POINT OF ORDER

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to a point of order raised on Friday, I have checked the record of Hansard and I see that inadvertently in an answer I gave to my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on Friday I used the word "negative" when I intended to use the word "positive". It was in fact a part of my response which was not particularly relevant to the question posed. The question asked me to take notice of a matter which I have done, but I wanted the record to be clear.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold) moved:

> That this House call upon the government to implement immediate measures to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment amongst Canadian youth.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks, I know it is not the custom in this House to state who is here and who is not, but I am particularly pleased that the Minister of State responsible for Youth is in his seat today to hear the comments not only from this side of the House but from all sides. We hope it will help him in his deliberations to alleviate the problem of unemployment among youth.

There is no need to dwell on the importance of jobs for Canadians, and I mean all Canadians, including our youth, including students. After reaching a low of 11.1 per cent in March 1990, the seasonably adjusted youth unemployment rate has increased steadily in response to the 1990–91 recession. The seasonally adjusted youth unemployment rate reached 14.9 per cent in January of this year. This is the highest monthly rate recorded since July 1986, except of course for the last figures received which show that our youth unemployment is now well over 16 per cent. This is unacceptable in a country as rich and as supposedly prosperous as Canada could be.

The developments underlying this trend are twofold. First, seasonally adjusted youth employment declined by 138,000 or six per cent, between March 1990 and January 1991. This is some 56.1 per cent of the total decline in the seasonally adjusted employment since the beginning of this period. Second, seasonally adjusted youth unemployment increased by 32 per cent or 92,000 students throughout this period. Labour market conditions would have been worse had it not been for a 1.8 per cent decline in the size of the youth labour force during this period.

We have to question seriously the government's commitment to student employment. Last year the government decided to cut the Summer Employment/Experience Development Program, also called the Challenge program, by 35 per cent. This is a program which in 1985 provided 37,345 jobs for students. Had the program continued, it could have provided, in my opinion, in excess of 50,000 jobs this year alone.

After such a cruel blow to their expectations, the government went a step beyond and decided to close employment centres on campuses. The numbers proved that the employment centres were heavily used. For instance, the employment centre at the University of Calgary, which has a student population of about 20,000, received over 15,000 application forms. It booked 656 rooms on campus for employers and it conducted 4,415 job interviews. A program as successful as this surely should have been considered to be continued.

Here in Ontario at Laurentian University, which has an undergraduate population of about 3,000, last year 1,000 students were placed in casual, part-time, full-time or summer jobs through these employment centres on campus. The administrators as well as managers and workers at the employment centres can easily vouch for the fact that they are, indeed, very busy.

However, senior officials from Canada Employment Centres have maintained that there is no national strategy for the closures and that each centre is looked at individually. In other words, I guess if you are lucky your centre stays open, and if you are unlucky or at the whim of someone—we do not seem to have any criteria—then the centres are closed.

It becomes very clear what is happening across the country, and it is nothing short of a silent war of attrition waged against one of the most essential services that students still have on their campuses. As far as I know—subject to correction by whoever in the House, perhaps the minister—there has been no public process of discussion or consultation with the student bodies.

We are now at the time of year when students have finished their classes for a few months, and their employment prospects for the summer of 1991 will most likely be worse than they were in 1990. The government intends to spend an additional $3 million on the Challenge program this year, but this is only an increase of 2.1 per cent above last year's allocation. That does not even keep up with the rate of inflation, the cost of living that we have from year to year. What we have is a decline in the amount of real dollars that are being put into this particular program.

How many students are we to expect will benefit from these additional funds? Given the severity of the recession, one would think that the minister would have taken additional measures to increase employment opportunities for students this summer. It would have been, in my opinion, a very logical step.

Over the years since this government has come to power, it has prided itself on its so-called "sacred trust". Among the sacred trusts of this government and of this country, I would surely include our youth. The record shows a disturbing lack of commitment to our youth and the other sacred trust that the Prime Minister has referred to many times in the past.

I quote Jane Arnold, chairperson of the Canadian Federation of Students who said: "Students represent Canada's single most important investment in the future, our ability to compete and to prosper." It was thus extremely shortsighted of the government to take away, in a manner of speaking, our youths' ability to compete and to contribute in the future.

We are short-changing the youth of today for the sake of saving a few measly dollars. They are truly our investment in the future, and we are turning our backs on them if we cut these programs and refuse to recognize that there is a great problem in student unemployment.

The Minister of Finance in his last budget announced an extension of the two-year freeze to five years to federal transfer of payments to universities and colleges. This represents a $775 million loss for post-secondary education in 1992-93.

Over that five-year period, that is 1991 to 1995, the government will have cut a total of $3.8 billion. That is not a small sum as it is the equivalent of the combined operating budgets of universities in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. It is close to $4 billion. That is a shame.

In the words of Professor Bob Kerr, president of the Association of University Teachers: "Canada's system of post-secondary education is hovering on the brink of bankruptcy."

What the government does not seem to link with its commitment to Canadians of jobs, jobs, jobs is the fact that these cuts are the equivalent of the loss of many, many jobs on campuses across Canada: jobs for professors, support staff, maintenance workers and administrators in the cities and towns where there are universities or colleges. This includes my riding of Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold where we have Brock University and Niagara College. The opportunities lost for employment are truly significant, and we in our particular area but right across Canada are really feeling the pinch.

I agree with the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada which states: "Canada's foremost assets in the future will be its human rather than its natural resources". Lack of support for universities, combined with lack of support for knowledge intensive industries, may prove in fact to be the most damaging effect of the Mulroney government's preoccupation with allowing market forces and market forces alone to dictate Canadian economic policy.

Incredibly the Tories claim to have strengthened research and development expenditures in Canada. With all due respect, this claim is simply false. In its 1990 world competitiveness report—and incidentally competitiveness is a new buzz-word for this government—Canada has been competitive over the years. We have turned out some of the best minds in the world. We have turned out many of the best products in the world. When we talk about competitiveness, this is not something new to us. We have been there. We are competitive and we will continue to be competitive in the years ahead.

To return to the world's competitiveness report, the World Economic Forum makes the following observations and conclusions, to which I concur.

Of the 23 OECD countries, Canada ranks today 17th in over-all research and development efforts, dropping from a 10th place ranking in 1984 when this government took over the reigns of power.

Second, in future orientation which heavily reflects research and development performance, Canada fell to an abysmal 16th place ranking in 1990, down from 9th spot in 1986.

This is an indictment of the policies of this government. These figures provide clear evidence that Canada's research and development effort has deteriorated significantly since the Conservatives took office. Even when compared to smaller, less wealthy countries, Canada is chronically weak in research and development performance. That is a sad fact.

Conservative support for innovation has been shamefully low. I am sad to say that it is not getting any better. At the scientific level we will surely expect a brain drain, a continuing brain drain, while at the manufacturing level we will continue to see heavy losses in employment and opportunities for jobs, Canadian jobs for our use, for our students, for the future of Canada.

The government said that we were "open for business". There are some of us who would also say that some of them on the other side think that Canada is for sale. But this country is not for sale. This country belongs to us, the Canadian people, but this style which has run throughout their economic policy has created, is creating and will continue to create economic chaos.

Not surprisingly, foreign investors have been quick to respond. Acquisition of Canadian assets by foreigners has virtually leapt in recent years. At one time they accounted for less than 10 per cent of foreign direct investment. They now account for over 55 per cent. "Open for business", I say that is a fallacy. We are giving away the economic control of our country and that is not acceptable to Canadians in this day and age.

Another example of the damaging consequences of this government's economic philosophy is found in the area of manufacturing policy. Here again our youth is deprived of opportunities, be it in the fields of research, administration or manual labour.

• (1120)

Over the past 18 months alone, Canada has lost over 172,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. When the government introduced its legislation for Bill C-21, the UIC bill, one of the promises made to Canadians was that a substantial amount of the these funds would be redirected and used for training or retraining the unemployed.

I felt a sense of relief at this announcement as I hoped that many young people, particularly those who had dropped out of school, would have a chance to join this program, upgrade their skills or learn a trade and give them at least a fighting chance in our society.

However, as we watch the ramifications of this bill, particularly from a financial point of view, we have reason to doubt that once more the government has made a serious commitment in this area as well. Bill C-21 called for an increase in the premiums for employees and employers alike. As part of Bill C-21, the government committed itself to maintaining premium levels for 1990, 1991 and 1992.

However, this year's budget paper states: "Rates would be adjusted in such a manner to ensure the financial integrity of the account". This may mean one of two things: either employer contributions will sky-rocket to meet any deficits in the unemployment insurance fund—and we see there will be a deficit for this year—or rates will increase for employees as well, breaking the commitment to keep the rates at the rate of $2.80 for insurable earnings for employees.

It is either the government is not telling Canadians the truth, which is very sad, or in the absence of these increases we could be looking at an accumulative deficit of the UIC fund of $6 billion by the end of 1992 as a result of higher than expected benefit payments. I venture to say that in such instances money for retraining will be scarce and we will see another broken promise.

Today, my plea to the minister is to look at the facts, look at what is happening to our youth across Canada, look at what the policies of this government have done to the job opportunities for our young people, look at the consequences of cutting back on these programs that are so necessary to our young people. I hope, in his deliberations, the minister will take our opinions into consideration but, more that that, will take into consideration the needs of our young people across this country because without them all of our futures look bleak. It is not just a cliché to say that our future lies in our youth and that our youth will be competitive and will perform well if they are given a decent chance to get the tools that will help them to get the jobs to be productive citizens in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I must say I listened very carefully to what the hon. member said this morning about a very important subject: Canadian youth and its ability to function in our society. I would like to say to the hon. member that there are at least two perspectives one can have on Canadian youth. Of course we can focus on the problems of young people who are unable to function, but I would like to say to the hon. member that there are also young people in this country who function very well.

I myself, as a member of Parliament—and I am sure other members have done so recently—have attended a number of academic events in my riding such as graduations and scholarship awards, and I am sure that once they finish their education, those students will find jobs, because in today's world, a young person's chances of finding a job increase with the number of years of academic training. I think the hon. member should realize that in Canada, we have young people who function quite well, and we should remember that and not focus exclusively on those who do not function well.

I may remind the hon. member, and I am sure he will agree, that youth unemployment has a number of deeply rooted and serious causes, which are connected with the phenomenon of dropping out of school. I think the hon. member will agree that when a young person drops out of high school, that does not help him find a job.

When looking for reasons why students drop out of school, we should not blame the federal government but society as a whole. When we have a society with social problems like poverty—I think everybody here will agree we are going through a recession—when we are in a situation like that, we see problems that are linked to poverty. There is a kind of vicious circle that makes life more difficult for our young people, but there is also the whole problem of the family unit that is under pressure. The hon. member knows as well as I do what those pressures have been like during the past decades, and the family environment is extremely important for young people, to help them persevere with their education.

So we have a problem that is linked to our education system and our training system, and we cannot put the blame exclusively on the federal government. The success of our young people depends on the success of a social partnership. Their success is linked to what the government does and what is done by all the provinces, by business, the unions and social groups. It is too easy to put all the blame on the federal government for the fact that some of our young people fail in their endeavours.

I would like to ask the hon. member—after all, it is easy for him to attack the government and say that 13 or 14 per cent of our young people are out of work—I would like to ask him whether he checked what the youth unemployment rate was in 1984, when his party, when the Liberals were in power? In case he doesn't know the answer, in 1984 youth unemployment was around 18.2 per cent.

Before accusing the government, perhaps the hon. member should look at the record of previous Liberal governments and stop to think before launching his accusations.

[English]

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, not only is the question the hon. member poses valid, but there are two or three other points he touched on I would like to address.

First of all, we keep hearing members of the government coming back to the way things were some seven or eight years ago. How far back do we want to go? Do they want to go back to the depression years and say how terrible the Tories were? Or, do we want to go back to the time of Sir John A. Macdonald? There comes a time in the history of a party when it has to take responsibility for what is going on in the country.

They have been in power now almost seven years. I say that if their economic policies have not begun to work after seven years, then who do we look to? Do we look back 15 or 20 years ago to point the finger? My suggestions are not so much in the form of blaming someone. My suggestions are made so that hopefully they will have a look at what has gone wrong and they will be able to make some corrections.

The member asked also about the native youth. One of my colleagues is to address that during the course of the day. He will be discussing native youth employment issues.

The member also said that there were two ways of looking at it: whether the glass is half full or half empty. He prefers of course to put forth the very rosy vision that everything is going well in this country.

On Saturday I was at a graduation in my riding at Niagara College. I was speaking to the president. There were 1,600 graduates. This graduation took place over a three-day period. Of these 1,600 graduates there are 450 who have jobs. Are they telling me that their economic policies are working when only one in four of these graduates are getting jobs? These are people with hands-on experience. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that whatever your responsibility is surely you should live up to that. Some of the responsibility is with the government; I have no quarrel with that. However, for those things which you can alleviate, which you can in some way correct, then that is what you should be doing.

That is what we are trying to help them with today with our suggestions as to how these things should be done. The hon. minister, in answering a question of mine about two weeks ago, said there is a great program underfoot for youth dropouts.

• (1130)

I wish him and I wish this program well. I am an educator by profession. I taught in the high schools. I know that the dropout problem in Ontario where I worked is very severe, but I suggest with all respect that these problems are not going to be solved by taking us back to 1983 or 1974 or wherever it is. The problems are going to be solved by facing them here and now and by putting programs in place which are going to help our young people rather than simply by us going back and forth and saying that it was done many years ago.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that I think everyone on all sides of the House applauds the concern that the hon. member has shown for youth and youth unemployment. Certainly when you are young and trying to find a job and there are none available it is a crushing experience. Our society measures people by the work they do, so a first and positive experience is extremely necessary.

I would like to ask the member about his view on where we are going. There are two ways of looking at economics, short term and long term, and it strikes me that the member is focusing his concern on a short-term view of our economic problems. His concern is for right now, this summer, the next 90 days or 120 days, and for finding appropriate jobs for students essentially by throwing government money at the problem.

I am wondering if the member could give me some comments on how he feels about the longer term structural solutions. Many of the problems we face today because of high taxation or government restraint have been put into place to address that structural long-term concern of debt reduction.

Does the hon. member feel we should abandon the strides we have made in terms of reducing government expenditure and overhead on a short-term basis in order to solve this problem with more cash? Or, does he feel that the goals, the needs of students in the long term, would be better solved by listening to those other political voices that are saying no, the government still spends too much? The government right now is not showing enough restraint, and we are still going $30 billion a year into debt or $60,000 a minute. Would the member comment, please?

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The hon. member himself is quite an outspoken advocate of tax cuts for the people of Canada. He did mention, if I understood him correctly, that I was interested only in the short term, the next 60 days, the next 90 days.

Nothing could be further from the truth. As a matter of fact, throughout my speech I said repeatedly that what we are looking for are solutions now which will help in the long run. When I talk about our students being able to compete, I suggest to the hon. member that they will not be able to compete if they are forever being thrust to one side. If we listen only to the market forces, if we are going to be dictated to as a nation only by the bottom line and by the almighty dollar sign, then I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all members in this House that we are short-changing our youth. We are not giving them a chance to get an education and we are not giving them a chance to get the tools so that they can compete in today's world.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, before I start I would like to underline the fact that I am pleased with the tone adopted by my hon. colleague in his speech on this very important subject. I do hope this tone will prevail for the rest of the day because we are dealing with a very important subject. I am particularly pleased with two of the suggestions he made in his speech, the first one being that he and I understand his party want to be helpful. Obviously I will be listening throughout today. I hope there are some suggestions that are helpful. I will certainly listen to them very carefully and analyse them even more carefully.

On the other hand, the hon. member also said you have to look at the facts. I think this is also a very important thing that has to be done because some of the facts are there and, if you want to be helpful, you have to start with the facts before you make suggestions.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold for tabling a motion that gives me the opportunity to recount once again the government's efforts to improve the employment situation for young Canadians. I do wonder, however, where the honourable member of the Opposition has been for the past few months, because the wording of his motion suggests to me that he has little knowledge of the scope of our efforts and the tangible results that have been achieved despite the recession we have witnessed this year. In any event, my predecessors and myself like the Minister of Employment and Immigration, those between the ages of 15 and 24 and have gone to considerable lengths to explain the various measures the government has taken to alleviate the problem.

It is important to remember, Mr. Speaker, that the main reason so many young people are currently without jobs or have few prospects for the future is that far too many young people do not complete high school. It is our belief that there are job openings, but not enough qualified people to fill them.

In light of that circumstance, we have chosen to focus our efforts on addressing the drop-out rate and eliminating the problem at the source.

In the 1991-92 fiscal year, we will spend $218 million on programs aimed at young people. Bear in mind, this total is over and above the funding under the Canadian Job Strategy, half of whose clients are young people. While this is a considerable amount, knowing how these funds are to be used is far more important than dwelling on mere numbers.

I would therefore like to describe in detail, Mr. Speaker, those of our initiatives that help young Canadians improve their chances of establishing a place for themselves in the labour market.

[English]

Earlier this year we allocated $143 million to Challenge '91, the summer employment program for students. Despite cutbacks in other areas, the youth program funding was not affected and the Challenge funding saw a modest increase over last year. The Challenge program has been in place for seven years. Its main objective is to encourage employers in all sectors to create rewarding jobs that provide young people with real learning opportunities. The program allows thousands of young Canadians to gain valuable work experience and contribute to the cost of their education. In addition, Challenge offers a wide range of benefits for employers including labour market information, compensation, government subsidy programs and the opportunity to post their job openings.

For young people, students and non-students alike, Challenge offers several different types of assistance. Under the Challenge '91 budget, $80 million will be spent on the summer employment experience development component, or the SEED component as it is known, in the form of wage subsidies to employers who hire students. This option is made up of two elements, one aimed at high school students and the other intended for young people attending college or university. This year, as last, SEED will focus on the creation of jobs that reflect the social priorities of the federal government, namely literacy, the fight against alcoholism and drug abuse, AIDS education, environmental protection and urban crime prevention.

Again this year participating employers have been encouraged to hire members of visible minorities and aboriginal and disabled young people.

I will mention that we expect 55,000 jobs for young people will be created under the Summer Employment Experience Development option of Challenge '91.

[Translation]

Another component of the Challenge program, Mr. Speaker, namely the Work Orientation Workshops, is an undeniable success. The formula combines work orientation workshops with on-the-job experience. Young people learn how to take charge of their own lives and receive practical advice on academic options and other matters.

• (1140)

Last year, 16,000 young people took part in Work Orientation Workshops and, at the current rate, all indications are that we will reach or exceed that number during the summer.

Two months ago, part of the workshops were integrated under the START option of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, which I will describe briefly for you in a few minutes. While they play a vital role, our summer employment programs are only one aspect of what we are doing for young Canadians.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that there is more to making the transition from school to the labour market than finding a rewarding summer job; we have to find more complete solutions designed with the future in mind. This is the specific objective of our second major youth program, the Stay-in-School Initiative.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, all the evidence suggests that preventing students from dropping out is one of the most effective ways of helping young people realize their full potential. We created this initiative to fight an alarming dropout rate of 30 per cent, one of the highest in industrialized countries. However, we believe we can do something to rectify the situation.

Japan, for example, although very different from Canada, experienced similar problems in the 1960s. At one time, approximately 30 per cent of Japanese students were dropping out, but the government took strong action, and now only 4 per cent of young people in Japan fail to complete their high school education.

In Canada, we believe the Stay-in-School initiative will go a long way toward stemming the loss of talent that occurs when students drop out. This project has a budget of $296 million over five years and is made up of three main components: first, employment programs and services aimed at potential dropouts, then mobilization of the players involved in order to find lasting solutions, and finally awareness activities designed to inform Canadians about the consequences of dropping out.

[English]

One of the key phrases when we talk about the stay in school project is mobilization of the players involved because without the commitment of our partners, business people, educators, parents, unions, and young Canadians themselves, we would never attain the important goals we have set.

During the five major round tables held last year for the players involved, we encouraged all who were interested to take an active role in their communities because they, more than anyone else, know the needs of the people in those communities. Our call was certainly heeded as dozens of grassroots projects came into being. This gives us cause to hope for even greater things in the months ahead. By making a solid commitment, our partners in effect broaden the scope of our programs and take concrete actions that translate the principles we have set forward.

I would point out that one of our most outstanding achievements has been the addition of the start option as part of the stay in school initiative to our national program, the Canadian Jobs Strategy. Under the start option, eligible groups can obtain funding to carry out projects aimed at lowering the dropout rate. Ideally, start projects will enable young people to continue their education or set high career goals and at the same time develop in the work place the skills they need to find a job.

The start option opens the door to innovation by such key players as school boards, youth services agencies and Indian bands. All are working toward the same goal: preventing students from dropping out. We cannot ignore the public awareness aspect. When I say public I am referring specifically to employers, teachers, parents, community groups and students—in short, everyone who is involved directly or indirectly with the dropout problem.

The members of this House are probably familiar with the advertising campaign that was carried out earlier this spring in connection with the stay in school initiative. Why did we launch the campaign? Because our studies opened our eyes to the very real fact that Canadians for the most part were unaware of the dropout problem and its consequences.

We know public awareness did grow as a result of the television and newspaper advertisements. We have made a number of other information efforts to complement the public awareness campaign. A newsletter on the stay in school initiative is to be distributed six times a year and, in co-operation with Health and Welfare Canada, a rock group has begun a national tour of 170 schools in 35 cities. At each stop, the band will try to use music to convince students not to use drugs and to stay in school.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our efforts to assist young people were not forgotten when we developed the Labour Force Development Strategy. Funds under the Labour Force Development Strategy have been used to revitalize the Co-operative Education option.

The experts we consulted all agree that this option is an ideal way to introduce young people to the job market. Accordingly, we have made a commitment to increase federal funding for Co-operative Education. The increased funding will enable us to focus more on high school students, as they are the ones most likely to drop out. As with other components of the START option and the Stay-in-School Initiative, Co-operative Education is essentially a joint venture, supported as it is by local school boards. Co-op education reflects perfectly one of our main objectives: helping young people make informed career choices.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about two other initiatives we have undertaken, namely, federal-provincial youth strategies adapted to the needs of New Brunswick and Newfoundland. More than $27 million have been allocated to these strategies. The strategies will be in effect until 1993 and are designed to eliminate the regional disparities that put young people in these two provinces at a disadvantage. We want young people in New Brunswick and Newfoundland to have as much of a chance as other young Canadians to obtain entry level jobs.

Federal and provincial departments, social service agencies and other partners have agreed to work together to better serve young people and give renewed hope to otherwise promising youth in New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

You will note that our youth initiatives are constantly evolving. The programs we have already set up are doing what they were intended to do, but needless to say, we hope to go much further.

Perhaps the member for Welland—St. Catharines-Thorold has forgotten the parts of the Throne Speech that dealt with youth issues. I will gladly refresh his memory.

In its Speech from the Throne, the government stated that economic prosperity is first and foremost a question of human resources and that it is therefore important to reach a national consensus on education and training. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has said so time and again, Mr. Speaker. No attempt will be made to encroach on the provinces' jurisdiction over education. However, it has been our experience that our system of education has not produced the desired results and that the provinces and federal government would do well to work together to achieve Canada-wide goals, Mr. Speaker.

Ensuring that, by year 2000, 90 per cent of Canadians obtain a high school diploma or the equivalent before the age of 25 would probably be a realistic goal. We further propose that measures be taken to double the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, science and engineering. Our ultimate goal is to have everyone consider the need to make a learning culture part of our way of thinking, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we believe that it is truly possible to raise the calibre and relevance of education in Canada, but once again, government has no intention of forcing its partners' hands.

To determine the course we should take, we are relying heavily on the Labour Force Development Board, which just met for the first time. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, the Board is an independent body administered entirely by the private sector, an organization rooted in the industrial, social and economic life of the country.

• (1150)

[English]

The board is guided by a firm desire to establish a training culture. It represents unprecedented co-operation between Employment and Immigration and labour market players, that is employers, workers, educators and social agencies. Because it is now more in tune than ever with social and economic realities, the government is confident of its ability to ensure, through its future action, that more Canadians will have the opportunity to contribute to and reap the full benefit of national prosperity.

As you can see, the options of the Challenge program and the stay in school initiative follow the same basic principles: give young people the skills they need to become productive members of the Canadian labour force. In so doing, we will restore Canada's productivity and competitiveness, two factors that are inextricably linked in this area of constant technological change, where competition means that only the strongest will survive.

We are listening to young people and those who are dedicated to helping them. Yes, we have taken strong and timely action. The government is working to give young Canadians the opportunity to flourish both personally and professionally.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the minister and the comments made by the member moving this particular motion.

I have a question I would like to put to the minister and it relates basically to the comments that he made concerning the relationship between employment, education and training, something that I think is very important. The minister reminded us that it was mentioned in the throne speech and I gather it has been mentioned in a number of throne speeches under this government and the previous government. He also touched on the work that the federal government must do to work with the provinces to ensure that there are opportunities across the country for education and training.

It is an issue I have been pursuing in the House. I hope to have an opportunity to introduce a private member's bill tomorrow in regard to the transfer of funds through cash payments and tax points to the provinces in health areas and in post-secondary education.

The previous Secretary of State could not assure me or the House, in this very important field for training and education of young people, that in fact those funds were spent in that particular area.

Under the current legislation passed by the previous Liberal government, we evolved into this block funding formula. Many people allege in my province of B.C. that the Social Credit government paves highways with health and education money.

I would like to ask the minister if it is the government's view that this block funding approach should continue and, if so, can he assure the House that the funds allocated to the provinces, in particular on post-secondary education, a very important matter, are in fact spent on post-secondary education?

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I want to address the comments and, obviously, the question of my hon. colleague of the NDP. He indicated that he would be tabling a private member's bill sometime tomorrow or during the week. I am looking forward to the input of the hon. member and I will be reading it attentively and eventually react to it, I suppose, like all other members of this House, at the appropriate time. I appreciate the hon. member's question and the angle he is taking with respect to the question, i.e., money transferred from the federal government to the provinces and what the provinces may or may not do with it. I understand the nuance.

I want to bring the hon. member to another way of looking at the situation and that is the education situation in general. We have a basic and fundamental problem with respect to education in this country, when at the high school level there is a 30 per cent drop-out rate. That represents about 100,000 high school students per year who drop out of school.

My hon. friend is sort of aiming at the post-secondary level, which is very important, there is no question about that, but before these students can get to the post-secondary level, they also have to go through high school. When there is a 30 per cent dropout situation in Canada right now, there is a fundamental problem, which is not just the federal government's problem, but it is a Canadian problem and deals with as much the provincial and/or other governments in Canada, that have their own responsibilities with respect to education.

As we have indicated many times before, we do not intend to infringe on provincial jurisdictions with respect to education. That being said, we have a problem with education. All governments and all interested parties have to get together and find a way to resolve this very crucial and important situation with respect to high school student dropouts. That is exactly what we are trying to do on the one hand with our stay in school initiative and also by opening the door to some very important discussions with the other responsible jurisdictions with respect to education in Canada so that we can find a solution and get to the root of the problem. It seems to be at the high school level where there is a 30 per cent dropout rate. Consequently, when those students do not drop out of school they will be in post-secondary education.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister who seems genuinely concerned with this issue that concerns us as well.

The minister said, in his remarks as well as in the Speech from the Throne, that economic prosperity is first and foremost an issue of people. I would like to ask the minister how his program, which includes a rather innovative strategy and which certainly provides important funds, since he referred to an amount of $296 million, how this policy will be implemented or adapted to the education policies in Quebec? I would also like to ask the minister if he could elaborate on the criteria that will be used for the allocation of those funds?

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the question asked by my honourable colleague. The problem to which she alludes is one which undoubtedly affects all the members of this House, and not only myself or the members that have spoken until now.

We are faced with a fundamental problem. In the Speech from the Throne, we referred, of course, to human resources and I think that my honourable colleague from the opposition has also emphasized, earlier, the fact that the lack of competitiveness, among other factors, is of course directly linked to the human resources available here in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that the 26 million Canadians that make up our relatively small population, compared to that of our neighbor, are, by and large, very resourceful. Given the proper tools, Canadians will continue to be competitive and to be able to compete with any country in the world. Indeed, we have the resources, as well as the resourcefulness that I just mentioned.

However, we must make sure that this resourcefulness of our human resources, notably our young people in school, is being promoted and supported. Mr. Speaker, when we are faced with a 30 per cent drop out rate, which amounts to 100 000 students dropping out in Canada, there is a fundamental problem which is not only a federal problem: It is a Canadian problem that all jurisdictions and interested parties must look at in order to find a solution at the first level, that is at the high school level.

So, Mr. Speaker, while all recognize education to be a fundamentally provincial responsibility, and while it is out of the question, for the federal government, to get involved in this field, we simply cannot ignore the problem.

So, our program is aimed at helping those young people stay in school, at analysing their situation, supporting them, and providing the tools that they need to stay in school, because dropping out is not the solution. It may be a popular solution in the short term and in the eyes of other dropouts, Mr. Speaker, but once again experience has thought us that dropping out is not a long term solution. People who drop out not only find it increasingly difficult, as the years go by, to find work: It also becomes harder for them to keep a job because technology improves and the world evolves, which makes it all the more difficult for the dropout to catch up.

So, Mr. Speaker, the solution is in dealing with the problem at its roots and avoiding having students drop out of school.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not wish to take away from the time of my colleague to the extreme left who will be speaking on debate. I just want to draw to the attention of the Chair that, under the provisions of Standing Order 43(2), for the remaining speakers from our party and for the remainder of the day we wish to divide our time equally.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, once more we are hearing the rhetoric about the importance of education, about the technological society and about creating a knowledge based economy in Canada. We are hearing all of the good words. What this debate is all about in the final analysis on the government side is words, words, words without substance.

It was back in February that the previous Minister of State for Youth had to suffer through the embarrassment of convening a press conference to announce the increase in funding in the Challenge program, particularly the SEED program, that this minister referred to in Question Period last week when he asserted: "No, there has been no decrease in student funding. There has indeed been an increase in student funding".

I suppose it is a question of interpretation. Let us first of all look back upon the last round of announcements with respect to the Challenge program. What we will find is that the SEED program was cut from $118 million to $77 million. This huge increase, bragged about by the hon. minister back in February in his former guise and now in the minister's present guise, amounted to $3 million.

The amount for the SEED program was increased from $77 million to $80 million, roughly a 4 per cent increase, a considerable degree smaller than the increase in the cost of living. It is a typical kind of performance by the government to claim that there have been funding increases when in fact in terms of real dollars there have been no funding increases.

If we look back just a little further, we will find that when this government came into office it decreased from the very outset the amount of money available to students.

However, what is so shameful about the February announcement is that even back in February it was possible to predict exactly what has occurred now, and that is that the unemployment rate among those defined as youth has hit the level of almost 16 per cent. We have had steadily increasing rates of unemployment in the over-all population exceeding 10 per cent since before February, and anybody who has made any attempt to relate the pattern of unemployment among youth with over-all unemployment will have discovered that by the time this is over the rate of unemployment among youth will double that of the adult rate.

This government had plenty of warning, lots of warning, that there was going to be the kind of situation that has been produced now, a situation in which the reality is that a lot of students are simply not going to get jobs. If all the students were former ministers of state for finance and trade, perhaps they could get jobs in the summer. Patronage might apply to them or something of the sort might provide them jobs. In other words, what we have is a situation on the other side where there has been a consistent disregard for the real situation among young people.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that in previous debates on the Challenge program we expressed some considerable concern about the change in proportions of Challenge to the SEED program that was being used to fund jobs in industry and in the business area, the profit area, as compared to the non-profit area. I am saying that now it is to cite the fact that federal funding can create a lot more jobs, even in a recession, if it addresses the needs that have been created by this government in its recession among non-profit organizations which are trying to serve the communities affected by the recession, the unemployment and the hopelessness that have been created by this government.

We heard the hon. Minister of State for Youth talking about how terrible it was that 30 per cent of kids drop out of school in Canada. And it is a terrible thing. However, I do not know how he can stand there and say it is a terrible thing and yet create a situation where the dropout rate is going to increase because of kids not being able to fund their way back into school next fall. He did not say anything about the dropout rate that is going to be caused among the colleges and universities, among students who will not be able to get jobs this summer. He did not say anything about the cutbacks in transfer payments to the post-secondary domain which have increased the pressure on tuition rates right across the country. Nor did he say anything about the GST that makes books more expensive. Nor did he say anything about the surcharge on student loans.

He did not say anything that was helpful to students. He did not say anything that was consistent with this rhetoric that this government has adopted about education. He did not say anything that would help students, as I think by now students can be confident will never be forthcoming. This government will not take on its responsibility.

The motion before us is a good one that my party will most certainly support. It says:

> That this House call upon the government to implement immediate measures to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment among Canadian youth.

Something should have been done a long time ago.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I just heard this gentleman here who purports to be the Minister of State for Finance. I am sure he is going to drag every bug and fly into his empty skull if he opens his mouth too much, particularly when he insists in this House in broadcasting flat out lies. I think his problem is that he hates to hear the truth. This, after all, was the arrogant minister who stood in this House and said that any students can get jobs when they want to.

I want to tell this minister on behalf of the students for whom he claims to speak that he speaks not a word for them any more than the rest of his government speaks for them. The issue is the sanctimonious behaviour of this government, which insists on going along its way in complete disregard to the needs of real people.

This country is being torn apart by the insensitivity of this government. Its future is being threatened by the insensitivity of this government. Its youth is being sacrificed as a result of the insensitivity of this government, and from the Minister of State for Finance the youth is being insulted by the insensitivity of this government.

The claim that is laid here before this House with respect to this motion is a relatively simple one: "Go back and re-examine", it says to the government, "what it is doing faced with a crisis of youth unemployment". It says that this government should attempt to do what it can to make it possible for young people to get jobs this summer.

The situation can be dramatized in terms of statistics. Among the larger employers of students we have IBM which hired 875 students last summer. It will only hire 760 this year. Bell Canada, which hired 1,195 students last year, will hire only 500 this year.

The fact is that now we have a situation in which not only has government cut its funding for the creation of youth employment. We have an ever increasing pressure on the jobs that have been in the past available to students by the great mass of adults trying to seek jobs.

For example, in the city of Windsor where quite a number of student jobs are created by the municipal government, they have had to concede that some jobs formerly designated for students must now go in a certain proportion to the adult unemployed.

In Windsor—I guess I would have to choose to cite Windsor as a typical example of a city that has benefited from this government's policies—no retail store jobs are going to be available this summer because one-third of them have already closed. We have none of those usual jobs being produced in the tourism area in Windsor that would normally be produced to allow students to get jobs in the summer.

Our position is very simple. At the very least, this government should return to a level of funding for the Challenge program equivalent to what it was the year before last, before it savaged it in 1989. It should provide $140 million for the SEED program and commensurately increase the over-all funding for the Challenge program so that those kids who are just leaving high school will also have an opportunity to get jobs.

There has been, within the context of this debate about youth unemployment, some debate about the question of education. The Minister of State for Youth chose in this debate about jobs for youth, for students, to talk about this government's promises in the throne speech to achieve certain goals: the elimination of illiteracy, an increase in the number of graduates in science and engineering, to double the number of workers who have access to training and so on. Then arose, as always has arisen, the debate about jurisdictional problems. This is not a debate about education, as such. It is a debate about how kids have to have money in their pocket to continue their education.

I think it is important to say a few words in the context of this over-all debate, which seen from a certain perspective is: How do you encourage kids to continue in school? Apart from the question of how much financing is available, we have the question of the character of what is going to be accessible to them in terms of training and education. I will simply say what I have said before, there is no jurisdictional problem for the proper exercise of leadership within the context of a full recognition that those jurisdictional problems do exist.

Jurisdiction has been used before as an excuse for doing nothing. My fear is that it will continue to be used as an excuse for doing nothing, to the further detriment of that economic future that all claim Canada must pursue.

I just want to say some final words about the question of student aid. As I indicated earlier, rather than finding creative ways to increase the funding assistance available to students, the government instead imposed a 3 per cent surcharge on student loans, when what is really needed are general improvements in the program.

On the weekend I was talking to representatives of part-time students who have been petitioning this government and the government before it repeatedly, so that part-time students will have the benefit of the same kind of financial aid that is available to full-time students. This is an important consideration because one of the circumstances is what this government has done to student employment opportunities. There are going to be increasing numbers of part-time students. Those students should have access to same quality of education with the same kind of support available to them as do the full-time students.

I ask this government to do one other thing in addition to increasing funding in the Challenge program and that is to get busy on the issue of student aid.

We have had committees and we have had promises and we have had nothing done. It is about time something was done in the area of the student loan program to ensure that there will be access for part-time students on the same basis as other students.

As long as we have the situation we have at hand where students cannot get summer jobs, we are going to have a real problem in encouraging people in the part-time sphere and they too, of course, will need jobs that in the present circumstances of a recession may not be available to them.

Therefore, in closing, I must confess some fatigue in repeating a debate that has been repeated so often in this House within the context of complete disregard of a problem that has so characterized this government. There is a need, a real need among students to be able to find jobs, not handouts, in order to continue their education.

The unemployment rate has become worse. It is practically as bad now as it was during the peak of the last recession, 16 per cent versus 17 per cent. This government needs to take initiatives to make more funding available so those students can work. It needs to re-examine its actions that have increased the costs for education. It has to look at what it has done to the university system and the college system and so on, that has made post-secondary education less accessible and less valuable than it was in the past.

Let us then put some substance into their expression of concern that we need to do so much to create a knowledge based society. Let us give real access to that knowledge to the students. Let us give them jobs. Let us give them institutions where they can learn. Let us take the necessary initiatives in education where this government and other governments have refused to undertake. Let us really commit ourselves to creating the knowledge based society that will provide a standard of living in Canada that Canada must have and which will support the social programs that some must have.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, youth has been the main topic this morning. We are all aware that young people are experiencing some very serious problems in our society. I say society, because this is a responsibility that must be shouldered by society as a whole, by all three levels of government, the private sector and the unions, and because we have a society in which values have changed. Families are becoming increasingly divided. As a result, our young people are demotivated, but nevertheless, the government has launched some very attractive programs for these young people. We also understand why members opposite want us to focus on better programs for high school graduates.

• (1220)

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair whether he could explain why the NDP government in Ontario decided to drop the Ontario Scholars Program, since these scholarships for Grade 13 students who maintain an average of 80 per cent cost only $2 million.

I would appreciate the hon. member's comments, considering the provincial governments' responsibility in this area.

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I do not like it. That is the simple answer. I would try to understand it and would hope that if the money were to be diverted to some educational program, it would benefit perhaps low income students who achieved a reasonable academic level, I would like it. But on the basis of what I know about it I do not like it.

My concern about education is not because I am a New Democrat and it is not because I am not a Progressive Conservative. It is because I feel strongly that education and knowledge is fundamental to our future economy, it is fundamental to opportunity and it is fundamental to a reasonable level of education.

I would ask the hon. member, who stood up in her preamble to her question to me citing these wonderful programs that the government has initiated to tell me one. Perhaps she means the work experience program which the government adopted from a New Democratic document. That is one that I can think of.

I do not know of any initiatives in education that can be expressed as particularly—oh, perhaps she is talking about the scholarships for science students, except that they do not just go to science students, but that was a good initiative. I say so and I say so clearly. It is not enough. There should be no higher priority in this country than the education and training of our people and the elimination of illiteracy. Therein lies the basis for the economic survival of our country.

So I will be consistent about that. I see no partisan issue involved in that. I wish that we could depart from our party labels and look at this in the context of common sense. In fact, in terms of the debate that we are engaged in now, the only issue of common sense is the question of how we are going to put those kids who are not working this summer back to work and what the government should do within that context.

I say the government should put the money back into the Challenge program that it took out of the Challenge program.

[Translation]

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair was saying, but what does it all boil down to? Is he saying all this just for the sake of making a long speech, to fight a battle that does not make sense, since he knows perfectly well this government provides GST tax credits to help all these families? Nearly 9 million people receive GST credits. This money can be used to pay for books and haircuts and for just about everything, and they receive quite a bit.

Would the hon. member, without necessarily giving a thirty-minute speech, comment on this?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to describe a single thing this government has done to help Canadians and especially needy Canadians. This government has divided our country, created a recession, and put the city of Windsor in a very critical position.

It is irresponsible of the hon. member to rise in the House and say that the government is acting to help the Canadian people. It is unacceptable because it is not true.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair is more concerned about his performance in the House than about substance.

Earlier, he said that the minister's speech was all words and no substance. I beg to disagree. The minister's speech was most interesting, because he identified all the programs the government has introduced, with the various types of funding to help our young people achieve their potential.

So before talking off the top of his head, perhaps the hon. member should listen to what the government says and consider the commitments it has made. We are aware of our responsibility to Canadian youth and act accordingly.

My question to the hon. member is this: He knows perfectly well that the Speech from the Throne emphasized—he said so himself that illiteracy was a major problem in this country—so does he admit that in the Speech from the Throne, the government made fighting illiteracy a priority? Our objective is to make sure that at least 90 per cent of our young people are able to get a high school diploma. We want 90 per cent of our young students to graduate from high school. Does he agree with those objectives?

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the member says I am concerned about my performance in the House while giving speeches which, I must assume, is a message that the performance has been good. A good performance convinces nobody. Let me respond to the question.

The answer is that his government has not stated any goals at all. The government has not stated any goals at all. If the government had a goal of eliminating illiteracy, if the government had a goal of doubling the number of science graduates, if the government had a goal of increasing the number of workers who achieve a level of training by twice, I would be solidly in favour of those goals. But this government does not have goals. Remember the goal of the Prime Minister that this government should achieve a rate of expenditure on science and technology of 2.5 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product. That was not stated as a goal and therefore it was not achieved.

When this government states goals rather than promises, and therefore understands that a goal must have a mechanism, a strategy for its achievement, then I will be very enthusiastic. But this is strictly sheer trickery just as was the Prime Minister's promise with respect to R and D. This is trickery with respect to education.

If those were goals I would accept them, but those are not goals, those are empty promises like jobs, jobs, jobs.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating a very important issue to this nation, youth unemployment. It is important, may I add, for many reasons, however, because this summer our young people are faced with an increasing unemployment rate among youth that stands at a devastating 16.6 per cent.

This is a very important debate because we have young people in this nation today who are demoralized and frustrated with their present situation.

What is equally important is that we begin to analyse the response presented to these young people by this government. The government response was basically that in its SEED program in 1985 it contributed $149 million, while in 1991, $80 million.

This comes at a time when this government has decided to take on a challenge, to speak to the issue of global competitiveness and speak to the creation of a so-called learning society. However, I wonder at times whether this government really understands the meaning of global competition because it seems to me that its answer to creating a globally competitive society is to tell young people to stay at home. Obviously the reality is otherwise.

I think the word competitiveness has entered the vocabulary of this government. Perhaps some media guru is telling the government it is a vogue word, a word used in Europe many years ago and a word acted on many years ago.

I think there is a fundamental problem with this government in understanding how a globally competitive society is achieved. It is not achieved by cutting resources like training and education in the field of human resources, nor by cutting research and development, science and technology. Obviously it has not been able to develop a global competitive society in this area and in many other areas including that of taxation.

The government has responded with cuts and by alienating a very important group of individuals in this society, namely our youth, who are already faced with higher tuition fees, an increasing debt load, spiralling education costs, and now no jobs this summer. What is important is to have not just a job, but a job that at least can cover the costs of tuition fees. It is not enough to have just a job that the government side can use as a statistic. A young Canadian must have a job that covers food, rent, and transportation to make it possible to have an opportunity for post-secondary education.

The question many young people have been asking themselves is: Does this government really care about young people? I think what really describes the type of interest shown by this government toward young people is in the statement made by the junior finance minister last Tuesday in response to the question from my leader on a call for action on youth unemployment. He stated that if young people would look hard enough they would find jobs. The minister is telling the close to 20 per cent of young people in Newfoundland that they cannot find work because they are not looking hard enough.

He is telling the 16.3 per cent in Prince Edward Island that they cannot find work because they are not looking hard enough. I am telling you that those young people are looking for work and they simply cannot find it because it is not there.

It is not there for two reasons. It is not there because this government's economic mismanagement has not created jobs in the private sector, nor has this government aided students during this summer of discontent. As a matter of fact, it continues to cut and block the major artery to Canada's future, our young people.

This is unbelievable, but I can tell you it is not surprising because this government has a track record on alienating Canada's youth. It has continued a direct attack on students. Look at the statistics on transfer payments to the provinces. In 1986 the government passed Bill C-96 which reduced the growth rate of transfer payments to the provinces by 2 per cent. The portion of financing for post-secondary education that was to be cut amounted to $1.6 billion. This is the type of help that this government has been giving students in Canada. There was a further cut of 1 per cent in 1990-1991.

This comes at a time when there exists a new global reality. The relative economic strength of a nation is often measured by the way the young people are trained and educated. We live in a fast moving world where there are many challenges. There are technological advancements. There is more information every day, every minute, from fax machines. It becomes important to train these people if we want to be able to compete. It is about time that this government realizes that it is not going to happen by chance. You must plan and you must plan correctly. You do not plan the future of a nation by continuous cuts to the very fabric that represents its future.

I am sure the minister will hide behind the WALL program and the stay in school program, but let it be known for the record that these might be new programs but certainly no new funding was allocated to these programs. It has taken away from post-secondary students, given to high school students, and pitted two needy groups of our society against each other. This is the type of politics we see day in and day out from the government opposite.

Canadians, our young people, are tired of being misled and tired of the type of approach this government has taken. I join the Liberal Party of Canada in bringing forth the points I have mentioned and those points so eloquently stated by the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold. We want to make sure that this government will find within itself the intelligence, the caring and compassion necessary to bring about the type of employment situation for young Canadians so that once again they can be proud citizens of this nation and take on and get ready for the challenges of the 21st century.

• (1240)

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is demanding that the federal government deal with the high rate of unemployment amongst Canadian youth. I would like to mention to him five programs within the Canadian Jobs Strategy which are designed to help young people find a first job or keep the one they have.

There is the Job Development Program, where $107.2 million go to young people. The Job Entry Program which gives $139.3 million to young people only. The Skill Shortages Program, $97.6 million. The Skills Investment Program, $8.4 million. The Community Futures Program, $6.7 million also for young people.

I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member is willing to recognize these figures or whether he will tell us that these programs are not meant for young people, when the fact is that 46.4 per cent of the 400,000 participants to the Canadian Jobs Strategy are young people. Consequently, $487 million out of a budget of $1.7 billion are used for training young people and helping them find a job. I ask the hon. member to comment on our programs.

[English]

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question posed by the hon. member. However, today we are speaking to a reality that perhaps can be best described in and by the title of Lila Sarick's article, I believe it was in The Globe and Mail of June 4, Thirsting for Employment in the Summer Job Drought:

> The search is on for career related work, but students are finding their prospects bleak as many companies have cut the numbers they hire.

Obviously, we are also aware of the cuts made by this government.

There is myth and then there is reality. Obviously, the programs that the government has introduced are not working, simply because we have a high unemployment rate among youth. It is a fact that you and I cannot dispute. I do not think that 16.6 per cent at a time when this government wants to compete globally is fair. Nor do I think it is something that this particular government would wish on young people.

Unfortunately, as a direct result of this government's policies, we are faced with a youth unemployment crisis. It is for this reason that this party has allocated today to address the issue. I hope the words and proposals made on this side of the House are answered by the government and acted upon simply because this is no humourous situation. It is very serious when a government in a Speech from the Throne speaks to global competitiveness, speaks to a learning society, but does exactly the opposite when it comes to financial commitment.

The reality is that if the government does not commit funds and does not give what is required to carry out the proposals that we have heard in the Speech from the Throne, it is not going to happen.

I am speaking to this government to kindly urge its leadership to act on the words that are cited in the Speech from the Throne and not use them as mere references. There is a generation of Canadians waiting for this government's actions, a generation that is going to spell out whether or not Canada will succeed globally.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in this debate.

In doing so, I wish to congratulate my colleague from Welland—St. Catharines and, of course, the hon. member for York North for initiating this particular debate on subject matter which is of great importance to young Canadians and also to many families across this country.

I enter this debate and wish to espouse the views of my constituents who are students at the University College of Cape Breton, and who may be students at Riverview High School, Glace Bay High School, Breton Education Centre in the town of New Waterford, MacDonald High School in the town of Dominion, Reserve District High in Reserve Mines, Duncan High School in Duncan and St. Peter's in Richmond County.

I have listened quite attentively to the remarks made by my colleagues on this side of the House, and equally so to the comments which have been made by members opposite. It should be noted that student unemployment in my province is roughly 16 per cent and growing. I suggest to the Chair that in my area of the province it has perhaps doubled 16 per cent.

We have had a proliferation of closings, shutdowns, and the erosion of national institutions. As a result, numerous jobs have gone by the wayside leaving families, some young, some middle-aged, some not so young, in a very difficult economic situation. That has exacerbated the situation for young Canadians in my constituency.

Just on the weekend, Friday afternoon when the House was closed, I was in my riding and met with numerous young persons regarding the lack of summer employment opportunities.

On Saturday, I went to local shopping malls in a couple of communities and, of course, I was bombarded by individuals. They were asking, on behalf of their sons and daughters, if there were any particular programs with additional funding from the Government of Canada to assist young people obtain summer employment. In many instances, this summer employment is needed to help pursue post-secondary studies and/or some form of training in the fall.

The reality is that the opportunities are non-existent. There are some communities across this country where opportunities do exist, but I suggest that in the slower economic growth areas, those opportunities for young people just do not exist.

Many of them, much perhaps to the chagrin of the Minister of State for Finance, are working very hard and diligently to try to obtain some form of employment. Whether it be six weeks on a grant or ten weeks filling in for someone, they are all attempting to obtain some form of employment in order to generate sufficient funds to pursue their education.

It does not stop there. I want to cite an example of what has happened in parts of my riding. A young lady who graduated from high school with superb marks went on to university and was successful in obtaining several scholarships. Her father and mother were not members of the bar or in the medical profession, but were average middle-class Canadians.

The policy of this administration, however, is that it taxes the scholarship.

• (1250)

For those who may be viewing this morning and this afternoon's debate, taxing the scholarship may not mean much in the whole scheme of things. However, when one has a relatively fixed income and, over and above that, has worked hard to attain a certain academic standard, it is difficult to proceed onward when you find out at the end of the day that you are going to be taxed because you worked hard. Yes, you are a student, you have done academically well, but the government is still going to tax you. This seems not to be very progressive thinking on the part of the nation's legislators.

Again, this is another example of the administration's activity with regard to youth and youth opportunities.

It has been mentioned many times in this House that there are many barriers in this country from province to province. In many provinces if one were to pursue a post-secondary education outside one's province, one could not qualify for a bursary.

Members may say: "Well, why does that student not stay in his or her own province and obtain the same type of degree that can be offered in other parts of the country?" The fact of the matter is that in many instances part of the educational process would be to go to McGill or Laval to acquire knowledge not only for academic purposes but also for the cultural and socio-economic status of that particular region. The hon. member makes a very disparaging remark on what I believe to be a very important subject matter. The hon. member will have her opportunity to express her view and I hope she will have the courtesy to give me my opportunity to express my view.

The fact of the matter is is that there are thousands and thousands of young Canadians who wish to go outside their province to pursue post-secondary education only to find that they are limited by the amount of money their province will provide in bursaries.

Those two factors, coupled with the fact that young people have no job opportunities, make their situation even more bleak. I called upon, and I call upon again, the minister responsible to provide the necessary funding to assist, in difficult times, those students seeking meaningful employment who wish to pursue post-secondary education as well as training and other forms of improving upon their job-related skills.

It is particularly difficult when talking to students graduating from Riverview High School, Glace Bay High School or Breton Education Centre to say: "Yes, continue on" when they cannot even get a summer job for 10 or 12 weeks. Surely to God there is an obligation on the part of the government of this country, in the kind of political situation we are in at the present time, to put its shoulder to the wheel and come up with creative and innovative programs to assist young people, not next summer or the summer after but this summer.

There are young people who live in small communities of 300 or 400 people, such as South Bar or on a reserve which is a little bit bigger. Surely there is an obligation upon legislators of the national Parliament to set an example and to provide some semblance of hope to these young people.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating that I have one or two moments left. Let me say, through you, to the members opposite, it is not tough medicine to say to young people: "Do it on your own", when in point of fact, there are no opportunities out there in the public sector or the private sector.

Surely the tough medicine for a government to bear at this difficult economic and political time in our country is to say: "Hey, let us bite the bullet here. Let us provide some hope. Let us provide the necessary funding. Let us assist young people across this country. Let us mobilize that talent, that spirit." I suggest to hon. members opposite that this will add greatly to the esprit de corps that we need in this country. More important, it will provide young people with a sense of hope, dignity and fairness to know that the Government of Canada, their national legislators do, in fact, care about them.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I just have a brief question to my colleague.

As he knows, the funding was increased, albeit a small amount. I do not think any of us are happy. We would all like to have more funding in our ridings to assure young people of more jobs. Under the economic circumstances, an increase of some $3 million was all that was able to be funded.

He is suggesting additional funding. Could he tell us what he is suggesting as an amount of increase in the budget this year? Where might he suggest it be taken from?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister has asked a specific question in terms of the amount. He has asked a specific question in terms of where the money might come from.

I suggest that the minister might wish to be creative in terms of the levers he has at his disposal and to initiate the assistance of provincial governments. Perhaps, one avenue is to provide the incentive for provincial governments also to share. I do not believe it is the sole responsibility of the national government. But if provincial governments had some incentive to ignite additional funding, such as in the example set by the federal government, much of what I am referring to, particularly at this time, could be forthcoming. It may be a 50 per cent increase and 50 per cent by the provinces.

The hon. member has heard comments from our critic responsible for youth in terms of restoring the levels of the past. The hon. minister must keep in mind that the conditions are quite different from what they were in 1986, 1987 and 1988, when the economy was much stronger. I am sure the minister would understand it would only be prudent and wise that when the economy is down, additional funding be made available for students for that particular year.

In terms of where the money can come from, the minister is probably much better aware than most members on this side of the floor as to where measures can be restrained in terms of their expenditure. I think, of course, of financing which goes out to the tune of billions of dollars on an annual basis to the private sector for grants and various subsidies. I am not suggesting that we cut them off completely.

Mr. McDermid: Whose riding gets the bulk of it?

Mr. Dingwall: The minister has made a point. Let me finish. I would like to debate that with the minister. The fact of the matter is that there are funds within the system, the present system, that the minister could re-allocate to this particular program in order to assist students.

The minister made a disparaging remark when he alluded to which riding gets all of those subsidies now under the present programs. There is no question that some of those subsidies for private sectors have accrued in my particular constituency. I do not doubt that and I do not dispute that.

An hon. member: Why should you?

Mr. Dingwall: But the hon. minister cannot sit there like a Cheshire cat and say to members on this side of the House: "No, no subsidies have come to my riding." That would be a denial of history. It would be a denial of Sir John A. Macdonald's policy as it relates to the protection given to the province of Ontario at the expense of other regions of this country. Do not get, shall we say, perplexed when members on this side of the floor say: Hey, we have exceptionally high unemployment in our regions. We are asking the Government of Canada to show leadership.

• (1300)

We are asking it to invite the participation of the provincial governments and the municipalities, as well as the private sector, and to initiate new programs which will assist young people this year. It is fundamental to providing some sense of hope, decency and dignity for the young people of this country, and I would hope the minister would support that.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today to respond to the motion moved by the hon. member concerning the action taken by our government in order to reduce the unemployment rate among young Canadians. I totally agree with my hon. colleague that we need to do everything in our power to help young Canadians find a job. And I would like to specifically address the situation of our youth in the Montreal area.

Since its first election in 1984, our government has worked hard to encourage young Canadians to pursue their studies, to realize their full academic potential and, once they graduated, to find a motivating job that would represent their contribution to Canadian productivity.

Of course, the hon. member knows, as we all know, that the present economic situation is difficult, not only in Canada, but in all industrialized countries. Despite that, our youth show initiative and, far from getting discouraged, they show entrepreneurship, which will certainly have the effect of raising the standard of living of Canadians during the present decade and even during the twenty-first century.

Our government does all it can to support their efforts. Indeed, it is the seventh summer that we put in place the Challenge Program, which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of State for Youth and whose aim is to encourage employers to create interesting summer jobs for young people. The future of young Canadians is at the forefront of government priorities. I believe we have proved it when we announced this year that $143 million would go into the Challenge Program 91. That is $3 million more than in last year's budget.

Also, of these $143 million, $28.3 million will go to Challenge 91 for Quebec. Let me explain to the hon. member the components of that program. One of the components of the Challenge Program is called Summer Employment Experience Development (SEED). It assists employers by giving them salary subsidies that will allow them to create jobs for secondary school, college and university students, but especially for secondary school students who have more difficulty than others to find a job.

The hon. member will be happy to learn that in the Montreal area, last summer, our government spent more than $4 million under this component and, more precisely, that 2,655 students participated in 1,146 projects over-all, which allowed them to receive a valuable training while earning money to continue their education.

I am pleased to tell the hon. member that this year again, the SEED component will encourage the creation of job opportunities conforming to government social priorities in the areas of literacy, drug and alcohol abuse, information on AIDS, environment, and urban crime.

Moreover, the funding of SEED this year is aimed at encouraging employers to hire visible minorities, natives and young handicapped.

In Quebec, the funds allocated to this program will be increased this summer from $17.8 million to $18.1 million. My hon. friend will certainly understand that summer has just started and that we do not quite know yet how many students from Montreal schools will participate in this program. There is ground to believe that this component of Challenge 91 will have as much success as in previous summers.

The Challenge program includes also a component called Work Orientation Workshops that gives high school dropouts an opportunity to reconsider their decision to not complete their education. These workshops are accompanied by an on-the-job experience aimed at encouraging dropout students to go back to school or, if they do not want to, to receive a practical training. More precisely, these workshops teach life dynamics, personal financial management, the operation of companies, and so on. These workshops help young people to understand what training and studies they will need to get in the labour market, where jobs require more and more skills and are more specialized.

I am pleased to be able to tell my honourable colleague, that as of the summer of 1990, the government had given the Montreal area more than $2 million through the Work Orientation Workshops, and 1,000 area students took part in them. For instance, on the South Shore only, $920,000 were spent on 467 participants.

This summer, the Quebec component of the Work Orientation Workshops will receive a total of $8.1 million, over and above a supplementary $2.1 million for year-round projects.

On May 9th, the Minister of State for Youth officially opened for the summer the 94 Canada Employment Centres for Students that are to be found in Quebec. Four of these centres are in the Montreal area. I can assure my honourable colleague that employees in these centres know full well how hard it is for young people in Montreal to find a job and that they use all their skills to help them.

As I was saying a while ago, everyone here knows that the whole world is going through very difficult economic times. Nevertheless, I am sure that the members of this House will recognize that the situation would be far worse for young Canadians were it not for the efficient assistance programs brought forth by this government. I am not only talking about the conponents of Challenge '91 I have just mentioned, but also about a few others such as the Student Business Loans Program which is administered by the Federal Business Development Bank and assits student entrepreneurs who wish to create their own summer jobs.

Last year in Quebec, 276 loans were approved for a total of $688,700 which led to the creation of 918 summer jobs. This is a sizeable increase of 72 per cent compared with the number of jobs created the previous year. And this year, this component has an over-all operating budget of $900,000. Moreover, we will grant $805,000 more for the Business Drive for Jobs component under which business associations are encouraged to create summer jobs for students within the business community without the help of salary subsidies.

We have also established the Native probationers Program which is offered during the summer and give native students the oppurtunity to work in Employment and Immigration offices.

Mr. Speaker, by taking advantage of Challenge '91 Program, employers in Montreal and across Canada will have a unique opportunity to raise the potential of our future Canadian labour force. For students, as for other young people, the Challenge' 91 components meet a periode range of employment needs including help for students who want to start a business and counselling to younger students who hesitate between staying in school and joining the work force.

Our action is an attempt at helping young people from Montreal and from all over the country, choose between their staying in school or going into the labour market. Our programs are intented to prepare our youths for employment. However, we should never go so far as to tell our young people to get a job instead of finishing school. That is why our government implemented its stay-in-school initiative in February 1990. Over five years, this project should receive $296 million. There is an alarming 30 per cent drop-out rate in Canada at the high school level. That rate could well be the highest in all of the industrialized world. My hon. colleague will recognize, I am sure, that this figure has to be checked.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that, by the year 2000, for two thirds of all new jobs, candidates will be required to have at least a high school diploma and, in many cases, five years of post-secondary schooling.

Students who drop out of school will earn much less than those with a high school degree and will have a much harder time finding and keeping a job. School drop-outs will be unemployed for longer periods of time than other workers. Either they will have to accept low-paid, low-skill jobs or make do with unemployment or some other type of income support. We must not let such a thing happen, and this government is committed to do everything possible to help youths in Montreal and across the country develop their intellectual potential.

Of course, we know that lack of education is an obstacle, and not only on a personal level. It can also translate into a much heavier burden on public assistance programs during a severe recession as the one we are experiencing now.

We must also ask ourselves what will happen if the dropout rate remains at 30 per cent. Who will fill the new jobs requiring sound training if we do not have a sufficient number of skilled workers to fill these jobs? How will Canada compete in the rapidly growing global economy?

The Stay-in-School project not only enhances access to well-paying jobs for a lifetime, it helps youths to accede to a better quality life. It gets us wondering: who should help defining these problems and finding solutions?

The answer lies in the three components of the project, that is programs and services related to labour market and geared to students at risk of dropping out of school, mobilization of stakeholders in order to find solutions, and public awareness activities to inform Canadians on the consequences of the current dropout rate.

Of course, education comes under the responsibility of the provinces, and we fully respect their prerogative in that area. However, my honourable colleague will surely agree with me that the long term consequences of dropout could affect the whole economy of this country, and that, to curb the problem, we have to combine our efforts on a national level.

That is why we call upon all those affected by this problem: parents, union leaders, social groups, young Canadians, business people and teachers. We need the opinion of all those involved because they know better than we do the problems affecting their communities.

During the last fiscal year, we added to the Stay-in-School project a new component called Start Option. It is a $16 million program that gives financial assistance for projects aimed at young people from 12 to 18 years of age.

Start Option is financed through the Job Entry Program of the Canadian Job Strategy and offers considerable flexibility. It allows organizations which qualify for the program, such as school boards, Indian bands and youth-oriented organizations, to receive funds in order to encourage young people to stay in school.

In the same vein, I have the pleasure to be able to point to my hon. colleague that, during the last fiscal year, Quebec joined the Stay-in-School project. A total of $1.5 million, including $153,000 for the mobilization of stake-holders will be spent in Quebec under Start Option.

For example, last summer, in Montreal, ten drop-outs were sponsored by the YMCA du Parc under Start Option, and they all went back to school this year.

Furthermore, last year in Quebec the Canadian Jobs Strategy's job entry program received funding totalling nearly $3.3 million, which benefited 176 participants.

I would like to give you and the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold the assurance that this government is doing everything it can, in Montreal as well as in the rest of Quebec and Canada, to help young Canadians become productive citizens.

When we adopted our Labour Force Development Strategy two years ago, our aim was to consolidate programs that promote the social integration of young people. Thanks to this strategy, our Co-operative Education Program has become even more accessible in high schools and universities across Canada. The program, which is very popular, gives students an opportunity to combine education and job experience, and we are committed to increasing funding for this very important program.

The Labour Force Development Strategy has led to an increase in entry-level skills development and has helped direct young unemployed workers towards the programs and services they need to find work. By further developing co-operative education, by improving apprenticeship programs and by emphasizing a comprehensive and concrete approach to entry-level skills development, we are giving young Canadians the kind of training they need to find a niche in a very competitive labour market. The government is using all these programs and initiatives to try and improve training and job opportunities for young Canadians.

Last year, the Science Council of Canada published a report in which it said that to sustain international competition, it was necessary to co-operate at the national level. That is what the government does. It creates partnerships with business, unions, the provinces and social agencies. A recent example is the $7.4 million the government has committed, over a period of three years, to research and development in the field of counselling methods and training programs for counsellors.

Our emphasis on partnerships is also apparent every fall during Canada Career Week. Special events organized across the country, with the co-operation of Canada Employment Centres, schools and business, give young people a chance to find out more about various occupations and think about their career choices. This fall, Canada Career Week will focus on younger students and urge them to start thinking about their careers.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold knows as well as we do that Canada can no longer count on human resources alone to make its economy prosper. In the last Speech from the Throne, the government clearly indicated that in a global economy, prosperity depends increasingly on knowledge, skills and innovation. That is why we emphasize up-dating skills so that young Canadians can develop and diversify our economy and give us a head start on world markets. Business, unions and governments are invited to work together to create at least 2.5 million new jobs by the year 2000 and to increase the real income of Canadians by at least 25 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, these objectives are realistic, but our young people will have the difficult task of achieving them. I want to give the hon. member the assurance that through the programs and initiatives I just described, this government, in co-operation with its partners in Montreal, Quebec and Canada as a whole, is trying to transform a national co-operative effort into effective local action. We are doing everything we can to provide a brilliant future for young Canadians, and we mean all young Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Moving on to the 10-minute question and comment period, the hon. member for Québec-Est.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my hon. colleague on this excellent speech and let him know that, no later than tomorrow, I will make sure, and it is my duty, that everyone involved in school issues in my riding gets a copy of this historic speech.

Mr. Speaker, in the discharge of my duties over the past seven years, I have often met people, men and women, who were looking for a job, either because they had lost their job or wanted a change. In every case, I did the same thing. I tried to make them realize that nobody is in a better position than they are to help them find a job. As the saying goes: "God helps those who help themselves." I noticed that they do not always give themselves every chance of succeeding. That is when I believe my advice can be the useful and, to sum it up, Mr. Speaker, my advice is this: first, identify the position that suits you before applying; concentrate on employers in the chosen field; apply in person; preferably, have a clear and up to date résumé; finally, take great care over your presentation at the time of the interview.

These constitute, Mr. Speaker, the ABC of success in job hunting. In my experience, a highly motivated person almost always finds work within a reasonable time, provided of course that person puts in the time and energy required and does not rely exclusively on others to do it for him or her.

From what my hon. colleague from Bourassa just said, I am convinced she pays as much attention to the young people in search of a job in her riding as I do in mine and gives them more or less the same advice.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Bourassa a specific question on the excellent, as I said earlier, speech she just gave. We know that the Co-operative Education program is a success wherever it is implemented across Canada. Can the federal government provide increased funding for this program?

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, this particular program, which is also part of the Labour Force Development Strategy, has been quite successful. Since it was introduced, $9 million per year has been spent on co-operative education. Furthermore, the government has approved new commitments totalling $16 million for the next four years to promote the co-operative education concept. High school students remain and always will be a major concern of this government. As you know, they are the labour force of the twenty-first century. Since this particular group happens to be the worst off at this time, the government is going to do everything it can to help bridge the transition between education and work.

In its comments, the opposition asked us to show some original thinking, to show initiative and creativity. I hope our colleagues on the other side of the House realize the tremendous range of programs that our government introduced since it came to power. The Challenge Program, for instance, which did not exist before and was introduced in 1985, almost seven years ago, a program that has a number of components such as Summer Employment Experience Development, Work Orientation Workshops, Student Business Loans, Business Drive for Jobs, CECs for Students, and Native Internship Programs. There are plenty of programs to help young people deal with the kind of situations they can expect.

I realize the situation is not a particularly easy one. In fact, we have a very critical situation, but our government has decided to face the facts and do what has to be done to ensure that the present critical situation with respect to youth employment will not be merely postponed, to be faced by future generations. In fact, what we see today was predictable a number of years ago. Without trying to blame anyone, however, we have decided to implement the necessary strategies to ensure that the problems we are able to identify now and to which we intend to respond will not be carried on to the next generation.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Bourassa for her excellent speech describing all the initiatives and programs the government has put in place to help young Canadians get a good education in with a view to securing a job later on.

I know the hon. member for Bourassa is very concerned by the situation in Montreal and today's debate must really be of interest to her. I would therefore like to ask her the following question. Given the serious problem of young people who drop out of school because they do not think they will find a job, if she were a student today in Montreal, what message would she convey to students who are thinking of dropping out? What advice could she give them?

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question. Actually, even though we have a full load of answers for them, the only advice we can give them are alternatives, through all our programs. So, as my hon. colleague said not too long ago, the only thing we can tell them is this: every generation, be it our very own, the previous one or the following one, every generation complains about being society's sacrificial lamb every one of them. The same goes for today's youth. They think of themselves somewhat as victims.

Last week, a young man in my constituency told me he could not see any reason to stay in school. He blamed his parents and the previous generation for having been too tolerant. I thought that was funny, because when we were young, we blamed our parents, our teachers or previous generations for some other wrongdoings.

It is never easy to be young. Kids have to take matters into their own hands, although they have been overly-protected and pampered, as is the case with the present generation. The reason they are going through all this might be that their parents and grand-parents, like my own, having lived through the war, became very strict. And then the people from my generation decided to try something else and we became much more tolerant.

The advice I would give them is first of all to be proud of their country. When one looks at the Japanese, one can admire the pride they show in everything they do. That could be considered chauvinistic, but perhaps the time has come to talk about that. The other advice I would give them is that there is certainly no future in dropping out, nor in giving up, nor in refusing to take up a challenge. The future is theirs. Indeed, it is an exciting challenge and it is all the more so because it is difficult. So I would advise them to complete their education because there is no other alternative. There will be absolutely no work for them without basic qualifications. Whether it be at the secondary or postsecondary level, there is no job for underqualified people.

