we must not forget, and that is the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec. Quebec has known periods of prosperity that were closely linked to its generous and equitable treatment of its English-speaking minority. I say without hesitation that quite often, Quebec's economic misadventures have been directly related to the existence of a separatist, sovereigntist movement in Quebec. When the sovereigntist movement gains strength in Quebec, the economy suffers. When the sovereigntist movement weakens, Quebec prospers. I would ask Quebecers to remember this: Quebec's survival and economic prosperity depend on the fair and equitable treatment of this English-speaking population in Quebec.

For all of these reasons, I wish to remind the government that it is important to treat opposition parties fairly. I assume the New Democratic Party will make its case to the government for improving this parliamentary committee. There are three comments I would like to make in the form of three small amendments which, we feel, are vital, considering the job to be done by this future parliamentary committee. We earnestly hope the committee will be appointed and will be able to report as soon as possible because, as I said earlier, this is a very urgent matter, and we are running out of time.

Madam Speaker, needless to say, the uncertainty created by this constitutional crisis is having a negative impact on our economy. How many investors have changed their minds because of the following consideration: Will Quebec which represents a quarter of Canada's population still be in Canada in two or three years? How much investment is not taking place in Quebec and other parts of Canada because of this constitutional uncertainty? We have no figures, but the impact is there. It exists because of this uncertainty which we must clear up as soon as possible.

That is why we suggest that the government table its proposal and that the parliamentary committee submit its conclusions as soon as possible, and above all, that Canadians be asked to vote on this new Canadian Constitution that will satisfy Quebecers and correspond to the aspirations of other Canadians.

In concluding, I move:

[English]

> That the motion be amended by deleting the word "fifteen" in paragraph 2 thereof and by substituting therefor the word "twenty" and by deleting paragraph 12 thereof and by substituting therefor the following: "That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;" and by deleting the words "February 28, 1992" in paragraph 14 thereof and by substituting therefor the words "December 31, 1991".

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair will take this under consideration for a few moments. I will come back and put it to the House a little later.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have listened attentively to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and to the Official Opposition, and I certainly welcome this opportunity to participate in this important debate. It is a debate that really establishes the foundation for how we are going to build our constitutional future. Therefore it is an essential debate, it seems to me, for the future of our country.

What we are talking about today is simply trying to find the best way to ensure the future of our nation, finding that road that will enable us to be a stronger nation, to have a renewed federalism—not just for today—that will lead us into the 21st century.

My party and I start with the premise that we want to see a renewed Canada, a just Canada and a united Canada. However, in this party we believe that it will take more than a commitment to a constitution. It will also take a commitment to building a fair and prosperous economy, to having those kinds of national social and health programs that mean that each Canadian has equality of access to those programs and to restoring health to our shared natural environment.

Today we are debating the constitutional resolution and how we, as a Parliament, will respond to Canadians and how we, as a Parliament, will seek that consensus that will truly bring us to the 21st century.

I believe that we as parliamentarians share a commitment to the future of this nation, and we share as Canadians a commitment to our children's future. We want Canada and all that it represents to the world to succeed.

I believe and my party believes that the success of Canada is dependent upon the full participation of Canadians in the process of national renewal.

I regret to say that the motion put before us by the government does not allow for that full participation. Once again the government is proposing a parliamentary committee. I would like to propose an amendment to this particular motion of the government. The amendment I would propose is, of course, to fundamentally create a structure which would include all Canadians right at the outset, but I know that it will be ruled out of order. In the 20 minutes that I have, I do not want to take up time debating that, but rather to put forth the point of view that there is another way, there is a different way to do this, and there is a way that will lead to success.

Once again, the government is proposing a parliamentary committee in which—remember—the government has the majority control. The purpose of the committee is to discuss the government's proposal. Once again we have a committee made up of senators and members of Parliament in which Canadians are invited to visit, but a committee that belongs to politicians and politicians alone.

Once again, Canadians find themselves on the outside looking in.

My party cannot support the government's motion. We are saying it is time for a new way. It is time to bring Canadians fully into the process. This is an extraordinary time and it requires extraordinary measures. We have to meet the challenges facing our nation with innovation, imagination and openness. Canadians must be involved and must feel involved in this process.

While both the government and the Liberal Party are supporting the joint parliamentary committee, my party has proposed, both in the House and elsewhere, that we should be seeking to establish instead a constituent assembly. We are proposing this form of assembly because a nation can only create a Constitution through creating a social consensus. We believe that the best way to do that is through the kind of assembly we are proposing, an assembly which would represent a broad cross-section of Canadians in the most promising way to reach that consensus.

There is no perfect way. We are not pretending to suggest that we have the perfect way to do it, but we feel profoundly that we must look at new ways and we must take the time to do that.

The member for Papineau, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party, says that those new ways would be playing around with the future of Canada. I reject that. What we want to see is the future of Canada with Canadians involved in defining that future and speaking for Canada.

The member from Papineau, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party, says that a constituent assembly that would respond and listen to the voices of Canada is a flight of fancy. It seems to me that it is time to really listen to Canadians because if the attitude of parliamentarians in this House is that the voices of Canadians are simply stating a flight of fancy, where can we go to find the consensus we must reach in order to save this country?

I want to contrast some of the differences that I see between a joint parliamentary committee and a constituent assembly. In doing so, I think this House will find some of those arguments extremely compelling in favour of a constituent assembly.

The government argues that the public will have a role in the parliamentary committee. The committee will travel so that Canadians will have the opportunity to appear before it, and in that way Canadians will be able to have their views heard.

In the government's opinion this is a full public role, but surely there is a difference between being a witness at a committee and being a member of a committee. A witness may have his or her opinion ignored or lost in the further discussion when a consensus is negotiated, but a committee member's view cannot be ignored. A committee member can ensure that his or her view is truly heard.

[Translation]

That is why, Madam Speaker, we must set up an entity such as a constituent assembly, made up of Canadian men and women from various groups and communities which are somewhat left out of the electoral process and under representend in it. I am referring to women, native peoples, ethnocultural groups and Canadians from all walks of life.

This way, we will make sure that the views of every Canadian are reflected in the final product of a genuine consultation process.

I spoke with the leaders of a number of organizations representing millions of Canadian men and women. They told me that they have had it with preparing briefs to submit to various committees only to realize that their views and opinions are always ignored.

Just yesterday, I met with members of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women who told me in no uncertain terms that they will no longer take part in this obsolescent consultation process. Why should they, Madam Speaker? Why would the thousands of Canadian men and women who testified before the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee want to come before this committe? Why would they indeed when they see the government go ahead with its plans, pursuing its own agenda, and this even before these committees table their reports and conclusions?

It is an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people who have submitted well–thought–out and constructive briefs to the Spicer Commission and the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee, Madam Speaker! This government did not even have the decency to wait for the commission and the committee to table their reports and listen to what they had to propose.

This is not consultation, Madam Speaker. It is a waste of time, effort and energy for Canadian men and women.

[English]

Madam Speaker, one cannot also avoid, when discussing the proposed committee, the fact that its membership is government dominated and the content of its discussions will be documents referred to it by the government. In other words, the government will have control over the committee, over the scope of the debate, over the writing of the final report. When the governing political party has such control, I find it difficult to attach credibility to the government's frequent proclamations committing itself to non–partisanship because to my party, the Constitution of Canada does not belong to the Conservative government, it belongs to the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: This House and Canadians have had experience with such government controlled committees before. There were committees after all on the trade deal with the U.S. There were committees on the GST. They all had public hearings and we know what Canadians thought about that.

To the surprise of no one, those committees supported the government. The government went ahead with its policies and ignored the views of Canadians. That must not be allowed to happen on this fundamental issue.

We cannot leave a committee on the future of Canada open to such dictates. It must not serve the interests and agenda of one political party. It must serve the interests and the agenda of the Canadian people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, one final word on the composition of this proposed committee.

• (1200)

The Liberal Party has proposed that we have more members on the committee, but I have to confess that I cannot believe that when Canadians are calling for a larger role in this debate, the government's response is to appoint 10 unelected, non–representative senators to the committee.

Why have they been given such a major role on the committee and why have the views of those Canadians who are not represented in this House not accorded any voice? This is the question that Canadians will be asking of this government. This is the question that this government must answer.

I suspect that the government has decided to strike a joint parliamentary committee and the Liberal party has agreed with that because that is what they have always done. There have always been joint parliamentary committees, but this is the 1990s and this is an extraordinary situation.

We are not opposed to committees, of course We are not opposed to even joint parliamentary committees, but we are saying that in this extraordinary situation it is time to find new solutions and new ways. It is time to be creative and stop turning to the old ways.

My party and I believe that a body like a constituent assembly could be that new way that Canadians are looking for. It would bring Canadians into the process of Canadian renewal and it would ensure that their participation is meaningful, that their voices are heard, and that their views count.

The majority of Canadians, I might add, agree with my party on the issue of having a body such as a constituent assembly which would listen to Canadians. I am told that in the Edwards-Beaudoin committee 158 groups supported the principle of a constituent assembly, which only 23 groups opposed.

Both this government and the Liberal Party are against the principle of the constituent assembly. The government gave two reasons to explain its position. It claims that Quebec would be excluded from the process and that the assembly would by-pass elected representatives.

I would like to rebut these two arguments. First, I would like to ask the government who will represent Quebec on this committee. Members of Parliament or non-elected senators?

A constituent assembly would also include Quebec members of Parliament, Madam Speaker. It could also include representatives from the labour movement, women organizations and other Quebec society groups.

In short, a constituent assembly would allow for a greater participation of the Quebec men and women and a more detailed expression of their aspirations.

I would like to remind this House that the people of Quebec are not against the idea of a constituent assembly. The Quebec government simply said that it would not take part in it. It does not object to the creation of that kind of a forum.

In fact, sooner or later, there will be a constitutional proposal. The question is how will we come up with one? Will it be formulated by a governmental committee or by the people? I think that the people of Quebec, like other Canadians, would rather like it to be representative of the largest possible section of the population.

[English]

The Conservative government and the Liberals also argue that a constituent assembly would mean that we were in some way not respecting parliamentary tradition and the parliamentary process. This simply is not the case. A constituent assembly would include elected officials and it would report back to Parliament.

I reject the argument that the parliamentary system would be by-passed because in fact under our current Constitution it is the Parliament which must make the final decision along with the provinces. I reject that argument. We know that the buck stops here. We know that parliamentarians will have the decision on the proposals. The question is how do we reach a consensus so that together in this House we can work toward the kind of future for our nation that we all so badly want to see.

The other parties in this House argue that it is up to elected politicians alone to come up with the answers. As much as I agree that an elected politician has an important role to play, a principal role to play, I must say that we as elected politicians certainly do not have a monopoly on creativity, intelligence or concern for the fate of our nation.

To suggest that we are the only proper representatives of the people's will is not only inaccurate in latter 20th century democracies, but also arrogant.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The reality is that we have been told by the government that this House represents a form of constituent assembly. It is true that we have all been elected to represent the citizens of our particular riding. The majority of people in this House do that well, but there are other eyes and other voices that are not as well represented in this House. The House fails to accurately reflect the Canadian population. When you look around the House of Commons, you do not necessarily see a microcosm of Canada. You do not necessarily see the reflection of the face of Canada in 1991.

For example, women who make up over 50 per cent of the population make up only 14 per cent of the House of Commons. Visible minorities and other ethnocultural communities are seriously under-represented. Aboriginal people are seriously under-represented. Disabled people are under-represented. Labour is under-represented. Middle income Canadians and working families are under-represented in this House.

These people have ideas to bring to the debate on the future of our nation. They have something to say. We must create a forum where they can be heard, and will be listened to. We must create a forum that will ensure that this constitutional round is a constitutional round for all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, as we undertake this task— and a very serious one it is—we are really talking about painting a grand new canvas, a portrait of our nation as we want it to be. We cannot leave the painting of the portrait to a small group of artists who interpret Canada from one perspective. There must be a great gathering of painters and artists, a diverse group, each offering something unique and all joining together to achieve a shared vision, a common landscape, a portrait in which all Canadians see themselves.

We can create a new, a more prosperous, more generous and more understanding Canada if we bring Canadians into this task. A constituent assembly is the way to do that, and it is a far better way than that proposed by the government.

I want to close simply by saying that I take no pleasure in standing here in this House to say that the New Democratic Party cannot support a government initiative on the Constitution. I say with honesty that I would like to agree with the government on this. I would like to agree with the Liberal Party, but I do not agree and it is the responsibility of my party, a responsibility which we proudly assume, to provide a voice for those Canadians who seek a new way to build our nation.

I will persist in opposing the repetition of constitutional processes that have so clearly failed in the past. I will persist in repeating my party's message that the process must be open to all Canadians. I have no certainty that there is only one right way, but I do know that millions of Canadians believe that it is time to have the voices of Canadians throughout this country from different origins and different walks of life as an essential part of the process with a voice and a vote.

To us, an open participatory process shows the greatest promise for national renewal. It provides the greatest hope for a Canada that is more just, more caring and more united. I assure you, Madam Speaker, that I will not let go of that vision. I will continue to speak out my party will continue to speak out until that Canada becomes a reality.

• (1210)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before proceeding with the period of questions and comments, I would like to indicate to the House that the amendment as proposed earlier by the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel has been found correct as to form.

We will now proceed with questions and comments following the speech of the hon. member for Yukon.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the member for Yukon. She seems to be strongly against the government's motion ant she mentioned, in support of her argumentation, certain solutions like the constituent assembly which might be used.

[English]

In her speech the member, and I wanted to quote her correctly so I noted it here, talked about the constituent assembly and how she thought this was a solution and that any other means would not be a reflection of the numerous groups that are not represented here in the House.

The affirmation she made was: "How do we reach the consensus?"

The NDP feels strongly against restricting this committee to elected representatives, given the historical fact that constituent assemblies in this country were not used, not even to write our 1867 Constitution. It was a group of elected people in 1867 who wrote our first Constitution.

Given the fact that around the world a constituent assembly is only used after a revolution or a civil war or when a new constitution is to be drafted—and I am thinking of Germany, Australia and France in particular—the main question to be addressed is: How do you choose the members of this constituent assembly to keep it within reason and, indeed, how do you get a consensus out of this group of people?

I want to ask her sincerely the following question: How do you select the people who would be on this constituent assembly? Does she have any proposals to put to the House? I did not hear any in her speech.

Finally, would she tell us how she would go about selecting those people who would be non-elected—I understand she named people from various groups such as women, aboriginals, labourers, and working families—asking for adequate representation and giving these people a mandate which in my view would be very difficult to fill.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend cites history. Had that history worked so well we would not be in the problem we are in now. What I am suggesting is that we have to look to some new ways.

The member asked a very good question: How would we appoint people or how would we have people on this constituent assembly?

I would like to make one point. First of all, we have the ability in Canada to define the kind of assembly that we want, not an assembly that is based on what another country has had. We can certainly learn from other countries, but we have the ability to create our own. I would say that there is a perfectly simple way of doing this.

Of course there would be parliamentarians on a constituent assembly. I have always maintained that for the past year. I have talked about this issue, but there is a number of national organizations which represent a broad spectrum of groups that have a particular stake in the Constitution and have been left out in the past. It would be my view that we would ask those organizations to nominate one or two members. It would in fact be possible, and quite possible it seems to me, that with many of those national organizations they may choose to nominate a person from Quebec and a person from somewhere else in Canada outside Quebec. This would give a greater Quebec voice to a constituent assembly than might be held in other fora.

I would say to the member that it is not outside our ability to develop an assembly which, while not perfect, would at least represent the major stakeholders in the process that we use. It seems to me that those national organizations which have legitimacy among their members and among the members of this House, because we often meet with these national organizations, would be quite capable of nominating the members they would choose to sit on such an assembly. It is not that complicated.

Whenever politicians want to shoot an idea down, they say it is too tough to deal with. It is not too tough, and we are saying it can be done if there is the political will to do it.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, we were extremely surprised to hear the position of the NDP to the effect that we could very well do without the presence of the province of Quebec or of members of the National Assembly within the constituent assembly. What an insult that is, Madam Speaker, to the population of Quebec, and it goes to show you why the NDP has an image problem in Quebec. And now they probably want to repeat the dirty trick Chrétien, Ouellet and others played on Quebec in 1982 when they repatriated the Constitution without Quebec's consent. Here is what one can do. At that point in time, Prime minister Trudeau said: We do not need the members of Quebec's National Assembly, we have members over here representing that province. This is what we are opposed to. It did not make any sense at that time. Conservatives denounced it. New Democrats denounced it. Now, here is what these hypocrites propose today. The president of the Privy Council is no better because he just said that there will be no member of the Bloc québécois on his committee, and that therefore he will do without half the population of Quebec.

So, if the NDP and all those funny people in the House want a constituent assembly to define what they want English Canada to be, their Canada, and not the country Quebecers want, well they should say so clearly. They should not try to make Quebecers believe that they want to build a Canada for all Canadians, including Quebecers. Perhaps they are entitled to their own country. Perhaps they are entitled to their own culture and traditions, but they should say so clearly, otherwise it is just a big joke.

Madam Speaker, I would like to ask this question to the member for Yukon: Does she agree with the ignominious proposition made by the president of the Privy Council that all members of the Bloc québécois should be excluded from the committee because they have a different point of view than Joe Clark and his Tory colleagues?

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: First of all, I would like to say that the member clearly misunderstood what I said about the participation of Quebec. What I said is of course Quebec should be a part of the constituent assembly. We would want to see Quebec a part of the constituent assembly; not just the Government of Quebec but all those constituencies in Quebec that we feel make up a constituent assembly in Quebec and have a lot to say about it. We want to listen to what all Quebecers have to say.

An hon. member: Including the Bloc Quebecois.

Ms. McLaughlin: Second, I would remind the member that in Quebec the Belanger-Campeau commission struck in Quebec certainly did include a large group. Is this member and are the Liberals trying to tell this House that that kind of commission which included labour, business, and elected and non-elected officials did not do its job? Well it did do its job for the people of Quebec, and I am just saying that a constituent assembly—

Some hon. members: Bravo, bravo.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions and comments period is over. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, in one year from now, the Canadian Confederation or the Canadian nation will celebrate an anniversary on a great land running from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, from the Canadian tundra to the American border. We were invited to that celebration almost one century and a quarter ago.

Yet, this event, Madam Speaker, grips me with anguish because sometimes I fear that when the day comes, no one in this country will want to celebrate, no one will be there to blow the 125 candles.

Madam Speaker, I don't think it is exaggerated to say that Canadians are out of breath. From 1867 to this day, they have been running till they were out of breath after their destiny. In 1982, they almost choked and last year, they had to hold their breath, Madam Speaker, in the troubled waters of Meech Lake. Sitting around the kitchen table, standing in huge wheatfields, their feet rooted in their boat, deep in the bottom of mines or behind their desks, Canadians are discussing in a hushed voice. From secret to confidence, they learn a new vocabulary: distinct society, separation, national identity. It's enough to lose one's language! I am not talking here about English or French.

I am talking, Madam Speaker, of the language of disappointment, of messages sometimes negative, sometimes contradictory, misunderstood or incomprehensible language that bursts out from here and there, a dialogue of the deaf, the Babel Tower, lost words and attitudes of defeat.

Madam Speaker, is it not the time for Canadians of all provinces and territories, citizens of old stock, First Nations, newcomers and all others to stop looking only after their own interests?

I think time has come for the whole family to sit around the same table, to wash their dirty linen in public and to resolve their quarrels before the sound of the tocsin.

You may judge my words rash, but I do not want to oversimplify the problem, far from there. I know very well that it is not easy to have a real and lasting dialogue from one end to the other of this immense territory, but I also know that the mission is not impossible. We only have to look at what is happening elsewhere.

On the other side of the Atlantic ocean, 12 countries of different cultures and languages, forgetting their differences, are preparing to put together their economic resources. They are going to combine their visions of the future in order to face the year 2000 in a climate of unity and mutual respect. This is in 1992, the very year which will mark for us 125 years of national survival.

I think the time has come, Madam Speaker, for all Canadian men and women, whether they live in Valleyfield, Lethbridge, Iqualuit, Goose Bay, Verdun, Kanesatake or elsewhere, to see what is happening in their neighbour's backyard, to get switched on to the world's major trends, to settle internal disputes in order not to miss the boat of the new millennium. One has never made any major discoveries by sitting on a pier.

Last year, the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future showed that Canadians were very keen on making their view points known, that they showed creativity and ingenuity about the way their common future would unfold.

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker!

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, which is very clear. The fact is that a member must not read his speech. It is obvious the member is now reading a speech which has been prepared in the backroom of some department and is not using his own words.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that the way our Standing Orders read now it is quite possible for a member to base his or her speech on notes he or she has in front of him or her. For the time being, this is how I interpret what the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry is doing. The hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry.

Mr. Hudon: Madam Speaker, after having been so eloquently interrupted, allow me to talk about this new parliamentary joint committee that was just proposed this morning. The appointment of this committee is timely, considering there is, as we say, some bickering going on.

Madam Speaker, over the years this instability has brought on a certain cooling off in the federal-provincial relations, as well as real disillusion within the population. In short, the constitutional fabric does not seem to be thick enough anymore to keep the country warm. The data provided confirm those fears. Our future is certainly in jeopardy when 70 per cent of Quebecers expect to leave the rest of the country; when 61 per cent of Western Canadians say: "If they want to leave, let them leave!" We need much more than wishful thinking to settle the conflicts between the different regions of the country. However, we are not yet at the stage where we have to rely on miracles. Let's just say that the time has come for some acts of faith and confidence.

Madam Speaker, this new parliamentary joint committee on unity is different in the sense that its speaks in ten languages for the ten provinces and the two territories. The committee will listen to the aboriginal people, to the man on the street, to long time Canadians and new ones. In short, the committee wants to communicate. As we know, its mandate is to obtain the opinions of Canadians concerning the government proposals. Some might say that it is not a very original mandate.

Yet, there is something new. For the first time in our history, a government is committing itself to appointing a committee which, thanks to a new and more aggressive approach, will enlist the participation of all of the provinces and territories into a new highly democratic adventure.

More concretely, the committee will have the power to hold joint sittings with the committees of legislature or individual members of provincial and territorial legislatures. It will also have the power to appoint sub-committees from among its members and to delegate numerous powers to those.

At a time where partnership is what it's all about, the Government of Canada is getting into high gear. It advocates a versatile approach and a philosophy based on widespread consultation, which will enable every group in the country to become equal partners and to choose together their common future.

Madam Speaker, this committee will also give a chance to Canadians to participate fully in the development of an action plan for the renewal of the country. However, the constitutional structure will only hold if there is a solid base and if we use the most adequate techniques.

The parliamentary joint committee on unity is a democratic model comprising two parts: first, a committee made up of federal parliamentarians representing all Canadians; secondly, elected provincial and territorial representatives who, by dealing with their federal counterparts on the same level, will express the needs and expectations of very distinct regions.

Madam Speaker, I purposely use the expression distinct regions. It is an expression that the Quebec nation, of which I am proud to be part of, has taught Canadians from coast to coast last year. However, the differences must not make us forget our links and those links, must not, in turn, become chains.

I therefore invite very sincerely Quebec to fully participate, with the enthusiasm, the perseverance and the energy that it has displaid so often in the past, to the setting up of this new special joint committee on Canadian unity. I also urge all the other provinces and territories to do the same. I invite them to clearly express their own views, while recognizing, at the same time, that there are, within our borders, other visions, other distinctions that also deserve to be appreciated and preserved.

In that regard, Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the committee will give particular attention to the presence and the participation of the First Nations. There presently exists some 604 aboriginal tribes in the country. This translates into as many lifestyles, perceptions and experiences that will contribute to the work of the committee. Those are legitimate concerns that the country as a whole will have to deal with.

At the table, the First Nations will sit in the front row next to the provinces and territories. At provincial meetings, parallel talks with native groups might even be considered. Because of all these initiatives proper attention will be paid to every view point and every need.

In spite of the problems tugging at the country right and left Canadian men and women are still quite fortunate—some may even call it a privilege—to be living on a free and prosperous land. We have acess to the best medical care possible, our children receive the finest education, our universities, industries and institutions train specialists whose knowledge and skills are prized world-wide.

The new joint committee on national unity intends to make good use of this unique natural resource. It will give top billing to scientists, thinkers, entrepreneurs, academics and other Canadian experts.

It will give them a unique opportunity to put their knowledge and ideas to the service of the entire nation, to help the people achieve a consensus. To this end, various activities are contemplated, such as round tables or even conferences to find, through the exchange of ideas, answers to sensitive or complex questions.

Madam Speaker, the measure I am outlining to you today is not meant to heal Canada's constitutional wounds. It should not be seen as a trade-off to make people forget about past failures. Lessons from the past have to be learned for the future.

We learned a great deal from the disappointments of the past decade. They revealed that Canada is not a homogeneous entity, but a nation made up of a number of small regional nationalisms just waiting to bloom under a flexible central government that would respect their rights.

They made us take a good hard look at our multifaceted national identity. They made us aware that, in Canada, a Canadian is a Canadian, whether his or her ancestors settled the virgin land of Abitibi, slaved away in the rice fields of Asia or survived in the desert.

That being said, we must not let ourselves get discouraged by the challenge in our search for national identity. If Canadian men and women are more divided than ever on this issue, is it not ground enough to make this difference our rallying cry?

The joint committee on unity will echo this cry. Following in the footsteps of the Spicer Commission, the public opinion will never have been so sought after and prized, whether through open lines or other means aimed at providing every opportunity for an exchange of ideas and meetings.

Travel broadens the mind, as we say. In the months to come, they will also shape this nation. The committee and its various sub-committees will travel across this country.

Not only will they meet their provincial and territorial counterparts on several occasions, but they will also hold public hearings and listen to the views and suggestions of all the groups and individuals concerned.

All of my colleagues in this House and myself must not take a back seat in this process. In your ridings, in your regions, it will be up to you to encourage your fellow citizens to get involved. You should start an informal dialogue with members of communities that you represent and that have put their confidence in you. They should be able to take every opportunity to stand for the future of this country.

In the months ahead, Canadians will not only be called to play a role in the constitutional renewal, they will also be kept informed of the latest progress on this essential matter, since the government will issue a number of information documents written in a clear and precise language. But it will do much more.

The television coverage of the committee proceedings will allow the public to follow on a regular basis the progress made, either on cable or community television that will show highlights of the most recent hearings of the committee, or by way of short factual reports on the most recent provincial meetings. One thing is sure, the Government of Canada will take the necessary steps to convey efficiently his message of unity.

Madam Speaker, I know that we have had a difficult period. As a Canadian, I was able to note the increasing weaknesses of the present constitutional system. As a member from Quebec I have heard all kinds of comments.

Our childhood was carved in the immensity of the land. The vastness of our land has always fascinated newcomers. Isn't it time to draw some kind of inspiration from our vast and generous country? One thing is sure, we will not build our future by setting up one committee after another. We have to show goodwill.

Yet, because we need the tools to bring about changes, because we need processes, structures, committees, let's get to work, each on our side. Let's talk about it. Let's watch each other acting. Let's work together for a better future.

M. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask two questions to my hon. colleague. First, I don't know if he had the time to read our amendment, but its purpose is really to enlarge, if you want, the membership in order to make sure that there is as many members as possible representing the different "Canadian realities", the essence of Canada. My second question relates to certain comments that were made by the New Democratic Party: do you believe that the proposition made by the government this morning may nevertheless involve in a very important way a number of groups and, I would hope even those groups mentioned by that party?

Mr. Hudon: Yes, I am familiar with the proposals and amendments put forward by the Liberal Party, and in many regards they are interesting. I think that the government—and I am not speaking on its behalf since I am not a member of the executive committee or the Cabinet—has nothing to gain from arguing about the number of members. I am drawing a parallel with his second question on the constituent assembly. As long as— Yes, we might not want to argue about numbers, but there is a limit. When I look at the proposal from the New Democratic Party, where it is assumed that a single constituent assembly might reflect the future of Canadians, I think there is a limit. The New Democratic Party did not give any clear indication as to the making of this assembly. Also, with such an assembly, you know where you start, but not where you stop. Their problem is that they travelled across the country, listening to just about everybody who had anything to say, because they told them that they should be heard. If you say to everybody "you should be heard, you should have a seat in a constituent assembly" you are making empty promises. So who would be there? I would like— However they did not submit any list of people who should be on such a constituent assembly lest they forget someone. There is also the fear of continuous amendments, because with a constituent assembly nobody knows when to stop.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member explain why he was against the concept of a constituent assembly. I am not sure I understand, because in Quebec, we had our own constituent assembly. We had our constituent committee. It was called Bélanger-Campeau. And when I hear the Liberals and the Tories say that they agree on something, I must say I have my doubts. There is something conspiratorial about this, because they both use the same arguments. Well, I want to deal with these arguments once and for all. How can you represent everyone in a constituent assembly? You can't. You can't represent everyone.

The Leader of the NDP said no system is perfect. We do not expect perfection, otherwise most of us wouldn't be here. But we are looking for democracy. We want non-political people to be involved as well, and not as participants on the panel, as suggested by the government and apparently endorsed by the Liberals, a panel on which people would be consulted.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I have often been consulted as a consumer advocate, and I think consultation doesn't mean a thing if you don't have the right to vote and the right to act on a committee like Bélanger–Campeau.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): There is something contradictory in what he just said, Madam Speaker. Does that mean members of a constituent assembly will have the right to vote? I don't think I ever heard that mentioned.

What I would like to say is that the members of Bélanger–Campeau are mostly members of the Legislature. This was not a constituent assembly, it was a committee formed by the Legislative Assembly, consisting mostly of members of that Assembly.

Furthermore, as a member from Quebec, you know perfectly well that you can ask your leader to table proposals. You know perfectly well—and you in the NDP have abandoned Quebec —you know perfectly well that Quebec has rejected the concept of a constituent assembly. This is another example of the NDP's totally ignoring 20 to 25 per cent of the Canadian population, in a process that should include as many people as possible.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the hon. member—and I listened carefully—referred to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, and more specifically to the first part that requests an increase in the number of members. I think his response was that the government was flexible, and I assume this was a positive response on behalf of the government. In other words, the proposal was received with interest.

The second part of the amendment asks that funds be made available to the other parties in this House, in proportion to the number of members on the committee. I think this was done with other committees in the past, and I think it is a worthwhile proposal. Perhaps the hon. member would care to comment.

Third, the change in date. It has always been our position that Canada urgently needed to resolve this issue, and we suggest changing the date on the motion from February 28 to December 31, 1991, in other words, we are moving the date up. We want to compress the committee's proceedings and cut about two months off the time. Could the hon. member discuss his position on the amendment in question, with respect to funding and the time factor?

Mr. Hudon: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier made it clear that the amendment was favourably received by me. It is not up to me to decide, but I think the three proposals are quite interesting.

First of all, regarding the number of members, I think we should be generous with our resources. Of course, cabinet will have to consider the matter and report back to the House tomorrow. The matter of funding is very important. I think that the matter of funds that could be made available to the committee for research services is in fact even more important than the other element of the Liberal proposal.

Although, having December as a starting date may—The study may take a little more time. There is certainly room for using the talents of Canadians as a resource for the people who will be on this committee.

As for the date, I agree the matter is urgent. This committee's work should have already begun. I call people and I ask them, since they have a lot more experience than I do in this area, to be realistic about dates. If you honestly think we can get something done by December—in fact with what we found out through the Spicer Commission and Beaudoin–Edwards on the amending formula, a lot of preparatory work has already been done. We have to collate all this. So I think it is a possibility.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a very short preamble.

[English]

In the spirit of co-operation it has already been indicated that my party wants to participate. It wants to contribute to the building of a new Canada, a stronger Constitution for all Canadians.

I would hope that in the same spirit the government will consider our amendments, the three points that have just been made, that is the possible enlargement of the committee, more members to ensure greater representation, the funding question, as well as the date that has been proposed for completion of the report.

I would like the New Democratic Party to make some constructive criticisms as well. The leader has said that there are no perfect solutions, no perfect approaches. I would hope that she would in fact admit that this one proposed by the government is neither more perfect nor less perfect necessarily than her own.

Hopefully, for the sake of Canada and all Canadians, there will be some constructive points made so that we can get on with the job. Canada and Canadians need us now. They need us to come to grips with this problem, so let us not cop out when there is a tough job to do. Let us not give it to others.

Canadians are calling upon us as parliamentarians, so let us get on with the job. Let us not give it to others when we think there might be significant heat in the kitchen and when we know it is not going to be an easy mandate. At the same time, let us not exclude others who want to be heard and who need to be heard.

I want to address four points.

[Translation]

First, the objective, that is the intentions or the raison d'être of the committee. Secondly, I will talk about its make-up, thirdly, the process and, finally, the fourth major aspect, namely the substance or the content of what will be proposed.

Let us remember as we undertake this monumental, historical task that the Constitution belongs to all Canadians: to you, to me, to all of us. We must keep that as a prime objective. Let us remember as well that we are now trying to correct what is not working and to respond to our many current problems. Let us remember that we want to make lasting changes to create a Canada that is united, with greater economic, social and political stability.

Let us remember that we should address what Canada is all about. What is this great country all about? How will it work? We must indeed have increased fairness, a more just society, and a more competitive society in the true spirit of the time so that we can in fact be much more sensitive to the needs of all Canadians. Let us make sure in the final analysis that we have a better Constitution for all regions, all provinces and, indeed, all Canadians wherever they happen to come from.

Those are the purposes that I see at the present time. Let us remember that as we undertake the composition of this committee we need to be sensitive to provinces, to the various regions of Canada, and I would include most definitely the territories. We need to be sensitive to the peoples of Canada: aboriginal Canadians, those of French origin, those who are of English speaking origin and those of origins other than aboriginal, French or English.

Let us remember as well as we make up the composition that we need to have gender parity. We need to represent men and women as equally as possible.

Let us remember as well—this is a fundamental point—that we are attempting to correct, to change and to build a Constitution for Canadians and for those who were here before us. We must reflect upon the past but at the same time, we must not forget that we are creating a Constitution and a country for the youth of our nation.

We often forget the youth of the nation when we undertake projects such as this one.

Madam Speaker, let us not forget our vision of Canada in terms of social, cultural, economic, and other policies. The prejudices that I have and the ones that those who were here before me are not the same as those of today's youth.

Canada is not the same today as it was before. It must compete at the international level and when we deal with this fundamental issue, we have to make sure that we take into account our youth, those young men and women, your children, my children, your grandchildren. We want to build a country that will fulfill their needs, that will make their lives better and that will bring greater justice at every level.

[English]

When we attempt to rebuild a country, let us not forget that it is for all Canadians, but especially let us not forget that it is for the young people. It is so easy to build something for yourself and forget the others.

I want to speak briefly about the process. We have already said that this must be a round for all Canadians. We want to make sure that we can reach out to each and every Canadian who has something to say about the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land. Let us ensure that it is an open process, that there are no hidden agendas, that there are no seamless webs. Let us ensure that we listen intently, sincerely and profoundly to what Canadians have to say. Let us make a commitment today to involve all Canadians who want to speak about the fundamental law of our land.

I have spoken about our aboriginal peoples. I have spoken about Canadians from French, English and other origins. Let us not forget the poor. They do not always have the voice that they need. Let us not forget our Canadians with disabilities who cannot always speak as loudly, as often and as forcefully as they would like. Let us not forget organized, non-organized labour and business people.

Canadians, generally, must be given the opportunity to be heard and we must make a commitment to listen to them no matter what region of this country or province they come from and no matter what their background happens to be.

Let us respond as well, once we have listened and listened carefully to all Canadians, in an open kind of way. Let us really attempt to hear and to bring forth solutions that will in fact correct and solve a lot of those problems.

I was a member of the Beaudoin-Edwards constitutional committee whose report should be coming soon. As I travelled across Canada and talked to my constituents, they told me that they want a solution to the constitutional crisis and they want it now. They want national unity because they believe that national unity brings economic stability. It will bring social progress and political stability as well. They are tired of this continual haranguing about where we are going, who is in, who is out and under what circumstances.

Let us come to grips with it, perhaps not for all times but for a significant period of time.

I want to address the question of substance. There is a number of principles that I think we must abide by and I shall share a few that my party has developed. In fact they come from a statement of the leader of the party.

[Translation]

There they are. I believe that we really need a statement on the nature of Canada and I would like this statement to include a number of issues that I have alluded to, namely that we recognize the regions, the provinces, and the people of different origins. I would also like us to show a profound attachment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If we want to be a first class country, it is fundamental to attach the greatest importance to this Charter.

I would also like to see a strengthening of the Canadian economic union. I find it hard to understand why we talk about free trade with other countries when there are still, in our own country, all kinds of barriers that keep us from working together in a much easier and simpler way.

I would like to see, like everybody else I believe, an institutional reform, so that our great institutions, whether it is the Supreme Court, the Senate, the House of Commons and many other ones, meet the needs of Canadians. The distribution of powers is also another issue that must be dealt with. I tried to bring this issue up when I was sitting on the Beaudoin-Edwards Commission. We discussed it a bit, but it was not an integral part of our mandate. It was thus put aside, and I think it is unfortunate. However, this time, we cannot put it aside.

Spending power is a matter of the great importance, not only to Quebec but to any province or region in Canada. It is a matter this committe will have to settle.

The immigration issue is a very sensitive one. Certain agreements were signed that Canadians are not quite familiar with. Moreover, I am not convinced, and this is not meant as a nasty remark, that we know just where we are going on this issue of immigration. Nevertheless, we must tackle it and try and find a solution. The Supreme Court of Canada is most important. Are changes needed here? The native peoples were also mentioned over and over, and I am so proud that we, as parliamentarians, as well as the Canadian people have given further recognition to the importance of and the key role played by natives, the native peoples of Canada.

Finally, it seems likely that we will be able to meet in a very concrete and significant way to their needs, or so I hope. In my view, the amending formula should be flexible, responsible and responsive to the needs of a modern nation, a nation changing very rapidly to compete with the rest of the world.

If need be, there should be a national referendum to settle this business, maybe not once and for all, but for a long time I hope.

[English]

At the end of this process I think that Canadians need to be able to say something like the following: Canadians need to say at the end of the process of this new commission that it was indeed a Canada Round, that we were concerned about Quebec, the north, the Atlantic provinces, the western provinces, and of course Ontario as well. It must be a Canada Round, and at the end of the process people must say: "Yes, it was indeed a Canada Round". Canadians must be able to say that parliamentarians reached out to Canadians, that they really went out of their way to find them, to listen to them and to respond to them.

Canadians have to be able to say as well at the end of this whole exercise that the process was indeed open, that partisanship virtually did not exist, that the most important goal was Canada and the future of Canadians, and that that is reflected in all the travels, the debates and the discussions.

They must be able to say that parliamentarians listened with open minds. They must be able to say that they as Canadians have had fair representation, that our aboriginal peoples were represented, that there were representatives from the French language communities, from the English language communities and from the ethnocultural and multicultural communities as well. They must be able to say that there was a good balance of gender, and that we were sensitive to the whole question of youth, the poor, the handicapped and other Canadians who feel that they must be heard, that they must be reflected in this fundamental law of the land.

Canadians at the end of the process must be able to say that there was a significant, substantive, sensible, sensitive response to that which was communicated and shared with the members of the committee. They must be able to say: "We do have a good solution; no solution is perfect, but this is a good solution".

I think that Canadians need to be able to say at the end of the process that the important nations of the world which are watching us today and will continue to do so with respect to our constitutional and other crises will acknowledge our success, that they will say: "We now see a Canada that is stronger, that is more united, that has a better sense of direction, not only on constitutional matters, but on other matters as well". If we are able to do that, I am certain that we will have a better country.

With respect to the amendments I just want to say a few words. I mentioned them briefly at the beginning.

I pointed out that we got involved in this as a party in a spirit of co-operation. I hope that the government will consider the amendments we proposed with the same open-mindedness to see if there would not be a way to accomodate what we proposed. We believe, as I said earlier, that this would help us, as parliamentarians, to meet the needs of the Canadian people regarding their Constitution.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will have a couple of minutes to conclude his comments when we resume debate on this motion.

For the time being, as it is one o'clock p.m., I will now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

TAXATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, several times during the past month, a number of my constituents suggested that all taxpayers should be treated the same by governments, whether they are married, single or living common law, and whether a family's income is earned by one or several people, all other things being equal.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the exceptional work being done by the Conservative member for Calgary North, Al Johnson, who with the Conservative committee on family tax measures is trying to find solutions to these problems.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, this week is Occupational Health and Safety Week in Canada, a time when we should express our gratitude to those thousands of working Canadians, both volunteer and full-time who work hard every day to make Canada's work places safe and healthy.

We must also, as parliamentarians, rededicate ourselves to ending the all too familiar litany of death, injury and industrial disease which continues to victimize Canadian workers and their families at the alarming rate of one death in every three working hours.

I am sure we are all sincere in our expressed aims, but two questions come to mind. First, why did both the Ministry of Labour and the Liberal Party fail to respond to an invitation from the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to join deliberations in Sudbury last week to rescue the financial viability and independence of the centre?

Second, why has the government still not proclaimed the health and safety parts of the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act passed five years ago, which would accord Parliament Hill workers the same health and safety protection as other Canadians?

Let us put our actions and dollars where our mouths are.

USE OF TOBACCO

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear that the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled the government's response today to the campaign against tax rates launched by tobacco companies. Although taxes are never popular, I know Canadians agree we should use all reasonable means to discourage our young people from smoking, a habit that often becomes addictive. In response to the efforts of tobacco companies that focus on taxes, while the real problem is public health, our government has used taxes as part of its national strategy for reducing the use of tobacco. Canada ranks first in the world on cutting the smoking habit, and the minister made it clear that despite the objections of tobacco companies, he intends to maintain the government's current policy. The minister also stressed the need to promote the government's program, to make Canadians aware of the dangers of smoking.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, due to this government's policies, small businesses are failing in record numbers. The recession which this government's policies helped induce has placed many small businesses in a very tenuous position.

The GST which came into effect last January has had a significant negative impact on small businesses across the country.

On July 1, this government's payroll tax increase of 24 per cent in unemployment insurance payments will come into effect.

Last week the proposed bankruptcy legislation was introduced and small business persons across this country were shocked to find out that this government will be hitting them again with another payroll tax to finance a wage insurance fund. This will mean added costs and more paper work for the already over-burdened small business sector.

At a time when jobs and economic growth are badly needed, this government seems determined to implement policies which will discourage small business from hiring more employees, discourage small businesses from expanding and propel many small businesses right out of business altogether.

THE PIG

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, after centuries of disrespect the common pig is now gaining new stature. Even as I speak, futuristic pigs are producing human haemoglobin in their blood.

In the best studied pig at the New Jersey Research Station, 10 to 20 per cent of haemoglobin is human. The amazing pig will soon be saving human lives. These unselfish animals are potentially virus free blood donors and after receiving their 100th donation certificate, they can still wind up on your barbecue.

The next time you pass a pig or a pig farmer on your way to work, do not look at them with disdain. Take them to the football game or buy them a beer.

The pig now commands a new respect. The life he saves could be your own.

HARBOURS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, June 14, two fishermen in my riding came close to losing their lives due to a serious silting problem at the mouth of Dingwall Harbour. The cost of this dredging has been estimated at $350,000 and although this is not a long-term solution, this government has not seen its way clear to providing even this amount of money.

Silting is a major problem in the harbours in my constituency. Bay St. Lawrence, Sugar Loaf and Ingonish are other places where silting has caused difficulties for individuals employed in the fishing industry.

Except for the fact that these two fishermen had a very powerful engine in their boat, they could easily have capsized and drowned.

A request for funding is now sitting in the Minister of Fisheries' office and I hope the minister will examine this request and approve it immediately. He comes from an area where fishing is the mainstay of small communities and must realize the daily dangers that fishermen face.

What is more important to this government, the lives of fishermen or $350,000? I urge the minister to act immediately on this very important matter.

SENATOR STAN WATERS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, we note with regret that Senator Stan Waters is suffering from fatigue. According to his own admission, his fatigue is a result of his trying to promote the Reform Party, no doubt an exhausting undertaking.

He is also reported as saying that this task requires about 80 per cent of his time with only 20 per cent left over for senatorial duties.

The question Canadians are asking is will Preston Manning's conscience require Senator Waters to return 80 per cent of his wages to the federal bank account, or does the leader of the Reform Party condone the spending of public funds to support his populist movement?

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post announced that it will be closing the post office in Brandon, Manitoba next month. This post office services over 38,000 people. The decision sent a clear warning to all Canadians. No post office is safe.

I and thousands of Canadians are angry that Canada Post took this step and in doing so, gave the residents of Brandon only six weeks notice before this arbitrary decision would become fact. Many other communities, including Guelph and Charlottetown, are receiving drastically reduced postal services at the post office. Many rural communities are losing all postal outlets.

Canadians deserve first class postal service. Instead they are forced to find insurance outlets or pharmacies which are often not equipped to provide efficient and secure services.

Canada Post spent nearly $200,000 on a luxury box at SkyDome to entertain its corporate friends. This kind of expense is obscene when average Canadians are being denied basic services.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the government has admitted that it has collected a windfall in profits from the Goods and Services Tax, a windfall collected at the expense of co-operatives across Canada.

The GST applies to share capital investments made to a co-operative.

Their competitor food companies do not pay GST on any risk capital invested in their companies.

For example, this unequal application of GST costs a retail co-op in Moncton approximately $20,000 a year.

The GST is also applied to the co-operative weekly fees. The co-ops have broken down their sales and determined that 40 per cent are GST taxable and 60 per cent are zero-rated. This unfair GST tax on food costs the same retail co-operative about $40,000 per year. This creates an unlevel playing field for co-operatives.

Months ago co-operative representatives suggested amendments to the legislation similar to that for credit unions. They are still waiting to hear back. These amendments would appear to be easy to accommodate and would help to correct some of the inequities of the GST as it applies to co-operatives.

GEORGETOWN COMMUNITY HOSPITAL

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, if there is a way of measuring a community's compassion, it is perhaps through gauging the way it cares for its sick and elderly. By that standard the community of Georgetown, Ontario, in my riding is truly both compassionate and caring.

For the past 30 years local civic leaders and volunteers have been instrumental in seeing to it that the Georgetown Community Hospital protects and heals the citizens who have come to depend upon it.

I am proud to rise in my place in the House of Commons to both thank and praise these people.

In a few days the hospital will officially mark three decades of operation. During that time the facility has expanded and now includes an excellent centre for the care of the aged.

In Georgetown we are proud of this achievement and while I know this House is often filled with rancour and complaint, I want to remind all members that our communities are enriched by local institutions such as these to which we must all offer our deep thanks.

WELFARE

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, Ontario is calling for a massive overhaul of the province's general welfare assistance system and the Region of Peel is outraged. Why? With the changes, a self-declaration system is advocated.

• (1410)

People will be able to apply for welfare by mail. Home visits will be abolished unless requested, and the welfare system will be opened to 16 and 17 year olds.

Welfare will become a hand-out rather than a hand up. Costs will skyrocket.

The region cannot bear this extra burden, nor can we.

Our federal government contributes 50 per cent of the funding for this program and has a 50 per cent interest in the well-being of the people in the province of Ontario.

We should be outraged too.

We should have the right to call for negotiations between funding partners.

We should ensure that the welfare system does not break the back of an already strained region.

We should, but will we?

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I spoke at the environmental gathering which was organized by the Aboriginal Cultural Society in Winnipeg yesterday. This gathering was to enhance the solidarity among aboriginal peoples by examining environmental issues facing our planet and sharing traditional values about Mother Earth.

I commend the organizers and the participants of this important event. David Suzuki participated and, as members know, his ability to reconcile the interests of science with those of humanity has made him one of the most well known and perhaps greatest scientist of our time.

Jeannette Armstrong from the Penticton Reserve stated "the native people of this land developed a lifestyle through a unique world view, based on the health of the whole individual".

There were many people in attendance, including elders. It is our elders and people who still live on the land who reinforce my conviction that native people can protect the planet through a combination of traditional and spiritual environmental values and new scientific knowledge.

I believe the environment is the foundation of our well-being. This is what the elders have taught us. This is what I call traditional knowledge. I believe that all Canadians want to protect the environment from destruction. In the end, this is the vision which will unite our country.

THE FAMILY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the family unit is central to the quality of life in Canada.

It is the family unit where values are shaped, where faith is nurtured and strengthened and where tolerance, good will and generosity are developed.

Therefore, I become very upset when any government introduces any legislation that directly, or indirectly, erodes or discriminates against the family.

Our current tax system penalizes many married Canadians by charging them billions of dollars more than if they were unmarried, according to yesterday's report by Statistics Canada.

The report said that due to differing deductions and credits, 58 per cent of married-couple families had less disposable income under the tax and transfer payment system in 1989 than if they had formed a family but remained unmarried.

I want to congratulate the Conservative member of Parliament from Calgary North for his leadership in researching and investigating this issue over the last two years. Let us act quickly to correct these unfair tax measures.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, ever since this government signed the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding with the United States, thousands of jobs have been lost in the forest industry.

Canada's ability to manage our forests has been turned over to the Americans.

Grandfathered into the free trade deal, this tariff is another example of why this government's trade agenda is seriously flawed.

To date, the government has failed to get Canada out of the MOU.

The minister should tell American officials when he meets them later this month that we want this tariff scrapped. The government should act before more jobs are lost.

Since this government traded away our sovereignty, let us get it back.

SENATOR STAN WATERS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, like the member for Regina—Wascana, I am very sorry that Senator Waters has had to spend time in the hospital because of fatigue.

I wish him a speedy and complete recovery.

What concerns me is the fact that Senator Waters attributes only 20 per cent of the problem to his senatorial duties, and the rest because he has been so busy working for his party.

For one who has made such a public issue of donating a small part of his salary to charity, perhaps he should show real charity and collect only the 20 per cent of his income that he says he is working for, and apply the balance to reducing the cost of government which he is so fond of criticizing.

It is a good time for the senator to put his rhetoric into action.

UKRAINIAN IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in celebration of 100 years of Ukrainian immigration to Canada.

Drawn by the promise of a better future for themselves and their families, the first Ukrainian immigrants arrived in Montreal on September 7, 1891. They were followed by nearly 200,000 who were a founding people of Canada's west.

Today, there are over 600,000 citizens of Ukrainian descent living in Canada. We share their deep love and loyalty to Canada and we respect their unique heritage and contribution to our country.

In the words of a former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Canadians of Ukrainian descent have added something of value, of strength and of colour to the Canadian character.

As this House will be in recess on the anniversary of this historic beginning, let us thank our Ukrainian neighbours today and together let us work toward many more years of the prosperity they helped to bring to our country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my first question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canada is again facing a major trade dispute: U.S. Customs is investigating Asian manufacturers who produce cars in Canada. We are told that the government intends to charge customs duty retroactively on cars manufactured here in Canada, because they say these cars do not meet the standards of the Auto Pact.

I therefore want to ask the government whether it is true that Asian manufacturers who produce cars in Ontario and Quebec, do not meet the standards of the Auto Pact.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I think the Leader of the Opposition is well aware, this is a report in the media. It is not a report based on something that we have received, nor has the company received it.

There is a leak here that we are not in a position to comment on. If it appears that there is something that does not meet the requirements of the free trade agreement, in the eyes of the Americans, then certainly that is something we will look into.

However, I should point out to my friend that we saw last week, with the very successful result of the pork countervail case, the result of the application of the extraordinary challenge, where Canada was successful in the position that it took; a three to nothing decision. I think that shows very clearly that the dispute settlement mechanism works.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, either these companies respect the auto pact content requirements or they do not. I am very surprised that the government does not know anything about it. It should monitor these things.

If the government does not know about it, why not? If it does know about it, what does it intend to do to ensure that the government trade action is not detrimental to Canadian workers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is a very silly comment by the Leader of the Opposition.

At this point, the matter is the subject of a regular, normal and confidential audit by the United States authorities, comparable to audits that we do in Canada in respect of the rule of origin rules that are the subject of the free trade agreement.

For him to suggest that there is something wrong and that we do not know what is going on inside the Government of the United States is silly. When we find out what the results of this audit are, we will be able to take action if it is appropriate to take action.

I think the hon. member would be well advised to wait for the facts to come out before he starts making these allegations.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am terribly surprised that the minister does not know what is going on. He should know if these manufacturers meet or do not meet the requirements of the auto pact. It is his job, not my job.

Mr. Denis Desrosier, a very respected automobile analyst said: "With the trade negotiations with the Americans and Mexicans coming up, the potential exists to fundamentally blow the auto pact apart." Can the minister assure Canadians and this House that the auto pact is not on the table in the negotiations between Canada, the United States and Mexico?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, I can assure the hon. member of that, but I also would like to advise him that between Canada and Mexico the largest single element of our trade is in automotive parts and assembled vehicles. There are some serious trade barriers that the Mexicans have that inhibit our trade, particularly trade in automobiles into Mexico, and I would expect that the Leader of the Opposition would be encouraging us to make part of these negotiations to help the export of our cars into the Mexican market.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for International Trade. The United States trade representative has stated that the United States and Mexico are negotiating separate agreements on immigration, oil mineral rights, and on the environment without Canada's participation.

Did Canada choose to absent itself from those talks or was it excluded? Has Canada in fact secured full and equal participation in trilateral negotiations, or can Canada be excluded from some aspects of the talks if the United States and Mexico decide to do so?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are full and equal partners in the trade negotiations. There are some elements that are outside the trade negotiations that are a subject of discussions between the United States and Mexico, as there are between the United States and Canada. We have a bilateral arrangement with Mexico in matters of environment that the Prime Minister signed when he was in Mexico about a year or so ago.

Those discussions are ongoing, but we agreed at our meeting last week that these bilateral discussions could turn into trilateral discussions. There will be full openness among all of us as to what is going on in these discussions, and if it appears appropriate to make certain bilateral discussions into trilateral discussions, that is something we can easily do.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, let me be a little more specific. The United States trade representative has announced that the United States has now agreed that ownership of all Mexican oil mineral rights is not on the table in the North American free trade negotiations.

Will the minister explain to the Canadian people why the ownership of all oil mineral rights is excluded in the case of Mexico, but not in the case of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I missed the last part of the question.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to repeat it. I wonder whether the minister would explain how it is that the ownership of all oil mineral rights is excluded in the case of Mexico, but included in the case of Canada.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the ownership of the mineral rights in Canada is a provincial matter. They are the governments responsible for the ownership. In fact they own the mineral rights themselves and it is up to them to decide how they should deal with them.

Our position in the free trade agreement with the United States was that we wanted to use the free trade agreement to ensure that we had access to the United States market to sell the products that come form those mineral rights, oil and natural gas in particular.

That was our choice. That was our decision as the government at that time and I believe it was the right one.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked the minister of health about the secretive, closed-door federal-provincial conference of ministers of health which will meet in Toronto on Wednesday. I now understand that this meeting has no agenda and will be restricted to ministers only. Clearly any minister can propose changes to our health care system such as provincial autonomy, disentanglement, user fees, or extra billing.

Can the Prime Minister tell this House if the proposals of his government that it will make at this meeting will include the federal government continuing to play a major role in medicare, including direct cash funding and the maintenance of national standards.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the secretiveness of the meeting, it cannot be that secret if my hon. colleague knows all about it.

My colleague, the Minister of Health and National Welfare, will be there at the conference and I am sure he will be pleased to report back to the hon. member when he returns.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Canadians are clearly worried about their health care system and they certainly do not get assurance from the questions and answers we are receiving from the other side.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Karpoff: My supplementary is to the Prime Minister. yesterday, the minister of Health said the Canadian health system was admired as the best in the world. Can the Prime Minister tell this House how much longer the Canadian system will remain the best when its own government will cut $62.4 billion from medicare financing by the year 2000. What specific financial guarantees will he take to the provincial ministers of health tomorrow so that Canadians will continue to have the best medicare system?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Canadians would be much more reassured if we put the questions ourselves. But of course, that is the privilege of the hon. member of the opposition.

With respect to the conference, as I said, my colleague the minister of health is going to be there tomorrow, and I am sure after the conference he will be in a good position to indicate what transpired at that conference.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responding for the minister of health. In a recent letter to the editor of Saturday Night the Deputy Minister of Health wrote that: "the government has developed an approach to regulation of prosthetic devices based on risk management, voluntary compliance and international co-operation."

There have been serious questions about the safety of the Meme breast implant. There are persistent rumours that the Meme will be back on the market by fall. Will the minister assure women that the Meme will not return to the market until it is proven safe.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, many questions have been asked about that matter of the minister of health in the past. He has given indications of what measures National Health and Welfare have taken with respect to that particular matter, and I am sure the minister will continue to assure my hon. colleague that everything with respect to health and welfare and the protection of the user will be maintained.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Last Friday, the US trade secretary said that her country and Mexico will negotiate, in the context of the free trade talks, a distinct environmental agreement, without Canada's participation. This is a real blow! According to Carla Hills, this is the only agreement contemplated in the context of free trade.

On June 15th, the Minister of the Environment promised, in committee, that our interests would be protected through negotiations at the North American level. Mr. Speaker, the trade arguments justifiying Canada's presence at the negotiating table also apply to the environment issue.

My question is this: what measures does the government intend to take in order to ensure that Canada is not left out of those negotiations, and to ensure that there is a trilateral agreement on the environment?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I guess it is a slap in the face that we do not have a common border with Mexico. That is the purpose for the large number of the discussions that the United States and Mexico are having on a bilateral basis, because there are considerable environmental problems along the United States-Mexican border.

I did say, in response to his colleague, that we have ourselves a parallel set of discussions going on between Mexico and Canada on environmental matters that are more of interest to the two of us as countries. We did discuss on Wednesday last week at the initial meeting of the North American free trade negotiations that we would be quite open among ourselves as three countries as to what was taking place in the two sets of bilateral discussions. If it were appropriate for us to become involved in their discussions or them to become involved in our discussions, the United States and the Canada-Mexico discussions, then that can be done.

• (1430)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Appropriate. If this government does not begin to understand the absolute integration of the environment with trade, we are going to get skinned in every trade negotiation that lies ahead of us.

On April 8 Canadian environmental groups which understand the issue wrote the Prime Minister requesting a meeting to help develop the Canadian position for the Mexican negotiations. They were not even given the courtesy of a reply or an acknowledgement. The failure to include environmental NGOs has already compromised the Canadian agenda and has put us far behind the preparations of the United States in these negotiations.

My question is: will the minister agree to meet with the concerned organizations this week? Furthermore, will the minister undertake to this House to set up a formal consultation structure by the end of the month lest we fall further behind the environmental eight ball?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Let me be quite clear, Mr. Speaker, there are environmental matters that are clearly in the realm of trade negotiations, and those are going to be part of the NAFTA negotiations. There are other environmental matters that do not have any trade significance but are the subject of two sets of bilateral parallel discussions, one between the United States and Mexico and the other between Canada and Mexico.

As far as the letter that my hon. friend refers to, I would be happy to look into that matter and I will get back to him.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): In the Canada-U.S.-Mexico trade talks Canadian industries, like our banks, want access to American markets, but the Americans want something in return. The Americans have made it clear for a long, long time that Canadian culture is up for grabs as far as they are concerned. So my question is to the Minister of International Trade.

Isn't he horse-trading Canadian culture for his Bay Street friends? If he isn't, why did the minister only tell Carla Hills that culture is—and I quote—"a sensitive issue"? Why is he not telling her at the trade table that culture is not a bargaining chip and that it is just not on the table? Why is he not saying that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have told that to Mrs. Hills; I have told it to Mr. Serra, I have told it to Mr. Katz and I have told it to Mr. Blanco, and I am quite happy to tell it for the seventeenth time to my friend from Mount Royal.

If she is concerned about this matter of trade and what is on the table or off the table, one of the things that she might consider is the fact that Mrs. Hills has said that some things are not on the table for the United States as well.

So that is part of the negotiations that we are going to be having, but my hon. friend can be quite sure that the position I have taken, both publicly and also in discussions with Mrs. Hills, makes it very, very clear that our position on the cultural industries in this country is not a subject for negotiation.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): We in this House know what the minister has been saying. But the news media seems to indicate that Carla Hills doesn't know what the minister has been saying.

The Mexicans were able to get their oil minerals off the table; the Americans have been able to get their immigration off the table; why have this minister and this government not been able to get the cultural industries off the table? That is my question.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all, immigration is not a trade matter. It is never the subject of trade negotiations.

The reason why the Mexicans have been able to get the ownership of energy resources off the table is that right now in their constitution they are constitutionally not able to comply with what the Americans or we might want to have. If she would only close her mouth and open her ears, she might hear something of what I am saying. I will say it for the eighteenth time:

The negotiations will not include any negotiation of trade in the products of our cultural industry.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister for International Trade.

United States Customs have attacked Honda and probably other Asian transplants in Canada for failing to meet North American content requirements. They have also accused Honda of dumping in the U.S. market.

My question to the minister is: will the government release the results of its own Revenue Canada audit and let us know how those results do or do not confirm the American findings? In any case, will the government indicate what action it intends to take to protect Canadian jobs which, after all, are North American jobs too.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Americans audit our exports and we audit their exports. Unless there is something that is contrary to trade rules, then the results of those audits are confidential.

The particular audit my friend is referring to at this point is still in the process of being carried out by the United States authorities. For him to start drawing conclusions on the basis of an audit that is not complete and ask for us to get the results of an incomplete audit out into the public domain I think is inappropriate and probably irresponsible.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): The Americans are already talking about actions to be taken on the basis of this secret audit.

One administration official says that if Canadian companies are having trouble now, just wait. Denis Desrosier, who is a well-known auto expert, says that the controversy could blow the auto pact apart.

Now we are engaged in trilateral free trade agreements. My question to the government is: what will this government do to prevent the gutting of the auto pact that this government already started in the bilateral trade negotiations as it enters into the trilateral negotiations with Mexico. How are we going to save Canadian jobs? How are we going to save the Canadian automobile industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite premature in the comments he is making. We have demonstrated in the two and a half years since the free trade agreement has been in force a very strong capacity to protect the Canadian industry against the attacks from the other side where they have proven to be inappropriate. The most recent of those came last week when we had a very strong win, which I have yet to hear my colleague opposite talk about at all, where we demonstrated very clearly the position we took against the position taken by the Americans. It was supported by the panel three to nothing. This is the type of result we can expect from the free trade agreement, from the dispute settlement mechanism, which my friend's comments from the other side, right from the start—

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment.

Since January 1989, Canada has lost over 280,000 manufacturing jobs, the bulk, and I stress, the bulk of which were as a result of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. In fact, 180,000 of those jobs have been lost forever.

My question, based on this harsh reality, is simply this. Since the U.S. Congress has already made a commitment to implement labour force adjustment programs prior to any agreement with Canada and Mexico, will the minister give the House an undertaking today that Canada will follow suit to protect the displaced workers under the upcoming free trade negotiations?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the member understands the differences that exist between adjustment programs for American workers and Canadian workers. Just maybe what has happened in the United States is that they have looked at Canadian adjustment programs and thought this was quite suitable also for workers in the United States.

• (1440)

We have in this country 400 adjustment programs. How many more are needed?

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

If the government does in fact have a national retraining strategy and programs as he states, can the minister give us specific program details for the 10,800 displaced workers in the auto industry and, indeed, the 9,200 displaced workers in the steel industry.

Also, how will these displaced workers be retrained? What sectors can they be found in?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me the next 20 minutes to go through the list of all the programs that are available.

Under the Canadian Jobs Strategy, these workers and all workers across Canada can benefit from the skill shortages program which helps train Canadians in skills that are in short supply and provides mobility assistance.

Employers needing workers with skills in short supply take advantage of this program. For the last fiscal year this was $265 million. Another one is the skill investment program which is another program which—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, this is the list that the hon. member requested. Come see me after Question Period, and I will give you a copy of the list of great things we are doing for Canadian workers.

SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

I would like to begin by commending the statement that was made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, while welcoming the change in apartheid legislation in South Africa, went on to say that the government would continue to urge changes dealing with prisoners and political exiles. I think that is an important statement on behalf of Canadians.

At the same time, the minister said that the government is now considering a change in its policy in relation to sanctions.

Considering the continuing violence in South Africa, considering the fact that political prisoners have not been released and that there are stalled negotiations, why is the government now considering changes in its sanctions program? Is it planning to bring those changes forward at the Commonwealth meeting of foreign ministers being held in July?

What is the government's real position on sanctions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's real position is the position that was articulated in this House some six years ago.

We have consistently followed that and defended that position throughout the Commonwealth, the United Nations and elsewhere, including the G-7 summits. The position is that sanctions are indispensable in bringing about the removal of the pillars of apartheid. We think that has turned out to be quite accurate.

In response to the calls from the new Secretary General of the Commonwealth and others, Canada is part and parcel of a re-examination of the thrust of the Commonwealth principles in respect of apartheid to see if changes at this point might be appropriate and helpful, given the significant nature of changes brought about by President de Klerk.

That decision has not been taken yet because the key word in Canada's position has always been that these changes must be irreversible with regard to the elimination of apartheid.

The Commonwealth foreign ministers will meet in June and the leaders of the Commonwealth will meet in Harare in October. At that point in time, Canada's position will be set forward with clarity, as it has been in the past.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it may have been set forth with clarity in the past. I am not sure the Prime Minister's answer today has much clarity to it.

Specifically, when Canada attends the foreign ministers' meeting, considering the number of calls that are now being made for changes on sanctions programs, on lifting restrictions on travel, visas and party participation, is the Government of Canada now considering making changes in the programs?

Is it responding to those calls for change or, taking into account the continuing serious problems of real discrimination in South Africa, will we hold to the sanctions program that has been announced by various and successive governments?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What various and successive governments? Mr. Speaker, it was only this government that brought about that program in the first place.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend ought to refresh his memory. With regard to the changes that are made, the changes, if indeed they come, will be made in co-operation with our Commonwealth allies. My hon. friend says: "What is our position?" Our position is the position that the Commonwealth adopted in Nassau in October 1985 and then supplemented by a series of initiatives under the chairmanship of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, as congratulated by Nelson Mandela when he congratulated Canada and this government when he stood on the floor of the House of Commons.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. I think that everyone knows that the Canadian steel industry is at risk in this country and at this present time Algoma Steel in particular. Successful restructuring of this company will require creative initiatives such as an employee buy-out.

On May 27 the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology endorsed such an initiative. I wonder if the Minister of Finance shares his colleague's opinion and will also endorse such an initiative.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there have indeed been meetings with the union workers as well as with the Government of Ontario, and there have been a number of telephone calls with respect to this issue.

It is our hope that the existing mechanisms will be sufficiently flexible to allow a program, such as the hon. member refers to, to proceed. However, I have to tell him that there is a fair amount of work that still has to be done and we hope that ultimately the objective that the hon. member and the workers have in mind can be utilized. We will use our best efforts in using the existing mechanisms to achieve that purpose.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): I do appreciate the minister's comments and I think he is also looking favourably upon such an initiative, but it is obvious that what is existing will not be sufficient. To facilitate such an initiative, obviously changes in federal tax policy will be necessary to complement hopefully pending provincial policy.

Will the minister indicate what specific initiatives he would consider and when because time is of the essence?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our position is that we remain hopeful that existing mechanisms can be utilized satisfactorily.

The hon. member shakes his head in the negative. I am not sure whether he has attended the meetings, but there have been meetings, there have been telephone conversations and there will be more, and we will attempt to co-operate and work in a co-operative fashion to see what we can do to facilitate the kind of objective that the hon. member has in mind.

TAXATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in Social Trends, a publication of Statistics Canada, we learned that almost 60 per cent of married families paid more tax than they would have paid if they were not married, a total of some $5.6 billion.

In the throne speech, our government promised to review all federal policies that relate to the family.

I would ask the minister if reviewing family taxation is one of his priorities and if he would commit to the House that he and his staff will thoroughly investigate this issue over the summer and that he will bring forward proposals in the fall that will establish fairness as the keystone of our tax policy for families.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the hon. member's concern and the concern of other members of caucus who have addressed this issue. Obviously, Canada's tax system must address the different family situations and we endeavour to do just that.

I appreciate the very constructive role that the hon. member has provided in bringing forth suggestions to me, and obviously these will be looked at in the interests of establishing a tax system that will be fair, that will be equitable and particularly fair and equitable as it relates to families in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, while it was yesterday that Statistics Canada reported that most married couple families pay more in income tax than unmarried couples, the tax situation since this government came into office is not something that just sprang out yesterday. Especially hurt are married couples with family incomes between $10,000 and $20,000. On the average, their disposable income each year is reduced by some $2,500.

Why will the Minister of Finance not make a commitment today to change the tax policies that discriminate against married couples, especially lower income ones? Why will he not make that commitment today to create a fairer tax system for all Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the huge burden of debt that we are asked to carry was not created by this government and it did not happen yesterday either. That is the harsh reality that we have to live with.

As I indicated to my hon. colleague, there are some very constructive proposals that are being considered. If the hon. member has any, I would be pleased to receive them because we will look at them all in the name and all in the interest of achieving a more fair and equitable tax system as it relates to families in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is so concerned about that huge burden of debt of which he spoke, why will he not admit that burden was created since his government came into office? It doubled since 1984. This is no excuse for 69 per cent of married couples with children and 75 per cent of elderly married couples to pay more in income tax than similar unmarried ones.

Therefore, my question to the Minister of Finance is: Why does he stick with fiscal policies that create this discrimination against married couples with children, and against older married couples? Why does he persist in maintaining this lack of fiscal fairness?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Canadians would want to know that 90 per cent of the accumulation in the national debt over the last six years was the interest and the compound interest on the debt that was inherited by this government in 1984.

The Liberals in 1981 and 1982, in their attempt to get out of the recession, tripled the deficit in that period of time, between 1981 and 1984. Obviously it makes it more difficult for us in terms of restricting our flexibility to deal with a number of the issues that the hon. member raises today.

As I indicated, there are some very constructive proposals that are emanating from this side of the House. We are looking at them seriously and I will certainly welcome any proposals from the hon. member as well.

PARENTAL LEAVE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Ralph and Irena Lawrenson of Markham adopted a young Romanian girl, Deirdre. Under current UIC rules, maternity benefits of 15 weeks are only available to natural parents.

In getting to my question, I want to say I believe this discrimination is unfair. As an adoptive parent myself, I know that most adoptive parents go through a unique, emotional and psychological period during the application and negotiation process.

I therefore ask the minister: will he reconsider the current discriminatory practices?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of sympathy for the hon. member on the question he raises.

I would like to tell my colleague and all members in the House that the Unemployment Insurance Act is not discriminatory between adoptive parents and natural parents. Both, under the act, are entitled to parental leave of up to 10 weeks.

In the case of a biological mother—and this is for the reasons outlined by the Federal Court of Canada in the decision on the issue—she is entitled to 15 weeks benefit for recuperative reasons which are not applicable in the case of an adoptive mother or an adoptive father. So there is no discrimination.

This is important. For children with special needs, the act further provides for five additional weeks for which a parent, adoptive or natural, can apply.

This is the situation and there is no discrimination.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government has decided to appoint a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House to examine the political reality of this country. This committee will seek the opinions of Canadians and Quebecers in the months to come.

It so happens that the government has decided not to have any representative of the Bloc québécois on that committee. Yet, the Bloc québécois is the only group in this House that represents an unavoidable movement in Quebec, the sovereignty movement.

My question is this: does the government not find it unrealistic to not want to see the reality just before embarking on such an exercise?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we intend to follow the well established Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I understand that after the disaster of the Spicer tavern and the failure of the mock Beaudoin-Edwards Commission, we are now going to set up the committee of ostriches!

I have another question for the Minister, since he is the one who answers. Does the Minister intend to imitate Mr. Robert Bourassa, the Prime Minister's friend, who has examined through his parliamentary committee in Quebec City, the two options, namely sovereignty and federalism? Does the government anticipate to broaden the mandate of the committee so that it will also study the behaviour of Canada once Quebec becomes a sovereign state?

FARM DEBT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of State for Agriculture. Last week the minister introduced amendments to the Bankruptcy Act to assist businesses facing insolvency to renegotiate their debts. The minister knows that farm debt rose to $23 billion this past year. A recent study by the agriculture committee reports that some 48,000 farmers are facing insolvency and the loss of their land.

Can the minister tell the House if there are any special provisions in this legislation to assist farmers who are facing a very heavy load of debt?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I should say first of all that the hon. member should remember that in 1986–87 we put in place the Farm Debt Review Board which was very successful with farmers across the country.

This legislation allowed a lot of farmers to sit down with their creditors to look at their business and stay in business. The new legislation on bankruptcy tabled last week will help farmers who, along with all Canadians, will have access to new tools. I will be more than happy to see my hon. friend as well as all my hon. friends in the two opposition parties support this government initiative because it will be very good for Canadians.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister. The minister knows that under the U.S. bankruptcy law, chapter 12, it assists farmers specifically in resolving and renegotiating farm debt. In fact during the past several years U.S. farm debt has gone down by 40 per cent, whereas Canadian farm debt has continued to rise to above $23 billion.

Why does the government not provide the same assistance to our farmers to renegotiate their debt and stay in business as has been provided to the United States farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it must be understood that when the government intervenes with an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, it must make sure that a balance is maintained between all the different stakeholders in that sector, particularly the people who loan the money.

I can reassure you and my honourable colleague, since I was in Regina yesterday and I got to meet the representatives of that sector. Yes, I was also in Vancouver yesterday. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the people involved were very positive about these amendments to the legislation and I am convinced that with the cooperation of the other members of the House we will be able to implement this. That initiative will help the farmers as well as all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. I am sure the Minister of the Environment is aware that recently declassified U.S. military documents confirm that a radioactive cloud 325 times as deadly as Three Mile Island was released from the Hanford atomic bomb production facilities in an intentional experiment known as Green Run on the evening of December 2, 1949.

Will the minister release funds from the green plan to study the long-term effects of this atomic radiation experiment on residents of British Columbia and Alberta because that has already been denied despite requests by the B.C. and Canadian Medical Associations for the study of the long-term effects on Canadian residents in B.C. and Alberta?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as representation, look into the matter and get back to him.

HON. STANLEY KNOWLES

83RD BIRTHDAY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this House would like to join me in paying tribute today to the Hon. Stanley Knowles on the occasion of his 83rd birthday.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party and on behalf of the constituents of Winnipeg North Centre, I also would like to bring greetings to Mr. Knowles. He is a man very much remembered and honoured in his constituency, and it is a pleasure to be here today on his birthday.

PRIVILEGE

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wanted to ask the minister a supplementary question. I know he answered it according to the law, but adoptive parents have some great difficulties. This particular couple had to travel to Romania, appear in court, they were asked if—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raised a question earlier in Question Period and an answer was given. The hon. member cannot seek a further answer by way of a question of privilege. The hon. member may wish to ask the question again, or the hon. member may want to put it on the adjournment debate, but it is not a question of privilege and I am afraid I cannot hear him put it.

CORRECTION TO COMMENTS

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity, which is the earliest opportunity that I have had, to bring to the House a correction in Hansard at page 1757, where I have referred to a legal addiction from which I suffer. I have checked the electronic media and indeed I did say "legal addiction" not "lethal".

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. There have been discussions between the parties. I think you will find that there will be agreement to the following motion being put to the House without discussion:

I move:

That this House orders, having regard to paragraph 8.(2)(c) of the Privacy Act, that the Solicitor General cause to be laid before an in camera meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, unexpurgated copies of the report by Mr. John Weir, concerning the escape of Daniel Gingras and the report by the Correctional Service Canada Board of Investigations concerning Allen Legere, and

That the in camera meeting of the committee take place with all the procedural protections normally accorded to in camera meetings, including a ban on the publication of the proceedings of the committee and on the disclosure of any information contained in the said reports which may be protected from disclosure under either the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act; and

That this House takes note of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections tabled in the House on May 29, 1991, and refers the said report and all the evidence and proceedings upon which the report is based, to the House Management Committee for further study.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Again, the government has been insensitive and failed to consult. I ask the Solicitor General not to propose motions out of the blue like that, because unanimous consent is required and it will not be given without consultation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In the absence of unanimous consent, the House cannot consider the motion of the Solicitor General of Canada.

Mr. Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When we had the first vote, this afternoon, I heard the name of the hon. member for Longueuil, as if he were present in the House. I want to advise the House that the member for Longueuil was not present at that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You are perfectly right, and the correction has already been made by the Clerks-at-the-Table.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table a Notice of a Ways and Means motion with respect to Special Assessments of Insurance Companies and Fraternal Benefit Societies. I ask that you designate an Order of the Day for the consideration of said motion.

NATIONAL UNITY

APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumes consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) to appoint a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to inquire into proposals for a renewed Canada, and the amendment of M. Ouellet (p. 1912).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the adjournment of debate, the member for Saint-Boniface had the floor for a maximum of three minutes.

• (1540)

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, just as we recessed I had asked the government to note the spirit with which we had made a commitment to work openly and co-operatively with them in terms of trying to resolve, in a very creative, significant, comprehensive way the needs of all Canadians from all regions and all provinces.

I had also addressed why this committee had been created, and the main point was really to attempt to bring some long-lasting solutions to the needs of Canadians.

I had also addressed the question of the composition of the committee. I had indicated that in our amendment there was an opportunity to broaden that representation so we could, in fact, ensure that a number of groups would be represented and that there might be greater satisfaction for all Canadians.

I had addressed the question of process and indicated that we must reach out, we must be open, we must listen and we must respond in terms of the information we have received.

Finally, I had indicated that we must have a substantive proposal that really in fact reflects what we have heard.

[Translation]

As a Canadian, as a Manitoban and as the hon. member for the federal riding of St. Boniface, I want to remind you all that Canada and the Canadians need us now. They need us to make an effort. They want us to solve their problems.

[English]

We are in fact pressed for time. We know that we have a job to do. This is not the time to cop out when the going gets rough. It is not the time to give it to another group to resolve. Surely together we can work and come up with a solution.

Together, in cooperation with one another and I hope constructively, let's work with all the Canadians for the well-being of all of Canada, and let's build a modern Canada not only for us now, but for our children and for the future generations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech made by the member for St. Boniface, and I must commend him for his speech which was balanced, well presented, and gave roughly the orientation to follow.

Like him, I do have hesitations with certain components of the solution to the problem, as, for example, the methods we should use to consult Canadians. We know that the New Democrats do not want us to give up the concept of a constituent assembly. They were unable to clarify this morning how they would designate people to this assembly. But they nevertheless tried to make us believe that it was the one and only solution.

We know that the constitution does not presently provide for a constituent assembly. Very few constitutions—in fact, as far as I know, there are none—provide that constitutional changes are made by a constituent assembly. This formula was used in certain countries—there are a few, but I will not list them—hit by a revolution or a civil war, and it was to write a new Constitution.

But I want to ask him a very specific question. It is about the referendum, which can be very useful, but also very dangerous for some of us who are afraid. It is true that a referendum, if it is used to confirm a project of society, to confirm an agreement, that is fine. But my question—and I ask him now, Mr. Speaker—is: does he agree with me when I say that a referendum which would be held to confirm a constitutional arrangement should not reduce in any way the rights guaranteed to Canadians by the Charter?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the question. First of all, there is a flagrant contradiction in the New Democratic Party position. As you have mentioned, they proposed a constituent assembly. That is one kind of constituent assembly, but there are many others. They said that they did not have the perfect solution. This one is not perfect either. So, I don't know why theirs would be better than this one. I have the feeling that they are all a little inadequate. Some how I still find contradictory that they would want a constituent assembly to involve more people, when they don't want a referendum. For me, this is the ultimate constituent assembly. So, they have to explain the rationale behind all this.

As far as your specific question is concerned, indeed, we cannot create a country and I have said so many times, but I appreciate so much the question. By depriving people of their rights—we heard that many times during the hearings across the country—we create a country, we build a stronger, more united, more stable country by trying to maintain, by ensuring that we maintain the rights that Canadians have acquired.

So, when I talk about a referendum, I talk about a referendum about a bill, about a constitutional reform if you prefer, that maintains all the rights that we have today and hopefully adds others perhaps for the aboriginal peoples and other groups that have not been treated well enough up until now.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface on his very well researched, creative and comprehensive presentation on an issue of great national importance, an issue that concerns the very survival of our country and our nation. I would like to congratulate the member on that presentation.

These are difficult times for the country. It is a very large country and we need a very big heart if we are to understand each other. I am reminded of the Latin maxim salus populi suprema lex est, the welfare of the people is the supreme law of the land.

It seems to me that as the welfare of the people is the primary mission of the whole country, testing our proposal via a referendum would be the ideal way. I would like him to comment since he indicated that the NDP wants a constituent assembly so that more people will be involved.

I find that almost paradoxical because the Charter of Rights is part of the referendum package and will ensure that minority rights will be protected and at the same time all people will be consulted.

I would like the member to kindly comment on this issue.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the questions.

First, I have said it and I want to repeat it, we from all parties need to ensure that we are primarily concerned about this great nation of ours. It is the second largest geographically, 31st in population size, and the eighth largest economy in the world, the one country where most people would want to move to, if they could. We must never forget that is the prime objective.

The second point I want to make is that there is a flagrant contradiction in saying that their model of a constituent assembly is going to involve more people without being prepared to implement the ultimate model, which is the referendum.

I want to stress again and again and again that a referendum must respect the rights of all Canadians and, hopefully, will add to the rights of many Canadians who have insufficient protection today, such as aboriginal peoples and others. These include the rights of women, the handicapped, working people and what have you. We will let the committee decide that. Surely, we must be sensitive to the rights of all Canadians. That is a contradiction.

The final point is an important one. We have to be careful about semantics, because many members will know that the 1864 constituent assembly was composed completely of parliamentarians. That is one model of constituent assembly.

• (1550)

I would hope that we could draw other people into the process and actually listen and respond to their concerns. The NDP has proposed one type. I have not seen its particular model presented to the House of Commons, I suspect because it would feel awkward pointing out the groups left out. There is good politics in what the NDP is doing, but is it best for Canada? That is the fundamental question.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): I will be brief. I think I was very surprised when I heard the speech of the member for St. Boniface who seems to have a solution to every problem today. Yet, during the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, he refused to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. He was against the Meech Lake Accord, but today he is about to propose a referendum where Quebec's population, all of Quebecers would be diluted in the Canadian population as a whole. So I tell the member for St. Boniface that he has the right to serve the interests of English Canada, his country; he is entitled to his own culture and traditions. You are entitled to that, but don't try once more to play tricks or to stuff Quebec the way you and your party did in 1982.

Mr. Duhamel: Even if I find his comments exaggerated and disgraceful, I will say that that is why my colleague and his party won't go far. I did not say I was against the Meech Lake Accord, I said I would support if the propositions of the Liberal Party were adopted, because otherwise the rest of Canada would have been left aside.

An hon. member: You are hypocrits!

Mr. Duhamel: And I find regrettable that those people elected by the people try to make me say otherwise or to make people believe that I said something else. Now they are smiling—

An hon. member: Another Chrétien!

Mr. Duhamel: Arrogance, insensitive, trying to interpret my own thoughts, my own words. You won't go far, my friends, with comments like that. You are falling apart. You are going to get drowned with your arrogance, with your lies and your exaggerations. I know the country as well as you do. I would even say I know the whole country even better than they do. I find interesting that they ask me a question, but then when they get treated roughly, they want me to stop. Well, I regret, I could say a lot more, Mr. Speaker, but they will pay the price for their arrogance and lies!

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, we must first agree that the wish expressed by the government to appoint a Special Committee of the House and the Senate to examine what is going on in this country and to see how the government and the institutions as a whole must deal with the situation, is a legitimate one.

As for myself, I can only support the wish of the central Parliament, of the federal Parliament, of the supreme institutions of Canada to deal with a crisis that is dividing the country and to try to see first the reality, and then what can be done about it.

In this sense, we must also commend all the parties in the House for seeking to rise above partisan lines, to form a sort of very large group, the largest possible, in order to look at the reality. Why do the parties have such an unusual instinct? We know well that parties generally fight at much lower levels and clash over the issues that divide them. Why, this time, do the parties feel the need to unite themselves in this endeavour? Why? Because they know well that the crisis is such that we must include, all aspects of the problem. We cannot afford, in the face a such a situation, to be divided, to hide the reality. So, we want all the parties to be there, because all the parties, by their very existence, show that political reality takes various forms, that it is not monolithic, that there are several aspects and that we must represent them all, which is what the parties do through the election that brought them here in this House. However where the approach of the parties in this House is misleading, where it distorts reality, is that it fails to reflect, in the composition of the committee, one of the aspects of the political reality in this country, that is the move of Quebec towards sovereignty.

In other words, the kind of unanimity we see in this Chamber, this search for the truth, for honesty, does not go beyond these walls. There is some kind of framework which this Chamber does not want to get out of. We choose to ignore the most critical aspect of this crisis, the fact that it generated a sovereignty movement in Quebec, the fact that according to the latest polls 57 to 59 per cent of Quebecers want sovereignty.

I understand that it is a problem for a federal Parliament, for a country like Canada, an enormous problem for which a solution has to be found. If I were a federalist, I, too, would try to find a solution to such a problem. However the majority of the people in Quebec are moving toward sovereignty. Therefore, the normal reflex in this House is to create something which would be above the parties, in order to see what the reality is.

By doing that, Mr. Speaker, the government and the opposition parties are burying their heads in the sand while saying: "Yes, we are going to review all aspects of the problem, but not sovereignty." But the problem is sovereignty, and the committee is not going to look at it, is not going to look at the fundamental problems of Quebec.

The process being launched today is therefore heading for immediate failure. This attempt is doomed to failure. It is obvious that what you embark upon today, without us—not because you exclude us, as individuals, but because you exclude what we represent—is a process doomed to failure in the same way as the two previous attempts. In other words, you will look at everything, except the problem.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only the attitude demonstrated by the the creation of the committee and the exclusion of the representatives of the Bloc québécois that shows that we live in a surrealist world, there is in particular, the speech of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, this morning, who, following the example of all those who speak here about the sovereignty of Quebec, condemned this movement. He tried, once again, to talk in a derogatory way, of something perfectly legitimate that reflects a deep reality, that is in keeping with an historic continuity of a people reaching towards the ultimate fulfilment.

When we talk about sovereignty the way we do, Mr. Speaker, we are once again burying our heads in the sand. When we are told that the fundamental values of the country are embodied only in federalism, we forget that the sovereignty of Quebec is as legitimate as that of Canada and that even Canada, in its present arrangement, does not reflect the values that it embodied in the beginning.

The Canadian dream, Mr. Speaker, does not work anymore, even with the values that were there originally. It is not Quebec's fault, Mr. Speaker, it is not the fault of sovereignty if, for the last twenty years, Canada has lost its place in the world, its competitiveness, its productivity and is not recognized anymore as a major international partner. It is not Quebec's fault, it is a crisis in self-confidence, Mr. Speaker. Moreover, Quebec cannot be blamed for that coup de force that was imposed on it in 1981-1982, as you well know.

Well, the House turns away from the facts and forgets what caused the situation we are now experiencing. But one must not forget, Mr. Speaker, because we, Quebecers, do remember! We are well aware that you also remember even if you do not talk about it, even if you ignore it when you take your decisions. Quebecers do remember that, in 1981-1982, nine provinces plus the federal government, with the support of the Parliament of Westminster and the Supreme Court, imposed on Quebec the shredding of the Confederation Pact. They acted to amend the constitution of a democratic country in order to reduce the powers of one of its two signing peoples, one of its two founding peoples, so that, in spite of its repudiation, in spite of its protestations, Quebec had to accept a constitution which still governs it today, eight years later, even though it did not sign it.

This democratic Parliament—for it is substantially and essentially democratic, I do recognize that—this Parliament nevertheless voted for a constitution against the opposition of Quebec, despite a nearly unanimous vote in the Quebec legislature by more than just the Pequists and Separatists, as they are often called here. The Parliament in Quebec, the rightfully-elected Quebec institution, all that exists in Quebec, had to accept a Constitution from which we, Quebecers, are excluded, although it governs us legally, although it is not politically legitimate, because we all know that a constitution is more than a piece of paper, Mr. Speaker, it is more than a legislation. A constitution embodies the values that bind us together. You could give your life for it, if necessary, and defend it with your own blood. A constitution is the soul of a people, because we are one country. But, this constitution, Mr. Speaker, does not speak for us, it is not our soul. This constitution was, in a very unacceptable way, pushed down our throat.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker, we did try for many years, in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990, to sign it. We, who come from the Province of Quebec, had decided to make one more show of confidence in Canada by signing the Constitution, even if it was a sign of disgrace for us. We were ready to accept the strict minimum, that is the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. It did not even change anything concerning powers. Everyone knew that it would not alter the balance of power.

But, they said no to us. That means that not only did they push an injustice upon us, an unspeakable injustice, which will stay forever in the Canadian history, as long as they will not come back and admit it, which they do not want to do, even today, at the risk of losing Quebec. Furthermore, they even refuse to make amends for that injustice, Mr. Speaker.

So, no one can tell us that sovereignty is a negative move to destroy this beautiful country. This country is on a self-destruct course, Mr. Speaker, if it has not already destroyed itself through its intolerance, its refusal to accept reality. We have a political problem, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that the Meech refusal was inspired by malicious intent.

[English]

I do not believe Canadians were motivated by malevolence against Quebec when Meech was refused. I think English Canadians think they have a country, Canada. They love their country. It is the country of their heart and they have a right to behave like this. I understand them very well. Their sons, their fathers, their grandfathers shed blood for it and they stand ready to do it any time.

That is why when you ask them to change their country on something which is perceived as being substantial they will say no because this is their country. I do understand that.

But you must admit the reciprocal reality because Quebec is not recognized in this country. This is your country, the federal institutions, the whole way of governing the country. It might be legitimate for you but it is not for us. There are two visions of the country, two loyalties, as respectable in one case as in the other. It means we have to put forward a political solution.

There is a requirement for political maturity now and a need to admit that Quebec has a right to have its own country. English Canadians have a right to have their country, and we also have the same right.

Some things are really very mature but are difficult to do now because we must start from reality. But what are you doing now? You are attempting to ultimately solve the problem but like ostriches you refuse to see reality, which is the main aspect of the problem.

What I hear is the Canada round. This will be the Canada round. When was the last Quebec round? When was it? The last Quebec round was in 1867 when Macdonald and Cartier sat down and struck a compromise and decided to build a country. More than 100 years after that one of the parties tore up the pact.

I think that this is a failure. This committee will be a failure like the Spicer committee, like the Beaudoin-Edwards committee. Why? Because some people do not have the courage to admit the fact that we have to examine two realities. That is why I believe that some change should be made. I am making an honest proposal because we sovereignists know perfectly well that the decision will be made in Quebec next year. In the meantime if something rational, responsible and realistic is to be done here, it should be first to accept our proposal to serve on the committee. We do not like to be on the committee. We are not here for that. It would be, as we stated in the letter, a way to allow English Canada to do more about the motivations of Quebec and to know what is going on in Quebec and why. So it would be a service to reality and to democracy.

Second, I really think it would be a question of responsibility and realism to look into what will happen when Quebec makes its decision. It would be wishful thinking to hope that Quebec will not make the decision.

Right now the National Assembly is debating a bill to oblige the government to set up a referendum on sovereignty by next October, 1992 at the latest. Then the government of Quebec will be obliged to put the question to Quebecers. We think their answer will be yes, we stand for sovereignty.

What happens to Canada if the answer is yes? It will not be a nice cosmetic report from a committee where sovereignty will have been hidden, taken away, that will make English Canada ready for this. English Canada must prepare itself for what will happen next year when Quebecers will take responsibility because they will have to take responsibility. That is why the second modification to the proposal should be to enlarge the mandate of the committee and allow the members of the committee to look into what should be the behaviour of Canada when Quebec becomes sovereign.

There will be huge decisions to make then. What kind of economic arrangements can be struck? What kinds of arrangements will have to be made relating to, for example, the monetary system, the debt, the partition of the assets, everything? Those are monumental questions to address. Even in Quebec we are doing that. Not only because we are trying to know what will happen when we become sovereign, but we have also set up a committee in the National Assembly to look into the next offers that will come from the federal government. Do not forget that those offers will not be studied by the committee if they do not immediately bind, as now, the federal government and the provinces.

Let us be frank, let us be courageous, let us be realistic. This country was not built on wishful thinking; it was built by people who looked at hard reality. We are not doing that. We are hearing speeches from cosmetic orators, people who, like the minister, cannot even answer a question on the substance of the motion and on the heart of the crisis; people who stand up and only throw insults at us and play games. It is time for the truth and we are calling for the truth now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comments of the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean. I refrained from saying anything while he was speaking, because I felt he deserved some respect. I must add, Mr. Speaker, that the independant members of the Bloc québécois have never shown me any of the respect that I have always shown them in the House. Most members here, even those of the government, have often been harassed by the members of the Bloc. I have even heard the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer call one of the ministers a "whore" this afternoon.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order!

Mr. Edmonston: I find that uncceptable. The hon. member knows that he said it. I heard him. I did not rise on a point of order right away, but that is often what happens—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Chambly to withdraw what he said because I never said that, as I live and breathe, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member for Chambly heard anything like that, it was probably in his own mind.

• (1610)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sure the hon. member for Chambly will withdraw, if that is the case.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I have too much respect for the Chair to refuse to withdraw what I said. But, Mr. Speaker, I know what I heard.

To continue my comments—

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Chambly who claims to be an honourable man will withdraw what he said. I was in the House throughout Question Period, and I swear on my honour that the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer did not say those words, and I am prepared to swear by that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I did not come to the House to argue with the people sitting behind me. My point was that I heard and that I know what I heard. But if the other people involved heard nothing, I will take their word for it.

In concluding, I would like to say—

Mr. Gérin: No, that isn't right. Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, they are trying to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, a member in this House made an accusation. The hon. member for Chambly just made an accusation he cannot maintain. We can't let the hon. member off the hook just like that. The hon. member accused the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer of saying something that was not said. We can't let matters go like that. Mr. Speaker, the Chair has certain duties and obligations. Tell the hon. member for Chambly to withdraw or leave. He has no business being here if he can't act like a gentleman.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I believe the hon. member for Chambly withdrew what he said to the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer. If the hon. member for Chambly has anything to add, I wish he would proceed so that we can get back to questions and comments.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, it seems my point was well taken, which was that we have a certain amount of decorum here in the House, and that we should treat people with a certain amount of respect. That was my point. To continue my comments, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that every time someone wants to criticize—

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will recognize the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer once more on a point of order, but I would like to get this over with as soon as possible so we can get back to the subject of this debate.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will deal with the matter, but I do not appreciate what the hon. member for Chambly said about me. As I said earlier, as I live and breathe, I never said those words, and I want the hon. member for Chambly to apologize to the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer or else leave the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We can always check Hansard, but to my knowledge, the hon. member for Chambly withdrew the words that might have been attributed to the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer. Subject to checking the blues, I think this aspect was dealt with satisfactorily. Now I do not believe the hon. member for Chambly referred to any members by name.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, to continue my comments, I was very intrigued when the hon. member for Lac Saint-Jean said: we are all sovereigntists in the Bloc québécois. I would like to ask him whether that includes the hon. member for Shefford, who still has his Liberal Party membership card? In fact, I wonder whether it is a card for the provincial Liberal Party, issued Saturday night when the provincial Liberal Party was all indépendantistes and sovereigntists, or a card for the federal Liberal Party.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Chambly on a point of order, I would remind him that questions and comments must always be directed to the previous speaker who was the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean in this case.

For that matter, I could not give the floor to the hon. member for Shefford in response to the hon. member for Chambly's question. I would like him to conclude since other members have asked to be recognized.

The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chambly would certainly agree that it is not the time now to throw a boomerang to try to know what are beliefs of and what party we belong to. Mr. Speaker, I, personally, am a member of the Quebec Liberal Party and I am proud of it. I am not like the hon. member for Chambly who claims to be "sovereignist" in his riding and federalist within the NDP. That is the difference between—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! The time allocated to the hon. member is now terminated and I would like to recognize another member who has already asked the floor for a comment unless the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean wants to answer if the hon. member for Chambly did actually ask him a question.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer to his question since he did put a question to me.

Mr. Lapierre: Or to his comment. Go ahead then!

Mr. Edmonston: Point of order, Mr. Speaker!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I would be much grateful to the hon. for Chambly if he would co-operate. The time provided for comments and questions periods is ten minutes. Now, seven and half minutes have been used already and some other hon. members would like to speak. I would like very much to recognize the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): But you did recognize me so that I could answer!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, but very briefly.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Chambly did not understand what the Bloc Québécois is all about.

The Bloc Québécois, Mr. Speaker, reunite every sovereignist of every political stripe in the province of Quebec. I can tell you that in Sorel, during the last week end, there were many New Democrates who have had enough of your party, of its hypocrisy and its double talk.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis for a question or comment.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I note with much regret and sadness that we have brought this debate down to very low standards. Personnally, I consider that debate to be an important debate since the future of my country is at stake. I, for one, do believe passionately that I can remain Marcel Prud'homme for ever within this country called Canada where I can evolve, breathe and be myself.

The only thing I would like to say to this House and in the presence of the responsibile minister, is that I regret that that member would not remain silent! The reason for that is quite simple because on some other occasions or during other debates, Heaven knows we can always indulge in that sort of exchange, but not when we are talking of the future or the possible desintegration of this country.

As I said, I am very concerned by the tone of this debate and I must say that the hon. member, who is a friend, did not help much to raise the level of the discussion. I listened carefully to the comments of the member of the new party—I do not mean the New Democratic Party because they just do not know where they are going—but the member from the Bloc Québécois and he got me thinking. I would have hoped that we all had the decency to listen to what he had to say.

I was in agreement with him when he said that we must return to the spirit of the Cartier-Macdonald era. That is why I am a Canadian, that I am not a member of the Bloc Québécois and that I seem so passionate now and I will conclude by saying that I shall be so in the presence of the responsible minister during the months to come.

But I must recognize that there were some food for thought in the hon. member's speech.

[English]

I would hope that people in English Canada will read his speech calmly, attentively and see if it is not worth saving this country by returning to what we call the spirit of Cartier and Macdonald.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I recognize the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean for a very short answer.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. I most sorry also that I could not get an answer from the NPD representive to the comments I made. I had hoped I might get a reflection from him. But I firmly believe that he will go through such a reflection outside the House.

I would particulary like the government to conduct itself with realism, with a sense of responsibility and with openmindness since it is responsible for Canada and Quebec, which is still part of Canada.

As for us, within the Bloc Québécois, we want to talk to English Canada. We think that discussions are paramount to our mission. We insist that we must have political solutions to political problems.

• (1620)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings—Agriculture; the hon. member for Markham—Whitechurch—Stouffville—Pornography; the hon. member for Nepean—Employment; the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence—Immigration; the hon. member for Moncton—Highways.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this very important debate to establish a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to consult with Canadians and to develop proposals with respect to our Constitution, proposals which might be discussed with the provinces and, in particular, with the province of Quebec.

The question might be asked: why is this necessary and how did we get here? I will summarize very quickly. As many Canadians know, in 1981-82 we repatriated the Canadian Constitution with a new amending formula. Before that time, we did not have a proper amending formula in our Constitution. We also, in patriating the Constitution, established a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and introduced other measures in our Constitution which were not there before, measures such as a recognition of aboriginal rights, an entrenchment of the right to equalization and so on.

At that time there was a Parti Quebeçois government in power in Quebec. For one reason or another, and I guess in particular, because that government's option was not for Canada but rather for a separate, independent Quebec, it did not sign the constitutional agreement of 1982. As a result, Quebec politically was left out.

When Mr. Bourassa came to power a few years later he made a five point proposal to the federal government and to other provinces as a basis for Quebec signing the Constitution of 1867 plus 1982, the composite Constitution as it developed, and those five points were put under discussion.

As a result of that discussion, the federal government with the provinces developed the Meech Lake Accord which was a series of amendments to the Constitution of Canada which would have addressed the concerns of Quebec and in particular the five point program put forward by Premier Bourassa. It also addressed some other matters that Mr. Bourassa had not raised at all, but which came out of the discussions with the other provinces.

We all know what happened. About a year ago the composite set of proposals to amend the Constitution known as the Meech Lake Accord did not get the necessary support. Parts of it required seven out of 10 provinces agreeing. There was easily that acceptance of it, but I think three major parts required the unanimous consent of all the provinces. It ended up that two provinces did not agree, and so the Meech Lake Accord failed.

In the aftermath of that failure there was a great reaction in Quebec. Many Quebecers, in part due to false information and in part due to a lot of demagoguery on the part of certain journalists, certain politicians and so on, felt rejected by the rest of Canada. This was a false situation because it was forgotten, and I think unfortunately forgotten, that eight provinces supported the Meech Lake Accord and the federal Parliament supported the Meech Lake Accord. The majority in all parties in this House supported the Meech Lake Accord and the Senate supported the Meech Lake Accord. I say that despite its flaws.

Our own party had, on two occasions, proposed nine amendments to the Meech Lake Accord, but the government, which I think was wrong in doing so, was totally inflexible. It did not accept any amendments. However, despite the fact that the Meech Lake Accord was flawed, on balance it was supported by this House, it was supported by the Senate and supported by eight provinces of Canada. There was no rejection of Quebec by the other provinces, what is called in Quebec sometimes "English Canada". I refuse to accept that description of Canada outside of Quebec as English Canada because it is made up of many elements, including one million francophones but also people from all over the world including our aboriginal peoples.

The rest of Canada did not reject Quebec. That was the perception and there was a great reaction which led to the re-emergence or reinvigoration of the indépendantiste movement, the separation movement, or the sovereignty movement—whatever you want to call it—in Quebec. As a result, the Government of Quebec under Premier Bourassa set up the Bélanger-Campeau commission in conjunction with Mr. Parizeau, the leader of the Parti Québecois. This commission carried on its work for the greater part of the last year. The Quebec Liberal Party, the provincial party, also conducted its own study with the Allaire commission. As well, the federal government set up the Keith Spicer commission and the Beaudoin-Edwards committee of this House and the Senate. All were dealing with different aspects of the Constitution and how we might resolve the constitutional crisis that arose from the failure of the Meech Lake Accord and, going back still further, the fact that Quebec had not signed the Constitution of 1982.

The government has put forward this motion to further the work at the federal level and has suggested this committee. Our party agrees to it. We have suggested some changes to the mechanics and the membership of the committee, but in principle we agree with what the government is trying to do, that is to develop in consultation with Canadians all over the country, openly and in depth, constitutional proposals that will be satisfactory not only to Quebec but to all Canadians.

I am an optimist. I was born in Montreal. I have lived in Montreal for the greater part of my life. I have also lived in Ontario and New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but I am a fifth generation Quebecer. I talk to my friends and acquaintances, the people I have worked with in law firms in Quebec—at one time I was the only anglophone in a law firm of 45 Montrealers. I have played hockey in Quebec on teams where the great majority were French Canadians, who were francophones. I still am in touch with these people. It is my deep-rooted feeling that we in all parts of this country have much more in common than what divides us, much more in common.

We share great values together. We share the land. We share the beauty and resources of this country. Consequently, what we are searching for is a constitutional formula which will represent the commonality of views and values and so on.

I think it is possible. If there was great division among the individuals and peoples of this country that outweighed the things that we have in common then I would say it is a hopeless task. However, deep down I know that I as an anglophone Quebecer have much more in common with my francophone colleagues in Quebec than I have with any American, than I have with people even within this country, from British Columbia and from Alberta. If we cannot find a legal constitutional formula which will represent this commonality of views, the spirit that Canadians share together, then what hope is there for the world?

That is why statesmen around the world are speaking out in amazement that we would even think for a minute of splitting up this great and wonderful country. They see Yves Fortier at the United Nations. They see Claude Jodoin, one of the greatest labour leaders that this country has ever produced. We have had three prime ministers from Quebec, we have produced outstanding people at the national level.

I am not talking about at the Quebec level. Of course, at the Quebec level it is evident that francophone Quebecers would rise to the top. However at the national level francophones have risen to the top in all facets of life: in the theatre, in dance, in music, in politics, in labour, in the academic world and so on.

I am an optimist. There is much more in common between us than that which divides us. What we have to do and what we hope to do in this committee is determine how to translate the commonality of interest into a constitutional formula.

My interest in these matters goes back a long way. I was a member of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1970-71. That was the committee chaired by Senator Molgat and Mark MacGuigan of this House. By the way, that joint committee sat for more than a year, and many of the recommendations in the report are still very worthwhile.

We travelled all over the country and heard people in much the same way as the government is recommending that this new committee do. Times were different then, but this was in the beginning years of the separatist movement in Quebec. There were other constitutional pressures from the west and the east at the time.

Again, I sat with the joint committee in 1980–81, the Joyal–Hayes committee, which studied the proposals to repatriate the Constitution and set up a charter of rights and freedoms.

I also had the good fortune to be a full member of the special committee on Indian self–government in 1981–82 which travelled this country for more than a year, meeting with aboriginal peoples. It finally recommended that we come out in favour of aboriginal self–government in this country.

The message that I want to give to the minister and to the members of the House of Commons is that in discussing these proposals, we cannot forget the minorities in this country. Some have said that this country is made up of minorities, that there really is not any majority.

That may be so. However, sometimes when the leaders of provinces get together, they represent the majority view of those provinces and too often have forgotten the minorities.

When I first came to this Parliament, we spoke of the two founding nations. At the time that might have made some sense. As we began to discuss these things with the Indian people in Canada, the Inuit and the Metis, we soon learned how ridiculous it was to consider the English and the French as the two founding nations when thousands of years before them were the first nations, the Assembly of First Nations as they call themselves now.

These people, the Cree, the Micmac, the Ojibway, the Montagnais and so on were here for thousands of years. They have been forgotten in the constitutional discussions. Of course, except for the Northwest Territories and to a certain extent in the Yukon, they do not form the majority in any political unit in this country. Consequently, they cannot bring their political views to light or put pressure on others because they do not have the political structures to do so. Approximately 1 million aboriginal people are spread throughout this country.

We have to find a way. I was pleased that the minister and our leader are committed to finding a way of involving those people in the constitutional discussion. If we do not do that, we will never have a Constitution which will serve all Canadian people in a just and lasting way.

I can recall very well last summer when I was in Geneva for a disarmament conference at the time the Oka crisis broke out. Canada was on the front pages of the European newspapers, but not in a very positive way. The headlines said that Canada was oppressing its aboriginal peoples, its native people.

In too many cases the news was oversimplified. It did not totally explain the situation. However, the message, which deep down is correct, was that we have forgotten, we have ignored and we have not treated our aboriginal people properly. This is an opportunity to do that.

With respect to our two official languages, it is recognized that Canada is made up of many peoples. Our leader has proposed that in a new Constitution the preamble should recognize the peoples who have come together to build this country, including the English, the French and the aboriginal people—I am not listing them in any priority—and the millions of people who have come from all over the world and now make up more than one–third of our population. They have come from Europe, Asia, Latin America, Africa and form a great and positive force in this country. We have to recognize them all.

We have a policy of multiculturalism in this country so that we can take the best of all those cultures. We are not a melting pot. We do not want to forget the greatness that comes out of those nations when these people come to this country. We want to keep the best of their cultures and make it part of our own.

We have two official languages and I cannot understand those people who try to diminish the use of the two official languages, who attack them, who look on them as a burden. For me to have two official languages is an outstanding asset for a country and in particular to have as our two official languages English and French, which are among the two greatest languages in the world.