Increasingly, with technological advances and market globalization, the fierce and sound competition which will prevail because of the opening up and rationalization of the Canadian people, our young people, will have to become more productive, more efficient and more qualified at any level and in any field. They have no alternative but to stay in school.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to address this particular motion because it is one that is of particular importance to Canadians generally, and certainly to young Canadians.

Members will recall that last Tuesday the Minister of State for Finance said in this House if they, that is students, look hard enough for jobs they will find them. Because the minister had said it, I thought perhaps I should check it out. Last Saturday in my constituency I took a young man and we went around to see what was available.

He is a good-looking young man, has good marks in school and is just finishing high school. He is motivated, has a number of skills and it seems to me he could be very useful in many areas. He is good-mannered and proud, he loves to work and has excellent credentials.

We visited eleven places like family restaurants, groceries, hardware stores, and so on. He did not get the slightest chance to have a job offer. He was told everywhere that there was no opening for the time being. There was no opening for the time being, and probably no opening during the week, the next week or the summer months.

Now, that is only one example of what is happening throughout this country. I intend to try the same kind of experience next Saturday. I will go around a number of other sectors with a young woman to see whether she has any chance to get a job.

• (1330)

Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that that young man I was just talking about had made a few written applications. We went to perhaps half the places where he had made an application.

Now, my colleague just said, and I appreciate her comments, that the government is doing all it can. But that is simply not good enough!

[English]

There is, not on the part of all members, but on the part of certain members in government, an insensitive attitude. "If they look hard enough for them, they will find them". I think that is too facile. That is too superficial. It is not that easy. What annoys me and young Canadians throughout the country is that there is no acknowledgement of the problem. If you cannot acknowledge that there is a problem, then how can you possibly deal with it?

This government has talked incessantly of competitiveness. We have to be competitive. That means what? That means, obviously, education, training and retraining. Clearly, we would all acknowledge that one is also educated through work. If I look at my particular life in the workplace and in schools, colleges and universities, I think I have learned as much in the workplace as I have in those formal institutions.

Why talk of competitiveness in such glowing terms with such rhetoric, when we see that the follow-up is not there, that there is tremendous disappointment on the part of young people?

That is what the situation is today among our young people. When we look at transfer payments for post-secondary education, the provinces will receive billions of dollars less. For training and retraining, we all know that less funds are allocated while more people need to be trained or retrained.

When we look at assistance to students, we see that the criteria have not changed since 1984. When it comes to programs for part-time students, everybody knows, including the government, that it is a disaster. We know that the number of part-time students has increased considerably. Then we have the 3 per cent administrative charge imposed on student loans; a 3 per cent charge for students who are the poorest, and we have not yet spoken of the GST on books and other learning material. You know very well that students are getting more and more heavily indebted. It is appalling and scary! It frightens those young people.

If we look at tuition fees, for instance, in my own province, since 1985, there has been an increase of almost 80 per cent. Those are the facts. Let us now talk of this job program for students.

[English]

Summer employment funding from 1985 to 1990, we recognize that the program has been reduced, cut, call it what you like, there is less money, from $149 million to $77 million, a cut of $69 million.

It is true that in February of this year the former Minister of State for Youth said: "Because of difficult economic times", referring to the recession, "we will put in another $3 million". It is not particularly difficult to put in $3 million when you have already cut a program by almost $70 million.

I could reduce all of my employees' wages by one-half, which is approximately the cut, and then give them a 3 or 4 per cent increase, and I am sure that they would not be particularly impressed.

What has been the result of all of this? There were 40,115 fewer jobs than in 1985, if one compares the 1990 total with that of 1985. In fact, there were fewer jobs in 1990 than there were in the year 1985. The average length of those jobs was 9.5 weeks in 1990 and the average wage was $6.10 per hour. That gives you the grand total, possibly, of roughly $2,300 per summer job per student. If you look at the increase in tuition fees that I have been mentioning, add no changes in student aid since 1984, increases in rent and all of their amenities of life, the 3 per cent administrative fee, the GST on various goods and what have you, clearly these students are working in an extremely difficult environment.

There has also been another problem that we have not yet talked about and we must address it. Initially, the intent was to have career-oriented jobs to really help with the learning, to help develop certain skills, to refine them if you wish, to make them more marketable, more competitive. Well, unfortunately, a lot of that has slipped by the wayside, and we do not have the same focus, we do not have the same commitment, or, at least, the intended results are not being produced. That is really unfortunate.

Let me just give another figure. If you look at the wages today and compare them with those of 1985 you see an increase of 12 per cent. So, if one looks at inflation during that period of time, roughly 20 per cent, there has been a net decrease in wages for students.

Now let us look at the unemployment statistics. They are in the range of 20 per cent. If one compares May of this year with May of last year, there is 4.4 per cent more student unemployment this year in the 15 to 24 year-old range, which is really unfortunate. Of course, the 20 per cent range camouflages a whole lot of things because in areas such as Montreal and, I suspect, Newfoundland and the Territories, it is probably a whole lot higher.

What is needed? A complete review of this program and all student-related programs is needed in order to ensure that they respond to student needs in terms of economic and social development priorities. We need wide input and we need to involve the students.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I don't deny that the government made a number of efforts. Yet we have to ask the basic question: Do we meet student needs? If our young men and women loose hope, if they begin to think that they can no longer find jobs and that they can no longer hope for a promising future, I think that Canada and all Canadians are loosing something.

[English]

Let us make sure that our young men and women of this nation are, in fact, the priority, that there are jobs, meaningful and significant jobs, to help them develop their skills, their abilities, their potential. Let us make sure that they do not despair, that they get the learning experiences that they need in order to make a contribution to this country.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the previous speaker, the member for St. Boniface, a question as it relates to the situation back in the early eighties when unemployment was extremely high in this country, along with an inflation rate that was rapidly increasing, and bank interest rates were very, very high.

This motion before us really does not give any alternative or make any particular suggestions other than to condemn the good work that is being done. In light of this, I would like to ask the member for St. Boniface if he has some suggestions, maybe reflecting on his experiences in the early eighties, as to how to improve the present unemployment situation. What particular things would this member like to see happening for Canadian youth in the employment sector?

Mr. Duhamel: I thank the hon. member for the question. I want to make sure I have understood the question because I think that my colleague was referring to the world recession in 1981–82, as opposed to the made–in–Canada recession of today, where indeed there were serious difficulties: interest rates and high unemployment. Absolutely. He failed to mention, of course, the differences in interest rates between Canada and the U.S. which recently have been at a record high. But we will set that aside for the time being.

I am amazed because I really did not simply point out the difficulties and pitfalls and some of the weaknesses of the programs. I did that because I expect that the government would want to listen to what it is that we have to say because it might be able to benefit from that. One of the main points I made is that there should be a total review of those programs to see if they are indeed in line with the government's economic and social development policies.

That was the first point. The second point was that there should be wide consultations in order to ensure that the review is as comprehensive, sensible and sensitive as possible. I did mention as well that it would be important to have the students involved in that kind of review.

With respect to money, because that is obviously an important consideration, we have a deficit of $30 billion and it has been hovering around that number for a long, long time. It will soon be $400 billion. It has more than doubled over the last seven years. I know we have a serious economic problem.

When I look at these cuts of $69 million and I look at some of the other activities the government undertakes, I cannot help but wonder whether we would not have been able to maintain such a program. Perhaps we would have been able to enhance it.

When there was a war in the gulf, money was found to go to war. We ought to be launching war against poverty; we ought to be launching war against unemployment; we ought to be making certain that our young people have the skills and the experience so they can contribute fully to Canada. I know that is what he wants, and certainly that is what I want. That is what my party wants.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface and I just returned from the opening of the Assembly of First Nations conference in Winnipeg. My hon. friend comes from a province with a very large portion of aboriginal people. He will recall that just a year or so ago the government cut the funding for post–secondary education to Indians.

I would like to ask him about this. He comes from a province with a very high number of aboriginal people. I would like to ask him about the devastating impact on young aboriginal people, young Indians, young Métis, and how that is going to affect their whole outlook on life.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the question. I tried to address that in part. Certainly his question is much more specific.

As I pointed out, unemployment figures for people 15 to 24 years of age are, as of this May, 4.4 per cent higher compared to a year ago. There are pockets within Canada where it is alarmingly high.

I was told as recently as last night, when my hon. friend and I attended the same function in Winnipeg with respect to the outgoing Chief Erasmus, that there are unemployment figures of over 90 per cent on our reserves. How can our young aboriginal people have any hope for the future when they face such a debilitating kind of situation? C'est écrasant, c'est extraordinaire.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in this motion which we have put before the House, we are calling on the government to implement immediately measures to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment among Canadian youth.

If we look at the unemployment figures which came out last Friday, the rate of unemployment for youth in this country in May was 16.6 per cent. That figure covers youth who are going to return to university, to CEGEP or to college in the fall and it also includes non–student youth. The figure of 16.6 per cent is considerably higher than the 10.3 per cent which is the general unemployment rate in this country, and that is bad enough; nearly 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. However, if you break down the figure of 16.6 per cent unemployment for youth, it is 15.8 per cent for students who will return to school and to university and it is 17.4 per cent for non–student youth.

Look at some of the things that are being said about this. I have here a clipping from The Globe and Mail dated June 4, 1991. The headline reads: "Thirsting for employment in the summer job drought. Summer jobs for university students are drying up while tuition fees are rising and students are becoming more serious about finding work related to their fields of study. The situation has made some students bitter, while others are close to panic." The article goes on to say that many of the jobs are part time or casual and the wages are near to the minimum wage.

Students rely on summer employment to pay their tuition, lodgings, food and books, and to live during the year while they are in university.

I have another article, this one from The Montreal Gazette of May 21. It is on the youth unemployment situation in Montreal, particularly with respect to students and their attempts to find summer jobs. It talks of one student who is among the 1,700 university graduates in Montreal who this year will find themselves jumping into a job market already made sluggish by a recession and a local unemployment rate which has left as many as 200,000 people seeking work in Montreal.

In the French newspapers, we see in La Presse

—May 27 1991: Tough summer for the students. The unemployment rate for those aged between 15 and 24 dramatically increased since September, that is less than a year, from 13.9 per cent last year to 20.9 per cent this year in Montreal. This summer, many students will have to accept small jobs paying the minimum wage.

Mr. Speaker, we could also read the following in an Ottawa newspaper, Le Droit, on April 25: Youth unemployment Statistics Canada just announced that youth unemployment in Quebec has reached alarming levels. Last month, the unemployment rate for those aged between 15 and 24 reached almost 21 per cent, that is 7 per cent more than March of last year.

[English]

This situation is alarming and what is the government's response? Two years ago the government cut the summer employment program, the Challenge program, by 35 per cent and this year it was increased by a mere $3 million, an increase of 2.5 per cent, I believe. With unemployment becoming a larger and larger problem, that was total nonsense. Total nonsense in face of the problem.

The hon. member just asked a question of my colleague: what would you do? What we would do is put the funding back where it was in 1984, 1985 and 1986 so that community groups and small businesses could employ people to do the jobs that have to be done.

In my own constituency, for example, the Challenge program has been cut for four consecutive years. Last year the funding was $107,865; this year it is $89,677, a cut of 20 per cent. Last year we were able to fund 68 jobs, this year only 50. I have already described the unemployment figures for students in Montreal.

What would we do? The groups that have lost those jobs are day care centres for young people. These are programs to help the elderly in hospitals and in senior citizens' homes. These are jobs in hospitals and in rehabilitation centres. If the government had a little more political will and put the money up front, there are all sorts of things that have to be done in this country, especially by social agencies for the poor, the sick, the elderly and for impoverished youth. Those jobs are there waiting to be funded. The government is simply backing off with this ridiculous argument that because we have a deficit we must cut back on all things. It is cutting back on the wrong things. The last thing you cut back on in time of recession is education and helping young people prepare for education.

What has the government done? It has not only cut back on the programs for summer employment. In the last budget it cut back on the training and retraining programs. It cut back on assistance to the provinces for post-secondary education. It cut back and closed the student employment centres and it cut back on research and development. These are the last things that you will ever cut because these are the things that help you increase your national income and productivity. These are the things that create a thriving economy.

If you do not have trained, skilled workers, if you do not have the professional people, the scientists, to do the job in this country, we will become a banana republic. I do not know if the government realizes that. By cutting education and cutting money to students for education, what the government is doing is bringing about a situation in which we are going to have a lot of people under-trained, under-educated and under-skilled and we will become a country with a much smaller capacity to produce and to cut that deficit.

If you really want to cut the deficit, you invest in things which will make you more productive. To quote the president of the Canadian Federation of Students: "Students represent Canada's single most important investment in the future. Human resources are the source of our greatest productivity in this century and at this time. It is absolute nonsense to cut programs that will help people contribute to the economy of this country and that is what you are doing when you squelch on your youth, your education and your employment programs."

There is a lot that could be said in this debate. For example, apprentices, because they lack hope, are dropping out of apprenticeship programs. I have here a special article from Statistics Canada pointing out that over 40 per cent of the 50,000 participants in apprenticeship programs drop out because they feel they have no hope of getting a job when their apprenticeship program is over. That is just another example.

The government's policy in this matter is cock-eyed. It says it is committed to the training of youth, to the education of youth and to the employment of youth, but that is rhetoric. The facts speak for themselves. The government says one thing but it does another. I say to the government: "Wake up. You are ruining the country and the country's future. Change your policies now before it is too late. If you want to ask us what should be done, we will tell you to do more of what was done in the last four or five years and you would be doing something."

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment or two to the hon. member because he stood in his place and threw around a bunch of numbers about unemployment and also gave this House the distinct impression that the government has abandoned young Canada and is doing nothing.

I just want to remind the member that problems of youth unemployment are not new. As the member should well know, when he was part of the previous government and we can hearken back to the last recession, there was a youth unemployment rate of almost 18 per cent in 1982 in the month of May. In 1983 there was over 20 per cent unemployment among youth.

Now that compares with May of last year at around 12 per cent and May of this year at 16 per cent, which is still too high. I think we will all admit that, but the hon. member has an obligation to put this into a context that means something, instead of just giving us a lot of rhetoric.

On the issue of this government having abandoned youth, I think the member and the House need to be reminded, and the statement should be corrected by saying that in February of last year the government announced a program worth almost $300 million just aimed specifically at this problem. That is not all. Summer Employment Experience Development Program is in place now for $80 million; work orientation workshops, $35 million; student business loans almost $1 million; Canada Employment Centre for students almost $10 million. This is serious money that is being spent.

I have one question for the member and it centres around one comment he made. He said there was a ridiculous argument that the government is cutting back on expenditures because we have a debt. I want to ask the member if he realizes that nothing hurts our youth more than debt. If we have cuts today it is because we had debts yesterday and the chickens are coming home to roost. We are poisoning the future and, what is most important, our youth knows it.

I would like to ask the member to rise in his place and tell us if he is going to accept and acknowledge his responsibility as a parliamentarian to stop squandering the future of this country.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for giving me that question. Of course we have to cut the debt, but you do not cut the debt by cutting back on education; you do not cut back the debt by cutting back on training; you do not cut back the debt by cutting research and development. If you are really interested in cutting the debt, you increase the productivity of the country. You increase the climate in which people will invest and they will find trained and skilled people in this country. The last thing you cut is education and programs relating to education, including summer employment programs for students. Yes, you cut, but you do not cut in those areas which will hinder your ability to produce more. The way you cut back on the deficit is by becoming a country with fewer unemployed and greater productivity.

That is my answer to that question.

With respect to the other question, he referred to 1981–82. We had a serious recession in 1981–82 and there was a high rate of unemployment, but the Liberal government of the day increased its spending for summer employment, increased its training programs and increased its programs for students; it kept people in university. Look at the record.

We increased the programs. I was part of the government. I was in Parliament. We increased the spending because we thought it was important to prime the pump and put people back to work.

What does this government do? It cuts. It cut by 35 per cent in 1990. It increased by a measly 2.5 per cent this year.

In answer to the hon. member, this is not the Liberals speaking. This is not the New Democrats speaking. I will refer to the president of the Canadian Federation of Students who says, and I quote from a press release of February 4, 1991, after the Challenge program was announced: "This government's record on student employment programs is appalling". I will spell it: a–p–p–a–l–l–i–n–g, appalling. That is the Canadian Federation of Students, not the Liberal Party.

Some hon. members: Hear. hear.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak today on this particular motion and to assure my hon. colleague that this government is committed to the youth of Canada and to youth employment. We all want young Canadians to have every opportunity possible to take their part in the nation's economy. We do not want them sitting back watching it go by. We want Canadians and Canadian youth to be involved in this economy. That is why this government has invested millions of dollars every year on services and programs for the youth of Canada. Even in this time of budget restraint we recognize that these kinds of programs must take place.

I want to point out to my colleague that the motion he has placed before the House completely ignores the reality of the situation. This motion only confirms that my hon. colleague shows a disturbing insensitivity to the real issues of youth employment. Youth employment is not simply providing a make–work project here or a make–work project there, a simple task of creating a few more jobs. The real key is the same one that affects employment for Canadians as a whole. That key is to develop our education and our training systems so that we can meet the challenges that face us in a global economy.

We must recognize that because our economic health as a country, which is our ability to compete, depends on how well we prepare young Canadians to take their places in the work force of tomorrow. We cannot afford to ignore the needs of our young Canadians, and we are not.

Since this government came to office there has been considerable progress made on behalf of the young people in this country. Millions of dollars have been committed to youth initiatives particularly in my area, certainly in southern Ontario and in the greater Toronto area where there are many competing demands for very limited resources.

We are meeting this challenge and we will continue to do so. Thousands of young Canadians use our programs to access skills, training and jobs. That includes all members of society. Right now hundreds of students are heading into the summer job market in my area and I can assure the hon. member that we are well aware that this is one of the toughest summers in which to land a job.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CLAM FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, several hundred people in the seasonal clam fishery in my riding have found themselves unable to earn a living because there is no market for their product.

The people involved reside along the Five Islands—Economy Shore and have no other means of support. Their situation has come as a surprise and caught them off guard. Their problems are compounded because their unemployment insurance benefits have now run out.

Through no fault of their own, hundreds of people have no source of income to feed their families. I ask that the Department of Employment and Immigration extend their UIC benefits for the few weeks required until the fishery market is re-established.

Although there are several programs to help Atlantic Canadian fishermen, these people seem to have fallen through the cracks. Part of the problem is an overabundance of American product which should be depleted shortly and allow the Canadian product to find a market.

I appreciate that departmental officials and the minister have all been very supportive. I urge them to find a solution to this problem as quickly as they can.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, whatever the other results, I believe that all ministers and all members of the House will agree that the inquiry into the Al-Mashat affair has seriously damaged the anonymity and impartiality of the Public Service.

The delicate relationship of accountability and mutual trust must exist between the elected and the appointed servants of the Canadian public.

The Public Service of Canada is the most important instrument we have as parliamentarians to ensure that the programs and policies determined by this House are determined impartially, efficiently and effectively, and to ensure that the government and Parliament are well informed and advised in determining the future of the nation.

In order to begin to repair the damage, I urge the Prime Minister personally to take responsibility for establishing a special committee of this House to examine and report to Parliament on restoring the proper balance of accountability, responsibility, anonymity and impartiality in the relationship between the elected and appointed servants of Canadians.

YOUTH

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I want to show you the youth situation, according to the labour market analysis made by the Canada Employment Center for Val-d'Or and Senneterre.

As you know, young people must face numerous difficulties on the labour market, the unemployment level being very high.

Moreover, jobs available are very often at entrance level in the hospitality or restaurant business or in retail sales. The working conditions are less competitive in these sectors and there is a high turnover.

It is no surprise then that young recipients give as their main occupation handling, administration, sales or services. The education level of young people in the labour market is high enough for the kind of work available.

However, the moment there is job specialization, young people have integration problems. I must mention that the drop-out phenomenon is reaching young people in our area too.

Mr. Speaker, life is not easy for today's youth, but it is encouraging to note that, since 1984, it is getting better. Only through our continued combined efforts will we get the best results.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, next year is Canada's 125th birthday. Canadians from coast to coast to coast will be celebrating a country that recently has had a difficult time.

Especially for aboriginal people, 1992 takes on a different meaning. At the New Democrats convention in Halifax this weekend we recognized this fact and have urged all Canadians and their governments to ensure that a serious message about aboriginal people is considered in any plans for 1992.

The recent shift of Canada 125 from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is a sign that hopefully the government will consider all regions of the country when planning its events.

We want to ensure that when we celebrate 1992 all parts of the country can participate, and not just Ottawa. Only through a grassroots celebration across Canada will we achieve the true national unity we are all striving for.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this House of Commons is devoting many hours today to a debate on the plight of our young people.

Opposition members are suggesting that the government solve the problem of youth unemployment by spending more money, money it does not possess and would have to be borrowed.

This is not what young people want. Instead, they want us to stop mortgaging their future with more debt.

As Jonathan Will writes from British Columbia: "No one in this country has more at stake in our current struggle with the escalating national debt than young Canadians".

As a young Canadian himself Mr. Will is asking us, the parliamentarians of this country, to stem the tide of red ink. Young Canada wants us to cut spending and free the future, not to borrow further and squander that birthright.

We have a responsibility in this House to do exactly that. The future does not belong to this generation and it is time we gave it back.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, you may be interested to know that Quebec's Minister of the Environment, Pierre Paradis, has urged the federal government to play a stronger role in the environmental assessment of the impact of the James Bay II project. We can only hope that the federal Minister of the Environment heard this unprecedented call for help.

Rafferty–Alameda, Oldman Dam and Kemano II are dam construction projects where the federal government had to be taken to court before it would respect its own environmental impact assessment laws.

The James Bay II project runs the risk of being added to this list of court defeats if the government does not live up to its environmental responsibilities.

Will the new Minister of the Environment listen to his Quebec colleague and do the right thing? We hope so.

STUDENTS

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, school holidays will start soon and I would like to offer my best wishes to all students for an excellent summer and a well-deserved rest. In my riding, I attended some events at the secondary, college and university levels designed to recognize the exceptional talents of our students. I have no doubt that those young Canadians will assert themselves and take their rightful place in our society.

I also want to take this opportunity to tell those students who are thinking of dropping out to immediately discuss their plans with their parents, teachers ou principals. If they make known their intentions, they will get to discover the different solutions that we, as a government, offer them and they will find that people are willing to help them evaluate the effects of such a decision.

MANITOBA

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago my provincial counterpart, Mr. Neil Gaudry, and I visited the St. Boniface Hospital Research Centre to examine the Magnetic Resonance Imaging Scanner. This machine which performs critical diagnostic and research functions puts St. Boniface Hospital in the forefront of medical research in my native province, indeed in all of Canada.

There is an important message here. If Manitobans were not continually ravaged by, for example, the loss of the CF-18 contract, massive cuts to health and education, the closing of the Portage la Prairie military base, what about Shilo, the decimation of Manitoba's trucking industry, the reduction of CN workers' complement by over 20 per cent, the possible rerouting of CP Rail's trains through the U.S., the almost total annihilation of VIA Rail, the privatization of Air Canada resulting in loss of jobs and the virtual gutting of CBC, what would happen? Where will it stop?

The message is very simple. We would thrive. Give us the support we need and deserve and we will hold our own. In fact we will excel at it.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, the membership of the Royal Canadian Legion believes in a united Canada and has since the organization's inception in 1925. It recognizes the need for change in our political structure, in the bureaucracy and in the Constitution. It believes through compromise and understanding Canadians working together can and will overcome these obstacles.

The Royal Canadian Legion supports: (1) a strong and united Canada, (2) a guarantee of individual rights and freedoms, (3) a policy of two official languages at the national level, (4) a need for a political framework supporting our continued existence as a nation, and (5) a simplified process to amend the Constitution.

Canadian unity is being threatened by separatists not only in Quebec but in western Canada. They want to divide our country. I urge Canadians to tell the likes of Parizeau, Bouchard and Manning that we believe in a United Canada. We are proud to be Canadians.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, last week we learned that a firm named Multinational Resources, listed on the Vancouver Stock Exchange and with strong links with U.S. companies, announced its intention to dam the North Thompson River, which is a tributary of the Fraser River at Vavenby, British Columbia, in order to divert water into the Columbia River basin which would eventually be delivered to the San Diego, California market.

This is occurring which the federal government begins negotiations to conclude a free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States.

We are aware that the governor of California, last month, indicated that he was anxious in purchasing fresh water from Canada for his state. We are reminded that the North America Water and Power Alliance proposal calls for British Columbia and Yukon Rivers to be damned and diverted into the United States and northern Mexico. We also know that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement did not say that Canada's rivers would not be diverted to flow into the United States.

I call upon the government to speak up and say that Canada's rivers will not be sold to the United States; that our fresh water is just that, our fresh water; that Canadians will not allow our rivers to be diverted wholly or partially to be sold in the United States or northern Mexico.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Quebec Premier Bourassa says that a constituent assembly is an uncalculated risk that is not worth taking.

Last year the premier took a calculated risk on 11 middle aged white men in blue suits meeting behind closed doors. He says he will not do that again. He is prepared to risk negotiating but only with the federal government. That is a risk, however, that English speaking Canadians find totally unacceptable because both the Prime Minister and the premier come from Quebec.

A constituent assembly may be an uncalculated risk, but it is a risk that 68 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec and 57 per cent of Canadians in Quebec say they want to take. That makes it the only risk that is acceptable to a majority of Canadians.

Surely, if we learned nothing else from Meech Lake, we learned that it is not worth taking the risk if it is not acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, when the hated goods and services tax went into effect on January 1, books started to be taxed in Canada for the first time since Confederation.

Back in November the Prime Minister said that he would reconsider the tax on books if there was proof the industry was being adversely affected, that is the book business.

Now there is proof, proof not only that book businesses are being adversely affected but also that education is suffering.

Canadian book publishers' sales dropped by 12 per cent since the tax was introduced. However, the more worrisome figures are these: sales of books to Canadian colleges and universities were down 23 per cent for the first quarter of this year and net sales to schools were down 34 per cent in March.

Can this be passed off as just another effect of the recession? No, Mr. Speaker, because during the 1980–83 recession Canadian book sales actually increased by nearly 54 per cent.

There are other troubling wrinkles that have resulted from the tax on books, a tax that sets Canada apart. Many foreign publishers, particularly smaller ones and those whose books are not taxed in their home countries, are so aghast at having to file monthly tax returns to the Canadian government that they decided not to bother shipping to Canada.

In March, the government lifted the GST from human sperm donated for artificial insemination. Surely books and the education of Canada's younger generation are important enough to be added to that list.

LA CORNE D'ABONDANCE

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, on May 31, I was invited to visit a food business in my riding called La corne d'abondance, formerly Le verger naturel.

This business, which is owned by two young people who succeeded their father after he had spent many years running it, many years is a striking example of a takeover by young dynamic people who are sensitive to the present needs of their customers.

Mr. Speaker, I was enthusiastic and impressed by the cleanliness, the concern for the environment, and the emphasis on product packaging and quality.

I am convinced that those young people will succeed in making this business what we could call an example for other youths who have the desire to carve out a niche in our active society.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in Halifax at the NDP Convention, the delegates passed a resolution to move us closer to a constituent assembly in this country.

Also over the weekend the Conservative premier of Nova Scotia, Premier Cameron, endorsed the idea of a constituent assembly on the Constitution. That now brings it to five premiers in the country who endorse the idea: Premier Cameron in Nova Scotia; Premier McKenna of New Brunswick; Premier Wells, the Liberal premier in Newfoundland; Premier Rae in Ontario; and Premier Devine in Saskatchewan.

In light of the growing momentum, as Premier Wells says on this particular issue, I would urge the Canadian government across the way to consider the possibility of a constituent assembly as a means of opening up the process and making it really accessible and democratic for all Canadians.

JAPAN

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of Canada's best kept secrets last month was the outstanding success of the Prime Minister's visit to Japan in promoting new dimensions of trade and diplomatic relations with that country.

As one who was privileged to be invited as a member of the Canadian delegation, I can speak first hand and proudly of the impressive performance by the Prime Minister in addressing the profound potential for trade in goods and services and for two-way investment which exists between Canada and Japan.

The Prime Minister's message was clear and simple: Canada is keen to increase its business with Japan in both directions. There is much to offer for each country: large markets, good products, innovative services, and a political and economic climate which is stable and compatible.

The Japanese response was equally straightforward. Their citizens admire and respect Canada. That respect was best expressed by the full participation of Japan's leaders at the opening of the new Canadian Embassy on May 27, an event to make any Canadian extremely proud.

It is too bad more news has not been made in Canada of this successful trip.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Four years ago next week the former Minister of Finance unveiled a tax package in which he claimed that future tax changes like the GST were going to be "revenue neutral" and that in fact "most Canadians will pay lower taxes". That is what the minister said on June 18, 1987.

Yesterday, his successor finally admitted what Canadians had known for months, and that is that Canadians under this government's policies are taxed to the limit and they will not take it any more.

In fact the Tory tax machine is so voracious that the GST has raised 18 per cent more than predicted: $400 million, to be precise.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: When will his government announce an 18 per cent cut in the GST rate to give Canadian taxpayers a break at the very least, or when will he end this vicious GST?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, royal commissions commissioned by the Liberal government over the years have said to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax and to bring in a consumption tax. That was done after great consultation with the Canadian public.

The first quarter returns are more than were expected by the Government of Canada, but one-quarter does not a year make. We have to wait until the year report is in to assess exactly how the largest tax change in Canadian history has performed.

I might remind the hon. member that we have made a commitment to the people of Canada that any funds from the GST that are excess will in fact go to the deficit reduction and debt reduction fund, which legislation will be introduced in this House later this week.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we have two ministers in two weeks who have admitted that Canadians are taxed too much.

My question is to the Acting Prime Minister.

[Translation]

We know that the taxation machine of the Conservatives has reaped out 18 per cent more than forecasted for the GST. That is, Mr. Speaker, $400 million more than anticipated! Is the Acting Prime Minister willing to reduce the GST by 18 per cent, since these revenues were not expected when it was first introduced?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, to be fair in assessing the goods and services tax, I think we should wait a year before we make that type of judgment.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian taxpayers are paying that tax now, and the Minister of Finance yesterday made it quite clear that the policies of his predecessor have failed and failed miserably. In fact the Canadian taxpayer is among the highest taxpayer in the world.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: My question to the Acting Prime Minister: given—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put her question.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the tax increases in the last four years have been higher than in any of the G–7 countries.

• (1420)

My question is for the former Minister of Finance. Does he agree with his colleagues, the Minister of Revenue and the Minister of Finance, that Canadians are paying too much tax? Does he agree?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. member quoted the two ministers out of context totally. Second, Canada is not the highest taxed in the OECD. As a matter of fact we are the third lowest under the OECD in total taxes paid in this country. So, before she makes these statements in the House, she should in fact state the facts. I think that is most important.

Third, unlike the Liberals who do knee-jerk reactions to everything, we are going to wait to assess this over a year period when it has been in operation for that period of time.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. During the registration period of the GST, the Minister of National Revenue said at the time that there were more taxpayers than anticipated. After three months, $400 million more than forecasted have been collected, the official explanation for that being that there were more returns than expected. Does the government know what the revenues of the GST actually are? Are we going to know how much taxpayers are actually paying for this GST which is creating problems for the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned to the hon. member's colleague, the money is going to the debt servicing and reduction fund. That is exactly the commitment that was made in the February budget by the previous Minister of Finance. That piece of legislation will be introduced in the House, I believe later this week, and I trust the hon. member and his party will support it.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, for seven years this government has never come close to one of its budget predictions.

When you introduce this proposed legislation, do you know how much money you are going to put against the debt with the GST? Stop saying you are going to put it against the debt. How much? Do you know what you are doing?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, all moneys collected under the goods and services tax, with the exception of those that go to senior citizens and rebates to low income people, will go into the debt servicing and reduction fund.

My hon. friend says: "How much?" He will know how much because the Auditor General will audit that account and produce the facts for the Canadian people.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, clearly the figures reveal that the Canadian public is being gouged and screwed by the GST even worse than the government itself predicted the Canadian public would be.

I want to ask the minister: Given these returns, if you like, in the first three months of this year, will the government reconsider the GST? Will it scrap the tax and will it look for the money that it claims it needs in things like the trust funds that are supposed to be taxed in 1993 but which the government is moving to protect further?

There are billions of dollars there that the government could tax which have gone untaxed for 21 years. Why does the government not do that and give the middle class a break and stop taxing them to death as these figures show you are doing?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): No, Mr. Speaker, we will not.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, let the record show I asked them to stop taxing the middle class to death and he said: "No, Mr. Speaker, we will not". That is the policy of this government, to keep taxing the middle class to death.

If the minister is not willing to do that, is he at least willing to consider some of the exemptions that people have been asking for time and time again? The government has said it is committed to a learning culture. Will it finally exempt books from the GST?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the question in the first place was would we abolish the GST. That was the question that was asked and I said: "no". That was no. If the hon. member was fair, he would admit that.

Second, we are not at this time considering reducing the GST on books.

Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the minister said that they wanted to reassess things after a year. Can I ask the minister if, not necessarily at the end of the year, this trend continues and if the government continues to make this amount of money from the GST, will they consider not only lifting the tax on books but also on women's health products, on co-operatives and a number of other areas on which there has been consensus that it is quite inappropriate to have the GST?

Mr. Speaker: The question is hypothetical.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

In public statements made last week the minister said that a secret and highly sensitive document informing him of the Al-Mashat affair and read by his chief of staff cannot be found.

Considering that the loss of this secret document is a serious breach of security and its loss undermines the credibility of the minister's handling of this case, I want to ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs: What specific steps the government has taken to thoroughly investigate the whereabouts of this secret memorandum?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me take this occasion before I answer the question, because I am sure the hon. member would want to do this himself if he had read the clipping, to offer the House's congratulations to our diplomat, William Bowden, for the award that he won, the only foreign diplomat to win an award from the United States for his courageous and compassionate assistance in the weeks after Saddam Hussein's August 2 invasion of Kuwait.

I would not want to let go unrecorded in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker, the gratitude of this House to an outstanding public servant.

Let me say that we have, as the hon. member knows from our original statement, put in place new procedures which will ensure that information comes directly to ministers as it is required. We are in the process of looking for the document within the department that the hon. gentleman mentioned.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it would have been more appropriate for the minister to offer congratulations to Mr. Bowden in a ministerial statement so that the entire House could have joined in that particular applause.

However, I would like to ask a supplementary question. In the past the government has never failed or hesitated to call in the RCMP when there were clear breaches of security. Considering how crucial this lost memorandum is to the work of the inquiry, to the credibility of the minister and to the whole understanding of the Al-Mashat affair, will the minister now ask the RCMP to begin an investigation of its whereabouts?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think that would be premature. I think it is important that we look for the document. That is what we are doing.

I also believe that as parliamentarians or as public servants or as ministers, however we are involved in this, there are pressing matters at stake which need to be looked at these days and I think that the House should turn to them.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

I would draw the attention of the House to the May 30 edition of Hansard wherein the Deputy Prime Minister in response to my party's Al-Mashat committee question says:

> All witnesses they require and*or demand will be available to respond.*

My question is: Does this statement still represent government policy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there has not been a request from the whole committee for other witnesses who have not appeared.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

It appears the government has invoked a new doctrine of ministerial accountability which states that the less a minister knows the less a minister can be blamed.

Can he confirm that this policy of calling witnesses just affirmed by the minister extends to the calling of the former Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Gordon Robertson, who will testify about ministerial accountability and responsibility?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, two things: As my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, outlined in her submission to the committee, there is a well accepted principle with regard to ministerial responsibility, not only accepted by this government but at the McGrath report hearings accepted unanimously by all members of this House.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We are following that practice. Now Ms. Copps seeks to change the topic, so let me deal with the second matter.

The second matter is, as I indicated, if there is a request from the whole committee that will be considered.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for industry and international trade. There were 15,000 more people unemployed in the month of May. Full-time jobs have fallen by 330,000 since this time last year, and the most recent economic report from the Bank of Montreal says that the recovery is going to be weak and sluggish. People, in short, are hurting. I want to ask the minister if the government will act against one of the key reasons for this economic damage. Will this government take Canada out of the free trade deal and give us back our economic independence?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is telling anybody on this side of the House that people are hurting. We understand that and it is something about which other ministers and myself have expressed a good deal of concern.

For the hon. member to say that we should get out of the free trade agreement tells me that the hon. member is not understanding the impact of the free trade agreement on the economy. There is no question we have been in recession, but if we had not had the free trade agreement we would have been in a deeper recession because the trade surplus with the United States has gone from $14 billion in 1988 to $17 billion in 1990. Our exports to the United States have increased by 12 per cent during that period, and we have seen a net change in the net flow of foreign direct investment into Canada, a change in the net positive basis for Canada, of $6 billion. All of those have created jobs in this country and have ensured that the recession is not more serious in its impact.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister likes to talk about the trade surplus. Let us talk about the whole current account balance because the fact is Canada had a current account surplus with the United States in 1988 and since the trade deal we have had a deficit of over $3 billion. That means lost jobs.

Is this minister prepared to start to do something about the whole host of problems with this trade deal, the fact that our energy policy moves are blocked, the fact that we are not able to make the moves to give Canadian content in our various industries, all those things that are stopping new jobs from being established in this country? Will this minister in fact give us back our independence as a nation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend asked a question originally about the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement affects exports and imports and that is what I was referring to in the current account balance which includes interest and dividends. To suggest that this is integrally woven into the free trade agreement, my friend could go back and understand that that is not the case.

He is looking for a degree of independence. We are gaining a degree of independence by the fact that we are following policies that are designed and will strengthen the economy of the country. It is with the strengthened economy that we will strengthen our independence as a nation.

For my hon. friend to suggest that total independence is achievable in this world of global interdependence is totally unrealistic and he knows that.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council who stated last week, in reply to a question I asked him, that Mr. Raymond Chrétien had made an error of judgment in not apprising him of the Al-Mashat affair before he set off to meet with James Baker and tour the Middle East.

Does the same symmetry principle apply to Mr. Paul Tellier, who knew about the Al-Mashat affair on March 11, but did not inform the Prime Minister before he met with the US President on March 13?

Will the minister have the decency to recognize and tell this House that, in fact, the Prime Minister knew about the Al-Mashat affair when he met with the U.S. President?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): In that case, I would have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Now that we know that a four-minister committee tried desperately to lay on someone else the blame for something they were responsible for, can the minister explain why this committee did not instruct Mr. Shortcliffe to demand an apology from Mr. Tellier as well, for not having apprised the Prime Minister of the Al-Mashat affair before his meeting with the President of the United States? Why have they demanded an apopoly from two civil servants, but not from Mr. Tellier or those who approved Al-Mashat's application in Vienna?

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. On May 7, Canada Post announced yet another attack on rural Canada, by eliminating manual sorting in small communities. This means half the staff of the Campbellton post office, in my riding, will be let go. Considering the high unemployment rate and the fact that the loss of sorting jobs will seriously hurt the economy and postal service in the area, what will the minister do to save these jobs in Campbellton?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the post office, along with all modern, progressive corporations seeks to use the latest technology to improve its efficiency. So the use of optical character readers and machine sorters and so on, have done away with the hand sorting.

The hon. member is not suggesting that any time technology allows us to do jobs automatically that formerly needed to be done by hand, we should get rid of the modern machinery and continue to do the operations by hand strictly for the purposes of maintaining those positions.

The post office is now the most efficient post office in the world and we should all be proud of that fact.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the same minister.

Canada Post intends to relocate sorting operations from Campbellton, New Brunswick to the province of Quebec, even though this is not part of the consolidation process.

Since I have a letter addressed to me from the office of the President of Canada Post, which says: "I can assure you that we have no plans to remove sorting operations from Campbellton", will the minister instruct Canada Post to rescind its decision in light of this breach of commitment and if not, why not?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The reason I will not do that is because in 1981, when the hon. member for Papineau was responsible for Canada Post, he brought in a bill creating a Crown corporation for the purpose of eliminating political interference. That was the position of the Liberal Party. We think it was a wise decision. In fact, it was a decision adopted unanimously by the House.

The hon. member is asking me to be in contempt of the House and I will not do that.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Previous news reports indicated that once the minister had a consensus among all of the provinces he would be approaching the U.S. administration to start renegotiating the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding.

• (1440)

Can the minister tell this House if he has the required consensus, especially from the Atlantic provinces, to tell the U.S. that Canada wants out of the MOU?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, a simple answer to the question is no, we do not have that consensus.

I have indicated to the U.S. trade representative, Ambassador Hills, that we have some major concerns with the MOU and that when we meet later on this month at the first meeting I have of the trade commission between the United States and Canada, I propose to raise this matter, but at this point we do not have a consensus as suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister's answer indicates the deep trouble that this government has got this country into when it signed away our sovereignty in forestry with the MOU.

My question to the minister is this. Will the minister tell Carla Hills and the gang that could not trade straight that this government rejects the MOU and will give the 30 days' notice and get Canada out of the MOU?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's suggestion as a representation, but as he knows this is a very complex issue. He asked a question concerning the Atlantic provinces. Atlantic Canada is not subject to the export charge and I think that for him to be honest with Canadian people he should understand that their position on the MOU is quite different from other provinces.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Unemployment in the greater Toronto area is now almost 10 per cent. That is over twice what it was last year at this time. A great many of those jobs could have been saved if we had had a U.S. style Chapter 11 bankruptcy law in place.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister this. How many more jobs are we going to have to lose and how many more businesses are going to go down the tube before we get modern bankruptcy legislation in this country, bearing in mind that it was promised some two years ago in the 1989 Speech from the Throne?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right. The Bankruptcy Act of Canada is in desperate need of being overhauled. Bills have been brought before Parliament I think some six times in the last 25 years in an attempt to do that and we are going to have one more try.

My colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will be bringing forward that legislation in the next few days. I think the hon. member will find that it goes a long way toward addressing the kinds of situations that are addressed in the United States Chapter 11.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. All members in this House are aware that the government is pushing ahead with the fixed link. Numerous studies have shown that the Trans-Canada highway in both New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island must be upgraded to four lanes to handle the increased traffic. There is no use in building a link for the year 2000 with roads that are 1950 and older.

When will this minister commit the necessary funds to ensure that New Brunswick has a four-lane Trans-Canada highway?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in this period of high constraints on the budget, the federal government has to manage its money carefully, and at the same time ensure that it meets its commitments with the various regions of this country.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Premier McKenna has stated that people are literally dying to get an up-graded Trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick. They are dying by the dozens and there are thousands of accidents each year. Newspaper headlines are revealing and I quote: "Highways Claim Five on the Weekend, Two More Die on New Brunswick Highways, Fatality Closes Trans-Canada Highway, Woman Dies in Accident Involving School Bus, One Killed in Car-Truck Crash" and just this weekend another death. When is this government going to assume its national responsibility and provide a four-lane highway for New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the enumerating the problems that my hon. colleague has just mentioned, I think if he looks carefully he will find that a vast number of these concerns should be addressed to the provincial government.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

Last week we learned the government's GST raised $400 million more in just 90 days than it was supposed to, a substantial hike for a tax that was supposed to be revenue neutral.

Last night the Minister of Finance said: "Canadians generally have made it fairly clear they do not want any new tax increases."

My question is this. Does this mean there is now some hope for my constituents that there will ever be any relief for middle class taxpayers? Is the GST a cash cow and, if it is, who is getting the milk?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as most middle income taxpayers in this country have informed me, they want the federal government to start paying the bills so that the kids of the future will have a wonderful country in which to grow and have their own families and employment.

We have to pay the bills that have been rung up over the years by the government. We have been living beyond our means. Any excess moneys will go into a reduction fund. In reducing the deficit we will be reducing interest rates and we will be making it unnecessary for us to raise taxes when we do have that income. I think all that is very important and that is what our whole tax system is designed to do.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week Environment Canada sent a 16-page pamphlet to every home in Canada. It was distributed only in French in Quebec and only in English outside Quebec.

With the result that 800,000 francophones outside Quebec had their linguistic rights denied and an equal number of anglophones in Quebec were similarly discriminated against.

Mr. Speaker, why did Environment Canada disregard the Official Languages Act?

[English]

Why is the government retreating on its commitment to official languages?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this pamphlet was distributed in connection with a television show that was on TV last night both in English and French concerning the environment. I think it met with some success. Environment Canada co-operated with this effort. We did not have the direction of it. We offered some support and were happy to do so.

I also want to point out that this does not mean that because there was private sector participation that this was an endorsement of any product of any kind, but rather a co-operative effort. I understand that the pamphlet was distributed in French in the province of Quebec. After we found out that was the case, we were told that it would be made available in English on request. We hoped that was the case.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have here the cover of the pamphlet and it is clearly marked Environment Canada. Whether it was prepared directly by the department or not, I believe the department should not have permitted such information to be distributed under its name in violation of the Official Languages Act.

I would like to know what the minister will do to correct this affront to Canada's language minorities and to assure it does not happen again?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern the member is bringing up and we take that concern seriously.

We are witnessing here some of the difficulties we run into from time to time when we want to do these initiatives in partnership with the private sector and many partners. These are part of the difficulties we run into.

I do not think there is any bad faith on anybody's part here from those who distributed the pamphlet. There was a sincere willingness to do this effort in a co-operative manner.

I will take the member's representations constructively and I assure him that we will learn from this lesson and, if anything, look at these initiatives a lot more closely in respect to how we deal with them and distribute information to the public.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Prior to the Canada-U.S.-Mexico talks, a number of American spokespersons have announced that they intend to reopen the Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade talks relative to cultural property of Canadians.

• (1450)

In his meeting this week, is the minister prepared to tell all Canadians that if the Americans intend to open the U.S-Canada Free Trade Agreement to get new access to Canadian property rights, he would get up and walk away from the table rather than meet that condition?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is saying that if the Americans suggest they want something from the free trade agreement and if we are not prepared to give it, we should walk away.

I think that is a very short-sighted view. We see some benefits in the North American free trade agreement, but not nearly to the same extent as the free trade agreement with the United States. Trade with the United States totals about $200 billion. It is only $2 billion with Mexico, but there are longer term benefits.

I have made it very clear in discussions I have had with Mrs. Hills, Mr. Katz and with other people in the U.S. administration what our policy is on reopening the trade agreement in relation to cultural products. It is simply not on.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, is the minister, as he spoke in answer to this question, saying to all Canadians that under no circumstances will he allow Canada to participate in a reopening of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement if cultural property from Canada is on the table, that it is an absolute "no", and he will not negotiate that issue?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have said time and time again that we are not going to negotiate that issue. It is not in the interests of Canada to see the free trade agreement opened. In particular, we have said that the cultural industries are not the subject of negotiation. Mrs. Hills, Mr. Katz and the other negotiators are quite capable of putting things on the table. Just because they put them on the table does not mean we have to accept them. We are going to bargain in the best interests of Canada, and we have made it very clear what our position is.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

If ever the spirit of Canadian citizenship was important to our country, it is important now and will become even more critical of value as we work to preserve Canadian unity in the months that lie ahead. Many people say that we lost the meaning of citizenship in Canada, and that the spirit of Canadianism has been missed by many citizens.

My question is this. What steps are we taking to reinforce and strengthen the meaning and the spirit of Canadian citizenship as the over-arching mantle under which the rich potential of our bilingual and multicultural heritage can be pursued? How are we installing the values of citizenship among Canadians, not only new citizens, but all those who have been born here as well?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

It gives me an opportunity to demonstrate the very firm commitment that in the proclamation of the new department and in my responsibilities as the first minister of this new department, that I intend making citizenship, its promotion, its affirmation and its full expression one of the most important and in fact essential activities of this department.

This member has consistently come up with excellent suggestions on how we can better promote understanding among all Canadians. I visited with him in Fredericton on one occasion and saw an initiative that has been ongoing for 20 years.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and concerns the government's relationship with aboriginal people.

As he knows, the Assembly of First Nations is meeting this week in Winnipeg and it was to be followed by an event called the People's International Pow Wow. The Department of the Secretary of State has turned down this proposal and I was wondering, given that this sends out a very negative signal to aboriginal people at a time when they are hoping to attract 15,000 people to a pow wow, if the minister would not reconsider this decision on behalf of the government.

I have to say that I had a very constructive meeting the other day with Mr. George Erasmus, who is the outgoing president of the AFN, and I look forward to having similarly constructive meetings with whoever is chosen to take his place, the membership and leadership of that and other aboriginal organizations. I understand very much the importance of participation by non-aboriginals in some of the ceremonial activities of the aboriginal people. I think that is something we all in this House must consider doing more than we have in the past.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister and it also regards the relationship of this government to aboriginal peoples.

As he probably knows, during the weekend at the initial meetings, the Assembly of First Nations discussed a need for review of Canada's judiciary system. This review has already been started in Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta but up to this point the federal government has refused to initiate a review of our judicial system as it relates to aboriginal people.

Would the minister indicate whether or not the government will change its decision on this matter?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canda and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I look forward, as do my colleagues, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Justice, to continuing a series of meetings with aboriginal leaders, including the newly elected leadership, the leadership to be elected tomorrow of the AFN.

Naturally if they bring to us matters that were raised seriously in their assembly we will consider them very seriously.

SELF-EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and refers to the Self-Employment Incentive Program which has proven extremely successful in my area in helping people off unemployment insurance, so successful in fact that the funding has already run out for 1991.

Will the minister redirect funding or make funding available to this program which has proven so successful in helping people off of unemployment insurance and into their own businesses.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Self-Employment Incentive Program is a successful one. As for the matter of budget, I can look into the regional allocation in the hon. member's province to determine whether or not we can reallocate within the fund to meet the requirements of his riding.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for youth.

Various government departments have responded to a job-hunting Nepean student and I would like to quote from three of the many letters that he received: "—budgetary restrictions have had a serious impact—including the summer employment program—" Quote number two: "—I regret to inform you that our office is not participating in the COSEP program this year". Quote number three: "—sorry to advise you that our office will not be hiring students in the summer of 1991".

Why is the minister stating one thing in this House while officials in various government departments are stating another?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would do me the courtesy of sending copies of those letters to me so that I might look at them. I will certainly respond to her.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to send those letters to the minister.

Students cannot support themselves on platitudes. Because of the government's cuts in transfer payments, tuition is up, GST is on books, rent is up. It stands to reason that if the budget allocation remains the same there will be fewer jobs.

Will the minister assist Canada's unemployed youth and introduce today a comprehensive assistance program?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, or should know, there is a debate on this question today. I invite her to participate in the debate and ask the appropriate questions at that time. I have already indicated in my speech this morning that the funds have not been cut with respect to the Challenge program. They have been increased, and some of her own colleagues admitted that.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade who later this week will begin the talks with Mexico and the United States on a free trade agreement. He will also be well aware of the North America Water and Power Alliance proposal to divert Canadian rivers into the American southwest and northern Mexico.

Will the Minister for International Trade say today categorically that this government will never allow the transfer of Canadian fresh water by interbasin transfer to the United States or northern Mexico, ever?

• (1500)

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to report a breach of the Standing Orders. Referring to section 37(1) and also the same rules in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules, section 409 says that a preamble need not exceed one carefully drawn sentence. Section 410 states that supplementary questions require no preamble.

Mr. Speaker, of 35 questions asked today, it is hard to tell exactly but it looks like almost 30 questions were in breach of those Standing Orders. I would just like to comment that if all members kept their questions according to the rules as outlined in the Standing Orders and in Beauchesne, we would all have more questions.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. John Richard Johnson, President of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, Australia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): During the course of Question Period I inadvertently stated that we have the highest taxes in the world. Mr. Speaker, I misspoke myself and what I should have said was that we have the fastest rising taxes in the western world. I wanted to correct the record.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

TABLING OF EIGHTY-FIFTH REPORT OF INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. This report was drafted by the official delegation representing Canada at the 85th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Pyongyang, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, from April 29 to May 4, 1991.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It would be useful to the Speaker if people who are not seeking the floor would sit down. It is very difficult to know who is seeking the floor or not. Thank you.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-228, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to update the provisions of the Criminal Code with respect to mentally disturbed accused persons. The bill is, in fact, not of my own authorship. It was one that was proposed in a white paper prepared by the Minister of Justice about three years ago. The hon. member for St. John's East was the Minister of Justice at that time, which gives some indication of the age of the document. But nothing has been done on the issue since that date.

The bill is introduced for the purpose of moving this issue along with some speed. I would hope that the government might consider referring the bill to a committee so that it could be studied there and enacted at an early date. This might assist the government in its dealings with these persons as a result of the Supreme Court of Canada's recent decision on this issue.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COMMEMORATION OF THE BIRTHPLACE OF CONFEDERATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–229, an act to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation.

He said: Madam Speaker, at the 1864 conference in Charlottetown, a feeling of anticipation and hope was born. This bill will fulfil the mandate by promoting symbols of a united Canada with plaques and other signs to mark sites and buildings of the Charlottetown Conference. This is a wonderful opportunity to showcase a very special event in our history while pointing toward our common goal of unity.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–230, an act to amend the Criminal Code (ministerial review).

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill is designed to deal with some of the more serious breaches of judicial review that we have seen in recent years. I speak specifically of the David Milgaard case and the Don Marshall case, where applications were made to review cases that were held up many years and there was serious questioning about the application of objectivity and independence.

This bill would propose the amending of the Criminal Code to have a special council appointed by the minister to review all these kinds of applications for reconsideration of criminal matters or cases of this kind and would provide an objective, independent review of the case.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–231, an act to amend the Family Allowances Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill is a proposal to amend the Family Allowances Act to deal with perhaps one of the most shameful aspects of Canadian society; the extreme poverty faced by many women with children.

The Senate report that was just released a few months ago points out that close to 900,000 Canadian children live below the poverty line. What is quite clear from that report is that much of it begins in the period where pregnancy begins.

This act is designed to amend the Family Allowances Act to provide payment of the family allowance during the last six months of pregnancy to many women subject to certain conditions, and I recommend it to the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO EXTEND HOURS OF SITTING

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I move:

> That, pursuant to Standing Order 27(1), the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, until 10.00 p.m. on June 11, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21, 1991.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, there has been some discussion among representatives of the parties, but of course the government has the right under the Standing Orders to proceed today with extending the hours.

I would hope that perhaps later today the parliamentary secretary or the government House leader could indicate to the House, in view of the extension of the hours which will take place on June 11, 13 and 17, 18, right through to the 21st, the bills that will be called, the motions that will be debated on the floor, in order to inform the respective critics of our party so that they can be here to participate.

Members on this side are willing to co-operate with the government, as we have demonstrated time and time and time again, Madam Speaker, but we would like to have some firm indication as to what the order of business will be for the remaining days to June 21, 1991.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, in that same spirit, we are certainly anxious to support this suggestion. I wonder if we could, simply as a matter of courtesy, ask the government House leader if he would not mind indicating, at least, as we understand today, and for the next foreseeable few days an outline of the business. This would facilitate dealing with the business of the House in a most expeditious manner and allow predictability and planning for all members as well, in terms of votes and participating in the important debates.

Mr. Andre: Yes, Madam Speaker, subject to of course, negotiation with the opposition House leaders and others, it would be my intention to call Bill C-20 tomorrow morning and Bill C-11 tomorrow afternoon. Wednesday and Thursday would be allotted days. In terms of the other bills, for the remaining period until the summer recess, I hope that at our regular Tuesday House leaders' meeting we will be able to agree to a calendar and agree to bills that could be dealt with over that period of time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present, and it is important for a number of reasons. I have 255 communities in my riding and the signatures on this petition represent about 15 per cent of those ridings. It contains about 125 signatures, so it gives you some indication of the total support that this particular petition has.

It really talks about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its historic key link to the culture of Canada and particularly to the Atlantic provinces.

They are very disappointed and very concerned with the recent cutting of the program Land and Sea. It was a great reflection of Newfoundland, the Atlantic and indeed Canadian culture from the maritime viewpoint and from the viewpoint of the land.

They are calling on Parliament to ensure that CBC programming remains intact and in particular that the local program Land and Sea and local programming in Atlantic Canada be maintained.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by several hundred people from coast to coast which calls on the Government of Canada and Parliament to act to bring the Canadian Human Rights Act in line with those of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and the Yukon, by prohibiting sexual orientation as a grounds for discrimination.

ADOPTIVE PARENTAL LEAVE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions this afternoon. The first relates to Bill C-21 and would require the government to review Bill C-21 with regard to adoptive parental leave—considering the literature that deals with the adoptive process, the bonding process, needs and rights of adoptive families, proper terminology in adoption, and discussion with adoptive families—and cause the government to change Bill C-21 so that all parents, whether biological or adoptive, receive the same paid leave of 25 weeks to spend time with their new children.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): The second petition I also have the honour to present asks Canada Post to strike a stamp commemorating the life and work of Marie Curie. I was always under the impression that Marie Curie was a French woman. She was by choice, but she was born in Poland and her name was Marie Sklodowska. The signatories on this petition call upon Canada Post to strike a stamp commemorating the great contribution that this woman made to the world of science and to the practice of healing.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to introduce a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and The Islands who call upon Parliament to pass a bill to make it an offence to desecrate or destroy the flag of Canada.

I note that the hon. member for Scarborough East introduced such a bill last Thursday, the same bill as he had introduced in the previous Parliament, and I commend him for his efforts.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, who is being vociferous at this point, will support the hon. member for Scarborough East and move forward his bill the way he does so enthusiastically with government bills.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure today to introduce a petition from residents of the Prince George, Vanderhoof, Port Fraser, Fraser Lake and Burns Lake area, about taxation, specifically the goods and services tax.

These petitioners call on the government to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a number of petitions.

The first petition is from a number of my constituents from Kamloops and some neighbouring communities who are concerned about the government's seeming intentions to cut back on Royal Canadian Mounted Police services. While we acknowledge the fact that the government has reinstated funding for at least one more year, the petition encourages the government to continue with its present level of support and not pass the cost along to the local taxpayers, in other words municipal taxpayers, or worse yet cut back with the resulting lack of services.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): The next petition is again on behalf of a number of people from British Columbia. It points out their ongoing concerns with the goods and services tax and the fact that there is still a tax on literature. They are perplexed as to why the government would want to tax reading material. They are calling upon the government to drop this part of the tax and introduce a real tax reform with a balanced approach that would do away with the GST.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): The last petition is on behalf of a number of federal public employees from the following departments: Justice, Public Works Canada, Parks Canada, External Affairs, Statistics Canada, Canada Post, Indian and Northern Affairs, CMHC, Agriculture, Labour Canada, National Health and Welfare, Department of Defence, CEIC, Transport Canada, Environment Canada, Revenue Canada, Customs, Fisheries and Oceans and actually others.

• (1520)

I think you get the picture. They are concerned that the government has imposed a zero per cent wage hike ceiling on federal public employees for 1991 and point out that a substantial increase was given to members of Parliament. If we are going to give an increase in pay to one group of people involved in the federal government, it should be to all employees.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, very briefly while the government House leader is here. He will be aware that the Secretary of State of External Affairs said on May 28, 1991, and I quote:

> We have said from the beginning that we would produce all of the people and all of the relevant materials to the extent that it is possible. I have given this House my commitment on that from the very beginning, and the hon. member knows it.

On May 30, 1991 the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance said, and I quote from Hansard on page 822:

> I have no objection to that, but surely it is a matter that should be properly questioned at the committee where all the witnesses they require and/or demand will be available to respond.

I have not had an opportunity to review the "blues", but I understand the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has now put a caveat and somewhat of a restriction and it now will be up to the entire committee to decide what witnesses will appear or not appear.

I am wondering if the government House leader can shed some light on a very important undertaking which was given to this House by two senior members of cabinet?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I wonder why the House leader could not get himself on the Question Period list today which he submitted to the Speaker. Some member of his party was on it and asked those questions. They were answered as a matter of fact. I think the evidence will show, and anybody who has been watching will see, that in fact the government has been totally forthcoming in terms of allowing officials to come forward with all documents and so on.

I can understand why, perhaps, the opposition wants to go on with a bit of a continuous witch hunt. If you keep bringing people before the committee, even if they have nothing to do with the issue, you never know what is going to happen. I think we should leave all that up to the committee. I believe that is what the former Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister said, that the committee is looking into this thing, doing a fine job and why do we not let it continue with it.

Mr. Dingwall: Through you, Madam Speaker, to the hon. House leader. I want to thank him for his obvious, unequivocal and clear undertaking to subscribe to the statements which have been made by the Minister of Finance, the Deputy Prime Minister and, of course, the Secretary of State for External Affairs on May 28 and 30.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, as was indicated, that question was asked in Question Period. It was asked last week. It does not become more legitimate when it is asked by way of a bogus Point of Order after Question Period.

He knows the answer. It has been given several times. Repetition of that order is in fact a little insulting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member does know as well as I do that this is the type of Point of Order that is normally raised immediately after Question Period. We are now into Routine Proceedings. We have had a motion passed. We are almost finished with Petitions.

I have a difficult time to see how this is a Point of Order, honestly. I will recognize the hon. member, but I would like him to tell me which of our rules is not being followed at this time, and explain the Point of Order.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, it is certainly not my intent to be disputatious, but it must be clear that the subject matter which I have raised on a Point of Order is of great importance for the continued deliberations of hon. members in this particular House, as well as those hon. members who serve in another committee. Madam Speaker, I appreciate your bringing to our attention the fact that this was not raised at a more timely occasion than when I did raise it. I wish the record to show that I believe the government House leader was involved with some discussions with the Solicitor General. I thought it a courtesy that I would wait until those deliberations had been completed.

In point of fact, I believe the hon. government House leader was vacating the Chamber when I summoned him to remain in his chair so that I could raise the point of order. The matter has now been resolved. I clearly accept, through you, the undertaking of the government House leader that he will abide by the statements made by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on May 28 and May 30.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will resume Petitions.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I would like to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by many people of Quebec, Ottawa, Nepean and Kanata, with regard to the high interest rate, the high dollar policies and 33 new tax increases since September 1984. They are saying that the government is taking the purchasing power away from consumers and this will only deepen and prolong the recession.

They also deplore the fact that the Conservative federal government intends to impose a freeze on the federal Public Service wage increases for fiscal years 1991 and 1992. They feel that the government is taking away their collective bargaining rights.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Parent (p. 1319).

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, as I was saying before—we were interrupted an hour and a half ago—right now this is a very difficult time for students heading into the summer job market. Most of us are cognizant of that fact.

I for one am very pleased with the government's response in trying to assist these students and help them into the job market.

We are making the best use of the resources we have at hand. Right now in Canada we have about 400 Canada Employment Centres that last year provided opportunities for about 270,000 workers. In my particular area we have about 17 employment centres and last year they provided approximately 11,000 high school, college and university students the opportunity to get jobs in their particular areas. One thing that is very important is the Canada Employment Centres are working very, very hard.

One of the things they are doing is helping kids to beat the odds when it comes to employment by teaching them how to look for work. Today, it is not a question of banging on doors, asking for jobs, and the doors opening. It takes a more sophisticated approach. We are teaching our students and young people how to prepare themselves for a job interview and how to prepare a good resumé.

I think that is very important to them not only for this summer but for the future when they are applying for more permanent jobs at different other times in their lives.

Canada Employment Centres are only part of the bigger picture. I think that is one of the things we should be talking about today because thousands of post-secondary students across Canada have found summer jobs through COSEP. In fact this year already in my particular area there have been over 900 students who have already found jobs under this program. In Ontario alone this year, under Challenge '91 over $18 million is going to be spent on employment programs for students including SEED, the kind of program that is going to help students not only this year but in the future. These programs—and last year just in Ontario alone there were over 9,500 of them—help students get experience in a job market they are often related to or interested in.

I think that is very important because we have increased our resources in Ontario for this co-op education under the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program. That is a very popular program and without it many Canadians would not be able to finish their university education. When you look at those kinds of numbers and those types of programs, that is very important to the youth of our nation.

The question of summer jobs, as I mentioned, is only one concern of this government's youth initiatives. Our interest in youth employment goes well beyond how many jobs are available this summer. That is the simplistic answer, and that is the simplistic part of it.

We are focusing on meeting the long-term needs of many young Canadians, those who need help the most. In the 1990s job market, those youths are facing a lifetime of employment problems, not just this summer.

When we look at the programs offered by Employment and Immigration Canada, we see that it is going to play a major role in ensuring that these young people get the employment skills, the education and the training that they need. Programs like Job Entry are working very successfully to give this group the employment skills that they need.

In metropolitan Toronto, there is more than $6 million being employed in the Canadian Jobs Strategy to help unemployed youth. This program targets those who have left school and who are trying to enter a very tight labour market, frankly, with very few if any training skills, marketable skills and the things that are necessary to land and keep a job.

Under the job entry program, these young people will gain employment skills and classroom training aimed at long-term employment.

I was at one of these centres not too long ago. These centres are providing youth with assistance, providing them with the ability to choose the type of career that they might be interested in, and providing an opportunity for them to get into a career. Those kinds of programs are working very well.

That is a co-operative type of program between the private sector, government, institutions and municipalities. Those are very substantive programs, and I think they help an awful lot.

Some of the things that we are doing for our youth are also directed to those young people, those Canadians who have simply run out of options.

One of the difficulties when you look at Canadian youth today—you often see them, Madam Speaker, when you visit our larger metropolitan centres from coast to coast to coast—is that there are children who are just lost in the system. They are not able to find their position in society.

When we look at the different backgrounds, whether they come from a broken home or from a ghetto-type of society which is poverty based, I think that we have to really consider and address the future that these children have.

When you combine that poverty factor and the low educational factor of these children who have dropped out of school, we are really looking at a very serious difficulty, and not just for the immediate short term but in the long run.

These Canadians are on the margin of society with no way to get back into society. They want to be contributing members, but frankly there are not a lot of people who want to take a chance on these young children.

I firmly believe that the actions and the activities that this government is taking are really going to help this generation and this group of people. I know that the Minister of State for Youth is very dedicated and very committed to this particular mission.

There are a number of programs right now in the metropolitan area which I represent that are going on for these youths who are severely employment disadvantaged. Many of these projects will provide the kind of assistance that will help these young people get better employment and better training.

If we can do that, it does an awful lot of other things for these children, because it gives them an outlook on life. It gives them a future. It gives them something to look forward to.

I know that the Metro-Youth Job Corps is one of their programs. It seems to work very well and it has been very efficient. It is not focused on short-term benefits. These children who are involved in it are getting a chance to learn generic job skills, valuable life skills that will help them to help themselves.

If we can do that, we are doing the kind of work that is really necessary for a government. If we can instil that sense of accomplishment, that sense of success in these young people, then they will go on and have a sense of purpose and a goal in their life. If we can do that, I think we will have been very successful.

Up until now, of the young people who take part in these programs, about 70 per cent go on to find permanent employment. These are young people who have had very difficult times in their backgrounds. It is really great to see that kind of result coming out of those kinds of programs.

There is another program. That is work done by the Kensington Youth Theatre ensemble, which one would think would not have too much to do with youth employment. However, if you look at the program, they learn how to be carpenters, how to be plumbers, learn other kinds of skills, writing skills, and team building. Those are the kinds of opportunities that our young Canadians are looking for.

The other thing this government is doing very substantively is encouraging Toronto kids and Ontario kids and Canadian kids to stay in school. One of the things that is very disturbing, I think, to all Canadians, particularly those in government, is the fact that 30 per cent of our youth are dropping out of high school before they finish their high school education.

That is roughly about the same number that goes on to finish university education. I do not think that is a very good ratio. That is something that is really heartbreaking and it is a loss of human potential for Canadian society. We just cannot afford to let those numbers continue. We have to get these children back into school to get the education required to be better citizens of Canada.

That is why I support the stay-in-school initiative. It is something this government is doing to tackle this problem and to not accept this totally unacceptably high dropout rate. This stay-in-school initiative is intended to encourage young people to stay in school and complete their education so that they will be better equipped to enter a highly competitive labour market.

Looking at these kinds of programs, such as the work orientation workshops under Challenge 91—another program to help those children who have recently dropped out of school and are now at risk because of the fact that they do not have that graduation certificate—this powerful combination is an effective technique for providing recent and potential dropouts with new options. By providing them with practical work experience related to their career choices, young people are learning the skills to become productive members of Canada's labour force.

This program also gives our youth a realistic picture of the world at work. I can assure this House that a glimpse of life at the minimum wage of $5 is not going to be too exciting to a high school dropout when they realize that by staying in school, they can get a much better, much more productive and much more rewarding job.

We estimate that we are looking at about 30 projects under the work orientation workshop in Ontario. I think that speaks for itself. Over 400 students will be able to take part in this program.

Our youth programs reflect our national commitment to ensure that Canadians continue to enjoy the benefits of a globally competitive economy. However, our prosperity depends on improving our ability to compete and improving the levels of skills held by all Canadians.

Canadians are now becoming more aware of the extent of the employment challenges facing all of us. One of the factors is that fewer young people are entering the labour force, compared to the baby boom years, and they just do not have the training and skills needed for some of the jobs that are available today.

That means that our young Canadians will not be able to provide all of the new skills that the economy demands. New skills requirements will also have to be met by retraining people who are already in the work force.

Canada's youth will continue to be an important part of the learning culture we are building, but it is a lengthy and a complex process in a country as diverse as ours. By working with young Canadians, we are already pursuing one of the most important first steps in this process.

I am confident that the youth programs this government has followed will provide a foundation for a strong and very competitive Canada.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to say that the member for York—Simcoe, who has just finished giving a very passionate address, knows of the respect in which I hold him.

However, I want to make a couple of comments and ask a specific question. First of all, I certainly agree that the Government of Canada is trying to teach our youth how to take a much more sophisticated approach to looking for a job. He talked about a career oriented approach. He talked about the preparation of good resumés. He talked about all of the things that would hopefully make looking for the desired work a more satisfying experience.

Does the hon. member not realize that even with the best skills and the most sophisticated resumé—and he knows from his own riding and certainly the greater Toronto area—that the $6 million for the metropolitan area really only works out to about $15 per student who is looking for a job right now.

Second, does he not realize that the problem is not with our youth who have the sophistication, the work ethic and who want to go out and do something constructive rather than sit at home for the summer? Does he not realize, and I am sure he does, that the real problem right now is that our housing industry has basically been frozen in the province of Ontario, especially in his own region? Does he not realize that, because of problems we are having—not just the GST but other costs in general—that our tourism, food services and hospitality industry has basically shut down? When many of these youths apply for jobs this year, there is just nothing there. There are no jobs right now for carpenters. There are no jobs for plumbers. There are no jobs for youths who drive trucks, dump trucks or whatever.

My question is, what do we say to those youths who go door to door, business after business? It does not matter whether it is a restaurant or a construction site or a lodge in northern Ontario or whatever. What do we say to those sophisticated youths who are right now getting shut out everywhere they go?

He must realize that the problem is not with our youth. The problem is that we have to figure out a way, in short order, to get confidence back in our small and medium-sized business community, which represents 80 per cent of the jobs, especially in our province. We have to get that industry fired up so that it in turn will have the confidence to meet that payroll, which in turn will give those youths a job. What does he say to those youths who are getting shut out everywhere they go right now in spite of many good government programs?

Mr. Cole: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood for his comments and his questions.

One of the things about the member for Broadview—Greenwood that I have always been impressed with is that he is often willing to provide suggestions and alternatives. I think that is a constructive type of opposition and a constructive type of government, which we should be looking at more and more often. I really respect the member for that.

He mentioned a couple of things I want to comment on. One was the limited number of dollars the federal government is spending. The member opposite knows the problem of budget restraints and knows the problem of the deficit and the debt we are facing. I do not think the youth of our country want us to say: "Here is a handout for a job here. Here is a handout for a job there. It is going to look after you for the next couple of months, but you are going to pay for it for the rest of your life". I think the hon. member could agree with me on that.

I do not think those kinds of programs are what is necessary. I think it is important, and I agree with him that it is not a problem with our youth. Our youth of today want to get jobs. They want to work and they want to contribute. I think he is quite correct that there is a malaise in the small business community, particularly in Ontario. In fact there is a frustration in the small business community right now. One of the things they are finding difficult is a provincial government that is really harnessing in on them. It is not giving them any opportunities to be productive. It is not giving them any opportunities for new employment, for new construction, for some of the things that we have talked about. Because of some of the things it is doing, there is no incentive for that land owner to build an apartment building and hire a bunch of students for the summer who could do some of the plumbing and some of the roughing in work and this kind of thing.

Fortunately, in our area, the construction industry does seem to be starting to come around now, but it is a very slow process and these small business owners who are involved in this kind of thing are very, very frustrated. They cannot even decide whether they are going to work Monday to Friday or Tuesday to Saturday or just what it is going to be. They are passing that buck back.

The small business owner today in Ontario is facing a lot of burdens with increased taxes and a deficit that they do not know where it is going. It is very difficult for that small business owner. But I hope that the small business owner is going to be able to see his way through and provide some of these jobs. I know that one of the things youth will do is take a chance. They are willing to say: "Hey, I will work a little extra hard this week or today and work for a little less because I want to make a success of it." I know our Canadian youth will make a success of it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend who suggests that the small business community is having a difficult time in the province of Ontario.

I want to tell him that the small business community is having a difficult time beyond Ontario and in British Columbia things are not very encouraging. They are not very encouraging in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Quebec and Atlantic Canada. So I do not think we want to focus in fact by suggesting that in one province things are significantly different.

But I do want to ask my friend a question. For this year's Challenge '91 program, I must have had 300 or 400 or even more small businesses who wanted to participate in the program. Some staff people had to phone about 240 of those small businesses and say: "I am sorry, there is nothing we can do for you." They wanted to hire a student or sometimes two or three students, but literally, for all intents and purposes, almost all of those small businesses had to be phoned and just told: "Listen, there is no funding. We cannot include you in this student employment program for the summer."

My question is to my hon. friend. I know he is a sincere individual and it is not a critical comment that I am levelling at him, but would he not think it would be a good investment, in terms of investing in Canada's most important natural resource, to say to small businesses that if you are interested it will make a difference for you to hire a student this summer, we would like to participate with you? Would he not think that would be a good way to invest taxpayers' money?

Mr. Cole: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The reason I was referring to Ontario in my previous answer was the fact that that was how the question was directed to me and I thought it was best to respond to the question. It is one of the things I try to do. I know a lot of members have difficulty with that at times, but I was trying to relate to the question as it was asked. I was not referring or suggesting that it was going to be easier in any other part of the country.

But I do want to recognize the member's question. He said that the government is not taking part. I think the member also knows that the federal government put $80 million into the SEED program this year in co-operation with small business to help create summer jobs. I think $35 million was put into the WILD program.

So you have to look at that kind of thing and you can separate and pick out one part of it or another part of the program or the different programs and say: "Well this program was reduced". I am not going to suggest to the member that it was not reduced, but there are other programs that have been increased at the same time.

I think it is only fair that you look at the over-all budget and at the over-all programming. I think the efforts by the government to provide this kind of encouragement to our youth is very, very positive.

• (1550)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43(2) I would like to share my speaking slot with my hon. friend from Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

First of all, let me begin by indicating what we are actually doing here today. We are responding to an opposition motion that this House call upon the government to implement immediate measures to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment amongst Canadian youth.

In other words, we are appealing to the government to do something about a situation that I suspect many people would consider to be immoral, to be completely unacceptable, to be wrong. We are saying to the federal government that as we look out across the Canadian landscape there are thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of young people who do not have a job in one of the wealthiest countries of the world. For that to occur we should be considering that to be not only unacceptable but immoral. What we are saying is that we are abandoning those young people. We are saying to those tens of thousands of young people "watch television or whatever, sit around and chit-chat with your pals; we are not interested in you participating in Canadian society in a meaningful way and participating in the building of the country". That is what we are saying, Madam Speaker.

But let me be more specific; that is what the government is saying, because as we have heard there are all sorts of proposals, all sorts of ideas from a number of speakers in the opposition. I think it is time that we acknowledged the fact that the most important natural resource in this country is not codfish, oil, gas, coal, wheat or trees; it is the people of Canada and particularly the young people of Canada. We should be investing in that natural resource, developing that natural resource, encouraging and nurturing that natural resource, like we have never done before.

What are we doing? Virtually nothing. I know the government will say "we have this ZIP program and SEED program and ZET program, and so on". But that is not even touching the surface of the problem, it is not beginning to resolve youth unemployment this summer. I have two sons, one going to university and one finishing high school. They are out trying to find summer jobs. There are all kinds of jobs that they can line up for, but they apply and there are 200 other young people applying for that same single job. It pays $5.50 an hour. They have to raise funds to continue their studies at universities, colleges and technical schools, and so on. Their friends are the same.

It is very frustrating for these young people to ask: do people not care? Does this country not care about us? Does the government not care about us?

That is why I put the question to one of my colleagues on the government bench. I know in my own constituency of Kamloops, when it came to the Challenge '91 program, we had applications from businesses, large and small, applications from non-profit societies, applications from municipalities and regional districts and hospitals and colleges that wanted to participate in what they thought was a government program to hire young people. They were prepared to put up good money and have the federal government match it, or in some cases ask the federal government to provide the meaningful job for a young person in an art gallery or in a municipality in an activity of one kind or another.

We had to reject almost all of the applications because we did not have enough money. We probably could only meet probably 20 per cent of the applications, and that is a business that would ask for three positions. "We can employ three young people", and they get one. Or a non-profit organization is prepared to hire seven young people to run a nursery program for single parents and we could maybe find two people for that particular group.

So there are all kinds of jobs out there. I think it is about time that the federal government says it wants to participate, in most cases with the provincial jurisdiction, and provide those meaningful summer jobs so that young people can go out and work in the summer and permit them then to return to school and their studies in the fall, having participated in a few weeks of work, to say nothing of part-time work, or to say nothing of all of those tens of thousands of young people who are simply unemployed, who have less schooling for a variety of reasons. Perhaps they have even graduated from secondary school or graduated from college and simply cannot find a job.

As we saw earlier, Madam Speaker, that is resulting in 16 per cent of young people between the ages of 15 and 25 who want to work and cannot work. There are no jobs. It is 16 per cent. I will tell you that there are many countries in the world that would not tolerate that. They would consider that to be the basis of a crisis that had to be addressed.

I remember something that occurred in Sweden not too many years ago. As you know, Madam Speaker, Sweden has practised many of the traditions of social democracy no matter what government has been in place, essentially that mentality continues on.

They looked out and saw what was happening in their country. They saw to their astonishment that 11 per cent of Swedish young people were unemployed. The Conservative government of the day in that country said: "This is wrong. This ought not to be. There ought not to be any young people out of work."

It said: "Within three years, we want to implement programs to ensure that every single one of those young Swedish men and women are meaningfully employed or involved in training or education programs of one kind or another." It set out to do that.

It created programs to encourage small businesses to hire young people on training programs. It encouraged young people through increased bursaries and scholarships to attend technical, vocational schools, colleges and universities. It set out a whole series of private initiated programs to help young mothers, single parents and seniors to go into the forests and practise silviculture methods. They went in and stabilized the banks of all sorts of mountain streams and so on to halt erosion. There were all sorts of programs that actually work to make Sweden a better place.

Do you know what happened, Madam Speaker? Yes, it required the government paying a bit more but it was already paying those young people some form of welfare or unemployment insurance. It topped those funds up and within three years every single one of those people were meaningfully employed and/or involved in society with their studies, or training or work programs. This includes every single one of them.

Then, those young people, as a result of the fact that they were being paid reasonably well for the job they were doing, they would purchase things. They bought Volvos. They bought clothes. They went out and entertained. They participated as regular citizens, and consequently, sales taxes flowed in, income taxes were paid along with excise taxes of various kinds.

In the end, the government virtually made money on that initiative. Not only was it cost effective in the long term after a three-year period, but every single young person in that country was meaningfully employed.

I realize that Sweden with eight million people cannot automatically transfer its experience to Canada, but we can certainly take the best portions of it and apply it where we can, whereas this government chooses to do virtually nothing which is an abandonment of the youth of this country.

I say that there are no shortages of examples in terms of what can be done. There are all kinds of proposals that we are hearing today.

We are begging the minister responsible for youth and, indeed, the government per se to begin to acknowledge the fact that the most important natural resource in this country are the people of Canada, particularly the young people of Canada. Right now, to ask them to go out and compete with the thousands and thousands of people who have lost their jobs and who have years of experience is not realistic.

We have only to find the comments made the other day by the Minister of State responsible for Finance and Privatization when he had the audacity to stand in this House and say: "There are lots of jobs for students. If they look hard for them, they will find them."

It is that attitude that obviously telegraphs that this minister and this government does not understand the depth and seriousness of the problem. When he says: "If you really work hard, you will find a job," that is nonsense. It is wrong, and it is callous.

I do hope that the present Minister of Youth sees the world quite differently than the Minister of State responsible for Finance and Privatization and actually introduces quickly in the days and weeks ahead meaningful programs to ensure that businesses can hire young people for training programs and meaningful employment and that all sorts of other organizations can take advantage of the programs as well.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in the course of this debate, one of my colleagues across the way said that the competitive position of Canadians was declining, and he quoted the report on world competitiveness.

I would like to point out, Madam Speaker, that Canada ranks fifth in the world on development of human resources. In 1990, it ranked third for the skills, motivation, flexibility and health of its population. In 1986, Canada ranked fourth, and in 1989, we ranked second.

• (1600)

I think the hon. member would agree that the ranking of third in the world is a vote of confidence by the international community in the quality of education, training and health of Canada's people, including youth. The recent Speech from the Throne makes it clear that the government is not resting on its laurels and will strive to improve Canada's performance in learning and to make the concept of lifelong learning a reality for all Canadians.

I have a question for the hon. member. The hon. member will agree that the private sector bears some responsibility for the creation of jobs, including summer jobs for students. Does the hon. member think that the federal government should subsidize summer jobs in Canada?

Mr. Riis: First of all, to answer the question specifically, obviously there is sharing between the private sector and government to ensure that young people find employment opportunities.

Let us recognize that the private sector is being beaten down these days. We know what is happening in terms of economic and financial statistics. We know what is happening to the business world, large and small. They are being pilloried. To expect them to be hiring the usual number of summer students is, I think, unrealistic. We have a list of many of the larger firms that are hiring for the summer, but for the small business persons these days it is almost impossible.

I say to my hon. friend that obviously there is a balance there, but the glowing statistics that my hon. colleague reads out about ranking fifth in the world for this or twenty-third in the world for that is not helping Mary Brown who is right now pounding the streets of this city looking for a summer job or little Jack Brown out there some place in Red Deer trying to find a job for the summer. It does not help these young people. It infuriates them to think that when there are programs that could be launched and when there are all sorts of initiatives that could be taken, the government is saying that we are ranking 13th in the world of this and we are doing well in terms of statistics. It demonstrates that it does not understand what is going on in the real world.

I encourage my hon. friend to get back to his constituency and talk to young people in the high schools and colleges and ask them how they are doing this summer. If his communities are like any other that I know in Canada, the young people are saying they are having a tough time. It is has been the toughest ever. The youth employment offices will be telling that in a formal way, if he does not want to go home and find that out. It is tough for students out there. It is very difficult for young people, and the government does not seem to be doing much about it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would just like to bring to the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is not just the private sector that needs to be motivated and encouraged. I realize that there are problems coast to coast in terms of youth unemployment, but I would like to be very specific.

In the province of Ontario we have a government that, granted it has been in power for only a year, has not approved one plan of subdivision, though there are close to 100,000 affordable housing unit projects on the books. Affordable shelter is something that we need, and this an area where literally 40,000 or 50,000 people could be employed overnight simply by the minister of housing and the minister of municipal affairs putting a signature to plans of subdivision, as long as they concentrate on affordable shelter.

I would hope that the member uses his influence with his colleagues from the province to get the affordable shelter program moving.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Fisheries; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, Bankruptcies; the hon. member for Don Valley East, the Environment; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Health; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, Immigration.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I too want to thank the member for Kamloops for agreeing to share some of his time this afternoon in the short time we have to comment on the particular motion before the House today, an opposition motion and a very important one I think.

It is calling upon the government to implement immediate measures to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment among Canadian youth. I think I would certainly second the comments of the member for Kamloops when he talked about how important Canada's young people are. I stand in this House and talk a lot about our forests and our fish and our farms, but he is quite right: if anything is our most important resource in this country, it has to be Canada's people and, undoubtedly, Canada's young people as well.

I took the time today to listen to the member who led off the debate and to the minister to hear some of the comments that were said on this and the programs, of course, that are trotted out by the government.

It is fair to say that any of the members in their own ridings who work with the Canada Employment Centres on this area need an up-date about every other day to keep track of all the acronyms and the different programs that are there. Of course, one of the members acknowledged the fact that in a number of areas those programs have been cut back. In fact, we have also learned that a number of Student Employment Centres on campuses are going to be closed. They are closing 100 of them, including some at some fairly significant universities across the country: the University of Calgary, the University of New Brunswick and the Memorial University of Newfoundland.

As well, just before commenting a bit on the question of unemployment among young people, I do not think we could really talk about unemployment among young people unless we mentioned as well the impact that the GST is having on young people and the government's seemingly endless round of consultations on trying to change the Canada Student Loans Program.

It has shown up once again in the regulatory reform package, the book that comes out once a year. I am sure you go through that, Madam Speaker. It shows that once again the government is trying to study reforms to the Student Loans Program. It was a leftover from the previous year. We hope that for the first time in some time the Government of Canada will actually move on bringing the Canada Student Loans Program into the future so that we have a current program that works.

I took the opportunity during the break to actually have my staff call the two student centres in my riding in Prince George and Vanderhoof. I asked them to call to basically give me some information and advice that they might have about what is the current situation that students and young people are facing right now.

The comments from the Prince George Student Employment Centre are that the jobs are down this year and that they are primarily casual and odd jobs: lawn mowing, car washing and what have you.

Very importantly, and this is a comment I think I would like to add as well, in many of our rural communities it is very difficult often for young people to get employment. Often they rely on jobs to work in their mother or father's business or their mother or father's friend who has a business. One of example of that, a particular example, is in Vanderhoof where the Student Employment Centre there reports today that there is a dramatic drop in job listings, fewer jobs, but also a large increase in registrants. The comment made by the student employment officer there is that businesses are not hiring because they do not have the additional funds. Largely they are attributing that to the problems businesses are having in terms of reduced business from the GST. They are deciding to go through the summer without doing that additional hiring.

As well, I had the opportunity a month or two ago where I thought it was important to go out and actually hear from young people to see exactly what the situation was. It was very interesting to hear from the presidents of student councils in the high schools in Prince George who actually commented that they felt, from talking to their constituents, that the number of jobs was done this summer.

We followed up after that meeting and the calls today again confirm exactly what they knew. They are likely better representatives than the government side, because they know what pressures are on their constituents and their fellow students. I would recommend to any member here who has not done that, to do it. If you cannot do it before the summer, meet this fall, as I am going to, with student council presidents so that you get a view and a sense from those young people as to exactly the situation they are facing.

It is clear, especially in a large number of rural communities, that young people are facing additional problems in finding employment in the larger centres, particularly in this case with the demands on young people these days in terms of seeing the messages on television about people travelling to Vancouver. There is real pressure on the smaller communities.

As members we participate in a number of projects. I tour a large number of the projects which are eventually funded, during the summer, to see how they are going and to find out how they are operating.

We face the same situation as the member for Kamloops. There is a vast number of employers, local governments, and non-profit organizations willing to participate and work with the federal government to employ young people, but this government obviously is not interested in that. There has slowly been the cutting back of these programs and making it ever more difficult for young people to get employment.

The throne speech, as I mentioned earlier today in comments to the minister, talks a great deal about education and training and how important they are. Coming from an area of B.C. where the participation rate in post-secondary education is very low, I welcome the initiative. I suppose it is the fifth or sixth time we have heard this initiative from the federal government about trying to get something going in this country on education and training. Let us hope it is successful this time. To date it has not been. I would certainly encourage any efforts in that particular area.

We are very pleased and honoured that in Prince George we will be getting the University of Northern B.C. shortly. The project is under way now. We hope it is not threatened by the ongoing cutbacks in funding from this government because of course that will play a major role in the whole question of employment in that area.

I want to close with one suggestion. The minister said he would be taking notes. He is not here now, but I know he is probably watching on television. In our ridings we have had the creation of our local advisory committees that provide advice to Canada Employment on various programs. Some of these work half decently and others struggle along. I would recommend to the minister that he consider a directive, if you like, or advice to those local advisory committees to ensure that there is representation from young people on those committees. They are often missed whenever a government or an institution starts talking about all the wonderful things it is going to do for young people. Of course the last group of people it ever consults or includes in the decision making is young people.

I just want to close with an appeal to the government to heed this motion. I hope it will support the motion. The fact is that something can be done.

An hon. member: Must be done.

Mr. Gardiner: "Must be done", says an hon. member. I agree with that. If this government can mobilize its intellectual, physical, mental and fiscal power such as it did when Canada participated in the gulf war, certainly there is no better cause in this country to mobilize the resources of the Canadian government than to help our young people.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I very much appreciated the member's intervention as it relates to the pursuit of education and, in particular, the pursuit of excellence by way of post-secondary education.

I wonder if the member could comment on the recent ridiculous decision of the Ontario government to do away with recognition of the Ontario Student Awards Program, the single award that actually gave recognition to students at the secondary level for the pursuit of excellence.

If the hon. member does not agree with this decision, will he make his views known to the Government of Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to present any views to any government in Canada to improve education policy in this country, and in particular the Government of Ontario which is cleaning up after the mess left behind by the previous Liberal administration.

The tremendous challenge that faces Bob Rae and the New Democratic government of Ontario is to ensure that Ontario is on a competitive footing, to ensure that our education institutions in Ontario are funded to the highest level possible, and to deliver a message to this government, and we will do the same thing: "Stop cutting transfer payments to the provinces, do your job, improve funding to health and education in this country. It is desperately needed".

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, the government has recently established the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, which is an agency comprised of 22 members, representing a wide range of groups, such as business, labour, social groups and the educational community. It is a real partnership. I think it shows the commitment of the Government of Canada to get directly involved with the private sector and bring the private sector right into the job creation process. It is something I really want to applaud the government for doing.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he thinks the establishment of this kind of board does not represent a fundamental and major step in improving the quality of Canada's education system? I wonder if he might comment on that because it strikes me that a partnership approach to finding solutions is the best way for us to go.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member representing Halton—Peel. I know there has been some debate about this board. I think I could endorse some of the general principles behind it, but I would add a couple of additional comments.

All too often, I suppose, we have tended to emphasize a great deal the efforts here in Ottawa. I would certainly appeal to the government and the members of that board to reach out beyond the usual offices and bureaucracies of the Government of Canada in Ottawa.

As well, I think I would say this. Often, we hear the rhetoric from the government side about how we are a great, free enterprise government and we are going to free up the marketplace, then the next day we find out how it bailed out yet another business friend.

What we need is some consistency in policy. I am not being critical of the member. I think there is obviously a partnership that has to be developed. However, it has to be a consistent policy as well, and a blanket bailing out of its friends is no way to fund business opportunities and investments in Canada, nor is it any way to ensure that young people will be guaranteed those necessary jobs in the future.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of participating in this debate. I am very pleased to have the opportunity of responding to the hon. member's motion.

First, of course, I would be remiss if I did not congratulate the member on having brought this to the attention of the House. I think the member clearly recognizes that the young people are the foundation of Canada, our future prosperity and our competitiveness. Certainly the member also underscores that government has a role to play in helping our young people who will assume the responsibility for running this country in the years to come.

Let us talk for a minute about student unemployment, why we have unemployment and why there are these problems right now.

The simple answer would be that we entered a recession, the economic cycle turned downwards and a lot of Canadians, as a result, have lost their jobs or have reduced employment opportunities. I think all of us will recognize and accept that as a fact.

However, it is time to move beyond that, and certainly beyond attributing blame, and ask some basic and fundamental questions, such as: "Why do we have a recession? What factors caused the recession to take place? Why could we not have avoided this economic trap?" We would have to answer that when the economic cycle started its downturn Canada did not have the resources necessary to combat it. We did not have budgetary surpluses. We did not have the tools at our disposal in order to prevent a recession from taking place in Canada.

When the economic downturn came and the inevitable hard times came we had no alternative but to suffer some body blows, some economic body blows.

We found ourselves, when the recession hit, as a country with a great deal of debt. As a result of that our interest rates were driven higher because we needed to keep refinancing this debt. It is an albatross around our necks. As a result, interest rates went up, which helped contribute to the economic downturn.

At the same time, the high debt also drove taxes higher. We have had a lot of tax increases in the last few years. Yes, middle class taxpayers are paying a very heavy load right now, but that direct increase in taxation is attributable almost directly and solely to the existence of a federal debt which keeps growing. The high debt, of course, is really nothing more than deferred taxes. This is basically my point.

We have a deficit today solely because we have a national debt. We are going to be paying $43 billion in interest this year on the debt alone. That wipes out the government's surplus and we do have a budgetary surplus now of almost $13 billion a year. We take in $13 billion a year more in taxes than we spend on programs, but that whole surplus is wiped out and an extra $30 billion of borrowing caused just because of the interest on the federal debt. This is the root behind our debate today. It is why we had a recession. It is why we could not avoid taking some measures to cushion ourselves from it. It is why we have student unemployment this particular summer.

We continue to go into debt in this country at the rate of $58,000 a minute and that is unacceptable.

As I mentioned a moment ago, a debt is actually deferred taxation. During the Debt Freedom Conference, which went on here in Ottawa, I noticed a statement by Laurent Thibeault, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He said something pretty interesting: "A deficit is really a package of future taxes". He got it exactly right, it is. At that same conference, Michael Wilson, who was then the Minister of Finance, said: "Only if enough Canadians are prepared to speak out and express their views both forcefully and persistently can we build the genuine, political will to stop living beyond our means". That is the whole point of this, political will.

Right now we are, perhaps as a result of having enough political will, continuing an abominable process. We are continuing to steal the future through debts and deficits from our youth and that is not fair. It is generational theft. It is a transferring of wealth from a future generation to one that wants it now, to a generation that wants everything now. That is why the cuts the government has made are responsible, that is why they are needed, that is why a lot of people have said that the government has not even gone far enough and that there needs to be more political will for even deeper cuts.

I think our role, as members of Parliament, is to preserve and save the future. It is very simple. We are here as guardians of a great country, guardians of a great future. It is up to us not to be squandering it. Frankly, we are doing that right now at the rate of $58,000 a minute. I firmly believe this is what the youth of Canada want. I firmly believe that the youth of Canada do not want this squandering to continue. I firmly believe that the youth want to have some hope that their lives will be better than ours, not more indebted and not more taxed.

The member who brought this motion before us today is asking that the government implement immediate measures to alleviate the high rate of unemployment among Canadian youth. In bringing that measure forward, he gives us the impression that the government is not doing anything now, that the government is abdicating its responsibility.

I just spoke for a moment about the need for the government to be more responsible than it is today, to cut even deeper and to protect the future even more. I do not want the impression to persist in any way that the government is sitting on its hands and doing nothing. It is not the case.

There are training programs in place already which are very expensive. A lot of money is being devoted to this. Let me just quickly run through a couple.

The Job Development Program will involve more than 75,000 young people this year. It is designed to enhance the employability of the long-term unemployed, many of them women, young workers and social assistance recipients.

The total participants in the Job Entry Program this year total more than 167,000 people. That program provides integrated training and work experience to help young people, women and social assistance recipients make a transition into the labour market.

There is a Skill Shortages Program, another 113,000 people this year alone who will be participating in that, helping to train young Canadians in skills that are in short supply and providing mobility assistance.

Then there is the Skill Investment Program. There are another 38,000 people this year who will be participating in that. It allows employers to train young workers in new technologies.

There is the Community Futures Program, as well, which offers support to help create business and training opportunities in communities suffering from chronic unemployment and economic dislocation. There are another 10,000 people involved in that.

Over all, under the Canadian Jobs Strategy, we have almost $490 million devoted to training programs and employment assistance for youth. Yet, we have the impression in this Chamber today that the government is abdicating its responsibility. I submit, those are not insignificant amounts of money. It is a lot of money.

The spending, as I mentioned, some would say is too much. Some would say that the government just needs to cut back 10 or 15 per cent across the board in every program. Some would say that we are spending money now that we do not have. Some would say that we are borrowing money now to pay the interest on money we already borrowed.

Some of those voices are right. We are doing that. That just makes the situation worse. Standing here debating a motion which says the government needs to do more, to throw more money at the problem, to raise the $490 million to $690 million or $1 billion a year, is just going to make the situation worse, not better, for young people. They are the taxpayers of tomorrow. The tax burden today, some would submit, and I would agree, is too high. But that is just a taste of things to come, a small taste.

Our debt this year will surpass $400 billion. It is probably going to happen some time in late August or early September. For the first time in Canadian history we will owe $400 billion. That is an amount that just staggers the imagination of most Canadians. They cannot relate to it.

Surveys show that only 2 per cent of Canadians know what $1 billion is. Only 2 per cent know that $1 billion is 1,000 million dollars. We are about to come to a point where we have 400,000 million dollars in accumulated debt.

I said that most people do not know what $1 billion is. Let me put it in this context.

If one had $1,000 a day to spend and one spent that money starting on the day that Christ was born, by today, a billion dollars would not have been spent yet. That is how staggering that amount of money is. Yet, we are going into debt at the rate of $30 billion this year.

I do not think the youth want that. I do not think the youth want a whole bunch more money thrown at them. I think they are more concerned about the money that has already been thrown at them, at us, at everybody else in this country. I think they are more concerned about the $400 billion that they are going to have to pay, and they know full well who is going to pick up the tab. It is not you and me, it is the generation to come next because we cannot even get our deficit down to zero, let alone start repaying our debt.

I think the youth are saying to us that they want their future back. Maybe right now in this House we ought to be debating ways that we can do that instead of debating ways so we can throw more money at the problem.

I mentioned a couple of minutes ago a debt freedom conference that happened here in Ottawa. A number of people came together to try and talk about some creative solutions for solving this problem instead of just burying it under the rug, or worse, burying it under a pile of money.

Here are some of the ideas that came out of that conference. We should stimulate public awareness of the scope of the debt problem in the hope that we can build more political will to take direct action. Let's try and educate the 98 per cent of Canadians who do not even know what a billion dollars is yet as to exactly where the economic future of our country is going.

Let's encourage the disentanglement of governments. There is too much duplication and overlap right now in the system. There are too few co–ordinated policies among various levels of government.

We can get a situation where the federal government, for example, will go and tax taxpayers and collect billions of dollars and then transfer it to the provinces and have no responsibility, no say, no accountability, no direction over how that money is spent.

We have a situation now where one level of government can mandate a program that another level of government has to carry out, and yet there is no accountability for funds being provided. There can be a board of education which is directed by a province to bring in a certain program, and who pays the bill? Not the government which mandated the program, but the property taxpayers in a community who have to then suffer higher property taxes in order to afford it and there is no accountability when you have a system like that. We ought to encourage the disentanglement of government.

We also need to start spending restraint from the bottom up. Governments closest to the taxpayers, municipalities, school boards and police commissions are the most directly accountable forms of government and that is where tax reform ought to take place. There ought to be more mechanisms in which individual property taxpayers can have direct input into some of these boards and commissions where there is not any accountability now whatsoever.

I think we should probably freeze federal spending as a whole. I think there is a political will for doing that out there. I think there is a political will not for throwing more money at the problem, but I think the will does exist that we could have an across the board spending freeze for a short period of time, maybe a couple of years. Maybe we could do a deal between the Government of Canada and the people of Canada whereby we could have a situation where we would accept to have an absolute spending freeze.

I think we ought to find ways of preventing other levels of government from increasing spending to offset restraint at the federal level. We have had a lot of years of tax increases and spending cuts from the federal government and it has been tough and it has hurt. A lot of people sometimes wonder where we are going.

I can tell you when we see a situation, for example, where a provincial budget will come down and provincial spending has been increased by 14 per cent at a single blow, it seems to wipe out a lot of the ground that we have tried to gain at the federal level. I think that is wrong and I think that Canadians are just about fed up with that style of confrontational government.

I think we ought to dedicate taxes more to specific spending programs. I think devoting all the GST revenues to a new national bank account for reducing the deficit was a start. I think a lot of Canadians felt better about that. Paying the GST is not easy. As we found out a few days ago, it is bringing in a lot more money now than was expected.

I think Canadians really want some measure of assurance, some guarantee that that money is not going to disappear into a black hole called Ottawa and end up financing some programs that people never asked for.

Maybe we ought to dedicate more taxes. Maybe we ought to take the tax load, divide it up, and parcel it out for a health care tax, an education tax and an environment tax. Maybe we ought to give people more direct accountability into how they are taxed and a say in where it goes.

One of the easiest ways for us to get a better economic future is if we encourage people to vote for those who promise them less and not more. I think that is probably the more responsible thing to do in the 1990s: vote for people who promise you less.

It would be good if we legislated a timetable to achieve a balanced budget. Maybe we even ought to have a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. Maybe we ought to remove from politicians the ability to run deficits in all but extreme emergency situations.

That is what the youth of Canada would like to see. They would like to see some legislated responsibility and accountability in the system so that they have some guarantee about the security of the future.

We ought to encourage more competition in regulated sectors of the economy. That is important. We ought to try to have a partnership, a committee or some kind of working group where there are taxpayers, business leaders, consumers labour representatives and others to work with the Minister of Finance on a comprehensive debt reduction plan which is not patchwork or hit and miss, but a comprehensive debt reduction plan that takes into account all levels of government.

That is what we are missing now. We have levels of government fighting each other. The response is that we get more debt, less co-operation, waste overlap, duplication and inefficiencies in the system. The time for that has got to end.

We have to review the powers of various levels of government. I think the level of government that stands should be the level—

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I hate to interrupt the defrocked priest of the GST, but I think the subject under discussion right now is what we are going to do for youth unemployment this summer.

I question the test of relevancy.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had perhaps listened during the opening of my remarks, she would have realized the extremely close relationship between the levels of economic activity in an economy, and jobs that are available for our youth.

Right now, we have a situation where we have a recessionary economy which we could not avoid because we did not have the financial, fiscal flexibility in order to avoid getting into that recession.

Now, we are in a recession and there is a direct consequence which is student job loss. You can deal with this in two ways. You can take a short-term, end-of-your-nose look at the economic situation and deal with it over the next 90 days or 120 days and throw a little bit more money at a band-aid project, or you can start thinking about how structural change in an economic sense, in a tax sense or a fiscal sense, will prevent these kinds of meaningless debates from going on in the first place.

We will not need debate in the House of Commons about summer unemployment for students when we can have an economy that is structured, sound and stable. That is the point. I hope the member realizes that there is a cause and effect relationship between a country that goes into debt and a country that loses its financial flexibility. That is exactly where we are today.

I will conclude now, so any members who wish to put a question or comment can. Let me just conclude by saying I do not think the youth of Canada want handouts. I do not think the youth of Canada want minor problems papered over with band-aid solutions when we have major problems threatening our whole economic and financial viability in this country.

There is a cry from the youth of this country for us, as parliamentarians, to realize what has to be done in a structural sense, stop bickering and arguing for political points and the cameras outside, and address these fundamental economic problems.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I raised the question of relevancy because if the member was honest with the people of Canada he would know that already by virtue of his government's cuts, specifically relating to the SEED program, there has been a 35 per cent cut on the backs of students.

In 1985, the program was funded to $149 million and this year, it is going to be funded to $80 million.

The member can blether on all he wants about what his government is going to do with the extra money it gets in its deficit reduction program, but clearly the students of this summer are paying the price for cutbacks of 35 per cent which this member has neither had the guts to defend nor even understand.

I have a very specific question relating to a letter that I have in my possession. I would like the government to explain why, with $80 million still set aside in the SEED program in communities like my own community representing six ridings, the total dollar value spent for student employment in Hamilton—Wentworth and Burlington, right on the border of this member's riding, was $189,000. That is shameful. If you take the average spent per riding, the Hamilton—Wentworth and Burlington area, which has been in a severe recession, which is suffering as a result of the steel industry cutbacks, would at the very least be entitled to $1.6 million.

I want this member to answer the test of fairness: What happened to $1.4 million that should have been going into our community? Why is it that his own government, in Access Awareness Week, had the nerve to send a letter to Hamilton city council denying them a grant for $3,800 to paint sidewalks to permit the Hamilton business area to be accessible to the visually impaired? How dare he, in Access Awareness Week, send pamphlets across the country to litter most of our waste boxes when they deny this very legitimate program funding? Because they are ripping off the Hamilton area to the tune of $1.4 million.

I would like the facts on that particular issue.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): I thank the member for her gracious and thoughtful question. I am glad she shares my concerns about the future of youth and the problems we face.

Ms. Copps: You didn't talk about the young people who need jobs this summer.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, the member said students are paying the price for government cuts now. I am not going to argue with her because I don't want to argue with her; it is counter-productive. I do not think anything gets served. Have there been cuts? Yes, there have been cuts. Some people may then be hurt by government cuts. Yes. I am not going to deny that. I do not want to get into a partisan fight.

I just want to say, and my point is, that students are paying the price in an economic sense not just for cuts but for debts, for decisions made in this Chamber by politicians over the last 20 years who decided that instead of taxing today they would tax tomorrow. Well, tomorrow came. Now we face a situation where we cannot avoid recessions when they come. We do not have the flexibility to set our own interest rates. We lose our financial ability to control our own economy. That is because of decisions made here 15, 12, 10, 8 years ago, and they are affecting our youth today.

I do not want to fight with you because I think probably we can make some sort of agreement on those facts. But the point is can we get our noses off the page of today and on to the page of tomorrow? What things are we going to do to prevent the decisions being made again in this Chamber that 10 or 15 years from now will end up having the same impact on people?

Ms. Copps: Yes, 35 per cent.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, running a country isn't easy, and it is even less so when we are faced with a catastrophic financial and budgetary situation, with a debt that will soon total $400 billion. Of course, everyone is prepared to offer solutions to this kind of problem, and to ours in particular. Of course we could print more money, according to the principle: Fly now and pay later. However, it was this disastrous policy which created problems for the past 25 years and which is now the reason we cannot deal with them once and for all, as we would like to do.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Halton—Peel eloquently described the dramatic situation facing us today, which is how to deal with the kind of debt we have. We can no longer afford to fly now and pay later. We are faced with a crushing debt, and that is why we must take a more rational look at the situation. Hysterical statements are useless, Madam Speaker. We have to run this country calmly and rationally, and do what has to be done.

I agree we must deal with the employment problems encountered by our young people. That being said, I have the following question for the hon. member: What kind of role could the government play to deal with a situation that is particularly dramatic among our Native people, something I fully acknowledge and everybody in this government realizes?

Perhaps the hon. member would care to comment.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, the government has established a Pathways consultation process to directly involve Canadian native representatives in the administration of employment and training programs. Two hundred million dollars is going to be made available through the programs of Employment and Immigration Canada for the training and re-employment of natives, including native youth. A large share of that $200 million will be directly managed by aboriginal management boards. The Pathways process is complementary, I think, to the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, which will involve—as we mentioned earlier in this debate—the private sector partnership directly in the management of skills training for unemployed people.

I thank the member for his question. There is some real hope that there is going to be hands-on aboriginal management of these funds and I think they will be spent in a very sensitive way because of that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, the Student Employment Centre in Kamloops is watching the debate this afternoon and just phoned in to ask me to tell some of the speakers that they do not consider providing money for Challenge '91 programs to be throwing money at students. They do not feel that providing support through government programs to assist students to attend colleges and universities is throwing money at the problem. I just want to pass that along to my hon. friend. While he might find comfort using that term, the students who are watching the program today are not pleased.

I would also point out on their behalf that in Kamloops alone, 1,200 students have applied for summer employment and as a result of the various programs, 371 jobs have been identified. We still have a shortfall of about 850 students. Hopefully things will change.

My question to my hon. friend is the following. I do not suppose anybody is suggesting we throw money around. I am not sure what that term even means, but I have not heard anybody suggest that on this side at all. However, surely it is a matter of priorities. In other words, we do have a lot of money in the federal coffers, tens of billions of dollars. We spend about $14 million a day on our armed forces; the government found $5.5 million for a comedy club in Montreal; the member who is knowledgeable on taxation issues will know that the government had just approved a continuation of a tax program to benefit the richest families in Canada through a special trust account program that enables families—extremely wealthy families—to avoid paying taxes. That is probably now worth about $50 billion, $50 billion.

The question I have for my hon. friend is this. As opposed to assisting young people in a meaningful way, young people in a school now or out of school, would he not think that would be more appropriate perhaps than the $50 billion we are losing in this ongoing tax haven for the wealthiest families of Canada, or for things like the $5.5 million that his government thought was appropriate to support a comedy club in Montreal.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, first to define what "throwing money around" means. I would use a definition of spending money you do not have. I think that would be a good place to start. That is where the Government of Canada is starting.

Mr. Riis: Like a house mortgage is throwing money around?

Ms. Catterall: Somebody forgot to pay off the debt.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): An interesting analogy is brought up by some members about mortgage and about the fact of borrowing to acquire assets. It is an interesting analogy because right now we have a mortgage on Canada which is $400 billion this year, and our mortgage payments are about $43 billion this year. That is $30 billion more than we have in our own bank account.

Can you imagine running a household that way, where you have to borrow to make most of your mortgage payments, and then add that on to the principal of the mortgage? That is what we are doing. The reason we have a $400 billion debt this year is because of the magic of compound interest. There was a debt in place in 1984 of almost $200 billion. As anyone who has an RRSP knows, if you put interest on a debt which you cannot pay because you have an operating deficit, your debt is going to increase. That is the reason.

The member talks about the possibility of tax reform in terms of dealing with residual, accumulated wealth. I do not have a problem with some of the philosophy behind what he is saying. I do not have a problem, for example, with the concept of examining succession duties. I think maybe that is a reasonable way to tap into some of the wealth which exists in a private pool. I think we ought to look at all these things. In a country with the economic situation we have, we have to look at all types of things.

If the member is suggesting finding $50 billion in tax revenue fairly quickly out of the economy, I think that is a recipe for economic disaster.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, our youth are an extremely important part of our society and I feel this government is letting them down.

It is no secret that the experience of unemployment is an unpleasant one. You lose your place in society. You suffer financially and you suffer a loss of your sense of self-worth. Who are we subjecting this experience to more than any other group in society? It is our young.

So far, from early on, we are sending a message to our young people that we do not need them.

I would like to read something David Brazil said to the Newfoundland and Labrador Advisory Council: "The unique nature of our youth employment showed that in terms of a cause and effect relationship, unemployment may lead to certain problems or stem from others. People who had experienced unemployment, or that of a close relative, generally experience lower self-esteem, lower satisfaction with life and feelings of social alienation and they were incapable of controlling their own lives. Through these psychological factors and their link with unemployment, it is very easy to see how early experiences with joblessness can lead to social problems such as alcohol, drug abuse and crime."

At the point in their lives when we need to encourage our young people to join our society as full fledged and responsible participants, what do we do?

We subject them to one of the most demoralizing experiences; unemployment. We strip them of their confidence and we strip them of the opportunity to get a start on their career. If they are students, we make it all the more difficult for them to pay their tuition, buy their books and feed and clothe themselves.

What are we telling them? What is this House telling them? What we are telling them is that we do not care. What we are telling them is that they are not as important to us as other expenditures might be.

Nothing could be farther from the truth and the government has to realize this fact.

The members opposite must open their eyes to this problem. They cannot afford to greet our unemployed young with the same disdain and distraction as they do with other social programs.

Unfortunately, this government seems capable of little more than successive attempts to try to put the blame somewhere else; on the provinces, and if that fails, on our youth. It is the old blame the victim mentality.

When the Leader of the Opposition called upon the government to take action on student unemployment, what did the Minister of State for Privatization say? He said: "If they look hard enough for jobs they will find them." Well I do not know where the minister has been, because if you go into a riding like Haldimand—Norfolk and you walk on the streets, that is where you will see the kids. They are still pounding the pavement looking for work and it is not there.

Federal funding for student jobs has decreased from $149 million in 1985 to just $80 million in 1991.

At the same time, repeated cuts in federal transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education have resulted in spiralling tuition costs for students. Students are trapped in a situation in which they have to pay even more to stay in school. They have to get even higher grades just to get into school, while at the same time they cannot find the jobs to pay the tuition. If they do find a job, they have to work longer hours to pay their skyrocketing bills and they still have to keep up their grades.

Over the past two and a half years that I have been a member, I have been speaking to many young people throughout my riding and elsewhere. Over that time the mood has worsened dramatically. They are growing more and more disillusioned with our system and frustrated by their uncertain future. There are hundreds of thousands of students leaving secondary schools this month, most with no prospects for a job, and there are thousands moving on to post-secondary education with no prospects for summer employment which they will need to pay for that education.

Last summer, close to 120,000 students were returning to school and these students were unemployed. The unemployment rate for these students age 15 to 24 ranged from 17.6 per cent in Newfoundland to 9.4 per cent in B.C. Even at the lowest rate, the student unemployment rate was well over 8 per cent more than the annual average unemployment rate for the general population, and by many accounts, this year is even more desperate for our students.

In rural areas rates are much, much higher. In my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk, there are the areas controlled by the Six Nations and the Mississauga band councils. The unemployment rate among our native youth is tragically high, as high as some 90 per cent in some areas of our country. That is disgusting.

For our riding of Haldimand—Norfolk there are options. Why not put a trade school in there? Why not set government priorities to directly work out solutions to this native unemployment situation? The solutions are there. This government must take action. This government seems unwilling to help in any real way. The former Minister of State for Youth did acknowledge in the 1991 Challenge booklet that it is expected that job prospects may be more difficult given the current economic situation. He announced in February that funding for the SEED Program was being increased by $3 million. Three million comes nowhere near to the $41.8 million it cut from SEED last year. It gave back a pittance, $3 million out of a $41 million cut. From 1985 to 1991, funding for the SEED Program has been cut in half from $143 million in 1985 to just $77 million in 1990. These cuts mean that 40,000 fewer jobs were created in 1990 than in 1985.

During the same time, the average length of a SEED funded job fell from 10.8 weeks to 9.5. In those five years the average gross wage earned by students in SEED funded jobs increased by only $234. This goes nowhere to cover the increased costs which these students are facing. During those same five years, because the government has cut transfer payments to education, tuition fees across Canada increased anywhere from 20 per cent to 150 per cent.

The Canadian Federation of Students has done a very informative paper on the critical issue of the government's summer employment program, aptly entitled It is Time for a Change. The CFS notes in its paper that the Ministry of Employment and Immigration has been reallocating funds from the SEED Program to other programs, like the Work Orientation Workshops and the Stay In School initiative. While it is critical that the government develop funds and programs to combat the unacceptable rate of high school dropouts, I find it objectionable that the government decided to take these sorely needed funds from the student's summer job programs. The government seems to be telling our youth: please do not drop out of school, but once you are in school and you need a summer job, we cannot afford to give it to you. Equally disturbing is the funding explained in the CFS paper: in 1986 and 1987, the most current years available, women made $263 and $302 less than men in the SEED funded jobs. This government must rethink its policies before it slips completely over the edge.

In 1990, the average gross wage of a SEED funded job was $2,334. Tuition fees are as high as $2,100 for full-time arts students. We are not at a point after six years of Conservative rule where a student after spending the summer at an average SEED job will have more than several hundred dollars left.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are motioning me for time. I believe I should have another two minutes left, but you can check with the desk.

I see you are motioning me. In closing, I just want to say that after checking Hansard for the last five years, this government has not brought forward a motion or programs in this House to debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Johnson): I am going to have to interrupt. The member's agreed upon time has elapsed.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté: No doubt about it, Mr. Speaker, I have been hearing members tell untruths. They most certainly did, and I would like to quote some interesting statistics.

It was mentioned earlier, among others things, that the funding was increased by $3 million only. But did you know that, in some areas, increases may not come as anticipated or hoped? Of course it is possible! There may be a new distribution, a reallocation of funds depending on the region and the needs. That is what administration is about: a more equitable distribution among regions to allow those that do not have the financial capability to develop to find some answers.

Another untruth was stated, Mr. Speaker. There was a net increase between 1984 and 1991, from 53.8 per cent in 1984 to 56.4 per cent. We have to keep the record straight. This means three per cent more jobs. So, let us call it as it is.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, here is my question: since we are here to manage deficits and debts that we do not want to pass on to our young people 20 years down the road, what would my hon. colleague suggest we do to manage equitably youth employment in the difficult circumstances we are in, especially given the debt we have been draging for 25 years? What would he do to turn this dramatic situation around overnight without increasing the debt? I want him to tell me, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speller: I think it is known throughout the world, but unfortunately this government does not know that investment in our youth is investment in Canada. The fact of the matter is, and I would point out to the hon. member, that from 1985 to 1991, funding for the SEED Program has been cut in half. The numbers speak for themselves; from $149.3 million in 1985 to $77 million in 1990. That is not an investment in our youth. These students need these jobs. There is an increase in tuition fees and the increase in all costs of going to school, providing an education for themselves have increased. Unfortunately, the jobs have not increased and the funding for SEED has not increased.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a very specific question, because I know that the member for Haldimand—Norfolk has a number of Stelco employees in his riding, as there is a factory there. He will also be aware that the desperate situation we face in Hamilton was further compounded by an article in today's Financial Times, which claims that Hilton Works in Hamilton may close completely and forever in the month of August.

That particular operation employs 7,000 workers, and according to the Financial Times, police in Hamilton have been asked to reschedule their vacations to stem the flow of violence that may flow from an empty Hilton Works.

I would like to ask the member if, given the desperate economic situation that we are facing in particular in the steel industry which is in desperate trouble—and obviously with rumours of this nature circulating in a respected national newspaper which have set the telephones ringing off the wall in my constituency office—this is the time that the government should be cutting funding, particularly for summer jobs which are already in such short supply.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Johnson): I regret to inform you that the agreed upon time for questions and comments will expire following a brief answer from the hon. member.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for her question. I too was shocked when I heard the amount of SEED money that was pulled out of the Hamilton and Wentworth area because a number of people from my constituency go there for jobs. I am shocked to hear that it may be true about Hilton Works because a number of students from my area have the opportunity of working in the steel industry not only there but throughout my riding. I know that the hon. member will continue to watch this and make the House aware of what is happening in that situation.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in my remarks concerning this question of high unemployment among Canadian youth.

I want to put on the record the fact that many young people today who are coming out of school are looking for work in our big population centres in Canada. They are moving from the rural areas in search of work in Alberta and Toronto and British Columbia, even more so today than yesterday, even more so this year than last year, or the year before.

I want to bring to the attention of the House and put on the record the fact that the Government of Canada has said to every young person in Canada who wanted to pursue the occupation of fishing, which contributes to our economy perhaps more so than that of a person who sits in an office, it has said to a fisherman, any fisherman, to a prospective fisherman, that they are not allowed any more in eastern Canada to be a fisherman.

The government froze all commercial fishing licences right around the eastern coast of Newfoundland. That is quite an amazing thing for the Government of Canada to do. It is quite a drastic thing to say that nobody, but nobody, is allowed any more to get either a fishing licence or a boat licence.

Just imagine a young man or young woman growing up in a family that fished all of their lives. All of a sudden he or she is told by the Government of Canada that they cannot pursue that job.

They cannot make that their profession for the rest of their life, or even today, tomorrow, the summer, the fall or all year because the government has frozen all groundfish licences. It has frozen all boat licences because the Government of Canada claims there are too many people in the fishery.

Imagine a young person who grew up in a fishing community, went to school there, went out and helped his father, his uncle and his family for years and years since he was 13 or 14 years old. Then he or she is told by the Government of Canada: "You have to go to Alberta to look for work because we are not allowed to give out any more licences, the reason being because there is not enough fish."

There are not enough fish. I have a letter here, written to the Government of the Soviet Union on March 22 of this year, to the U.S.S.R. Ministry of Fisheries, saying the following: "Initial quotas are allocated to the U.S.S.R. within the Canadian 200-mile zone in 1991—cod, redfish, turbot, squid, capelin, mackerel".

There are all of the tonnages listed off. Then, if I go to the other quota tables I will see Cuba and the Faerøe Islands, the group of islands off Denmark. They have quotas.

This year there is the G.D.R. I presume that is the German Democratic Republic which is now really the EEC, because it joined the EEC last year. There is Japan, Norway and Poland.

The question arises as to what is wrong with the Government of Canada that it would freeze every single young person in eastern Canada out of the fishing industry and say to him or her: "You are not allowed to fish anymore."

I have come to the conclusion that the Government of Canada has made the incredible mistake of concluding that fish do not swim. I say that because the government has given quotas to all these foreign nations on the basis that if it gives it to them off the Labrador coast: "They can do it up there because a lot of people are looking for licences off the Newfoundland coast."

The government assumes that by drawing lines in the middle of the Atlantic, every fish is going to stop when it gets to the line and it will never cross over the line.

It probably has the RCMP on the line saying: "You are not allowed to go any further". There is a stop sign somewhere. Maybe it has an electric fence that goes down through the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. The government believes that fish do not swim.

The other mistake it makes is by giving, for example, the Soviet Union a quota of capelin. It says: "Oh well, we are giving this to the Soviet Union because that capelin can only be caught in the fall when it is not roe bearing. It is not spawning". It says: "We leave the spawning capelin in the spring to Canadians. We reserve it for Canadians".

How can a Canadian catch a spawning capelin in the spring when the Soviet Union caught the non-spawning capelin in the fall?

The Government of Canada should reassess its policy of putting a total freeze on all licences for fishing in eastern Canada. It should reassess it on the basis that there is no logic or rationale that can be used.

The government is saying to a young person today in a fishing community that: "You, a young person in Canada, are not allowed ever to get a licence to pursue the occupation that your family has pursued for years", while at the same time, the young man can sit in the evening, look out on the ocean and see the lights of those foreign vessels offshore catching the very fish that he made an application to catch through the Government of Canada.

With those few remarks, I will take my seat. We are all expecting the minister of fisheries, of course, to change all of these decisions that were made two months ago by the Government of Canada and we are waiting for him to turn around, come into this House and say: "Look, we are going to allow Canadian youth to enter the fishing industry."

After all, we do not outlaw them from entering the legal profession or the medical profession, or from becoming a carpenter or a logger or a miner. But we outlaw them, we say: "You are not allowed to become a fisherman in this country". That is absolutely outrageous and outright discrimination against the youth of Canada.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to the very distinguished member for Gander—Grand Falls here this afternoon raise this whole concern, and one he understands very well with respect to the fishing industry from that great province of Newfoundland, but he erred. He erred this afternoon, in my view, by suggesting that it is the fishery and the lack of fish or the policies of the Government of Canada with respect to fishing that has caused some demise to the youth who were neglected by this government.

Why did he not, one would wonder, bring forward so that everyone could hear the fact that this government is providing $40 million to Newfoundland alone for its youth on a five-year program. This is one of a kind in Canada other than, I believe, New Brunswick. It is providing $40 million with an agreement with their provincial government to, in fact, assist many young people with the problems that they face.

He is not the only one who understands the fisheries of this country, because the riding I represent has a large commercial fishing industry. It is one that the hon. member never even thought of with 1,200 commercial fishermen, and now experiencing some low catches as well as low prices.

The hon. member in front of me on this side of the House says: "You have fishermen?" Yes, 1200 commercial fishermen in one riding of mine alone.

It is not just the fishing industry. This government, which the hon. member failed to recognize, has with an agreement with that province come to the rescue of youth. Now he may say that is not enough, but if you were to compare that $40 million going by this government into the province of Newfoundland with other provinces, you would find it most lucrative.

I do not know if he is suggesting it should be doubled or the provincial government should also double. I do not know what he is suggesting. But to stand in his place here today and suggest that due to the policies with respect to some contracts going out to the Russians on some pregnant fish that they wanted to catch, and making a lot of fun about it, is not going to help the youth of Newfoundland, I don't suspect. How many may go out to fish and not stay in school, maybe become drop-outs because they have to assist in bringing home some sustenance for their families? That may be a case in point.

This government clearly has done a great deal in an area he never even wanted to bring up in his comments this afternoon. He wanted to put it on the record. But $40 million is not something you can just flinch at and say is nothing.

I would like him to make a comment on that.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I did not mention the money for summer student employment because I wanted to make one point about young people who are coming out of school. However, the hon. member has just mentioned it. I know his riding fairly well in Manitoba, and what he did not mention—of course, he said now they have a lucrative commercial fishery in fresh fish; that is absolutely correct—but I understand from talking to the Department of Fisheries personnel, is that they are claiming that this hon. member is actually making arrangements to have a company set up in his riding to process fish from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. So he could go on and he could also mention that.

I will tell him now why I did not mention this $40 million. The change was made when this Conservative government took over. Before, under the Liberal administrations we had a great deal of money for non-profit organizations, for recreation groups and this sort of thing. A lot of this money that the hon. gentleman is talking about goes to private enterprise which now qualifies for the funds.

So we do see it. If the hon. member went over the list of jobs that he is talking about that are actually funded through private enterprise, he would see fast food take-out places funded for summer student employment. A lot of them, I maintain, would still hire the students regardless of whether the Government of Canada did it or not. Bartenders are funded for the summer under the Youth Employment Program. The bartender would have been hired anyway. It just shows the Conservative slant of this government in taking the youth employment money and redirecting it to where the jobs would have been anyway.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to join my colleagues in responding to the hon. member's motion concerning youth employment.

In particular, I would like to focus my response on the Challenge program, the government's highly successful and innovative summer employment initiative for Canadian students which is now in its seventh year.

As I do so, I would like to not only relate the Challenge program on a national basis but also to draw comparisons with the Challenge program at work in my own riding of Fredericton—York— Sunbury during the current year.

What makes the Challenge program so successful is not just the thousands of summer jobs it provides young people; what makes it successful is the fact the various Challenge components offer meaningful work experience and positive reinforcement that will help participants meet the future demands of a highly competitive work force.

It is this far-sighted approach that has, in fact, defined this government's approach to all of our youth programs, be it Stay in School, Job Entry, elements of the labour force development strategy, the START program or many of the other initiatives designed with our young people's long-term employability in mind.

It is relatively easy for a government to haphazardly throw together so-called make work programs for young people every summer. But it is quite another thing to create a consistent co-ordinated program like Challenge, a program that generates employment opportunities that enhance the critical school-to-work transition, a program that attempts to address the long-term labour force market challenges faced not only by our youth but by employers as well.

Let there be no underestimating the scope of this challenge. Jobs are becoming more high tech and the educational requirements are getting stiffer almost as we speak. And yet while at least seven out of ten new jobs required in the 1990s and beyond will require at least 12 years of education, our entry labour pool population of 16- to 24-year-olds is actually diminishing. Clearly, if a third of a steadily shrinking labour force of youth lacks the necessary education or training for tomorrow's jobs, we have to ask: "Who is going to fill those jobs". If we cannot supply workers for the jobs of the future, we have to ask: "How will Canada ever compete in a global economy?"

It is in this context of squarely facing such urgent questions that the government has chosen to frame its youth initiatives. To simply throw money, as I have said, at short-term make-work programs that deal only with results instead of with causes would be irresponsible and finally disastrous. Because, simply put, if the school drop-out status quo is maintained and if the present low rate of on-the-job training continues, we as a country can look forward to decreased productivity, to decreased competitiveness and, finally, to a decreased standard of living.

That is why our youth initiatives focus on work experience, on career information and education, and on skill development. That is why we have targeted young people most at risk of leaving high school and those attempting to enter the labour market without having completed their education as the chief priorities.

That is also why we are emphasizing the development of human skill potential, the key ingredient to diversifying our economy, to competing globally and to creating jobs. That is why the Challenge program is so important.

The federal government is justifiably proud of the Challenge program. It combines work with education, creates thousands of summer jobs for students, fosters the learning-by-doing concept, and forges partnerships in all sectors of the economy. It is a preventive program in every sense of the word, pro-active rather than re-active, a program designed to build for the future today. The various challenge options respond to a wide range of employment needs from assistance for students seeking entrepreneurial opportunities to counselling support for younger students looking to come to terms with their education and employment choices.

The Challenge program encourages employers to create jobs for students and help provide valuable work experience for Canada's future labour force. Employers take advantage of the program to assess the potential of their future employees.

Another positive element of the Challenge program is its adaptability, both regionally and in terms of its over all national emphasis. Therefore, over the past two years, the changing student employment situation has led us to shift our focus to provide more assistance to those who have the most problems in the labour market. More emphasis has been placed on high school students, who traditionally have the most difficulty finding summer employment, as well as on potential and recent high school dropouts.

With this in mind, the government has increased funding for the SEED component of Challenge '91, while maintaining funding levels for all other challenge components.

In 1991, the Challenge Summer Student Employment Program will receive $143 million nationally with another $27.2 million allocated in ongoing funding to special youth strategy programs on a federal-provincial basis in both New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury this will amount to $1.1 million for the summer of 1991, plus an additional $1.8 million through the federal-provincial youth strategy during other portions of the 1991-92 year.

A moment ago I mentioned the Summer Employment Experience Development program, or SEED as it is called. I would like to take this opportunity to touch briefly on it and the various other challenge components.

In terms of resource allocation, SEED is the largest component of the Challenge program, receiving $80 million this year. SEED asks employers to create quality jobs for students and then subsidizes the students' wages for the summer. In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury there is a total of $823,000 spent out of $1.1 million on the SEED program, which will enable 360 individual employers to engage for the summer 450 students. SEED is a very active, dynamic and important program in the Fredericton—York—Sunbury riding.

SEED has been a proven catalyst across the country for the creation of summer jobs that enable young people to contribute to society and that support the government's social priorities. Jobs in the areas of literacy, substance abuse, AIDS education, the environment and urban crime are therefore high on our eligibility list.

As well, this year's program will again encourage the hiring of visible minorities, aboriginal youth, disabled young people and the creation of activities designed to meet the needs of these groups.

The SEED program is divided into two streams, one for high school students starting jobs in late June or early July, and the other for college and university students for jobs normally starting in the month of May.

In 1990, high school students accounted for about 40 per cent of the SEED participants and female participation in the program reached 54 per cent.

Altogether, last summer SEED subsidized approximately 29,000 employers which created roughly 54,000 brand new jobs, many in the parts of the country hardest hit by student unemployment. I would like to repeat that the SEED program in 1991, this summer, will permit 350 employers in my riding to provide 450 students with summer work.

The second major component of the Challenge program is the Work Orientation Workshop or WOW program. In 1991, WOW will retain last year's funding level of $35.2 million across Canada. In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury that figure for 1991 will be $275,000.

WOW is geared to the needs of our main target group, young people who are at risk of quitting school before they graduate. It encourages students to continue their education by providing work experience and life skills training.

WOW combines workshop counselling with practical on the job experience and academic support. This powerful combination is one of the most effective techniques for providing recent and potential drop-outs with new options for their future both in school and in the labour force.

In fact, so effective has the Work Orientation Workshop concept become that some WOW initiatives now run year-round. Last year in Canada nearly 16,000 young people participated in WOW projects. In 1991, in my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury between 120 and 150 students, depending upon the final calculations, will participate in these Workshop Orientation programs which have been so effective, both nationally and in every local riding.

A pivotal co-ordinating element of the Challenge program is the network of Canada Employment Centres for students, which will receive $9.7 million this year. There are approximately 420 of these student placement offices right across the country. During the summer months they help students find jobs and help employers locate workers. The Canada Employment Centre for students offers a free placement service for employers. There is no charge for listing a job vacancy.

I am pleased to say that the Canada Employment Centre for students is fully utilized and fully at work in my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

In 1990 the Canada Employment Centres recorded more than 270,000 student placements across Canada. That is very fine work. Excellent results for a specialized student employment centre.

The fourth component of Challenge is the business drive for jobs. Our partners are the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Retail Council of Canada and business members across the country. The core of this program is business talking to business about the benefits of hiring students. This year the funding contribution to that program will be $805,000 to provide financial and advertising support. That is also a very effective and very important program.

Finally, there is the Native Internship Program to which the Challenge program will contribute $2.3 million in 1991. In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury that figure will be $64,300 and will employ 15 students in 10 government departments.

The Native Internship Program provides aboriginal students with valuable work experience at Employment and Immigration Canada offices and in other departments across the country.

Last summer in Canada almost 500 native students benefited from participation in this program.

In reviewing these Challenge components, it is clear that the common link is relevance to both student and labour market needs. It is clear too, from the feedback the government receives every year from students and employers alike that this approach to summer work is the right one, particularly in light of Canada's competitive priorities for the 1990s.

Through the Challenge program, not only do we encourage students to stay in school, but we also give them a chance to acquire the experience and the skills they will need to find jobs in Canada's future workforce. Employers for their part benefit from the nurturing of an efficient and dynamic labour force.

The hon. member's concern with employment in this motion and with the prospects for the summer of Canadian young people is a concern all members of this House and certainly this government share. It is a concern that this government is clearly committed to addressing through focused and effective programs such as the Challenge program and the components of it which I have described, all of which have long-term implications for our youth and for our labour market as a whole.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of a Ways and Means motion respecting the Income Tax Act and other legislation, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated to debate the motion.

ALLOTED DAY, S.O. 81—UNEMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Parent (p. 1319).

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have often heard members in this House blaming our government for inadequate policies.

Today, I would like to correct that impression. Our government is constantly rethinking its youth assistance policies. More than ever, the government wants to show our kids how to grow their own food instead of increasing their dependency by feeding them.

Government funding for youth programs has not diminished. We are simply trying to do better with the same amount of money. We try to encourage our private sector partners, business people and community agencies to take charge of the labour market with our support. The government has a new approach. We do not want to create local jobs that would lead to youth assistance dependency; instead we want to help our young people by making their transition to the labour market easier. Why should we key on paying for jobs which would exist anyway?

There is no need to create jobs for just about anyone. Several workers are able to find jobs without government assistance. So, our government chooses to keep its funding for the most needy. Our initiatives are future-oriented. We opt for more preventive measures. The stay-in-school project is a good example.

Other programs will follow to help prepare our kids to meet tomorrow's challenge. I have a question for my hon. colleague about the stay-in-school project.

[English]

The opposition has talked a lot about summer jobs for students. This is the objective of one of several youth programs, but programming for summer student jobs does not help the 30 per cent of Canadian youth who drop out.

My question: Can the member tell the House what concrete steps the government is taking to assist youth to stay in school.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, the government recognizes that unemployment can lead to very severe social problems and that the greatest at-risk component of our student population is, as the hon. member says, the close to 30 per cent who will not finish high school.

One very significant program which has been introduced on a pilot basis, an experimental basis in Newfoundland and in New Brunswick to which I have referred, is the youth strategy through which year-round access offices have been established. Counselling services have been established to encourage young people who are out of school or contemplating leaving school to review their future, to come to terms with education requirements and to come to terms with their future in the job market.

In my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury, that youth strategy will have a total application of almost $2.3 million in the 1991 year, of which about $275,000, or 10 per cent, will be attributed to the workshop orientation program in the summer.

That is a federal-provincial shared program, 70 per cent supported by the federal government and 30 per cent by the provincial government. I think the program in Newfoundland is similar, although I do not have the exact details.

All I can say is that is one very dramatic initiative which this government has taken in company with the province of New Brunswick and the province of Newfoundland to address that very specific area to which my hon. friend refers.

The WOW programs which I have described in my address, while they are summer work programs, also address the prospective high school dropout with the combination of on-the-job experience, counselling and training with a view to returning to high school to complete education and then on to the job opportunities which have been identified through the WOW experience, frequently on a permanent basis.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I see by the clock that we have about 20 minutes and by prior agreement we would have the 20 minutes on our side to speak. We have two members who are going to speak, and I just wanted to advise the Chair that they would each be taking the 10 minutes. I do not know how that would work with regard to the questions after they speak but I would ask your indulgence and the indulgence of the House, seeing as both these members have done a great deal of preparation, to get them both on.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the first member. He is being recognized for a period of 10 minutes, which is to be followed by a 5-minute period of question or comments, and whether it is used or not is not the Speaker's choice. The Speaker will recognize people who are standing and then I will recognize the other member for whatever time there is remaining.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I would also like to say a few words on this very important resolution put down by my friend and my colleague from Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold. I suppose of the many issues that we have the opportunity of debating in the House, none is more important than the substance of the resolution which my colleague and friend has put before us today. It calls upon this government to implement measures immediately to alleviate the devastatingly high rate of unemployment amongst Canadian youth.

I know the House has heard it several times today, but I thought having listened to my friend from Fredericton—York—Sunbury that it was time again to remind the House of what the resolution says. I say to him that I listened with great care to what he had to say and for the most part nobody on this side will argue with what he said. There are some things he did not say that I would have liked to hear him say, but I will not put words in his mouth. In his talking about the Challenge program and how good it is, and the Work Orientation Workshop and how good it is, we do not argue with that. We argue, we take exception, to the way the government has tried to gut these programs, to use a good Newfie expression. We take exception to the manner in which, in real terms, the government has taken what has the potential to be a good program and rendered it impotent by not giving it the amount of money that it needs to function effectively and to reach those thousands of people out there, young people, who are on the unemployment rolls.

He read his speech well. It is a marvellous idea he pushes, and we support the same idea. He stopped short by not telling us what he is doing on behalf of the people of Fredericton—York—Sunbury, and by extension the people of Canada, to beat some sense into the thinking of this government that this is not a time to renege. His own words condemn his argument when he says the WOW program has the same amount of money that it had last year. Implicit is the admission that in effect there is a cutback. Everybody out there knows that with inflation, if you have only the same amount of money as you had last year, you have to cut back somewhere. His own statement gives a lie to the argument he tries to make. His own statement tells us that there is, in real terms, not as much money in this program or in other programs as there was last year.

The reason we bring forward this motion today is because youth unemployment, the whole area we focused on today, for all the rhetoric, for all the brave speech-making on the other side, has become a wasteland. It is an economic nightmare when you realize what is happening to the talent, to the potential and to the skills out there vested in those young people. It is the pillaging of a resource. Our most valuable and precious resource is being wilfully pillaged by this government.

There can be no other explanation for it. The government is pillaging, devastating, brow-beating and pummelling our most valuable and precious resource. What is happening here is a human tragedy. It is a double tragedy that men and women on the other side will stand up and try to condone what is going on here, try to put a good face on it and try to pretend that disaster somehow is a success. It is a human tragedy of considerable magnitude.

The youth jobs are drying up. The tuition rates are going up in the universities. The students' ability to even get an education is being further limited by this government with the cutbacks and the freeze, first for two years and now up to five years in transfer payments.

Consider that in the province that I come from, the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, the unemployment rate according to the Statistics Canada figures for April, 1991, was 33.5 per cent. One-third or one out of every three young Newfoundlanders 18 to 24 is walking around, not because he or she is lazy, not because he or she will not go to work, but because there is no work to go to.