Not only are they widespread throughout the world, but they have great literature and culture associated with them, great theatre, great writings, great philosophers, and great political theorists. To have these two great languages as our official languages should be an asset. Canada, different from many other countries, can do business in French and English. We can do diplomacy in French and English. We write books in French and English. We produce theatre and television in French and English. We have great universities in French and English. We have great libraries in French and English.

The United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy only have one language. They can only do all those things to which I referred in one language. We have this great asset and advantage of two official languages and we should make the most of it. We should use the fact that we have two official languages to attract tourists, business, international associations of the United Nations or whatever. I can recall right after the Second World War that ICAO and IATA were attracted to Montreal because Montreal was a city with two official languages and many other cultures such as Italians, Greeks and so on. That was an attraction for international organizations to move there. Great international conventions would come to Canada because we can work in two languages. We can make it an asset. We can look at something positive.

There have been rumours that in order to get a constitutional agreement there could be suggestions that we cut back on our commitment to linguistic duality or to the two official languages. By the way the policy of bilingualism is not and has never been that all Canadians must speak the two official languages. The policy is that the government must be able to serve Canadians in their language, either English or French, where they are in sufficient numbers and that makes good sense. That does not hurt anybody. There has been some talk that we should move to the Swiss model. In Switzerland, where I lived and worked for a while, there are 22 cantons, the great majority of which are either German, Italian, or French-speaking, but there are only two cantons that I know of with two languages.

In Canada there are one million francophone Canadians living outside Quebec. As was already stated in the debate today, those million francophones are greater than the entire number of francophones living in Quebec at the time of Confederation in 1867. There are also—fewer today than there were a while ago, unfortunately— about 700,000 to 800,000 anglophones living in Quebec who have very deep roots in Quebec. They developed many parts of the Eastern Townships and, with the Inuit and the Indians, developed the north through the Hudson's Bay Company and the fur trade in the very far north of Quebec. They have very deep roots in Quebec.

To move to a situation where we would say that Quebec would be a French-speaking province—I will refine that in a minute—and all the other provinces would be English-speaking, I think is wrong. I have always recognized that the principal language of Quebec should be French and I have always recognized that Quebec should be a distinct society. It has been a distinct society since it was on this continent.

In the Constitution of 1867, Quebec was the only province that was to have civil law. All the others were to have common law. Quebec was the only province at that time that had the responsibility of two official languages under Article 133. Quebec was the only province with protected counties.

Since that time, other things have developed. Quebec has its own pension plan la Régie des rentes. The other provinces have the Canada Pension Plan. Quebec collects its own income taxes and the other provinces do not. Quebec and Ontario are the only two provinces that do not have the RCMP as their provincial police force.

My point is this: Quebec has had very distinct traits for over 100 years. We should recognize that and where it is essential, provide the powers that go with that distinctiveness. This does not mean that we would go as far as the Allaire commission report, but we could achieve a balance which would provide justice to Quebec and to the rest of Canada. That is what this committee strives to do.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member speak about Quebec in his speech and I get the distinct impression that he loves Quebec. Besides, a family as long-established in Quebec as his is truly a Quebec family.

We, Quebecers, know that French-speaking and English-speaking communities can easily live side by side. However, I find the hon. member a tad too optimistic. A man with his political experience should know that attempts have been made over the past 30 years to renew the Canadian Constitution which is a complete anachronism.

Since 1960, in Quebec, prime minister Duplessis, then Mr. Lesage, Johnson, Bourassa, Lévesque and Bourassa again have tried hard to renew it to no avail. I would like to ask him why have 30 years of constitutional discussions produced no agreement between Quebec and the rest of Canada?

I would also like him to tell me if he thinks that the government is truly committed to this final stage, before October 1992, when the people of Quebec will most likely decide upon sovereignty. What does the hon. member think of this then: a government who, the day before presenting this motion it claims to be important, encroaches upon the education system which has traditionally been the exclusive jurisdiction of Quebec—and I think that, in Quebec, francophones and anglophones alike agree that this is an area of provincial jurisdiction? The government comes here and tells us that he wants to invade this jurisdiction as well as that of manpower training and regional development.

Would the hon. member not say that the actual actions of this government are designed to dismantle this country and confirm Quebec and the people of Quebec in their resolve to gain sovereignty status?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, in response to the questions of the hon. member, I must say that I am pleased that we have people representing the points of view of the hon. member in this House, because it gives us a chance to debate all possible views. If we did not have members of the Bloc Québécois here, I do not think the debate would be as complete. I do not agree with them, but I think it is important that in a discussion such as this, we should have views from all sides. Therefore, I respect his question.

I admit that it is frustrating. He says it has been over 30 years and they have not been able to achieve the constitutional amendments they have sought. That is not entirely correct.

I have been in this House for 25 years. I was here when arrangements were made for Quebec to opt out and formulate its own pension plan la Régie des rentes, which I mentioned already. It is more or less the same, but is totally controlled by Quebec and not part of the Canada Pension Plan.

I was also here when the arrangements were made with Quebec with respect to immigration so that they could control to a much greater extent their immigration policy, who entered the province as immigrants, how they were treated when they arrived, the promotion of immigration and so on.

There have been some other major accomplishments with respect to negotiations, not all constitutional, but within the present Constitution to allow Quebec to develop its own policies and to do things its own way.

Nevertheless, it is frustrating to propose and get constitutional amendments. Let me remind the hon. member in the House that it took almost 50 years for us to get our own amending formula in 1981-82. It took over 100 years to get a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution. Some Canadians had been pressing for that for a long time.

I will refer to the United States. I say it took us a long time to get a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada entrenched in our Constitution, but the women of the United States have been trying to get an amendment to the American Constitution on equal rights for women for, I think, over 25 years. That amendment has been put forward time and time again and has never received the necessary support among the American states and in the American Congress. So yes, it is difficult to get constitutional amendments because constitutional amendments must go through procedures which are more difficult to get.

I think it is wrong to suggest that just because Quebec does not have all the constitutional amendments it has sought, it has not achieved much greater control of its own destiny. It has in fact become one of the outstanding francophone communities of the world, one of the great cultural centres of French-speaking life in the world.

With respect to education, I totally respect Quebec's jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of all provinces with respect to education. I am not sure what happened. I know that in the Speech from the Throne, the government proposed certain measures with respect to post-secondary education, and that is an area the federal government has been involved in for some time.

If they made those proposals without consulting Quebec, then they are to blame. But in the past, under the Lesage government, I believe under the Johnston government and other governments, there were agreements with Quebec with respect to post-secondary education. Quebec always maintained its total jurisdiction, but they accepted in certain ways assistance from the federal government to deal with inequalities, minority language education, minority language training and so on. Yes, we must respect the present jurisdiction of the province of Quebec and all the provinces.

Yes, to get an amendment to the Constitution is a frustrating thing, but if you persist and you have the proper political will, you will get it.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to have this opportunity today to speak on this motion to appoint a special joint committee to inquire into constitutional proposals for a renewed Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the special joint committee being proposed combines the more attractive features of a constituent assembly, with the accountability of our parliamentary system. Ultimately the Parliament of Canada will set the direction for our country and mould its future. Parliament represents the highest authority, the level within our political system where issues and problems are transformed into ideas and solutions. It is therefore highly appropriate that a parliamentary committee should be given the responsibility of taking the government's proposals for a renewed Canada to the people, and then returning with those proposals, reshaped, altered, modified and augmented for eventual disposition by this House.

This Parliament, this House of Commons, is the ultimate constituent assembly of Canada.

The committee will have the good wishes of all members for success, and I am sure the support of all sides of the House.

• (1650)

The task before the committee is a daunting one, but the reward is nothing less than a reunited, recreated and rejuvenated nation.

Canadians are eager to participate in this process and this committee will provide the mechanisms through which the hopes and aspirations of the people of Canada can be transformed into legislative reality and into the building blocks of Canada's future.

I am sure that all of us in this House believe we are the most fortunate people on the face of the earth. None of us would choose to live elsewhere. Unlike the crises that have gripped most other countries of the world, the current national debate in Canada is not over economics, not over religion, not over basic human rights. Rather, it is a debate over whether or not we choose to continue to live together, whether we have the capacity and the will to better understand one another's needs and concerns, whether we have the strength as a society to embrace and welcome those cultural, linguistic and other features that make us different as individuals and groups and yet, collectively, make us a far stronger, richer and more mature society.

As we all know, our country, Canada, is today going through one of the most critical development periods in its history. We have a vision of a rich and generous nation, one of great material wealth but more important, a country of very high human values based on the diversity of two official languages and many cultural origins, not the least of which are the aboriginal peoples which originally inhabited this land. It is a vision unparalleled throughout today's world, both in the richness of its potential and in the complexity of its application.

Unfortunately, however, for reasons which are obscure to most of us who live here and really beyond comprehension to people in the rest of the world who look upon Canada virtually as the promised land, our rich vision is clouded by preoccupation with the problems of attaining that vision. We have experienced confrontations about language, aboriginal rights, bigotry and racism, regional alienation, financial stability and, political responsibility.

Almost as we speak, in these very days there are forces gaining momentum that seek to destroy the vision of Canada that most of us hold so dear. Those forces must be confronted and turned aside, not with violence or hostility, but rather with knowledge, understanding, tolerance, the strength of reason and the will to see our vision survive.

Each one of us has the responsibility to think through our own vision of Canada and to help identify with the cause of the nation as a whole.

For me, one expression which I can leave with you to describe my feelings as a Canadian is the sense of real freedom which is to be found in this country: freedom to exist and live in a land so vast, with lots of room for everyone; freedom to grow and develop in a society that is open and generous and tolerant; freedom to participate in a democracy that is just and accessible; and freedom to dream in a potential which is overflowing with opportunity.

Those are the feelings I get when I think about the unique privilege of being a Canadian. They represent a state of mind not easily attainable in most other parts of the world today where landscapes are becoming more limited, population densities more burdensome, societies more volatile, democracy more fragile and dreams more distant.

It is critical in my view that in any vision of Canada we must always be mindful of that special reality of individual freedom which it offers for each one of us. That is a value above all others and should be the foundation for any vision of nationhood.

Economic arguments may be important, but they will not carry the day. Understanding, sensitivity and an abiding desire to build our nation together are the forces that will shape our future.

Perhaps first and foremost we have to learn to listen better. We want to encourage an outburst of public interest, even fervour. Canadians are not given to flag-waving and public displays of patriotism, unfortunately. But most of us feel a deep love and affection for our country.

This special parliamentary committee will provide the focus for these feelings. This parliamentary committee will talk about Canadian citizenship, and I would like to repeat some words I said to this House a few weeks ago. There are few words used throughout the world which convey the vision of freedom and democracy more clearly than these words, "Canadian citizenship". It is often said, for example, that a Canadian passport is the most prized document in the international community. Yet among Canadians here at home there frequently seems an apathy about the values of our own citizenship, almost as though we have lost the meaning of our country, our sense of pride in it and our spirit of patriotism for it.

Surely this is a state of mind that we must revitalize for ourselves and for future generations of Canadians. Surely the common denominator of Canadian citizenship must be reinforced as the mantle under which the rich potential of our bilingual and multicultural heritage can be attained and fulfilled. That is a current challenge for each of us, more important now than ever before.

There will be no winners if we cannot resolve the serious differences that exist in Canada today. Our very independence would be placed in doubt and certainly, at best, our capacity for independent action would be greatly diminished. Nobody, except perhaps for a few impractical dreamers, wants a fractured Canada. But other nations have drifted in just that sort of a situation through indifference and lack of will to act courageously and intelligently when the time was right.

The situation is serious right now, but we have much in our favour. Most importantly, we are a civil people, used to coming to decisions after agonizing debate, soul searching, praying, cajoling and yes, even compromising. We have done this for nearly 125 years and I am convinced we have the capacity to do it, if necessary, for another 125 years. Our children and grandchildren have the right to expect us to make our very best effort, to put aside selfish, partisan interests and to work toward solutions that are acceptable to all parts of the country.

There will be only losers. All Canadians will be losers if we do not succeed in bringing forward a workable solution to the current impasse. We must redouble our efforts because our reputation as a stable and reliable nation is already suffering. This is costing all of us, every single one of us.

Some sincere, concerned Canadians have argued strongly for the convening of a constituent assembly. The government has not ruled out such a course, but adding another layer of legislative, consultative activity to our already complex system is hardly a sure cure for our ills. It would be no quick fix. Ultimately it will still be in Parliament where we will have to make the final decisions, no matter what course is chosen. We will achieve nothing by abdicating our responsibilities to another body, especially when the groundwork has not been prepared. We would only delay the process, and this is a case where delay will not solve the problems. Delay will only make matters worse because those who would destroy our country are not marking time, they have momentum and their goals are to achieve separation before the rest of us can even catch up.

Whatever means are chosen to get us to our objective of a united, strong Canada, those means must have the full support and participation of all players. We do not go into a game like this with only part of a team; we must go in to win. I am convinced that this parliamentary committee that is proposed will have the resources, the substance and the power to bring about a consensus within Canada that will eventually lead to the unity of this country.

In the absence of time, I am going to cut my remarks short. I would like to propose a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry:

That the amendment of the member of Papineau—Saint-Michel be amended by deleting all of the words after the words "House of Commons".

CANADA REFERENDUM AND PLEBISCITE ACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence) moved that Bill C-201, an act respecting referendums and plebiscites in Canada on questions of public importance, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the Canada referendums and plebiscites bill by first saying a few words about its purpose. Second, I will make some comments about the sources of this bill and third, I will touch on the legislative process which lies ahead of us. I will conclude by making some general observations about the whole process of referendums and plebiscites in our country.

As to the purpose of Bill C-201, the Canada Referendums and Plebiscites Act, it is quite simply, to provide Canada, at our national level, with the enabling legislation under which direct voting could take place at such time as Parliament would see fit to submit questions to the people.

It is a fact that seven of our provinces have such enabling legislation on their books. In the case of Prince Edward Island, it is a very simple statute of five or six sections. In the case of Quebec, it is an extraordinarily comprehensive statute. It is time for us, in the national Parliament of our country, to likewise have available at such times as it may suit the nation's purposes and the wishes of the Parliament and the people of our country to have direct consultation on an issue and have the legislation in place for that.

There has been, of course, a lot of discussion in the country lately by many people as to whether we should have referendums or not. It goes back and forth. Sometimes it strikes me like the debate that might be going on among a number of teenagers about who should get a driver's licence. Nobody has ever checked to see if in fact there was a vehicle to take for a ride in the event that there was a licence to drive the car.

This legislation is the vehicle under which direct votes could take place and it would be a very fine thing for our country to have it ready and available when the need arises.

It is parallel to the situation with the Canada Elections Act which is the enabling legislation under which votes take place when there are elections to Parliament.

The purpose of this legislation is to set out all of the rules and procedures: who votes; how the voters' lists are prepared; how the questions are decided upon and the vote by both Houses of Parliament to approve them; the formation of two umbrella committees, one for the "yes" side and one for the "no" side; rules governing the raising and spending of money; rules dealing with broadcasting, advertising and campaigning. These are all of the procedures that, in the late 20th century, Canadians have to come to expect in order to have fair and free electoral processes.

The bill is, as I say, comprehensive. It was first tabled back in July 1988 and I have resubmitted it on four occasions since. The Clerk, at that time, said that it was the largest private member's bill ever tabled in the House of Commons. Today is the first opportunity for the Canadian House of Commons to actually consider this legislation. I do not take particular pride in the fact that it is so big, but it is comprehensive in the same way that the Canada Elections Act is comprehensive. It deals in detail with all of the procedures that are the thicket of laws that guarantee freedom of the process, fairness of the process and finality of the outcome, because the results are achieved through prescribed and knowable procedures in advance.

With that in mind, I would like to say a few words about the sources from which this bill has been drawn. In the past, other members of Parliament have proposed that there should be plebiscites or referendums. Mostly it was in the form of a resolution or a motion to let the wording of the Canada Elections Act apply mutatis mutandis, great lawyer's words meaning, as far as and as possible and to the extent applicable.

It would be a very unfair thing for the Parliament of Canada to place the responsibility on the Chief Electoral Officer and all of his staff to decide in the heat of a national referendum or plebiscite campaign just how some of those rules from the Canada Elections Act ought to apply in the case of a direct vote. That is why, again, I think this step is very important for Parliament to proceed with.

As far as the sources on which this bill has been drawn, Mr. Speaker, one would be the bill the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Lalonde, under the Trudeau administration, tabled before the House of Commons when they decided to introduce such a bill allowing referendums and plebiscites to be held in Canada. The Lalonde bill was the result of a commendable effort on the part of the government of the day and all the lawyers in the Department of Justice to produce an excellent legislation. So, that is the first source.

The second one is the Quebec Referendum Act. This excellent piece of legislation contains provisions concerning both committees: the "yes" side and the "no" side. It also states that, at the time of passing the motion on referendums in the House, the Quebec National Assembly can decide what the exact wording of the question will be, vote a specific amount of money to both sides, the same for both the "yes" side and the "no" side. The same ideas are incorporated in this bill. By the way, it is interesting to note that the Quebec Referendum Act is in fact based on the British act respecting plebiscites on the issue of joining the European Common Market. So, this is the second source: the Quebec Referendum Act, an excellent act indeed.

The third source is the bill introduced by this government during the last Parliament, Bill C-79, including all the necessary amendments to the electoral process pursuant to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and other amendments based on the annual recommendations of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada. That is the third source. These provisions are included in the proposed bill.

I have also drawn on other information. For instance, the Direct Legislation Act of Saskatchewan, earlier in this century, contained provisions regarding advertising brochures. That is covered in this bill, but updated, with another provision regarding videos to allow both sides, the "yes" side and the "no" side, to put forward their arguments, ideas, philosophies, policies on both sides of the issue. I have also added a few ideas based on discussions I had with members of Parliament. As far as the legislative process is concerned, I have no doubt that a legislative process does exist. That is why I would like to see this bill referred to a legislative committee of this House, where it could be reviewed carefully and amended as it might seem fit. For instance, based on the recommendations of the Beaudoin-Edwards Joint Committee, it is entirely possible that ideas regarding referendums come out of the Constitution's amending process. If that is possible, it will also be possible for a legislative committee to make amendments and I see absolutely no objection to that.

With regard to referendums on a constitutional amendment, changes must be made to this bill. Although at the present time the constitutional formula requires the support of seven provinces with over 50 percent of the total population, amendments will be necessary but that can be done after the joint committee tables its recommendations.

That concludes my comments on the legislative process. So, I hope I can count on the support of members on both sides of this House so that there can be an exchange of ideas on the subject and recommendations can be made. All the better for Bill C-201.

[English]

I wish to make some general observations about the role of referendums and plebiscites in our country. I think it is important briefly to do this so that this bill is seen in some context apart from the context I have just described as the need to have enabling legislation.

The first point I would very much like to stress is that no one should see a referendum or a plebiscite as something which is threatening to our parliamentary institutions or rivalling the role of elected representatives.

I am an elected representative. I certainly am not trying to under cut the role that we as elected representatives have in the process, but it can be and it has in our history already been a process, the direct voting, which is complementary to the role of Parliament. It is supplementary to the role of Parliament. Particularly in this bill there is provision for continual close involvement of the Parliament of Canada.

I think there is a necessary safeguard there regarding concerns which have been expressed by many members of Parliament and by the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs enabling us to see, for example, the role of Parliament in voting to approve the wording of any question that would be submitted to the Canadian people, and also the role of parliamentarians setting up the oui committee, the "yes" committee and the "no" committee, the umbrella organizations.

This is not separate from Parliament. This is not antithetical to Parliament, but it is complementary and can be seen in a positive way, especially in light of our history with our two previous national plebiscites, over 60 plebiscites or referendums at the provincial level, and some several thousand plebiscites on municipal questions at the local ballot boxes which are certainly part of our democratic infrastructure in Canada. Some 94 or 96 separate statutes across our country at the provincial level accord the right to vote to citizens on specific questions.

The second point of a general nature regarding plebiscites has to do with their educational role. After the last election there was a lot of debate as to whether that election had been a plebiscite or a referendum on the free trade issue. In 1911 there was a lot of discussion as to whether that election had been a referendum on reciprocity with the United States, or in Quebec a referendum on the naval bill.

The fact is that when you are into a general election, a lot of issues are mixed together, as are the personalities of all the candidates and the party leaders. It is not really possible in our election system to have the narrow, specific focus for an intense period of four or six or eight weeks of a plebiscite campaign on a specific question. This is a great opportunity for Canadians to become educated as they hear the pros and the cons of the question before the country, and they have the personal interest of becoming informed because they know that next Monday that man and that woman have to go and mark a ballot with an X beside "yes" or "no". That is something which leads all of us into a positive educational process which I think can be very important for this country.

A third point, and somewhat related to that, is that the campaign period can be a time of self definition for individuals and for all of us as Canadians. For example, three years ago in Prince Edward Island, Premier Ghiz submitted to the people of that Island a question about a fixed-link crossing. Although there had been debate and in five elections people had been promised some kind of tunnel or bridge, this was the first time in the history of P.E.I. that the men and women, the citizens, had the opportunity to debate among themselves whether it was good, whether it would help the economy, but it would hinder the island psychology, and so on. They sorted it out, just as in Quebec 10 years ago when Quebecers had to sort out and self define auto-définition who they were and what it could mean to be a Quebecer or a Canadian or the two together. In the Northwest Territories the people went through the same thing in deciding how to vote in their plebiscite to divide the territories.

This is very important. In our country too often people are permitted to stay passive spectators. I see this as a positive opportunity for Canadians to become active participants and in the process define more robustly who we really are as Canadians.

Another point has to do with the opportunity that a plebiscite campaign provides for ventilation of feelings within the Canadian public. Why wait three or four or five years between general elections to say to Canadians that is the only time that they are going to have to come out and really get involved in issues? I think anyone here in this House of Commons knows the current mood across our country. I think it is highly appropriate from time to time—not on every question, certainly not, but on those issues of transcending national importance—to put the question to people so that they can all become involved in this and get out of themselves and express publicly their feelings on the issue. Ventilation on some of these issues is a very important part of Canada's nature as a democracy.

A further point is that I think the participation of people is fundamental because Canada has a parliamentary system which is based ultimately on the consent of the governed and not the coercion of those people. For there to be consent on the way the grand lines of our public policy are proceeding, the greater the participation and the more robust our democracy, the more authentic that the participation and consent will be.

Finally, I want to say I do not think that holding referendums and plebiscites is a magic solution without risk. It certainly has to be exercised with wisdom and care and statecraft, but it is a part of what is possible for our country as a democracy. The history of our country shows that on balance, the uses of direct voting have been positive and constructive.

If members in the House can consider and support this bill we will serve our country well by providing the enabling legislation, so that when it is appropriate and when there are issues on which Canadians from coast to coast to coast must be consulted directly, we will not have an eleventh-hour flap about how it should be done. The rules will be there and we can simply invoke them in a calm and deliberate fashion, involving all Canadians in the future of our country.

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: I wish to call your attention to Standing Order 29(3), Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Indeed, we do not have a quorum. Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There being a quorum, the debate shall continue. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I deplore this inane interruption.

Mr. Gérin: Order, Mr. Speaker!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just said he deplored this inane interruption.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Gérin: It is not inane to ask that 20 members out 295 be in the House, so that we can have a quorum. Not a single minister was here. There were only four Conservative members at the very most. If they are not interested in the proceedings of the House, well, that is not inane.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead has asked that a specific Standing Order be enforced and the Chair had no other choice but to comply. I would ask the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to describe the situation in more parliamentary terms.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, since I was not referring directly to the hon. member, I think what I said was correct.

Anyway, I would like to say a few words about Bill C-201, which was introduced by the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I would like to commend him for his efforts. I know he worked hard to prepare this bill over 200 pages long. The bill is very significant for all Canadians, and specially for those who look to referendums as a means of passing bills in this country.

The hon. members took a lot of clauses out of the elections act, and I see that he has made a lot of changes to bring them up to date, and that is a good thing.

[English]

I want to say, however, that I have grave reservations about the whole idea of referenda in general. I set these comments aside from his bill. I feel that in a parliamentary democracy a referendum must be a very rare occurrence indeed. I do not believe that it is something that should be resorted to lightly or on a frequent basis. I believe that the electoral system we have in this country, with the system of representation that we enjoy, generally ensures that Canadians are well represented through their elected representatives in Parliament and in provincial legislatures.

I recognize, as I know the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore does, that in the last few years there appears to have been some breakdown in Canadians' views about their elected representatives. I realize that there is a sense of unease, a sense perhaps of lack of representation of divergent views in this place. I regret that that is so. I think it is in part because there is a perception that the government is not responsive to the views of Canadians. I agree that in some cases that is so. In others, I think the government can be responsive and occasionally is.

I have plenty of occasions to criticize the government and I am trying to avoid any of that in this particular debate, but I think that is part of the lack of confidence that Canadians feel in their system because, as I have said, they feel the government is unresponsive.

Certainly as a member of the opposition I would prefer that the government pay closer heed to our comments on bills in this House. On minor matters I feel that as a member I get quite good co-operation, by and large, from the government on matters relating to my constituents. However, on major issues and bills I feel that perhaps the views of the opposition warrant further consideration.

Certainly the arguments about referenda fit into this because the argument of those who believe that Parliament is not representative is that that lack of representation can be cured by running to the people with bills or with questions that can then be decided there. While occasionally resort must be had to such an unusual remedy, I suggest that the usual practice must always be that the elected representatives in Parliament make the decisions respecting the introduction and dealing with bills, that the legislation of the country is passed and adopted here in this House and in the other place in the normal legislative process, and that opportunities for public involvement in the legislative process be expanded, be looked at, rather than use the referendum as a means of deciding issues.

The difficulty with referenda that we have seen in recent years—and I think we can look at the recent Quebec examples—is the emotion that can be developed in a campaign so that rational discussion, rational thought and rational behaviour become more difficult. When it is practised on a nation-wide basis, it becomes increasingly difficult to control the running of emotions, the involvement of mass enthusiasm and perhaps discord and disillusionment with the system when people's aspirations or hopes are built up in the course of a campaign.

I see that as a peril and one that if it were to be used frequently would cause grave disorder in our country. I do not think it is particularly helpful as a means of resolving disputes because people simply do not sit around in referenda, if they are being held constantly, and vote rationally and discuss everything on a rational, plain and simple level. It becomes more involved and convoluted than that in most cases.

Nevertheless, I think that the bill the hon. member has introduced represents a very good effort at providing for a means of conducting referenda quickly and efficiently in Canada. It is a start. I would be glad—and I know our party would be glad—to have this matter go to a committee where it could receive further study. We could review each of the provisions and the clauses, possibly improve it in places, look for ways that it could be fixed and possibly improved further. We might not find many. We might be well satisfied on clause by clause study in committee.

I am prepared to say that we support the principle of the bill, subject to the reservations I have about the referendum generally. Of course I hope to have an opportunity later this day to discuss the possibility of a constitutional referendum in connection with the motion that we will be discussing in Government Orders later dealing with the establishment of the special joint committee to study the Constitution. Our party's position, as hon. members will have heard, is that we support a referendum on the findings of that committee. That is the position that we support. I am delighted to support it myself, and I hope to have something to say about it later.

However, in terms of this bill we support the effort. We commend the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for his efforts. We are quite prepared to support the bill at second reading and send it to committee.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise in debate this afternoon on this private member's bill, Bill C-201, presented by the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

I also want to add my congratulations to the member. I know the amount of work that it takes for a member, perhaps with some advice from other places, to put together a private member's bill. In any case, the member certainly gets some credit for putting together a pretty thick document. As you know, it is over 200 pages and has entailed a certain amount of work. I think it is clearly an indication to the House of just how much concern this member has about this bill, a bill dealing with referenda and plebiscites. I congratulate the member for his initiative in this regard.

To that effect, we would certainly be pleased to support referral of the bill to a committee for review. In the general context, if I could just make a few comments about plebiscites and referenda, I do not think members of Parliament or parliamentarians should necessarily be afraid of referenda and plebiscites, but I think there is room for caution. I think the member who is presenting the bill mentioned that when he opened debate this afternoon.

At times having a referendum or a plebiscite can be seen in one regard as a way of letting us off the hook. That means then that members of Parliament or other parliamentarians in other legislative bodies really are not required then to make a decision, and it makes it easier for us. The position I would endorse, and which I think we should take a broader look at in committee with this bill, is to give people an opportunity through referenda or plebiscites to really have some citizens' democracy and make some decisions on major and significant issues in the country.

I think that is particularly important in regard to constitutional matters. Not to restrict it, but I think especially in constitutional matters there is room for us to consider that.

I would not be honest with myself or the House if I did not list what I think are a couple of cautions we have to watch for. While I am not an historian I can think of two recent examples where if the government of the day had the use of a referenda or a plebiscite. I refer to the events in the fall of 1970 in Quebec when, if the government of the day had used a referendum or a plebiscite to further its goals, the Government of Canada would have crushed Quebec. It is clear that the reaction of the government of the day was an over-reaction. As hideous as the events being dealt with were, clearly history has shown it was an over-reaction. I think we would regret in years to come that we would have all rushed to make a decision like that.

To some it is a cautionary note. However, for the people who were opponents of Meech Lake it would be fair to say that at the time when the Prime Minister and the premiers, while I am critical of the process, reached the decision on Meech Lake I suspect if a referendum had been put it likely would have passed. For some that would be turning their argument upside down. In some cases people who opposed Meech Lake endorse the idea of a referendum on the very idea that they were opposed to, and it would have likely, in my opinion, passed.

I will wrap up with the cautionary note. I think of the example in my province of British Columbia, and the member mentioned provincial legislatures having this power. We just had a flirting experience with this concept as the former premier was going to try to use referenda which would have been very divisive to settle land claims in British Columbia. I think he was flirting with a very dangerous situation there. He did back off because he realized what he was getting into.

Obviously if we collectively in our country or in a province make a decision, right or wrong, we then have to live with its consequences. Perhaps at a later date we would find out that we erred. Let us hope not, if that were the case. However, certainly the member has brought forward a concept that is absolutely worthy of study. That is why we can support it being referred to committee.

I would hope there is nobody who would not be prepared to debate the merits or demerits of referenda and plebiscites. That is clearly what the member is attempting to do with this bill. I for one would be pleased to participate in some of that debate and to use his bill as a way to discuss this matter in my riding.

I again congratulate the hon. member on the great deal of work that he has obviously done on this bill. I hope for all of us that it can be a learning experience so that we can all become better in governing our country and give all Canadians that opportunity.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in support of the bill that has been put forward by the hon. member for Etobicoke–Lakeshore. Bill C–201 is a very excellent bill dealing with referendums and plebiscites in Canada on questions of public importance. I stress that fact: questions of public importance.

I do not think I really have to tell you that the concept behind this bill of referendums and plebiscites is one which I believe, and I trust you believe as well, that the public of Canada is wholeheartedly behind. That is demonstrated by the participation in the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. The interim report of the Spicer commission, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, quite clearly points out that the majority of the people who participated in that process feel that politicians lack awareness of their accountability to their constituents. As a result of that lack of awareness, the people of this country quite clearly put forward to the Spicer commission a number of ways in which that awareness of their accountability to their constituents could be put forward very forcibly to their representatives, you and I and the members of this Chamber.

One of those suggestions was, quite clearly again, the idea of a referendum. It was not just a referendum on everything. It was a referendum specifically on constitutional issues and on other major issues or, as the hon. member has framed it, on issues of public importance.

Of course this bill is particularly important at the present time when we are dealing with the issue of unity and the constitutional crisis that we now face. We have seen throughout the previous Meech Lake debate that as time went on Canadians became quite disillusioned with the process of dealing with constitutional change behind closed doors. They wanted a process in which they could participate. It is interesting to note that as time went on it was not just the Canadian public that felt that way. The participants in the process itself, premiers and prime ministers, had comments about the fact that we could never go through that kind of a process again. We had to do it differently.

How do you do it differently? I have not heard any better way suggested which involves all of the public of Canada than the referendum process.

You know that I put forward a suggestion for dealing with the constitutional process that involves a constituent assembly. I am certainly not the only one who has put that forward. A number of others have, but the concept that I have suggested would involve a constituent assembly which makes recommendations that are then submitted to a federally sponsored referendum, tabulated on a province by province, territory by territory basis. The results of that referendum would then be submitted to the federal, provincial, and territorial governments to be dealt with in accordance with the 1982 amending provisions of the Constitution Act.

In that way it seems to me we would make sure that all Canadians were involved in the process. We would also make sure that provincial and federal representatives were clearly aware of what the people who elected them thought on this particular issue. Not that it would be a one majority vote that would govern the whole country but, if it were tabulated on a province by province basis, the provincial and federal representatives would clearly know how their electors felt on those issues.

The problem of course with the process that I have suggested is that we do not have any legislation in place for a referendum. That is where I have to congratulate the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for putting forward this bill at what I think is an extremely significant time for legislation of this sort. It is not the first time, as the hon. member has pointed out, that we have had referendums in this country. It is not the first time that there has been legislation at one level or another. We do have it at provincial levels; we do have it at municipal levels. We had a referendum in Quebec in 1980 on the question of separation. We have debate going on right now in the National Assembly of Quebec on Bill 150 on the issues of sovereignty and having a referendum in October 1992. We have had referenda in this country on conscription in the First World War and the Second World War. There is nothing revolutionary about this concept. It is something we have done before. There is no reason why we should not have legislation in place to do it again and do it when we need to do it.

The fact is other countries have this in place. To the south of us in the United States some 30 separate states and the District of Columbia have this in place. They go beyond the scope of this bill. They do not go to referenda that are sponsored by governments, but to referenda that electors themselves can initiate by petition. The state of California which has a population of 26 million, exactly the same as Canada, has such legislation in place. It is called direct democracy where electors can petition to have a question put on the ballot. If 5 per cent of the people who voted in the last election for governor of the state of California had petitioned then that question would have had to have gone on the ballot. The most famous of those was Proposition 13 in the state of California dealing with the issue of property tax reform. In the 1990 state election in California there were actually 14 separate propositions or 14 separate referenda on the ballot. California is not alone in the United States. Many of the large states have that sort of thing as well.

What we need is something similar in Canada. We have heard the critics this evening. We know there are critics of this process who feel that this might be a way for the majority of people to run rough-shod over the minorities. It has been said that we elect members of Parliament to represent us because they can look into the details of all of the issues that require legislation. Of course there is the Edmund Burke theory of democracy that says once we are elected we are here to do and exercise our own judgment and to heck with everybody else until the next election.

All of these arguments and all of these criticisms have a certain amount of validity. At the same time the concept of the referendum has an enormous amount of validity in it as well, particularly when you are dealing with important issues. Surely an issue like the Constitution, if nothing else, is the kind of issue we should be dealing with in a referendum, particularly if we have a federally sponsored referendum as would be provided by this bill tabulated on a province by province basis.

The only way we could do that is to have legislation for a referendum in place and that is why it is so very important for this House to pass this bill this evening.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the honourable member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who tabled this bill which, I am sure, comes at the right time in our history, a time when many Canadians ask themselves major questions about the process triggered by the constitutional reform proposals.

Mr. Speaker, this whole debate is about a constituent assembly, a referendum, a plebiscite— In any case, I just want to say a few words. I will be brief about the proposal before us, Bill C-201, an Act respecting referendums and plebiscites in Canada on questions of public importance.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, which is rather voluminous, contains provisions that would allow the consultation of Canadians on numerous issues, including constitutional changes. It is on this particular aspect that I would like to make a few comments, because Canada does not have a lot of experience in that field.

We have had two plebiscites. Plebiscites, as they are defined in the bill, are consultations that do not have binding force for the government, as opposed to referendums, which do have binding force. The definition of the word "referendum" on page 8 is as follows:

> "referendum" means a direct vote by which the electors decide, with binding force, a question submitted to them pursuant to a proclamation issued on the paragraph 10*a*), c) ou d);

By contrast, Mr. Speaker, a plebiscite is defined— In any case, a plebiscite does not have binding force. I have the definition in English, I will read the English definition:

• (1750)

[English]

"Plebiscite means a direct vote by which the electors express without binding force their wishes or opinions on the questions given to them pursuant to proclamation under paragraph 10(b) or (d)".

Mr. Speaker, for those who have forgotten, the Canadian experience goes back to 1898, when Canadians were consulted on prohibition, alcohol. You will recall that the population was consulted and, if I remember correctly, 51 per cent voted in favour, and 49 per cent voted against, more or less. Therefore, the government did not do anything. They dropped the issue and it became history.

Canadians were consulted again in 1942. This time it was about the conscription. The results were rather decisive, since 65 per cent voted for it, while some 35 per cent voted against it. Because of those results, it took two years before the government decided to do something and, in 1944, Mackenzie King used the conscription as a means to force or incite Canadians to participate in the war effort.

Mr. Speaker, these two plebiscites in our history have left bitter memories in the minds of the Canadian population. For us, French Canadians, I should say Canadians speaking French, it was synonym with division among groups, among families, among people, among regions and among provinces. This caused numerous problems. Therefore, I would be somewhat hesitant to hold a referendum or a plebiscite regarding a Canadian issue. Anyhow, seven provinces already have legislation allowing for going to the people. It is probably not a bad thing that a country like Canada considers the need for such a legislation. I congratulate the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for putting this before the House.

Personally, as I said, I have serious concerns. I believe that a referendum binding on the government ought to be on a question worded with extreme caution, a short and clear question, a question without ambiguity of any kind. Maybe we could go to the people to ratify an accord or a constitutional amendment which has been carefully explained. But this is a prerequisite.

Second, I think it would be useful that the question, when put to a referendum or plebiscite, be endorsed by the political parties and that, as I said a while ago in another intervention, the question be such that it does not diminish existing rights and fundamental rights of Canadians, and in particular minority rights.

I will end my remarks on this, I think that any question put to a referendum or plebiscite should require a double majority. By that I mean that the majority at the national level might prevail, but that where a regional element is involved the four regions—Ontario, Quebec, the East and the West—of the country would have a say. This kind of double majority, along with the other conditions, might convince me that we could use a plebiscite or a referendum to get the view of the people of Canada on a given issue.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it might be advisable to refer all of this matter to a committee. I will support the motion for second reading so that this bill can be read and referred to the committee.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise on Bill C-201 brought forwards by our colleague who, I am sure, has worked very hard on the concept of referenda and plebicites.

Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for the work he has done. But I suggest that the government choose a strange moment to table that proposal now before the House. We know that the government wants to pass, on this very day, a legislation to establish a constitutionnal committee without the participation of a large segment of Quebec population and we are most suspicious about the timing of such a move now that Quebec has planned its own referendum by the fall 1992.

We all remember that in the speech from the throne, the government of Canada led us to believe that it might introduce a legislation on referenda. Thus, the government should have had the courage to take that responsability on itself instead of trying to pass that legislation throught the back door by way of a private member's bill.

Personally, I am not opposed to the concept of referenda and plebicites, but what I am opposed to is the idea of using them as a mean to create a diversion. That exactly the position into which the governement cornered itself. The governement was concerned with the outcome of a Quebec referendum and it was looking for a means of diversion that would confuse everybody and allow it to ignore a will clearly expressed by all Quebecers.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, as far as Canada is concerned, one has just to refer to Canadian history to be reminded that each and every Quebecer is truly suspicious when it comes to a national referendum. We all have been through the upheaval of the conscription and if we were not personally, we know what it has been. So, I think that all those who know what this country is all about realize that no concensus is possible on any issue whasoever.

Therefore, we find that there is reason to be suspicious, even more so now that we have heard the leader of the Liberal Party who said, when he went to Quebec City, that a national referendum could carry regardless of the will of the Quebecers! That, Mr. Speaker, makes it more suspicious with the sight of the three traditional federal partys coming together today on the opportunity of holding a national referendum in an attempt to "skin off" Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, the trustworthiness of the hon. member who accomplished such a giant work is not being questioned. What is being questioned here is the trustworthiness of the government and of the official opposition which are looking for every possible means, with the help of the New Democratic Party, to prevent men and women in Quebec to express themselves clearly and to get to their sovereignty according to their own schedule without being subjected to the threat of a national referendum as proposed by the hon. member for Beauséjour.

It is obvious that such a measure is designed to be used as a blackmailing tool now. If the principle of a referendum is valid today, why was it not two, three or five years ago? Why that proposal today, at this very moment, when Quebec has decided on a course and timetable, do we want to pass this legislation on the sly.

Mr. Speaker, members of the Bloc Québecois will not put up obviously with a national referendum. We will, of course, fight that concept as of now. It being 6 o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I think we could resume this debate on some other occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The period devoted to the study of private members' business has now expired.

NATIONAL UNITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 1912); and the amendment of Mr. Ouellet (p. 1924).

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in this debate today.

Before us is a motion to establish another parliamentary committee to look at the next phase of constitutional change in this country. I want to say at the outset that the priority for all of us, not only members of Parliament but Canadians, is to ensure that we find a package and a mechanism to keep this country together.

The most important thing is Canada. The most important thing is national unity, and the most important thing is trying to find that accommodation, that package to keep this country together. That is the most important issue.

The only way we are going to do that is to build a national consensus in all parts of this country, in the provinces and the territories, and among all peoples of this country with a package that I would call the Canada round which would make all parts of this country at home in Canada, and want to stay together. That is the objective.

I hope every member of this House would put the country first before his or her political party. The way to do that and ensure that has caused some differences in this House. We suggest in our party that the most likely way of having a successful conclusion, a national consensus, is to establish a constituent assembly. It is not good enough to have only another parliamentary committee.

A parliamentary committee in itself does not well represent all the people of this country. There are many people who are under-represented in the parliamentary system. Look around the House. We do not have anywhere near gender equality in this House. There are very few visible minorities. The ethnocultural community in Canada is under-represented. There are not the number of aboriginal people there should be proportionate to their numbers in Canada. There are many other social groups, particularly poor people in this country, who are vastly under-represented by the parliamentary system.

We are saying as a party that we cannot support the motion before us because it is exclusively a parliamentary committee. Instead of that, we have talked often in our joint committee on amending the Constitution, in this House and across the country, in publications and so on, about the need for some sort of constituent assembly.

As a member of the amending formula committee, I can tell you that the overwhelming majority of Canadians who appeared before our committee said that we need a constituent assembly. We have to broaden out the process and have more than just members of Parliament as part of that process.

We are saying as a party that parliamentarians have a very important role to play. As parliamentarians we should represent about half of that constituent assembly. We then fill out that constituent assembly by adding on the other half representing the important minority groups in this country, in particular the aboriginal people, the ethnocultural reality of Canada, the official language minorities and the visible minorities. They are very important players. Those four or five groups are people in this country who are minorities under-represented in this House. They should be part of that constituent assembly.

In addition, we must make sure we have a proper balance between farm groups, business groups, labour groups, fishing groups, poor people and other people of this country. Gender parity would be easy to strike if we had a constituent assembly.

The idea of a constituent assembly is not a radical one. There have been many constitutional assemblies around the world after a revolution, when new nations are formed or when a nation is in a crisis situation. Our country now is in a crisis situation. We need more than just the parliamentarians or politicians to try to pull together that national consensus.

There must be at the end of the day a national consensus involving the major political parties and the major players at both the federal and provincial level if we are to succeed.

The reason for that is we have an amending formula now which for most amendments requires agreement of the federal Parliament along with seven of the provinces representing two-thirds of the population of those provinces for that amendment to carry. For five more important things, including the amending formula itself, we need unanimous consent.

It is obvious that even for the legal and technical amending procedure of the Constitution of Canada what we need in this country is a national consensus on a package. We are much more likely to achieve that national consensus if we have a broader group participating and pulling together that national consensus.

If we have the aboriginal people represented as fully participating members of that committee, or that constitutional convention or whatever we call it, we are much more likely to have the support of the aboriginal people of Canada and not get into a situation like we did last year in Manitoba in which a member of that assembly felt he had to try to stop the Meech Lake Accord because it did not address the needs of the aboriginal people of Canada.

I appeal to my friends across the way, to the minister in particular, to consider the arguments of the constituent assembly: the overwhelming majority of people who appeared before the committee on the amending formula and process—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the member for Yorkton—Melville has made an excellent speech which deserves the government's attention. I would like to call your attention on the fact that there is not one minister in the House and that the member made very interesting remarks which I think the government should have listened to a long time ago. His contribution is always remarkable, but there is not one minister who has the decency to be present now in the House. Where is the minister of Constitutional Affairs?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I recognize again the member for Yorkton—Melville.

M. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the member for Shefford for his speech.

[English]

The reasons for a constituent assembly are the following. First, as I said, the overwhelming majority of witnesses who came before our committee wanted a constituent assembly. Second, public opinion in this country wants a constituent assembly. If one looks at the most recent public opinion polls, we see that approximately 70 per cent of the people of Canada want a constituent assembly, they want to open up the process.

Third, a growing number of premiers are in favour of a constituent assembly or are very, very open to the idea of a constituent assembly. I think of Premier Rae in the province of Ontario, I think of Premier Devine in Saskatchewan who is open to the idea, Premier McKenna, Premier Cameron of Nova Scotia who is open to the idea of a constituent assembly, and I think of Premier Wells in Newfoundland who has been calling for a constituent assembly. These premiers are either in favour of a constituent assembly or they are open to the idea of opening up the process and working in that direction.

An hon. member: What about Bourassa?

Mr. Nystrom: What about Bourassa? Mr. Bourassa said no to a constituent assembly.

What we in our party are saying is that you cannot isolate any province or any part of the country. What we are saying in our party is that this constituent assembly must be drawn from the four or five groups that I have mentioned. If we cannot get all of the provinces to send MLAs or MHAs or MPPs to an assembly, then we should not have any provincial representatives there, because we cannot afford to isolate any one of the provinces. We made that very, very clear from the outset.

Like Bélanger–Campeau in Quebec, we had a committee there of 18 members who were elected in the Quebec National Assembly, and then through a consensus of the two parties there was the addition of another 18 members who represented a good cross-section of Quebec society. It can be done in the province of Quebec and it can be done in the rest of the country as well, including people from all regions, territories and provinces. If the provinces do not want to participate officially, there are a lot of people who have experience at the provincial level who could be on the constituent assembly.

[Translation]

For instance, I am thinking of Raymond Garneau who was a member and a minister at the provincial level, in Quebec, in the previous Bourassa government. He has a lot of experience and could represent Quebec and the Liberal Party of that province. There are many people in the province of Quebec who can very well represent that province, as there are many in Saskatchewan and elsewhere in Canada.

[English]

These are the reasons we need a constituent assembly, to open up that process.

We have always said in our party that the constituent assembly would not be enshrined in the Constitution. We would not want a constituent assembly to deal with all constitutional issues from here on in: whether we should enshrine property rights or aboriginal rights or change some of the rights in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; dealing with the notwithstanding clause or with other issues of importance, or saying that it should be a one shot deal.

We are in a serious situation of national disunity in this country and because of that we need to have a constituent assembly at this time, but it should not be a permanent part of the amending process. We have made that very clear. It should not be enshrined in the Constitution as part of the amending process and we have made that very clear as well.

The constituent assembly would do no more than this parliamentary committee is supposed to do. A constituent assembly would try to draw together that national consensus, the accommodation that will keep this country one.

That is exactly what the parliamentary committee is supposed to do as proposed by the government across the way. It is supposed to draw together a national consensus, to draw together a package to keep this country united.

All we are saying in our party is that the composition of that committee must be different than what the government envisions it to be. The composition of that committee must be a mixture of parliamentarians and non-parliamentarians. The ministers across the way say they do not want non-elected people on it and that it should be a parliamentary committee.

In the motion presented to us from the government it is proposing that there be 20 senators on that committee but senators are not elected. Senators have no mandate from their constituencies, from their provinces, from their regions. They are not elected. They are appointed by the Prime Minister of the day.

As individuals, I know a lot of these senators can make useful contributions, like Senator Beaudoin or Senator Gigantes du Parti libéral. As individuals they are very good people, but they are not accountable to anyone. If the government can appoint 10 non-elected senators then why can't we, as the House of Commons, make sure we appoint the Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, for example, as a member of the constituent assembly and have full voting rights in that assembly like the member of Parliament from our party or the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party of Canada.

I ask the members of this House to open up their minds to the possibility of flushing this out so that the people of Canada feel some ownership to this constituent assembly, so they feel some ownership to the process that we are to embark on come September of this year.

I believe that the chance of success will be a lot greater if we had as fully participating members the aboriginal people of Canada, people representing linguistic minorities, more women, visible and multi-racial minorities, ethnocultural minorities and the like. I think that is the way to go.

We cannot risk failure. The Meech Lake Accord failed and a lot of people in this House, including the overwhelming majority of members of all three national political parties, were in support of the Meech Lake Accord.

It failed because of a couple of reasons. It failed because there was a perception in the country that the people did not have ownership of that particular accord, that they did not have access to the process, that the accord was negotiated by 11 First Ministers and presented to the House of Commons and to the various provincial legislatures as a fait accompli.

We could not change anything. We could not amend anything. It was called a seamless web.

I would assume that everybody has learned some lessons from that experience and that the next package will come to us as a package that will be amendable by members of the House of Commons as well as by the legislative assemblies of this country, including the Quebec National Assembly.

It seems to me it would be a lot easier to build that consensus if not only members of Parliament, but non-parliamentarians are also part of the process. There is no law and there is no precedent in this country that says that the Constitution belongs to the parliamentarians. There is no law in this country that says only the parliamentarians should be involved. There is no law that says only elected parliamentarians should be involved. There is no law that says senators should be 40 per cent of that particular committee.

I remember last spring when Jean Charest was the chair of the committee looking at a companion resolution for the Meech Lake Accord. We had 15 members on that committee. There were no senators. They were all elected members of Parliament representing the three parties of the House. So why do we bring back senators into this particular operation?

In the past we have also had non-members of the House of Commons involved in parliamentary committees. I remember the former Liberal member from Cochrane, Keith Penner, chairing a committee on aboriginal rights a few years ago and the participating members of that committee were people representing the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

We do have a precedent for that happening in the past. I say to the government across the way: "If you really want to be non-partisan, then do not be afraid to lose your government control of that committee". I think that is the big problem.

If we had a committee that was made half of parliamentarians and half non-parliamentarians, there would be a government minority on that committee. At the end of the day, for the new agreement to pass through the amending process, it has to be reflective of a national consensus. Let us start off that way and try to have a committee that is reflective of the national reality of this country, one that mirrors Canada and the real world.

I conclude by saying that to us, in our party, the process itself is so important that we have to vote no to this particular resolution to establish a committee made up uniquely of parliamentarians. We feel that if we set up a committee made up of parliamentarians only, we jeopardize the very process itself and the exercise, which is to find a national consensus and a package that is acceptable to all political parties in this House and different political parties across the provinces and territories of Canada.

If we can enhance the possibility of a national consensus by bringing more people into the committee, then why not open up our committee and involve more than just parliamentarians? That is the simple crux of the argument because the important thing is to keep this country together.

Having travelled the country extensively in the last four months as a member of the committee on the amending formula, I can say to you that I am much more optimistic now than I was a few months ago.

[Translation]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are changes not only in the province of Quebec, but also in the rest of Canada. I believe that most Canadians want to reach a consensus and find a national accommodation, and I have a feeling that most Quebecers would accept a renewed federalism if Quebec is recognized as a distinct society, if we can do something about the division of powers and other important matters for Quebec and its people. I also have the impression that the nine other provinces and the two territories are now more open than five or six months ago. I believe that most Canadians outside Quebec want to find some accommodation, that they wish to find a compromise with Quebec in order to keep the country together and strong. I also have the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that most Canadians want to see the three national parties and all other political entities of the country as well as all politicians work together in order to find a solution to this national problem.

[English]

I believe we can find that solution. The Canadian people want, above all, Parliament to lead the way, Parliament to put aside some of the partisan fights and clashes we have in this place every day as a natural, normal part of our endeavours, and put the country first and find that national consensus and national bargain.

I know it is there. Even last spring, with all the difficulty of Meech Lake, through the parliamentary committee chaired by Jean Charest we had a unanimous report that came up that we thought was a national consensus and a national compromise. It was scuttled because of certain events, including the defection of the now leader of the Bloc Quebecois from the government benches and also of the intransigence of some of the first ministers to consider some new options on how to solve the national crisis.

Let us not let it slip away again. We may not have another chance. This may be the last chance. I argue and we argue that we can increase and enhance the possibility of a solution to the problem that tears this country apart if we broaden the process and have, instead of just a parliamentary committee, a constituent assembly of parliamentarians and non-parliamentarians, working together to try to build a truly national consensus and find a solution to help this country get over its constitutional problems and get on to the real issues facing Canadians in the modern world.

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order. As the hon. member for Shefford pointed out a moment ago, there is still no minister of the Crown in the House. We are discussing Government Orders and I would suggest that perhaps the House adjourn until a minister arrives.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I must recall all members of this House that the presence or a point of order should not be raised on absence of a member of this House.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: You are absolutely right, Mr. Speaker, when you say that we are not allowed in this House to refer to presence or absence of a member. But as the member for Kingston and the Islands said so well, we are dealing with a government business, something very important for Canada, and yet since 3.30 p.m. this afternoon, no Cabinet minister has been seen in the House. Mr. Speaker, I find this totally unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think the rules are very clear, and I repeat, members are not allowed to refer to the presence or absence of a member in this House. Questions and comments.

Mr. Hudon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs rises on a point of order.

Mr. Hudon: I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and remind my hon. colleague that the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was present in this House until 5 p.m.

Mr. Gauthier: That is exactly why we should not raise the question, but if the member insists, I will tell him that since 5 p.m., and it is now 6.20 p. m., not one minister has been seen in this House, and we are dealing with government business—.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think that you have conveyed your messages one to another, and I now call for your co-operation. Questions and comments. The hon. member for Laval West.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, —

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Manicouagan on a point of order.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I apologize, I am not in my seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Laval West.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of my colleague from the New Democratic Party who agreed in favour of a constituent assembly. I think his main argument was that there are ten senators and fifteen members of Parliament on the committee that the government wants to create. He was right when he said that senators are appointed by the government in place, that is by the Liberals when they were in office or by the Conservatives since they came into office. I am convinced that if the New Democratic Party had been in office recently, they would also have appointed senators to the Senate.

On that commission that represents people from all over Canada, senators are still Canadians, people with Canadian citizenship. So, I wonder why the NDP member from Saskatchewan is against having some senators on that commission? I would ask him to explain to me why he is against that. Those are full-fledged Canadians just like us, and I am proud to participate in this debate and also in that committee which will set the outline of our political future, of the future of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: The answer is very simple, Mr. Speaker, because the Senate of Canada is not elected, and if there were non elected senators—

An hon. member: They are Canadians.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, they are Canadians, but Mr. Ovide Mercredi, the president of the native groups, is also a Canadian and the mandate of the native group in our country— if a senator could be a member of that committee that is non elected, why not have Mr. Mercredi, who is the president of the Canadian native group? I simply say that we can have nine or ten non elected senators on our committee, even if I have a lot of respect for Mr. Beaudoin and Mr. Gigantès. But if we can have somebody who is not elected at all, who comes from the Senate of Canada, why not have Mr. Mercredi? Why not have a business leader? Why not have a Canadian union leader? Why not have—

[English]

Why not have gender parity on that particular committee? Let us open up the process. That is all I am arguing for.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville who is known on this side of the House as a friend of Quebec.

He made several speeches in the same vein during the debate on Meech Lake, and I must say I enjoy my exchanges with him.

However, one of the points he made was that we had to have a constituent assembly to represent all minority groups, all visible minorities in Canada. This is a very high-sounding principle, Mr. Speaker, but I have some trouble with it.

For instance, there are about 75 different nationalities in Canada, if I am not mistaken. Does the hon. member mean that a constituent assembly would have to have a representative of each of those nationalities, including the Vietnamese community, the Italian, the Chinese, the Mongolians, in fact, every country in the world? Is that what he wants? Is that how he sees this assembly?

Mr. Speaker, I think we are wasting a lot of time looking at the kind of forum we need to deal with Canada's constitutional problems. Perhaps we should go on to discuss the problem itself and not waste our time trying to decide what would be the best formula for this forum.

My second point is that a constitution is important to a country. Everybody says so. However, I don't think we should get carried away, Mr. Speaker.

I remember when I was at the University of Ottawa, my professor of Political Science told our class one day that the most impressive constitutional document on this planet was the Constitution of the Soviet Union. However, if ever a country made a complete mess of it, it certainly did, Mr. Speaker.

That being said, would the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville reconsider his demands for a constituent assembly and opt instead for the Parliament of Canada, a constituent assembly lawfully elected by Canadians every four or five years?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the hon member for Saint-Maurice is negative about the concept of a constituent assembly, but the Bélanger-Campeau Commission in Quebec is a constituent assembly. It was a group of 18 elected representatives and 18 non-elected members, and this commission found a consensus in the province of Quebec and made a number of proposals on behalf of Quebecers.

We suggested having a similar model at the federal level, to have a process that is more open or more democratic for Canadians. Like the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, which had members representing labour, the business community and many other Quebecers. If I remember correctly, they also said they offered a seat to native groups in Quebec, but the offer was turned down. In any event, this group was a representative sample of the population of Quebec. We can do exactly the same thing here at the federal level, across Canada.

We have many organizations.

[English]

He mentioned the ethnocultural groups, the Chinese Canadians and the Vietnamese Canadians. There is the Ethnocultural Council of Canada. Let it decide which two or three or four members should be in a constituent assembly. Our party suggests 80 to 100 people on that constituent assembly.

One of the premiers has suggested between 70 and 80 people on a constituent assembly. There are national organizations representing aboriginal people and ethnocultural people. There are linguistic minorities—

I am thinking of Francophones outside Quebec, of Alliance Quebec which represents English-speaking Quebecers in the province of Quebec.

[English]

There is no reason why these groups cannot be invited to name one or two members to this particular assembly. This would open up the process. I do not think it is an idea that is all that radical. It is in tune with about 70 per cent of the Canadian people who want it, according to all the public opinion polls. It is certainly in tune with what the witnesses were calling for before the committee which this House struck last December to look at the amending formula and the process of constitutional change.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised by some of the examples that the member for Yorkton-Melville has given us. He cites Belanger-Campeau as an example of a constituent assembly. However, it certainly did not represent gender parity and was by no means concerned with hearing the voices of aboriginal peoples as members of that committee.

On the other hand he gave us the example of the Charest committee as being an example of when a committee system worked, when Parliament worked. However, it was not his type of constituent assembly since it did not contain any non-elected members.

This confuses me. I would like to put to him very quickly the concern that I have. I understand where he is coming from and I hear the same voices that he hears. However, the concern I have is that it would appear as though there is a movement away from a representative democracy as a system for brokering and giving voice to all of the interests in Canada. That concerns me.

The second thing that concerns me is how he thinks we could possibly respond to the time constraints that are upon us if the very mechanism for dealing with the issues before us requires invention and creation.

Mr. Nystrom: We cannot risk failure. A constituent assembly of 80 to 100 people would not take much longer than the committee across the way. It is likely to have a better chance to succeed in creating a national consensus, of being inclusive and ensuring that aboriginal people and others are fully participating members of that assembly.

The other point he mentioned concerned Bélanger-Campeau. It was a constitutional convention of a sort and there were parts of it that I too did not like. Of course we need gender parity. I made that very clear in my remarks. If we had gender parity maybe we would have an easier chance of finding a national consensus.

The member talks about representative democracy. I am not sure non-elected senators make a useful contribution to that because they are not accountable to anyone, they are not elected. I think we start by saying that if we want something more representative, perhaps we should just have, in addition to members of Parliament, people representing big organizations in this country and small minority groups from coast to coast.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today in the House of Commons to speak to the motion put forward for our consideration of appointing a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to inquire into proposals for a renewed Canada.

First of all, I have to point out that the constituency that I come from is in the Northwest Territories. The national constituency that I deal with is aboriginal in my capacity as the critic for the Liberal Party of Canada.

It was very clearly put before the Beaudoin-Edwards committee that there are six principles which should be dealt with in dealing with the whole constitutional issue. That was put forward by the Minister of Justice of the Northwest Territories. He indicated that the mandate is one that is very integral to the success of the whole inquiry. He said that governments must have a clear mandate to proceed with any fundamental changes to the Canadian Constitution.

He then went on to the role of the people. Any new amending formula, he stated in that specific case, must guarantee that Canadians will be involved at all stages of significant constitutional amendment.

He then went on to say that the role of legislatures, any new amending formula in that specific case—but we are dealing with many other things here—must ensure that a significant majority of members of each legislature are required to ratify amendments. He suggests that a free vote would be part of this approach.

Any new amending formula must clearly and carefully balance the role of the executive arm of the government with the role of Canadians and their elected representatives sitting in legislatures.

He said that aboriginal nations must have a guaranteed role in any constitutional amendment process affecting aboriginal interests.

Then he discusses the role of the territories, because the territories are an extension of the federal government. They are indeed not provinces. They have an act under which they operate. It is a very unique situation posing very specific challenges which constitutional experts and the legal community have to confront in dealing with the territories' aspirations to fit into their rightful place in nation building and within Confederation, such as it is.

He states that in this case any changes to the current amending formula or any new formulae must provide for the involvement of territorial residents and their elected representatives in matters that directly affect constitutional development in the territories, and the role of territorial residents in national affairs.

Any new amending formula that might involve regional representation must recognize the Northwest Territories and the Yukon as distinct regions within Canada and not as interest groups to be consulted in some other less formal way. I particularly feel that we have gone through a proliferation of committees and groups.

I sat on the Charest committee with our chairman Mr. Charest and a number of my other colleagues. We criss-crossed the country, consulting with people. I felt that in a time of great challenge we demonstrated some leadership and the spirit of compromise, but our advice was not heeded. The particular process we engaged in was pretty conciliatory. It is not that we agreed on everything.

I think there is a lot to be learned from engaging in this kind of work as parliamentarians and legislators. We get to know the people and their concerns, and there are some very diverging views across this country that are difficult to reconcile with the best of expertise or any legal body of opinion that exists out there.

I must say we demonstrated that we could agree because we have come to some consensus on a number of very difficult issues. We were charged with the responsibility of responding to the New Brunswick resolutions and I guess ours was to pick and choose. The picking and choosing, although there was a list of recommendations, were not the simplest things to do because of the diversity that exists and because when you are dealing with the heart and matter of a country it is generally the extreme that tends to prevail. There were some very differing opinions on that committee, but from my experience I would say that anything dealing with the future of this country is worth engaging in.

I have a number of concerns. With regard to representation on the committee, I would like to see greater gender equality, I would like to see a far greater role for women, I would like to see a far greater role for aboriginal people and I would like to see equitable participation. Participation has to be that they are equal partners in all of the negotiations and all of the consultations regarding what exactly goes into the body and the preamble of the Constitution in the end.

There are a number of issues which have to be dealt with in terms of the Northwest Territories and in terms of the aboriginal peoples. If we talk about equitable participation, we need to know that any of the other activities that prevail at this time will essentially not undermine or usurp the whole essence of the kind of role that, for instance, the two government leaders of the Northwest Territories play in forging ahead with a constitutional agenda that spells equality for all Canadians, including the northern people and the aboriginal people.

Our aboriginal leaders are elected leaders. They also have to be present at the table and they have to be equal partners in these negotiations. Gone are the times when we can ignore the voices of aboriginal people and the disaffected regions of this country. This is not a Constitution for one region of this country. This is a Constitution for the whole of this country and every Canadian must have a part of it.

We talk about the Americans many times. It amazes me because in my travels to Central America and to the Middle East last summer, I came in contact with Americans who talk about their constitution as if it were a part of their skin and a part of their flesh. It should not be the responsibility of a select group of individuals who would disaffect the rest of the nation to change the Constitution, to make fundamental amendments to the Constitution. My concern has to do with the participation of these two particular leadership regimes. We have elected a new leader for the Assembly of First Nations, Mr. Mercredi. I am sure that Mr. Mercredi sees a role for himself, as well as his representation on behalf of 600 chiefs in any kind of constitutional amendments that are going to take place.

The other thing that I see specifically is that the north, because it is not yet a province, is looking for a basis of equality. It is looking for equality in terms of how it participates and equality in terms of how its substantive issues are dealt with.

It has been agreed in principle that the north will be divided some day into two separate areas, one being Nunavut and the other being a separate territory which might go by another name.

In doing that, we may eventually opt for becoming a province. If the Northwest Territories does become a province, it is felt by all northerners and by our leaders that we should have the equality and the fairness that was afforded to all other provinces. All the other provinces, pre-1982, were created with bilateral negotiation directly between the particular applicant and the Government of Canada and we feel that is what should prevail.

We also feel strongly that if there are going to be any changes of the boundaries of the two territories, the territories have to be consulted and the pre-1982 conditions thereto also have to prevail.

We look in the aboriginal constitutional agenda and we see a complete forging of opinion last week when we elected a new leader that aboriginal people do want to see the inherent right to self government entrenched in the Constitution. This fundamental move is not one which would allow for a continuing succession of laws that either oppress or suppress the rights of these people. What this would do is replace an archaic way of dealing with the rights of aboriginal people.

I guess the most formidable aspect of the inherent right would be the inherency. What does it mean? Canadians want to know what it means. Essentially what it means is that you give the people a right to carve out their own future and to eke out their own destiny. You give the people the right to make their own mistakes or to make good for themselves, politically and otherwise. We are talking about political power and political representation.

We also want to talk about the provisions afforded to other Canadians within the Constitution. If there are going to be provisions on the basis of culture and linguistics, we want to have our languages. There are 53 aboriginal languages, only three of which are not threatened: Inuktitut, Ojibway and Cree. All these other languages are indigenous to this country. Once they disappear, there is no way of repatriating or rejuvenating those languages elsewhere in other countries. We cannot go to another land and retrieve those languages.

There have been many suggestions in the area of the preservation of language and culture for which aboriginal people have been excluded. They are not part of negotiation for our cultural industries or cultural properties in the free trade agreement. This has to be considered and I think these are the kinds of things that aboriginal people have concerns about.

The other aspect is that aboriginal people want to be part of the First Ministers' Conferences. I believe that there is some movement and some receptivity to the whole idea of reinstating the original agreement of the Government of Canada, I think it is section 37(1), which affirms that their right to this round of negotiation would be reinstated.

There is some receptivity to that whole idea. That is yet to be brought out in forthcoming reports and whatnot. I have no idea whether that is the case, but I believe with the amount of negotiations, consultations and expert representation that we get from our elected leadership in the aboriginal community, that has been brought out very clearly by the aboriginal leadership.

The other thing that I think is quite interesting is that we have perpetuated the whole mythology of two founding nations. I was at the Assembly of First Nations leadership convention and there it was put to rest that this is not the way that Canada should be perceived historically. We are not co-founders, we are the first peoples of this country and this is the way that Canadian history has to be reflected. If there are going to be future constitutional negotiations, this has to be given paramount consideration.

I guess one of the more dangerous aspects of constitutional dealings are the kinds of words and the kinds of phraseologies that are employed. What happens here is when you use a certain phrase like "two founding nations" you are bound to exclude someone. I think these are the sensitivities that have to be employed when we are going to appoint a joint Senate and House of Parliament committee. The Northwest Territories is an area which best reflects the toierance that we are known for as Canadians. In the Northwest Territories there are eight official languages. Along with French and English there are the aboriginal languages which are deemed official. If you get on an airline in the Northwest Territories you will be provided the safety instructions in the various aboriginal languages.

You can go into a hotel and look at the bar of soap and all the toiletries offered and they are all done in syllabics in Inuktitut. I believe we set an example. There is tolerance there. There is acceptance of diversity. I think the people who come forward from our part of the world demonstrate that we are not tunnel visioned, we are not closed-minded, we do not exclude other Canadians. We keep the doors open and prove that we have the ingenious creativity to be able to allow room for everyone in Canada.

We do not predicate our constitutional dealings on the basis of being single-focused, on the basis of being intolerant. We are flexible. We understand that the whole political end of the constitutional reform process is one of the art of the possible. The art of the possible includes an element of compromise. We understand that.

The one fundamental exception which must prevail is that we cannot ignore the rights of northerners. We have to include northern leaders on an even and equitable basis with all of the other leaders across this country in dealing with the Constitution. We have to allow for the political aspirations of the north. There has to be dialogue. We cannot let things like the royal commission—it is a very good idea which I support and will be one of the tools to, perhaps, providing one building block for a new relationship between the Government of Canada and the aboriginal people.

We must not allow that to supersede bilateral negotiations between our elected aboriginal leaders or any kind of negotiations with the north. There have to be provisions for both. I think there is room for both. There are a number of issues that can unite us, not just our linguistic aspirations or our linguistic goals and priorities. If that was the case, why do we not have an aboriginal language foundation?

There is a lot of symbolism in telling people that the language which is indigenous to your people and to your country is important, it is you, it is how you communicate. It is your psyche, it is your psychology. It is the heart of your people. That is very important. Why has that not been done. That can be done outside the realm of the Constitution.

These are things which would symbolically ease a lot of the tension and frustration that is there.

Having said that, I believe that there are a number of concerns. We have concerns about the inherent right to self-government. We also have concerns about the whole issue of extinguishment. Aboriginal people feel that they are people who keep their word.

They have agreements. They have engaged in treaties. They have engaged in a number of specific and unique arrangements with governments, with the Queen in previous years through the Royal Proclamation. There are specific arrangements that they have honoured and they feel they are people of their word.

They feel that major, comprehensive land claims, given a good deal and a fair shake concerning the compensation and land base they get, is good enough to guarantee certainty. Certainty can be had with the kind of treatment you give a people, with the kind of fairness within the process. You do not need to extinguish aboriginal title to ensure certainty. That is a mythology. It is the wrong way to go at it.

For years and years it was the aboriginal people of this country and the northerners who have been willing to share their land, who have not hoarded the resources of the land, who have given access. Now we come to a point where they have not benefited economically. They have been marginalized.

We look at the whole issue of political representation. We are now in a situation where we are putting forward an all-party proposal to have aboriginal electoral districts which would perhaps produce nine members of Parliament from the aboriginal community.

This proposal is not to make aboriginal MPs special or give them special status, but to remove the structural barriers that are there. The Indian Act was a suppressionist document which would not allow aboriginal people to vote until 1961. These are the things which have happened and which we have to change and make even.

One of the ways in which we can measure the equality of a people is by their socio-economic status. Let me give one figure that is rather glaring. In my community only 5 per cent of aboriginal students make it out of high school. That is a very, very abysmal figure. There are some places across Canada where non-aboriginal communities say: "Well you are tax exempt. You guys have a lot of money because you hoard money". However, when you live on a reserve with 90 per cent unemployment, what good is the tax exemption, especially when there is another tax which you are not exempt from, namely the GST.

There are conflicting ideas out there that basically are misrepresentations of the facts. There are attempts by members of Parliament from all parties to provide an equitable basis, to give a fair shake to the people that need it most. I think the senior citizens of this country are ones to be reckoned with. They have had a share in the building of this country.

In a sense, we have been fighting the constitutional battle since 1982 and before that. This has produced this malaise and a psychology among our young people which provides for very little hope. We have to go out there and reinstil that confidence and hope in our young people so they can quit internalizing the anger and the frustration they feel because of the hopelessness they feel concerning this country.

We have a beautiful country. I, as a member of Parliament, am proud to be a citizen of this country, to come from the place that I come from and to come from the aboriginal people with 600 strong leaders, chiefs, across this country who have the ingenuity to work with different levels of government under a great deal of tension, challenge and frustration.

I just want to say that we need to put hope back into the minds and hearts of the people of this country. I guess the people I feel strongly about are the disabled, the aboriginal people, women—there has to be gender equality as women are 52 per cent of the population of this country—and senior citizens of this country. I pay tribute to them because they built this country. I think it is up to us to maintain all those priorities which were laid out when we walk in the footsteps of those great people.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest, as I always do when my colleague speaks because when she speaks there is usually a lesson to be learned.

I guess I come with almost a cloak of cynicism and I do not really want to have it. The role of Parliament is to consult, it is to be constructive and it is to try to put into legislation instruments which will continue to allow this country to grow and be great and to allow those, particularly those who are most disenfranchised from the system, to find ways to participate to the fullness of their potential.

However, something struck me in the speech. This resolution talks a great deal about who has to be included. I guess the reason I say a bit of cynicism is that we are all guilty of creating that cynicism. The aboriginal communities in Canada total somewhere over one million individuals. That is more than the population of the province of Nova Scotia. It is more than the population certainly of P.E.I., New Brunswick and Newfoundland, and perhaps equal to some of the western provinces. Yet, here we are in 1991 discussing whether we have the wherewithal to keep this country together.

We are striking a committee of necessity to go, once again, and listen to Canadians. I want to ask my hon. colleague, in particular, about dealing with the aboriginal communities across Canada. Consultation is wonderful, it is a great thing, but consultation is no good unless we listen and unless what we glean from the consultation actually finds its way into the process, those structures that I talked about that make this country better and allow people to fully participate.

Can my colleague fill me in and perhaps take a little bit of the cynicism away from me that I feel, particularly tonight, in this House, on this motion? The aboriginal community has been dealt with very unfairly over many decades by Canadian citizens and by respective governments. They have been consulted before, but they have not been listened to. She mentions that it was 1961 before they were allowed to vote and participate. They are the first citizens of this country, yet we denied them that basic democratic right of which they have a great history and a great tradition.

What makes this committee different? Aboriginal communities have been promised consultation before. We have a royal commission. We have a House of Commons committee that has looked at the amending formula. We have the Spicer committee. We have had everybody out asking and I wonder if that particular community still has the faith that it will be listened to and that, finally, its voices and concerns will find their way into constructive changes to our society and particularly to our Constitution? Does she believe that those communities believe that this process will be any different than other ones that we have all participated in?

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for bringing forward his concerns and the questions about why it is that aboriginal people would feel that such a process would bring any different results than the numerous attempts that there have been at constitutional reform and amendments.

My feeling and my belief is that after our experience at the failure of Meech, the government has had to re-examine, not only the process, but the substance of what has been debated in terms of the Constitution. Not only that, but there has been an emerging sense of urgency among the aboriginal population out there. We cannot have a country in which they are the first peoples where they, essentially, will be carved out of the Constitution.

The aboriginal population wants to feel, and does feel, that they have emerged over the last 20 years into the strongest kind of leadership which is a combination of education, experience and political moxie. We have out there 600 chiefs who are to be reckoned with. We have out there the various locals of the Metis who are to be dealt with.

We have a strong group in Manitoba. The Manitoba Metis Federation has people in it who will not allow another constitutional process to go by which would exclude them and which would not deal with their issues. The Metis, for instance, are adamant that they are going to get recognition in section 35. That will be part of their constitutional agenda.

There is a different wind blowing out there now. It is not the hot winds of Oka in 1990. It is a warm, gentle wind that is giving a velvet tap on the back of Canadian politicians saying: "Listen, there is another regime of leadership out here and it is the leadership of the first nations". We elected a new leader and that leader has something that was not there till recently, that is, a unified, complete group of people which believes that solidarity is going to be the quality or component that puts it over the edge in terms of what it can achieve. Also, there has been a real delineation of fundamental issues. These people are not talking about a proliferation of details. What they are speaking about is their political aspirations, their political representations and their inherent right to self-government being entrenched in the Constitution. Their culture and their languages have to be recognized.

They have every faith in themselves, more than they do in anyone else. It would be up to them to guarantee that there is a rightful place for their children and their grandchildren in this country. In fact, I give my complete trust to those people, to guarantee that there is a role for our children and for the future of our people in this country. We are going to find our rightful place within Confederation, not because we do not have a place, but because it has not been recognized, and that will not happen again.

The cynicism that my colleague feels is one that aboriginal people are very experienced with. Frustration, intolerance and, at times, embitterment have consumed a great many people who are trying to deal with some challenging issues. But you know, we are people of hope. We are a people, I think, of the future of this country. We believe that we have some of the best leadership in this country, and if we support them, they will come forward. They are very clear about their message and where we stand in this country and I give them my complete trust.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, let me say that it is a difficult challenge to follow my colleague and my good friend. She speaks with so much conviction, and she speaks from the heart.

I do believe, like she does, that we are dealing with a question of leadership. I think there is a lack of leadership on the part of some of our political leaders. Before I get into my remarks, I think it is appropriate to set it in context.

We are dealing with a subamendment presented by a member of the government, the member for the riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury. It is a subamendment to the amendment put by the member from Papineau. The amendment put by the member for Papineau would, in our view, improve the motion before the House. I would just like to state and situate the comments I am going to be making, by referring to the subamendment and the amendment.

First, I will deal with the amendment, because I think it is appropriately situated. We wanted to do three things. We wanted to increase the numbers of members of Parliament on the committee from the motion's proposal of 15 members of the House and 10 Senators, to 20 members of the House.

Second, we wanted to make sure that there were funds available to the opposition parties so that they can hire research advisers and experts in the field who will give us the needed support in committee.

Third, we believe sincerely that there is an urgent situation here and that the emergency is such that the committee should come forward with a report by the end of this year, that is, December 31, instead of the proposed date of February 28, 1992.

The effect of the subamendment by the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury would be to eliminate from the amendment the date of December 31, 1991. I take it that since he is a government member, there is some sympathy on the government side of the House for the two proposals of increasing the number of members of Parliament on the committee, and second, to allocate certain funds to the opposition parties to allow them to hire appropriate research and professional staff.

Having said that, I think this motion should be adopted. I do not share the view of the New Democratic Party that we should vote against this motion. I believe there is enough in this motion to allow for compromise and enough in the motion to give all Canadians a process which I think would be acceptable.

I just want to point out a few paragraphs on page 18 of today's Order Paper dealing with the motion.

> That the Committee develop procedures to ensure aboriginal peoples participate fully in the development of the Government of Canada's plan for a renewed Canada and, in particular, on issues of special interest to them;

I think that is essential.

> That the Committee be authorized to put in place mechanisms designed to encourage and facilitate the participation of individuals and groups of Canadians;

That, I think, is innovative and interesting.

> That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional——and so on.

The addition of 10 senators, who are part of Parliament, is correct. Whether the NDP wants to recognize it or not, the Senate is still part of the Canadian parliamentary institution. What I have heard today from the member for Yorkton—Melville is a hard line by the NDP saying, in other words: "If we do not have our way it will be no way". They insist on having a constituent assembly. I will address that point later in my remarks as I think it is an important tool, an important mechanism that could be used, but it is not in this motion. There are suggestions that similar structures could be put in place, mechanisms designed to encourage and facilitate the participation of individuals and groups of Canadians.

It could be a task force, it could be a panel, it could be a constituent assembly of some sort, but the motion gives the committee the authorization to do that and I do not understand why the NDP, if I heard it correctly this afternoon, is going to vote against the motion, because in this motion there is no provision for the words "constituent assembly".

I do not understand and I will, perhaps, want to hear further from them as to what their position is.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in our history, Canadians cannot afford to be lazy, passive or indifferent. They cannot afford to be neutral. We cannot be neutral when our country's future is at stake. We must take a position and make that position known, so we will not be left out of the current process. For obvious reasons, and I want to make this clear right away, my personal option is for a federal Canada, an improved, strengthened and possibly modified federal formula.

Mr. Speaker, the government referred to this special joint committee in the Speech from the Throne. The committee will be asked to analyse the findings of the Spicer Commission, which will report next week, and of the Beaudoin–Edwards Commission, which I believe is to report very shortly. The parliamentary committee we are discussing today, which will be appointed once the motion is passed, will meet the legislative committees of the provinces and territories, native groups and other individuals and other groups, as appropriate, to discuss with them the future of our country. It will a parliamentary task force with a government majority. I realize that.

Mr. Speaker, they were elected on November 21, 1988; Mr. Speaker, they were elected on November 21, 1988. They legitimately form the majority. The people of Canada have spoken.

The question was debated in eight provinces, Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly. I will list them here. As I said earlier, there was the Spicer Commission and the Beaudoin–Edwards. There was also the Silipo Commission in Ontario, whose report is forthcoming; the Bélanger–Campeau Commission in Quebec, whose report we all know; the Horsman Commission in Alberta; the British Colombia Cabinet Committee on Confederation; the Manitoban Task Force on the Constitution; the New Brunswick Commission on Canadian Federalism; and as recently as last week, another report was talbed, entitled the Report of the Group of 22, which outlined some practical suggestions for Canada. This report was put together by a group of distinguished Canadians, including former politicians, administrators and businessmen. I have read this report, Mr. Speaker. It is very interesting.

Now, the establishment of this parliamentary committee we are now considering will have to deal with all these people who have been examining the issue to get a good understanding of the problems involved and, hopefully, find solutions. After all, Mr. Speaker, this country deserves that we make every effort to find a solution, or solutions, to our problem—because we do have a problem, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, I heard people say: "We remember Meech and we do not want to make the same mistake again." I know full well that there are members in this very House who think that the Meech Accord was defeated, abandoned or rejected, whatever, because of its content. Well, I am sorry to say they are wrong. In my riding, people had mixed feelings about Meech, feelings they wanted to share and they were not given the chance to express them, Mr. Speaker, to improve the proposal. That is why the people became somewhat cynical about politics and the process underway and finally rejected the proposal.

In the proposals the government will come up with or will put forward by September, I hope we will find suggestions that will be debated, amended, changed and worked on and finally come back to the House on February 28, when the report is tabled, so that all of us here and in the other place can peruse it and stay abreast of what is happening, because, whether we like it or not, for the time being, the Canadian Constitution cannot be amended without unanimous consent on such important issues as the Constitution.

So, once the Parliament of Canada has debated the issue and the provinces have had the chance to do the same, Mr. Speaker, if everyone agrees, the Constitution will then be amended.

Mr. Speaker, we are considering ways of consulting the Canadian people. I do not want to get into the substance of the bill and deal with the program per se. The position of the Liberal Party was clearly stated earlier today, around lunchtime, by the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, with our nine points proposal regarding possible amendments. I would simply want to take whatever little time I have left to touch on the two processes involved here. We heard a lot about a constituent assembly today.

We could also mention—and I have done so today—the binding and non binding consultations. I am one of those who are still hesitant but have finally come to accept that a referendum could be held to ratify the decision that will be made by Canadians next year.

I would like to get back to the process. I believe that a constituent assembly is normally used specifically to rebuild a society. According to the few books that I have read on the subject, a constituent assembly is usually made up so as to represent the whole society. The constituent assembly convenes to draft the integral text of a constitution, or an amendment to the existing constitution.

Mr. Speaker, in France they even have a building that is only used for a constituent assembly when there is talk of setting up one of those. As we know, there have been several republics, and each time there was a constitutional reform, they had a constituent assembly. Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that they have not used referendums in France; they have done so. It is a tool which is used but, often to their disarray, the governments lose those referendums.

Mr. Speaker, I was recently asked a question about referendums, because everybody knows that in 1981–1982, I was one of those opposed to a referendum on the patriation of the Constitution, the enshrinment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and so on. Mr. Speaker, I was convinced that this was the wrong tool and I said it many times in this House.

However, today I am a little more inclined to think that referendums can be used under certain conditions. This afternoon, I have put those conditions to you. The question must be simple, clear and concise; it must not limit any right; it must have the approval of all political parties; and, finally, it must be subjected to the double majority. These might be difficult and strict conditions, but I believe that referendums present very high risks.

When I said that you had to have a winning referendum, some media representatives laughed. They said: Isn't that funny! Well, Mr. Speaker, you do not hold a referendum if you know that you are going to lose it. Therefore, if we use a referendum for ratification purposes, for obtaining a national consensus, we must make sure that we stand a real chance of winning it.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to talk about the constituent assembly. Quebec has said that it will not participate in such an assembly. Indeed, the government of that province has clearly indicated that it would not participate. Others—I heard it in this House—others have expectations, great expectations which, in my opinion, far exceed the potential of these constituent assemblies.

To my knowledge, the constituent assembly is not part of the constitution of any democratic government. It has been used, as I said a moment ago, and I can give you the dates, in 1787 in the United States, in 1848 in Switzerland, in India, in Pakistan, and of course in France. But it has been used only for the purpose of drafting a new constitution following a civil war, a declaration of independence or some traumatic events.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, we are not there yet. We have before us a proposal aimed at setting up a parliamentary commission made up, I hope, of 20 members of Parliament and 10 senators. These 30 individuals will have to consult with provincial and territorial legislatures, interest groups, aboriginal peoples, French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec, Mr. Speaker, who have changed their name last week-end and now call themselves the French and Acadian Communities of Canada. Their Federation held a big convention in Ottawa and they decided to change their name. I am glad, because I like to be identified first as a Canadian, not as a French-speaking citizen living outside Quebec. I was born in Ontario and I do not like to be identified in relation to Quebec. I am first a Canadian, but I happen to speak French. What can I say, that is my mother tongue, the language I learned when I was a kid, and I still use it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude with these words, since I see you are telling me I have but a few minutes left. We will have to compromise. I invite the New Democratic Party to reconsider its position, because we need unanimous consent in this House to create a parliamentary committee to consult with all Canadians so that we can find a solution. Voting against the motion will do nothing to help push forward the constitutional issue, to renew our Constitution, and to protect our interests, which we all want to do, at least, I hope so. We hope the NDP will support the motion. If not, we will be at a dead lock because of partisanship. Mr. Speaker, I beg the New Democratic Party not to make a partisan issue out of this debate. Make it a Canadian issue, not a partisan issue. From the tone of the debate today, I am afraid there will be a lot of dissension in the House along political lines on grounds which I find totally unacceptable and that is unfortunate.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier just said. He asked many questions to the New Democratic Party. As an NDPer for Quebec, perhaps I could answer his questions.

First, he referred to our proposition to create a constituent assembly and he asked if this was not just partisanship on our part. I would like to tell the member for Ottawa-Vanier that I attended an NDP caucus meeting and I can assure him that if we demand a constituent assembly or an enlarged parliamentary commission, it is not for partisan considerations, it is mainly because we want to give Canadians a hope that they too can be part of the process.

I would like to say that the way we see things is that people will participate to an enlarged commission, like the Commission Bélanger-Campeau, which by the way was an excellent commission. Unfortunately, no New Democrat was able to sit on that commission. Nevertheless, I am not going to moan like the Bloc Québécois. I have accepted the fact. I thought perhaps it was normal since the number of seats was limited. The Bélanger Commission has done a very good job. When I hear members of the Liberal Party and Conservative Party say that a constituent assembly cannot work, I say it's not true. We have had evidence of this a few months ago in Quebec, and I am very proud of that.

Also because my colleague for Ottawa-Vanier is a lawyer, I guess.

Mr. Gauthier: No.

Mr. Edmonston: You are not a lawyer? In that case, I am very happy.

When I was a member of the Barreau du Québec, we used the expression audi alteram partem, which means: Listen to the other side, or let people be represented. This means you should not accuse people or take any decision in their absence.

The reason for a constituent assembly is not only to consult people, to ask them information, but to have them as partners in order to seek a solution together.

[English]

I would just like to add that as a Quebecer myself, I have seen how a constituent assembly can work with the Belanger-Campeau commission. I was very proud of that commission. I thought we did some good work. I think that we did not do as much good work when we started playing politics with the commission, and I do not want to see politics played with the Constitution and the federal scene.

That is why I, as much as my hon. colleague, would implore the NDP to compromise and not ask for a constituent assembly or constituent commission. I would remind my colleague that we are not looking for a confrontation. We would compromise if we could. There is a difference between compromise and capitulation. What he is calling for is capitulation.

With the amendment of the Liberal Party to the motion, essentially they are playing around with the fringe of this committee: "Increase it from 15 to 20, give some research funds and have a report two or three months earlier, and we the Liberals will be happy and everyone else will be happy". That is not the way it is.

Presently there is a leadership crisis. We need to have parliamentarians inside this committee. When you tell me 15 parliamentarians and 10 unelected senators are going to be calling the shots with a few panels for the aboriginals and the first nations, that is not the way to work toward a constitution. We know that.

I will just remind my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier once again, if we believe in democracy, that all the briefs that were presented before the Edwards-Beaudoin commission, more than 150, called for a constituent assembly and about 20 some did not. If we believe in democracy and listening to the people, then let the people decide. I think those who have passed before the commission have decided. To say otherwise, as my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier says, that we do not go with a constituent assembly, is to me the sum of arrogance and elitism.

I am not surprised to find both the Conservatives and the Liberals in the same boat.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the NDP has a way of showing a kind of Freudian slip. The member referred to the committee as having 15 parliamentarians and 10 senators, non-elected.

I would remind him that the senators happen to be parliamentarians. He must understand that. We have a structure here, a bicameral operation. It is called the House of Commons and the Senate. That is Parliament. The NDP always seems to want to get around that by making claims that the senators are not parliamentarians.

I regret that I have some friends and enemies there. I do not ever want to go there, but I would suspect that the NDP should learn that Parliament is both Houses of Parliament: the House and the Senate.

I think that the hon. member's comments show that he should read again the motion before us. It is rather clear. In both official languages it is quite straightforward. When he tells me that solutions have to be found, that we must take advantage of the expertise that we have and also call on every willing person, I ask him to read again the following section:

> That the Committee be authorized to put in place mechanisms designed to encourage and facilitate the participation of individuals and groups of Canadians;

Mr. Speaker, we have there everything to create, put in place and add structures which could satisfy the NDP who want a larger consultation. We could have panels, task forces, study committees which could be an integral part of this group of parliamentarians and which could hear Canadians on this important issue.

• (1930)

Well, I remind them that the simple fact of opposing the motion—I think I heard the official spokesperson for that party say that they would vote against it, because it is not a constituent assembly—is not good enough. I tell them, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot understand that they refuse to make any compromise, that they cannot take a more reasonable position which would give Canadians a chance to make their opinions known.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now over. The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate this evening. In fact I am honoured to do so.

The Constitution of our country goes to the very essence of how we view our country. I am saddened, however, and even somewhat embittered that we have to oppose this government's proposal.

There are two reasons why we are going to be opposing this resolution of the government. First is timing and second is the composition of the committee. Let me first address the timing.

As a member of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, we were reassured on many occasions that the government would not pre-empt the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, nor would it pre-empt the Spicer commission report. These are committees established by this government, the time frames of which were established by this government.

I have some quotes. On May 15 of this year the Prime Minister, in response to a question in the House, said: "We want to be consistent. We should wait until the reports on these massive consultations have been tabled before proceeding with a government initiative".

On May 17 the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs said: "I have no intention of judging the Beaudoin–Edwards committee report before it is received, and I have no intention of rejecting the suggestions it may contain".

The timing is a bit curious. If the timing has suddenly become inconvenient at this time and if this government refuses to listen to what these reports have to say, then what confidence can we have that it will listen to the next committee?

The second point, and the main thrust of my argument tonight, is regarding the composition of this committee: 15 members of Parliament and 10 senators. I have two words for that. It is "an insult". As a member of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, I speak from personal experience. At the outset of our hearings I was not convinced that a constituent assembly was the way to go, although my party had advocated this as early as last summer. I too was concerned with many of the arguments being put forth from both the government and the Liberals that a constituent assembly would further denigrate our parliamentary system. As an elected member of Parliament who has a lot of respect for our parliamentary system, I did not want to contribute to that further denigration of our parliamentary system; it is too fragile.

On the Beaudoin–Edwards committee we heard a lot about what is wrong with our country and about the enormous challenges which we face constitutionally. I will give some examples: first, the whole division of powers, particularly with my interest in the environment, the jurisdictional disputes that we have been embroiled in on the environmental stage in our country. Second is the relationship with the aboriginal peoples. We just have to look back to last summer to know how fundamental that question is and how we must address it. Third is the relationship with Quebec.

These are just some of the agenda items which the next phase of the constitutional debate must address.

As I said, we heard much of what is wrong with our country. We saw much of what is right. As someone who was patriotic before becoming a member of Parliament, I can tell you my experience on the Beaudoin–Edwards committee has reinforced that patriotism. It has strengthened that patriotism. It has given a whole new definition of what patriotism is.

We saw a land of breath-taking beauty, of awesome diversity. We also saw so-called ordinary Canadians, I call them extraordinary Canadians, grappling with these very complex issues. They were an inspiration. The majority of the witnesses who came before us advocated a constituent assembly. They gave me the confidence that this new device, this dramatic departure, could provide a way of giving us a credible process where we had none in the past.

On the antagonisms we heard so much about, which exist in our country against aboriginal people and against Quebec, I did not see those in many instances at all of those hearings and on those many long days. What I did see consistently was antagonism to politicians. People do not trust us, and with good reason.

The process which we have here has not addressed our constitutional malaise. Why do we not see it? Why do we not realize that we must have the courage to try a new way? I now believe that a constituent assembly must be made up not only of elected politicians. I respect elected politicians, some of them, most of them, but it should also include the public.

This blending of that much maligned public with the elected politicians in our country would not denigrate our parliamentary process, it would reinforce it. This is what this government and the Liberals do not seem to be able to grasp.

The government's proposal is unwilling to invite unelected Canadians to participate in the recreation of Canada unless they happen to be unelected Canadians appointed to the Senate from either the Liberal Party or the Progressive Conservative Party.

Do you not see the irony of saying that you are standing up for elected politicians when you are willing to have ten unelected political hacks included on that committee? I think that the people of Canada can certainly see the irony in that if it escapes the members opposite and the members from the Liberal Party.

It is not just the government that thinks this way. This morning the hon. member for Papineau in his remarks in this debate referred to the concept of a constituent assembly as a flight of fancy. Such arrogance is not new to Liberals and Conservatives but it is particularly offensive at a time when all politicians are being tarred with the same brush.

I wish to dissociate myself completely with such a condescending position. We must have a new way. We must have a process in which all people across the country can see themselves reflected. Obviously they now do not see themselves reflected in the government or Parliament. We need a credible process. We must find a way to restore the confidence of the people in the institutions which govern them.

I have news for the old parties. Our institutions cannot be saved by ignoring the people who put us here. All we will do is further erode the public trust. Canadians want politicians to clean up the mess that politicians have created.

The Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives want to criss-cross this country one more time and then return to the safety of Ottawa to close the doors on reality and issue a report which in no way reflects the public mood.

New Democrats say the time is long past for a new approach, one which includes Canadians, not excludes them.

It is a time for courage. The situation demands courage and this is why we oppose this motion. This is not a courageous motion. This is an entrenchment of old ways demonstrated by both the government and by the Liberals. It is a demonstration of intransigent thinking.

We must have a new approach. We must have the confidence in the people of Canada that they will do the same as I did, take the problems before them and find a solution. On the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, I had the courage to change my mind on a constituent assembly. I hoped the government would do the same.

In conclusion, I want to say that Canada is not as fragile as some would have us think. It is a strong and vibrant land with strong and vibrant people. It has survived many, many things in the past. It may even survive another parliamentary committee examining the Constitution.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the NDP talking the way they do today. Two years ago, they criticized the way Quebec had been treated in 1982 by Trudeau, Chrétien and Ouellet, who signed and imposed a Constitution without the assent of Quebec. And today, these same people from the New Democratic Party who, obviously, have absolutely no knowledge of what is going on in Quebec, these same people propose a constituent assembly without the Quebec National Assembly being part of it. They propose the same thing as the Liberals did in 1982 and which led to the constitutional crisis that we are in. These people say publicly and try to lead Canadians to believe that they want to help save Canada. Well, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, perhaps they are saving Canada, but it is going to be their own Canada, because Quebec will then be elsewhere, Quebec will then be a sovereign country.

I might even ask them to continue in that way. They help Quebecers understand that this country does not make any sense, which does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that English Canada does not also have a right to its own country. An English Canada looking like the NDP, that is fine with me, but they should never lead Quebecers to believe that they represent them, when they try to give them a repeat of the coup de force they did in 1982.

So, I ask them: how do they think they could sell that message to Quebecers today? Show the real face of the NDP to Quebec! I also ask the member for Chambly to go and explain to Quebecers this new vision of Canada that excludes Quebec.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I would be only too happy to. I think that having had the experience of visiting Quebec City for the first time during this Beaudoin–Edwards trip and seeing the beauty of that place and listening to the very moving testimony of the witnesses from Quebec, one rings in my ears. That was the witness who said: "Bourassa does not own Quebec, nor does Parizeau own Quebec. We want a voice in the constituent assembly of Canada".

It is the old way, the old politicians which brought wrath on the heads of Quebec. We want to open up the process to get the elites out of control. The Bloc Quebecois, on its high horse and in its own parochial way, thinks it is the only one that can speak for Quebec. They do not speak for Quebec. I know that now because I heard the voice of Quebec in Quebec City.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that I wanted to ask a question of the member to clarify her point of view on that very issue of Quebec. But I think her answer is very clear and I am not going to ask a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I will not respond to the hon. member right now. I prefer to wait, maybe I will do so later.

But I want to ask a question of my colleague. I listened to her speech and I am pleased that she could see the real picture of Quebec while she was there. I realize also that there are a lot of people who are speaking up loud and clear for Quebec, and it is not only the Liberals who are doing it, nor the Bloc Québécois, the NDP, or the Conservatives. There are a lot of people who do not belong to any of these political parties but who still want a certain logic, a Parliament in which they can believe.

The question I want to ask my colleague is as follows: keeping into account the work done by the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee, what are the main reasons that pushed her to change her mind on the constituant assembly, and why was she originally for or against it?

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Chambly for that question. It is a good one. I think that having seen and heard the voices of Canadians during that process, I trust Canadians. I wish that the government and the Liberals would trust them as I have learned to trust them. I think that we should have confidence in the people who send us to this wonderful place, and I wish that the government and the Liberals would trust them the way we have learned to do so.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

I heard today the spokesperson for the NDP tell us that the NDP would vote against this motion. I understand that she is very upset with the process and I want to ask her if this motion is carried or passed by this House, will the NDP participate in the process?

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, we will be holding caucus discussions on that very issue tomorrow morning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken today but not on debate. I asked a few questions.

I would like to speak on the motion mainly because I think the question of a constituent assembly is a very important one and we have had a lot of things bandied about here today as to whether we should have a constituent assembly or not. I cannot vote for the motion without the provision for a constituent assembly.

• (1950)

As a parliamentarian, to exclude the public in the way that this motion does I find is arrogant and wrong.

I read a newspaper report about the Leader of the Opposition where he says: "A constituent assembly? Nobody knows what it is, how long it will take, who will be on that, will they be elected or not elected." He explained that they had one in Australia that was a great success. They debated for 13 years and reported nothing.

Well, you can have a constituent assembly that does more than nothing and, as I said before, I believe the Bélanger-Campeau commission in Quebec did a great deal. I think it pretty well outlined what are the choices facing Quebecers. I was quite proud to be a Quebecer, as I am now of course, but to be in Quebec at the time that the Bélanger-Campeau commission held its hearings.

I find that when you are looking at setting a commission up to study a problem as complicated and as important to a country as a Constitution is, you need to have members of that commission or that committee who are not just parliamentarians, but who are representative of the unelected.

When I am talking about the unelected, I am not talking about unelected senators. I look at the numbers we have here. We are looking at 15 plus 10. We are looking at 15 members of Parliament and 10 senators, for a total of 25. Now that is an insult to Canada because just Quebec by itself in the Bélanger-Campeau commission had I believe 36 members.

Now I was impressed with the 36 members. We had members from the union side, members representing business and even representatives of the Equality Party if I am not mistaken. It was important to have all sides being heard. These are elected as well as unelected.

The thing here is that it worked well in Quebec, but this government does not seem to have confidence in Canadians sufficiently to the point where they would allow this to be done on a federal scale. Now that bothers me a great deal because I do not see what we would lose by having—hold on—a constituent committee or a constituent assembly in the sense of the Bélanger-Campeau commission. What would we lose? The government could still try to find the best representatives of the diverse groups, unelected people but who are very good.

I was impressed by the Group of 22 which came out with a number of suggestions which were dealing primarily with decentralization, but they had their other suggestions as well which I felt, for unelected people, my god, these people were on to something. I really felt, as I feel right now, that if we can plug into Canadians and get this information, not only does the process get revitalized and democracy is well served, but we do get some good information and some things that we can deal with.

When you have people participating in this way, these are people who see the process working and then who believe in it. One of the problems with Meech Lake, and I think this is one time we should put one myth to bed, was that it was a process which appeared to be closed-door. I have heard often, these 11 men making the Constitution in a closed room one night, well that is not exactly the truth. This was really a lot of consultation over many years. This was not a closed door deal, but the perception—and we have said in politics that perception is reality—to the Canadian people was that it was. So that is what people believe it was.

If we were to have the perception as well as the reality of having an enlarged committee, as they did in Quebec, we would bring in these people. I know it will not be perfect. Who is a perfect representative for the native peoples, for women, for senior citizens and so forth, but we must make the effort, because to do otherwise we are selling ourselves short and we are certainly selling Canada short.

There are Canadians who want to participate.

I want to respond to what the Liberal member for Ottawa—Vanier said that the motion, as it stands right now, will do all of those things.

The motion will bring in Canadians and the government will be able to talk to these representatives and get the information from them. That is not what I am talking about. I am talking about members with power, power-sharing, empowerment, people who are at the table and who are negotiating, who are talking about what they feel is important in a Constitution and have a direct say. They are not just to be patted on the head as someone who would be consulted and then told: "Okay, now go back to where you were because we are finished with you", but must have a direct say in the creation of a Constitution which is a Constitution for all the people of Canada. That is the perception and that is the reality that we want to create.

I believe that it would not be that difficult, as I said before. All we have to do is enlarge the parameters, all we have to do is add in the motion of the government a form of constituent assembly or a constituent committee. I am sure that we could seriously consider that. We just do not want people consulted in a very unserious manner, a manner where people would not really have any power whatsoever, where they would just be used and, I think to a certain degree, abused.

When examining the question of membership, the numbers of members on this committee, if we look at 15 elected parliamentarians, 10 unelected senators, we are really not dealing with that many people. When we are drafting rules for a Constitution, the Constitution that we are going to be living with for many, many years while at the same time trying to deal with the separatist threat from Quebec, we have to be more serious than just having 15 parliamentarians and 10 unelected senators.

I do not have a partisan objection to the Senate per se. I just feel that if we are going to have unelected people on it they should be people from the constituencies, people who have a certain amount of competence in their area of concern. I believe that, as we are talking more and more these days about decentralizing government services and decentralizing the way we deliver these services and the way we govern, it is a good way to show our good will to the people of Canada by asking them to be active participants on the committee.

I do not believe that choosing this pathway instead of what the government in its motion has chosen is going to cause the government a great deal of problems. I feel all the government side has to do, as I said before, is just amend its motion and just make some kind of an effort to include a constituent committee. It must ensure that it is one with power and that it represents people from communities who have, as I said before, a particular competence in their area.

I want to respond to what my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier said about the NDP's failing to be on side or not being a team player. That affects me particularly because I can remember the same criticism when I was in the United States and I was against the war in Vietnam. I said I had reasons why I was against it. There is a kind of love it or leave it. You have to be a team player or you are off. I left it. I felt it was wrong.

I am not going to leave the debate here today. This debate is an essential one about democracy. It is about bringing the power to the people. On something that is as important as a Constitution—I cannot even believe I am here arguing in favour of a constituent assembly or a constituent committee, a kind of Bélanger–Campeau enlarged, to a government composed of a large number of members from Quebec. I cannot believe that I have to tell them what they should know almost in a reflex manner. Yet, here I am saying: "We did it in Quebec". We do not have to be team players. All we have to do is expose the logic and the pragmatism of such a decision on the government's part. If it were to include a constituent assembly or a constituent committee, it would be very pragmatic.

I believe that through a constituent assembly we can bring in people from the Caisse Populaire, we can bring in people from the unions. In Quebec, particularly, we can bring in people from the grassroots who want to participate.

I do not believe for one minute that sovereignty is inevitable, as my colleague from Lac-Saint-Jean said earlier. I do not believe the separation of Quebec from Canada is inevitable.

I believe that, through including people from Quebec who are knowledgeable in their respective areas, we can deal with the question of the threat of separatism. That is the best way to deal with it. Not hollering insults here in the House or one party against the other or saying: "You have to play ball. You have to be on the team". This is not a team sport. We are talking about the future of our country. I am talking about a very pragmatic suggestion made by my party that we have a form of a constituent assembly or a constituent committee in order to include Quebec, to include people who have never had a voice.

I am not talking about appealing to what I call the constitutional cottage industry of professionals who come before the committee and who oftentimes—I guess it is no longer publish or perish, I think it is testify before a committee or subcommittee or perish. I am not talking about these people, although there are many who are good and who are doing their job well. I am talking about the people who are not normally part of the power structure, who do not have a voice and who must have one.

In conclusion, do not mistake the position of the NDP for one of partisanship and do not mistake our motion as something which is going to be difficult to apply. It is not going to be difficult. It can be done. It is very pragmatic. It has been done in Quebec. We have seen the fruit of that. Just simply try. If you do not try and say: "Well, it is our way or no way", then you force us as a party to vote against your way because your way, in our humble opinion, is not the democratic way.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Chambly for having had the courage tonight to give his own personal opinion about the process that led to the negotiation and the signing of the Meech Lake Accord.

I know from first-hand experience that a lot of people have presented the signing of this accord and what happened subsequently as being something which happened between 11 men in a room. He has had the courage tonight to say that that is not true. I choose the word "courage" to describe his affirmation, because he is directly contradicting, as we all know in this House, the leader of his own party, the member for Yukon. She is one of the persons in this country who repeatedly propagates in her speeches and in different interventions the myth he has had the courage to confront and destroy tonight. I want to congratulate him for having had the courage to take on the leader of his own party in that respect. I think I agree with him. I know it is difficult for any member of Parliament to directly contradict on the floor of the House of Commons most of the members of his or her own party and the leader of his own party.

I want to say that I disagree profoundly with him on what the concept of democracy should be in the case of a constituent assembly. I have heard members allude to the fact that there is some absence of legitimacy because a House of Commons committee is struck. I disagree with that. I fundamentally disagree with that. Members, by making that argument, diminish the importance of our basic institutions in our country, our democratic institutions.

The truth of the matter is that this Parliament and the members who sit in this Parliament, no matter what their leanings may be—and that includes the Bloc Québécois, the Reform Party, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party— have been democratically elected by the people of Canada to this institution. It is the basic democratic institution in our land out of which a parliamentary committee is formed, and members go on to do their work. That is the way the British parliamentary system has worked. It has worked successfully, and I think what we are undertaking to do through this committee is very much in line with that.

I have difficulty with the member's argument when he says that we can open up the process. I think he would recognize that at the end of the day, in the spirit of democracy and in recognition of the institutions that have served us so well and that are there now, it is the National Assembly of Quebec that speaks for the people of Quebec in the areas of jurisdiction which are now attributed to it.

If we are in some difficulty today, I would argue that it is because in 1982, when we patriated our Constitution, an argument was made that the government of the day in Quebec because it was a Parti Quebecois government was not a legitimate government and that for some reasoning the federal members of Parliament elected from Quebec spoke for the National Assembly in their areas of jurisdiction. I think that is the fundamental error that led to the constitutional difficulty we are in today.

Whatever the process may be, I think that at the end of the day members of this House have to recognize that it would be the National Assembly of Quebec that will choose in which way it will proceed in the name of the people who elected its members.

Where I have some difficulty is that the National Assembly and the Government of Quebec have clearly said that they will not participate in a constituent assembly. The member may not like that, but to proceed otherwise would mean that they would eliminate from the process the province of Quebec. I cannot understand how he comes to that conclusion. He speaks of Belanger–Campeau. Belanger–Campeau did not propose that the National Assembly or the province of Quebec participate in a national constituent assembly. Belanger–Campeau did not do that.