Those programs that my friend from Fredericton—York—Sunbury made reference to a few minutes ago could help bridge the gap for some of those people if the government had not been so niggardly, stingy, or deliberate in its plan. I say deliberate because I see in the government's approach to youth unemployment the latest indication of its brutal and single-minded consistency. This government always hits the most vulnerable. Look around you. Look at what it has done for the aged and for the sick in terms of the cutbacks in transfer payments for health. Look at what it has done to children in terms of family allowance payments. Look at rural people in terms of rural post office closures and railway abandonments and so on. Look at small business, the most vulnerable in any sector. In business it is the small business. In society generally it is rural as opposed to urban. Among humans it is children as opposed to adults. It is the aged as opposed to others. It is the sick as opposed to the healthy.

This government, you would think with deliberate intent, sat down with a pencil and said: "Okay, who is the worst off out there, who can we hit, who is most vulnerable?" In its exercise it came across students, students who were already having difficulty staying in college to complete their education so they would be better off. This is the crowd that preaches training and preaches qualification and it has cut those students off at the knees, those very students who want to get qualified. It has cut them off with higher tuition fees and other expenses which make university almost impossible for many of them.

This government has a brutal consistency. It goes out there and it hits those who are most vulnerable. In this present example, it hits the students, the young people, whose rate of unemployment, particularly in Newfoundland as I have said, is one-third in the age group 18 to 24.

This government is brutally, brutally consistent. It kicks you while you are down. The students are down right now, the young people are down, the 18 to 24 age group is down because of the economy and down because of increased expenses of going on to college and continuing their education. These people are down and out.

So what does this government do? It is consistent all right. It kicks you while you are down and now it kicks the student.

In the same vein it turns a blind eye, it turns a deaf ear because it cannot be argued that those students' plight has not been put on the floor of this House of Commons. It cannot be argued that the government does not know what the problem is. The government has symbolically shown that it understands very well what the problem is because it has crafted programs to deal with the problem, but then it will not fund those programs. It will not fund them adequate to the need.

I say again to my friend from New Brunswick that the WOW program and the Challenge program are marvellous programs.

You will not find anybody on this side of the House knocking the programs as concepts, as workable functional utilitarian ideas. Our plea is for the government to literally put its money where its mouth is. If it cares as much about youth unemployment as its spokespeople have said today it does, let it put more money into those particular programs.

In conclusion, I reinforce what my friend from Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold has so well said in his speech today. The time has come for the government to implement immediately some measures to cure this problem before it becomes an overwhelming and consuming tragedy. The loss will be ours if we lose the skills the potential and the future of those tens and thousands of young people who are out there walking around because they would just like to have some work to go to.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): I have a couple of comments on the hon. member's speech. He talks about the funding for post-secondary education. I suspect that he does not really have the latest figures in terms of the percentage of government funding for post-secondary education that is now held by the Government of Canada.

In fact it is very high. It varies by province, but in his own province it is well over 50 per cent and he knows that.

Second, he talks about tuition fees and how they are going up. I wonder why he wants to favour the rich. Every economic analysis done on tuition fees indicates that low tuition fees favour the rich, that if you increase the tuition fees along with reasonable student support systems then they begin to have more and more effect on the economic class that needs that kind of help.

Once again we get the rhetoric which somehow sounds good but it bears no relationship in terms of reality.

I just could not help but clarify a couple of those points for my hon. friend.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, the minister for science has some suspicions he has admitted. I have one or two myself. I suspect he did not read the Minister of Finance's last budget speech, so I will quote a sentence from it for him because it announced an extension of the present two-year freeze to five years on federal transfer payments for universities and colleges.

Now, that is my suspicion, but the minister in jumping up and accusing me of rhetoric wants to talk percentages. Did he ever try to buy groceries with percentages? Did he ever try and pay for tuition with percentages? Just walk into the Registrar and say: "I am here to pay my tuition. Here are the percentages."

The people I talk to, I say to the minister for science, are not the rich. They are the people in the small communities, the fishing communities along the south coast of Newfoundland who say: "I had intended for my Johnny, my Mary to go to university, but we cannot afford the tuition". Now, if they are the millionaires he is talking about, yes, they are millionaires in many terms, but they are not in money terms and they would like to have this government not cut them off at the knees instead of getting up with that blarney I just heard from a minister of the Crown.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not want it to get into debate. There are two minutes left.

Would the hon. member yield for another question?

The hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I wanted to comment what the hon. member for Newfoundland said earlier, but since he spoke in English, I would rather ask him a question.

[English]

His colleague from Newfoundland already mentioned that the reduction in fish quotas hurt the employment opportunities of Newfoundland youth, but he no doubt knows that many Newfoundland youth quit school to enter the fishery activities, leaving them with few skills to seek alternative employment.

What does the hon. member think should be done to help encourage Newfoundland youth to remain in school? Let me tell you something, Madam Speaker. Just keep in mind that in September 1988 the cabinet approved the expenditure of $40 million of Canadian Jobs Strategy funds for youth strategy pilot projects in New Brunswick and Newfoundland where youth unemployment is the highest. In February 1989 a five-year agreement was signed between the province of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada to implement a co-ordinated federal-provincial pilot project, the objective of which was to ensure that all youth are in school, in training, or in jobs.

I would ask the hon. member what the government can do to keep those youths in school longer. That is the question.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, to the second part of the question, the member well knows that none of us in the speeches today has said that the programs that are implemented are all bad. We recognize, as I said in my speech, that the WOW program, the Challenge program, the youth strategy, the kinds of things to which he makes reference are all good programs. They are not adequately funded but they are good concepts.

What do you do to keep them in school? I am sorry I do not have more time to answer more extensively, but in a word of response to the gentleman who raised the question "What do you do to keep them in school?"—I also answered that in my speech—you make tuition fees affordable so they can go in the first place.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa–West): Madam Speaker, I would simply like to address one of the effects of cuts made in the summer job creation programs in my riding.

[English]

It goes exactly to the question just asked by the previous member in that these cuts in summer employment are going to guarantee that many poor children do not go back to school this fall. Many poor children whose only means of getting through the summer, having a little bit of job experience, and feeling the value of going back to school in September has been lost to them.

I have thousands of families in my riding who live below the poverty level and these are the families who are not able to benefit this year from the Challenge '91 program because the funding for this program was cut from over $100,000 just two years ago to $22,000 for the last two years.

With so little time, I would like to read into the record what happens to children who live in poverty when they do not get a chance for a summer job that gives them a little bit of income which allows their family to send them back to school in the fall. What happens is that poverty is perpetuated.

I want to read from an article in today's Ottawa Citizen about the results of that poverty: "Chronic illness is substantially higher among children who live below the poverty line than those who live above. It has double the number of psychiatric disorders for those who live in poverty compared to those who do not. At school poor performance is twice as high for children on welfare as for children not on welfare". The dropout rate is approximately four and a half to five times as high for poor children as it is for non–poor children and, most devastating of all, accidental deaths are nine to one for poor children. Homicide–suicide is four to one for poor children. Pedestrian car accidents that kill children are two and a half times as high if you are poor.

These are the results of poverty. These are the results of not having summer employment. These are the results of not going to school and perpetuating the whole cycle of poverty.

I say to the last speaker who asked the question that the way to keep young people in school, the way to end the cycle of poverty is to have enough family income so that people feel they have some hope of a better future.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, on May 17, I asked the government what it was going to do to help the 1,600 employees who lost their jobs as a result of the Pascal Hardware bankruptcy. I pointed out that Pascal's hardware had been in business in Montreal and region for 87 years and as a result of its bankruptcy on May 16, 21 stores were closed and 1,600 employees lost their jobs.

In particular, I asked if this lay–off and these workers would qualify under the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, known as POWA. I also asked what other initiatives the government would take to retrain and re–employ the 1,600 individuals.

POWA, the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, is good in principle, but very defective in its criteria and its administration. And it is under-funded.

I have here an article from The Winnipeg Free Press of May 23, by Leonard Shifrin who calls the POWA program "a cruel lottery for the laid off" and he points out that "while this program promised much, after three years it has only spent $73 million of the promised $150 million used in the first two years and it only provided benefits to 2,244 ex-workers". Right across the country only 2,234 workers, when at Pascal's alone, 1,600 have lost their jobs. Obviously, no matter if this program is good in concept, it is grossly, grossly under-funded. I hope that Pascal's employees will qualify under that program. The program needs to be extended.

This bankruptcy of Pascal's also raises several other issues. One is that the Bankruptcy Act needs amendment. Under the present Bankruptcy Act, employees only have the right to receive $500 in back wages and after that they become unsecured creditors, so all sorts of other creditors get their money before employees, some of whom have worked for 20 and 30 years. I know some of them who worked at Pascal's. They are going to get a raw deal after many, many years of working for that company.

I think this bankruptcy also gives rise to questions to the government as to when is it going to come forward with amendments to the Bankruptcy Act.

Finally, I hope, as I said, that the government will announce that Pascal's employees will qualify for POWA. I hope, as well, that the government will realize that POWA is not enough. In addition to more funding for POWA and some amendments to its program, it must also bring amendments to the Bankruptcy Act to give laid-off employees, as a result of a bankruptcy, much more compensation for their wages so they should not be left out in the dark, as they will be under this program.

I anxiously await the response of the minister or the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. Warren Allmand for his question concerning the lay-off at J. Pascal Inc. and its potential for consideration under the Program for Older Workers Adjustment, or POWA, and what the government initiatives are with respect to retraining and re-employing these workers.

As the hon. member is aware, POWA is a federal-provincial and territorial program designed to help long-service older workers who have been permanently laid off and have no prospect of finding other employment. Lay-offs that occur in all private sector industries and commercial Crown corporations, including the lay-off at J. Pascal Inc., are eligible for consideration under POWA and subject to the criteria consistently with other lay-offs across the country. I would stress, however, that POWA remains a program of last resort, to be applied after all other adjustment measures have been considered.

With respect to the hon. member's concern regarding the consideration under POWA of the lay-off that occurred at J. Pascal Inc., I would like to reassure him that it will be assessed by the Canada-Quebec and Canada—Ontario POWA committees.

While this analysis takes place, most laid-off employees will be provided with financial assistance through the unemployment insurance program. Once the analysis is complete, Mr. André Bourbeau, Quebec Minister of Manpower, Income Security and Skills Development and the hon. Bob MacKenzie, Ontario Minister of Labour and the Minister of Labour, the hon. Marcel Danis, will evaluate the findings to determine whether the lay-off is eligible under the program for older worker adjustment.

For your information, I would like to take this opportunity to outline the main lay-off eligibility criteria. Very significant economic disruption in the region; significant loss of employment in the industry; importance of the lay-off relative to the size of the community and a large proportion of older workers affected are some of the criteria.

I would like to refer the member to the information I have passed on to him, and we want to thank him very much for his concern.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, when I was a kid, every day after school, I and my friends would go down to the cliffs on the edge of the Don River Valley in Toronto to play.

We would not only play on the cliffs but we would play in the dumps that were all along the edge of those cliffs. Today, Madam Speaker, you and I would not call them dumps, we would call them land-fill sites.

All those dumps or land-fill sites are now completely filled up. There is no place else to put garbage in those locations. They are all grassed over, and that is a real problem.

Ten years ago when I served on metropolitan Toronto council, and on the executive committee there, we bought a huge land-fill site, the Keele Valley site, just north of Toronto in Maple, Ontario.

We were told at the time that this would last for my lifetime and probably for the lifetime of my children as well. Today, we are told that at the end of this year, at the end of 1991, that land-fill site is going to be completely filled up. There is not going to be any space in it at all any more.

We are told as well that by 1993 the last remaining land-fill site in metropolitan Toronto will be completely filled. There is no place else to put garbage.

Metropolitan Toronto is not the only place with this problem. Every large municipality has this problem whether in Ontario, Quebec or the prairies. We are told that by the middle of the 1990s all of these existing land-fill sites are going to be completely filled up because we in Canada have the dubious distinction of being considered the most wasteful people on the face of the earth.

Canadians produce 1.7 kilograms of garbage per person per day. That compares with the Americans at 1.5, the Germans at 1.3 and the Chinese at less than .5. In fact, every Canadian produces about one tonne of garbage each year. Two-thirds of all of that comes from industry, business and institutions. The other third comes from our own homes. About 30 to 50 per cent of all that garbage and waste that comes from our own homes comes from packaging.

What are we going to do about this? Some people say: "Let's incinerate it. Let's burn it all". Other people say: "Let's ship it out of town". In Toronto we say: "Let's ship it to Kirkland Lake". In Montreal they say: "Let's ship it to Sept Îles". Other people say: "Let's just let it pile up. There is no problem at all. Let's go on and continue the garbage binge". Other people say: "We should be recycling it". And some people say: "We should be reducing it". In fact, that is really what we should be doing.

Since packaging is such a large part of that waste, the federal government, with tougher regulations, can play an important part in reducing that packaging that is filling up our land-fill sites and causing us this great problem.

The green plan says that we are going to do this voluntarily. We are going to cut down on packaging voluntarily until some time in 1992. Then, after that, we will start to think about putting some regulations in place in 1993 if that does not work. By that time, all of these sites are going to be filled and it will be too late.

I say to the minister tonight: "For heaven's sakes, Mr. Minister, do not wait until we have to pile up the garbage in our parks, school yards and apartment balconies. Let's get some tough regulations in there right now."

• (1810)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my remarks to the hon. member for Don Valley East concerning packaging of waste.

He is so right in saying that the largest single component of municipal solid waste in Canada, accounting for some 30 per cent of the total, is in packaging. The importance of this issue is underscored in Canada's Green Plan, which he has already acknowledged.

The National Packaging Protocol is the first initiative cited in the green plan in the list of Canada's efforts to reduce waste. Under the National Packaging Protocol an over-all target was established of a 50 per cent reduction in packaging waste by the year 2000. The in-term targets of 20 per cent by the year 1992 and 35 per cent by 1996 were also set.

The federal and provincial environment departments, as expressed by the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, fully support these goals and consider voluntary compliance as the preferred means of achievement. Regulations to achieve those targets will be implemented if voluntary action, especially by industry, fails to achieve the 1992 goal of a 20 per cent reduction in packaging.

Under this front, through the National Packaging Task Force, the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment is engaged in developing recommendations for a comprehensive federal–provincial legislative package to support the objectives of the National Packaging Protocol. The recommended legislative elements will contain standards and codes for packaging and specified content and composition for packaging materials. In fact, dialogue has already begun with the task force multi-stakeholder group to develop its regulatory framework, including the development of examples of model regulations at the federal and provincial levels. Discussion and consultation will also be required to ensure a consistent application of the legislative elements throughout Canada.

Establishing regulations is only one of the possible means to achieve the goals of the National Packaging Protocol. Environment Canada will participate in the investigation of possible economic instruments and other means to support the protocol's objectives of reducing waste and protecting Canada's environment.

HEALTH

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance for giving me the opportunity to continue this debate on the importance of fiscal transfers to the provinces.

The question raised last week in the House of Commons during Question Period was prompted by a report by the very well respected National Council on Welfare. In its Spring 1991 report entitled Funding Health and Higher Education—Danger Looming it raises the alarm that perhaps Canadians were not aware of just how dramatic the changes were that were about to take place within the funding. Although they did not use any particularly derogatory or nasty adjectives that perhaps the opposition would be more inclined to use to accurately describe the government, they did, however, note just how cash poor the provinces are going to be. Provinces such as Nova Scotia with hard-done-by areas such as Cape Breton deserve more support than they appear to be getting and will get in the future.

They start out with the proposition that health care and post- secondary education are undertakings vital to the well-being of Canadians. I think even the government could agree with that. They continue to stress the fact that people in poorer provinces would have to make do with health care services that are inferior to the services enjoyed by Canadians who happen to live in richer provinces. In other words, people living in Cape Breton, rural Quebec, northern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, interior parts of B.C. would be hard pressed to keep up the medical services and post-secondary education if the present strategy of the federal government were allowed to take place.

That, by the way, is the reason why this party opposes so strenuously Bill C-20, which is its budgetary strategy for reducing even further the payments. So as bad as this story is from the National Council of Welfare, I can assure you that it will even be worse if Bill C-20 is allowed to pass through this House.

This report is not a negative report. They in fact have several recommendations which I would like to bring to the attention of the House. These recommendations should be taken more seriously by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, in a very offhand response said: "Oh, the report is inadequate", and sat back down. However, the report like all reports can be discussed intelligently, and that is why I am happy to have the government here tonight. To say it is inadequate when this organization has a 20-year history of presenting Canadians with well thought out positions on poverty, issues that most Canadians would not like to hear about, or at least most governments would not like to hear about. These people have continued to work hard on behalf of Canadians and deserve not to be dismissed in that easy way.

It recommended that the federal government should continue to play a significant financial role in both health care and post-secondary education. Can you imagine, in this country, that recommendation having to be made? Can you imagine not taking it for granted that the federal government has a role in medicare and a role in post-secondary education?

The very fact that the organization thought that it had to remind the government is a testimony to how much things have changed in the last while.

Second, any changes in the financing of health and higher education should result from federal-provincial negotiations rather than being imposed by Ottawa. How did this government ever win an election? It won an election by saying: "Look at what the Liberals are doing. They are imposing on this country".

This most respected organization says: "The imposition of terrible measures by this very government". It has quickly forgotten just how important this is.

There are many other issues raised in this report.

I stand here before the House asking the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to reconsider their responses, to not describe the report as being inadequate but stand up and understand that Canadians are expecting more from them in terms of fiscal transfers.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre. We had the privilege of working together for the last two and a half years on industry, science and technology, so I look forward to our work together on health and welfare.

Canadians do love their health care. Each and every one of us do. There have been a number of public opinion polls that indicate a very high approval rating. Actually about 90 per cent believe that our medicare system makes Canada one of the best countries in the world in which to live.

However, it is also recognized that health expenditures are increasing. They are increasing faster than the rate of inflation and the growth rate of the Canadian population.

In such an environment where provinces today spend up to one-third of their budgets on health, provincial finance ministers are naturally very concerned about over all costs. It is now generally accepted that spending more on health care does not always result in proportionate improvements in the state of health care.

Major transfers to the provinces, including both the cash and the tax transfers, will grow on average by 3.7 per cent for the period 1991-92 to 1995-96. All other federal programs will grow by 3.4 per cent.

This government stands by the national standards of our medicare system. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has made this clear in the House. This is not a promise that the government takes lightly, as a recent National Council on Welfare report would have one to believe. We are very serious about our national medicare system. Poverty does affect Canadians and it is also a major concern for this government.

This is definitely an issue which requires more time, more effort and more attention from all Canadians.

Since 1984, the government has embarked on a series of initiatives to improve the situation of Canadian families. Our approach has been to support self-sufficiency among Canadians through economic and social policies which have helped to create a climate in which job creation can prosper. Even in a time of necessary fiscal restraint, however, the government has acted to better support lower income families with children and this government has increased by more than 50 per cent the maximum value of the child tax credit since 1984. We introduced a new child tax credit system. We have helped parents who are separated or divorced with their maintenance fees and we introduced a goods and services tax credit under the GST.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt. Those two minutes do go very quickly I must admit.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise this evening with regard to a question I put forward on May 30, 1991, to the Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning the contradictions in public documents that have been released regarding the Al-Mashat case. I wish to put on record the words of the former President of the United States, John F. Kennedy. He submitted to Congress a special message on ethical conduct in government which reads as follows:

> No responsibility of government is more fundamental than the responsibility of maintaining the highest standards of ethical behaviour by those who conduct the public business. There can be no dissent from the principle that all officials must act with unwavering integrity, absolute impartiality, and complete devotion to the public interest. This principle must be followed not only in reality but in appearance. For the basis of effective Government is public confidence, and that confidence is endangered when ethical standards falter or appear to falter.

It would be very helpful if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration could share with members of the House this evening an explanation with regard to the contradictions between version A and version B of public documents that have been made available concerning the Al-Mashat case.

Canadians are concerned about how an individual of such stature as Al-Mashat could get into the country when there are thousands upon thousands of people who are waiting, and have been waiting for quite some time, to obtain admission to Canada.

Canadians expect more, much more from their elected officials. Contradictions and half-truths are simply unacceptable to the people of this country. They want the issues of our time addressed with clarity, common sense, single-mindedness, and sincerity of purpose. They want high standards of ethical behaviour maintained by those who conduct the public business. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that they want performance from this government, not public relations, and they want leadership, not salesmanship. I hope that the parliamentary secretary to the minister can provide a suitable answer.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Madam Speaker, standing in for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is unavoidably absent, I will gladly answer the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond's question.

Madam Speaker, the minister stands by his previous statement: he was informed of the Al-Mashat case on May 7, 1991. The question the hon. member asked in this House on May 30, 1991, could also relate to statements made by ministers Valcourt or McDougall. So, as the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated on May 30 and has repeated over and over since, the Minister was made aware of this matter on May 7, 1991.

Madam Speaker, as the member knows, this government did not hesitate to offer and extend full cooperation to the House committee asked to consider the Al-Mashat case. The ministers put themselves at the disposal of the committee, officials testified and documents were submitted. Perhaps the hon. member would rather we made a secret about it. If that is the case, we are sorry to say that the hon. member will be disappointed.

Madam Speaker, in this whole affair, this government has been very open and very quick to co-operate. It wants all Canadians to be informed of what took place, and that is precisely what we did.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking the parliamentary secretary for his patience.

On Monday, June 3, I had occasion to rise in this House during Question Period and ask the minister of fisheries about the alleged illegality of the dockside monitoring program.

The government is currently compelling fishermen and fish processors to pay user fees to private companies set up by the government to monitor the catches of fishermen as a condition of entering into a licensing agreement with the ministry of fisheries.

The problem is that the government did not bother to obtain either legislative or regulatory authority for the user fee portion of the program. That was the finding of the senior legal counsel of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations and Statutory Instruments.

In his report, which I released on May 22, the senior legal counsel states: "The minister, in using his discretion to obtain the payment of monitoring fees to monitoring companies by fishermen and to secure the fishermen's signature of agreements, is exercising his power unlawfully".

I sent a copy of this report to the minister of fisheries on the day it was released. On that day we also heard from the parliamentary secretary that the user fee portion of the program was under review by his ministry. I would have thought that the result of that review, given the thorough and authoritative way in which the document presented the case for the illegality of the fees, would have convinced the minister of fisheries to do the honourable thing and to rescind the user fees and reimburse the fishermen. Perhaps if he were insistent on imposing these user fees, he would have sought the necessary legislative authority to do so at a later date. However, when I asked the question of the minister of fisheries a week ago today, his reaction was to slough off the report as just one lawyer's opinion.

For the minister to assume this stance shows not only a callous disregard for the law, but something which we would not have expected from a minister of his experience and his calibre. The minister of fisheries appears to hope that no one will take this matter any further. He seems to hope the government will get away with this blatant disregard for the law, even though the program has clearly been brought into question with regard to its illegality.

This is no way to deal with the enormous problems facing the fisheries. For the government to resort to illegality or to coverting the legal requirements to bring about its objective is all the more galling to fishermen who are forced to take food off their families' tables in order to pay for these ludicrous user fees. Fishermen are tired of the government ignoring this fact and claiming that the program is in the best interests of fishermen and everyone involved in the fisheries. They are not fooled, they are appalled. They are demanding that the government confront the issue of these illegal fees head on and not sit back smugly but re-evaluate its program, rescind those fees and reimburse the fishermen who had been asked to pay them without the proper legislative authority.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Dockside Monitoring Program was introduced as a pilot project in 1989 with the support of the industry to reduce the widespread misreporting and under-reporting of catches in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This program, which was expanded in 1990 and 1991 to cover all mobile groundfish vessels, as well as mid-shore crab vessels, shrimp vessels and large herring seiners, will continue. The legal opinions regarding the legality of collecting dockside monitoring fees referred to by the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso have been reviewed by the legal counsel to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans continues to hold the position, based on past legal advice, that he has the authority to implement the current system and to require fishermen to pay the costs of the monitoring program. The fishermen as well as producers on the Atlantic coast who benefit from the fish resources have indicated that they want a system which will maintain an orderly and an economically viable fishery. The Dockside Monitoring Program is a tool which is critical to the realization of this goal. It ensures that management's plans are implemented fairly and the high quality of data gathered under the program also aids in stock assessment, ensuring that the total allowable catches, the TACs, are set based on actual stock strength. Over time, this will help the stocks to recover.

Furthermore, with the introduction of individual quotas on groundfish, crab and shrimp fisheries in the gulf, it becomes critical to have a precise and timely monitoring system in place. The fishermen and processors who benefit from the resource must contribute to its management and rebuilding. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans does not have sufficient resources to pay for the program. This is not to say that the program cannot be improved. Consultations will be held this year with industry groups to discuss ways in which the efficiency of the program can be improved and cost minimized.

I wish to thank the hon. member for bringing this again to our attention.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to seven petitions.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-232, an act to amend the Immigration Act (visitors' visas).

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill amends section 9 of the Immigration Act. Its purpose is to facilitate the issuance of visitors' visas to close family relatives of Canadians.

It is identical to the private members' bill presented by me in the last session of this Parliament and would permit a Canadian to stand as a surety or as a guarantor for the terms of the visitor visa.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1990

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-233, an act respecting fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces.

He said: Madam Speaker, I have just a brief explanation. Essentially this private member's bill is similar to one I had tabled in the previous session.

It would essentially impose upon the federal government an obligation to ensure that funds transferred to the provinces for health and post-secondary education are spent in those fields.

• (1010)

It is important to note that this bill is similar to a recommendation made by the government's own National Council of Welfare in a report that it issued last week.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have a petition duly signed by 28 residents of the city of Thunder Bay and certified by the clerk of petitions.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990; to maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely; to become a legislated mandate for VIA Rail; and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern, passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

I am pleased to announce that the federal NDP convention adopted the back on track campaign this weekend.

MMT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to table another 150 names on petitions. This totals over 9,000 names tabled, calling upon the government to ban methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl in Canada and substitute it with 10 per cent ethanol in all gasolines.

These petitioners are very concerned that the government would ignore the fact that ethanol blended gasoline is an environmentally friendly product, but they are even more upset that the government appears to be listening more to a very massive campaign being conducted by a large American company to maintain MMT in gasolines in Canada when in fact it has been banned in the United States since 1978.

We ask this government to move as quickly as possible to adopt this proposal.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have here a petition from young Canadians recognizing the increasing need for education in Canadian society to meet the challenges of globalization, the changing Canadian economy and Canada's social challenges.

They recognize there is tougher competition in this world and education is the way of beating it. They deplore the cut of $485 million this year and the 3 per cent administrative fee on loans. They point out that education is not simply for the wealthy, that education must be for all Canadians. They encourage the government to give it a higher priority.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present another petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands who call upon Parliament to adopt a law which would make it an offence to desecrate or destroy the flag of Canada.

The petition directly supports the bill introduced in this House by the hon. member for Scarborough East and urges this House to deal with the bill expeditiously and perhaps see to its prompt adoption.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops and neighbouring communities who are concerned about the latest statistics from Statistics Canada.

They point out that the level of violent crime is increasing and encourage the federal government to reconsider its plans to cut back on the funding for the RCMP and maintain traditional funding in the years ahead.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, another set of petitioners from western Canada are calling upon the government to rethink the decision to curtail VIA Rail service.

They point out that in Europe, passenger rail service is the most environmentally sound way of moving large numbers of people. It makes sense for the second largest country in the world geographically to have a good passenger rail system and are asking the federal government to reconsider the decision to cut back on VIA Rail funding.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to present to the House Bill C-20 for second reading debate, the 1991 Budget Implementation Act, a very important piece of legislation. I am pleased to see so many Liberal members in the House today taking an active interest in this very important debate.

I think it is important, in opening this debate, for all members to realize the importance of expenditure restraint. It is critical in our attempt to ensure that we can provide a climate that is conducive to economic growth and stability. The issue of expenditure restraint is a key element of federal government policy.

The provisions outlined in this bill will help to ensure that Canada continues its progress toward economic recovery this year, but just as important these measures will help ensure that we set in place the essential conditions for stable continuous growth, and permanent job creation, as well as real increases in national and individual prosperity throughout the decade.

The legislation before us proposes to change four specific acts of Parliament. The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act will be amended to extend the two-year limitation introduced in the 1990 budget on the growth of established programs funding to the provinces for another three years. In conjunction with this we are also proposing to amend this act to permit the withholding of other federal payments to provinces in the event of a breach of the national health standards set out in the Canada Health Act.

We are also asking for a change to the Parliament of Canada Act to limit annual increases in sessional and expense allowances for members of the Senate and the House of Commons. I know that all members of the House will take an active interest in that provision of the bill.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, it is well supported.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am pleased to hear that from the hon. member from Kingston.

As well the bill before us amends the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act to extend the current limitation on payments for an additional four years.

Finally, the Unemployment Insurance Act will be altered to increase premium rates to ensure that this vital national safety net remains on a sound financial basis. I am sure the hon. member from Kingston would want to ensure that the Unemployment Insurance Act and the fund therein would be retained on a sound financial basis. That is something that he should know, if he does not already know, is required by law.

These measures continue and add further certainty to our commitment to put our national finances in order. For countries and governments as well as individuals and firms this is a fundamental starting point for the long-term security and prosperity of our country.

When we first announced the Government Expenditure Restraint Act in the 1990 budget, Canadians could at that time look back on six years of unprecedented growth, a record where we led all major industrialized nations, except Japan. Today, however, we in Canada as in the United States and in the U.K. are experiencing a recession. This has had an adverse impact not only on our economy but equally as well on our fiscal situation.

We hope and we have every belief, thanks to the effective measures we have taken in time, that the turnaround is imminent and that we will soon again enjoy positive growth. Judging by the positive indicators that we see emanating on a daily and weekly basis, we sense that the recession has bottomed out or is close to bottoming out. The point of recovery in the second half, as was projected in the February budget, is clearly imminent.

The measures now before the House are designed to renew our progress in reducing the annual deficit and controlling the destructive growth of our national debt. They are also part of the comprehensive plan to restore economic confidence and to bring down inflation. This is, of course, the key to a continuing and enduring decline in interest rates, which will fuel recovery and provide a climate for growth.

Since 1984, our government has been following a comprehensive, mid-term plan for fiscal consolidation and economic renewal. We have reduced government spending. We have tackled waste and inefficiency in government operations. We have reformed the tax system to provide a more secure and more equitable tax base while ensuring that there was fairness in the system, as well as international competitiveness. We are implementing structural reforms to improve the growth potential of the Canadian economy and, as outlined in the Speech from the Throne, we are determined to attack the issue of productivity and improve our competitiveness. This is key for a trading nation like Canada which relies more on trade than any other nation in the world with the exception of Germany.

These actions were successful in stimulating strong growth, particularly in investment over the 1985 and 1989 period. As well, these measures have allowed us to reduce the deficit. For 1990-91 it has been reduced by nearly one-half as a percentage of the GDP from where it was in 1984-85. As a percentage of GDP the deficit has been reduced from 8.7 per cent to 4.5 per cent—

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense, absolute nonsense.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and that is the key number, Madam Speaker, in spite of what the hon. member suggests.

The measures introduced in last February's budget will ensure that our deficit spending does not increase this year over last, despite the pressures of the recession. Then, through the combination of expenditure restraint, economic recovery and lower interests rates, the deficit will begin to move sharply downward to just $24 billion in 1992-93, the lowest level in more than a decade.

The fiscal track that we are now on, by 1994-95 we will have eliminated the need for any new government borrowings on the financial markets for the first time in 25 years.

Mr. Mills: Double the tax grab and put all the burden on small business.

Mr. Mazankowski: We see all the big spenders over there and they are critical of that, and I can understand why. I am waiting to hear some words of enlightenment from the other side, but so far I have not.

Madam Speaker, the measures introduced in this bill will work effectively together as part of our plan for economic recovery. It is a plan that will bring about lower interest rates and strengthen our capacity to create jobs and generate real gains in Canadians' incomes. We will achieve these goals through a series of co-ordinated interrelated actions, carefully structured to promote economic progress while ensuring that no unnecessary burdens are placed on this country, either today or in the future.

For example, in tandem with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, we have set out low, but achievable targets, for reducing inflation. I am confident we are on track to meeting our goal of 2 per cent inflation by the mid-decade. This lowering of inflation represents the only reliable long-term method of bringing down interest rates.

Second, we are putting government finances firmly on a course toward a balanced budget. Third, we will introduce legislation to establish a debt service and reduction fund which will provide, by law, that revenues from the goods and services tax and from the privatization of Crown corporations as well as any private contributors will flow into this fund.

Well, I am certainly in a position to welcome any contributions coming from the other side today, and it is tax deductible. My colleague says that there is deafening silence over there.

All of these funds will flow into this fund, to be used only to reduce the deficit, to stop the growth of debt and not to finance new programs.

Fourth, we are severely restraining government operations. We are freezing operating budgets. As well, wages and salaries are being tightly restrained for cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, Order in Council appointments, and for federal public servants.

These are very important and bold initiatives to deal with the very tough and difficult issues we now face. If we were to follow the Liberal pattern, we could talk about the 1981-82 recession. The government at that time—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: They do not want to talk about history. That is rather interesting.

During the recession of 1981–82, the Liberal government chose a different path. That is why our budget this February and the legislation before us has become so necessary. What we are faced with today is not only paying the bills of today, but we are forced to pay the bills of yesterday, caused by my friends opposite who still believe that they can spend their way to prosperity.

What happened? By 1984–85, the annual deficit had tripled under their regime to over $38 billion in just four years. Interest charges on the debt were consuming a rapidly increasing proportion of revenues, revenues that could not be allocated to better the lives of Canadians.

That is the point. A huge deficit and the cost of servicing the deficit limits government's ability to provide needed services to Canadians. That is the real issue we face today. In fact, it is the compounding interest on the national debt we inherited that now accounts for almost all of the growth in the debt that has occurred over the last six years. That is the truth.

If we had followed the Liberal way, that short-sighted political way that is even today suggested by some of our more learned critics across the way, we would then have embarked upon a course of spending and fiscal irresponsibility which would have aggravated all of the fundamental problems we now have. It would have deepened and complicated the problem of renewing our national prosperity.

For example, if we had followed the same track that the Liberals were on, today instead of having a $30 billion deficit we would have had a $99 billion deficit. That is really the fact of the matter. It is a stark comparison of the difference in approaches and the difference in attitudes.

Instead of restoring the government's ability to assist Canadians in need, we would be weakening that capability. Instead of building greater confidence in Canada's ability to deal with its problems, we would be sending a message of indecision, uncertainty and probably incapacity.

We cannot spend our way out of difficult times with money that we have to borrow. The philosophy behind our program for economic renewal is clear and very concrete. We have to pay our way at home and earn our prosperity in the international marketplace. That is why we have embarked upon a course that places less reliance upon government and taxpayers' pocketbooks and more on personal initiative and enterprise.

Government spending in the end comes only from one source: the taxpayer. It is not government that creates jobs, prosperity and provides higher real incomes. It is the private sector through its enterprise, its initiative and its production. It is that production which produces the wealth that not only services governments and the important services that governments provide, but indeed provides the wealth for Canadians. It is not government that creates jobs and provides higher real incomes. Prosperity cannot be legislated, it must be gained in the marketplace. That is a very important philosophy. It is something I am pleased that hon. members opposite are agreeing with.

If we have that right, then it is pretty clear that we have to concentrate our efforts on attempting to put in place the kind of economic environment that is conducive to providing ways in which the enterprise spirit will prevail. The innovative and entrepreneurial spirit will certainly then provide the kind of wealth and the support and welfare for all Canadians. We clearly understand the role that government has to play. It must provide an economic environment in which prices are stable, productivity and risk-taking are rewarded, and initiative is encouraged. It is in keeping with this philosophy—

Mr. Mills: You're punishing productivity.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says we are punishing. Yes, it is difficult because we have a difficult fiscal problem we have to contend with. Until we address that fiscal problem, we will not be able to provide that kind of encouragement and that kind of climate which the hon. member, I know, wants—

Mr. Mills: Well, say that.

Mr. Mazankowski: —to establish. We have a difficult problem. We have to distribute some medicine. I am saying it. That is a fact. You cannot hide behind figures. The facts are clearly there.

Mr. Mills: What pious nonsense.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am asking hon. members across the way to shoulder their share of the burden and the responsibility because they created it and are probably more responsible for it than any other government in this country.

It is in keeping with this philosophy that our government has given a priority to the two key aspects of this renewal: structural reforms, such as deregulation and privatization, and removing the obstacles and barriers to innovation and enterprise and growth, whether it be interprovincial trade barriers, over-regulation, or various kinds of burdens and impediments to growth and economic activity. Second, we have devoted our attention to sound macro-economic policies.

As I indicated, we recognize the pressures and hardships that are facing many Canadians. Economic recovery is this government's fundamental goal, but we have to get the fundamentals right. Our policies, reflected in the measures in this bill, are establishing the sound fiscal plan on which recovery must be based.

It will be a recovery that is not borrowed from tomorrow's account. Instead, it will be a recovery that gives lasting promise and opportunities to young Canadians entering the work force, one that protects those on fixed incomes, the poor and the elderly and those who save and invest, from the ravages of inflation. That is important, Madam Speaker. The members opposite scoff at the inflationary targets. At the same time they want to ensure that elderly Canadians will not see their incomes eroded. I think we can all agree on that and in order to preserve that capacity we must ensure that we fight inflation and maintain realistic inflationary targets.

As well, we will be basing our recovery program on a philosophy that allows working Canadians and employees to plan for the future in confidence, knowing that economic growth reflects real strength rather than being based on the artificial and transitory prop of government.

At this time in a globalized economy there is no way that we can hide our inefficiencies or our lack of competitiveness. We cannot hide those inefficiencies through government subsidies or the creation of Crown corporations. It is all out there. We live in a day and age of globalization where national boundaries are becoming increasingly irrelevant. As a nation which relies on world trade for about one-third of its GDP we obviously have to address that as one of the most important priorities. That is what we are doing both in the budget and in the commitment undertaken in the Speech from the Throne.

Meeting these goals cannot be done without restraint, co-operation, some sacrifice and hard work. We must all share the burden.

Having set forth the reasons for this legislation I want to elaborate on some of the specific measures involved.

The current limitations to the growth of Established Programs Financing, or EPF, will be extended through to 1994-1995. This measure will reduce federal cash expenditures by about $340 million in 1992-1993, $465 million in 1993-1994, and about $750 million in the third year.

It is important to put this measure in context. While it is an important step for government, it is not the drastic and destructive burden on the provinces that some have suggested.

The savings that we will achieve represent only about one-half of 1 per cent of the total provincial revenues in 1992-1993. Even with the measures proposed in the bill, EPF transfers in 1992-1993 will exceed $20 billion.

These transfers will continue to grow with provincial populations. I trust that hon. members will remember as well that in addition to the EPF transfers, the federal government also provides substantial assistance to lower income provinces through the equalization program, to help them provide a level of service that is consistent across the country. This support provides for health care and post-secondary education as well.

Equalization transfers have grown significantly—

An hon. member: They have been cut.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says that they have been cut significantly and that is absolutely, categorically false. The fact of the matter is that equalization transfers have grown significantly over the last few years, from over $5 billion in 1984-85 to over $8 billion in the current fiscal year. These transfers are not affected, and I repeat, these transfers are not affected by the budget.

They will continue to grow in line with the nominal rate of growth of the economy.

The government recognizes as well that limiting the growth of transfers under EPF raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles. Therefore, the legislation under consideration will also amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. This will allow the government to withhold other payments to provinces in the event there are insufficient EPF cash transfers against which to apply financial penalties for a breach of national medicare principles, as set out in the Canada Health Act.

At the same time that we are asking the provinces to share the burden of fiscal restraint, we are also calling on this government and members of Parliament to do their part. The February budget announced our intent to freeze the salaries of cabinet ministers for the coming year. As well, the bill before us will amend the Parliament of Canada Act to limit annual increases in sessional allowances for members of both Houses to the average wage increases within the Public Service of Canada for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994.

Any increases in salaries and allowances for office holders of the Senate and the House of Commons and expense allowances for all MPs in these years will be held to these same levels.

Such measures ensure that the burden of financial restraint is not limited to the Public Service alone. It also means that all of us in government must learn to live with the resources that we have available, a discipline that the private sector cannot avoid and that we must learn to share.

As another element of the expenditure restraint program is the legislation before us. It extends the freeze on the transfer payments to provinces under the Public Utilities Income Transfer Act, commonly referred to as PUITTA, for an additional four years until 1995. Under the terms of the 1990 budget, these payments were frozen at 1989 levels of $280 million. As a member from Alberta I want to suggest that our action here is much less drastic than the actions taken by the provincial government. In its 1990 budget, Alberta decided to eliminate completely its rebates of provincial income taxes paid to privately owned utility companies.

These tax revenues are now retained in full by the provinces, but our measure continues to return most of the federal income tax from these utilities to the provinces. That provides a level playing field with Crown corporations which do not pay taxes and operate in other provinces. It is for that reason that PUITTA was put in place in the first place.

Finally, the government proposes to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to increase premium rates. Effective July 1, 1991, employee premiums will be increased to $2.80 per $100 of insurable earnings, from the current $2.25. Premiums for employers will rise to $3.92 per $100 of insurable earnings from the current level of $3.15. These measures work to assist the important restructuring of the unemployment insurance program that was undertaken last year, along with measures to provide more training and fewer disincentives to work. The program was placed on a sound financial footing with the costs financed through employee–employer contributions.

Since then, the deteriorating labour market conditions have led to higher than anticipated benefit payments. Consequently the program's account is projected to go sharply out of balance. This would seriously jeopardize the financial integrity of this self–financed program and further damage the government's fiscal position.

Since the UI account is consolidated in budgetary transactions, the changes in the rate will reduce the deficit by $2 billion in 1991–92 and by $2.4 billion in 1992–93.

• (1040)

The measures that we are proposing here today are not easy and not painless. They are the consequence of too many years of government overspending and overborrowing.

We worked hard to reverse that trend and reverse that record, but to make further progress on behalf of all Canadians we have to ask Canadians everywhere—individuals, other levels of government and businesses—to share in the burden of fiscal restraint.

I said earlier that our policies and programs are already having a positive effect on the economy. It is worth highlighting just a few of the recent indicators that show we are on track for recovery in the second half of this year.

For example, short-term interest rates have dropped by more than five percentage points in just over a year. The Bank of Canada dropped its rate again last Thursday to the lowest level since April 1988, and I am sure that all hon. members will agree that that is good news.

As well, I think it is important that the differential between Canada and U.S. interest rates has narrowed significantly. From a high of about 560 basis points a year ago, it has dropped to well below 300 basis points. I believe 2.59 per cent was the last figure I saw and that was for a three-month commercial paper.

If we compare the Canadian prime rate at nine and three-quarters per cent to the U.S. prime rate at eight and a half per cent, that is a differential of about one and a quarter per cent. Those wide spreads that were a legitimate complaint in the previous 12 months have narrowed significantly, and I believe that it is a clear expression of confidence in the measures we have taken. It is a clear measure of confidence in our bid to engage in fiscal consolidation that we have demonstrated a resolve and a commitment to deal with the deficit and to deal with the underlying causes of inflation.

I think the underlying causes of inflation and the inflationary expectations and pressures are key elements to interest rates now and in the future, and it is important for us to maintain that course.

In turn, the reduced interest rates are fuelling a significant rebound in the housing sector as both housing starts and resale transactions surged in April.

Also, last week Statistics Canada announced that manufactured shipments, due to the strength in the automobile sector, increased a half a per cent in March to $22.6 billion, the first rise in five months. A recent Conference Board of Canada index of business confidence showed a dramatic gain in the first quarter.

These are all positive signs and positive indicators, but we are not suggesting that we should get over-ecstatic about it. We think the recovery will be slow, but we hope that it will be a durable one.

I think it is a clear fact that the course we are on is proving to be the right one, and I think that is shown by the indicators that we see.

If we waver and let the deficit begin to surge again, we will significantly undercut the renewed business confidence in the mid-term prospects that will help generate new investment and new jobs. We will also be encouraging Canadians in every sector to return to the inflationary behaviour and expectations that are the driving force behind higher interest rates.

We simply do not intend to let this happen. The national interest, the prospect for all Canadians to enjoy renewed growth and prosperity, demands that our commitment must not flag just at the point where we are beginning to get back on track. By persevering we will not only be able to bring the deficit under control but will also, in the not too distant future, begin removing this burden from the backs of the Canadian people and particularly the backs of future generations. Only in this way can we build the Canada that we want for ourselves and for our children.

I am presenting this bill for second reading. I urge the hon. members to support it, to support the motives and the inspiration that underlie the bill. It is certainly in keeping with the trend and the direction that we must take in terms of fostering a solid foundation for economic growth and prosperity in the future.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my congratulations to the Minister of Finance. I believe it is his first major speech in the House since taking over this portfolio. I would also like to thank the minister for having his staff brief the opposition parties and give us an opportunity to review some of the technicalities of this very important piece of legislation. When I was listening to the minister, I was thinking that it is unfortunate that the sins of the father have to be visited upon the son. I am sure the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls is a man better equipped than myself with images for these situations. I was thinking about the change in the government and how it always tries to make things seem like a relay race, a smooth transition of handing things off. But if we look at this government since it changed portfolios, it is more like a hot potato race. Immigration is over here and external is over there and finance is there, and all are throwing hot potatoes into the air hoping someone else will catch them. The minister is being caught with a hot potato and the first move he has to make is with Bill C-20.

The reason why this party will not be supporting Bill C-20 is that we disagree fundamentally with the strategy behind this legislation. It is a strategy of social policy by stealth. It is a strategy of undermining the fundamental programs in this country by using technical measures rather than by dealing with them in a straightforward way.

The harsh battle that we saw with Bill C–69 is about to be repeated with Bill C–20. We must show Canadians that this government is seeking to undermine the Canada Assistance Plan, to undermine the equalization programs, and to undermine medicare and post–secondary education. They are doing this not by dealing with them directly, not by telling Canadians they are no longer interested in those programs, but by using fiscal measures through the back door that Canadians have a difficult time understanding and following.

It is at this quiet moment in the House at 10.30 on a Tuesday morning that an important piece of legislation is being introduced without people really understanding what the future holds for them.

I would like to spend the time during my speech to go over some of these measures and to explain, as best as I can on behalf of my party, why this legislation is in fact dangerous.

A well–known Canadian, Grattan Gray, has written in Policy Options, a very well respected magazine, that he would describe the strategy of this government as social policy by stealth. I would like to quote, to set up this particular analysis, from Mr. Gray.

> In brief, the Tory style of restraint has become what can only be characterized as "social policy by stealth".
> It relies heavily on technical amendments to taxes and transfers that are as difficult to explain as they are to understand and thus largely escape media scrutiny and public attention. It camouflages regressive changes in their rhetoric of equity in an attempt to convince Canadians that tax increases are tax cuts and that benefit cuts are benefit increases. By further complicating an already complex labyrinth of taxes and social programs, the stealth style of policy making confuses the electorate and so insulates itself from criticism. The Conservative's record on social and tax policy constitutes a variation on Newton's Third Law of Motion. For every positive action there is an equal and opposite negative change. As a result, the goal of a fairer, simpler and more rational system of taxes and transfers remains as distant as ever.

In other words, the language is there: the language of fairness, the language of concern, the language of good management. The government knows the language. The government does not have a clue as to how to carry this out fairly, on behalf of all Canadians.

The minister is fond of referring to the past. Anyone who watches the House of Commons during Question Period sees that this government refers constantly to what the bad guys did, what the Liberals did in the 1970s and the 1980s. They do not mention of course the introduction of medicare and old age security. They do not mention the amount of money that was put into post–secondary education so that this whole generation could be educated. They seem somehow to forget that.

Perhaps we should go back and ask: "What were they thinking in those years?" Let us take the former Minister of Finance, for example. He said as reported on March 23, 1982 at page 15758 of the Commons Debates:

> In past years, the federal government has used its taxing power and the financial strength of its position to exert its influence and to establish national standards and programs—

National standards and programs, these are words that we hear all the time now. he continued:

> This is acceptable and I think we can understand the use of that power.

Here we have the future Minister of Finance staking out the turf that he is in favour of national standards and in favour of the use of the federal powers to follow up.

He continued in the same debate:

> The only sign the current government shows of cutting spending is by shifting the burden of the established programs funding on to the provincial governments. The provinces are now moving into a deficit position, a position which will make it more difficult for them to finance this shift in spending. This is particularly true in Ontario and in the eastern provinces which do not have the substantial energy revenues of most of the western provinces. That is not co–operative federalism. That is a predatory federalism, and it will not and cannot work in this country.

Let us read those words again and think about them: predatory federalism on provinces that cannot afford it. What do we see this government doing? We see it undertaking and participating in predatory federalism to the extent that the only road that these governments have nowadays is to go to the courts. We have federalism by court action. We have the provincial governments taking the federal government to court on basic constitutional issues such as the cap on the Canada Assistance Program.

Can we imagine a future Minister of Finance standing up in the House to speak in a debate like this and laying out a position that it is fundamental to his understanding of the country that we do not terrorize provinces?

Then in February this year he stands up and says, without any warning at all: "We will extend the existing 5 per cent cap on the growth of Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta for three additional years". This is while they are already in court on another issue.

Second, the existing freeze on total per capita cash and tax transfers to the provinces, under Established Programs Financing, will also continue through 1994–95.

So there you go. On the one hand you stand in opposition and worry about the terrorism created by a government dealing with the recession. Then you come into power and say that the first people you are going to knock over are the provinces. You are going to make them pay for the programs even though you know most of them cannot afford to. In addition, it is fundamental to their fiscal security to have a strong central government. You take the language, you make people look this way, and while they are looking this way you take the cash and run.

Bill C–20 is all about taking the cash and running. It is done in a very quiet way where, if it is not pointed out, people will think that this is just a burden that we have to carry.

I listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance and I want him to remember his words when he said there was only one taxpayer. The great mythology in this country is that there is only one taxpayer, you and me. Well there may only be one taxpayer in this country, but there are distinctions among that so–called one taxpayer that this government refuses to admit.

Recent research has shown very clearly that the middle–class taxpayer is a special person as compared to the corporate taxpayer under this government. The rises in taxes paid by the average Canadian, which we estimate to be 34 taxes at last count, has doubled the rate of tax increases to the corporate sector. Now that is not to go on, as the NDP would, to a great anti–corporate diatribe. It is simply to point out to the government not to give us this thought that there is only one taxpayer when it has made a distinction. If there is only one taxpayer, why do the taxes go up a high percentage for the middle–class family and only a small amount for the corporate taxpayer? The government itself is saying just the opposite, that there are two classes of taxpayers and that it favours the corporate taxpayer and is going to protect them.

The guilt that people try to bring out in this deficit reduction dialogue has to be stopped. There is a deficit, it is important for us to get rid of it, and this Liberal Party will participate in any reasonable debt reduction scheme. As part of that package we not only want to see deficit reduction but real tax reform from this government and some wealth creation. We do not have wealth creation in this country right now. We have the loss of 275,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector which is just one indicator as to how little we have.

We would then like to see some real policy directions and the reform of social policies in this country. You cannot just single out deficit reduction and then drive everything by that when you have no idea how to govern the country in a reasonable way. No wonder so many Canadians are turning elsewhere and are becoming introspective by wanting to set up their own countries and move away from the centre.

The centre cannot hold if you do not have any ideas. This government lacks ideas. As commentators have said, it moves by stealth.

Yesterday, we heard the ministers of finance in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island talk about what it is like trying to set a budget when the government takes money away at every opportunity.

This is not to say that the provinces are not positioning or that they do not have their own axes to grind. None of us are naive about provincial ministers of finance, but I would just like to point out that federalism requires co–operation.

The government cannot on one hand be trying to set out a new constitutional regime and perhaps even be talking about a new economic regime while at the same time saying to the 10 colleagues around the table: "We are going to try to squeeze every ounce of cash out of the system, and we really do not care how much you scream".

The provinces are there under the Constitution to deliver services which are close to people. That includes welfare, education, looking after municipalities and a number of functions. If you ask who matters more to average Canadians, whether it be the backbenchers in the House of Commons, city councillors, local administrators or provincial people delivering education, they will tell you we count for less every time.

Our job here is to design a federal regime which protects and supports those people. We do not do it by undermining them at every opportunity.

Bill C-20 is designed to carry on the battle begun by this government in 1984 to undermine the social fabric and the current constitutional arrangement in this country. Each federal-provincial meeting whether in health, social policy or fiscal arrangements with the finance ministers, including the first ministers' meetings dealing with the Constitution, has been designed to shift the direction of this country.

Direction is not shifted by directly saying "this is the new Canada", but by saying "free trade will have no negative impacts on the country. Bill C-69 will have no impact on the country. The constitutional arrangement will really have no impact on your lives".

Suddenly people are turning around and saying: "Where is my country? Where is the place my parents built up? Where is the place I moved to? Where is the place that opened its arms and welcomed me?" It is depressed because the underpinnings have been removed by people who do not understand how it was put together in the first place.

The fight over Bill C-20 is a fight to get this government to recognize the significance of legislation which undermines the activities that people take pride in. The bill is a piece of legislation which comes out of the budget.

In the Canadian parliamentary system, when the budget statement is made the government presents a number of items to see it through. There is no new news in here, but we see the details under which the government hopes to continue its Draconian measures to destroy this country.

In the first section it deals with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, federal post-secondary education and the Health Contributions Act. It repeals a number of the sections and sets out a low growth strategy in the transfer payments to the provinces. I would like to deal with what that means to somebody in any one of our Canadian cities who is trying to get proper services.

What does it mean when the federal government says: "We are no longer going to sponsor post-secondary education the way we did in the past"? What does it mean to somebody 18 or 19 who is thinking of their education? It means they better begin to prepare and save if they can for very high tuition increases.

It is not out of line to think that tuition will hit $3,000 in the very near future. People say: "Why are we paying so much for education?" When people in this House went to university, they probably paid somewhere between $400 to $900 for tuition depending on the province.

Now we are saying to the next generation: "Three thousand dollars a year is not much. Don't worry about being $20,000 in debt". Then we will have to tell them: "You have to go back to Bill C-69 and Bill C-20 to understand how the federal government began to grab the cash out of the system". This can be very obscure and difficult to understand for a student in high school right now.

We stand in the House of Commons today and say to the government: "Rethink your fiscal arrangement strategy. Don't squeeze the universities. Find another way of financing this country. Find another way through tax reform. Find another way through economic growth. Don't be driven by the deficit to the point of distraction".

The act also continues on to outline the strategy, first noted in the budget, that the government is going to extend its powers under the Canada Health Act.

The Canada Health Act was designed by the last Liberal government to give the Minister of Health and Welfare fiscal authority and financial powers to limit payments to provinces which do not conform to the standards of the medicare program. The medicare program, of course, has five principles attached to it and with those five principles we protect our medicare system. If it is found to be sufficient, and as long as everyone stays committed to those five principles, then the need to actually use the Canada Health Act is very limited.

Members of this government are anxious to protect medicare because they understand that people out there fear them, they fear for medicare, they fear for its future. At the meetings of the ministers of finance yesterday in Charlottetown the story was: "You guys in the federal government are destroying medicare; we cannot finance it under the present program, let alone under future cuts".

This government understands that that message is out there in Canada. It has two choices. It can either recognize the concern that medicare is fundamental to the way Canadians think about themselves and do something about it, or take away medicare cash and force the provinces to find cash in other ways. This government pretends to be protecting the system, but in reality it pulls cash out of the rest of the system in order to play this charade. This is a charade and it is going to be called a charade and it is going to be fought as a charade.

The Government of Canada could protect medicare through the Canada Health Act and through proper funding of the provincial arrangements that now exist. It does not need to pull cash out of the rest of the system or threaten the provinces.

The act is somewhat obscure as to what measures are available. Perhaps for the public record this will be the opportunity to lay out exactly what is meant by other measures.

The federal government transfers funds to the provinces under several different programs. In reviewing these programs you have to remember that the federal government, if this gets through, will be able to pull money out of any of these programs. This sounds like a good idea, protecting medicare. Again, the way to protect medicare is to fund it, not to take money from elsewhere.

For example, under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government shares the cost of each province's income maintenance and social services programs on a 50—50 basis. Cash expenditures for 1991–92 are forecast to be $5.7 billion. If the federal government decided that a province was not spending its medicare money properly, it could hold back the transfers under CAP which is meant for welfare. This is, in fact, an attack on poverty. Day care is paid for under the Canada Assistance Plan. If the federal government is not happy with the way medicare is working out, because public opinion polls tell it to be careful in medicare, it could take money from day care. It is right here in the legislation.

Crop insurance, now here is a hoot. Farmers could be forced to pay for money lacking in medicare. It has the right to take away from crop insurance. The federal government shares administrative costs and premiums for crop insurance programs with the provinces and farmers. Federal contributions for the current year are estimated to be over $200 million.

This government could take money away from official languages and education. These formula payments to provinces under the Official Languages and Education Program provide enhanced opportunities for Canadians to learn a second official language. The cost is estimated to be about $263 million for the current fiscal year. That too can be pulled away.

There is a number of programs dealing with disabled persons under miscellaneous health and welfare to the extent of $170 million. Let us think about it. They want the authority to put into this legislation that if they want some money they can pull back $170 million from disabled persons.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Walker: This is unbelievable. Why would they want that particular instrument in government, unless deep down they thought: "We are going to squeeze these guys so hard they will not know how to fund medicare. We are going to be out there telling Canadians that we will do anything, anything except put up the cash, anything but tax reform, anything but turning this country around". This is just not the way to govern the country.

Turning to young offenders services, the federal government has agreements with the provinces and territories to share the costs incurred delivering justice services under the Young Offenders Act. The contribution is estimated currently to be $158 million.

Let us go over the list. They can take money from farmers. They can take money from young people. They can take money from the disabled. They can take money from welfare, from poor people. Is this the strategy for protecting medicare?

Let us continue. They can take money from justice. One of the great concerns of people is with safe cities. The federal assistance to provinces for legal aid programs related to criminal law and for programs that compensate victims of violent crime, $77 million. Again, people who have been subject to violent crime could have their money taken away from them.

Transportation includes federal transfers to provinces and municipalities for coastal marine transportation services, the establishment and operation of airports, and rail grade separations. Another $69 million is made vulnerable.

Equalization, which the government puts at $8.4 billion, is a big pocket to get into. Territorial financing for the territorial governments, another $1 billion is not going to be available to the federal government.

Perhaps the one that I enjoy the most—and I am sure my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands will be happy to discover it—is that this government wants to put into this package grants in lieu of property taxes. The federal government makes grants to provincial and municipal governments instead of paying the property taxes levied on federal and diplomatic property. The grants to municipalities right now is estimated at $344 million.

In other words, if there is a hospital in Ontario which for some reason the government does not like the way it is operating, perhaps with user fees or whatever, it can turn around and say to the city of Kingston: "We are withholding all your money". It could say to the city of Ottawa: "We are just going to withhold your money, that is it; get the province in order".

What kind of terrorism are they setting in motion? They have the legislative authority to turn municipalities against the province and against the federal government. Is that co-operative federalism the former Minister of Finance waxed on eloquently when he had the luxury of being in opposition? Perhaps he never thought he would be government and have to take responsibility for this country. Perhaps some of the good news is that he no longer is responsible for the financing of this country and we will find a better way of doing things.

We consider that this new weapon in the arsenal of the federal government in its attack on this country is totally unsuitable. We will work as hard as we can to make Canadians familiar with this particular component of the legislation and to fight hard against it.

If that were all the bad news we would be saddened, but there is no end to the bad news from this government. The bill continues on to deal with the UI. It quietly announces a 30 per cent premium increase of $2.25 to about $2.85. We have to stop and think: this follows the legislation they are so happy about, Bill C-21, not two years ago in this House, after a long, bitter and acrimonious fight in which the government withdrew from the unemployment insurance and left it up to individuals and companies.

Now we find out that the premiums have to be raised because in the absence of government support the fund is in a great deal of debt. Is there any mention in this legislation or in the minister's speech about training? Did he say anything about training? No.

So here we have on the one hand the Prime Minister traipsing about the country, balloons going up about how interested the Department of Finance is in training issues and how incompetent the provincial governments are in education. What do we find in the legislation the government presents to the House. We find that it is capping the moneys and withdrawing moneys from post-secondary education.

The government talks about the unemployment insurance fund. Does it mention training? No. How do people get themselves back into the system if this government cannot even remember to mention it in a speech, let alone care to do something? It cannot even remember that it made a commitment.

The Conservatives come into this House and talk about the need for deficit cuts and so forth, and then they turn around and attack the working people of this country in a way which totally destroys their confidence that they will have a secure and full life in this country.

Until these attacks stop, the depression in this country and the uncertainty will continue. It is up to this Minister of Finance to show some leadership and to understand how a piece of legislation such as this is so destructive.

Recently this legislation and the budget were reviewed by the National Council of Welfare. This is an advisory group to the federal government. It published a report entitled Funding Health and Higher Education—Danger Looming. This has been a subject of much discussion in the last 10 days. It is an excellent report. It comes from an organization which has been researching in this area for 20 years. It has managed to do the fine balancing act of being a critic of the government and a creature of the government at the same time and of being a spokesperson for Canada's poor at the same time as being responsible in its judgments.

I have over the years used many of its documents as a researcher and can attest to the seriousness of it work. It became the centre of a controversy last week when it indicated that the cash payments being made to the provinces were about to disappear.

As the government well knows, there are two components to the transfers that it makes under, for example, the health programs. It makes a tax point transfer, most of it settled under the 1977 EPF arrangement, Established Programs Financing arrangement, but it also transfers cash. In the analysis done by the National Council of Welfare, those cash payments begin to disappear from the provinces. Those cash payments are first to disappear in Quebec within five years, and in the rest of the provinces and the territories within 15 years.

When we look at this analysis we begin to understand the dilemma of the federal government. It refuses to tax properly, and therefore it is cash short. It does not have a gross strategy for this country and therefore revenues are shrinking. It has a deficit that is mind-boggling, three-quarters of which has been created by its own stupidity. When we take those components we realize what the National Council of Welfare is warning us about. Then we go back and look at Bill C-20 and all of a sudden realize what this is all about.

The government is trying to move out of its traditional domain. While it talks of national standards and tries to introduce into the constitutional debate a discussion on national standards, it pulls its cash off the table. As it pulls its cash off the table, particularly in medicare, the provinces say: "Well, listen, we need this cash for medicare. We are having trouble. We are having to choose between education and medicare". The government shrugs and says: "Medicare is protected under the Canada Health Act and by the way under Bill C-20, if you mess around with that, we have all these other weapons and we will go after you there".

The National Council of Welfare points out the following in its remarks, which I think are very good: "Health care and post-secondary education are undertakings vital to the well-being of Canadians". That should not have to be restated, but it does in this country right now because people are losing sight that that is one of the reasons we got together in the first place. It warns that people in poorer provinces will have to make due with health care services inferior to the services enjoyed by Canadians who happen to live in richer provinces if these measures go through.

Again, let us think about it. Let us think about my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls having to go back to his constituency and saying: "No matter how difficult life is in the province and no matter how much you struggle, the only news I have for you after this spring is higher UI premiums and the likelihood that your medicare system is not going to be as good. By the way, if you want to go on to post-secondary education, you can try the university in this province, you can pay your $3,000, but really it is getting to be better elsewhere in the country".

We cannot deal with families on that basis. We have to tell them they are there as fishermen, as loggers, as miners and as farmers. Sometimes there are good years; sometimes there are bad years. Sometime there have been bad years in the west. What are they supposed to do if medicare gets undermined? Do they live for three months in the farms of Manitoba and then go to Toronto for medicare during the winter?

What are the Conservatives thinking about? The National Council of Welfare is saying: "Be careful, this is the system you are setting in motion. We want you to pay attention to it because, if you let them put this into legislation, in 10 years you will wake up with no cash from the federal government". The federal government says that it does not have cash, that it will squeeze somewhere else, and that, by the way, it is trying to make a good constitutional deal for everybody to make them feel like this is a fair country.

That is why this government has no credibility and that is why the sooner it is gone the happier Canada will be.

There are some very specific recommendations coming from the national council report which are worth while presenting to the House. As this legislation moves to committee, I would like to see the committee consider some of them and make sure that the legislation conforms to these important points.

First, the federal government should continue to play a significant financial role in both health care and post-secondary education.

Second, any changes in the financing of health and higher education should result from federal-provincial negotiations rather than being imposed by Ottawa. What a message.

After years of co-operative federalism beginning under Lester B. Pearson in the 1960s, after special deals made by Mackenzie King to ensure that UI became a national program, after the leadership shown by Paul Martin, Senior, in ensuring the medicare came into Canada despite federal-provincial problems, the development of regional development programs in the 1970s within the atmosphere of federal-provincial agreements, the extension of economic development ERDA agreements, the Economic and Regional Development Agreements in the early 1980s, we are all of a sudden starting the 1990s with an advisory group having to make the most elementary statement that Ottawa should not impose new agreements.

Why does that have to be stated? It has to be stated because nobody trusts this government any more, particularly the people concerned about social policy in this country.

Third, any new arrangements negotiated for financing health and higher education should focus on federal cash payments. A cliché in business, particularly small business, is: after a deal has been made, who has the cash? Maybe we should remember this in dealing with the federal government: Who has the cash?

They do not have it because they will not collect it and, because they do not have anything, they will not give it to the provinces. We know that the individual taxpayer in Canada has no cash, their provinces have no cash, and the feds say they have no cash. The big question right now is: Who has the cash?

The Minister of Finance went over the problem and said: "Oh, I don't have any cash, Mr. Opposition Party. You should know that". This country has cash, so who has the cash? If the biggest tax collector in the country is telling us that he does not have cash, where is it? Is it because they have wasted it and therefore should not be governing any more? Is it because they do not know how to collect it fairly? Why do they not have the cash? I ask the minister that question. Perhaps he can return to this point later on in his discussions.

Finally, federal funding for health care should be distinct from funding for post-secondary education. Federal legislation should stipulate that the cash received by a province for health and higher education is to be spent as intended.

I want to deal with one of the most subtle and dangerous changes in the fiscal arrangements in this country, by focusing attention on medicare which we can take for granted is one of the most important if not the most important programs we have, because when everything is said and done health is essential to life, and by building a corral around medicare we have to stop and think about what has been excluded. If we do not have cash for medicare, where do we find it? That is the question provincial ministers of finance have. You find it in post-secondary education. So many provinces have been guilty of stealing moneys from the post-secondary field to cover up other fields.

It is stealing from their future. It is stealing from students who need a first class education. I do not mean 50, 60 students in a political science class whose books are four years old. That is kidding ourselves. People who have language skills, people who you can trade with—how can you have a world trading system, as these ministers talk about, if you do not have people who can speak many languages? How can you speak many languages if you do not get trained?

You talk about going into Asia. Who are you talking about going into Asia and what skills are they going to have?

You talk about selling our wheat to new markets or developing new products in the wheat markets. Where is that research going to be done? You do not do that by reading a four year old book at a university library. You do it in first class facilities.

The National Council on Welfare is absolutely correct to say: "stop the stealing from education because nobody notices it today or yesterday". All of a sudden down the line everybody is going to notice it, everybody is going to be in a panic and then it may be too late because you cannot create a new student. You cannot create a new university library. You cannot create a new community college by going "presto, it's here". This takes time and a lot of effort and if we do not start now, it will take us 20 years to catch up.

These are the comments on Bill C-20. As you can see, we have serious reservations about it. We are very concerned about the ongoing cutbacks to the transfer payments to the provinces. We think it is a strategy not developed in a realistic way in the context of program development, of tax reform, of deficit reduction.

We are as concerned as the government about the debt that it has created, and let the records show that it is their debt and no one else's debt. It had a finance minister there for seven years. He knew what the debt was. He projected every year that he would be doing a better job. He failed. It was turned over to a new minister. It is too late for them, but the country is saddled with $400 billion worth of errors.

This party is very sensitive to the need to reduce that deficit, but it is also, as I have indicated in my speech, it is something that is not done on the backs of farmers—and this is documented—of municipalities, of provinces, of people who are vulnerable in the society. You do not build strength by attacking the weakest.

This attack on the weak should not go unchallenged and, thus, our party opposes this legislation and will continue to challenge it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, we have had a remarkable demonstration this morning of the smugness of this government. We are confronted with economic conditions across this country which are damaging human beings, destroying communities, making our opportunities for the future as a country more narrow, making our potential for our young people more constrained. That is the reality of our economy across Canada in 1991.

The New Democratic Party has just completed an economic recovery tour of 15 communities. We talked to over 75 groups, groups ranging from farm groups, women's groups, co-operatives, groups representing aboriginal Canadians, to trade unions, to business groups, from those representing large scale business, like the Bank of Nova Scotia, to those representing small scale business like Caplan Retail Stores in Hamilton.

The message which has come to us is not a message such as the Minister of Finance tried to present to this House this morning. He suggested to people that everything was really moving ahead, that this government was on track and that the economy was moving into a recovery which was going to be durable. Those were his words.

I have to say that this minister and this government is certainly on track. It is on track in leading this country into the worst period of economic experience that this country has felt for a long period of time, since the 1930s.

We go back to the recession of 1981-82. There is no question that the Liberal Party at that time led us into a recession which was attacked by the Conservatives on that side of the House because it demonstrated to those Conservatives that the Liberals did not care about people. The Conservatives may have been right, that the Liberals did not care about people. What the Conservatives have done in their economic management of this economy is to demonstrate that not only can they repeat the mistakes of the Liberals in the early part of the 1980s, but they can do so with a callousness, coldness and lack of concern for the future of our entire country, which as we enter 1991, really puts our country at risk.

We had a set of hearings in Montreal. A great many francophone groups came before us. They were groups such as the Union of Quebec Farm Producers, the UPA, the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the representatives of the environmental groups and social development groups in Quebec. Many of these groups had already given up in expressing their view of where Canada and Quebec should go in the future.

They had said: "Quebec should become independent." Why? Because these groups demonstrated to us how devastating the economic policy of this government was to the every day Quebecer, to the person who does the work to make that society go forward. Yet this government says: "We are on track."

I quote not from something that the New Democratic Party has written, not from something that comes from a trade union, a farm group or any of those popular groups across this country that we talked to during our hearings, but from a publication which came out yesterday, "The Business Review" of the Bank of Montreal.

This is not exactly a socialist document. This is something from one of the largest business corporations in the country, the Bank of Montreal. What does it say? It says:

> The current recession has clearly been much more severe than earlier expected.

• (1130)

Do you remember what the government told us just six months ago, back last fall? They said: "This is a temporary slowdown, just a brief pause for us to get our breath". Well it has turned out that they were wrong with respect to that. The current recession has been much more severe than earlier expected.

This government has also said: "Well, the rest of the world is experiencing recession". Let me quote again from the Bank of Montreal:

> In Germany and Japan, on the other hand, a slowdown is currently underway but there seems no likelihood that in either country, a recession will develop.

This government has tried to call this a slowdown. It is not a slowdown, it is a reversal. It is a destruction of economic growth in this country, a reversal which has reduced the level of output in Canada. Germany and Japan are not experiencing that and are not expected to experience it according to economic observers such as the Bank of Montreal.

The minister suggested to us this morning that things are rosy, that there are many positive indicators; housing starts, manufacturing shipments, business confidence is growing.

Let us look at the reality. The reality is, and again this comes not from the New Democratic Party, but from the Department of Finance's own publication which came out this past Friday. It indicates that the GST revenues collected in the last fiscal quarter were higher than estimated in the February 1991 budget, by $400 million. That is $400 million on a base of $1.8 billion.

In fact, this government has collected from the pockets of Canadians, 25 per cent more than it told Canadians it was going to collect—25 per cent more in GST. The minister considers that a positive indicator. Let me tell you, there are many constituents of mine and many people across this country I have talked to who say that is precisely the problem. This government is taking the money from peoples' pockets which would otherwise be spent on goods and services and keeping people at work in this country.

The minister says positive indicators. He did not happen to mention the unemployment rate on Friday, which went up from the previous month to 10.3 per cent, an unemployment rate increase which includes a loss of jobs for our young people in this country, a loss of jobs for young men for a total of 13,000.

The seasonally adjusted figures for unemployment itself indicated that 15,000 more people were unemployed in this country last month. Is that a positive indicator? If we compare the unemployment figures that were just announced Friday with last year, what is the reality?

The reality is that full-time employment in this country of ours decreased by 330,000 jobs since April of last year. Surely it is not possible for this government to say that these are positive signs for the future of our country.

This decrease is not just in the goods producing area, the manufacturing sector which has been hit so hard. There were 174,000 jobs lost there, but 65,000 jobs were also lost in the service producing sector.

We have seen, brought home to us in these kinds of statistics, that this is not a country enjoying a durable recovery. This is a country still experiencing recession. When we move into recovery—eventually we will have to move into recovery because that is how business cycles work—what sort of recovery is it going to be?

Again, let me quote from the Bank of Montreal which is usually on the government's side. It does not say that it is going to be a durable recovery. No. It says that it is going to be a weak recovery. To quote:

> Weak income growth is expected to be one of the main impediments preventing a more robust recovery.

Expansion is expected to be sluggish. Maybe this government is satisfied with a sluggish, weak recovery. Let me tell you that you have lost 330,000 jobs in a year. To see a sluggish recovery and be satisfied with it is surely shameful. In my view, there is no question that this government is far too smug about what is happening.

Interest rates in this country are still far too high. The gap between us and the United States of 3 percentage points is far higher than anything that we had historically between Canada and the United States in the past. We have never had that 3 per cent rate.

The dollar's value now is consistently over 87 cents American. Every single institution that you speak to in this country, from the government's own Economic Council to the Canadian Exporter's Association and the trade union groups that are being hit so hard in terms of jobs by this recession, says one thing with a single voice. The government succeeded in bring labour and business together on the one single, dominant point that the dollar in this country is far too high and that we have to reduce interest rates further so that we get a competitive level of dollar. The Economic Council, the government's own body, has suggested 78 or 80 cents.

We have a government that has changed the unemployment insurance system so that there are far more people being forced into the destructive experience of having to receive welfare payments to keep their families together.

We have seen the destruction of our manufacturing base. We need investment in the future, in training, in research and development, in new institutions to channel capital into the rebuilding of our manufacturing sector.

This government is giving us none of that kind of leadership. Instead, it gives us the bill that is in front of us this morning. This legislation is as mean-minded, penny-pinching and as non-creative as any of its previous legislation in the last seven years.

What we have in front of us is a piece of legislation which takes, at a time of a national unity crisis, the present level of support to the provincial governments and it says "we are going to cut that level of support even more in the future". It breaks its promises to the provinces with this piece of legislation, and assumes that somehow that is going to contribute to national unity.

Anybody who has any sensitivity, any sense of concern about the future unity of our country, has surely got to say to these people "for the sake of a united Canada, don't do this; don't destroy the promises that have been made in the past". These promises were broken last year, and this year the government has gone on to break them for a further three years, to 1994-95.

You cannot expect, if it continues in this way, to see medicare, which the people of this country care about so much, survive. You cannot squeeze a good system, a system which is performing so much better than its equivalent in the United States. The United States has a system where Americans spend over $2,200 U.S. per year per person for their coverage while Canadians spend under $1,600 per year per person. It costs on average for Americans $360 per day to stay in American hospitals, compared to $210 in Canada.

Here is a system that is helping our competitiveness, helping our capacity to deal effectively with competition from the United States, by giving us a much more effective, much more human, much more accessible program and the government is attacking it by cutting back the funds that are going to it.

My colleague, our health critic, is going to be talking more about this as this debate goes forward because this is one of the most dangerous parts of this piece of legislation. The government says it is going to be able to withhold other cash transfers. All that will do is increase the squeeze on the provinces, increase the conflicts with the provinces.

As we struggle with unity problems, is it wise to cut back transfer payments to the provinces? I do not think so, Madam Speaker.

[English]

There are other parts to this legislation too. There are amendments which reduce the ease with which members' salaries will increase. We have no problem with that. There are amendments to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Some of my colleagues will be talking to that. There are amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Some of my colleagues will be focusing on that. Over-all, what we have here in front of us is another example of the constipated, devastating approach that this government has been taking to management of our economy. People across this country are hurting and hurting badly as a result.

All I can hope is that this debate will bring this government to its senses, that it will somehow start to recognize that it must change direction for the future good of our country and of our people.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a few words on the record with respect to the legislation which is before the House today, to amend certain acts in order to really enforce the budget that was brought in and, specifically, the federal transfers fiscal arrangements act, which really affects the money transferred to provincial governments from the federal treasury.

The Minister of Finance made a statement in this Chamber a few moments ago which I am going to disprove. I am going to lay on the Table of the House facts that are directly contrary to what this Minister of Finance said today and what the Government of Canada said in its budget. They said that although there were cuts to the provincial governments for education and health and equalization payments, the actual dollar figure was not cut. That is what the government is saying. It is saying that the rate of increase has been cut back, but that there is no actual dollar for dollar cut to the provincial treasuries.

I have with me the official charts given to me by officials from the Department of Finance. They show some interesting facts. They show that, for example, that the province of Newfoundland will receive for this year $16.9 million less than they received last year under equalization.

What is equalization? Equalization, as defined by the Minister of Finance, is, and I quote from a letter that he wrote to me.

> —a formula set out in legislation that compares provincial governments in their abilities to raise revenues from the revenue sources typically used by all provincial governments.

In other words, a provincial government is sent every month a sum of money. The poorer provinces now, to make up for the revenues they could have received if they had the ability to raise money through taxes that the other provinces are able to raise through taxes, are given equalization.

That defines, then, what the poorer provinces are in Canada in total amounts of money. What are the poorer provinces in Canada, the top three?

The province that will receive the most money in equalization from the federal government is Quebec. Of the total equalization package of $8.4 billion this year, Quebec will receive about $4 billion, Manitoba about $1 billion, and Nova Scotia about $1 billion. Therefore, in total amounts of money being transferred to the provincial governments from the federal Treasury, the top three in total equalization to the poorer provinces are Quebec, Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

In looking at the figures year over year, here is the way they work out in equalization. The largest increase in equalization payments for this year will be to the province of Manitoba at $90 million more than it received last year. This is according to the federal Treasury. Then comes the Northwest Territories, which is is under what is called "territorial financing". It does not receive an equalization payment as a provincial government but will receive territorial financing of $90 million. Next comes Saskatchewan, which will receive an extra $70 million; then comes Quebec, which will receive an extra $60 million; then comes the territory of Yukon, which will receive an additional $36 million; and then there is New Brunswick; which will get an additional $25 million; Nova Scotia comes next and will receive an extra $23 million; then comes Prince Edward Island, which will get an additional $5 million.

Those are the increases in equalization for the year 1991–1992, as outlined by the Federal Department of Finance.

Madam Speaker, you will notice that I only read out nine provinces and two territories. I left out a province. I left out a province because that province is not receiving an increase. That province is receiving a decrease. It is not just a decrease of $1 million or $2 million or $3 million or $4 million or $5 million or even $10 million. No. It is a decrease of $20 million this year. Here it is on the official record, in French and English, if the Minister of Finance does not understand it. The province of Newfoundland will receive less money this year in federal equalization than it received last year.

Let us not forget it is not just equalization payments we are talking about but the total transfers to the provinces. In other words, the federal government pays money to the poorer provinces to make up for the fact that they are poorer provinces and cannot raise the revenues from taxation that other provinces can raise. It is not only that. The transfers are also for health and education. They are for grants in lieu of property taxes, reciprocal taxation, public utilities, income tax transfers, statutory subsidies, youth allowance recovery, tax points for this and tax points for that. But if we add it all up, it is called the total transfers to the provincial governments from the federal Treasury.

The total transfers to the provincial governments are interesting numbers. This upcoming year we will see total transfers of $36.472 billion, $36.4 billion. The provinces receiving the most in Canada are Quebec and Ontario at $10 billion apiece. It is then British Columbia at $3.2 billion, Alberta at $2.7 billion, Manitoba at $1.98 billion, Nova Scotia at $1.78 billion, New Brunswick at $1.623 billion, Saskatchewan at $1.453 billion, and down it goes to include the territories as well. Newfoundland is ninth. The big three in equalization payments, as I pointed out, are Quebec, Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

I mention all of that to show on the official record that the Minister of Finance is wrong. There is a province in Canada that is receiving less equalization this year than last year. There is a province in Canada that is receiving less in total transfers this year than last year, and that is the province of Newfoundland.

If that were not enough, another strange thing happened this year. You will notice that on these charts that I am going to table it says estimated federal transfers to the provinces, territories and municipalities for the fiscal year. The reason why it says estimated transfers is that these transfers are made prior to the federal government knowing how much is actually owed to the provincial governments.

In other words, at the beginning of every year the government makes an estimate for that year and sends a cheque in the mail toward the end of the month so that the provincial governments will get it at the end of the month. The total figure for the year is an estimate and at the end of the year the government then reassesses that estimate. After all of the figures are in, in 36 months hence, three years, it will determine the actual amount of money that should have gone to those provincial governments.

What happens from time to time under these fiscal arrangements is that provincial governments are either owed money or they sometimes have to pay back money to the federal Treasury.

Last March in the federal Department of Finance in Ottawa an audit was done on the fiscal transfers to the provinces. They found out the amount of money that provinces get through taxation on cigarettes, booze, gasoline and all other taxes.

They added it up and found the actual dollar figure that each province received, the amount the government paid them, the amount the provinces thought they were going to receive in equalization transfers and then the final accounting was done. At the end of March of last year the federal government found that there were four provinces in Canada who were overpaid, from three years ago. Those four provinces were Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

Do you know what that means? It means that now those provinces have to pay the money back. There is a formula for paying back the money and they have to pay it back at no more than $60 per head of population in any one year. Let us look at the figures. Who owes the money?

For all of Atlantic Canada in 1988 the Atlantic provinces owe $90 million to the federal Treasury. For 1989 they owe $85 million to the federal Treasury. What is interesting is that of the $90 million owed for the year 1988, the province of Newfoundland owes, according to the federal Department of Finance, $37 million. Thirty seven million dollars of the $90 million owed by the four Atlantic provinces was overpaid to the province of Newfoundland, according to the Department of Finance.

In 1989, of the $85 million that was overpaid to the four Atlantic provinces, it claims that Newfoundland was overpaid $34 million. As I explained a moment ago, the repayment schedule of limiting the amount of money to $60 per head of population per year, so as not to overburden a government every year, means that Newfoundland will be paying back that money for three fiscal years.

In other words, the only province in Canada that is paying back the federal treasury for money that the federal government claims was overpaid to them in 1988 and 1989, the only province that has to pay it back for this year and for a portion of next year, is the province of Newfoundland because the federal Treasury says: "You were paid too much money in 1988 and 1989".

Add those two facts together. Add together the fact that dollar for dollar the province of Newfoundland this year will receive far less than they got last year, and the fact that they now have to pay back millions of dollars. The cheques are sent out every two weeks, back to the federal government here in Ottawa for money that the federal government claims, and the books show the province was overpaid in 1988 and 1989.

If you were in a position to say: now, in which provincial government would I like to be the Minister of Finance? It certainly would not be the province of Newfoundland, would it? Here you are being cut back on your equalization payments, dollar for dollar, by the Government of Canada. You are being cut back on your transfer payments dollar for dollar and on top of that, you have to pay back money it claims was paid in this case to a previous government. Imagine that, a previous government. There was a Progressive Conservative government, a Tory government in power in the province of Newfoundland in 1988 and 1989.

An hon. member: They did not ask for the money then.

Mr. Baker: The Government of Canada says: Oh, we overpaid them then, so now we are sending a bill to the Newfoundland treasury and you are going to have to pay it back in three years. On top of that, we are not only going to make you pay back what the Tory government got three years ago, but we are going to cut back dollar for dollar what you get in equalization and total transfers. We are going to single you out and we are going to cut you back dollar for dollar. The government loses $16.9 million in one area and $20 million in another area. Why? According to these estimates, not only are its cash transfers down, but its total transfers are down. Its fiscal equalization is down. Its cash subtotal is down. Its general purpose transfers are down for this year, and the Minister of Finance stands up in the House and says no province is being cut. He is saying oh, there is a reduction, yes, but all provinces are getting more than they got last year.

Oh, no, that is not correct. In fact, they are not only getting less than they got last year, but they have to pay back money they got four years ago. Add to that the Minister of Finance in the province of Newfoundland paying back money the former Tory government got three years ago. Here you are trying to plan your budget and they are saying: "We are going to give you a lot less than you got last year, dollar for dollar". On top of that there is the federal government imposing a 7 per cent new tax that takes 7 per cent out of the economy of every provincial government in Canada.

I must say for the official record that I heard a newsman interview Premier Clyde Wells and ask him about the money owed. The premier said: "If Newfoundland owes it, then Newfoundland will pay it back. If we rightfully owe it on the books, in the accounting, then we will pay it back." Other leaders would have declared a day of mourning and had everybody in the province walking around with black arm bands, carrying coffins down the street. They would. Any other previous administration would have done that. But the premier of Newfoundland said that if we owe it we are going to pay it. You have to admire a man like that for his honesty and integrity, his apolitical approach to the entire question.

I think it is an outrageous thing for the Government of Canada to do and I ask them to do two things. First of all,forgive the overpayment. After all, we just forgave moneys that were owed to Canada by several foreign nations and several foreign banks. Secondly, and I will conclude with this, Madam Speaker, I know you are trying to get me to sit down; we should have a formula that says no province should actually lose money, dollar over dollar from last year, to ease the pain for those provincial administrations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows that the only thing I was trying to do was tell him that his time had expired. There was no reflection upon what he was saying.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the hon. member had to say. I wondered if there was an implication in what he was suggesting about the request for repayment of moneys from Newfoundland that perhaps the overpayment was politically motivated in 1988 because there was a Newfoundland election coming up, and perhaps the government was trying to bail out its Tory friends.

Then in 1990 the money was demanded back after the Conservative government in Newfoundland was thrown out and the people lifted the yoke of Toryism off their backs, as it were, in that election. I know they wish they had done so successfully federally as well. I wonder if he could tell us if he thinks that the demand for payment was politically motivated. Does he feel that the Conservative government in Ottawa, having failed in its attempt to bail out its Conservative friends in Newfoundland, felt that it should demand this money back in order to burden, or punish, the people of Newfoundland for having voted other than Conservative? Is he suggesting that in his speech? If so, does he think it is a proper way for a federal government, that is supposedly bent on national unity, to behave?

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, there have been people who have suggested to me that perhaps the previous PC government in Newfoundland, faced with an election, gave an overestimate of the amount of equalization moneys that were due. I do not hold that opinion because I believe that although the system does lend itself to the possibility of that happening, it is not based on the amount of money that is transferred, but on an estimate. It is a guess by the federal government how much money a provincial government would be able to collect if it had the same fiscal capacity through taxation as the other so-called wealthier provinces.

I think it was an honest mistake on the part of the federal treasury. I do not believe though that any federal government should turn around and ask Premier Wells or any provincial premier in this nation to pay back money that a previous administration was given three years before.

What I was reading here—and I can table this—is a letter to me from the Minister of Finance explaining the entire procedure and explaining why Newfoundland is the only province in Canada paying back money this year and next. The other three provinces received over-payments that were so little they could pay it back in one year, you see. This is why he went into extensive detail to explain to me why Newfoundland was singled out. And then he attached, for my benefit, the charts that showed again that Newfoundland was singled out. On top of this, Newfoundland was the only province in Canada that received a reduction in its total transfers. He also pointed out in the chart that Newfoundland is ninth in the amount of money received from the federal Treasury—ninth of all the provinces. Newfoundland is not in the top three provinces that receive equalization money from the federal Treasury.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a short comment to my colleague. I think it is important to point out the timing. When you first mentioned this incident, the question that came to my mind was that if all of a sudden I got an extra thousand dollars on my pay cheque at the end of the month, wouldn't I know? It would be up to me to go to the payroll clerk and say "here, you have made a mistake". So, I thought that surely to goodness, if there were millions and millions of extra dollars coming into a treasury, the recipient would have noticed that this tremendous sum of money was over and above what he should have received. It would be incumbent on the recipient to go back to the giver and say: "Hey, you have made a mistake, we did not expect this".

I initially wondered why the Liberal government would not have picked that up. But my colleague has just informed me that the Liberal government was not the recipient. In other words, they discovered it quite a bit later and they were not involved in the transaction. I think it is important for the member to comment on the time lapse between the original recipient and when the new government found out.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, that is a very interesting point.

According to this letter from the Minister of Finance which I received just the other day, the former Progressive Conservative government of Newfoundland received $71 million more than they should have received—$71 million.

Well, as the hon. member has just pointed out, surely to goodness they should have at least looked at it and said: "Well, my goodness, where are we getting this extra money from?" I mean, it is $71 million. It is not $5 million or $10 million or $20 million—it is $71 million.

Certainly, it should have been incumbent upon them to say: "This is a rather exorbitant amount of money we are receiving."

The points made here today have not even been mentioned publicly before to my knowledge. Is it legitimate for Newfoundland to receive less money this year than last year and have to pay back all this money?

Perhaps it was a legitimate exercise, if it was politically motivated at the time. I think it was a legitimate exercise. The Government of Newfoundland has taken a position as I mentioned before. The premier says: "If it is on the books and Newfoundland owes it, brother, we are going to pay it". It is a very honourable position for the premier of Newfoundland to take.

Certainly, as I said before, there are a lot of politicians in this country who would have been very political and would have been beating the drum. They would have made political hay out of it. The premier of Newfoundland did not do that, but the premier of Newfoundland then has to turn around and cut his budgets.

There was cut, cut, cut everywhere to make up for this money that they have to pay back every month. Every two weeks they send a cheque to pay back. They have to make up for all this money, the actual dollar for dollar cut year after year. They have to pay back.

How can the Newfoundland government respect its commitments at all, having to do that? If you wanted to be a minister of finance, you sure would not want to be one in the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the legislation before us has dire consequences for what we determine to be the poorest provinces.

There are provisions for cutting back on transfers to provinces. I understand the point the member for Gander—Grand Falls is making about the injustice of the situation, but I just want to ask him a general question.

There was a report put out by the National Council of Welfare this year called "Funding Health and Higher Education: Things are Looming". In this document, there is a chart on page 30 which shows that Newfoundland, for example, by the year 2005 will have its cash outlays cut to pretty well nothing.

I want to ask the member: How in the world can this country stay together if the richer provinces can continue to give services in the health field, in post-secondary education field and others, such as CAP, and the poorer provinces are called upon in less than 15 years to do without the federal contributions assisting them in maintaining these very good and very Canadian programs? That is, I think, a very important question.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, that is perhaps the most important question of all.

As you know, Madam Speaker, we all share the opinion that the two most important things that government has to look at are health and education, hospitals and schools. My goodness gracious, if there is something that you would not touch, something that you would hold up and say: "I am not going to touch that as a budget, it has got to be hospitals."

My goodness, you would never cut back on the expenditure to hospitals, but what has happened here is this. The federal treasury gives what we call "block funding" and no longer gives dollar for dollar. When the federal government cuts back on block funding, the provincial government then has to find the dollars from some other place.

It just cannot be done because you cannot take your entire funding for wages and salaries of public employees and put it into trying to keep hospitals going.

• (1220)

You have to pay salaries. You have to do maintenance on your roads and so on. That is what the provincial governments are left with. In the case of Newfoundland—now that chart is interesting—we are practically down to zero. No money at all under block funding. If hospitals are to be kept open in Newfoundland, the provincial government has to take the money from everything else. That is a tragedy.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak at the second reading stage of Bill C-20.

It was not my intention to comment on federal payments to the province of Newfoundland, but after the hon. member's speech, I feel I should set the record straight.

First of all, federal transfer payments to the provinces, including Newfoundland, are statutory and subject to certain calculations, to ensure that annually, and I would almost say in advance, the provinces receive the money to which they are entitled under a number of existing programs.

When I hear the hon. member complain that Newfoundland has to pay back money to the federal government, I may remind him that the amount Newfoundland received was more than the amount to which it was entitled after the final calculations were made. I will get back to this later.

So in this case, it is perfectly normal for Newfoundland to pay the money back to the federal government, as it would be for any other province, whether we are talking about Alberta or British Columbia or Quebec. All the provinces are governed by the same legislation. Madam Speaker, the hon. member also said—and I am not sure how he figured this out—that Newfoundland would receive less money this year or the year after. This is just not true. In 1991–92, Newfoundland will receive more money under all programs—I will elaborate on some of these later on—than it received in 1990–91. This applies to all programs, including equalization, established programs financing, and so forth.

I wanted to set the record straight because the hon. member got carried away by his subject, with figures that were probably inaccurate, but my point is, Newfoundland was not penalized in any way.

To get back to Bill C–20, the proposed legislation affects several areas. The two main ones are federal–provincial fiscal arrangements and the Parliament of Canada Act. When we talk about federal–provincial fiscal arrangements, we must be careful because there are several kinds. In Quebec, when we talk about federal money, the first word that comes to mind is equalization. This is one kind of transfer payment. There is also established programs financing.

Very briefly, established programs financing involves money that is distributed annually by the federal government to all provinces on an equal basis. Each province gets the same amount per capita, and whether I happen to live in Newfoundland, British Columbia or Quebec, the federal government sends the same amount.

Equalization—which is different—is a special program to help provinces who need more assistance in funding health care and education. Equalization payments are received annually by the four Atlantic provinces, Quebec and occasionally Manitoba.

And here is another distinction: federal money goes to the provinces in two forms: as tax points and as cash.

This year, the federal government will give Quebec about $11 billion. It does this through the equalization program and EPF, established programs financing. How does the government pay? That is indeed the question. There are two ways: tax points and cash. Mainly in Quebec, the amount paid in the form of tax points is much higher. Madam Speaker, perhaps you will remember that when you files your income tax return like all Quebecers, and I see it was a delightful experience, there was one line on the return for Quebec residents where it shows 16.5 per cent, because Quebec collects more income tax from its residents than the other provinces. This means that the amount on the cheque the federal government sends to the Province of Quebec is not as high, because the province has already collected the difference via the tax return you filed on April 30 like any good Quebecer.

So we have two programs under which Quebec receives money, and two ways in which the federal government pays the money to the province: income tax collected directly by the province from Quebec residents and the amount on the cheque sent by Ottawa.

Madam Speaker, recently there were reports and comments by various sources to the effect that in a few years, Quebec would no longer be receiving money from Ottawa. That is probably what will happen. It does not mean that the federal government gives the province less money. In fact—and I will quote the figures later on—the annual amount received by the Province of Quebec, like the amount received by the hon. member's Province of Ontario or by any other province, increases every year, but the amount on the cheque written by the federal government may go down because the province may be collecting more money directly in the form of income tax.

Madam Speaker, perhaps I may quote a few figures that are vital to this discussion and also to opposition members' understanding of Bill C–20 and that of the general public as well.

In 1984–85, Quebec received $8.1 billion from the federal government, which means $1,256 per capita. The federal government paid the province the equivalent of $1,256 per capita in 1984–85. For 1990–91, the amount is $10.1 billion, which means $1,503 per capita will be received by Quebec in 1990–91, as money transferred by the federal government to the provinces.

An hon. member: What would it have been otherwise?

The hon. member says: what would it have been otherwise? That is not the point. The point is that annually, the federal government transfers more to the provinces percentage-wise that it spends on program spending. The federal government's expenditures are around 3 per cent per year, and we have maintained that so far, despite the fact that the opposition keeps telling us to reduce the deficit and at the same time spend more. We are working on the deficit, and we are maintaining increases in program spending at 3 per cent, the exception being transfers to the provinces that are now growing at a rate of almost 4 per cent per year.

So we have to keep these figures in mind. If we look at the provincial governments, Madam speaker, we see that the increase there is about 6 per cent. Well, the national debt is very national. It is the debt of all Canadians. Whether I live in British Columbia or Prince Edward Island, as a Canadian I have to cope with a problem that is called the national debt. Today, the national debt is more than $15,000 per individual, per Canadian. Each and everyone of us, from new born babies to senior citizens, is $15,000 in debt. Something must be done.

The measures taken by the federal government are in some cases draconian. I admit.

Last Friday, I took part in a lunchtime open line radio program at the CHLM radio station in Trois-Rivières and the announcer, Michel Charland, was saying that Canadians feel they are paying a lot of taxes, if not too much. My reply was this: "It is true that we are heavily taxed, but we have many services and an enormous debt." This debt, Madam Speaker, has to be paid off; otherwise—if we keep increasing our spending by 6,7 or 8 per cent every year—the future generations will not be able to even dream of any new programs.

Just think, Madam Speaker, that 35 cents out of every tax dollar collected by the federal government is taken up to pay, not the capital, but the interest on this debt we inherited from the Liberal government. Let us call a spade a spade. When we came into office, the accumulated debt was $200 billion. Granted, it has increased. But, Madam Speaker, the national debt has grown by the amount of the interest payments we have had to make every year. Had it not been for this debt we inherited in 1984 and the interest to be paid on it, there would not be a annual deficit.

The Opposition gets angry, Madam Speaker, when we mention the debt they left us but it is the truth. There is a debt and we have to live with it.

But, I would like to come back to Bill C-20, if I may. The good thing about this, Madam Speaker, is that it wakes them up to hear me talk about their debt and our debt. I was just trying to explain to my colleague opposite that, had it not been for the interest we had to pay on these $200 billion, we would not have ended up with an annual deficit and, with no annual deficit, the debt would not have increased. It is as simple as that. So, 35 cents out of every tax dollar goes to pay the interest on our debt, the debt of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, the federal government must continue on the course set out in 1984 and administer while recognizing, provincial needs regarding education, health, etc. Let me give you more figures, Madam Speaker. In 1992–93, Quebec will receive $10.8 billion from the federal government. That's $1,575 per capita. You will remember that I said that, this year, it is $1,503.

So, there is indeed an annual increase, and I could give the figures for all the provinces, Madam Speaker, because they will all get more next year that they got this year. Now, Bill C-20 calls for a reduction in this increase, so that the provinces can do their share and help us deal with the national debt and deficit problem we are faced with.

We could increase transfer payments further. That could be done, but the question would remain: where shall the money come from? If the national debt could be paid off tomorrow morning, which would mean no more deficit, we would not have to pay interest charges anymore. We would then have about $30 billion available every year to create programs to help Canadians, $30 billion to develop new programs, create jobs and make life yet easier for the people of Quebec and Canada. This is the amount we have to use right now to pay interest charges. The limit on the credit card has been reached,

Madam Speaker, as it was in 1984. And what we have been trying to do ever since is precisely to pay off the interest on the debt and, by 1994, no longer have to borrow so that we can start paying back our debt the normal way, the way a country is normally administered. That is one of the aspects covered in Bill C–20.

As you know, Madam Speaker, in 1984, the federal government was spending $15 billion more, not $15 million but $15 billion—we are not talking peanuts here—every year than was coming in. The Canadian people were getting $15 billion more, in programs of all kinds, thant they were paying for in taxes. This contributed to the annual increase in the deficit and the national debt.

This year, we will be spending $10 billion less on programs than we will be collecting in taxes. Now, that's good management! That is what all the people who are watching us do, how the head of the family manages the household budget: they spend a little less than they earn and set some money aside. And that is what we have managed to do over the past five years. In just five years, we turned a $15 billion deficit in a $10 billion profit, a $25 billion improvement. It was no easy task. How did we do it? We made unpopular but necessary cuts and increased taxes a tad. But 70 percent of these $25 billion that have changed columns come from cuts within government, while 30 percent come from increased taxes. The tax increase was only 30 percent, not 100 percent, as the Opposition said. To achieve this turnaround, we brought government spending down by 70 percent, and more needs to be done, Madam Speaker. All is not well yet. There is one major outstanding problem.

There is nothing I would like better, Madam Speaker, than to hear the Opposition say they agree with Bill C–20. The time has come to work all together, the NDP and the Liberals along with the government, to settle the financial situation of the country. Among industrialized countries, Canada is the one with the largest debt. Every Canadian man and woman is $15,000 into debt without having received anything for it. I think that of members opposite for Bill C–20 the support.

There is another aspect of this legislation that I have heard hardly any comment about so far and that is the freeze on the salaries payable to the members of Parliament, including government members, opposition members, Cabinet members and the Prime Minister. Bill C–20 contains a provision whereby, next year, the percentage increase of the MPs and ministers' salaries would not exceed the average percentage in the public service of Canada. That is to say that, if federal civil servants do not get a raise, neither will the hon. members. And you are well aware that we are not necessarily planning on giving civil servants a raise.

So, I hope the opposition will support this piece of legislation to set an example for all Canadians. By voting against Bill C–20, they will be voting for a raise. I think that, in these difficult times, as they take such malicious pleasure to point out, the members opposite should join members of Cabinet and government members to show leadership and do what has to be done.

The other provision of Bill C–20 which did not get much publicity is the four–year freeze on the operating and capital budgets of all federal departments. This means that if next year a department wants to set up something new or increase its operations, it will not be able to get new money. It will not be able to knock on Treasury Board's door or ask the Minister of Finance or anyone else. It can't say: I need extra money for my budget because I have a special item. That won't work. All capital spending and operating budgets are frozen.

If they want to get around that, it will take another bill to allow department X to spend more than was provided in its budget for 1990–91. It would take another bill, so I imagine that frozen means frozen.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, and I see you are signalling that my time is almost up, I want to make it quite clear that all monies collected under the GST, as well as all revenue from privatization operations, will be used only to reduce our national debt. This money will not be used for new programs, new budgets or anything else. I think that is important, and that it will help improve our quality of life and the economic situation in this country.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments and perhaps pose a couple of questions to the hon. member in debating this bill.

I think the hon. member is trying to make a case that Canadians should be preoccupied with the deficit of money, but not the deficit of lives. In this bill there will be a cut in funding to provinces, a cut in education, a cut in health care. Many other complications are also emanating from this bill before us today.

In matters of education, I would like to indicate to the House that a consequence of cuts in funding to transfer payments to the provinces will be a cut to post-secondary education. We already know that over one million children are poor in this country and that one of the consequences of poverty is dropping out of school. We have heard Canadians tell us, and it has been debated in this House, that we should be competitive in the world. I ask the hon. member, if we do not have an educated citizenry how can we have a competitive citizenry?

In pursuing the economic argument, I wonder if the hon. member has read the Senate report on poverty released in January of this year. There is a beautiful analysis in the document telling us that if you spent $5 billion today for the poor of our country and for the poor children, you would reduce the number of school drop-outs by 186,000. Over a period of 20 years there would be a net return of some $27 billion.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he disagrees with this well-researched analysis. Will he agree that it is not deficit spending to spend $5 billion today when you can, in return, get $27 million in productivity, in revenues, in payment to the unemployment insurance program, in reduced claims from the unemployment insurance program and in reduced claims from social assistance programs?

I would like to see the economics of this government.

While I am on my feet, I would just like to ask the hon. member: What is the distribution of the national debt? He alluded to our debt being equivalent to the debt of every single Canadian. I think that is a very simplistic analysis, and I think the hon. member must answer to Canadians. To whom do we owe money? I am told by the Library of Parliament that at least 20 per cent of the total national debt is owed to the Bank of Canada. Who owns the Bank of Canada? The Government of Canada.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Pagtakhan: The hon. member is saying no. Is the hon. member saying that the money that goes to the Bank of Canada is not revenue for the Government of Canada? .I would like the hon. member to research his information.

I have the figures here for total health expenditures for selected years from 1960 to 1990. The expenditure is expressed in terms of the per cent of the Gross National Product. In 1960 it was about $2.1 billion, 5.5 per cent of the Gross National Product. In 1984 it was $37 billion, 8.6 per cent and in 1990 it was $60 billion, about 9.2 per cent of the Gross National Product. Since 1984 there has been only a .6 per cent increase of the per cent of the Gross National Product. The Gross National Product is one way of telling our capability to pay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. Is he aware that he was recognized on questions and comments? Let us call it comments and questions if you like. I am sorry I interrupted the hon. member. I thought he was really getting into debate at this time. I imagine he will want to allow the parliamentary secretary some time to answer. There are about three minutes left to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I realize that. I will conclude at this point by indicating that since 1975 the rate of growth in national health expenditures has been similar to the growth in the Gross National Product. The capacity of Canadians to pay has been there. I would like the hon. member to explain his government's rationale, its preoccupation with the deficit spending. Let us speak of the deficit of lives.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I see I have very little time to answer the hon. member's question.

I would like to start by repeating a very important point which the hon. member does not seem to have understood. He says we are cutting amounts transferred to the provinces. I gave an example which shows we are not cutting, only reducing the annual increase in transfer payments. A cut—the people of Trois-Rivières will understand—is when you earn $500 a week and your boss says: Well, now you will get $400 a week. That is a cut. However, if you earn $500 a week, and you were supposed to get $550 but your boss says: No, you won't get more than $525, that is not a cut, because I am now earning more than I was earning before.

So transfer payments to the provinces are not being cut but the increase in those payments is being reduced. I hope the hon. member understands, because if we are not talking about the same thing, there is bound to be a problem, whether a person is asking or answering the question. So transfer payments to the provinces are not being cut but there is a reduction in the usual increase.

The hon. member also wanted to know to whom we owe all this money. We owe this debt partly to Canadians and partly to people outside Canada. But this is all part of the old Liberal philosophy, Madam Speaker, which maintains that the debt doesn't matter because we owe the money to Canadians. If I owe my brother $100,000 and my sister $200,000 and my father $300,000, and I have no money at all, when I go to the bank for a loan, can I tell them: No, I don't owe any money, I just owe money to my family? When I open my books for the bank, Madam Speaker, it doesn't matter who lent me the money. I still owe it!

The same is true here. Canada's debt which is partly owed to Canadians and partly to people outside the country is still a debt, whether we owe the money to Canadians or to non-Canadians. And internationally, when other countries look at Canada and its debt, they say: Canada, your debt is $400 billion. They don't care who lent us the money. It is still $400 billion.

I went to Japan recently, and we talked about this. They don't care who lent us the money. Their question is: Do you owe that much? Yes, we do.

Madam Speaker, I think we should get rid of this Liberal philosophy that it doesn't matter as long as we borrow from Canadians. Madam Speaker, this is very serious! And when I say that the federal government owes $400 billion, I am not talking about the money owed by the various provincial governments. If I happen to be an investor looking for a country to invest my money, and I look at Canada and I do some figuring, well, I don't think we have that much to offer, compared with other countries. And that is why we must deal with this problem.

Madam Speaker, my time has expired. Thank you for your patience.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in debate of Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament February 26, 1991. It is debate on the values and ideals which are fundamental to our society and the institutions through which we maintain a national standard. These ideals and values are quickly being eliminated from the face of Canada.

The Minister of Finance, in this budget just as in the last budget, is continuing on course in passing the buck to the provinces of this country. The federal government has simply transferred their federal fiscal problems to other levels of government.

At this time I would like to draw attention to a statement made in the House, since we are great at going back 10 or so years, by the member of Parliament for Etobicoke Centre in March, 1982, in which he criticized the government of the day for shifting the financial burden to the provinces by reducing transfer payments. This is still true today.

The current five-year freeze on the EPF, Established Programs Financing, will substantially reduce the funds available to the provinces. By freezing transfers to the provinces, the government is clearly and systematically destroying Canada's health care and post-secondary educational systems at a time when the U.S.A. is trying and is hopefully going to find ways to implement a health care system in that country.

Each year as the population increases, students realize the necessity for higher education and the demand for classroom space escalates. While the number of instructors per students declines, the funding diminishes.

Students now face higher tuition fees. UPEI, opening in September, is predicting that tuition increases will be 15 per cent. Add that to the fact that there are not many jobs out there for students. There are higher tuition fees, overcrowded classrooms and the burden of other cost-maintenance measures which the smaller provinces are forced to administer.

Federal funding in post-secondary education is imperative to keep tuition fees from becoming unaffordable for most Canadians and to ensure better access to higher education for low-income people. This is a must.

We must not let our education system become a system for only the wealthy people in this country.

No wonder we have a problem with national unity. The federal government is forcing the provinces to compete with one another for insufficient funding.

Over the next two years Prince Edward Island will lose $12 million in transfer payments. This will spell higher taxes and fewer social programs, and most of all, it will sever Atlantic Canada's lifeline.

The writing is clearly on the wall. Social programs and medicare appear targeted as the first to go. Smaller provinces and territories will not be able to hold the system together or support the development of new or innovative health programs. How can the federal government expect a small province to maintain national health care standards when it slashes the EPF?

I again draw your attention to the member for Etobicoke Centre when in 1982 he stated that all Canadians will suffer from a cut in services for post-secondary education and health resulting from cuts to Established Programs Financing.

As our health care system advances, we find people living longer lives and the costs of high technology and medical equipment rising. With cuts to transfer payments, the provinces are forced either to slash essential services or impose higher taxes on the already overburdened taxpayer.

To cite again my hon. colleague for Etobicoke Centre, the government does not seem to realize that there is only one taxpayer who pays the taxes for the federal, provincial and municipal governments. The taxpayer does not care where services come from; what the taxpayer wants is to see service provided to meet his or her needs. As my hon. colleague stated almost 10 years ago, this government is showing utter contempt for that taxpayer.

At one time Canada maintained national standards for health care and other basic services, but no more. In the last budget the federal government vowed to maintain national standards through new legislation. Indeed, we now have a national standard, a national standard which is the slow death of medicare. It has become the standard in every province.

We need a strong federal presence in all social programs to ensure that Canadians will have access to similar services and similar benefits no matter where they live. A strong federal presence is impossible without a strong federal financial commitment. Without federal leverage, provinces can and probably will impose user fees for medical and hospital services. This is a backward step which will deter poor people from seeking the care they need and are entitled to.

On the other hand, it could be difficult for Canadians to have full medicare coverage when travelling outside their home provinces. Has the government forgotten that federal funding in the field of health was the incentive that lead to the development of medicare in all provinces and territories? Regional disparities have always been a problem throughout our history. Without substantial financial contributions from the federal government, regional disparities will continue to grow and affect our national standard of living.

There is no conceivable means whereby provinces like Prince Edward Island will be able to afford half of the meagre social programs existing today, unless there is strong federal financial commitment to uphold the national standard.

It will be difficult, much more difficult for poorer provinces to provide accessible and affordable programs to their residents.

In my riding of Hillsborough, a great many people are on fixed or low incomes or are seasonally employed. I strongly emphasize this is neither by choice nor by laziness. These people now have the added burden of paying the GST. The federal government will not even reimburse the rebate credit to those taxpayers under 19.

In the past, cash payments from the federal government have made it possible for Canadians to have highly developed systems of medicare and post-secondary education. Any cuts which threaten the integrity of these programs are a direct affront to the fundamental values and ideals of the Canadian people.

I would conclude by saying that Prince Edward Islanders are fully aware of the deficit problem that Canada is facing and are more than willing to pay their fair share. The federal government must realize that it cannot pass its fiscal mismanagement on to the provincial and municipal governments of this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the honourable member and wish him bon appétit as it is one o'clock p.m. I will now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, although it has been over a month since Canadian truckers, frustrated by this government's inaction, blockaded major highways in Ontario, the government has yet to deal or to act with the mess that deregulation has caused. Yet there is much it could do if it wanted to.

For example, deregulation has resulted in making $100 million worth of transport licences worthless. This has had a devastating impact on a trucking firm's equity base.

In the United States in 1980 when the trucking industry was deregulated, the American government gave its carriers a three-year accelerated write-off on these licences. I call on the government to do this in Canada for our tuckers and to offer loan guarantees for these authorities until that time at which the firm's equity base can be restored.

Truckers cannot afford to wait any longer for this government to act. As we saw a month ago, if this government does not act it could be a long, hot, slow summer on our nation's highways.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, a disconcerting new phrase has crept into Canada's national unity debate which frequently is used to misrepresent the values of our official languages legislation. That phrase is "enforced bilingualism". Those words tend to imply that bilingualism is a mandatory requirement which is imposed, perhaps unfairly or unjustly, upon individual Canadians.

In reality the reverse is true. Rather than imposing either or both official languages upon any citizen, the concept of bilingualism actually provides the freedom for each one of us to live completely in only one language in Canada if that may be our wish. Therein lies the basic value of bilingualism.

The Official Languages Act provides that Canadians can and must be served by the federal government in the language of their choice. The intent of that legislation is linguistic freedom, not linguistic imposition. To be sure, the concept of bilingualism does impose special linguistic capabilities upon government in order to serve the people. The fundamental purpose remains, however, to make individual Canadians free to be unilingual and to live fully in this country in either English or French.

To describe the concept as "enforced bilingualism" is to really miss the true values of linguistic freedom which must be inherent in a generous and tolerant Canadian society.

POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were reminded that the feminization of poverty is not an academic theory but rather an undisputed and acknowledged fact.

Jean Swanson of the National Anti-Poverty Organization, at the government's own symposium on women and the law, noted that many women today are forced by Canada's inadequate social support system to commit crimes of survival such as writing bad cheques, shoplifting and prostitution.

The federal government is retreating into the Middle Ages by cutting social programs. This government sees support for low income Canadians as charity, not as a right, not as an entitlement. It has cut unemployment insurance, capped the Canada Assistance Plan, and kept the minimum wage below a living wage.

All Canadians, and especially single parent women and their dependent children, are being sunk deeper into poverty. How much more evidence does this government need before it realizes that antiquated social policies are forcing all Canadians, and especially women, to make impossible choices just to survive?

This is deplorable and Canadians should be outraged.

FIRST COMBAT ENGINEER REGIMENT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of Canadians the efforts of the First Combat Engineer Regiment and its ongoing activities in the Persian Gulf.

The fighting in the Persian Gulf is over and the majority of the media has gone on to other issues, but the very important and extremely dangerous duties of our engineers continue. It is not a glamorous job, but it is an integral part of the United Nations effort to restore peace and safety to the border area between Kuwait and Iraq.

What is this onerous task that takes 250 members of our engineering regiment from their home at Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack? What is it that causes families to be separated and worry to be the order of the day? These very brave men and women are clearing unexploded ordinances from the Kuwait–Iraq border so that unsuspecting people will not get hurt. These people are finding and defusing bombs. They are laying their lives on the line every day, doing whatever it takes to ensure the safety of others.

I pay tribute to the brave Canadians of Chilliwack's First Combat Engineer Regiment. I wish them Godspeed and safety in their duties. I pay tribute to the families in Chilliwack who worry and wait for the return of their loved ones. I wish them strength. Canadians thank them for their service.

BILL 178

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, English speaking Canadians who live in Quebec, Canada's French speaking province, a province of cultural plurality and diversity, also want their rights as Canadian citizens respected.

The English of Quebec believe it is time to reaffirm their place in a dynamic Quebec and a dynamic Canada and want to stop the outflow of Quebecers, young Quebecers.

We are uncomfortable with the removal of our rights of presence and we want Bill 178 removed. It is disrespectful, offensive and neither reasonable nor justified. Removing Bill 178 would let all Canadians feel at home in Quebec and anywhere else in Canada for speaking and working in French or English is an economic, social and cultural asset.

Language itself is not the issue. It is rights and freedoms in a democracy that are at stake.

I sincerely hope the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs will remember in discussions with Premier Bourassa and other leaders the profound Canadian belief that you advance neither society nor its majority by diminishing the rights of any minority: English, French, aboriginal or any other minority group in our society.

FOREIGN INVESTORS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government's indebtedness is a serious problem, but it is not as disastrous as we describe it so often. In fact, it is a problem which Ottawa controls much better today than it did a few years back, in spite of accounting appearances and large figures.

In certain respects, we are doing the same thing as with the assessment of the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States.

According to a recent study by the Bank of Canada, the Canadian economy has shown in 1990 a positive balance of $4.3 billion in foreign investments. It was the first time in 16 years that Canada had such a positive record. According to some economists, this positive balance is due only to the fact that Canadian investments abroad were lower last year. However the Bank of Canada believes that it is a positive effect of the Free Trade Agreement, which made Canada more attractive to foreign investors.

Mr. Speaker, one fact remains: Canada never had such a positive balance in 16 years.

ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Georges Erasmus is retiring today as Chief of the AFN, that is, the Assembly of First Nations.

I have known Georges Erasmus from about 15 years ago when I was with the Berger commission up in the north. At that time Canada got its first view of an incredibly talented generation of native Canadian leaders. Georges Erasmus, a Dene from the Northwest Territories, is one of those leaders.

I wish to acknowledge in the House of Commons his work in the constitutional conferences, his administration of the AFN, and his energy and determination on behalf of Canada's first peoples. He is a tough and effective foe of government no matter what the stripe of that government, and he warned us of explosive grievances in the native communities.

I want to express the personal hope that Mr. Erasmus will spend a little time, perhaps in the Gray Lakes area of the Northwest Territories, will mellow out a bit, and will come back to serve the first nations and to serve Canada as he has done so effectively in the past.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Alberta's Premier Getty says that we need greater decentralization but recent public hearings found that Albertans favour a stronger, not a weaker, federal government.

Quebec minister Remillard says that his province will not participate in a constituent assembly, but a recent poll says 57 per cent of Quebec residents favour holding a constituent assembly.

If the recommendations of a constituent assembly were subjected to ratification by a federally sponsored referendum tabulated on a province by province basis, the real feelings of the people of each province would be made abundantly clear to their federal and provincial representatives.

After all, Premier Getty and Mr. Remillard certainly would not be the first Canadian politicians whose views did not correspond to the wishes of the people they were elected to represent.

DRUGS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a number of members of Parliament from both sides of this House met with the Drug Legislation and Enforcement Policy Committee of the Toronto Mayor's Task Force on Drugs. The municipal politicians need our help federally in two ways.

I want to know why this government, despite repeated requests, has done nothing? When will the Minister of Justice return the money used in undercover operations to the municipal police? Currently the police invest money for the undercover purchase of drugs. When the dealers are busted the money is kept by the federal government. It should be returned to the community to continue to fight against drugs.

Also, there must be a full review made of the Supreme Court Decision in the Duarte case. The police were told that the use of the audio and audio-visual taping equipment was not allowed, but they need that tool as undercover backup.

We are going to lose a whole generation of children unless we stop delaying and start to work to win the war against drugs.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, cross-border shopping is a form of tax revolt now being performed by thousands of Canadians. Let me point out that these Canadians believe they have every right to cross the border and shop in the U.S. despite the ruinous effects on Canadian business, but cross-border shoppers have no right to think they can be cross-border smugglers.

• (1410)

I want to rise today and praise the Minister of National Revenue. He has invested many hours in understanding the complexities of this problem and in listening to people living in border communities.

Now he has taken action. Soon cross-border smugglers will face additional personnel when they return to Canada and stiff new penalties on those goods they have tried to hide. Cross-border smugglers should no longer be above the law. They should not penalize the rest of Canadian taxpayers by trying to avoid paying the taxes which support the great services in this country. Cross-border smugglers must be shown the way, and the minister has had the guts to stand up and do exactly that.

MINERS' MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, today, June 11, marks Miners' Memorial Day in my riding of Cape Breton. Miners' Memorial Day, also known as Davis' Day, is a day to honour the many coal miners who have fallen victim to the hazards of coal mining.

The coal mines have been a part of our history on the Island and they have claimed many lives. The cold, dark, and dreary pit has taken many a father, a brother, an uncle and yes, many sons.

Today we honour those brave men and we give special thought to the families who remember this day with great sadness and loss.

Mining has changed through the years but yet the mines and the miners are still a pride for all of Cape Breton. We look at our coal mines with a sense of respect and yes, a sense of fear.

I would like to join with my constituents on this Miners' Memorial Day in remembering those who were lost and to pray for the safety of those who still carry on the great tradition of the Cape Breton coal miner.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, as we are all aware, the environment is an issue that affects us all. It transcends all boundaries, be they geographical, political or ideological.

Ensuring a healthy future for our environment demands a tremendous level of co-operation. The Fraser River clean-up, announced June 1 in my riding of Delta, is the product of such co-operation.

Many groups, from environmentalists to industry, municipal, provincial and federal governments, have all played important roles in putting this clean-up program together.

The challenge now will be to build on the partnerships that have been established and to extend them to involve everyone who lives or works in the Fraser watershed. As the Minister for the Environment has said, the Fraser River is at a critical stage. By acting together and by acting now, we can save the Fraser for future generations to use and enjoy.

The headline in Vancouver Province reads: "Good news for fish". The $100 million clean-up plan is good news not just for fish, but for everyone in British Columbia.

BLUEBERRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the blueberry industry of Nova Scotia has grown from a million pounds production in 1953 to about 20 million pounds production today. The value to the province each year is in the area of $30 million. Most of the blueberry crop is processed and exported, making it the most valuable exported horticultural crop in Atlantic Canada.

Considering this tremendous growth, the value to the economy, and that it is a major export competing with products from other countries, it was disappointing when the Department of Agriculture research station in Nappan, Nova Scotia discontinued research on blueberries a few years ago. The industry is now concerned that the remaining research being done at the Kentville research station is being threatened.

Research is being done on varieties, chemicals, production and harvesting. Research includes machinery and materials and in the past has resulted in significant strides ahead in blueberry production.

It is absolutely necessary that the Department of Agriculture continue this research if the industry is to continue to grow and be competitive.

Oral questions

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday in Halifax at the National Convention of the New Democratic Party, a resolution was passed that gives a clear indication that the Canadian shipbuilding industry will be taken seriously by a New Democratic government.

This resolution gives balanced support to all aspects of the industry—construction, supply of components, training, labour—and states that amendments will be made to the Canadian Shipping Act that will require Canadian ships to be built in Canadian shipyards by Canadian workers, then to be crewed by Canadians when carrying Canadian goods.

At the moment any ship built anywhere in the world can call itself Canadian as long as it flies the Canadian flag. This is wrong and is damaging the survival of the struggling Canadian shipbuilding and repair industry.

With the implementation of this resolution, that situation will change. For the first time the shipbuilding industry in this country has the assurance that a government of Canada will do what it can to protect the industry.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is very said to read the June Globe and Mail report of the environmental embarrassment that is the Barbara Weit River in western Prince Edward Island.

Choked by potato processing waste starch from the Irving owned Cavendish Farms plant and raw sewage from the town of Kensington, the river will not even grow seaweed.

Would it not have been nice during Environment Week to announce that federal and provincial governments would support and encourage those good corporate citizens, the Irvings, in building a fuel ethanol plant utilizing cull potatoes and this starch waste rather than putting up a $10 million sewage treatment plant.

The Irvings could then use this ethanol as a source of octane for their gasoline operations while providing diversified employment for the Summerside region.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare.

For months now, his government has been denying that transfer payments to the provinces for health care and education are being cut. We know now, following the tabling of documents by the Quebec Health Minister yesterday, that in six years transfer payments to Quebec will be reduced to nothing, zero, zilch.

Is the government now willing to admit that these cuts are threatening our universal medicare system?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we will never point out enough how the hon. member for Hamilton East is ill informed and how much she is consistently distorting the facts.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that transfer payments to the provinces in the health field come under two headings: cash transfers and tax point transfers.

In 1977, when her party was in power, the government of the day granted, to Quebec in particular, additional tax points to give, I presume, more responsibilities and more flexibility. This is why, starting in 1996, Mr. Speaker, all transfers from the federal government will come to Quebec as tax points that it will be able to manage as it pleases.

I wish the hon. member would tell the people from Quebec who are listening that she is against them managing their own health care system, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Canadian taxpayers want to send one message to the minister's finance meeting, one clear, unanimous message: We are paying too much tax to too many governments.

Can the government explain how increasing the number of tax collectors will make the system fairer for ordinary Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. Acting Leader of the Opposition would agree that we do have a serious fiscal problem in this country. I think all governments, federal and provincial, are addressing the fact that we must try to weed out any inefficiencies in the system and try to deliver our services as a government, as all governments, in a more effective and efficient way.

On that score, all governments agree with that fundamental philosophy. It is not a matter of cutting back services. It is a matter of trying to deliver the same standard of services but to do it in a more effective and efficient manner.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, according to the study released yesterday by the Quebec Minister of Finance, from 1990 to 1995 the federal share of health care costs will be reduced from 40 per cent to 32 per cent. It is on a downward, slippery slope that is causing a crisis in Canadian health care.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Is not his underlying agenda in fact to reduce transfer payments to the point where the federal government will no longer be responsible for universal health care? Does he not plan in fact to make the provinces responsible financially in that area as well?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that in this fiscal year some $37 billion will be transferred to the provinces in the form of cash and tax points. That number is going to increase each yea,r not decrease.

As a matter of fact, for the next five years there will be increases in the order of 3.7 per cent per annum and that is built upon annualized increases of 4.7 per cent per year per capita for the have provinces and 5.5 per cent per year per capita for the have not provinces.

• (1420)

Not only has the growth been increasing over the last five years, but it will continue to increase over the next five years.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, Sidbec-Dosco announced 600 lay-offs, 275 of which are in my riding, in Ville Émard. The reason is obvious. I quote from the president of the company:

> The dollar is killing us. It is the great culprit. American steel is coming into Canada in full swing and at a very low price.

While this government is closing its eyes, companies are closing their doors. My question is as follows: How long will the government stick to its suicidal policies? How many more plants, Mr. Speaker, will have to close their doors before Canada knocks on St. Jude's door?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of respect for the hon. member as a businessman and an entrepreneur. It would be nice to know what value he would place on the Canadian dollar and how he would go about sustaining that.

He knows very well that many factors contribute to the value of the dollar, namely the confidence within the Canadian economy both from an economic and a political point of view, the relative rate of interest, the relative rate of inflation, commodity prices, and the capital exchange market.

All those things have an effect upon the value of the dollar. Having regard to all those things, I would be interested in knowing how the hon. member would set the value of the dollar, what value he would set it at, and how he would sustain it.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, right after the next election we will answer those questions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): If you cannot answer them, then step down and let somebody else take the job who can.

That answer is absolute nonsense. It is wanton and callous. Since 1980, the U.S. government has funnelled over $30 billion a year to the U.S. steel industry while this government's only counter has been to hike our dollar to a suicidal 87 cents.

Let there be no mistake. The government can drop interest rates by a further two points. It can tell the world that enhancing our manufacturing base is as important as targeting a tax induced inflation.

There is only one issue. This government can provide our steel industry with a level playing field. Why won't it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that when I put the question to the hon. member all we saw was an absolute cop–out.

We know very well that consistent with the Liberal tradition we would end up with interest rates of 22 per cent and an inflation rate of 13 per cent.

I find it passing strange that the hon. member argues with the fact that there is confidence in the Canadian dollar, confidence in the Canadian economy and confidence in Canada as a political entity.

Why is he trying to downgrade and degrade the Canadian economy and the confidence that investors have in the country?

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Almost a year ago, I proposed on the floor of this House that we need to have a new process for building the Constitution. We need to have a process that we felt would succeed and that would have legitimacy and the faith of the Canadian people.

At the time I proposed that we should look at a process like a constituent assembly. At that time the Prime Minister said that he thought it was an idea worth consideration. Yet, in advance of the Beaudoin–Edwards report and in advance of the Spicer commission report, the government appears to have totally rejected that idea.

Why has the Prime Minister rejected the idea of having a more open process so that Canadians can be heard and listened to in the constitutional process?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all of us in the House were interested in the quite constructive and complex discussions on national unity that occurred at the recent meeting of the New Democratic Party in Halifax.

I think that underlines the difficulty of the issues we are facing and also the importance of dealing with those in an innovative and a tolerant way. I personally want to congratulate the leader and her party on the way in which they approached those complex issues.

We have not at all ruled out a more open process. Quite the contrary. What we have done is taken the decision that at a time when we are seeking to restore confidence in this country it would be useful for us to draw the best from a parliamentary system that has served us by and large well, but also to add to that other elements that might ensure that people who feel excluded now will feel included in decisions affecting the Constitution and the future of our country.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr, Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

He is right that at my party's convention this weekend we were able to bring together people from very different parts of the country with disparate views, and it was tough. He is right, it is tough. However, after a whole day of talking about national unity and what we could come to agree on, I have renewed my faith and even strengthened my faith that everyday Canadians have something useful to say on the Constitution and that we have to look for a way to include them.

Yes, we have to include politicians as they were included in that discussion on the weekend. It is not a question of by–passing elected politicians at all. In fact what I am proposing is that we have a process that includes elected politicians from all three levels and adds to it the best of the other groups that have felt excluded so that we have one voice to look at the Constitution and the future of this country.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the question has to do with whether the government is prepared to look at methods that can combine the elements that the leader of the New Democratic Party has just referred to, and the answer to that is yes.

I look forward to the opportunity to do two things: first, to discuss with her some of the ways in which that can be done in the proposal we are putting forward and, second, I look forward to reading the reports of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee which we expect will be before us on or before July 1.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my point however is: if we are going to start a new process, let us start it in a new way right from the beginning.

At this point in time, the government is suggesting a committee made up of only politicians, including a large number of non-elected senators. That committee will simply have to study the government's proposals. Will the government consider replacing that totally inadequate process with a new one, and agree to consult other political parties and start that new process now, right from the beginning?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question here is if we are ready to abandon a process I have discussed in general terms with other parties, as well as native leaders, a committee representing women in Canada, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, and the premiers.

No, we do not intend to abandon an approach based on our parliamentary institutions, but we are perfectly open to suggestions that would give our fellow Canadians the opportunity to get more involved and participate fully. I have already discussed such approaches with, for example, native leaders.

I am prepared to consider some other solutions, but in a country like ours, when you discuss the importance of our traditions, of our institutions, I think it would be best to use our parliamentary system as the basis for our approach.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Yesterday when I asked the whereabouts of the secret memo that had been lost in the office of the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present minister said:

> We are in the process of looking for the document within the department—

• (1430)

The minister has had three months to look for that document. This is a document that goes to the very heart of the credibility and responsibility of this government.

How can the government and the minister be so cavalier and casual about a secret document that has been lost in the bowels of her department for over three months?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said yesterday. I might say that because this memo did not come in the normal way and did not have the normal routing slip on it, it is a little harder to trace. We are looking for it. What can I say?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the minister was at all serious about this matter, she would know that this memo came in an envelope marked "Secret." Those of us on this side of the House take that seriously, even if the minister does not.

Considering how important it is to get to the truth of this matter, is the minister prepared, if she cannot find the document, to ask the RCMP to come in so that they could find the document and Canadians can know the truth?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member actually took his job as seriously as I take mine, he might have discovered that since the time I became minister other serious things are going on in the world, not one of which he has asked a question about.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on May 16 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said she welcomed a parliamentary inquiry into the Al-Mashat affair. On the same day she said the government was prepared for full disclosure.

Yesterday the government House leader told the press that it was pointless for the parliamentary inquiry to continue and that the government would be moving to shut down the committee this afternoon.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Since Parliament has clearly yet to finish its inquiry into this matter, will the Prime Minister give an undertaking to the House that the government will stick to its promise of a full inquiry?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. member has misinterpreted what I said to the press. I did not say the government would be closing down the committee, I said it was up to the committee. The facts are on the table. She knows it, everybody knows it. The committee will decide what to do.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that astounding new revelations are coming to light on the Al-Mashat case on a daily basis, we want to know what the government is trying to hide. Will the Prime Minister give his assurances that the inquiry will continue, and that the committee will be allowed to continue its work to get to the bottom of this affair.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): What is astounding is how they trivialize Parliament by these types of questions.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance with respect to cross-border shopping.

The Canadian Labour Marketing Productivity Centre has reported that the Canadian dollar is now worth 11 per cent more on purchases in the United States than it was in 1980.

Why does the government not cut interest rates more forcefully so as to reduce the value of the dollar and help Canadian border communities in that way.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that in order to bring interest rates down and to keep them down over the long term, you have to get the fundamentals right, that is attacking the inflationary pressures, inflationary psychology and expectations and that is what we are doing. As a result, interest rates have come down by over five percentage points since a year ago and the spread has narrowed between the United States and Canada from a high of about 5.5 per cent or 5.6 per cent to about 2.5 per cent. I am sure the hon. member would suggest that is a good track record. If we can keep on that track and continue to fight the root causes of inflation, hopefully we will see interest rates come down further still. That is the key to growth, that is the key to jobs and and that is the key to prosperity.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

There is no doubt that the government has created a problem. Thanks to the GST, cross-border trips are up an incredible 22 per cent in the first four months of this year.

Why does this government rely on the big stick approach, which has been announced by the Minister of National Revenue? Why does it not change its economic policies so that people do not have to vote against its high tax, high dollar and high interest rate policy by cross-border shopping?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance just answered that question.

Since the member makes reference to my big stick approach, I had assumed that my announcement yesterday was going in the right direction until I read the following statement: "Those are all good steps. I welcome federal efforts to beef-up customs as part of a bid to deter cross-border shopping." That was Bob Rae, the Premier of Ontario.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the missing memo.

The government suggests that it is mere coincidence that a top secret memorandum in the Al-Mashat case has gone missing. The question is, if it was lost, who lost it? If it was stolen, who stole it? If it was shredded, who shredded it?

I would like to put a question to the Solicitor General. Why has the Solicitor General of Canada, responsible for national security, not called in the RCMP to track down the whereabouts of that particular memo?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is because I have not been asked to.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, is the Solicitor General saying that he is waiting for a telephone call from the Prime Minister to investigate a missing top secret memo?

I put the question to the Solicitor General again. The credibility of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is at issue in terms of the whereabouts of this particular memo. The minister is responsible for matters of national security. Will the Solicitor General do his job and call in the RCMP to investigate the whereabouts of that particular memo, or is he going to continue to protect his cabinet colleagues?

Mr. Speaker: The question was all right up until the end. An accusation that the Solicitor General is protecting a colleague is a completely improper allegation and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to withdraw that and put the question to the Solicitor General. Will he not agree that he is responsible for matters of national security? Will he not agree that the RCMP should be called in to investigate the whereabouts of a top secret memo that went to the offices of the former minister of external affairs? Why is it that there is one standard of justice for ordinary Canadians and another standard for his cabinet colleagues?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what is perfectly clear is that all the information in this case has been coming forward to the committee. We have been very forthcoming. What the information has shown is that there were some errors made. There is no smoking gun anywhere, as the hon. member has not been able to prove through all these many months because we have been very forthcoming with information.

That is it, that is all, there is no more. I am sorry, John, but there is no more.

• (1440)

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On May 14th, the minister said that Mr. Raymond Chrétien had taken no action to make sure that his deputy minister would be informed of the Al-Mashat affair. Yet, documents made public yesterday, by the minister herself, clearly demonstrate that she was wrong. Indeed, according to those documents, Mr. Chrétien took concrete action, as early as February 27th, to inform the deputy minister, Mr. Demontigny Marchand. Is the minister prepared today, in this House, to do the honourable thing, admit her mistake and put the record straight?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a divergence of opinions between the official at the deputy minister's office and those at Mr. Chrétien's office. All the information is before the committee. Everything is clear to the committee. It is up to the committee to determine which opinion is the correct one.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the committee will face its responsibilities. What we are trying to do here, on this side of the House, is to make sure that ministers also take on their responsibilities.

According to documents made public yesterday by the minister herself, it is clear that Mr. Chrétien is the only senior civil servant to have taken concrete action in order to inform both his minister and his deputy minister. So, in the light of this information, would the minister not be ready, in all fairness, to admit that she was wrong with regard to Mr. Raymond Chrétien, and to apologize to him for having needlessly tarnished his reputation on May 14th?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we pledged to give all the information to the committee and to the public. That is what we have done and that is all we can do. What went on before the members of the committee is clear, and the decision is theirs.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Before the public ever had a chance to participate in an environmental assessment, the Rafferty–Alameda dam was built and the Oldman River dam was built. Before construction begins on any roads or dams, before any land is flooded, will the minister assure this House that there will be a single, comprehensive, environmental assessment review process on the James Bay II project, known as the Great Whale?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the member is probably aware that there have been discussions with the Government of Quebec and the Cree and the Inuit. The sense of those discussions was to try to explore whether there was a possibility of doing one single assessment. The Government of Quebec through its Minister of the Environment, Mr. Paradis, was willing to look at that question and get back to us. I expect that they will formally say whether or not they are ready to do that and we will take the matter from there.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Four weeks ago the Federal Court of Canada wiped out the Kemano settlement agreement, struck down the Order in Council exemption of the project and ordered an environmental assessment review of Alcan's huge power export project in British Columbia.

Since the court concluded that time is of the essence and that environmental concerns should be dealt with in advance of construction, will the minister today undertake his legal obligations and appoint an EARP panel for Alcan's Kemano II project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the member will know, the decision was rendered and is being actively reviewed by the government. There are legal and environmental considerations.

I do want to add one thing. The information I have is what the court suggested we do was not necessarily—and I stand to be corrected if it is not the case—to undertake an initial assessment that may or may not lead to an EARP panel. If I am wrong, I will correct myself. My information, if I remember correctly, was that we undertake an initial assessment that may or may not lead to an EARP panel.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, there now appears to be a real human cost to the Senate stalling of the GST legislation. Delays in passing the bill have in turn caused delays in building the GST processing centre in Summerside, Prince Edward Island. This has caused great uncertainty in a community which has already suffered from government cutbacks when the Canadian forces base there was closed.

My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Can he tell the House what steps he is going to take to fulfil his statement of last September when he said: "The welfare of the civilian employees of the base whose jobs will terminate in 1991 is uppermost in our minds".

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that statement stands. Because of the delays in the Senate last fall and winter, we were late out of the starting blocks in trying to begin preparations for the processing centre in Summerside. However, since then, with co–operation from other federal departments, we have caught up. We will begin training and hiring as early as next year and then phase in the operation.

I would like to advise the hon. member that I am meeting this afternoon with representatives of DND civilians from Summerside to assure them that this government continues to meet the commitments we made last year.

BANK OF CANADA

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister is no doubt aware that a number of federal agencies, including the Bank of Canada, have embarked on a policy of preventive withdrawal from Quebec. Yesterday, we heard that as of July 1, the Bank of Canada will close its international division in Montreal and withdraw the position of foreign exchange consultant which has existed for over 20 years to help financial institutions in Quebec.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: In the circumstances and considering that one-third of foreign exchange transactions take place in Quebec, will the Prime Minister ask the Bank of Canada to reconsider this decision which runs counter to the interests of Montreal and Quebec?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to reassure the hon. member who is often concerned for the wrong reasons. No service or position or person has been transferred from Montreal to Toronto by the Bank of Canada, as a result of the restructuring he mentioned.

What is happening, Mr. Speaker, is quite straightforward, and all government departments and agencies are having to cope with this. We have asked them to help reduce the deficit, and it is a fact that at its various offices, including those in Montreal, the Bank of Canada has cut certain positions. In Montreal, this amounts to about 2.5 person-years. The people in question were offered jobs in other positions in Montreal and elsewhere, but that is as far as it went, Mr. Speaker.