I ask the hon. member: How can he say that today when he knows very well that what he proposes would eliminate 25 per cent of Canada's population?

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in an editorial published in Le Devoir, Lise Bissonnette clearly states that Quebec is waiting for proposals from the rest of Canada. Now is the time for the rest of Canada, all of us, all the other provinces, to decide how we wish to change the Constitution and what proposals we can offer to Quebecers.

In her editorial, Lise Bissonnette says that Quebec is certainly waiting for us, the rest of Canada, to try to solve our problems together. After reading her editorial, I also agree that we must do just that. Let us see how we can improve the Constitution, how we can change the federal system so that Quebec could better fit in.

I see no problem with that. I also recall that, in 1981–1982, when the Constitution was repatriated, Quebec indeed suffered a coup de force, but do you remember who was among those who rejoiced most, who even congratulated Messrs. Chrétien, Trudeau and company? Yes, Brian Mulroney. If one reads carefully the speech he delivered immediately after the repatriation of the Canadian Constitution, one sees that Brian Mulroney was in the same boat as Chrétien, Trudeau and company.

So, be careful when speaking of coup de force. I clearly remember that one. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I know it is always risky to offend or oppose one's leader. I will choose my words carefully, Mr. Speaker, I have said that perception is tantamount to reality. According to a certain perception, eleven persons participated in the Meech Lake process and tried to satisfy the five basic demands of Quebec, and we were all under the impression that they were the only people involved. Reality was different. However that perception was shared by my leader, several members of my party, and most Canadians.

So, it did not require so much courage. I simply wanted to clarify the facts.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Very well, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask my colleague if he recognizes that the real voices for Quebec, now, are the National Assembly, Premier Bourassa, and Mr. Parizeau, Leader of the Opposition.

• (2010)

Mr. Edmonston: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I think that the real voice for Quebec, is now the National Assembly, of course. I have no quarrel with that, but it is not only Mr. Parizeau, it is all the political parties that make up the National Assembly. Finally, I have also in mind the people who have been elected to this Parliament, the Bloc Québécois, the only NDP member in Quebec, the Liberals or the Conservatives. They too represent Quebec, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that this resolution has finally come before the House. I am glad to see that this government has finally brought forward a mechanism for resolving the constitutional impasse that has for the past year and more sapped our will as a nation. I am glad that finally the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has launched, as he declared in his remarks this morning, the Canada round of constitutional renewal.

We can quibble about the details. We can argue about the number of members who should be on this committee. We can argue about when the committee should report. We on this side of the House have made suggestions about that. We have made recommendations as to the process that the committee should undertake. We have made suggestions in a spirit of being constructive for dealing with this very important and critical process of constitutional renewal.

However, it is essential—and our leader has been saying it for months now —that Canadians finally come to the point of resolving this constitutional impasse.

What I think has so dissipated our will as a nation over the last several months has not been so much the substance of constitutional change. If we look at the points of differences among the parts of Canada, between Quebecers and Canadians elsewhere in Canada, between Canadians in the west and Canadians in the east, between aboriginal Canadians and the rest of Canadians, what separates us as people are really not profound in a constitutional sense. With a certain will to resolve these differences, the points of constitutional differences are really minor when we look at them in the broad scheme of things.

One irony has constantly been referred to by observers of the Canadian scene as they watch Canadians and their governments torture themselves with constitutional wrangling, as we have over these last several months. They continue to remind us that Canada is rich in resources and really the envy of all the world. People everywhere, millions of people from all over the world, would happily give everything they own in order to have the privilege of living here. Refugees are lined up and are back-logging our refugee system in order to be allowed to come and live in Canada. The irony is that a country with this potential is spending so much energy wrestling with fine and rather insignificant constitutional points of difference. Much of our problems as a society has been amplified and magnified by being brought into a constitutional discussion.

I think that that is really what is at the bottom to a large degree of the difficulties that we have faced as a country in the last several months and perhaps the last several years, although I think in the period preceding Meech Lake that problem has been exemplified.

What I think happened was that in an attempt, and I think give the Prime Minister credit, as he saw it to bring Quebec into the constitutional family, he raised the stakes to such a level and raised the level of the consequences of a failure in producing agreement to such a high pitch that an agreement, first of all, was virtually, as it turned out, impossible and the consequences, the fall-out from that failure to produce agreement, was so dramatic that it has really taken months for Canadians to recover from that process. Really, I think that that is one of the sad facts which has surrounded the whole Meech Lake process.

In the period following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord when, of course, Quebec retreated and took it very badly that the accord was not signed, the acrimony has been perpetuated, I believe, by the discussions which followed in the months after Meech Lake.

I think it is important that finally we are setting forth some mechanism. I agree, it is probably imperfect, but at least there is some mechanism in there that we can begin to deal with the substance of constitutional reform and to I think de-dramatize the issues, and as we have so often said, certainly as our leader has so often said, be able to put this affair behind us so that we can begin to deal with the other more pressing problems of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a few moments as an Acadian. As you know, one of the very important aspects of these constitutional discussions is culture and especially the desire of the people of Quebec to have control over the protection of their language and culture.

Mr. Speaker, I can easily understand where that will to acquire the levers of power in linguistic and cultural matters and to protect their language and culture comes from. I am not a Quebecer. I am an Acadian, and for four centuries, since they came to Canada, Acadians have waged a constant battle to protect and preserve their language and their culture. We have managed to do that in spite of very difficult circumstances. Those who know the history of Canada know about the deportation of Acadians; they know that we were scattered all over the United States and that when we came back to Canada, we settled in various parts of the Maritimes, and they know the consequences that that fact had on the survival of our population.

I come from a part of Cape Breton where for three generations now, we have seen the gradual disappearance of the French language, which was currently spoken in some villages. We have always had to fight to preserve our language in our small villages.

For example, my maternal grandfather and grandmother did not speak English. My mother and father spoke French, but nowhere near as much as my grand parents. Those of my generation, myself, my sisters and brothers, my cousins, we were almost completely assimilated. We did not speak French at all. I had to learn it over again, since I did not speak French when I was younger.

So you know, Mr. Speaker, that we have lived with the problem of assimilation and that we must always cope with it outside Quebec and inside Canada. I can tell you that it is thanks to the programs and the will of the central government of the country named Canada that we were able to preserve our language and our culture in our region, and proudly keep our language alive at home.

I think we must not forget that, especially when we speak of preserving French, what we are all anxious to do in Canada. I think that all the Canadians are proud to be part of a society with two official languages, and we are proud of that because everyone knows, all over Canada, that this fact makes us different as a society and that it helps preserve the French language and culture in Quebec.

If the francophones outside Quebec think seriously about the aim which everybody agrees with, the preservation of their language and culture, they will see like others did the only way to maintain a French society in Quebec as well as outside Quebec is to be part of a strong Canada, a Canada with these two languages. This is one of the reasons, one of the elements at the origin of the constitutional debate.

However, we must avoid to over dramatize the constitutional issue. We must rather think about the essential objective, the one that we all share, myself as an Acadian, the people of Quebec, the francophones from Ontario and Western Canada, as well as the non-francophone Canadians, that is, the fact that we want to stay together, we want to keep what we have already gained, two official languages and a multiplicity of cultures which add to our society and make it richer.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that in this time of constitutional renewal all Canadians from all over the country and not only those who are in this House will find a way to use the mecanisms in place to put that period of constitutional amendment behind us so that we can pass to something else and take up the challenges of the next century and of the next millennium in Canada and across the world.

We have problems, like the ones our aboriginal people are now confronted with in Canada, as well as poverty and isolation in our society. These difficulties are a lot more serious than constitutional problems. Whatever the nature of our institutions, because of these difficulties Canadians will again want to live together. Whatever happens to Quebec, we will have to live together. I think that if we look at our immediate future in that way, we will be able to solve our constitutional problems because, if you ask me, they are not that difficult after all. All we need is the will to solve them. If we have that will, as Canadians, I think that we can keep our society and our country united, then move on to the next challenges which, in my opinion, are much more interesting and up-to-date than putting the finishing touches to constitutional sentences or texts. I think the time has come now to solve this problem once for all and to move on to the real challenges facing our society.

It is for that reason that I am glad the minister responsible for constitutional affairs has finally provided at least a model of constitutional renewal. We know it is not perfect. I think we are going to try and improve it, but we are going to work with it and we are going to try and use it for the purpose of finding a way out of this deadlock.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, first let me compliment my friend and colleague on the very excellent address he just made to this House in both official languages.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comuzzi: As the applause dictates, it shows how much we appreciate the comments that were just made.

In all items that come under discussion at different times, not only on this side of the House, but across the aisle, there are things that we agree with and things that we do not agree with. I am sure my colleague would agree that many of the institutions in this country that are presently under review should all be reviewed in order that we come up with the end result of a much better, much finer and a more workable Canada.

The things that we can agree on, as Canada approaches its 124th birthday, it is that we have developed, over the last 124 years, a country that respects our seniors, a country that has been able to develop a comprehensive health care plan, a country that fought in two world wars and Korea and still respects and honours the veterans who fought in that war, a country with 124 years of a magnificent history.

I wonder if my friend would comment when I ask: "Are we not embarrassed at this particular period of time in our history, when we spend so much of our time, and so much of the time within this Chamber, talking about constitutional issues until it is coming out our ears, that what we should really be discussing are those things of real value to Canadians today?"

These are items such as: how do we get this country out of the recession that we are in, how do we create jobs in this country and get Canadians working, how do we get Canada working again? These are the issues that I think confronts this country.

I wish my friend would comment on those, because once those are accomplished, I am sure, and as my colleague has stated, then this country will resolve those other areas once this country starts to move and shows a progression and the impetus that has made us great for 124 years and I am sure will keep us great for another 124 years.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his kind words and for his comments. I agree very much with what he has to say. I think the constitutional issues have overly preoccupied us here in Canada. For ordinary Canadians it is matters such as jobs, such as the economy, such as finding jobs and making basic economic decisions that really preoccupy them much more than the Constitution.

I would like to take his points a little further because I believe that, in Canada, at this juncture in history, as we end the 20th century and begin the 21st century, we really are, in a sense, failing our role in history and our place in history by spending so much of our energies on constitutional matters, in the face of world difficulties, which Canada is so well placed to deal with.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): For example, we have a reputation as a nation of peacemakers. We are considered by people all over the world as a country that is able to resolve its conflicts, to resolve conflicts in the Middle East, in Asia, in other parts of the world, and yet, at home, we are tormented by constitutional conflicts of a much lesser nature.

We are facing, in the world, a situation in which the planet is under environmental attack on a world scale. Canada is one of the largest countries in the world and one of the cleanest and most environmentally promising and we have a duty to history to be the leaders in securing a sustainable future for all of mankind. If we dissipate that energy in constitutional wrangling, we are not only denying our responsibility to ourselves, we are denying our responsibility to mankind. I think that is the perspective in which our constitutional discussions should be cast.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in hearing the question asked by my colleague from the riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, where he indicated that ordinary Canadians are most interested, most concerned about their economic plight and that much of the constitutional debate is motivated, both within Quebec and outside of it, by a great deal of concern about the effects of the actions of this government on their daily lives.

Yet they are going to have a constitutional committee, according to the government, consisting of 25, of which 10 will be senators and the rest will consist of a majority of members who have the support of no more than 15 per cent of the population. Even the Liberal proposal, which suggests adding five to that, would still leave a majority on that committee consisting of unelected senators and a majority of men and women who have been responsible for the crises in the everyday lives of the men and women of Canada.

Therefore, I ask the hon. member: Would it not be a more appropriate vehicle for constitutional change to have a constituent assembly that would get rid of the distrust that Canadians certainly do feel about politicians? I would ask his opinion about a constituent assembly and defend any alternative position in the face of those facts which are going to lead to the distrust and the doubt of Canadians about the validity of the constitutional process that is to begin with the motion that we have before us today.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The first point to make is that the first job of parliamentarians is to do their job, and this is the parliamentarian's job. I hope that as a member of Parliament, he will be willing to do his job.

An hon. member: That is what he got elected for.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Second, we all know that this is the Canada round and we want all parts of Canada to participate. We know that the constituent assembly would not have Quebec participate. Therefore, this mechanism will enable all parts of Canada, including Quebec, to participate, and for that reason we should give it a chance and allow it to work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important and interesting motion that is before the House.

The motion deals with the setting up of a committee to look into making recommendations to Parliament and the Government of Canada on proposals for a renewed Canada.

As you will recall, in the original document which was agreed to by all of the provinces, the original document I am referring to was the document which was signed by the former premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. Brian Peckford.

There was a clause in that constitutional agreement which said that every year there would be a review of the jurisdiction of the federal government in one of our primary resources, which was the fishery. However, consequently, after that signing took place, that particular clause was removed, it was no longer there. It was removed because it was thought by certain premiers, after what they said were consultations with the fishing industry, that the jurisdiction of the federal government should not be questioned on the business of the fishing industry.

I want to put on the record my concern that this particular item must be revisited. It must be examined, impartially, by the members of Parliament and the senators who are on this committee, from the point of view that it is constitutionally unworkable to have provincial governments with total jurisdiction over fish plants and the federal government with total jurisdiction over the fish.

In other words, everything presently under our present Constitution that happens on land is in the total jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Everything that happens in the water or on top of the water, in the ocean, is under the total jurisdiction of the federal government.

The problem we have today in Canada, in this primary industry of the fishery, is we have fish plants that are closing under provincial jurisdiction under the Constitution because the federal government is cutting back on the quotas, that is the amount of fish that can be fed into those fish plants to keep them operating. Obviously, this is an unworkable situation.

The provincial governments, it is said, went too far in giving approvals to have numerous fish plants built around the coastline of eastern Canada in the past 10 years.

It is cited by many experts that that is why now there are so many fish plants in trouble and that is why they are closing: because the provincial governments have total control over the issuing of all licences for onshore facilities.

The fact of the matter is that the federal government today sits down. The people responsible sit down in the federal government. They make the decisions on fish quotas and how much fish will be caught by Canadian fishermen, by what boats, by what companies, and in what manner.

In other words, the federal government determines on an annual basis whether or not fish plants will be open in Quebec, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Prince Edward Island and in Newfoundland, and in British Columbia. The federal government is in total control over that.

I noticed just the other day some good news for the Canadian fishery. Here I must give some credit to the federal government. I have not ever given the federal government, this present government, any credit for anything it has done in the fishery because, as you know, I have a great objection to this government issuing fishing licences to foreign nations to fish inside Canada's 200-mile zone.

What happened the other day was this: just prior to the Prime Minister going to Germany, the Canadian government made a decision to cancel all fishing licences to German vessels inside the Canadian 200-mile zone. That may not sound like a big announcement. The announcement was never made, and of course even today if somebody were to ask the Minister of Fisheries in this Chamber the question of what happened, how come Germany now is no longer permitted to have fishing vessels inside the 200-mile zone, I believe the Minister of Fisheries would probably stand up and give some excuse, but try to smooth over the fact that the federal government has done this.

To their credit, they have done this. I will tell you how they did it a couple of weeks ago. Normally, Germany has seven factory-freezer trawler licences issued to their fleet to fish inside Canada's 200-mile zone. Those seven licences are held in St. John's, Newfoundland, to fish 9,000 tonnes of fish. Now, 9,000 tonnes of fish is about as much as it would take to keep a fish plant going in Eastern Canada.

Last year while there were problems in Germany with the unification issue, the German fleet did not come in to pick up its seven licences. There was terrible confusion. The actual quotas were held in the name of the German Democratic Republic. They did not come in to St. John's harbour and pick up those licences, and they just sat there. They did not even fish what is called the NAPPO quota of 485 tonnes of redfish in zone 3-LN, which is a zone outside the 200-mile zone and inside the 200-mile zone off the east coast of Newfoundland.

This year, this summer, we have this big change that has been made. That is, the federal government has given the orders: no more licences to be issued to the German fleet.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I really am developing a headache straining to understand what fish quotas have to do with constitutional change and the structure of whatever process is to be used for the purpose of constitutional amendment. Is there not a requirement on the part of parliamentarians when they enter into debate to enter that debate with relevant debate?

Mr. Nicholson: I have some of the same fears as the member for Windsor—St. Clair. I had considered interrupting the hon. member on the same point of order until he got to the part about giving credit to the federal government. I think he would probably find unanimous consent in the House to at least complete that thought before he gets back on the Canadian Constitution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have no problem with what the hon. member is saying and I know he is coming to the relevance as far as today's debate is concerned. I think the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls has the floor.

Mr. Baker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I might add for the benefit of those hon. members who are wondering what the subject has to do with constitutional reform that is is said that fish gives you brains.

I would suggest that members in the Chamber, at least some of them, eat more fish. If they did, they would realize that all provinces in Canada under the original proposal, the original constitutional agreement, before the Meech Lake problem, all the provinces of eastern Canada, all the provinces of western Canada, all signed the document that said explicitly that the question of fisheries jurisdiction will become a part of the new constitutional formula and at the end of every year there would be called a meeting of all the first ministers and they would specifically discuss fisheries jurisdiction. That was in the original proposal. I suggest that that certainly has relevance in any debate concerning agreement on the Constitution.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, I was giving some credit to the federal government for what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans did the other day, which he will not admit, because I presume he thinks it would be an embarrassment because here we are having these nice cosy talks with the new government of Germany and on the other hand cancelling all their fishing licences. That is why there was no announcement made. I am simply bringing it up publicly because it was never brought up publicly to show what can be done by the federal government to satisfy the very question that the provincial premiers had in the beginning.

Why was that clause put in the original constitutional agreement that was signed by every premier? It was because there is a serious problem in this nation between jurisdictions, between what is in the Constitution now and what is the law of Canada now, and what it should be. You cannot have—and the premiers recognize this—one level of government, namely the provinces, deciding on what type of industry there will be on the land if you have the other level of government, namely the federal government, deciding on what fish is going to be caught.

That took up a lot of time.

To get back to my point, I must admit that after looking at the charts for this year, the German licences are still held outside the 200 mile zone by NAFO, but the federal government has decided not to issue any inside.

The reason I bring this up is that is one nation with 9,000 tonnes of fish that can be used by the provincially approved fish plants in eastern Canada to keep them going. Our problem on land is that there are an additional seven foreign nations which, through the Department of External Affairs and the federal Department of Fisheries have today quotas inside the 200-mile zone that can be used by the provincially licensed fish plants to keep them going if they had the fish.

• (2050)

Regarding the original drafters of that new constitutional agreement, I do not want to give credit to any one premier here because I think there was a general understanding among the premiers that this was a serious question which could only be settled during constitutional talks.

Why would you have a constitutional discussion involving the areas of public expenditure and the areas of raising money if you could not as well have a discussion on perhaps one of the largest industries in eastern Canada and how it is run by two governments not knowing what the other is doing?

The industry itself as so defined, the companies, is not in agreement with having in the constitutional accord the specific reference to a continual review of jurisdiction in this primary industry.

I would suggest that this committee call in for hearings and examination our fishermen and our fish plant workers regarding the question of jurisdiction over fish quotas.

The hon. member said hearings or herrings. Even the question of herring is very important because there are many foreign nations which have herring quotas inside our 200-mile zone.

I think that the entire question should be re-examined, perhaps even above the objections of some of the industry and above the objections of some of the premiers because I know that some of the premiers will not be comfortable with that examination.

I think it is so, so important. The question of whether thousands upon thousands of Canadians will be able to have jobs next year is very important. The question of thousands and thousands of fishermen being able to fish is very important.

Subjects that can be dealt with the by constitutional committee bring a human element into constitutional discussions because, quite frankly, the common person today says: "Well, if those politicians would only shut up, we would not have problems in the Constitution". That is the general feeling in this country.

They say we have had a commission of inquiry here, one in Quebec. There is one by this party, one by that party, one by this provincial government. Here is another committee about to meet and they say: "If the politicians would only shut up, we would not have such a problem in this country today."

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I was very much taken by a lot of the comments by the hon. member as he made a transition from fish to loud mouthed politicians. I gather that is a reference to the distrust shared by so many Canadians about the exclusive role of politicians in the constitutional process.

Since he did not say anything really about the government motion, his own party's motion or our proposal for a constituent assembly, I would like to address that issue.

I ask this question in the context of one who has in his travels around the world seen a great deal of respect and a great deal of puzzlement about what Canadians are going through.

Ours is a country that has made an awful lot of progress and has done well in accommodating two official languages, two cultures, for much of its history, and has done well in accommodating itself to a new Canada which is far more diverse and which has within it the prospect of a great deal of potential based on that diversity.

As the member for Western Arctic indicated that she had a constituency, I would claim a constituency as well, one which has been excluded from the constitutional debate. I speak from the context of a family that has been in this country even before confederation, considerably before confederation, and not yet have we been included in the constitutional process.

Someone has said that politicians speak for the people. The politicians speak for the majority of the people, and a Constitution, particularly a charter of rights, must address the rights of minorities. The plea of Quebec is the plea of a minority in the country, and there are other minorities that have to be addressed as well.

I would also say that coming from Windsor I come from a community whose majority consists of the new minorities, so-called, in this country.

In every constitutional process the focus has been on a debate between two founding peoples as if they were the only people involved in the debate. The consequence of this was that in 1982 I listened with great disappointment as first the women were shut out and then had to fight to ensure that equality of the sexes was included in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I was very disappointed when the charter of rights came out of that round of negotiations with the notwithstanding clause which compromises the equality of certain members of the Canadian community. That would not have happened if there had been the sense among politicians to understand that something besides simply the majorities has to be recognized.

My question to the hon. member is this: by what means does he intend that the committee just proposed by the government or as amended by his party will ensure the participation of those other minorities in a way that consistently presents the views of those communities and not of their parties? I would like to know how he is going to deal with that with this committee and I would like to hear his arguments against a constituent assembly which would address the participation and inclusion of those who have been excluded up until now.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised many subjects in his question. He has raised many subjects and I would need, as any member would, hours to address each one of them.

I might suggest to the hon. member in his suggestion on the constituent assembly idea that the first constituent assembly that we had in Canada was what was called the National Assembly in 1947. The hon. gentleman might be surprised that I remember this quite well. In 1947, '48 and '49 a constituency assembly met in the nation of Newfoundland to consider the options. It talked for three long years. There were campaigns and every evening around the radio—we had no television in those days—everybody would tune in and you would always go to the house of someone who had a radio, a battery radio. Not everybody had a radio, and the battery would only last for so long because there was no electricity. You would go to this person's house, tune in and listen to the recording of the day's proceedings on these very large long playing recordings at 78 rpm.

For three years those discussions went on in that constituent assembly. They went on and there was a final vote taken. It was a fascinating thing to listen to. After those three years—the point I am getting at is this—of discussion, the National Assembly, the constituent assembly of representatives from all over the province decided against even looking at Canada, after three years. It did not want to look at Canada.

Do you know how Newfoundland became part of Canada? Do you know what happened, Mr. Speaker? What happened was that the advocates for joining Canada went around with a petition to all Newfoundlanders outside of the constituent assembly and got permission to place union with Canada as one of the options on the ballot for the national referendum which took place in the province of Newfoundland.

My point to the hon. member is that in the only case of a constituent assembly we have on the books in this country met for three years and decided something that was not even on the ballot paper in the referendum that followed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to yield the floor to the member from Newfoundland.

We could hear another three hours. I would have asked him this question. I will not but I will mention it for him to ponder. While he was talking, I was looking at a public opinion poll which said that almost two-thirds of Canadians, 68 per cent outside Quebec and 57 per cent in Quebec, believe a constituent assembly could help chart a constitutional course for the nation.

A constituent assembly was described for polling purposes as a body made up of Canadians from all regions and all walks of life who would meet and put together a constitutional proposal which Canada would then offer to Quebec. Lo and behold, Premiers Clyde Wells of Newfoundland, Frank McKenna of New Brunswick, Bob Rae of Ontario and Grant Devine of Saskatchewan have called for such a process to ensure that Canadians do not feel left out of the next constitutional round as they did during the failed Meech Lake talks.

Had I wanted to be nasty, I would have said to the hon. member: "You are a Liberal. You are from Newfoundland. Premier Wells is a Liberal. He is from Newfoundland. He wants a constituent assembly. Why do you differ from Premier Wells?" Perhaps we will hear another three-hour speech on the topic of fish later on in the debate.

An hon. member: His brother is a deputy premier.

Mr. Waddell: He can ask his brother then.

I rise to speak on the constitutional debate. It is the first time I have spoken in the House on the Constitution since I spoke on the Meech debate. That was on Thursday, October 22, 1987. It is with some fear and trepidation that I rise, because the last time after my speech and after I voted against Meech I lost my critic area and was exiled from my party, just for a short period. I am not complaining. In some countries they take dissenters out and shoot them. This was a relatively minor penalty.

I want to quote from my speech on that night when I said:

> Let me begin by saying that I too believe it is important to get the signature of the Quebec Government on the Canadian Constitution. However, it is not sufficient a priority that nothing else matters. The real priority is a good and sound Constitution for Canada.

Near the end of my speech I said:

> I favour the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society in order to protect the language and culture of Quebec. But the Meech Lake Accord goes beyond Quebec's distinctiveness. This is the essence of the Accord for me. The price paid was to give all the provinces rights in federal powers and institutions: the Senate, the courts, immigration, this broadly-based premiers' conference, the opting out and the spending power.

I concluded by saying that Canadians:

> —share a greater loyalty to Canada than the sum of the loyalties toward the provinces. That is the flaw in the Meech Lake Accord and that is why it has to be rejected.

I would be less than human if I did not say that is exactly what happened. I think we have to face why Canadians rejected Meech, what it means for the country, what it means for Quebec, what it means for this debate, and what it means for setting up this committee.

I believe that Meech was rejected because of the process and because of the substance. The elites in English Canada, including members of the House of Commons and the parties, were not in touch with their people and the people overthrew the elites.

What was to have been Quebec's round became the provinces' round. To obtain the provinces' agreement to Quebec's five points the federal government agreed to enlarge the powers of all the provinces. That was not acceptable to English Canada. The defeat of Meech, it is said, has revived the dragon of Quebec nationalism.

I do not think that argument will really wash. We would have been in a worse condition if Meech had passed. By rejecting Meech we have preserved the Supreme Court as a national court. We made sure that Senate reform was not translated into nothing more than a Senate, nothing more than a repository for provincial instead of federal hacks and mediocrities. We thwarted a transfer of powers to the provinces that would have undermined federal programs and institutions.

I ask you, and the member for Saint-Denis as well: Does anyone really believe that if Meech Lake had been adopted Quebec nationalists, who he has fought so strongly against, would have been satisfied, that the supporters of independence would have been satisfied?

Nationalists want fundamental restructuring of the Canadian Constitution and the position of Quebec in it. Indépendantistes in Quebec want a sovereign state and separatism.

I believe it is time that we took Quebec's movement for independence very seriously. I think we have to be honest with each other. We are facing a national crisis and we may indeed see Canada breaking up.

I wish the member would listen to me. I listened to him. I am putting forward a position, I think with some past credibility, which reflects the views of my electorate.

We need to take stock of what kind of Canada we want. We have to advocate it very clearly and we have to be honest with our people. We need voices to speak for Canada. The Prime Minister has proven to be a failed deal maker and not a nation builder.

The right hon. member for Yellowhead, the present minister, is an honest and decent man. However, his community of communities view of Canada is a minority view of Canada and has consistently been rejected by the Canadian electorate.

When Sir John A. Macdonald ran on one Canada, when Pierre Trudeau ran on one Canada, when John Diefenbaker ran on one Canada, they were all swept into power with the support of Quebec, I might add.

I think he is taking a minority position. The premiers speak for the provinces and not for Canada.

Another process like the last one we saw at Meech Lake, which this government resolution sets in place tonight, will simply result in further concessions to the provinces and further undermining of Canadian federalism.

We can change this. The member for Yukon set forward a new process, another way of doing things. She said this afternoon in the House of Commons: "We want Canada to succeed. That success is dependent on the full participation of Canadians from the outset of the process". She did not speak hypocritically.

• (2110)

The New Democratic Party itself had to face this issue internally. We had to put our own process in order before we could talk about other people's processes. The leader of our party took our constitutional committee, which had been the committee of the leaders, the federal leader and the provincial leader, and expanded it to include other people, other members of Parliament and provincial members, women, aboriginal people, minority people and so on. We expanded it and we got a better document.

We also set up a task force from our caucus and we looked at reform of Parliament. Members present have to be blind if they are not seeing the Reform Party speaking out about parliamentary reform and the Bloc Quebecois also talking about a fundamentally different sort of parliamentary reform but a fundamental change in the federal Parliament.

We put together a task force and we went out and spoke to people. We took our constitutional committee report, our task force report, and we went to our federal convention in Halifax and presented them to the people.

I said that we have to be honest. Now be honest. Our members, the militants in our party, do not want to discuss the Constitution. They see other problems.

In British Columbia, my province, we have problems with the forestry, with aboriginal claims, with the environment. In Saskatchewan there is a major farm crisis. Ontario is being deindustrialized with a loss of jobs. The maritimes want to diversify their economy. Of course, I do not have to talk about the problems of unemployment in Montreal and other parts of Quebec. There are other problems.

Ask any high school kids and they will tell you that the environment is the number one problem in Canada.

I am proud of the leader of our party has pushed our party in this direction. We have to deal with this matter, the matter of the Constitution. We have a national crisis.

Members think it is funny. I do not think it is very funny. I am trying to put forward an honest position on this particular issue.

In this debate tonight the New Democratic Party has set forward a constituent assembly of a broad section of Canadians. The government has taken a position—and it backed it up with argument and speakers—that we should have a parliamentary committee. That is, as it argues, in the parliamentary tradition.

The Liberals spoke. I heard the member for Papineau who spoke. I am not quite sure what the member said, but I am quite sure of his position. He talked about our position as a flight of fancy. Do we not need some fancy in this country? Do we not need some imagination? Do we not need some creative thinking? Do we not need a means to give Canadians some real participation and some real power in constitution making?

The member for Yukon has pointed out that a parliamentary committee will be controlled by the government. We will have a government majority. It will have before it the government program. She said: "Once again Canadians will be outside looking in". I say that we are in an extraordinary situation. We face the possible break-up of this country in 18 months and we partly brought it here in our own.

The Prime Minister insisted that Meech could not be changed. He insisted that if Meech were rejected it was a rejection of Quebec. It has become a self-fulfilling prophecy. I understand how deeply hurt Quebecers feel, and I feel for them too. I think together we can restructure a new Constitution. What we are suggesting are some new ways of doing it.

The new ways would include a constituent assembly on which we would have MPs, MLAs from the provinces, people from the cities of this country, people from the rural chambers of commerce, native people, multicultural groups, women, business and labour taking part in this. I have great faith in Canadians and I believe that Canadians can speak to each other, as the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands found out when she travelled with the Beaudoin—Edwards Committee. Canadians want a constituent assembly. They want to speak to each other, and I think Canadians can solve these major problems. We share more than what leads us apart in this country.

What about Quebec? The Quebec National Assembly rejects a constituent assembly. I say so what? So what if Bourassa or Parizeau or Bouchard or the Quebec media or the editorial writers reject this? So what? I trust the Quebec people. I trust their good sense. I trust their judgment. I think they should overthrow their elites like we did at Meech Lake, the English Canadians, so that they can get a viewpoint, because I think they want to stay in Canada but with a restructured and better Canada.

We can have a constituent assembly that includes Quebec as well. I want to remind the government that it has a very tenuous hold on power. It has about 15 per cent of the electorate. Constitutionally, of course, it has a right to govern and we recognize that. It is a very, very slim hold on power, a very tenuous mandate. It is the most unpopular government in Canadian history. The Prime Minister who supposedly is going to lead the process has failed before at Meech Lake, has failure around his neck, and is the most unpopular Prime Minister we have had. He is a deal maker, not a nation maker.

We need a new process. The government needs a new process, and the process will be a constituent assembly.

The Minister for International Trade may think it is funny, but I would ask him to look at what happened to Meech Lake, why Canadians rejected it, and why we need a process that is going to work now.

I want to speak to my own party and people who are watching our broadcast tonight. I think we have a lot in the New Democratic Party to contribute to this debate. Tommy Douglas said that the whole basis of national unity is founded on the principle of equal treatment for all and special privileges for none. I think we should remember that.

We have to contribute three major points to this debate. The first major point is that we have to insist on social and economic equality in this country. We must point out that the federal spending power, the transfer payments, equalization payments and regional development policies have addressed the economic inequalities in this country and have produced a relatively equal country.

We have to insist on national standards for social programs. That is how we get medicare. That is how we will get national child care in the future, day care. That is how we will get national environmental programs. We have to lead the fight on that.

Second, at the same time we have to stand up for a distinct society in Quebec. It will not be easy to say that all across Canada. Quebec is distinct. It has been distinct since 1774. Quebec is where the French language is predominant. The civil code is a distinct legal system. Quebec has its own pension plan. Quebec collects its own income tax. Quebec has a special agreement on immigration with Canada. We should not be afraid to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

How far do we go? If we want to face the real question, how far do we go to accommodate Quebec? I think the answer to that is: We go some distance without sacrificing Canada and its institutions in the process. There is a line, but as an English Canadian politician who voted against Meech Lake I want to say clearly tonight that we want Quebec in Canada. We need Quebec in Canada. We are prepared to make the reasonable accommodations to have Quebec in Canada. It will take some courage to say that in western Canada and in other parts of Canada.

Third, I think a great contribution we can make in the debate is to keep insisting, as we did in 1981–82, that aboriginal peoples have a real place in this Constitution. It is their Constitution too. We should insist that they not only be part of the constituent assembly but that they be in fact a part of the Constitution in the sense of recognizing self-government.

I want to conclude by a quote from Tom Berger, a former judge who was speaking in Calgary at the Martland lectures. I quote: "I want to see Canada survive with Quebec. Staying together is important not only to ourselves. If people of different languages, cultures, races and religions can live together harmoniously within a great federal state, perhaps they may learn to live together harmoniously in a wider world. In Canada, we have democratic institutions. Et je dis cela au Bloc québécois, we have democratic institutions, the rule of law, and an educated populace. If we cannot find a way to live, what peoples, what nations can?

Quebec, like English Canada, has a stake in the survival of these ideas in the world. I think he is right.

Let me conclude, if I might, by saying that we advocate a new process, a radical process, a different and creative process, as the member for Yukon said, to include Canadians, to have a constituent assembly, to get a framework of constitutional ideas, to take that perhaps to the people and then to Parliament, and we will have a new Constitution for Canada.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care and did not interrupt my friend for Port Moody—Coquitlam, but I should say that while I do not agree with his point of view I know that all of us bring with us our certain political philosophy into the debate. As much as we want to be non-partisan, we carry that with us.

What disappoints me about his remarks is that he camouflaged them so much in his speech. I think the true philosophy of my friend is the one which he expressed during his leadership race, about two years ago I think it was. I watched him on local cablevision here in Ottawa. I had the thrill of watching my friend as he was contending for the leadership of his party, and he said that the Meech Lake Accord had to be defeated because it was a threat to the future of the welfare state.

That is the bottom line for this member. I wish he would come clean with all of us and say that is his obsession with any kind of government structure, that he wants to preserve the welfare state and the future of the welfare state. Aside from a very pessimistic view of the future of Canada, to make that the ultimate goal, what bothers me is that he stands here tonight and says: "We want Quebec, we want Quebec". However he sacrificed it a year ago in order to preserve the structure of a welfare state.

I wonder if the member would tell us tonight if that is still his bottom line, that regardless of what structure we have, whether it is a constituent assembly that he proposes and very few other people want or whatever, the format is for coming to a decision as to the future structure of the political system in Canada, whether his bottom line still is the preservation of a welfare state.

Mr. Waddell: May I please respond. I might say that the member mentioned he had the thrill of watching me on local cable television. I am sorry, I did not realize that suffered from insomnia and needed my help to put him to sleep.

My bottom line is not a welfare state. Of course I am partisan and biased and I have my positions, and I will set them out in a minute. I want to preserve a civilized Canada.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Waddell: That is what I want to preserve. I think Canada is a civilized country and I think this government is destroying Canada, quite frankly. With the combination of Meech Lake, with the decentralizing forces to the provinces, taking the power away from the national government and letting the provinces into the federal institutions to control the Senate, to control the court, to have the premiers conference institutionalized, and so on, I think is going to incapacitate the federal government.

That is what his party wants to do. It believes in room for capital. It really believes in less government. That is his position, that is his bias and his government. People say: "The Prime Minister does not have any vision". I think he does have a vision. He wants to deregulate, to privatize—

An hon. member: A corporate vision.

Mr. Waddell: It is a corporate vision of Canada and it is wrecking this country. You decentralize the way Meech was doing, and then you add to it the free trade deal in which Canadians start looking north-south instead of east-west, and gradually all those national institutions and the rope that holds Canada together begins to slip. We can see it happening. We are losing this country.

I have my biases like he has his biases. I want to see a civilized Canada with good social services. That is what makes Canada different from the United States. That is what makes us a great country. That is why they said we are second only to Japan in being the greatest country in the world to live in, but his government is taking it apart. I pushed and I will continue to push for a strong government which can hold Canada together, one government which acts for Canada and is above the sum of its parts.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, in all the years that I have been sitting in Parliament, I have tried to understand the philosophy of the New Democratic Party.

An hon. member: It's impossible!

Mr. Prud'homme: I have made considerable efforts. I have a lot of respect for the New Democratic Party, I have a lot of respect for most of the hon. members sitting on that side; those people have a notion of what Canada could be.

Very briefly, since I know I have only a few minutes, I would like to ask the hon. member, as well as all those who are watching me from the other side—I have circled their names but perhaps I should not name them—but I ask them to try to understand, as I was saying this afternoon, what Canada is all about. What could make us build a country called Canada?

For 27 years—and I ask the hon. member to think about it—for 27 years, ever since I have been a member of Parliament, I have welcomed here hundreds of young people every year.

[English]

I hear from hundreds of young people each year for 27 years. Sometimes I do not know how to explain Canada, so I invite them for a walk around Parliament and show them what Canada is all about by showing them three monuments. "Go behind the Library of Parliament", I say that to English Canada.

[Translation]

I tell those who speak French not to get angry if, when speaking about Canada, I prefer to do it in English because those are the ones I have to convince that this country is worth saving. Go around. I almost apologize to my fellow French-speaking compatriots, but since Mr. Bouchard now does it with elegance, so do I.

[English]

Go and see the first monument behind the Library on the Senate side. Why are there monuments to two people there, Baldwin and Lafontaine? It goes back a long way.

By the way, I asked the Speaker to have their names reprinted because they have faded over the years, and it is shocking. I hope tonight that Public Works and others will make sure to reprint the names of Baldwin and Lafontaine. That was the spirit of prior Canada.

Then go back, as I said this afternoon: Why is it that we have those two monuments? Parliament is only supposed to honour Prime Ministers. I say to English Canada to come here and go around Parliament. I say to the NDP member that he should go around Parliament tonight and ask why there are two monuments, Baldwin and Lafontaine, together. In 1867 there was Mr. Cartier and Mr. Macdonald. This is not supposed to be, but that was the spirit of what built Canada.

I say that to the millions of new Canadians whom I have always defended, whom I always will defend for their pride, like mine. They must understand the history of Canada, and the history of Canada is right here on the Hill.

We do not need to go to the library. We do not need to be a scholar to understand the spirit of Canada. Go around the building tonight and you will see Cartier and Macdonald. One was a Prime Minister; the other one was not. Yet they are there together.

Go behind the library, young colleagues and friends. I am not aggressive, but when you talk about Canada I cannot do otherwise but say; "Open your eyes. Go back to the spirit and the rest will follow, but go back first to the spirit of what built this country".

What built this country was an entente. Call it an agreement, call it a pact, call it a law, call it what you want. Constitutionalists will make a debate on each of the words I have used tonight. I am not interested, even though I have some experience in law but never practised in reality.

I am not interested. Canadians are not interested. They want to have a country that works, that functions, in which people are not the same. First we have to go back to the beginning, the history of Canada, the spirit of Canada. Dear colleagues, and I could name Mr. Friesen, Mr. Domm, Mr. Vankoughnet, Mr. Horner, Madam Feltham and others, please, all of you, just walk around Parliament before you go and get your inspiration there. Come back tomorrow morning. Get your inspiration and you will see that if we all make an effort to go back to the spirit that built this country, we will show the rest of the world.

The rest of the world will know that together we can have a different kind of country in which Marcel Prud'homme will remain Marcel Prud'homme and Benno Friesen, with whom I fought vigorously on certain issues, will remain Benno Friesen. Horner, who I see there, will remain Horner. With all due kindness, as I always say, the Paproskis of Canada will remain the Paproskis of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think that really requires a reply, but I will allow 30 seconds. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: I am delighted, and I want to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis who is respected in this House for his wisdom. He asked me to go and look at the statues of two great Canadians, and I accept his invitation. Perhaps we could go together after the debate.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, earlier, I heard an NDP member explain that as a member of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, she had been to Quebec city for the first time in her life, and that all of a sudden she understood —Imagine what that says about this committee: A member from the West who goes to Quebec City for the first time and all of a sudden understands —A revelation from Heaven? A revelation, my eye! No wonder the New Democratic Party has lost touch with Quebec, a New Democratic Party that wants a constituent assembly without Quebec, without the Quebec National Assembly, and that claims to understand Quebec!It is just a repeat of the political manoeuvre by Chrétien and Ouellet in 1982. You are making the same costly mistake that shocked so many Quebecers, but you don't seem to realize what you are doing. However, I have known you for the past seven years I have been here.

Basically, you are good people and good Canadians. I think you just don't understand what is happening in Quebec, because these people live in other provinces. Am I going to blame them because I don't want a country in their image? Of course not. Let them have a country in their own image. I hope they will have the kind of country they want, with the laws they want, with their own culture and their own traditions and their own language. And we in Quebec will also have our own country with our own culture, our traditions, our language and our business.

An hon. member: Never!

Mr. Gérin: Not never, my friend from Western Canada, but soon. Soon we will have our own country, because this country is two countries. These are two totally different visions of the same country. Since the conference in Victoria 20 years ago, we have had 20 years of constitutional negotiations and we are no further than we were then. We were unable to come up with an amending formula except in 1982, but this was at the expense of Quebec. That was the last time. It was the second, the first and the last time because this will never happen again, whatever the NDP may think, whatever the Conservatives, the Anglo establishment party of this country may think, whatever Jean Chrétien may think, who has just concocted an agreement today with the Conservatives, probably another plot to shaft Quebec.

This, Mr. Speaker, is entirely unacceptable to Quebecers. For 20 years —and the hon. member for Saint-Denis who has been here for 27 years has seen quite a few constitutional conferences. He saw Quebec's Premiers try to make some headway, starting with Duplessis, Lesage, Johnson, Bertrand, Bourassa, Lévesque, and now again Bourassa, but they never got anywhere. And you really think we are going to go on like this? We are bankrupting this country and Quebec as a result of this situation.

In the 70s, to buy peace and camouflage the fact that Canada was coming apart at the seams, Trudeau started borrowing billions and billions and gave a few hundred million to Newfoundland and a few hundred million to the West to mollify the farmers and to the Maritimes, a little bit to Quebec, mostly peanuts. Today, in 1991, we have a country that is in debt to the tune of more than $400 billion. Mr. Speaker, do you have any idea how many zeros that is? Four hundred billion dollars worth of deficit? This year we are going to pay nearly $45 billion in interest alone. While Canadians are paying $110 billion in taxes, $45 billion of that amount is used to pay the interest on the debt. Why? Because we have not been able to deal with the fundamental problem in this country which is the Constitution. Because we keep trying to solve a problem that is impossible to solve. Everything has been tried: the strong arm method à la Trudeau and the conciliatory method à la Mulroney. All Quebec Premiers have tried. We have tried any number of things, but it was no use.

Today, we spent the whole day talking, not about what Quebecers would like to talk about the economy, jobs and the environment no, we still hear people of good will say that after 20 years, we have to persevere like the bull in front of a 20-foot thick wall who keeps saying: It doesn't matter, we will get through somehow. This has got to stop. We can no longer afford to go on like this. Quebecers can no longer afford to ignore the real problems.

The time will come when people will have to decide. In Quebec, we made our decision. In Quebec, we appointed the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. Thirty-six people, eighteen elected and eighteen representatives of all groups of Quebec society. The unions were represented. Business was represented. We were generous. We even let André Ouellet in. Not bad. We even let Jean-Pierre Hogue go to the Commission. Of course, he didn't speak. When he did, it wasn't worth much, but in any case, we let him come as a representative of the Progressive Conservative Party. We even let Lucien Bouchard from the Bloc Québécois in. At the Commission, he managed to establish a consensus. The consensus, Mr. Speaker, is on a referendum on sovereignty, by October 1992. If you want to know what is going on, it takes more than just a short visit to Quebec City like the hon. member for the NDP thinks she got a revelation from heaven, like Mr. Ryan.

Come and live in Quebec for a month, even just two weeks. Come and visit the countryside in my riding of Mégantic—Compton— Stanstead. Come and see us. The people will tell you themselves that they are tired of governments like this one, of their beating about the bush, of measures that achieve nothing.

The people of Quebec cannot stand it anymore. I remember, during the 1983-84 campaign, Mr. Mulroney was travelling across the province—back in those days, we thought he was going to be so great —and referring to the Liberals as "those 74 morous".

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that he is using first names. The name is either the Prime Minister or the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean or whoever he addresses, but not their first names.

He has been here a long time now, so he understands that.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Do you think that the people of Stanstead know who I am talking about, Mr. Speaker, when I mention the member Salaberry or whatever? No, they know him by his name. But, when they hear me say Jean-Guy Hudon, on the other hand, then they know I am talking about a very fine man.

But they do not understand— No, no, Mr. Speaker, I heard you and I will do as you said. I will not name—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will not mention it again, but if the hon. member keeps doing it I will cut him off and we will go to the next speaker. That is the decorum in this House.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, they know very well that the member for Salaberry is a very fine man, but they wonder how he stays with the Conservative Party. That, Mr. Speaker, they cannot figure out, but they know he is a fine dedicated man. However, one can only wonder how the member for Salaberry and his colleagues from Quebec who replaced the Liberal "morous"— I used no name, Mr. Speaker, just a collective designation.

We are wondering how these members who are supporting today a plan of action designed to renew Canada can, at the same time, endorse the recent Speech from the Throne in which the government announced publicly that it is taking over the area of education, an area that Quebec considers off limits. So, on the one hand, they advocate a renewed federalism, along the same lines as Quebec somewhat, while on the other, they take over some areas of its jurisdiction. How much do you figure this double jurisdiction regarding just about every department and ministry has cost us, Quebecers? Try and explain to the agricultural producer in my riding why it is he has to go to the Quebec Farm Credit Bureau on one side of street and to Farm Credit Corporation Canada on the other. There are civil servants on both sides of the street, but too many civil servants only make things worse. It costs hundreds of millions of dollars in the area of housing, Mr. Speaker.

The same is true in the area of income, Mr. Speaker, as well as in that of manpower training. It is like that in every sector. They not only go in the field of education and manpower training, for which there is a consensus, there is unanimity in Quebec that manpower training must strictly be a jurisdiction of the Government of Quebec. And it is easy to understand why it must be a provincial jurisdiction.

In the field of education, our high schools, our technical schools and our universities are there to teach people a profession, to make them learn. It would be normal that Quebecers who need retraining later on in their lives and in their jobs, to be able to go back to the field of education.

But no! They will have to go through another system, a federal system. I imagine it should be better, because it is Canada. Education is another sacred sector for Quebec. The political minister for Quebec—I will not name him, Mr. Speaker, but you too would be able to name him—the political Minister for Quebec just said again that there should be a regional development department for Quebec, another sector which, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission said, belongs to Quebec. When are you going to mind your own business? When are they going to mind their own business, Mr. Speaker?

Immediately—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. We have a few minutes left. I would like to hear the hon. member's speech. If we do not let him finish we will not get on with the next speakers, please.

Mr. Gérin: It is an old tactic to try to interrupt someone who is talking. Instead of listening and try to understand, they make jokes, they say anything, they talk among themselves. Now, it is too late; they are not able to read, but they should listen or else they should go to their ridings and pay attention to what their constituents have to say. This might be much better than the mediocre results of the government.

You know, when you are only at 11 per cent or so in the polls, as is your case, you should not laugh. If I were you, I would ask myself some very serious questions. Go to your ridings, with your 11 per cent. I see some here who are only at 7 or 8 per cent and they keep going down. In fact, you are so unpopular that, in my opinion you will be below zero pretty soon.

Mr. Speaker, the good thing about all that is being done in this House and will be done later in English Canada is that the latter defines the kind of country it wants to have in the future. I am willing to give them that country.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While the hon. member is sort of getting his breath and getting a drink of water, I would not object to him not losing any time. There have been some interjections on things which I would like to hear him finish. I ask that he get his full time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): His full 30 seconds? The hon. member has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, we are now close to the end of the day. So it is normal to lose your voice when you have taken part in the debate in the most intelligent way possible. It's too bad because there is so much more to say.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my friends in English Canada that they have the right to have their own country. Sovereignty is not a concept too difficult to understand. Sovereignty, Mr. Speaker, is the right to pass your own laws. It is normal to make your own laws, to collect your own taxes and to reach agreements.

In Quebec, we make our own laws in about half of the total jurisdictions. We have our own taxes. We already have international agreements. I think we would be able to take the same responsibilities, but in all jurisdictions. Once English Canada has the right to pass its own laws, to preserve its own traditions, its own culture, I see nothing wrong in the fact that Quebec and English Canada, Upper Canada and Lower Canada as we used to say in the past, join together and build an agreement based not on our differences, as we have been trying to do for the last 25 or 30 years, but try to build an agreement, a superstructure as a Premier calls it, or other kinds of agreements based on our similarities, Mr. Speaker. But as a sine qua non condition, the agreement would have to be reached within preceded by the sovereignty of Quebec.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it really is a sad moment in this House to hear the member of the Bloc Quebecois. I do not believe his comments reflect at all the sentiment of the majority of Quebecers who, like the constituents of London East, are proud of this country's heritage, proud of what this country has done for each and every one of us.

I do not believe that this member speaks for anybody other than himself. It really is hypocritical, because last year not only he, but his leader, accepted the largesse of the Canadian people and the Government of Canada. In fact, his leader from Lac-Saint-Jean accepted $800 million for his riding to get into this House of Commons in a by-election. Really, the Canadian people have been more generous to the member than he has been to the Canadian people tonight. It is absolutely unbelievable that a member in this House can speak of this country in such a fashion.

I believe that this member is stuck in a time warp. This country has been built on generosity and tolerance from all people, from Quebec, the west, Atlantic Canada and Ontario. That is what has built this country. I am not at all sure that he reflects the sentiments of the majority of Canadians at all.

Let me ask him one simple little question. The Bloc Quebecois essentially wants a Quebec without Canada, very much like its counterpart, the Reform Party, which wants a Canada without Quebec. I want to ask him how he can reconcile the fact that he wants the good things of Canada, such as our dollar, our trade, and the economic links to this country and yet is prepared to disavow himself of all the good things that have built this country over the past 124 years.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Of course, we are ready to pay a portion of the huge federal debt which we inherited from that wonderful Canadian federalism.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I have a comment tonight about how the Quebec National Assembly speaks for francophones. It is true in Quebec. It is a provincial government and it speaks for the majority in Quebec. There has been a tradition in Canada, enunciated by Henri Bourassa and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that in the federal House, Quebecers and federal politicians have a responsibility for the French fact and francophone rights throughout Canada. That was the dream of Henri Bourassa and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is wrong to say that this House does not play a role in protecting the French language and the French fact. Someone has to say that. It is a revisionist view of history.

I believe the Bloc Québécois is misleading the Quebec people by pretending that separation will be so easy. Does he not realize that if there is separation there will not be representation by Quebec in a federal bank because the bank will be controlled by English Canadians in the new country of English Canada and Quebecers would have no control over it? Is it not misleading the Quebec people by saying that separation will be easy? Quebec would not be in a federal bank. There would not be a common currency. There would be some question as to whether his farmers would get access to markets in the rest of Canada. So, why are you misleading the Quebec people on this?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: You tell me that the Bank of Canada would be controlled by English Canada. That would not be very different from the present situation. The Bank of Canada serves the interests of Toronto. Look at all the decisions that the Bank of Canada took to help Toronto, to bring the inflation down in Toronto; it had an extremely negative impact on the economy of Quebec and of Montreal. Look what is done in research and development. It's always done in favour of Toronto. You, New Democrats, a party mainly based on regional interests out of Toronto, should be able to understand that Quebec has been a victim for many years. We have thought for a long time that by reforming the Constitution, by reforming the powers, by changing the whole constitutional picture, we could manage to benefit from Canadian federalism. However that seems impossible, it seems impossible to even start changing or amending. That is why we have, as we say in Mégantic—Compton, pulled the plug.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO EXTEND HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take much time on this debate because I know there are still a few members that would like to participate.

Pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of consideration of government motion No. 3.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 1912); the amendment of Mr. Ouellet (p. 1924); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bird (p. 1970).

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I give some credit to the House tonight. One of the members asked why we were bothering to extend the hours of debate. I asked what was wrong with trying to debate the Constitution of Canada. That is why we are prepared to spend some extra time in the House of Commons tonight to talk about and debate a very important issue before not only this House, but all Canadians in the country.

Just before starting with some of my comments, I would like to pay credit to a couple of members in our party who I think have done really an outstanding job in terms of representing our party's views on the Constitution, in particular our two members who have served on what has come to be known as the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands and the member for Yorkton–Melville. I would also like to give special credit to an earlier speaker tonight, the member for Port Moody–Coquitlam.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like a little decorum in the House, please, so that we can get our speeches over with.

If the Whips need to have a conversation would they please go behind the curtain? You are right in the line of the speaker and I cannot see him. I know who the better looking one is too. The hon. member for Prince George–Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Gardiner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know you would like to have a direct line of sight to me.

As I was saying, I would like to really congratulate the member for Port Moody–Coquitlam who has done a great deal in our party in advancing the constitutional debate, and as well our leader, who in the time that she has been the leader of our party has dragged many of us kicking and screaming into the constitutional debate.

If anyone, certainly in our party and in this House, has done a great deal by arguing that we must, in building a new Canada, open up a process on the Constitution it has certainly been the member for Yukon and the leader of the New Democratic Party. At our recent convention in Halifax she was involved in what could have been a very fractious debate. It was an intense debate but it could have been a fractious debate. If a party is to develop any kind of constitutional position it must be united and pull all its disparate parts together, as we and many other parties have had to do. That is one significant challenge and one that she was successful at. We certainly credit her for that.

We are debating tonight a motion to create a committee of this House and members of the Senate, with some provisions to include other people, to discuss further proposals for a Canadian Constitution. This committee will finally receive in September the proposal from the Government of Canada in terms of what we see as their proposal for the future of this country.

I appreciated the comments made earlier by the member for Saint-Denis who very passionately told the House about his vision and what he saw as some of the sense and origin of this country and from where he gets his vision. I would like to share with him an equal vision of this country. As I travel through the part of the country that I represent, I see a vision of my country through the mountains, the forests, the rivers, the people who live and work in that world, and I understand what he said about Parliament and what it should be in this country.

I suggest to any member who has wanted to try and shape this country through a career in politics to go past the Peace Tower when it is lit up at night and feel like one very lucky person to have had a chance to share in the debate about the future of Canada. I would hope that all Canadians who from time to time watch the debates on television, or those Canadians who have an opportunity to come to Ottawa to see their capital, that when they see the Peace Tower it means more than just the top part of a building where a bunch of politicians are trying to figure out how to run the country. The Peace Tower should stand for something in this country, for peace, for unity in Canada, and for their own vision of what our country is trying to establish.

I think it is important that there is intense debate in the country and in this House between our members, members of the Bloc Quebecois, and others. I would hope that we would want to fight over Canada. I would hope it would be important enough—that we would be passionate enough—to have the sense to really fight for what we believe. Thank goodness that people do have some emotion about the country. It would be terrible if this Chamber passed in one sitting all of the stages necessary to pass a Constitution in this country. What a boring thing that would be if we treated our Constitution in that way.

I do not think we should have to apologize if members in this House and people across the country get emotional about what they believe in and what our country should stand for. I am glad about that because clearly those people believe in something, as we should as well.

What are we doing with this committee? I would say that it is with some regret that we speak on this motion presented by the government. Since the failure last June of the Meech Lake Accord, we have had very intense discussions led by the Prime Minister. I remember leaving Ottawa and going to speak to grad ceremonies in my riding and talking about the importance of national unity and how we needed those young people to make their contribution to Canada. That was just a year ago, but that has been a long time in terms of the debate we had in the country on the Constitution.

I say with respect for all of the comments made by learned members and with the effort made by my leader and my party in terms of outlining a broader process to involve more Canadians in the constitutional process, I would hope that after a year we might have done a little more, that maybe tonight rather than debating what may end up to be—we hope it becomes more than that—yet another parliamentary committee. It is unfortunate that tonight we could not have been debating and fine-tuning perhaps the components and aspects of a constituent assembly that I think would go some distance toward showing Canadians that not only do we respect the advice and opinions of Canadians from all walks of life, members of Parliament, members of legislative assemblies, representatives of local governments—a group quite often missed in this debate—but that we want them to be part of a process. A little goes a long way when it comes to showing Canadians that we are prepared to consider their views when we are writing and dealing with the Constitution of Canada.

If there is one constant that we will be faced with from now on, that constant is the change in our Constitution. This is not something that will be resolved by September or the fall of next year, or into 1993 with a spring election. We have the ability to change and to amend our Constitution at home on our own, now.

Others were here before in that historic debate when we brought home, as it was said, our Constitution. So, change is with us constantly now and we have to be prepared to deal with that.

I have mentioned some of the groups that I think can and should be involved in this debate. I have talked about members of legislative assemblies, and I have talked about local governments. Their voice has not been heard a lot lately. I also want to mention because it is so important that aboriginal people in this country have their role as well in the makeup and the writing of our Constitution. We cannot allow another failure in that area. I hope we have a commitment from this House and others that that will in fact be the case.

We have had an example, one small step perhaps, but an example of what a government can do. I am referring of course to the recent announcement by the Government of Ontario that has signed a statement of a political relationship with the First Nations of Ontario. The Ontario government has done what the President of the Privy Council and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs ought to be doing as they continue their discussions with the legitimate leadership of the national aboriginal organizations. Our member who represents Port Alberni has spoken eloquently on this issue previously in the House.

I would hope that as we consider this motion and the debate that we are having that we do look beyond the confines of the rules as we have known them and have become comfortable with. Let us not be afraid to experiment, let us not be afraid to listen to some new ideas.

One new idea we debated this afternoon. The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore presented his bill on referendums and plebiscites. Let us not be afraid to consider a couple of ideas from time to time. We are a young nation. Next year we will be celebrating our 125th birthday and we have many years to go. We have survived a great deal as a country. We will I hope survive our current fracas or discussions. I am hopeful that we will, and I am particularly hopeful of course that in writing this Constitution that we be inclusive, as is being said, that we include aboriginal people and the groups that we have mentioned before. We will not accomplish that—or, I would hope that we have to go some distance to ensure that we do—with the motion before us now.

I would ask that the House give serious consideration to our proposal for a constituent assembly. Our leader has said that it is not perfect. What is? But it is an attempt, a signal if you like, a call on the government to lay out in some detail a message that we are prepared to reach out to Canadians, to have their say, to have their view and to participate in the writing of our Constitution and to share some of that emotion and some of that vision for Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, I would just like to advise hon. members who are waiting for the adjournment proceedings that under Standing Order 38(7) they are today cancelled.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I believe all members in this House received a document in their offices yesterday or a few days ago called "Some Practical Suggestions for Canada: Report of the Group of 22". I compliment this group because rather than sit around and complain as many do, it got together and did something.

It put this report together with 28 recommendations of what should be incorporated in the Canadian Constitution. I do not agree with all of them, but as I say, I compliment it for doing something positive.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with recommendation 14 which reads: "We recommend that full and complete recognition of the four economic freedoms, the freedom of movement, labour, capital, goods and services be stipulated in the Constitution so that the Canadian economic union can be fully established and citizens can have recourse to the courts to ensure that these provisions are met. We suggest that consideration be given as well to the creation of an administrative tribunal which would oversee the practical realization of these essential economic principles and would assist in the resolution of the problems."

Coming from the constituency which he represents, does he see that this will be a positive thing into the Constitution or a negative thing, this building in the free movement of labour, capital, goods and services?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, let me respond to that question first of all with just a brief comment on the member's preamble to his question.

That was on the proposal from this group as it is called, in which there are some learned people who are presenting their views of Canada and suggestions on how we can take a look at the country.

The member mentioned that in his preamble with a suggestion. These people are making their proposals and suggestions in a positive way, or adding to the debate.

Let me make one comment about what I hope is one small way that I am helping my constituents in this debate. During the discussions on Meech Lake, it was very interesting to ask how many people had actually read Meech Lake. In a room in which everybody in my riding would have got up, howled and screamed about Meech Lake, not one may have read it.

As a practical solution or attempt at that, I have made an effort to my constituents to ensure that those people who are interested in the constitutional debate are sent a package once a month of pro and con debates. We will be including this Group of 22 submission in that package for my constituents. We have about 300 people in my riding now who have written to me. I invite anyone else in the country who is interested to write. I would be more than pleased to put them on that list so that they can make an informed decision about the Constitution.

A "more informed decision" means we will have a better vision of the country. Specifically, to his question in terms of some of the four components in the Constitution, I would certainly be prepared to look at them. On first hand, I do not see any reason necessary to reject them. I suppose some debate would be with the provinces which have their own challenge in terms of attempting to break down the barriers they have between their jurisdictions.

We have had some cases in which that has been almost ridiculous. On first glance, I would not have a problem with that. I suppose we would have a better Canadian economy if we had better coast to coast to coast trade than we do now.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I know the hour is late and I do want to thank all the members of this House for the latitude given in extending the hours of the debate so that remaining speakers, my colleague and I, have an opportunity to address this really important issue.

Canada is a country which faces troubled and difficult times. It is a nation which today is at a crossroads. It is a nation with an uncertain future. It is easy to point fingers at who or what is to blame for taking us to this critical point. It is easy to blame this government. It is easy to blame this Prime Minister. I think we have to recognize that in some measure we are all to blame. That is precisely why we all must be part of the solution.

Canadians are a people who are rather uninformed about their country. That is possibly due to the fact that we are constantly submerged and inundated in a wave of culture from our U.S. neighbour. We do not have a healthy sense of national identity. We are a vast land, a land with a very sparse and a very diverse population. We tend to view ourselves from two distinctly separate realities. The problem, when you look at it, goes right back to the beginnings and the foundations of Canada.

Before Confederation there were essentially two Canadas, composed of two founding nations: the French of Lower Canada and the anglophones of Upper Canada. As this land grew and spread westward the perceptions of Canada evolved. The francophones of Quebec remained within the frame of reference of a Canada of two founding nations. The anglophones, the English-speaking Canadians, particularly western Canadians, began to perceive our land as an equal partnership of provinces and territories.

Canada today, as a result of that evolution of realities, has become a land, if you like, of two solitudes. It is a Canada of vastly different realities. That is why the Meech Lake Accord failed. It had essentially competing objectives and it was assisted by a Prime Minister who chose to roll the dice with the future of this nation. The demands of Quebec to be essentially a nation within a nation, with special privileges and powers, in the perception of western Canadians, of English Canadians, was unacceptable.

The application of the notwithstanding clause to impose French-only language rights within Quebec was the straw that broke the camel's back in western Canada. That is why western Canadians are now railing against the concept of bilingualism. The question they ask themselves is: why should English Canada be attempting to accommodate Quebec through a national bilingualism program when Quebec is trying to override equal rights within the province? That is the perception. It is the reality in terms of a western Canadian perspective. I want to try to bring that perspective here on behalf of western Canadians so that we can attempt to deal with this difficulty.

Quebecers, to present the other view, if they cannot follow their own perceived sovereign destiny within the national framework then they do not want to stay in Canada, they want to pursue their own future. To westerners, if they cannot have an equal partnership, then perhaps it is time that Quebec leaves. There are certain sentiments in the west which take that viewpoint. The reality is that we tread in very dangerous waters. It is a situation which threatens to rip our young nation apart.

The failure of Meech Lake last year has paralyzed this government and it paralyzed this nation. We do not have the kind of constitutional tools to deal with the kind of crisis which besets us today.

• (2220)

The current parliamentary structure is incapable of resolving this crisis. Canadians know that we as parliamentarians have in some measure failed them. There has been a clarion call for change in the way that this country runs itself.

There has been a request, a demand, for a mechanism to resolve this constitutional impasse.

One thing Meech Lake has taught us is that the Canadian people themselves are no longer willing to sit idly by on the sidelines while the process evolves behind closed doors. They want to be active. They want to take an active role, to be fundamentally involved with the process of solving this crisis, despite the anger and the frustration that is out there in Canada on both sides.

There is also, I feel, a growing desire to heal the wounds that have been left from the Meech Lake fiasco. There are genuine efforts coming about toward real national reconciliation.

I want to point to a small community in my riding, on the western edge of my riding in the Okanagan—Shuswap, the community of Falkland which is now becoming known internationally as "the little town that could". This small community is trying to reach out to our francophone friends in Quebec with an "I care for Canada" campaign. The little town has been flying hundreds of flags. There are T-shirts. There are buttons. There are letter writing campaigns going on. Falkland has challenged other communities in my constituency and throughout the west to open up a dialogue with communities in French Canada and to tell our francophone friends, the brothers and sisters in Quebec, that we want them to stay. We want them to remain a part of Canada.

Other communities have taken up the challenge which Falkland has levelled. Falkland's sister city in Utah is even proudly flying our own Canadian flag and is taking up the challenge of the need for national unity in Canada. Falkland's message to Canada is that despite our differences, and granted they are real, together we are stronger.

I believe there is a growing hope for a united and a stronger Canada which will include our friends in Quebec. That is why my colleagues and I support a renewed process of reconciliation. We very much want to see a renewed Canada, a just Canada, and in particular, a united Canada.

It will take more than simply a commitment to constitutional change. It means a commitment to building a fair and a prosperous economy. It means a commitment to maintaining our national health and social programs. It means a commitment to restoring health to our natural environment.

Today we are debating a constitutional resolution and how we as a Parliament will seek consensus which will hopefully lead us more united into the 21st century.

The success of Canada is dependent upon the full participation of Canadians in the process of national renewal. Regrettably, this motion before the House does not allow that full participation. The people of Canada have spoken loud and clear. They want to be involved. They no longer trust this government. They no longer trust the politicians. They want to have a hand in the process in a very fundamental way. They do not want to leave their future and the future of their children in the hands of the political process because that political process has failed them before. They do not want it to fail again.

Enough of the back room deals and enough of the rolling of the dice, they are not willing to have their children's future simply gambled away.

The government response to this challenge levelled by Canadians, after all the commissions and studies, is to strike another parliamentary committee, a committee in which the government has control, a committee in which the government calls the shots, a committee in which the government shuffles the deck and deals the cards, and in which unelected senators, believe it or not, will have a say and perhaps the balance of power in the outcome of this process. It is a committee of politicians speaking to more politicians. Once again the Canadian people are on the outside looking in, and that is unacceptable. It is time to bring real people into the process.

Both the Liberal opposition and the Conservative government have adopted the proposal for this committee of self-interest. My colleagues and I have to reject this proposal. There is a need for involving the Canadian people at a fundamentally different level, and that is ignored in this committee proposal.

My colleagues and I have proposed a constituent assembly, a process where Canadian people can become involved and can take part in the decisions that affect the future of this nation. A nation can only create a Constitution through a process of social consensus, and the best way to reach that social consensus is through such a constituent assembly.

Earlier this evening the Liberal member from Papineau called a constituent assembly a flight of fancy. If our Liberal and Conservative friends call listening to the voice of the people of Canada a flight of fancy, then I submit we are in deep trouble indeed.

The Constitution of Canada, the future of this nation, does not belong to this government. It belongs to the people of Canada and, by God, they must be able to have a say and be able to participate in that future.

As was mentioned earlier tonight by my colleague for Port Moody—Coquitlam, 68 per cent of the Canadian people want a constituent assembly. Canadians are calling for a larger role in this process of constitutional reform. The government's response has been to appoint another committee and to appoint 10 unelected, unrepresentative senators to that committee who may well hold the balance of power in the deliberations of that committee. That is unacceptable to the Canadian people. More politicians and more hidden agendas are unacceptable.

My colleagues in the New Democratic Party and I are not opposed to the concept of parliamentary committees, but this constitutional impasse, this crisis that we face, is an extraordinary situation. It is time that we explored new solutions and explored the utilization of new tools to resolve those problems.

We have to turn away from the old ways and from the old ideas. A constituent assembly, I submit, could well be that new way Canadians are looking for. It would bring Canadians back into the process of national renewal. The voices of Canada would most assuredly be heard.

The Conservatives and the Liberals argue that a constituent assembly would mean that we are not respecting the parliamentary tradition and the parliamentary process, that we are usurping parliamentary power.

Parliament would not be by-passed by a constituent assembly. It is in fact Parliament that would make that final decision. My leader had said earlier tonight: "The buck stops here". Although the constituent assembly would involve Canadian people in the process, that final decision still rests with Parliament.

I might add that once that final decision had been made by Parliament, we could well go back to the people for a final ratification of that consensus through a national referendum. This would ensure that Canadian people were involved in the process from beginning to end, that they had a stake in the results of that process, and that they had a stake in the future of this country.

What we are talking about here is fundamental reform, constitutional reform and parliamentary reform. We are all participants in the painting of a grand design for this nation. It is a challenge which we must share and it is a challenge which all Canadians must share. It is a challenge at which we cannot afford to fail.

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, my colleague for Okanagan—Shuswap alluded to the 101 legislation which is trampling on English language rights in Quebec in his opinion. Perhaps, my hon. colleague read too much from a certain press in English Canada and perhaps he has not tried hard enough to understand what really went on in Quebec under the 101 legislation. The only people's rights who were trampled on were the Francophones like myself who could not send their children to an English public school because both themselves and their wives were French unilingual, even though they were supporting English public schools in Quebec with their taxes.

My colleague seems to have forgotten the many anglophone universities, high schools, elementary schools, kindergardens and hospitals where every Anglophones can be served in English, even in Quebec City where they barely represent 4 per cent of the population. My colleague cannot say that in his region of Canada, Francophone minorities receive the same treatment as the Quebec Anglophone minorities.

Moreover, the hon. member mentionned the Meech Lake Accord and the vision we had of our country. The Meech Lake Accord were proposed as a mean to undo a wrong that was done in 1982 when the province of Quebec was excluded from the Canadian Constitution. I think that the Meech Lake Accord was fair to every Canadian. And the hon. member's party should have supported it. That is all I had to say.

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, my colleague makes a very compelling case about his own particular situation as a unilingual francophone. I sympathize with the arguments he has made.

It is not possible within the time structure of the debate to expand upon my comments more fully than I did except to say that what I was reflecting is not my personal bias about the situation in Quebec but rather the perception people throughout western Canada have of the whole situation with regard to the notwithstanding clause and the imposition of Bill 101.

That brings me back to the point I was making earlier. We have two realities in Canada and we have a problem with communication between our francophone friends in Quebec and the English-speaking western provinces. There are different perceptions. If Canadians could travel more across this country, if there was more opportunity for cultural exchanges, for educational exchanges between students from schools in western Canada, the prairies, the maritimes, Quebec, those communication barriers would begin to break down.

We have French immersion schools in my constituency. My two youngest daughters went to that school. Often that particular school does have exchanges with schools in Quebec. It is a great opportunity for those students to learn about other cultures and to learn the differences between francophone and anglophone Canada. That is precisely the issue. We have to learn to bridge that gap. I hope someday we can say that we have accomplished that.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the debate of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap. We had the pleasure of representing our country at the United Nations at one time so I know he speaks with sincerity and has the best interests of our country at heart.

He quoted my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel as running down the constituent assembly idea. What he fails to do is put it into full context.

The member for Papineau—Saint-Michel asked how the constituent assembly can work when one of the provinces has already publicly stated that it will not participate in the process of a constituent assembly. I would like him to tell the House how his party plans to resolve this? It is pushing a constituent assembly at almost every debate I have heard. That is the one idea they have, yet one province has already rejected it.

I would like to hear from the hon. member just how his party plans to resolve this.

Mr. MacWilliam: I think the member has a very relevant point. I appreciate him bringing it up and trying to place some parameters around the comment that the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel had made earlier this evening.

The fact is that the argument the member makes refers to the political elite of that particular province. Although that political elite says they will not participate in a constituent assembly, when you ask the people of Quebec how they feel about a constituent assembly, 57 per cent of say "yes" to a constituent assembly, and 68 per cent of the people outside of Quebec say "yes" to a constituent assembly.

Clyde Wells of Newfoundland, Frank McKenna of New Brunswick, Bob Rae of Ontario, Grant Devine in Saskatchewan, all say "yes" to a constituent assembly. Just because Mr. Bourassa says "no" does not mean it is not possible. The people of Quebec also say "yes."

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to the speech by the member for Okanagan-Shuswap. I heard him mention the two separate realities in this country. I feel that he is over-dramatizing the differences some people think exist between Canadians.

I am a Quebecer and I do not detect these two separate realities. We are all human beings. We are all Canadians. Canada means something to many Quebecers, to the great majority of Quebecers I would say. What has been missing in the past few years is someone who can adequately articulate what Canada is all about to all Canadians so that all Canadians can see themselves within this great country.

Someone reminded me that it was Pierre Berton who defined a Canadian as someone who could make love in a canoe. I think we should reflect a little bit on—the Minister for International Trade suggests that I have the quote somewhat wrong, but that is almost it. I would suggest that we ought to think a little bit more about the things that we have in common, rather than the things that may set us apart.

Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne, the government indicated its intention to tackle on the constitutionnal issue. The government said that it would put forward new proposals designed to focus the debate on a more united and more prosperous Canada.

Some proposals were submitted to the Joint Committe of the House and the Senate on September and that committee will be required to consult Canadians. It will be asked to report to the governement or to the Parliament within a five months timetable.

We are talking today about the terms of reference and membership of this joint committee. During the debate on the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister mentioned the need to think of the national interest. He underlined that it was up to the Parliament of Canada to think of the national interest.

For a long time, Mr. Speaker, members of my party, the Liberal Party, have recognized that only the Parliament of Canada speaks for all Canadians. The provincial législatures only speak on behalf of the citizens of their respective provinces. Some national organizations represent the interest of women or native people, but the only assembly speaking for all Canadians is the Parliament of Canada, and this is why I said a moment ago that we need Canadian leaders who are capable of championing the national interest in this House.

We have to remember, Mr. Speaker, that we have here 295 elected members who represent all Canadians. Who could know better the wishes, the needs and the interests of Canadian voters, of the Canadian people, than the hon. members sitting here, in the House of Commons? Our duties give us a good appreciation of the general interest, on top of the particular interests of our constituents. Who could better than us reconcile the interests of our constituencies, our provinces with the national interest, than the people in this place, Mr. Speaker?

I am glad that the Prime Minister recognized that no constituent assembly could be better than the House of commons, but we are not talking about that today, we are talking about the membership of the joint committee. This committee has to represent all Canadians. To this end, it must have enough members to be a good sample of the population. Without giving undue importance to the differences, let me say that it is necessary for the committee to be representative of the various regions, languages, genders, ethnic origins, ages and interests of Canadians.

However, the government proposal will not allow that representativeness. Let us look at our party, Mr. Speaker. We will have four members on the committee. We will have to select one member from each of the four regions. We will have one member from the Maritime, one from Quebec, one from Ontario and one from the West. The member from Quebec will, most certainly, be French-speaking. With only four members, the Liberal Party will not be able to have an English-speaking member from Quebec and it is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, that 800,000 English-speaking Quebecers be without representation on the Liberal side.

[English]

Perhaps a Conservative anglophone would be picked, but I believe that many anglophones in Quebec would agree with me if I said that their point of view of the country has been better represented by Liberals in recent years than by Conservatives.

An hon. member: That is for sure.

Mr. Berger: Their interests would be better represented by Liberals on this committee. One would not think that the government needs to be told that anglophones in Quebec feel a certain anxiety about their future and would want to make sure that their views are expressed as we go about making important decisions about the future of this country.

In addition to the criteria I mentioned above, namely that attention be paid to the language of the members of the committee and to the regions that they will represent, I think it will be important to consider the interests and background of members of the committee. Of particular concern to me is the need for this committee to adequately address Canada's position as we enter the 21st century. Our leader, Mr. Chrétien, has talked about the need perhaps to address the division of powers—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I apologize to the hon. member. There have been discussions among the parties to move some motions and I want to indicate before I do this that I am not trying to cut anybody off. I know the member from Annapolis Valley—Hants wishes to speak.

I have several motions to put, which I believe the House will consent to. I move:

That this House orders, having regard to paragraph 8(2)(c) of the Privacy Act that the Solicitor General cause to be laid before an in camera meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General unexpurgated copies of the report by Mr. John Weir concerning the escape of Daniel Gingras and the report by the Correctional Service Canada Board of Investigations concerning Allan Leger; and

That the in camera meeting of the committee take place with all the procedural protections normally accorded to in camera meetings, including a ban on the publication of the proceedings of the committee and on the disclosure of any information contained in the said reports which may be protected from disclosure under either the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act; and

That this House takes note of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections tabled in the House on May 29, 1991, and refers the said report and all the evidence and proceedings upon which the report is based to the House Management Committee for further study.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-2

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That when Bill C-2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act, is called for debate, the Speaker shall recognize one member for the government party, two members from the Official Opposition and one member from the New Democratic Party to speak for a period of time not to exceed ten minutes each, following which the Speaker shall forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of both report stage and third reading of said bill.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-9

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, when Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, is called for debate, the Speaker shall recognize one speaker from each of the three recognized parties to speak for a period not to exceed ten minutes each following which the speaker shall forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of said bill.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if I could seek clarification from the government House leader. Regarding Bill C-9, one of the amendments proposed by the New Democratic Party has been accepted by the government, which of course would be dealt with at report stage.

Mr. Andre: The parliamentary secretary is not here this evening, but barring any change from this afternoon, it is my understanding that that one amendment would be recognized.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to certainly give our consent, with the clear understanding that arrangements have been made on that particular critical motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps when the parliamentary secretary is on his feet with regard to the motions which he is going to present in the next number of minutes, as well as those that have passed, I presume he will indicate that these motions will be called for tomorrow, namely June 19.

• (2250)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that it is our intention to move these various bills and motions tomorrow, June 19.

BILL C-19

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to pre-study Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking;

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or usual practice of the House, on Wednesday, June 19, 1991, forthwith upon disposition of the Ways and Means proceeding concerning a bill respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies (notice of which was given on Tuesday, June 18, 1991) the bill based thereon (notice of which was given on Monday, June 17, 1991) shall be introduced and read a first time pursuant to Standing Orders 68 and 69.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE COMPANIES AND FRATERNAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to pre-study the government bill on notice dated June 17, 1991, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-22

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs be authorized to pre-study the government bill, C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, upon the completion of a 10-minute speech from one member of each of the three recognized parties; and

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, notwithstanding the Standing Orders and usual practices of the House, on Wednesday, June 19, 1991 during Motions and Routine Proceedings the following motion be proposed by the Prime Minister:

That, in accordance with subsection 49(1) of an act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada, Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 31, (4th supplement), this House approves the appointment of Dr. Victor Goldbloom as Commissioner of Official Languages for Canada.

That in debate of the said motion, the Speaker shall recognize one member of the government, two members from the Official Opposition and one member from the third party recognized in the House, each to speak for up to 10 minutes each;

And that following such speeches, the question on the said motion be deemed put to the House and deemed adopted.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: I raise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which pertains to this nomination of Dr Goldbloom, a personality which I have the honour to know, very well by the way. I do not wish to break this happy unanimity by saying that we will not give our consent to proceed so rapidly. I regret, and I wish to take part in future debates, which will take place this fall. Because I read again this nomination, on a very important subject, with all the constitutional problem, I simply regret, and I want to make it clear that I regret. But I will not refuse to give my consent, and this has nothing to do with Dr Goldbloom. I simply deplore the fact that we cannot discuss further this resolution of the right Honorable Prime minister. However, I will not deny this happy unanimity to proceed with the few speakers that you are proposing.

[English]

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I understood the hon. member well. He and I spent a great deal of time together in committees so I am familiar with his phraseology.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, at any time during the adjournment of the House between June, 1991 and September 15, 1991, the Speaker may cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill or bills, following which the Speaker shall adjourn the House forthwith according to the provisions of this order; and

That, the provisions of Standing Order 28(3), respecting recall of the House for urgent and pressing matters, not be superseded by the provisions of this order.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Winnipeg, Manitoba from August 11 to August 13, 1991, to attend the 13th Annual Conference of the Canadian Council on Public Accounts committees and that the necessary staff do accompany the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources be authorized to travel to attend, with the necessary staff, the 39th Canadian Coal Conference in Banff from September 14, 1991 to September 17, 1991.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to travel to Whitehorse, Yukon, for the period beginning Tuesday, September 3 to Sunday, September 8, 1991 in order to participate at the National Aboriginal Justice Conference and that the necessary staff, the Clerk and the Research Officer, do accompany the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be authorized to travel to Montreal and Quebec City on September 26 and 27, 1991 to hold hearings in relation to disabled persons and that the necessary staff do accompany the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House

PRESENTATION OF COMMITTEE REPORTS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when reports of all committees are completed, the committees may report their findings by depositing their reports with the Clerk of the House and the reports shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-6

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, when Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons, is called for debate, the Speaker shall allow 30 minutes of debate at report stage and 30 minutes of debate at third reading following which the Speaker shall forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of third reading of said bill;

And, immediately upon the taking of such divisions, the House shall stand adjourned until September 16, 1991 at 2 p.m. subject to the House order adopted by this House at an earlier time.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to confirm my understanding that the government has agreed that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade will undertake to study and report on Canadian exports of military goods, defence production policy and policies, to convert Canadian defence production industry to civilian uses, and to make recommendations for amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act, related regulations and the Criminal Code.

It will submit its report by December 31, 1991 to the Minister for International Trade. Once Bill C-6 is given Royal Assent, and pending completion of the parliamentary report, the government will include on the automatic firearms country control list, only the 10 countries with which it has the required bilateral defence research, development and production agreements, plus Saudi Arabia, assuming that the agreements being considered for that country can be successfully completed by December 31, 1991.

All applications to export automatic weapons to countries included on the list will be considered on a case-by-case basis in accordance with established policy, guidelines and procedures. The only sale of automatic weapons to Saudi Arabia between now and December 31, 1991 will be by GM Diesel of those mounted on the LAVs under the proposed sale to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia by General Motors.

I further understand that the external affairs and international trade standing committee will establish a subcommittee before the House recesses, that the subcommittee will have the authority to meet this summer, and that it will hold public hearings, including some outside of Ottawa, that there will be a reasonable research budget and that the research program will be subject to all-party approval.

• (2300)

I would ask the government representatives to indicate that my understanding is correct.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is our understanding.

Mr. Cooper: If the House were to adjourn tomorrow night, it may take until Thursday to get the external affairs committee to meet, to establish its subcommittee and to get up and running.

Mr. Brewin: That would be within the spirit of the understanding and that would be fine.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, just to seek one clarification on the 30 minutes set aside for report stage, presumably the understanding is that that would be sufficient time for the hon. member for Victoria to put the appropriate amendments forward at report stage.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the words "appropriate time" are obviously very difficult for me because I do not know what amendments the hon. members proposes or what other members may want to participate for a few moments in the debate. By allowing the 30 minutes, certainly it is our intention to co-operative with the hon. member to give him his opportunities and others as well.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have not been a party to a lot of these interesting discussions, but I certainly understand the purport of them and I certainly appreciate the work of the parliamentary secretary. However, since we had such a long-winded undertaking from the member for Victoria on certain precise understandings, I will not get into my whole thought about what a lack of opposition there is over here and no wonder the government is riding pretty high even though it is low in the polls. I will not get into that.

In effect this would normally be the adjournment debate. I do not want to preclude that, but I am prepared to participate in it. Therefore, since the hon. member for Victoria came through with his long-winded obligation that someone over there said "okay", I would like to know, if I understand things correctly, does that mean if that motion goes through that the defence committee will not meet to consider the implications of what we all know are going to be interesting, disturbing and necessary announcements about defence capability and base situations in Canada.

Second, as an old chairman of the transport committee, could I ask a question of the parliamentary secretary. He is trying to do a good job and doing it well. He is not disturbed by his House leader or the Whip, thank God. Could the parliamentary secretary let this lowly member know, as an ex-chairman of the transport committee, does this motion mean that there is going to be a full summer until September when the transport committee is not going to meet to consider a multitude of things including the port of Halifax and our Atlantic ports, notwithstanding the position of At and East?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in terms of the defence committee, no, this does not preclude the defence committee meeting to discuss a possible new announcement on defence policy which might come up. That would be the intention.

The only reason for the indication of support from the member for Victoria was the external affairs committee could of course meet and do this anyway. He wanted the assurance that there would be a reference from the House in that regard. We simply give him that assurance.

As for the transport committee, I do not know if the chairman is here tonight, but there is certainly no prohibition against spending all the months of July, August and September if they choose to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The house has heard the terms of the motion by the hon. parliamentary secretary with the provisions by the hon. member for Victoria.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt that motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Prud'homme: A point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saint Denis.

Mr. Prud'homme: It is too late, it has already been adopted. I just wanted to put that on record. It is good for me to put that on the record for future debate. It seems to me that when Bob White speaks the NDP gets in line.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. House Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition on a point of order.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members would want to extend their appreciation to our colleague from Saint—Henri—Westmount, who was so kind as to give the floor to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader in order to introduce those motions. I want to thank him on behalf of all members for his co-operation and his courtesy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL UNITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 1912); the amendment of Mr. Ouellet (p. 1924); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bird (p. 1970).

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, that is the biggest hand I have ever received in this House. It shows that if you are patient, some good things come from it once in a while.

I lost my audience in the gallery while this was going on. Perhaps there are still some people out there in television land.

Prior to the points of order, I was saying that I had a particular concern that the special joint committee on the Constitution adequately address Canada's position as we enter the 21st century.

[Translation]

A month ago, the leader of our party, Mr. Chrétien, dealt with the division of powers in his constitutional propositions. He advocates a functional approach. Interests of the population, not those of governments or of civil servants, must come first. He also says that a reform of government powers should always have enough flexibility to allow Canada to face the challenges of the Twenty-First Century.

Mr. Speaker, I was staggered by the speech of the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, a member of the Bloc Québécois. His words were absolutely nonsense. He defended the new separatist theory according to which Canadian federalism is the cause of our social and economic problems.

Mr. Speaker, during all my years in Parliament, I have had the privilege to listen to several distinguished persons who were concerned by the position of Canada in a constantly changing world.

Mr. Speaker, not one of those persons concerned with the future of Canada in a world in evolution has lamed the Canadian federalism for our problems. Far from that, they all say that our problems are caused by our incapacity to adapt to economic and technological changes.

Mr. Speaker, the committee must listen to those people who have a vision of the future. I think of persons like Larkin Kerwin, the president of the Canadian Space Agency, the president of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research, the president of the Science Council of Canada, or to the astronaut Marc Garneau.

• (2310)

Mr. Speaker, economic arguments support federalism. Mrs. Sylva Ostry, former president of the Economic Council of Canada, who has spent many years at the OECD, said recently, in an article published in the Globe and Mail and in Le Devoir, that Europeans have joined in a common market for economic reasons, because they were concerned with their jobs. They understood that it was necessary to consult each other to compete with Japanese and Americans. Research and development has become too expensive to be undertaken by a country alone or by a company alone, and without joining with our countries, Mr. Speaker. Sovereignty has no place in the global village of today. If Canadians want to succeed, they must not be divided but they have to work together and find new mechanisms of cooperation and dialogue.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the joint committee will deal with those issues in order to secure the future of Canadians, of our children and granchildren.

[English]

For the reasons I have mentioned I believe that the government's proposal is deficient. I understand that an amendment has been proposed by a member of my party, the Liberal Party, which would increase the representation, the number of MPs who would serve on this committee and would therefore ensure that it could better represent all of Canada and all of the interests that are important to be heard in this debate. The government should not proceed with its proposal unless it accepts our amendment. This is not the right way to begin the important work of this committee. I hope that the government will listen to our proposal and ensure that this committee gets off on the right foot.

Mr. Nowlan: Point of order before we get to comments.

I do not want to interfere with comments. I understand the problem the former Minister of Finance has, the present minister of whatever-he-is, in trying to negotiate a playing field between Carla Hills and the Mexicans.

In view of the motions we just approved a moment ago we may adjourn for the summer recess. Otherwise I am going to be raising this every day. I want the Chair to make a ruling on what I thought was always a fundamental element of parliamentary proceedings—but I understand the government does not fully appreciate parliamentary proceedings—that there must be a minister of the Crown in the House while we deal with Crown business, the business of the taxpayer. Quite frankly the whole essence of this place, I thought—and I may be wrong—is that when you deal with the business of the people there must be at least one minister in the House. We go through this hypocrisy and charade of petitions at one stage of our proceedings but when the House is in session it is not supposed to be a charade.

I always thought there was supposed to be a minister of the Crown present. In fact two ministers, one who could listen and a second who could be called upon by the Chair to say moved by minister so-and-so and seconded by minister so-and-so and say: "What the member for Antigonish said was correct and we can put this into the bowels of the bureaucracy and see what will happen".

I am not asking for a ruling tonight. I do not mind the government backbenchers in the lowly corner where I used to sit, before I came to sit here as a backbencher in opposition, but I must say as I sit here in opposition that 25 years ago—and I have come full circle because I am about three seats from whence I began—we always had two government ministers in the House. Never in my life, knowing what I thought about parliamentary democracy and what I thought the Conservative Party believed in terms of parliamentary democracy, did I think I would ever see the insult that has developed over the last few weeks into an affront, as far as I am concerned, to the public of Canada.

I understand the government backbenchers for statements, I understand them for questions, but I do not understand the Speaker recognizing three or four—just a minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has made his point, but I will listen to him further.

Mr. Nowlan: My point is this. I want the Chair to take this upon itself. My thoughts after 20 some years may be wrong but perhaps we should not have any members of Her Majesty's Privy Council sitting in Her Majesty's Privy Council seats to pick up their frigging pay, to pick up their frigging pensions and to pick up the problems of the people.

If that is the problem, I want the Chair to tell me, and it will not be bothered with me on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has made his point. I will look at it and also will—

Mr. Nowlan: When are you going to rule, before we adjourn?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will see what we can do tomorrow for the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the speech of my colleague opposite, the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount. I have appreciated part of what he said but I certainly could not appreciate as easily all of what he said, whether he said it in his nice French or in his elegant English. It seems to me that I would like to talk about— Do I have to end my remarks, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No.

Mr. Hogue: So, because it seemed to me that the hon. member from the opposition would be kind enough to stand up and be recognized, he could also be decent enough to listen when someone else has the floor, Mr. Speaker.

So, I go back to our colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount and I find it sad, even extremely sad that, perhaps without realizing it, he used an euphemism which, because of the very fact that it was an euphemism, made the situation very dangerous.

At the very beginning of his speech, he said that we should not overdramatize differences, that we are all human beings. I think that is an euphemism and a very dangerous statement. In fact, human reality is based on the difference between individuals. Human reality and social reality are based on the recognition of differences. The recognition of differences— we are not citizens of the world. I am a Canadian citizen, born in Montreal, living in the province of Quebec and that is what makes me different from Americans and people from other countries. And I am sure that our opposition colleague will want to correct his words or express with less audacity that euphemism which is dangerous and which can only feed such unstructured statements as those that we heard tonight from one of the Bloc Québécois members.

Mr. Berger: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to retract. I recognize many differences. I might even say: Vive la différence. Moreover, I might even add that federalism is a system that allows for the difference. Having said that, I think I have already mentioned that overdramatization must be avoided. In spite of our differences, we all have certain things in common, certain things which hold us together. In my opinion, those who enjoy the privilege of being members of this House should talk more about these things which unite us and less about differences. Let others talk about differences.

M. Prud'homme: My comment will be very brief, because it is a debate that will never end, probably, between some of my colleagues and me. After listening to my colleague, and it is not the first time, I think that we will never agree on some aspects of federalism. We should be careful—and it was true long before my honourable colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount, arrive in this House—with those who think that everything beautiful, noble, great and intelligent always comes from Ottawa.

[English]

I have travelled enough in your province and in every other province of Canada to know that a lot of good can come from provinces. That is why I am not an absolute, total centralisateur and I believe that this country will only survive if we understand that on various levels of government a lot of good could be created.

It reminds me of when I arrived. My father told me: "Beware of people whose policy is 'Father knows best and the rest of you all across Canada know nothing.' "

There is a tendency for those of us who are here in Ottawa to neglect and not recognize that in various parts of Canada there is a lot of good that can come from various provincial governments.

Earlier, to a colleague of mine from the Atlantic, I said: "I am afraid some morning we may get up and see Canada does not exist any more". Simply out of boredom people will be so fed up they will give up. Or others, and this is more dangerous, will say, like the hon. Minister of Transport, and I am astounded that my hon. colleague and the Minister of Transport may have something in common, that there is no problem. The Minister of Transport keeps saying there is no problem and so he is not going to address how bad the situation is in Montreal.

I can tell him that he has members of Parliament from the government, the member for Bourassa and the member for Outremont, who are better prepared. I am going to ask the Prime Minister of Canada to ask these people if they think that the situation is so great in Montreal. I would not like to embarrass them by saying that, but I know they realize the situation is bad. My colleague seems to say: "Oh, do not worry, there is no problem".

The situation is very serious. I am not preaching: "Do not go to bed tonight, you know bad things are coming tomorrow morning". The seriousness, however, of this debate is real. We must not encourage people to go to sleep too easily and say: "Do not worry, everything will be all right; big daddy in Ottawa knows what to do."

I would hope my colleague will at least share that with me; that the situation is serious. He should recognize, point number one, that the situation is serious and point number two, that simply because we are in Ottawa does not mean that all the public servants know all the answers. A lot of good can come out from the provinces. That is why I am a decentralisateur-fédéraliste.

[Translation]

Mr. Berger: I never said that Ottawa has all the answers, Mr. Speaker, far from it. But I think it is necessary to maintain a certain balance between the provinces and the federal government. That is the essence of federalism. I can give my colleague the example of medicare, which may have come from Saskatchewan, but which was developed nationally by the central government, which, ultimately, is the only government capable of acting at the national level, for all Canadians.

I will remind hon. members of the resistance that our province of Quebec opposed through the years to different social initiatives of the federal governement. In the 1930s, Quebec governments were opposed to family allowances. They quoted approving by Clemenceau who said that the State had too many children to be a good father. In the 1950s, Duplessis opposed medicare. He said that good health was God's business and had nothing to do with the Reds in Ottawa.

So, it is important to recall our history—

Mr. Prud'homme: That is not what he said. He said the only insurance against illness was good health.

Mr. Berger: That's right. He said: "The only insurance against illness is good health and that's God's business and has nothing to do with the Reds in Ottawa".

So, it is important to recall our history, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country". We all know where that statement came from. It will live on, probably, as long as there is life on this earth.

The one thing lacking in the whole constitutional debate, in the whole process of setting up a committee of 15 members and 10 senators, is this very question: "What can I do for my country?"

I rise to put this on the floor of the House as an idea for the committee as it travels across this country, to sensitize Canadians to ask: "What are my duties to my country as a Canadian citizen? What are my obligations to my country"? People born in Canada very seldom ask themselves that, because they are automatically Canadian citizens. People who come to Canada and apply for citizenship do at least take an oath. In that oath they stress their duties to this country.

My obligations, my duties to this country can be summarized very simply in one word.

An hon. member: Let us hear it.

Mr. Flis: The member says: "Let us hear it". Well, here it is and I hope you will remember it for as long as you live. The one word is "respect". Respect for others, respect for property and respect for authority. If we can build that into our Constitution, a simple rule that children in kindergarten can learn and will be better Canadians for the rest of their lives. Respect for others. Yes, respect for our aboriginal people. Respect for the anglophones, the francophones, whether they be in a majority or a minority situation. Respect for allophones and their languages and their cultures. Respect for the physically handicapped, the mentally handicapped.

When the provincial government turfed out the mentally handicapped from Queen Street Mental Hospital without any support services there was not much respect shown by politicians for those mentally handicapped. I have many of them in my riding of Parkdale who are still suffering.

Respect for seniors, to ensure that for as long as they live they have respect and security and an adequate income in this country. Respect for children providing adequate day care.

If we can build respect for others into the Constitution, it is my duty to respect others and to ensure that others are provided for. Respect for property. If Canadians grow up from day one with this respect for property, they will respect the water to make sure it is clean for drinking.

• (2330)

They will respect the air that we breathe and not put pollutants into it. They will respect the land that grows our food to feed not only Canadians, but the starving, the dying in Ethiopia and in other countries. Respect for property means respecting our forests, our trees.

Just three weeks ago I was with the Canada–Europe delegation in British Columbia and the members from the European Parliament were horrified to see the clear cuts on our mountains. I hope they do not pass a resolution boycotting our forest products. We tried to show them the excellent reforestation programs we have; planting two trees for every one we cut out. Respect for authority has to be built into the Constitution.

As a Canadian citizen, one must go off with respect for authority, for this House and for all the parliamentary traditions that you, Mr. Speaker, try to preserve. You did that just this afternoon because one member was breaking the rules of this House and you drew it to his attention. I am sure he will respect this institution much more from now on. There must be respect for the legislatures, for the laws, for the courts, the police who enforce these laws and for the Constitution which we will finally hammer out for Canadians.

I do not want to take much more time, but I do want to put on the floor of the House that somehow in this process of coming up with a revised Constitution, we must put in: "What is my duty and my obligation to this country?" And not just: "What can I get out of this country?" Every group and everyone is trying to milk it for all they can. No, let us turn it around and say: "What can we do for our country?"

I think we can summarize it in the one word "respect", respect for others, respect for authority, respect for property.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for my friend. He delivered a very thoughtful speech. He talked about respect and one of the things he mentioned most prominently in his speech was respect for property rights. I wonder if he is prepared to support an amendment to the Constitution which guarantees property rights for Canadians.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, as usual the minister was not listening and this is why I am glad the hon. member before drew to the attention of the House how ministers do not attend on that side and do not even listen.

I did not say "respect for property rights", I said "respect for property". The desk that the hon. member is sitting in is property. He should not be defacing it. He should be respecting it. That is what I mean by respect for property. I did not mention rights. I said respect for property which a kindergarten or a grade one student can learn, and respecting this Constitution by doing so.

Mr. McDermid: I was trying to ask him a question which he did not answer, obviously. I asked him if he was in favour of placing property rights in the Constitution. I want the record to show that he did not answer that.

He did not respect the rules of the House when he drew to the attention of the House the absence or the presence of people in the House. He did not show respect for the rules of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the member for Parkdale—High Park wish to respond to that very briefly?

Mr. Flis: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker, absolutely. I respect the fact that the hon. minister is in his seat listening to my debate. Again he did not listen. I drew to his attention, when the hon. member from Canso—Hants drew to this House's attention, that there was no minister previously in this House. That again is showing no respect for this institution because in this institution, through precedents, there always has to be a minister or two.

By ignoring that, they are again showing disrespect for this institution.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, in the context of questioning, might I enter this debate about property, pursuant to the remarks made by the hon. member from Parkdale—High Park about respect for property.

It is unfortunate that the hon. member set himself up to be asked what was obviously an attempt to put him on the spot with respect to property rights. I cannot be put on the spot about that. I do not want to have property rights in the Constitution.

I remember so well how this has been used against various people, attributing the lack of property rights in the Constitution to various parties and/or governments. The fact of the matter is that it did not go into the Constitution in 1981 because there were provincial governments that did not want it in, Conservative provincial governments that did not want it in, and federal political parties like the NDP that did not want it in. There was a combination of reasons why property rights did not go into the Constitution. Anybody who wants to be honest about why those rights are not there would admit that. The member who spoke was there at that time and knows that to be true.

The problem is that we have had too much respect in this country for private property, and not enough respect for the common property called the environment. We have not had enough respect for the property of us all as human beings: land, air, water, sea, and soil. These are the things that belong to all of us and to all generations. Those are the property rights for all generations that the member should spend more time thinking about, and less about how he can enshrine in the Constitution the property rights of people whose private property rights have already done enough damage to the environment.

Mr. Flis: It just goes to show who was listening to my debate and who was not.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate on the motion. I know that time is moving on and, in view of all those motions we made earlier, there is pressure to get out of here.

The hon. member for Portneuf, who participated in questions earlier, is starting to giggle back in the back row after he spoke about two solitudes. He is a friend of mine to a point, but I could get very emotional about the motion before the House. As some members across the way know, it was basically a motion of this type a year ago that was my moment of truth with the government party. Certain events which followed finally caused me, as I said in caucus, to no longer be able to put up with some things I heard, basically political intellectual dishonesty. I stayed out of caucus and then the next fall I formally broke from the government and the party, I had been a member of for 20-some years, more than the years of any of the members that I see opposite.

Let us not kid around on this motion tonight. I debated whether I should even participate in this motion because I understand the desire of Canadians from all parties and all segments of the country to try to put this place back together again.

Humpty-Dumpty was on the wall a year ago. June 23 was the catch line and the demarcation line and the deadline. Humpty-Dumpty fell off, Meech Lake fell off, and the country was going to be forever ruined. Yes, the country has been forever changed.

Humpty-Dumpty fell off the wall because of rolling the dice and all those things we are not supposed to speak about now. We are not supposed to be negative. We are not supposed to talk about all the things that happened but look ahead and try to solve the future.

I agree with that but unless we realize what happened we are not going to solve the future.

• (2340)

That is why this motion tonight introduced understandably at the eve of our summer recess is not going to get the attention it deserves. However, I give full credit to the government this time, not last time, because at least this time it is allowing an open debate. Some of the members opposite, especially the then Whip and a friend of mine, now the Solicitor General—he was the government House leader. I sat in the House for three days to make sure there was at least a debate on Meech Lake.

Finally the government House leader acknowledged my presence and was honest with me and there was an abbreviated debate. My friends opposite, and my friends across this country I think we know now that the fundamental problem with Meech Lake, with all respect to the Prime Minister with whom I have great problems over Meech Lake, was not just the rolling of the dice. The problem was that there was not a full debate in the House of Commons on Meech Lake before June 23. You can say what you want about free trade, but there was a very vital debate concerning free trade in this House. There was an election campaign and then there was another debate in this House, as we all remember, as things were forced through before the gong came down before Christmas and it was put in place. There was a debate.

I am not going to castigate my colleagues who speak sincerely on something so fundamental to us but I have never heard so much claptrap in my life on something so fundamental. At least there is an opportunity to ventilate what some may think is claptrap but what others may think are interesting ideas.

I think the fundamental thing from all the speeches on this motion—I give full credit to the government for bringing the motion in and it is an open-ended motion to which all members can speak. There is no cut-off. There is no little deal. There is no little back room agreement to cut it off when all parties had the conspiracy of silence. I say to the supine, sterile NDP and/or the Liberals and/or the government we did not have the debate in the House of Commons then but at least we are having the debate now on setting up the committee.

I think, without getting too involved emotionally—which I am—at least there is a feeling in this House and there is a feeling across the country that people should participate. Not just the frigging politicians, not just the frigging sterile premiers, not just the Prime Minister—who is a tremendous poker player with the premiers—but the people. The great problem is how do they participate. Is it with another address to an august joint committee which travels around the country?

If the member from Vancouver or wherever wants to speak to the Chair let him speak to the Chair in his time. Otherwise I will call him what he is, but I would not dare because I am very serious on this issue, and he was too and I give him full credit. He was one of the few members in this House who was against the conspiracy of silence on Meech Lake. Therefore, I am very disturbed that he is trying to interrupt the Chair when I am trying to speak on something so fundamental because the government has allowed us to speak and I guess, when the motion comes, I will vote for it.

Frankly, time has moved beyond the motion and this is what is sad to me. While we all talk about the public participating, the public has participated until it is coming out of their ears. Constitutionalitis has become a fog over Canada. All the experts are talking about this and that. We all know it is important. The fundamental thing is that this Parliament of Canada, this high court of Canada, this Constitution of Canada that is here in the House of Commons is dead. It is beyond the boards. Other things have happened, be it Quebec and the Bélanger-Campeau commission—and I wish a member from Quebec would say, and I wish the member for Portneuf would say, or the other member who was on the Bélanger-Campeau commission would say, Dr. Hogue, the member for Outremont, and he is a good friend of mine—I wish someone would say, especially on the Liberal side, that the Allaire report was commissioned by the Liberal Party before Meech Lake fell.

As I understand it, the Allaire report was there to study the options with or without Meech Lake. Then we had the Bélanger-Campeau commission and now we are going to have the Spicer report and now we are going to have the Beaudoin-Edwards report.

Is it any wonder that Canadians are totally confused as to what really is going on? Here we are, on the eve of summer recess. When we all met here in all our rhetorical flourishes—and it is important, it is fundamental—but the sadness is I think a lot of Canada has gone by us. This is why the Reform Party has arisen and that is very dangerous. This is why the Bloc Québécois has arisen and that is very dangerous.

I am not a Reform person but I can tell you that when the Parliament of Canada is silent on fundamental issues no wonder—nature abhors a vacuum, it is a law of science— the Reform moves in with superficial messages that frankly have to be analyzed. It is a seductive message. I say this for all of Canada because there may be someone watching tonight regardless of who is in this House. One of the beguiling messages of the Reform, which is close to being anti-French or anti-this or anti-that is that it says: "Hey, Quebec, we will deal with you if you decide to come into Canada. Then we will talk to you and/or run candidates in Quebec".

Mr. Speaker, you are a lawyer, and there are some other lawyers around here, and we are all practical people, because we all got elected and we all understand people. Where did you ever hear of a situation where you are going to talk about the living arrangements after the divorce? That is part of the beguiling seductive message of Reform: "Hey, we won't talk to you until you come in". I am scared to death of Reform because of its seductive, beguiling capacity to woo English speaking Canadians in English speaking Canada and the Bloc Quebecois—which I won't waste much time on because I don't understand them—that is Quebec and that is French Canada. Yet, that is not the totality of Canada that we all love.

Yet, a lot of English speaking Canadians are supporting the Reform Party—and the Reform Party was not even mentioned in this motion which talks about Canada because we are all supposed to be too nice, we are not supposed to talk about the realities.

I am going to talk about a fundamental reality in my closing, which is not going to make any members across the way happy—and I shouldn't perhaps say what I am going to say. I am on-side in terms of trying to figure out what the answer is. I do not have the fundamental answers.

I agree with some of the comments made opposite, and here, that perhaps this parliamentary committee is a pseudo committee which has been committed to death, and a quasi-constitutional assembly.