AIR CANADA

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Another federally-controlled agency which has been partially privatized, and I am referring to Air Canada, has changed its mind about the training centre in Montreal and moved its flight simulators to Toronto, and I just heard that as a result of a restructuring of all Air Canada flight operations, out of 16 directors there will be only one Francophone and only three in Montreal, while the others will be posted in the rest of Canada.

Can the minister give a good reason why all this has to happen at the expense of Montreal, once more?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as everybody knows, Air Canada was privatized several years ago and has become a commercial operation that is trying to restructure its operation like any commercial business, in order to survive as long as it can and provide Canadians with an efficient transportation system.

I am surprised the hon. member opposite should be upset about the fact that a company tries to enhance its stability and thus be able to provide jobs for its employees for many more years to come.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a booklet that I am sure the Prime Minister knows well. It is entitled Notes on the Responsibilities of Public Servants in Relation to Parliamentary Committees. It was issued by the Privy Council Office in December 1990 and declares most emphatically the doctrine of ministerial responsibility.

On page 6 it says as follows: "It is ministers and not officials who exercise the constitutional authority of the Crown, and it is ministers and not their officials who are responsible to Parliament."

Will the Prime Minister confirm that this is the policy of his government?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I realize this occurred before the hon. member was elected, but in 1985 the McGrath committee on parliamentary reform spent a lot of time looking at the question of ministerial responsibility. It concluded in its third report, on page 21 I believe, that the doctrine of ministerial responsibility as historically practised was outdated and no longer reflected the reality of today.

It went on to recommend that the government co-operate in making officials available for appearances at committees so that members could access officials directly. That recommendation was unanimous. All parties of the House recommended it. The government accepted it. I wonder why the hon. member will not.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to a report of the eighties, I am referring to a document issued by the Privy Council Office in December 1990, six months ago.

On page 1 it says: "Ministers are responsible to the House for everything that is done under their authority". Will the Prime Minister have the integrity and backbone to accept this statement—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member can ask if the Prime Minister wants to do something else, but using those words imputes the honour and integrity of hon. members.

Mr. Wappel: I will rephrase the question. Will the Prime Minister accept this statement and instruct his ministers involved in the Al-Mashat affair to accept ministerial responsibility for the actions of their officials?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, every single minister who was involved with this issue has been here ready to answer questions. They have appeared before committee.

In keeping with the recommendations of the McGrath committee, all of the officials who had an interest in this issue appeared before committee and answered all the questions asked by the opposition, even some of the rude and outrageous ones.

So the reality is that by being here and answering questions—even those that are out of order—for the hon. member we are showing responsibility. We are trying to comply fully with that document as well as the policy adopted by this House after the unanimous recommendation of all parties on the McGrath committee.

I think the hon. member, if he is being fair, will recognize that we fully accept responsibility.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The trucking protests on Parliament Hill and in other cities in the last couple of weeks focused attention on the Canadian trucking industry. The minister mentioned at the time that there are a number of studies under way.

Can the minister advise us whether anything has been done to alleviate the concerns of the owner-operators of these trucks?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question and reassure him that in fact I have met with many people, including representatives of the largest transportation unions, the Canadian Trucking Association, the National Coalition of Owner-Operators Association.

I want to emphasize to the hon. member that the unions have been full participants in the task force process; indeed, they originally proposed setting up the task force in June 1990.

I also want to assure the hon. member that I will be attending the task force meetings tomorrow and Thursday in Toronto along with the Minister of State for Transport. I look forward to seeing the work of the last eight months come to fruition. I anticipate a very busy and fruitful meeting.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. For two days in a row members on this side of the House have asked ministers opposite why the government has not been actively engaged in trying to find a missing top secret memo. For two days ministers have demonstrated, in our view, a a real active lack of interest in finding that memo. Incredibly the Solicitor General today said he has not instructed the RCMP to look for it because he has not been asked.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, who described a missing budget document as a criminal act and described those who had it as criminals in advance of any court case, whether he will now instruct the Solicitor General to have the RCMP go into External Affairs to see if they can find this missing memo, or if they cannot find it, find out what happened to it? Will the Prime Minister do that, given his interest in finding missing top secret government documents?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I said in this House yesterday that should it be necessary to call in the RCMP, this government would do so. We do not yet believe it is necessary. We are looking for the document. I have said that several times. I am continuing to look for it.

There is nothing I can add to that. I think if the hon. member has some patience, he will be satisfied.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. The minister's answer gives rise to my request that the Prime Minister deal with this matter. It is clear that after three months of so-called looking for a document, the minister continues to say there is no urgency. There is an urgency, and it is necessary now for an outside agency, for the RCMP, to find this document.

Will the Prime Minister of Canada please instruct his Solicitor General to send in the RCMP to find out what happened to this critical missing memo? The government appears not to want to find it. Is it not important to find the truth? Find the memo.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the point is that shouting at the House is not going to change the course of events. It also is silly to say that we have been looking for this document for three months. We began to produce the documents, as we said we would, when it was revealed that this person was in the country without ministers having concurred.

We have done our best to be forthcoming. The information is there. The opposition has not found a smoking gun and there is not one to find. It is over and they know it.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for constitutional renewal. In his many discussions across the country with provincial premiers and others concerning the Constitution and rights, has he discussed the question of property rights. Would he, in that discussion, talk about property rights and the right for people to own property and not have it taken away from them without due process and compensation, in much the same fashion as set out in the Bill of Rights produced before this House by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of property rights is of very real interest—I guess not to Mr. Tobin, but it is to other members of the House of Commons—to Canadians across the country and has been discussed in various rounds of constitutional discussion. The question was whether it had come up yet in my consultations with provincial governments. It has not. But there will undoubtedly be a range of opportunities over the next several months for that and other constitutional issues to be considered, including by this House.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. Yesterday in the House the Minister for International Trade said that the government has failed to reach a consensus with the provinces on the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding before making a presentation to the Americans tomorrow to get Canada out of this rotten deal.

What specific steps is the minister and the government taking to see that all provinces are united to ensure that we can tell Carla Hills tomorrow that we want to scrap the MOU?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, there have been ongoing discussions with the provinces.

• (1500)

A position has been put together that will formulate the approach which will be used in our discussions with the United States. The Minister for International Trade is in charge of the situation. There have been meetings today with the minister from British Columbia who is in the gallery, and things are well in hand.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Many people in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk and throughout rural Canada are being charged GST every time they turn on their tap. While city dwellers can fill up a swimming pool without paying a cent on GST, rural residents who are not hooked up to the municipal water system have to pay GST on water used for drinking, cooking and washing.

When will the minister put an end to this unfair discrimination against rural Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to farmers, if they do pay a GST they can claim it back as an input tax credit.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to take too long in the House. I want to find out a few little guidelines. I understand fairly well how the system works.

In terms of the recognition of guests in the Speaker's gallery, with the greatest respect, I think that might come between statements and Question Period, not to interfere with the flow.

You can take that under advisement, Mr. Speaker, as I hope you will take something else under advisement. That has to do with the guidelines on statements made by members which is open to all members. I understand some of the rules. I know you do not use a list because a list would be an insult to the independence of the Chair. Mr. Speaker, I know you just would not follow that.

Having sat here all Monday and all Tuesday, having done my parliamentary aerobics as I fully expected to do, and not being very upset that a lot of good government members have made a few statements, some of which were somewhat provocative and/or a little political, I do take umbrage, having been here and rising at the gong at 2 p.m. until 2.15 p.m., with seven government members being recognized yesterday, fine, and today eight government members being recognized, five of whom were recognized yesterday.

I really do think, as you sit in the chair of the equal among equals, that you look equally at all sides of the House and recognize members who are doing their parliamentary aerobics so that we can present statements, certainly not even to suggest that a list is giving you any direction but to suggest that your own independence is going to be the guide.

Mr. Speaker: I am certainly paying attention to what the hon. member suggests. I hope we will be able to satisfy him and other members.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENTS OF GOVERNMENT HOUSE LEADER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the notice of a question of privilege I sent you earlier this day.

I wish to refer to the statements of the government House leader as reported in the media which I submit were intended to interfere with and impede the business of one of the standing committees of the House.

Such interference with the business of the House, which includes of course the business of committees that as you know and all hon. members know are after all creations of the House, constitutes in my view a contempt of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds further—if it is appropriate, and it may well be, I shall certainly hear him—I listened very carefully during Question Period and I am quite sure the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond did as well. I am wondering whether the response given by the government House leader to a question on this point would make any difference to the hon. member's intervention. I bring that to the attention of the hon. member.

Mr. Dingwall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was indicating to the Chair and to all hon. members present I refer to Erskine May, the 21st edition, page 115, which reads:

> —any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his > duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

That is on page 115 of Erskine May, the 21st edition.

It should be noted that on several occasions ministers of the Crown gave clear undertakings to the House. In fact the hon. minister opposite, the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, stated on page 254 of Hansard, dated May 17, 1991:

> —we are very anxious to get this matter before the committee as soon as possible. Then all relevant officials can be called before the committee because we are absolutely convinced that the facts we have elucidated will become obvious to those who keep an open mind.

That was on May 17. On May 23, 1991, at page 477 of Hansard the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated the following:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and all other members of this House will have a chance in the standing committee to respond to all the issues that were raised. We have already said that we prepared a report, and that report has been released.
> If there are additional matters on which further details are requested, it will be the committee's job to take care of that and I trust it will.

On May 28, 1991, on page 680 of Hansard, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> Let me say as well that we have agreed there will be an open and honest inquiry—.We have said from the beginning that we would produce all of the people and all of the relevant materials to the extent that is possible.
> I have given this House my commitment on that from the very beginning, and the hon. member knows it.

On May 30, 1991, at page 822 of Hansard, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said:

> I have no objection to that but surely it is a matter that should be properly questioned at the committee where all the witnesses they require and/or demand will be available to respond.

Mr. Speaker, in today's Ottawa Sun there is a headline, "Tories to end Probe. House leader wants Mashat inquiry dropped". In fact the minister is quoted as saying: "—the committee has already established how Iraq's former ambassador to Washington got fast-tracked into Canada".

He is further quoted as saying: "I don't know what further facts could be adduced".

Mr. Speaker, in other words the government House leader is interfering in the committee's conduct of what was supposed to be an open and honest inquiry. He is saying to the committee that it is getting too close to the facts and that it better stop before it really uncovers the truth.

Mr. Speaker, members—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I have already indicated that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond might consider carefully what the hon. government House leader did say in Question Period, but certainly that last remark is getting to be an allegation that carries with it a lot of difficulty.

I am giving the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond every opportunity, I think, to make the point, but I do not think that the point is that the statements which are reported in the House amount to interference with the committee.

The hon. minister has already, at least to some degree, responded to that. Certainly I think that the interpretation put by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond goes farther than the argument needs.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. member opposite will have an opportunity to respond to the concerns that I have laid before Mr. Speaker and will respond in kind. I have heard, as other members have heard, some of the remarks made by the hon. member opposite. He will have an opportunity to explain in full in a moment or two, provided the Chair will give me an opportunity to conclude my remarks.

• (1510)

Members of my party and of that committee have made it clear that a number of further sittings and witnesses are required. They have suggested that the former cabinet secretary, Gordon Robertson, an acknowledged, non-partisan expert on ministerial responsibility, appear as a witness. They have also requested that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Employment and Immigration reappear in order to clarify their roles in light of information gathered since they last appeared. For the same reasons, they wish to recall Mr. David Daubney. They would also like to hear evidence from a former legislative assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In conclusion, the government House leader has announced that he is, in essence, ordering the committee to shut down. His statements can only be interpreted as orders to the government majority on the committee to do what he says or else. In my view, he is intimidating the committee and, therefore, impeding it in its pursuit of its work. This represents not only a reversal of government policy toward the work of the committee, but is also a direct and, I believe, unacceptable interference in the work of the committee and therefore of the House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, what we have just had is an abuse of this House by debating an issue that has no right on this floor. There was no point of privilege. You will notice he did not put a motion, which is required when he raises a point of privilege. He did not demonstrate, in any way, shape or form, how he is impeded in performing his duties as a result of it. It was a bogus point of privilege and, frankly, I think it should come to an end if the hon. member is going to show the respect for this institution he frequently talks about.

Let me deal with the allegations. He suggested that I have ordered the committee to finish. To begin with, he knows that the House leader, because of parliamentary reform and the changes in the rules which this government brought in, cannot order a committee to sit or not to sit. I cannot do that.

He then quoted, a number of times, statements made in the House, where I and others have said we would welcome a committee sitting. That was not considered interference in a parliamentary committee. He also says that because outside the House I am quoted as saying I would welcome the committee terminating its sittings, that is interference. How can it be both? How can it, on the one hand, by suggesting a committee sit be perfectly appropriate, but by suggesting a committee not sit is somehow an intolerable abuse of that member's privileges? What an absurdity and what a waste of the House's time.

Again, he is abusing the House by distorting and warping what in fact was in the paper. If anybody has a privilege it is me for the deliberate distorting of what is in the paper. What is in the paper under quotations is: "I don't know what further facts could be adduced," Andre told reporters. That is what I said. It is a breach of the privileges of this House, Mr. Speaker, for the House leader to say such an outrageous thing. My gosh, what is this place coming to that I should be so outrageous as to make this kind of suggestion?

Mr. Speaker, if you think that is a breach of the privileges of the House, I would welcome a motion and will defend myself for having so abused the hon. member's sensitivities by suggesting I do not know what further facts could be adduced. My God, I did not realize I said something so outrageous.

Come on. This is a waste of time. I suggest we get on to other business and the hon. member stop wasting time in this manner.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I really do feel I have to provide a few observations, particularly based on the rather hysterical outburst by the government House leader.

I join with my friend, the opposition House leader, who was astonished, as most sensitive Canadians were this morning, to read the headlines in The Ottawa Sun that the House leader wants the Al-Mashat inquiry dropped. We all remember time and time again when the government House leader has indicated clearly, as other senior ministers have, in an effort to divert if you like, a discussion on the floor of the House of Commons that the committee would be the appropriate place to obtain the evidence.

I do not remember the exact quote, but I remember the statement being made that all witnesses necessary would be welcome at the committee. That suggests that if committee members had people that they believed were appropriate in order to get to the bottom of this that they ought to be heard.

Therefore, when the government House leader says that he does not know whether further facts would be adduced, that is sending a very clear signal to his colleagues on that committee that enough is enough, and the Tories plan to end the probe.

Perhaps the truth of all of this will come out in the next few days in terms of whether or not all of the appropriate witnesses are still allowed to be called. At that point we may be back again.

I simply want to join with my colleague to say that it appears to me that the government House leader is prejudging the work being done by the committee. A certain element of interference is there in his comments. After all, we are told on a regular basis by the government House leader to get off the issue in the House of Commons because the committee is where this should be dealt with. Yet now he is saying that as far as he is concerned, enough of the facts have come out and the committee, presumably, should wrap up its proceedings.

I want to simply say that it is important that we get to the bottom of this. It is important that some minister eventually accept responsibility for this dastardly sequence and the way to do that is in a committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think the government House leader protested a bit too much in his statements. I want to cite a couple more authorities for Your Honour to assist you in consideration of this case.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has already referred to the statements in the case. I have turned to Maingot's work on Parliamentary Privilege in Canada page 193, where the learned author writes, quoting one of your distinguished predecessors, Madam Speaker Sauvé. He states:

> As the Speaker has said recently, ". . .the dimension of contempt of Parliament is such that the House will not be constrained in finding a breach of privileges of members, or of the House. This is precisely the reason that, while our privileges are defined, contempt of the House has no limits. When new ways are found to interfere with our proceedings, so too will the House, in appropriate cases, be able to find that a contempt of the House has occurred."

I submit what has happened here is an attempt by the government House leader to muzzle this committee. That is a breach of members' freedom of speech. That is one of our fundamental privileges in this House.

The suggestion is that there has been an attempt to muzzle our freedom of speech. If that is so, I suggest that it constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House. If it fails on that score, it is certainly a contempt of the House because it is one of our fundamental privileges.

I refer also to Halsbury's Laws of England, fourth edition, page 608, where there is a distinction drawn between the offences of contempt and breach of privilege, citation 1500 in that work. I quote again:

> The power of both Houses of Parliament to punish for contempt is a general power similar to that possessed by the superior courts of law and is not restricted to the punishment of breaches of their acknowledged privileges. Any act or commission which obstructs or impedes either House in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of the House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency to produce such a result, may be treated as a contempt even if there is no precedent for the offence.

I do not need to read further, but I submit that in this case there is clearly authority. If Your Honour finds that there is a prima facie breach of privilege in this case, either myself or the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond will be pleased to move the appropriate motion to have the matter referred to the House management committee where it could be investigated fully.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I feel like my privileges have been abused for about 15 minutes. I tend to be busy and there are meetings that need to take place and this discussion has gone on at some length.

If, Mr. Speaker, you were to find significant members of this Chamber speaking to the press about what committees should do to be indeed a contempt and a breach of privilege of this House, I suggest that most members on the other side of this House would be guilty. On more than one occasion, I have seen an enormous amount of publicity in the last two or three weeks from members on the other side, from the Official Opposition and the third party in this House, long, long dissertations on television, lots of quotes and newspaper articles in which people are telling the Al-Mashat committee or the external affairs committee exactly what it should do.

If that is a contempt of Parliament, it would be a sad, sad day for the notion of free speech. However, this filibuster on this issue is a denial of free speech and I think it should come to a conclusion right now.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to your suggestion that I reflect and weigh very heavily as to what the government House leader had said in Question Period. As a result of that, I made my summation and of course did not proceed with the normal motion, which the hon. House leader has referred to as somehow being a major omission in terms of our parliamentary procedure on the floor of this House.

I was thinking that the hon. House leader would have taken advantage of the opportunity to explain and to apologize to the House and to committee members for his activities.

If that is not the case, I believe, based on my summation that I have made, and listening to other evidence that has been adduced, that this is a clear violation of the privileges of the House. If the Chair finds such a prima facie breach, the appropriate motion will be proposed.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to deal with the matter immediately.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond brings to the House by way of a question of privilege what he alleges is a contempt of the House, as a consequence of what appear to be quotes from the hon. government House leader in a journal today.

The quotes concern the hon. House leader's views of certain proceedings in the committee and certainly indicate the government House leader's opinion.

The thrust of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond's argument is that this amounts to an improper interference in the affairs of the committee and, as a consequence, it is a contempt of the House.

I ask the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the members of the House to keep in mind what the hon. government House leader said during Question Period. I think it is clear from the comment that he made in answer to a question put to him that it was his view, if I remember the words correctly, and it certainly was his declaration that the committee makes up its own mind about what it is to do.

The hon. the member for Calgary West has risen and has reminded hon. members that there has been a great deal of comment about this committee outside this place. There has been some comment about the committee inside this place, but for the most part, within the bounds that the Chair has had to set with respect to questions.

I listened carefully to the hon. member for Kamloops and also with care to the erudite comments adding to those given by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I have to say that, on balance, having listened to both sides of this argument, I am not persuaded that there is a prima facie case of contempt. I thank hon. members for their restraint in the arguments that have been presented to the Chair.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from the response of the Minister of the Environment during Question Period to the question put regarding Alcan's Kemano II project.

I have provided the minister with the appropriate sections of the Federal Court ruling of May 14, 1991 by Mr. Justice Alison Walsh.

The minister suggested that perhaps only an initial environmental evaluation is what is suggested by the ruling, but I think the following two very short quotations will reveal to the minister and to the House that that is not what the court had to say and I quote from the bottom of page 36:

> I conclude that the Kemano II Completion Project requires an assessment by virtue of the environmental assessment review process and that the ministers involved, and specifically the Minister of the Environment, were under an obligation to arrange for it and not frustrate this by the settlement agreement signed in 1987 finally by the order of the minister, confirmed by Order in Council that no such assessment is necessary.

A few sentences down it goes on and it says:

> —deciding against an EARP assessment in connection with the present project, however, where on the facts it is evident that one is required, goes far beyond the exercise of discretion in a fair manner with which the court cannot interfere and becomes a failure to undertake a legal obligation required by law. The same is true, although perhaps to a lesser extent, with respect to the other ministers named as respondents. It is not sufficient to be satisfied with—

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me like this is a carrying on of a debate arising out of Question Period rather than a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am almost finished the one sentence that I was reading.

> The same is true, although perhaps to a lesser extent, with respect to the other ministers named as respondents. It is not sufficient to be satisfied with a review, however extensive, performed by the proponent of a proposal, even in co-operation with the ministers involved without a public assessment by an independent panel at which all interested parties may be heard.

Those are the quotations that I think are the most important and I am sure the minister is aware of the conclusions of the Federal Court in relation to the same judgment.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Skeena for having sent over to me copies of the rulings that he has just quoted from. Although I do not have page 36, it is not material to the point I want to make.

First, let me reiterate that I stand by the answer I gave in Question Period. I think what the member from Skeena and I are talking about here is a question of interpretation rather than a disagreement on what the ruling is about. Let me be clear so that there will be as little confusion as possible on what this is about in the environmental assessment process.

As far as I can tell from the pages I have in front of me, I think that when the judge refers to a process, the judge refers to this process in a generic sense of the term more than the specific sense.

The process itself is made up of two parts as they now stand under the guidelines. The first part requires that a federal government department makes what we call an initial assessment. Once the department has made that assessment, it determines whether there are or are not mitigable measures that can be taken in the case of any specific project and it can then be satisfied that those mitigable measures are taken and not ask for a public panel. There is also a public panel that can be asked for if there is what we call sufficient public interest.

In the case before us, my understanding of the ruling is that the court says that the ministers involved should do that environmental assessment process in the generic sense and that that would require the initial assessment to happen. Let me refer to page 38 of the same court ruling under the title Specific Conclusions. The last five lines of that page 38 where the justice says "with respect to paragraph 4 an order of mandamus will be issued requiring the various ministers named to comply with the requirements of the EARP guidelines order and submit the proposal to an environmental screening and assessment pursuant to section 10 thereof".

That, as far as I am concerned with the information I have, is an order by mandamus to the ministers concerned, not the Minister of the Environment, but the ministers concerned, to undertake what I referred to in that initial process.

In closing my remarks, let me point out to you that as the guidelines now stand, the Minister of the Environment does not have the power to act alone in constituting a panel. To do that requires that an initiating department ask the Minister of the Environment to do that. Once that request is made to the Minister of the Environment, he or she has no choice but to order the panel. But that, mechanically, must be done first and that is why I answered the way I did during Question Period.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order reluctantly and with appreciation for the difficult job of the Chair.

I would like to point out that I was questioner number four on the government side and I do note that the government side obtained about five questions yesterday and I was somewhat inspired by the privilege that we had to ask some questions. As a result of that, I prepared a question today on a subject that was not addressed by anybody in the House of Commons, and I was not able to ask that question.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the frustration and I share it with my hon. friend and many others, I might say, who would like to ask important questions.

That is why I would like to suggest right now, in an effort to facilitate my hon. friend and many others, that we extend Question Period for 30 minutes every day, between now and June 21, so that these important questions have an opportunity to be put.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

We do not have to change the rules as proposed a minute ago. I refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citations 409 and 410 which say "in Question Period a preamble need not exceed one carefully drawn sentence" or "supplementary questions require no preambles whatsoever".

As far as I can tell from my record today, we had 32 questions in Question Period and not one of them qualified under Beauchesne's citation 409 or 410. Those are also listed in the annotated Standing Orders in section 37(1) that even go back to the original Beauchesne's of 1922 and they are referred to all the way back to the English Debates in July 18, 1862, 129 years ago.

All we have to do, all of us in the House is co-operate and follow the rules. We do not have to change the rules, just follow the rules that are very clear and simple and anybody here can understand them. They are not complicated, they are simple, and if we all follow the rules we will all have the opportunities to ask the questions that we need, and we do need the opportunities to ask the questions.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the hon. member who is persisting in this, because of course he is very selective in his readings from Beauchesne's. He is ignoring another fundamental rule in Beauchesne's which I draw to the attention of Your Honour, and that is citation 417 in Beauchesne's sixth edition which says: "Answers to questions should be as brief as possible, deal with the matter raised and should not provoke debate."

Today we had answers to questions that were evasive, that were an abuse of this House because they did not answer the question that was asked. Ministers stood here in the House and had the unmitigated gall to suggest that a search was under way for documents, without calling in the police, because the documents were missing for three months. We had ministers say that everything was fine when it patently was not. We have had a constant abuse by ministers of the rules of this House by giving long windy answers that drift all over the place.

For the hon. member to suggest, as two of them have, that they were deprived of a right to ask questions because of questions on this side of the House is completely wrong. Question Period is for the opposition, and those members should learn that fact.

It is not an opportunity for the government backbenchers to throw softballs at their ministers so they can answer it any way they want.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! The Chair has heard from the three major parties represented in this Chamber. I would reiterate the suggestion I made last week to the effect that the House Management Committee may be the most appropriate forum to pursue the discussion hon. members want to have on this issue.

I will therefore seek the co-operation of the House and humbly suggest that hon. members bring this matter before the House Management Committee if they want to go in greater detail into the matters raised during question period.

FINANCIAL TIMES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this is on a different point of order. It relates specifically to an intervention of my own yesterday during the discussion of the opposition motion on youth unemployment.

I quoted from an article in The Financial Times in which an unnamed reporter in The Financial Times claimed that Hilton Works in my riding, which employs 7,000 people, was about to announce a permanent closure in August of this year. The unnamed reporter further went on to state that the police in the city of Hamilton had been called specifically with the intention of involving more officers in August, lest there be violence at the announcement of a permanent closing of a facility which has been in operation for more than 100 years.

You can understand the concern that this particular article raised among the people of Hamilton. My phones were ringing off the wall. I have had conversations both with the police department and with the senior management of Stelco They have advised me that in fact that particular article is patently false. There are no intentions of closing the Hilton Works operation, which employs more than 7,000 people, and in fact over the last year there has been more than $100 million of fresh investment to upgrade that particular facility.

I thought it was important to put that information on the record because clearly, in the battered economy that we have had in Hamilton, it does a disservice to our community when unnamed sources promote rumours that become the substance of newspaper articles—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: The member is giggling, saying I raised it. Yes, I did raise it in the House because when The Financial Times published a report claiming that 7,000 of my constituents were going to be laid off, I naturally wanted to raise it in the House.

When the information came to my attention that it is false, I wanted to make sure, on behalf of all of my constituents, that this information was on the record. All Canadians should know that Hilton Works is not closing down and that people who put out this kind of rumour should not be allowed to parade it as news because it is not.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that a Ways and Means motion relating to a taxation measure respecting the operation of a wage claims payment program and to amend the Income Tax Act thereof, laid upon the table on Monday, June 10, 1991, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, June 6, consideration of motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read a third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When Bill C-11 was last before the House there were 10 minutes remaining in the question and comments period following the speech of the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

• (1540)

I will now recognize hon. members who wish to continue the question and comment period.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, when my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls was speaking previously on this debate I was particularly struck with his knowledge of the whole sector in Atlantic Canada.

I want to refer here to the actual purpose of that particular bill introduced in 1966. The two main purposes were to ensure that eastern Canadian ports could compete with the United States ports and to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports.

As the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee contends, the budget papers that contain this measure failed to identify the full purpose and objective of the program and rationalize this decision to terminate it solely on the basis of the absence of competition between the United States and Canadian ports.

Having said that, I want to ask the member: If I were to place a phone call asking where I can get information on this or where I can get freight service—I suppose it would have to be a 1-800 number—where would I have to place that call? Who would answer?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, at this time of the year, a lot of people are planning their vacations, especially their vacations to motor to Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island or some other place.

There was a 1-800 number under that subsidiary of CN, Marine Atlantic. There was a 1-800 number until about a month ago. The 1-800 number was 1-800-565-7421. There were very catchy tunes on television and on radio advertising the 1-800 number.

The 1-800 number has now been discontinued, but if you are in the United States or in Texas, there is a 1-800 number that you can use. If you are in Alabama or any state in the United States, there is a 1-800 number: 1-800-347-19981 if you want to write it down and you are in the United States.

If you are in Canada, you cannot call a 1-800 number. You cannot call toll-free. If you want to take any of the ferry systems or any of the boats in eastern Canada that go to these islands, you just cannot call toll-free. If you live in the United States, you can, and that is not the end of the story.

When you compare the rates, it is amazing. In terms of the union with Canada—I can remember when the debate was on about whether or not we were going to join Canada—there was quite a campaign on, that we should join Canada because there were advantages to it. One of the big things in the Railway Act, the act we are talking about today, was that the rates to be charged for passengers and freight moving to Newfoundland would be comparable to the rate charged if you went an equal distance on land. That is in the terms of union.

Now looking at the new rates, it is $99 for your car if you go from North Sydney to Argentia. Your cabin costs $96.25 with the GST added and no window. If you want a window, you have to pay $99.77 for your cabin. A reclining chair is $12.04 with the GST included, an adult pays $41. That is on the Argentia run. That is pretty expensive. When you add all that up, it is close to $700.

On the Port aux Basques run,—I am talking about return now with four adults in a car— it costs practically $400. You could go to Prince Edward Island 20 times on that kind of rate, down to Argentia. But in answering your question relating to competition with the United States, not only do they have a 1-800 number in the United States of America for our services to our islands in Canada, but they do not pay GST say if you phoned Bar Harbour, Maine. If you called Bar Harbor, Maine about Marine Atlantics, CN's subsidiary which operates between Bar Harbor, Maine and Yarmouth, you will notice that there is no GST on the cabins there. Also, you can get a return fare. Now you know what that means. It means you get a reduced rate if you buy a return ticket. So there you go. The 1-800 number is gone in Canada but is still in the United States. If you are in Texas or Dallas you can call free, but if you are in Canada you cannot. GST is not charged for the ferry that matches up with the state of Maine from Canada and you get special return rates which are lower than if you paid individually one rate to the other.

I believe that these rates by CN and its subsidiaries are a violation of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada. They have not only taken away those subsidies, they have even taken away our railway tracks in Newfoundland. Not only are the railway tracks gone, but even the ties under the railway tracks are gone. It is pretty difficult walking down those railway lines with not even a track there or a tie. Every three or four feet you drop down into a hole. That is what is left. Not only did they take up the railway tracks and the ties, they did away with the railway and took away the subsidies that we are talking about. They also sold, as I mentioned before, the telephone company that they own. They sold that last year.

We have really been sold out by the Tory government.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I can only take it from the comments of the previous speaker that the decision to terminate this program in the budget papers, based on the absence of competition between the United States and Canadian ports, was a false assumption as were so many other items in that particular budget.

Could the member give me a comment on that, please?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I think the entire bill that is before the House is a good indication of what the Government of Canada is doing. What the Government of Canada is doing is setting adrift the entire intent of equality in this nation, in transportation and in everything else. It is setting us adrift and it is making the decisions by cabinet. They are not even waiting for us, as parliamentarians, to pass the bill.

Why if you even look at this bill you will discover that the bill really applies, I believe, to flour and grain that was put on a railway car back in 1978 I believe. So, in other words, it would not apply unless the flour and grain has not yet arrived at its destination. The subsidy was done away with in 1988 or 1989 and the Government of Canada did not even wait to pass the bill before this Chamber. They are now bringing in that particular piece of legislation, but I would not like to use any flour that has been on a train for the last three years covered by this particular piece of legislation.

Maybe that is what is wrong every time I bake some bread and it does not work out. Maybe it is the flour that we are all using.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on Bill C-11, but maybe you will allow me, just in passing, to make a comment which I am sure you will find relevant to the debate, at least to one of the debaters in the debate. I listened again with great interest to my friend from Gander—Grand Falls as he talked in the last few moments, answering questions from my friend from Lambton—Middlesex. I could not help but have a couple of thoughts when he mentioned that he remembered the events of the Confederation battle between the pro-confederates and the anti-confederates in Newfoundland in the pre-1949 period. Surely he does not remember it too well because he is much too young to remember a lot of it; and what a fount of wisdom this man is.

Very few people know his direct connection to the Confederation period or, after the fact, I tell my friend from Calgary Southeast, among his other many achievements he is also the publisher, the producer, of a best-selling, long-playing record called, "Oh, What a Battle It Was". This record makes available on tape to historical buffs and others some of the actual speeches of Mr. Smallwood and his protagonist during the great convention that preceded the coming together of the Dominion of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada in 1949.

I am not paid to do this but I believe there are still a few records somewhere available out there in somebody's cellar. If not, I have one that I would be glad to play for the member for Calgary Southeast. He would hear some great speeches by Mr. Peter Cashin, the uncle of Dr. Richard Cashin, and by Joey Smallwood and others of that particular period.

Apart from—

Mr. Sobeski: What's the relevance?

Mr. Simmons: Ah-h, now the member for Cambridge wonders about the relevance. Apart from always wanting to throw a bouquet in the direction of my friend from Gander—Grand Falls, it is supremely relevant to revisit those debates on that particular record which my friend has seen fit to have preserved. He went to the CBC archives back in those days when he was not busy being the editor of Hansard in the Newfoundland House of Assembly, being the clerk of the Newfoundland assembly, or the Editor of Debates. He has been a fairly busy fellow in his day but he found time to go to the CBC archives and have the speeches put on a record to be available to the public. Many thousands of Newfoundlanders have those records and I am sure as a result of this promotion today the requests will come flooding in again. I want him to know that my share goes to charity.

There is a relevance, I say to my friend from Cambridge. The relevance is that when those great debates were going on, apart from the rhetoric—of which we get a little bit in this House—of those days, Major Peter Cashin led the anti-confederate forces, the Newfoundland independence forces if you like, the Responsible Government League it was called, and Joey Smallwood led the other forces—by the way I was just talking on the phone to a friend of mine today who visited Joey this afternoon; he is hale and hearty, still walks around his garden three or four times a day and is in very good shape. He will be 91 this Christmas Eve, but he is in very good shape, the only living Father of Confederation.

When Joey and Major Peter Cashin and their entourages got up at the national convention in St. John's to debate the future of Newfoundland, they marshalled the various arguments which will be found on that tape to which I made reference in relation to the member for Gander—Grand Falls. Those arguments were either for confederation or against confederation. My friend from Gander—Grand Falls in his last answer made reference to one of those arguments. Joey Smallwood and others successfully sold the benefits of the two dominions, the Dominion of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada, coming together. Those who are about to remake the country keep in mind what Newfoundlanders did in 1949. They passed up nationhood, albeit they were only a half million souls or even fewer at that time. They deliberately, consciously in a vote—it took two votes to do it, mind you—said: "We will forfeit dominion status and nationhood, as a small country, a full-fledged member of the British Commonwealth." Do not forget that it was one of the four dominions in the Statute of Westminster back in 1931; New Zealand, Australia, Canada and Newfoundland. It was one of the original four dominions. That dominion elected by popular ballot in the period leading up to 1949 to forfeit its dominion status, to forfeit its national status, to become a province of Canada.

As an aside, but I believe an important aside from where I stand, I say to those who are now redrawing the map of Canada and reconfiguring what kind of Canada we are going to have, one of the many factors they have to keep in mind is that unlike every other province of this country—well, I suppose the exceptions are the original four, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario, who came in as provinces—but the only other of the ten provinces that came in as a separate entity and was not carved out of existing territory already part of the Dominion of Canada was Newfoundland and Labrador. It came in as a province, not part of a region, not a quarter of a province, to be a province. That was the trade-off.

I give notice now that when the time comes when we as Newfoundlanders have to choose between fighting for that principle and opting for some hodge-podge of regions in this country that subvert the dreams and aspirations those people had in 1949, my father and mother and the parents of my friend from Gander—Grand Falls and others, we have no doubt where we will stand in that particular debate. That is another debate for another time.

I will talk about the retroactivity of this bill in a few moments. The bill itself is an affront. It is an affront that can be traced in terms of impact right back to that great Confederation battle involving Newfoundland's decision to join Canada. Part of the package, if you like, that was put before the voters at that time when they were asked to choose between continuing dominion status or being a province of Canada, a marriage with Canada, related to matters of transportation, availability of foodstuffs at reasonable prices.

Now, 42 years later, we in Newfoundland, as in so many other provinces, but for us it is more poignant, for us it is more pointed, for us it is more focused, because we made overt decisions based on the inventory of this country as it was then, based on the advantages, based on the substantive benefits of being part of this country. I could run through them if we had the time, but just in a quick illusion, not only to do with transportation, but to do with that social safety net, the family allowance, the pensions and so on, which are now being dismantled, left, right and centre by the representatives of the confederacy to the south over there. They are just dismantling it every chance they get.

The continuance of the railway was a part of that package and that has since gone the way of the dodo bird.

Mr. Mills: It is a retreat of national government.

Mr. Simmons: As my friend from Broadview—Greenwood says so well, what we are seeing is the retreat, the abdication of the national government, the shredding of the mandate of a national government. What purpose is there in having a national government if it has no raison d'être, no reason for existing, if it works itself out of business.

Bill C-11, which in the last House was Bill C-26, died an honourable death at third reading stage. Then the government, by the back door, got it back in here again over the opposition of we who felt it should not be here.

Mr. Speaker, if you go back to the 1200s, to 1215 I suppose, the Magna Carta, and follow through from there, the whole principle—even 1066 my friend from Regina—Lumsden says—the very beginnings, the very elemental, primitive, beginnings of parliamentary democracy and follow it through to the present day, you will find that there was always some protection for the ordinary people. This is why we call this place the House of Commons. Here we represent the common, ordinary people of Canada. That is where the name "Commons" comes from.

But we in the opposition are less able to do it when we have a government that writes its own rules every day of the week. It is equivalent to having a losing baseball team. Lord knows they have become a bunch of losers over there. Then, because they cannot win with the rules as they are, they keep changing them. So they say well, you fellows will still have nine players, but we would like to have 13. We would like to have two people at bat at the same time; we want our people only to run one base instead of three; we want to shorten the distance between bases from 90 feet to 45 feet.

It would be easy to win a game if you were allowed to write your own rules all the time. Is anybody in this Chamber surprised that this bunch of losers over here, this crowd that cannot get the support of any more than 14 per cent of the people, can still ram legislation through here? How can they do it? They can do it because they doctor the rules of the game all the time, they keep changing the rules. That is the only reason this bill is here. This bill should not even be here because it died at third reading in the last House. If they wanted to bring it back they should have had the integrity to bring it back in the normal way instead of ramming it through as part of a package of four.

Mr. Speaker, the bill itself would undo a long-standing set of subsidies that were put here by a former government—and I will tell you, it was not the Tory government either—because it saw a need to look after the ports of Saint John and Montreal and Halifax and the other ports down the St. Lawrence.

It was done at a time when it was trying to parallel a similar circumstance which had taken place in the United States in 1959. That is why we implemented this amendment to the Railway Act in the 1960s.

It is true that that subsidy we were trying to match no longer applies in the United States. But before we throw it out, we ought to go back to the people who brought in the bill in the first place. I am glad to say it was a man by the name of Jack Pickersgill, a man who was born in Manitoba. I have always said that you do not have any control over where you were born. Not that Manitoba is a bad place to be born, but having been born in Manitoba and having worked in various parts of Canada and the United States, he had the good sense to run for and win a seat in Parliament to represent the people of Newfoundland.

My great friend and a great parliamentarian, Jack Pickersgill, represented the old seat of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I think it was called something different in those days, Gander—Twillingate, I guess, for a number of years.

As Minister of Transport, he introduced this legislation that this government wants to cut the guts out of. He said at the time that one of the reasons was the one I mentioned before, that it was to match the advantage of subsidy that the American ports, the eastern seaboard ports had. To put Montreal and Saint John and Halifax and those ports in a similar circumstance, he brought in the legislation. But he brought it in for another reason. It is worth reading the actual quote from that particular time.

Mr. Speaker, he said at the time: "To ensure that we will have rights which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports." To provide some incentive, some inducement.

I want to ask members on that side of the House who are representing those Atlantic ports, where are they now? Where are they now, that their jobs are going down the drain in Halifax and Saint John. This is not fear mongering. This has happened in the past few weeks. The elevators are closing. People are losing their jobs down there in Halifax. We have heard the stories. We have seen them in the press. Where are the people they sent here to speak up for them? Where are the members who now should be doing what Jack Pickersgill said 30 years ago needs to be done. Are those Tory members telling us and telling their constituents that there is no need now for some incentives to shippers to use those facilities?

They ought to take a look. When they go back to their ridings, if they get the nerve to go back to their ridings, they really should take a walk down around the port in Halifax or Saint John or Montreal and some of those other places and see what is happening there, see the devastation there, see the pain that this legislation is inflicting even before it has been implemented. Why can this legislation inflict pain before its time? Because this government not only has brought this bill in through the back door, it has gone and wiped out the subsidies anyway as of July 1989.

This government is now trying to get the legislative authority to do what it did two years ago. Twenty-three months ago the government wiped out this particular subsidy without any legislative debates. It is a complete shame. It is a tragedy to sit here and watch basic protections, that the people in any democracy have a right to, being eroded by a government that changes the rules of Parliament to suit its own whim. It uses its own muscle to change subsidies and laws without even the benefit of a rubber stamp in Parliament. The government has the majority to do this and if it had some good planning, maybe if it felt it important to do away with these subsidies, it would get the sequence right. This government would get the law changed first.

That is not too much for those producers to ask who are left out there twisting in the wind, nor for those farmers to ask whose prices are already, I am told, depressed as a result of this particular initiative.

Mr. Speaker, do you realize that export grain shipments in the ports of Halifax and Saint John have stopped? Saint John grain elevator is closed. Fifty-five people in Saint John, New Brunswick, have lost their jobs, in Halifax another 27 people. These are actual statistics which put a face, a human face, on the madness that the government is up to with this particular Bill C-11.

There are so many more things I could say, but I see by your signal that my time is just about up.

Let's see what the present Minister of Finance had to say, the Deputy Prime Minister, a man who has a reputation for telling it like it is, about an earlier effort to do away with this particular provision, this At and East subsidy. Here is what the gentlemen who represents a farm riding in Alberta had to say when he was in opposition. At that moment back there when it was talked about that they were going to wipe out the subsidy he said that the government must not cancel the At and East subsidy. Then he went on and said:

> The elimination of this subsidy could mean a loss to Canada of something in the order of $28 million worth of value added processing activity.

He was slightly wrong, only in the sense he was very low on the figure. It means a loss already of more millions than the $28 he mentioned at that particular time.

If there is one thing that disillusions the public, it is people who say one thing in opposition and other in government. I would have thought that the very man who would not do that is the gentlemen who is now the present Minister of Finance.

I see that you are getting ready to cut me off because my time is up. How time flies when you are having fun.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

There being only 10 members present I would like you to call a quorum.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see there are fewer than 20 members present. Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since we now have a quorum, the debate shall resume.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it would be a pleasure for me to participate in this debate, but I have the sinking feeling that I have already spoken at third reading, which would prohibit me from continuing. I wonder if I could see some clarification from the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You are right.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform my colleagues, especially on the other side, that I will do anything to get an audience. I hope you will stay to be reminded about some things for Atlantic Canada which you are participating in doing away with.

For nearly 100 years there has been a number of transportation assistance programs in place in Canada designed to keep east-west movement of goods and people going in commerce, and also designed to prevent the United States from moving in on us with their transportation systems.

Various governments at various times over the last 100 years have made wise moves, sometimes forced on them, sometimes because they did the right thing on their own. These transportation programs were designed to take into account our geography, our climate, where our people are located and how far we are from export positions.

The average grain haul in Canada is over 900 miles. In the United States it is some 700 miles. They have the advantage of a massive waterway system and much of their grain is grown closer to their seaports.

Australia and Argentina, two other main competitors are, on average, within 200 miles average of export position. It is similar in Europe. From Poland west there is not a grain haul more than 300 or 400 miles.

It means that Canada has to take extra measures to give us that so-called level playing field, although so far we have had level playing fields where the other guy has the ball on our ten yard line all the time. The reason for these programs was to give us an equal shot at the ports of Quebec, Saint John, Halifax. That was the reason for the Crowsnest Pass rates, the bridge rates and several other programs that have been done away with by the previous government and this one.

Our transportation systems are in bad, bad trouble. Our railroads, our airlines and our trucking industry, between so-called deregulation and the free trade deal have been put in an impossible position.

Somebody raised the trucking industry in the House today. The fast write-offs for the trucking industry in the United States also applies to railroads, so both the Canadian trucking industry and our railroads are at disadvantage. But we provide subsidized transportation costs for purposes I mentioned and also to equalize, to some extent, our opportunities in competition with U.S. transportation.

This measure, as others before, and I include the Crowsnest Pass freight rate, has done nothing but increase costs for grain producers. This one also affects Quebec, Ontario and the prairie provinces, particularly Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

I want to ask my hon. friends over there, where the heck are the Conservative members from the Atlantic, from Ontario, from Manitoba and Saskatchewan? We only have four left from Saskatchewan and it will not be long before there are none left. Where are they? This hurts the Canadian Wheat Board. It needs to do more effective export marketing of flour, milling wheat and feed grains. This hurts the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board.

The effect of this bill is not just a couple or 300 jobs in Atlantic Canada, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The effect of this sort of a measure goes away beyond those borders. In fact, I submit, there has been no net cost of this program to the Government of Canada. The maximum it ever paid in the subsidy was $40 million, and it would fluctuate from $10 to $40 million each year. But when you consider the number of people it kept working, not only in the terminals and the flour mills in Saint John and Halifax, and consider the benefit it was to livestock producers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who were making a buck, paying taxes, and consider the help it was to grain terminals and transporters on the Great Lakes and the upper St. Lawrence, the result was more income for the government in the form of taxes. This program did not cost the government a darned nickel.

Mr. Speaker, four grain elevators have shut down since the At and East has been cancelled: two in Midland, one in Port McNicoll and one in Prescott. The terminals in Midland and Port McNicoll are in the riding of the former Minister of Transport, not the present one, the second last one. We have been through so many I think they should put a revolving door on the Minister of Transport minister's office.

An hon. member: It shows their level of commitment.

Mr. Benjamin: This is the 14th or 15th one I have been through.

Ontario flour mills have lost export contracts since they quit paying the subsidy, and require lower wheat prices to compete with mills in Quebec or with the Americans or the European community. They lower the wheat prices, that bankrupts some more grain producers in Ontario as well as in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

I want to say, as far as I am concerned, we have a first class Speaker of this Parliament, but like all the rest of us, he is not perfect. I think the Speaker should rule with a hard hand on any government legislation that is put in effect over a year before it is even passed by Parliament.

We took the federal government to court over another bill back in the 1970s. We took it to Federal Court and the Federal Court told the federal government to pay its bills. It had to keep on paying part of the storage costs of grain in Canada. I do not know why the Atlantic provinces' governments have allowed this one. They could have taken it to court because it has to be somebody who has a direct interest in the matter. I do not know where Dover Flour Mills is. Why are they not in on this? I do not know where the management and ownership of the terminals in Halifax and Saint John are. Saint John has been shut down for over a year now. We need those grain terminals.

Canada only consumes 20 per cent of our grain production; 80 per cent of it goes to export. The Americans consume 80 per cent of their grain production; 20 per cent of it goes to export, just the opposite of our situation. So we have to do all the things we can to give us a fair shake at these markets.

When we dealt with this bill the first time in the previous Parliament, we met with and talked to the people from Halifax and Saint John. We talked to the livestock producers in Nova Scotia. You know what lengths they were feeling they had to go to? They were looking at bringing corn in from the United States or feed grains from Europe, for God's sake, and out west and in Ontario we are up to our backsides in feed grain. What the heck are we doing?

This is wrong-headed, it is stupid, it flies in the face of good economic transportation sense. I know there are Conservative members from Atlantic Canada very unhappy about this. Well, you can just say the word to your Whip that you are either not going to be here for the vote or you are going to vote against it and put your action where your mouth is. With something that is bad for the country as well as bad for your own area, surely you have to persuade the government not to proceed or you have to try to defeat it, no matter where you sit in the House.

Oh, for a minority Parliament. They would not have dared try it, they would not have dared.

• (1630)

The Halifax grain terminal is crucial to livestock producers because they bring in feed grain from Ontario and western Canada. They use that terminal for a surge capacity. They fill it up. They decide what space they need for the milling grains and the high-grade export grains, and they fill the rest of it up with feed grain. As and when farmers need feed grain, they truck it from that grain terminal in Halifax out to the feed lots on their farms and out to their processing plants. That is almost by the boards. The Halifax grain terminal is barely breaking even; its days are numbered.

To pursue my earlier complaint when I said I did not think the Chair was 100 per cent right on this issue of retroactive enforcement of legislation before Parliament has even dealt with it, both Houses, before it has received Royal Assent, how can you do that, Mr. Speaker? It passes all understanding as far as I am concerned.

I want to say that the subsidies paid under the Export Enhancement Program by the United States and the European Community subsidies are causing us enough trouble but we increase our troubles ourselves by doing away with this minimal program.

We should be exploring more flour and grain markets. We used to ship a lot of flour to Cuba. It was a three-way deal with the Soviet Union. It would sign a contract for two million, three million or four million tonnes of grain, specify a certain number of tonnes had to be milled into flour and the flour went to Cuba out of Halifax and Saint John.

The Cubans sent the Russians sugar, molasses and rum. That is how they paid for that flour. The Russians sent us cold cash. That arrangement was in place for about 12 or 14 years; it was a good deal. By the way, the Russians said that the Cubans make very good rum. They prefer vodka, but they will drink the stuff. It was a semi-barter deal.

Those Caribbean countries, including Cuba, badly need feed grains, and they badly need flour. What are we doing? We are shutting down the whole operation in Atlantic Canada. How dumb can the government get? Where are the Tory MPs from Atlantic Canada, from rural Ontario, from the Great Lakes ports or from the St. Lawrence ports? Where are the Tory MPs from Manitoba and Saskatchewan? We will not worry about the ones from Alberta; they have enough trouble anyway. Alberta's grain all goes pretty well to Vancouver.

Mr. Riis: Not this week, it doesn't.

Mr. Benjamin: Not this week, no.

Isn't it funny when there is a lockout. When there is a lockout, nobody says a word. When there is a strike: "Oh, legislate them back to work." There is a lockout. How come they do not legislate the grain companies back to work? I do not understand it.

However, nothing is moving west, so let's ship it east. The trouble is that we have lost the Crowsnest Pass rate and now we have lost the At and East rates. It makes no sense. It is of no significant use or benefit to the reduction of the deficit.

If you put that many people out of work, if you cut down on that much export out of those terminals and ports, you cut down on government revenues and you probably lose more money than what the subsidy costs.

It is not only no net cost. The livestock industry in the maritimes depends on grain. It is estimated that the abolishing of this puts the transportation costs for feed grain up by $10 a tonne. It is estimated that 5,000 jobs will be lost in the livestock industry, the feed mills, the meat packing plants and the dairies.

Surely that is not a risk worth taking over a piddling little subsidy like this.

As I said at the outset, this subsidy is what allows the Government of Canada to take into account our geography, our climate and where our people produce their goods and services. It gives us an even fight with our competitors in the United States and the European community and these dummies want to cancel it.

I hope my hon. friend, who is a farmer in southern Saskatchewan, will get up and try to defend the abolition of these rates. I hope he will tell the feed grain producers and the producers of high grade milling wheat in his riding that they are going to lose some support and help on the export, that it is going to inhibit the ability of the Canadian Wheat Board to do even a better job even than it is doing now.

The figures I got show that closure of Dover Flour Mills will cost 45 to 60 jobs; the Halifax terminal lost 483 jobs at the port and 250 indirect jobs are going to be lost as well. Dover Flour Mills is the only flour mill left, I believe, east of Montreal. It is the only one left. I understand it is efficient, it works well and makes good flour. What would you want to shut it down for? Why would you cause the management and ownership of it to have to shut it down? How dumb can a government get?

The Ontario flour mills tell us they have lost export contracts and they want lower wheat prices. All they have done then is victimize our grain producers even more. You cannot blame them for trying.

The Halifax terminal plays a vital role in the livestock industry and the grain and flour transport industry in Atlantic Canada. It always has. Why cut it off? You have already cut off one terminal. It has stopped and has not been running since February, 1990.

I am hoping that in the last days of this session the government will decide that it does not need to do this now. A subsidy is not a net cost to the government. The number of jobs lost will cost more money than what the subsidies were. It will cost more in lost export contracts than what the subsidy costs. It has not been a net cost to the government and it never has been.

I hope the government will change its mind on this. I will applaud them for it if they do. It is totally unneeded and unnecessary and it makes no difference to the deficit. I hope they will decide to withdraw this bill.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, in the current spirit of civility and non-partisanship that hopefully will pervade Parliament, I hope I can appeal once again to the member for Regina—Lumsden to recognize the realities of this situation as they apply to the change in the At and East and the repeal of that form of subsidization.

I do not want to excite him further. I just want to review, very briefly, the history of the change that was made by the budget.

First of all, since July 1989 there have been no grain or grain products including flour moving under the At and East system. The port of Halifax and other east coast ports have not in fact been receiving any flour shipments through the At and East for exactly two years now. It is a fait accompli in terms of the realities of the situation.

We can and we have debated time and time again the question of whether the At and East subsidization process should have been removed. The member just pointed out that there may have been no net saving to the government in one sense, and that has been a matter of debate. I do not see any further need to advance the arguments pro or con on that point. Because of this, and I am repeating myself, the grain and flour are not moving through the port of Halifax under At and East. What jobs have been lost, what harm that may have impacted on the port of Halifax has been carried out. It is history.

What we in the port of Halifax would like to do, and I think other Atlantic members agree with me, is pursue offsets to the cancellation of the At and East.

The member for Regina—Lumsden knows that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission said from the outset: "We will not defend the At and East; we will not attack the cancellation of the At and East".

But we in the transportation industry are particularly interested in the east coast ports like the port of Halifax and want offsets. We have been diligently working to try to create those offsets. One offset would be the assurance that the grain elevator in the port of Halifax is continued in operation, and a great deal of work has been done to accomplish that purpose.

There is also the matter of the impact on the agricultural industry and people have been looking at that. But the answer there is self-sufficiency in its feed grains, and a great deal of work has been done on that.

My point is to appeal to the member for Regina—Lumsden to allow the bill to pass. Let me tell you why. It is due to the fact that the bill has never been passed that there is this legal dispute, albeit an academic legal dispute, that has prevented to some extent the agreement with respect to offsetting benefits that would minimize the impact of the At and East.

We can go on with the argument. I think the member's party protested the legalities and brought the matter to court. The fact of the matter is that no shippers are using the At and East and no shippers intend to use the At and East. Again repeating myself, it is history.

I want to point out to him that there is a real disadvantage in not passing this bill, as Dover Mills Limited has found out in Halifax. There are now grain ships, flour ships, going right through to Thunder Bay and using the western grain transportation subsidy to move grain out of Thunder Bay which would otherwise have gone through Halifax.

There is a downside to not having this bill passed, and I wish he would understand and appreciate that.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, there is a perfectly good reason why there is no grain moving through Halifax and Saint John. When the railroads found out that if they moved that grain they would not get the subsidy as of January 30, 1990, they just refused to move it—except at the full commercial rate. That is why there is no grain moving through Saint John and Halifax.

They were warned, they were told, so was the Canadian Wheat Board; if the subsidy ain't going to get paid, we can't afford to ship it there—and it costs the farmers even more money.

There is another point the hon. member made, but he got me so stirred up that now I have forgotten what it was. But it doesn't matter because it wasn't a very good one and I was going to shoot it down, too.

However, in any case, this has been a cooked up set-up for over two years.

Mr. Crosby: It is history, Ben.

Mr. Benjamin: It is not history. Withdraw the damned bill and keep paying the At and East rate subsidy. You might get some friendly remarks out of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada, just for a change.

You know, you keep doing it. You keep niggling away at the few benefits that our grain producers and our transportation systems have, to the point where we have no railway tracks left in Newfoundland. The CPR wants to abandon that line into Halifax. With the At and East gone, they don't need it, they say. We have lost 3,000 miles of railway tracks in the three prairie provinces. We lost the Crow rate. Our trucking industry is in dire straits and so are our railroads.

It keeps saying that it is going to reduce the deficit. This is going to cost more than the programs cost and it is going to cost more in a lot of different ways.

We used to have the best rail transportation system in the world. We had two world leaders in airlines. We had an excellent trucking system with truckers who were responsible.

We get deregulation. Hells bells, now, if one can get the money from a bank, lease a couple of aeroplanes and hire a couple of laid-off flight crews, you are in business, and all that happens is that they take turns going broke. The same thing applies to the trucking industry. That is what deregulation got us.

I hope all my colleagues read that series of three articles in the Ottawa Citizen over the weekend, all the things that the witnesses before the transport committee warned you about in '85, '86 and '87. The government was warned. It was told repeatedly and chose to ignore it.

It is about time the government realized that, like the Speaker, they ain't 100 per cent right. In fact, they are a long, long way from being close to that. They have been wrong on this one. They have been wrong on several others. It is bad economic and transportation policy. When are they going to realize it and withdraw this bill?

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I first want to compliment my colleague on a very excellent speech. The one area I would like him to address is the possible relationship between the elimination two years ago of the At and East subsidy which assisted the movement of grains, to a certain extent, by rail to Halifax and Saint John, and the fact that today the railroads are very, very worried about the ability of the American railroads to undercut them by taking away traffic that currently is destined for Halifax; not grain traffic, but container traffic, although we have also seen some shipped in marine. Is there a real danger that because of the At and East elimination this government is actually directly responsible for the decline in other movements to the ports in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to assure my hon. friend that the repercussions of this are on things like container movement and general cargo movement. The American railroads and American ports, Boston in particular, will offer rate incentives and confidential contracts, which will further cut into the movement of cargo, other than grain, to Halifax and Saint John.

I want to make a final point. My friend from Atlantic Canada asked me a question. He quotes the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. I do not know if he was in the committee, but when the minister, the hon. Mr. Lewis, was there we asked him why the alternatives to eliminating the At and East rates that were put forward by Atlantic provinces had not been studied in spite of the fact that that they had been received over a year before. My hon. friend tells us about the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission which sent that study to the then Minister of Transport over a year ago. He tells the transport committee he has not studied it. Obviously he had no intention of studying it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The question and comments period is over.

Before resuming debate it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

[English]

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate and put some facts and figures on the record, not only for this House of Commons but for those who might be watching and taking a keen interest in what is happening with this debate and with this legislation.

We also have to recognize that since this At and East Program was put in place in 1967, the world shipping and economies have changed. Our grain markets have changed dramatically throughout the world, so we have to position commodities where we can best do that.

In 1967, when that act was put into place, the government of the day established the subsidy for grain and flour shipments moving for export at and east of Buffalo, New York. I sometimes wonder how well all of us understand when that was done and why it was done. Maybe my hon. colleague was here when that happened. I do not know what year he came to the House, but quite possibly he was here at that time.

The objective was to preserve jobs by encouraging the use of Canadian rail grain handling and port facilities to export Canadian grain and flour instead of shipping via the U.S. eastern seaboard ports. The At and East rail rates were frozen at the levels in effect in 1960 for grain and in 1966 for flour. The program applied to grain and flour moving from Georgian Bay, Lake Huron, Lake Ontario and the Upper St. Lawrence to the Lower St. Lawrence and maritime ports for export.

At the time the program was put in place, Canada's biggest markets for grain and flour were in Europe. Nobody can argue with that because at that time that is where the markets were. For instance, in the 1967-68 crop year, the United Kingdom was our biggest market, importing 1.8 million tonnes of wheat and flour. Canada exported 4.6 million tonnes of wheat and flour or 50 per cent of our total exports to Europe that year, compared to 3.1 million tonnes or 35 per cent to Asia.

That was 23 years ago and a lot has changed since then. Our principal grain markets are now in the Asian Pacific Rim. In 1988-89 Canada exported 4.4 million tonnes of wheat and flour, 25 per cent of our total exports, to Europe and 6.7 million tonnes or 38 per cent to Asia.

With that shift in markets, there has also been a shift in transportation patterns. More of our exports now move through the west coast and competition from U.S. ports is no longer considered a threat to east coast ports.

This subsidy is no longer necessary to keep Canadian grain moving through Canadian ports. The majority of the program stakeholders have recognized the subsidy is not cost effective nor needed to keep grain moving through Canadian facilities. They have expressed a willingness to explore possible alternatives.

The At and East only encouraged the use of high cost transport routes instead of cheaper routes dictated by the marketplace. For example, Ontario grain was shipped backward, or west, in order to transit from Georgian Bay ports and qualify for the subsidy. It also encouraged extra handling and storage at these ports. We do not have the luxury of using money to do those things. We have to be very responsible in how we spend our moneys. We have to change to alternate programs. The subsidy cost the federal government between $21 million and $48 million in the 1980s.

In 1988, 655,348 tonnes of export grain and 201,677 tonnes of export flour moved under the At and East subsidy. Over 95 per cent of the exports went through Halifax and Saint John. The subsidy for that one year was $32 million.

Export grain moved by the program represented almost the entire volume of grain handled at the port of Saint John and about 60 per cent of the volume at Halifax.

The elimination of the program was announced in the budget in April, 1989, effective July 15 of that same year. Shipments in transit, as of July 15, were eligible for the subsidy if they were exported by January 31, 1990.

As a result of the termination of the program, the Halifax elevator has lost some of the grain it previously handled and the Saint John elevator has since closed.

From the point of view of the agrifood industry, the effects have been minimal. The Halifax elevator provides an important level of competition to rail for the shipment of feed grains into the region. This competition is estimated to save about $10 per tonne on feed grain transportation costs. The storage capacity of the elevator also ensures that there is an adequate supply of feed grain in the region at all times.

This has not changed. The Halifax elevator continues to serve the livestock, feed and flour industries. The Saint John elevator, which has closed, had been almost exclusively handling export grain from outside the region. As a result, its closure has had a minimal impact on the Atlantic agrifood sector.

The At and East program has been under review for a number of years. It is generally recognized that it was not cost-effective. In 1984 the program was assessed by the Canadian Transport Commission, and the Commission found that in the period from 1971 to 1981 the grain component of the subsidy created approximately 330 jobs, at an average cost of $86,780—and that is in 1981 dollars. In 1985, the Nielsen task force recommended termination of the program as a means of expenditure reduction. Since the Nielsen task force report, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, known as APT, has made a number of proposals mainly intended to maintain economic activity in the Atlantic provinces.

Last May the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds announced that a study of the viability of the Atlantic elevators would be conducted under Agriculture Canada's Grains 2000 program. The Grains 2000 program is operated out of the National Grains Bureau in Winnipeg, and it was chosen specifically because it was designed to allow industry participation in its projects. Industry has participated fully in this study. A consultant was chosen and a 24-member steering committee representing agriculture and transportation interests in the Atlantic region was chosen to guide the consultant's work.

The consultant selected was based in Halifax and did the study in conjunction with other consultants based in New Brunswick. The consultant met with the steering committee several times and also met with other industry groups in the region. He also examined proposals such as those submitted by the APTC and the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Corporation.

The study concludes that the Halifax grain elevator is viable in the short term and can be made viable in the long term for much less than the cost of the At and East program. The report suggests that Halifax can become viable by equalizing water and grain freight rates between Halifax and the St. Lawrence ports based on a payment of about $3 per tonne on an addition of 100,000 to 200,000 tonnes of grain. The cost of implementing this recommendation would be between $300,000 to $600,000 per year.

The Saint John elevator has unique needs, and to approach long-term viability it would require a marine off-loading lake as well as additional storage capacity to accommodate an increased level of throughput. In addition, assistance of over $1 million per year would be required from the federal government to equalize water freight rates between the Saint John and St. Lawrence ports.

The study also examined the potential for a seaport elevator on Prince Edward Island. The study concluded that the volume of grain moving to and from that province is not sufficient to justify a single-use facility at this time.

The report recommended that Transport Canada consider replacing the potato handling facility at Summerside with a multi-commodity facility.

The ministers now have the Grains 2000 report and are prepared to act on it. The government understands that the viability of the Halifax elevator is important to the local flour milling industry. The government also recognizes its importance to livestock producers and understands that the removal and the termination of the At and East has reduced the volume of grain moving through the port. For livestock and feed industries, Halifax represents a competitive alternative to rail for shipping feed grain into the maritime provinces.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona) moved that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (ending development and exportation of prescribed items and substances) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my hope for this bill, Bill C-204, is that it might become the vehicle for a long overdue debate in this country about Canada's commitment to, and involvement in, the nuclear fuel cycle and all which that entails, from uranium mining through to waste disposal.

It is a debate which, when I was elected in 1979 seemed about to occur. The new Progressive Conservative government elected on May 22, 1979, was promising a parliamentary inquiry into nuclear energy. The motive for the inquiry was mixed.

The nuclear industry in Canada was a creation of successive Liberal governments. The Conservatives were open to an inquiry which, as well as raising fundamental questions as some had in mind, would uncover Liberal sins, the greatest of which, for some, was the failure to more successfully market Canadian reactors.

In any event, the government fell and with the return of the Liberals it was business as usual for government and the nuclear industry. All attempts to get any kind of public debate or input were stymied.

For instance, I tried in 1980 to get the then energy minister, Marc Lalonde, to hold hearings on the proposal to build the underground research laboratory at Lac du Bonnet, Manitoba, but to no avail. I also introduced a private members' bill at that time which called for a moratorium, an inquiry and a referendum on nuclear power. It was debated for an hour and then disappeared into history, as almost all private members' bills did at that time.

Since then, we have had the reform of private members' business which permits some private members' bills to be chosen as votable, a designation which provides for longer debates and a vote. This has meant on occasion that bills which would only have been debated once and forgotten have actually become law, because MPs have seen fit to give a bill their support freed from the discipline of government business.

One such bill is former Bill C-204, sponsored by the former member for Broadview—Greenwood, Lynn McDonald, who I might say is also involved in the life of this bill as a leader in the campaign for nuclear phase-out. Obviously, my hopes for this bill are that it, too, might become law.

Having said that, I appeal at this point to MPs on all sides of the nuclear issue to support this bill at second reading so that it can be sent to a committee and become the context for a much needed debate.

Returning to the history of non-debate which I was recounting before, all we got from the Liberals between 1980 and 1984 was an internal departmental review which not surprisingly concluded that everything was all right.

There was some hope that the Conservatives in 1984 might return to their 1979 policy of having an inquiry, but this was not to be. Now we have the current minister of energy, the hon. member for Provencher, making speeches all over the place about the importance of nuclear power to Canada's energy future.

Just today, the minister of energy, speaking to a meeting of the Canadian Nuclear Association in Saskatoon, made an offer of federal money to the province of Saskatchewan to help bring a nuclear reactor to Saskatchewan. This is a classic case of one government with absolutely no mandate negotiating with another government with absolutely no mandate on anything, needless to say no mandate with respect to choosing to locate a nuclear reactor in that province.

Where does this strange commitment come from on the part of the minister of energy and on the part of the government as a whole? It is not from any visible, parliamentary, political or public process, that is for sure. We have had committees which looked at isolated aspects of the entire nuclear issue thanks to the freedom given to committees to study what they want.

A committee looked at food irradiation, for example, and recommended against it. The then minister of health ignored its recommendations. Who was the minister of health at that time? The member for Provencher, who is now the minister of energy and chief promoter of the nuclear option.

Another committee looked at high level radioactive waste disposal, producing a report called The Eleventh Hour, which made a number of good recommendations, most of which have been ignored by the current government. Is it just a coincidence that the research going on into high level radioactive waste disposal, not to mention the entire Whiteshell Nuclear Research establishment, is located in the riding of who? The hon. member for Provencher, who when he was the minister of health, systematically withheld information available in his department about radiation levels in Canada after the accident at Chernobyl.

I do not want to dwell too much on the hon. member for Provencher. He is simply an archetype of those whose minds are captive to the mindset of the nuclear industry, with a dash of constituency politics thrown in for good measure.

Of course, now the minister of energy and the nuclear industry have discovered the environment, particularly the greenhouse effect. Those who for years vacillated between heaping scorn on environmentalists or ignoring them now purport to have been Greenpeacers in disguise all these years and offer to lead the planet away from the dangers of greenhouse gases into the benign and beckoning embrace of increased reliance on nuclear generated electricity.

We recently had a unanimous report in this House from a committee that looked at the issue of the greenhouse effect for 18 months. That unanimous report made no recommendation whatsoever that nuclear energy ought to be regarded as Canada's response to the greenhouse effect. Yet, we have the hon. member for Provencher, the minister of energy—and I read his speeches faithfully as they come across my desk—saying time after time after time that nuclear energy is the answer to the greenhouse effect. Once again he is ignoring the unanimous views of a committee of this House as he did before with respect to food irradiation. If this is parliamentary reform, if this is giving hon. members more input into government policy, then I am truly mystified as to what the government might mean by its rhetoric.

Not surprisingly, I find the greenhouse strategy of the nuclear industry to be reprehensible and wrong, particularly when it manifests itself in the TV ads by the Canadian Nuclear Association, an association whose major members are taxpayer funded organizations like AECL. In the absence of any real debate and/or decision by Parliament, why should public money be channelled into advocating only one side of the issue? Let us have a good debate. Let us pass this bill on second reading. Let us get it into committee and let us have a committee process in which all sides and all aspects of the debate can be aired and heard, including the issue of whether the nuclear option is the answer to the greenhouse effect.

Otherwise, if the government and/or its members defeat this bill and prevent such a process, perhaps they should provide the Campaign for Nuclear Phase-out or Energy Probe or the Concerned Citizens of Manitoba or various other environmental groups with the funds to design and broadcast ads, putting the other side of the case that is now being made on TV by the Canadian Nuclear Association.