Quite frankly, if I had my way I would have done it a little differently. We are trying to play catch-up ball. I must say that you have to accept the blame where the blame is, because if it wasn't blame you would take the credit. The Government of Canada has to take the blame for the fact that we are trying to play catch-up ball. We are trying to play catch-up ball because of the mess of last year. You can't blame it on Clyde Wells. Oh, yes, it is easy to blame it on Clyde Wells because he is an anglophone, he is a WASP but you do not want to blame it on Elijah Harper, who is an Indian with a feather on his head. He waved the feather all over the Manitoba legislature. Oh, no, it is easy to blame. Let us not talk too much about individual blame but collective blame has to be on the government of the day.

So now we are trying to pick up the pieces. We will have the Spicer commission coming through some time. We will have Beaudoin-Edwards coming through. These individuals are all nice Canadians.

What disturbs me is that here we sit during the summer. I am all for a summer recess. I am glad we are getting out of here. However, if this is the fundamental issue, if this is the issue that is going to break up Canada when we have had wars off-stream that were going to break up the world, why do we not have a Parliament that meets in a national coalition or a union Parliament or something like that? If this is what the stakes are, are we still going to play our partisan games?

I think my time is getting pretty close. I guess I will vote for the motion, because at least it is another move, another pause, another deflection in law that we call a traverse. You traverse the issue so that you never have to face it. That is kind of what we are doing here in this Parliament of Canada. We should be involved in it and should have been involved in it right from day one after we knew Meech went down the boards and we had the summer of discontent that we had last summer, but not the summer of zombie land that we are going to have this summer. Then this committee is supposed to be struck by independent means and there are to be conversations with House leaders to get the 15 or 20 members who meet in September. Then they are going to travel the country again, a country that is so travelled out with constitutional committees who is going to listen?

I agree with members of the NDP and perhaps the Liberals. I think, perhaps not tonight or perhaps not when we adjourn Wednesday or Thursday,but when we have the Spicer commission and we have the Beaudoin—Edwards report, that we should have the government response. Let us find out if there is someone to get together. If it is that fundamental, as we all know it is, we could call the Parliament of Canada back and get to work, all of us.

On that uplifting, positive note, I am going to say the following. Maybe I should not say it, because it is not positive or uplifting.

You are telling me, Mr. Speaker, that my time is just about over and I think it is. I feel sad about the Prime Minister. I do not think he feels as sad about me but, frankly, we are two Irishmen. We had a lot to give to each other. I had a lot of parliamentary experience and he had none, and that is part of his problem. I have a lot of knowledge about Canada and his was confined to Quebec and the board rooms of the Iron Ore Company of Canada. Many members will not know that I worked for the Iron Ore Company of Canada before Brian Mulroney ever became the president of the company. I was a surveyor on the Iron Ore centre line, sent up the Moisie River from Seven Islands, before it was called Sept Isles, up to Knob Lake, to Schefferville. It was ironic that he became the president and I just became a member of Parliament; then he became my leader and here we are tonight.

I say this in the nicest way. I am glad the member for Brampton is giggling because he is one of the first to be affected. I say this without getting too political on a fundamental issue, and I really say it seriously. Let us have the Spicer report. Let us have the Beaudoin–Edwards report. Let us see where the government makes its decisions and the caucus is going to go. I will not get on the caucus because its members are nice friends of mine. Frankly, this caucus could have had different directions if it had made its decisions and was prepared to bite the bullet, but it did not.

We are now at this stage. We are going to have those reports. They are supposed to be the blueprint for Canada. We are behind the eight ball. Therefore, I should not say what I am about to say. Unless the reports come out and unless the government makes the right move, at a certain stage next year the Prime Minister, my Prime Minister, your Prime Minister, the Prime Minister of Canada, has to decide what is best for Canada. I will accept him at his word, that the next election is not the issue. I agree with that. Canada is the issue.

If he honestly believes that, then I think this Prime Minister at a certain stage, not to be a lame duck totally, when and if we can get certain things done has to do the same as President Johnson of the United States and say to Canada: "Look, Canadians, I am not here for the next election. I am here for the sake of Canada. Let us hope that we can get some agreement to make this Canada we now know work in a fundamentally changed form"—and I am prepared to agree—"but I am not here to reap political benefits".

If we cannot get a union coalition type of situation, which I am afraid we cannot, I think that is naive, then I think my Prime Minister, your Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Canadians has to decide at the right time and it has to be within a year. He must be able to make the unity message and to get the polls to turn around to say to Canadians: "Look, Canada, I have put this together. I have tried. I have done all of these things. We have got these people working. This is what we have come up with, Quebec, if you want it or not."

Whatever the responses are, the Prime Minister by this time next year if things have not turned around totally, and I do not know who said what there but I am very serious and this is a very serious thing to say, has to decide to do the honourable thing, not only for the country but, my friends, to save the Tory party.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I will be very, very brief. When my friend speaks he knows the affection I have always had for the Nowlan family because I sat with his father and his father was a good friend of mine when I was a student at university. He taught me so much about parliamentary process and procedure and many other things which were interesting to learn when you go around Parliament.

I cannot do otherwise but be highly interested in the suggestion he made. The beauty of the parliamentary process is that we listen to each other. Some people do not listen, but I like to listen to what people may have to say and you forget if there is nothing to remember.

He made two proposals tonight and if he would be kind enough, I would like him just to elaborate for a few minutes because I know other members would like to question him. He made a proposal that it would be advisable and possible, if if we are to adjourn tomorrow night, to be sad that we will not have a chance to debate the Spicer commission report and the Beaudoin-Edwards report. I would not mind if Parliament were recalled for a day's debate on each of these reports. Would he kindly elaborate on this new and fresh idea? He is the only one who made this suggestion.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the comment from my good friend from Saint-Denis. That is the point. I agree, let us not open this place to have the opposition run riot with a multitude of problems. I do not see why the House leaders, who have made so many interesting agreements tonight to get us out of here tomorrow, could not make an agreement provisionally to come back here. I do not want to come back here, but this is a fundamental issue.

I think this would at least flag the fact that the Parliament of Canada, the Prime Minister, in a very good speech he made here in the House and one in Toronto and one in Quebec, said that parliamentarians were going to be fundamentally involved. I think it is unnatural. What is the alternative? We have these reports coming in and we sit here in the slumber of summer and then we stagger back here in September all fit and gung-ho with all our other individual problems which affect members and/or aim criticism at government. We all understand this because you and I, and I hate to say it because you, Mr. Speaker, are supposed to have a halo in the Chair, used to sit in opposition. I am still there in this interesting hybrid situation.

I am glad for the question from my friend because I think it would be an impetus to get the Parliament of Canada involved in this issue, not in a multitude of issues and perhaps not even Question Period unless it were on the Constitution. You can devise certain ways to do it and at least we would be back in the ball game rather than trying to catch up. I can say this; come September we are not going to be catching up. We are going to be very partisan and we are going to be behind the eight ball. In some ways, Canada is behind the eight ball.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, during his speech, my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants said that I did not understand very well what happen with the Meech Lake Accord and that it might somewhat be unfortunate for me.

I would like to say something to my colleague, for whom I have a lot of respect—he is an old timer in the House of Commons—and I also have respect for the decision he made when he decided to sit as an independent because he was opposed to the Meech Lake Accord. I respected his decision. I must tell him that I, like the majority of Quebecers, have never perceived the failure of Meech as a denial, by English Canada. Quite the contrary.

All that Quebecers and the rest of Canadians saw on TV, was that ten provincial premiers and one federal prime minister signed the Meech Lake Accord. Everybody saw that. What was difficult to understand or to recognize for Canadians was the fact that two premiers reneged on the deal. The first one did not do anything and let the aboriginals representative take the blame rather than assume his responsibilities as premier. The other one simply did not keep his word.

That is what I perceived, as a Quebecer and as a Canadian, and I believe that the majority of Canadians had the same perception. I would like my colleague to give us an explanation, because he added something else in his speech when he talked about the silence plot on Meech. I have never heard about such a plot. The hon. member and myself were members of the same caucus; we got the same informations and, as far as I know, everybody was aware of what the Meech Lake Accord meant.

So, I would ask him to clarify, for the members of this House, and for the Canadians that are listening, if there is still some at this time, what he meant by this silence plot on Meech.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my friend, who is a very conscientious member, has asked me a very serious question. Actually, there are many parts to this. I used his name because I heard his earlier intervention when he commented about Meech Lake and said that this was a denial of English-speaking Canada against Meech Lake. That is really why I mentioned the name of my colleague earlier. It was not a denial of English-speaking Canada against Meech Lake. As he says, there were 97 per cent of Canadians, representing all the provinces except one, and then there was Manitoba in between that were sort of for Meech Lake. But the conspiracy of silence was very definite. And if the hon. member does not understand that by now, then that is part of the problem with the Conservative caucus. There was an agreement between the Prime Minister, the then leader of the Liberal Party and the then leader of the NDP. Those two have changed. I can tell you I sat just about where the member was sitting, only about two seats up in the corner, and I sat there for two days to make sure that we at least had a debate on the motion to refer the Meech Lake matter to a joint committee that sat in the summer. That is what I mean about the conspiracy.

Don Johnson, the former member from Westmount, or wherever it was, by this time, was out of the Liberal Party. He was seated around here. Now he happens to be president of the Liberal Party, but that is immaterial. He and I, and I was here longer than he, I have to say, in terms of my attendance in the House, tried to force a restricted debate. We have had a better debate already on this motion and more participants than we had on the Meech Lake proposal, if you will check Hansard.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between the parties and I believe that the House will give its unanimous consent to the following proposal.

[English]

I move:

That the debate be allowed to continue until no further member rises in debate, at which time the question will be deemed to have been put on the subamendment and the subamendment will be deemed to have carried on division, following which the question will be deemed to have been put on the amendment, as amended, and the amendment, as amended, will be deemed to be carried on division, following which the question will be put on the main motion and the question will be deemed to have been put and deferred for a formal division tomorrow at three o'clock p.m., following which Mr. Speaker will adjourn the House; during the time from the adoption of this motion until the adjournment, there will be no dilatory motions or quorum calls receivable by the Chair.

I am not suggesting that all of the motion is in order, but I would reserve any arguments on that point to another day. I suggest that we proceed as outlined, and I think that that would find agreement throughout the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You were about to recognize the hon. member from Winnipeg—Bird's Hill. I just wanted to point out to the House, as we are debating the Constitution, with the clock going past midnight, the hon. member who came to this House as a young man at the age of 27, just turned 40, and has just turned middle aged with the Constitution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I congratulate the hon. member from Bird's Hill who is now transferred to Winnipeg—Transcona. A very happy birthday.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me that time that I needed to rise to my feet. Thank you also, to the members of the House for their good wishes.

I was reminiscing with the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville earlier this evening. When I celebrated my 30th birthday, we were in the middle of a constitutional crisis in this House in 1981. I hope that when I celebrate my 50th birthday in this House that we will be beyond this.

I had a comment for the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. If I could get people's attention, particularly the member for Brampton who was part of this debate. When the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants made his suggestion as to how the Prime Minister could help the situation by considering whether or not he ought to resign, by considering whether or not he is part of the problem, the hon. member for Brampton said that the Prime Minister was not a quitter.

I respect that view that the hon. member for Brampton has of the Prime Minister, but I think there does come a time when quitting is not necessarily a disgraceful thing to do, particularly when there is a widespread view that is held in a widespread way that the Prime Minister is part of the problem.

We can leave it to the historians to debate whether this is in fact the case, but it is also the case that the Prime Minister should consider this. I think that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has made a suggestion that should be taken seriously by the Prime Minister.

I am sorry there are not more members here, and I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here to hear what has been a very good debate about this. I think that we should do this more often, have a real debate, the kind of debate that we have threatened to have tonight.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with more or less everything the hon. member from Bird's Hill said. I have a great respect for him.

He has been a member of the constitutional committee of this House of Commons for years. He was one of the members who was in opposition at the same time as I was. That is the point about the member from Brampton. The fundamental problem of the Tory Party today in government is it forgets from when they came.

You can have the Prime Minister. I agree there are certain things that I will take exception with the Prime Minister on. But the fundamental thing is that the public of Canada in 1984 and in 1988, but especially in 1984, went for the Tory Party for a change. We were good opposition people.

Long before the member from Brampton came out of the Chamber of Commerce down there in the southwestern horseshoe, and got into the House of Commons, there were some of us here carrying the torch. We were carrying the torch and we carried it pretty gosh-darned well.

Then we get into government and there are so many new members of government and a new Prime Minister, none of whom understand Parliament. They think that they can hoodwink the Canadian people by just abusing and contradicting in government what we used to say in opposition. You can shake it all down. There may be night sittings that we do not have so that we can get to know each other and some of us know each other too well. There may be a multitude of things, but the fundamental thing, I will be here long after the next election which the member from Brampton would be at the present time.

The fundamental thing is this, that unfortunately, the members of opposition who became government, and especially got inoculated with cabinet juices, and started to drive cabinet cars, and started to have cabinet perks and then told caucus what to do, they forgot that what we used to say here was so nasty. With television, good or bad, an educated public, they are not going to put up with that any more and that is one of the reasons for the malaise.

Coming back to the question from Birds Hill, I agree with the member obviously, but the member for Birds Hill and other members on both sides, and there are some members even on the government side today, and that is one of the reasons I broke with the government in a sense. The member from Brampton will never experience this. He never wanted to ever vote other than what he was told to so that he could get his—

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder why we could not agree that the pages be permitted to go home.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement? It is agreed that the pages be able to go home.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So agreed and ordered.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, might I say that, while we send the pages home, I am grateful as a member of Parliament to have an opportunity to speak in the House on what is, I think, a very important issue for our country. I am grateful not just to the pages and to yourself and to colleagues for permitting the debate to go on, but also the other staff who are here to keep us functioning so that many of us who would like to talk about this have an opportunity to do so. Although we have had a little bit of debate, often we do talk for the record. We also, as part of our functions as members of Parliament, I believe, have an important responsibility to express for the benefit of those who elected us our views on important issues.

I think that as we talk about the resolution that is before us to create a constitutional committee to again look at proposals for a renewed Canada, that there are some things that, as one member of Parliament, I would like to talk about.

I am conscious that many Canadians, and I am sure that many of my constituents, if any of them are still up, are growing very weary of constitutional discussions. I am sure that many of them believe that only lawyers and maybe political junkies care about such arcane matters as notwithstanding clauses and divisions of powers and section 91 and 92 and maybe they think that politicians should be occupying themselves with economic problems and solving some of the other important issues that confront us.

In a sense they are right. Our economic problems in Canada today are serious and they require a very great deal of thought and insight and determination, perhaps even more than the constitutional problems that we face. I think that this is not a matter of losing sight of what is important. I think very often people are not interested particularly in insurance until they realize that their house in on fire. To my constituents I say: "I believe that perhaps our house is on fire and it is time we started to look for our insurance policies".

The failure of the Meech Lake Accord and the subsequent developments that have occurred in the province of Quebec have made this a very important and perhaps a watershed time for Canada.

None of us knows what will come of these significant developments, but what is clear is that significant change is going to come. It will be certain if Quebec decides that it will not continue in Canada, and it will be necessary if Quebec decides to stay.

My concern and my hope is that Canadians are going to realize before it is too late that Canada really has to be preserved. Canadians do not make it a habit of flaunting their patriotism as some other nationalities do. We have a rather small country with a pretty short history. It has been said that we have too much geography and not enough history. We are a nation not because of a war, a revolution, but as a result of a series of conferences that resulted in a vision of compromise.

I suppose it is even true to say that we tend to define ourselves more by what we are not than by what we are. We are surely the most reluctant nation on the face of the earth. Do we not appreciate the value in what we have? Have we become as a nation so weary of our pitiful problems that we cannot celebrate the greatness that is Canada? Can we not see what we have to offer to our children and to the world that is so valuable, a view of the world that says "bigger and stronger is not always better", a view that says we need to look after our poor and weak and sick while rewarding talent, skill and enterprise, a view that says it is no shame to see compromise where others see only conflict?

Do we not understand that it is not by chance that we have played a role in the world and in its institutions far in excess of what our size, our population and our wealth would dictate.

I know that our problems are not going to be solved by blaming anybody and there is lots of blame to go around, but I think where we started down the wrong road on this was when the Prime Minister of Canada said that the Constitution of his country was not worth the paper it was written on.

Can we imagine the President of the United States making such a statement? As a result of that, I feel a great deal of anger and frustration that we can stand here and contemplate the dismantling of Canada.

I think there are some fallacies that underlie the problem we are in. One of them is that opposition to the Meech Lake Accord represented a rejection of Quebec by English Canada. First of all, there is no such monolith as English Canada. In addition, many things that were criticized about the Meech Lake Accord had nothing to do with Quebec. They concerned aboriginals, the north, the rigidity of the amending formula and other things.

Another of the fallacies that I think we hear repeated on and on is that Canada is not working. I think we are at a period of change in our country and we should be prepared for reform, but to glibly say as some people do that Canada is not working is simply wrong. Maybe Yugoslavia is not working. Perhaps the Soviet Union is not working. Canada is working. Canada, despite whatever the flaws may be that people want to talk about, is one of the wealthiest, most prosperous, most successful nations on the face of the earth.

I believe that today's problems are in no small part a result of the fact that we have dwelt on some of these fallacies too much. We have become too negative on ourselves, too critical. It is time that maybe Canadians put on a face of patriotism and talked about some of the things that are good about Canada, some of the things that make this the nation of choice for so many people around the world who want to come here.

Throughout the protracted and distasteful death throes of the Meech Lake Accord, it became evident that the need to look to Canada's future could not be satisfied by a confrontational or incremental change without knowing where Canada was going to end up. The polarization over Meech Lake was surely based upon a disagreement over whether Meech was going to contribute to Canada's unity or whether it would lead to a weaker Canada and thus inevitably to further disunity.

I object to the crisis atmosphere we have ourselves in over this issue which tends to prevent rational and reasoned argument from being part of the process. I think it is clear that certain fundamental changes are going to have to be made. Some of these changes arise out of concerns of Quebecers. The Allaire report correctly points to some of these, but there are other concerns as well.

These changes are going to be difficult for us to address in the context of the uncertainty in which we now find ourselves. The continuing threat of separation from Quebec creates an atmosphere in which the result can only be bitterness and recrimination. In a protracted period of disintegration, if that in fact is what we embark upon, is going to result in nothing but economic hardship and political and constitutional chaos.

I believe that Quebec's linguistic and cultural goals are more likely to be achieved within Canada. I also believe that the Canada that would remain, if Quebec were to separate, would be significantly poorer in every way and much less influential in the world. In the arithmetic of separation ten minus one does not equal nine. Canada without Quebec would be smaller. Out of the G–7 group of the largest industrialized nations, Canadians would be known as a people who could not keep a country together that was one of the most fortunate on the face of the earth.

Anyone who thinks that the remainder of Canada would be easy to govern after Quebec left should think again. The ease with which Preston Manning and his like talk about the existence of a Canada without Quebec should be a warning to people about how false those assumptions are.

Seeking a solution to Quebec's concerns as a preliminary step to dealing with other constitutional issues was attempted in the Meech Lake round and failed. This was most definitively not a rejection of Quebec. Rather it was a failure of process and a clear statement that Canadians will not be bullied into accepting ad hoc changes to their Constitution when there is little prospect for other grievances to be addressed in a reasonable time and fashion.

Those as well on the other side, the new allies of Preston Manning and his group, the Bloc Quebecois that proposes an independent Quebec, have a heavy burden of responsibility to speak the truth to Quebecers. Independence will not come easily, and the fact that Jacques Parizeau goes around professing that he believes it will be so will not make it happen easily.

I think there are some issues that have emerged in the course of how far we have come in this debate that are clear. One is that there is an emerging consensus that there has to be a reduction in the over-all level of government deficits and debt, and that this should be enabled by any constitutional reform.

There are other issues as well that are emerging. They emerged in the Allaire report and other places. Duplication and harmonization are clearly becoming issues on which we need to seek a constitutional understanding among us. It makes no sense whatsoever that in a variety of fields federal and provincial governments are occupying themselves with the same concerns, are hiring and employing bureaucrats to do the same things. Nor does it make any sense that we continue to operate our market in Canada as ten little countries with respect to many different goods and services.

The government was right in raising the issue of interprovincial trade barriers in the Speech from the Throne. I only hope that we can make very rapid and real progress in these matters. In terms of competing in the world, Canada already begins with the disadvantage of having a relatively small and very spread out domestic market.

Why on earth do we want to make it more difficult for ourselves by chopping that market up into ten little ones? It does not make any sense at all.

The Allaire report in Quebec, which put many people outside of Quebec on edge, makes very clear and valuable proposals on the economic union within Canada. We should seize on those and we should promote them and try to gain a consensus across Canada.

A popular conventional wisdom is developing on where we should go in this constitutional debate that concerns me and I want to talk a little bit about it. That is the idea that the solution is going to be the decentralization of power. The fact that Canada is a large and diverse country is not sufficient reason to divide powers so as to create ten little mini countries when it comes to government powers, at the same time as we are trying to break up the interprovincial barriers.

In fact, the world outside our borders is moving towards broader political understanding, broader consensus and co-operation and greater power sharing. Trade and investment is becoming more and more global. To fragment power in Canada, either through Quebec becoming independent or through massive decentralization, is to abandon our levers at a time when global pressures are growing. We are surely stronger united than we would be divided.

I believe that a vastly decentralized Canadian state would find it impossible to lean into the wind that would blow from Washington. In other words, you may be able to take power away from the federal government but that does not mean that it is going to end up with the provinces. Some of it is going to end up outside our borders.

In embarking on constitutional change I think there are a few principles upon which we can agree. The first is that all Canadians should share a common understanding of their fundamental rights and freedoms as expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Second, all Canadians should benefit from common social programs based upon national standards as a simple right of citizenship so that Canadians can be confident that opportunities are available to all, no matter where in the land they may be. For example, my provincial health care plan must have adequate coverage for me anywhere I travel within Canada.

Third, I believe that all Canadians should have a national government elected by the people, able to give voice to the needs of Canada as a whole and able to speak with authority for Canada on the world stage.

Canadians should be able to enjoy a commonality of purpose based upon national consensus, genuinely sought and formed at a national level. Elected political leaders need to ask what is in the best interest of Canada as a whole and have the power to act on that response. The sum must be bigger than the parts. The national government should be working to bring us all closer together.

I believe that the issues most crucial to our future as a nation on this planet in the coming century require national consensus, national will and international co-operation. These issues are global environmental imperatives, global economic restructuring, including Third World development, and world trade.

Can we really face these global issues as an even more decentralized state than we already are? How can our international representatives speak for us in world assemblies on such vital issues as climate change or ozone depletion or reforestation without having the authority to bind Canada? Would we really enter into another free trade agreement, when we do not have free trade among our own provinces? I think these are the issues that need to be dealt with in a focused and clear fashion in this debate as it evolves.

• (0030)

My concern to this point has been that there did not seem to be any kind of organization or orchestration, perhaps choreography is the right word, about how this was going to unfold. The presentation of the resolution that we are debating now, forming a parliamentary committee to look at specific proposals and to consult with Canadians is a positive move. It gives some shape to what is happening, some hope that this is actually a process that has an end which will result in a product to which we can rally the support of Canadians.

Before I close, since it was the NDP who hoped that we would have real debate here, I would like to say in response to its suggestions today that I regret its position, that it cannot support the resolution because it does not contain a constituent assembly.

As I said to the member for Yorkton–Melville when he spoke earlier this evening, I understand where he is coming from on that issue. I hear some of the same voices, the same concerns of people that somehow the process has excluded them.

When I hear the proposals that the NDP make for a constituent assembly I am, first of all, concerned that it could not be completed in a timely fashion. Second, I am concerned about the notion that Canadians cannot be represented unless a member of their particular group speaks on their behalf. It concerns me to think that the implications of the suggestion of the NDP are that when I speak or vote in the House of Commons I do not do so on behalf of the women in my constituency, that I do not do so on behalf of the people of racial origins other than my own in my constituency. This does not make sense to me and I cannot understand why the NDP insists that elected representatives are inadequate to speak on behalf of the people who elected them, even though they may be different from themselves.

To take his case to an absurd conclusion I would say that, no matter what suggestion is made, children are under-represented. Are we to have children on the constituent assembly? Perhaps we should.

The other thing which concerns me is the implication that politicians are incapable of dealing with these important issues of the day. I accept much of the criticism that has been levelled against all of us, that we for some reason have lost the trust of Canadians. Frankly, I blame the government for a lot of that sentiment but that is not the point of addressing it tonight.

Canada is a country rich in democratic traditions. The cornerstone of those traditions is the fact that we elect our leaders from among our peers. Therefore, those elected to lead in Canada are of the best and the worst and the mediocre of our society. If we constantly harp on the worst then very soon the best will want no part of this process.

I plead with the people of Canada to give us all another chance. To give us the time to deal with these issues. We can find a solution. It will not be the solution that satisfies all 25 million Canadians. There will be dissent, there will be people who do not find their own solution in what comes out. However, for the sake of our country, for the sake of all that we have, let us not lose all those good things because we are unhappy with a few things.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I want to congratulate the hon. member. That was probably one of the most thoughtful speeches today. I think he put his finger on a number of concerns that we all feel in the House. I just wanted to add my congratulations.

He did get one shot in and I want to correct the record because it was one of the better speeches that I have heard in this House in a long time. He quoted the Prime Minister as saying that the Constitution was not worth the paper it was written on and asked what would happen if George Bush said that about the constitution in the United States.

There is a slight difference, and let us put it in context. The Prime Minister of Canada was referring to our Constitution in saying that if seven million Canadians are outside our Constitution, then it is not really worth the paper it is written on. That was the context in which was delivered. The difference is George Bush doesn't have one of his states of the union outside the constitution of the United States.

If the hon. member, in the mood of the speech that was given by him, which was excellent, would understand and in all fairness place when the Prime Minister said that in proper context to be fair to the Prime Minister, I think he would agree.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his comments. I do not have the context in which the remark was made, and so I cannot dispute him. My recollection is that it had to do with the notwithstanding clause, because I recall at the time being confused by that since Meech Lake did not remove the notwithstanding clause.

In any event I want to say two things. First, I share the concern I am sure the minister has that the province of Quebec, through its provincial government, did not accept the 1982 constitutional amendments. I am not sure that that leads me to the conclusion that seven million people were left out of the Constitution, given that the Government of the Province of Quebec in 1982 was one that was devoted to separation.

I believe I am also correct in saying that if we look at other very successful federations in the world, we find other examples of countries that work quite well without having every state accept the federal constitution. I suggest that Bavaria has not accepted the constitution of Germany and yet it has worked extremely well for the country. I believe that one or two states in Australia have voted to secede from that federation a number of decades ago. Their efforts were not successful, but it did indicate a lack of acceptance by those state governments of the federation. Sometimes you just have to soldier on.

I do not think we have that option any longer. I think we had that option prior to 1986 but we do not have that option now. The task is for us all to come up with a constitution that not only is worth the paper that it is written on but is worth the love and respect of the people who are bound together by its terms.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, after moving the resolution concerning the adoption of the amendments and finally the main motion a few minutes ago, I have now lost my audience and that of the hon. member for Ottawa South, and that is unfortunate. Anyway, I am happy the minister is still here to ask questions and correct any mistakes I may make during my speech.

Therefore, the first thing I want to do is to congratulate the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs who has introduced this resolution this afternoon. I believe that it is a very important resolution for our country. He made an excellent speech. I think that, if we can agree on the amendments proposed by my party, we will have a good resolution that we will be able to support. We disagree with the government on only two things.

The first is the time limit. The government has proposed that the committee should have until February 28, 1992, to submit its report. We have suggested December 31 of this year. And I think that this date is more reasonable. It gives the committee enough time, and I think the situation in Canada to-day demands that the committee does its work without delay.

Secondly, we think that the government did not produced any proposals to change or amend the Constitution today or in the past. Our party has made some proposals, but the government has not done anything. It has indicated that its proposals will be tabled before the House or the committee in September of this year. It is the view of the official Opposition that it is too late. The governement had almost a year since the failure of the Meech Lake Accord and it is time to put an end to this and to make these proposals to this House and to the committee.

[English]

In any event, with those criticisms I should also add that I believe the government itself has brought about the current constitutional crisis, as we have said repeatedly in this House. I regret that, but our job now is not to lay blame, it is to proceed to try to solve the problem.

We on this side are pleased to help and I suggest that we have done so. I will come to terms with that in a moment.

Before turning to the proposals put forward by the Liberal Party, I would like to look for a moment at the position put forward by the New Democratic Party, which basically is to oppose this motion on the basis that a constituent assembly is a better way to proceed.

When I first heard the idea of a constituent assembly, I must say it had some appeal. It sounded reasonable. It sounded as though it could be considered as a means of involving the members of the public who seem so enthusiastic in getting into this process.

When I considered it, it was many months ago. Having considered it for a while, I dismissed it as a reasonable means of solving the problem at this time. I did so for many reasons set forth by the hon. member for Papineau—Saint Michel this morning in his very able speech, particularly the delay in deciding who is to be in the constituent assembly and how it is to be selected. That will take months, and it will not work.

There will never be agreement as to how the constituent assembly is to be constituted. The hon. member for Yukon, in presenting the views of her party in her speech, was exceedingly vague on this point. There was no indication on how members were to be selected. There was no indication of who would be on it, except members from groups. She stressed that various groups would be asked to send representatives.

Who will agree on which groups? How will the groups choose the delegates to be members of the constituent assembly? Will it be by election? Who will be members of the groups for the purpose of the election? These issues were not dealt with. It is so complicated and so convoluted that it would take months to settle that issue before such an assembly could be brought together.

The hon. member for Ottawa South, in his speech, referred to this particular problem which the NDP is plagued with on this issue. I regret that it has not really concentrated its mind for more than a short time on it because I think if it had, it would have realized that what it is proposing is unworkable.

I want to turn to the argument that it advances in saying that everyone must be represented by one of his or her own kind. It reminds me of Noah's ark. All the animals went in two by two. There had to be two of every variety. If every variety were not there, it would be a failure of representation on the earth afterward because there were none there to reproduce.

It just does not work that way in modern political thought. I think I am safe in saying this is not modern thought, this idea of representation in democracy has been around for a very, very long time; in the British parliamentary tradition for well over 900 years. I do not think I need go back beyond that, but it is not new. This is something which is old in civilization. For generations, thousands of years, people chose to have representatives do their governing for them. That is exactly what we have had in Canada since our inception as a country under the British North America Act and under the various acts that preceded it. I suggest that it is a perfectly workable alternative for us today.

Members of Parliament can represent their ridings. They are capable of representing their ridings. Some of us may be better at it than others, and the people make judgments in respect of our abilities to represent our ridings. We do have that ability. Some may be better, some may be less, but the ability, the capability is there.

I am white. I am male. I happen to be Protestant. I happen to be a Liberal, not a Conservative or a New Democrat. I happen to have English as my native tongue. That does not mean that I am in any way inhibited from representing all the people of Kingston and the Islands who may be somewhat different. Some might not have English as their native tongue, some might be female, some might be Catholic or some other religious belief, some might not be white and some might not be Liberals. There is the odd Tory in Kingston and the Islands, and there is the odd New Democrat. I am still their representative in this House for the term for which I am elected. I do not say to any Conservative or New Democrat who comes to me for assistance: "Sorry, I cannot help you, you are not of my party". I do not know any member in this House who would ever say that to anyone else who came to him or her for help. There may be one, but if so, I do not know him or her.

We all work as representatives of all the people in our ridings when we work in this House. That is a vital and fundamental principle of Canadian parliamentary democracy. If we have the ability, or at least the capability of representing all the people in our riding, surely we do not need a constituent assembly which is to be made up of all these diverse groups in order to achieve representation.

Why would it be any more representative of the people than the elected House of Commons just because its make-up was made to reflect the various diversities of Canada? The people of Canada make a choice, and if we go to a constituent assembly the choice will be made by limited groups here and there which will be asked to make selections and send people, it will not be done on popular election.

From a straight political point of view, I can understand why the New Democratic Party would prefer the constituent assembly.

Mr. Nowlan: Peter.

Mr. Milliken: I am surprised that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants is obviously supporting the New Democratic Party in this view. It sounds as though he is from his grunts and groans at the back.

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: This is phoney, there is no point of order.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: I appreciated the break.

The fact is that the members of the New Democratic Party are obviously of the view that there is some political advantage to be gained in going for a constituent assembly. They take the view that if there were elections now for a constituent assembly there would be more New Democrats elected than there are in this House. There would be more Liberals elected, too, in my opinion. I suspect, and I think the minister would agree with me, that if there were an election tomorrow we would probably have most of the seats in a constituent assembly and the Conservatives would have very, very few.

Mr. Nowlan: The Reform would have more—

Mr. Milliken: I am not out to try to argue this on partisan grounds, I do not think it needs to be. I do think that we need to look at the constituent assembly not from the point of view of partisan advantage, but from the point of view of whether it is the reasonable method to deal with the constitutional situation that we are faced with. I suggest that it is not. What we need to look at is taking advantage of the elected persons we have here, putting them on a committee and getting the job done. That is what the government has proposed. We support it, with the modifications that we have suggested in our amendments.

• (0050)

We on this side of the House say that we strive to represent all of our constituents at all times regardless of their differences. We seek to speak on behalf of all of them. We obviously fail from time to time. On one issue or another we will have differences. The fact is that we make the effort. I think it is a genuine effort on the part of all members on this side, and indeed on every side, of this House.

The surprise for me is that the New Democratic Party, which calls itself the Democratic Party in Canada and stresses how democratic it is, is abandoning this fundamental precept or concept of Canadian democracy in opting for a constituent assembly, instead of taking advantage of the membership of this House.

I note that one of the principal reasons why it ought to abandon this whole concept is because the province of Quebec, through its government, has indicated its unwillingness to participate in this assembly.

It is not surprising that the New Democratic Party ignores the Government of Quebec. At its recent convention in Halifax, out of 521 delegates only 30 were from the province of Quebec. One-quarter of Canada's population was represented by well less than 10 per cent of the delegates present at that convention. That is a standard pattern in that party. It has not been able to change that position. I suggest that if we looked at the breakdown of delegates, which I do not have, we would find that it was quite unrepresentative of large chunks of the rest of the country as well.

What has the Liberal Party done in order to further this debate? It has proposed, through its leader, a framework for reform of the Constitution. The usual practice for an opposition is to wait until the government makes proposals and then criticize the proposals.

In this case, the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Beauséjour, has chosen to go public with a set of principles and proposals to amend the Constitution of Canada. I suggest that it is unusual, but it has been done in this case, and the Prime Minister of Canada has followed virtually every one of these proposals and adopted them as his own. He has agreed, on behalf of his government, that these proposals merit consideration and are sensible and that he is prepared to proceed on them, all but one. That one deals with the question of a referendum.

Let us see what the proposals are.

[Translation]

The first proposal was a statement on the essence of Canada. The leader of the opposition spoke of our attachment to the two official languages, of our varied cultural background, of the distinct nature of the Quebec society and of the role of the native peoples. These are some of issues raised in the statement on the essence of Canada.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: It sounds like Meech.

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: That is right, it does sound like Meech, but the Meech Lake Accord did not contain everything.

The commitment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was also mentioned and, in particular, the primacy of the Charter, as well as the building up of the Canadian economic union. He said the barriers to interprovincial trade should come down.

He proposed a reform of our institutions mainly affecting the Senate, considering that this renewed elected, equal and effective Senate should be a key component of the constitutional reform.

[English]

An hon. member: Equal?

Mr. Milliken: No, he did not say that. He did not say equal,

He also proposed the division of powers, pointing out we would be well advised to consult the provinces on this issue of great importance to every level of government, provincial and federal. All that was proposed.

On the subject of immigration, he proposed that the existing administrative arrangement governing immigration be entrenched in the constitution.

As for the Supreme Court of Canada, he proposed that the provinces be given the right to designate judges, what was proposed in the Meech Lake Accord.

For the First Nations, he proposed that constitutional reform enshrine their right to self determination, and this is the position of the Liberal Party.

Likewise, he proposed that the amending formula—

I am very sorry that the hon. member is not interested in my remarks, but he will be able to read all this in the document prepared by the Opposition Leader's office.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would have thought the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, a very responsible member of the House of Commons who is very involved in all these discussions, would have communicated all this to the committee when it gets into committee. However, to take the time of the House 12.55 a.m., with all the personnel working here, shows to me an absolute abusive interest in the affairs of the nation.

This speech is a speech not on the motion, but on the Liberal proposals, good ones and bad ones, that should be put before the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has four minutes left in his speech. Then we will have questions and comments.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the time taken by these interruptions by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants will be added to my time.

I sat here and listened patiently to an extremely boring speech from him. For him to continue interrupting my speech when I am trying to explain these policies, I find unnecessary in the circumstances and I ask him to restrain himself.

An hon. member: I have a question for when you are finished, thank God.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member can ask questions to his heart's content when I am finished. I will be pleased to answer them, but I also want to say that the amending formula proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, according to the Victoria charter is again, as he suggested, most effective for Canada. It is a reasonable one. He has put it forward as our position.

That represents a framework in which constitutional reform can proceed in this country. It is a sensible, logical approach to the issue. It is one that has found favour with the government. I have no doubt that it will be considered by the committee as the hon. member has suggested, and I hope it will be.

I think that as members of this House we have an obligation to do our best to see that this works. I hope that the motion, when it is amended, will find favour with all parties in the House and that all parties will work to ensure that the committee is successful in its work.

I was born in this country and I had that privilege. It is one that I know many of my countrymen enjoy, but many came to Canada by choice. I have travelled very extensively in this country from St. John's to Victoria, to the northern tip of Baffin Island. I have canoed thousands of miles in Canadian rivers and I have visited most of Canada's major cities at one time or another.

My roots in Canada are very deep, and my family has come from various parts of the country. I have lived across this country for various periods of time and in various places, mostly in Ontario but briefly elsewhere. I have a very deep affection for this country and I, like other hon. members, do not want to see Canada divided.

Our aim in the opposition in this case as in many others is to strive to make the system work. We believe that Parliament can work. We believe the House of Commons of Canada does work. Sure, we have problems once in a while with different aspects of government policy where we see the place is breaking down. By and large, the House of Commons works. Its committees work. We believe that this committee studying the Constitution can do a job for Canada that will make every member of this House proud of its achievement if we just give it the chance and if all members work together to make the committee a viable option.

I support the amendment that has been proposed. I hope that the matter will be dealt with tomorrow at the vote on a virtually unanimous basis and I hope that we can all strive, whether we are on the committee or not, to make it the success that it should be.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hour is late, but quite frankly the hour may be late for the country and therefore the hour being late in this Chamber is immaterial. I therefore take back what I sort of inferred when the hon. member from Kingston and the Islands was concluding his speech.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is one of the more constructive, sincere and capable members of this House, so I have two questions for him.

He is sort of the assistant House leader. I do not know what his official title is, but after the Spicer report, after the Beaudoin–Edwards report, goodness knows that the government is going to respond to those reports because we do not know, but would the hon. member be the leader in his party, which is Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, to try and develop not just a consensus, but to explore with the government a coalition union situation on this matter of the country. That is my first question, a very, very specific question.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is very hypothetical. I see no evidence that it will be necessary to form a coalition with the government on this issue. I am optimistic that there will be a unanimous report from the committee as I note there was from the committee that studied the Meech Lake Accord chaired by the present hon. Minister of the Environment.

Obviously, the parties in this House worked together with great success on that committee. Unfortunately, the committee report was not acted upon, and I will say no more in respect to that.

I think it is important that the hon. member realize that there is a difference between forming a coalition with the government on this issue and making a unanimous committee report, which I think is possible. I hope that it will happen and I think all hon. members should work to that aim.

Mr. Nowlan: Very good, Mr. Speaker, this is an educational night. I really appreciate that answer of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands which leads me very naturally to my supplementary. I do not know if he was a lawyer, but I used to be.

Therefore, I understand the problems in trying to get a coalition union situation in this very partisan atmosphere here. The hon. member talks about a unanimous committee report and we all saw what happened to that. Therefore, there is the cry outside of this hallowed Chamber of having the constituent assembly referendum process.

I really want to ask the hon. member this question. I heard him talk and denigrate in effect the NDP situation of constituent assembly, and it is not just the NDP situation of constituent assembly, but there are many people without party affiliation who feel—it may be wrong, it may be difficult, it may be complicated—they want to get involved.

Could the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands answer this specific question. When he talks about the constituent assembly, would he agree with me after he signs that memo that there is a heck of a difference between a constituent assembly of people with all the difficulties of collecting them, all the difficulties of organizing them, all the difficulties of having them focus on a report and then perhaps the elected members, most likely properly the elected members developing their recommendations.

I was amazed at the hon. member who knows quite a bit, not more than I, but quite a bit more on constitutional law, on constitutional assemblies.

Does he not agree with me that the fundamental difference at the moment between what we are doing with the parliamentary committee with all its potential and a constituent assembly feeding into the parliamentary process is that with a constituent assembly you do not have any party discipline? In terms of the House of Commons and a parliamentary committee, and I have been through it for 25 years, you have something called party discipline. Does he not think the fact that there is no party discipline in something so fundamental as a constituent assembly is something that should at least be considered and explored and then rejected rather than rejected for the ideological negatives put forward by the negative situation of the Liberal Party?

Mr. Milliken: First of all I want to say I do not think the Liberal Party's position on this is negative. With respect, it is the most positive of any of the parties in this House. We are the only party that has laid on the table a proposal for amending the Constitution and dealing with the situation we are in at this time. No other party has so far come up with such a comprehensive proposal at this stage.

I think that has taken considerable courage from the Leader of the Opposition. It has shown some judgment. That is the first point I want to make.

Second, I do not agree with him that a constituent assembly would necessarily be non-partisan. I think there would be all kinds of partisan divisions in a constituent assembly and if the hon. member does not agree with that he is dreaming in technicolour.

Constituent assemblies will divide on all kinds of bases. There will not be a party Whip, but at least with a party Whip you are able to whip together differing interests into one concrete group. With a constituent assembly you would have every division going in the country shown up and exposed and members would arguing with each other. It would be very divisive. There is no guarantee that everybody in it would suddenly say that this is exactly what they wanted, that they had hit on a consensus. There is no guarantee of that at all.

I want to point out that in the motion, if he would read it, it sets up this committee. I urge him to look at it very carefully. There are all kinds of provisions—

Mr. Nowlan: Subcommittees.

Mr. Milliken: I listened patiently to his questions. The least he could do is listen to my answer.

It says the committee will provide Canadians with an opportunity to participate fully in the development of the Government of Canada's plan for a renewed Canada. The committee will have subcommittees with power to travel and hold public hearings within Canada. The committee will have the power to hold joint sittings with the committees of legislatures or individual members of provincial and territorial legislatures. The committee will develop procedures to ensure aboriginal peoples participate fully in the development of the Government of Canada's plan for a renewed Canada and in particular on issues of special interest to them.

There are all kinds of powers in here which are unusual in a parliamentary committee. They are designed to make this committee react and interact with Canadians across this country. I think it is a reasonable proposition. It is the best we have seen yet from this government. We are delighted to see it has taken this step. We support those aspects of this motion. I think the hon. member, if he looks at it and thinks about it, will realize that in terms of what could be accomplished in a reasonable time with minimum of division and discord the parliamentary committee is a sound, solid approach. There is a risk that the Conservative Whip will lay it on a bit thick but I am prepared to take that chance. I think that the country is prepared to take the chance, and we in the Liberal Party have committed ourselves to working with the government to achieve unanimity on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate is ended. Thank you very much. I thank all hon. members for a great debate this evening.

Mr. Flis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. At 10.55 we did pass a number of motions put forward by the government parliamentary secretary. Motion No. 9 reads: "That at any time during the adjournment of the House between June 1991, and September 15, 1991, the Speaker may cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal assent, et cetera".

I think I heard the parliamentary secretary put a date in there, but when I asked for copies from the Clerk there was no date. I do not see how we could pass something like this without a date. I think I heard him say June 19, but in the copy that I have and it is initialled—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will have a look at it tomorrow.

Pursuant to order made earlier this day the subamendment is deemed adopted on division. The amendment as amended is deemed adopted on division, and the question on the main motion as amended is deemed put and the division deferred to later this day at three o'clock p.m.

Accordingly this House stands adjourned until later this day, June 19, at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1.10 a.m.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming painfully evident that this government does not give a darn about housing and people. In the past three years we have had three ministers, countless studies, reviews, conferences and more bafflegab. The bottom line is that we have received nothing but cuts, cuts and more cuts to co-op housing, to social housing, to public housing and absolutely zero for home buyers and home builders.

The homeless are growing in numbers, the waiting lists for affordable housing have grown by the thousands. Thousands of workers are out of work and the government dawdles while people suffer more.

The Canadian Home Builders' Association, the Canadian Housing Renewal Association, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and the Co-Op Housing Federation all call unanimously on this government for a national housing policy, for national leadership on housing and for the Conservatives to be part of the solution, not part of the problem.

Mr. Speaker, this government has the unmitigated gall to spend $375,000 for a dog house. The real question is this. Is this government's housing policies going to the dogs?

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, in mid-March of this year, I orally warned the now Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that I anticipated unusually difficult ice conditions in Newfoundland.

On May 9, I wrote the minister again warning him that income for fisherpersons could well be deferred for about a month because of the severe ice accumulation, and I urged him to encourage his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to implement contingencies for this.

Unemployment insurance ran out for fishermen on May 18. From then until now, the extension of UI has been granted on a piecemeal, gradual basis to groups of fishermen from area to area, from week to week. During that period of time, my office made 25 consultative calls with DFO and I wrote two other letters.

Last night, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced that all fishermen would be eligible for compensation. In this monthly interval, despite our warnings and advocations, great anxiety has been caused to fishermen and their families, many of whom have had no other source of income since the middle of May.

While we are grateful that this compensation package has finally been approved for all, I would ask the government that should this ever be the case again, that decisions be made earlier, especially when there are warnings and this unnecessary pain, worry and anxiety to those engaged in the primary industry in Newfoundland, be avoided.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, community leaders from across Canada will be brought together to improve dialogue and communications among Canadians as a result of funding from the Secretary of State in support of the initiative of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities is a national organization of some 600 municipalities representing more than 70 per cent of the Canadian population. The federation has been a force for national unity for a long time, and this program will play a positive role in promoting better understanding and fostering dialogue among Canadians from different parts of the country. These programs and efforts are important contributions to Canadian life, because strong and progressive communities are essential to the over-all prosperity and happiness of the country.

The funding from the Secretary of State Department will help the FCM undertake a six-month pilot project for an exchange program in the latter half of 1991.

CFB SHILO

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the threatened closure or downsizing of CFB Shilo by the Department of National Defence would be yet another blow to the economy of Manitoba, from a government seemingly determined to bring it to its knees.

After major reductions to Kapyong Barracks and the transfer of the Second Princess Patricia's Light Infantry from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and the devastating loss of the forces base in the town of Portage la Prairie, it now seems that the government is intent on spreading the misery to Brandon.

CFB Shilo has been invaluable to the department as a training base. It is also the provinces third largest employer outside of Winnipeg and its closing would affect nearly 1,700 military and civilian jobs in the area. Shilo contributes over $110 million annually to the local economy and the spin-off effects from its closure would be disastrous to Brandon and the surrounding area.

We have learned that the troops on the base would in all likelihood be transferred to CFB Suffield, yet another move by this government to build up Alberta at the expense of Manitoba.

I call on the federal government and the new Minister of National Defence to refrain from inflicting further damage on Manitoba's economy.

FRENCH CANADIANS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, since today is the last day before the summer recess, I would like to take this opportunity to wish all Quebecers a happy Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate to recall what was said 35 years ago by historian Arnold Toynbee, internationally known as one of the greatest historians of this century, when he was a guest speaker at McGill University in Montreal. On this particular occasion, he said that when the Archangel Gabriel sounded the trumpet on the last day, there were two peoples that would definitely be around to hear him: the Chinese and the French Canadians.

I thought he made his point very eloquently and in fact, there is a lot of truth in this when we look at how Quebec, first known as New France, developed since the sixteenth century. French Canadians are indeed here to stay.

PORK INDUSTRY

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, June 24, 1991 marked an important date for Canadian trade. In a unanimous decision, the final bilateral dispute panel of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement ruled in favour of Canada's pork producers and exporters. The decision will mean millions of dollars in recouped countervail duties for our pork exporters.

This decision reaffirms the success of the free trade agreement and once again proves the anti-free trade Liberals and NDP are dead wrong. The Americans tried their utmost to maintain the status quo but they failed.

United States trade representative Carla Hills stated: "We used the rules that were in place. We got a decision and now we will have to live with it".

Contrary to the naysayers, this demonstrates that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement is sound and that the dispute settlement mechanism has been tested and proven sound.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, eastern Ontario and southern Ontario are the only areas in Canada that do not have a regional development program under this government.

Since January 1, 1989, when the so-called free trade agreement became law, 148,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in Ontario alone. High interest rates, an artificially high Canadian dollar, rationalization and centralization of corporate business, have pulled industries out of small town Ontario and cities alike. Jobs have moved to Mexico, the U.S. and elsewhere. High taxes caused by 33 tax increases under this Tory government, high fuel costs and other transportation expenditures have driven jobs from Canada.

U.S. farmers are benefiting under free trade but Canadian farmers are not. Post offices, VIA Rail and potential tourist infrastructure have been taken away from the regions of Canada. Canadians want a lower Canadian dollar. They want tax relief, but most of all Canadians want a new government that knows what this Canadian nation is all about.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY WEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of all members that this is Canadian Occupational Health and Safety Week. This is a week dedicated to highlighting the important role of health and safety programs that they have in the workplace in reducing the number of illnesses and the accidents that cost society so much each year.

At the federal level the Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for the health and safety of all federal government employees. Health and Welfare Canada through its public service health programs provide a wide range of services to protect and to promote the mental, physical and social well-being of federal employees. Two of their current priorities are, increasing the capacity to respond to post-trauma stress and also a continuing emphasis on investigating complaints about the poor quality of air in the workplace.

• (1410)

The health and safety of our federal employees is important and I am confident their interests are being well served by this department.

INTERNATIONAL FESTIVAL OF LANAUDIÈRE

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the International Festival of Lanaudière will start its fourteenth season of activities this week. A marvellous program of classical music will be presented from June 20 to July 28. The audience will hear world famous performers, including new French singer Françoise Pollet. Mozart will be in the spotlight on this 200th anniversary of his death, with a number of concerts by performers like Christopher Hogwood and the Handel and Haydn Society.

The festival's amphitheatre, in a breathtaring setting unique in this country, has room for 2,000 people under its roof and 8,000 more on the lawn, whose natural slope offers an excellent view of the stage. The visual impact, however, is nothing compared to the acoustics where no effort has been spared to render the subtle harmonies of our virtuoso performers as faithfully as possible.

This year, the festival will include the biggest hologram in the world, one of the few to be exhibited outside. It was made by artist Georges Diens who was inspired by the Champs Élysées in Paris.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time is expired.

TRADE

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, today we met with a group of individuals representing coal mining communities in western Canada. What they told us was both sad and shocking. It seems that for a number of reasons their industry is losing ground to competitors in the United States.

Western Canadian producers are subject to high transportation costs, including the GST, which American producers are not. If this government is serious about increasing interprovincial trade, it should look at a tax rebate for the transportation of goods from one province to another.

Also I would like to remind all members of the House that coal produced in western Canada is on balance cleaner and less damaging to the environment than the American product. It is time that this government showed support for western Canada coal producers, mine workers and the communities that depend on them.

I call upon the federal government to take immediate steps to remove the barriers from interprovincial trade.

WORLD FOLKLORE FESTIVAL OF DRUMMONDVILLE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the 10th World Folklore Festival of Drummondville will be held from July 5 to July 14, and I invite all members and all Canadians to come and take part in the most important traditional event in Quebec.

For ten days, under the festival theme "Dix ans au rythme du monde", more than 30 folk dance groups from 21 countries will share with us their customs and traditions through music, dance and song, as well as a host of interesting activities. More than 800 performers from Canada, the United States, France, and countries as far away as the U.S.S.R., Poland and Argentina, will demonstrate their age-old, enchanting traditions through the medium of the dance.

About 1,300 volunteers have been working very hard for many months to make this popular festival a world class event. Last year, Mr. Speaker, the festival, which was named tourism event of the year, welcomed 750,000 visitors.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

AUTO SAFETY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that U.S. authorities are attempting to restrict Canadian manufactured motor vehicles when the Canadian Department of Transport is proposing to relax the Motor Vehicle Safety Act to give preferred treatment to U.S. manufactured vehicles in Canada.

I find it puzzling and unacceptable that U.S. manufacturers will be allowed to supply a product in Canada that Canadian manufacturers are prevented by law to supply.

In my view, this move will dilute and confuse the Motor Vehicle Safety Act in Canada. It will increase the cost of new cars to consumers and it will transfer jobs to the United States.

It is unacceptable to have two sets of safety standards. It is imperative that the U.S. industry be required to meet the same standards as Canadian industry in Canada. The Department of Transport must review these amendments and assure the Canadian industry a level playing field in our own country.

IRAQ

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the war in the gulf may be over but the casualties continue to mount.

The UN Undersecretary-General referred to the near apocalyptic conditions following coalition bombing of Iraq. UNICEF has reported Iraqi children have stopped growing because they are not getting enough to eat. Waterborne diseases are widespread.

Surely Canada must urge the immediate lifting of non-military economic sanctions against Iraq. As the UN Secretary-General reported in March, the Iraqi people may soon face a further imminent catastrophe which could include epidemic and famine if life supporting needs are not rapidly met.

The Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War have asked: How is it possible that the international community allowed its governments to place an entire civilian population in such jeopardy? Canada must accept our share of the responsibility for rebuilding after the carnage of this tragically wrong war.

CFB CHILLIWACK

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Chilliwack is a very friendly and close community. So when part of the community comes under stress and strain, the community comes together in support of its neighbours.

There is stress and strain in Chilliwack right now because there are some vicious rumours that part of our community might come under attack. The Canadian Forces Base is an integral part of the community in Chilliwack, and many people are concerned that it might be closed.

This is causing a great many people in Chilliwack and throughout British Columbia serious concern. As I speak, the First Combat Engineer Regiment is in Kuwait clearing mines. The families are already stressed by the absence of their loved ones. It is encouraging to know that when times get rough and stress gets high, people pull together. Such is the case in Chilliwack where military families are supporting each other and where the community is rallying in support of the base.

I have confidence that the cabinet, when it deals with this, will let common sense prevail and that Chilliwack will remain a stronger, more cohesive community that is 100 per cent intact.

PARLIAMENTARY TOUR GUIDES

Mr. Speaker: I know that hon. members would want to join me in welcoming our new parliamentary tour guides who will be introducing Parliament to visitors from Canada and around the world. They have been at work since May and will welcome over 300,000 people before the summer is over.

PARLIAMENTARY PAGES

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that all hon. members will want to join me in thanking the parliamentary pages whose terms will end shortly.

I am sure all members will agree that the young men and women who were selected to serve as pages have shown they are worthy representatives of Canadian youth, of whom we are justly proud.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Every 17 minutes, there is a sexual assault committed in Canada. Ninety per cent of the victims are women. Women across this country, including women on all sides of this House, are afraid to walk in their own neighbourhoods at night.

In light of these tragic facts and in recognition of the Montreal massacre, will the Prime Minister today announce a royal commission to examine the tragedy of this war against women?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important issue.

I do not know where she has been because a commitment was made in the Speech from the Throne that a blue ribbon panel about violence against women was going to be established by this government. The appointments to that panel are being made as we speak in the House today.

The government's commitment to look at this issue very seriously and to identify it as a unique and particular issue of Canadian society, in other words, violence against women being a particular social phenomenon, is clear. We have every intention of following through not just with the study of violence against women, but with the appropriate actions to deal with its causes and its effects.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. The tragedy at the Polytechnique in Montreal was followed by a tripartite initiative on violence against women. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister's Quebec lieutenant has killed this initiative. Why does he today refuse to endorse the creation of a royal commission of inquiry on violence against women? I would appreciate an answer from the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just erroneously and, I assume, inadvertently informed the House that someone I know killed an initiative for a project that would have the effect of reducing and eliminating violence against women. The Minister of Justice just said the exact opposite.

In the Speech from the Throne, the Canadian government announced its intention to initiate a thorough inquiry into violence against women. At this very moment, people are being selected to conduct this inquiry which will be a very important one for Canada, and as far as I know, members of this House are practically unanimous in supporting this very important initiative by the Canadian government.

• (1420)

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we had a chance in this House to do something unanimously. We had a chance for all political parties to come together to support the initiative of the subcommittee that was struck on the issue of violence against women. Instead, the effort of an all-party committee was torpedoed by the parliamentary assistant to the minister of health.

Will the Prime Minister overrule the torpedo action carried out by his colleagues and will he today—

Mr. Speaker: The question goes right to the heart of something that is taking place in the committee at this time. I listened very carefully. I know the hon. member will notice that I did not interrupt until I certain I heard it carefully. I think it is out of order. Perhaps the hon. member could put her question another way.

Ms. Copps: The very basic question is this. Will the Prime Minister endorse a unanimous recommendation in this House and move today to strike a royal commission to examine the war on women that we as women are facing all across this country? Will he do that today for the women of Canada, please?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks me whether I will endorse a unanimous recommendation for an inquiry into violence against women. The answer is not only will I endorse it, I announced it in the throne speech on behalf of the government, not today, but some six weeks ago.

The Government of Canada is in the process of putting together the terms of reference and the nominees of a commission of inquiry that will be a very important instrument to protect women against the vicious crime of assaults against women. This was announced in the throne speech. We are in the process of following through. There is nothing partisan about it. I endorse it just as enthusiastically as the deputy leader of the Liberal Party.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE CANADA

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns violent offenders. There is the Takahashi case on the west coast where an inmate was sentenced for three life terms for sexual assaults yet was out playing golf with a murderer, a fraud expert and an unarmed guard.

On the east coast, the Thompson case, an inmate committed a murder while on parole. There is concern in my community that he will receive a temporary absence to Moncton or be moved to a minimum security facility.

Is the minister satisfied with the way in which violent and sex offenders are receiving escorted temporary absences?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): I appreciate my hon. friend's question and I realize that he is concerned, as are we, about public security in these matters. The security of the public is first and foremost in the operations of Canada's correction service and we will continue that.

I should tell my hon. friend we are reviewing the matter of corrections and conditional release and we would expect to be coming forward in the fall with a new program which would address the concerns that my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): My supplemental is for the same minister. Mr. Minister, obviously from what you said, you realize that Canadians have lost complete confidence in the parole system in this nation. As I mentioned, the earlier cases and also the Légère and Gingras cases, all focus attention on the problem. Obviously victims and communities worry. Victims need to have some input into the system before releases are granted and at the very least they should know when somebody is being released.

Would the Solicitor General be prepared to order a full comprehensive parliamentary review of the parole system, especially with regard to violent and sexual offenders?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have two points in response to my hon. friend. First, I would like to think that in the fall when we bring forward the reforms I mentioned, that in the discussion and the review of those amendments, we could have that kind of examination.

At the same time, while I appreciate that when dealt with in the specifics, some of these cases do not look as appropriate as my hon. friend and I might think.

I want to say that the temporary absence program is successful. In the fiscal year 1988–89, the success rate in terms of trying to protect the public and rehabilitate people was 99.93 per cent. So there is a fair degree of success to this, while I admit that there are some problems.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Just over a year and a half ago, all members of this House shared the tears of the parents of the victims of the Montreal massacre. Before and since then, many of us in this House have talked about violence against women.

The report of the subcommittee on the status of women, entitled War on Women has made some extremely useful recommendations, has heard a number of witnesses, men and women from across this country who came to speak to this committee and share the pain of violence. They asked this committee to do something, to take direct action. It is not only the victims, it is the abusers and it is the children who suffer from violence.

Does the Prime Minister accept the recommendations of the report by the subcommittee to really do something about violence against women or does he support the views of those on his side of the House who rejected this report and refused to endorse it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My hon. friend, I think, does perhaps an injustice to some colleagues in the House of Commons. There has been no rejection of any of the provisions of the report.

Ms. Black: Many refused to endorse it.

Mr. Mulroney: There has been no rejection. As I understand from the distinguished member from Calgary, there was a desire for an opportunity for members of the House to be seized of this and to debate it. There was no rejection.

Ms. Black: They had it over a week.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is asking me an important question and I am trying to give an answer. I was not a member of the committee or of the subcommittee. All I know is that the member for Don Valley North, the chairperson of the committee, Barbara Greene, has done an outstanding job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: To the best of my knowledge, no one has voted against a single provision of the report. The object of the exercise is to bring the subcommittee report forward to the committee and eventually to have the House of Commons enact legislation pursuant to the recommendations of that report. That, I believe, is exactly what will happen.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the women of Canada have waited a long time to see some serious work on the issue of violence against women. All of us in this House, I am sure, want to see that happen, but we want action now. When we want to put grain handlers back to work, we do it in a day. When want to ensure that arms sales can take place, this government does it in a day.

Will the Prime Minister endorse the recommendations of this subcommittee's report? Will he make sure that these come forward quickly for action now, for the women of Canada, for the children of Canada and end violence in this society, not just talk about it.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the committee has voted to table the report, which makes it a proper subject of public discussion and that it contains recommendations that touch a number of departments in government. But I think it is important to point out that the government continues now to be actively involved in seeking ways to deal with this problem concretely through legislative and policy initiatives.

• (1430)

As the hon. member will know, I just recently hosted in Vancouver an historic three-day meeting on Women, Law and the Administration of Justice which was historic because it involved high level presentation from the judiciary, representation from every Department of the Attorney General in this country, high level experts in the area of violence against women and other areas related to women and the law. This was a working group that was designed to conform with recommendations that we can act on.

We will look forward, with great interest, to the recommendations coming forward from the parliamentary committee, but we are working now on dealing with the issue of violence against women.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Clearly, the women of Canada do not feel that. I think this is the issue. The issue is whether this government is prepared to seriously address the whole issue of violence against women.

[Translation]

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, the provincial, territorial and federal ministers responsible for the Status of Women are meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland.

Which recommendations will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women announce at this meeting, those contained in the report or those rejected by her cabinet colleagues who refuse to acknowledge the tragedy of violence against women?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, because the committee, as I understand, voted to table its report, the meeting of Ministers responsible for the Status of Women will be free to discuss it. It will be in the public domain. More important, they will have available to them the recommendations that came out of the Vancouver meeting, an historic meeting, the first of its kind and will provide a very important subject matter for the meeting of the Ministers responsible for the Status of Women in working to counter violence against women.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Montreal, Algo Group Inc., Canada's leading apparel manufacturer became the latest Canadian firm to announce its likely departure to the United States.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether this is what he had in mind when he said to the OECD in Paris a couple of weeks ago: "Those who lose jobs during periods of economic slow-down such as we are now experiencing may well find their new positions in different industries, occupations or regions".

Why does the minister not have the courage to admit these effects of his policies at home? What industries, occupations and regions is he referring to and what policies is the government bringing in to help workers through these periods of adjustment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think if my hon. friend would be honest with the people who are listening to this Question Period, he would read the accurate parts of the decisions that this company is making. It says in the article that the company is moving an office to Britain so that they can sell women's clothes that are made in Canada into Britain.

They also point out that if they were to move to Mexico it would not be to take away jobs from Canada, but would be moving jobs from the countries in southeast Asia into Mexico where it would bring those low cost inputs closer to Canada to help maintain the profitability of the manufacturing of that company within Canada.

The suggestions that they might be moving to the United States are speculation. The actual results and decisions that this company has taken are related to decisions that will help the manufacturing facilities here in Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the shareholders of Algo will be delighted with the minister's confidence in their company.

I ask the Minister of Finance to please explain to the people of Canada the meaning of his remarks made to the OECD. I will quote them again in case he did not hear them the last time: "Those who lose jobs during periods of economic slow-down such as we are now experiencing may well find their new positions in different industries, occupations or regions."

Will the Minister of Finance, whose words I have quoted, please tell Canadians what industries, occupations and regions he is referring to and what programs the Government of Canada proposes to give assistance to workers who have to make these adjustments brought on by his own policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about the confidence of the shareholders of Algo Industry. He should let the Canadian people know that this is a company that has had a continuous series of profitable years since it was founded in 1942. It has made profits throughout recessions. It has made profits when times are good.

If he wants to talk about some articles that are in the paper today, why does he not talk about Terrence Corcoran when he talks about the recession is over, dead, deceased, expired, it is finished.

CFB GOOSE BAY

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence or whoever is answering for him today.

Goose Bay has been an important northern base since 1942. It still serves our NATO allies and it is the main economic mainstay of the 8,000 people who live there. My question is how can the government contemplate closing Goose Bay when it has absolutely no defence policy for this country? Will the government give an undertaking today that before any change is made in the status of Goose Bay or any other base in this country a defence policy for the future will be brought forward that can be discussed with the people. Can we have that undertaking today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, I am happy to inform my friend that the minister, pursuant to many meetings with the senior defence personnel, will be bringing forward very soon to cabinet for consideration some changes in our defence posture. The United States and all of our allies are changing some important elements of their defence posture as a result of changes in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe. All NATO members are doing precisely that.

The German government has announced a reduction of some 180,000 troops in Germany alone. Canada will of course be examining options that will best serve our national interests while maintaining the integrity of a very highly skilled and professional military.

CFB SHILO

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister. Canadian Forces Base Shilo is a first-class military base and the third largest employer in Manitoba with nearly 1,600 permanent military and civilian personnel, as well as hundreds of part-time and contract jobs.

How then could this government intend to close this first-class military base and still make sense in the absence of a comprehensive national defence policy? Will the minister make an undertaking today that he will first consult with Manitobans before considering any change in the status of CFB Shilo in Manitoba?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member for Portage-Interlake and the member for Brandon-Souris have both made repeated interventions on behalf of Manitoba in regard to this very excellent military installation. The government is in the process of reviewing all of its expenditures in this area from recommendations from the military. We are analysing and will be analysing recommendations that come from the professional military in regard to their needs across Canada.

I can assure my hon. friend that the government is fully acquainted with the excellence of the reputation of the base because of the very strong interventions by the member for Brandon—Souris and his colleagues from Manitoba.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Statistics Canada today published a study which destroys the government's favourite argument that it is social program spending that is the cause of the country's deficit. The study shows that social spending has not increased relative to Gross Domestic Product for the last 16 years.

Will the Minister of Finance take this study seriously, this study which shows that it is corporate tax breaks and the high interest rate policies of successive Liberal and Conservative governments that are the main causes of the deficit? Will the minister take steps to end the generosity of his government to the corporate elite and to wealthy individuals in Canada and show that he is serious about the deficit?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will agree with me when I say that one of our biggest challenges in terms of cost pressures is the cost of servicing the national debt, the national debt we inherited from the Liberals when we took office in 1984.

Yes, this government has been generous toward social programs in this country and it continues to be. For the record, the last five years, in terms of major transfers to the provinces, which is largely for the purpose of sustaining health and education and other benefits that go to help the average Canadian, have increased from the last five-year period of $150 billion to $183 billion during this fiscal period.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, with respect, that is not what the study shows. The study shows that social spending has remained the same over the last 16 years. I grant the Minister of Finance that the deficit is in large part due to corporate tax breaks created by the Liberal Party of Canada. But that does not exempt this government from the fact that they have refused to close many of the main loopholes that still exist from that time.

Will the Minister of Finance give a commitment in this House today, given that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is meeting with his counterparts today and tomorrow, that social spending in this country will not be asked to contribute one more cent to the elimination of the deficit, a deficit that social spending did not create. When will the corporate elite be asked to pay down the deficit?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated to the hon. member that for the five-year fiscal period ending 1991-92, the amount of federal transfers to the provinces amounted to $150 billion. For this five-year fiscal period, 1991-92 to 1995-96, it is projected that we will transfer $183 billion in transfers to the provinces, which is largely used for health, welfare and education. That is not a reduction of revenues, that is an increase in revenues. On a per capita basis, the transfers per person have risen from $950 to $1,250 in the last five years. That is not a reduction, that is an increase.

CANADIAN ABORIGINAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. The business arm of the Tree of Peace of the Friendship Centre of Yellowknife submitted a proposal to the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy for a project which would spell and realize, in the long term, a viable and largely independent economic base in the aboriginal community of the Northwest Territories.

Many would benefit from this particular facility. Why, then, does the government defy its fiduciary responsibility to the aboriginal people by rejecting outwardly this very comprehensive and economically viable proposal?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is very interesting. The Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development program has been responsible in the last five years for creating over 4,000 small businesses on and off reserves in Canada.

This particular application is being considered further by the board. I will do my very best to take another look at it.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the executive of the aboriginal community in Yellowknife are requesting that perhaps it would be an option for them to have the proposal revisited immediately, not to wait, and that perhaps the accessibility of a business loan would be considered by the minister.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be reminded that in the last two years alone we have funded over 40 small business projects through the CAEB program in her part of the Northwest Territories, and I think over a dozen in Yellowknife alone. They are very good projects, I am sure she supports them. I would be glad to take a look at this one as well.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, major environmental disasters are waiting to happen in Canadian waters. As the Minister of Transport well knows, the report of the public review panel on tanker safety recommended last October 24 that specific measures be implemented to prevent catastrophic marine spills.

Why has the government taken no serious action to implement the panel's recommendations? And what suitable immediate measures will it take to prevent these looming disasters?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this government formed the Brander–Smith committee which examined this whole question. The Brander–Smith report that was tabled with the Ministry of Transport some months ago is a very, very comprehensive and very serious work. We have been examining the different components of it and are on the verge of making some recommendations and decisions as to what needs to be done to take into consideration the contents of the Brander–Smith report.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government believes that band-aids can stem serious haemorrhaging.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister and concerns the interim report of the royal commission on passenger transportation.

Since the commission has urged the government to review its policy on abandoning railway lines and alienation of rights of way, to prevent the irrevocable loss of these rights of way, what does the Minister intend to do to ensure that passenger transportation has a future in rural Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): That was another excellent initiative by the government and the Prime Minister of Canada. The House will recall that the royal commission of inquiry was established by the Prime Minister himself. The commission's members are extremely competent people who are dedicated to their work. They submitted an interim report some time ago, which contains recommendations on the issues raised by the hon. member opposite.

We are giving these recommendations careful consideration. We are analysing the financial impact and will report on this question very shortly.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Terrence Corcoran, writing in The Globe and Mail says that the recession is dead, it was dead on the 23rd of April, possibly the 7th of May. I think it was dead in March. I was wondering in view of the economic performance and indicators and the very much lower interest rates, whether the Minister of Finance had new projections with respect to growth this year, and what his projections were all around concerning whether the recession, in fact, in his view was dead.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is rather encouraging to note that good news flows from this side of the House rather than from that side of the House.

I did see the article to which the hon. member refers, and I think it is the second in a series. I think he was pleading with the opposition to start using the other "r" word as they insisted that my predecessor should use the "r" word when the slow-down was occurring.

The article to which the hon. member refers says "the recession is dead, long live the recovery". I think that recovery is very near. All the indicators are there. We assume that growth will emerge again in the second half and 1992 will be a banner year of about 3.5 per cent growth.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Privatization.

Yesterday it was announced that Petro-Canada shares will be sold for $13.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1450)

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): They applaud, Mr. Speaker. What they are applauding is the fact that the shares will be sold for about half the company's estimated net asset value per share.

What the Liberals paid too much to buy, the Conservatives will charge too little to sell. Canadian taxpayers will be left reeling from the fiscal one-two punch.

What is the government's best estimate of how much money will be returned to the Canadian treasury once Petro-Canada is completely sold off? Even a ballpark figure would do.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to give a ballpark figure on that at all.

Of course, markets will decide the price as we move through the privatization program. It will take some time. As the hon. member knows, it is a fairly large company, so to provide a ballpark figure now would be very foolish on my part.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. minister is correct that it would be very foolish on his part because it would appall the Canadian people.

Given the very real fears of many observers that Canadian taxpayers will lose more than $4.8 billion of the $6.8 billion in 1990 dollars they paid to build Petro-Canada, what credible guarantees that the Canadian people will not wind up receiving as little as 30 cents on the dollar for their energy company can "Discount John" give us?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, that was a real zinger.

I noticed the hon. member's press release that came out today. In the first half of it, he said that the government was giving the shares away. In the second half of it, he said that the ordinary Canadians cannot afford it.

That press release is about as suspect as the figures that he is throwing around in the House today.

TEXTILE AND GARMENT INDUSTRIES

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade, and concerns the textile and garment industries.

The fourth edition of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement now in effect will expire on July 31, 1991. Whether or not to maintain this particular status is one of the items on the agenda of the GATT Uruguay Round. Could the minister tell the House what kind of action the government intends to take to protect the interests of the textile and garment industries and the jobs of Canadian workers?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member has shown a great deal of interest in the welfare of the textile and clothing industry.

It is a very important industry for his part of the country and also other selected parts of the country. In the multilateral trade negotiations, we have been very careful with proposals that we have been prepared to put out in order to ensure that the ongoing nature of the industry can be protected.

We also have been working with the industry in ways to help them put in the equipment and improve their technology to allow them to be competitive on a world scale basis. I am sure my colleague noted my response earlier in Question Period that some companies have been quite successful in being able to maintain and build their markets on an international basis.

AIR INDIA FLIGHT 182

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General regarding the Air India tragedy and the surveillance role of CSIS.

During recent committee questioning, the chairman of the Security Intelligence Review Committee replied that the RCMP continues to insist that a SIRC review would impede the criminal investigation which is still proceeding.

It has been six sad years since flight 182 went down. Why can SIRC not conduct its internal review now? Will he tell the RCMP to back off and let SIRC do its job?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's interest in this matter. He will know that the RCMP has contracted with a deep-sea diving outfit and will be making an effort to recover more of the belongings of those people who died in that particular crash. They will be doing that this summer.

We hope that we will have the same success with that that the government did with the Reyat investigation and subsequent conviction in B.C.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, no one has yet shown how an internal review by the Security and Intelligence Review Committee would impair the ongoing criminal investigation of the RCMP.

Will not the minister signal to SIRC that it should get on with its job and direct it to conduct a section 54 review under the CSIS Act so that questions regarding SIRC's or CSIS's surveillance role in this tragedy can be put to bed once and for all.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate that under no circumstances would I want to in any way impair the efforts of the RCMP and the progress that has been made to date. The RCMP realizes the concern that everybody has that the perpetrators of this crime be brought to justice and I am sure that everybody in the House agrees with that theory.

CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Finance.

The Canadian dollar continues to climb in relation to the U.S. dollar. There have been many claims that this is because of a secret deal made between Canada and the U.S. as part of the free trade deal.

I was wondering if the minister could tell us today about the true value of the Canadian dollar and if indeed there is any relationship to the free trade agreement.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the exchange rate of the dollar has absolutely nothing to do with the free trade agreement. As the hon. member knows, we have a floating exchange rate. The value of the Canadian dollar is established in the marketplace based upon many factors, i.e. commodity prices, balance of payments, capital movements, inflation, inflationary pressures and interest rates. All of those components are part and parcel of the value of the dollar.

I think one of the reasons that the dollar is enjoying a high value is simply the fact that many foreigners are investing in Canada. It is a clear demonstration of the confidence that is being expressed in the Canadian economy.

CAPE BRETON ECONOMY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will know that on March 31 the mandate of Enterprise Cape Breton expired and that the government promised there would be a new regional development program in place before July 1. As the Prime Minister knows, the economic situation in Cape Breton is very serious. Unemployment is growing, there are continually closures and more bankruptcies. I want to know from the Prime Minister when this new regional development program, the successor program to Enterprise Cape Breton, will be announced and put in place.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can simply respond on behalf of the Devco part of the equation, not the over-all Enterprise Cape Breton part of the question which perhaps my colleague can answer.

In terms of Devco, we have worked very closely with the board and with the union to see if we can have in place a more viable enterprise there. I am very hopeful with the co-operation that I have seen, the last three or four months in particular, between the union and management. So I am feeling more optimistic about Devco's future.

As for the other aspects of Enterprise Cape Breton, perhaps my hon. colleague can add to my answer.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows and the hon. minister knows that Devco has nothing to do with Enterprise Cape Breton.

What I wanted was an answer. One agency has been taken away and we were promised by the government that in Cape Breton there would be a replacement regional development program. I do not think it is too much to ask the Prime Minister and the government when they are going to keep that promise, particularly when the deadline they themselves set for replacing this agency is only a couple of weeks away. When will this agency be put in place?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already given the indications of the government. We are very concerned about the situation in Cape Breton. It has been a tough time in Cape Breton for as long as I can remember, 30 or 40 years. Successive governments have wrestled, with varying degrees of success, with very serious structural problems in the economy in Cape Breton.

• (1500)

We began with Enterprise Cape Breton. We had some successes and, as the report indicated, some failures. The cost of attracting jobs to Cape Breton pursuant to some of the programs that the previous government initiated and we initiated was deemed by some outside observers to be excessively high.

ACOA, which Premier McKenna has described as the most important regional development agency ever introduced into Atlantic Canada, is contributing in some substantial way to some successes in Cape Breton, but we are cognizant of the problem that my hon. friend raises.

We are also aware that decade after decade we have failed as a country to successfully resolve some of these serious problems in Cape Breton. I give my hon. friend the undertaking that the Government of Canada in co-operation with the Government of Nova Scotia will try even harder to bring about a greater degree of prosperity and social justice throughout eastern Nova Scotia and into Cape Breton.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The government has indicated its opposition to sovereignty association, saying that Quebec can negotiate sovereignty but not association. This echoes statements by Reform Party spokesmen in the past 18 months, indicating to Quebecers that separation is not a costless excursion.

Will the government also indicate its opposition to asymmetrical federalism, that is that it is unacceptable in a truly federal system to grant special sovereign powers to any one particular province which cannot be granted to all provinces?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the little coalition between the Reform Party and the Bloc Québécois might allow them in their seat to work out the small differences that they might have.

Let me make one thing very clear. The position of the Reform Party of Canada is a position which assumes the separation of Quebec. That is not a position which we in this party or most Canadians in this country accept.

Mr. Speaker: I remind the hon. members who are rising that I will recognize the hon. member for Surrey North on a question of privilege, which takes precedence.

PRIVILEGE

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my privileges have been breached by the premature leaking of parts of the reports on health care to be issued by the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and Status of Women, prior to it being tabled in this House.

Also the Liberal health critic, the member from Winnipeg North, told the press that "all parties have given their support to the report". However, he knew that the New Democratic Party and I did not support the Tory–Liberal majority report, that I had voted against the report, and that I would be issuing a minority report.

This misrepresentation of my position caused me embarrassment and forced me, in order to set the record straight, to breach House conventions and release my minority report at noon although the French translation was still not available.

This premature release of the parts of the report, the misrepresentation of the contents of the report and my position prevented me from carrying out the proper duties as a member of this House and therefore breached my privileges.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a question of privilege pursuant to the rules as set out in Beauchesne's as well as in the Standing Orders.

There has been no notice given to this side with regard to this particular question of privilege. However, if the Chair wishes to take it under active consideration, perhaps at some point in the near future we may have an opportunity to revisit this particular argument and accept interventions from this side.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised by way of a question of privilege certain things that emanate from a committee.

It may be premature for the Chair to consider whether or not it is privilege. I will take it under consideration. The hon. member may want to consider my comment.

For the moment, though, I would like to move on. I have another question of privilege.

CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to basically give notice of privilege or potential privilege at this time.

As the House is aware there were media reports this morning indicating that the office of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers was wire–tapped during the last round of collective bargaining.

As the member of Parliament of the New Democratic Party responsible for labour issues, I was in constant contact with that union, and I would worry—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Murphy: Despite whether other members of this House consider it an important issue, my personal communications as a member of this House were potentially violated by the fact that there was a wire–tap occurring. My conversations as a member of this House were important in terms of my speaking in this House, in terms of my communicating and my negotiating.

I would raise this as a notice at this time because if there were a wire–tap conducted by Canada Post, the RCMP or CSIS, certainly my rights were impinged upon.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say that the laws on wire–tap in this country are very clear. If there has been a breach of the law, the appropriate authorities should take care of it.

I want to lay to rest any allegation that Canada Post in any way, shape or form tapped any phones during that period. I just did not want that accusation on the record.

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to bring to the attention of the House events which occurred yesterday during an unrecorded, in camera meeting of the standing committee on health and welfare.

I feel that the rights of members of that committee were breached in several ways. There was interference by the office of the chief government Whip when proceedings were interrupted to change membership and substitution forms required to be relayed—

Mr. Speaker: If this is a matter which she alleges took place in the committee, it would seem to me that the Chair does not have any lawful authority to intervene at this time. I think the hon. member's proper course is to take the matter back to the committee. Until such time as I receive a report from the committee, I am not at all sure that I have any authority to act.

PROCEDURE DURING PASSAGE OF CERTAIN MOTIONS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege, because last night, after the normal sitting hours of the House, the government, with the obvious co-operation of the opposition parties, participated in a brazen manoeuvre for the purpose of expediting more than 15 motions without consultation, which affected my privileges as a member, effectively gagging all independent members of this House in every debate today.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider the attitude of this House, and when we see the members of the three other parties getting upset, it is pretty obvious they feel guilty. I appeal to your sense of responsibility and especially to your obligation to protect the minority in this House. Mr. Speaker, at 3 p.m. we refused to give our consent to certain motions. When the government realized the motions had been rejected, it first made sure that our members were not in the House and then indulged in this brazen manoeuvre. In fact, it is worse than that. It is abuse of parliamentary procedure, because now all three parties have ensured— Just look at all the motions that were passed! I appeal to your sense—

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to the comments made by the hon. member for Shefford. Nevertheless, we have a situation where apparently, the members who were in the House moved a motion that was adopted unanimously.

Consequently, the House has spoken. Perhaps the hon. member has a grievance, but all members have a responsibility to be present in the House during the proceedings.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Consequently, there is no question of privilege.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton–Stanstead, on another question of privilege.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege concerns my constitutional right to be able to speak and vote in this House every time a decision is made.

I was here in the House until after the scheduled sitting hours. At 10.02 p.m., the government moved a motion for the sole purpose of allowing two or three members to speak to the motion on the Constitution. Today, I heard that instead, they intended to pass 15 motions and gag an independent member.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to your sense of honour and justice, and I ask you to allow independent members in this House, members of the Bloc québécois, to speak to the bills and motions that will be tabled in the House today, despite the orders given last night.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Constitution, the Charter of Rights, members of this House are so proud of —

Mr. Speaker: In his question of privilege, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead takes a certain position on the events that occurred yesterday, as a result of which a motion conclude the debate received the unanimous consent of all members present.

The hon. member may have a case under the Charter of Rights, but it is not up to the Speaker of the House of Commons to take a position on the Constitution. If the hon. member has a complaint, perhaps a conversation, a dialogue or negotiations with all other members of this House would be in order. Perhaps this approach would be acceptable to the hon. member.

However, I must say this is certainly not a question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, on her earlier question of privilege. I may have ended her comments prematurely. I will hear her now.

My point is that I am having difficulty seeing how at this stage in the committee's activities I have any lawful power to interfere.

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the point that I want to make is that there was external interference by the office of the chief government Whip, outside the committee, in the proceedings. The proceedings were interrupted to change membership, and substitution forms which were required were withheld by the Whip's assistant. The rights of the committee were breached when a vote which was properly held was improperly rescinded and the decisions of that committee were overturned.

With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I would like to give an outline of what happened. A vote was taken at the committee. The chair had ruled that the people there had the right to vote.

The assistant to the chief government Whip withheld the papers and as a result of that the vote was overturned.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty I am in is that the hon. member must exhaust her remedies in front of the committee. At this point it would be improper, because I do not have the lawful authority, to interfere. The hon. member may want to pursue this in another way. The immediate way is to take it up with her colleagues in the committee.

I understand the hon. member's feelings on this matter and she may very well have a complaint. However, I have to say that I regret I am not in a position, certainly at the moment, to intervene.

There is a number of members rising on points of order. The Chair may need some help in order to get through this expeditiously.

If the hon. member, for example, for Annapolis Valley—Hants has a point of order arising solely out of Question Period I will hear him. That applies to other hon. members. If they are points of order that do not arise solely out of Question Period, as we are under an order to get on with the vote and then we have Routine Proceedings, I would prefer to take the points of order later.

Certainly the hon. members who are rising, if not heard now, will be heard a little later on. Perhaps if I give that assurance we can get on with the vote.

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my point of order does arise out of Question Period. It is very short, it is succinct, but it may be substantive. I will be very brief. As we perhaps break for a summer recess I am just trying to determine what the rules and regulations are. I would like to know if there is any place in the Question Period for a bona fide supplementary yelled out fairly audibly.

That leads me to my second point, which I do not really want to press because I do not want to embarrass the Chair; I have the highest respect for the Chair. Perhaps it is time we admitted that there is a list if there is, and I would not want to say there is because it is an insult to the independence of the Chair to have a list. The Mother of Parliaments in England and the Parliament in Baghdad never had lists because that would be an insult to the Chair. If there is a list, I want to know if that is the sole criteria for members, and especially independent members who now do not come within a government situation, to be recognized. Then we can save a lot of physical energy that we spend in getting up and down like a yo-yo and not being recognized. Those are my two questions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the hon. member. First of all, I am not revealing a great secret when I say that of course there is a list. The hon. member has often been on that list. Your Speaker is not necessarily bound by the list, although I always try to co-operate as much as I can. I could even tell the House how we got to the list. The hon. member knows very well how we got to the list. It was through great discipline in keeping just one member of the party up in opposition so there was only one person the Speaker could go to. There is no secret about a list, and the hon. member knows as much about lists as any member in the House.

The other question the hon. member poses is whether there is there any place for the independent member or for a supplementary upon certain occasions.

Of course there is. The hon. member was recognized for a supplementary only a few days ago. I have often gone to members for a supplemental. However, I have to take into account the number of members who are seeking the floor and what is happening on any given afternoon. The hon. member knows I cannot satisfy everybody on every afternoon. That is a matter which my hon. friend who may be rising later on a point of order may come back to.

I appreciate the hon. member's intervention and my answer is yes, there is a list. I am not bound by it. I can ignore that list and intervene to allow private members, wherever they are, not only to ask questions but also to ask supplementals. That is a right which remains with the Chair and I do not think it has ever been seriously challenged. I would remind all hon. members that it is a right which the Chair has had almost since: "The memory of man runneth not to the contrary".

If the points of order are not arising out of Question Period, something that happened in Question Period or something that did not happen in Question Period, I would ask hon. members to raise them later.

1968 ELECTION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to draw the attention of the House to a very important date, June 25, next Tuesday, because that is the anniversary for at least seven members of this House of Commons who were elected some 23 years ago on June 25, 1968.

They include yourself, Mr. Deputy Chairman of Committees, and the Deputy Prime Minister. This illustrious group of members also includes the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden who is sitting down here and the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville who I guess is not in the House today, a very distinguished member. It includes also the hon. member for Davenport who sits right here but has just stepped out of the House, the hon. member for York Centre and myself.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Foster: I might mention that the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who was elected actually in a by-election in the fall of 1967 has been adopted by the class of 1968 as an integral part of our group.

I might say that 1968 was a really great year, and I think most of the members of the Official Opposition would agree with that. It was great for many reasons, but especially because we were just coming out of our country's centennial year and we showed great optimism, great hope and great confidence in our country.

As we go into this year, with all its trials, tribulations and great difficulties, I hope that we may find anew using those traditional Canadian feelings of of tolerance, goodwill and understanding the hope, the confidence and the optimism that we had in 1968 and go on to build a better and even stronger Canada.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, my dear colleague stole my stuff. I just wanted to add that of the 96 members of Parliament first elected in 1968, only about six and a half of us survived. I warn all hon. members about the mortality rate around here. There is no such thing as a cinch except in the saddle.

I want to say also that the hon. member for York Centre is a second offender because he did not serve the whole time. He got knocked off in one election and came back again in the next one. He is a recidivist. However, we include him in our august group. I want to remind the House that this august group will be meeting this evening and the time and place are secret to everybody else.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I of course want to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Algoma and the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. I also want to echo what they have said. I think it is fair to say that paying tribute to the survivors causes us to reflect on some of the very interesting times that we have had. I think 1968 was indeed a very special year as the hon. member said.

There was a huge majority. The Liberals were in charge. There was a huge majority, so it gave many of us newcomers an opportunity to learn parliamentary procedure at a very relaxed pace.

I think it is fair to say that throughout the 23 years we have all developed a very warm and healthy respect for each other, a very warm friendship. It is also fair to say that each and every member has contributed something significant to his or her own constituency, own region, and to Canada. For that I want to salute them all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, all I would like to say is that it is great to be a survivor.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Next Tuesday, June 25, marks another anniversary as well. It is the fifth anniversary of the passage by this House of Bill C-45, the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act, and it has still not been proclaimed.

My question to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader is: Can we expect that Parts II and III, which give effect to the act and extend to House and Senate employees the same health and safety rights enjoyed by all other Canadians, will be proclaimed by that date? If not, by that date? When, after five years?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. It is an extension of Question Period.

SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just want to bring to the attention of the House some points of order. I want to use as my references the Standing Orders and Beauchesne's which I know are legitimate because the House leader of the Official Opposition just used them as references in his point of order, so they must be valid. I refer to Beauchesne's citation 410, Standing Order 37 and to Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice which all say: "Supplementary questions need no preamble and should flow from minister's questions".

All the supplementary questions today were out of order. I just wish to bring this to the attention of the House management committee. I hope that it will direct—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member has time, maybe in the next couple of days he could go into the Speaker's chamber and discuss it a little further.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

REFORM PLAN

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I tabled yesterday in this House a bill setting out what is probably the most important Public Service reform plan in nearly a quarter of a century.

Economic conditions may command stringent wage constraints, but they must not stop us from having a broader vision. For Canada to be competitive on all fronts, changes have to be made now to produce, in time, a more modern and efficient Public Service.

Mr. Speaker, I rise before the House today to provide the honourable members with a statement on the status of collective bargaining in the Public Service. I believe it is important that Members are aware of the current situation and that the facts be clearly presented.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the February 26 Budget, the then Minister of Finance set out the government's wage policy for the next three fiscal years. In fiscal year 1991–92, salary budgets in departments are frozen at the level of the previous year.

The Minister indicated at the time that any negotiated wage increase this year would require a corresponding reduction in employment and that, in any case, the government would not contemplate wage increases this year of more than 3 per cent. In the following two fiscal years, provision is made for annual increases of up to 3 per cent.

This approach, Mr. Speaker, was imposed by economic necessity, balanced by a desire to continue collective bargaining with the unions. In that spirit, I met with the leaders of the Public Service unions on the day following the Budget to explain the Budget policy to them personnaly, and to seek their cooperation in negotiating agreements that the Canadian public can afford.

Since February, there have been regular collective bargaining sessions with Public Service unions representing 58 of the 80 bargaining units and 184,000 of the 190,000 employees subject to collective agreements. I regret to inform the House that unions generally have not agreed to accept, in their negotiating demands, the limits established by the Budget—and the fiscal situation that lies behind it.

Union leaders have continued to make wage and benefits demands that are well beyond the capacity of the public purse. Indeed the leadership of the two largest unions, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada have, to my considerable regret, publicly stated that their unions will take whatever action is required to force the government to change its wage policy.

[English]

The government and the country are faced with a fiscal situation which must be addressed. The government outlined its full dimensions in the budget and we owe it to the Canadian public, who are faced with the corrosive effects of recession in every sector of the economy, to live within the measures announced at that time. The fiscal imperatives are clear. We must contain both the deficit and inflationary pressures if interest rates are to be brought down to a level that will lead to a sustained economic recovery.

Continued federal government leadership in dealing with inflationary public sector wage pressures is an essential part of this strategy. The actions of the six provinces which have followed our lead since the budget show that it is the right course.

As President of the Treasury Board I must pursue this objective in a way that preserves the integrity of government services to the Canadian public while minimizing the impact on public employees.

In addition, this government is engaged in a far-reaching process of renewal in the Public Service which I do not wish to see compromised. Its two cornerstones are a more service-oriented Public Service and greater attention to the human dimension in managing the Public Service.

My strong preference, therefore, is to continue to work with the unions to arrive at fair settlements for our employees which are within the limits of what the government and the taxpayers can afford to pay.

At the same time, I will be the first to acknowledge that the choices we have offered the unions are not very palatable to them any more than they are to the government. This is reflected in the current state of the collective bargaining negotiations.

By June 21, the last day before the summer recess of Parliament, 55 of the 80 bargaining units representing some 165,000 employees will have collective agreements that have expired. In five cases, they have been expired for more than one year.

By the time Parliament convenes in September, a further eight agreements will have expired. Also, by that time as many as 38 bargaining units and 170,000 Public Service employees could be in a legal position to strike. In addition, we expect binding awards to be handed down in early July for 18 occupational groups represented by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker these are the facts of the situation. I would now like to advise the House of the guiding principles that the government intends to follow during the summer months as this situation unfolds. We will continue to press for negotiated settlements for as long as the unions are willing to come to the table. We owe this much to our employees and to the system of collective bargaining itself, which has served both employer and employees well over the years.

But we will move swiftly and firmly if the situation deteriorates unacceptably. We will seek the recall of Parliament to enact the necessary legislation if there are illegal strikes or if there is unreasonable disruption in service to the public.

As announced in the Budget, we will act to modify any arbitral awards that go beyond the 0-3-3 guidelines to bring them in line with the Budget. If we are forced to introduce legislation, it will cover all departments and agencies for which the Treasury Board is the employer as well as other public bodies that are dependent to a significant degree on Parliamentary appropriations. This would include Parliament and its employees. And the same terms will aply to all: a 0 per cent increase in wages in fiscal year 1991-92 or in the period immediately following the expiry of a collective agreement and 3 per cent in the following year.

Three groups whose contracts had already been the subject of protracted negotiations before the Budget—the Translation, Auditing, and Computer Systems Administration groups—will be provided with higher settlements for the period before this fiscal year, but they too will then be covered by 0 and 3.

This legislation, then, would apply for the first two years of the three-year compensation restraint program announced in the February 26 Budget. The government remains committed to the Budget ceiling of 3 per cent in the third year of the program. The Minister of Finance announced in the Budget inflation targets for the next five years: 3 per cent by the end of 1992; 2 1/2 per cent by the middle of 1994; and 2 per cent by the end of 1995. These reduced inflation levels should allow us to achieve the third year of the compensation restraint program through collective bargaining.

Having stated my desire to continue to negotiate, I recognize that for some bargaining groups it may not be feasible to expect a voluntary agreement by the time the House returns on September 16. If this proves to be the case, I think it will probably be in the best interests of all concerned to introduce compensation restraint legislation at that time to cover those who have not been able to settle for at least a two-year agreement within the 0-3-3 limits. I am very conscious that this would mean the suspension of collective bargaining for this round, but it may be the fairest course to take under the circumstances.

[English]

These are hard measures, made necessary by hard times. In the economic climate in which we live, I do not think it is unreasonable to expect public sector employees to assume their share in working toward recovery. In my own recent travels across Canada, I met with Public Service employees at all levels and in all regions. I have concluded that these employees who, after all, are taxpayers themselves, are prepared to accept lower wage increases over the short term in order to make the future brighter for us all.

I received a second message both from union leaders and employees. The recession and the government's fiscal situation have created profound and, I do agree, understandable uncertainties in the minds of Public Service employees about the risks of losing their jobs. They are aware of the job losses and of the sacrifices that are being felt in the private sector and they are deeply conscious of the potential implications for themselves of the wage targets announced in the budget. This uncertainty also undermines the effective delivery of government services, and I want to put an end to it.

On May 29 I advised union leaders that the government had effectively lost any room it might have had to negotiate wage settlements for the current fiscal year at an increase of more than zero per cent. To proceed with a 3 per cent increase three months into the fiscal year would probably mean releasing more than the 6,000 employees forecast in the budget.

The other side of this coin is that a freeze on wage levels eliminates for all practical purposes the necessity to reduce further the number of jobs in the Public Service during the period of such a freeze. We will continue to need to change or eliminate specific jobs as the Public Service adjusts to changing demands for its services. Here and now I can make a commitment that every current employee of the Public Service who is affected by any such changes resulting from the budget will be offered a position on comparable terms for the period for which the wage freeze applies, if he or she is willing to be trained or relocated.

In that spirit I would also like to announce that departments will be instructed not to proceed with contingency plans which they were asked to develop at the time of the budget to absorb any wage increases in 1991-92 above zero per cent. There will, therefore, be no reason for lay-offs in the balance of this fiscal year as a consequence of the budget.

This is not job security in the sense in which unions negotiating demands too often mean it; a guarantee of lifetime employment. It is not this kind of job security. That would be unacceptable. Like good employers in the private sector, we recognize that it is in the interests of the employer and employees alike to have as much continuity and certainty as possible in order to have a productive and stable workforce.

This government's record in redeploying employees whose jobs are eliminated for other reasons is an excellent one, as the experience of the recently completed five-year downsiding program demonstrates. This has been thanks to the workforce adjustment policy which has provided an equitable safety net for employees. That policy expires on June 30 of this year. However, we are very much interested in negotiating a new one, in consultation with the unions under the auspices of the National Joint Council. In doing so we are prepared to explore ways of alleviating union concerns about the effects of contracting out in particular.

Our discussions with union representatives have made good progress and I am hopeful that we can arrive at an agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today I am asking the leadership of the Public Service unions to go an extra mile with us in avoiding major disruption to the Canadian public this summer.

In my time as President of the Treasury Board, I have developed a great respect for them personally and for the system of collective bargaining that is one of the foundations of our Public Service. I know they share the priority that I give to maintaining the highest possible quality of service to the Canadian public.

I know too that the union leaders understand that the government will not deviate from the terms of the February 26 Budget, especially at a time when there is mounting evidence that we are on the right track and have the strong backing of Canadians for what we are seeking to do.

But I believe there continues to be real scope within the Budget to arrive at negotiated settlements that meet the needs of our employees. The government will introduce legislation if it must, but I would prefer to try to make the established insitutions of staff relations work in these difficult times as well as they do in better circumstances.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in 1984 this government was elected on the illusory promises of fiscal responsibility, solving the economic problems of the country and jobs, jobs, jobs. Seven years later 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed, the debt and the interest it is costing have more than doubled, and the nation has been in an unnecessary, made–in–Canada recession created by this government. Canadians have been realizing for some time that the Emperor has no clothes, no vision and certainly no economic plan.

Today's statement is the culmination of the government's abject failure to meet its commitment to Canadians, to provide them with good government with quality services at an affordable price.

The statement today appears, like so much the government has done, on an ad hoc basis, decided at the last minute, thrown before Parliament without adequate forethought. In fact, as the person expected to reply to this motion, I heard that from the press that this statement would be made, not from the minister's office.

Yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board presented a package of so–called reform and revitalization of the Public Service. I must remind the minister and Canadians that this has been the foremost Public Service in the world, up until recently.

He said that this bill would help Public Service employees to concentrate on service to citizens rather than serving systems. He added that Canadians expect a Public Service that is effective and up to date, which is staffed and led by Canada's ablest men and women.

In this statement today the same minister has shown that he has no understanding of how to build commitment, competence and progressive thinking and service to the public in the Public Service of Canada.

I marvel at the minister's audacity to stand up again, in a final display of disregard, on the eve of the recess of Parliament. It is a display of disregard for workers' rights, threatening to call Parliament back, threatening to introduce legislation when he cannot negotiate a zero increase this year, even threatening to override the decisions of impartial third party adjudicators.

• (1620)

The minister says he has a desire to continue collective bargaining, an admirable statement. The minister should bargain with the unions at the table, and not on the floor of the House of Commons.

May I interject on a point of order? I am finding it increasingly difficult to speak with the rabble going on around me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Speaker finds it difficult to speak with some of the static that is going on over at that side of the House. I would just hope you would keep it down, please.

Mrs. Catterall: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. There is a lobby outside and if people want to be disruptive, they can do it there.

The minister quotes economic necessity as the reason for this statement today and for the regressive and excessive measures announced in the February 26 budget. The economic necessity has been created by this government, not by the workers, not by the employees. The economic necessity arises directly from this government's policies: high interest rates, a high dollar which is hurting our manufacturers and hurting our exports, high unemployment and unprecedented tax increases.

The recession has been created by this government, not by Canadian workers. Particularly, federal public sector workers have shown remarkable restraint in wage demands, giving a complete lie to the minister's statement that the unions representing Public Service employees have been irresponsible in their wage demands.

The minister calls on the public sector workers to assume their share in working toward recovery. That is exactly what they have done. The minister knows perfectly well that federal government workers have led the way for over half a dozen years, in wage restraint, accepting wage settlements below the rate of inflation, accepting wage settlements below those of any other public sector worker and accepting wage settlements far below those of the private sector.

He gets up today and pretends to the Canadian public that somehow federal public sector workers have been driving inflation and driving economic problems, and that is simply not an accurate reflection of reality. It is a reflection of the fact that the government wants to try and pretend that somehow it is those who work for the people of Canada who are responsible for the fiscal and economic problems this government has created.

The government served a signal on February 26 that it had no intention of bargaining in good faith. I want to say very clearly in this House that the Liberal Party introduced collective bargaining into the Public Service of Canada and the Liberal Party will continue to defend collective bargaining in the Public Service of Canada.

The government has stalled on negotiations. It calls on the unions in this statement to come back to the table. It is the government that has stalled on negotiations and has not been negotiating. It is not negotiation when you sit down at the table and say "this is what you are going to get." The minister's concept of negotiation is like the concept of justice in some countries: "Yes, we will give you an open, public trial. Yes, you can call witnesses, but in the end you are going to get executed." That is not justice and this is not collective bargaining.

Unions have not accepted the bargaining by blackmail which this government tried to introduce by saying very clearly to people at the beginning of the process, before they had any discussions or any negotiations, here is the bottom line, like it or lump it, and the bottom line was this: you can either get a fair salary increase this year or you can sacrifice the jobs of your fellow employees.

The unions, I think quite properly, have said they are not prepared to bargain away the jobs of their fellow workers. This kind of bargaining by blackmail simply is not the way we operate in a democratic nation. We operate in a democratic nation by workers, employees and their employer sitting down and trying to reach a reasonable solution.

Since February 26, this government has precluded that happening. It has given employees every reason, in this statement today, to know that it is not dealing in good faith with its employees. They know that. They have those cases before the courts and those cases will be dealt with before the courts.

But clearly, when you sit down at a bargaining table and say this is going to be the end result, no negotiations take place, no negotiations have taken place and no negotiations can take place. For the minister to try and blame the employees for the outcome of that kind of bargaining by blackmail, is simply not a fair representation to Canadians or to this House of the situation.

The minister has said that the fiscal situation is responsible for this. Well this government has created the fiscal situation.

I ask Canadians, as I ask all members of Parliament, to listen to the messages we have had from this government. For six consecutive budgets it said: "We have a debt problem. We have a deficit problem. Here are tough measures to deal with the debt and deficit. We are asking all Canadians to pay more, to get less, to do with less, tighten their belt buckles so we can get rid of the debt and the deficit." That is six consecutive years of promises to do something about the debt and the deficit and it keeps going up.

Canadians are starting to wonder if this government has any idea what it wants to do about the debt and the deficit because every single solution it has proposed has failed to work.

An hon. member: No credibility. No trust.

Mrs. Catterall: This government claims fiscal responsibility. I sat in meetings of the public accounts committee where Treasury Board officials said: "We cannot tell you if you are saving money by your downsizing program because we cannot tell you what you are spending on contracting out or short-term employees".

In other words, while contracting out has gone up by billions of dollars, while the Public Service of Canada has been destabilized, while service to the old, the young and the sick has been suffering, this government is totally unconcerned about how much money it is wasting on contracting out. In fact, for all the Canadian public knows, for all the public accounts committee knows, for all this House knows, we are spending twice as much on services, through contracting, as we were six or seven years ago, because this government simply does not know. Is that fiscal responsibility? Of course it is not.

The government will cite its commitment to austerity in the bill that says: "Well members of Parliament are going to restrain their own wages in line with the restraint on public sector wages." We note that the government did not decide to restrain its own wages based on this year's collective bargaining when public servants' wages are to be frozen. Oh, no, we, as members of Parliament, are not going to put ourselves in that boat. We are waiting until next year when we are promising the Public Service 3 per cent.

That kind of hypocrisy is something of which Canadians are sick and tired. That kind of hypocrisy is something that makes it impossible for public servants to work with confidence and with trust in partnership with this government.

Who is really going to suffer? It is easy when you are earning over $100,000 a year to say: "Oh well, I will do without a salary increase this year", or "I will accept 3 per cent next year". Who is going to really suffer? How about those tens of thousands of people, 80 per cent of them women, who are earning under $19,000 a year? They are the ones who are going to suffer. Is there any special provision for them?

How about the 68,000, nearly one-third of public sector employees, who earn incomes below the poverty line?

That is not the message that this government wants to get out there. It wants to get out the message that everybody working for the federal government is a fat cat, living high off the hog, working maybe one-quarter of the day. They know that it is not true and they have a duty to tell the public of Canada that it is not true.

The minister promises no further job cuts. Does he think anybody believes that? My phone has been ringing for months with calls from people. We are cutting out things like health promotion services and people are losing their jobs. We are cutting out or eliminating supervision of drug residues in foods in Health and Welfare and it is probably still going on today.

People are losing their jobs and Canadians are losing valuable services.

A few years ago we had a five-year downsizing program which is now finished. It ended at the end of last year. Now we have another downsizing program. The minister has said that they told departments not to implement their downsizing. That is not very believable when today in government departments across the country people are being told they do not have jobs and are on surplus.

If you were going to cut the fat in government you might look at the most bloated cabinet in any nation in the free world. You might want to look at why cabinet ministers have doubled the number of employees they can take out of those over-worked government offices and put to their own personal and political service. They have doubled the number that they can use, doubled the costs to the Canadian public, and cut services to Canadians.

Perhaps we on this side of the House should be happy that 1.3 million people who work for the public sector across Canada are seeing this government for what it is because they are not going to want to vote for it, they and all their families, friends and neighbours. Perhaps we should be happy about that. We are not. We are not because we know it will be Canadians who suffer.

Seventy per cent of the Public Service is not here in the national capital region, not at the beck and call of members of Parliament and members of cabinet. Seventy per cent is out there across the country in communities from the 12,000 in Victoria, to the 18,000 in Halifax, to the 9,000 in Newfoundland, delivering service to Canadians. Cutbacks are hurting Canadians. We saw with the ships' crews it is rescues at sea that suffer when public servants are not there to do the job. Seniors suffer when they cannot even get a simple answer to a pension request for over six weeks. The unemployed suffer when they are trying to feed a family when they are out of a job and the unemployment office is so over-worked that there is going to be a six to eight week delay in the delivery of their cheques.

Canadians suffer when customs at the border are understaffed. Those who collect 25 per cent of the revenue that comes into the country are only collecting 40 per cent of what they could because they do not have enough people to do the job.

We heard very recently in this House about cutbacks to health services to Canadians at a time when our medicare system is in desperate trouble because of the cutbacks of this government to the funding of medical services.

All those services which Canadians consider part of being Canadian, part of a just and compassionate society, part of a society which serves its people from coast to coast to coast are in danger because of the actions of this government.

This statement is a travesty. It has nothing to do with good management. It has nothing to do with good government. It has a lot to do with the politics of Preston Manning and the Reform Party. If Canadians wanted to see a precedent of what they are in for with the next Conservative government, or with a Preston Manning government, just let them watch. I ask Canadians this summer when some of their services may be disrupted to remember it is not the over-worked public servant behind the counter who is to blame, it is this government.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I share the views of the hon. member from the Liberal Party when I say how frustrating it is to have the opportunity to respond to a statement not even knowing that the minister is going to make a statement in the House.