In the time I have left, I would like to enter into the substance of the debate and give an account of why my own view is that we should discontinue the nuclear option, a view which I have held since the early 1970s when I first became active in anti-nuclear politics, long before I got to this place.

At the root of my position on this issue is not some sort of Luddite, negative reaction in principle to new technologies or progress.

My life is full of, and dependent upon, a variety of new technologies, many of which I quite enjoy and which I think greatly increase our quality of life. At the root of my opposition to the nuclear option is the quite rational judgment, which is therefore debatable, that the risk involved in nuclear energy is not acceptable, especially when we have other choices. The problem with a nuclear reactor is that when something goes wrong it really goes wrong and all the years of safe operation, all the years of pious assurances, all the years of technological hubris, are to quote an old hymn "like an evening gone". The damage, the disruption and the other negative consequences last for lifetimes.

It is, as it has been called, an unforgiving technology, a Promethean bargain, that has only tragedy as its last result however long that result may take to occur. I have seen such consequences with my own eyes in Ukraine on the way into Kiev from the airport where older single family neighbourhoods are being bulldozed in order to facilitate the construction of high-rise apartments to house the some two and a half million people who have had to be relocated or evacuated as a result of the accident at Chernobyl.

I know that the reactor at Chernobyl is not identical to Candu reactors. I know that our system is better. I know that human error was involved at Chernobyl, but unless we are being asked to believe that our system is completely and utterly fail-safe and our people without capability for error then we have to ask ourselves whether the prospect of having to evacuate Toronto and environs, however improbable, is a risk worth taking when there are other choices.

I say that it is an unacceptable risk needlessly perpetrated by an over-all commitment to an energy policy dictated by the institutional self-interest of the energy supply industry in this country. Within this the most glaring institutional conflict of interest is the way in which AECL is asked to both market and make judgments that could affect the marketing of nuclear reactors.

A good example of this is AECL's involvement in high-level radioactive waste disposal. Being able to say that the waste disposal problem has been solved is crucial to the successful marketing of reactors abroad. For that very reason it should not be AECL that primarily determines the acceptability of disposal options. It should not be the institution which depends on a solution being perceived to have been reached and which is responsible for the judgment about whether that solution has indeed been found.

An even better example of this institutional self-interest is the way in which AECL at the Romanian reactor site in Cernavoda managed to turn a blind eye for years to the fact that it was a forced labour camp to which people were being conscripted to work, as well as to many other things in terms of structural flaws, et cetera, in the work being done there. AECL turned a blind eye in order not to damage the prospect of further reactor sales abroad.

In any event, the rejection of risk because of the magnitude of the consequences rather than the probability of the consequences is an ordinary human judgment that we all make all the time. This is what many Canadians are doing in their rejection of nuclear power. Indeed, this is what the nuclear industry itself seems to be doing by insisting on things like the nuclear liability act which exempted it from any meaningful liability in the event of the kinds of accidents it keeps telling the Canadian public are so improbable. If these accidents are so improbable, why has the nuclear industry sought and received and now seeks to maintain this kind of protection from the consequences of accidents that it says itself are improbable? It is because it has made the same kind of ordinary rational judgment that the magnitude of the consequences make nuclear power a special case. That is what those of us who are against nuclear power are saying.

As for uranium mining and waste disposal, these for me are classic examples of inter-generational moral issues. We need to ask ourselves tough questions about whether we really have the right to bequeath to subsequent generations a world full of uranium tailings and lethal waste, not to mention the aboriginal justice issues raised by uranium mining itself in northern Saskatchewan for example.

Finally, there is the link between nuclear power and nuclear weapons which, in the final analysis, is the genesis of the special mystique attached to the nuclear industry in Canada and elsewhere ever since the Manhattan Project and the development of the atomic bomb. It is this link to the ultimate evil of planetary destruction which has provided the nuclear industry with a unique immunity from political accountability and authentic debate because it has its origins as a strategy for diverting public attention away from atoms for war to atoms for peace.

Nuclear power has been protected for years because it is the means by which nuclear technology for the purposes of global death has been morally and politically laundered. Even the Brundtland commission fudged on this issue, which is an example of the power of this issue and its relationship to matters of national security and nuclear weaponry.

In July 1986, following the Chernobyl nuclear disaster, the federal NDP caucus launched its own public inquiry into all aspects of the nuclear fuel cycle in Canada. The inquiry was co-chaired by myself, as NDP environment critic at that time, and the former member for Vancouver-Kingsway, Ian Waddell, who was NDP energy critic at that time. We held hearings across Canada, received numerous briefs and presentations and conducted additional research into a variety of issues. No report was ever published because of a shuffle in critic portfolios that took both of us into other areas of concern before it was completed.

I would like, at this time, to share what I think were some of the major conclusions that were emerging from that process, all of which are in keeping with the spirit and substance of this bill.

One, the nuclear fuel chain from uranium mining to high level waste management poses unacceptable hazards to human health and the environment.

Two, nuclear power and nuclear arms are inextricably linked.

Three, nuclear power is unnecessary to meet Canadian energy needs. There are cheaper alternatives, notably demand reduction through improved energy efficiency.

Four, the Canadian nuclear industry has been a drain on the public purse. Alternative investments could create more long-term jobs and more balanced economic development.

Five, Canada's involvement in the production, manufacture, sale and use of nuclear materials and technology for all but medical purposes should be phased out.

Six, such a phase-out should be seen not in negative terms but as an opportunity to revitalize and retool the Canadian economy by reducing costly energy over-consumption in favour of a much more efficient energy use.

We could finally have an energy policy that reflected more than the narrow self-interest of the energy supply industry, an industry which, far from being interested in sustainable growth, is still committed to the infinite growth in a finite world that the Club of Rome warned us about 20 years ago.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are indicating I have very little time left. I wonder if I could ask the indulgence of the House to just finish my remarks.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: Seven, the Nuclear Liability Act should be repealed and nuclear designers, suppliers and operators should bear full responsibility for any damage which may be caused by nuclear reactors and other nuclear facilities.

Eight, operating nuclear reactors and other nuclear facilities should be required to implement the best practicable technology for reducing risk and radiation exposure.

Nine, enforceable authorized limits for radiation exposure should be established for workers and the public from each nuclear facility, including both individual and collective limits.

Ten, the Canadian government should demand a shutdown of U.S. nuclear facilities which threaten Canadian lives and communities, including Perry, Fermi II and the Hartford Nuclear Reactor in Washington pending a public review of the facilities in consultation with Canadian nuclear regulatory officials.

Eleven, a reciprocal agreement with the U.S. should be established for continuous monitoring of all transboundary nuclear hazards. The IJC could provide a suitable mechanism for administering such an agreement.

Twelve, all aspects of visits to Canadian waters of nuclear powered and nuclear weapons capable vessels should be the object of a separate inquiry done in consultation with effective municipal and provincial governments as suggested by Gretchen Brewin, Mayor of Victoria, in 1986. In the meantime, until such inquiry reports, a moratorium on such visits should be in effect.

Thirteen—and I will be winding up soon—further construction of nuclear reactors should be halted in order to pursue other energy alternatives and in so doing to also minimize the accumulation of even more high-level radioactive waste.

Fourteen, there should be a permanent and legally enforceable ban on net imports of nuclear waste from other countries.

Fifteen, there should be a ban on reprocessing of waste from Canada and from other countries and an end to research in this technology by AECL and other government supported bodies.

Sixteen, responsibility for waste management should be removed from AECL and given to an independent commission reporting to the Department of the Environment with full public participation at every stage of the decision-making process and ample funding for the development of independent technical expertise.

Seventeen, there should be a legally enforceable guarantee that Manitoba and other non-nuclear provinces will not be required to host a nuclear waste facility.

Eighteen, waste generators should be required to bear full costs of high level waste management, including intervener funding, hearings, research by Environment Canada and others, compensation for host communities and liability insurance for waste sites, et cetera. Let the real costs of the nuclear product be seen and felt in the marketplace. I say this to my friends on the other side who are great fans of the marketplace.

Nineteen, Canada should be pushing for a change in the terms of reference.

Mr. Kilgour: With great respect, there are a number of people who want to speak in this debate. I hope he will not speak for more than another few seconds.

Mr. Blaikie: Nineteen, Canada should be pushing for a change in the terms of reference of the International Atomic Energy Agency so that it is no longer responsible for promoting nuclear power as well as preventing its misuse for military purposes. The IAEA's commitment to nuclear power has damaged its ability to report objectively on nuclear accidents.

A full accounting of all forms of public subsidy and support to nuclear power should be published, and a study of the impact of anticipated job losses in the nuclear industry should be conducted with a view to devising strategies for a transition to a post-nuclear energy economy.

Finally, I say to those who work in the nuclear industry that it should not be thought that there will be no more jobs in the nuclear industry if there were to be a nuclear phase-out. There will be jobs for decades to come in decommissioning nuclear reactors, in figuring out what to do with all the high-level radioactive waste that we have to deal with already. All that a nuclear phase-out would do would be to turn the attention of the best minds in the nuclear industry to how to get ourselves out of this mess that we are in rather than how to get ourselves even deeper into the mess that we are already in.

I am sorry that my time has expired, and I am sorry that I may have treaded upon the indulgence of the House. I had even more to say, but I am anxious to hear what others have to say.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate with some serious concern about the comments I have heard. Perhaps I will just refer to two very brief ones from the hon. member that I find interesting.

The hon. member talks about the government of which I am a member having no mandate to talk to another government in Saskatchewan, which he again says has no mandate. You have to understand that we are talking about a government that has a majority in this House talking to another government that has a majority in another House, and who is accusing us of not having a mandate? A person from a party which represents 22 per cent of the votes in Canada, which represents some very few seats in this House. I do not know who has the mandate and who does not.

I would suggest to the hon. member that he ought to look at who has the mandate and who has the right to make decisions on behalf of this country.

The other issue that I find rather exceptional in his comments is this. He says that we ought to be concerned about generational issues, that we ought not leave to our children and our grandchildren, et cetera, some of the legacies that we have today. I wish that party would have that attitude when it comes to spending money. I wish they would be concerned about that every time they rise in this House and say spend, spend, spend and let other generations worry about it. But that is not what this debate is about.

This debate is about nuclear energy and the benefits of nuclear energy to Canada. I want members to understand what we are talking about here. First off, my riding has one of the longest, largest operational nuclear power plants in Canada, the Pickering nuclear generating station. It has in its capacity eight reactor units. Those reactor units provide approximately 20 per cent of the electricity that the province of Ontario consumes. So I have an interest, and I have a direct interest as a constituent and as a person who represents a constituency. That plant has operated without fail, without harm to any of its employees because of the fact that it is a nuclear plant since, I believe, 1964.

What do we have proposed here by this resolution? The resolution says that the Atomic Energy Control Board would refrain from licensing any nuclear power reactors starting in January, 1992, for 50 years. Fifty years we are talking about.

What would that do to Canada's economy and what impact would it have on the environment, short and long-term. I would like to talk about some of those, because there are some short-term impacts that would be rather dramatic to Canada, and particularly devastating to certain regions, including a region that I happen to represent. It is not just the riding of Ontario, but the province of Ontario.

Among the first victims would be the consumers living in the province that I live in and represent. Bill C-204, the one being proposed here, would prevent Ontario Hydro's Darlington nuclear power plant from having its last two reactors, reactor numbers three and four, licensed. The taxpayers of Ontario, the electricity consumers of Ontario, the NDP government of Ontario, which have invested $14 billion in building a new plant in Darlington, would be deprived by the NDP party of this House from commissioning and putting in place a reactor that will provide 10 per cent of the electricity to the province of Ontario.

It is amazing how they would stand for that. Even the NDP party of Ontario does not have the guts to do that kind of thing, yet these people over here in their glass houses sit there and say would it not be great to do so. Well, I find that rather unacceptable, particularly when these reactors are slated to come onstream in June and March of next year and the year following.

The inability to obtain operating licences for these two reactors would have a significant impact. There are some 935,000 customers in Ontario who would lose the benefits of access to this electricity that is needed a year and a year and a half from now.

Where do we go for it? I know where they would say we would go for it. They would just as soon we go to Ohio because there is no generating capacity in Ontario. We can go to Ohio and have them fire up their oil-fired generating plants so they can spew their acid rain over the province of Ontario and Quebec. That is what they prefer we do. What else would they prefer we do? Maybe go to northern Quebec and dam up a few more rivers and flood a few more terrains so that we can have the electricity. You cannot dam rivers in a year and a half, but that is what they would have us do. Or maybe it is because the member is from Winnipeg. He prefers to go to Winnipeg or the province of Manitoba and buy some electricity from one of their dams and rivers that they are talking about damming up.

Where is the NDP's concern over all those matters? I find it rather insignificant on its part that it would even address those other subjects. Immediately, a year and a half from now, it would throw away some $8 billion or $9 billion without any thought. But, then, that is the NDP, so I guess I should know better.

It goes on from there. There is another impact of this whole resolution. We recently sold a Candu-6 unit to Korea. Canada has been trying to export our technology, trying to export our jobs, trying to create increased technology. Kill that sale, make that sale die is what it is proposing in its resolution. If you kill that sale, you kill an awful lot of opportunities and jobs for Canadians.

What does it mean? Well, $400 million of economic activity in Canada and 28,000 person-years of employment lost. From the party that talks about trying to create jobs in this country, by this simple resolution 28,000 man-years of work are gone with the scratch of a pen. I cannot believe that it truly—well, I can, because that is its way of doing things. I just find that the whole concept the NDP is proposing carries on this process.

He says: "Pass this bill so that we can have a debate, so that we can take this to a committee and have a debate". Simply passing this bill would send the signal to those parts of the world that are looking at new reactors, new technology, that maybe Canada is having second thoughts, we ought not to look at Canadian reactors.

Imagine doing that to the Canadian industry. The NDP will do it. However, a government that I am a member of had better not because that is absolute folly.

Now, I will talk about our international reputation because it is a rather significant point. This Korean contract, if we cancel it, if we cancel any other potential sales or any interest,we must consider that so far the taxpayers of Canada have invested about $4.2 billion in creating this industry in Canada, $4.2 billion. With a stroke of a pen, the NDP would write it off. Amazing. That is NDP socialist philosophy—go ahead, write it off, don't worry about the impact. Another $4.2 billion gone.

An hon. member: Then they will print money.

Mr. Soetens: Then they will print money, as one of my colleagues says. That just goes on, and of course that is the immediate impact. Never mind the immediate environmental impact that it doesn't seem to want to talk about. I find the whole concept of what it is proposing to be absolutely ludicrous.

Just think about it in another perspective, though. The member says: "Don't worry, there won't be any loss of jobs because there will be all these jobs available to decommission the plants". Isn't that ludicrous. Isn't that absolutely ludicrous. First off, what do you do for electricity? He has not answered that question in his whole debate. What do you do for electricity while you are decommissioning these plants? What happens to the technology that is required to keep the Bruce nuclear reactor, the Pickering reactor, and the Darlington reactor running? Shut down the industry and you may find that without that ongoing technology, it just doesn't happen. I find it rather deplorable to hear the member say there will be lots of jobs available in shutting it down.

There is $30 billion worth of investment in Ontario—that is the province I represent—by Ontario taxpayers and energy consumers, and he says: "Write it off, shut it down".

The list goes on. It goes on further. Those are some of the short-term immediate impacts. There are others, and some of them relate to the economy and the environment, and the world's environment. They talk about that in their party. I know the NDP are really not serious on the environment, but it does talk about it.

We in Ontario have 17 reactors. There is one in New Brunswick and there is one in Quebec. I am talking about large electrical-generating reactors. They generate some 11,000 megawatts of power. That is an awful lot; 16 per cent of all the electricity generated in Canada, 44 per cent of all the electricity consumed in Ontario, 40 per cent of the electricity consumed in New Brunswick. Not small numbers, not by any stretch of the imagination, and in certain regions of Canada very expensive things to replace, and certainly items that are not replaceable instantly. This bill would prevent construction.

As have other speakers, I would like to wrap up with another minute or two if I could have consent of the House to do so. I realize my time is up but I would look to the House for that approval.

I think it is important that we cannot just do away with 50 years. That is what we are hearing, a moratorium for 50 years. It is important that we continue to generate electricity, that we continue to have the options available to us.

I have a lot to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the case has been well made by the proposer of the motion as to why this matter should go to a committee for a full-fledged debate on the matter.

I understand that this matter will stop at six o'clock p.m. and it will come up again in the fall for a continuation of this debate so that how the Liberal Party will vote is not to be determined by what is going to be basically a pro-nuclear speech here.

We have people on all sides of the issue, and we are not speaking with one voice. We are not monolithic.

To end the development and export of nuclear substances, nuclear reactors and atomic equipment and materials required to build nuclear reactors, which is ultimately the purpose of the bill as I think the member would admit, would mean a step backward in the economic development of Canada.

Regarding livelihoods of many Canadians and our international reputation, we have about 39 per cent of the world's uranium supply and have developed a very successful and comparatively safe nuclear industry in this country. Our industry sells about $1 billion worth of uranium to domestic and foreign electrical utilities annually.

For years, Canada has been the world's largest uranium exporting country. In 1984, we became the largest producer, surpassing the United States.

After a decade of very little growth in the Canadian nuclear power industry, the 1990s looked promising for future expansion. The international markets for safe nuclear power plants are showing strong signs of revival. AECL predicts that its sales will triple over the next four years to about $660 million from $191 million in this fiscal year.

The nuclear power plant sold to South Korea will inject $400 million into the Canadian economy, creating about 7,000 jobs over a four-year period. With growing concerns about acid rain and the greenhouse effect, the Canadian nuclear industry has seized the opportunity to promote a technology that does not emit large quantities of SO2 and CO2 into the atmosphere.

Uranium, as members know, is largely sold to fuel nuclear reactors for electricity generation. The use of nuclear energy for that purpose is forecast to increase from the present 15 per cent to 20 per cent by 2020.

The increase in demand for nuclear energy will result in an increasing demand for uranium and create economic opportunities for Saskatchewan, which possesses vast reserves of uranium. It supplies over 20 per cent of the uranium produced in the western world.

The alternatives to nuclear energy in source provinces are running out. There is little hydro potential in Alberta, Ontario, Saskatchewan or the Atlantic provinces. Saskatchewan must have a new generating capacity in the next four or five year, and the nuclear option is a viable one.

I am the first to agree that nuclear energy must be very critically assessed. Many future scenarios indicate that meeting energy needs and environmental demands without nuclear power will be difficult. Nothing is perfectly safe, and this must apply to nuclear electrical generation as well. The tragic catastrophe in 1986 at Chernobyl brought the issue to the minds of everybody in the world.

That incident prompted the International Atomic Energy Agency to introduce two new international conventions. I will not give the details because my time is very short. We signed both of those conventions.

The incident resulted from an incredible series of human errors, incompetence, arrogance and bureaucratic squabbling in a then totalitarian system. The list of violations is extensive. It hardly needs to be said that safety precautions were nonexistent at Chernobyl.

Unfortunately, everywhere else in the world the social and political fall-out from the Chernobyl accident seems to be as long lived as the radioactivity it spewed. It provided opponents of nuclear energy with fresh ammunition. It was a tragic aberration in the history of nuclear power.

The Chernobyl type design, and this cannot be stressed too strongly, is not used anywhere except in the Soviet Union and could not be licensed to operate in our country.

Proponents of nuclear power express confidence that a new age of commercial reactor-building is already at hand, thanks to various breakthroughs in nuclear power technology. Advanced reactor designs are safer than existing models and can be built faster and for less money. A number of reactors being developed in the U.S., such as General Electric's fast-breeder PRISM reactor, Rockwell's SAFR reactor and the Department of Energy's Modular High-Temperature Gas-cooled Reactor, for example, incorporate self-shutdown mechanisms which require no mechanical, electrical or human intervention.

It remains, as we all realize, to convince a very sceptical public—I was one myself but I think the facts are beginning to change my mind—that commercial nuclear power is more reliable than ever.

The main economic disadvantage of building nuclear generating plants is their capital intensity, which makes them extraordinarily expensive. For example, in mid-1990 Ontario Hydro announced that the final price tag for Darlington would be more than $12.7 billion. It remains unknown how much it would cost to decommission a nuclear power plant once it reaches the end of its life cycle.

Yet, once in operation, nuclear generating systems produce cheaper energy per unit than thermal generating ones.

Since the Chernobyl incident, the use of nuclear energy has continued to grow around the world. In 1986, 26 nations operated 396 nuclear energy plants, which provided 15.5 per cent of the world's supply of electric power. In 1990, 25 nations operated 424 nuclear energy plants, providing about 17 per cent of the world's electricity. The steady expansion of nuclear energy world-wide since Chernobyl vindicates the safety and benefits of western style nuclear energy plants. World-wide nuclear energy has displaced over 15 billion barrels of oil and saved $420 billion, I understand.

Our country relies on nuclear power for nearly 16 per cent of its electrical generation. Two new Candu reactors have been brought on line since the Chernobyl incident. In total, there are 20 Candu reactors operating in the country; 18 in Ontario and one each in New Brunswick and Quebec. Two others are, of course, under construction in Ontario. In 1989, four Candu reactors were included among the top 10 world reactors. The Point Lepreau station, located in New Brunswick, has been a world performance leader, producing power for more than 93 per cent of its eight-year life.

Now, what about other countries? In France, the number of nuclear energy plants increased from 49 in 1986 to 56 in 1990, supplying about 75 per cent of France's electricity, the equivalent of 68 million tons of oil. The French are proceeding with the development of a fast-breeder reactor, with the potential to deliver 50 times more energy from uranium than the standard water reactor.

In Sweden, the country that my friends in the New Democratic Party love to point at, I understand the government is moving away from its decision to phase out nuclear power by 2010. I understand that the Swedish government has concluded that it cannot afford to lose such a clean, low-cost source of electricity. In January 1991, the three political parties decided not to close two units in 1995 and 1996. Again to the member who proposed the motion, public opinion polls in Sweden showed last year that 75 per cent of the Swedish people believe nuclear energy will still be used after 2010.

Italy, which closed down its nuclear energy plants after Chernobyl, is now reconsidering since nuclear energy is the only valid alternative to the country's near total dependence on energy imports and oil.

What about Japan. A long-term government strategy calls for nuclear energy to supply 43 per cent of all electricity by 2010, up from 26 per cent today. To reach that goal 40 new reactors must be built.

There seem to be no insurmountable technical problems of solidifying wastes into chemically stable forms and disposing of them permanently, but political opposition has delayed the execution of specific projects in many countries. Waste disposal is therefore in hand only in the technical sense, but is well behind the schedule necessary for nuclear power to play an increasing role in the decades ahead.

Both the French and the Japanese convert their most toxic waste into a stable, glassy substance and store it in concrete bunkers at least several hundred metres below the ground. This is a temporary solution until experts determine where to dispose of the waste permanently.

There are obviously undesirable problems associated with the transportation of nuclear fuel and waste, as well as with maintenance or decommissioning of old plants at the end of their operating life. Where the equipment or building materials have become radioactive, the storage must be long-term and secure. Decommissioning costs escalate and the economics of the next generation of plants will become tougher.

However, the greenhouse effect is often a powerful argument for increasing the use of nuclear power if the safety and waste problems can be overcome.

I would ask the members: Is society better protected by dumping huge quantities of SO2, NOX or CO2 particulates and other contaminants into the atmosphere or by isolating relatively small quantities of radioactive waste?

A dispassionate view of the role of nuclear energy and global warming control was provided by a witness at the hearings of the Standing Committee on the Environment with impeccable environmental credentials, Dr. James Bruce. He said:

> Where the nuclear option looks to be a reasonable option from the economics of the situation, then I think it is probably better from the point of view of the world's atmosphere than to build a fossil fuel plant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time is over.

Mr. Kilgour: I could perhaps ask another favour, if I move more quickly, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly.

Mr. Kilgour: Thank you. I will skip a page-and-a-half, Mr. Speaker.

Nuclear power is different not only from fossil power but even from the solar option. Fossil fuels are sooner or later depletable, solar and nuclear are not. Unlike solar, the current status of the nuclear industry offers an infrastructure that would allow for the deployment of nuclear energy on a massive scale in the foreseeable future.

I would finally quote—well, I will not quote, I will end right there. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. There have been discussions among the three parties and I am sure you will find consent for the following motion:

> That, when no member rises to speak on debate on Tuesday, June 11, 1991, on the motion for the third reading of Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), the Speaker shall adjourn the debate; and
> That the resumed debate on such motion be called on Friday, June 14, 1991, with one speaker, for up to 10 minutes each, from each recognized party in the House, followed by the question being put on the motion and any requested recorded division being deferred to 3 p.m. on Tuesday, June 18, 1991.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to confirm that the words of the motion that indicate the Speaker is to adjourn the debate mean that at that time the House will proceed immediately with the late show. In other words, there will be no other item of business called and the late show will proceed whenever that magic moment arrives that no other member rises to speak, should that happen before 10 p.m.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I can confirm that even though we do have a rather extensive list that we could draw from, we will not call any further business and we will then immediately go to adjournment proceedings.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, things may have changed under the new rules, but when I used to have the position that the hon. parliamentary secretary has, I do not think we got up during private members' hour to do this. We did this at the end of the private members' hour debate, and I wonder why we are not doing that today, if I am correct in that hypothesis.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, once again to demonstrate our co-operation to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, we would concur with the intent of this particular motion. But if memory serves me correctly of our meeting this afternoon, this motion was to be brought forward later this evening when the debate on Bill C-11 would collapse, if in fact it did collapse. However, I accept the intent of the hon. member opposite and I presume that my colleagues to the left will consent to this particular motion to which we now give our consent.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am not here to dissent. I understand that discussions have been held. However I would ask that the time which this little intervention has taken not be taken away from private members' business and that the appropriate number of minutes be added so that we can continue past 6 p.m.

• (1750)

Mr. Cooper: Of course we would have no problem with that in the couple of minutes that this has taken in the normal time of Private Members' Business.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): What was just said is well noted. Does the House give unanimous consent for the request of the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader to talbe this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House heard the wording of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

The House resumed consideration on the motion of Mr. Blaikie (p. 1465)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity today to address the House on Bill C-204 put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

I would like to take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to look at the nuclear industry in the national as well as global context. Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada actively supports the availability of a wide range of electricity supply options, including fossil fuels and nuclear power, as well as the various renewable options, such as biomass, wind, and solar power.

Conservation will also play an important and growing part in the overall future of electricity generation. Indeed, nuclear-electric generation compares favourably with other sources in terms of its overall environmental impact and does not contribute to acid rain, nor the greenhouse effect.

In sustaining a strong and viable nuclear industry, the governement of Canada continues to support the development of the uranium mining industry, as it has done for more than forty years. For decades, Canada has been the world's leading exporter of uranium and has ranked second behind the United States in terms of uranium output.

In 1984, Canada replaced the U.S. as the Western world's leading producer, and now produces more than twice as much as its nearest competitor, and one-third of the world's output. Today, the uranium industry in Canada employs almost 3,000 people, and generates revenues of close to $1 billion annually. Roughly 85 per cent of the uranium produced in Canada is destined for export, mostly to the United States, Japan and Western Europe, where it is a major contributor to national energy programs.

Our uranium exports are critical to the electricity supply mix of our trading partners. For example, Mr. Speaker, how many realize that, in France, 70 per cent of the total electricity supply is nuclear-generated. In Belgium, the figure is 66 per cent, while in Sweden it is 47 per cent, in Switzerland 37 per cent, in Finland and Spain 36 per cent, in Japan 27 per cent, and in the United Kingdom and the United States about 20 per cent. These contributions are not insignificant, and Canada is a major source of fuel for many of these national programs.

In this latter context, Mr. Speaker, Canada's uranium producing industry is critical to our obligation under the Canada/U.S. Free Trade Agreement, which was implemented early in 1989. The FTA provides clear benefits to both Canada and the United States. It ensures that Canadian producers will have access to the U.S. market and that U.S. utilities will have access to Canadian uranium on competitive terms.

Uranium ranks sixth in terms of output value among Canada's metal commodities after copper, zinc, gold, nickel, and iron ore. However, it is much more important as an energy commodity. In 1987, Canada's uranium output was equivalent, in thermal energy terms, to the production of petroleum and natural gas combined, or almost four times Canada's production of coal. Canada has proven, untapped uranium resources which will ensure our dominant position in world markets well into the next century.

Like its competitors, however, Canada's uranium industry is currently facing an uncertain market, plagued by low and volatile spot prices, significant excess inventories and new sources of low-priced uranium from Eastern Europe.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed Bill would undermine the Canadian uranium and nuclear industries, resulting in the loss of thousands of jobs and millions of revenue dollars. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the time when the uranium mining industry deserves full support from governments, since uranium remains a highly valued energy resource for Canada and its principal trading partners.

Mr. Speaker, much of the increased concern about protecting the environment is focused on the uranium and nuclear industries. These concerns are shared by everyone who agrees that we should not pollute our natural environment. With regard to uranium mining, the government of Canada is confident that the monitoring processes instituted by both the federal and provincial regulatory agencies and the strict standards required by them has served to minimize environmental impacts and protect the health and safety of the mine workers and the public alike.

The uranium industry is one of the most highly regulated of all industrial activities. It should be pointed out that all Canadian uranium operations are classified as nuclear facilities. As such, they are controlled by the federal Atomic Energy Control Board (AECB) under the provisions of the Atomic Energy Control Act and the regulations derived from the Act.

The AECB issues licences for the operation of uranium mines only after ensuring that they will not have a significant effect on the health and safety of the mine workers and the public, and after reviewing measures designed to ensure adequate protection of the environment.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is committed to ensuring that the future development of uranium resources will not cause serious environmental impact. In April 1991, the AECB referred six proposals for new uranium mining projects in Saskatchewan for public review by an independent Panel pursuant to the federal government's Environmental Assessment and Review Process (EARP).

Officials of both the federal and Saskatchewan governmenents have successfully negotiated terms of reference for a joint federal/Saskatchewan Panel, which will ensure that the environmental, health, safety and socio-economic impacts of these developments will be fully evaluated.

I am confident that this review process will demonstrate that uranium mining can be conducted in a safe, and environmentally responsible manner. I am very pleased that the two levels of government have fully co-operated in initiating this joint review process.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, Canada exports uranium only to those countries that have made a commitment to the international community that they will not use the uranium, or its byproducts, for nuclear explosive purposes, and have signed a bilateral agreement with Canada to that effect.

The government of Canada remains firmly convinced that the non-proliferation precautions that have been put in place make it possible for canada to contribute effectively to the peaceful uses of nuclear power and the resulting worldwide benefits, while ensuring that no diversion for weapons purposes occurs. Canada's safeguards are among the most stringent in the world, and the government of Canada believes that the sale of uranium from Canada contributes to our national non-proliferation objectives.

Mr. Speaker, the emerging awareness of the advantages of nuclear power bodes well for its future, and in turn for Canada's uranium producing industry.

In August 1988, Canada's Parliamentary Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources released a report entitled Nuclear Energy—Unmasking the Mystery. In its report, the Committee stated its position very clearly, and I quote:

> "Maintaining the nuclear power option is vital to Canada's interests, as it is vital to the interests of society in general. There is a compelling case to be made in support of continued nuclear development, a case based upon the future inadequacy of conventional petroleum resources and upon the environmental degradation arising from burning coal in progressively greater quantities for electricity generation."

Mr. Speaker, it may be of interest to the Honourable Member for Winnipeg-Transcona to know that a November 1988 poll by Decima Research showed that eight out of ten Canadians feel that nuclear energy is a good or realistic choice for large-scale generation of electricity and that it will be an important future source of energy. This poll also revealed that six out of ten Canadians favoured nuclear energy as one of the ways to generate electricity.

So, in closing, Mr. Speaker, I will remind the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona of the importance of the Canadian uranium and nuclear industry as both a reliable and clean source of energy for the future. Although well-intentioned, the proposed bill makes no sense in the national and global context and should therefore not be passed.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would request that I be first on at the next sitting of the House on this particular bill.

We as Canadians have a great habit of creating something that is great for Canada and for the world, as we have with the Candu reactor and with nuclear energy. Over 50 per cent of the energy used in the province of Ontario is from nuclear energy.

As soon as we do this, there are Canadians who come forward and they want to destroy what other Canadians have created that is useful to this nation and to our competitiveness in the international market itself.

One of the great things we have going for us in this country is that we have energy. Nuclear energy is one of the cheaper forms. We would be paying about 20 per cent more for our hydro bills today if we had to pay from sources other than nuclear.

Take for example the Avro Arrow aircraft. We did that, and we destroyed it. We have to go outside our own country to find people who have confidence in our Canadian industry, in our Canadian creativity, in our Canadian scientific community.

When the Challenger space shuttle blew up in the air, they realized that it was the O ring that had caused it, that had let go. Immediately, the Americans and the international market realized that Canadians had the O ring in their Candu reactor and they never had an accident.

Let us talk about safety here. All this fear campaign about a great energy source we have in this country has got to stop. I would love a debate on it. I will fight for it any day of the week because it is one of the greatest creations of Canada.

Do not throw fear around about Chernobyl. The Russians built their energy plant first and their safety systems were non-existent. They did not build them until after the accident. In Canada, we build our safety systems first, and they are built to protect us from human error. That is why they are there. We go from there, and we put our nuclear reactor in place last of all.

I just want to give a simple example of some of the fear campaign that is going on, if I may. Daughter number one comes home and she says to her mother: "Mother, I have two offers of a job for the summer. I can work at the Darlington nuclear plant or I can work in the restaurant atop the CN Tower in Toronto". And mother says: "Oh, my goodness, I think you should go to the CN Tower restaurant", not knowing that that daughter working in the CN Tower restaurant in Toronto will get twice as much radiation as she will while working at the Darlington nuclear plant. Why? Because the safety devices are built into the Darlington nuclear plant, and the higher you go the more radiation you get. So wherever you go in Toronto, you will get more radiation in the CN Tower than any other place in Toronto.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will continue my debate later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to conclude my remarks. We were talking about the importance of the elevator at Halifax, which is the only facility available for storage of milling wheat in that area.

The government will demonstrate a support for the Atlantic livestock and flour milling industries by taking a leadership role in ensuring the Halifax elevator remains open. We are committed to ensuring that does happen. The government has examined various options to this effect, including the proposed equalization assistance contained in the Grains 2000 report. The government is monitoring the situation in Halifax and, if needed, is prepared to act quickly to ensure that the elevator facility continues to play an important role in the agrifood industry. The government is prepared to offer the Saint John elevator the same level of assistance as any program assistance offered to Halifax.

A number of other initiatives have been undertaken by the government to serve the interests of the Atlantic agrifood sector. Various initiatives have been put in place to help the region move toward self-sufficiency in feed grain production. We know how important it is to develop feed grain production there.

On December 14, 1989, the government announced the $6 million special Atlantic livestock initiative to provide temporary support to the Atlantic hog, beef, and sheep sectors over a period of three years.

Feed freight assistance rates were also recalculated in 1989 to take into account the storage component at the Halifax elevator. The feed freight assistance provides a fair equalization of feed grain prices with adjacent feed grain deficit areas. This is one of the programs being reviewed as part of the over-all agricultural policy review process.

Feed freight assistance has also been included in the over-all review of agriculture transportation policies being conducted as part of Growing Together, the agriculture policy review.

When the federal and provincial agriculture ministers met in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, in August 1989, they agreed to a review of transportation policies. They decided then that the feed freight assistance, the Western Grain Transportation Act, and minimum compensatory rates on canola products should be reviewed in the light of changing economic and market conditions. The discussion paper Growing Together highlighted four pillars of reform to guide this review. The pillars include market responsiveness, increased self-reliance, a recognition of regional diversity with a national approach, and environmental sustainability. These are all very important areas.

The transportation committee of the policy review examined options for changes in the implications of such options. It presented its report to the federal-provincial agriculture ministers' meeting in Moncton in August 1990.

Subsequently, federal and provincial officials prepared a framework paper on options for using the funds currently spent on feed freight assistance and the Western Grain Transportation Act. This paper was presented to ministers in Winnipeg in November and is issued along with the committee's report as a basis for consultations.

Agriculture Canada has worked very hard to put in place a grains and oil seeds safety net program that will help farmers throughout the country, including those in the Atlantic provinces. This program has two components, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan, or GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, or NISA. Together they provide farmers with predictable stabilization. This is probably the most comprehensive legislation that agriculture has ever had the opportunity of having in history. It is a very major piece of legislation and we feel it is a good process. The producers and stakeholders were all involved in developing that program and we feel it will be of great benefit and offer the predictability that is necessary for the long-term viability of agriculture.

Agriculture Canada is also taking a very active part in an industry-government review of the Atlantic Livestock Feed Strategy. A task group led by the Atlantic Farmers Council is examining all our programs to ensure that they contribute most effectively to the development of the Atlantic livestock sector. The task group is expected to submit a preliminary report for consideration by the federal and provincial agriculture ministers when they meet in Kananaskis in July of this year.

In conclusion, I would like to re-emphasize that this government has not forgotten the needs of agriculture producers in Atlantic Canada or, as a matter of fact, in any part of this great country.

We have been working with the provinces and with farm groups to develop new programs to better serve the industry.

We need to re-examine old programs that have been in place for years if we are going to achieve this. If we find the programs have outlived their usefulness, as At and East clearly has, we must take steps in the best interests of the industry and the country to adapt or remove them so that both farmers and the government can get better value for their money.

I was very pleased just a short time ago when there was an agreement in this House to see debate conclude on Friday and get on with this important piece of legislation.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary, who is very sincerely interested in agriculture, for his contribution. I was very glad that he mentioned in his remarks the study commissioned by the minister of grains and seeds, et cetera, et cetera, which is known, I understand, as the Grains 2000 Atlantic Port Study.

I know the parliamentary secretary himself is a very successful farmer, I think in a different area of grains. I do not know if it is all in peas or not, but it is in different ingredients. What I was hoping the parliamentary secretary might say and my question to him at this stage is this: he has read, I presume, the report of the Grains 2000 Atlantic Port Study. Is he aware that the report says that unless some more export grain is channelled through that elevator, it is jeopardized.

As a farmer in his own professional life, can he see Atlantic members involved with their farm constituencies sit idly by and let a subsidy program that has been here as long as the Crowsnest Pass—not quite because that was in 1966 and it was J. F. Pickersgill, I was in the House when he mentioned why this At and East was there to enhance the delivery of grain through the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

Forget about Saint John. It is gone and it is not fighting it, although it has lost the jobs. However, as a farmer, and not necessarily as the parliamentary secretary, if he had to put his produce into an elevator, that a 25-person steering committee that he is aware of, which is the Grains 2000 Study, said that unless it gets help it is dead and gone, would he sit idly by and let our government put this bill through without any real debate and without what we have talked about for two and a half to three years, admitting there are differences in trade patterns now, admitting there are differences in so many things in the world but admitting one thing that the parliamentary secretary did not admit, that for two and a half to three years the Departments of Agriculture, Transport, seeds, et cetera, et cetera, regional development have been trying to come up with a package to offset the loss of this $28 million to $40 million subsidy which in terms of seed money, as other people have said here today, produced more income, more taxes and less unemployment insurance and less welfare than the cancellation of this policy?

Would the parliamentary secretary sit idly by? What is his answer to my constituents who are the farmers in the Annapolis Valley who have listened for three or four years in good faith, waiting for offsets or some program to help take care of the cancellation. We all realize that subsidies in abstract are distorting, but they also are life-giving in certain situations. What is his answer to these farmers of my riding and to other good Canadians in Atlantic Canada if the recommendations of the Grains 2000 are not implemented? As I think the parliamentary secretary knows, there has not been one tittle of concrete movement or one concrete commitment to help fill the vacuum with the loss of the subsidy and put in some offsets. So what answer does the parliamentary secretary have to that?

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is asking me to speak as the parliamentary secretary and he is also asking me to speak as a farmer. I love to speak as both whenever I get the opportunity.

The hon. member has indicated the loss of $28 million to $42 million in the Atlantic region on the At and East program. I want to remind the hon. members that the majority of that money was used in central Canada as well as in the Atlantic region. To say that total loss took place in the Atlantic region is not correct because it happened in Ontario, and it also affected the farmers in my riding.

We do have elevators to ship out of and to receive there and we do have an inland terminal at Goderich which is quite capable of fully loading ocean vessels to full seaway depth.

An hon. member: And with navigation.

Mr. Cardiff: Yes, all those things are possible. We are also committed to spending tax dollars wisely and fairly. We have indicated that we will support the Halifax elevator every way we can and we are committed to doing that. We have offered the same options to the Saint John facility if it wishes to take up some of this.

We also want to support the livestock and feed grains industry in the Atlantic region. Further development of the production of grains there is very, very important because that is job creation as well and can probably produce, with the new varieties that are being promoted today, all kinds of opportunities in the Atlantic region for new grains and some oilseeds to be grown in those areas.

We are committed as well to working with agriculture to do that.

As I said, there are the two programs: the Atlantic Livestock Feed Initiative and the Special Atlantic Livestock Initiatives Program. We hope that we can and will continue to support agriculture across Canada, particularly in the Atlantic region.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, if someone else wanted to ask a question, I would appreciate the parliamentary secretary's answer.

I was here when J.W. Pickersgill gave a statement of why the whole At and East was there. When I get on, recognized by the Speaker later on in my speech, I am not going to give him too many facts and figures about the job loss and all that. It has been covered well by those who have spoken here on the debate today, but this is such a symbolic thing that I can tell you that in terms of Atlantic Canada, this is the cut of the Gordian knot to the producers close to the land.

I have a fundamental philosophy: the closer to the land you are the more basic you are, the closer you get to the cities and the concrete canyons and that is life, things become more difficult and more artificial.

An hon. member: Take it easy, Pat.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate that. I do not want to get personal. That is not my speech yet.

The parliamentary secretary, the member from Calgary Southwest, is a nice, interesting young man who has got a computer mind and an interesting competent ability, but when he led off this debate he said: "The bill now before the House seeks to eliminate a subsidy which has outlived its original purpose and has become a burden on the public purse." I want to ask the parliamentary secretary what the distinction is between the At and East subsidy and the Western Grain Transportation subsidy?

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I suppose they could be similar in certain ways, but we have to recognize that the markets we are supplying have changed considerably since this bill was put into place in 1967 and we recognize that.

In the first part of my speech, I gave the figures of what grain exports were to Europe at that time.

As the hon. member knows, since then we have developed major grain markets in Asia, China and in other parts. Because of other components that have come into this, the Export Enhancement Program of the United States and the programs of the European countries, many of those countries that were net importers of wheat now are exporters of wheat. All those things have changed. We have to find the best possible means of exporting our product. We have to compete in the world with what we are selling and we have to move it to a position of loading for shipment in the most economical way possible.

I believe we are being responsible in what we are doing in responding to that. I know for a fact that the withdrawal of the At and East program does not affect the people and the producers in the province of Ontario to the extent that it does in the Atlantic regions. As I said before, we are going to work with those people, with the provincial governments and with the producers to make sure that they are compensated in some way that we can work with them so that they will have a viable and good future in agriculture.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to discuss in some detail the bill before the House, Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act, insofar as it applies to grains and flour subsidies.

I must confess that I am a little bit amazed to be speaking in this House again on this very bill. At one time in the last session it died on the Order Paper.

I was sitting in my home in Thunder Bay watching television, watching the very capable and eloquent delivery on the folly of this bill by my colleague and good friend from Gander—Grand Falls. He expounded the history of the At and East bill from the development in this House in 1956 onward and it was very interesting to me.

The bill is brought on again with some surprise. I thought at one time that the government had reconsidered its position and decided not to bring forward this legislation in this session, but obviously without much luck. Here we are debating it at third reading.

There is a certain amount of offensiveness in the way this legislation is brought on. Two years ago the government first brought forward its plan to do away with the At and East rates and the effects of this legislation were immediately implemented by an Order in Council. What we are doing today is in effect debating a bill which has already been operative for the last two years. We are doing some housecleaning on behalf of the government in order to implement the proper legislation which already has been operative for the last two years.

I, like some of my colleagues, have only been here for two or three years, but it has always been my understanding that any legislation in order to be operative must be passed and debated in this House, and then implemented if it is passed. How the procedure can implement the workings of this bill to cut out those subsidies and then two years later bring before us the bill for debate leaves me somewhat dumbfounded with respect to the procedures within this House.

I am told by my colleagues who have been here for a long time that the implementation of this bill was done by an Order in Council and that is the way this government has been operating in this House since 1988. That along with the closure motions and so on has taken the responsibility of government away from the people and those of us who are elected to come here, hoping to do a job. What it has done has really been an administrative form of government without due respect and due regard to the parliamentary process. I take great exception in the way this is being done.

What I will do, since it has been implemented, is talk in some detail on some historical perspectives of the bill before the House, but as I stated it really does not matter because it has been effective for the last two years.

The subsidy in question was known as the At and East rates. It really means that from Buffalo in the east to the eastern coast, a program was in effect since the mid-1960s which maintained a fixed rate level for the movement of grain and flour via rail to eastern Canada mainly for export.

Because the rail rates at that time were frozen, the cost of moving this grain from all the ports in the southern part of the Great Lakes to other areas such as Halifax and Saint John was a subsidy which was paid to the railways for the movement of this grain. It was a subsidy, as my colleague behind me stated in the Question Period, which amounted to $40 million.

On this side of the House, we are not going to say that $40 million is not a lot of money, but $40 million when you talk about the grain shipments in Canada and the subsidies given to grain shipments is not a great deal of money when you consider that we spend $3.5 billion in this country on the movement of grain and on the subsidies of grain.

The At and East program evolved in response to a 1959 rate reduction by U.S. railways for grain movement. Historically the purpose of the legislation was to be competitive in the eastern part of this country with the U.S. farmers who were also producing the same commodity and offering it for sale to the same customers to whom we were trying to sell this product.

Since that time, we have been exposed to the round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We just cannot seem to come to grips with, or arrive at any solution or agreement in principle to, the subsidies offered to the producers of grain, not only in Canada and in the United States but offered also to our friends in the European Community.

Since that time, we have been faced with what is a common term in this House but which is growing in importance; what the Americans are doing under their Export Enhancement Program. The Export Enhancement Program as applied to the grains in this country is devastating our grain industry.

Speaking generally with respect to the growing of grain and the movement of grain, the system at one time served all Canadians very well. It served the grain producers, those who grew the product on their farms. It served the mills. It served the flour exporters, the shipping companies and the railways. It served the elevator workers in Thunder Bay, the area I represent, and in British Columbia and Prince Rupert.

I refer always to the same phrase we so often hear: the movement of grain in this country is 10 per cent protein and 90 per cent politics. In 1985, when this government took over, we saw a dwindling of the grain movement coming out of the west into the port of Thunder Bay and down to the St. Lawrence seaway where we at one time enjoyed over 50 per cent of that export market. It dwindled to less than 35 per cent.

The drought in 1988 and the Export Enhancement Program—I talked about how the grain industry is subsidized in the United States—put all grain producers in this country and those involved in the grain industry in a great deal of jeopardy.

The farmers themselves have been placed in some difficulty. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, and I do not want to embarrass him by these figures, at the agricultural committee this morning said that in 1983 the price of a bushel of grain was $5.80. These are the problems that we find in the grain industry today.

In 1983, the price of a bushel of grain was $5.80.

In 1991 the price of a bushel of grain is $2.75. It just so happens that in 1983 there was a different government, represented by this side of the House, when the price was $5.80. In the seven intervening years, through the mismanagement of the grain policies in this country, the price of a bushel of grain was dropped by almost half, to $2.75.

I think when we talk about the grain industry and the transportation of grain, all of the ports and all of the cities on the St. Lawrence seaway have been hampered by this problem that has been imposed by this government. All of the ports from Thunder Bay right through to Halifax, Saint John, down river ports beyond Montreal and east of Montreal have suffered because of this government's lack of concern and, I think, complete lack of knowledge of what the grain industry is all about.

The grain industry is not just a matter of growing grain and selling it. It is a very, very intricate business that relies on timing from the time it is harvested on the prairies to the time it hits the grain cars and from the grain cars to the boats. All of that must be integrated with the sale of the commodity to our friends, usually in the eastern countries of Europe. So it is a very complicated business that needs tremendous involvement and the involvement of a government which understands and empathizes with the problems, not only of the communities, but of the people who are involved with growing this product.

At one time our only competition was in the United States. However, now we see with the advent in 1992 of the European Common Market that that may be the greatest competition we are going to have in the grain business in the world. It will be coming not from the United States, but from the European Common Market, which has in place a subsidy that really causes a serious dilemma in the Canadian wheat business.

In addition to the dilemma of the farmers and the cities involved on the St. Lawrence seaway, in the last seven years, the shippers have been having a serious problem. I can remember when there were 160 to 170 bottoms or boats that would carry that grain from the port of Thunder Bay down to the down river ports beyond Montreal. Now we are down to something like 70 or 75 bottoms or ships that are available to carry that grain down. That number is lessening because we do not use it and we do not take this business and use it for the nine months of the year. What is happening is that those who are involved with shipping grain to the down river ports are saying they just cannot afford to operate those ships.

It is another dilemma we find ourselves in. I warn this government that we are going to have bumper crops in the future and we are going to have to export this grain and we are going to have to use the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway. Unfortunately, because of its actions, when it comes time to use that capacity of 22 million tonnes in Thunder Bay, and those boats that are on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway, they will not be available. They will either have been sold to other countries or torn up for scrap. That magnificent facility that we have on the St. Lawrence seaway, starting from the port of Thunder Bay, will no longer be. It has been an operative organization for so many years. It is an organization that we will not be able to replace in this country. That is one of the dilemmas because of the transportation policies of this government.

One of the other areas that causes us problems is the glut of wheat on the market. We all know what has happened with the amount of grain that we have not been able to sell, or sometimes have had to sell at distressed prices brought on by the trade agreement, brought on by the lower prices for Canadian product. The low prices, again, cause such a dilemma for our Canadian producers.

The elevator workers in this country are in a terrible state. I just see on television—

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

I must say I have not done this for a long, long time, since I was in opposition, but I am now in this rarefied situation between government and opposition and I do not see a quorum in the House.

Also, I do not see a minister of the Crown in the House and that to me is one of the fundamental things we are dealing with, the Crown business, the taxpayer business, the pocketbooks of the Canadians and we do not have any—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: The quorum has now been restored.

Mr. Ricard: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laval–Ouest, on a point of order.

Mr. Ricard: Madam Speaker, this is the second time today members have asked for a quorum count. I have been here for seven years, and whenever a member has something interesting to say, he always has an audience. I wonder why some members rise in the House to ask for a quorum count, probably because they—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I don't think the hon. member would wish to comment in this way on the speeches of his colleagues. I think the best thing to do at this point is to resume debate with the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: The same point of order. Just to elucidate for my hon. friend, it was not the man who was making the discourse who called the quorum. I must say I thought he was making such a good speech there should be other members in to hear him. I called the quorum.

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, let me thank my colleague from Annapolis Valley, a former chairman of the transportation committee and a very fine chairman.

Getting back to the serious issue of the grain industry and the farming community of this country, what we are seeing is the over-all aspects of Canadian transportation and we see what happens to a country and to a government which operates without a policy on national transportation issues.

A country the size of Canada without a national transportation policy suffers and the farmers suffer and those involved in transportation suffer and the transportation industry suffers when there is no policy that we can follow. The country not only suffers, it bleeds and in some instances such as we are seeing today it haemorrhages and we cannot stop the haemorrhaging.

The legislation we have before us is just another example. Last week in this House we talked about another transportation issue that involved the Aeronautics Act and the changes in the piecemeal legislation, and two weeks ago the legislation was before this House with respect to airport transfer of power. Those are just some of the issues that have been hitting this side of the Chamber in piecemeal fashion.

Let us look at what has happened in this country since 1984, lacking the transportation policy it so vitally needs. Just this week in the Ottawa paper, there was a magnificent three-part article by Mark Kennedy, Ten Steps to the Dryden Disaster. One of the crucial areas there was the lack of regulation within this country, and it had a great part in the disaster. Look what happened right here in Ottawa in the last few weeks with respect to deregulation of the trucking industry. Look at what is happening to all of our seniors in this country because they cannot get on a passenger rail service and fulfil their desires to travel across and see this country because we do not have passenger rail service any longer.

Then there is the failure of this government to recognize the St. Lawrence seaway as a viable transportation route in Canada; the lack of the federal government to support a national transportation policy that uses national highways, to take an obligation to provide for the Trans-Canada Highway, which right now borders on disaster. This is what affects Canadians and it makes us wonder what Canada is all about. Without transportation this country has no unity, and without unity we have no Canada.

What this country needs and what I implore this government to do is develop a national transportation policy that will benefit farmers, shippers and all those who are so adversely affected by what we see happening here today.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my friend the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, who was a very valuable and constructive member of the transportation committee, how he, as a member from central Canada, Thunder Bay, where a lot of these grain boats start, views the cancellation of admittedly a subsidy program that certainly benefited and was supposed to benefit the Atlantic Canadian ports, even though they are sometimes in competition with the Thunder Bay port.

Mr. Comuzzi: I thank my colleague from Annapolis Valley for that question. I will try to answer it as succinctly as possible. If we develop and operate under a national policy of transportation within this country, we must realize that we cannot just look at one area of the country and ask for its betterment at the expense of another area. When we develop and work by a policy, we have to look at Canada as a whole.

As I said, in the development of plans and procedures for the future that will take us into the 21st century with respect to rail transportation and the use of the St. Lawrence seaway, we should develop a policy that will enhance and ensure that the Great Lakes shipping fleets will stay in place and that we are able to utilize the benefits of the St. Lawrence seaway and the grain elevator systems.

I think of an article we had this past week in the Thunder Bay newspaper about Herbie Danaher, the business agent for all of the elevator workers. It gave his trials and tribulations as the business agent for that union and what he has had to do over the years. At one time we had 1,800 workers and now we have 800 workers on the waterfront. The article tells how he has had to cope with those problems and deal with those people who had such a knowledge of the shipment of grain.

Those are the areas that cause great concern to any member of Parliament that is involved in this very vital industry. We are not operating in a system; we are not operating with an over-all plan that enhances all of the communities and all of the regions of this country.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for that answer. He answered my next supplementary in part by talking about a national transportation system and trying to have a balanced plan enhancing all the different parts of the plan.

I would like again to ask my hon. friend to try to give his perspective to members of the government and to Canadians who may just happen to have stumbled upon this debate through television.

I know this member as a very fair individual, notwithstanding that he is from central Canada and we from the east sometimes feel central Canada tariff policies leave much to be desired. However, I am asking the member from Thunder Bay—Nipigon, in this balanced plan for transportation that I know he has worked for in the transportation committee, what his reaction is to an At and East subsidy that has varied between $28 million and $40 million? That is the variance over the period of years it has been in effect.

I would like to hear his reaction to the cancellation of that as well as the maintenance of the western grain transportation subsidy that helps farmers in the prairies get their grain to the western markets through the ports of Vancouver and/or Prince George, to the tune of $700 million or $800 million.

Does the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon feel that that is a type of situation that helps make Canadians in Atlantic Canada feel they are fairly treated?

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants for that question. Not to correct him, but the Western Grain Transportation Act is an act that enhances and assists not only the shipment of grain to the west coast ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, but it also enhances and assists grain that is shipped in the summertime to Port Churchill in the northern part of Manitoba. It also subsidizes the movement of grain to the ports of Thunder Bay, but does not subsidize the movement of grain from the Thunder Bay port to the down river ports.

What we have here is an industry that the government subsidizes in some form by about $3.5 billion a year. I think what we have to do—I will go back to this policy that we have to develop—is take that $3.5 billion and spend it more wisely than we are doing. It must not be spent at the exclusion of areas and regions such as those represented by my friend. What we have to do is impress upon the people in this industry in Canada that we can no longer have the terrible unstable conditions on our waterfronts that I see developing in Thunder Bay, that I see developing today in Vancouver and Prince Rupert, that I see developing in Churchill.

With the kind of money that the taxpayer in this country is spending, in excess of $3.5 billion a year, what we should be able to do is assure those workers, who have dedicated their lives to this industry, that at least they would have some stability and security of employment so that they do not have to look at layoffs which may extend for 18 months. At the end of the 18 month period, even if they have been employed by Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or Manitoba Pool or Cargill or any of the others, they are no longer an employee of that company. It is just not fair and it applies to every region in this country.

We have to stabilize the labour force in those areas that are involved in the vital industry of grain, the growing of grain and the shipping of grain in Canada.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate this evening on Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act dealing with grains and flour subsidies. I rise after listening today to many knowledgeable orators in this area, such as the hon. members for Gander-Grand Falls, for Regina-Lumsden, Halifax West, Thunder Bay-Nipigon, and Annapolis Valley-Hants, who has been part of the question and comments and a former chairman of the transportation committee, and many others. It brings home to me, and hopefully brings home to others in this great institution, that the Government of Canada, whatever government that may be, is going to have to continue to play a role in the transportation industry in this country because we are too big a country and too diversified to let the transportation industry live by the free market system.

We see this in this very bill because the results of it are already in effect today. The subsidy part of the At and East program was eliminated in July 1989. This rail subsidy has helped Atlantic Canada become more competitive in the shipping of grain by way of its ports. Along with all the other cuts to transfer payments and whatever, we are going to eliminate this financial arrangement.

The effects of this have already been felt, as seen in the case of the elevator in Saint John where jobs have been eliminated. If the Halifax elevator is forced to close, this will be another devastation to this part of the country.

I agree, and the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission agree, that the rates we are talking about are inefficient and distorting but I do not agree with the government's slash and burn approach to the problem. The subsidy should not be eliminated until the effects of such a move can be offset by other programs.

The termination of this subsidy, known as the At and East, will have serious economic consequences, as I have said, for the maritime ports; not only for them but for associated activities which depend on the movement of export grain and flour through these ports. Activities at the grain elevators, port employment and railway employment will be significantly affected.

The bill will also have a negative impact on flour milling and the movement of domestic feed grains in the Atlantic region.

The importance of maintaining elevators such as the one at Halifax cannot be overstated. It is a viable operation, critical to the entire economy of the Atlantic region. As well as the activity generated by the movement of export grain through the facility, the elevator also plays a vital role in the storage and handling of domestic feed grain and milling wheat. The local poultry and egg industries and, to a lesser extent, the beef industry will be seriously affected should the Halifax elevator be unable to remain in operation.

In addition, the Halifax elevator is utilized as the only means of storage for milling wheat by the only Atlantic region flour mill.

The use of the Halifax elevator for domestic feed grains represents the only competitive alternative to the use of railways as a means of obtaining the required feed ingredients for the local livestock and poultry industry. The use of light vessels to Halifax with truck delivery beyond is the only competition facing the railways for the movement of domestic feed.

When will the government realize this? When will the government halt this brutal affront to the economy of Atlantic Canada?

As I said before about the local livestock and poultry industries, the maritimes are faced with a tremendous disadvantage in terms of feed costs versus the competition in Quebec and Ontario. Once again, the government is giving the predominant provinces priority while ignoring the Atlantic region.

This was discussed by the member for Thunder Bay–Nipigon and the member for Annapolis Valley–Hants. This is another way of playing the regions off against one another. We talk about unity in this country. As long as we play one part of the country off against the other we will not have the unity that is so greatly desired by most people in this country.

I say to the government that we must stop this. When other means are put in place and the regions of the country are able to stand on their own two feet, when the regions—whether the Atlantic region, the western region or the northern region of this country—are able to realize a standard of living that is equivalent to the other larger provinces then I believe that we are on the road to having greater Canadian unity among our people. It is not just a language problem.

The shipment of export flour through the port of Halifax also contributes significantly to employment of this port. It plays an important role for the railways in positioning boxcars in the maritimes for domestic use. Another issue that has arisen in the last couple of weeks concerns the containers moving out of the Halifax port because the railways cannot afford to move them.

The cars utilized for shipment of export flour to Halifax are then repositioned within the maritimes for the shipment of domestic cargoes. As I have been saying, the At and East program has a significant impact on the Atlantic region and particularly the Halifax–Saint John area.

Through programs over the last normal year almost 90 per cent of the total tonnage moved was exported through Atlantic ports. Export grain moving under the program represented at that time almost 100 per cent of the volume handled at the Saint John elevator and 60 per cent of the volume handled at the Halifax elevator. The discontinuation of the program already has and will continue to have serious repercussions on the economic depression of the maritimes.

According to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, $14.5 million in economic activity has been lost in the region as a direct result of this government's strategies. The elimination of the At and East rail freight rates hurts not only workers whose jobs depend on the busy ports and righst-of-way but the Atlantic agricultural sector as well.

Already local livestock and poultry industries face a major disadvantage versus the central Canadian producers in terms of feed costs.

Prince Edward Island produces only 80 per cent of the feed grain it needs to supply the needs of its livestock and poultry industry. New Brunswick produces only 35 to 40 per cent of its requirement and Nova Scotia produces only 20 per cent. The maritime provinces depend heavily on grain shipped from western and central Canada.

Higher costs from these grains, which will certainly result from higher transportation costs, will cripple these industries, causing a further decline in the economic activity and employment in this region. The potential exists for further economic harm to Atlantic Canada should the grain elevator at Halifax be unable to continue operation.

As has been expressed by the member for Halifax West earlier in the day, we must take steps to ensure that further negative economic consequences for the Atlantic region be avoided.

• (1900)

This government must support Atlantic Canada on this issue. This government must support the directives to which they were elected, and it must stop ignoring the pleas of Atlantic Canada.

Again, I hate to repeat this, but this is just another emphasis on shutting down Atlantic Canada, shutting down rural Canada, pitting one part of this country against the other.

In closing, I want to say that the At and East Program may be outdated, but it is this government's responsibility to help the affected industries, whether they are western and central Canadian grain producers, railway workers, Atlantic livestock producers or eastern ports. It must do something to protect them during the transition period and beyond.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): I would just like to ask the member if in fact the cutting of the At and East Program was a direct result of the free trade agreement where it was agreed to cut subsidies. Of course, this cut came in the budget of 1989 when there was almost $400 million cut in various farm programs: crop insurance cut by $200 million, the At and East by $60 million, Rail Branch Rehabilitation Program by $48 million, grain and crop advance payments by $54 million, dairy exports by $12 million, commodity-based loans by $15 million and the Canadian Dairy Commission by $10 million.

Do you feel that the government was very naive when it made all these cuts because it is obvious the Americans have not cut theirs? Because they have not cut theirs, and our program has already been slashed, the program is in the process of being removed, or it has already been discontinued, will the Americans fill that market to the detriment of the Canadian producers?

Mr. Proud: I want to thank my colleague for his questions. A simple answer: yes, I believe this has happened. We have known that the subsidy has been a dirty word around here for some time. Subsidies to the agriculture sector, to the transportation sector, are being eliminated almost daily, as a result, yes, of the free trade agreement and as a result, also, of our neighbour to the south putting pressure on the people involved in the GATT negotiations. This is something that has been ongoing for a number of years. The elimination of this and the subsidies still being paid in the United States shows that we have got ahead of ourselves and probably are shooting ourselves in the foot by doing this.

Certainly the agriculture community and the transportation community in this country, as I said a few minutes ago, needs subsidies, it needs to be helped to keep this country strong and great. With the elimination of this particular subsidy, we will see the transportation of these goods through other parts south of us in the United States.

Yes, I believe that this is a direct result of the free trade agreement because in the negotiations, and after the signing of this agreement, it was stated that our subsidies on grains and farm commodities, on shipping and on transportation must be eliminated or we could not participate in this free trade agreement.

I think we have come out second best on this deal. I believe we must go back to the table now, when they are negotiating another deal, and renegotiate these things that were mentioned in the first place by the Macdonald commission, that there were certain of these things that should be negotiated and protected for us in Canada.

I say that this has not been done, but we had better look seriously at it or we will not not only have manufacturing left in Canada, but our agriculture products will all be supplied to us from south of the border.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Thank you, Madam Speaker. You almost look surprised that I was up on debate on a bill. Perhaps it has been so long.

I would like to say at the outset that I am not pleased to debate Bill C-11. I am not pleased because of what it does to Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario, and to the prairie provinces. But it is an example of how this Conservative government does not understand Canada and why it exists as a separate country north of the United States and how it functions.

I want to work my way through that argument during my time debating this bill tonight.

This bill, which is the elimination of financial assistance to move grain and flour from one part of Canada to another will leave it to the market system, to free enterprise. It is because subsidies distort the picture, because they are no longer needed, the government says. They have outlived their usefulness.

Well, tell that to the 5,000 or so men and women, and their families, whose jobs have outlived their usefulness, thanks to the elimination two years ago of the At and East rail subsidy.

We are a country that basically built itself north of the 49th parallel in a very narrow band of people from sea to sea, with scattered settlements elsewhere up toward our other sea. Our connection is east-west, yet the normal draws in the market economy would dictate that the raw materials, in this case grain, would travel from where they are harvested to where the largest number of people are, or where export position is.

On this continent that draw is southward, to where we have a neighbour which has a population ten times our size. The economies of scale work to put pressure on that, and it is only through interventions of governments, Conservative, Liberal in the past, that has enabled us to remain separate.

We now have a Conservative government that has decided that the marketplace is something it is more concerned about than the survival of this country. It has been slowly cutting off the ties that have held this country together.

It is no irony that the same month this subsidy ended, half of the rail passenger services in this country were eliminated, a devastating blow to Atlantic Canada.

It is no surprise that a year and a half to two years into the subsidy having been removed, that we now see other freight components of the services to Atlantic Canada being undermined. The railroads are extremely worried about their competition from American rail. The port of Halifax is worried that those containers that have been coming by rail to Atlantic Canada, to Halifax, will now go by rail to New York, because of the kind of rate cutting that is happening down there, both on rail and in terms of the ports. They have already seen container traffic that originally was destined for Halifax to be picked up by foreign vessels relocated to Montreal. They are seeing rail lines removed, they are seeing their air system totally restructured in Atlantic Canada, to the point where you cannot go anywhere unless you go through Halifax. That is a boon to Halifax but it doesn't say much to a lot of the other communities which used to have a higher level of service to other parts of Canada.

So, Madam Speaker, I suggest that the elimination of the At and East subsidy is just yet another symptom of a major disease that has struck this country and it is called Conservatism and it is the implementation of the right-wing agenda.

But it hasn't just hurt Atlantic Canada. By and large, most of the grain and the flour that goes to Atlantic Canada under the At and East program goes by rail. Only one-third of that is going to Halifax by marine.

It is the rail workers in Quebec who have lost their jobs because of this move, the workers who maintain the trains, who operate them, the communities which service the trains and service the employees by providing goods and services.

In Ontario it is two-fold. Let me change that, it is three-fold. It is the rail jobs, the elevator jobs and the shipworker jobs, the men and women who ply the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway who have seen yet another decline in the amount of grain available to them to move. That grain has not been redirected through another east-west link. It just does not move. That is why we have seen Ontario elevators shut down. That is why we have seen elevators in Atlantic Canada shut down.

One of the elevators in Ontario is now being considered as a storage space for used tires. Used tires in a grain elevator, can you believe that? That is their only hope for any kind of economic assistance, storing somebody's garbage in their grain elevator. Even the rats will be out of work because they will not have the feed to live on.

When my colleague the member for Regina—Lumsden was talking, he made reference to the fact that there was an estimate of 5,000 jobs being lost. Well, the annual subsidy is around $32 million a year.

Mr. Benjamin: Average.

Mr. Angus: I worked it out. The average subsidy is $32 million a year. Do you know what that works out to? It is $6,300 per worker.

I think I heard in this House not too long ago that one of the impacts or the realities of some of the offshore development in Atlantic Canada was a cost per job of $190,000. Here, to save money we are cutting out $6,300 per existing job. They have to pay more in income tax, they being those 5,000 men and women. They put more back into the economy than they take out through the At and East subsidy. It does not make sense. This At and East subsidy was an investment in the future of Atlantic Canada and in the men and women who work in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario and on the prairies. This is dumb economics. It is the Conservatives who do not know how to run a country, let alone a corner store.

Bob Rae invests in people. He does not worry about the folks on Bay Street. He knows how to work on behalf of the people of Ontario and he will continue to do a damned good job, I want to tell you.

An hon. member: Ask all the people who are in the construction business if they want to support this.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I think I have caught their attention.

Mr. Benjamin: For all the good that will do.

An hon. member: They are sensitive. Very sensitive.

Mr. Angus: Let us take a look at some of the specifics in this bill.

We are talking about 944,000 tonnes of grain and flour moved in 1988. About 90 per cent went to the ports of Halifax and Saint John. According to the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission: "The economics of grain traffic at the port in 1988 amounted to $25.9 million in revenues and 263 jobs, while flour traffic resulted in $28.4 million in revenue and 220 jobs". So there are nearly 500 direct jobs in the Halifax—Dartmouth area alone. In Saint John, the port corporation says that the movement of bulk grain through its port in 1988, under the program, amounted to $8.5 million, along with 90 direct jobs. Collectively, they say that in addition to the 573 direct jobs in the two ports, another 250 indirect jobs may be lost as well, just in those two communities; that many jobs with one slice of a pen by the minister responsible for this program.

The livelihood of all those people plus all of the rail workers, the marine workers and the farmers who no longer have the ability to move or to sell their products, is on the hands of that minister.

One elevator has been closed, Saint John. We are also seeing effects on other areas. We are going to see higher freight rates for western Canada for the grains.

Let me just correct the record. The Saint John elevator is the one that is closed. Also, the transfer elevator at Port McNicoll, Ontario. I think that is in the riding of the former Minister of Transport, one of the many who have come and gone from this place under both Liberals and Conservatives, just another indication that neither party really understands the importance of transportation.