On a day when we should be celebrating the end of a parliamentary session and heading home to our ridings and families, we face instead a day of mourning. After hearing the minister speak I think we have to acknowledge that we have heard the minister sound a death knell for collective bargaining in the public sector.

The minister in his speech said that on the day following the budget he met with the unions personally to seek their co-operation in negotiating agreements that the Canadian public could afford. The day after the budget he decided to consult, the day after the hammer came down the minister decided to consult. Not before the budget, not in any way being serious about consultation when that consultation was taking place after the fact.

The minister went on to say that the unions generally have not agreed to accept in their negotiating demands the limits established by the budget. What a surprise. They were consulted after the fact.

He went on to say that the leadership of the two largest unions, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, have, to his regret, publicly stated that their unions will take whatever action is required to force the government to change its wage policy.

That is exactly as it should be, because those union leaders were speaking on behalf of their membership after having had a free vote within their unions about what they thought about the government's policies.

Government after government, both Liberal and Conservative, have refused to legislate full free collective bargaining for public sector workers. Both those governments have treated their workers with great disdain; both have consistently refused to treat the men and women who work for them as partners. They have continued consistently, both governments, to treat them as adversaries.

They cannot negotiate classification or pensions and there are a whole number of prohibited areas under the Public Service Staff Relations Act which the unions cannot negotiate. That act was passed 25 years ago. We have had a successive parade of Liberal and Tory governments ever since, for at least 20 of those 25 years, which have wanted to amend this legislation.

The government introduced Public Service 2000. Many of the attitudes at the bargaining tables and the reason many of the components have not completed their bargaining is because the government has been stalling, waiting for this legislation. Now we find out that the government introduces legislation which does not bring Public Service 2000 into a mode to be ready to go into the 21st century. As my colleague from Nickel Belt says, we should be calling this PS 1000 because you have taken us back to the dark ages.

The minister referred to continued federal government leadership in dealing with inflationary public sector wage pressures as an essential part of his strategy; "and the actions of six provinces which have followed our lead since the budget show that it is the right course". Everybody in this House knows and Canadians all across the country know that the Minister of Finance called together the finance ministers, cut a deal, and agreed before the federal budget came in that they would attack the public sector workers from coast to coast to coast in this country. The two governments in this country which have made it absolutely clear that they will live up to their collective agreements have been the Bob Rae government in Ontario and the Tony Penikett NDP government in the Yukon.

The fact that six other governments in this country have followed suit with this misguided Tory government does not mean that this government is following the right course. It means that six other Liberal and Tory governments are on the wrong course.

I would like to go on through the minister's comments.

He talks about a renewal of the Public Service which he does not wish to see compromised. Does he mean renewal with a hammer?

He talks about bringing the human dimension into managing the Public Service. The human dimension is back to work legislation. He is saying: "If you do not settle, we will tell you what you get". Is that the human dimension that the minister is speaking about? If that is the human dimension that this government talks about then I am surprised that this government has not introduced legislation to abolish collective bargaining in the public sector.

That is in fact what the minister is doing. He is calling it another name. He is saying: "If the unions do not settle by September 16, it does not matter that they are in a free collective bargaining process". If they do not settle, the minister has said: "We will tell you what you get. We will suspend collective bargaining for this round".

I wonder about a minister who says he is concerned about the human dimension in managing the public sector in one paragraph and in the next paragraph talks about suspending collective bargaining in this round.

He goes on to say that 55 of the 80 bargaining units representing some 165,000 employees as of tomorrow will have collective agreements that have expired, in five cases for more than a year.

It is interesting that when this government wants to make progress and wants things to happen—my leader mentioned during Question Period that it wanted the grain handlers' industry back in operation, it wanted gun sales legislation to go through—anything can be done by this government. When it comes to collective bargaining, this government has set the pace for the country for stall tactics.

Fifty-five out of 80 bargaining units are living with expired collective agreements. Yet, the minister says that if they do not settle by September 16 he will tell them what they get. He goes on to say that by that time—meaning September—as many as 38 bargaining units and 170,000 Public Service employees will be in a legal position to strike.

"Legal" is the operative word here. The minister very clearly stated today that "legal" means nothing. The minister has said that he will recall Parliament immediately to legislate these workers back to work whether the strike is legal or illegal. If they do not have a collective agreement by September he will tell them what they are going to get.

Free collective bargaining is something we should be very proud of in this House. He says he will continue to press for negotiated settlements for as long as the unions are willing to come to the table. When somebody announces to me that the deal is zero-three-three, that we are not moving on anything and that we are going to sit around and wait until the minister introduces the legislation.

He is going to draw up the legislation. We are going to adjourn for a couple of months and if the unions wait long enough we will tell them what they are going to get. Who the heck would want to come to the bargaining table? I am surprised that the unions have stayed at the table as long as they have.

He says: "We will seek the recall of Parliament to enact the necessary legislation if there are illegal strikes or unreasonable disruption of service". Again, "legal" does not mean anything. What is the point of having the right to legally strike in the public sector if the minute you do you are legislated back to work? That is a farce.

The minister talked about recognizing that for some bargaining groups it might not be feasible to expect a voluntary agreement by the time the House returns. It might not be feasible. Mr. Minister you said that. Yet, the minister is saying that he will introduce compensation restraint legislation at that time to cover those who have not been able to settle their agreement.

What is the point? The Treasury Board has no reason to bargain now. The union could keep coming to the table all summer long, but there is no reason to bargain. The minister has promised the Treasury Board bargainers: "Just hang out, guys, because on September 16 I am going to introduce legislation and you do not have to do the work you set out to do. I will do it for you". That is free collective bargaining, public sector style, under this government.

He says that on September 16 he will suspend collective bargaining for this round, but it may be the fairest course to take under the circumstances.

Why does he not just save time? Why does he not just introduce legislation today saying: "You have no rights, public sector workers. I am going to do it for you. I am going to tell you what you get". There is nothing fair about even one thing the minister said in his statement today. Not one thing he said was fair. Yet he says it may be the fairest course.

He has concluded that these employees, after speaking to a number of public sector workers across the country, are prepared to accept lower wage increases over the short term in order to make the future brighter for us all.

I ask the minister to name names. I would like to know if any of those workers who were willing to take a lower wage to make life rosy for us all, were the women who are working at the poverty level for the federal Public Service.

I would like to know if any of those people he spoke to were women who were waiting for the promised pay equity under this federal government. I would like to know and I am anxiously going to await a response at some time from the minister on that count.

He says that the uncertainty undermines the effective delivery of government services and he wants to put an end to it. I guess it is better to be certain you are being beaten up by this government than to continue to be uncertain whether you are going to be beaten up by this government.

He says that for the period of the wage freeze he is willing to ensure that nobody is laid off if the union accepts the zero, three and three, and if workers are willing to be trained and relocated.

Just yesterday, in the briefing for PS 1000 the minister's representative told us—PS 1000, we are back to the dark ages here—that deployment or redeployment of public sector workers, in other words, moving them around, would be strictly voluntary. It would not be compulsory. Yet we have the minister saying today: "They will not be laid off if they are willing to be trained and relocated. No choice, just move".

The minister went on to refer to the work force adjustment policy, the fact that it has already expired and a new one will be developed in consultation with the unions. I have already spoken about the kind of consultation the public sector unions can expect from this government.

He says that our discussions with union representatives in the area of contracting out have made good progress, and he is hopeful that they will arrive at agreement. I challenge the minister to give an example of one government jurisdiction in this country where public sector contracting out has proven cheaper or more cost effective. In fact, yesterday the minister spoke of bringing the federal government more into line with the private sector.

There are many people on the government side of the House who know that the private sector would not put up with the inefficiencies in the area of contracting out. The reason it would not is because it is not efficient, it is not productive, and it is not good for morale.

The minister has yet to show any of us one area where privatization or contracting out has been efficient or effective.

• (1650)

In fact Mr. Kenneth Dye, former Auditor General, referred to contracting out as "the government's greatest boondoggle". There have been studies done in British Columbia that outline very clearly how expensive contracting out becomes for government. Yes, you get rid of a few workers on your payroll, but you are paying out this big contract and you have to develop a whole new bureaucracy to supervise and look after the contracts.

It is very interesting that nobody has been able to show us how contracting out is effective.

The minister said that he would like to see the unions go the extra mile with the government to avoid disruption of the Canadian public this summer. Some 55 of 80 bargaining units representing 165,000 workers have had their collective agreements expire, five of those bargaining units for over a year, and the minister says: "I would like to see the unions go the extra mile".

I would like to see this government go even a few centimetres toward finding a solution to the collective bargaining process.

The minister said that he has developed a great respect for the workers personally and for the system of collective bargaining. What the minister said today does not indicate great or little respect for the collective bargaining process. In fact, it is questionable whether this minister has any respect at all for the collective bargaining process.

The minister really said it all when he said in his closing remarks that "the government will introduce legislation if it must, but it would prefer to try to make the established institutions of staff relations work in these difficult times as well as they do in better circumstances".

He makes a farce of the free collective bargaining process and of arbitration by making that statement. If the government wants to run the government like the private sector, he had better start by treating the workers with respect. Instead of threatening back to work legislation and suspension of bargaining, he should introduce legislation providing for full free collective bargaining in all areas, as in the private sector. Then we would know that he is serious and then we could expect efficiency, enthusiasm and respect for this Parliament, this government and this employer from public sector workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have received a request from the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer to reply to the minister. I regret that, pursuant to Standing Order 33(1), the hon. member is not eligible to respond to the ministerial statements.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up too much time, but I think that this is common practice. If you care to check precedents, even in the days when the Social Credit was represented in this House without the status of an official party, their members speak for a few minutes. This was done out of courtesy and goodwill. In fact it is up to you. The Précis of Procedure leaves it to the discretion of the Speaker. So, I appeal to your discretion and your generosity.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): What I can do is ask for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

CANADA-UNITED STATES GROUP

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian section of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group which represented Canada at the 32nd meeting in Kananaskis, Alberta from May 23 to 27, 1991.

This was the 32nd annual meeting and the Canada-U.S. delegates divided into three specific committees: one dealt with trade and economics, one with international issues, and one with energy and the environment.

I want to thank all the delegates from all sides of the House and indeed the other House down the hall who participated. I would also like to send our sincere thanks to the staff who made this meeting very successful.

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague from Scarborough East, I am pleased, pursuant to Standing Order 34, to present to the House the fourth and fifth reports in both official languages of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have a report from the interparliamentary delegation? Let me hear your point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With all these reports from interparliamentary delegations being presented, I wonder what the Chair thinks of the fact that independant members of this House have no access to these delegations.

Could the Chair take this under advisement? We do not travel much, as you know. Still, there are things about this Parliament that we should know. I think we are being discriminated against, and they—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can put his name down on any of these interparliamentary delegations and, if he is selected, he will be able to go on the trip.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

HOUSE MANAGEMENT—FIFTH REPORT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Committee on House Management and, if the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the report later this day.

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND STATUS OF WOMEN—FIRST REPORT

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first report of the reconstituted committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and Status of Women.

The committee appointed in the last session has been reconstituted by special order of the House for the sole purpose of completing its report entitled The Health Care System in Canada and its Funding—No Easy Solutions as a result of almost two years' work.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women, in both official languages.

The committee requests that the government table a comprehensive report within 90 days.

The human rights violations that the committee heard about in this report are similar to those that occur in a war. I truly think that the committee's feelings are that the government must address this and is very supportive of many of its recommendations.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might have unanimous consent of the House to move concurrence in the first report of the subcommittee on the status of women.

An hon. member: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT BILLS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there are several bills that the government would like to introduce, including the Judges Act, the amendment to the Criminal Code (mental disorder), the energy efficiency bill, the foreign ships bill and the Extradition Act.

I would therefore move:

That, notwithstanding any standing orders and usual practices of this House, for all government bills that appear in the Notice Paper today the usual 48-hour notice period be waived and that the said bills be introduced and read a first time in this day during Routine Proceedings under the item "Introduction of Government Bills".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–245, an act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of children).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to prevent parents and any person standing in the place of parents from using force toward a child as a means of correction. It would repeal section 43 of the Criminal Code. While we have abolished corporal punishment in most schools in Canada, too many children remain victims of violence and abuse within the family.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–246, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act (sexual orientation).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to implement the recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the unanimous recommendation of the parliamentary committee on equality rights, to prohibit discrimination within federal jurisdiction on the basis of sexual orientation. At the present time, lesbians, bisexuals and gay men are not protected from discrimination in employment or access to services or accommodation. I would note that the government promised to amend the law in 1986. We have waited far too long for justice, not special rights but equal rights.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–247, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda).

He said: Mr. Speaker, section 318 of Criminal Code provides that everyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence. This section defines genocide as the killing of members of any identifiable group with intent to destroy the group. This bill would expand the definition of identifiable group to include any section of the public distinguished by sex or sexual orientation.

Gay bashing and violence against women are widespread in Canada and this bill is a small step toward reducing this violence and harassment

In conclusion, on this bill I want to pay tribute to the work of Burnaby resident, Joy Kilmore, who has put tremendous energy and dedication into this very important issue.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the definition of the term spouse in the Income Tax Act and the Canada Pension Plan Act to ensure that the same financial and fiscal benefits relating to pensions are available to both heterosexual and homosexual couples.

The Government of Ontario has urged the federal government to implement this important change to reflect the reality that the relationship of lesbians and gay men are just as strong, just as loving and just as committed as other relationships in our society and our laws should reflect this fact.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-250, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to repeal subsection 13.(5) of the Canada Post Corporation Act. This subsection is discriminatory to rural route carriers in that it prevents them from the enjoyment of rights by excluding them from the employee's status as provided for in the Canada Labour Code.

I therefore submit this bill in the hope that the House, in its wisdom and concern for justice, sees fit to repeal an unjust and unjustifiable provision of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-251, an act to amend the Department of Veterans Affairs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, after 45 years of procrastination, foot dragging and outright discrimination, it is time for this Parliament to act on making merchant seamen veterans of the Second World War and every war since. I know the minister and the committee are dealing with it, but the foot-dragging is still going on.

We have 18 provisions for the welfare of veterans of the three armed forces; merchant seamen qualify for four. They do not qualify for seven of them at all. If you are a merchant seaman and want to start farming under the Veterans Land Act, the only way you can get a loan under the Veterans Land Act is if you are disabled. Who the hell is going to farm if they are disabled?

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-252, an act respecting the orderly marketing of potatoes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since 1973 when the Horticulture Council of Canada passed its first resolution to introduce a national marketing agency for potatoes, this issue has been bounced around. Numerous times various provinces have wished to go forward but there was no national legislation enabling them to do so. This will provide an umbrella for those provinces to set themselves up in a national agency.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-253, an act to amend the Food and Drug Act (food irradiation).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to prohibit food irradiation, the importation of irradiated food and the exporting of equipment or materials likely to be used for food irradiation.

The bill would also provide for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to undertake studies and research on the effect of food irradiation on human health and the environment, and to present a report to Parliament which could then be referred to a committee of the House of Commons or a joint committee of the two Houses, after which the Governor in Council could decide whether or not to continue the irradiation of food.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INTERPROVINCIAL LIVESTOCK TRADE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-254, an act respecting interprovincial livestock trade.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that any interprovincial transaction where livestock are moved from one province and slaughtered in another, that the company operating the slaughterhouse and buying the livestock must be deemed to hold the funds for that transaction in trust to avoid a situation which occurs occasionally, where a packing house goes bankrupt and the producer is left with a year's work and no money.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce C-255, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to lower the voting age in Canada to age 16 so that people 16 and older will be able to participate in federal elections.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL SPORT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-256, an act to recognize hockey as a national sport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is an opinion held by some that lacrosse is actually our national sport—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: Though all of us enjoy and admire the sport, the point is that lacrosse was never officially declared Canada's national sport, and considering the popularity of hockey across Canada, I am introducing this bill to declare hockey as our national sport.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MAGNA CARTA DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-257, an act respecting Magna Carta Day.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the title explains it adequately.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-258, an act to amend the Criminal Code (cattle rustling and range cattle).

He said: Mr. Speaker, as most members of the House of Commons know, cattle rustling is a serious situation in much of Canada. We are suggesting with this legislation that we increase the penalties for cattle rustling. We are all aware of what the penalty was in the old days, but we do not permit that in Canada any longer so we want to increase the penalties to encourage people not to rustle cattle.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Attewell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of very important petitions of an urgent nature which I hope we get to soon. I do not know why this backlog of private members' bills occurred but I think you might find, if you ask the members, that there might be unanimous consent to proceed to the next step.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Routine Proceedings

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-259, an act to amend the Auditor General Act (request for an inquiry).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this private member's bill is to empower standing committees of the House of Commons to require the Auditor General of Canada to inquire into and report upon any matter relating to the financial affairs or public property of Canada. The report is to be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons and laid before the House forthwith by the Speaker.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-260, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (corporate and political office prohibited).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prohibit senators from holding directorships in any companies which have dealings with the Government of Canada and to prevent them from functioning as professional organizers and fundraisers for any political party while being paid to serve in the Senate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we all know that the other day the First Nations of Canada asked that June 21 be set aside and recognized as Aboriginal Solidarity Day.

• (1720)

We are rising later today. I was originally going to give notice of this and present it on Friday. I wonder if I could ask—considering that it is aboriginal people and they requested this—for consent to present this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Bloc said "no".

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like the Speaker to tell us if he has recognized the "Bloc" as such?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): What is there to recognize? I just heard a "no" from your part of the Chamber. There is nothing to recognize.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think there is some confusion among my hon. colleagues.

Is it my understanding that representatives of the Bloc Québécois have opposed the notion of setting aside June 21 as Aboriginal Solidarity Day?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will ask for unanimous consent again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, you have just singled me out as a member who refused consent. I did not refuse consent for the reasons given by the hon. member who sponsored the bill, but because of mistakes—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are really not interested in that. All we are interested in is if it is a "yes" or "no" for unanimous consent. The rest is debate.

EUTHANASIA AND CESSATION OF TREATMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-261, an act to legalize the administration of euthanasia under certain conditions to persons who request it and who are suffering from an irremediable condition and respecting the withholding and cessation of treatment, and to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to make some necessary changes to the Criminal Code to allow individuals to refuse the commencement of life extending medical care, to request the discontinuation of life extending medical care and to consent to and request the administration of palliative care which may in fact shorten their life.

In another context, the purpose is to allow individuals then to die with dignity without subjecting their physicians to legal repercussions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and order to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-262, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (appointed proxy voters, non-listed electors and advanced polls).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very simple one. It is to correct what was not permitted during the last election, that is, to permit all Canadians to vote wherever they happen to be on election day. That is the nature of the bill, and I would hope that it could in fact proceed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I too would seek the leave of the House to introduce a bill for which notice has been given. Unfortunately it is not the appropriate 48-hour notice, given the early decision of the House to rise in an unexpected fashion tonight.

The bill has, in fact, captured the attention of an all-party committee. It is an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, to encourage the labelling of food to prevent unnecessary deaths in the sale of food.

It was supported in a non-partisan fashion in the last Parliament. It was a measure designed to save lives and I hope that it will not be blocked this time, because whatever one's political party, I think as a Canadian, one should be interested in saving lives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-263, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (personal and living expenses).

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are many Canadians who are concerned about the fairness of the income tax system. Yet there are many Canadians who receive tax free income on the basis of expense allowances. Those Canadians include many municipal politicians, school board members, commissioners and other people elected to those bodies, public school boards, separate school board trustees, municipal councillors, regional councillors, members of provincial parliaments, members of Parliament and senators.

Some receive allowances 50 per cent greater than their income, income tax free. Members of Parliament and senators receive another 33 per cent.

Basically, the intent of this bill is to make all those allowances taxable.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and order to be printed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Loiselle (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That, in accordance with subsection 49(1) of An Act respecting the status and use of the Official Languages of Canada, Revised statutes of Canada, Chapter 31 (4th Supplement), this House approves the appointment of Dr. Victor Goldbloom, as commissioner of Official Languages for Canada;

—He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all, speaking on behalf of the government, I would like to thank the former Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, for his dedication to the task at hand and for exceptional services rendered to the government in the course of a brilliant career that spanned four decades.

[English]

Mr. Fortier first joined the public service in 1952 and served in Canada in diplomatic posts world-wide until his appointment as Commissioner of Official Languages nearly seven years ago. We extend our best wishes for the years to come.

It is a great pleasure for me to address the appointment of Dr. Victor Goldbloom as the next Commissioner of Official Languages. Knowing Dr. Goldbloom as I do, it came as no surprise to me that when the Prime Minister spoke with opposition leaders, both fully endorsed and welcomed the proposal and then approved it.

[Translation]

In fact, Dr. Goldbloom's background and his expertise in so many areas make him eminently suited to taking on the duties of Commissioner. He chaired the language rights committee of the Court Challenges Program. He is a native of Montreal and a graduate of McGill University. He practised as pediatrician and taught pediatrics for many years before entering public life.

He became chairman of the medical economics committee and was, successively, president of the Association des pédiatres de la Province de Québec, the Association médicale du Québec and the Canadian Medical Association. In this latter capacity, he travelled across Canada, becoming acquainted with the health care systems and social problems of the provinces and territories.

In 1966, he was elected in the new riding of D'Arcy McGee as its first representative. He represented the riding in the National Assembly for nearly 14 years. In 1970 he was appointed minister and became the first member of the Jewish community to sit in the Quebec cabinet. Subsequently, he became Quebec's first Minister of the Environment.

In February 1973, he took over the Municipal Affairs portfolio, and in 1975, he also became the minister responsible for the Olympic Games facilities. Re-elected for a fourth term on November 15, 1976, he resigned his seat in the fall of 1979 to become president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. From 1982 to 1990, he was president of the International Council of Christians and Jews.

• (1730)

[English]

Dr. Goldbloom has been the executive director of the Folds de la recherche en santé du Québec since January 1990. The new commissioner is active in community life and participates in numerous voluntary associations: the Canadian Council for Native Business, the Jean Lesage Foundation, the Jewish Public Establishment Co-ordinating Committee, the Canadian Medical Association Subcommittee on Environmental Occupational Health, and chairs a task force for the Canadian Paediatric Society on Environmental Aspects of Day Care. He is a member of the board of the Quebec Drama Federation. He is an honorary patron of the Quebec Bar Association Foundation. Many of his accomplishments have been recognized. He is an honorary Doctor of Law at the University of Toronto, an Officer of the Order of Canada. He has received the Government of Canada Award for Race Relations and he is an officer of l'Ordre nationale d Québec.

In 1988 the government adopted a new Official Languages Act, which built on and improved the previous legislation. Dr. Goldbloom will have the critical responsibility of overseeing the realization of these provisions.

The role of the commissioner is an important one. He is an ombudsman, a servant of Parliament responsible for ensuring the recognition of both official languages and the compliance with the Official Languages Act by federal institution.

[Translation]

Mr. Goldbloom comes to this position at a critical time in our country's history. Our new Commissioner of Official Languages will undoubtedly want to take an active part in defining our country's identity, as did his predecessors.

Mr. Speaker, we—the government and I—are confident that Dr. Goldbloom will be successful on this important mission and we wish him the best of luck.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I am pleased to support the appointment of Dr. Victor Goldbloom as the Official Languages Commissioner for Canada. Dr. Goldbloom is the first anglophone Quebecer to fill this position. He is a bilingual Montrealer and a graduate of McGill University. All of these things we have in common with him. I might also say that for 14 years he represented the provincial constituency of D'Arcy McGee, which shares territory with my federal constituency of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

The hon. minister pointed out many of Dr. Goldbloom's accomplishments, including the fact that he was president of both the Quebec Medical Association and the Canadian Medical Association. As minister, he was Minister of Municipal Affairs and the first Minister for the Environment in Quebec. Recently, he has been the president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. Also he was president of the committee which decided whether or not certain individuals and groups should get funding to contest violations of their official language rights before the courts.

Mr. Goldbloom himself is from a minority in Canada. Consequently, I believe he will be extremely sensitive to the position of the linguistic minority communities in this country.

That having been said and without any criticism of the individual who is appointed—and we support that appointment—I must say that the process by which the government went about this appointment was deplorable and once again shows the great incompetency of the government.

The government knew more than one year ago that Mr. Fortier, the previous commissioner, was to resign on June 14, yet even last week it had not started consultations with the opposition parties on an appointment.

I want to point out that the Commissioner for Official Languages is an officer of Parliament. He is not an officer of the government. He reports to Parliament. He does not report to the government. Therefore, he requires the support of all political parties in this House. Consequently, it is incumbent on the government to consult closely, in advance, with the opposition parties. It did not do that. Mr. Fortier retired from his position last week and consultations only started this week, the week in which Parliament is to adjourn.

That having been said, I hope this statement on the record will assure that the next time in seven years' time—and this will not be forgotten—this will be done in a more proper manner and that the consultations will be done as I think they were intended.

At the retirement party reception for Mr. Fortier, I congratulated Mr. Fortier and especially congratulated him for his close contact and communication with members of the Standing Committee on Official Languages. He was always in touch with us and he was always available. I also pointed out that he always acted with great balance and fairness and also with courage. If an ombudsman or a Commissioner for Official Languages is to be successful, he must be fair to all language communities in Canada and when he sees a violation of their language rights, he speaks out with courage and with forthrightness. That is what Mr. Fortier did and we are sure that Mr. Goldbloom will do the same.

Among the outstanding issues that Dr. Goldbloom will have to deal with, of course, is the fact that despite we passed the Official Languages Act in 1988, we still have not got in force the regulations that go with that Official Languages Act.

The government has presented to us draft regulations for service to the public. Those have been examined by the standing committee and referred back to the minister. One hopes that they will soon be in operation. But the government still has not provided us with the draft regulations relating to the language of work in the federal government or to equitable participation by English and French speaking Canadians in the Public Service of Canada. We are still waiting for that.

The former commissioner, Mr. Fortier, spoke out strongly demanding those regulations time and again.

The new commissioner will also have to deal with the attempt by certain groups in Canada to dilute and to step backward with respect to our policy on official languages. There are even rumours today that the Spicer commission next week will recommend a weakening of the commitment to official languages or a stepping back with respect to that policy.

I must remind the House, Mr. Speaker, through you, that this attempt—and this was even discussed at a behind the doors conference of the government—to move to a sort of Swiss model in Canada is totally out of context and ridiculous for Canada where we have a million francophones living outside of Quebec, more francophones living outside of Quebec than there were francophones altogether in 1867 at the time of Confederation, and 700,000 to 800,000 anglophones living in Quebec.

So that model that is being suggested that Quebec would live entirely in French or work in French and the rest of Canada entirely in English is not to be accepted. One would hope that our new commissioner will deal as strongly with that as well.

The final issue is the attempt by the government by privatizing Crown corporations to the private sector and removing them from the ambit of the Official Languages Act. We were dealing with a bill that was before this House recently, making the point that in privatizing the airports in Canada they should not be exempt from all the provisions of the Official Languages Act. When Air Canada was privatized, it was privatized with all the obligations of the Official Languages Act imposed on it. We again have to be vigilant and the new commissioner will have to be vigilant to see that the government does not try to get away with those sorts of things.

Those are the difficult issues that the commissioner will have to deal with. We congratulate him on his appointment. We are here to support him. We are here to work with him and we know he will do a good job.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The honourable member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I was reading the Official Languages Act. As you know, the Act provides that the Commissioner shall be appointed after approval by resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons. The procedure being followed in this instance is totally unusual and everything is prearranged. The vote of the honourable members was taken for granted. Mr. Speaker, this is not in accordance with the legislation, nor with its spirit. Look at this resolution which says: That, after those speeches, the motion be deemed to have been put and carried.

Mr. Speaker, I think that everything was prearranged and that is not at all in accordance with the spirit of the legislation, nor with the tradition. This is a point of order and I invite you to read again the provisions of the Act. You should have tabled a resolution in proper form. I challenge the legality of what we are doing right now.

• (1740)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion was adopted yesterday that there were going to be four speeches and pursuant to the order made yesterday, the question and the motion now before the House will be deemed put and the motion to have been adopted.

That was ruled by the House yesterday and that is the way it is going to be.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, that appointment was made in secret, without consulting the Members of the Bloc-Quebecois.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to congratulate the Prime Minister for having been able to convince Victor Goldbloom, an excellent choice, to accept the position of Commissioner of Official Languages. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Goldbloom, and to express my sympathy, to him, for he is taking on a demanding and difficult task. It is a difficult task because the expectations are very high. Many Canadians ask themselves questions about bilingualism. Is it a program that costs too much money? How much does it cost? Why all that money? Does bilingualism mean that a linguistic group has a better chance of obtaining a job in the federal public service? Those of us in this House that support bilingualism and the Official Languages Act know that there are good answers to those questions.

It is the job of the Commissioner of Official Languages to go out and talk with Canadians, to explain to them the importance of bilingualism, and to answer their questions about that very important act. However, Mr. Speaker, progress in the federal public service has been slow and inconsistent as regards bilingualism.

For instance, I worked for months with a group of francophone members of the RCMP who did not get the bilingualism bonus, even after having won a very clear decision by the Federal Court. Those people are entitled to that bonus.

The Commissioner of Official Languages is the watchdog of the federal public service. His mandate is to ensure that the Act is implemented. I hope that Mr. Goldbloom can bark and has sharp teeth, because he will need those requirements.

The tensions between the different linguistic groups in that country are very strong and the francophone minorities are still fighting for their rights. The role of the Commissioner is essential to help this country find a common ground concerning those issues. Mr. Goldbloom, an anglophone from Quebec, was a minister in the Quebec provincial government during a turbulent period. Therefore, he is well prepared to help find a solution to problems that he knows very well.

As for me, I would like to give three pieces of advice to our new Commissioner: First, to ensure the implementation of the Official Languages Act while always respecting the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec; secondly, to continue to build bridges between our two linguistic groups, by showing great patience and humility; and, thirdly, to oppose the efforts of this government which is trying to back off as regards the implementation of this essential piece of legislation. In other words: Don't give up!

I wish the best of luck to Mr. Goldbloom in his job as Commissioner of Official Languages, and I offer him all the assistance and cooperation that my party and I can provide, so that he can succeed in bridging the numerous gaps that still exists between our two linguistic groups.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to welcome the new Commissioner for Official Languages, Mr. Victor Goldbloom.

Under the Official Languages Act, the duties and functions of the commissioner are defined as follows:

> It is the duty of the Commissioner to take all actions and measures within the authority of the Commissioner with a view to ensuring recognition of the status of each of the official languages and compliance with the spirit and intent of this Act in the administration of the affairs of federal institutions, including any of their activities relating to the advancement of English and French in Canadian society.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Goldbloom's predecessor carried out its duties with efficiency, vigour and a lot of courage. Indeed, always mindful of the mission this House gave him, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier had the courage to enforce the Official Languages Act, for which criticisms were sometimes levelled at him. He was able to honour his responsibilities and also the confidence placed in him by the linguistic communities. He showed the way for Mr. Goldbloom who now takes over.

Not only will Dr Goldbloom fill the shoes few people would fight over, but he will also have to sell the linguistic duality. Our new commissioner will have to say no to all those who would want to trade the official languages for the so-called sake of national unity. As the watchdog for the rights of linguistic minorities, that is of French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec as well as English-speaking Canadians inside Quebec, as the advocate of linguistic equality in our country, and on behalf of the minority he has the duty to protect, he will have to say "no".

Mr. Speaker, our new commissioner will have to continue to uphold these principles. He will have to explain to all Canadians the difference between institutional bilingualism and individual bilingualism. Several individuals who are against the Official Languages Act think this legislation aims at making Canada a bilingual country. Several people think that, under this legislation, all Canadians must become bilingual. And yet, this Act only ensures that all Canadians, whether they speak English or French, can be served in the official language of their choice in federal institutions. Why would anyone object to an English-speaking Quebecer being served in English by his or her government or a French-speaking Ontarian being served in French, when dealing for example with old age pensions or immigration or defence? Why would anyone be against an unemployed anglophone from Sherbrooke or an unemployed francophone from Vanier being given services or directions in his or her language?

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees language minorities the right to education or trial in their own language. How can we logically transfer to the provinces the responsibility of enforcing those rights, when the majority in these provinces is not even abiding by them, Mr. Speaker.

The message from the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada, last weekend, and the one from Alliance Quebec are very clear. Minorities do not intend to relinquish their rights and are planning to be very active during the constitutional debate. Minorities do not want to be left out and are planning to make themselves heard loud and clear. The new Commissioner will have to do the same.

Racists of all stripes are spreading lies and inflating the cost of bilingualism, hoping to fool the innocents. The present attacks come mostly from these defeatist groups which have never accepted the Canadian reality.

When we talk about official languages, we are talking of the co-existence of these two languages in Canada, and sometimes in some provinces or some parts of the country. We must stop blaming all the problems of Confederation on this co-existence. We must stop making it the scapegoat for all our problems. As some would say in my riding, Mr. Speaker, we must stop using bilingualism as the national ketchup to put on all the problems this country has.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must stop talking about the cost of language duality and start talking about its benefits.

Whether it is bilingualism, multiculturalism, native programs, fisheries, defence, the CBC, transportation or anything else, we must not see only the cost, especially if it is inflated, we must also judge the value. The only way to maintain Canadian unity is to keep the values which are the essence of this country.

The new Commissioner, Dr. Goldbloom, must face quite a challenge, but a challenge vital to the future of our country.

I wish him all the best in the fullfilling of his mandate. We would like to assure him of the same support we gave to his predecessors, Commissioners Spicer, Yalden and Fortier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Inadvertently I missed Private Members' Bills because of some of the confusion around here.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-264, an act to amend the Bank Act (fair banking practices).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide for the availability of basic bank services at no cost to consumers, the prohibition of certain charges as well as the disclosure and notification requirements governing service charges. The amendments would also suspend all bank service charges for a period of one year.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

LIMITATION OF INTEREST RATES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-265, an act to provide for the limitation of interest rates and fees in relation to credit card accounts.

He said: This bill deals with the problem we have when interest rates go up, when the bank rate goes up, then credit card and retail card interest rates go up very, very quickly. However, when the bank interest rate comes down, interest rates come down very, very slowly. This bill would provide a floating cap on retail credit card interest rates and on bank credit card interest rates. They will go up and down in relation to the bank rate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-266, an act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (salaries).

He said: This bill would ensure that any corporation to which the Corporation and Labour Unions Returns Act applies be required to file with the Chief Statistician of Canada a return containing information on the salaries paid to its officers.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-267, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act (priority of claims).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to change the priorities and place above the secured creditors, employees whose salaries, vacation pay, pension credits and all other benefits have been lost as a result of a bankruptcy. They would be placed ahead of any financial institution which is a secured creditor.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, given that we have returned to Private Members' Bills, I would seek leave to introduce a bill to amend the Food and Drugs Act. It is the bill which I explained earlier would have been introduced if the proper 48-hours' notice had been given. There has been a 24-hour notice given. The bill seeks to reduce the number of deaths caused by the improper labelling of food and drugs. Since we have returned to Private Members' Introduction of Bills, I thought that with the goodwill of the House and the wish of everyone to save lives, that they might agree to this particular—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there is a motion standing in my name that has never been put to the House. I wish to withdraw the motion in light of the motion adopted that effectively does what this motion was intended to do. Given the subject matter, it has been referred back to the committee. It is the one for concurrence in the privileges and elections committee report, so I withdraw the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There was no necessity for it, but I have noted the withdrawal.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I am asking for the guidance of the Chair so that the Standing Committee on Transport can be immediately convened for the express purpose of reviewing the sale by the Canadian National Railway of Route Canada Incorporated. After an extensive investigation, the principals of Route Canada have just been charged by the RCMP for fraud in excess of $4.2 million.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that there were many questions put in this House about this sale and particularly about the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that is debate. Are there any further motions?

PETITIONS

LEBANON

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to table a petition signed by some Lebanese religious leaders and some groups who are asking the government of Canada to reopen its embassy in Beirut as soon as possible.

These petitioners, Mr. Speaker, have live through a fifteen year war and foreign occupations, and they ask the international community, countries like Canada, to intervene because they have a commitment to Lebanon which is a democratic country, and to ensure that the United Nations resolutions Nos 425 and 520 are complied with.

For too long Lebanese people living in Canada have been asking their government to make representation to the United Nations to merely give the Lebanese people the opportunity to live in peace.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of aboriginal citizens of the First Nations of Canada. This petition was collected by my colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic.

The petitioners state that the goods and services tax has been unfairly imposed on them because they are immune from such taxation by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights. These rights have, in part, been affirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, the Constitution Act of 1982 and the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Sparrow case.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibility to the citizens of the First Nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nation citizens both on or off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserved lands.

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, duty and privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions, signed by residents in my riding of Hamilton West, Stoney Creek and Winona. They clearly state that an absolute majority of voters in Croatia, Slovenija, Boznya, Herzigovina and Macedonia adopted for democracy, independence and sovereignty of their respective republics.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to adopt a policy that would encourage and help the republics that opted for the democratic process.

FOOD ADDITIVES

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of Newfoundlanders and Labradorians primarily from my constituency in St. John's East and a number of Nova Scotians.

The petitioners request that we enact legislation to amend the food and drug regulations to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives and also that restaurants and food retailers make the same information available, particularly in response to the citizens who suffer from allergies, a great concern of many people.

PARENTAL LEAVE

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition certified correct under Standing Order 36 from about 50 constituents of my area.

The petitioners believe that Bill C–21 has discriminated against adoptive parents and have asked that the government change Bill C–21 to allow both biological and adoptive parents to have equal treatment by allowing both to be home with their children.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present.

One is signed in favour of the First Nations of Canada who are immune from such taxation as the GST by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights.

The petitioners want Parliament to recognize its responsibility to the citizens of the First Nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nations citizens both on or off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserve lands.

Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from Canadian citizens who object to the GST being applied to books, magazines and all kinds of printed matter.

The petitioners feel that this is a first in Canada. They totally object to it.

FOREIGN POLICY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my voice with those of other members, including the member for Hamilton West, in presenting a petition wherein the undersigned call upon the government to recognize the right to self–government and the absolute right to self–determination of the majority of voters in Croatia, Slovenija, Boznia, Hetsnogovia and Macedonia.

The representatives of the Croatian Multi–party and Inter–organizational Committee for Hamilton are convinced and petition Parliament to recognize that only by support for freedom and democracy and by strong opposition to martial law will civil war be prevented in that particular part of the world.

That is the wish of all of us, to support the right for self–determination and to abhor the use of force to meet a certain political end.

That is the petition that I am very happy to present on behalf of hundreds of residents of the Hamilton area.

WAGE CONTROLS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition which is calling upon the Government of Canada to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

The petition is signed by dozens of Canadians from Cambridge Bay through to Kanata. It recognizes the fact that the cost of living in northern Canada is one-third higher than it is in southern Canada. This imposition of wage controls has an even worse effect on northern Canadians. That should be recognized.

The petition calls upon the Canadian government to correct these grievances and injustices.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my third petition is signed by several dozen residents in the Hamilton-Stoney Creek area and calls for revisions of the Young Offenders Act to protect Canadians who are seeking a better justice system with justice not only for the offender but also for the victim.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by many hundreds of people in Toronto concerning the situation in Lithuania.

The undersigned asked the Parliament of Canada to immediately recognize the legitimate democratically elected government of the Republic of Lithuania and establish diplomatic relations with it.

The petitioners demand that the Soviet Union not annihilate the legitimate government of Lithuania. They demand that the Soviet Union withdraw all its military forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. They demand that negotiations between the Soviet Union and Lithuania begin and ensure that international mediation is provided during negotiations. They demand that unconditional international aid to the Soviet Union in the form of credits and feed grains be conditional upon the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Baltic states, and resolution of the Baltic crisis.

PARENTAL LEAVE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present a petition concerning some of the problems and difficulties of adoptive parents. I asked a question in the House yesterday on this topic.

The petition asks the government to review Bill C-21 with regard to adoptive parental leave, considering the literature that deals with the adoptive process, the bonding process, needs and rights of adoptive parents, proper terminology in adoption, and discussion with adoptive families and so on. It is signed by a number of residents of Markham, Unionville, Thornhill and other areas.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): My second petition, as secretary-treasurer of the Canadian parliamentary group for the Baltic people, is similar to the one the hon. member for Winnipeg-Strathcona put forward just a few minutes ago, so I will not read it out in detail. However, it basically supports the independence and freedoms that the Baltic people are seeking.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): My third petition, signed by literally hundreds of names, asks the government to enact legislation amending food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in the prepackaged foods in place of the general classifications now permitted.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. One is from Canadians, particularly those from Alberta and British Columbia, and calls for an increased priority for education to meet objectives such as globalization, changes in the economics of the country and Canada's social challenges. It points out that there is tougher competition out there and we need to increase our support for education. It points out that there has been a cut of almost $500 million to education this year in transfers to provinces. It deplores the 3 per cent tax and points out that education is for everyone, not just the wealthy.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My second petition is from some residents of Saskatchewan and Alberta, pointing out the government's 33 tax increases and indicating that they deplore the interference with collective bargaining. The petition also says that the government is using civil servants to attempt to enhance its political message, its political popularity. It calls upon this House to consider the petitioners' grievance.

SELF-EXILE APPLICATIONS

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first petition is signed by 132 residents of the Kitchener–Waterloo region. It calls upon the government to speed up the processing of all outstanding self-exiled applications of thousands of east Europeans who came to Canada under the self-exiled program.

The second petition is signed by thousands of people across Canada. My colleague from Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville mentioned the intent of this petition, so I will not repeat it.

TAXATION

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions today, the first one from approximately 1,000 residents of the Moose Jaw—Lake Centre riding calling upon this government to cease its insane economic policies and particularly to withdraw the goods and services tax and introduce a truly progressive tax reform that is fair to all Canadians.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): My second petition is from approximately 100 farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. They call upon this government to place oats back under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now enjoys under the Canadian Wheat Board.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present this petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, duly certified as to being correct in form by the Clerk of Petitions.

The petition is signed by a good number of residents of one community in my constituency, about 200 residents of Edam, Saskatchewan. They note that Canada Post has proposed to close the post office in Edam, Saskatchewan, along with other post offices in Canada. They note that rural post offices like the one in Edam, Saskatchewan, are serving their communities well and should be maintained. Therefore, the petitioners—and I agree with them—call on Parliament to support the maintenance of the rural postal services from existing full service post offices, like the one in their community of Edam, Saskatchewan, and they call on Parliament to reject any proposal which would result in the closing of the existing post office.

REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present a petition today that reminds Parliament that Canada has never recognized the forcible annexation of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia into the Soviet Union and responding to the Government of Lithuania's request for immediate support of all democratic countries to protect independence. The several hundred signatories, from Fort McMurray to Toronto, ask the Canadian government to immediately recognize the legitimate, democratically elected government of the Republic of Lithuania and establish democratic relations with it and take several other measures to indicate Canada's support for the elected democratic government of Lithuania and for its right to self-determination.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table a petition that has been signed by a number of residents of the province of Prince Edward Island. These residents are concerned that the federal government has chosen to proceed with a bridge connecting Prince Edward Island to the mainland when the residents of Prince Edward Island have had no opportunity to express their opinions in this matter. The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP's request to halt all business relating to this issue until such time as a direct vote of the public is held in the form of a plebiscite to specifically determine whether the construction of a bridge should proceed across the Northumberland Strait. These people suggest that Canada should let the island decide.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of people in my riding wherein the petitioners humbly sheweth that the tools for building a better Canada have been abandoned, that this government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the next four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations in Calgary, Corner Brook, Goose Bay, Sydney, Toronto, Saskatoon, Windsor, as well as other areas. The petitioners call upon Parliament to re-examine the government's priorities and to consider restoring funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada.

Mr. MacWilliam: Point of order, Mr. Speaker, the member for St. Albert and I have waited patiently to put in petitions for the members of our communities. It would only take a short time and I am sure the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. members?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

SENDING OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES TO EUROPE TO DEAL WITH THE TREATMENT OF ITS ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BY CANADA

Question No. 5—Mr. Walker:

Did the government send two officials to Europe on a three week mission to try and counter any impressions of Canada's treatment of its aboriginal peoples, and, if so, (a) what was the selection criteria used to determine which officials would be sent (b) what consultation process was undertaken with aboriginal people concerning this tour (c) what were the names and credentials of the two officials?

Hon. Barbara Jean MacDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government sent an official of External Affairs and International Trade Canada, accompanied by an official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to Europe to brief Canadian embassy officials and other interested parties about the Government's policies respecting the aboriginal peoples of Canada. The briefings were given in eleven capitals (Lisbon, Madrid, Rome, Vatican, Bonn, Oslo, Stockholm, The Hague, Brussels, London and Paris) on eleven consecutive working days (January 28—February 11, 1991).

(a) The official of External Affairs and International Trade Canada with the appropriate mandate was the Departmental Coordinator for International Aboriginal Affairs. The official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was an advisor on international affairs and was selected for her detailed knowledge of federal aboriginal policy and programmes.

(b) The aboriginal people were informed of the mission. Such briefing missions are normal practice for External Affairs and International Trade Canada.

(c) External Affairs and International Trade Canada was represented by Mr. B.D. Marantz whose career has been divided entirely between external relations and aboriginal affairs. The Department Of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was represented by Ms. Catherine Chalupa, an advisor on international affairs in the self-government sector of her department.

SALE OF DE HAVILLAND

Question No. 15—Mr. McCurdy:

Has (a) the Prime Minister (b) any other minister been contacted by Mr. Fred Doucet, or anyone employed by Fred Doucet Consulting International Inc. concerning the sale of de Havilland Aircraft of Canada and, if so, on what dates?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons):

The Lobbyists Registration Act does not require for the registration of meetings or representations.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 30—Mr. Vanclief:

Is Mrs. Mila Mulroney currently allocated office space by the government, on or off Parliament Hill, and, if so, (a) where is that office space located (b) what official business of the government does she conduct in that office (c) what is the operating budget of that office (d) under which department of the government are the funds for that operating budget allocated (e) how many people staff that office (f) what office equipment and furniture has been supplied to the inventory of that office?

Hon. Leonard Gustafon (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): (a) Office space located in the Langevin Block is used by Mrs. Mulroney.

(b) Mrs. Mulroney assists the Prime Minister in fulfilling the duties of his office including responding to the substantial correspondence she receives from individuals, charitable groups such as the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation etc, community groups, and professional associations.

(c) There is no separate budget for the activities described in paragraph (b). Operating costs are absorbed within the overall budget for the PMO.

(d) Costs are absorbed within the PMO operating budget which is part of the Privy Council program budget as reflected in Part III of the Main Estimates.

(e) A number of staff members of the PMO provide assitance to Mrs. Mulroney for official functions, in addition to other duties they have within the PMO.

(f) There are no separate budgets within the PMO for the purchase of office equipment and furniture. Such costs are kept within the limits of the overall operating budget of the PMO.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 39—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

Does the government have a policy regarding the payment of legal fees for public servants and, if so, (a) what is it (b) are they totally protected (c) does this policy also apply to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): (a) When a public servant requires legal assistance for a job related matter, the Department of Justice normally provides a lawyer. Where the Department of Justice is unable to provide legal assistance (for example, where the public servant has been charged with an offence, or where it would be a conflict of interest for the Department of Justice to act), government policy allows a departmental deputy head Minister to authorize payment of fees for private legal counsel.

(b) This policy generally covers cases when a public servant is: charged, or likely to be charged with an offence; sued or threatened to be sued; required to appear before a judicial, investigative or other inquest or inquiry; of in other circumstances sufficiently serious to warrant the provision of private counsel.

(c) This policy does not apply to Members of Parliament. However, where Ministers are acting in their capacity as heads of government departments, the government may provide legal services or pay legal fees.

MOTOR VEHICLES PURCHASED FOR USE OF CABINET MINISTERS

Question No.43—Mr. Boudria:

1. Since November 21, 1988, how many motor vehicles has the government purchased for the use of Cabinet Ministers and, in each case (a) who was the vehicle purchased for (b) what was the (i) make (ii) model (iii) price of each vehicle?

2. Was there a vehicle trade-in with respect to these purchases and, if so, what was the (i) make (ii) model (iii) year (iv) value of each trade-in?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): See attached. (p. 2103)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I do not question the authority of the Whips, which allows them to go back into the House immediately. However, I do wish, and I am not saying that he showed a lack of decorum, because I don't want to be rude, but I even saw the Deputy Prime Minister running because the bells only rang for a few moments.

I realize the Whips may enter the House immediately, but as a senior member of this House, I feel I must at least protest against the unseemly haste with which they want to end the session. I have no objection to ending the session, but if there are further votes this evening, I wish all members would at least be given a chance to enter the House to do their duty as parliamentarians, because otherwise, the House cannot function properly. And this applies those who asked for the vote, as they are entitled to, and to those who proceeded in haste, which they have a right to do. However, as a member I expect to be given a chance to exercise my rights as a parliamentarian.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair always welcomes comments by the dean of the House. However, I may remind him that what happened was entirely in accordance with the Standing Orders and practice of this House.

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-28, an Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall this bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. To my knowledge, we have not reverted to introduction of government bills. I would like to know why this can be done at any time. Could you explain?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford ought to know the Chair is bound by a number of orders that were adopted last night, with unanimous consent. This was done in full view of the Canadian public, it was on television, and the Chair is bound by these orders which were adopted unanimously.

WAGE CLAIMANT PAYMENT ACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-22, an Act to enact the Wage Claimant Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be prestudied by the standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made on Tuesday, June 18, 1991, the Chair will now recognize one member of each of the three official parties, for a period of ten minutes each. Subsequently, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs will be authorized to proceed with a preliminary study of Bill C-22, an Act to enact the Wage Claimant Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that this order made in the middle of night and on the sly is unfair and should not be approved while—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I would call upon the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead to co-operate. The point he is raising was raised several times already today and has been settled. Again, I call upon the goodwill of the members of this House, keeping in mind people are watching us on TV. Moreover, the Chair is bound by the order that was made pursuant to the rules of this House and approved uninamously. The hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to rise in this House this afternoon to support Bill C-22 which I had the privilege to table last week. All members have a clear and pressing responsibility and that is to update every piece of legislation so that it will foster economic growth and prosperity in Canada while ensuring that businesses and consumers are treated fairly.

[English]

The amendments before the House represent the fruit of an extensive process of consultation review and reflection with those with a stake in the reforms: governments, business, labour, consumers, financial institutions and the insolvency community.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all members of this House agree that the bankruptcy legislation should foster rehabilitation rather than liquidation and that it should afford consumers better protection. Because of this common vision, I can give the members opposite the same assurance I gave the critics I met with: I shall remain open to any reasonable suggestion concerning changes to be made to the proposed legislation.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to outline briefly the contemplated reform. The new legislation will give businesses that have a reasonable chance of surviving the tools to ensure their survival.

[English]

We are proposing that the current rules be changed to allow businesses in financial trouble the option of filing a notice of state of 30 days, with the official receiver for protection from all creditors, both unsecured and secured.

[Translation]

Another goal of the proposed reform is to strike a new balance between the following: the rights of the unpaid suppliers, the Crown interests and personal bankruptcies.

Everyone in this House will certainly be happy to hear that the primary purpose of the new provisions concerning the rights of the unpaid suppliers is the well-being of small businesses. All too often, in a single customer context, a flourishing business would collapse over a single deal when a shipment could not delivered because the business it was intended for had declared bankruptcy.

So, from now on, within 30 days of the delivery of goods to a business which is subsequently placed under receivership or declared bankrupt, suppliers will be entitled to reposess the goods.

We also took steps to limit the priority of the Crown, one of the more blatantly unfair aspect of the present Bankruptcy Act.

[English]

We have not forgotten consumers in the reform. Under the current rules, individuals cannot effectively negotiate with their creditors on amounts owing. This is unfair to both debtors and creditors. That is why we will permit the repayment period to be extended and permit debtors to negotiate with their creditors on amounts owed.

In the same vein, our reforms will make it less difficult for bankrupt individuals to get back on their feet by proposing to streamline guidelines governing access to summary administration.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, everyone has been saying for the longest time that one of the most serious deficiencies of the Bankruptcy Act, as it stands, is the fact that it does not protect the people who work for businesses that go bankrupt. In such cases, not only do the workers loose their jobs but, all too often, they never see a penny of the back wages their employer owed them. That is why we are proposing a new wage claim program to give them some protection as regards the payment of their wages and vacation pay upon their employer declaring bankruptcy or being placed under receivership.

[English]

—to be funded from employer contributions of roughly 10 cents per employee per week.

• (1830)

The program will allow employees in an employer's bankruptcy, receivership or liquidation to receive up to $2,000 for wages and vacation pay, and up to an additional $1,000 for unpaid expenses for travelling sales people.

The federal government, the largest employer in the country, will pay into the program as well, and we have asked provincial governments to do likewise.

To minimize the paper burden of employers, premiums will be collected jointly with the unemployment insurance program.

Finally, we have also included in this act a provision for it to be reviewed by Parliament after three years. We must never again allow so important a piece of legislation to become as seriously out-dated as the Bankruptcy Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, preparing this reform was a real challenge because we had to strike the right balance between protecting the interests of small businesses, consumers and wage-earners on the one hand and, on the other, helping viable businesses get back on their feet and protect jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the reform I put before this House will help us reach those goals. I ask all honourable members for their support so that Bill C-22 is enacted as soon as possible. Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind this House that in 1987, the last time a bill numbered C-22 was tabled in this House by the present Government House Leader who was then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that bill on the drug industry was a resounding success. I hope 22 will be a lucky number again. We trust that, with the cooperation of my colleagues in this House, we will be able to pass this bill quickly at this stage. We will refer it to committee for preliminary study, so that, come September and October, we will be in a position to pass it in this House so that we may enjoy the benefits of this legislation very soon next fall.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise today to speak to this motion which deals with the disposition and the treatment of Bill C-22 in that it would allow Bill C-22 and its contents to be pre-studied by the consumer and corporate affairs committee prior to its introduction and debate at second reading in the House.

I think it is fair to say that after some consultation with the minister who just spoke, I would have to be in agreement that the timing of this bill is important. The Bankruptcy Act has not had substantial amendments applied to it since 1966. The current bankruptcy legislation which we are operating under has been around since 1949.

There are a number of provisions in that act which have to be scuttled. There are some new provisions which have to be added. There is some updating which certainly has to be done. Some of the major components of the act lead me to believe that with some flexibility on the side of the government, and it is there because I think it truly has a desire to come up with a piece of legislation which is workable and supportable by all those who are concerned, during the pre-study period we will certainly be able to listen to interested groups.

It is my hope that the committee will be able to travel as we do the pre-study, not extensively, but as much as necessary to listen to those parties that are interested outside of the capital region. Bankruptcies do not just happen here, they happen all over the country. If good suggestions come forward in the spirit of co-operation and compromise, I hope the government will listen to that and will accept good amendments that do not alter the direction of the act.

Concerning the direction of the act itself, there are two or three points which I just want to very briefly address.

The Wage Earner Protection Program is one which is long since overdue, and is one which has been the subject in the past of some private member's motions in this House. Back in 1949, there was a provision for some priority for workers' wages up to an amount of $500. The effect of this Bill C-22 would put in place a fund for workers' wages to a maximum of $2,000, plus the $1,000 for sales persons' expenses would come out of the fund. The government thinks that this may cost abut $60 million per year. It is proposed under that piece of legislation to be financed solely by the employers.

We have some difficulty with that for a couple of reasons, which we will get into during the course of the debate, and which I am sure will be raised by interested parties which will be called upon to submit testimony during the pre-study period.

One of the questions we want to examine and talk to individuals about is whether the wage earner protection fund actually should have been in two parts. One fund with a super priority for wages and the second fund, financed either by the Treasury or by a combination of an employer tax and the Treasury of the Government of Canada, which would basically act as the emergency fund but still give super priority.

Those are things about which we will listen to witnesses to determine if the current proposal is the best one for the circumstances.

Another provision which is very timely and overdue deals with the 30 day stay provision for firms in financial difficulty. It is absolutely essential that this type of protection, which they have had in the United States for a number of years, is introduced to a modern bankruptcy act in Canada.

As we all know, because we all have constituents who are in business, all too often secured creditors walk in quickly, seize assets, cut off credit lines, and put receivers in place. Many times healthy companies, for whatever reason—they may be having some temporary difficulty—find themselves in a position where they cannot go on with their business and bankruptcy ensues. The purpose of any amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, as the minister said, is to instil some balance in the system, balance between all the players in business, without any question.

We must ensure that this 30 day provision is sufficient to protect the interest of the debtor, of the consumer and of the secured creditors. Those things will be debated.

One of the other provisions which is extremely important deals with suppliers. All too often what happens is that suppliers, who basically lend, give material to other businesses and perhaps they are out 30 or 60 days. A day or two after the material, perhaps large amounts, go to another business that business will declare bankruptcy and most of the time the supplier is not in a secured position. Unfortunately, the supplier loses a tremendous amount of money and in many cases the domino effect causes that supplier to go out of business. We have seen that a lot in the current recession.

Those provisions are also addressed in the bill. A pre-study of the bill will allow other interested parties to participate and I think we might see some good suggestions for amendments.

The only major concern I have at this point is that we are in a period of record bankruptcies. As we well know, the bankruptcies in the first quarter of this year have been at a near record level. The total number of bankruptcies in the last seven years, since this government took power, is a staggering 273,789. In each of those cases in the case of consumer bankruptcies, there is a great deal of devastation felt by those people who have had to claim bankruptcy under this antiquated act.

As for business bankruptcies, there are hundreds of thousands of individuals who over the last seven years have found themselves in great difficulty with some of the wages, the investment they have put in the company, at risk. I am certainly hoping that those individuals will be able to be heard during the pre-study and have some input into the final package presented to the House, during second reading and when it finally does get to committee after second reading.

One of my big concerns, and I should say it here, is the amount. The ceiling is $2,000. If we simply factor in the $500 protection of the 1949 act with the CPI factor it should be around $3,100 or $3,200.

Again in the Coulter report of 1980, a figure of $2,000 for such protection was suggested. If you factor in the CPI it appears that protection should be around $3,200. Those are the types of concerns that we will be bringing to the pre-study and that I am sure we will hear about.

• (1840)

Again, the big concern we have is that some of the provisions of this act are not going to be enforced. If the act was passed today, we would still have a problem with the wage earner protection program.

The wage earner protection program cannot be put in force until January 1, 1992, which means that even if this House could find some consensus right now, there would still be hundreds of thousands of individuals, if the current recession and record numbers of bankruptcies continue, who would not find any protection in that particular fund.

Indeed, the studies have shown that in commercial bankruptcies 30 per cent of them have wage claims that are left outstanding. The sooner that this type of protection is brought in, the better off it will be for thousands of Canadian workers right across this country.

In closing, I hope that by the time this committee gets to do the pre-study in the fall, we will see some signs of recovery, some signs of a change in this government's economic policies which caused this recession in the first place.

I hope that we will not be sitting here in this House in December after this bill is passed, knowing full well that because the bill did not come in earlier in the session and the wage earner protection fund did not kick in earlier, that another 40,000, 30,000 or 25,000 companies and individuals have declared bankruptcy. Another 10,000 or 20,000 wage earners have seen their hard earned investment in their companies go up in smoke.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I move that the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead be now heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Again, I remind hon. members that the Chair is bound by a House order adopted unanimously last night in this House. I recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

An hon. member: Point of order.

An hon. member: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I refer hon. members who want to raise a point of order to the Votes and Proceedings of the House, where the order that binds the Chair is recorded. It says:

> The Speaker shall recognize one speaker from each of the three recognized parties to speak for a period not to exceed ten minutes each.

So I have to follow that order, and I recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Gérin: On the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this is the bill that we waited 42 years to get into the House of Commons.

Successive Liberal governments refused to do anything about updating the Bankruptcy Act of 1949. They went through the recession of 1982, which was one of the worst downturns in economic activity in Canada, with thousands of bankruptcies.

Thousands of workers lost their jobs because of bankruptcies and received no compensation. We started into this recession brought on by this government and now we have gone through the worst of it. Today, they have the gall to stand up and say the r word.

Say the other r word, "recovery". The recession is dead. Here we have the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The fireman has now come to put out the fire. It is a towering inferno. He arrives at the fire with a stepladder and a garden hose.

The one positive thing I could say about this minister—I must say it—is that he is courageous. After all, he has been in this post longer than any other Conservative Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At seven months, that is an eternity. Finally, he has delivered, but what has he delivered?

An hon. member: A baby.

Mr. Rodriguez: No. He has delivered a mouse.

He has laboured hard and long, and we have waited with bated breath for this delivery. We were expecting a very modern bankruptcy act.

An hon. member: There is a mouse in the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Anyway, at least we have the bill before us. The bill will go to pre-study and as it goes to pre-study there are certain things about it that we want to examine. I welcome the minister's openness. He said he is prepared to take amendments. Let us see what some of those things are that we are concerned about.

First and foremost, we must be concerned about the compensation for workers who have lost their wages. I want to tell you that in 1949, $500 was what workers could get. In 1949 you could buy a car for $500.

An hon. member: And it would run, too.

Mr. Rodriguez: My friend, who is an expert on hidden car warranties, told me it would run. One could buy a car for $500. Why, $500 would be the down payment on a house in 1949.

The minister says he is updating the bill. One would think he would really update it. What does he tell us the maximum amount is that workers could get now in lost wages in a bankruptcy?

An hon. member: Tell us, John.

Mr. Rodriguez: In lost wages and vacation pay? Up to, no, no, not $10,000. No, no, not $8,000. No, it is $2,000. I mean $2,000.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: I did a bit of calculation and took $2,000 in today's dollars back to 1949, and do you know how much it is? It is $50. Yes, $50. In 1949 dollars it is $50.

This is a generous minister you see here, and he is not even generous with his own money. He is going to really make those big corporations pay, 10 cents a week per employee. Do you know how much money he projects to collect in this fund? Sixty-two million dollars.

An hon. member: And how do the banks make out, John?

Mr. Rodriguez: They are doing quite well in this. If you are a mom and pop operation with 10 employees, you pay 10 cents a person a week. If you are a big bank with 30,000 employees, you pay 10 cents a person a week. There is regressive taxation for you.

Pascals, which went into bankruptcy, would take 5 per cent of the fund right off the bat. There are thousands of Pascals that have been going bankrupt in the last little while. We have a problem with that. We have a problem with the fact that the minister decided he is not a fighter. This minister is not a fighter. He is a lover. That is what he is.

Let me explain before he thinks I am being dishonest here. The minister had a choice to make on this Bankruptcy Act. He could take on the big financial institutions of this country. He could have placed workers in a juridical position in terms of secured creditors. He could have put them at the front of the bus. What does he choose to do? He says: "No, I am not going to fight those big financial institutions".

They lobbied him. Do you know what he has done? He has put the workers into a little fund, $62 million in the fund, and he did not fight for the workers in terms of their position on the scale. We have a problem with that. We want you to explain why you did that.

This fund, for all of Canada, is $62 million. Ontario alone has put aside $175 million for the wage loss program, $175 million. You got the surplus in the GST. Why do you not go there and take $100 million and put it in? Why do you not go there? Why do you go to small businesses and put another tax on them? Why do you tax small business? All you know how to do is tax, tax, tax. All the Tory backbenchers are saying: "Oh, we have to lower taxation". I hear an election on the horizon. It is not going to do. We have to look at that.

We have a problem. The minister says we are going to protect suppliers. Company a supplies company b with materials on June 1. Company b goes bankrupt on June 15 so company a has until June 30 to go and get the supplies that it delivered there on June 1.

Now the question is: What happens if company b goes bankrupt on June 29? It was supplied with the materials on June 1 and it goes bankrupt on June 29. Company a has one day, and it gets even more interesting. What if b goes bankrupt on June 30 early in the morning? There is no time for a to go and get his material. What if he arrives at the place and his materials are hanging from the ceiling? Is he allowed to remove them?

An hon. member: Exactly.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, he is not. We have problems with that.

The bill is not retroactive, particularly for workers. There is no retroactivity. We have come through the worst part of the recession. This bill will not get passed till some time in the fall, so all of the victims of this government's inept economic policies have all gone by the wayside. There is no retroactivity in the bill, so we have a problem with that.

We have a problem with the taxation to small business. This is another tax on small business. No matter how you cut it, no matter how you twist it, it is a taxation on small business.

Then the minister says he is going to tie this into the unemployment insurance program. This one we have to explore because the UI Act says any moneys received from an employer have to be counted as income. We have to see how these two things relate.

Last, but by no means least, we are concerned about the ripple effect. The minister says that at some point maybe the provinces will have also to pay into this fund and probably the municipalities. The municipalities can only get their money from one group of people, and that is from taxpayers, homeowners. We have a problem with that.

While I welcome the fact that you have actually brought in a bill and that it is going to go to study, I want to say to the minister that I hope he is going to be as open-minded in terms of amendments, when we get into the discussion of the bill, as he has been when he wanted us to give support for this matter to go for study.

I hope he will maintain the same generous spirit, brother, when we get down to the short strokes.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Consequently, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs is authorized to proceed with the preliminary study of Bill C-22. An Act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, as reported without amendment from Legislative Committee F.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that you will find, if you examine the amendments which have been put forward with respect to report stage of this bill, that they are all in my name. I would like to withdraw all those motions, with the exception of Motion No. 9, which I would like to continue to have stand.

Let me read the motion to you, then, that would continue to stand:

> That Bill C-9 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 6 to 13 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:
> "(3) When a regulation under this Act is changed during the 95-day period referred to in subsection 2 above, such regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least 30 days before the proposed effective date thereof".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So, the Chair takes into account the request made by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Pursuant to the order of Tuesday June 18, the Speaker will now recognize one speaker from each the three recognized parties to speak for a period not to exceed 10 minutes each, following which the Speaker shall fortwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of said bill.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Deblois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the order of the House, from last night, in the middle of the night, must be taken integrally. Now that you have accepted the motion of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, you must allow all the other members, including the independent members, to take the floor.

Mr. Speaker, it is undemocratic that the whips of three parties exclude the independent members, including those of the Bloc Quebecois.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that he should be careful and use a parliamentary language that is in accordance with tradition.

That being said, Motion No. 9, to which the member for Essex—Windsor is referring to, is part of the report of the committee. It is not necessary here to get anybody's approval.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. To my knowledge, this report belongs to the House and the decision rests with the House and not mutual agreements concluded between the three parties last night, without the knowledge of Canadians.

I request a declaration from the House on that issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion proposed by the member for Essex—Windsor is in accordance with the rules, but the debate on this motion must take place according to the order which is binding for the Chair and which is in the proceedings.

Consequently, I recognize, pursuant to the order, one speaker from each of the recognized parties.

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question put to you and for which we request a ruling does not have to do with those who will take the floor. We know that ourselves; we read the order and we saw the gimmick. That is not what the question is about.

We want to know if a member can withdraw a motion, like that, without unanimous consent. That is what I want to know.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize, but we are dealing with technicalities and, once again, the member for Essex-Windsor—I may have used the wrong wording—has not moved a new motion. He is simply indicating that, in the series of motions on the Order Paper, he is only keeping motion no 9.

In that regard, we are authorized, at the report stage, to recognize only three speakers on the motion kept.

• (1900)

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, that is not the point. According to the rules of this House, we have to put forthwith every question necessary, to dispose of proceedings not only those indicated by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. We want to vote on and dispose of every question and motion before the House, Mr. Speaker. That is the question I raise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. We are again dealing with technicalities. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor has only given notice of his motions. He has not introduced them yet. The hon. member just pointed out to Motion No. 9, and I must say about this motion and all other questions that have to be disposed of on this Bill, that I am bound under the rules of this House to recognize one member of each of the three officially recognized parties.

Mr. Steven W. Langton (Essex—Windsor): I move: Motion No. 9

That Bill C-9 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 6 to 13 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) When a regulation under this Act is changed during the ninety-five day period referred to in subsection (2) above, such regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least thirty days before the proposed effective date thereof."

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret, but, pursuant to Standard Order 30(6), since it is 7 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

ACCOUNTING OF USE OF RESOURCES

On the Order: Private Members' Business

May 16, 1991—That, in the opinion of this House, the government should require each government department and agency to include in their budget submissions an accounting of the use of resources whose use or disposal has an impact on the environment and annual targets for reduction and to report any associated cost savings.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa-West is not available at the moment. I would then ask that the motion—

—be left in its order of precedence, retain its precedence in the Order Paper and accordingly we are unable to proceed with private members' hour at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the member was here a few minutes ago. I do not know if she had something urgent to attend to, but I myself am prepared for this motion. I was advised of it this morning, and I am now ready to proceed with my speech.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, according to Standing Order 42, I think if the government is willing to accede to the request that comes from the official opposition it can be granted by the Chair. We would suggest that it keep its order of precedence. We make such a request.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to refer the hon. members to section 42(1) of the Standing Orders. It is stated that: Questions put by members and notices of motions, not taken up when called may (upon the request of the government) be allowed to stand and retain their precedence.

Since, that is the case of motion 473, the government just called the motion will stand.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like for you to explain the meaning of the expression "not taken up". For myself, I am ready to take it up, I am ready to speak, I am available.

Mr. Allmand: But she is not even here to move the motion!

Mr. Lapierre: Someone could do it for her. She was here just three minutes ago.

Mr. Rocheleau: That is what we call cohabitation!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. To open consideration of a motion, the mover must be present in the House to introduce it. The member knows as well as I that it is not the case.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME (MONEY LAUNDERING) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-9, an Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, as reported without amendment from a legislative committee, and the motion of Mr. Langdon (p. 2111).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, considering that we gained an hour by not dealing with private members' business because the member was hiding, I move that the House do now adjourn until 8 o'clock, to allow members to see to their business, which could prove more interesting for Quebecers than what is going on now.

I move that the House stands adjourned until 8 o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. As you know, the Chair is bound by the Order of Business as set out in the Order Paper which provides for extended hours to 10.52 tonight. Since there is no other private member's business according to notices on the Order Paper, I have no choice but to pass on to the next order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, would it be possible for a member, me for instance, to move Mrs. Catterall's motion, given her absence?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Lapierre: You are not the Speaker!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting 20 minutes. We now start to look at the question of money laundering which Bill C-9 deals with. Bill C-9 is an important piece of legislation which requires financial institutions to keep the various paper records which will be essential in the tracing of money laundering operations associated with organized crime.

• (1910)

This attempt to deal with money laundering more effectively is certainly something that we in the New Democratic Party support. We were especially pleased to be able to persuade the government in the course of the previous session of Parliament that it was important in a bill such as this, which leaves so much of the details of what will take place to regulation, to see to it that regulations would not be put into effect until there had been a period of at least 90 days after their publication in the Canada Gazette, during which time people would be able to make presentations to the government with respect to those regulations.

We feel that is an important precedent for future pieces of legislation which have the same reliance on regulations as Bill C-9 does.

We also feel, and I gather that the government is in agreement with us now on this point, that if during that 90-day period there is a change in those regulations which leads to a different set of regulations being put out within that 90-day period for reflection and representation, it shall then be possible still to have a further 30 days for those people who were prepared to accept and to live with the previous regulation to be able to adjust to the regulation change, and to be able to make representations with respect to the change and so on and so forth.

The recommendations which came first to the government for this extended 90-day period and subsequently, were presented to a legislative committee which reviewed this bill, came from the Canadian Bar Association. They represent an important principle in the view of the Bar Association that you should not have regulations put into effect without some period of possibility for dealing with those regulations and responding to those regulations on the part of those who will be affected by the regulations.

We would have preferred to move this particular amendment at the legislative committee stage, but some mix-ups in communication at that stage made it impossible to do so and so we have moved it at report stage on the basis of the representations made to us during the legislative committee hearings by the Canadian Bar Association. It felt this legislation should not proceed without this further 30-day period if there is a change in regulations as a consequence of representations during the 90-day period allowed with respect to the original regulations set out.

With this change, which I understand the government is prepared to accept, there is the possibility that it will be moving a subamendment which will put this particular amendment into conformity with the original piece of legislation; making it 90 days as opposed to 95 days. We would support and accept this change. We think that this now represents a good piece of legislation.

It is a piece of legislation which will make it easier for our police forces to deal with money laundering associated with drug trafficking and with other forms of money laundering. We think it is an important step for the government to be taking. We are pleased that step is being taken as part of a broad series of moves on the part of various countries throughout the world to try to get better control over money laundering in order to deal with the serious problems which it represents and which drug trafficking represents to our society, to our children, and to the world itself.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I will be taking 10 minutes.

I want to thank the members on the legislative committee for their co-operation. We had a good hearing and we heard some very interesting witnesses. It was the feeling of the members that we could move along and bring this to the House in report stage, get it through report stage and third reading at this sitting.

I am sincerely thankful to the members of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party for their co-operation and assistance. It is an example of how we can work together when we really want to.

As the member for Essex—Windsor has said, this is a very important bill and is part of the drug strategy that we have in Canada. We also have an agreement with the G-7 nations to try and track the money laundering or money that is used or acquired in the sale of illegal drugs. It is also part of a United Nations' initiative which is going to grow into, I believe, a very, very important strategy on the part of various governments to control the funds acquired through the sale of illegal drugs.

The member for Essex—Windsor moved Motion No. 9, and I, as he has indicated, intend to amend Motion No. 9 as follows:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the word "95" and substituting therefor, the word "90".

As the member for Essex—Windsor indicated, this will bring Motion 9, which amends C-9, into conformity with the bill.

I think that is about all I can say on it. It is an interesting bill. We had some good briefings from the Canadian bankers, the RCMP and others. I think the initial co-operation of members to pass the bill with a speaker from each party and with the speed with which it was dealt in committee shows the will of the members to get this bill into law as fast as we can.

• (1920)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-9 and the amendments put forward by my colleague from the New Democratic Party.

The bill before us would provide for the tracking of money laundering in Canada by requiring Canadian financial institutions to comply with bookkeeping requirements.

The draft regulations published with the bill indicate that any transaction of $10,000 or more would be recorded. The penalties for a violation of the provisions of this legislation would range from fines of $50,000 to $500,000 and prison terms from six months to five years.

As it has been noted by the government, my party has been supportive of the basic aims and intentions of the government with regard to combating and laundering of proceeds of crime. The bill builds on the so-called freeze and seize legislation, Bill C-61, which in addition to giving new powers to both the courts and the police to seize crime proceeds, created the offensive money laundering.

Money laundering is a process by which illegal profits are transformed through financial markets and to legitimate—

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: I would like to have quorum in the House so that I can give a speech that the Canadian people appreciate, but not the hon. members it seems. So, I am calling for a quorum count.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is quorum. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his concern.

As I was saying earlier, money laundering is the process by which illegal profits are transformed through financial markets into legitimate funds serving to obscure the real identity of the real owners of the funds and to obscure the nature and the source of these funds.

These activities are being pursued on an international scale and there has been a move afoot in the G-7 and other international forums to develop domestic programs and encourage co-operation to combat this program.

There is little question that a fundamental part of any attempt to control and combat the smuggling of illegal drugs must be the development of effective monitoring and evidence gathering systems in the laundering of drug profits.

There has been general consensus in this country for some time that there are great shortcomings in Canada's financial reporting laws. It has been because of these shortcomings, coupled with our proximity to major drug routes and our large, open border with the United States, that Canada has gained a reputation world-wide as an easy and safe place to launder the profits of illegal activities.

In testimony to the legislative committee studying the bill before us, RCMP officials confirmed that the problem of money laundering in Canada has indeed been a large one. In fact, over $1 billion a year is laundered in Canada through illegal drug practices.

What this has meant is that police agencies, once having identified someone believed to be engaged in criminal activities, were severely hampered in the collection of evidence that might help convict these people. As such, we are very eager on this side of the House for this government to bring down legislation that will correct these matters.

After the disappointment with the government's first attempt in the last session with Bill C-89, we are considerably more satisfied with the bill before us today. We are pleased that the government has given consideration to the shortcomings of the previous bill brought to the attention of this House by members on this side of the House.

The draft regulations accompanying the bill are also an improvement. There are now definitions of cash and of the nature of the records that must be kept. There is still some concern however in our party that too much is left to regulation. As such, the operation of this legislation could change dramatically without being brought before this House, again requiring only an Order in Council.

We do understand the need as was articulated in the committee for flexibility in such a moving area. We recognize that, as many people are engaged in money laundering activities, they are very quick to find and exploit any loophole in the law. We must be just as quick to stop them from doing this.

There also remains a concern that the recording of large transactions will be extended to overseas branches of Canadian banks. We know, for instance, that there is a significant amount of money laundering activity going on in the Caribbean. It is our hope that this will not provide for the significant undermining of our efforts. We are pleased that more countries are joining the effort to curb laundering activities at this time.

I will leave it at that, but I would just like to leave you with a note. We want to send a message to this government and to the people who would do these illegal activities in our country. We as parliamentarians will not stand for this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, June 18, 1991, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of Bill C-9, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Kempling.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: I would like to defer the vote until 9.45 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Stop the bells now. Pursuant to Standing Order 40(5)(a), the division stands deferred until 9.45 p.m. tonight.

And the bells having stopped:

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, there are precedents. Once the bells have started ringing—You know full well, ask your old colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Neilsen. We have been through that bell ringing before, Mr. Speaker. Members were called in. You cannot stop that, we are not in a lawless place, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, once the bells start ringing, I think we cannot stop them. Maybe you could indicate how you go about having them stopped.

• (1930)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the rules are very explicit about that.

An hon. member: Which rule?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Standing Order 45(5(a), page 27, latest edition.

> (5)(a) When the Speaker has put the question on any debatable motion, including any votable Opposition motion on an allotted day— except as provided pursuant to section (3) of this Standing Order, the bells to call in the Members shall be sounded for not more than thirty minutes—

And carefully note this:

> —provided that, while the Members are being called in, either the Chief Government Whip or the Chief Opposition Whip may approach the Speaker to request that the division be deferred—

This is what I have just noticed.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, you are right. Standing Orders state it clearly. But we are now told the division will take place at 9.45 p.m., if I am not mistaken. Can the Chief Government Whip guarantee that the Prime Minister's party, which is being held at 24 Sussex Drive, while Canadians go hungry, will be finished at—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! That was no point of order.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of report stage of Bill C-2, An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act, on which Legislative Committee C reported without amendment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order made Tuesday, June 18, 1991, the Chair will now recognize one member from the government party, two members from the Official Opposition, and one member from the New Democratic Party to speak for a period of time not to exceed 10 minutes each, following which the Speaker shall put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of report stage and third reading of Bill C-2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask you permission to speak, because Bill C-2 relates to the National Capital—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I remind the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer that the Chair is bound by an order of the House unanimously agreed to by the members present and that, after having recognized each of the members named in the motion, if the House unanimously agrees, I will be pleased to recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the whips can agree for their own party, but they cannot agree for independent members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not a point of order. The hon. member knows very well that there is an order of this House and that the Chair is bound by it.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent on the Speaker of this House to protect the rights to the minority members. Independent members have the right to speak and I have the right to protect—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I will point out again that this matter was resolved several hours ago. The Chair is bound by an order agreed in front of the whole population by the members present in this House. I recognize the honourable whip of the government.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise for a few moments to speak on Bill C–2. As members know, my constituency is the constituency of Calgary West.

For some time now one of the smaller units of the National Energy Board has been located in the riding of Calgary West and in fact is housed at the present time in the same building as my constituency office.

This piece of legislation in terms of western Canada, the provinces of Alberta and Calgary in particular, has symbolic significance of great importance. We lived through a very difficult time some years ago with the National Energy Program which had some very difficult consequences for our community and our part of the country. That is where the symbolism comes in, the transfer of the National Energy Board to Calgary has a symbolic flavour.

Perhaps of more importance in the longer term is the fact that it will reduce the costs consumers ultimately have to pay for the provision of energy in this country. The location of the board in the city of Calgary really signifies the fact that 90 per cent of the work done by the board and those who are petitioners before the board involve firms in the city of Calgary. This will cut down enormously on their travel costs, food costs, airline tickets and so on, and ultimately any business expense ends up being paid for by consumers.

This move, while a bit costly in its initial phase, will have long-term consequences over the decades and will reduce those costs to the consumers of the future. It is a sound business proposition. It has symbolic importance, particularly in this year when we are so engaged and will be engaged in the 12 months ahead on national unity issues. That symbolic importance for the good of this nation through its willingness to stay together cannot be underestimated. I guess if there is a negative side to it, we know and we feel badly for some of the families that feel they cannot travel to Calgary. It would be lovely if they could. They would enjoy it and their children would prosper in that part of the world, but there are families with two incomes, with two jobs and there are difficulties in many cases caused to families in the Ottawa region.

The provisions to assist those people in securing employment with the Government of Canada in this region are also an important part of the plan of the government so that the disruption to families is minimized as much as possible.

In closing, I just want to say to the National Energy Board on behalf of the people who live in my riding, the people who live in my city, the people who live in my province and the people who live in western Canada, welcome, we will treat you well. The country will be better off when this piece of legislation is proclaimed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I am asking for your help because I see that the Minister who moved the motion is not present in this House, and since there is no Member of the Cabinet in this House, it is out of order that we should continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to point out to the hon. member that no member should mention the presence or the absence of any member in this House.

Mr. Gérin: But the Minister is not here!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If you remember, a moment ago, I simply said that the custom is that the member moving a private member's motion has to be in the House to move his or her motion. That is why we then had to make this observation.

However, more generally, the House rules provide that we should not mention the presence or the absence of a member in this House.

Mr. Gérin: Very well, Mr. Speaker. But the Minister did not present his bill. There is no Minister here and the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but I think hon. members are questioning the Chair's ruling, which is not allowed by our rules.

The hon. member for Ottawa West.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I know it is getting late but I really did need to speak on this bill. I have just been through the rather unpleasant and difficult experience of sitting on the legislative committee on Bill C–2 and it was once again a demonstration that the government is prepared to use its majority power either in the House or in committee to override any sense of good democratic process.

The government has had this bill in hand in committee since May 23, 1991.

It was only last week, over three weeks later, on June 18 that the committee finally convened to consider who it would invite as witnesses. Having sat on the bill for three weeks, the government members on the committee used their majority to ensure that the committee would complete its business less than 48 hours later. What it essentially said was there are witnesses who want to be heard from, but unless they can come to its beck and call within the next 36 hours, the committee is not going to hear from them.

As a result, many of those employees to whom the member just referred, who are affected by this decision of the government to move the National Energy Board, were unable to appear either individually or through their union representative and present their concerns about this bill, some suggestions which they felt should be considered by the government and possibly even in the legislation.

There was ample time for the committee to hear from witnesses and conclude its business in time for this House to deal with this bill before the recess. However, members were adamant that they would not sit at all on a Friday or on Thursday evening or on Monday to hear from people whose lives are being disrupted and changed with very little warning and very little notice.

The committee was able to hear, excuse me, chose to hear from only one representative of employees representing the small component, the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. The Energy, Mines and Resources component of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Council of Canadians and numerous others that had written to the minister indicating their interests in this bill and their opposition to this bill were not allowed to come before the legislative committee.

Many of my own constituents could have come had the committee in time given any indication, had the government members of the committee in time given any indication that they would not hear from the duly elected union representatives of those employees. They did not, and therefore people were denied the opportunity to present to the members of this Parliament their concerns and ways in which those concerns could have been remedied.

There is a lot of playing with words in this. It was very interesting during the course of discussions to find out that this government has no decentralization policy. It was very interesting to find out that it does but it does not. We asked very specifically, and the information I have from the Treasury Board is this: "The decentralization program no longer exists." The decentralization policy does not apply. On the other hand, the next paragraph says: "For some time the Treasury Board has been working to eliminate the decentralization policy".

You may ask: what difference does this make to this bill and to these employees? The change in location of the National Energy Board affects over 300 employees. If this were being handled properly, as the decentralization should be, the employees would be given up to a year's notice of their move. They would be given an extended period of time in which to maintain a residence here, travel back and forth, and adjust their family life to their new situation.

Because the policy is not being followed by this government, people are being forced to make choices to either separate their families or not move with the board. The result is that the board is losing some very competent and capable people. I think that is a shame, but I think it is more of a shame that the federal government is not living by its own policy, which says one year notice to employees.

We all know that this has been extremely rushed and as a result it is extremely expensive, and I will come to that in a moment. The announcement was made in the budget on February 26 without the knowledge of the chairman of the board of the National Energy Board and without, I am told, the knowledge of the minister. As late as the end of April people did not know the conditions under which they were being asked to move, they did not know what expenses would be paid or what would await them in Calgary, but they were asked to make a decision within less than three weeks as to whether they wished to uproot their family and move halfway across the country. That is not a fair and just way to treat people.

The minister, when he appeared before the committee, referred to fair and equitable treatment of all employees. I want to acknowledge that the minister seemed genuinely surprised when he found out that all employees were not being treated equally and were not being treated fairly, that some employees in the management category were being treated with much more compassion, with much more respect and with very special privileges compared to the rest of the employees of the National Energy Board.

I urged the minister during the hearings, and I urge him again, to ensure that the equity and fairness he referred to in his presentation to the committee are respected and that people are treated with compassion and concern for their individual lives.

Unfortunately, the minister chose to use the opportunity to make some rather unfortunate comments about public servants and I want to refer to them because I do not think that was appropriate. The attitude on the other side of the House seems to be that if people choose not to go with the Energy Board it is because they are not loyal to their employer or because they somehow have something against Calgary. Nothing could be further from the truth.

People have reasons why they are unable to relocate when a government job relocates. It is entirely inappropriate for the minister to say things like: "To put it bluntly, I have very little time for public servants who, with emphasis on service, somehow feel it is their great gift to the Canadian public if they are located in Ottawa". That is not the case at all. People were hired here. They have established families here. There were many particular cases we heard over the course of the hearings which indicate why people will choose not to move.

The kind of special treatment the management category is getting is very effective because 75 per cent of the management category is going while—and I think this should be a real concern—only one-third of the scientific and technical category is going and less than 10 per cent of some of the support staff.

That very clearly indicates that this move has a discriminatory and much more significant effect on women employees of the board, and I think the board needs to address that.

The other concern is the move to special employer status. Unfortunately the chair of the committee ruled out of order an addition to the bill which would have protected employees during the transition to special employer status. Again I urge the minister, having not agreed to that amendment so it could be incorporated in the bill, to have a look at truly meeting the obligation of fairness to employees of the board, as he stated.

The member who spoke previously said that this will save money. In fact it will cost $26 million and there has been no cost benefit study done, so he has no way of knowing whether it will save money or whether it will cost more money. It will definitely cost more money to hire employees. The board will have to pay up to $15,000 extra for many of their employees to compete with the market in Calgary, and that is the reason for applying for special employer status.

I would encourage the member to stick to the facts, to withdraw any suggestion that he knows this will save money, when he knows no such thing. In fact, the cost is $26 million, some of which will be paid by the industry. However, as the member has said, that portion will end up on the oil, gas or coal bill of every consumer in Canada.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say, first of all, that I share the concerns of the member for Ottawa West. Second, I have nothing significant to add to the remarks I made at second reading or to the remarks made by my colleague, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan at second reading. The concerns we have for the employees of the board stand. However, on balance we support the bill.

Having noted that, I would like in the interest of fairness and balance to seek the unanimous consent of the House to turn my remaining time over to the member for Hull—Aylmer so that he may speak about the effect of the move on his constituents.

• (1950)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I understand the hon. member. Does the House give its unanimous consent to hear the member of the Bloc Quebecois?

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak today on Bill C-2, an Act to amend the National Energy Board Act, a government bill to move the National Energy Board from Ottawa to Calgary.

I think it is absolutely abominable, Mr. Speaker, that the government should want to transfer anything out of the National Capital Region, all the way across the country. Especially not these days. Today, we have heard the President of Treasury Board announce that he does not want to hear about salary increases for public servants unless they are at 3 per cent at the most.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask you to enforce the Rules of this House. We find it very hard to hear the excellent speaker, the hon. member because our colleagues on the other side are chatting right and left and their voices cover almost everything else. From my place, all I can hear is their murmur.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I can tell the hon. member that I hear voices from both sides of the house while he is speaking.

I recognize the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester again.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kind.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, the hon. members of this House are supposed to remain in their respective places.

An hon. member: Only for the votes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): What the hon. member means is that members of this House can only speak from their place in the House. But the Rules of the House provide nothing on the matter as far as other periods are concerned.

So, the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Bellemare: Again, Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I also thank my colleagues of the Bloc Quebecois who are kind enough to want to hear what I have to say. They really believe that the government is wrong in presenting this bill. I would like for them to do me the courtesy of listening to me for at least a few minutes and not interrupt me for the fourth or fifth time.

They could try. Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board announced today that salary negotiations were now over as far as he was concerned and that, contrary to what had been said, the maximum raise public servants can expect in not 3 per cent but 0 per cent.

Now, public servants will have to accept a 0 per cent maximum raise this year so that none of them is laid off. Mr. Speaker, he gave as an excuse the yearly big deficits but especially the huge and disastrous national debt which is now nearing $400 billion. A few hours later, the governement was trying hastily to spend a lot of money to transfer an entire government unit to Calgary.

I am clearly under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the government has not moved in this case by reasons of efficiency and efficacy but strictly by political reasons. It is evident when talking with government members who do not represent the Capital Region, and sometimes I ask myself if they care for it, if they would rather transfer every good public servant to be found in the capital anywhere else in Canada. The government members give everyone the impression that all the public servants are to be found in Ottawa. Rarely have I met a member who knows that less than a third of the federal public servants live or work in this region. So that means that more than two thirds work elsewhere in Canada. There is a report on the Public Service.

[English]

"Key statistics on Federal Public Service Work Force, 1990"

[Translation]

And this tells us that, in 1990, all these 218,328 employees were proportionally distributed according to the population of each province. I note the province of Alberta which has 6.1 per cent of the public service work force. I notice here that the province of Quebec has 14 per cent and Ontario 16 per cent to be added to a third already in the capital region, divided between Hull and Ottawa.

In the discussions with the Public Service, we are also reminded that they are trying to reach a proportion which would be fair for women, men and visible minorities. Two hundred and seventy-three civil servants will be asked to leave the national capital region, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering what for. Thirty per cent of these civil servants are French-speaking people who live either on the Quebec or on the Ontario side. These families will now be forced to live in Calgary, a wonderful place which is extremely friendly, I have been there. I know some people and I have friends who work there. However, the majority of the people who work in Calgary—I would even say practically everybody at the present time—are people who really want to live in Calgary and make it their home. But presently, some families are going to be torn apart.

Several civil servants belong to families where both husband and wife are working. They both work to pay for their home, their mortgage and all the family related expenses. What protection is the government going to offer in the case an employee who is moved to Calgary if his or her spouse cannot find a job? What protection? None. In the case of children, are there any French schools? I am told that yes, there are some. As we know very well, here in the National Capital area, some people prefer either the Quebec school system or the Ontario school system. Only on the Ontario side, there is a choice between French public schools and French Catholic schools. Is there such a choice over there? What about the choice of doctors for example, when people are used to having a family doctor? Will French-speaking families enjoy health services in French? Will they have access to professional legal services in French? Will they have a French community centre? Will they be able to live in French, if they want to?

Families will be torn apart, Mr. Speaker. For all the 273 families that will have to be transferred, there are young people who are 16 to 21 years old and do not want to leave the area they live in, the house they live in; as a former educator, I am sure many of those young men and women will want to stay in the National Capital area, and this will tear families apart.

• (2000)

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it does not make sense to move the National Energy Board to Alberta even if 80 per cent of all oil and gas activity takes place there. It is easy to forget about activities related to electric power elsewhere and other energy products the National Energy Board has to deal with.

Another impact of the move, Mr. Speaker, will be considerable travel costs between Calgary and Ottawa because the National Energy Board officers will have to come here for meetings with directors, administrators and ministers responsible like the energy minister. I tell you they will end up with two head offices in no time.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

In putting the bill now before us you noted that the agreed upon allotment was a 10-minute speech by a member of the government, two 10-minute speeches by members of the Official Opposition, and a 10-minute speech by the New Democrat opposition.

That 10-minute speech by a New Democrat opposition member has not been made. I spoke for two minute at the most.

An hon. member: It was the best speech of your life.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Why, thank you. I would like, therefore, to seek unanimous consent of the House to allot the remaining time from that New Democrat allotment to the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, that he may voice the concerns of his constituents in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Hawkes: Members of the government agree.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Edmonton-East, from the New Democratic Party, for giving up a few minutes of his time to allow me to support the federal civil servants in the National Capital Region, on the Quebec side.

Mr. Speaker, as we can see tonight, a lot of bills are being pushed through at the end of this session, without Canadians, especially in the National Capital, being aware of them.

Mr. Speaker, under Bill C–2, almost 300 employees of the National Energy Board will be relocated to Calgary, and they either take it or leave it. As stipulated in the bill, Mr. Speaker, from now on, these civil servants will have to reside in, or within a reasonable commuting distance of Calgary.

Mr. Speaker, for several months now, we have seen civil servants leaving the National Capital Region, and especially the Outaouais, for various parts of the world.

Mr. Speaker, if that is the kind of decentralization the government has to offer to the provinces, if that is the kind of decentralization which is supposed to satisfy Quebec, and all Quebecers, we do not want any of it! Within the National Capital Region, on the Quebec side, there are 26,000 civil servants. A few hours ago, we took away their job security, Mr. Speaker. A few hours ago, we gave the President of the Treasury Board the right to eliminate the persons–years principle, and authorized managers to transfer employees.

Mr. Speaker, how many of these measures will the government apply from now on, and who will get hurt? The federal civil servants, that's who. In closing, I want to say that this is an intolerable situation for the Outaouais and all of Quebec. If that is how you intend to ensure national unity, Mr. Speaker, I feel very sorry for you. Mr. Speaker, the president of the Treasury Board mentioned earlier that he would most likely pass a bill if civil servants decide to go on strike when the timing is right. This is a decision they already made. What did the minister tell us tonight? That he would pass a bill precluding any strike in the public service.

Mr. Speaker, this a shameful dictatorial attitude towards federal civil servants. This a totally unacceptable way to deal with those civil servants. I have to speak for my fellow citizens in the Outaouais Quebecois, because none of the 67 Quebec members of the government said a single word tonight to protect a single job in this area. This is the kind of government we have. It reminds me a bit of Christmas Eve, when you open presents under the Christmas tree. The only difference is that there is no gift for the Outaouais Quebecois. They are transferring employees one by one, and these will soon be discharged. That is the way you deal with your civil servants.

Mr. Speaker, never in the history of Canada did a government trample on his employees the way this government does. There are 26,000 public servants in Quebec who are worried because they think Quebec will become a sovereign State in 1992 because Quebec is not satisfied with federal propositions after the Meech Lake rejection. Mr. Speaker those same public servants who clung to employment security with the federal government just lost that security tonight. I say this to the public servants on the Quebec side of the Outaouais and also to those on the Ontario side of the National Capital area, because the whole area will be affected by that move. It is not only the people from the Outaouais who will lose their jobs, but also people from Ottawa, Nepean, Gloucester and Carleton, people from Buckingham, Aylmer and Hull, people from all over the National Capital area.

I see those whited sepulchres opposite looking at us and laughing as if it were funny to cut jobs here and transfer them to the riding of the Chief Whip of the Government of Canada. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is another hard blow. After getting involved in education in Quebec, in professional training, in regional development, today they are depriving us of our jobs on both sides of the Ottawa area.

Mr. Speaker, nearly 300 employees will have to move to Calgary, and but the worst of it is that Canadians who have been asked to tighten their belt will now have almost $30 million for unfairly transfering those public servants who are now working here. If they do not want to go, they will get kicked out. A little pay cheque and then out.

Mr. Speaker, I find that absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. Pronovost: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint–Maurice is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer has really taken off on a flight of oratory, but before we have a work accident in this House, I would invite him to remove from his jacket the knife from the parliamentary restaurant and the fork that everybody can see—

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I did have a knife. It is the knife the Conservatives use to cut jobs in the Outaouais. That is the knife, Mr. Speaker, and here is the gag that the Conservatives stuffed in our mouths tonight in this House.

• (2010)

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I will ask the House of Commons, I will ask all members who are here, even though, unfortunately, there are not many, if empty seats could talk, they would not say a word.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order of Tuesday June 18, 1991, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of Bill C-2, An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion on the bill at the report stage?

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Gérin: It is Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, Mr. Speaker, but it is a neighbouring riding, a very scenic rural riding in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I note that there was a minister to move the motion, but that there was none to second it. Therefore, I think that we should simply reject this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Canadians are getting a course on the rules of the House, this evening. I remind the House that it is not necessary for such a motion to be seconded by a minister.

I ask the question again. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to see this vote deferred until 9.45 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, all day you have reminded us how important are the motions carried last night.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. members that Standing Order 45(5)a) authorizes the government whip to request that the division be deferred. I am only following the Standing Orders.

Therefore, at the request of the whip, I defer the division until 9:45 p.m. On a point of order, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal your decision and ask that the question be put forwith, in accordance to the order that was carried in secret last night.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have two comments to make. First of all, nothing was done in secret, and I want to say to the people who are watching us on T.V. that the proceedings of the House of Commons are public, that they take place in front of the T.V. cameras, d'un océan à l'autre.

Moreover, the question was put forthwith. You have to understand that it is the recorded division that was deferred. But the question was put and, in accordance with the Standing Orders, I have no other choice but to defer the division until 9.45 p.m., as requested by the whip.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find there have been discussions among the parties and that there is unanimous consent to permit me to introduce a private member's bill regarding a National Solidarity Day for the First Nations of Canada.

Some hon. members: agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

NATIONAL SOLIDARITY DAY FOR THE FIRST NATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): moved for leave to introduce Bill C-268, an act respecting a National Solidarity Day for the First Nations of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, let me take this occasion to thank all of my colleagues for this generosity. I am simply requesting that a bill be introduced and read a first time. It is called, an act respecting a National Solidarity Day for the First Nations of Canada.

It says: "Throughout Canada, in each and every year, June 21 shall be known under the name of Aboriginal Solidarity Day". I will consider this to be first reading of this bill.

I do not seek time for further discussion, but as the clerks are looking for the bill at this unexpected time for introducing private members' bills, may I just ask the members present, if it be appropriate, that we simply deem to have read the bill a first time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. So that there is no misunderstanding later on, the chief government Whip has asked that the vote be postponed to 9.45 p.m. He has just asked for another vote to take place at 9.45 p.m. I think he should revise what he just said to make sure that we do not have a debate on which vote will take place at 9.45 p.m.

He should tell us how you intend to proceed. You should make your wishes very clear to the House. It is regular, but I want to make sure that we do not have a useless debate when we arrive to vote.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the most common practice of the House with a deferral is that the first deferral would be the first item voted on. If there is a second deferral at the same time, it would be the second item, and so on. The series would be in that form.

The bill we just completed would be the second item in terms of report on third reading. The first deferral would be the first set of votes.

I thank the member for raising it because it is an important instruction to members. Some members may want to vote on some of these items and others may want to vote on other items.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken note of the interventions from both sides, and we will proceed with the successive votes on the various bills at 9.45 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons, as reported with amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order made Tuesday, June 18, 1991, the Chair will allow 30 minutes of debate at report stage and 30 minutes of debate at third reading, following which the Chair will put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of third reading of said bill.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in debate at report stage.

I would like to begin by putting on the floor two amendments. I would like to move these two amendments pursuant to the motion passed last night.

• (2020)

Perhaps I can read them into the record. I move:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-6 be amended in clause 2 by adding immediately after line 5, at page 2, the following:

"4.2 The Governor in Council shall not establish an Automatic Firearms Country Control List, or re-establish, amend or vary such a list so as to add a country to that list until

(A) the Minister has tabled in the House of Commons a certificate in respect of any country to be included in or added to an Automatic Firearms Country Control List stating that

(1) the country is reasonably required to be included or added to an Automatic Firearms Country Control List for purposes of Canada's national security;

(2) the inclusion or addition of the country in or to an Automatic Firearms Country Control List will enhance security in the region of that country;

(3) the country is not a country that is a threat to international peace and security;

(4) the country is not a country that is excessively armed; and

(5) the country is not a country using military armaments, or a country where there is a serious risk that such military armaments will be used to suppress human rights in breach of the United Nations Charter and the United Nations declarations and convention relating to such matters; and

(B) the inclusion or addition of a country referred to in paragraph (A) in or to an Automatic Firearms Country Control List has been approved by a resolution of the House of Commons."

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-6 be amended in Clause 3 by adding immediately after line 37, at page 2, the following:

"(C) a security impact assessment in respect of the export made by a committee of the House of Commons after the committee has conducted public hearings in respect of the export, concluding that the export will have a net positive security impact on Canada, has been tabled in the House of Commons".

I would so move both of these motions, seconded by the hon. member from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. If I may pass them to the clerk, I will then perhaps address a few minutes of remarks to the motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to rule the proposed amendments out of order because the motion was made last night between parties excluding, of course, the independent members who were not consulted. Today I understand the motion that was presented, I was not allowed to speak to the motion or the amendment, despite the fact that it is new. There was no way to know even, this morning or last night. So either the order is changed and I am allowed to take the floor to defend the interest of my constituents, or you reject the amendments as such.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, this motion was deliberately worded to allow 30 minutes. If the member would like to speak to the amendments, I think those who would like could shorten up a little to make sure that there is adequate time to respond to the amendments.

The government has no intention, unless there is time left over, of using any of the time that it might normally claim.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering what the chief government Whip is saying. Are there two standards? There was a government order that only government members and opposition members would be able to speak, and suddenly he is changing that order and there was not unanimous consent.

Could you make it clear to me, please, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to be very clear. It is said in the Votes and Proceedings, that there were 30 minutes for the debate at the report stage and 30 minutes of debate at third reading. There is no other restriction. So any member can take the floor during the 30 minute period.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, on that basis perhaps we can then proceed to debate the two motions that are on the floor.

The two motions deal with the following points. There are really three points embodied in the two motions. The first important point is that the first amendment would provide that the government will be bound by very specific criteria when it comes to consider adding countries to the Automatic Firearms Country Control List. Bill C-6 gives to the Governor in Council the right to establish an Automatic Firearms Country Control List, the result of which is that automatic firearms can then be exported to that country.

There is in place now a government policy that covers export permits in respect of weapons and military goods. The government has said in committee—and the hon. Minister for International Trade said it in committee—that the government would be bound by the policy which has been established by the government in deciding whether or not it is going to permit the export of automatic weapons. As well, the minister gave some very express words to the committee as to the policy that he or the government will follow in respect of adding countries to the list.

This amendment embodies precisely the requirements that the government says it will be bound by. Rather than leave it to the government, this amendment would have Parliament control the criteria applicable to adding countries to the list. The great significance of this is that we have here a very critical national policy as to whether we are going to get into the arms trade business with countries outside NATO and countries with which we have traditionally traded arms.

Saudi Arabia is the first in a slippery slope. There is a risk that governments will be tempted, for industrial policy reasons, to begin trading with Indonesia, South Korea, the Philippines, South Africa, who knows what countries, in the interests of furthering the industrial concerns of various constituencies. These criteria will prevent a government from changing, at whim, the policies that it wishes to follows, and we call on the government to consent and agree to that.

The second part of the amendment imposes a requirement that the list be approved by the House of Commons, that the list be made public and open to public debate. It would seem to me that the reasons for that are self-evident, because of what the government calls an anomaly in the Criminal Code. The government is being forced out in the open to debate the sale of light armoured vehicles, with automatic weapons attached, to Saudi Arabia. That debate has been very valuable, as we will see shortly. It is critically important, as a matter of public policy, that whenever the Automatic Firearms Country Control List is established, whenever countries are added to it, that that be a matter of public debate in this House and subject to the approval of the House.

The final point, and I will finish now, is that the amendment will require that before an export permit for prohibited weapons is issued, there will be a security impact assessment by a committee of the House of Commons. Again that is self-evident, similar to an environmental impact assessment. We believe that no sales of firearms or other weapons should take place around the world unless it is in the security interests of Canada.

It cannot be merely for the industrial interests of Canada. It must be for the security interests of Canada and consistent with those security interests. The idea of a security impact assessment was put to our legislative committee by Ernie Regehr of Project Ploughshares. It is a fine idea, one which is incorporated in this amendment, as are the other amendments. I would urge the House to adopt these policies.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The two motions presented by Mr. Brewin and seconded by Mr. Hovdebo will be debated together and voted on separately.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, these two amendments to Bill C-6 are substantially the same as two amendments which I presented to the bill while the bill was in committee, although I must say that my amendments were better drafted and more comprehensive. Nevertheless these amendments have substantially the same content and therefore I would support them.

• (2030)

Let me go on to say that these amendments, as well as the amendments I put forward in committee, are similar. The first amendment is similar to the government's policy on these questions, not legislation, but to its expressed policy.

Why then are we attempting to put the government's policy into legislation? The reason we are trying to do this, and the reason the hon. member is trying to do this, is that as the legislation is written it is too wide open. Through the legislation alone the government could in fact sell to a number of countries that many of us would not approve of.

For example, the legislation as written says that the government can sell these automatic firearms to any country that is on the Automatic Firearms Country Control List. It says that only those countries with which the government has an agreement for defence, research, development and production, can go on that list. At the present time, the government has 10 such agreements. Nine of the agreements are with NATO countries and the tenth one is with Sweden. At the present time, the government can only sell these automatic firearms to those 10 countries, but not necessarily to those 10 countries.

The problem is that the government can conclude further agreements on defence research and so on with countries and there are no guidelines, no criteria to stop it from developing, let us say, from concluding agreements with countries all around the world, some of whom are involved in conflict, some of whom have serious human rights violations.

The government has a policy—it is not in this legislation—that it will not sell arms or that it will consider very seriously selling arms to countries that are involved in conflict, either international or internal conflict, or it will consider very seriously selling arms to countries that have serious human rights violations.

We think these are good policy criteria, but we want those policy criteria included in the legislation. That is what I attempted to do in committee, and it was defeated by the government members. Now the hon. member is attempting to do the same thing at report stage. I think that is a good thing.

The response of the government, when we tried to do that in committee, was that this would make it too inflexible for the government. We say that is correct. It will make it too inflexible for the government. Why should the government suddenly want to change its own guidelines which are sound? Why, for example, would the government want to sell weapons to a country where there are serious human rights violations? Why would the government want to change the policy and sell arms to a country that is involved in conflict, either internally or internationally, where the security of Canada is not involved? Why would the government want to sell arms to a country where the United Nations has imposed sanctions, such as South Africa?

We are saying if the government takes these guidelines seriously, and they are sound, then they should not be subject simply to ministerial change in a cabinet room. We are saying that these guidelines are so sound and so reasonable that they should be put in the legislation.

That is what my hon. friend is trying to do. They are not expressed exactly in the same way, but they are substantially the same as the government's policy guidelines. He is putting them in the legislation and, yes, they will make it more inflexible. The government will not be able to change them unless they come back to the House of Commons and seek an amendment. We think that is a good thing, because it puts the control of these very important matters, that is, to whom we sell arms, in the hands of parliamentarians and not simply the cabinet.

The other reason why it is important to put these guidelines in the legislation is because if they are broken, or if they are interpreted too widely, then a citizen can go to court and seek an injunction saying: "You are breaking the legislative guidelines".

If the guidelines simply are left in a policy document as expressed by the government, by the minister, and they are interpreted too broadly or too loosely or even violated, there is no way anyone can go to court and say to the judge that the government is breaking the guidelines because they are not law. What the hon. member is doing is putting these guidelines into law, and we support that.

One might ask again, why we want to do this at this time when they have been in policy documents for years and years and that has been more or less satisfactory. We want to do it now because there is a new commitment to stopping the sale of arms to countries with serious human rights abuses or who are involved in conflict.

During the Iraq-Kuwait war, the world was outraged by the fact that 95 per cent of the armaments held by Iraq were sold to Iraq by the five permanent members of the Security Council. The Prime Minister of Canada, and rightly so, said he was outraged at that and called for a world summit to control the arms trade. That was seconded by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, who said that it was very bad that the world should be selling arms to a country like Iraq, especially in such great numbers, and that we must do something about it.

We agree with the government. We agree with the Prime Minister. We agree with the former Minister for External Affairs that something more substantial should be done. What we are suggesting, and I support the hon. member, is that we put these guidelines into law and I hope the House will accept that.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the right to speak is given back to independent members and that the government is beginning to realize that, after all, democracy is what is best in the world. The government presents today a bill forbidding the sale of Canadian arms to countries where democracy is really not what it should be, to countries where Canadian arms could be used to infringe on human rights. But what happened in this House in the middle of the night, Mr. Speaker? The House passed motions secretly, so to speak, after independent members were led to believe that it was all over and that everybody could go to bed at eleven o'clock after they had spent 12 hours in a row in this House. All of sudden, at eleven o'clock, 15 very important motions were passed without any debate. Mr. Speaker, those motions made it clear that no independent member, no member of the Bloc Quebecois would have the opportunity to speak. If that is what the new Canada is all about, I think that we should—

Mr. Pronovost: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, we have before us a very specific motion that was submitted to the members of the House of Commons, but the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is talking about an entirely different subject. He is talking about what happened last night, and I think you should call him to order immediately so that he can talk about the motions before the House, since he wants to exercise his democratic right to express himself as a parliamentarian. Now that the House has allowed him to do that, I wish he would do it properly for once.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, this same government which had sold arms to Iraq when Iraq was our friend found itself in a tight spot when the president of Iraq turned against the western world, since we had to declare war. The government knifed independent members of this House in the back last night, and I think there is an interesting and important parallel to be made here. We simply should not allow the exporting of arms to countries that could use them to violate human rights, to repress people, to build an arsenal, and suddenly find out that, we have to spend billions and billions of dollars to try to take those arms away from them.

Think about what happened in Iraq. How much did that war cost the free world? The Iraqi people were fighting with weapons those same countries, not only Canada, but also the United States, France, and Great Britain sold them, when they were considered a friendly country, fighting against Iran. That is making fun of us! There is a parallel to be made here between the tragedy which happened at the École Polytechnique and these weapons. If these weapons are made in Canada, if we have research and development done in that area, if we allow such weapons in our country and authorize their exportation, then we are more likely to have dangerous people firing crazily at innocent victims, as we have seen in Montreal, Quebec.

• (2040)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want the government to get serious. You have heard some interesting speakers. There is no substantial policy, and I know the hon. member for Saint-Hubert is knowledgeable in that area, there is no substantial policy in this bill. It will give us great pleasure to defeat it in a little while.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the motion standing in the name of Mr. Brewin. Shall I dispense with the reading of the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, this is an unanticipated result, but I think the solution for the House is to defer this vote as well until 9.45 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the Standing Orders and according to the request of the Government Whip, the division on the question stands deferred until 9.45 p.m. when the divisions will be taken seriatim, that is successively after the previous bills will have been disposed of.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, a motion was passed last evening which provided for 30 minutes of debate at report stage and another 30 minutes at third reading. I am wondering if the House would give consent to allow the debate on third reading to continue at this time and then we will put the question later.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the Chair has no other choice since it was specified in the order found in the Votes and Proceedings. We have just concluded the thirty minutes or so of debate at report stage and we must now proceed to third reading, if I understand the order correctly.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: The normal practice at report stage is to hear the yeas and nays for each proposed amendment and to do that in sequence with the debate to take place on each amendment. We have in fact disposed of the first amendment. There is a second one on the floor. We would have no objection to members spending 30 minutes on the second amendment if that were the will of the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So I had a little distraction. Of course, before we proceed to third reading, we have to dispose of the bill at report stage, and that cannot be done until the recorded vote is taken at 9.45 p.m., after all other motions have been disposed of.

So, to be very clear, a motion was presented a few minutes ago asking unanimous consent of the House to proceed to third reading stage.

[English]

Does the House give its unanimous to go to third reading?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, given the situation we are in with the motions that have been passed, it would be in the House's best interests if we suspend to the call of the Chair at 9.45 p.m. at which time the bell would sound to call in the members.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is member of the Whip's own party who wishes to speak on an adjournment debate. It is a four-minute speech. There will be a gap of time before the votes.

If the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is prepared to give consent for the members of the Bloc Quebecois, it would be in the interests of all of us since we are here until 9.45 p.m. anyway to permit that member to speak on the adjournment debate.

I would appeal to the Whip to be reasonable to one of his own members.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I tend to be reasonable at all times to all members. I hope that is my reputation.

The government would have absolutely no objection to any member of the House who feels dissatisfied with any of the questions they have asked making some comments. Perhaps we could start on a priority basis with those who were on last night's list and lost their opportunity at that stage to have their late show privilege of four minutes. On any side of the House, if there are members in that position, we would have no objection to use the time between now and the time of the votes in that way.

This House is the bastion of freedom of speech in this country. We would like to see consent from all sides of the House to continue the debate on this important piece of legislation. In the absence of that, we would be quite happy to have the late show for as long as it takes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, we will not be able to vote in favour of the government bills, because of the major blow dealt to democracy. However, members do have rights, even though they are not the same as those of the government. That is why I think we should allow members to ask questions, which we could have done yesterday, that is, of course, if there are people on the government side who can answer, but then I would be very surprised if there were.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since we do not have unanimous consent on the motion presented by the hon. member for Edmonton South East, I will recognize the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

[English]

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I was one of the individuals originally scheduled to speak. I think I was second last night for the adjournment debate.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will listen to you after the hon. member.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, to continue, I was one of the members last night. I think there were five of us in total. Of course, when extended hours happened last night automatically the adjournment debate was killed. I would really appreciate the co-operation of the House to have the adjournment debate tonight. I am speaking further to a question about the need for pornography legislation. It would be for four minutes and, if there is a parliamentary secretary, there would be a reply. There may be one or two Liberals who were scheduled last night as well. It is time that is not going to be used for any other purpose, and I would really hope that I could get consent of this House to proceed with that.

• (2050)

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I do not give unanimous consent to this request.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The matter is settled. There is no consent and I will suspend the sitting until 9.45 p.m., when the question will be put on several bills.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Why should we suspend the sitting, Mr. Speaker? I live 350 kilometres from here and my constituents expect me to be in this House to participate in the proceedings—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I suspend the sitting because there is no unanimous consent to proceed. The sitting is suspended until 9.45 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that the end of the session is near, we should regain some common sense.

I do not think that this is the most sensible way to conduct our affairs. Mr. Speaker, you had, as is your duty, to call the votes. You asked for those who were in favour. There were yeas and there were nays. Therefore it was your duty, and you did it, to call the vote. So it is incomprehensible that the vote would be unanimous in many instances.

We know very well what is going on. But this is not the way to conduct, in my opinion—

• (2220)

[English]

I only say that as far as Marcel Prud'homme is concerned, I do not think it is the way to conduct our affairs. I understand it has been difficult since last night for a group, I will call them a party, it has been difficult for a political party but that is no reason. I will not participate in that kind of charade. If you call a vote, I will vote. I will let the others do what they want, but I know exactly what I will do. If you call for a vote, I will vote. If it is a unanimous vote, I do not understand why we are being asked to vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have been prevented from speaking because of the motions of last night, but we will not be prevented from voting!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Bill, as amended, concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made Tuesday, June 18, 1991, a thirty-minute period is scheduled for third reading of the Bill.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I trust that most of the members of the House will remain while I explain to them why they should vote against this bill on third reading. I am sure that they know the reasons why they should be against this bill. It is those opposite who should remain while we are doing this. Perhaps we could have a second while the House clears.

We have 30 minutes in which to address the issue of the fundamentals of this bill. What I would like to do is first of all set out the two fundamental reasons why our party is against this bill and will vote against it on third reading.

The first is fundamentally a matter of conscience. This bill will permit the sale of automatic weapons to any country in the world that the government deems fit to sell those—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I would ask the cooperation of both sides of the House. I would remind hon. members they are invited to a reception given by the Speaker at the usual place.

[English]

I recognize again the hon. member from Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: The minister of privatization or whatever it is, says he is going for a drink. That would probably help his understanding. The member chose to intervene in the debate. The minister chose to heckle during the debate. There is no order in that point. It seems to me that if the government members are interested in listening, I hope they will just learn a point of two from the observations we have to make.

This is one of the most important policy initiatives that is before the House in this part of the session. It represents a significant departure of Canadian policy which would permit the sale of automatic weapons to Saudi Arabia. That country has a very poor human rights record. It is in a region of the world which is sensitive, testy and has just come through one of the most difficult wars of this century. The people of that region are still paying the price.

The war that we have seen in the gulf is a war which both sides in this House can see was caused by the uncontrolled sale of arms by the western world to a region which did not need those arms. It seems to me that the first issue is an issue of conscience of all Canadians. I believe that Canadians find it very difficult to understand why it is that one of the first bills that this government introduces in this session is a bill to extend and expand the sale of arms after the eloquent statements which were made at the end of the gulf war.

As we went through this bill and through committee, I learned a thing or two about how the government works. It became very clear that instead of the conspiracy theory of operation it is the screw-up theory that really counts most of the time. This bill was an invention of the international trade side and those who are responsible for selling goods abroad. The export permit people in External Affairs and the trade minister are responsible for this bill, not the External Affairs minister who is responsible for disarmament and arms control, not the Prime Minister, but those who are responsible for industry.

The argument that is made in committee for this bill over and over again is the industrial argument. Here we have jobs. Here we have an industry. Let's sell them. Who cares what the purpose of the weapons are? Who cares that there are people who may be killed as a result of the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia? That is irrelevant.

• (2250)

We had an official from the minister's department who came before our committee and said that the only reason for this bill was industrial. There was no examination of the security reasons for this bill, there was no suggestion of the foreign policy reasons for this bill. What we had was simply a trade deal.

Surely, after everything that the world has seen in this century, the time has come to call a halt to arms sales. That is the first issue before the House.

The second issue is that this bill is flawed. The government has said over and over again that it complies with certain standards when it comes to the sale of arms. But its members refuse to agree to an amendment which would incorporate those standards in the legislation. The government has refused amendments which would require it to make the list of countries public to whom arms will be sold. It has refused those amendments. It has refused sunset clauses. It has refused to set out the reasons why we should be permitting sale of arms abroad. That is the second reason why we are against this bill.

The government was so anxious that this bill go through because there is at least one side of the government's head which understands that the defence industry is fundamentally a flawed industry. Around the world, the market for arms is fading. The third world can no longer afford arms. The market in the west is contracting. The cold war is over and investments which Liberal and Conservative governments have made in the arms industry are proving to be flawed investments.

An hon. member: Yes, hundreds of thousands of jobs.

Mr. Brewin: My Liberal friend here says "Hundreds of thousands of jobs". But it is jobs at the price of human lives.

An hon. member: Give me a break.

Mr. Brewin: He says, "Give me a break". They are making guns, they are making automatic guns which are going to be sold to a repressive regime in Saudi Arabia.

Out of all of this has come at least one ray of hope, and I would like to use the remaining couple of minutes to outline where that ray of hope is coming from.

Last night the government agreed at long last to a suggestion put before our committee by the Canadian Arms Control Centre, John Lamb and Project Ploughshares, that the time had come for a full public review of the export of arms by Canada, the defence production industry and policies of conversion from military uses to civilian uses. As a result of that agreement, tomorrow morning the external affairs committee will meet and will strike a special subcommittee, which will be authorized and agreed to by all sides of this House, to conduct that public inquiry.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: That public inquiry will have hearings not only in Ottawa, but outside of Ottawa. We will work in full co-operation with the citizens' inquiry that has been established by the Canadian Peace Alliance and involves groups from all across Canada. We will be working closely with that citizens' inquiry. Members on all sides of the House will work to try to understand that there must be a better way for Canadians to earn their living.

This morning I spoke to CAW Local 27 from the hon. Liberal member's riding. Its members asked for this bill to be passed. They disagree with our position that this bill should be defeated. But they said to me this morning that they, more than any other Canadians, want to earn their living doing something other than making arms. The time has come for members on all sides of this House to realize first, that this is a dying industry. This country cannot continue to go through the slippery slope of first selling to the Americans, then to the Europeans, then to countries like Saudi Arabia. Who will be next? Indonesia? South Korea? South Africa? If the government accedes, as it has in this case, to the argument of selling to Saudi Arabia, it will accede next year to an argument to sell to Indonesia or South Korea or to whatever other dictatorship wants arms from Canada because this is a dying industry.

The first thing the government has to realize and will realize is that there must be a change in how we earn a living.

Let me finish with this note. All Canadians want this Parliament to show some leadership in ending the arms race which has caused so much tragedy around the world. I believe that the agreement the government made last night to establish a public inquiry into Canadian policies in this area is a very important first step toward working out that kind of leadership for this country.

I am very pleased that the government has acceded to that. I am very hopeful that the subcommittee will do very useful work for Canadians and that finally, perhaps, we can turn the corner and Canada can truly realize its place in the world as a peacemaker.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take long in this debate but I do want to put some perspective on what the hon. from the New Democratic Party has been saying.

To listen to him you would think that one of the major industries, one of the largest industries in this country was the arms industry. This is simply not the case. To listen to him you would expect that we were a major contributor to the build-up of arms in the Middle East which took place prior to the gulf crisis. That is simply not the case.

What I think is very clear is that we have in this legislation listened very carefully to the concerns that people have expressed about the importance of putting tight controls on any arms shipments. As we have moved into the area of the export of automatic weapons, we have been conscious of the fact that there is an anomaly which has prohibited the export of these arms, an anomaly in the Criminal Code which was not contemplated at the time the Criminal Code was changed in 1977. We are correcting that anomaly.

I think it is important to note that as we have corrected this anomaly, we have put a tighter set of export controls on the export of automatic weapons by providing for a country control list which will be very tightly controlled. There are very stringent requirements as to what type of country can be on that list. In addition to that, there will be a case by case review of every arms shipment that will be made that is subject to these restrictions.

There is a long history of control of weapons from this country. This government is not changing that history. It is not trying in any way to make any deviation from the standards and the traditions and values which have been expressed by Canadians during the course of many, many years. Those traditions will be honoured. Those values will be honoured in the administration of the control system that we have put in place.

I do want to make a comment on the statements made by the hon. member to the effect that we are ignoring the fact that there are certain countries, certain areas of the world which have been subject to excessive arms build-up. We are conscious of that.

The Prime Minister has spoken of that. The previous Secretary of State for External Affairs and the current Secretary of State for External Affairs have spoken to that. We have been at the forefront of encouraging nations, the major arms exporters, to put a more transparent system in place so that we can avoid, as a group of peace loving countries, these build-ups in arms.

I go back to what my friend from the New Democratic Party has said, that the workers of Diemaco or GM Diesel would like to have other jobs so that are not working for a companies that produce arms.

I think that if we lived in an idealistic world, in a utopian world, we could all say that is something we strive for. However, it is simply not a realistic thing that we can expect to achieve in the world we live in today. We have to have armed forces in this country and we have to arm those armed forces so that they can do their job.

• (2300)

Our level of requirement in this country is simply not sufficient to support domestic industries. What we have put forward in this legislation is a very tightly controlled means by which these companies, which have been suppliers to Canada, can also broaden their markets and supply to other countries and, by so doing, keep a viable arms industry within this country for our domestic needs as they are required. That is the simple basis on which we have allowed a very tightly controlled export, a process, a mechanism by which these arms can be exported to other countries.

If we are going to live in the real world, if we are going to recognize the reality as it is today, we must have some basis of supplying our own domestic needs. We must provide these companies with a basis whereby they can be viable enterprises or else we simply will not be able to have them supplying our needs and we will be totally reliant on the supplies from other countries. I do not think that is a sensible policy.

This is the basis on which we have gone forward. I have not heard much criticism of the mechanisms that we have put in place because they are among the tightest in the world today. It is on this basis that we present this legislation to the House.

As I said, we believe that it honours the traditions and values that Canadians have set forward, and we will continue to do so in the implementation of the policies that we have established.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we are now debating the final stage in Bill C-6, which authorizes the sale of automatic firearms to other countries.

The minister, in the speech which he just gave, is pretending that this bill does not open up, to a greater extent, the sale of arms to other countries, but he says that it in fact places greater restrictions on the sale of arms. That is complete nonsense. This bill authorizes the sale of automatic firearms to other countries, firearms that, up until now, are not authorized to be sold to other countries.

This bill in fact authorizes a wider and greater sale of armaments to other countries at a time when the whole world, including the Prime Minister and the former Secretary of State for External Affairs and the present Secretary of State for External Affairs have said we should cut back on the sale of arms to other countries.

I just listened to the television news at 10 o'clock and at the CSCE meetings, which are taking place in Berlin, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs tried to convince the ministers of other countries that they should cut back the sale of arms to other countries. I could not believe what I was hearing since this bill is before this House tonight.

Let us read again what the Prime Minister said on February 8, 1991 in the midst of the Iraq-Kuwait war. He said: "One of the main lessons to be learned from this war is the danger to us all of the proliferation of both conventional and non-conventional weapons." He went on to say: "The major arms exporting firms and nations have contributed to the current crisis."—that is the Iraq-Kuwait crisis—"The greater majority of weapons in Iraq's arsenal come from suppliers in the countries of the five permanent members of the Security Council. This problem must be brought under control and the time to act is now." He went on to say: "Next week I will propose to the UN Secretary-General, Mr. Perez de Cuellar, that the United Nations convene a global summit on the instruments of war and weapons of mass destruction." That is the Prime Minister on February 8, 1991 only a few months ago.

What did the Secretary of State for External Affairs say? He said: "It is imperative that the world declare that there be no Middle East arms bazaar. Ninety-five per cent of the weapons in the hands of Saddam Hussein came from the five permanent members of the Security Council." He went on to say that he would call for a world summit to control the arms trade. There was such outrage at the time of the Iraq-Kuwait war at the fact that 95 per cent of Iraq's armaments came from the five permanent members of the Security Council, that the world said: "Let's do something about this". I thought they were serious. That was one of the few occasions I applauded the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What do we get a few months later but a bill to authorize the sale from Canada of armaments that up until now had not been possible to sell. We opposed this bill at second reading because it was too open-ended. We can understand the sale of armaments to countries who are involved in collective security arrangements with us for defensive purposes or for peacekeeping. Consequently, I have no argument with the sale of these small arms to the Netherlands and to certain restricted countries. But this bill was too open-ended and lacked parliamentary control, too much control was in the hands of the cabinet and the minister.

At committee I proposed two amendments. One would have restricted the sale of arms in this bill to the very policy criteria that the government has in its policy statement on this matter. The government does have a policy statement on this matter. The problem is that it is not legislated, and if we take the words of the Prime Minister to heart, the words he said in February, and the words the former Secretary of State said in February, then we should make our rules a little bit tougher. We would make them a little bit tougher if we put the guidelines, if we put the policy principles they have in that policy statement, into law. That is what I tried to do in committee and it was defeated by the government members.

Tonight the hon. member for Victoria tried to do it again. He had more or less the same ideas in his amendments and it was defeated once again tonight.

The other thing we tried to do was provide for greater transparency in the sale of these arms within our own country. I had put forward an amendment stating that any addition to the list of eligible countries to which we could sell these armaments, each time an addition was proposed by the government, that matter would have to be referred to the standing committee on external affairs where the minister would have to go and justify the addition of this new country for the sale of arms. The committee would discuss it and vote on it and then send that back to the House.

This would put this very important matter, i.e. the sale of arms to other countries, not only in the hands of the back room of the cabinet but also into a committee of Parliament where it could be reviewed.

I recognize that the government has the majority on parliamentary committees and in this House so if it really wanted to ram through the sale of arms to a certain country it would be able to do so. Nevertheless, the Canadian public would see what is happening, and the government would have to come to justify the sale of arms to this new country or other new countries.

My amendment to that effect was defeated in committee, and tonight the amendment of the member for Victoria which was similar was also defeated in this House.

It is difficult to believe that the world, and this government, should show so much outrage at the sale of arms during the Iraq-Kuwait war, and they have forgotten about it so quickly. As a matter of fact, in the speech given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in London during that war, he pointed out that 28 western northern countries sold arms to both sides. What an obscenity. Of the countries that were not involved in the conflict, 28 of them sold arms to both sides and kept that war going for nine years, and a million people were killed.

They were not Canadians, Americans, French, British, or Russians. They were young Iranians and young Iraqis. They were human beings and these countries made profits, made money, out of selling arms to both sides. I must say that Canada was not one of those 28 countries. We did not sell to either side.

The fact of the matter is that the arms trade is out of control. One does not bring it to a stop, one does not make speeches to the CSCE, as the Secretary of State did today, it seems.

• (2310)

You do not make those speeches and then support a bill at home providing for a greater sale of armaments.

The government did not accept the improvements to the bill which we suggested. It did not accept the amendments we suggested, so we will vote against it again at third reading.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to finally be able to contribute to this debate on Bill C-6 that will authorize the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons. It is the height of hypocrisy to hear the government say those kinds of things to Canadians at a time when they are outraged by what is happening, particularly in the Gulf region. In January and February, we heard the Prime Minister denounce the arms trade around the world. A few weeks later, the same government members come before the House of Commons and want to contribute to the arms race themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why Canada would accept to militarize its economy today. The reasons given by the Minister for International Trade are not valid. They say they want to make the military industry in Canada more profitable and, for that, we have to export more arms.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine a minister coming to tell this House that to prevent the exporting of arms is not normal. He did say that it was an odd provision of the Criminal Code.

After recent events, I cannot believe that this government, who tried to come across as uncompromising, will join the list of countries who participate fully and freely in the arms race. If Canadians were consulted on this legislation, they would not accept their government authorizing the selling of arms, specially behind everybody's back, because after this House has voted tonight, there will be no more control by Parliament. From now on, it will be External Affairs officers together with National Defence officers and Cabinet ministers who will decide where, when and how we will sell arms. I do not understand why there is no parliamentary control on a matter of such importance, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce talked about his amendments that we supported, but we cannot accept the fact that we are giving a blank cheque to this government to sell arms all over the world. We just have to look at recent events, not only around the world, but in the province of Quebec. Everybody wants a stricter control of arms. Everywhere, people want to restrain this epidemic of violence. Today, the government wants us to believe there will be a stricter control of firearms. We know how the government is. We know what lobby is putting pressure on them, Mr. Speaker. The legislation before the House is certainly the product of the defense industry's lobby. This industry successfully lobbied the Conservatives who now put cost effectiveness before human dignity.

I cannot believe it, Mr. Speaker, when I hear these people say, as they did even today, that they are willing to sell arms to some countries, which have no democratic principles and no respect whatsoever for human rights and for the fundamental values Canadians and Quebecers all share, especially where peace is concerned. If there is one thing our conscience dictates to all of us, it is our quest for peace on earth.

Canadians are always sad to see their government sell its soul in order to sell arms.

Mr. Speaker, this is unprecedented, and only a Conservative government would introduce such a piece of legislation.

An hon. member: Eleven per cent in the polls.

Mr. Lapierre: No wonder they are so low in the polls. Their policies go against the best interests of Canadians, but especially against their consciences. Today, they gave us the most striking example of that.

First, they followed blindly all military decisions made by the Americans and then they were ordered by somebody to impose this kind of bill to this House.

Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois will fight this bill tooth and nail. It is too bad this government does not have more of a conscience.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to an order made Tuesday, March 18, 1991, it is my duty to interrupt all proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the motion for third reading of Bill C-6, An Act respecting the exporting, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons.

[English]

The question is on the motion standing in the name of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: I would gladly have allowed the senior member of this House, my friend, Mr. Gray, the hon. member for Windsor West, to say a few words, but since he is temporarily absent from the House, it is my pleasure to thank first of all the pages who will be leaving us.

I will not look at them, because I think we are all very sad to see them go.

[English]

It is a custom that at the very end, someone gets up. It is too bad somebody else did not do it. These young people are our hope for the Canada of tomorrow we wish to see.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Prud'homme: I sometimes stay longer in politics because when I see these young people who will be the Canada of tomorrow, I think there is hope.

There is one thing which I hope—I say it in English only—that they have understood. There are, in this House, many different kinds of members of Parliament. There are some who are very devoted to other opinions than mine. I think there is hope that these young people may communicate to their friends and parents that there is a hope for Canada as long as we accept—

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, this government said that the recession is over. I would like to know: over for whom? Not for constituents in Northumberland, not for farmers across this land, not for fishermen, not for industry, small businesses, not for consumers. Very importantly, not for Canada's voiceless one million children living in poverty.

Poverty denies children and their families access to basic rights, access to food, clothing and adequate shelter. Childhood poverty translates into poor physical health, emotional trauma, poor educational achievements, early school drop-outs, and ultimately unskilled, uneducated, costly social assistance statistics.

Children in Canada and around the world deserve that basic rights be met. On September 30 last year our Prime Minister was co-chairman of the United Nations Summit for Children in New York which called for ratification of a UN convention on the rights of the child. To date, 86 countries have ratified. Canada has not.

Ratification of the convention is an essential first step in fulfilling—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, farmers will receive $1 billion less in income this year than they did last year. The solution of the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds is to tell farmers to dump a load of grain on the parking lots of European car dealerships and not to buy their products. The minister is apparently oblivious to the fact that farmers are not buying Mercedes-Benzes or BMWs these days.

Not only in western Canada but in Ontario as well thousands of producers are on the verge of losing a livelihood that took generations to build. Farm organizations from one end of the country to the other have been pointing out the need for a third line of defence payment. Why is the government ignoring its own program?

By the way, where are all the other programs that the PC government was going to introduce as part of the Growing Together paper it presented back in 1989?

Yes, the Europeans are causing problems for Canadian farmers, and yes, the Americans are causing problems for Canadian farmers.

If, however, the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds really wants to know the biggest problem Canadian farmers have today, he need only look in the mirror.

THE SENATE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing that all Canadians can agree on, it is the need for Senate reform. What we cannot agree on is how to do it.

The 1979 Pepin–Robarts commission recommended that the Senate be replaced by a Council of Confederation, made up of delegations appointed by provincial governments based on representation by population. But a great many Canadians want a Triple–E Senate, one that is elected, equal, and effective.

Australia has a Triple–E senate as part of its federal parliamentary system of government. In Australia it works, not always smoothly and efficiently, but decisions are made and actions are taken.

Critics say that the Australian senate interferes with the government's right to govern, that is the cabinet's absolute control of the legislative process. Frankly, that may not be such a bad idea.

NATIONAL STRATEGY FOR THE INTEGRATION OF PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to draw the attention of the House to the National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities, which was adopted recently. As you know, the strategy was announced by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg on September 6.

Today, 3.3 million Canadians have a disability, and visible or not, the disability is very real for the person concerned.

These Canadians are not asking for special privileges. They are merely asking for equality.

Firmly resolved to respond to these legitimate concerns, the federal government has promised to spend $158 million to support this national strategy and its three objectives: equal access, economic integration and full participation.

The federal government wants to make it possible for persons with disabilities to take an active part in the economic and social life of this country.

Mr. Speaker, together we can build a Canada where all citizens will have—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[English]

ANTI–DRUG ENFORCEMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are very upset and frustrated about the GST, income taxes, unemployment and drug use. In metro Toronto the issue of drug use is of concern to parents in almost every neighbourhood.

This problem must be tackled through the education of youth and through effective police enforcement programs. The federal government has been asked repeatedly by Toronto metro council and metro police commission that part of the money the metro police force uses in pursuing drug investigations, and a share of the value of property and proceeds confiscated by the RCMP, be returned to metro authorities to be spent on education, crime prevention, rehabilitation programs and anti–drug enforcement activities.

Once again we urge the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to support the fight against drugs on the streets and in the schools by acceding to these very reasonable requests.

THE DISABLED

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in June 1990 an all–party committee of this House under the capable chairmanship of the hon. member for Oxford tabled a report called A Consensus For Action. The report outlined barriers that prevent the full participation of Canadians with disabilities in the daily life of our country. I was frankly cynical as to whether anything substantive would come from the report and its recommendations.

Accordingly, I was delighted and would like to commend the Prime Minister and the government for their important announcement of the national strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities. Furthermore, the strategy includes a tangible commitment of $158 million.

Canadians with disabilities are not asking for special privileges. They merely ask for equitable treatment and the same opportunity and access to fulfil their lives and to make their contribution to Canada as are enjoyed by other Canadians.

This government's announcement and its strategy is one more important step in this direction.

FISHERIES

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to publicly thank the Public Service Alliance of Canada and its members for agreeing to work behind their own picket lines in order to participate in the B.C. Salmon Hatchery Egg Take Program.

This action has saved a precious and valuable resource from certain extinction in areas around the 17 major hatcheries in British Columbia.

The Conservative government was prepared to see the west coast salmon resource go down the drain with everything else it has touched in this country. Thanks to the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which put the interests of the public and future generations first, this valuable resource has been saved. Thanks to the Public Service Alliance of Canada and its members, this is one precious resource that will not be destroyed by the Mulroney government.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the agriculture industry is once again suffering. This time it is not an act of God but the actions of the grain handlers and the longshoremen's union. The grain handlers have chosen to support the Public Service strike, thus disrupting the very industry that feeds them and their families.

This type of action cannot be condoned or tolerated. Agriculture is essential to the economic prosperity of this country and should be declared accordingly. Legislation must be put in place to secure the well-being of the agri-food industry.

EDUCATION

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the thousands of college and university students returning to school this month have little to cheer about. Many failed to secure work this summer in Canada's depressed economy. Now the neediest of these students, those who have applied for financial assistance through the Canada Student Loans Program, realize as they go to cash their cheques that they must pay up front 3 per cent of their assistance as an administration fee.

Shame on this federal government. Not only has it made post-secondary education more expensive and exclusive through its cuts to education transfers, but now it purports to tax one of the most important programs that help our youth pay these soaring costs.

To add yet another obstacle to accessible education, this government has chosen to close its campus employment centres, thus eliminating another important avenue for paying for an education, a job.

Mr. Speaker, when will this government stop starving and start investing in education in this country?

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the strike by the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Leader of the Bloc Quebecois has remained silent. The reason is this: On May 24, 1991, in Le Soleil, Mr. Denis Gagné, a member of the teachers' union in Chicoutimi, reported the following: "In 1982-83, Lucien Bouchard represented the PQ government on the employer's side during negotiations with the public and semi-public sector".

• (1410)

According to Mr. Gagné, in addition to his income from his law firm in Chicoutimi, Mr. Bouchard was paid more than $250,000 by the Quebec government to introduce a 20 per cent cut in the salaries of teachers, nurses and all social sector employees in Quebec.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, thousands of striking public servants came to Parliament Hill today. When they left an hour later, the lawns of this public building were a sea of trash—placards deliberately shredded into small pieces and ground into the grass.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a big deal, but it is symbolic and it is very distressing. I do not know what goal the union bosses, egged on by the Leader of the NDP, were trying to accomplish through this eco-violence, but for those Canadians who travelled here to see their Parliament Buildings, this was a disgrace. Surely the strikers do not have an argument with the lawn of the House of Commons. If the union's friends in the NDP cannot teach them to respect Parliament, at least they can tell them it is wrong to wantonly harm the environment.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the first general strike in the Public Service in Canada's history is the result of the unfair and dictatorial tactics of this government.

By suspending collective bargaining and refusing to negotiate equitable wage conditions, the Conservative government has destroyed the co-operation that must exist between public service management and employees if essential services are to be provided to the Canadian public.

[English]

In the National Capital Region, the economic effects of this strike are being felt in the business community. Local television news broadcasts reported that my riding of Carleton—Gloucester was suffering severely from the negative effects of the loss of the revenue normally generated by public servants.

I call upon the government to act with fairness by respecting the fundamental right of its employees to a fair and just contract.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Alliance of Canada has taken extraordinary steps to promote its cause. In my riding, the union hierarchy has resorted to bringing in professional agitators and union extremists to take the place of local PSAC members who refuse to walk the line.

If they had a choice, they would prefer not to strike. This is not peculiar to my riding, it is happening across the country. The use of professional agitators and extremists to enforce a picket only brings the reputation of the labour movement into disrepute.

I call upon the PSAC to refrain from this type of tactic.

PAY EQUITY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, in 1977 the Liberals brought in pay equity legislation, but they never moved on it. In the 1984 throne speech, this government promised pay equity for its underpaid women workers. During the 1988 leaders' debate, the Prime Minister said: "We are agreeing on a policy for pay equity for women. We are budgeting for the funds required on an ongoing basis."

Now the government sings a different tune. The Tories are saying no deal to women working for $19,000 a year. They have tried twice to stop the Canadian Human Rights Commission from looking at pay equity in the Public Service. The Human Rights Commissioner has said that the government is not playing fair on pay equity. Shame on this government, Mr. Speaker. Where are those funds that were budgeted? Why have cabinet ministers and their friends received increases and not women workers at the lower end of the economic pay scale?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all hon. members, I want to offer congratulations to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on his being honoured this morning for his work on behalf of Canadian veterans and their families.

The National Council of Veterans Associations this morning presented the minister with its prestigious medal of service. Also this morning, the national vice-president of the Korean Veterans Association presented the Minister of Veterans Affairs with an honorary life membership. In presenting the medal of service Cliff Chadderton, the chairman of the National Council, said: "Gerry Merrithew is not only a good Minister of Veterans Affairs, he has shown himself as well to be a great Canadian and must be given credit for the current efforts being made by veterans' organizations to preserve our national unity".

Canada's programs for veterans are second to none. The same can be said for the minister who leads and directs those programs.

UKRAINIAN CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, September 7 marked an historic milestone in Canada's history. One hundred years ago, Wasyl Eleniak and Ivan Pylipiw entered Canada and were the first of the Ukrainian immigrants to settle in the prairies to link our country from sea to sea.

These pioneers struggled against disease, poverty, climate and social indignities. They fought hard, persevered and succeeded. In the years that followed their community has given Canada successful farmers, educators, entrepreneurs, mayors, MLAs, members of Parliament and the Senate, a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and a Governor General.

Such is the success of the Ukrainian community that immigrants and new citizens of today look at their story of struggle and success as a model to follow.

It has been said that Canada's true wealth stems from its citizens. Let it also be said that all Canadians are proud of the Ukrainian presence in its citizenry. Indeed the Ukrainian Canadian centennial is about all of us. I therefore urge Parliament and this government to continue to give attention to this year-long celebration, not only in the interest of cultural equality but also for the sake of national unity.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are back in Parliament. We would like to have started in an easier fashion because this country needs some order, but unfortunately, there is a terrible strike that nobody wants, including the strikers.

A few minutes ago the Public Service Staff Relations Board—I talked with the president and it was confirmed to me—ruled that this government is not respecting the law of the land and is in breach of section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Will the Prime Minister do the right thing at this moment, follow the law of the land, go back to the negotiation table and try to find a solution to this unfair situation that exists today whereby the poorest in the Public Service are receiving a zero increase in their pay when people in the higher echelons are getting a big pay increase?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put to rest once and for all the notion that higher civil servants are supposed to be getting treatment that others will not get. This is not the truth. This is not a fact.

The civil servant upper echelon managers will all go through the same system of zero, three and three, as you will be going through and as we will be going through.

As a matter of fact, we negotiated a settlement for our managers from June 1990 to June 1991. A commission set up by the Liberal Party recommended 6.2 per cent. I refused it for last year. I settled for 4.2, which is less than what PSAC got. As of June this year they were already at zero increase.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that we want to find a solution and that we want to start this session in an orderly fashion, since it will be a very important one for Canada. That being said, perhaps the government could start this session by respecting the laws of this country. A few minutes ago, a federal board, established by an Act of Parliament, said that this government had violated Section 51. Does the minister intend to observe the laws of this country and go back to the bargaining table to find a way to resolve this dispute?

• (1420)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this morning, the Public Service Staff Relations Board answered two questions from the union. The first question was: Did the government—and I am quoting the union—bargain in bad faith? The Board did not agree. However, it did say that in its opinion, we probably should have made every reasonable effort to reach an agreement.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition may not be aware of the fact that we have been negotiating with the Public Service Alliance of Canada for seven months, and that, give or take a few hours, we have had 60 days of bargaining and 30 days of conciliation. I had a meeting with Mr. Bean Friday morning, and he said he would never accept the government's policy. We were prepared to negotiate all terms of the collective agreement, except for the budgetary policy related 0-3, and he refused.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this land understands that the intention of this government was to have a strike. It has been working all this time to make sure there is a strike which will serve its political purposes.

I want to ask the minister if he will do the right thing. The people of Canada are suffering today. They want an end to this strike. A very easy way to solve this problem is to appoint a mediator who will have the right to look at all the problems. The public servants will go back to work and we will have peace in this country. Then we will be able to deal with the other fantastic problems of this nation.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I see that the Leader of the Opposition has another miracle solution. I do not know if it is the same as the one he had yesterday which was rejected by the unions.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, at budget time we made many difficult decisions. One was related to the union. This is not union bashing because many unions have accepted the 0-3 and have signed agreements with us. We have negotiated in good faith. We have conciliation board reports recommending acceptance.

What we wanted to do at budget time and we are doing today is making sure that the debt does not go up and the deficit does not go up, but that interest rates go down and inflation goes down, and it is working, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, this government has dealt in bad faith with seniors, with the unemployed, with students, with farmers and fishermen and now it is dealing in bad faith with its own employees.

Canadians understand what good faith means. When is this government going to recognize that it is in violation of the law of this Parliament? What is it going to do to put itself in conformity with the law as every other Canadian citizen has to do?

An hon. member: Respect the law.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, of course we respect the law. I will look at the report which was handed to me just before Question Period.

I will say this. The best way to provide for a secure future for our public servants and for all Canadians is to be really helpful and not to go about making statements such as that we are determined to hit the unions or to hit the Public Service. This is not true at all. We are determined to help them by getting the finances of this country in order and out of the mess that existed when your party was in power and we are having some success. Would they prefer the Liberal way with interest rates of 22 per cent and with inflation at 14 per cent? I think they prefer our answer to those questions.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Canadians understand belt-tightening, they understand fairness and they also understand obeying the law, which 99 per cent of them do. The board has clearly found this government in violation of the law of Parliament. I ask again, what will the government do to get back to the bargaining table and negotiate fairly, in accordance with the law, and stop the turmoil it has caused in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to tell the hon. member that I am ready to meet with Daryl Bean any time he wants—this afternoon, if he so chooses. But I want it to be very clear that we are not moving from the zero and three, but we are prepared to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: This is not something new. It was in the budget. If the Liberals are so worried about the legislated wage freeze, what did they say about the premier of New Brunswick—your province, Mr. Leader of the Opposition—when he legislated a freeze of 0 per cent?

We are going through a difficult period. We are making decisions, we are not passing them on to our children.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, because it seems clear from the minister's answers that he does not understand the difference between negotiating and dictating.

Independent conciliation boards have said that this government must bargain in good faith and has not been doing so. The Staff Relations Board again this afternoon made the same judgment and said the government was not complying with section 51 of the act. There is only one group in this dispute which is acting in good faith and that is the Public Service Alliance, which today said that to show good faith they would take down the pickets at airports and they would expedite border crossings.

Will the Prime Minister show good faith and instruct his government's negotiators to sit down now with public servants who do so much good work for this country, negotiate in good faith and negotiate on the terms of the contract on which they are entitled to negotiate.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, to negotiate in good faith one has to take account of the reality of life.

Would the Leader of the NDP propose that I use the Daryl Bean solution? When he was faced with similar problems a few months ago he said: "I understand that my staff members are a little bitter and frustrated, but these are tough times", and he proceeded to close 20 positions.

I prefer to keep our civil servants and to give them an offer which on the whole is reasonable.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, public servants know perfectly well what is happening. This year, for instance, a speech writer working for one of the government's ministers was paid nearly $24,000 for five weeks of work. Meanwhile, some 5,000 public service employees, most of them women, earn about $20,000 a year, for 52 weeks.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Everyone says that wage equity is a matter of simple justice. Why won't this government do the right thing now for women, for the most disadvantaged members of the Public Service?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party mentioned the problems experienced by public servants in this situation, and as someone who has been a public servant for much of his life, I must say I understand the problem.

However, I think they also realize what the situation is and that today, in all sectors, collective agreements are being renegotiated. What about Canadian Airlines and Air Canada? We are going through a difficult period, and these are the people who will have to pay, with their salaries.

I understand why public servants are upset. They deserve to get a lot more. But that being said, as far as equity is concerned, it is a very serious problem and we are constantly looking for ways to improve the situation in this country.

I think the Leader of the NDP could at least acknowledge the initiative taken by this government in 1990 to set aside $317 million to bring wages to equitable levels, and that same government is adding $87 million annually. I think that is quite something, considering the present financial situation. I agree there is room for improvement, and we are prepared to make those improvements.

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like the people of Canada to understand that the Canadian Human Rights Commission, which said that this government must institute pay equity, is being taken to court and challenged by this government about pay equity. The people of Canada and the women of Canada understand that.

We have a situation here where senior management, senior civil servants and indeed members of Parliament are receiving salary increases. We see the head of the Bank of Canada receiving a substantial increase. We have received a substantial increase this year.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party to put her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: I want to simply ask the Prime Minister a question.

On one hand, we do have those who are the most privileged in our society receiving salary increases. On the other hand, we have people who are working for the Public Service, such as single parents, women, still making $20,000 a year. This government says no to them. Is this right? Or is this wrong?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not right and it is certainly not true.

I will repeat again that the senior managers of the Canadian government, the ministers, the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the members of Parliament will all receive when the time comes at the first of December, zero per cent for the following year. They will receive 3 per cent the year after and 3 per cent the year after that.

Members of Parliament will not get an increase before January 1, 1933.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: With regard to the managers, the year starts in June. The Alliance got 4.8 per cent and the managers got 4.2 per cent for last year. Since June, they are at zero per cent increase.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: I wish the leader would get her facts straight.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, if it is 1933, maybe the minister will make it retroactive.

I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries who has had in his hot little hands for two months now a report stating in graphic detail that the Newfoundland inshore fishery is in absolute total collapse.

For example, 8,200 fishermen and plant workers on the northeast coast alone, including some in his riding, will not qualify this year for UI although all of them qualified last year.

Is the minister now ready to act on the recommendations in that report and bring in an aid package for those fishermen and plant workers, or some sort of a catch failure program?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the fishery along the northeast coast of Newfoundland and along the coast of Labrador has been extremely poor this year due, one has to assume, to very late ice conditions, cold and sloppy water and to the fact that as a result of that the codfish and the capelin have not come in as they normally do.

There has been an absolute, total collapse in certain areas such as for example the fishery in Labrador. It would not be true to say that there has been an absolute total collapse of the inshore fishery in Newfoundland this year, but there is a serious situation with respect to the northeast coast.

It is likely that the amount of inshore cod caught along that coast this year might only be 50 per cent of what it was last year. We do have a serious situation. This has been under assessment now for some weeks. We are considering with the provincial government—

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Mr. Crosbie: If this is unimportant to the hon. gentleman opposite, I can sit down. We have been consulting with the Government of Newfoundland and with the industry there for some time. We will be bringing forward proposals when they are ready.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister it is due to ice and sloppy water, but I think he might agree it is due to some fairly sloppy government as well.

These fishermen and these plant workers, as he knows, have no fish, no money, and what is now painfully obvious is that they have nobody in the cabinet prepared to argue, to plead the urgency of their particular case.

Why is the minister dragging his feet on this? Why does he not take off that St. John's fish merchants hat and go to bat for those people who are really hurting out there and who, contrary to what he says, are caught in situation of total collapse in the fishery? He should check his figures because they are much more dramatic than he would admit in this House.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I will leave it up to the viewing audience to judge the grossness of this rhetoric, but I would just point out that when the fishermen along this coast needed assistance from May and, in fact, well up in August with respect to the fact they could not fish because of ice, I arranged a nice compensation program that has put $18 million into their hands during that period.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who knows that farmers right across this country, grain and oilseeds, horticulture producers, are facing the worst financial crisis in a generation because the government has not provided emergency transitional funding for the losses in last year's crop.

I want to ask the minister when this government is going to act. When are they going to provide this assistance in view of the tremendous disaster facing Canadian producers this summer.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, assistance provided by the Government of Canada and the provincial governments last year was assistance to bring us forward to this time where the safety net programs, both GRIP and NISA, could be put in place.

I remind the hon. member that both GRIP and NISA were designed by farm groups, by provincial governments, and by the Government of Canada. It was at the request of the farmers and their organizations that there be a very specific support system in place. That is what we have at this time, and as we proceed with the interim payments on GRIP, and with the NISA payments that are going out at this time, the producers will receive the support that the hon. member is asking for. These programs were designed in co-operation with producers.

I understand this is a difficult time, but as the cash flow of some $2 billion from these safety net programs enters the farmers' hands, they will find that it has been this government and the provincial governments that have come to their support in this time of low prices.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that his own third line of defence emergency committee rejected that solution two weeks ago in Winnipeg. They told him and asked him to provide emergency assistance, third line of defence based on the losses that occurred in the past crop year.

I want to ask the minister when he is going to recognize that they have made a mistake and that they have to bring forth emergency assistance for those losses as soon as possible.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member should recognize is that the Farm Support and Adjustment Measures, FSAM, that were put in place this summer totalled over $650 million. Those support systems were put in place to bridge farmers into the safety nets for the 1991 crop. Farmers are now concluding this crop. They will then be able to apply under the GRIP and NISA programs.

I say to the hon. member with all sincerity that if he wishes to support the grains and oilseed sector, if he wishes to support the cattle industry and other important agriculture sectors, he will support this government in getting the grain moving, opening up the packing plants, allowing producers access to a market that is being denied because of the PSAC strike.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who surely knows that we can deliver all the $2 wheat we like and we will never get ourselves out of the hole that farmers are in as a result of last year's shortfall of income. It is that last year's shortfall of more than $1 billion that is not being addressed by this government. GRIP and NISA address this coming year. They cannot carry that deficit into a year with $2 wheat which has less purchasing power than was ever the case in the history of recorded wheat prices.

What happened to the third line of defence payment? What became of the third line of defence? It was promised throughout the negotiations all of last year and it has disappeared. What happened to it?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member or at least I really believe the hon. member is not saying that the some $650 million that was put forward on the third line of defence to bring the grains and oilseed producers over into the safety nets of GRIP and NISA is nothing.

An hon. member: That is not enough.

Mr. McKnight: One member from the Liberal Party says that is not enough. I understand that it is difficult at this time, but I remind colleagues that the third line of defence committee met in September in Winnipeg, addressed this issue and recognized that the very system the hon. member is criticizing is a system that was identified by producers, the provincial government and the Government of Canada to assist grains and oilseeds producers through this very difficult time, until stabilization through GRIP and NISA can be achieved.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the minister will recognize that throughout the negotiations it was understood by all of the negotiating parties that third line of defence would apply for those periods of time when GRIP and NISA were not in effect, which is namely the crop year that has just finished.

When is the government going to make the third line of defence an effective program, rather than introducing red herrings such as was produced in April which reduced the premiums that were expenses farmers did not have before GRIP and NISA were introduced? When will it address the real problem of a shortfall of $1 billion?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as part of the assistance through this bridging process there was assistance provided by the Government of Canada on the premium of 25 per cent for the gross revenue insurance program.

If the hon. member is saying that the 25 per cent of that premium being paid by the people of Canada is not of any benefit, I think producers would object to that.

If the hon. member is saying that the total contribution that the federal government is making through NISA to producers who are claiming assistance under NISA at this time is not of benefit then I am sorry. There are over $650 million for last year being put at the disposal of producers, plus this year there will be some $2 billion to producers for the 1991 crop.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member through you that he may object to the price of $2 for wheat. I object to it also, but I do ask him to take a look at producers who have grain on the ground, the bins that are overflowing, and ask him for his help along with his colleagues so that we can move grain and so that producers are able to take advantage.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture.

We have a crisis on Canadian farms. These are the people who produce food for Canadians. A standing committee of this House recognized that crisis in late August and unanimously passed a motion calling upon the government to provide, on an emergency basis now, aid to Canadian farmers in order to help them survive this year.

I remind the House that this was a unanimous decision and motion. What is going to be done? Nothing has been done yet.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleague that although there may be differences as to the amount of dollars provided, I think all members of this House recognize the assistance that has been put in place at this difficult time.

Members on the government side and members in the opposition benches understand that it is a difficult time in the agriculture community, not just in the grains and oilseeds industry. Specifically, with the grains and oilseeds producers we have provided as a bridging mechanism some $650 million last year. That includes cash advances and NISA, which producers at this time may collect. There is even an opportunity for provinces to add additional funds to those NISA accounts and some provinces have taken advantage of that.

I refer the hon. member to the $2 billion. When NISA starts to flow between September and December, there will be some $337 million flow under NISA. In the first interim under GRIP there will be approximately $406 million. There will be another interim under GRIP of—

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry. I must ask the hon. minister to shorten his answers.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental question is to the same minister.

I want to remind the House that the crisis is now. The financial crisis is also causing a psychological and emotional problem in Canadian farm families in homes across this nation.

I would like to ask the minister what the government is doing to provide support and guidance to Canadian farm families while they are trying to exist on a day-to-day basis.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the assistance has been put forward not just by the Government of Canada, but in co-operation with our partners in the agricultural industry, the provinces and the producers themselves.

The hon. member must recognize that the programs that have been designed over the last six to eight months to assist producers have been designed with the co-operation of farmers, the other partners in the industry, the provincial governments, and any further discussion such as will take place by the third line of defence in October will involve consultation with those partners.

I ask the hon. member, if he is talking about psychological damage, to think of the grain producers in western Canada with grain on the ground, his inability to deliver the product that he has worked hard to grow because some hon. members believe that he should not have that ability and support a union in their demand for $2 billion tax dollars from the Government of Canada.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Need I remind him that Canadians are still waiting for his government's proposal to resolve the constitutional impasse. Yesterday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that there was still no consensus on this issue within Cabinet. My question for the Prime Minister is very simple: Is there a Cabinet crisis, yes or no? When will we have the government's proposal to break the constitutional deadlock?

An hon. member: There is no crisis!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Unfortunately for my friend from Papineau—Saint-Michel, there is no crisis. On the contrary, everything is going well. In the near future, as agreed, we will table constitutional proposals, and I know, or at least I hope, that we will have the support of all Canadians in developing a new Canada.

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister give this House the assurance that his government will come forward with a comprehensive proposal spelling out the government's position and making it very clear that he will not abdicate his responsibility by asking a parliamentary committee to make the suggestion on which his own cabinet is unable to agree?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will be bringing forward very soon, as the Prime Minister said, specific proposals from this government to a committee where we hope those proposals will be improved by the committee and by the people of Canada.

We at least learned a lesson from the experience of Meech Lake and that lesson was, among other things, that we cannot shut the people of Canada out of the writing of their own Constitution.

We do not intend to shut the people of Canada out of the writing of their own Constitution. We will give them firm proposals. We will ask for their considered judgment and their improvement, and we hope that then together we can go forward to achieve progress that will change the constitutional nature of this country.

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who knows that over the summer the United States Coast Guard illegally boarded and seized seven Canadian fishing vessels inside Canada in Dixon Entrance.

Would the minister explain to Canadians why the government has refused to lay charges against those members of the United States military who illegally seized Canadian vessels and forcibly removed Canadian citizens from Canada to the United States?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the incident. We are also well aware of the situation within that area.

This government, as previous governments, has never ever recognized that those disputed waters belong to the United States. Those are sovereign Canadian waters. We protested publicly and strongly and we beefed up our own surveillance on the other coast as well.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Prime Minister.

I think it would be helpful for the Prime Minister to explain the policy to Canadians behind granting immunity from prosecution to members of the United States military who have committed indictable criminal offences in Canada this summer, while Canadian citizens legally fishing inside Canada are kidnapped, jailed and forced to pay ransom by the United States and are formally offered no assistance by Ottawa.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter is still under discussion with U.S. authorities and Canada will continue to be consistent in its approach to those waters.

In the meantime, since it is under discussion, I think it is probably inappropriate to comment further because those discussions are strong ones.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The agriculture industry is presently experiencing a desperate financial situation. The government has put in place excellent safety net programs which will help agriculture in the future. However, many farmers cannot wait for the proceeds of these programs. They need assistance now.

Will the minister advise this House of any further steps he will take to alleviate the present situation facing our farmers?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is aware of the assistance that has been provided. Members from the opposition say they doubt it. I happen to know that the hon. member is very involved in her community and very involved in the agricultural sector and that her question is a serious one.

As I have said to other colleagues who have asked the question, there is at this time and there was last year in the Farm Support and Adjustment Measures program some $650 million made available. That was to bridge farmers into the safety nets of both GRIP and NISA. That means that over the next 12-month period there will be approximately $2 billion paid out to producers in those support systems.

What I do say to the hon. member and other colleagues is that the third line of defence committee, which is made up of provincial and industry men and women and the Government of Canada, is continuing to address and monitor what we are observing taking place around the world. However, I do know that she would agree with me that one way to change the outlook is for producers to have the ability to move grain to the market, and I hope she will do that.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Around August 28 or 29, Canada Post lost 1,600 old age security pension cheques for seniors who live in Val-d'Or. On your initiative, you had duplicates of these cheques printed on August 30 and on Saturday morning, August 31, with the letter carriers and postal workers of Val-d'Or, we were able to distribute these cheques to the seniors.

Mr. Speaker, my question is: Are you prepared, on behalf of the seniors of Quebec and Canada, to confirm to us today that their September pension cheques will be delivered to their homes before September 30 by Canadian letter carriers and postal workers, and not by Canada Post managers with their temporary offices? We have had enough of making old people wait in front of these offices for hours!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, the recipients of old age security pensions did indeed receive their August cheque and I have no indication at this time to believe that it will be otherwise in September. Therefore I think that everything should go normally, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halton—Peel on a supplemental.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, during the recent postal dispute everybody lost—businesses, pensioners, the post office and its employees.

Mr. Speaker: For a supplemental it is appropriate to put the question.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, there has to be a better way to manage postal relations. Will the minister responsible for Canada Post now adopt a recommendation made by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs that "in the event of a disruption in postal services Canada Post's exclusive privilege to deliver letters should be suspended for the period of the disruption".

Does the minister not agree that by removing both Canada Post's monopoly and the union's ability to hold people—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member I think has put the question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, along with the overwhelming majority of Canadians, I share the hon. member's disgust at these postal strikes which occur with such regularity and the damage it does to the economy.

I think the question of examining the monopoly is well worth looking into, and indeed we might consider doing it on a permanent basis so that Canadians cannot be held for ransom the way they have been.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance have stated on several occasions that the recession in Canada was over. Obviously, the government is turning a blind eye to the deplorable economic situation in the Montreal area.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: How can the Prime Minister say that the recession is over when housing starts in the Montreal area dropped 40 per cent during the month of August alone?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, according to the economic indicators, the recession has ended and economic recovery should be on its way.

Mr. Speaker, with his experience, the hon. member should know that it may be a matter of weeks and months before the cumulative effect of economic recovery can make itself felt, but I am confident that this will happen. We are analysing the situation through the Quebec regional economic development board. We are receiving an increasing number of requests for assistance, which means that businesses in the Montreal area are ready to get off to a fresh start.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that businesses in Montreal are recovering. What about Air Canada which two weeks ago laid off 911 employees, including 458 in Montreal? Today, Nationair laid off 180 employees, including 90 in Montreal.

Is that economic recovery?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, most economic studies have given a very good assessment of the situation in the air transportation industry in Canada. The phenomenon is not peculiar to Montreal but to the air transportation industry in general, not just in Canada but throughout the world, and especially in the United States where a number of large companies have disappeared.

I strongly advise the hon. member to read these studies, and I am sure he will then understand the situation, Mr. Speaker.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

When federal support to education drops from 7.3 per cent in 1986 to 6.4 per cent in 1991, when Canada Employment Centres on campus are closed in spite of youth unemployment of close to 20 per cent, when the government imposes a new tax on Canada's student loans, why does the government continue to talk about a learning culture? When will the government stop its assault on Canadian students?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer my hon. colleague opposite by saying that first of all I have met with the student bodies. We have discussed what the government is doing at the moment, and I have indicated very clearly that the program he mentioned, the Student Loan Program, is a program that is some 27 years old.

In early summer I asked my officials to conduct a thorough review of the program, which is very near completed, and we will be making an announcement in this House in the very near future as to how the government intends to continue helping students in need attain their educational goals.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister.

Thousand of students across Canada are protesting against the new 3 per cent tax on university and college student loans. Is the government, is the minister prepared to withdraw this unfair tax which prevents students from continuing their education? Why is he once again taxing people who already have trouble making ends meet, Mr. Speaker?

• (1500)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I explained in English, this program was introduced in 1964. This 27 years old program has never been reviewed. It has flaws and improvements are in order. That is what we are doing. In the weeks to come, months at the most, we will be introducing in this House as new program to help students in need complete their education.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for the Treasury Board said earlier today that he would meet with the president of the Public Service Alliance this afternoon, but the president must understand that the minister is not moving from zero and three.

The ruling of the Public Service Staff Relations Board in its order says: "The insistence on conditions precedent to negotiations—"

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is necessary that the hon. member read the order. I would ask her to put her question.

Ms. Langan: Is the minister saying that he is going to ignore this ruling of the Public Service Staff Relations Board?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, of course not.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise hon. members that there are at this time some tributes to be paid.

TRIBUTES

THE LATE HON. ROLAND MITCHENER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a very distinguished Canadian.

When Roland Michener died, every Canadian had reason to grieve. All of Rolly Michener's adult life was spent in the service of the country that he loved so much.

He brought to public life the powerful virtues of dedication, selflessness and generosity. He will be remembered above all for his serenity and perhaps as well for his smile. I have no doubt that Canadian history will smile back at the legacy of this remarkable man who occupied the highest office in our land and was never happier than when he could meet with ordinary Canadians in their own communities and share their pride in being citizens of what is quite a marvellous country.

Some would say, though, that he was probably happiest jogging daily at 90 years of age and urging, by his example, an entire and sometimes reluctant nation to follow his route to good health and longevity.

[Translation]

Next year, we will celebrate our country's 125th anniversary. Canada, a vast and great country which inspires respect and envy all over the world. On that occasion, we will recall its glorious history as we look to an even brighter future. As we remember with emotion those men and women who have devoted their lives to making Canada a better place, no doubt many of us will think of Roland Michener.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had the great privilege of knowing Mr. Michener when he was Governor General and I was serving in this House.

He was a great public servant. He had a great personality and a great variety of topics to discuss and he was always very relaxed.

Later, when I quit politics for a few years, I shared many days with him because we were working in the same law firm. As the Prime Minister said, he was very relaxed and very philosophical about things and always cared a lot about what was going on in this country.

If we were all to be like him, putting forward our best for the good of the nation, the country would be much better. He was a great example of public service and what it is all about to be comfortable anywhere in Canada.

When he was the Governor General—

[Translation]

—he went to Quebec, and everybody recognized him immediatly. Particularly in the latter part of his life, with his sportsmanship, his fine figure and especially his concern for young people, urging them to stay in shape, he showed us how one can be a great Canadian who gained a great deal from serving his country, be it as a member of this House, as Governor General of Canada or as ambassador abroad. I hope that such an example will be an inspiration for the coming generations of Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to express my personal regrets and the regrets of my party at the passing this summer of the former Governor General and former Speaker of this House, Roland Michener.

[Translation]

Mr. Michener led a life we can all be proud of. After serving in this House as a member, he went on to become the Speaker of the House of Commons, Canadian ambassador to India and Governor General of Canada. He served his country well. He did so with unequalled dedication and enthousiasm.

[English]

Roland Michener was, to most of us, much more than a Rhodes scholar and admired House of Commons Speaker. The core of his character represented so much to us about what is good about Canada. His tolerance and his understanding, his sense of fairness and in fact his sense of humour were something that immediately attracted all Canadians and we too became part of that mission that he had on behalf of Canada.

Finally, I would like to say that Roland Michener led a very colourful and productive life. I am sure all of us hope that the values that he stood for and the love that he had for his country will live on in all of us.

THE LATE SENATOR AZELLUS DENIS

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, when the time comes to pay a final tribute to a man who gave 56 years of his life to politics, I realize that few of my fellow citizens meet the definition of "political" as clearly as Azellus Denis did.

It can be said that by practising for more than half a century a profession that he loved, he acquired virtues like realism, prudence and a certain wisdom that arose from this long experience. For if the scholar studies books, as Balzac said, the politician studies people, their interests and the causes that give rise to their actions. Shrewd, sensible, at times crafty, Senator Denis, who had been a member of Parliament for 28 years, was a real politician. Political institutions—organization, government and public affairs—had long ceased to hold secrets for him.

I can even say that he was what is called a "political animal", that is, someone with all the talents and all the shrewdness required to work effectively as a zealous member of his party.

Allow me a few moments more for a career which will go down in the annals of the Commonwealth as—

[English]

—probably one of those who served the longest in the Commonwealth, 56 years: 28 as a member and 28 as a senator.

[Translation]

Under an often rough exterior, the man whom everyone affectionately called Azellus, sometimes with a hint of mockery, had a tender heart. He had a sense for friendship; he had the gift of keeping his friends. It is regrettable that he refused to write his memoirs, despite my many requests.

Fortunately, I remember very well our many meetings and discussions, from the first day I was his master of ceremonies in 1949.

Mr. Speaker, you can imagine what this politician, who knew the end of the Great Depression when he was first elected in 1935, who knew the Second World War, who knew conscription, who knew the glorious post-war years, who witnessed the establishment of NATO, would have had to say to us. He was always loyal to his party. He served Mackenzie King, of whom he spoke to us so often, and was elected with him in 1940 and 1945. In 1948 came the great and friendly Louis Saint-Laurent, re-elected with him in 1949, 1953 and 1957. As he said, while his party was defeated, he was re-elected.

• (1510)

Then there was Lester B. Pearson, the fine and distinguished diplomat. He was re-elected with him in 1958, a very difficult year for us, and witnessed the end of the Diefenbaker regime in 1962 as well as the coming to power of Pearson in 1963. I am getting now to the most important part of his life. He, the man who understood the poor so well, was made Minister of Postal Services. No doubt the popularity he enjoyed at the time would have been of great help today. In 1964, he was appointed to the Senate, where he sat ever since, and I had the privilege of taking over as member for his former riding.

Imagine how much I learned from him about the Duplessis era and the turbulent and exhilarating days of debate on the Quiet Revolution! He was a first class member of Parliament—and I am addressing those who are listening as well as those who should—great at representing his riding, always available to his people, to the little man and the less affluent members of society.

This is something we should reflect upon at this time, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate that you did not have the opportunity of hearing him in caucus when he stood up for the needy in a style of his own, of course, and without all the usual media fanfare. He was a reserved, quiet and modest man of good advice on people and on things.

Someone wrote about on him, on the role he played in René Lévesque's election in 1960.

Having been close to the action in those days, I can assure you that, had it not been for him and my late father, René Lévesque would have never made it in 1960, and you can read about this in René Lévesque's memoirs.

A man of wisdom with a colourful way of expressing himself, with his demise, another page of parliamentary history is turned. To his wife, my dear friend, Mrs. Émé Denis, I extend, on behalf of us all, my best wishes for a long life and the assurance that today we are with her in our prayers. Have no fear, honourable colleagues, Azellus was welcomed in Paradise by his many friends, always anxious to know what is going on down here, on this troubled earth and in this party he loved so dearly.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we were dismayed to hear that Senator Azellus Denis had passed away on Wednesday, September 4.

A great patriot and man of action, he served his province and his country well for over half a century in the humanitarian and social as well as the political sphere. He gave generously of his person and helped to make our society what it is today.

I therefore wish to join all our compatriots and the members of this House in offering his family and friends our sincere condolences.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the Minister of National Defence in offering my sincere condolences to the family of Senator Denis.

I have had the privilege of sitting in this House for many years, and Senator Denis was in the Senate throughout that time. Like the hon. member for Saint-Denis, he was a true servant of the public. He was always available to his constituency. He was full of good advice for everyone, and my colleagues and I always enjoyed talking to Senator Denis because he would give us an entirely different perspective that was always very down to earth.

Often when you read editorials you tend to get carried away by new ideas, but the senator was fond of saving that what peaked today might be gone tomorrow. In fact, there was a lot of truth in what he said.

This gentleman, who spent 56 years in public life, was an example to us all and very hard worker. In conclusion, I think all members would do well to remember, like the senator, that we are here because there are some people out there who put their trust in us.

I therefore wish to pay tribute to his memory and offer his family my sincere condolences.

[English]

THE LATE WILLIAM KEN ROBINSON

I would like to speak about another person who passed away not long ago, who had been a member of Parliament, Mr. William Ken Robinson. He was in this House with us for many years and was another example of a person who decided to serve. All of his life he was involved in organizations that meant something to the grassroots, such as the Red Cross and organizations of this nature. Later, when he came to this Parliament, he was always trying to be a bridge between the different factions in this House. He was always involved in interparliamentary organizations, very often travelling abroad.

He was an anglophone who was extremely proud of the fact that he would participate in organizations of members of Parliament in the French language. For him it was a great contribution.

I had the privilege of working with him when he was my parliamentary secretary in 1980 when we were involved in the referendum and patriation of the Constitution. Whenever I felt the pressure, Ken was there giving me a good slap on the back and telling me to keep up the good work. He will be missed.

I see his wife and his two sons in the gallery. You have to be proud of your husband and your father. He was a great guy and we will miss him very much.

THE LATE SENATOR AZELLUS DENIS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I too want to say how saddened we were when we learned last Wednesday of the passing of Senator Denis.

Senator Denis served in Parliament for more than half a century. He was elected before many of us were born.

While I do not have knowledge of what happens inside the Liberal caucus, I do know from various comments that people have made over the years, that when discussions of a critical nature occurred, Senator Denis often stood back, but when he did speak, he spoke for the people. He spoke for the people of his constituency when he was a member of Parliament.

When we look at Senator Denis' record and acknowledge the fact that he was first elected in 1935, re-elected in 1940, 1945, 1949, 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962, 1963, you know that here was an individual who not only served his constituents well, but served his country well.

Mr. Speaker, our prayers and our sympathies go out to his fine wife.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to add a few words, especially after what was said by our colleage from Saint-Denis. I know Senator Denis was his political mentor, and I also happen to know the Senator was an important factor in the political career of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint—Michel.

Personally, as someone who met Senator Denis, first as a ministerial assistant and later as a member of this House, I can testify to the fact that he was genuine. When we say French Canadian, with all that traditionally implies, Senator Denis was a real French Canadian. I heard him speak over the years, and what he said was always imbued with common sense. We have all had occasion to listen to his remarks, and today, with my colleagues, I wish to pay tribute to the senator and thank him for his words of wisdom and his advice were greatly appreciated.

Tributes

THE LATE WILLIAM KENNETH ROBINSON

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it was with sadness that we learned about the passing of our former colleague, William Kenneth Robinson, former member of Parliament for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. Ken Robinson suffered from a brain tumour and died at the Queensway General Hospital on July 25 when this House was not sitting.

As our leader has already said, he is survived by his wife Margery and his two sons, John and James, brothers Keith, Arthur, Norman and sisters Verna Tanner and Shirley Mathews.

Ken Robinson represented the Etobicoke—Lakeshore riding for 14 years, from 1968 to 1972 and again from 1974 to 1984. In 1984 his political career was cut short when, on the evening of his own nomination, he ended up in hospital.

Ken was a hard worker and liked the challenge. He talked to me a lot about his responsibilities as parliamentary secretary to four ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General, the Minister of State for Social Development, the Minister of National Revenue. He served conscientiously on two parliamentary standing committees, the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He was an active member on the international unions and associations, the Interparliamentary Union, known as IPU; the Canadian Native Parliamentary Union; the Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group; the Canada—U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group, and the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Ken received his law degree from Osgoode Hall and practised in his own law firm in Etobicoke as Queen's Counsel. I learned from his family today that Ken was a lifetime learner and just last year he received his doctorate in philosophy.

Mr. Speaker, if you check the Canadian Parliamentary Guide you will see that Mr. Robinson probably held the Guiness Book of World Records for belonging to various associations, societies and organizations. He served with the Royal Canadian Air Force and was a lieutenant-colonel in the reserves. He was honorary president of the St. John's Ambulance Association, a member of the Board of Governors of Queensway General Hospital Association. He was on the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council; president of the Canadian Tai Kwan Do Association; patron of the Canadian Field Hockey Association; chairman of the Gurkha Welfare Trust Canada.

Ken was also active in the Etobicoke—Queensway Lions Club, where memorial services will be held on October 11, 1991 at 8 p.m. This memorial service is being organized by the residents of Etobicoke and West Toronto, again indicating their appreciation for what Ken did for his community and for the country.

Ken was a member of the Royal Canadian Legion, Branch 217; he was a member of the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society. He was also a member of the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, the Association of Corrections and Criminology, the Canadian Club, the UN Association in Canada, the Royal Commonwealth Society, the Canadian branch of Amnesty International, and that is just a bit of what is listed in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide.

Ken had a big heart. He was always ready to help others, whether it was helping others through his parliamentary role, his law profession, through the Liberal Party or through his day to day activities. Ken was a well-liked workaholic, putting in long hours and eight-day work weeks. It was not uncommon to see Ken in his office at 11 p.m. or midnight or even 1 o'clock in the morning. He will be missed by his family, colleagues in this House, his friends and, above all, his constituents. Ken represented his constituents for 14 years, the constituents of Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): I rise today on behalf of the members of this side to pay tribute to Colonel Ken Robinson. I might start by saying, sir, that the current member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Mr. Patrick Boyer, wanted to be here specifically to do this himself but, like Wayne Gretzky, he has back problems this week and cannot be here. He sends his personal regrets and homage.

To know Ken was to know a very special guy. I had the privilege, sir, of knowing him in this House and outside this House. Not only did we spend four years here together in parliamentary service, but we served for many years on the councils both locally and nationally of the Royal Commonwealth Society, which is only one—as my colleague has indicated—of the dozens of important national institutions to which Ken gave unstintingly of his time and his energy.

To know Ken was to know one of the proudest Canadians one could ever meet. No Canadian, English or French speaking ever fought harder in the defence of his or her heritage. His record of public service and dedication will serve as a shining example to all of us.

On behalf of all the members on this side, sir, we extend our sincere condolences to his wife Margery, and his two sons, Jamie and John.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party caucus, I want to say how saddened we were when we heard the news on July 25 of the passing of Ken Robinson.

My colleagues in the House of Commons have commented on the wide range of ways in which Ken served his community and his country. In the Canadian Parliamentary Guide, Mr. Speaker, it goes on longer than almost any other parliamentarian, listing all of the ways Ken served his country.

I want to say, on a personal note, that I had the pleasure of serving in the House of Commons with Ken in the early 1980s and although we were from different political parties and I was a rookie member of Parliament, I remember many, many days spent discussing matters over cups of coffee as he informed me of the the ways that this House operated. I will be forever grateful for the generosity he showed me during those novice years as a parliamentarian.

Our hearts go out to an individual who served this country with distinction, who was an extremely hard-working parliamentarian on behalf of his party and the House of Commons and, in particular, on behalf of his constituents.

Our prayers and our thoughts today are with his wife Margery and his two sons Jamie and John.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute as well to Ken Robinson. He was elected in 1968, the same year that I was elected, along with 70 or 80 other new, fresh members at that time. I do not think there was anybody who brought a greater enthusiasm, interest or concern for their constituents to the House of Commons than Ken Robinson. He served in this place for some 14 years, up until 1980. He had a very distinguished career here in the House of Commons. He was a lawyer by profession. He served in the Royal Canadian Air Force. He was a member of an enviable list of community and city organizations from the constituency of Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

While here, as well, he served as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General and the Minister of National Revenue.

The three points I would like to make is that Ken served his constituents very well, he was very concerned about his country and their well-being and that he was a good friend. He was a good friend to members long after he left the House of Commons. You would see him at caucus reunions and so on. He did not forget those people.

I know that many members of this House were shocked to learn this past weekend, who were not aware, that he had passed away in July of this past summer, after quite a lengthy illness.

I simply want to express to his wife Margery and to John and Jamie, our condolences especially from all members on this side of the House, but especially from those members of the class of 68 who were first elected to the House of Commons with him and enjoyed his friendship so much, his camaraderie and the good times we had together.

THE LATE GRACE MACINNIS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege and honour today to speak on behalf of the Conservative Party of Canada in honour of Mrs. Grace MacInnis who passed away this summer at the age of 85 in Sechelt, British Columbia.

We understand that during her last years she suffered greatly from arthritis, but this physical affliction did not affect her in any way mentally. She was noted when she was a member of this House, as well as the provincial legislature, for her keen mind, the strong and well reasoned positions that she took on matters she felt were important to her.

As I mentioned, she served as an MLA in the provincial legislature from 1941 to 1945 for the riding of Vancouver—Burrard and served as the member of Parliament for Vancouver East from 1965 to 1972. This was a seat that her husband Angus had held previously from 1935 to 1957.

I might add that my grandfather was a very strong advocate of the CCF party at that time and a good friend of the MacInnises. Like Mr. Woodsworth, he would spend half his time preaching the gospel and half the time preaching the gospel of socialism.

Mrs. MacInnis was elected as a member of Parliament from British Columbia. She was also the only woman member of Parliament when she was here in the House. She was involved in issues which were not popular at that time such as contraception and abortion. She took her stand and her position, for which I understand she was ridiculed roundly by her male colleagues. She also undertook a stand on the humane treatment for the Japanese internees during the war, again a position that was not popular.

As I said, she was a woman of keen intellect, great principles and determination. I am sure that she will be missed by all her friends and colleagues but she has left each one of us a pioneering legacy not only as Canadians but as parliamentarians. So we wish her survivors and her colleagues the best wishes that we possibly can at this sad time.

• (1530)

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to pay tribute to Grace MacInnis who died on July 17, 1991. Grace MacInnis, the MP for Vancouver Kingsway from 1965 to 1972, was an outstanding Canadian. She was a charter member of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation which was founded by her father, J. S. Woodsworth, in 1933.

As my colleague said, she represented Vancouver Burrard in Victoria from 1941 to 1945 and was the first woman from British Columbia to become a member of Parliament in 1965. She was married to Angus MacInnis, who had earlier represented Vancouver East for 22 years, and she carried on his fight for redress for Japanese Canadians.

Grace MacInnis represented all that is best in a politician and a member of Parliament. She had clear goals as a democratic socialist, a deep respect for people, and a dogged determination to fight for what she believed was right. She spoke eloquently about bread and butter issues that affected peoples' lives, encouraging people to organize and take collective action to solve problems and work for change.

She did not hesitate to speak her mind. She was bilingual and had a strong appreciation of Quebec's place in Canada.

I knew Grace personally best on the front lines of community action in the 1970s when she encouraged public housing tenants and mothers on welfare to organize and fight for their rights to child care, jobs, decent housing, and a say in decisions that affected their lives.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall how she brought their cause to Parliament and spoke up for them.

Women parliamentarians will appreciate that Grace MacInnis had a lonely life as the only female member of Parliament in 1968. Despite the heckling from male colleagues who she once referred to as "MCPs", she continued to fight for birth control programs and the right to choice on abortion. She often said that all children should be wanted and loved and women should make their own decisions on medical matters. She advocated pay for parenting so women would not have to suffer the indignities of welfare and their essential work would be recognized.

After retirement, Grace continued her interest in people and Canada and in our party. Despite failing health, she was in demand as an inspirational speaker and she rarely refused an invitation. Painfully crippled with arthritis, she used to say: "I work fine from the neck up".

She continued to be an inspiration for aspiring politicians, including several of us in the House, and a role model for women across Canada. Above all, Grace MacInnis cared for children and wanted a better world for future generations. She established the Lucie L. Woodsworth fund in memory of her mother to enrich the lives of disadvantaged children.

Grace MacInnis will remain an inspiration to future generations for her pioneering efforts in the CCF-NDP, her integrity as a politician, her love of Canada, and her dedication to achieving a peaceful and caring world through social democracy.

On behalf of members of Parliament, I extend condolences to her family and friends in their loss. We also celebrate her rich life that has left a legacy for all of us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me to stand in this House today on behalf of the Liberal Party and pay tribute to the late Grace MacInnis. She was a woman who bore a proud tradition and a proud heritage as the daughter of J. S. Woodsworth. She was also a woman who stood on her own and many times alone in this Chamber as a model for women and for politicians everywhere.

Earlier, in preparing this tribute, I spoke briefly with the hon. member for Windsor West who told me how well she handled a variety of critics positions while in this House and he particularly remembered her competence in being critic for consumer affairs when he was minister.

Mr. Speaker, it is something for women in this House to be able to look back 50 years, or 20 years, or even five years for models in all parties who have gone before those of us who work here today. Grace MacInnis was a great role model for the women of Canada and, indeed, for all politicians, and she will stand as a shining beacon in Canadian history.

Mr. Brewin: I am quite content to give way to my friend, formerly from Kingsway, who has seniority and also charm.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I certainly have the seniority. I do not know about the charm.

Mr. Speaker, I rise as the former and last member for Vancouver Kingsway to add to the eloquent words that have been spoken in the House, especially by my colleague, the member for Vancouver East.

Grace McInnis affected all people. I heard about the role model for women in the House and I listened very intently to that. I just want to add a few words as to how she affected me.

She and her husband stood alone in Canada for the interests of the Japanese Canadians when they were interned during the war. Angus McInnis gave a speech in this House, I believe in 1944, where he was alone. Grace told me personally that when they stood up and spoke in Vancouver in those days, it was like going against a tidal wave of public opinion. It is usually easy to go with the flow, but it is pretty difficult and it takes a lot of courage when you have to buck public opinion and you have to do it on such a controversial issue. Grace had courage, determination, she had a lot of fight. We are going to miss her. Canada is going to miss her. This House will miss her. I miss her.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to join with my colleagues in paying a word of tribute to Grace McInnis. She was a woman who made a profound contribution to Canada. She served in this House with my father, and I had an opportunity on many different occasions to personally see her in action.

Her father, J. S. Woodsworth, was perhaps one of the most influential leaders of his time in this country. Grace had an indomitable spirit. She passionately believed in democratic socialism, in social justice, in equality and freedom. She was a very, very important Canadian. She had courage, she had wisdom and she had grace. We will miss her. Her family will miss her.

If I could just conclude on a personal note. All of us have had our share of losses over the years and we know what her family and friends will be feeling. We share with them the grief they must feel and the celebration and joy in her life.

Mr. Speaker: I must bring to the House's attention that I have several applications on privilege. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

PRIVILEGE

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS AND THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this earliest reasonable opportunity as the House reconvenes today to rise and speak to the question of privilege raised by the member for Surrey North at 1500 hours on June 19, shortly before the House adjourned that evening for the summer. Unlike the said hon. member who failed to give me notice when he spoke at that time, due notice of my intention to now rise and respond has been given not only to the Chair but also to him.

To rationalize his claim that his personal privileges as a member of this House were breached, the member for Surrey North made three serious allegations to which I will respond point by point in this Chamber as well. First, he claimed that I prematurely released parts of the June 1991 first report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs and the Status of Women, henceforth entitled Health Care System in Canada and its Funding: No Easy Solutions, prior to it being tabled in this House later that afternoon at about 1700 hours.

I would like to inform the House that I did not release any copy, in full or in part, of the aforementioned final report; in fact, I first saw the final report after it was tabled. Neither did I release, in whole or in part, any of the draft reports despite requests by a reporter for a copy. I did, however, discuss the central thrust and message of the report with a reporter when interviewed by phone. I have since noted in the media clipping of June 19 that four of eight recommendations out of the 40 in the final report had nearly the same wording as when finally reported.

I must call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that the central thrust of the information I shared with the media has been in the public domain for quite some time, either as recommendations of the many witnesses who appeared before the standing committee on health and welfare since the study was initiated in the previous Parliament or as two interim reports by the committee, the first tabled in this House on September 13, 1988 and the second on June 18, 1990 of the present Parliament. These interim reports summarize "recurring themes in the briefs and testimony of witnesses".

Nevertheless, I have since realized that I might have exceeded my enthusiasm and might have shared with the public far more of the central themes than I would wish before its tabling in this House. For this, Mr. Speaker, I apologize in case I hurt this institution of Parliament.

Second, the member for Surrey North also alleged that I misrepresented the contents of the report when I told the press: "all parties have given their support to the report".

Third, he alleged that I knew the New Democratic Party and he did not support the majority report and that I knew he "had voted against the report" and therefore I misrepresented his position. These are simply not true. Conceivably the member could even use for his defence Appendix F. I will therefore speak to it very briefly.

Appendix F, subtitled Minority Report and seen on page 113 of the whole report clearly states in the second sentence of the opening paragraph:

> While I would concur with many recommendations in the report, I do dissent with the report in the following areas.

And he indicated the two areas he purported gave dissenting opinions. While Appendix F suggests absence of concurrence, even this claim on his part disappears under careful scrutiny.

I wish I could examine more fully for the House today his dissenting opinions and recommendations against recommendation nos. 1, 3, 12, 17, 28, 30, 37 and 39, which I have called to the attention of the Speaker when I gave notice that I would not go through that in the interest of time.

I would, however, just like to cite two short examples. In the minority report—and I must say I did not see that prior to its tabling—he indicated in recommendation 2: "That the federal government reaffirm its commitment to the guarantees in the Canada Health Act to Canadians for a health care system that is universal, accessible, comprehensive, portable and delivered by public and private means and free of user fees or extra billing, et cetera".

Recommendation 1 of the whole report states that the federal government, in co-operation with the provincial and territorial governments, develop a clearly stated national policy on health care that is consistent with the existing Canada Health Act. Those principles are stated in the Canada Health Act.

A second example indicates: "The other major weakness of the report is that it does not put enough emphasis on the responsibility of the federal government for health promotion, protection, disease prevention and medical research".

Recommendation No. 3 of the total report states that the federal government emphasize illness prevention and health promotion, and devote greater resources to education, information, et cetera.

I wish I could discuss this at length. I can assure all my colleagues that a careful reading of the report, particularly the above-noted parts, will show mainly differences in wording but concurrence in essence and substance. Perhaps we could have persuaded him to change his mind and issue a minority report, but since I did not see his minority report I could not have known what he wrote, his claim in it and his position.

Finally, I would like to present a crucial piece of evidence, the Minutes and Proceedings of June 12, at which time the member for Surrey North and myself among other members were in attendance. Page 122 of the report indicates concurrence and: "It was agreed that the draft report as amended be concurred in". That is in the proceedings of our committee. Shall I say the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies?

In conclusion, I would just like to say that it is sad for a member or a colleague to use an unfounded allegation against another. It becomes even more sad when a colleague uses unfounded allegation to breach House convention.

Allow me to quote what he said:

> This misrepresentation of my position caused me embarrassment and forced me in order to set the record straight to breach House conventions and release my minority report at noon.

That was five hours before the report was released and three hours before he raised his question of privilege. He had ample time to raise his question and not breach House conventions. Is he telling the House that two wrongs would make a right?

I trust I have proven to the appreciation of this House that the serious allegations that the member for Surrey North did level against this hon. member speaking were unfounded and, should he wish to pursue his grievance further as to facts, I invite him to bring his case before the standing committee where the matter emanated and where it can properly and more fully be debated.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I want to just make three or four very brief responses. First, the member was given notice on June 19. His office was given notice on June 19 that I was going to raise the matter.

Second, if he will read what I said in the House on June 19, I at no time accused him of leaking the report. It says clearly that the report was released prematurely. It made no reference as to who released the report.

Third, if he discussed it with the press—and as he said he went too far—that is on his own conscience. That has nothing to do with what I raised in the House.

Fourth, what I said is that he indicated that there was unanimous agreement with the report when he knew full well that I had voted in committee against recommendation 1, that I had voted in committee for not concurring in the report and that his implying to the media that I supported the government and the Liberals in their unanimous agreement on the report caused me embarrassment and forced me to clarify the situation.

I think the hon. member should simply acknowledge that he discussed too much with the press too soon and that he misrepresented my position on that committee.

Mr. Speaker: This matter was first raised by the hon. member for Surrey North on June 19, 1991. At that time, as it seemed to be a matter emanating from a committee, I did not act on the representations that were given to me. Subsequently the hon. member for Winnipeg North, as the hon. members have heard, has taken issue with some of the things that were said on June 19 by the hon. member for Surrey North.

I have listened to both hon. members who have aired their grievance, but I think the better course to follow is to view those statements by both members as certainly conscientious on each member's part although there may be a difference of opinion between them as to the effect of the various things that took place at that time.

I think that both members have had a chance to explain their position to the House and I think that we should move on.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity that I have had to raise this matter of privilege. It arises from a June 5, 1991 press release from the Canadian Gas Association which I have provided to you. This press release was widely distributed and contains false statements about a committee of this House of which I am a member.

My privilege is partly a question of fact and partly a question of law. It is extremely serious for two reasons. First, the unanimous Standing Committee on the Environment report Out of Balance deals with global warming, an issue the committee concluded is a severe threat to Canada and to the world. Second, the statement contained on page 2 of the Canadian Gas Association press release that the standing committee "has come to agree with Canadian Gas Association statistics" is absolutely false and the Canadian Gas Association has failed to withdraw it despite contact by myself.

The committee dealt at length with the discrepancy between statistics and chose on page 56 of our report to print both the World Resources Institute figures and the Canadian Gas Association figures with a recommendation for an urgent investigation of Canadian Gas Association data through an independent survey.

This is an extremely serious issue because the Canadian Gas Association claimed to be less than 10 per cent of anthropogenic emissions in Canada, whereas the World Resources Institute, even though it has since reduced its estimate, is listed in our report as being 30 per cent of emissions, methane being a very serious contributor.

I believe this is a question of privilege, and I therefore move that this matter be placed before the appropriate committee, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Election, for consideration.

Although the chair of the committee is not present today, in his letter to me there is one paragraph that sums up the difficulty that all members of the committee have encountered in this situation regarding methane release. I quote from the letter of July 17 to me from the member for Rosedale, our committee chair:

> From that letter the CGA wrote a draft press release and sent me a copy. I was greatly disturbed by the wording of the release and immediately contacted the CGA to voice my disapproval. They agreed to accept suggestions for changes and incorporated them into yet another draft release.
> Again I voiced my disapproval with the very negative tone of the press release and the strong language used to to describe the negligence of the committee. I was so disturbed that I informed the association that I would surely go public with our own version of how the WRI data was used and why. It was sure to be very different from the CGA report.

One final note from the paragraph on the second page:

> I tried to make it clear to the CGA that the committee's report report was not misleading as their release indicated, and that we nor the CGA were aware until our report came out that WRI had published a retraction on its figures.

I close with that. I believe it is a serious matter, because the CGA press release was widely distributed and there surely is not a more important issue on earth, short of all-out nuclear war, that deserves accurate, forthright information than global warming.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Skeena for bringing the details of this issue to my attention prior to today. I think I should say to hon. members that I have read very carefully the letter the hon. member quoted from the hon. for Rosedale who is the chairperson of the committee in question.

Clearly the hon. member for Skeena and also the chairperson of the committee, the hon. member for Rosedale, are concerned about what happened. The House has heard the facts, but I think the appropriate thing to do at this time is to raise the matter at the very earliest convenience at the committee. After that is done, I may be able to deal with the matter further.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34.1, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian Group of the Interparliamentary Union which represented Canada at the Seventh Interparliamentary Conference on Co-operation and Security in Europe in Vienna, Austria, July 1 to July 3, 1991.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation of the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-30, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I notice in reading the Order Paper that what you have just tabled is listed as government bill No. 2.

Government bill No. 1 is an act to increase the judges' salaries. I wonder if the ministry is proceeding with that bill today, because it is listed on the order paper.

Would the judges get zero, three and three or would they get big, fat salary increases?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that is a matter the hon. member might want to take up with the minister or the judges.

PETITIONS

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition today on behalf of a number of constituents. It draws to the attention of the House that a British Columbia firm has announced its intention to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby, British Columbia, in an effort to divert water into the San Diego, California zone.

The petitioners remind us of the Nawapa plan, which is the plan to divert Canadian waters into the U.S. and northern Mexico. They are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter and again on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, they point out that the federal government has refused to extend to public sector workers their full rights of collective bargaining. They say that the federal government wants to contract out jobs done by the public sector workers in flagrant violation of the law and existing collective agreement with its workers.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon Parliament to protect the collective bargaining rights of public sector workers and reject the imposition of wage controls and the further contracting out of jobs in the public sector.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition calling on Parliament to abolish the goods and services tax, which has had a devastating impact on the tourist industry in Vancouver Island.

Entrepreneurs on Vancouver Island feel that this odious tax has had a devastating impact on the local economy and on the tourist business. They humbly pray that the government will remove the goods and services tax as soon as possible in view of the harm it has caused Canadians in this area.

• (1600)

MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people in Comox and Courtenay, British Columbia who are petitioning that during World War II Canada's merchant seamen made a critically important contribution to the defence of Canada and to the victory of the allied forces, that merchant seamen faced grave risks in carrying out their duties and many lost their lives or were seriously injured, that the risks undertaken and the value of the effort made by merchant seamen were equal to those of other Canadian forces.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request that the Government of Canada at long last designate Canada's merchant seamen as veterans of World War II and accord them benefits as veterans of the regular forces.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. They call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the western world.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from residents of the Melford area in Saskatchewan who are petitioning the government to continue with the 70/30 cost sharing ratio between the provincial and federal governments for the payment of RCMP services so that our national police force remains visible across the country.

They object to the federal government reducing its contribution to the RCMP and those policing costs in their rural areas.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have with me petitions from people all across Canada from every province calling on the federal government, this Parliament, to protect the collective bargaining rights of public sector workers and reject the imposition of wage controls and the further contracting out of jobs.

The federal government wants to contract out jobs, the jobs done by public sector workers, in flagrant violation of the law and existing collective agreements with the workers.

This petition calls on the government to turn that around.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, duty and privilege to present this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It is signed by close to 100 Canadians living in my riding in the constituency of Hamilton West and Hamilton East, on Hamilton Mountain and the government held ridings of Lincoln and Hamilton—Wentworth.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free, collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present three petitions. The first one is with respect to the goods and services tax.

The Canadians who have signed this petition point to the 34 tax increases, the devastating effect of the goods and services tax on low and middle income Canadians as well as on seniors, students and small businesses. They ask for a repeal of this tax.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition from Canadians who talk about the $485 million cut to education, of the goods and services tax on books and other learning materials, on the 3 per cent tax on loans to students which just makes a mockery of competitiveness, learning culture and all of those buzz words that we hear. They ask for a fair share for Canadian students.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Finally, I have a petition from Canadians who are alarmed that this government is not obeying the law as it treats with the Public Service of Canada.

They point out that senators, members of Parliament, heads of Crown corporations and others have received substantial increases, and they are angry that the poorest of the poor should be held to zero.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present this petition on behalf of my constituents of Kenora—Rainy River, specifically the communities of Ignace, Sioux Lookout, Sioux Narrows, constituents from Atikokan—Thunder Bay and some from St. Catharines and Halifax. It goes on and on and on.

These people of the great country called Canada would like to petition us in this place to ask the government to consider the imposition of this particular piece of legislation that we will be hearing about very shortly which in essence is going to take away the bargaining rights of many Canadians.

The question that has to be asked here is this: Are collective rights, the rights of individuals in bargaining, only acceptable during good times, yet when there are tough times ahead we can take the rights away from individuals?

The Conservative federal government is prepared to take away the bargaining rights of workers across Canada, threaten them with job losses when contracting out, interfere with conciliation and arbitration—

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. member that it is not a place to make a speech. Petitions are being presented. I am sure the hon. member will want to close off.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, maybe I missed this place so much, I have become long winded.

An hon. member: Could you say you missed it?

Mr. Nault: Some of us would say we missed it and some of us would say we did not.

In closing, I would ask the government across the way and all Canadians and members of Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for collective bargaining for individuals in Canada.

EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a petition signed by Canadians from all over Quebec and Ontario.

The petitioners are calling on the government to reinstate a national education standard in consultation with provincial governments, educational professionals, industry and labour, parents, volunteer organizations and individual Canadians.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition with 200 signatories.

The petition is from the cities of Windsor, Toronto and area, Nepean, Hamilton, Cornwall and Barrie, just to name a few. These people are most concerned that the federal government is prepared to take away the collective bargaining rights of workers across Canada, threaten them with job losses and contracting out, interfere with conciliation and arbitration, and legislate employees back to work.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to present to this House hundreds of names from workers in London, Ontario calling on this government to get back to the negotiating table and to negotiate in good faith rather than try to undermine the collective bargaining rights and systems in this country that served it so well.

[Translation]

BILL C-21

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of constituents in the riding of Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

These petitioners call upon Parliament to repeal those provisions of Bill C-21, the pernicious legislation dealing with unemployment insurance, so that all parents, whether biological or adopted, may receive the same paid leave to spend time with their new children.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Ms. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 650 people in my constituency who know how dependent the communities of Annapolis and Digby counties are on CFB Cornwallis.

They also know that CFB Cornwallis provides high quality and cost effective English new recruit training for our Canadian Armed Forces. They also want this House to be aware that CFB Cornwallis has the facilities to expand and meet the needs of national defence.

The petitioners call upon this House to see that CFB Cornwallis is maintained as an English new recruit training base and expanded to meet the needs of a Canadian defence policy.

S. O. 52

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 106 signatories from east metropolitan Toronto, Markham and Durham region.

The petitioners take note of the disproportionate impact of new tax increases and inflation on low wage earners and call upon the government to reject the imposition of a wage freeze on the public sector and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for all Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker: Questions on the order paper.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Before getting to Government Orders, I have several applications for emergency debates. I will deal with them in order.

An hon. member: What about Questions on the Order Paper?

Mr. Speaker: The response indicated that there were no Questions on the Order Paper today.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Dixon Entrance is now such that there is a real potential for a life threatening incident. Canadian fishing vessels are being boarded by armed U.S. military personnel inside Canada. The vessels are being seized, on-board cargo stolen, Canadian crews are being threatened, assaulted, kidnapped and jailed and ransom payments are being demanded without trial.

This is not a matter that can be dealt with during any of the regular proceedings, as we learned during Question Period today. It is a genuine emergency because a Canadian vessel could be seized at any moment and a growing number of Canadian skippers have expressed the view that their vessels will not be boarded inside Canada by any U.S. authorities. Firearms are present and visible now on Canadian vessels and as I can personally attest, they are visible, present and shown by the U.S military vessels marauding along the A-B line.

This situation in terms of the vessels that were seized and boarded during July and August has not been dealt with by any of the ministers or any of the departments in Canada. There have been no charges proceeded with or laid against the U.S. authorities for coming inside Canada and committing violations both found within the Criminal Code and that are contrary to international law. Even the Lewis Reef, a Canadian enforcement vessel, that approached the U.S. Coast Guard Liberty when it had the Eliza Joye in custody was refused the right to board the vessel.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter of some importance. I also have to caution the hon. member that it is not appropriate to get into debate. I think I have the facts thoroughly and fully in front of me. It is a very serious matter. I think that all hon. members would consider that it is.

I do not think that it is appropriate at this time to proceed with an emergency debate, to adjourn the business of the House for an emergency debate today. Of course, we will follow with interest the situation.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I too rise requesting an emergency debate as to the steel industry in this country.

The Canadian steel industry is under unprecedented crisis. Since 1987 imported Canadian steel has fallen to 3 per cent of the American steel market, an all-time low, while American imports into Canada have risen from 2.5 per cent to 17 per cent, an all-time high.

Observers attribute this change in the balance of trade to the relatively high Canadian dollar and the political lobbying of American steel producers. Canadian steel producers and their families are suffering. Unless immediate action is taken to reverse this trend, the situation will become totally untenable.

I suggest a debate is urgently required to convince the government to lower the dollar and provide protection against the flood of steel imports, which has risen above 25 per cent. Unless immediate appropriate actions are taken, there is the possibility that there will be no steel industry in this country.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member of course has given the appropriate notice for the application. This is not the first time that the matter has been raised in the House. I would ask the hon. member to continue raising it and discussing the matter with others in the Chamber.

I do not think it would be appropriate to proceed to an emergency debate today.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as my letter to you reported, European and U.S. actions have resulted in depressed world grain prices and the real incomes of Canadian grain and oilseed producers were at record lows this year. Net incomes were at a record low in the crop year just completed a month and a half ago.

Farmers were continually assured by the government that some defence against these international prices would come forth in a third line of defence. The net income shortfall of more than $1 billion has not been addressed by the government. The crop year ended one and a half months ago.

If Parliament cannot debate this, the government seems to have the intention of forgetting about it and letting those huge debts that farm families have piled up continue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Facts are what I need to have in front of me, and I would ask hon. members to be careful not to stray into debate. There is a reason for that. Under the rules the applicant for an emergency debate can present the case, but other members are not allowed to be recognized to take issue with something that does stray into the question of debate.

The matter is, of course, one of importance and is well understood in this House to be so. However, I point out to the hon. member that there was extensive debate in Question Period today and there may well be in the ensuing number of days in the next week on the issue, which is as I say important, but it would not be appropriate in my view to proceed to an emergency debate tonight.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 52 to request that you give consideration to the following.

It has been almost 20 years since Canada ratified International Labour Organization Convention 87. This freedom of association convention of the UN agency establishes the rights of organized labour. In 1987 the ILO reviewed Canadian back-to-work statutes and ruled that public inconveniences resulting from strikes "cannot justify an abridgement of the fundamental rights guaranteed by convention 87 unless they reach a point where they affect the life, personal safety or health of all or part of the population".

Nearly one-third of the Public Service Alliance of Canada's bargaining unit has been declared essential, Mr. Speaker, and are not on strike. It appears that Canada is close to breaching this important ILO convention by passing legislation to force those non-essential workers back to work. A debate on the international ramifications of this suggested government action is urgently required, Mr. Speaker, to inform the government of its international commitment and the concerns of this House for the continued respect for these intermittent national conventions.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for giving notice of the matter which she has raised. Again, it is an important matter, as are these matters usually when there is an application for an emergency debate. It may well be that there will be sufficient opportunity, perhaps today or in the coming days, to raise the matter in full debate in the House.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would seek the indulgence of the House to appeal for positive consideration under Standing Order 52 for an emergency debate.

This involves the fact that the Canadian pink salmon runs are in very large numbers moving through the fishing grounds into the spawning areas in record numbers, and that the processors in British Columbia have refused to buy Canadian fish. They have instead chosen to purchase Alaska surplus pink at very low costs and thereby have deprived the Canadian fishing industry from earning a living on the resource which they have spent so much money and time in developing.

The failure of the processors to buy Canadian resource while buying the American surplus stocks has resulted in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans not providing an adequate opening on the pink salmon runs. This, of course, will harm—and it is happening right now, harming the people in the fishing industry, harming the communities—and could indeed within the next few days harm spawning channels where massive surpluses of pink salmon move on to those channels and disrupt the spawning process for the preceding fish that have gone on.

There is an urgent requirement for a debate and some adjudication of this matter and little action to have it considered in any other forum. I would say that if this House were to consider it in a positive fashion that there are options with CIDA, with the food loans that have been proposed for the Soviet Union. These fisheries on Canadian fish could take place, the communities would be protected, the industry would be protected, and indeed an action of the House on this basis, if we moved immediately, would protect the resource for the future.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Again, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this matter. It is certainly a matter on which the Speaker personally has some intimate knowledge, and I recognize its importance. I think there will be ample opportunity to raise it in the next few days.

• (1620)

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to request the consideration of the Speaker for the adjournment of the House for an emergency debate pursuant to Standing Order 52.

There can be no issue of greater or more urgent importance to this House than the state of the Canadian economy and the health of that economy. For this economy to once more re-enter a situation in which recessionary conditions are taking place would be one of the worst economic crises that we could face.

Today Statistics Canada released the first important economic indicator for July which shows that manufacturing across the country has declined for the first time after four months of increase. Combined with the significant rise in bankruptcies in July and the increased rate of unemployment for July and August, Canadians have good reason to fear that we are re-entering the recession.

The fact that our dollar is being—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate on such an important matter to interrupt the hon. member, but I think the application is straying well into debate and it may very well be a debate that the House would want to hear.

I recognize the seriousness with which the application is made, but I think under the circumstances there will be opportunity to raise the matters to which the hon. member refers, certainly in Question Period and possibly on designated days. At least for now I would ask the hon. member to seek other ways of raising the matter and debating it in the House.

Mr. Langdon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Did I cut the member off? I did not mean to do that. I was just trying to indicate that perhaps his very cogent remarks were getting into very cogent debate. I thought he might use his own discretion, but I would be pleased to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Langdon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would just comment that if I were to be debating these facts, I would be doing so with considerable more force and passion than I am displaying in simply reciting these facts.

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes just the recitation of facts carries with it its own passion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-29

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 53(1) and I would like to move under those Standing Orders:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order and usual practices of the House;
> that, the House sit without interruption till 10 p.m. every evening, beginning September 16, 1991, to September 18, 1991, and that the proceedings on Private Members' Business and the Adjournment Debate be suspended for the duration of that period; and > that, Bill C-29 be called for debate at second reading, at the conclusion of this urgent matter and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.; and that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole;

that on Tuesday, September 17, 1991, at 10 a.m., immediately after Routine Proceedings the House shall begin its study at committee of the whole of the said bill and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage and the report stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.;

that on Wednesday, September 18, 1991, immediately following Routine Proceedings, the House shall begin consideration of Bill C-29 at third reading, and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, the Standing Order states that in relation to any matter that the government considers to be of an urgent nature, a minister of the Crown may do as I have just done. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to remind the House that back to work legislation is by its nature urgent. Since 1966 it has occurred nine times. On every occasion but one, there has been agreement between opposite sides of the House to waive the usual time, the usual notices, the usual delays that are part of the legislation and to treat it with some dispatch.

In this particular instance we have reached an impasse. There are innocent third parties being hurt desperately. The grain farmers in the west, in particular, are being hurt. The Canadian Wheat Board estimates the loss to farmers at about $36 million a week and 25 per cent of the farmers are at risk of being driven off their farms this year.

We know that part of PSAC has been designated as essential service. In fact, what has happened is that the picket lines have not allowed the members designated as essential service to get to their jobs so they can perform the services. That has resulted in airlines being unable to fly. The airlines because of the drop in traffic may have to lay off some 2,500 people. Air Canada says they do not know at this time how much money they have lost because of the PSAC disruptions at Pearson Airport and other airports, but they know it is millions of dollars and more people will be laid off.

The urgency seems to me to be self-evident. The nature of the way the strike is being run with people being hurt, and the essential services personnel not being able to perform because people are precluded illegally by strikers from going to their place of work. We see line-ups at the borders; factories having to close because under the auto pact the integration of plants on both sides of the border has meant that there is a very short delay between the time when parts stop arriving and the plant must shut down. Innocent third parties who are not a part of the union, who are taxpayers, are losing their jobs, losing money while this political battle is going on with Daryl Bean.

In view of that circumstance and in view of the fact, as I have pointed out, that since 1966 on nine occasions we have had back to work legislation and on every one of those occasions but one there has been a willingness shown by members of Parliament on both sides of the House to recognize the inevitability of that action. The legislation will pass. Delaying it only puts more financial burden on the population. It only causes more harm and more disruption.

We are not asking for something that is exceptional. It has occurred in the past on many, many occasions. I would ask that we have an opportunity to treat our employees better than PSAC has treated its own.

An hon. member: Oh, nobody believes you.

Mr. Andre: In The Toronto Star of April 19—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. Perhaps, I can be of assistance to the House. I recognize the hon. member for Kamloops is rising on a point of order and I will hear him at the appropriate moment.

Just so that we know what we are doing here, the hon. minister has risen under Standing Order 53, and I am going to read it to the House.

53(1) In relation to any matter that the government considers to be of an urgent nature, a Minister of the Crown may, at any time when the Speaker is in the Chair, propose a motion to suspend any Standing or other Order of this House relating to the need for notice and to the hours and days of sitting.

(2) After the Minister has stated reasons for the urgency of such a motion, the Speaker shall propose the question to the House.

In my view, the hon. member has given his reasons for the urgency and the hon. minister has fulfilled the obligations under paragraph 2.

It is now my obligation to put the motion to the House and when done, I will, of course, hear a point of order. That has been the practice we have been following in these matters. I am going to hear the point of order before any further debate takes place.

• (1630)

Mr. Andre, seconded by Mr. Cadieux, pursuant to Standing Order 53(1), moves:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order and usual practices of the House; that, the House sit without interruption till 10 p.m. every evening, beginning September 16, 1991 to September 18, 1991, and that the proceedings on Private Members' Business and the Adjournment Debate be suspended for the duration of that period; and

That, Bill C-29 be called for debate at second reading, at the conclusion of this urgent matter and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.; and that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole;

That, on Tuesday September 17, 1991, at 10 a.m., immediately after Routine Proceedings the House shall begin its study at committee of the whole of the said bill and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage and the report stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.;

That, on Wednesday September 18, 1991, immediately following Routine Proceedings, the House shall begin consideration of Bill C-29 at third reading, and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m.

I will now hear the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, of course I have no question with the appropriateness of proceeding under Standing Order 53 and welcome an opportunity to participate in the debate.

However, I am not a lawyer so I seek some guidance. The guidance that I am seeking has to do with the decision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board earlier this day. I want to take just a short moment to quote from the comment made by the board. It says: "This Board, in general, shares the views expressed in the cases cited above. The obligation provided under the Public Service Staff Relations Act to bargain in good faith and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement is not substantially different for this employer than it is for any other employer in any other jurisdiction in Canada. The insistence on conditions precedent to negotiating terms and conditions of employment at the bargaining table is incompatible with the requirement to make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement." This is a critical comment. Accordingly, the Board declares that the employer has acted contrary to section 51 of the act and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the act.

I simply seek guidance on this point. This decision by the board obviously indicates that the government's action contradicts the spirit of the law and maybe we would even say it contradicts the letter of the law. I really seek guidance.

Now that this decision has been made is it appropriate for us to continue on as though no decision has been taken by the board?

Mr. Speaker: I am interested, of course, in what the hon. member for Kamloops has raised, but I would ask the House to bear with me for a moment so that I can explain the procedural position that we are in.

The hon. member for Kamloops is, in effect, asking the Chair to make a legal ruling and that of course the Chair is not empowered to do. The hon. member for Kamloops puts forward with some eloquence and precision arguments which could easily be used and probably will be used in debate which support the position taken by some members in the House that the legislation referred to by the minister and the notice ought not to be passed by the House, but that is essentially a question of debate.

I understand perfectly well why the hon. member has raised this. There would seem to be, at first blush perhaps, an inconsistency in the House proceeding given what the board has said.

It is not my place nor do I have the authority to make a ruling that would prohibit, or for any reason interrupt the normal proceedings of the House.

I thank the hon. member for presenting his case in a succinct way.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I follow you and I understand your position. But I think we have to realize that we have a board, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, a creation of this Parliament under the Public Service Staff Relations Act which has said today clearly that the government, through Treasury Board, broke the law.

That is what it said in its decision today. The point is that the discretion of allowing the debate on this whole question is yours, Mr. Speaker.

I want to quote Standing Order 53(3):

Proceedings on any such motion shall be subjected to the following conditions:

(a) the Speaker may permit debate thereon for a period not exceeding one hour;—

Mr. Speaker, I put it to you that if we debate something of this nature where the Public Service Staff Relations Board has declared publicly that the government has broken the law, how can you allow such a debate?

Mr. Speaker: The short answer to that is found again in what I explained to the House with respect to my powers and the limitations on them.

Paragraph (3), to which the member for Ottawa—Vanier refers—I take the hon. member's comment seriously because he is a very experienced member—says: "Proceedings on any such motion shall be subject to the following conditions: (a) The Speaker may permit debate thereon for a period not exceeding one hour."

I take that to be a clear direction to the Speaker which is relating to time for debate and not the substance of it. There are, of course, other conditions that proceed. Debate.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I apologize to my hon. friend. Hopefully, I will not take much of his time.

Again I want to seek guidance on this issue because if we continue with this motion referring to Bill C-29, if this motion is adopted and if we proceed with the passage of Bill C-29, it contradicts an act that was passed by this House.

Mr. Speaker, you say that you are not in a position to pass legal judgment. We agree. Where do we seek guidance in terms of who responds to this apparent impasse and problem in terms of us going against an act that was once passed by this Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member is saying and I will try to explain the matter further for all hon. members.

It may well be that there is an inconsistency, but it is not an inconsistency with which the Speaker has the power in my opinion to interfere. One of the arguments that may very well take place in the debate—I should not speculate—or maybe the very argument that the hon. member has put forward is that ultimately it is for the House to decide what it wishes to do with the bill.

It may later be for a court to decide that the House has done something that does not have the force and effect of law, but that is a matter for the court and not a matter for the Speaker.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in listening to your remarks with regard to the point of order raised by my colleague to the left, and my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, there is a message that you are delivering to this House. I wish to follow that.

Essentially, Mr. Speaker, you have now stated quite clearly why we as a national party should defeat and not support this motion which is being put forward by the government House leader at this time.

There are several points which must be taken into consideration.

• (1640)

Mr. Speaker: Again I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member except to say that I suppose there is a temptation sometimes to quote the Speaker as being in favour or in disfavour of some position taken in debate. I do want it clearly on the record that I was not trying to get into that debate at all but to stick very carefully to procedural matters.

I ask the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Dingwall: Quite rightly, Mr. Speaker, but you not I used the word "power", and the power of this Parliament can now be clearly demonstrated because of the order which has been issued by the staff relations board to defeat and not to accept this motion which is being put forward by the government House leader. That is the point, that this Parliament has that kind of power.

There are two other major issues which are pertinent to the discussion as raised by the government House leader. The first is that the bill itself, Bill C-29 I believe it is called, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, will breach a long-standing tradition in Canadian labour relations whereby the collective bargaining process is suspended for a minimum of a 24-month period.

That in itself would cause many individuals to give it the name of a Draconian law, but in actual fact it goes well beyond Draconian because it tramples the rights for which the labour community has fought for years and years and years. They have now said to Canadians from coast to coast that the collective bargaining process is no longer applicable, with all its various functions in terms of conciliation, in terms of mediation, and in terms of arbitration. That is the first point.

The second point that must be recognized is that we now have a law which will suspend the rights with regards to collective bargaining rights in this country. Now the government introduces a motion to give the boots to Parliament, that we suspend the normal proceedings here of Parliament to deal with a major subject matter facing the Canadian people. Two wrongs, Mr. Speaker, and now, as recently as today, we have heard about a quasi-judicial body. Let us use our heads; this is a board empowered by federal statute, debated and passed by this House and the Upper House. Appointments are made at will by the Prime Minister of Canada. Those individuals sit on that board in a quasi-judicial function and they have determined, not the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, not hon. members opposite, that the government, their very own government, is bargaining in bad faith and has broken the law.

In the eyes of most reasonable individuals, those are three substantive compelling reasons that we as members of the Official Opposition cannot support the government motion being put forward by the government House leader here today.

What is this, Mr. Speaker? This is a political battle. This is a politically motivated strike, conceived in PCO—and, for all of those that may be viewing television tonight, that is the Privy Council Office—orchestrated by the principal secretary Norman Spector and the Prime Minister's Office, to build up a straw man or a straw woman so that they can trample rights. They could not do it to the premiers because they are their political cousins in some jurisdictions.

They could not do it there, Mr. Speaker, so they have to find somebody they can fight, and at the end of the process hopefully they can win. Why, why would a government want to do this? I ask this Chamber: If you are at 12 per cent in the polls and are continuing to go down, if you are desperate to hang on to political power at any cost, who would be the best whipping boys and girls in this country to pick on?

It would be the secretary who is earning $26,000 a year. I do not see them picking on Bill Hopper? I do not see them doing anything with respect to the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

An hon. member: He got 35 per cent.

Mr. Dingwall: But you know, Mr. Speaker, that is Tory justice, that is Tory fairness. This is the worst, despicable display of a political opportunist in terms of the Right Hon. Prime Minister, to pick in some instances on poorly paid public servants in this country. We find that despicable.

An hon. member: Shame on the Prime Minister.

Mr. Dingwall: I see one of my colleagues from Nova Scotia trying to speak. I will be interested to hear what he has to say. In point of fact, if the government were really interested in resolving this strike, if it were really concerned about the farmers, if it were really concerned about the people who are going to our airports, if it were concerned about the men and women who work in the public service, why would it not opt for the most demonstrable act that Parliament could take and order the Prime Minister to put in place a mediator to discuss all of the issues, monetary and non-monetary? Would that not resolve it?

We know that government has difficult choices to make. We know that this strike is not popular in all parts of this country. We also know that the workers want to go back to work, that they want to have the collective bargaining process and all the rights appended thereto.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Is it fair for a government to bring in a bill which suspends collective bargaining rights in this country for 24 months? Is it fair for the government to introduce a motion to suspend the rights of parliamentarians to debate the subject matter of that particular bill? Is it right and fair for the government to continue to operate in the way it has to date, notwithstanding the fact that we have a quasi-judicial decision of a board whose members were appointed by the Right Hon. Prime Minister, approved by the cabinet and who have now deemed that this government is breaking the law, has bargained in bad faith and is continuing to do so.

Any decent, reasonable, respectable individual could not support—and we as a national party will not support it—the motion of the hon. member who happens to be the government House leader.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Scarborough West—ministerial responsibility; the hon. member for Surrey North—health care; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Armenia; the hon. member for York West—trucking industry; the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings—Agriculture.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the very outset that this is a very dark moment in our country's history, a very black moment in our country's history, a very scary time, when we consider that we are now about to address the most oppressive, the most Draconian labour legislation ever introduced into a western democracy.

We are going to be asked to support legislation that is clearly against working people across this country, especially working women. When we consider that it eliminates collective bargaining for federal public servants and now is extended beyond federal public servants, we have to ask who is next.

• (1650)

We shudder because this disease is creeping out from this place.

I only look to the province of New Brunswick and Frank McKenna there. This program looks good compared to what they are doing. This is at least a zero, three and three. Theirs is a zero, zero and a zero.

We remember the six and five program coming back again. It is a ploy against working people. That is why we feel it is fair to ask who is next. That is why on behalf of the party that I represent, the New Democratic Party, I am proud to say that the minute we sniffed this legislation, the minute we had an inkling of what this government was going to do in terms of this dastardly act, we did not debate it, we did not discuss it, we did not share our thoughts. We said we oppose this legislation now, now, now and we are not going to change our minds.

Talk about Stalinistic tendencies, talk about a big brother approach to dealing with your own employees. These are the men and women across Canada who for six and a half years have been asked to explain Tory policies. Can you imagine the horror that these folks have had to endure: explain and support Tory policies from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island. That is a terrible task to ask of anyone. They did their jobs and they work hard at it. We know they work hard at it because the Manufacturers' Association of Canada is saying: "Get these people back to work. We have got to get these people back to work to make our country work".

What did the government do at a time when it is asking its employees to be more productive, to work together, to co-operate with the government, to put their shoulders to the wheel, to make our economy more productive? The Prime Minister looks at the employees and says: "I don't think you're worth a plugged nickel. I don't think you're worth a single cent for an increase". I know we give increases to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I know the head of CN gets increases. I know that we gave bonuses to our senior managers. I know that there were other increases throughout the system. For those tens of thousands of men and women who work for the government, if one thinks Brian Mulroney is a bad Prime Minister, imagine having him as a boss. Can you imagine having somebody who humiliates you publicly as an employer?

We are seeing something here today. The government is asking us to co-operate to get this Draconian legislation through quickly, to impose these shackles on our public employees as quickly as possible. We will not do that.

This is a very unique situation. On the one hand we have the government House leader standing in his place pleading with us in order to end this strike. May I suggest that the decent and honourable way to end this strike is for the Prime Minister to get in touch with the President of the Treasury Board and say: "Do the honourable thing and get back to the negotiating table and start dealing with your employees as you should be doing".

This is the largest strike of federal public employees that this country has ever seen. Never have public employees been so humiliated by a back to work piece of legislation.

I have before me a long list, going back to 1950. Other groups have been forced, through legislation, back to work, 24 as a matter of fact. There is one thing different between all of these and what this government is doing today. All of these had attempted collective bargaining. All of these groups had sat down in good faith and attempted to negotiate a settlement.

This government says: "We will not allow a collective agreement to be negotiated. We are going to impose a settlement". How Stalinistic can you be? You say to your employees: "This is the law. This is our position: zero, three and three. If you do not agree to it, we'll use our parliamentary muscle and force it upon you".

With all of these back to work legislations that we have dealt with over the years, never have they been so Draconian.

They have always been back to work legislation with a settlement based on negotiations that had taken place—they were required to back to work as a result—and then subject to an arbitrator's report. In other words, there was always something else attached to the legislation that would treat those involved with some dignity. Not this slap in the face to tens of thousands of public employees across the country.

There are all sorts of reasons why we oppose this particular motion. As we sit here at this moment, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, a quasi-judicial board, struck by an act of Parliament has said on page 10: "The board declares that the employer, Brian Mulroney, has acted contrary to Section 51 of the act and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the act".

In other words, the board says that the federal government is breaking its own law. The federal government is breaking a law of Parliament.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Riis: Are we asking them to just ignore this? Of course not. What about the fact that section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms requires people to be treated equally under the law? This piece of legislation flies in the face of section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It says: "We are going to treat our employees unlike anybody else treats their employees, anywhere in the country."

We say that we believe this flies in the face of our own Constitution. It flies in the face of an act of Parliament. It flies in the face of any decent employer's relationship with its employees.

I say, for a whole set of reasons, we will not support this motion. This is a silly motion. It is a desperate motion. I suppose we ought not to be surprised, when we consider that the government introducing this motion is a government that 88 per cent of the people of Canada have lost faith in. Eighty-eight per cent of the people of Canada are saying: "Call an election Prime Minister, because we want to kick you out. We want to change the government". No wonder it is attempting something so drastic.

In closing, I want to say to my hon. friend the government House leader, and when I say "the government" I do not mean him personally, that when the government acts as a bully and pushes people around, humiliates people, fights with people, ridicules people and then asks people to co-operate and be friends, it is a gesture in futility.

I think what we are seeing across the country is 88 per cent of the people rising up in a popular reaction against this government and saying: "We are sick and tired of being bullied by the Prime Minister, his cabinet and his caucus".

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the motion before the House. I might say at the outset that any time I hear my colleague and friend from Kamloops speak, he always goes over the edge. He always overdoes it. I do not know how many times I have heard him say: "This is the worst that has ever been done anywhere in the world".

I want to speak about the effect of what is going on in the country as a result of the PSAC strike on the people of Canada.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kempling: Just listen and you might learn something. I had a call to tell me that the lift bridge at Hamilton was going to be blocked by PSAC strikers. They told me they were going to come from both directions and block the bridge, stop the engines of their automobiles and walk away, abandon their cars and leave them there. That was Thursday night before the Monday strike date. What was the purpose of this? The purpose was that there were two ships sitting out on the lake waiting to come into the harbour and there were 10 ships due in over the weekend.

• (1700)

If the half dozen people who work on the lift bridge could jam up the end of the lake, I do not know what they were going to accomplish or what it was going to do for the PSAC. All I know is that it is going to shut down a lot of industries in the city of Hamilton.

Thank God the police moved in and told them: "If you leave your cars on the bridge, we will tow them away. You will be charged with the towing charge. You will also be charged with obstructing a public thoroughfare and you will also have to pay the storage charges for your vehicle".

Of course, Friday morning the cars were on the bridge. There were the police and they moved them away. They had the tow trucks lined up and ready to go.

I ask myself whether it is right that a handful of people operating a lift bridge have the right to tie up a whole harbour to shut down a bunch of industries in Hamilton so that no shipments should be received or taken out. I say that that is wrong. I do not care what the issue is.

Then we had people in manufacturing industries who have adopted the just in time delivery concept. That is the current fad in the manufacturing industry. Could they get their supplies? No. Where are the supplies? They are in trucks trying to get across the border. If one watches the television news, one would see that General Motors was flying parts into Oshawa airport on DC–3s or World War II airplanes.

What about the perishable food that was coming through the border such as fruit and so forth? It was tied up in the border traffic. This is atrocious. It should not be allowed to happen under any circumstance as far as I am concerned.

We have grain farmers in western Canada. The Minister of Agriculture spoke today about the grain piling up in the fields and about full grain elevators. The farmers cannot get it out. This should be allowed to happen. I say it is wrong. We are doing the right thing in putting forth this motion in the legislation that we are going to bring forward to see that this stops.

I am going to naturally speak in the course of the debate that will ensue I am sure once the minister's bill comes before the House. I want to reinforce what the minister said in the House today about this zero, three and three that I keep hearing from across the hall.

Zero, three and three is for everyone: the Prime Minister, cabinet, members of Parliament, members of the RCMP and the Canadian Armed Forces. Zero, three and three affects everyone.

The big lie that is out there and that is trying to be pushed by some members and some members of PSAC is that we gave ourselves an increase and now we are going to take it out of their pockets to pay our increase. That is absolutely nonsense.

Everyone knows that the contracts within the Public Service come up at various times of the year. For instance, we know that our wage adjustment came up January 1, 1991. We know that some management contracts came up in June of 1991 and others came up at other times.

Zero, three and three applies to everyone in the government who is on government payroll whenever it comes up. Ours will come up within three months.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kempling: This is typically NDP. They want to shout you down. They want others to listen to their members, but when others are speaking, they want to bellow and holler. They do not want to know the truth.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, this motion is a good motion. I hope the House supports it. We have to get the various departments of government operating again. We have to provide services to the public that it expects. We cannot tie this country up economically for Daryl Bean or any of the other people. We hear stories about how Daryl Bean in dealing with his own Public Service union treated his own people, what increase he gave them and how he dumped a percentage of his staff off when they disagreed with his position. It is all right for Daryl Bean to do that but if anybody else does it they are terrible people.

I hope that the House will get its head as it has in previous years and pass this motion and let us move on into the bill that is going to be coming up, let it get passed and over and on with other business of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry–Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words in the debate this afternoon.

First of all, let us not forget it was the government opposite that caused this strike. In its Budget, the government announced that public servants would get an increase of 3 per cent. All of a sudden it changed its mind. It backtracked and said that 3 per cent was too much, and 0 per cent would be better. That is Tory thinking for you. So 0 per cent was better. But before imposing 0 per cent, it first took good care of friends in high places. It made sure all the big cheeses in government got their share before wage restrictions were imposed.

[English]

After the government provoked this situation it waited and waited, hoping of course that the public servants would go on strike and then that the strike would fall apart the next day.

Well, bad luck for the government. There happened to be good weather last week, apart from all other things, and the public servants came out in large numbers. They probably would have come out in large numbers nevertheless, but even larger numbers because good weather came about, much to the chagrin of the Conservatives across the way.

They allowed this to fester for a little while, thinking that it would go away, that the strikers would back down and that the government would look hard-nosed and tough, particularly in those parts of Canada where it is hoping to appear to be emulating the western Reform Party.

Of course that fell apart. First of all it did not work. Public servants did not back down. They continued with the strike.

It is obviously true that this strike is bad for a country. Everyone knows that. It is obviously true that it is equally bad for those who are on strike in terms of getting a paycheque this week it is. However, the government is of the opinion that legislating the workers back to work or threatening to do so with a zero per cent increase is the solution.

Now let us look at what the government has done. First of all, we are back today sitting in this House and the government pretends that it is going to use every tool at its disposition to ensure rapid passage.

A while ago I heard the hon. member for Burlington talk about the urgency of putting these people back to work and how this government was really going to move ahead with this process. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you what procedure it has used to get, according to the government, rapid passage of the bill. It used a motion under Standing Order 53(1)—this is the motion on which we are speaking—under which motion any 10 members can stop the debate.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you that this is a charade. Even today that government across the way does not even want to legislate the workers back. I would disagree with them for wanting to do so, but it is not even true. They are using a rule which does not work.

There was another rule that it could have used had it been serious, but I will not tell it what it is though. Maybe it is so inept that it did not know the right rule to use, but there is a rule that would have been far more effective had it been smart enough to use it. Alternatively, maybe it was just devious and pretended it wanted to start this process today and it was doing it for the media. They are grandstanding, Mr. Speaker. That is what those Tories are doing. That is what they did all summer, and that is why they provoked that strike to try and get some favourable press.

I guess when you are at 12 per cent in the polls you are so desperate you can do anything. Imagine having a 12 per cent popularity rating. I am sure I could take a public opinion poll and find that more than 12 per cent of Canadians still believe that Elvis Presley is alive. But this is the kind of popularity the Prime Minister and his friends across the way have today. As I said previously, the government is not even sincere about what it wants to do, either that or it is so inept that it does not deserve to govern because it did not even invoke the rule that would make it work if that is what it wanted.

I am sure the Conservatives are busy researching their book to find the appropriate rule. Fat chance that I will tell them.

Let us get to what happened today. The Public Service Staff Relations Board said, in a decision earlier today, that the government had acted in bad faith. This is not just an opinion. Listen to what they have decreed. They decreed the following: "The board declares that the employer has acted contrary to section 51 of the act." In other words, it has breached a law of Parliament. It has not breached a guideline. This is not the conflict of interest guidelines that cabinet ministers breach regularly around this House and that we have all heard so much about. That is another matter we can discuss another time. It has breached a law of Parliament.

What is the solution for this breach of a law of Parliament on the part of these people across the way? Well, their solution is to introduce a motion to pass a bill, the effect of which will be not to remove that section of that act, just to ignore it and to supersede it with something else.

[Translation]

One wonders, Mr. Speaker, what will happen once the government's proposed legislation is passed. What will happen for instance, if public servants take the board's decision and go before the courts and ask for the new legislation as passed by Parliament to be repealed, because it violates existing legislation?

[English]

I see the government House leader is with us. I am sure he has been researching why it is that he made a mistake and used the wrong rule in order to get this motion passed, or is it that he really did not want that motion passed at all, that he said: "Let us use the wrong rule and let us see what it does." Well, of course, with the right rule, according to the government, or the rule that would have worked more effectively, it could have probably got its motion passed. After all, much to my chagrin and yours, Mr. Speaker, being the objective person that you are, the government is Conservative and, of course, it still has a small majority in the House of Commons, so eventually it can get this legislation through.

It is my hope that before this process is over that the government will at least consider doing the following: that it will include in its legislation measures to give some fairness, be it the final offer selection process, a binding arbitration process, or a mediator who will have the opportunity to deal with everything, including salary. There should be something in the bill to give it fairness. There are workers out there, and they were out there earlier today, and they want to go back to work. They cannot afford to be out there now.

[Translation]

Like you and me, these people have financial obligations and they have certain obligations to their families. Mr. Speaker, these people deserve to be treated fairly by the government opposite.

[English]

At the very least, Mr. Speaker, I think the government should be sincere and forthright and tell us exactly the purpose of the motion that we are debating right now. It is certainly not the passage of it because it is not going to pass. The government knows it because it only requires 10 MPs to defeat it and there are a lot more than 10 of us on this side of the House.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, just beginning where the last member left off. It does seem odd that we are debating a motion which the government knows full well has no chance of passing in this House. At the same time the government claims that it is facing an urgent situation.

I think what is urgent, if anything is urgent at this time, Mr. Speaker, is that the government take cognizance of the fact that a body set up and constituted by this Parliament has ruled against the government, has ruled that the government was not bargaining in good faith, was not in compliance with section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. What is urgent, Mr. Speaker, is that the government which is given the responsibility of upholding the law of this land is, instead, coming to Parliament at this very moment with a false sense of urgency about ending the strike, when it could end the strike within minutes if it simply decided to comply with the ruling of its own quasi-judicial body, that it go back to the bargaining table and bargain in good faith.

I say to the hon. member for Burlington, who used the phrase "this should not be allowed to happen", I agree, this should not have been allowed to happen. This did not have to happen. This happened because the government allowed it to happen, because the government refused to bargain in good faith, because the government did not do those things that would have permitted a negotiated settlement. Instead, the government has sought to divide Canadians, to turn them against each other.

We saw in the Canada Post strike where the government and Canada Post deliberately withheld cheques, deliberately put Canadians in the position where they might develop animosity toward the postal workers. We have a government which is committed here to turning Canadians against each other.

The member for Burlington asked how can a handful of people hold up ships in the harbour—or whatever the case may be, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian people are asking how much longer will this handful of people called the Conservative caucus run this country, when they are only supported by a handful of Canadians. People are tired of being handled by this handful of disreputable people called the government. What we see out there today, Mr. Speaker, on the lawn of Parliament is not a handful of people; we see tens of thousands of workers representing tens and hundreds of thousands of honest Canadians who are saying "enough is enough is enough of this group over here".

So let us stop with the phony motions that we know are going to be defeated. Let us stop with trying to override the rulings of well constituted bodies like the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Let us have some real justice, some real respect for law, and let us have the government drop all this nonsense and go back to the bargaining table as it has been instructed to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in this debate and more specifically to the motion tabled by the government. I am against the motion because I feel that what we have here is an illegitimate government that is taking away one of the legitimate rights of its employees: the right to strike. I think we should consider why our public servants are on strike. It is the government's fault.

Mr. Speaker, only last February, in the Budget it brought down, the government unveiled its plans for the next three years: 0 per cent, 3 per cent and 3 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I represent more than 26,000 public servants in the Outaouais region. These employees need the money they earn. They never wanted this strike. These employees want to work, but they do not want to work at any price.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore the present attitude of this government which not only hurts the Public Service but also hurts the private sector because in this area, the private sector is affected by the fact that the Public Service is on strike.

I don't think anyone agrees with strikes, but in this particular case, I think the government has taken undue advantage of the Public Service. Let's go back to January 1, 1991, when members had their 4.2 per cent increase, when senior management had its increases, when the President of the Bank of Canada, for instance, had his increase, and when all the upper echelons of the Public Service had received their increases. The government has used only the Public Service, secretaries, low-level employees, employees who absolutely must work, Mr. Speaker, as a tool to increase its popularity, to try to improve its standing in the polls by telling the people, "We'll get out the big stick and beat up on our public servants and show them who's boss."

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, it is shameful and ignoble for the government to act that way. Mr. Speaker, they were getting ready today to table a bill for judges, who are people doing serious, honourable, important work, but are not the lowest paid individuals in society—

Mr. Lapierre: $140,000.

Mr. Rocheleau: They earn $140,000 a year. So the government decided to postpone this bill for a few days perhaps, whereas this morning, Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Laurier—Sainte-Marie and I went to support the public servants against this shameful action of the government—shameful!

Mr. Speaker, I have never been known as a union man or a left-winger. I have rather always been known as someone to the right, but when I see the government act in such a way, we must keep fairness in mind. They must act fairly, Mr. Speaker.

If the government gave the Public Service the right to strike in 1967, well, it should tolerate the right to strike in the Public Service! You cannot just take away the right to strike after one week, when that right was acquired legitimately, Mr. Speaker. If, instead of extending our sittings here, they had extended the negotiations with our employees, we would probably have gotten some results.

Mr. Speaker, this morning, I listened to Daryl Bean, the President of the Public Service Alliance, who said that he wanted mediation as the postal workers had a few weeks ago. Why the double standard, Mr. Speaker? It is shameful and unacceptable.

Earlier, I heard the hon. member for Burlington tell us that such strikes in essential public services should never happen. We all know that, but, Mr. Speaker, it is the government's fault that we are in the situation we find ourselves today and which has been dragging on—

Mr. Lapierre: It is provocation!

Mr. Rocheleau: It is government provocation. I see those lackeys opposite, those Tories who are just waiting for constitutional proposals. You are in one hell of a mess, but still you fail to realize that you are no longer relevant but you are taking away legitimate rights!

Mr. Speaker, on the subject of unemployment, why are there so many unemployed in Canada today? Because of this government, the very same government we owe this inflation to, Mr. Speaker. This zero percent salary increase is not a simple freeze. In fact, it amounts to a salary reduction because, with the GST, this government has created inflation and forced consumers to pay higher prices.

That is totally unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that there will be yet more defections in the government ranks. I cannot understand why there have not been any more. How can one submit to and blindly serve a prime minister who has lost his marbles, become lackeys of a government without direction, a government that failed miserably in just about everything it has undertaken in the past seven years?

Today, Mr. Speaker, it is cracking the whip to force our civil servants—and not the best paid at that, but the poorest of them—to go back to work and so that they can bow to its every whim.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add just one thing concerning the people of the Ottawa area, from both sides of the river. We represent in this place over 100,000 public service employees who have the right to work every day, but this government has no right abusing them and one of those days it will have to pay dearly for it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And more than 10 members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 53(4), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DESIGNATION OF SITTING DAYS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and usual practices of the House, the Government House Leader may, before the normal hour of daily adjournment on Friday, September 20, 1991, at any time during daily proceedings, on a point of order, designate Saturday or Sunday, or both days as sitting days;

That, on Saturdays and Sundays, the daily program be identical to Friday as specified in Standing Order 30, except that the proceedings on Private Members' Business, Statements by Members and Question Period shall be suspended;

That the Legislative Committee dealing with a bill standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board entitled "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto", shall report back or be deemed to have reported back the said Bill no later than two sitting days after the referral at second reading of the said Bill:

That the provisions of Standing Orders 76(1) and 76(2) be suspended and that consideration at report stage of a Bill standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board entitled "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto", be undertaken the sitting day following the tabling of the Legislative Committee's report on the said Bill;

That, if no later than 7 p.m., the sitting day prior to the consideration at report stage of a Bill standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board entitled "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto", written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in the said Bill, it be printed on a Notice Paper; and

That, immediately after the adoption at third reading of a Bill standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board entitled "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto", this Order shall be rescinded.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the purpose of this motion is self-evident. It is to allow this House to sit daily, including on weekends, for the necessary time to get this important legislation passed.

May I say just parenthetically that I was reminded by a letter from a former colleague who wrote to me the other day and said: "How come we still have this archaic process of first reading, second reading, committee stage, report stage and third reading which was designed 125 years ago when we did not have these modern communications? It was designed in a day when it was—

• (1730)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister is letting us know what he received in a letter and he might let us know what he mailed back too. The hon. minister.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there has been some comment by a number of people in the last few months, most particularly I suppose by the Spicer commission, about the decorum in this place; the barracking, the shouting down, the not allowing members to speak, the rather childish behaviour that we see. I am quite prepared, as I have earlier this afternoon, to sit silently to listen to the opposite side.

I would hope that out of respect for those who look to this institution for leadership and guidance that we in fact would have the same courtesy and that those who feel compelled to speak would simply submit their names to their House leaders and they will have an opportunity to do so. In the meantime common decency would dictate that the polite thing to do is to allow a member to speak.

As I was indicating, this former colleague who wrote and talked about these practices said that he was particularly struck watching the other jurisdictions who seem to have had more modern procedures. However, that is a subject for another day.

In the 1991 budget the government laid out its plan for economic recovery, a recovery that not only puts the recession behind us, but which also leads us towards continuing growth and prosperity. The Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development projects that Canada will lead the G-7 nations next year as a result of the budget process we have in place.

We did not deny in the budget however that it would be necessarily easy, particularly in view of the opposition we faced from those in our society who do not agree with our approach because ours is not an approach for more government intervention. It is an approach which calls for less interference by government, recognizing that if growth is to be strong and ongoing, the economy must be free from undue restrictions and we are being attacked on that position.

Our approach calls for less government spending, not more. We are also being attacked and challenged at every turn by those who do not agree with this approach. Indeed, daily in Question Period, including today, we have had calls from the opposition to spend more money on this and that, worthy causes to be sure. Unless one is willing to stand up and say: "I want more money spent on this and I am willing to see taxes increased or the deficit increased or the government cut back on some other area to fund this program", they are not acting responsibly. You cannot keep demanding more and more without admitting that what you are asking for is more money from the taxpayers.

The taxpayers have said: "We have had enough. We have had enough paying to government for them to distribute. We want that money left in our own pockets". They are saying: "We think the deficit is too high. We are leaving a terrible legacy and we want you to bring the deficit and debt down". They are saying that every time we cut some government service to keep to this fiscal plan: "We don't like what you have cut".

That is the difficulty, but it is a difficulty that has to be faced by responsible people and we are doing that.

Our approach is based on less government spending, lower deficits and as a result, lower interest rates and we are seeing the success of that interest rates keep coming down. Our plan for economic recovery will bring about even lower interest rates through the following actions: clearly achievable inflation targets of 3 per cent by the end of 1992, 2 per cent by the end of 1995. Lower inflation and lower expectations will lead to lower interest rates. The plan calls for us to put government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget. We cannot keep borrowing from the future generations to finance our spending today.

By reducing the deficit and the debt we will remove one of the more serious pressures on inflation. We are extending the expenditure control plan. We have released our discussion paper on spending caps legislation and we will move, as soon as we can, to pass the legislation which will create the debt servicing and reduction fund.

The third key element of the plan is the restraint of government spending. We state in the budget that operating budgets will be frozen at current levels and the wages and salaries of cabinet ministers, MPs, all Order in Council appointments and all federal public servants will be tightly restrained—zero, three and three.

There has been a lot of misinformation about the senior public servants. I would remind members of the House what in fact occurs in terms of senior public servants. Under a structure put in place by the previous government, there is an outside committee that looks at the salaries of senior civil servants, that looks at comparable rates in the private sector and makes a recommendation to the government. They recommended for the period of time June 1, 1990 to June 1, 1991 that the increase be 6.2 per cent, I believe. We said no because we had introduced the budget with the 0 per cent and for that period it would be 4.2 per cent, but as of June 1 it would be 0 per cent for senior managers, no increase that people are talking about—0 per cent.

During that period of time from September 1, 1990 to September 1, 1991 PSAC got 4.8 per cent. They start at different periods. It is wrong to suggest they got an increase, it was for a period of time that ended last June. They were due for another increase June 1 and that increase is 0 per cent. They will be due for a 3 per cent increase next year on June 1 under this plan and public servants would be due for an increase of 3 per cent next September 1 and members of Parliament will be due for a 3 per cent increase January, 1993. So we are all getting 0 per cent.

This false information of suggesting that somehow some other group has been looked after is simply that, it is absolutely false.

Now anyone who makes the claim that we propose this wage package to public servants in order to pick a fight or to cause a strike forgets about the budget. Presumably they also question the motives of other sectors and governments in society who are also asking for restraint from their employees.

I remind the House that the Government of New Brunswick negotiated an agreement and two months later rolled it back and froze the salaries. The Government of Nova Scotia did the same thing. The Government of Quebec, the Government of Newfoundland, the Government of Manitoba and the Government of Saskatchewan put in restraints. In my city, as a result of restraint in the oil and gas industry over the last two years, 14,000 employees in the oil and gas industry have been laid off. They do not have job security, they are laid off because of the state of the economy.

Who in this House is going to say we want higher oil and gas prices so that those individuals will not be laid off? Who in this House is going to say we want higher taxes so that we can pay the public servants higher rates? Who is going to have the integrity to be honest that the money comes from the taxpayers' pockets and you are going to have to raise the taxes if you are going to give away more of that taxpayer's money to whomever? When you have the integrity to do that you deserve to be listened to, but until then, screaming and yelling and putting out false information does not impress those who have the responsibility to look after things.

The hypocrisy of some is beyond belief. April 19 in The Toronto Star, Leslie Papp reporting from Vancouver stated: "Delegates at the Public Service Alliance of Canada convention voted to slash the union's budget by $1.8 million each year over the next three years, leaving 14 staff positions vacant and another six to be cut by attrition." They cut out staff of PSAC's own employees. Worse, after voting, delegates walked past upset employees asking them where they were working next week. Is that your pink slip? "The comments left two of the union workers in tears", staff members said. Then they all got together and said: "Accusing Ottawa of committing economic crimes". "This government will not listen to reason", is being said.

Then he said he understood why the staff was bitter. It has got to be frustrated, but we are in a tight situation. He is not in a different situation than us. He had an option. He could have raised the fees. He could have raised the union dues to pay these employees and not lay off 20 people. He could have borrowed the money to keep these employees on staff so they would not be laid off. He said he could not do that.

He says that we must dip into the taxpayers' pockets to take more taxes to give to the employees and that we must borrow more for this next generation to do that. He would not do it for his employees.

Talk about a hypocrite. He says that we are trying to pick the strike.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks if they do insist on heckling to comments that are not likely to cause disorder in the House and I am sure I do not have to say that again.

The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, on September 13 in The Ottawa Sun Ron Corbett reports that he was called by a person who was on strike at home, not on the picket line, who said he felt he should be at work but was afraid to cross the picket line.

He is a former union representative, he was president of the local.

> In May he quit his union post.
> "The more I saw, the more convinced I became that this wasn't a union for the workers, it was a union for the people at the top".
> My caller says his dissatisfaction with PSAC started last year, when the support staff at PSAC headquarters went on strike—and Daryl Bean played hardball.
> The PSAC workers were looking for 5 per cent wage increases—

Remember, this is at a time when members of PSAC itself got 4.8 per cent.

> Bean, who handled the negotiations personally, offered only 3 per cent. It's the same amount, we all know, that the federal government once offered Bean.
> At one point during the conflict Bean went so far as to lock his workers out of PSAC headquarters, and that riled my caller to no end.
> "I don't think any union man should lock out his workers—the whole affair struck me as utter hypocrisy, a case of 'do as I say, not as I do.'"—
> —Bean told him later that the workers should be happy with 3 per cent because their benefits were better than those of workers in the private sector, and any way, the union was short of money.

Well, well, well. When the President of the Treasury Board says we have pretty good benefits for our employees but we are short of money, we are outrageous, we are terrible, we have no concern. When Daryl Bean does it, oh, well, that is all right.

Then members opposite stand up and say that we tried to trigger a strike.

Here is what the caller said to Ron Corbett:

> I'm convinced that Bean wanted a strike. It was important to him that he turn PSAC into a powerful, militant union.

He goes on to say that the strike was never about wages or a new collective agreement. It was about power.

CUPW is another labour situation that has not been resolved. They offered and imposed on their employees 2 per cent over 18 months, half of what they went on strike for at the post office.

Shirley Carr says we are in a street fight. "Security, we demand security. We demand that you stop contracting out. We demand that you stop privatizing and deregulating. We demand security for these employees".

The CLC negotiated job security out of the contract it had with its own employees six years ago. Work for the CLC six years ago and you had job security. Work for the CLC today, you do not. It was negotiated out by the same Shirley Carr who says that we are treating our employees unfairly.

It is ironic in many ways that we have these statements by Bean and Parrot and Carr and Bob White. It is frustrating. For contrary to their own actions the unions are asking us to do things they have chosen not to do for their own workers.

They want us to raise taxes or borrow the money in order to meet their demands. Our choice has been to restrict spending, the same choice unions are making. We think it is a responsible choice in the best interests of all Canadians.

I am tired of the accusations about members of Parliament. Since 1984, the inflation rate has been 29.6. Members of Parliament salaries have gone up 17.6. We did get the travel allowance. Not mentioned in any of these discussions is that for the last several years in a row, each year according to formula, the travel expenses of public servants have been raised. The per diem expenses when they are on the road have been raised. Their fringe benefits have been raised all along the line. People insist on talking about our fringe benefits, but not those fringe benefits. Let us look at the whole package.

The President of the Treasury Board has said he is willing to talk about more in terms of security, fringe benefits and adjustments if there are people who are on a scale that makes it difficult for them to live. The union has said, "no". Daryl Bean has said: "No. We will not discuss anything until you get off your 0–3–3. Only when you get off that".

In other words, he is saying: "Only until you express your willingness to tax more or to borrow more to pay for my members, even though I am not willing to do that for my own employees".

Five Public Service unions have already settled for 0–3–3. You do not read about that. They have settled. They have agreed. They have said: "Yes, we recognize that we are in a tough position". They have said: "Look, at a time when airline employees are being laid off and oil and gas employees are being laid off; at a time when 25 per cent of the farming community is in tough shape; at a time when we are just coming out of the recession and it finally looks like our children might not have an impossible debt burden to deal with, we do not think it is unreasonable for us to join everybody else in the country in saying zero for a year. We do not think that is an unreasonable sacrifice". Five unions did that.

There is no question that the leadership of the labour movement is against us. I have seen Shirley Carr and Daryl Bean on television saying that this is not a political strike. That is what it is. It is not the welfare of the employees that they are looking after. It is a political strike. We have the CLC, CUPW, Canadian Auto Workers, Judy Rebick of the NAC and others joining together in a political fight. They are using the cause of the workers to pursue a political objective. Their concern about the workers is two faced by virtue of how they treat their own workers. This is a political fight. That is fine. We have a responsibility to the taxpayers of this country, to the future generations of this country, to ensure that in the pursuit of political objectives this country is not hamstrung and crippled so that we have no opportunity to meet the challenges that are demanded of us in the years to come.

The reality is that the budget brought in earlier this year is the right budget. The Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development, the International Monetary Fund, international groups have applauded Canada for its path. Ironically, we are suffering for it.

My friend over there mentioned the Canadian dollar. It is an irony that we are perceived by the rest of the world as doing so well that the movement into Canadian dollars is causing us problems. The dollar is too high. Foreigners like our currency because they perceive that the government is doing well. That is one of the ironies. It is something we have to deal with.

It is regrettable that this motion is necessary. As I have said, out of the nine times in the past when back to work legislation has been introduced, on all but one occasion there was recognition by the opposition that it simply made sense that we get together and agree to have appropriate and reasonable debate. Nobody wants to cut off debate. After debate you decide. That is what we are looking for. Reasonable debate and decision.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it requires the co-operation of the House to do that. We cannot delay any longer, so I am putting forward this motion which will put some limitations on the stages, but would require us to sit over the weekend so that we can get it done.

Just to ensure that the motion itself has an opportunity to pass, I would like to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on Government Order No. 4 in the name of the government House leader, and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the government House leader and his references, I would remind members of this House of the words and the way in which he presented his arguments when he made reference to the president of PSAC, made reference to the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, and made reference to the president of the Canadian Auto Workers union and their representatives. I asked myself the question: I wonder why Canada has such great difficulty competing in the international community when our own government cannot pull it together, labour, business and government. That, obviously, is the answer as demonstrated by the remarks and the veracity of the remarks of the government House leader. I think it is utterly shameful as to what he has said here this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

The member opposite makes many references to certain items which he believes to be important. The hon. member has served in this House for a considerable length of time. I would ask him to reflect upon what was said on page 8 of a decision which was rendered today by the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Again, I repeat, it is a statute of this House, duly passed by this House, and consists of members appointed by the Prime Minister and approved by the cabinet.

Here is what this decision reads in part:

> Labour relations boards in various jurisdictions have held that to insist on preconditions before bargaining for a collective agreement is contrary to the requirement to bargain in good faith.

For example, and they cite a particular case, Rolf, Clarke Stone Packaging, 1980, The Ontario Labour Relations Board. They go on in this particular case to say that the narrow issue here is whether the respondent's conduct complied with the Board's order to bargain in good faith and make every reasonable effort to make a collective agreement. It goes on to say other things.

Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, that the board, a government duly appointed board has now made the decision, a quasi-judicial board, saying that the Government of Canada has bargained in bad faith.

Is there any wonder that we as a country trying to compete with other countries have such difficulty when our own government bargains in such bad faith with labour, with a major component of an economic unit such as labour? It is very obvious to me and my party, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened here has been a game, and I might add with some regret, a great deal of regret in point of fact, being played by the government in order to uplift, if you will, its political standings by playing on the mood of the Canadian public, who are somewhat agitated by the drawbacks that this strike is having across the country.

If the government was so concerned, if it were really concerned about resolving this dispute, why can it not appoint a mediator? That is part of the collective bargaining process. But it is swinging this way, it is swinging that way. The Conservatives want to have this matter before Parliament. They are trying to drag it out. They are trying to incite—and I use that language respectfully, Mr. Speaker—through acts of provocation, union representatives and individuals across this country to have violent confrontations in order to substantiate and legitimize what we now know is an act to suspend collective bargaining, what we now know is an act by Parliament to put the boots to Parliament, what we now know is a breach of the cornerstone of free collective bargaining in this country called bargaining in bad faith. We know all of those things. They are trying to create the emergency, and they are doing a pretty good job. But does it not play right into the hands of a government which is desperate to hold on to political power at any cost? It is not I, Mr. Speaker, who has used the word "power"; it has been the word used by the government House leader opposite, who said in the Chamber today that this is a game about power.

Raw political power we are seeing here, Mr. Speaker, and I am confident that in the end, in the final analysis, Canadians will come to recognize that the actions of the Prime Minister, of the front line ministers, the McDougalls and the Clarks and the Mazankowskis and the Wilsons, and the respective constituencies that they represent—

An hon. member: They don't represent them.

Mr. Dingwall: Ah, that is the key phrase. That is the key phrase. They represent one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is their political friends and their political cronies. We find it despicable, Mr. Speaker, that we have had to come in this country to this kind of confrontation.

The question I ask members of this House: Have we seen it elsewhere? It is Brian Mulroney's way, the Prime Minister's way, or no way. Did we see it before, Mr. Speaker? And we are going to see it again, as evidenced here with this particular piece of legislation. I say this to the viewing public tonight: Note the procedural gymnastics of the government opposite in order to draw to the attention of the Canadian people a sense of urgency, hoping that there will be conflict on the picket lines, hoping that there will be confrontation between innocent individuals to render their decisions, their Draconian decisions, as being legitimate.

Mr. Speaker, one wrong does not make it right; two wrongs do not make it right; and three wrongs certainly makes it very wrong for this Parliament and for this government to proceed the way in which it is proceeding here today.

In closing, in the few minutes that I have before it reaches the hour of six, there are other things that have to be stated and put on the record, which my leader will do tomorrow, because I presume we will be proceeding directly to second reading. But there are issues of great importance. The government House leader has talked about the issue of contracting out, or has refused to talk about contracting out. Bill C-26, which was passed by this House, provides for layoffs in the event that work loads are contracted out. Well, last year five billion dollars—five billion dollars—was spent through contracting out.

Now, I ask this House, do they think it is a political slush fund? Are there any Tories who have benefited from the contracting out?

An hon. member: You had better believe it.

Mr. Dingwall: Have the young workers across this country who are within the Public Service and elsewhere really benefited from this?

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Dingwall: I suggest to this House and to the viewing public here tonight, Mr. Speaker, that the five billion dollars which has been spent on contracting out is another form of the Brian Mulroney patronage that we have seen in this country and are sick and tired of in this country.

The government House leader makes no reference whatsoever in terms of what the conciliation boards have said, and I will close with this quote, Mr. Speaker. Here is what they said on all monetary issues and rates of pay. Here is what the conciliation board reported—duly appointed by the government as well as appointed by the union representatives—and I quote:

> All of the above issues are directly monetary matters. Obviously, the key to their solution is an agreement on basic wage increases. However, while the union positions on wages are flexible, the employer's position is presented as being totally inflexible.

What nonsense this government is trying to put forward today in the House of Commons.

• (1800)

I argue through you, Mr. Speaker, that we will not be a part of a government which is selecting individuals who are members of unions and are suffering because of the incompetence of the government opposite.

I wish to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-2, An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, on June 11 of this year I put a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister in connection with ministerial responsibility. This question arose around the drama of the Al-Mashat affair, as it has now come to be called. We did not have an opportunity in the close confines of Question Period to address some of the points that I mentioned in the question.

I do not wish to talk about the Al-Mashat affair specifically. What I want to concentrate on is the issue of ministerial responsibility. What I would like to do is try if at all possible to put my point succinctly and if possible to get a straight answer from the government.

In my question I referred to a little booklet of some six pages, which is entitled Notes on the Responsibilities of Public Servants in Relation to Parliamentary Committees. It is put out by the Privy Council Office. It was put out in this case in December 1990.

For those who are not familiar with the Privy Council Office, of course it is the highest office for public servants in this land and provides guidance to those public servants on how they should behave.

In my question I quoted a couple of paragraphs of this little booklet. In responding, the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, proceeded to lecture me on the McGrath committee of 1985 and what occurred in the McGrath committee. Of course, that is totally irrelevant because that took place many years before the publication of this document. This document is recent. It is less than one year old and it was given the blessing of the Privy Council Office. It says very clearly the following, and I quote from page one:

> Ours is a system of "responsible" government because the Government must retain the confidence of the House of Commons and because Ministers are responsible to the House for everything that is done under their authority. They are answerable to Parliament and its committees. It is Ministers who decide policy and Ministers who must defend it before the House and ultimately before the people of Canada.

That is on page one of this very short booklet. On the last page of this very short booklet, page six, there is a recap. Remember that this is a booklet that public servants are expect to read and are expected to follow in their conduct when they appear before committees.

It is reiterated in the final paragraph and I quote:

> It is Ministers, and not officials, who exercise the constitutional authority of the Crown; and it is Ministers, and not their officials, who are responsible to Parliament. Officials are accountable to Ministers.

I asked a very simple question in connection with those two paragraphs. I thought it was clear, non-partisan and simple. Will the Prime Minister confirm that this is the policy of his government? Surely a yes or no answer would have sufficed.

A document produced by the highest civil servant to be followed by the rest of the civil servants, I ask very simply: Is this the policy of this government. I am asking again. Could I please have a yes or no?

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the member had to say.

I was a member of the McGrath commission as was his colleague, the member for Papineau. One of the clear statements made by that commission was that while ministers of the Crown are responsible, they cannot be exclusively responsible because every department in government is so large that you cannot expect the minister to know everything that is going on in the department.

I want to respond more specifically to what the member has to say to put to rest any concerns he might have concerning the state of health of parliamentary democracy as it exists in Canada today.

In our system of government, the powers of the Crown are exercised by ministers who are in turn answerable to Parliament. The exercise of these powers for which ministers are constitutionally responsible to Parliament provides the foundation of responsible government.

This system of government enables Parliament to focus responsibility for the conduct of government on those of its members who hold ministerial office and who ultimately must personally answer to Parliament and hence to the electorate for their actions and the actions of their subordinates.

Ministers are supported in the exercise of their responsibilities of the Public Service whose duty it is to give loyal, professional and non-partisan support to the government of the day.

Public servants are responsible to ministers. They have no constitutional responsibility to Parliament, nor do they share in that of ministers. They do, however, support ministers in their relationship with Parliament and to this extent they may be said to assist in the answerability of ministers to Parliament.

Ministers fulfil their responsibilities and are called to account by the House of Commons for the exercise of their statutory authority in accordance with practice and convention. This accountability is and has been well noted by eminent authorities and those who have political responsibility.

The way in which ministers exercise their responsibility for the actions of their officials will depend upon the circumstances and whether an official has acted, for example—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the time is over.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to elaborate on a question I posed in June.

Canada is facing a crisis in health care and it is based on two things. The cutbacks by the federal government and transfer payments that the government was anticipating.

Those cutbacks by the turn of the century will amount to $2.4 billion or about $10 billion a year. This year alone the cutbacks are crippling the provinces' ability to deliver health care. All one has to look at is cutbacks to health care, particularly in the weaker provinces of Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces. Newfoundland had to lay off 10 per cent of its nurses.

In my home province of British Columbia, the cutbacks amounted to a loss of income of $500 million this year. In the province of Ontario, it was $2.5 billion this year in money that it had been promised to provide health care to Canadians.

What does this mean in my community, Surrey, which is one of the fastest growing communities in Canada? It means that we have 1.1 acute care beds per 1,000 population instead of the 3.3 that is necessary. Forty per cent of the population must leave its own community to receive basic health care.

The federal government's response is that we should be putting more money into preventive health care. Surrey, because of the cutbacks, is not able to provide the preventive health care that is necessary.

• (1810)

We are 35 full time public health nurses short in the municipality of Surrey. We are 27 health inspectors short. These are the people who provide preventative services that save money down the road. One of the things that is threatening our health care is the cutback in the transfer of funds. The other is the erosion of national standards.

This government has waffled when it comes to upholding national standards. Right now we have three things happening that are threatening national standards with the introduction of user fees in Canada.

We have the Tory convention clearly saying and going on record that it wants to introduce user fees.

The province of Quebec has introduced user fees in some emergency hospitals. This government has not taken any action in relation to that and shows no indication that it is going to take any action and uphold the Canada Health Act.

In my province we have the premier, Rita Johnston, that great Socred. In B.C. we know what Socreds are. They are just a combination of Liberals and Tories who get together to form power. The premier has come out supporting the introduction of user fees.

What we have in Canada is a threat to our national medicare program. I would like the government to clarify what its commitment to national medicare is, that is a partnership between itself and the provinces with joint and equal financing and with the federal government setting standards it will uphold.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is unequivocally committed to supporting our national system of medicare and the five principles of accessibility, universality, comprehensiveness, portability and public administration will be protected.

The government this year provided over $16 billion in transfer payments under the EPF, Established Programs Financing. This is double the amount the federal government transferred to the provinces just ten years ago.

Maintaining the national standards of underlying medicare is not just about money. Canadians realize that both federal and provincial governments cannot endlessly allocate substantial new financial resources to meet the increasing costs of health care. Most provincial and territorial task forces and commissions have acknowledged that more money is not the answer to the problem in health care.

The federal government has to ensure that health care costs remain affordable. To do this, it must join all the stakeholders in the field of health, be it the government, health care professionals or consumers of the health care services. Everyone has to participate in seeking and implementing solutions to the challenges that are facing us.

The federal government has already laid the ground work for ongoing dialogue and possible approaches to improve the health care system.

One example is the positive and very beneficial meeting between the federal and provincial health care ministers last June and also their agreement to a follow-up meeting this week.

Another example is the creation, in conjunction with our provinces, of the Canadian Co-ordinating Office on Health Technology Assessment.

The federal government welcomes all contributions of the stakeholders to this debate on how we can improve a good health care system. We can improve it, we can alter it, we can streamline it, but we will preserve it.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, September 18, I will be leaving Canada to journey to Soviet Armenia. I will be Canada's official observer at the referendum for independence which is to be held on Saturday, September 21.

An aide from our embassy in Moscow and Vazken Tertian are accompanying me. Mr. Tertian is a Canadian Armenian leader who lives in Thornhill.

This will be an historic trip for both of us, but it will be an emotional visit for Mr. Terzian. Born in Lebanon, this is the first time Mr. Terzian will visit Armenia where his parents were born.

His parents had to flee Armenia during the 1915 massacre. His father to be was three years old and his mother to be was four years old at the time. Thousands of children had to flee. His parents walked almost 1,000 miles in search of freedom. This cruel and arduous ordeal took six months. His mother's aunt was the only adult to help them. His family eventually settled in Lebanon.

In 1920, Armenia was taken under communist rule as a result of the revolution. This communist yoke was to last 70 years. Finally, with the growth of Gorbachev's Perestroika and Glasnost, the flames of freedom burned.

In December 1989 the oppressive communist regime was buried with a democratically elected Parliament in Armenia.

The next milestone in Armenia's fight for democracy and freedom was in August of 1990 when the newly elected Parliament put forth a road to independence.

This road to independence included the plan for a democratically conducted referendum on independence. This referendum will, as I said earlier, be held on Saturday, September 21.

Both Vazken Terzian and I are thrilled and honoured to have the opportunity to be in Yerevam, the capital of Armenia, to witness this historic referendum with our own eyes.

While we fully expect overwhelming support for the referendum, it is important that the referendum be conducted with absolute integrity and fairness.

We will be monitoring the process by investigating the preparation of voter lists, finding out how ballots are distributed and other details such as the identification necessary for voting.

We want to ensure that results are tabulated correctly and fairly. These are just a few of the many steps that we will be monitoring.

I am proud to say that this will be my second trip to Soviet Armenia. My last visit was in March 1989. It was a sad journey. I led a group of Canadian Armenians to examine the tragic devastation caused by the December 1988 earthquake. My good friend Apkar Mirakian, from Scarborough, was one of the Canadian Armenian leaders on the trip.

It was physically and emotionally exhausting to visit the ravaged sites and to witness and learn about the incredible death and destruction that occurred.

On our trip, Mr. Mirakian and I had the thrill of attending a special service on Easter Sunday at the Atchmiazin Cathedral.

I have tremendous respect for the resilience displayed by Armenians over the past decades. They survived the genocide of 1914–15. They survived 70 years of communism.

There are still problems to be settled in Azerbaijan where human rights violations continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but are you making a statement? I do not understand your speech. Have you a question for the government?

Mr. Attewell: I do but I wanted to outline the importance of the trip and this independent movement. I do want to ask, in terms of the human rights violations in Azerbaijan, can the parliamentary secretary tell me if that is being dealt with expeditiously?

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the member from Markham for the opportunity to represent Canada during the vote that will be taken in Armenia during this week, actually on September 18. It is a delight for all of us who have enjoyed democracy for so many decades and centuries to see these people, who have suffered the scourge of totalitarianism and communism for so many years, experiencing now the light of freedom in their lives.

Along with that, I might add, how energized we are to see what is happening in the Baltic states and the independence that those people in the Baltics are enjoying now after having been denied the democracy that is so rightfully theirs for these 50 years.

I am pleased to say that the government has chosen to send the member from Markham to Armenia to make sure that the human rights violations are, if possible, non-existent, that a vote is honest and accurate. The minister just very recently met with members of the community in Toronto, just 10 days ago, to assure them that Canada is on their side. Wherever there is an opportunity for people to experience the flourishing of democracy and free speech, free thought and free action, we want to be with those people.

I therefore wish the member Godspeed and hope that what he experiences there is unimpeded democracy during the vote that will be held just a few days hence.

Adjournment Debate

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the minutes available to me to review in this Chamber a question I had the opportunity to pose to the government, namely to the Minister of Transport, on May 14, 1991.

If we cast our collective minds back to that period, we will remember that instead of the Public Service union protesting outside Parliament's door today, it was truckers from across the country, particularly from the province of Ontario.

Truckers came to Ottawa because they are literally being run off the road by American competition. We, on this side, are not saying that a Canadian trucker and a Canadian industry cannot have the technology and the will and the determination and the work ethic to compete with their American counterparts. But what we are saying is that because of the size and the differential in the size between the American and the Canadian trucking industry, the fuel costs, the depreciation costs, the tax structure costs, it is simply an unlevel playing field.

To simply sit back, as this government is doing, and say to the Canadian truckers and the industry that they should not worry but should go out there and compete in the name of free enterprise, is irresponsible.

It is also irresponsible to promise something and do absolutely nothing. The predecessor to the current Minister of Transport last summer in Windsor, when they had a blockade, said that he was going to take the issue to cabinet and that he was going to make the financial changes required for the trucking industry to compete. He then said he was going to study all the factors and unleash a series of seven task forces to study the industry inside out and report back with the intention of ushering in some action and some much reform and change.

Where is the change? Where are the modifications? On April 22, 1991, I wrote the minister to say that we were getting another series of blockades because another year had passed by and nothing had changed. On April 24 we appealed once again to the minister who basically did not lend us or the trucking industry his ear nor that of his government.

What happened was that on May 13, like the workers outside our doorstep today, enough was enough. They basically rallied in frustration, losing their pay per day, and they stayed here several days and many of them could not afford it. But they basically appealed to Parliament to listen to their concerns. We presented on a parliamentary day that we initiated an entire parliamentary debate focused on the trucking industry. We were not strident, we were not negative. We offered a nine-point program which we felt with all sincerity was legitimately addressing the concerns presented to us. That was on May 17, and the minister promised to look at it, to release the reports and take action on the recommendation of the reports. It is now September 16 and nothing has happened. The minister has said nothing and done nothing. What I am advocating and what we are hoping for, Mr. Speaker, with the fresh start that presents itself to the Chamber and to the government particularly, as fall is a symbolic start of any school or of any chamber, we are looking for a symbolic and a very practical change of heart as it relates to the trucking industry. I hope my hon. friends on the other side will begin that process today with an answer and with a promise to make things better.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has raised this issue today so that we can get a few facts on the table.

The Minister of Transport has had several productive meetings with the task force on trucking issues. This task force was established last year to give the industry a forum for discussion of industry problems and for consultation with the government. Members of the task force represent shippers, carriers, unions and owner-operators. Last July the minister advised the task force that the government is prepared to consider the need for some form of transitional assistance to the industry and asked for their input.

The Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Transport met again last week with the task force. At that meeting the task force gave the ministers their recommendations for transitional assistance. As the minister explained at that meeting, the next step will be for him to take these recommendations both to his provincial and federal colleagues. It is the minister's intention to meet with his provincial colleagues in Winnipeg later this week. Provincial participation is clearly a key element.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member has, that studies on the trans-border trucking competitiveness that were commissioned by the task force did not substantiate the claims from the opposite side of the House about the tax burden for our truckers. Indeed, the studies proved that because of the introduction of the GST, the tax burden of Canadian truckers is about the same as that of American truckers. In fact, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the goods and services tax, the federal tax on diesel fuel has actually been reduced by three cents a litre.

I am very aware, as is this government, that the trucking industry has been hard hit by the recession. Thankfully though we have begun to hear from sources both inside and outside the industry that the outlook for the future is improving as the recession ends.

The Minister of Transport is committed to fostering a Canadian trucking industry that meets the needs of the Canadian economy and a strong economy will benefit all participants in the trucking industry itself.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, on May 31 of this year I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the situation faced by the fresh apple industry in Canada.

The Canada Farm Products Marketing Council has recommended to the minister the establishment of a national marketing agency for fresh apples. This was after the council held hearings in the fall of 1990 across the country, especially in the five major apple growing provinces.

I was pleased that in his answer on May 31 that the minister indicated he would do what the growers asked him to do. And I am here again tonight to stress that I hope the minister follows up on that.

The apple industry, the fresh apple industry in particular, but all of the industry—but we are talking about the fresh apple industry here this evening—is an important industry. There are 8,000 apple farmers in Canada, producing 500,000 tonnes of apples per year and employing 15,000 Canadians.

The problems facing fresh apple producers in Canada is one of both price and world overproduction. During their extensive hearings, it was demonstrated time after time that the major predicament facing Canadian growers is one of price. In 1989 the average producer received 9.5 cents for apples that cost him over 14 cents a pound to produce, a tough way of doing business.

The Farm Products Council has accepted the recommendations of the producers. I would like to just very quickly go over those, Mr. Speaker. They are a very excellent group. They address the concerns that Canadians have about marketing agencies and speak very well to them.

First, this system would ensure reasonable returns to efficient producers. There will be a high level—one-third of apple imports into Canada. Quota will have no value. There will be no shortage of apples due to supply management. There will be incentives for growers to produce high quality apples of the varieties wanted by Canadian consumers.

• (1830)

The agency will be oriented toward promoting the demand for apples and is in strict compliance with the terms and conditions of GATT and the free trade agreement.

My question to the government is this. When is the government going to begin to put into motion the recommendations of the Farm Product Marketing Council and the vast majority of Canadian apple growers, and take immediate steps to launch a national marketing agency for fresh apples for the benefit of all Canadians?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member, at the request of apple growers, the National Farm Products Marketing Council began an inquiry into the merits of establishing a national apple marketing agency. The report of the council was released on May 8, 1991. Although the report recommends the eventual establishment of a national apple agency with all of the powers under section 22 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, there are a number of steps which remain to be taken before an agency can be proclaimed.

These steps include the development of a more detailed marketing plan and the need to take into account the principles of second generation supply management, as well as Canada's international trade obligations.

The development and implementation of an effective national apple agency will require the close co-operation and participation of provincial governments as well. To ensure that the views of the provinces are taken into account early in the process, the minister initiated discussions with them and has asked for input from the apple producing provinces on the report of the council. This includes New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

The Minister of Agriculture has also requested input from the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on the implications for Canada's trade obligations and the processing sector, as well as the impact on consumers.

Only after consultations with provincial governments and cabinet colleagues, will the government be in a position to provide further direction to the National Farm Products Marketing Council and the apple growers on the next steps in the process.

I think the member would agree that those processes have to be followed.

In the meantime, we would encourage apple growers to continue their efforts toward developing an improved apple marketing system. It was recognized by growers during the inquiry that there are a number of issues which must be addressed by apple growers to improve their marketing system. These include information systems, apple pricing, promotion and trade data. Agriculture Canada has provided $50,000 in financial support to the apple committee of the Canadian Horticulture Council and to assist in analyzing the problems with the present marketing structures and to assess options and make recommendations for incorporation into the development of a long-term marketing strategy for Canadian apples.

This information will be of great benefit to the industry in planning for the future.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I notice that the Minister of National Defence is not in the House to make a statement at this time, and I can appreciate the scheduling difficulties. I am wondering if the House would agree to allow us to revert to ministerial statements at three o'clock to allow the Minister of National Defence to make a statement to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter for the consideration of the House. Of course it can be done if there is consent. I look to the hon. parliamentary secretary for his response.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance to consult with the Minister of National Defence this morning, so may I bring that to his attention? I will certainly come back to the House and advise the House as to whether or not we can do that.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-269, an act to amend the Copyright Act (fair use).

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this bill once again. In the last session I was very pleased to have an hour of debate on this issue and then it was unanimously referred to the committee, which never considered it. I think one of the frustrations of being a backbencher is that it takes so long to get any issue of importance to your constituents considered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Question No. 20—Mr. Boudria:

I am informed by the Department of National Revenue as follows:

Customs and Excise Division of Revenue Canada produced a poster highlighting a logo and the words "A Proud New Image".

The purpose of the poster was to inform the Canadian public and the Customs and Excise employees of the new departmental identity which provides a quick and easy recognition of all Customs and Excise material. Until then, there was no common symbol for Customs and Excise.

The poster was created by the design firm Banfield Seguin and some 12,000 copies were printed.

Before commencing the work on the poster, the Communications Branch invited two designers to discuss their ideas. It was decided by a committee created within the Department to hire the firm Banfield Seguin.

The printer for the poster was chosen by DSS.

The poster was distributed to all Customs and Excise employees and to various offices of Customs and Excise.

The cost of designing the poster and submitting camera-ready artwork with colour separation was $2,171. The cost of printing the poster through DSS was $4,950.

The standardization of one common graphic for use by both Customs and Excise means significant savings.

Question No. 36—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

How many classification audits of Departmental Public Service positions were completed in 1988, 1989 and 1990 and, in each case, what were the findings for each department?

Approximate cost: $97.

I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat as follows:

See attached.

During the 1988-89 biannual audit, 3,303 positions throughout the Public Service were audited. Two hundred and forty-eight, or 6.4 per cent of the sample, were considered to have been incorrectly evaluated. This is a significant improvement over the results of the last audit conducted in 1985-1986 when 11 percent of 3,568 positions were found to have been incorrectly classified.

Annex A shows the departments audited and the results for the biannual audits of 1988-1989 and 1985-1986.

The third triennial audit has been underway since February 1991. The departments should have completed their reports before the end of February 1992.

Question No. 37—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

For the classification audits of Departmental Public Service positions prior to 1988, have all the observations made relative to over classification etc. been corrected and, if not, which departmental audits have not been corrected and when will these be corrected?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 5 hours and 32 minutes

Approximate cost: $98.

I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat as follows:

See attached.

The results of the 1985–1986 biannual audit showed 417 of a total sample of 3,568 positions had been incorrectly evaluated (11 percent error rate). Based on available information, the vast majority, if not all, of the proposed corrective measures have been implemented to our satisfaction.

Since the last audit, Treasury Board Secretariat has introduced a number of control measures to ensure that each year the departments undertake classification control and audit activities. Reports are produced quarterly and annually for Treasury Board review and analysis in order to rate the departments on the quality of their classification control systems. Only departments which have received a "Fully Satisfactory" rating and maintain a rate of incorrect decisions below 10 percent are granted increased classification authority.

This annual report is also one of the elements used in the comprehensive evaluation of the departments.

Question No. 54—Mr. Wappel:

Is Charles Ng presently enrolled in any inmate pay programs, and, if so, (a) which program (b) what level of inmate pay is he receiving?

Approximate cost: $74.

I am informed by the Department of the Solicitor General as follows:

Charles Ng is on an inmate pay program.

(a), (b);

Specific information pertaining to Mr. Ng's involvement in programming as well as the level of pay he may be receiving is personal information about Mr. Ng and therefore cannot be disclosed as it would contravene the Privacy Act.

Federal inmates may earn anywhere from $5.25 to $6.90 per day in an institution, depending on their performance on the job. Inmates willing to work but who are not working because of job shortages, medical reasons or lack of supervision receive a base rate of $1.60 per day. Inmates who refuse to either work or participate in institutional programs are not paid.

Question No. 56—Mr. Manley:

What is the total cost that the government will incur for the complete relocation of (a) the Canadian Space Agency to St. Hubert, Quebec (b) the National Energy Board to Calgary?

Approximate cost: $334.

I am informed as follows:

a) Industry, Science and Technology Canada:

The total cost incurred to date by the Canadian Space Agency in relation to its relocation to St. Hubert is $334,488.

Public Works Canada:

The Canadian Space Agency (CSA) is presently located in leased premises at 500 René-Lévesque Boulevard West in Montréal, in a building belonging to TRIZEC. The lease commenced January 1, 1991, and will terminate December 31, 1992, with two six-month options available.

The CSA occupies 2, 744.6 m2u (3,012.6 m^2r) of office space spread out over several floors with nine interior parking spaces, at an annual cost of $1,054,259.37. The Agency also occupies 50.2 m2u (55.2 m2r) of storage space in the basement of the same building at an annual cost of $7,672.14.

The total to Public Works Canada for the interior fit-up of the Agency was $411,688.64.

b) National Energy Board:

The NEB estimates that the relocation of the Board's operations to Calgary will cost $20.5 million. In addition, it is estimated that the department of Public Works will incur incremental cost of $6 million to lease and fit-up office accommodations for the Board. Eighty-five percent of these costs, or $22.5 million, will be recovered through cost recovery charges.

The cost related to the relocation of that portion of the Board which was transferred from the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration (approximately 15 percent) will be excluded from cost recovery.

The actual costs incurred by the government will be some $4 million.

Question No. 61—Mr. Hovdebo:

1. With respect to the CIDA funding cuts to contracts for (a) CUSO (b) OCSD (c) Canadian Teachers' Federation (d) Canada World Youth (e) Canadian Crossroads International (f) CECI (i) what specific criteria were used to select each organization for cuts (ii) were the organizations consulted concerning these cuts and, if not, why not, (iii) why were these contracts not honoured (iv) will the anticipated savings of the CIDA funds as a result of these cuts be placed in the ODA program reserve?

2. Does CIDA anticipate any further cuts to (a) the above noted organizations (b) other organizations?

Approximate cost: $115.

I am informed by the Canadian International Development Agency as follows:

1. i) CIDA has used the following criteria for each of the organizations mentioned:

—to make funds available to meet urgent new requests for official development assistance received or anticipated by the Government;

—to maintain support for the activities and programs identified as the main responsibilities of these organizations:

—not to jeopardize the viability of these organizations.

(ii) No, because decisions resulting from the tabling of the February budget and the March estimates could not be finalized until just before the 1991-92 fiscal year began. CIDA hastened to make them available to partner organizations as quickly as possible, that is, before the fiscal year was well under way.

(iii) CIDA does not have contracts with the NGOs mentioned, but rather contribution agreements. Multi-year contribution agreements between CIDA and Canada World Youth, Canadian Crossroads International, OCSD and the Canadian Teachers' Federation had to be amended owing to limited budgetary resources and the large number of new demands on official development assistance budget. Contribution agreements with CUSO and CECI had not yet been signed when the budgets for these organizations were announced. Furthermore, payments for multi-year contribution agreements are also subject to an appropriation by the Parliament of Canada for the fiscal year in which the payment is to be made.

(iv) The funds saved will be used to meet the new demands on the official development assistance budget.

2. a) No further reduction in CIDA's contributions to the organizations mentioned is planned in 1991-92.

b) No further reductions are planned for CIDA's contributions to other organizations whose funding levels were reduced in 1991-92.

Question No. 63—Mr. Laporte:

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 3 hours and 45 minutes

Approximate cost: $69

I am informed by the Department of Finance as follows:

Money from the Canada Pension Plan has been loaned to the federal and provincial governments.

(a), (b)

The governments owing money to the Canada Pension Plan as at March 31, 1991, and the amounts owing are as follows:

Norhtwest Territories	0.00
Canada	3,492,216,000.00
Total	37,661,664,000.00

(c) The repayment arrangements consist of semi-annual interest payments on the principal amount and full repayment of the principal at maturity. The maturity date for all outstanding loans is twenty years from the issue date.

(d) The rate of interest being charged on outstanding loans varies as outlined in the Canada Pension Plan—Part III, Section III, Paragraph (2)(a). The Act states that the rate is calculated as follows:

"in the case of an obligation having a term to maturity of twenty years, on the basis of the average yield to maturity as determined by the Minister of Finance of all outstanding obligations of the Goverment of Canada that are not limited or restricted as to the negotiability or the transfer or assignment thereof and that have terms to maturity of twenty years or more, weighted according to the amounts of those obligations then outstanding, —".

Question No. 64—Mr. Laporte:

What steps has the CRTC taken towards implementing recommendations of PSAC 2000?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 5 hours and 5 minutes

Approximate cost: $92.

I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission as follows:

The Commission, in the spirit of PS2000 had, in the Fall of 1990, initiated an internal consultative process with employees. Known as the Employee Consultative Committee (ECC), its objective was to allow employees the opportunity to identify issues and concerns in their work environment.

The process was structured around focus groups animated by a professional in the management communication field, and supported by questionnaires completed by staff. The process resulted in a report identifying close to 70 recommendations for change dealing with every aspect of the work environment from air quality to improving management styles.

Senior management of the Commission gave the ECC report its approval and support, and established, in the spring of 1991, the "Task Force for Revitalization", a committee of six employees with a six month mandate to act as a catalyst for change within the Commission. The Task Force's role is to implement, as soon as possible, all recommendations of the ECC report that prove feasible.

Two months into the Task Force's mandate, several initiatives have begun to address employees' immediate concerns, such as overcrowding of office space and an orientation program and kit for new and existing employees. The Task Force is also addressing the broader questions of career development by, among other things, examining the possibility of establishing an assignment program. The question of how the operational budget concept and management accountability will be introduced is being addressed by a pilot project in three branches. A complete review of the performance appraisal system is being undertaken, including the introduction of an incentive and awards system.

In terms of the PS2000 focus on service to the public, the Commission had, prior to the tabling of the PS2000 White Paper, undertaken internal reviews on streamlining its operations in both broadcasting (Ross Task Force) and telecommunications (Sherman Task Force). Each of these studies had a specific goal of improving turnaround time of decisions and public notices and reducing the associated costs to the Commission's clients.

In addition, because of the nature of its regulatory system (primarily through the public hearing process), the Commission has always undertaken extensive consultation with its clients as part of its policy formulation and decision-making process.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 9 hours and 5 minutes

Approximate cost: $169.

I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows:

The information provided under sections 17 and 19 are considered to be trade secrets by the tobacco industry whose members have requested confidentiality. This request to confidentiality legally prohibits the Department of National Health and Welfare from answering whether these chemicals actually are being used by the Canadian tobacco industry.

The chemicals referred to by the hon. member can be used as humectants by the tobacco industry to promote retention of moisture. Of the five chemicals, for only one, diethylene glycol, is there limited evidence of carcinogenicity in animals. The International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC) has yet to establish whether this compound is a potential carcinogen. The other four chemicals have not been shown to be carcinogenic in studies conducted to date.

Question No. 66—Mr. Karpoff:

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare audited all accounts connected with the National AIDS Research Program in respect to the establishment of a National AIDS Registry and, if so, (a) what were the findings (b) were usual standards of accounting and project management adhered to (c) has the advice of the Auditor General or other outside source of professional advice been sought to ensure that such standards will apply to federally-sponsored research projects?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 8 hours and 5 minutes

Approximate cost: $145.

I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows:

The Department of National Health and Welfare requested the Audit Services Bureau of the Department of Supply and Services to carry out an audit of the University of Toronto's accounts with respect to a Contribution Agreement between the University and the Department for the design phase of a Treatment Information System for AIDS/HIV (TISAH). This audit was for the period June 15, 1990 to December 31, 1991.

(a) The audit found that expenditures of $386,870 were appropriately incurred against this project, subject to the acceptance by the Department of one non-arms length transaction in the amount of $27,000.

(b) The audit included a general review of the accounting procedures and such tests of accounting records and other supporting evidence as the auditors considered necessary to conduct their audit.

(c) The Auditor General periodically reviews the Department's contribution programs; the Department implements recommendations made as a result of these audits. All contribution agreements of the Department contain a clause which requires the recipient of Contributions funding to maintain appropriate financial accounts and records. The right of audit by the Federal Government is a standard clause in all such contribution agreements.

Question No. 67—Mr. Karpoff:

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare taken a public position against the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission Public Notice 1990-86 entitled "Proposed Amendments to the Television Broadcasting Regulations, 1987, Radio Regulations, 1986 and Specialty Services Regulations, 1990" regarding the advertising of hard liquor beverages and, if so, what is the budget of the department for anti-alcohol abuse advertising on broadcast media for the fiscal years (a) 1989-90 (b) 1990-91 (c) 1991-92?

Approximate cost: $125.

I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows:

The Department of National Health and Welfare has taken a public position against the CRTC Public Notice 1990-86. The Public Notice specified that public comments should relate to specific evidence (or the lack thereof) in support of or against the distinction made by the existing regulations in the broadcast advertising of beer, wine, coolers and spirits.

The Minister's response to the CRTC indicated that this was not a useful approach because the question posed cannot be given either an affirmative or a negative answer.

The Minister emphasized his belief that it does not serve the public interest to make a decision on the proposed amendments on the basis of comments for which no adequate scientific answer is available. At the same time, basing a decision on responses to this question alone ignores broader and more relevant issues raised by the proposed regulatory amendments.

The Minister's submission to the CRTC also indicated that, while the Association of Canadian Distillers might initially restrict itself to its stated intentions of airing only moderation messages, the Association might decide at a later date to exercise its right to advertise its products. The Minister emphasized his concerns that this could lead to a significant increase in the total volume of broadcast ads promoting alcohol products, thus increasing the exposure of children and adolescents to such product promotions. In addition, the visibility of cautionary messages concerning the negative consequences of unwise alcohol use would be further obscured by the resultant increases in promotional messages about drinking.

The Department implements two public awareness and information campaigns which address issues related to alcohol abuse: the "Really Me/Drogues, pas besoin!" campaign of Canada's Drug Strategy; and the "Play it Smart/Moi, j'ai toute ma tête!" campaign of the National Program on Impaired Driving.

Question No. 68—Mr. Karpoff:

Does the federal government support the International Code of Marketing of Breastmilk Substitutes developed by UNICEF and the World Health Organization for adoption into legally enforceable legislation for all countries and (a) if so, what efforts are being made to have the Code adopted in Canada and when will the Code take effect (b) if not, why not?

Approximate cost: $89.

I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows:

Although the federal government supports in principle the World Health Organization (WHO) International Code of Marketing of Breast-Milk Substitutes, it does not support the adoption of the WHO International Code into legally enforceable legislation for all countries. Because of the universal scope of the WHO International Code, some of its provisions are neither applicable nor appropriate for implementation in Canada.

The Department has for almost a decade supported breastfeeding as the preferred form of infant feeding. Canada also played a key role in developing and promoting the WHO International Code of Marketing of Breast-Milk Substitutes.

In 1981, after the adoption of the Code by the World Health Assembly, the Department obtained unanimous support for the aim and principles of the Code from all Canadian provinces.

The provinces felt that the Code should be implemented in Canada through education and health promotion rather than through legislation or regulations.

The Department has consistently taken a strong position with the Canadian infant formula industry and urged them to assume their responsabilities under the International Code. In 1987, departmental negotiations with the formula industry, through the Canadian Infant Formula Association (CIFA), led to the industry's agreement to respect the aim and principles of the International Code of Marketing of Breast-Milk Substitutes.

On October 28, 1987, CIFA members voluntarily adopted the CIFA Code of Practice.

The CIFA Code represents the industry position on the WHO International Code as adapted to the Canadian situation.

In addition, Canada recently signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, again affirming our support for breastfeeding as a contribution to children's health. The Convention is now being reviewed for ratification.

Question No. 71—Mr. Holtmann:

Has the Long Plains Indian Reserve ever filed a land claim related to property currently being used by Canadian Forces Base Portage la Prairie and, if so, when and under what conditions was it filed?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 4 hours and 5 minutes

Approximate cost: $73.

I am informed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows:

No, the Long Plain Indian Band has not filed a claim to land being used by the Canadian Forces Base near Portage La Prairie. However, the band does have a general claim under treaty for additional land. On May 10, 1991, the band submitted a band council resolution stating its interest in acquiring the land Canadian Forces Base Portage La Prairie as part of a settlement of the claim because the base is in its treaty area.

Question No. 77—Mr. Whittaker:

With respect to the Prime Minister's diplomatic trip to Japan in May 1991, was a private jet used because of possible delays in the originally scheduled flight and, if so, (a) what was the gross additional cost of the private charter (b) what was the difference in net cost between the original scheduled flight and the subsequent private charter (c) who was scheduled to travel on the original flight (d) who travelled with the Prime Minister on the private charter (e) was there a difference in the passenger lists between the original scheduled flight and the private charter?

Approximate cost: $44.

I am informed by the Offices of the Prime Minister and the Privy Council as follows:

No.

Question No. 78—Ms. Campbell (South West Nova):

With respect to the Goods and Services Tax, how many individuals have qualified for the maximum GST credit and had the rebate fully withheld and applied to outstanding tax arrears?

Approximate cost: $72.

I am informed by the Department of National Revenue as follows:

Goods and Services Tax (GST) Credits are determined each year based on family status and income. Individuals may apply for GST Credit benefits on behalf of themselves, their spouses and their children. As a result, there is a maximum GST Credit which differs for each possible family make-up. For example, the maximum GST Credit based on 1990 GST Credit application forms for a single person with no children is $290, for a single person with one child is $480, for a spouse claiming on behalf of a family with two children is $580 and so on, adding $100 for each additional eligible child.

Revenue Canada, Taxation does not maintain statistics on the number of individuals who received the maximum GST Credits for their particular family make-ups nor does the Department track the number of individuals who had their full GST Credit applied against outstanding tax arrears. To date, approximately 4 per cent of the total value of GST Credit benefits have been applied to outstanding tax liabilities or whitheld pursuant to court orders under the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act.

Question No. 79—Miss Campbell (South West Nova):

With respect to the recent three year joint marketing accord signed between Tourism Canada and the Saga Group Ltd., (a) how many similar joint agreements were signed during the fiscal year 1990-91 (b) how much money has been devoted to the distribution of promotional material?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader ot the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 21 hours and 50 minutes

Approximate cost: $394.

I am informed by the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) as follows:

a) Nil

b) A total of $412,000 was devoted to the distribution of promotional material in 1990/91.

Question No. 83—Mr. MacAulay:

With respect to the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Package (AFAP), will the government provide assistance to fishermen in need of assistance to remain in the groundfish fishing industry and, if so, (a) what is the total dollar amount allocated and/or spent for (i) each Atlantic province (ii) Quebec (b) how many people in (i) each Atlantic province (ii) Quebec have received or will receive assistance?

Approximate cost: $126.

I am informed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans as follows:

There are components of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program (AFAP) which will assist fishermen to diversify their operations and/or improve the economic viability of their fishing enterprise.

(a) (i) & (ii) Allocations of funds are not made on a provincial basis. Fishermen can submit proposals for funding to Fisheries and Oceans (DFO) to undertake a particular project which will benefit their fishing operations. However, the Program is not meant to subsidize their fishing activity but rather to complement their present activity for greater viability.

(b) (i) & (ii) To date about forty (40) fishermen and fishermen groups have received funding. Indirectly, funds provided to processors have also benefitted fishermen by opening new markets for underutilized species. The number of fishermen receiving funds under AFAP depends on the number of proposals received and the amount of funding available over the five year program to fund those proposals.

Question No. 86—Mr. Milliken:

1. With respect to commissions paid to private real estate agents by the Department of National Defence, (a) is there an established commission rate and, if so, what is it (b) are there any regional variations and, if so, what are they (c) during 1990, what was the rate amount paid per base, for the sale or purchase of residences belonging to military personnel in Canada?

2. With respect to Canadian Forces Base Kingston, what are the names of the real estate agents who received commissions and how much did each agent receive?

Approximate cost: $328.

I am informed by the Department of National Defence as follows:

1. The Department of National Defence has no pecuniary relationship with any private real estate agents. All payments for real estate fees are made to military members as reimbursement for commissions paid to agents contracted by the individual members to sell their private residences.

a) The Department normally will not reimburse fees that are based on a rate of commission higher than the multiple listing rate recommended by the area real estate board;

b) rates vary between provinces and municipalities and because the Department does not deal directly with agents, no record of actual rates paid is maintained;

c) as rates are set by local area real estate boards for the general public, the Department does not keep track of the rates paid by base.

2. Because the Department does not deal directly with real estate agents, and Departmental information systems have not yet perfected the cost capturing of relocation expenses such as real estate fees to this level of detail, payments to individual agents are not tracked separately. As such, there is no practical way to determine an accurate dollar value of real estate fees reimbursed to members at CFB Kingston.

Question No. 88—Ms. Clancy:

In 1989, did the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada deny a request to have St. Mary's Cathedral in Halifax, N.S., declared a national historic building or a building of architectural significance and, if so, (a) what were the reasons for the refusal (b) how many other applications were made and refused?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 8 hours and 35 minutes

Approximate cost: $154.

I am informed by the Department of the Environment as follows:

a) At its February 1989 meeting the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada (HSMBC) considered the possible national significance of St. Mary's Basilica in Halifax, N.S. It was the Board's recommendation that:

While St. Mary's Basilica was undoubtedly of considerable regional importance given its place in the history of Catholicism in Nova Scotia, it was not prepared to recommend that the Cathedral was of national historic or architectural significance.

Further, the Board stated that it would be pleased to give further consideration to the possibility of erecting a plaque at the Basilica, should studies be presented to it in the future, on religious leaders in Canada or examining themes such as the emancipation of Nova Scotia Catholics, which indicated that such action was indeed warranted.

b) Other applications made and refused in 1989 include:

1) Naval and Military Establishments, Penetanguishene, Ont.

2) Old Brewery Bay (Leacock Residence), Orillia, Ont.

3) Kingston General Hospital, Kingston, Ont.

4) Pearse House, Scarborough, Ont.

5) Chalmers Wesley United Church, Quebec, Que.

6) Former Public Market, Sainte-Scholastique, Que.

7) Peake Buildings, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Question No. 91—Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing):

Has the government taken any steps to stop clearcut logging in Wood Buffalo National Park and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Time required to prepare this answer: 9 hours and 5 minutes

Approximate cost: $164.

I am informed by the Department of the Environment as follows:

The Canadian Parks Service has been negotiating with Canadian Forest Products Ltd. since January 1991 to seek an end to the legal logging operations in Wood Buffalo National Park. Progress continues to be made through these negotiations.

Commencing in January 1991, the Canadian Parks Service and Canadian Forest Products Ltd. agreed to new harvesting standards for the logging operations which better protect the natural ability of the forest to grow back after logging. These standards will apply to any future logging operations, if they should occur.

Time required to prepare this answer:	6 hours and 50 minutes
Approximate cost:	$124

I am informed by the Department of the Environment as follows:

Environment Canada	(a) $3.8 million

*Question No. 8—Mr. Saint-Julien:

During the period from October 1, 1990 to June 1, 1991, has VIA Rail had to cancel passenger trains, due to unexpected circumstances, on the following three return routes: Montreal—Senneterre, Seneterre—La Sarre and Senneterre—Cochrane, and, if trains have been cancelled on these routes (i) on which routes (ii) for what reasons (iii) the dates and times of the cancellations (iv) the number of passengers affected (v) how many taxis did VIA Rail send in each case (vi) for how many passengers (vii) at what cost (viii) how many buses did

VIA Rail rent to transport the passengers (ix) at what cost, and (x) how much did it cost VIA Rail for meals and rooms for the passengers?

Approximate cost: $610.

I am informed by the Department of Transport as follows:

VIA Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows:

(i to x)

From October 1, 1990 to December 9, 1990, on Tuesdays and Thursdays the Senneterre–Cochrane trains were turned at Taschereau. Because of the poor condition of the track between Taschereau and Cochrane it was impossible for these trains to complete the round-trip in time to depart Senneterre for Montreal on schedule. VIA did not provide transport during this period beyond Taschereau on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

On March 28, 1991, the Senneterre–Montreal train was terminated at Hervey because of a freight derailment and 58 passengers were transferred by bus to Montreal. Two buses were used, one local and one express, at a cost of $790.50.

On May 29, 1991, as a result fo the same derailment, 60 passengers were bused from Montreal to Hervey where they boarded the train for Senneterre. Two buses were used, one local and one direct, at a cost of $790.50.

On May 26, 1991, the Senneterre–Montreal train was terminated at Duplessis due to a freight derailment. The 100 passengers were transported on three buses to La Tuque. Ninety of the passengers continued on two buses from La Tuque to Montreal. On arrival in Montreal, three passengers were accommodated at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel. The cost of meals and accommodation was approximately $3,600.00 and $2,800.19 was paid to charter the buses.

On May 27, 1991, as a result of the same derailment, the Montreal–Senneterre train and ten passengers were transported by bus from Montreal to La Tuque at a cost of $1,070.00. Train service was cancelled between La Tuque and Duplessis. The train operated from Duplessis to Senneterre.

On May 28, 1991, because of the same derailment, the Senneterre–Montreal train was cancelled. Twenty-five passengers were transported by bus between La Tuque and Montreal. Two buses were chartered one for local passengers and the other for through passengers at a cost of $2,140.00.

On May 29, 1991, the Montreal–Senneterre train was cancelled, also due to the same derailment. One bus was chartered to transport 24 passengers from Montreal to La Tuque at a cost of $1,070.00.

*Question No. 13—Mr. Saint-Julien:

During the period from 1980 to 1991, were Hydro-Quebec tariff structure contracts entered into by the federal government with Native villages in Quebec in order to give these villages preferential rates, and, if so, (a) how many (b) in which villages, and (c) at what rates?

Approximate cost: $438.

I am informed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows:

No. The federal government does not have any arrangement with Hydro-Quebec to provide electricity to native villages.

The department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is only responsible for the supply of electricicity in one Cree village (Waskaganish), where power is provided by generators.

*Question No. 14—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Has VIA Rail awarded a cleaning contract for passenger trains in the town of Senneterre, for trains running between Montreal and Senneterre, and Amos and La Sarre, and, if so, (a) to whom (b) how much is the contract worth (c) how many bidders were there?

Approximate cost: $182.

I am informed by the Department of Transport as follows:

Via Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows:

a) VIA has awarded a contract to J.P. Spécial Inc. to clean the Senneterre-Taschereau trains in Taschereau. (CN cleans the Senneterre-Cochrane trains in Cochrane and VIA cleans the Montreal-Senneterre trains in Montreal).

b) The value of the contract is of a proprietary nature and cannot be released for competitive reasons.

c) Two bidders.

*Question No. 26—Mr. Comuzzi:

For the fiscal year 1991-1992, were government funds allocated through the Department of (a) Transport (b) Environment (c) Fisheries and Oceans (d) Agriculture to address the infestation of zebra mussels in the Great Lakes system and, if so, in terms of (i) dollars (ii) person-years (iii) percentage of total for research (iv) percentage of total for prevention of further spread (v) percentage of total for cleanup, what total amounts?

Approximate cost: $144.

I am informed as follows:

Transport Canada:

a) (i) For fiscal year 1991-1992, Transport Canada's Marine Group includes a project in its R&D program for the study of 'Ballast Water Organisms in the Great Lakes' with a total cost estimate of $100,000. While not specific to the problem of zebra mussels, they are included in the scope of the project.

(ii) There are no person-years attached to the project as it is intended for contracting out.

(iii) The project's cost of $100,000 represents about 2.5 per cent of the total planned research and development expenditure in 1991-1992 for the Marine Group.

(iv) & (v) Answers to these elements of the question cannot be given at this time.

Environment Canada:

b) (i) The Department of the Environment is spending a total of $140,000 in fiscal year 1991-1992 on the zebra mussel. Of this amount, $100,000 has been transferred to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to supplement its research and monitoring program. The remaining $40,000 has been awarded to a University of Guelph researcher through the Great Lakes University Research Fund. The total research grant is $60,000 with the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council contributing $20,000.

(ii) No person-years have been allocated.

(iii) 100 percent of the total is for research.

(iv) Zero percent is for prevention of further spread.

(v) Zero percent is for cleanup.

Fisheries and Oceans Canada:

c) (i) Total dollars $210,000 *

* $100,000 transferred from the Department of the Environment.

Agriculture Canada:

d) No government funds were allocated in the fiscal year 1991-1992 to address the infestation of zebra mussels in the Great Lakes system.

*Question No. 27—Mr. Comuzzi:

2. From the total cost, what was the allocation in dollars for (a) research (b) salaries (c) travel (d) printing (e) distribution and (f) public meetings?

(e) $15,000

(f) The Special Advisor's travel costs allowed him to meet 1,600 individuals across Canada.

*Question No. 34—Mr. Gauthier:

For each of the next ten years, what is the estimated additional cost, if any, that would be incurred by the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) if married PSSA retired pensioners over the age of 60 were permitted to split their PSSA pensions with spouses 60 years of age or older along the lines permitted by the Canada Pension Plan?

Approximate cost: $71.

I am informed by the Treasury Board Secretariat as follows:

When a pension payable to a contributor under the Canada Pension Plan (CPP) is split, a portion of the contributor's monthly pension is simply paid to the contributor's spouse. This portion is treated for all purposes as though it were being paid to the contributor. Thus, if the contributor dies before the spouse, the amount payable to the spouse ceases to be paid. If the spouse dies before the contributor, the amount payable to the spouse reverts back to the contributor. In other words, there are no additional benefits, and therefore no additional costs, when a CPP pension is split.

Similarly, there would be no additional costs for the Public Service Superannuation Account if married pensioners were permitted to split their pensions along the lines provided under the CPP. It should be noted, however, that proposed amendments to the Income Tax Regulations (which were released in draft form by the Department of Finance in December 1989) prohibit the registration of a pension plan which permits pension splitting other than on marriage breakdown.

Approximate cost: $118

I am informed by the Department of Supply and Services as follows:

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill that is before the House today has two purposes. In the first instance, it seeks to end strikes in the public services that are seriously disrupting essential services to Canadians and damaging important sectors of the Canadian economy.

More broadly, it implements the terms of the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Program that the Minister of Finance announced in his budget on February 26, 1991.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset let me address an issue that has an important bearing on this bill. The Public Service Staff Relations Board stated yesterday that the government has not made every reasonable effort within the meaning of section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act to negotiate a collective agreement with the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

I am of the view that all our negotiations with the unions have complied with the law. The PSSRB's decision on the PSAC negotiations surprised me, since we have been able to reach settlements with four other unions that are within the government's announced wage policy.

In the case of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, we have had 60 days of negotiating sessions and we have gone through another 30 days of conciliation proceedings. Nevertheless, in order to make absolutely certain that we respect yesterday's PSSRB ruling, I have instructed my officials to indicate to Mr. Bean that they are willing to return to the bargaining table without preconditions.

With respect to the issue of a wage increase, this government remains irrevocably committed to the zero, three formula included in Bill C–29.

Let it be clearly understood that there shall be no wage increase this year, and the wage increase next year will be 3 per cent.

These offers are of course very limited and I understand frustrating, but let me remind the members again of what we saw yesterday in les Ateliers Angus in Montreal where 900 people were laid off. This is the cruel reality we have to live with.

[Translation]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we must go ahead with this bill. We cannot afford to wait until collective bargaining resumes.

The Public Sector Compensation Act provides that non–monetary proposals may be negotiated this year. Consequently, I have asked my agents to invite Mr. Bean's negotiators back to the bargaining table.

Mr. Speaker, the government must deal with the problems caused by the general strike called by the leaders of PSAC, a strike that jeopardizes the provision of essential services to Canadians and that is disrupting certain key sectors of our economy.

Grain terminals can no longer handle this year's harvest. Businesses say lay–offs are imminent because of delivery delays. On the picket lines, Canadians have seen strikers use violence and try to intimidate employees who want to work and have a right to work, and who in some cases were legally obliged to work.

By use of these tactics, the union has managed to close down federal buildings and deprive Canadians of certain services. It has gone beyond the limits of what is reasonable, as will testify the injunctions we obtained. This situation cannot be allowed to go on. The interests of all Canadians are at stake.

The government is not prepared to compromise economic recovery and essential services, nor is it prepared to let employees who want to work or are legally required to work be exposed to violence and intimidation because of their legitimate attempts to cross the picket lines.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we ask the House to pass this legislation and to do so expeditiously.

[English]

So we are proceeding with this bill. The measures in Bill C-29 have been brought about by the circumstances of our time. They represent, I admit, a departure for a limited period from the principles and institutions of collective bargaining that govern the relationship between the government and its employees in the Public Service of Canada. They also constitute a reduction in the real compensation of everyone who works in the federal public sector. This includes members of this House and our employees.

These measures will serve to address immediate and pressing concerns in the management of the economy and of the Public Service. For this reason, the government is seeking the most expeditious passage for the bill that is possible under the rules of this House.

I recognize that the provisions of the bill also create an obligation on the government to ensure that the expected benefits for the economy are realized and that long-term effects on labour relations in the Public Service are minimized.

The state of relations between the government and its employees is of particular concern to me as President of Treasury Board and I hinted that I intend to do everything that I can to strengthen that relationship once the legislation is in place.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before outlining the main points of the bill, I would like to recall the events that made it necessary to table this legislation. I would also like to draw the attention of the House to a number of aspects that are not mentioned in the bill but which contributed to the government's decision.

Hon. members will recall that the February Budget provided that departmental salary budgets would be frozen at the level of the previous year.

• (1020)

The Minister of Finance indicated at the time that any negotiated wage increases for 1991-92 would require a corresponding reduction in the number of jobs, and that in any case, the government would not contemplate wage increases of more than 3 per cent. For the next two fiscal years, annual increases would be capped at 3 per cent.

[English]

This was an important signal to other employers in the economy that they should exercise restraint in their own wage settlements if we as a country are to have a robust and enduring economic recovery. Seven provinces have followed the lead of the federal government in this respect, and there is strong evidence that the Canadian public agrees that we are on the right track.

On June 19, after it became evident that the unions would not agree to a reduction in employment levels in return for wage increases, I informed the House that the government was no longer in a position to negotiate wage settlements for the current fiscal year at an increase of more than zero per cent. On the other hand, this decision left the government in the position of being able to protect employment in the balance of this fiscal year. This then is the genesis of the zero and three formula that provides the framework for this bill.

These measures are made necessary by the weak state of the economy and the government's deteriorating fiscal situation. The government cannot afford wage increases this fiscal year and no money has been provided for such increases.

[Translation]

It is clear that the Public Sector Wage Restraint Program, also known as 0-3, was necessary, considering the financial and economic situation. However, I agree that the program has dealt a heavy blow to the government's wage guidelines and to collective bargaining in the Public Service. I also agree that collective bargaining negotiations have been very difficult for Public Service unions this year.

From the outset, I had hoped to negotiate wage settlements within the 0-3 guidelines by offering some flexibility on non-wage proposals, but throughout the bargaining process it was also clear that we might have to resort to a legislated settlement in the interests of all parties concerned.

[English]

Hon. members know that successive governments have taken the approach that the Public Service should be a fair employer and should provide compensation that is sensitive to the larger labour markets.

The unions are perfectly right when they point out that public service settlements in recent years have been lower than those provided by other sectors of the economy and that zero and three therefore are even more difficult to accept for this year and next, but they have been perfectly wrong to suggest that government workers are underpaid in comparison with their private sector counterparts.

The inflation targets announced by the Minister of Finance in the February 26 budget should in fact bring increases in the cost of living below the level of 3 per cent by the third year of the zero, three and three program which is why this bill seeks to implement only the first two years and to permit the resumption of full collective bargaining as soon as possible.

[Translation]

When I reported to the House on June 19 on the status of negotiations, we were seriously considering the possibility of recalling Parliament during the summer recess, for a number reasons. First of all, the collective agreements of 55 bargaining units representing some 165,000 employees were due to expire, with more to follow later on. We were also expecting a series of binding awards that would be a serious threat to the Public Sector Wage Restraint Program. Furthermore, two groups represented by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, Auditing and Computer Administration, had been in a legal strike position for some time.

Finally, since the number of groups that would be in a legal strike position was increasing daily, it became more and more likely that essential services to Canadians would be disrupted.

[English]

As it has turned out, Parliament did not have to be recalled. The binding awards that were handed down for 18 bargaining units represented by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada reflected the zero and three framework.

I would like to repeat that again in this House. The binding awards that were handed down for 18 bargaining units represented by PSAC reflected the zero and three framework. For their part, several other groups including ships offices and air traffic controllers have reached settlements with Treasury Board based on zero and three. To that extent our hopes have been realized.

On the other hand, the Public Service Alliance of Canada continues to reject the budget's wage policy. Its leadership categorically refused to negotiate on the basis of zero and three. Most of the 155,000 employees that it represents are in a legal strike position, and hon. members are well aware that many of them are exercising it.

Before the House recessed I served notice that we could well have to consider legislation upon our return. We are now in that position.

The government has now decided that it must proceed for two principal reasons. The first and most important is the one that I gave at the outset. We simply cannot wait any longer to deal with the situation created by the strike.

In addition, the Public Service Alliance of Canada has made it very plain in public and to me in private that it will not now or ever voluntarily accept the terms of the budget. Since the government is not about to abandon the budget, we are at an impasse.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, after explaining the reasons that led the government to table these objectives, I would now like to discuss some of the details of the bill itself.

The bill imposes a two-year extension on all collective agreements and all prior compensation plans. This means that all present strike activities will be illegal. As soon as the legislation comes into force, all union members now on strike will have to return to work. The bill provides for stiff fines for union leaders and employees who refuse to go back to work or recommend continuing the strike: up to $100,000 a day for the unions, $50,000 a day for union leaders and $1,000 a day for employees.

[English]

The fines for unions and union offices are, if they are not paid, to be collected through withholding union dues that the government collects on behalf of unions. There will be no jail sentences for non-payment.

The legislation covers all public servants and not just those who are on strike. The same provision will also apply to managers in the Public Service and to members of Parliament, the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers and their staff, members of the Canadian Forces and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Order in Council appointees will also be covered as will the heads and employees of other government bodies that are non-commercial in nature and not normally self-financing.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the bill will freeze wages for one year, whether they were set through collective bargaining or otherwise, and limit wage increases to 3 per cent the following year.

The wages of two groups whose collective agreements were bargained lenghthily before the budget was tabled—I am refering to the Auditing Group and the Computer System Administration Group—will be adjusted for the period preceeding the current fiscal year, but increases will be limited to zero and three percent for the following years. The legislation also makes an exception where any compensation plan established pursuant to the government wage policy came into effect after the budget was tabled but before this bill was introduced.

• (1030)

The bill does not suspend all aspects of collective bargaining in the Public Service. I want to emphasize that it explicitly excludes benefits and services provided under the terms of policies arrived at through consultation under the auspices of the National Joint Council of the Public Service.

The NJC is a union-management consultative body that brings together the leaders of all the Public Service unions and officials of the Treasury Board to agree upon policies that then become annexes to all collective agreements. Elements of compensation that are arrived at under NJC auspices include Public Service health insurance, disability insurance and dental care. And there are many other matters, including health and safety issues, that are discussed in the NJC.

We have deliberately left these policies and programs outside the legislation in order to provide scope for continued discussions between the unions and the employer representatives.

[Translation]

I would also want to stress that this bill does not affect pay equity within the public service. Over $80 million in equal pay adjustments will continue to be paid to employees. Moreover, the bill in no way affects the application of the Canadian Human Rights Act. In other words, during the entire restraint period specified in the bill, the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be able to deal with matters that fall within its purview, including those relating to pay equity.

[English]

I would like now to close with some comments about issues that the bill does not address. As a general matter, I have sought to ensure that the legislation covers only those matters that are necessary to restore public services and to implement the essential features of the public sector compensation restraint program announced in the budget.

The agenda that we have been discussing with the unions is considerably wider than that. The Public Service Alliance has included three major issues, job security, contracting out and pay equity in its public demands, and representatives of the other unions have made it clear that they are interested in these issues as well.

I would like to say a word about each of them. In my June 19 statement I outlined the government's position on job security. We are not prepared to entrench no-layoff provisions in collective agreements. That would be irresponsible, but it would also be unnecessary.

I stated then and I repeat now that there is no reason for additional layoffs in the balance of this fiscal year as a result of the budget. In addition, I made a commitment that every current indeterminate employee of the Public Service who is affected by changes in specific jobs or by their elimination as a result of the budget will be offered a position on comparable terms for the period the wage freeze applies if he or she is willing to be trained and possibly relocated.

[Translation]

Generally speaking as a fair employer, we recognize that it is in the interest of the government and its employees to ensure continuity as much as possible and to clear up any uncertainties if we are to have a productive and stable workforce.

As regards the relocation of employees affected by the elimination of specific jobs, this government's record is beyond reproach. All but 1,087 employees affected by the government restraint policy since its inception in 1986 were redeployed within the public service. Based on a workforce of 225,000, this would indicate a 99.5 percent job security overall.

We wish to keep this impressive record intact, Mr. Speaker. That is why we have chosen to continue to consult the union on renewing the staff adjustment policy agreed to by the NJC; this policy provides fair protection for employees.

Contracting out is an issue related to the previous one. The government is committed to providing services to Canadians as effectively and efficiently as possible. For this reason, it has sometimes had to turn to the private sector. The idea is not new, nor was it new 30 years ago when the Glassco Commission dealt with the issue of "make or buy". We will not give up contracting out as a responsible way to manage public resources. At the same time, we are sensitive to its impact on our employees and we have discussed it with the union at the National Joint Council.

[English]

Finally, I would like to mention equal pay for work of equal value or pay equity, as it is also known. The government remains committed to pursuing the goals of pay equity through its proper forum, which is the Canadian Human Rights Commission. This is why the work of the commission has been exempted from this bill. We have had a long history of working with the unions on these issues and it was they, as a group, who launched the current legal process with the Canadian Human Rights Commission. This is why we consider it inappropriate to negotiate the issues separately with individual unions.

[Translation]

Hon. members should also be aware that since 1978, many complaints concerning pay equity were resolved in close cooperation with the unions and the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

In 1990, the government made a retroactive lump-sum payment of about $317 million to 73,400 public servants. That is almost a third of a billion dollars, Mr. Speaker. As part of this move to pay equity, payments of over $81 million a year continue to be made, and other payments may follow when the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal has ruled on the pending cases. It is an important issue involving major expenditures.

[English]

In conclusion, I want to return to a point that I made at the outset. The Public Sector Compensation Act is based on the premise that all of us working in the public sector have a necessary contribution to make to national economic recovery. For the employees of the Public Service, it is not what they deserve in relation to the contribution that they make daily to this country. Unfortunately, the government and the economy generally do not have the capacity to recognize fully this contribution through the compensation that Public Service employees receive. But, we remain prepared to meet with the unions to discuss non-monetary issues outside the areas of compensation covered by the bills.

Dialogue with the unions will continue to be a central feature of the relationship between the government and its employees and it is my strong desire to remain open to the concerns of the Public Service union wherever I can.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it was not possible to reach agreement under Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) concerning allocation of time for second reading of Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto. Pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), Mr. Speaker, I give notice of my intention to propose a motion at the next sitting of the House for allotting a certain period of time for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at this stage of the bill. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order, knowing that there is no question or comment period.

Mr. Riis Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I simply want to say at the outset that the discussions regarding Standing Order 72 have not been completed. I just want to make that point clear.

• (1040)

Because of the importance of the presentation of the President of the Treasury Board this morning in terms of laying out where we are in this very critical issue, could I ask him to repeat very briefly his opening statement regarding the return to the bargaining table that he has now instructed his officials to do, particularly the point of no preconditions.

It is such a critical point. It is not a question. I am simply asking him to restate that short part of his presentation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: I apologize to the hon. member. I am quite prepared to repeat this section, which is a very brief two or three paragraphs.

I said that I wanted at the outset to address an issue that has an important bearing on this bill. The Public Service Staff Relations Board stated yesterday that the government has not made every reasonable effort in the meaning of Section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act to negotiate the collective agreement with the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

I am of the view that all our negotiations with the unions have complied with the law. The PSSRB's decision on the PSAC negotiations surprised me since we have been able to reach settlements with four other unions that are within the government's announced wage policy. In the case of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, we have had 60 days of negotiating sessions and have gone through another 30 days of conciliation proceedings.

Mr. Bean even said he was suspicious that we might have made deals with the other unions. Of course we did and we are prepared to make deals with him also. He refused them. Nevertheless, in order to make absolutely certain that we respect yesterday's ruling of the PSSRB, I have instructed my officials to indicate to Mr. Bean that they are willing to return to the bargaining table without preconditions. With respect to the issue of a wage increase, this government remains irrevocably committed to the zero and three formula included in Bill C–29.

Let it be clearly understood that there shall be no wage increase this year and the wage increase next year will be 3 per cent.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today at a extremely critical time in Canada's history. Our country is in great difficulty. No one is providing any leadership at all. Today, we are faced with what is probably the greatest strike the Public Service of Canada has ever known. It may not be as big as the Winnipeg strike in 1919 or the construction strike in Quebec in 1976, but it certainly marks a turning point, because there is a big difference: This is the first time we have a strike because the government decided there was going to be one. This is not a matter of collective bargaining. When we look at this government's strategy, it was obvious that it wanted public servants to hit the streets. It is a strategy we cannot condone.

As I said yesterday, our presence here in the House of Commons is useless. Everything that could be done, the government could have done last week. We made a suggestion to the government which was taken up yesterday by the union. If it had wanted a mediator, if it had wanted to observe the laws of this country and negotiate and use every means at its disposal, it could have had everyone back to work at this very moment. It could have had everyone back to work last week.

When I said yesterday that if we put everything on the table with a mediator, and when I spoke directly to 20,000 union members on Parliament Hill, everyone applauded when I said: You don't want a strike because you like the idea. What you want is a fair deal, the same as everybody else. However, this is a government that wants confrontation.

[English]

This government does not want to solve the problems. It thrives on confrontation all the time. It is not the problem of looking at the deficit figure that is the preoccupation of this government today. It does not look at the figure for the deficit. It looks at the Gallup poll deficit that it is confronted with.

It will again start attacking the weak. We saw that in the spring. Rather than ministers getting up in this House and taking responsibility for their actions, they blame bureaucrats who cannot defend themselves, attacking the weak, rather than taking their responsibilities. What are they doing today? They are attacking the lower level classifications in the Public Service. The government gave an increase of 4.5 per cent to the big shots. Two days after that, it has a new policy. It decided on zero for the people at the lower end. This is what it has done. Now it is trying to cover itself, because it got caught hands down. It says next year it will do that.

It is this year that the people are affected by the problem. It is this year that they are faced with 6 per cent inflation. Of this 6 per cent inflation, half of it has been created by higher taxes imposed on the Canadian people by this government.

The president of the CNR got his increase this year, but the little public servants who make only $16,000, $18,000 or $20,000 will have to wait for one year. They will have zero next year because the government got caught hands down. It tried to sneak it in. When we saw that and informed the public of that, the government decided to change its mind.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the minister stood up in this House and said: "Yes, in New Brunswick they have a zero increase". Yes, they have a zero increase, but the minister should have been fair to the Canadian people and told them the truth. What they have done in New Brunswick—it is a Liberal government—yes, they have a zero increase because this government has cut the transfer payments to them.

In New Brunswick, 30 per cent of their employees got the increase, those at the bottom, but not those at the top. Those at the bottom. That is the difference. In New Brunswick the employees who make less than $20,000—and it is one third of the Public Service there or 30 per cent—got an increase of 2.5 per cent this year, not zero. Those making $17,000 got an increase of 3.4 per cent, not zero.

The public servants have zero here. The government did not offer 3 per cent. Good. If government offers 3 per cent today, we will be on the its side. The public servants did not refuse the 3 per cent. The government offered zero. The government is legislating zero. If the government offers 3 per cent, we will back it up. There will be no problem. We will all agree. We know that we have to show some restraint. We know that.

We were confronted in the past with the same problems. Yes, we were, but we never offered zero when there was 6 per cent inflation. We never did that.

At this moment what the government wants is a confrontation. Yes, it was six and five for everyone. It was for prices too. It was for everyone. It was not a 4.5 per cent increase for those who make $300,000 and zero for those who make $16,000. It was six and five for everyone.

The question that faces us today is not a question of right and left. It is the question: Is it right or wrong? We could have a solution of this problem very easily because mediation is what is important at this time. In front of a mediator the union would have been able to argue what was done in New Brunswick.

• (1050)

They would have been able to argue that those at the lower end would have received compensation of perhaps 3 per cent. It is not much when inflation is 6 per cent. At least it is something to cope with the misery that they are sometimes faced with.

This government wanted to divide the country again—

Ms. Copps: It rolled the dice.

Mr. Chrétien: And it rolled the dice. It wants to gamble. It is always "my way or no way". It is always like that.

I travelled in this country all summer. I went into eight of the ten provinces during the summer and I have never seen the country in such a mood. The people are completely discouraged.

You meet farmers, fishermen, consumers. They are not very happy. They take their cars and drive to the United States and shop because the taxes have raised prices so high because of the policies of this government. They are not happy to come back with the back of their cars full of goods that they have bought in the United States. They cannot compete with prices because of the level of taxes that this government has imposed.

This government will of course impose this legislation eventually. We know that. It will use closure. It always uses closure. I remember when this House was respected a bit by the government. I remember the days when closure was used once or twice every two years. It is every week that it uses closure, or every two weeks in this House. It is always "my way or no way".

I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada are waiting. They want to tell this government that there should be justice in our land. They want the people on the other side to understand that it is not by confrontation that we will win. It is not because it has a majority.

Of course, it got a majority in 1988. It was on one issue. It managed to get a majority because of the so-called debate on free trade. There were other preoccupations, and now it uses that to ram through its right wing agenda. It wants to make sure that the "fats" are getting bigger in Canada. It does not care about the people.

There are a lot of people who are suffering in Canada today. They do not have a cent, and the government has no compassion for them. The people of this country are feeling terrible.

Again, we will have a piece of legislation. The bully attitude, it will win. It will use closure. The workers will go back to work through legislation. These hundreds of thousands of people are serving the people very well.

I read in a column in The Gazette the other day about a person in Montreal who said: "I lost my passport and I had to leave the same day. It was a terrible complication, and I was received by two public servants at the Guy Favreau Place in Montreal. They treated me very well." They had compassion. They made sure that he would not have complications because of this loss of a passport.

I have dealt with the Public Service during my long career. Most of them, 99 per cent of them, have one ambition in life: to do a good job and earn their living properly. This union has never gone on strike, ever. It has always managed to settle the claims.

There were some strikes here and there once in a while, but there was a way to handle that. There was a way. There was a conciliation board report. It does not want anybody to mediate the situation.

In the past when we were confronted with that, we were not saying: "We impose a settlement on our own." We always had a mediator or a conciliator telling us what we should do. If it was rejected by the unions, we would impose what had been recommended to us and to them.

Now, the government started the negotiations by telling them: "We want to talk, but the base is zero."

An hon. member: Great talk.

Mr. Chrétien: Great talk. And zero remains zero.

That is why we are having this problem. We will vote against this bill because this bill is wrong. This government had a choice. It could have followed the law of this land. The Public Service Staff Relations Board ruled yesterday to bargain in good faith, not to start the first day imposing zero.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Next week this government will ask these workers to follow the law of the land. We will be asking them to follow the law of the land because there is no other society where people do not follow the law of the land. But it will be difficult for some of them. They will see the Public Service Staff Relations Board report and they will say: "The Government of Canada has not followed the law of the land and we are obliged to follow the law of the land".

Mr. Speaker, we have no choice. We have to vote against this bill.

[Translation]

This legislation is not necessary, there is no need for it. If the minister and the government had really wanted a settlement, they would have acted in good faith and would have negotiated. They would have considered the solution adopted by New Brunswick, for example, which gives to the weak members of the Public Service at least a little so they can face the difficult situation caused by this government, because inflation is now 6 per cent and half this rate is due to the reckless tax increases of this government.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we must vote against this bill. We must vote against this bill because these people would not have been on strike last week, would not be on strike today and tomorrow. If only the government had done something very easy which it had the power to do, that is to name a mediator mandated to review everything, including wages. And, if the mediator had concluded that the government was right and that, under the circumstances, the 0–3–3 formula was justified, then we would have had an impartial judgment and we would probably have decided to support the government.

But, right from the beginning, this government had opted for confrontation. There were weak ones that could be attacked and they would be; the big ones at the top would not be disturbed, only the little ones at the bottom. The big ones are their friends. At least, I am proud to say that, in similar circumstances, we would have very likely followed Mr. McKenna's approach where 30 per cent salary increases were given to those at the bottom of the salary scale and 0 per cent to those with salaries above a certain level.

These premiers, Mr. Speaker, I must tell you, found themselves in a situation of mismanagement of this country's business by the government which had cut the transfer payments they needed for wage increases.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: But, in spite of the difficulties they experienced because of this government they came up with a much fairer solution than the one the government is offering us now.

[English]

I move, seconded by the member for Ottawa West:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefor:

This House declines to proceed with Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, the principle of which is to remove the longstanding rights of Canadian citizens to participate in free collective bargaining as agreed to by Canada in international conventions and as established by an act of Parliament and which principle is offensive to the House.

• (1100)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This amendment is in order. Therefore resuming debate on the main motion and on the amendment. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important debate today because we will in fact be setting a precedent for the future, a precedent about the rights of working people in this country, the government's employees, to free collective bargaining. It is also a debate about the government's obligation to respect the laws of the land, to respect the findings of its own bodies. It is also about workers being able simply to put food on the table and to live in dignity.

Today the minister said in his remarks that he is prepared to instruct his officials to begin negotiations again without preconditions. He also made other remarks about the fact that he clearly is not going to change his position on the 0 per cent wage increase. I think this requires clarification from the minister concerning exactly what the position of this government is. Through its actions and the legislation before us, this government is taking away the democratic right of collective bargaining of workers. It is treating its employees with contempt and it is denying its workers the income that they deserve.

That is why my party will not support this legislation. The New Democratic Party will not support the legislation. We cannot support a government that attacks the principles of Canadian democracy and the rights of Canadian workers because today it is these workers and tomorrow it is the rights of ordinary Canadians across the country.

This strike is causing hardship to people in this country and this government knows it. This government could have sat down at the negotiating table last week. This government could have sat down with the unions yesterday. This government could be sitting down with the unions right now. We know that farmers are suffering because of this strike. We know that it is very difficult for those in the west to have the grain shipments moved because of this strike. It is not that the union is working against the people of Canada, it is saying to this government: "We must stand up for our rights now or the rights of all Canadians will be taken away by a government that has no respect for democracy", as evidenced by this motion.

I want to say that we were with the Public Service Alliance right from the beginning and that we will continue to stand with working people in this country and we stand with them now. But I think it is important to put into context what the attack on the Public Service of this country means and exactly what it is that this government is saying to the Canadian people by this action.

Since 1984, the Conservative government has been telling Canadians everywhere that government is the problem, that it is a bad thing. When you have a party in power preaching that doctrine is it any wonder that the Canadian public is cynical about politicians and about governmental institutions. According to the Conservatives, while government is the enemy, big business is the saviour. Privatization, deregulation, corporate handouts, all of these reflect that attitude, and though these policies have all been unqualified failures the government continues to blunder on with them. Now it is saying the Public Service is part of that, and make no mistake—I hope the Canadian people make no mistake—this is part of the agenda of this government: to make sure that the union movement does not have its say, that democracy is undermined and that there is a continuation of the corporate policies that this government pursues, not in the interest of working people across this country but in the interests of multinational corporations only. We say bring more balance in. Listen to the working people of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Let me add to that, Mr. Speaker. We hear a lot from large business organizations saying that public service is a non-productive sector of our economy. Let me remind this House that far from being a non-productive burden on society, government absorbs many of the expenses that would otherwise be paid by private corporations, such as education and health care. Even more likely, without government involvement those services would not be left provided to Canadians.

Government has a role to work in the interests of all Canadians and I must say they have failed abysmally everywhere in that role. It has failed the farmers. It has failed the workers and it has failed the ordinary Canadians of this country by imposing measures such as the GST and the trade deal. We in the New Democratic Party and 88 per cent of Canadians are saying we are not going to take it anymore. We are standing up against this government and saying change your policies and work in the interests of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to look briefly at several issues that are at stake in this legislation: collective bargaining, pay equity, salaries and inflation, and the attempts of this government, in my view, to provoke a strike.

We have seen the reports of independent conciliation boards, of the government's own Public Service Staff Relations Board yesterday. The verdict is that the government has refused to bargain in good faith. This is extremely serious because the Public Service Alliance has attempted to bargain in good faith. Yesterday, in a positive gesture, they offered to remove pickets from airports and border crossings and, if the government were to come through with negotiations, to ensure and reach out to farmers. They sat yesterday with the National Farmers' Union and said: "We are concerned about you. We are concerned about this moving forward, and we want to help. We ask for a little movement from this government".

The government has an opportunity today to send a message to Canadian people. This morning on my way to work I was walking along the street. I stopped at many of the picket lines and there was one consistent message from the people. They said: "You know, we don't want to be out here. We don't want to be disrupting the Canadian people, but we know we have to make a stand now". The most common thing I heard from people was this: "Will they listen to us?" That is a refrain across this country about this government. "Will they listen to us?"

I say in all respect to this government that this is the time to listen as we move into a very difficult constitutional debate, to listen to Canadians, to listen to their own employees.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this bill abolishes the right to collective bargaining for hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It is shameful! But this bill goes much further. It tells employers in the private sector that they no longer need respect the right to collective bargaining. It gives them too the right to treat their employees unfairly. But I wish to remind hon. members and Canadian companies that the right to collective bargaining was hard won by Canadians after tough struggle in a less enlightened period.

• (1110)

We will not let the government make a decision that takes us back many decades. We will not allow ourselves to go back to those difficult times. The rights of Canadian workers cannot and will not be abolished.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, collective bargaining is one of the few tools in a democracy that workers have which ensures recognition of their rights and, yes, their responsibilities. It is fundamental to justice and equality. Justice and equality cannot be represented by one side having the club and the other side having no tools at all. Justice and equality are what we are trying to preserve here in this House today. That is what the New Democratic Party stands for, to have balance in that process, to have justice and to have equality.

I would remind this House, Mr. Speaker, that just a few years ago we all witnessed with great joy and great support the work of a very important union leader and union, Lech Walesa and Solidarity in Poland. We said how wonderful this was, that they stood up against a government that was autocratic.

The union movement both in Canada and internationally has led the fight for democracy. The public servants in this country are again leading that fight and they are giving expression to the fact that they will not accept being treated with a lack of respect. They will not accept a government that says, simply, take it or leave it, you have no rights, you are not real citizens; we will simply legislate but we will not negotiate.

We are talking about democratic rights. We are also talking about dollars and cents. I want to make one particular point here and that is about pay equity, equal pay for work of equal value. This has been the law of the land for 14 years. The minister mentioned it in his speech today, but the government has done nothing. It has had seven years to implement this law. In that time, it has done virtually nothing.

What it has done instead is to attack pay equity at the Human Rights Commission. It has been trying to get the ability not to implement pay equity.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a conciliation board report that put it in very simple terms, and I quote:

> Pay equity has been the law since 1977. It was time it was implemented for the federal public service.

I and my party, Mr. Speaker, agree with that sentiment, but let me say that it is long time past it was implemented. Canadian women are tired of second class salaries from a second class government. We deserve equality and fair pay.

This government says it cannot afford to pay women equally. It can just pay women poverty wages. But it can afford bonuses for management, increases for the Bank of Canada president, rewards to the consulting firms because that is the only way you can get access to the government anymore. But it cannot afford to pay more to clerks who make $20,000 a year.

The reality is, if we are to call ourselves a progressive, humane and egalitarian society, then not only can the government pay women what we deserve, it must pay women what we deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, not only women are underpaid in the Public Service. The average salary is $27,000 a year.

Do not forget that many of these workers are heads of families, maybe single parents, or their family's sole income-earner.

Let us think about that for a moment, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if any of us could live on such a salary. I ask the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister whether their family could survive on such an income. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

An increase of 0 per cent when inflation is 6 per cent is not a freeze but a cut in pay. In the past six years, public servants have suffered similar cuts. They have already paid for the government's economic incompetence; they have already done more than their share.

[English]

I think most Canadians know and accept that the government's refusal to negotiate wages with the public servants has nothing to do with economics. It has everything to do with politics.

We know that Public Service salary costs make up only a small portion of the entire federal budget and that salary increases would have a minute impact on the over-all budget.

We know through Statistics Canada that the accumulated debt that this government says it wants to attack is almost entirely due to two things. It is due to the corporate tax loopholes and interest costs stemming from the government's high interest rate policies.

Sadly, I believe that this government sought this strike. It sought this confrontation because it wanted to play one taxpayer off another. It wanted to play farmer off against worker; trucker against worker. It wanted to find a scapegoat for its own economic mismanagement.

I have heard the Treasury Board President refer to Canada's 1.5 million unemployed and suggest that public servants should not ask for an increase when this unemployment situation exists. The one and a half million unemployed, I would add, was created by this government's policies, by this government's made-in-Canada recession.

I have a message for the minister and for the Prime Minister. The 1.5 million people unemployed know it is not public servants that put them out of work. It is the policies of this government that put them out of work.

It is clear that the government's strategy to turn Canadians against public sector workers has failed. It has failed because through this strike I think other Canadians understand better now that federal government employees are just like themselves. They have families. They do a good day's work. They provide services to Canadians that are essential and they face the same challenges. They face mortgage payments and rent payments, buying back-to-school clothing, which most Canadians face.

What the whole issue comes down to is justice and decency. Is the government willing to truly reconsider its position to go the bargaining table without preconditions, as the minister stated today? Is he prepared to go there and talk about pay equity for women, to talk about zero per cent, to talk about the low income earners in the Public Service? Is he prepared to show respect for the people of this country who make the institutions work?

Denying workers their rights, denying the democratic process will not only fail the Public Service workers, it fails the Canadian people.

I want to say in closing that there is a simple question here. How can the government justify major increases for senior managers, increases for the heads of corporations like the Bank of Canada, and at the same time say that the clerk trying to get by on $20,000 does not deserve some pay increase? It is a simple question of right or wrong. It is a question of what kind of Canada we want to live in. It is a question of fairness and justice.

• (1120)

So, Mr. Speaker, my party does not support this legislation because we support the fact that Canadians have a right to express their views and to negotiate with their employer in a free, respectful way.

It is with some sadness that I say that the government continues to bring Canada to the brink of despair. It has a chance today to negotiate. Begin the process now, show respect for the workers, and you will have the support of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate to try, if I can, to bring a little different perspective to the comments that have been made so far by the members of the opposition parties, and to maybe straighten out some of the misconceptions.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party spoke three or four times about pay equity. She obviously did not listen to what the President of the Privy Council said, that pay equity discussions are ongoing, they are not part of this at all. In fact, I attended a meeting of the Treasury Board the other day where this matter was talked over in detail. Pay equity is an ongoing consideration and we are handling it through the Human Rights Commission rather than through discussions under Bill C-29.

I want to talk for a few minutes about the effects of the strike on the people of Canada, because after all they are the ones who are, I believe, suffering the most. I recall just before the deadline for the strike, Thursday as a matter of fact, that there was a meeting of the PSAC union in Hamilton. They decided that they were going to close down Hamilton industry that depended on Hamilton harbour for its livelihood. They made a plan to occupy the lift bridge into Hamilton harbour. They were going to run their cars on to the bridge, turn off the engines and abandon their automobiles. In that way the bridge could not be lifted and ships could not get in and out of the harbour. The reality is that the police moved in on Friday morning and told those people who stopped their vehicles on the bridge that if they did not move their vehicles the police would tow them away and they would have to pay the towing charge, the storage charge, and be fined for obstructing a public throughway.

What was at stake here? What was at stake really was that there were two ships sitting out in the lake ready to come into the harbour, there were 10 ships scheduled to come through the canal over the weekend, and a handful of people were going to bring this economic unit to an absolute standstill. They were going to say: "Your ships cannot go in and out because we cannot get an agreement, or our union is not able to come to an agreement with the Treasury Board".

I object very much to that sort of conduct. Aside from that, I have had people call me, telling me that they are in the produce business and had produce in tractor trailers held up at the bridge. They could not get through the bridge at Niagara Falls and Fort Erie and in Detroit. Therefore, the fruit was rotting in some of the containers. I have had manufacturers call me and say they had materials tied up in containers in the customs warehouses around the Toronto–Hamilton area. They said if those containers were not released, they would have to close down their operations.

General Motors was bringing in automotive parts by air to the Oshawa airport. One manufacturer in Burlington called me and said that if he did not get his materials, Ford Motor Company would have to close down two production lines in Talbotville and one in Michigan that produced a certain model of Ford automobile.

These are just a few in my immediate area. Then, we go across the country and look into the position of the grain farmers in western Canada. What is happening to them is that we begin to see how devastating this is to people in the farming community. They just have no opportunity to do very much about it.

We have pressures on us from manufacturers, farmers and wholesale and retail people who are telling us that they want this matter settled. If we cannot come to an agreement, they say: "Legislate them back to work." If they do not go back to work, we are in a very serious condition.

The government has been negotiating with PSAC for 90 days. It was 60 days of straight negotiation and 30 days in conciliation, and it has not been able to come to an agreement with PSAC. It has made an agreement with four bargaining units within the Public Service and there are several more ready to announce within the next few days. We think that we have bargained in good faith and done everything we can to bring this matter to a resolution.

I am here to tell you that if we cannot get an agreement, then the legislation will go forward and they will be legislated back to work under the zero, three and three.

There has been a misconception. I will not call it a lie. I will call it a misconception. Perhaps it was planned as part of the tactics of those who oppose what we are trying to do. Zero, three and three covers everybody. It covers the Prime Minister, cabinet, members of Parliament and all agencies, governments, Crown corporations, judges, RCMP, the Canadian Armed Forces and everyone who receives a cheque for services from the federal government.

The lie that is being pushed out there is that: "You guys fattened your pocketbook and left us out there. Now, you are going to pay yourselves off our wages."

Anyone who knows anything about the Public Service of Canada and its 390,000 employees knows that there are dozens of bargaining units, each with a closing date. Zero, three and three applies to each one of those units when that agreement expires. That is just plain common sense. Maybe some of them would like to have all those agreements occur on one date. Maybe that is possible. I do not know whether it is desirable or not.

I think we should study it to see if we want it to go that way or not. I do not think we do. I know that we cannot, as a government, continue to allow this strike to go on and allow the services to be denied to the people of Canada. We have to come to an agreement to settle this.

Take the people travelling out of some of our major airports. We settled with the air traffic controllers. They settled on the basis of zero, three and three but the entrance into their place of work is being obstructed by other people in the Public Service who are out on strike. We cannot allow that to go on.

We cannot allow people who have to travel in this country for a whole variety of reasons to just suddenly be brought to a grinding halt. We think that is wrong.

So it is. We have settled with engineers. We have settled with certain ships' crews in the maritime service. We have settled with a number of unions in the Public Service, and we are continuing to bargain.

• (1130)

I want to say just a word about the decision that was brought down by the Public Service Staff Relations Board. We felt all along that we were bargaining in good faith. We have met, as I say, for 60 days for negotiations and 30 days of conciliation. Any of these negotiations are tough. We are dealing with professional people on both sides. I have judged, looking at the process, that they have been fair all the way through, but our difficulty is that when we get people like Mr. Bean, who has said: "You know, this is not a monetary matter. We are politically opposed to the Government of Canada." That is what it is: "We are politically opposed to them". It is not a monetary matter at all. That is what we get when we talk to them.

We feel that we have bargained in good faith all the way through. The minister has ordered his negotiators back to talk with PSAC, with Mr. Bean, and he has said that we will discuss anything on the table, but the zero, three and three stays because it is part of the economic policy of this government brought down in a budget on February 26 and it stays. It is not going to be changed. Therefore, we are prepared to talk about non-monetary issues in the discussions that are before Treasury Board. We are prepared to talk about them and probably reach some agreements.

None of these things are easy. We look back on when we had other restraint legislation not brought in by our government but previous governments. I remember those debates. I was here and they were rancorous. When we had the six and five they just suspended any negotiations whatever. Any Public Service agreements that were in place were just suspended. That was it, they were just suspended. They went along for a period of time and finally they lifted them because it brought other pressures on the government.

Our main position is that we have to deal with the economy of this country in a realistic, across the board way and everyone has to contribute to that. We have said that everyone in the government will be subject to zero, three and three. When we look at the private sector we see companies laying off people. We see rationalization of industry because of the movement in various types of commerce in the world and in manufacturing in particular. We see manufacturers in Canada who have decided, for economic purposes, that they are going to use just-in-time delivery only to find that the materials they need for that just-in-time delivery are sitting at the border in trucks, containers and what have you. We cannot allow that to go on. If we allow it to go on there is going to be a massive lay-off in many of our industries.

A gentleman called me up and said that if we did not release certain materials that he has coming through the border that he is not going to be able to deliver certain supplies to the steel companies in Hamilton. That is going to have a disastrous effect. Combine that with the closing down of the Hamilton harbour, what would you have? You would have chaos in the city of Hamilton.

I am of the view that we have taken the right course and that we are doing the right thing at this time. It is not pleasant. We do not take any particular joy in it, but it has to be done for the good of the country. The economy is showing some improvement. Interest rates are down, inflation is moving downward and there is a good deal of economic activity. In fact in our area of Hamilton-Oakville-Burlington area the—

An hon. member: That is not true.

Mr. Kempling: You will have your chance to speak so say what you want to say.

In our particular area, The Hamilton Spectator recently carried a story saying that Oakville, Hamilton and Burlington are going to the high employment areas in this next 12 months. You would not know because you are never there.

An hon. member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Kempling: Go back to the sewer. At any rate we have a good thing going in the area and I think we are going to come out of this thing quite well in spite of the yapping I hear across the aisle. We are going to come out of it quite well if we stick to the program we have put in place.

The budget brought in by the Minister of Finance on February 26 was a recovery budget. It was meant to regenerate economic activity in the country. It is doing that. We are beginning to see the signs. Real estate sales are up for six months in a row. We think the economy is beginning to turn around quite nicely and we are going to be the beneficiaries of it down the road.

The thing we have to do is show leadership. We have to show the private sector that we will not allow government expenses to get out of line. We have put a bill in place for that. We cannot allow wage settlements in the government sector to be out of line.

Six of the provinces have followed suit and have taken the lead from the Minister of Finance and indicated that they are either are going to do the same or have done the same thing as the minister suggested in his budget. Therefore, I think we are on the right course and we will come out of this in pretty good shape down the road.

We will, as minister said in his speech, comply with the request of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and are ready to meet with Mr. Bean and his negotiators to see if we can reach some sort of an agreement with them on non-monetary matters and other matters. We hope they will come to the table and do what they can to help the process along and do their part.

It is rather ironic that their own employees have to be represented by unions. I do not think they have bargained in good faith with some of their own employees. From what we read in the news comments, they have had some difficulty in coming to agreements to amounts less than zero, three and three. But we have had good success so far with several bargaining units and we are going to continue to bargain with them. We are confident that as time goes on we will be able to bring this matter to a conclusion this week and we will proceed with other legislation as it comes up.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the member a couple of short, sharp questions.

I listened to him and I really found it a bit offensive. He said that we negotiated and we ended up and we settled with a number of unions at zero, three and three and they are perfectly happy. I would like to ask him if in all good conscience he can tell me that they negotiated with the air traffic controllers, the ships' officers, the engineering people and did not give them monetary compensation in some form or other, whether it was in upgraded classification or through financial compensation. What you did was all through the back door, but you are not forthcoming. You do it in a very conniving and wrong-headed kind of way. It is not open. It is not for the public to understand.

If you can show me one of those groups that did zero, three and three I would be very pleased to say that I was wrong and that you were right. I have a sense that there was certainly compensation of some kind so that you could negotiate. Why do you not do the same thing with the Public Service Alliance? Why do you not negotiate while they are at work? Why do you not appoint a mediator and allow those people to go back to work? They want to work and at the same time do the right thing in terms of their ability to meet the increased inflationary costs across this land. You have not allowed them the dignity of their right to work and at the same time their right to compensation which you have done with the other groups that you say you have negotiated with zero, three and three. You know that you have not done that.

Why do you want to leave those doors closed, rather than open with respect to negotiation? You know very well that you have also given yourself a clause in this bill that is totally reprehensible. Again, it is government through Order in Council. That is wrong and you know that.

In many ways I have a lot of respect for the member for Burlington. But when he can stand there and hold the government line in that way, it is totally unacceptable. Just stand up and tell the truth about how you negotiated those other contracts and what the monetary compensation was.

Second, could you tell me why you do not take a leaf from what Judge Gold did with the post office and send them back while you negotiate? Last, are you prepared to take that cut in salary? I am. Are you?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, if those are short, sharp questions, I guess we have a new meaning for short, sharp questions. The member knows that the various agreements we have signed have different closing dates. All those closing dates were prior to the February 26 budget. In many cases they settled for 4.2 per cent for back pay, but from the point of the signing of that contract forward it is zero, three and three. They accepted it without a great deal of difficulty. They realized the position the government is in regarding restraint.

I would be pleased to see if I can get the details of those various contracts.

Mrs. Finestone: Table them.

Mr. Kempling: I cannot table them. The minister can table them. At any rate, they are private between the Treasury Board and the unions themselves and we would have to get their permission to do it.

I do not see that we have bargained in bad faith. I think we have done a very good job thus far. This legislation is necessary in order that we are able to continue our economic policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not answer the last question regarding the fact that the public is under the impression that MP's, senators, presidents of large corporations, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and many other people, have already received a salary increase.

This impression is there, Mr. Speaker, and it is true that in the case of MP's the law says that on the 1st of January there will be an automatic increase in salary amounting to the cost of living minus 1 per cent. Like myself, some hon. members would be willing, Mr. Speaker, to give back the amount involved.

My question to the hon. member for Burlington is very straightforward: Is he, personally, willing to return to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Government of Canada, money he received since January 1st in order to bring himself to the same level as civil servants, members of the Alliance or other unions, which are subject to this 0-3-3 policy?

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I find this rather fascinating. I cannot remember the member for Ottawa—Vanier at any time when parliamentary salaries or allowances were being negotiated standing up in his place and saying: "No, no, we don't want that". But now in a grandstanding way he is able to stand up and make an issue like this.

Our salaries and allowances, as the member knows, are set by statute and by agreement. They are effective January 1.

From January 1992, that period on, members of Parliament will have zero, three and three in effect. That is the way it is. Everybody will have zero, three and three: RCMP, Canadian Armed Forces, everybody who works for an agency or board, or Crown corporation. Anyone who receives a cheque from the Government of Canada will have zero, three and three. That is the way it will be. We are all equal as far as that is concerned.

The Public Service settlement that was made last year was 4.6 per cent. How far back do you want to roll it?

Mr. Gauthier: The question is simple. Is the member for Burlington ready to roll back his salary like many of us here on this side are willing to do—it is not grandstanding—so that we can meet with his government's policy, the policy of the Minister of Supply and Services of zero, three and three. It is not grandstanding. It is a simple question. Yes or no?

Mr. Kempling: On January 1, 1992, members of Parliament will receive zero, three and three. That is it. That rolls back whatever we have had in our statutes. It is grandstanding.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hamilton East for a brief intervention.

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Yes, and I would also like to reserve my right to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I would like to ask the member a very direct question. It has been asked once before. He refuses to answer. Is he willing to show Canadians that he is going to set the example by rolling back his salary as of last January?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times I have to say it. Our wage adjustment was put in place prior to the February 26 budget, and that is the guideline that we have to follow.

When our wage adjustment comes up January 1, 1992, we will be subject to zero, three and three from there on. That is the way it is, and that is the way it is with all the bargaining units within the Public Service. We are no different.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the member for Burlington talked about the tremendous inconvenience that had been going on in his riding.

Of course, there is not a riding across the country that is not experiencing some form of inconvenience. We all would like the Public Service to get back to work. We know that if you would appoint a mediator, this could happen right away.

There is another group of Canadians here that is being lost in this debate. It is the 2 million people who do not have a job.

The hon. member for Burlington talked about the fact that in his riding, there was very little unemployment. He talked about the fact that it was going to be a growth area for employment. I would like to know what he is doing to pass on whatever ideas or programs he is implementing in his specific riding so that the rest of his government could pass on those ideas to the rest of this country so that the 2 million unemployed could get back to work. I would like the member to address that.

The unemployed are the forgotten people in this debate.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much time I have, but I could go on for a couple of hours on that.

We have had a good deal of industrial activity in the area generally. We have added about 53 new manufacturing operations. It is very, very encouraging and very good. There has been a good deal of rationalization of industry as well across the country and across the province.

I can recall one company that moved in. Toledo Scale called me and said it had good news and bad news. I said: "What is the bad news?" It said: "We are closing down our manufacturing operation in Windsor. It has been going since 1890." I said: "What is the good news?" "Well, I have more bad news. We are closing down our head office in Mississauga."

I said: "Can there be any good news after that?" He said: "Yes. We are putting a brand new state of the art plant in Burlington where we are combining our manufacturing and head office operations. We will be able to compete on a global scale." That is the sort of thing that is going on all over southern Ontario.

• (1150)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, on a point of order the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to get up on a point of order and I would like to ask the Speaker to request clarification of the statements made by the member for Burlington. I do not know what planet he is living on, because one-third of the manufacturing jobs across this country have been lost in the last year.

When I challenged his statement that the Hamilton-Burlington area was coming up roses in the employment sector, he said to me, and I quote: "Go back to the sewer". He most certainly did and it was heard by every person sitting on this side of the House. He said to me: "Go back to the sewer". It is not the first time that that member has personally insulted me in a very denigrating way. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to chapter 7 in the Rules of Debate. You cannot use words like "false", "pig", "reflections", "rotten", "spurious", "stinker", "stupid", "subterfuge", "trickery", "truth", "unfair"—

Well, I dare say, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion "Go back to the sewer" is equally as demeaning to this House. And, when you are talking about the allegation that the employment situation in my community is fantastic, I think I have the right to challenge that, and I don't think I should be told to "go back to the sewer" for challenging it.

I want a retraction here in this House by that hon. member.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Has the hon. member for Burlington any comment?

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the comments were made in that context. I stand by the fact that there is a good deal of economic revival in the Hamilton—Burlington area. Steel Company of Canada has a large number of orders. Dofasco's order book is right up to top. There is economic activity all over.

As far as the "sewer" goes—I mean, when you speak in this House and the member for Hamilton East is there, she just chips in all the time. I can remember when the Prime Minister was here and the insulting comments she made to the Prime Minister, day after day after day. But when anyone makes a comment to her she likes to— So, if I have said anything—and I did not say any of those stupid words that she read from the book, I did not say any of those—but if I said something that offended her, I apologize, I take it back.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Then, I consider the matter closed. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Ottawa West.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to start these comments today with a thank you. I want to thank all the people, and there are a quarter of a million plus of them across this country, who every day deliver services to Canadians. I want to thank the people who help my constituents in getting their unemployment insurance cheques, who help them find jobs or training programs when they need it, who help seniors process their old age security cheques, even when there are now backlogs, delays and tie-ups at offices arising from cutbacks in the public service and a cutback in services to Canadians.

I want to thank those people I have met in Atlantic Canada who go out on the ocean and risk their lives to save other Canadians and to provide much needed services to shipping and transportation. I want to thank the people in Cranbrook and the people in Vancouver whom I have met with who are working for the Government of Canada because they want to deliver services to Canadians, who are frustrated and fed up because they are not being provided with the resources to be able to deliver those services, and the managers, who are having to do more with less and know that, in fact, what they are doing less with is less.

I want to thank all those people. I do not want to name any of them because all of them feel under threat from this government. All of them feel that any expression of an open opinion on how badly this government is managing the country can lead to them being the next on the hit list.

The Liberal Party of Canada appreciates the important role the Public Service of Canada has played in the building of this nation and in progress and prosperity for Canada world-wide.

We recognize that politicians may have had the dream of a nation from coast to coast to coast, but the people who put the bricks and mortar together include the public sector, the people who work for the Government of Canada, who carry out the wishes of this Parliament.

We believe that the country only works when there is a co-operative relationship between Parliament and the employees of the Government of Canada, based on respect and a sense of fair play. That is what is being eroded here, Mr. Speaker, far more than simply the question of what happens with somebody's pay cheque next month or next year. It is a question of whether or not this country can keep functioning productively and efficiently if this government continues to insist on using its own employees as the victims, the scapegoats of its own mismanagement of the economy, social programs, international relations and everything that is important to Canada.

In a broader vein, any nation needs a co-operative partnership between government, management and labour if it is to prosper and to make progress. That multisectoral partnership is essential to our competitiveness abroad, to our ability to continue on the road of nationhood.

What we are seeing here is part of a much bigger agenda. It is not simply a question of what is in the pay envelope next week. It is a question of persuading all Canadians that they have to be satisfied with working for less, that our economy, as a result of the policies of this government is going to become an economy of lower paid, unskilled jobs. You persuade people that they have to work for less and under any conditions and yet at the same time you deprive them of the institutions that protect their rights to fair, open bargaining with their employer.

Those rights are under attack, not just for the public servants in this case, but for all Public Service employees and for all private sector employees.

I want to talk about a couple of things. First of all, the government is perpetuating the myth that somehow this has to do with the economic situation of this country. We all know who has created that economic situation, and if we ever needed more evidence, we just need to look at the way in which they are using that as an excuse in this particular case. We heard nothing in the February budget and we are hearing nothing in this debate that we have not heard for six consecutive years. In six consecutive budgets this government has said to Canadians that they should pay more taxes, accept fewer services, accept the deterioration of medicare, education, science and research in this country. Pay more but get less. The government will downsize the Public Service; it will pay them less, and they have accepted decreasing wages against inflation for many years now. They have exercised restraint.

The promise was that for all this pain, all those extra taxes, all those cuts in services, what Canadians would get was a lower deficit and a lower debt. What has happened in those six years is that the debt has doubled. Is it not time for the government to admit that it is its fault and that this program is not working, has not worked and will not work.

There are some reasons for that. The entire payroll of the union that is now on strike against this government is only 3 per cent of national spending. That is less than the $5 billion per year this government spends to contract out.

On that note I want to switch and talk about fairness. This bill that the government tabled before us yesterday demonstrates boldly, crudely, that this government has no intention of being fair, that its plans have absolutely nothing to do with fiscal responsibility or the debt or the deficit, but simply breaking the backs of its own Public Service employees.

There is an exception in this bill which says that while Public Service employees will get a zero per cent increase, our friends, all those consultants on whom we have spent billions of dollars to tell us we love the GST and we love the green plan, and we love the government, are not subject to a freeze on their costs now or in the future.

I remind people again that what we spend on those contractors is many times what we spend on these people who are now on strike against zero. Who are these people who are on strike against zero? They are not the president of Petro-Canada with a salary of over $400,000 a year who got a $20,000 raise. They are the people whose entire salary is $20,000 after 15 years with the Government of Canada. An entire salary of $20,000 gets no increase while an appointee of this government earning $400,000 gets a $20,000 increase. That is not fair and Canadians know that is not fair.

There is money for the fat cats from this government, lots of money for the fat cats, and no money for the work horses who keep this country running every day. If we ever needed proof of just how important their work is to keep this country running, we have certainly had it in the last week and a half.

This government has deliberately played politics with the fundamental infrastructure that keeps the economy of Canada running. It has deliberately provoked a strike that has disrupted transportation, disrupted the movement of goods and services, disrupted the movements of Canadians, and disrupted our social programs. The government will keep on doing that instead of accepting, as the Public Service Staff Relations Board decided yesterday, that it is breaking the law. The government can correct that and conform with the law immediately by getting back to the bargaining table, by negotiating as it should have been doing since last February and avoiding everything that is happening to this country as a result of its failure to do that.

All the government needs to do is appoint a mediator, get back to the bargaining table, and show it is looking for a solution instead of the continuation of problems.

I want to speak particularly about those who are hurt by this government's actions. While we, as members of Parliament, get our increases in a year of high inflation, while the high paid appointees of the government get their increases, while the deputy ministers and the senior managers earning over $150,000 get their increases and will even get their bonuses, their pay-offs for lay-offs, people earning $20,000 or less going down to as low as $16,000, get nothing. Canadians know that that is not fair. Canadians also know that 80 per cent of the people in those lower income brackets are women.

If this bill were tested against any standard of equity between men and women, this bill would contravene the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We have other examples of inequity. We have regional rates of pay where somebody working in the poorest provinces of this country are paid less than people working in other parts of the country for doing exactly the same job. That is not equitable and that is not right.

The ministers and the members opposite keep saying: "Yes, well we will get zero too". Oh, boy, is that not nice. This year, when inflation is over 6 per cent, almost entirely due to tax increases by this government, we get our raise. But somebody earning $20,000 who cannot afford the price of bread does not get an increase. Sure, next year we will take zero when the government is projecting that inflation will be down to 3 per cent. Let us do it to ourselves when it is easy and do it to everybody else when it is tough.

The government has not been fair even among its own employees. The members opposite have said: "Other unions have accepted zero, three and three". I challenge the government to show me one contract that has been accepted at zero, three and three without other compensation to employees. The government has talked about the engineers, the air traffic controllers, the ships' officers and other groups. In every one of the contracts that has been mentioned there has been financial compensation to people for accepting zero, three and three. Either it was a lump sum payment or some shift in how wages are applied. It is upgrading a whole group by a whole classification. The government continues the unfairness because it still holds unto itself the right in this bill to change people's classification so they can say: "We are not giving them a raise. They are just getting a reclassification".

More money in your pocket is more money in your pocket, so I ask why this government is doing it for its best paid employees and not for its poorest paid employees. There is only one answer to that. Its purpose here is not to be fair, not to challenge the deficit and the debt. Canadians understand belt tightening, but they do not understand this kind of injustice and unfairness. Its job is to persuade the lowest paid workers in the Public Service of Canada that they had better be prepared to work for this government under any conditions at any price. It is a message they are trying to get out to other workers in Canada.

Collective bargaining is a basic right in a democratic society: the right to sit down with your employer and co-operatively decide what your working conditions are going to be and what your compensation is going to be. This government has violated that right and it intends to undermine that right for every other worker in Canada.

I want to make a few other comments before concluding. Collective bargaining is in danger in Canada and when collective bargaining is in danger, then the rights of any employee, any person working for a salary in this country, is in danger.

I want to talk about who is responsible for this situation. It is certainly not the public servant who is responsible for the unemployed in this country. It is not the public servant who is responsible for putting Canadians at each other's throats. I am disgusted by what I have seen in the last week—the actions of this government putting people in a position where the grain harvest is in danger and where all segments of society are suffering simply because the government refused to talk to its employees.

This is a political fight. The difference is, nobody in this House is putting the livelihood of their family on the line. But the people who are out on strike are putting as little or as much as $1,000 in two weeks and sometimes many times that on the line because they believe they are fighting a government and a principle that most Canadians support as well. They believe they are seeing the fulfilment of the Tory agenda to disrupt yet another institution of government.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party has said they have been behind the alliance from the beginning. Well, we have taken a very strong stand against this wage freeze. We knew it would lead to this, even if the government did not. But we do not walk in here a vote the way big business tells us, like the government does. We do not walk in here and vote the way the president of any union tells us. We walk in here and vote based on what we hear from our constituents, from Canadians from the business community, from the farmers and fishermen of Canada and we say: Get a solution here.

Appoint a mediator. Stop breaking the law. Get back to the bargaining table and get services back to Canadians.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I know I am sitting so high up here that it is hard to see me. Hopefully, they will not put another row behind the curtains here or Pat and I will not be seen at all.

I wanted to ask my colleague a particular question that has been bothering me through this whole episode, and that is the fact that on the one hand we have been told consistently over the last seven years that the Prime Minister is the great negotiator, the individual who has the ability to conciliate with the different groups in the country and put together a package that all Canadians will accept. During that process we have also been told that the Prime Minister understands labour because, as you know, he used to do that for a living before he decided to attempt the most difficult job in the land and that is to run this country and to be the Prime Minister, the top official in the land.

I have in front of me the last 20 years of back to work legislation. I might say that it intrigues me that in the last 20 years there has been back to work legislation—all under previous Liberal governments I might add—but one of the things that interested me the most about looking back in the past and looking back at the records is that every one of these pieces of back to work legislation had the abilities for an arbitrator or a mediator put into it.

One of the things that I wanted my colleague to maybe touch on a little bit for us is why the great conciliator, the great negotiator, the present Prime Minister, did not even attempt to allow the process which we call collective bargaining to have its final conclusion. If things completely do break down there is a system which allows for an arbitrator or mediator.

I just want to quickly run by a few. In 1972 there was the St. Lawrence Ports Operations Act and it allowed for Judge Alan Gold to mediate. Again, in 1972, the West Coast Ports Operation legislation called for a mediator if no resolution was found. In 1973, Maintenance of Railway Operations Act, Judge Alan Gold again. In 1974, West Coast Grain Handling Operations Act, Dr. Neil Perry, University of Victoria, as a conciliator. In 1975, West Coast Ports Operation legislation calls for an arbitrator if no resolution found. It goes on and on and on.

During the comments that I will make during my speech I will focus a little bit on these.

I would like to ask the member what her sense is as to why the present government would not attempt to do something as obvious as other governments have done in the past and learn from the institutions that we have put in place which will allow for these mechanisms to work?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. Before coming directly to an answer, I think he has raised some very important points that I hope people are keeping in mind in this. The first one is that I think the Prime Minister could be capable of negotiating. I think there has been a deliberate plan here since last February not to negotiate and, in fact, to ensure that a strike would happen and that it would be as disruptive as possible to the country. In other words, I think the government deliberately decided there would be an interruption of services to Canadians so not only is it holding its own employees hostage, but it is holding Canadians hostage.

For instance, the government clearly knew when it introduced the budget and when negotiations could have started last February it could have reasonably predicted, I think, that in September the grain elevators would be full and that the shipping of grain and the very harvest itself and the livelihood of farmers across the prairies would be in jeopardy if we were not able to move that grain. Yet the government chose not to use the power it has to designate the people working in the grain industry as essential workers. It could have done that last year. It could have done that at any time and it chose not to. To me that is a sign of a government that wants to create conflict and wants to create disruption of services to try and recoup some of its rapidly disappearing support.

I think we are also seeing a style of government here that we have seen consistently since September 4, 1984. We saw it in the free trade deal where the idea was not to bring Canadians together, but to encourage each segment of society to look only at what is good for them, not what is in the interests of the country. We have seen the promises of jobs, jobs, jobs and yet we have seen a huge segment of our industrial base disappearing. When the government promised pink slips and running shoes to public servants in 1984, it did not say it also meant pink slips and running shoes for jobs, for seniors, for the unemployed and for Canadian business, but those have been the results. We are seeing the same approach as we saw in the Meech Lake Accord where it is my way or no way.

I have decided this and so you have to accept this and I think what typifies this whole approach of the government is really that horrible week in June that we all lived through when we saw provincial premiers being bullied, when we saw all kinds of psychological warfare because a few people felt that not every dot on an i, not every cross on a t in the Meech Lake Accord was perfect.

I think Canadians want leadership that is going to bring them together, not divide them, not put them at each other's throats. That is how I explain the situation we are in right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): So, Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is placed in the rather undesirable situation of having to debate a special back-to-work legislation reguarding the members of the Public Services Alliance of Canada.

Certainly such an outcome to lenghty and unsuccessful negotiations cannot be seen as satisfactiory, and should not be for that matter, by anyone in Canada. Some accuse government of inflexibility, while others blame the union leaders, their irresponsibility and their attempts to score political points on the back of the Canadian public and their own membership.

Those who support these two conflicting philosophies will come up with all kinds of arguments to defend their position. Heaven knows that there is no shortage of them. The main problem facing us today, Mr. Speaker, is not to determine who is right and who is wrong in this conflict, and whether the government could have done more for his employees or whether union leaders have gone too far once again; neither is it to decide whether the right to strike has been trampled on, respected or abused. The main problem we are confronted with today, Mr. Speaker, is sadly our collective—and I stress "collective"—inability to restore some sanity in Canada, to set our country a logical and serene course instead of that windy and unsure road of confrontation that is destroying it.

This conflict within the public service of Canada is simply the product of excessive selfishness and individualism as well as a blatant lack of respect for authority and the law of the land. This conflict also reflects an intensive downgrading of all the values that were a source of pride for us in the past, particularly the traditional tolerance of Canadians which is increasingly giving way to intolerance.

It is altogether amusing and sad, Mr. Speaker, to see for instance how in the opinion of Quebecers Ottawa is wasting all its money in an effort to support farmers in Western Canada, how for the people of Ontario Canadians from the Atlantic provinces who fish for a living are insatiable leeches feeding on the taxes paid by the wealthier provinces, and how the people of Manitoba to this day still seem to bitterly resent Quebecers for getting these now famous contracts.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, under this public service conflict lies another Canadian reality, namely that for a majority of Canadians from wherever they live, the federal system is no longer benefitting them but only benefits their neighbours, at their expense of course.

Our nation has become—and I am very sad to have to say that—an extremely egotistical nation which fails to face reality. Our problems are rich kids problems and, more often than not, spoiled brats problems. We all demand more and more from the federal government, from our boss, from our community, from our municipality and our school board but, at the same time, we want to give less and less.

We Canadians are after short term gains, as if under the threat of an imminent world-wide nuclear war. Every budget cut made by this government or other governments in this country is met with a general outcry, thousands of dissatified voices from all parts of the country claiming that the cuts should have been made elsewhere. But if the government had the unfortunate idea of doing just that, other voices, contradictory voices would rise immediately to protest vehemently such action.

Yet the crybabies and spoiled brats that we have become want to see our $400 billion national debt eliminated or at least reduced. However, when the federal government or a provincial government bravely engages in that undertaking, no one is willing to make the necessary sacrifices.

On that subject, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, the public service of Canada employees are no better and no worse than the vast majority of Canadians. I am disappointed, Mr. Speaker, because Canadians seem to have forgotten to take a good look in the mirror in the morning and ask themselves: "What can I do today for my country and help resolve this crisis?" Instead, Mr. Speaker, we Canadians prefer to acknowledge that a problem does exist of course but we choose to blame it on our neighbour, our boss and ultimately on the politicians, whatever their political stripe, and on any and all governments.

When it tabled the budget in February, the government had the courage to put down in black and white its strategy for economic recovery and deficit reduction. The federal government never concealed its hand from the unions or the Canadian people. Quite the contrary, it clearly stated its priorities. I find it very surprising today, Mr. Speaker, that members of the House of Commons of Canada would want to delay the passing of this back to work legislation. Each new striking day will only do more harm to all Canadians, including the strikers and their families.

It is time we as Canadians stopped playing this useless game of national self-destruction. We should stop wondering who is responsible for this strike and consider all the implications of a labour dispute that is being forced on thousands of Canadians. First of all—and this point was not brought up so far in this House, by government or opposition members, but it is a very important one—in addition to having their salaries frozen by the government in 1991, which is not very palatable to employees in the public sector, in addition to having their salaries frozen, Public Service union members are about to lose 4 per cent of their salary because their union is keeping them on strike for another week. Mr. Speaker, every week on strike means a 2 per cent drop in the annual pay of Public Service union members. This is not a cut imposed by the government but by the Public Service Alliance of Canada which forced its members to go on strike.

Granted, the federal government is doing nothing this year to improve the salaries of union members, but it seems to me that today, public servants are suffering even more at the hands of their union leaders, whose strike strategy will cause them to lose even more money.

Second, the present dispute is doing serious harm to our fledgling economic recovery. Can Canada afford this useless confrontation? Third, thousands of Canadians are no longer receiving the essential services to which they are entitled. In some cases, the strike is causing very serious harm to the poorest and most vulnerable in our society.

Fourth, the unions must realize that when they work for the government, they are in a monopoly situation. When Canadians need a passport or an unemployment insurance cheque, they have to go through the federal government. Government employees should realize that the unique job security they enjoy is a benefit that does not exist anywhere else in our society.

Fifth, our fragile economy can no longer afford the kind of disruption this causes for our airlines, airports, meat inspection and grain shipping. Some unions, some union leaders and some members of the opposition have said the federal government was glad to see public servants on strike because this meant it would save several million dollars a day in salaries. That is extremely shortsighted. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government knows perfectly well that every day of this strike costs the Canadian economy a lot more than the number of dollars saved as a result of the work stoppage.

Mr. Speaker, it is in Canada's national interest to put a speedy end to this labour dispute. This back-to-work legislation has become imperative because the strike has interrupted essential services, in addition to causing very serious harm to innocent Canadians. Our airlines, already in financial difficulty, are losing millions of dollars daily because of problems at the airport.

Canadian auto manufacturers are having all kinds of problems because the parts they need are held up at customs. Fruit and vegetables are held up at the Canadian border, and meanwhile their quality deteriorates. Our grain is not delivered on time. Canadians cannot get their passports in time for the trips they have planned. Businesses no longer receive payments owed by the federal government which annually purchases $20 billion worth of goods from our businesses. This shortfall is a threat to jobs in many small businesses in Canada.

Considering these and many other reasons, I find it hard to understand why members of the New Democratic Party consider the right to strike as a supreme right in this country and refuse to entertain any negative consequences of the present situation. Instead of helping to settle this dispute, the NDP is doing its best to delay passage of special legislation and aggravate the situation.

Mr. Speaker, Opposition members are fond of making patriotic speeches about Canada and about how much they love this country. Today, Opposition members have a unique opportunity to put those grand ideas into practice and help Canada out of this crisis, instead of fanning the flames of controversy.

For all of these reasons, I think this labour dispute should be terminated today. I therefore urge all members to ask that the debate be concluded and adopt forthwith this back-to-work legislation for Public Service employees.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very brief comment and then pose a couple of questions to the hon. member.

As I was listening to his presentation, I was wondering whether he had heard the eloquent presentation by my colleague, the member for Ottawa West, when she reminded Parliament about the role of the public servants.

I think it is clear to all Canadians that public servants are there to serve Canadians, to serve our seniors, our new immigrants, our new citizens and to serve us in Parliament as well. I would like to remind the member to keep in mind that workers would like to go back to work.

The issue before us is the process by which we would like workers to go back to work. Is it a process without honour and dignity or is it a process with honour, dignity, and with a heart on the part of this government? That is the question Canadians would like to have answered.

I suggest that if we force the workers back to work with a precondition it is almost like putting a bitter pill into a sick child, tying his hands, and gagging his mouth. That is not the way to have a child swallow the needed medicine. We have to do it with honour and respect. Likewise, we have to tell our workers that we are coming to them with a heart, that we really understand their needs. We will remove all preconditions, follow the decision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, sit down and negotiate and appoint a mediator so that the workers can come back to work with dignity and will understand that they are valued in the Public Service.

My questions to the hon. member are these: Does he believe that the right to strike is a legal right of all Canadian citizens involved in work? What advice would he give the government so it bargains in good faith? Does he really believe in the rule of law, a law that has to be followed both by citizens and by government, particularly this government?

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Winnipeg North for these few remarks.

In particular, he asked me whether I recognized the legal right to strike in Canada. I was the president of my union as a journalist in Trois-Rivières, Mr. Speaker, and we had to live with an employees' strike that hurt not only the workers but also the company.

But coming back to the public sector, there is an important difference. Yes, I recognize the employees' legal right to strike. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, what concerns me about the hon. member for Winnipeg North, since he frequents the New Democratic Party members more and more, is that I think he tends unfortunately to consider the Public Service's right to strike as the supreme right that will overrule and override all other rights in Canada. That is the big problem in our society.

I did not mention it in my speech earlier, but we, especially in the Parliament of Canada, have this passion of talking about the rights of Canadian citizens, the right to strike or to do almost anything, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that I do want to respect, but I think that all of these rights tend to make parliamentarians and Canadians forget, Mr. Speaker, that we also have responsibilities. Wherever we go, when we receive people lobbying MPs, in the two years since I was elected, Mr. Speaker, I do not remember having received a single group that came to tell me about the responsibilities that had to be faced and the difficult periods we had to go through. I do not remember seeing many like that.

On the other hand, groups have come to meet me to claim all kinds of rights, an endless list that you cannot imagine. All members of this House, be they on this side or the other, have received pressure groups telling us about their rights, regardless of the consequences for other citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I would call this the Canadian situation, this tendency we have here in Parliament only to see the rights of specific groups. I do not want to deal only with the Public Service today, but with all of them. When national organizations come to do their lobbying, they only care about their own problems, small or large. The problems of others are unimportant! They would impose on their neighbours to have their own rights recognized.

Our country is sick, Mr. Speaker, and I consider this legal right to strike in the Public Service to be one that can be exercised, but within proper limits, without imposing on other Canadians who also have rights. We all have responsibilities as well.

[English]

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a short comment with two very brief questions.

I note that the member discussed the saving that the government is making as a result of this strike. I believe he said something in the neighbourhood of 2 per cent per week.

Since the workers will be off for something just over two weeks, this will provide a bit of a sizeable saving, or extra funds. Was he inferring that this would mean that there would be some funds that could be available for negotiations, or does he view the government's policy as being zero increase for each and every individual? Does that zero increase only apply to the total budget?

If it does apply to the total budget, I am wondering whether we can still see some optimism for a settlement here.

My second question is a very brief one. I know he alluded to problems with grain movement. Was he aware of any grain movements through the seaway prior to the declaration of the strike? My information was that there was virtually nothing moving in that avenue from the prairies. It was pretty much plugged up, and because of the lack of sales it was not very likely to be unplugged.

[Translation]

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, on the issue of grain movements, I think the hon. member from Saskatchewan could talk to farmers in his own area who are getting increasingly worried about what is going on with this strike. He is probably in a better position than I am to confirm this information. Every night, on the news, even on the French networks, we see Saskatchewan farmers greatly concerned about the attitude of the New Democratic members in this House who work in the higher interest of their Public Service union, instead of worrying about the state of the economy in Saskatchewan and all other provinces.

On the second issue, I would like to make myself clear, since I am not sure my colleague got my point. I clearly indicated that some members in this House wrongly claim this strike is making us happy, because we are saving some money. It is quite the opposite. The Government of Canada recognizes that the very small amount we can save with this strike is nothing compared to the enormous losses the Canadian economy is suffering.

Also, it is true the government is freezing wage increases at 0 per cent, even though I would have preferred to avoid any such freeze, but the government is imposing a freeze. According to the government's plan, there is zero increase. But the unions— Maybe you could talk to your friends in the civil service. These people are imposing a salary reduction of about 2 per cent of their member's annual pay for every week they strike. When this conflict is over, the federal government will have given 0 per cent to its employees and the Public Service Alliance will have imposed a salary reduction of around 4 per cent on its members, who it says are in dire financial straits.

Canadian men and women have to be told about that reality, Mr. Speaker. In my riding of Saint-Maurice, I know personally dozens of public servants who do not agree with the government's strategy because it hurts them, and I understand that, but they are even more angry with their union leaders who dragged them into a strike that hurts them even more, although they knew full well that they could not win against a government that had stated its policy very clearly in the February Budget. After this strike, Public Service unions will have to deal with their members who are suffering needlessly.

Instead of sitting down with the government, Mr. Speaker, and trying to negotiate non-monetary clauses and perhaps gaining something in that respect, Public Service unions impose a salary reduction on their members and prevent them from getting anything at the moment, which I think is most unfortunate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I would like to suggest that members who wish to converse do so discreetly—I say this as a friendly suggestion—so that the Chair and our listeners can hear the speeches.

Resuming debate.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me extreme pleasure today to rise and talk about a topic that is very close and dear and near to me, an issue and an area that I dealt with on a regular basis in my work life before I became a member of Parliament. That is the area of collective bargaining and the area of collective rights for workers in Canada. I speak specifically about the union that I worked for in the railway industry before I became a member of Parliament, and that is the United Transportation Union.

I want to touch a little bit on that as I go along today and talk about this particular piece of legislation that is before us, and also about the need to understand what we are talking about here.

First of all, I would like to deal with the individual rights of workers and Canadians and to deal with it in two areas. One is the public sector versus the private sector, and the myth that seems to be being perpetuated on the other side that Public Service employees and those workers who work for the Public Service are different from the private sector employees who are out there, and who go on strike on a regular basis.

First of all, I want to talk about the fact that I believe, simply, that all workers in Canada should have rights. The problem that we are having here today is to define what those rights should be. On the one hand we have a government on this side which feels that because in the particular budget put forward by the then Minister of Finance in February, which outlined a particular program, therefore, the collective bargaining rights that Canadians have by law no longer are necessary or are no longer important because its agenda as a government should supersede that.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a big mistake to make. First of all, the collective bargaining right, the institution of organized labour, the institution of rights of Canadians will be there a lot longer than this particular government will, a lot longer than we as members of Parliament will be here, if we guard it very carefully and very sincerely.

The fear I have is that we are setting a very nasty precedent with this particular piece of legislation. Yes, strikes hurt. There is no doubt about that. That is what they are intended to do. If anybody on the other side can say to me: "You are allowed to go on strike only in good times; you are allowed to go on strike only when it does not hurt anybody else", then we have difficulty with understanding what the labour institution is all about and what the progress and process of collective bargaining and the need for that particular right of the individual worker is.

I get the sense, by listening to the members opposite, that they feel the only time an individual should have a right to strike is if it is not going to hurt anybody else. Well, if they sincerely believe that, then they should be straightforward and tell us as Canadians and workers that no one should be allowed to strike in this country because someone will be hurt.

One of the areas that has really interested me, as I mentioned in my question to the member for Ottawa West, is that the government has changed the rules of the game somewhat as it relates to back-to-work legislation. The great conciliator, the Prime Minister we have today, is well aware of the labour movement and collective bargaining. Unless he was the worst labour lawyer in the country, he should know that there is a particular system in place that we have to follow in order to maintain the rule of law.

I want to again mention some of the different pieces of back-to-work legislation that came forward in the last 20 years. The reason I keep emphasizing these is because they also were a Draconian measure to a certain extent. I as a member believe that if you are going to say to Canadians and to workers that you have the right to strike, then tell them so. If you do not have the right to strike or there are certain areas of the economy that you cannot, as a government, accept allowing people to strike, then say so. That is what we call the services that are essential to all Canadians and we put those on the books to make sure those services will be maintained during these work stoppages.

The government, in a sneaky way, is saying to the Public Service that it, the Public Service, has no collective rights. It is also saying that the Public Service has no right to strike, because during the whole process of collective bargaining there is the ultimate. When you come to the end of the whole collective bargaining process, what is left? That is an arbitrator or a mediator. If they are suggesting with the back-to-work legislation that we have come to the end of the process of negotiation with no agreement, then we have to take a look at what the alternatives are.

The alternatives should always be maintained based on what we have done in the past. In the past, Mr. Speaker, based on the Maintenance of Railway Operations Act in 1966 it was back to work with an arbitrator, which meant that both sides would make their presentation to the arbitrator, and the arbitrator, an independent body, was a third party.

Can you imagine what it would be like if I was your employee, and I had to believe that you as a person, as a member of Parliament and as our Speaker, would be judge and jury every time I had a dispute. What we did to be fair to workers in this country and what governments put in the past was the ability to have an independent third party who does not have the ideology or the government's agenda at heart, but has the equal rights of everyone involved at heart. That is what arbitrators and mediators are for. That was in order the maintain the credibility of the system.

Mr. Speaker, what we have seen in the legislation before you today, is the complete erosion of the credibility of the system. Now, basically, this governments says: "It does not matter what you say or what you want, I am going to tell you what you are going to get".

In 1966 they understood there was a big problem in the country. A lot of people were being hurt because, as you know, in those days when railroads were in their prime, when they shut down the whole country shut down. Therefore, what took place was was back-to-work legislation but the government gave both sides the legitimate right to go in front of an independent third party to make their cases and let that person rule on it.

In 1972, under the St. Lawrence Ports Operations Act, the same situation took place. In 1973, again it was the same situation with a railway strike, with Judge Alan Gold being asked to arbitrate the dispute. With the West Coast Grain Handling Operations Act in 1974, Dr. Neil Perry of the University of Victoria was the conciliator. In 1975 the legislation called for an arbitrator if no resolution was found. In 1975, again under the St. Lawrence Ports Operations Act, Judge Alan Gold was asked. In 1976, under the Port of Halifax Operations Act, again there was a court magistrate who was appointed as mediator if no resolution was found. In 1977, the Air Traffic Control Service Continuation Act, there again was the ability for an arbitrator to look at whether this dispute could be resolved. In 1978 with the Postal Services Continuation Act the mediator was the then minister. In 1978, the Shipping Continuation Act, it was William Kelly, as every one knows, as in 1982, the West Coast Ports Operation Act, with William Kelly again.

I bring forward this issue because what we have seen with the present government is a change of how we deal with disputes in the Public Service. Basically that is what the government has done, and it really interests me that it has done it. In 1966 when the government of the day, the Liberal Party, gave the Public Service the right to strike, the Progressive Conservative Party, which now governs this country, voted in favour of that. It meant at that time in 1966, when Mr. Diefenbaker was still the leader, they felt very strongly that yes, there was a right for workers in the public sector to pull their services if they felt they were being treated unjustly.

To go further with that theme, we now have something that is even worse and that is the belief by not only the workers but the decision and the belief by the Public Service Staff Relations Board that indeed this particular government has not been negotiating in good faith. I do not know if members on the other side realize how worrisome it can be to believe that even before you start the other side has no intention of coming to an agreement. Then again we look at the complete dismantling of the institution of collective bargaining. When we look at that very seriously, we have in essence what we have seen in other countries in the world: complete chaos where we cannot maintain the rule of law because workers have lost complete faith in their governments. We may sit here and say that it would never happen in Canada because we are too democratic and we do things that are just and fair. We know the difference between right and wrong. My leader spoke very eloquently about the difference between right and wrong. When we get the Public Service Staff Relations Board telling us that what the government is doing in dealing with its own civil servants, its own employees, is wrong, then we all have fears and we should all be very fearful of what is to take place next.

It does not surprise me one little bit that the president of the alliance would come out publicly and say: "We may just ignore the law." The reason for that is simply: "If you can ignore the law, as the Parliament of Canada has done under section 51, then why should I honour the law?" That is a very serious situation to be taking place in our country. Once we let ourselves, as members of Parliament, agree that breaking the law is acceptable, whether it be under section 51 or whether it be a president of a union saying: "Well, it doesn't matter because we may just continue this anyway", we are really leading toward what we have seen in other countries and that is a complete dismantling of the institutions that we have put in place to have what is aptly put, good government.

I think I should read into the record what the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruling states. First of all, the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruled in line with decisions, and this is not new. They ruled in line with the decisions by the Ontario Labour Relations Board and the British Columbia Court of Appeal, which held that to insist on preconditions before bargaining for a collective agreement is contrary to the requirement to bargain in good faith. Here is exactly what they said in that ruling:

> The insistence on conditions precedent to negotiating terms and conditions of employment at the bargaining table is incompatible with the requirement to make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement. Accordingly, the board declares that the employer has acted contrary to Section 51 of the act and orders the employer to comply with Section 51 of the act.

• (1250)

Well, that is pretty obvious and pretty clear. Other institutions, other provincial jurisdictions, other governments and other areas that we deal with on a regular basis, have already ruled that you cannot put preconditions. Therefore, what this is telling us is that the budget is basically a plan. The Minister of Finance puts down a budget and it is a road map to where the government is going to go. It does not mean that it is etched in stone. As one knows, the government very rarely meets its objective. It is an attempt to try and get where it wants to go.

For the minister of the Treasury Board to stand up in this place and tell us: "We told you in February that this is what we were going to do, so we have no choice but to do it" is nonsense. The fact remains, in this system we have set up, you have go to the table with the sense that we are here to look at the issues and we are here to negotiate.

Let me remind the Prime Minister, since he has probably forgotten this. I am aware that he has shut a few towns down in his day. The Prime Minister has to understand that negotiation is the art of compromise. It means that you do not get exactly what you want and I do not get exactly what I want when I go to the table. But we get what is best for both sides.

It is not right to sit here and tell anyone who has ever been involved in the labour movement: "You are going to get this whether you like it or not. Do not bother to tell me how you feel, inflation is running at 6 per cent. I do not really care. That is what you are going to get". What one is looking to find are some severe problems in the labour movement.

I was talking to my colleague about an hour ago about this particular issue. One of the things that is well known in public life is the moment you lose the faith of the civil servants, one is really in for big trouble, simply because those are the unelected people who put in place the policies of a particular government.

Simply, what it has said to the Public Service is: "You have no rights. You have no voice." Under collective bargaining, that is the only voice it has to show its employer that it disapproves of certain issues. If that is taken away, then it has to expect to get it from a different arena.

I really pity the government for what is going to take place in the next year and a half once this legislation goes through. I also must say that I expect on this side that people will be very excited to see all of these brown envelopes show up at their door on a regular basis, because now the credibility of the government has been completely undermined. I am sure the Public Service will start to undermine every move the cabinet and this government makes because they have done the same to them.

And as we know, all is fair in love and war. Therefore, what the government has declared on the labour movement and the Public Service is war. Now it will be seen in a lot of different forms. I believe the government should be put on notice that that is exactly what it has done with this kind of legislation that does not follow the rule of law.

I want to talk briefly about the back-to-work legislation. One of the things we cannot fool ourselves about is that this is a complete suspension of collective rights. Let us not kid ourselves that this is a plan of the Tory government just to allow wage restrictions for a certain period of time. Looking at the legislation, it also has the ability to reclassify the Public Service. It claims it is just following out its mandate under PS 2000 and will continue to do that. It uses the equity that we have been working on for many, many years now, as it relates to women, as the argument in order to reclassify if it wishes. I think that is a pretty scary indication of just where this government is prepared to go.

The other issue is the back-to-work legislation. It does not deal with the contracting out situation that we are now facing in the government. If we follow what is being told to us by many, that contracting out is now at the level of $5 billion, it seems quite unfair and wrong to think that on the one hand it is okay to allow the contracting out to continue unrestricted.

Regarding the minister, who is the only minister from Ottawa, I can understand why he would be here squirming in his seat considering what this may do to his career. I would think that he may look at the minister who was then, in 1966, pushing forward the legislation in the belief that public employees have the right to strike. It was the member from Ottawa or the member from Carleton, if I am not mistaken, and before they were thrown out of office, he was the minister responsible for the Treasury Board in the Diefenbaker government. I can understand why the minister across the way would be a little nervous.

I want to wrap up by saying this. The labour relations in this country are a very, very sensitive thing. In order for a government to be successful, two things have to happen. One is that you need to have understanding of what workers are looking for and they have to understand what you want. Second, you need to have what is most appropriate, the faith in your government that it will do the right thing.

I think that the partnership between government, labour and business has been broken and therefore we will see the complete dismantling of the rule of law under this particular piece of legislation. I think anyone of sound mind and body would have no choice but to vote against this.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I regret the complexity of the name of the constituency, but it has a local significance.

I appreciate the opportunity to ask my hon. colleague a question, but first of all to make a comment or two. Initially I sat and listened this morning to the amendment that was made and, while I have had some previous experience in another jurisdiction consisting of some nine years and therefore it gives me some degree of expertise in parliamentary procedure, I know of no other jurisdiction that will allow an amendment that completely contravenes the intent of the original motion. I look across the way at a former municipal colleague who I know would agree with me that it makes absolutely no sense that if you disagree with a motion all you have to do is vote against it, but there seems to be some purpose in restating, re-inventing the wheel. I sit there and I listen with amusement and I hope that some day it takes us somewhere.

The hon. member opposite alluded to several issues that give a particular bent to the matter before us that I do not happen to agree with. I agree fully that this is a situation that no one takes any great deal of pride in. It is not a situation in which government members sit here with glee and delight in knowing that they are going to have to interfere with a process that we would like not to interfere in.

The hon. member makes reference to the elimination of collective bargaining. I would suggest to him that there is not a political party in Canada that has not found itself in the same position and regretfully caused itself to legislate people back to work. I can say that having lived in Saskatchewan and having seen the NDP government of 1982 having to do exactly the same thing, not with the Public Service, but I believe it was, at that time, with the nurses.

I sit here and I listen to that knowing that everyone here, without exception, has had experience in the unpleasant task that we have at hand and I wonder where there could be such a defence against having developed the need to become involved in this insatiable requirement that is placed before us.

I would like to ask the hon. member a couple of questions. He indicated that he felt there was no difference between the government and the private sector. I suggest to him, for a minute, that perhaps there is some difference in that the government sector provides a service that the public demands on an ongoing basis 52 weeks a year. I would suggest that in the private sector that is not the case.

From time to time, there were certain members of the private sector losing their jobs for periods of time through lay-offs and so on, not to the same—

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Newfoundland fishermen and plant workers are facing the worst crisis they have faced for decades. For months they were unable to fish because of severe ice conditions. When many of them did get out they found there were no fish to catch. Fishermen were losing more with every trip they took.

With the fishing season for many coming to a close one simple and tragic fact is clear: thousands of Newfoundlanders are facing a very bleak winter.

I am calling on the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to put in place a disaster relief program which will ensure that the close to 8,000 inshore fishermen who will not qualify for UI are not forced out of the fishery or on to the welfare roles of the poorest province in Canada.

The government cannot claim to have been unaware of this problem. In an internal DFO memo dated June 28, 1990, the minister was advised that the current fisheries failure may appear unprecedented, but it is probable that failures of similar magnitude could occur in the future in this or other fisheries.

There is no excuse for delay. It is time to act.

DISABLED PERSONS

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, in Winnipeg on September 5, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State announced a $158 million program, a strategy to help people with disabilities integrate into the mainstream of Canadian life. As the Prime Minister commented, what every disabled persons wants most is simply to be recognized as an individual.

It was with this understanding that the National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disability has been designed. The program stresses partnership between disabled persons and the community, partnerships that can overcome barriers of attitudes and of space and access that prevent disabled people from achieving their full potential.

The key word is "access" to places, to employment, to opportunity. Canadians must tear down the barriers both mental and physical and make this integration program the success that it can be.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, this morning in The Hague Lord Carrington announced that a new Yugoslavian ceasefire had been successfully brokered. At the same time the armed conflict is escalating. All parties are on the offensive. Warships are on the move. Ports are being shelled. There is even a danger that neighbouring countries may get involved.

While lives are being lost and successive ceasefires fail, my colleagues and I are being petitioned from all sides to work toward an end to the conflict. There is much to be discussed if all the people of Yugoslavia are to settle their differences and live in peace, but it is critical that the temperature of the conflict be lowered first.

While the EC and CSCE as vehicles for settling this dispute appear to be having little success, third party intervention by UN peacekeeping forces has proven successful in the past. Canada has an opportunity to show leadership on the international stage.

When will the government realize that Canada must work on a most urgent basis to support the ceasefire? We must support the request by the presidents of both Yugoslavia and Croatia for UN peacekeepers. Lives are being lost while we wait.

NATIONAL STRATEGY FOR THE INTEGRATION OF PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, persons with a disability see every day as another challenge. They are constantly up against obstacles that put them at a disadvantage when seeking employment and advancement, education and training and equal access and participation. In other words, they cannot lead normal lives. Active co-operation by federal departments with Canadian communities is helping to eliminate these obstacles.

The National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with a Disability, announced by the Prime Minister on September 6 in Winnipeg and by the Secretary of State on September 9 in Montreal, would not succeed without the partnership that exists between provincial, territorial and municipal governments.

Of course, we must not forget volunteer groups, the business community, the media, unions and disabled persons and the organizations they represent. These partnerships already exist and are growing daily.

Mr. Speaker, it is up to each and eveyryone of us to support these partnerships and to urge all Canadians to help implement this admirable strategy.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the tactics this unpopular government is using against its own employees are unconscienable. It brings in devious pay increases for the upper echelon of the Public Service and Crown corporations. It introduces wage controls on lower level public servants. It ignores the collective bargaining process. Promises have been broken with respect to pay equity. Untruths have been told about contracting out. All this is done in the hope that Canadians will become hostile to the strikers.

The government is in effect saying to all employers in Canada that it is okay to throw away the right to bargain and to hold over the heads of workers the threats of job losses and contracting out.

We have a government that is politically opportunistic, with no respect for the citizens of this country. It is not too late for this government to negotiate a fair solution that will put the Public Service back on its feet while generating a spirit of good will for the future.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament I am constantly confronted by mothers, fathers and children whose basic human rights are being violated. They are deprived of security of person, of physical and mental health and are subject to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment because their families are separated, frequently for as much as six years.

I urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of persons who have been determined to be convention refugees and allow families to be reunited in Canada for inland processing as is done in the United States.

Let us cut bureaucratic processing time and cost, reduce health and welfare costs, and help families who will be Canadian citizens.

PARLIAMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House the hon. government House leader, in making reference to a letter which he received, asked: "Why do we have this archaic practice of having first reading, second reading, third reading, for pieces of legislation?"

This government has proven itself capable of, in just a few years, dismantling a parliamentary system which took centuries to develop. It has steamrolled over our institutions of democracy to enact a Draconian legislative agenda which Canadians do not support, and now the minister says: "Why do we need to have all of these stages of debate in the House of Commons?" Perhaps next he will ask: "Why do we need to have the House of Commons at all?"

It seems that the government has realized that at 14 per cent in the polls the only way that it can hold on to its power is to do away with democracy and rule Canada by a dictatorship. At least one good thing might come out of it: We would not need the government House leader any more, now would we?

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, self-determination is being increasingly established as the right of people in every corner of our changing world. We have seen citizens of east European countries and the Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia being granted a voice in the determination of their political futures. Unfortunately, this is not the case for the people of Croatia and Slovenia who voted 95 per cent in favour of independence.

Today, His Excellency Yves Fortier, Canada's Ambassador to the United States, has stated that on the instructions of the Prime Minister of Canada he will explore with the United Nations Security Council the possibility of establishing a UN peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia.

I know that every member of this House will join with me in supporting a role for Canada as an integral part of any effort to help put an end to the bloodshed in Yugoslavia.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, on March 15 this year, I rose in the House to discuss the economy in the Montreal area, and I recalled the passionate words spoken by Jean Marchand who always pointed to Montreal as the economic heartland of Quebec.

On Tuesday, June 4, 1991, the caucus I represent launched a one-day debate in this House on the economy in the Montreal area.

Since that time, not a single government initiative. The responsible minister prefers to ignore a situation that has become catastrophic.

On behalf of all Quebecers and the people of Montreal, I ask and beg the Prime Minister of Canada not to listen to me or to us, but to read this morning's impressive article in the Journal de Montréal by Jean-Philippe Décarie, and a number of reports by that excellent journalist, Michel C. Auger. If he does, I am sure he will get rid of the minister responsible for Montreal and let him take on lesser responsibilities. I am sure he has a number of members who would be able to do the job, and I am thinking of Hogue, Tétreault, Della Noce, Gibeau and others. They will have no trouble doing a better job than the minister because, Mr. Speaker, the situation in Montreal has reached catastrophic proportions. I hope the minister is replaced by one of the members I just mentioned.

DEBRIS CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, we are all concerned about our environment.

For 10 years there has been a very successful program for controlling debris on the Fraser River, the port of Vancouver and Howe Sound. It is the Fraser River debris program. It has been jointly funded by the federal and provincial government as well as the forest industry.

In spite of the large expenditures made for the clean-up of the Fraser River in the green plan, the debris control program appears about to be discontinued. This would be contrary to any common sense as the debris control program resolves one of the major causes of pollution in the Fraser Basin and on the south coast.

The expenditure on debris control is minimal compared to damage to the marine, fishing, tourism and recreational activities. I would plead with all the departments involved to continue their full support for this essential program.

BRYAN ADAMS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Canada's biggest rock star, Vancouver's very own Bryan Adams has been told by Canada's federal broadcast regulator that his newly released songs are un-Canadian.

All songs on Adams' new album Waking Up the Neighbours have been denied Canadian content status and are subject to restriction on all FM radio stations.

At the same time songs by British rocker Tonight's the Night Rod Stewart and U.S. blues singer Bonnie Raitt are considered Canadian and allowed unlimited play.

This ruling is an insult to a quintessentially Canadian performer who has received both the Order of Canada and the Order of British Columbia for his work.

Something is clearly wrong with the CRTC grading system on Canadian content when artists like Adams are denied Canadian status.

I call upon the CRTC to revise its evaluation procedures and amend this outrageous ruling. It is an insult to Adams and to all other Canadian performing artists.

Come on, CRTC. Get with it, eh?

CANADA POST

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents are concerned about the actions of Canada Post, especially when it comes to meaning the closure of a rural post office such as in Halton, Ontario.

Some people think the member of Parliament should directly interfere in the business operations of Canada Post, but there has to be a better way.

I call on the government to accept the advice of the House of Commons consumer and corporate affairs committee and privatize Canada Post; then set up an independent regulatory agency with decision-making powers something along the lines of the CRTC.

That way, clients of Canada Post and communities affected by it would have a way of appealing decisions made by the corporation. We would have something that is lacking today. We would have accountability.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a letter I wrote to the Prime Minister on August 27 on the situation in Yugoslavia:

> We are witnessing the most intensive fighting yet in Yugoslavia's undeclared civil war.
> The Yugoslavian army, controlled by the communist Serbian government, continues to ignore the Yugoslavian presidency under Stepe Mesic and attack the Croatian National Guard under the duly elected Government of Croatia.
> At this time of crisis, I urge you to recognize the independent republics of Croatia and Slovenia, and to immediately ask that all Yugoslavian troops be withdrawn from Croatian territory in an effort to help curb the further escalation of the conflict.

Canada's support of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia would be viewed as our meaningful commitment to freedom and democracy.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday evening, Mr. Chrétien stated, in response to questions from the press on constitutional issues, and I quote: "What the people of the Gaspesian Peninsula want is to get their UI cheques. They do not care whether they come from Quebec or Ottawa."

All the men and women who live in that region were shocked to hear such a thing. They will never tolerate that such a value judgement be made about their community. Contemptuous statements such as this give away the ignorance of their author concerning the history of this wonderful region and its people. The Gaspesian workers are proud, courageous and hard-working people. As a matter of fact, is it not a fact that they are one of the most valued workforce in the whole of Canada? Mr. Speaker, these people want to develop their part of the country to halt the exodus of its citizens. They want to work, not to sit and wait for their UI cheques as Mr. Chrétien would like us to believe.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon all Gaspesian men and women to let the Leader of the Opposition know in no uncertain terms that they absolutely find such comments unacceptable. Mr. Chrétien, the people of the Gaspesian Peninsula have heard you and they will remember it in due time.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, we learned yesterday of the closure of the Canadian Pacific Angus Shops, in the east end of Montreal. Nine hundred jobs will be lost, on top of the many jobs that have already been lost in the rail and air transportation industry in Montreal. This situation is unacceptable.

What is also inadmissible for Montreal is the inaction of the Minister of Transport the very minister who unfortunately is responsible for the Montreal area. The Chamber of Commerce of Montreal denounced this minister who refused to meet with them. Mr. Speaker, this government has lost its credibility and this minister proved to be incompetent a long time ago. Montreal deserves better that this bunch of politicians without a vision that make up this government.

My party support the sovereignty option for Quebec. As its mayor stated before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, Montreal needs a national Quebec policy to promote its development. A sovereign Quebec would have the added advantage of not imposing upon the rest of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time is up.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister a question. A few years ago, as you drove into Montreal, you saw signs with a very appropriate slogan proclaiming Montreal a city with pride. Today, Montreal is a city with unemployment. After Air Canada and Canadian Airlines, now 950 jobs are being lost at the CPR's Angus Shops in Montreal. What a fine way, Mr. Speaker, to celebrate the 350th anniversary of the city. So I ask the Prime Minister what he intends to do to deal with the absolutely disastrous economic situation in Montreal and to find jobs in a city with over 20 per cent unemployment.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would tell the Leader of the Opposition that this government has promoted the economy of Montreal as it has promoted the economy of the country by taking very specific action to prepare people to hold high-tech jobs. I would tell the Leader of the Opposition that over the years, we passed Bill C-22 for the pharmaceutical industry, we helped Canadair, we helped Pratt & Whitney, we set up the Space Agency and the headquarters of the international environmental agency in Montreal. We did those things, Mr. Speaker. Since 1984, we created 83,000 net jobs on the island of Montreal, while in the previous four years, the Liberal Party presided over the net loss of 4,000 jobs.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

When the government said the recession is over, we have to wonder what they are putting in the water cooler in the cabinet room. It seems that everything that the government touches these days turns to a disaster. I am almost afraid to ask it to try to do something about the economy, but there is the reality that there is 1.5 million Canadians who are looking for work today.

• (1420)

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what he intends to do to find jobs for these Canadians who want to work. You do not have to force them to work; they want to work.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows very well that positive growth was recorded in the second quarter of this year, 4.9 per cent at an annualized rate. The domestic demand went up by 6.9 per cent. Exports were up by 22 per cent. The merchandise trade balance is up to $12 billion. Labour income is up 5.7 per cent. Corporate profits are up by 40 per cent, and personal disposable income is up by 6.3 per cent.

The recovery began one-quarter earlier than we had anticipated. It is important to get the fundamentals right. It is important to ensure that we nip the inflationary psychology in the bud, and we have done that. We are on the road to sustainable growth and sustainable recovery with price stability. That is our goal and that should be the goal of the Leader of the Opposition as well.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when you drop the economy you create a recession yourself, and after that it is trying to improve a little bit. You are far away from where you should be at this time.

Go to Atlantic Canada today and talk to the fishermen who will not even have the right to receive their unemployment insurance. Go to Quebec and Ontario where there are hundreds of thousands of people who have lost their jobs in the manufacturing sectors. Go back to your own provinces in the west and ask the farmers what they think of the policies of this government.

It is not statistics that we want. We want concern for the people. When will the Minister of Finance do something to create jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the Leader of the Opposition would be disappointed if we did not follow Liberal economic policy.

The reason that we do not follow Liberal economic policy is the fact that ten years ago today the unemployment in this country was 12.8 per cent, and today it is 10.6 per cent. Ten years ago today, following Liberal economic policies, the inflation rate was 12.9 per cent. Today, it is 5.8 per cent. Ten years ago today the prime interest rate was 22.75 per cent. Today, it is 9.5 per cent.

No, we will not follow Liberal economic policies.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a government that stands in the House and brags about double digit unemployment is a government that has lost touch with the people. Why don't you go to the people and ask them what they think?

My question is for the Prime Minister. In his first speech those many years ago, the Prime Minister said: "Another component of industrial progress has to be a major commitment to civilized labour relations in this nation. You do not learn about this program in the PMO. You learn about it from those who have grown up in the area and understand the problems of living, breathing people, those who have worked out problems and have a track record to deal with, not governments that unilaterally bring in legislation"—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put her question.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am getting to the question. I want to ask the Prime Minister why—and I quoted that he did not believe in governments that unilaterally bring in legislation to abuse collective agreements—does he do today what he found so offensive in 1983?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): But, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to rise to tell my hon. friend indeed that was a fine speech that I gave back in 1983. In fact, if my hon. friend cares to look at it, the statistics will clearly indicate that labour relations in Canada have been civilized in large measure over the last seven or eight years.

The NDP laughs. They should be talking to the NDP government in Ontario. There is a serious strike going on in Toronto. In point of fact, there are 3 million people—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, we have reduced very considerably the number of days lost in the Public Service and in Canada over the last seven years.

From time to time we all encounter difficult circumstances; the country is encountering a difficult circumstance now. The economic recovery is in train. It appears to be broadly based, but it remains fragile. All elements of the economy including the Public Service and the private sector have been asked and will be asked to do their very best to make a contribution to making sure that this economic recovery remains durable so that all Canadians, including public servants can benefit from a strong economic recovery in Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the government's lowest paid clerks, those people who really need our help, make $16,500. A month before this Draconian legislation was brought in, that minister and that Prime Minister got a deal which will increase their compensation by $11,413 respectively.

If the government's program is so fair, why did the Prime Minister get an increase that is ten times higher than that of the lowest paid civil servants across this land?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has her numbers wrong.

Some hon. members: Again.

Mr. Loiselle: She mixes apples and oranges. If you want to look at the Public Service in the same way, in the newspaper last week you could see that the travel budget of public servants for last year was $500 million. Should you put that in their pay? It has nothing to do with it.

The increase to members of Parliament was 3.7 per cent and to PSAC members was 4.8 per cent.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This morning the government responded to the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruling that this government had been bargaining in bad faith, with the statement that it will go back to the negotiating table.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: I suggest that the government read the ruling. The statement of the minister this morning was that the government would go back to the table with no preconditions.

It is interesting that the Minister of Finance said in his response to an earlier question that labour income in this country has gone up 5.7 per cent. He was citing this as an indication that the recession is over. For public servants this government is offering them zero per cent. The recession is not over for them.

The minister said this morning that he will go back to the negotiating table with no preconditions. Can the Prime Minister confirm that that is his government's position, that he will do that, and that his government will bargain in good faith with workers now with no preconditions?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. leader of the NDP understands that the situation for these employees is difficult enough without making it a charade. It is not true that we have offered to go back without preconditions. We have always been ready to negotiate with the Public Service Alliance, as we have with others.

She will remember that it is Mr. Bean after the budget who said: "This is going to be a political strike. We want to go after this government". We sat with him for 90 days and we tried to make a deal on all of these issues that are of concern to her and to us, and he would not move.

The Public Service Staff Relations Board stated what we should have done according to section 51: not bargained. We have bargained. It is not that we did that in bad faith, not at all.

• (1430)

They said that the board concluded that the preconditions were incompatible with the requirements to make every reasonable effort. I said that I was surprised, because we have made efforts and we are prepared to continue with those efforts. That is what I said this morning. We are prepared to sit with the union and negotiate without preconditions, but I will say that the zero, three and three is still a firm commitment.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that there is a double message to the workers of this country. The minister has made a clear statement that he would negotiate without preconditions.

[Translation]

Further to the Minister's comments on negotiations with the Alliance, is the Minister now prepared to withdraw the government's challenge of the Canadian Human Rights Commission's decision on pay equity for Canadian women and for the Alliance?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if you allow me, the government is going to court only to obtain a formal opinion on the interpretation of a clause.

Parliament passed a pay equity law, we respect it and we are in fact the first government to set aside a sum of money, $317 million, and to set aside $80 million a year to help women achieve equal pay.

Now we disagree with the tribunal on an interpretation which we think goes beyond the law. We are prepared to comply with the court's decision, but we are asking for its opinion. That is all, nothing else. We are ready to act on equal pay; we have shown it more than any other government.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I did not think that in order to implement the law you had to wait for a court decision. If the law is pay equity, implement pay equity. It seems to me that is the simple thing to do.

The government has talked about negotiation but the back-to-work bill remains under discussion today. I want to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has recently returned from a trip abroad where she spoke in Ukraine about Canada's good international record on democracy and on democratic rights and freedoms.

I would point out to the minister that the legislation put forward by this government, this back-to-work legislation, is once again legislation that is in direct violation of the United Nations Labour Convention No. 87, which guarantees freedom of association and which Canada has signed.

How can the Secretary of State for External Affairs justify making such comments outside the country and yet support her government in such legislation which contravenes the rights of workers within this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, in the case of the Liberals I have some hope because they will have a convention, I believe, in November to start knowing what they think.

Six governments in Canada have imposed pay freezes. Liberal governments have legislated them. We have tried to negotiate them. We have sat with the unions to try to improve the package because there are a lot of other things in a collective agreement besides salaries. I may say to the hon. member that indeed we are continuing this. I have instructed my officials to inform Mr. Bean that we are prepared to sit and discuss these things with him. I am happy to inform her that indeed we are presently moving in the right direction.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As we speak, another major blockade by Canadian truckers of the Ambassador Bridge is currently under way in Windsor, Ontario, in direct and justified response to this government's complete inaction toward the trucking industry.

I ask the minister: How many more studies, protests and blockades need to occur before the government changes the existing rules and regulations which now place Canadian truckers at a severe disadvantage to their counterparts in the United States? Do you care about protecting Canadian jobs or not?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member opposite knows very well that a task force on trucking has been at work for many months and has come to some conclusions as a result of a number of meetings.

We have met with the truckers, although the vast majority of the trucking problem rests with the provincial legislatures because they are the ones that are crucifying trucking with their very high cost on fuel. This is where the problems rest mainly.

Nevertheless, we have met with the truckers who want to speak, not with the truckers who are trying to do same thing that some people have tried to do with PSAC and turn this into a fight against the government. We are working with the truckers who want to work toward a proper solution.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians do not want to fight the government but they want to fight to protect their jobs. There is nothing wrong with doing that when a government is blind and insensitive to their pleas.

I return to the Minister of Transport. After a year and a half of promises, why has the government failed to respond tangibly to this crisis? How can it possibly sit back while Canadian truckers' families are losing their livelihood, their jobs, their savings, their homes and finally their dignity? Doesn't this government care?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is evidently not trying to work to improve the lot of the workers. He is trying to make political gains out of that. He should know by now that the studies that were commended by the task force on trucking issues have determined very precisely that the federal government taxation system has nothing to do with the problems of the truckers.

Their problems are in the provincial legislatures where the taxation on fuels is enormous, whilst at the federal level our excise tax on diesel fuel that is used by the truckers is less than in the U.S. Our excise fuel tax in Canada is 4 cents per litre. In the U.S. it is 6.2 cents per litre.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the 1991 fishing industry along the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador will be recorded as disastrous, potentially the worst in memory.

My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. When can we expect an implementation of an aid package that will address this depressing and devastating situation?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as I answered yesterday, the government well knows that we have had a very poor fishery along the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador this year.

The government instituted an aid program last June and paid compensation to fishermen who were prevented from fishing by ice from May 15 to when the last of them received assistance in August. We are now considering and deciding with the provincial government and after a consultation with the industry and the union what further steps may be needed to assist fishermen and plant workers who will not be able to even secure their qualifications for UI this year.

This matter is under very active consideration. If we act as generously as we did with respect to ice compensation, then the hon. gentleman need have no fears about the assistance that will be forthcoming.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, this aid package that is going to be produced when the government is ready may have been okay for years past when the fishing industry was in trouble, but right now, when we are looking at less than 50 per cent and in some cases in various ridings 10 per cent and 5 per cent of the ordinary catch, I would suggest that these are not ordinary conditions for fishermen and plant workers who are having their incomes wiped out and not enough work to qualify for unemployment insurance. Therefore it requires emergency and extraordinary measures.

Why will the minister not give urgency to this pressing matter and come to the rescue of those in dire need, not next month, not next week, but now?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we are now in the middle of September and the fishing season is not yet over. Fish are still being caught. We are contacting every community and every fish plant along the northeast coast and Labrador to see exactly what the situation is, what the accurate, factual situation is.

• (1440)

We know of course that in places like Labrador it is an absolute disaster and that in areas like Black Tickle they hardly caught a dozen fish this year where they caught thousands of tonnes last year and the previous year. There are certain areas which will have to be assisted, and they will be.

We are not ready yet to announce any plan. We are talking to the provincial government which also has a heavy responsibility here and there will be an announcement in due course.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, protests across this country are mounting and spreading against this government. In Windsor and elsewhere in Ontario hundreds of truckers are blocking border crossings. They are blocking highways. They are doing so to support PSAC and to call for the resignation of this Prime Minister.

The Minister of Transport promised short-term help to truckers in July. Why has the Minister of Transport not come through with this help? Why has the Minister of Transport ignored the precarious economic situation, the grave difficulties of many Canadians across this country? Why has he not given these people the short-term help he promised in July?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that this government has given not only short-term help to the truckers but very long-term help. By introducing the GST we have reduced taxation bill of the trucking industry by $400 million a year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Corbeil: In addition to that, truckers who are not blockading to support PSAC or any other political motive have sat down with us on numerous occasions to try to iron out their temporary problems.

We have worked out some solutions with them. We have indicated to them again that the main focus of their problem is in the provincial legislatures, but we are also working with them on temporary solutions. We are doing that very remarkably, to the satisfaction of the truckers, the shippers, and the owner-operators. However, those who are blockading because they want to achieve some political motives are not serving the trucking business.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport.

I want to remind the minister that it was his government that deregulated the trucking industry in this country, thereby setting the scene for the crisis we are in today in that industry.

The minister clearly promised in July some interim assistance separate from the impacts of the GST. What the truckers want to know is when they are going to find out what that assistance is so that they can get on with their lives, move goods on behalf of Canadians and keep the economy rolling.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the truckers know very well what we are offering. We have sat down with them on numerous occasions. We are working toward a solution and the truckers are very happy, but they have come to realize through the process again that the main thrust of their problems is in the provincial legislatures.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the region of Montreal. The unemployment rate is above 35 per cent in Montreal-East. We lost thousands of jobs in refineries, at Canadian Steel Foundries, Vickers, Air Canada, Angus, Nationair, in textiles, and the list is too long to mention them all here, Mr. Speaker. When will the minister finally convince his colleagues of the Conservative Party to find a solution to the economic stagnation in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, how can the member for Saint-Léonard speak of the closing of refineries when we all know that it is his party's abominable national energy policy which caused problems to the oil industry and is responsible for the state in which it is today?

Mr. Speaker, this government, since it came to power seven years ago, has created 81,000 jobs. The previous government, in the four prior years, "created" a net loss of 4,000 jobs. I believe we have no lesson to learn from people who devastated Montreal's economy and who caused so much damage to the country's economy that we have no other choice today but to take measures to redress it.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, as minister responsible for the economy of Montreal, this minister ought to know that Montreal used to come first for transport and high technology. Now, all major industries are dying out.

Is the minister planning to make another Schefferville out of Montreal? Will he stop referring to the 50s and start proposing once and for all a recovery policy for Montreal?

Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that what must be listed here is the number of initiatives that we have taken precisely to ensure that in the years to come, workers in Montreal, men and women, will continue to hold high technology jobs.

I will only mention the $65 million National Defence contract that we have been giving to the Canadian Arsenals since 1988, the contracts for almost $200 million that Spar Aerospace Ltd has received for the Canadian Space Agency, and the $86 million contract that we have given to Bombardier for the maintenance of CF-18s. We have invested $1.5 millions in the Technology Centre and $40 millions in Islands Park. We have contributed $43 millions to Canadair to modernize its regional jet. All those are high technology jobs.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle-Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The answer from the minister responsible for the City of Montreal clearly shows that their program is one of inaction. The Quebec Minister of Industry, Mr. Gérald Tremblay, on the contrary, understands the problem and supports a totally different position: We need to intervene in a very forceful way, he said, and I quote: "Either we take the necessary measures to build an economy for the future or we watch powerless our society becoming poorer and poorer."

Here is my question to the Prime Minister: How long is the Prime Minister going to remain a silent witness to the impoverishment of Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard should, at least, have the decency of not contradicting himself in a speech of a minute and a half. He said, rightfully, that we should do something and he quotes the Quebec Minister of Industry. I just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, a large number of initiatives taken by our government regarding high technology industries that greatly helped the Montreal area. I didn't name them all, Mr. Speaker, because I didn't have the time, but over the last three years, we spent $35 million to help new industries settle in the East of Montreal which resulted in the creation of 2,000 jobs and the investment of at least $100 million by the private sector in this field alone. These are a few concrete examples, Mr. Speaker, of what we are doing to stimulate the economy in the Montreal area.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): What are you talking about? Mr. Speaker, just yesterday 3,000 jobs were lost in Montreal. This is just rhetoric! Let me quote minister Tremblay again: "Choices have to made urgently. We know what the choices are. I for one have decided for Quebec."

This question is also for the Prime Minister. What is he waiting for to make an economic decision about Montreal, about Quebec, about Canada. No further studies are required. Government has the power, but it lacks the will to use it!

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is really incredible! Understandably so, considering it is coming from a carpetbagger who in 1988 landed on Montreal Island and suddenly discovered Montreal and the province of Quebec. It takes a lot of gall on the part of a member from a party whose former leader massacred Quebec, Mr. Speaker, and excluded it from the Constitution, to come and tell us that the present leader of the Conservative Party did nothing for Quebec when in fact he has been the only Canadian Prime Minister in the past fifty years to really stand up for Quebec!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it concerns the David Milgaard case. Mr. Milgaard is one of Canada's longest serving prisoners.

The Prime Minister recently told Mr. Milgaard's mother that he would speak to the minister about the case which, if I may say, was a very decent and humane reaction.

Has the Prime Minister done that? Has the minister decided to act in what appears to be a situation where justice is not only not done, but there appears to be compelling evidence that Mr. Milgaard did not commit the crime?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member has chosen to alight on that particular subject which does not appear to have interested him before.

The Prime Minister did in fact meet—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has the floor. I know that she will be given the courtesy of allowing her to put her answer.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I was reflecting my concern that the hon. member who is a lawyer and an officer of the court would stand up in the House of Commons and appear to prejudge a case with which he is completely unfamiliar.

It is quite true that the Prime Minister did have a discussion with Mrs. Milgaard about her concerns about her son's health. The Prime Minister communicated that immediately to me. I communicated it directly to the Director of Corrections, although it is the responsibility of the Solicitor General, and that matter is being looked into by his department.

I have already dealt with one application by Mr. Milgaard under section 690 of the Criminal Code. I have refused the application. My reasons have been made public. There are 12 pages of reasons, which were given to Mr. Milgaard's counsel who made it public. Therefore I feel free to make the letter public and I am happy to provide those reasons to the hon. member.

Another application has been received which will be dealt with in the same fair, straightforward and impartial way as the first application. If that application meets the threshold, it will be granted. If not, it will not.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, let me tell the minister that all Canadians, not just me, are interested in this case because there is a public perception that there was a miscarriage of justice here. She should do something about it. There is not much point in following the same process again.

Will the minister accept what the Marshall inquiry said, open up the process and make it less prosecutorial–driven by the Crown? Let us open it up so she really has the facts. Will she in fact make the MacIntyre report public, make the justice department file public so we can all see it and, finally, will she refer this case to the Supreme Court so that we can have a public inquiry into this man's guilt or innocence?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to remind the hon. member that this is a process that did result in a new trial for Donald Marshall, and I have granted applications under section 690 of the Criminal Code.

It is a power that is exercised pursuant to the royal prerogative of mercy. I recognize that there are some concerns about it in the sense that it is not by definition a transparent process. I am discussing with my department ways in which in fact it could be made more straightforward.

I think it is important to emphasize that in reviewing these cases the Department of Justice has no vested interest in the outcome. Our interest is only in doing what is just.

Unlike others who wish to comment on these cases, I am confined to the evidence that could be put before a court. When in the previous application of Mr. Milgaard people were making what I considered to be highly unfair attacks on the credibility of the process, I went outside the Department of Justice to get independent advice from one of Canada's leading criminal lawyers and retired justices of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I am quite open to suggestions to make the process more—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should really move on.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who is well aware that the high value of the Canadian dollar is killing our manufacturing exporters.

Has the Minister of Finance told the Governor of the Bank of Canada that by cutting the differential between Canadian and U.S. interest rates to a point where they were during the 1970s we can lower the value of the Canadian dollar and create jobs instead of destroying them? If the minister has not told the governor that as yet, will he undertake to do so without delay?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that I meet with the Governor of the Bank of Canada on a regular basis. I think he will agree with me that there has been a substantial easing in monetary conditions.

The interest rates in Canada have dropped by five and one-third per cent since its high of last year. The spreads have narrowed considerably from well over 5 per cent to less than 3 per cent, so that spread has narrowed and is continuing to narrow. There are some positive results that are occurring as a result of that lowering of interest rates and the easing of monetary conditions.

The problem is that we have to continue the fight against inflation to ensure that bringing inflation and inflationary pressures down will result in a further reduction in interest rates, and that is the track that we are on.

I think that the hon. member would agree that the economy is in recovery. We expect that recovery to continue into the second half and on into next year. That will produce positive benefits for all as it has in the house building industry, as it has in the automobile industry, and as it has in confidence both within—

Mr. Speaker: It is time to go on.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

The P.E.I. potato industry has been seriously damaged by a supposed presence of a virus which has prevented it from exporting to the rest of Canada and the United States.

As the minister now knows his department has blundered badly. There is now no evidence that the N strain of the virus has been found in any of the 96 cases identified this year.

Will the minister now admit that this is indeed the case?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister should be briefed, as is the minister from Prince Edward Island, that there has been a meeting of the bi-national committee of Canada and the United States. It has evidence that in the 96 cases which have been identified as having PVY-N presence this year the end strain has not been isolated in any one of them.

I want to know what the minister is going to do about this and what steps he is taking to open the border to the rest of Canada and the United States for P.E.I. potatoes?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should draw to the attention of the hon. member that yes, there is a bi-national panel meeting experts from around the world who have had experience in the PVY, PVY-N, PVY-O and PVY-X viruses. There is one scientist who has made a statement to that bi-national panel that is accurate as far as the hon. member is concerned. He is not accurate in saying that the bi-national panel has made a decision that there is not PVY-N.

But I say to the hon. member that regardless of the strain of virus it is not accepted in the United States.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, each day the Public Service Alliance strike continues the government is not paying out millions of dollars in salaries to its workers.

My question is to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister consider applying these savings directly to reducing the deficit so that some financial good can come out of this regrettable strike for all of us?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, offset against any savings that may occur as a result of the saving in salaries there would also be on the other side a corresponding cost in terms of disruption and delays. A lot of the work will be delayed and, of course, there will be some loss of revenues as well. So I think it would be very difficult to put a figure on that.

• (1500)

Furthermore, as the hon. member knows, the debt servicing and reduction fund does not allow for this kind of funding to go into that fund. As it presently stands, it is the net revenue of the GST, the revenues that are acquired from the sale of Crown corporations and any voluntary contributions that you, Mr. Speaker, or other members of the House or any one of the public may wish to voluntarily contribute to defraying the deficit.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it has to do with the Milgaard case. More evidence has come in over the summer pointing to his innocence. There are calls from all over the country demanding a review of this case.

I would like to know from the minister, given the fact that she has referred to the application before her, how long she is going to take before she gives a decision on the latest application?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the file has not yet arrived at my desk. My department is dealing with it expeditiously and I will deal with it as expeditiously as possible, according to the evidence and the law.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

It will take a while for this second review of the application. I would like to know from the minister whether she would consider working toward Milgaard's release on parole pending the completion of the review of the application. There seems to be no reason for the continued incarceration of Mr. Milgaard. Would she work towards the release of Mr. Milgaard on parole?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is making some rather extraordinary assumptions. I would remind him that is the prerogative of the National Parole Board. Mr. Milgaard, like anyone else who is incarcerated, has the obligation to apply for parole and to appear before the Parole Board.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED COMMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, normally I would rise in my place with regard to this point of privilege under the provisions of a point of order. But I believe one can justify a question of privilege on the grounds that a remark was broadcast across the country which elicited angry telephone calls as a result. The remark tended to place, I believe, the whole House in disrepute.

I am referring to the exchange between the hon. member for Hamilton East and the hon. member for Burlington. While the hon. member for Burlington was taking his seat, a comment was made in a very uncomplimentary fashion, which I will not repeat on the floor of the House of Commons, but I do have a copy of the tape which I would like to review.

Again, I repeat my remarks that I rise on a point of privilege with regard to the exchange which took place between the hon. member for Hamilton East and the hon. member for Burlington. When the hon. member from Burlington was taking his seat, some very uncomplimentary remarks were made which I have on a tape that I would like to review.

In point of fact, I wish to refer to three short, succinct citations which I believe ought to be considered by you as justifying a point of privilege.

I quote from "Breeches and Contempts" by Maingot, Parliamentary Privilege in Canada on page 213:

> To constitute a breach of privilege a statement reflecting on the conduct of a member in his capacity as a member need not to be true but it must tend to lower the House in the eyes of the public.

I suggest that the tape will prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that it does; second, there are actions which, while not directly in a physical way obstructing the House of Commons or the member, nevertheless obstruct the House in the performance of the functions by diminishing the respect to it.

The second citation which I would ask you to review, Mr. Speaker, and which I will table with the clerk, is on page 214 from the same text:

> Contemptuous references hold the member in disrespect of his parliamentary conduct and, thus, the House is held in disrespect. The House of Commons is prepared to find contempt in respect of utterances within the category of libel and slander and also in respect of utterances which do not meet that standard.

The final citation is from the sixth edition of Beauchesne, page 143, citation 486, which reads in part:

> It is impossible to lay down any specific rules in regard to injurious reflections uttered in debate against particular members or to declare beforehand what expressions are or are not contrary to order. Much depends upon the tone and manner and intention of the person speaking.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will give careful consideration to what was said and the tone in which it was said.

Further quote:

> Sometimes upon the person to whom the words are addressed, as whether that person is a public officer or a private member not in office, or whether the words are meant to be applied to public conduct or to private character, and sometimes upon the degree of provocation which the member speaking had received from the person alluded to. All of these considerations must be attended to at the moment as they are infinitely various and cannot possibly be foreseen in such a manner that precise rules can be adopted with respect to them.