Neither party understands the importance of transportation because if they did, they would have left a minister in place long enough to learn the job. Having said that, the only one who came to the job with any knowledge was the first Conservative Minister of Transport. Although we fundamentally disagreed with him on policy, at least he knew what he was talking about when he got into the ministry.

The livestock industry, the feed mills, the meat packing plants and the dairies are going to be hit by the decision of this government.

The estimate is that rail rates for domestic feed grains will go up by at least $10 a tonne. The livestock industry in the maritimes depends on grain from Ontario and western Canada, and if the transport costs do go up by that $10 a tonne, it is estimated that 5,000 jobs will be lost in the livestock industry, feed mills, meat packing plants and dairies. This is 20 per cent of the total employed in this industry and related industries in Atlantic Canada and that is from the Executive Director of the Atlantic Farmers' Council, Keith Russell.

The elevators keep closing. We have two in Midland. We have one in Port McNicoll and one in Prescott. Two of those are in the former Ministers of Transport's riding.

Ontario flour mills have lost export contracts and require lower wheat prices to compete with Quebec mills for CIDA contracts. At the same time, Ontario farmers are already receiving record low prices and cannot afford to see prices drop.

For the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board, the At and East allowed it the flexibility to store wheat longer before shipping it which allowed it to get a better price. The elimination of the At and East Program forced the storage facilities in Georgian Bay to close and made shipping wheat to maritime ports during the winter more expensive.

I want to touch on another point. The existence of the At and East provided some flexibility for the Port of Thunder Bay. As you know, Thunder Bay is closed in terms of the marine side for two to three months each winter. It varies, but somewhere between the middle of December and the middle of January we shut down and we are open again when the ice goes.

During the late fall after the Welland Canal closes, we can still move grain by water to the bay ports and store it there for inclusion in the At and East. That allows more grain to come off the prairies during the winter months and to fill up the elevators in Thunder Bay, while at the same time providing for the possibility of a winter rail program.

By eliminating the At and East Program and by eliminating those elevators which I talked about in the Great Lakes, we have lost some more flexibility.

In addition, thanks to this policy and the lack of concrete action by this government dealing with the inequities of the Western Grain Transportation Act, we have seen hull after hull after hull either flagged out to be used elsewhere in the world instead of the Great Lakes or cut up for scrap so that our Great lakes fleet has lost the ability to move a bumper crop for this country.

Decisions like this put forward because of a desire to conform to market economics have really undermined a part of the fabric of this country: our ability to grow excellent grains, the best in the world on our prairies, and get them to markets, through our eastern ports or through our western or northern ports. It is one more knife in the coffin of the grain industry in this country.

I say to you that the government has made a fundamental mistake, both in philosophy and in terms of practice. This has got to be changed and it will be changed by another government because it is too important to leave in the hands of the market.

Madam Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence. I want to conclude by saying that I am not happy to be speaking on this bill. I do not think it should be before us and that is why we will be voting against it.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, like other members who have participated in this debate, I have fundamental mixed emotions for a variety of reasons. I am not going to waste much of my limited time tonight to talk about those reasons. I am going to come down to the basics of the bill.

The bill is now C-11. It used to be C-26. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who gave a very constructive contribution to the debate and is also one of the more active, constructive members of the transportation committee of which I had the honour at one time to be the chairman, knows fully the ramifications of the bill as does his colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, another member of the transport committee. He gave a very balanced approach. I did not agree obviously with the full extension of some of the thoughts, but I understand why he and his House leader and others who have spoken initially have said they were not happy to speak because this bill, as the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden said earlier, which is absolutely right, is that this is a retroactive bill that is putting into law what a budget did back in 1989.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what law school you went to, but I know you went to a venerable one and I certainly went to an honourable one. One of the most invidious, odious pieces of legislation was a retroactive piece of legislation that was put into law after the event and changed the rules half way through midstream.

On retroactivity, this bill should never have been before the House, I am not going to waste much time on the procedural aspect of the mutation, the interesting parliamentary mutation from an aberration of prorogation, when things were dead; but of course aberration and abortions are not to be treated lightly here. Prorogation used to mean that everything was cut off at the pass. If you did not get the legislation through, it died on the Order Paper.

This, Mr. Speaker, as you and I well know, was a great motivational inspiration to make some deals. As you got into June, July or August, as I used to sit here in the earlier days of my tenure, the George McIlraiths, the Davie Fultons and men who understood Parliament got together and said: "Hey, we have debated this too darn long". That was of course before television which even makes it longer now because it cuts through to the core and cuts through to the sham. Even Carol Burnett could not stay longer than 10 years, and yet a lot of these debates seem to go on 10 years. But unfortunately—and I say it sadly—my former colleagues in the government, all of whom are honourable souls, have an Achilles' heel and that is the fact that they do not understand the parliamentary process.

I could go on to a whole speech on that. I am not even going to mention the Prime Minister who never had any parliamentary experience before he came here. That could be part of the problem too.

Some of us earned our spurs in the trenches and did not come from the corporate boardrooms to the cabinet room. I say that is part of the problem of this parliamentary system. That is part of the parliamentary system and the problem that we have today as, Mr. Speaker, you and I well know.

We talk about the mother of battles and we talk about that horrible charade that we just went through in the Persian Gulf. I will not get into that tonight. But we have at least something serene, something stable, something basic, and that is the Mother of Parliaments that we are all supposed to have taken something from and/or adopted and adapted to our own particular geographic, historical and traditional and/or social mores and ways.

One of the basics of Parliament was that at a prorogation the Order Paper was dead. Government, get your house in order and renegotiate the new bills because something happened in the last session and they did not get through.

With that invidious notice of motion given approval by the Speaker I have to say sadly, Mr. Speaker,—I am almost prepared to predict that the slippery slope of the present Chair is going to be defined by his ruling on that invidious notice of motion—that with one stroke of the pen, Mandrake the Magician resurrected five dead bills that were in voodoo land.

With a little parliamentary imprimatur and the persuasion of the government House leader, they came to life again. The resurrection of Lazarus was never more supreme than those five bills that came out of that invidious notice of motion.

That is what we are dealing with here tonight. We have one of them on our platter. It should have been through negotiation. It could have been done through consent.

Perhaps this bill need not have taken the time it is taking in Parliament now because I agree with some of the comments, from the members opposite, especially those of my friend from Halifax West. I better not touch him too much because this gets too close to home.

I agree that the de facto input of subsidy under the At and East, Bill C-26 which is now Bill C-11, has been dead since July 16, 1989. Of course, as the hon. member for Regina-Lumsden said, once you cut out the subsidy, then it is kind of silly to talk about shipments of grain to the east.

I never thought I would ever be doing this in my life, but I happen to be sitting here in the opposition. That is part of the problem of this House. There are a lot of government members who never sat in opposition. They forgot from whence they came.

I agree with some of the comments made by my former colleagues who have spoken tonight. We cannot attune hypocrisy to any one individual, but the generic term applies to the hypocrisy in opposition. You say: "A, B, C and D," and then you get in government and it is "X, Y, Z".

You know something, Mr. Speaker, the fellow called Preston Manning is down the hill in a place called the Civic Centre. I am told by my colleague from Beaver River that there are 2,000 people there tonight to hear the new messiah on the political field. He has a lot of things to say.

One of the things he has to say is that this institution which used to be the highest court of the land should no longer be the biggest hypocrite forum in the land. With television we can no longer get away with saying one thing in opposition and then getting in government and doing just the opposite. That has happened so often.

In fact, there is an interesting contribution of the member for Burin—St. George's in quoting—I see the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds here; he is a very good friend of mine—the remarks of the present Deputy Prime Minister in his contribution to the debate on the At and East when he was in opposition. He said nothing different than I am saying tonight because what he said then was true. What I am saying tonight is true.

Coming to the reality of this debate, it was the then Minister of Transport who then set up—I think he said this under the National Transportation Act debate, and I happened to be a member in 1966— the transportation commission and he became the first chairman of the National Transportation Agency, which was an interesting thing to do in those days. Now Eric Nielsen is, so things haven't changed that much.

However, Mr. Pickersgill said many things. I am going to cut through all the wheat and the chaff, even though this is what this bill is about, because my friends on the opposite side who say it is dead, it is over, it is history, they forget the history from whence they came. The whole reason for the At and East was that little part of Canada which is trying to sustain itself. Mr. Pickersgill, my adversary at the time, was a lowly backbencher. I was about three rows up here to the right, so I have really come full circle. I watched him in the front row make his inimitable speech. I won't get into the mannerisms that he sometimes used, but the important thing he said about At and East is that it "was to ensure that we will have rates which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports". There are many more things he said.

When I hear friends of mine opposite say that the At and East is history because the de facto implementation under cabinet order was July 16, 1989, I start to ask myself the question: "Is the elevator left in Halifax history?" That is the crux of this debate.

I cannot think of another individual item that affects Atlantic Canada so adversely, even though no one understands it, as the cutting of the At and East. In fact, I believe that in the proverbial bowels of the bureaucracy some bureaucrat was picking at bottom line reduction in spending and said to a confrere: "We have got to cut certain moneys out and we've got to cut certain payments out. What's this At and East?" Quite understandably I can almost believe that he could not have got an explanation. Someone looking at this escalating subsidy of $28 to $40 million—and that's approximate because it changed from year to year, but between $28 and $40 million—could easily say: "Hey, in our deficit reduction program let's slice this down".

Madam Speaker, do you know what we found out when the bureaucrats came before the transportation committee? I think my hon. friend from Thunder Bay–Atikokan was there and my hon. friend from Thunder Bay–Nipigon was there, as well as other members. We had officials from the Departments of Finance and Transport and whatever. I almost have the name of one, but I am not in the habit of mentioning names of public servants when they cannot defend themselves, but this is all a matter of the public record. In effect, we found out through the hearings of the transport committee on the At and East two years ago that someone inferred—now I am paraphrasing but I could get the absolute minute of the transport evidence to support what I am about to say—that: "Whoops, we slipped. We cut out the subsidy and now because of GATT and the international implications of a subsidy for export, we cannot reimpose it".

That is one of the messages received by the transport committee that had some hearings on this issue.

Madam Speaker, I don't know how much more time I have. Can you give me a little hand signal? Good—five minutes, that is great.

I am glad to see the minister here because I have a very real respect for the minister. I know he is anguished over this. However, Mr. Minister, do you really believe the statement of your parliamentary secretary, the computer whiz from Calgary Southeast, with a great competent mind but no heart and no compassion? He hasn't learned compassion. The Reform Party is like a wildfire in Alberta because a lot of competent members do a good job mechanically but they do not have any compassion for the people. If the parliamentary secretary was a member from Atlantic Canada he could not have made the speech he made to lead off this debate on Thursday, June 6. His first sentence was: "Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House seeks to eliminate a subsidy which has outlived its original purpose and has become a burden on the public purse".

I ask the parliamentary secretary to stand up in this House, this open forum, to admit that the Western Grain Transportation Act is a subsidy for grain movement which distorts the market and has outlived its usefulness. I do not think the parliamentary secretary even understood the beginnings of the At and East, as illustrated with the quote I gave from Mr. Pickersgill, then Minister of Transport, that it was there for a very designated purpose. The hon. member for Regina–Lumsden and others have said that, in terms of the stupidity of eliminating this subsidy, it is more than offset with the cost to the government in increased welfare, in increased unemployment insurance payments, and the loss of the economic activity and the tax that could have been raised by that economic activity. We know the jobs are lost. The Saint John elevator is gone. We are not even trying to resurrect it.

The misleading thing about this debate that makes me most irritated of all is that when everyone talks about cutting out the old history no one mentions what the minister did then. It was this minister in the House tonight, I think, who was responsible for setting up the Grains 2000 port study. The minister received the report in November 1990 and it was finally released to the public in February 1991. Let us not say what that young little youthful computer parliamentary secretary from Calgary Southeast said: "Well, we are going to monitor the situation", and I quote from page 1289 of Hansard:

> And if needed, the government is prepared to ensure that the Halifax elevator remains in operation for the benefit of the Atlantic livestock and flour milling industries.

What the heck does the young computer member for Calgary Southeast and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture think the Grains 2000 ports study said? It said that unless there is help, unless export grain is enhanced, that elevator goes down the drain the same as the elevator in Saint John goes down the drain. When that elevator goes down the drain, we cannot resurrect it. It is the same fallacy as Preston Manning, coming back to Reform, says: "Hey, we do not want Quebec unless Quebec says it is in". When do you ever have a divorce and then ask to get the terms of living? I could put that another way but in effect it is the same for this elevator.

An hon. member: Kill it off.

Mr. Nowlan: You do not have the elevator killed off and then suggest that a munificent government—we know there is not that much money around—is going to resurrect it. I mentioned the resurrection of Lazarus earlier, but it is not going to happen to a sterile elevator when world trade has gone by. Of course, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture is right about trade changes in the movement of grain. However, what he did not say is that we have already lost sales to some of our traditional customers because the At and East subsidy is not there. That helps to distort the trade of grain.

I do not know if the minister is going to contribute before this debate ends but the Grains 2000 report, and I give him credit for setting it up, says, as he knows from his bureaucrats, and my point and every Atlantic Canadian members' point has to be that you cannot support Bill C–11 unless there is something more than the wistful thinking of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, who says: "Well, we will monitor, and if the need arises we may do A, B, C and D".

I was the chairman of the transport committee for two or three years or more—that is a past date and I do not mind trading on it at all—and we had hearings on this issue and tried to use the lever of not passing the bill to get the bureaucracy to come up with something called "set-offs".

An hon. member: Offsets.

Mr. Nowlan: Offsets. The same thing, but twisted around. It had the same impact.

An hon. member: Spin-offs.

• (1940)

Mr. Nowlan: Spinoffs, offsets, setoffs, we have had three years of discussion and there is nothing except this wistful pious hope that, if needed, we may be prepared to ensure that the elevator may stay for the benefit of the agriculture industry, of the flour industry, of jobs.

If this was a bill castrating the Western Grain Transportation Act, there is not a member in the western caucus even of a government who would have allowed this to come this far. My sadness is that there are not more Atlantic Canadian members up here in this House of Commons on all sides in a collective issue that has no partisan stripe, or should not have, but it is going to have unless members exercise. I know good members try within the government caucus to get the offsets, but there are no offsets today. We then waited and marked time until we heard the grain study report.

I appreciate, Madam Speaker, you have been very kind and generous, more so than usual, but I understand that because I know my time is just about up on this particular situation. I am not going to trespass further.

I really say that, without anything firm in offsets, we have talked for three years in the House and the committee, delegations, the Atlantic Transportation Commission, suggesting certain proposals that have not been accepted. In fact, in talking to the Atlantic Transportation Commission today, there have been letters from the Atlantic Farmers' Council of May 31, the Canadian Feed Industry, the Co-op Atlantic of May 17 and Maritime Advisory Council on June 3, others who have written to the minister asking: "what are you going to do with the offset program?"

What do they get? They get a slap on the face, no answer to the letters, but this bill on the floor of the House. I conclude with this. One of my colleagues on the opposite side of the House, who is a friend of mine says that it is all history. It does not matter because it was all dead because, in effect, July 16, payments stopped and the railways did not do it. If it was dead, why—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. My dear mother used to say: "Use, but do not abuse", unless there is unanimous consent of the House. Questions or comments?

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the intervention in this debate of my colleague, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. Perhaps we should have let him talk a little bit more on the transport committee. He makes eminent sense in his opposition to this bill.

I wonder whether the member would care to react to the following statement. If we are to survive as a nation, if we are to ensure that the items that we export, particularly grain products like wheat, like flour, if we should as a country be neutralizing transport. In other words, it should not cost anything to get it to our ports so that once we get there, then the marketplace, the international marketplace, would begin to click in. In that way, there would be no internal distortions in terms of east-west direction, and we would ensure that the value added could be accomplished throughout the country rather than just at key points. I wonder if he would care to comment on that.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I think if I understand my hon. friend's question, it is a nice leading question and I would agree with that. That is in effect what the At and East was trying to do.

He mentioned the country. We all can make compassionate speeches on the country. I cannot emphasize enough that in Atlantic Canada, even though people do not understand it, those who do—and they are the farmers, they are the producers, they are the people in the marine and the transportation industry—this is a cut of the Gordian, another slice of the Gordian knot that keeps us all together.

As we have all said here in this debate, it was relatively peanuts when you put the $28 million to $40 million to little old Atlantic Canada against the $700 million or $800 million for western grain transportation. I know there are some different factors there, but still you have the subsidy. You cut off one and you leave the other. Yet the governments says it is going to review it, and yes, it may, the same as it is going to review the survival of the Halifax elevator. I am telling you, in Atlantic Canada, I have not felt so badly for a long time because of the fact that this does tear away.

It comes right down to Joe Citizen. You could look at this tomorrow in the newspaper and say: "Good God, what is going on in Ottawa? Have they really lost their minds or has the summer season really taken over".

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my good friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants whether he would care to comment on a matter in terms of equalizing opportunity between Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario, St. Lawrence and Great Lakes ports, the matter of ice-breaking. You do not have to break ice in Halifax and Saint John.

I and my colleagues are not complaining that the taxpayer pays for the cost of ice-breaking. We are not too worried about that. That is a natural hazard that Canada and the Canadian government takes into account. We do our best to help out the people in those areas, in those industries to get ice-breaking.

Does my hon. friend have any estimate as to whether or not the ice-breaking services in Quebec, in Montreal, in the upper St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, exceed the costs of the At and East rates?

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend from Regina—Lumsden has asked a beautiful question. I must say that in all the debate I have been involved with over several years, I frankly do not know the answer. I do not know the answer in terms of offsets, whether the cost of one in effect the offsets price of another. The same, frankly, as I do not know really the offset of removing the payment for the subsidy to the railways—which employed people—and yes, it was not the most efficient way to move grain. Most people do not understand that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission for several years suggested different modes and different ways to move that grain.

It is a good question. This is something that, frankly, I think government should have done. What is that thing called in Washington, the office of financial management or budget control? That is a question that I think deserves an answer, and I agree. I am not against the ports of Montreal, Quebec and the St. Lawrence, but those are extra costs that you do not have when you go to Halifax, which is one of the world's great open, natural all-year ports.

The other thing they do not have is the offset of cutting the subsidy: How much because of the loss of jobs—and other people have touched on this—the increase in unemployment insurance, the increased welfare, the loss of tax dollars from depreciated economic activity? I would say that on both counts, in terms of the offset of navigational aids and the ice-breaking work, that that would be very close to the subsidy we pay to Atlantic ports.

Mr. Benjamin: It is a lot more.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Or more. Well, we all can play with figures, depending on how you start to calculate the base calculations.

Second, and I think almost as important, the absolute cut in the subsidy is not a net benefit to the government. It is going to be a net deficit to the government.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to say a few words on Bill C-11, the At and East rate bill. I want to compliment the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants because—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. member gets into his comments, may I assume that the hon. member is splitting the 20 minute period with another member? It will make it easier for the Chair to advise the hon. member.

• (1950)

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I assume we may have to get unanimous consent for each of us to get 40 minutes but we will try our best.

The bill that is before the House tonight is Bill C-11, which replaces the old Bill C-26, and I believe that the debate tonight is really about the government bringing back a bill at third reading without unanimous consent.

There is a very fundamental aspect about this whole debate that is fundamental to the survival of Atlantic Canada. I think the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants brings to this debate two valuable perspectives. One, he has been a distinguished chairman of the transport committee for many years so he has been through all the briefs and presentations by grain producers, shippers and so on, but also, he comes from one of prime agriculture areas of Nova Scotia. His perspective is, perhaps, very well founded. He really touches the kernel of what we have to do in this country if we want to have a broadly-based agriculture industry that is diversified.

During the free trade debate our caucus had public hearings in Fredericton and we heard presentations mostly opposing the free trade deal, but some were relatively in favour of it. The statement which really caught my idea of how devastating the free trade deal would be to Atlantic Canada, to much of Ontario, and to many other parts of Canada; was the comment by somebody after a long afternoon and all kinds of presentations when it was said that if you want to see what free trade can do for New Brunswick, go across the border into Maine and see what free trade has done for Maine. They have had free trade with the rest of the United States for 50 years, 100 years.

When you stop and think about agriculture in Atlantic Canada, they have their specialties like potatoes in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and those commodities. They have a special climate and soil base and all the rest of it. They also have a dairy industry which they do not have much of in Maine. They have a pork industry which they do not have much of in Maine. Yet, they have the same resource base generally.

Look at companies like Irving, and McCain's, especially, which was a world-wide food processing industry started in New Brunswick. They do not have any McCain's company that has a world-wide base in Maine that I know of. That is because we have organized our agriculture on the basis that we want medium-sized units, very efficient, and we want to produce milk and cheese and these other commodities of the dairy industry all over the country.

If you go to the United States, you can go to Wisconsin, Minnesota, Florida, or California. Those are the main dairy producing areas. Our concept, which the Tories are rapidly trying to destroy, and God help them if they serve for another two and a half years, they will have gone a long way towards doing that, is based on trying to have a broadly diverse industry through the use of marketing boards, supply management, and marketing mechanisms like that. To some extent the Wheat Board is another mechanism which tries to diversify and help the industry.

The debate tonight is not so much about whether the At and East rate will be effectively killed, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants said. It was effectively killed on July 16, 1989, when payment of the subsidy was stopped. There are a lot of people in this House, including the hon. member who just spoke who has a stake in his constituency, who want to see this kind of agriculture continue in this country.

The Tories are hell bent on another scheme of market economy. They think they will solve all the problems. It will be a disaster. It will be a disaster for Canada because the kind of diversified agriculture we see in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island will be destroyed, if we destroy those special instruments we have put in place, including the At and East rate.

It has already been described that it is going to cost our agriculture producers down there some $21 a tonne for their feed grains. It may not sound like very much, until you talk to hog producers in Prince Edward Island, as we did a couple of weeks ago when we visited there with the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings. They are teetering as to whether they are making a go of it or not.

Removing this subsidy, throwing the whole marketing board system into question, may not show up in the big macro-economics of the country, but it has a profound influence on the individual producers. Hundreds and thousands of those individual producers making a go of it with a medium-sized, very efficient operation is what gives rural Canada the vitality we want to maintain.

I am surprised when I hear and see columns by one of the Tory members for Halifax where he says: "We do not need these subsidies down here. We will make it on our own". That is one aspect of the whole agriculture side of it.

Then there are the industrial jobs. Already the Saint John terminal has closed, throwing 55 people from the maritimes out of work, a very substantial number of people in that community. The Halifax terminal may eventually close. It involves another 27 jobs I am told and, perhaps, several hundred if one considers the stevedores and the rail people and so on. Therefore, there is a very, very profound impact of the At and East rate.

What we were trying to do when this was put in place, was to try to balance the cost of shipping from Buffalo to the Atlantic ports, which are two or three times more than the cost of shipping and the distance involved from Buffalo to New York City.

This is an important debate because it talks about the viability of Atlantic Canada, the viability of our agriculture industry, the diversification of our economy and it is very important that the government not be able to get away lightly with removing support programs to our most vital industry, the agriculture industry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments. There is a five minute question period. The second part of the 20-minute debate, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I wish to make three points with regard to this debate on Bill C-11.

The first point deals with the procedural aspects, the second with the substance of the bill itself and third, the measure of fairness or, indeed, lack of fairness with regard to the bill.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants made reference in his remarks to the fact that this was a previous bill known as Bill C-26. Thereafter, the bill had been reinstated by a government omnibus motion, which made members of my party express great frustration and anger that the government would attempt to reinstate a bill which was basically, in procedural terms, dead on the Order Paper as a result of the government's decision to prorogue the House.

• (2000)

Many members in our caucus have spoken out against this particular bill, some with great emotion, all based on factual information provided to us by various interest groups in our respective regions, whether we come from the west or from the Atlantic region.

I think it can be said that most members of Parliament on this side of the House, and I can only speak for those in my caucus and in the Liberal Party, disagree wholeheartedly with the government on the measure to reinstate the bill. In doing so, we do not just do it for political gains.

I just want to review the substance of that bill. It implements an April 1989 budget decision to eliminate what is commonly referred to as the At and East rates effective July 15, 1989. That was almost two years ago. These At and East rates are really specified under section 272 of the Railway Act. Under this section of the Railway Act, shippers in Atlantic Canada for instance paid 1960 rail rates for export of grain and 1966 rates for export of flour. Those rates have not been frozen at the levels they were at on those two dates.

The Government of Canada subsidizes the balance of these rates to amounts of between $20 million and $40 million or so in recent years. Perhaps a more precise figure is about $37.3 million for the fiscal year 1988-89. That is the substance of Bill C-26 and now Bill C-11. It is a subsidy. It is a subsidy paid by the Government of Canada to individuals who happen to reside in the regions of our country.

I see across the way the minister who has some responsibility for regional economic development in this country. I have to ask myself why a government would, at this time with the economic situation being the way it is, want to rid itself of this particular subsidy affecting primarily a smaller region in this country. Thirty-two million dollars to the Government of Canada is not a large expenditure in terms of its total expenditures.

The third point that I had raised at the beginning of my remarks, because I know I have limited time, is the fairness. We subsidize western grain transportation. I think it has been referred to as $700 million or $800 million, whereas in the Atlantic it is roughly $32 million. I have not heard any member on this side of the House, in the years in which I have been elected to this Parliament, question the authenticity, the need and the importance which the subsidy for western grain transportation does for that region of the country.

I think most members, if not all, would support and support enthusiastically that kind of subsidy to that region of the country. The reason why is because it is just, it is appropriate and it is fair.

What we find particularly disturbing in Atlantic Canada is there is $700 million and $32 million.

I ask the Chair, where is the fairness? The fact of the matter is, there is no fairness. This is a deliberate act to inflict economic pain on those of us who happen to reside in Atlantic Canada. If it were otherwise, it would not proceed.

We have heard the catch-all phrases: "We are going to review the prospects of trying to save the grain elevators in the port of Halifax. We are going to review that at some point in the future". That is a code word which this government has used time and time again to do nothing. For those of us who have been the victims of this government's policy in Atlantic Canada, we are disheartened to learn that a $32 million subsidy is being cut off when a $700 million plus subsidy for another region of the country is going to proceed.

When I say $32 million, what do I mean by that? I said $32 million, $37.3 million, $30 million and $40 million, average it off if you will. The economic impact of the termination of the At and East program for grain elevators in dollars is $3,735,000. The flour mill in Halifax is $3,200,000. It includes wages and benefits paid by flour mills at Halifax and also goods and services purchased.

With regard to the grain elevators, it includes wages and benefits paid to elevator employees at Saint John and Halifax, and also goods and services purchased by elevators.

The additional cost of livestock and poultry feed is $18 million on an annual basis. This has been calculated with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, using tonnage of feed grain handled under the Livestock Feed Program of Canada and rail freight rates, which in the absence of the Halifax elevator, would apply in lieu of present water compelled rail rates.

Local grain production, $950,000; port and railway employment, $8,280,000 adding up to approximately, on a yearly basis, anywhere between $32 and $37.3 million. That is the extent of the subsidy and that is where it goes.

For those of us in Atlantic Canada, we just call out, not for a special rate or a preferential rate but just for due process, fairness and some semblance of dignity for the people who live in that particular region. It is no wonder that residents of Atlantic Canada say: "Hey, we have to re-examine those national institutions which impact so negatively on our economy and on our people".

In closing, let me put this brief amendment on the record. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-11, an Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to ask the permission of the House to keep it under advisement for a few minutes. We will continue debate and then I will come back and put the motion to the House once I am sure it is in order.

Questions or comments.

• (2010)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member from Cape Breton who gave such an excellent speech and who moved a very appropriate amendment.

The amendment really is saying to the Government of Canada that the people of Atlantic Canada have had enough. I want to ask the hon. member this question: how does the hon. member see this decision by the Government of Canada in ending the subsidy for the movement of grain and flour into eastern Canada which is now being replaced by imports of heavily subsidized grain from the EEC?

How does he think this fits into the general attitude of this Government of Canada toward his part of the country, especially as it relates to this bill which deals with the railway?

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, first of all I want to thank my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls for such an intelligent, thought provoking question at this hour of the evening.

Succinctly put, I think the measure the government has put before us tonight ought to be addressed from a number of perspectives. Specifically, with regard to the question as raised by the hon. member who has now brought to the attention of the House that there will be large quantities of imports from the European Economic Community, I think it fits quite nicely with the government's over-all economic thrust, which is clearly the following.

We have a large geographical map of Canada. We have a small population base dispersed over this large geographical mass. We are going to deny the role of the national government in terms of bringing people and geography together with regard to our transportation system.

The government does not want to be involved in that any more. It wants to let the so-called free market enterprise operate, but the fact and the truth of the matter is that when it says that and when you check the record of where this particular quantity of goods will come from, it is being massively subsidized by the foreign country that is exporting into Canada.

That has been the economic philosophy and thesis of this government; to deny Canadians in the poorer regions of this country an opportunity to place their trust and their faith in other regions and in other people throughout Canada domestically and hinge their bet on some foreign power whether it be Third World, the European Economic Community or our economic neighbours to the south.

In response to the hon. member, I find it rather frightful that we in Canada as national legislators would allow this kind of behaviour and conduct to continue. We know, because of fact after fact, that we as Canadians are being robbed of our economic livelihood domestically and creating a dependency, not domestically but internationally, on markets abroad and on foreign economies to provide Canadians and in this particular instance, Atlantic Canadians, with a product which is both reasonably priced and appropriate under the circumstances.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period of questions and comments has now expired.

After discussions with the Clerk, the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member Cape Breton—East Richmond is in order.

We will now resume debate.

All speeches are of 10 minutes and there are no periods for questions and comments. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

I think we are having a marvellous round of après vous, Gaston except that no one is called Gaston.

The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls had been recognized and so that he does not lose his place he should have the floor. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I was listening as the hon. House leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition was speaking and moved this motion. He represents an area of our country called Cape Breton Island. Thinking about the railway, it was not that long ago, it was in the last year, that the federal government decided that there would no longer be rail passenger service from the riding of the hon. member who moved this motion, extending right down to Truro, Nova Scotia.

The trans-Canada link of CN ended. Passenger service from coast to coast ended because there was no longer a connection from Newfoundland to British Columbia. It ended. It stopped with that decision in the past year involving Cape Breton Island.

Just think of it. The federal government subsidizes a bus operation in Newfoundland. When you get on the bus and go to the ferry boat in Port-aux-Basques, if that bus does not make that ferry boat, you have to spend the night in Port-aux-Basques. If the ferry boat does not meet Acadia Bus Lines in North Sydney, you have to spend another night in North Sydney, and if the private bus company does not meet the train in Truro, Nova Scotia, you have to spend another night there. You can see what change has taken place in the past year. That is why I support the motion put forward by the opposition House leader.

When you think about it, it is rather interesting. The presence of the federal government in rural areas like Cape Breton Island and Newfoundland has practically disappeared. The post offices are being closed one after the other. That job is gone to that community, never again to be returned. Never again will you see a flag pole with a Canadian flag on it in a lot of these small communities because that was the one building that had it.

No more will you see a train move down the track, because CN has closed and laid off the people. There have been great plans to give them pensions and the golden handshake, but the jobs are gone and the federal presence is gone.

The federal presence on land with your trains and with your post office, which was usually the one place you could identify the federal government, is gone.

Then by air. Air Canada, a Crown corporation, was cut back and no longer do you have that presence in the rural areas. You have air traffic controllers today in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. In the name of saving person-years, the Government of Canada embarked on a policy of hiring Americans. Bring them up on contracts to work in Toronto in our air traffic control centres so that they would not count as federal employees. I think that is what was behind it, because we have young Canadians today who are anxious to get into air traffic control, very highly paid positions in the federal government, perhaps some of the highest.

Last year, we were hiring Americans on contract. Now we have a bill before the House to move the airports to local authorities. Federal employees again will completely disappear from some communities in this country, never again to be treated as federal public servants, but as employees of a corporation operating an airport.

Some of us received letters lately. I received one today, and I went back over my files to discover that back in 1989 I had received a similar letter talking about the rumour of closing the Burnt Point lighthouse. This fellow says: "We have no meaningful land mass between us and the European and African continents and many times in years past the fact that contact could be made to the lighthouse keeper by means of a citizen's band radio has meant the probable difference between being rescued or lost."

Today the contract has been awarded to close the Burnt Point lighthouse in Newfoundland and to close another 11 lighthouses. The cost to the federal treasury is $1 million apiece. One million dollars to do away with one person-year which is absolutely necessary. There are another 22 being closed. The contracts are going. I will put it on the record that a member from the Government of Canada, from St. John's East, interfered politically and got a lighthouse in Belle Island, Newfoundland, lifted from the list. A political interference by the member for St. John's East on behalf of politics.

We have the Government of Canada saying to us in eastern Canada that we are not even allowed in Coast Guard again to use our ice-breakers. They are tied up. You see the new policy is that you tie it up. There are seven tied up today in Quebec City. Five are tied up in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. There are another two tied up for engine repairs in St. John's, Newfoundland. Meanwhile, there is ice everywhere around the coast up there. The policy is: "Well, you know, we are looking at the Arctic transportation system and when one of those large ships gets stuck, we are going to send up an ice-breaker from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, up to Greenland." To save money. It is cheaper to tie them up than it is to have them operating.

That is the policy of the federal government. No matter where you look, it has had a small presence in Atlantic Canada. That is why the six-month hoist is so important. We must put an end to this bill which stops the subsidy on the movement of grain into eastern Canada. It is another point in a long list of actions by the Government of Canada which has seen the removal of federal presence in the air, on the land and on the sea. The House here today should vote with the hon. member, the House leader for the Official Opposition, in the motion to put a six-month hoist on this bill. Every member of the government who votes for it will be congratulated in the next election.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, this is not a debate that I am pleased to take part in. In fact, I have already spoken twice on the At and East legislation, the first time on February 12, 1990.

At that time I pointed out that there were 400,000 to 500,000 tonnes of wheat sent under the At and East regulations by the Canadian Wheat Board. The Ontario Wheat Board alone moved between 150,000 to 200,000 tonnes under this legislation on an annual basis.

I want to commend our opposition House leader for his amendment. I recall placing a similar amendment back on June 5, 1990, to delay the implementation of this legislation until 1995.

Had the government listened to what we were saying, not only in the Official Opposition, but listened to what the witnesses in front of the legislative committee dealing with this piece of legislation were saying, it would have realized that it was making a grievous error.

When it looked at the Grains 2000 study of November 1990—and a delay such as we proposed at that time would have allowed it to take a look at the impact of this—it would have realized the error of its ways and withdrawn this legislation and put Atlantic Canada back on a competitive basis in terms of its livestock and poultry industries and saved all those jobs connected to the flour mills and the elevators in Atlantic Canada.

This government moves very, very slowly. I recall April 12, 1989, when we asked the government to do something about the no-rolled beef that was coming into Canada at the time, a million pounds a week. Since that was tabled at that time, those imports have tripled. As a result we have six packing plants that have closed in Ontario since that time. This low-grade beef has devastated the beef industry in eastern Canada.

Finally, the former Minister of Agriculture acknowledged the crisis and told the Canadian Cattlemen's Association that he has instructed his officials to require that United States beef, whether graded or ungraded, be identified as such to consumers.

Two years and two months after the problem was drawn to his attention, the government is finally going to look and see what is going on.

I have to suggest tonight that I strongly suspect that I had some of this cheap ungraded imported United States beef in the cafeteria in the Confederation Building at lunch time, tough as nails. It stays with you. You have to chew on it for a long time.

When this government cut back this subsidy, as I mentioned earlier tonight, I suspect part of the reason was that it was trying to do away with subsidies to adhere to the provisions of the Free Trade Agreement. It thought that this is a transportation subsidy, it would be a good one to do away with. The government completely ignored the fact that the maintenance of the Mississippi waterway is done by the United States Department of Defense. That, in effect, is a subsidy to the United States grain industry.

Let us examine the other subsidies the U.S. is giving. I will use one as an example, the Export Enhancement Program. For the year 1989 it was $777 million, in 1990 it was $556 million, and in 1991 it was $900 million, a total of $5,033 million since it was first introduced in May 1985.

This government is very naive to have entered into such an agreement without having the United States lower its subsidies at the same time as ours are being lowered.

It is kind of amusing that this government stands idly by and does not do anything about these subsidies. In fact, there is a provision in the free trade agreement to call for consultations if the other country keeps its subsidies. There is also a provision to ask for compensation. The government has done neither. Instead, it has opened up the borders to United States grain and grain products. We all know what is going to happen in Atlantic Canada when those subsidies on United States grain look so attractive to the grain buyers. That market will not be supplied by Canadian grains, it will be supplied by grains from other countries.

One of the interesting things I found the other day was that one of the very major grain companies in North America, American-based, has really taken advantage of these subsidies, both coming and going. It uses the export enhancement subsidy to transport grain out of the United States. Then, in turn, it took a subsidy from the European Common Market to transport barley—that is the original product it exported—from Sweden back into the United States. It has it both coming and going and this government sits idly by and cuts back our transportation subsidies, which were put in place in 1966 in order to ensure an adequate supply of grain to Atlantic Canada when the seaway is frozen up, grain that would travel by rail from western Canada or from Ontario into the areas of Atlantic Canada where it is used, or from where it is exported.

I also have to take this government to task and ask it to retaliate concerning another issue that has been brought to my attention just these last few days. The Chicago Board of Trade has passed a resolution just recently to ensure that its Export Enhancement Programs only handle American product. Therefore, this resolution would not allow those companies to buy Canadian grains because they might turn around and export them.

This is another abrogation of the free trade agreement, if this government stands idly by and lets this happen. Our Ontario soybean industry is hit hard, as the United States is the largest export market, with 70,000 tonnes shipped this year.

With what is happening here, in terms of the pressures that are being brought to bear on the Canadian producers, there were over 70 food processing plants closed in Canada last year, 32 of those in the province of Ontario. I know the minister likes to brag about the 50 new plants that have opened. However, I should remind him that on the list his department gave to me one of those plants was in Arizona, an irradiation plant, and another one in Butte, Montana, a canola-crushing plant. Those are hardly Canadian plants. Two were water-bottling plants, some were warehouses, some were plants that had previously closed and reopened.

The fact of the matter is that the food processing industry in Canada is hard pressed. By removing the At and East subsidy, by opening up the borders to American wheat, flour and other products that market will be lost to Canadian producers, who produce the highest quality grain in the world as efficiently as any of our counterparts in the United States. The government has failed to recognize that their input costs, input costs that are under direct control in many instances—I speak here of interest rates and fuel costs—have placed them out of competition.

I ask this government to reconsider the error of its ways and reinstate this legislation which is so badly needed in Canada at this time.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, Atlantic Canadians are wondering what it is that the federal government has against them. We have seen a relentless attack on Atlantic Canada and we have seen nothing to assist the fishing industry, which we all know is in a crisis and has been for some time. We have seen unemployment insurance cuts having a drastic impact on the region and cuts to transfer payments to the provinces making it ever more difficult for the provincial governments in that region to fund health care and post-secondary education. We have seen cuts to VIA Rail which have had a major impact on the ability of people within the region to move about that region. We have seen the closing of post offices. We have seen a major attack on the region of Atlantic Canada and, as I say, Atlantic Canadians are wondering why this is. What is it that the federal government has against them?

At this time all these things took place when Atlantic Canadians were and are suffering from severe economic conditions and totally unacceptable levels of unemployment.

The situation in Atlantic Canada is indicative, of course, of decades of neglect by successive federal governments and by provincial governments which refused to take matters in hand.

Last weekend, some 1,200 New Democrats were in Halifax for our annual convention, and I have had many opportunities also to visit Atlantic Canada on other occasions. What Atlantic Canadians are saying is that they have had enough of these policies which attack them, which undermine their ability to create jobs and to function in Canada as a viable region.

They demand some attention to their legitimate concerns from the federal government, and surely they have a right for the federal government to pay attention to those demands.

Coming from a province like Saskatchewan, it is easy for me to understand the concern and the anger that exists in Atlantic Canada. In fact, all of the regions of this country have been neglected by the government's obsession with its free enterprise market-driven agenda. This bill that we have before us now, Bill C-11, which will cut a further $35-or-so million from the Atlantic Canadian economy is another example of this government's obsession with market oriented policy, and in this particular case with transportation policy.

The reason for the subsidy which amounts to about $35 million was, first of all, to assist Canadian Atlantic ports in competing with American ports. But it was also designed to ensure that there would be some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities in Atlantic ports. Indeed that was one of the reasons stated by the Minister of Transport at the time for the introduction of the subsidy. In other words, the At and East rates were intended to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and the other St. Lawrence River ports.

Serious economic consequences flowed and are flowing from the termination of the At and East rates. Activities such as grain elevator operations, port and railway employment, flour milling and the movement of domestic feed grains, have already suffered as a result of the termination of the rates. Virtually all of the export grain tonnage via Saint John and a large portion of that via Halifax moves under the At and East rates. While it of course creates distortions in the transportation marketplace as a result of the subsidy, nonetheless it has given those ports an opportunity to provide employment and to provide economic activity in their regions.

It is not that people have ignored the government's concerns with regard to this transportation policy. Indeed, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission recommended some alterations, some changes in the policy which would go some way toward responding to the government's concerns while protecting the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission proposed to reduce the demand on the federal treasury by lessening or eliminating any distortions or inefficiencies. They also proposed to maintain the movement of export grain and flour through these Atlantic ports to maintain the commercial viability of those two ports of Halifax and Saint John. They proposed that the frozen rates to the St. Lawrence ports be allowed to rise to a compensatory level and be held at a compensatory level on an annual basis by the National Transportation Agency, and that rates to the ports of Halifax and Saint John be set at a fixed differential above those rates to maintain the current competitive relationship between the St. Lawrence ports and the Atlantic ports.

On the basis of fairly recent figures, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee concluded that the adoption of this proposal would save the federal government approximately one-half of its total subsidy payments, but would nonetheless maintain the viability of those ports of Halifax and Saint John.

In response to these proposals, in response to the debate that is taking place; and in response to the concern about job losses in Atlantic Canada, the government has proposed this bill which, as I say, will cut $35 million from the economy of Atlantic Canada. Such is the means by which this government listens to Canadians and responds to Canadians' concerns.

We have already seen the impact of the removal of this subsidy. We have seen the elevator at Saint John close with a loss of 90 jobs. The elevator in Halifax is operating on a break-even point on a day-to-day basis and its future is clearly in doubt.

If the Halifax elevator closes, it is likely that the only flour mill in Atlantic Canada will also be forced to close. Without the Halifax elevator, shipping feed grains by lake vessel through the port of Halifax would no longer be possible. The likelihood is that rail rates would increase by anything up to $10 a tonne. The livestock industry in the maritimes, which depends upon grain from Ontario and western Canada, would also be adversely affected. Indeed, studies have suggested that if transport costs go up by $10 a tonne that 5,000 jobs will be lost in the livestock feed mills, meat packing plants and dairy industry. That is 20 per cent of the total employed in the livestock and related industries.

The closure of the Halifax grain elevator itself would result in a loss of some 480 jobs in Halifax and possibly another 250 indirect jobs lost as well. The closure of the flour mill which is so closely related to the grain elevator would result in another 45 jobs lost.

In other words, it is a major, major impact on the economy of a region which is already under severe, severe threat.

In addition, there would be implications in Ontario as well.

Well, enough is enough. Atlantic Canadians hold the federal government in the lowest esteem they have ever held it. I guess it is possible that support could go even lower down into single figures, but it is unlikely that Atlantic Canadians are going to forget this major attack on their economy.

What Atlantic Canadians are asking for and what every Canadian is asking for is a fair shake, a fair chance for their federal government to care about what happens to them, to help when times are tough and not to slash programs which create jobs and which help keep jobs in the region.

At the NDP Convention last week, the party restated its commitment to the fishing industry, to fishing communities and to those working in the fishing industry, and became the first and only party in Canada to have a pro-active and comprehensive policy to support the shipbuilding industry. These are two critical industries to Atlantic Canada employing many, many people, industries which have received little or no support from this government. Once the ships that are presently being refitted in the Halifax yards are completed—there are three there which I visited last week—there will be no work for 1,400 people.

At the moment, the yard in Dartmouth employs 16 people when it could employ many, many hundreds.

Anyone who cares about fairness, anyone who cares about people having jobs and opportunities and feeding their families in Atlantic Canada and across this country would have to be opposed to this latest attack on Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by explaining to anybody who wonders why a member from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is getting up to speak on the At and East bill.

There are a number of reasons for it. First of all, I am an Atlantic Canadian. Second, I am very concerned about the effects this will have on the Atlantic provinces. I am very concerned in particular about the effect it will have on the ports of Saint John and Halifax since I know both the ports and the cities very well. In fact, I lived in Halifax for probably one-third of my life. I also know the economic impact this will have on the Atlantic region and I want to make a comparison before I sit down on what it could mean compared to other things that could happen that would be considered as being disastrous.

Another reason I am very anxious to speak on this is because one of the architects of this bill was one of my predecessors. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants made reference to the hon. J. W. Pickersgill many times. Mr. Pickersgill still lives in the Ottawa area, I speak with him frequently, and I know he is very interested in this debate this evening.

Although it has been done many times this evening, as much for myself as anybody else, I want to recall what At and East means. I had heard the term many times and, quite frankly, I did not quite know what it meant.

It was developed in 1959 and it is a grain and flour subsidy program administered by the National Transportation Agency. It does two things. It gives a subsidy on grain moving essentially from the Great Lakes to ports east of Montreal: Halifax and Saint John, New Brunswick; and for flour moving from points east of Thunder Bay and transported by rail to ports east of Montreal again transported to Halifax and Saint John.

The reason this was developed in 1959 was that in the United States the U.S. railway systems reduce their rates at and east of Buffalo, New York. So the "at" was Buffalo for the United States. The "at" was essentially Montreal for us. Their reduction of rates made it very difficult for Canadians to compete and the fear was that we would use the U.S. route to transport our grains and flours, so in 1959 the At and East, which we are discussing here this evening, was implemented.

It worked quite well until the budget of April 27, 1989, when the announcement was made that the 1959 At and East rate was going to be cancelled. It gave the reason for it initially as I just gave, but then it said the competitive concern no longer existed because the cost of shipping by rail to the United States ports was now considerably higher than the cost of shipping by water through the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence seaway.

As many people have said during this debate today, that was only one of the reasons this policy was developed. Again, to use the words of the then Minister of Transport, the Hon. Jack Pickersgill, another reason the legislation was under consideration was to ensure that we have rates that would provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of Atlantic ports. In other words, the major reason was for ensuring that the eastern Canadian ports could compete with the U.S. ports. In addition, it was considered by the government of the day that it was also fair to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports. I think that was reasonable then and I think that is reasonable now.

I want to get into the despicable and unforgiving manner in which this was done. The announcement was made a couple of months later. The whole thing was cancelled and this government has been trying to produce retroactive legislation which I understand from my lawyer friends is the worst kind of legislation. It tries to make right a wrong.

In the wisdom of this House, it did not get through. Then, through the stroke of something that was considered by many members to be, if not unparliamentary, then very close to it, a motion was made which reintroduced the bill to put it back to where we are today.

• (2050)

That gives me, as a new member of Parliament, not a warm feeling about how things operate in this House. I do not want to elaborate on that because that is not the reason I am on my feet.

What is this going to do? Essentially, if it is not going to devastate the port of Halifax, it is going to have a tremendous reduction.

Madam Speaker, I do not know how much you know about ports. I have spent more than half a lifetime being in ports, sailing into and out of ports. I can assure you that I have been to many ports in the world and Halifax is one of the better ones. So is Saint John, New Brunswick. They are excellent ports.

One may say: "They may be good, but if there is no use for them, why are they there?" I think there are all kinds of considerations. Let me give you one to begin with.

We have heard various figures being bandied around. We have heard of various jobs. We have heard of jobs as high as 400, 500 or 600, if you take it all into consideration. The second and third order effect, I would suggest, may well go above 1,000.

The consistent figure that we hear and the one that the government was aware of when it introduced this motion is $35 million. As the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond said, $35 million is not a lot of money to the Government of Canada. But I can assure you that it is a lot of money to Atlantic Canada when you consider the effects of all the things that have happened such as VIA Rail, unemployment insurance changes, the effects of free trade and all the other cuts, the post office, et cetera. I could go on for the rest of the time I have to be on my feet about the ills that have happened.

There is no compassion when it comes to the area that I come from. I am not one given to easy criticism of any government, or any particular party, because I know it is not easy to run a country. It is very difficult to run a country. One is bound to make mistakes, operational mistakes from doing business, if you do anything at all.

This kind of a mistake is a kind of a knife in the heart of Atlantic Canada to say nothing of what is happening here when there was really no need for it. The effects that we are going to see are not in themselves going to be devastating, but they are going to be another nail in the coffin. We do not need many more. It is just about shut down right now.

Let me tell you what $35 million means. I once did a speech to the Board of Trade in Halifax and I indicated that the effect of the Navy in the Halifax–Dartmouth area was roughly 25 per cent of the economy if you took into effect the first, second and third orders; the families, their spendings, the doctors, the dentists and the professionals required because of the people in the Halifax area.

Madam Speaker, do you know what that worked out to? It was around $350 million a year at that time. That was about three years ago. Thirty-five million dollars is 10 per cent of that. If one looks at the $350 million as being one-quarter, 10 per cent is a pretty big impact on the Halifax–Dartmouth area.

What happens when the jobs are lost? What about the welfare payments? What about the UIC? What about all the other things that are going to happen?

As we all know, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is responsible for running the At and East program, and it is going to have to come up with something else for the grains and the flours that are not being brought to eastern Canada.

Do you know what they are going to do? They are looking at the possibility of, would you believe this, importing foreign wheats, oats and barley, not from the United States, but from France and from Europe.

Here is the scenario. We jack up the rates so we do not get the flour and the grain, and what do we do? We get the grain, flour, wheat, oats and barley from Europe and France. Therefore, we will not subsidize the rates for eastern Canada because, for some reason or other, it is not considered to be efficient. I am not going to make any odious comparisons with the west. Then we go and subsidize the European Economic Community, with which we are great competitors. I try to understand this, and I cannot. I doubt if any member here can. I have stood in this House and voted for and against many things. But when I get up to vote against this, it is going to be one of the most vicious votes I have ever made because I think it is one of the worst things that has happened in this House since I have been a member of Parliament.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I just want to compliment the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception on a very thoughtful speech on a very complex issue which, frankly, a lot of people do not understand. I share his views. Being a member of the transport committee for several years, I can say in terms of witnesses who came before that committee and members who were on that committee that the At and East is such an inane title to a subsidy program. If we called it pork and beans, anything we wanted, then there would be a little life to the thing. But as you say, it was at and east of Buffalo.

In the budget of 1989, the then Minister of Finance only mentioned one reason why it did not apply any more, in his judgement, and he did not mention the other reason that Mr. Jack Pickersgill stated in the House in 1966 when he confirmed the At and East in legislation.

I do not want to trespass too long here, and I am not going to repeat everything that was said earlier, certainly by me. Several of my colleagues across the way have said this is a dead issue because the subsidy de facto has not been paid since July 16, I think, of 1989 under cabinet order. Therefore, this bill is really putting the end to a subsidy program that may have been nice, but things change. It is over. It is history.

As I did say, repeating myself a little, I have concerns. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception touched on it, showing the reason why he was the Grand Admiral of the Maritime Command Fleet in his very lucid assessment of the issue.

I am not worried tonight about speaking on the history of a subsidy program. I will be the first to admit that a lot of subsidy programs have to be changed, have to be cancelled, have to be phased out, re-adapted to changing circumstances. My concern about history is the history of that elevator. I cannot stress it enough here tonight in as even a way as one can, that I am disappointed that more Atlantic Canadians from all sides of the House have not contributed to this part of the debate. If that elevator goes, the $35 million input into the economy that my hon. friend talked about is there in spades. Relatively speaking, I hasten to say, that is a conservative estimate of the impact of that as it filters down into the agriculture area, let alone the flour mill, which is the only flour mill, that is viable and ongoing in Atlantic Canada.

The thing that really bothers me about the other side of the subsidy program is the multiplier effect that you get out of some subsidies. My hon. friend from Regina—Lumsden asked me a question about this after I finished speaking earlier. I had not been asked that question previously, and someone should answer it. No one is going to answer it tonight, and most likely it is not going to be answered before we get to vote on this bill.

With all respect to our British parliamentary system, this is where there have to be more changes made, more reform in this House to make it a more viable place where we have more meaningful debate and where we get more objective advice. I refer to the American system, in part, where they have their OMB, their Office of Management and their other agency which does congressional assessments and studies on the impact of legislation.

In all the years the At and East has been before this House, I have seen nothing. I hope if there was something that could refute me that the government would produce it before we vote. That was basically the first part of the question from the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, who asked me if the cost of the subsidy varied between $28 and $40 million. This is why it is so difficult to put a handle on it. It changes from year to year, depending on the shipments of grain and/or the export of flour.

Roughly, it has gone from $28 million to $40 million over the period of its existence. But is the cost of that any more or any less than the cost of the coast guarding effect. My maritime commander might even have figures on that. Seriously, is that the cost of a subsidy which has a multiplier effect because it helps the farm community and it helps people all through the community? Goodness knows how that is clawed back by government in taxes. So it is really not a $28 million to $40 million output, depending on what year you take it, because an awful lot of it comes back in taxes because of the economic activity of the $35 million that my friend talked about.

But then you still have the cost of the navigational equipment and the ice-breaking facilities to keep the St. Lawrence open, to say nothing of the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec. I have never seen that assessment as to whether one offsets the other or what is the deficit or surplus position. I would think in another way, in another world, a more ideal world that we should know something about that before we cut off this type of subsidy. We all know that once you cut it off, it is not going to come back. And that brings me to my final point.

I am perhaps being a little more aggressive than my hon. friend who spoke before me, a very even-tempered and mature person. I am trying to be that myself. However, have been here for a few years and have had At and East talked about until it is like corn flakes coming out of my ears, and still nothing is provided by government to help offset the loss of the subsidy, to fill in the vacuum, to help compensate for the loss of the economic activity.

I have certain friends over there, and I am not going to name them by constituency because that might get a little too close, who are neighbours and friends of mine from my province of Nova Scotia. They have said that we could do this, or we could have double stacking, or we could have the corn countervail come off, or we could have unit trains that go from Halifax through. We could have all these things. We could have a marvellous world out there. But we all know there are some realities.

The thing that bothers me about this piece of legislation, without getting into the procedural reasons why we are debating it tonight which I mentioned earlier is another debate in itself, if this thing is dead as it has been in terms of dollars paid out since July 16, 1989, what is the problem with the amendment moved by the opposition House leader? In effect, it would give it that six-month hoist so that at least the bill is not completed, proclaimed and finally terminated so that there can be some pressure on the bureaucracy to use a lever. We all respond to pressure. We know that in this world of ours. There would be some pressure on the bureaucracy to come up with some of those mythical offsets.

That is what bothers me, and that is why I think the amendment moved by the opposition House leader has merit. I know there are some sincere members and a couple of sincere ministers on the government side who have been trying to work out some type of meaningful program to offset the loss of this subsidy so that we are not left high and dry in Atlantic Canada as we have been in so many ways as described here by other colleagues of mine tonight.

That is the reason why every Atlantic Canadian, at least I would think, would have to support the amendment of the opposition House leader. If that does not carry, then certainly for their own consciences and those of their constituents, they should have no hesitation in voting against a piece of legislation that is not going to do what it is intended to do anyway, namely, save the taxpayer's money, yet is going to have an adverse effect on the economy of an area that really cannot stand many more blows.

Again, I am glad to have had the chance again, in view of the amendment of the opposition House leader, to have spoken. I just hope that members on all sides, and especially the government side, those from Atlantic Canada will really decide that sometimes parties are necessary, but the people you represent are fundamental. On this bill, there is absolutely no question of how you should vote.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have been listening to the debate on this motion. Is it C-11 or is it C-26? It is regurgitated, right?

An hon. member: It is C-11 today.

Mr. Fisher: Yes. And the fact that it is even back in the same form it was before the House prorogued is indicative of the problem that this House is facing, and not only with this piece of legislation.

I have been listening to the debate on C–11, in its earlier form and since it has been amended as well, and I see the speakers groping for some way to express what will happen in the most horrendous terms possible. It seems that it is not possible to come up with a superlative that describes how horrendous this bill is.

An hon. member: Grotesque.

Mr. Fisher: No, that does not even come anywhere near it.

The Americans have a way of distilling the English language. If we were American, we may say: "I am from Missouri, I have no faith in this. I do not believe it. It is not going to work". We have "good news, bad news", which has almost become a cliché. When it comes to C–11, the regurgitated C–26, there is no good news. We have come to a point where the worst–case scenario, as described by the opposition—and I would say collectively, in all charity—really becomes in the real world, as the previous speaker mentioned, the good news. The worst–case scenario which we described really becomes the best news.

If you are referring to free trade, we described the worst–case scenario and it turned out to be even worse. Perhaps not the best news, just the only news. It is worse than we even imagined. The changes to C–21 are far worse in their devastation than the opposition described. Where the opposition was talking about the transfer payments and the unwillingness of the government to keep up with the increases in inflation, as far as post–secondary education and medicare are concerned, our worst description becomes even better than reality has turned out to be.

That is the case with this piece of legislation. The At and East was simply a way to compensate for the extra cost of hauling exported grain to the Atlantic ports of Saint John and Halifax in the winter when the St. Lawrence is closed and the ability to ship it by the cheaper waterway was no longer an option available to the wheat producers or the grain producers of Canada.

It had the spin–off effect of keeping the elevator in Saint John and the elevator in Halifax viable entities, employing many people along the way. That is good, and we will get into the numbers of people that are involved in that. The concept of the At and East is just a marvellous way of helping the grain producers of the west and Ontario, a way to help the millers of the maritimes, a way to help the livestock producers and the poultry producers of the maritimes as well, and to keep the cost down for them and the products they produce, which the people of the region consume. We had a positive spin–off there as well.

What has been proposed has not only been proposed, it has been eliminated. During part of the previous debate someone from the government side said: "It is gone. It is finished". That is probably an apt description of what is going to happen to this government as a result of the programs it has brought in, the others which I have referred to including this one.

One of the previous speakers referred to the elimination of the lighthouses and how the lighthouse keeper said the closest habitation to him was Europe and Africa. I suggest that this kind of legislation and previous situations show that the Government of Canada is equally as far removed from the populace of Canada and will suffer the results.

The grain elevator in Halifax, which I referred to previously, contributes to the economy of the city and the region somewhere in the neighbourhood of $25.9 million per year and employs somewhere around 480 people on a continuous basis. That is just the grain handling portion of it.

As a result of it being able to store grain for the millers of the area, it contributes, through that and through the milling facilities, another $28.4 million to the region for a total of $54 million.

The At and East cost the federal government somewhere around $40 million, so we can see that from the port of Halifax alone there is a positive effect within the Canadian economy of somewhere around $14 million. If we include the port of Saint John, the other open water port during the time that the St. Lawrence is frozen, and its contribution of somewhere around $8.5 million and around 90 jobs we can see that the total economic effect to the region is extremely positive in relation to the expenditures.

We, as New Democrats, have suggested that, in agreement as a matter of fact with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, perhaps the $40 million is, in view of increased technology and so on and the changing times, a figure that could be reduced. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission suggested a cost of $20 million could be a sustainable figure and still keep the ports open and be able to continue as had been done with the $40 million under the At and East.

Comparing the $20 million which has been proposed in comparison to the almost $60 million result shows a tremendous cost advantage for the Canadian people.

If we take into consideration the probability that the cost with the At and East being eliminated will rise by $10 per tonne, there is the probability that flour mills will close. There is the probability that packing houses will close. There is the probability that the livestock industry, the feed mills, will also be adversely affected in the region to the tune of somewhere around 5,000 jobs in the ancillary agricultural activities within the region. That amounts to almost a fifth of the people employed in the agricultural sector of the economy of the region.

There are effects as well for the province of Ontario. Four grain elevators will shut down, or have shut down, because the At and East has been cancelled—two of them in Midland, one in Port McNicoll and one in Prescott.

It is interesting to mention that the one in Midland and the one in Port McNicoll are in the constituency of the present Solicitor General. I do not know whether that indicates bravery on the part of that gentleman or not, however it is also interesting to note that he was the Minister of Transport when it came into effect.

The worst-case scenario is that as a result of the elimination of this subsidy there is a likelihood that a good many of the other commodities all across the railroads to the maritimes will be diminished, perhaps even to the point where there will no longer be any trains, as is the case in Newfoundland.

I can see the time when all the way from the constituency of the Solicitor General to the maritimes there may be no railroad at all except perhaps the CPR which runs from Montreal to Boston.

My time has run out. I tried to outline the worst case scenario and I assure the House that things will be one heck of a lot worse than that.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about this bill and raise a few questions which I think are being raised in the minds of some Canadians. I think the last poll showed about 86 per cent of Canadians at the present time just cannot accept or understand what this present government is trying to do to this country. As said by some earlier speakers this evening, the big question in their minds is what they are going to do and continue to do for the next two years.

The question comes to my mind as well. Their actions on this bill, the support of the maritime, western and Ontario grain producers through this bill and the way this bill was used in the At and East subsidy really beg the question: what is the government trying to do to rural Canada, and for what reason? It is shutting down post offices. I have had the opportunity to be in the west and I am not exaggerating when I say that I was through towns, rural towns, in which there were four by eight sheets of plywood across the windows and doors of the shops and the stores.

I cannot understand the purpose or the reason or the motive of the government to continually try to drive rural people out of the areas where the quality of life is second to none, where everything can be provided and where it is a tremendous place to raise families, and into the more urban areas where unfortunately some of the problems of our society today seem to exist at a much higher rate and intensity.

We know that the At and East subsidy was put in a number of years ago for several reasons. It was put in to allow producers another route to market grain from this country on an open port, 12 months of the year. It was also provided and put in place in order to provide jobs through that avenue to the maritimes where they have been, are now, and certainly will be needed in the future. I know that it was not put in place to assist livestock producers in the maritimes. That was not the purpose of it. It was for milling grains and flour and the shipment of those. I would be less than honest if I did not say it had some positive spin-off effect.

Much of the feed grain needed in the maritime region for livestock production has to be brought into the area and this being there, not used directly but indirectly, was certainly a positive effect.

Just this morning, to raise the question again, what is the government trying to do? What is its motive? At the standing committee on agriculture we had presentations from the Ontario wheat producers board and from the prairie pools. The discussion this morning was on the opening of the Canada–U.S. border to U.S. grain coming in. I do not know and I have been in the agricultural industry and the agrifood industry all my life. I keep asking myself what the purpose or the motive is behind all of this.

There does not seem to be an answer. Some of the things we hear people say I do not choose to repeat here in the House because they are not very polite things and I do not wish to make those comments.

We have a situation in the maritimes right now, over all in the maritimes, in which we are looking at somewhere around a 15 per cent unemployment rate. We know that this program has cost $30 to $40 million in the past, and that is a considerable sum of money. I realize that and I recognize that. We also know that in order to make money, in order to create money, you have to spend money. The spin-off effect of this program has been tremendous, and it has not only gone to one small group. It has gone to the producers in the west, the producers in Ontario, to those who take part in the transportation system, to the mills in the maritimes, to the ports, to the elevators and it has gone to all kinds of people.

Why is the government doing it? How can the maritime backbenchers and the maritime cabinet ministers sit there and do this to their own people? Then to make a farce of the whole thing, the government did this back in July of 1989. I have not been a real student of the parliamentary process for as long as many of my colleagues have been here in this House, but it was my understanding that when the House was prorogued whatever was on the Order Paper died.

I guess I should not have said some of the things that I did to some of my constituents when we were talking about that at town hall meetings earlier this winter. They asked me: "Mr. Vanclief, what happens to the work that is before the House?" I said: "when the House is prorogued it all dies on the Order Paper". Now I have to go back and explain to them why it did not die on the Order Paper. Here it is back again. What purpose? Another example, if you are wondering what the government is trying to do, is it is trying to manipulate the orders of the House, the Standing Orders of the House, and trying to manipulate what Canadians have wanted to and still want to think of this House, this great Chamber that we are in tonight and every day.

As a colleague from the other place said when he visited my riding not too long ago, when you look at much of the system and much of what the present government is doing to the system and the way it is using the system to achieve whatever goal the government is trying to achieve, quite frankly we cannot understand what that is, other than it appears to be total destruction and total lack of care for individuals, whether they be primary producers, blue collar workers or whoever.

You tend to have to almost force your mind from wandering to the thought of knowing who wanted the free trade agreement, and knowing who wanted the GST. The friends and the buddies of the government wanted these and the government has delivered for the good of a few and without question for the harm of the majority of Canadians.

There is an amendment before the House. I ask the government to stop and take account of what it has done, take account of what it is about to continue to do, and take account of one case in particular in which we in the opposition told the government it was doing the wrong thing when it came to the handling of grain, and that was a few months ago on the Advance Payments for Crops Program. We pleaded with the government at that time. It can do nothing more than come back to us at this time and say to the opposition, if it is being honest with itself and honest with Canadians: "You told us the right thing, opposition members." It did reinstate the advance payment. I am asking the government, I am pleading with it on behalf of primary producers and every one in the system; the employees, the workers, the elevator operators, the port workers, those who want to purchase grain from Canada at that time of year. It opens another market, it gives another avenue to ship, and heaven forbid we need all of those every chance we get.

The government talks about being competitive and that we have to stay that way, and every time we turn around it takes away one of our competitive edges, one of our management tools and one of our operative tools in marketing of grains and crops. The government speaks one thing out of one side of its mouth and another thing out of the other side of its mouth. It really begs the question.

In closing, I ask the government to reconsider. The amendment before the House tonight is giving it the chance to reconsider what it has done and what it wants to make official by the passing of this bill. When government members vote with their conscience, I hope they stop to think that what they are doing is to the detriment of so many in so many different ways. I ask them to support the amendment before the House put forward by the House leader of the Opposition here this evening.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege, although I was not intending to speak on this debate. I must admit that, I would not call it coerced, but I was motivated to speak. Now that I have spent the last three hours here, I think it is very appropriate. It again proves a lesson to me that if you stay in this House and listen to the debate there is so very, very much to learn. I am sure the Canadian people know that there are not many more than 20 people out here and I hope there are more of them out there who have also learned a great deal about a topic which is of extreme importance to eastern Canada.

As I listened to the ribbon of thought, I said: "Now how can I relate that to my constituency?" The longer I spend here the more I feel that I can relate it because I was in eastern Canada this past weekend and I am in my own constituency a great deal and the two are very similar. We are all like voices in the wilderness saying: "Please pay attention. Please do not do any more economic injustice to us."

When I think of the $35 million subsidy that goes toward the At and East I relate that to my community and I relate it to transportation. Sault Ste. Marie is at the confluence of the Great Lakes. We had a proud Sault Ste. Marie lock. It has been closed for three years. It would cost $35 million to replace that entire lock. We have implored the transport ministers, all of them, to put some money into the canal because it is a Canadian link between the Great Lakes. The answer from our government is that there is no necessity for a Canadian link and we can rely on the American locks. Thirty-five million dollars would make a tremendous investment in our community. The lock is on the very flag of our city. Does it want us to tear it off the face of the community? That is why it is so very, very easy to relate to what is happening here with At and East.

I now realize the extreme importance of the funding of this subsidy to eastern Canada. The amount is perhaps insignificant to the amount of money when you compare it with the dislocation of people and the social programs which have to come into place to fund, I understand, 5,000 people whose jobs will be lost because of this action. I am sure the cost will be much more than the $32 million.

My reading tells me that the revenues into Halifax and Saint John are beyond the $32 million subsidy. It is a net gain. Therefore, why the action?

I think all of the members from eastern Canada have suggested that. We cannot understand the rationale. The rationale from the government, as it said on April 21, 1989, was that the subsidy has the effect of diverting traffic away from the seaway in favour of subsidized rail movements and is inconsistent with the government's market-oriented transportation policy. There is the bottom line. It is for market oriented transportation policy, as in VIA Rail, and beyond transportation policy we get into Canada Post and PetroCan. We are talking about a federal presence in eastern Canada, in northern Ontario, that we are beginning to miss. We are losing that federal presence. This is a disavowal of the government's obligation to be in these outlying areas, the extremities of Canada. It is extremely, extremely unfortunate, and it is a euphemism to say unfortunate.

• (2130)

From time to time it has been attempted, I do not think intentionally, to pit region against region. The figure of the western subsidy amounts to $700 million and certainly the $32 or $35 million pales in comparison. Should we be pitting west versus east? From time to time it involves central Canada. People say: "This is done at the expense of eastern Canada to support rich central Canada". I resent that attitude, because central Canada, Ontario and Quebec namely, is suffering economic hardship, probably beyond just about everyone else. Because of the loss of manufacturing jobs people can no longer look to central Canada with envy. We are in similar circumstances with eastern Canada.

Subsidy is a difficult concept to define, certainly as shown by the free trade agreement. There was a purpose and there is a purpose for subsidies. If regional subsidies are used strategically and appropriately, they can help the areas of Canada that require that help. We just cannot disband all subsidies because of a bottom-line, budgetary decision. We cannot allow that to happen.

Take a look at the irony of this situation. We are competing with the Europeans, who are heavily subsidized in agriculture, and the Americans, who are heavily subsidized, and we are the good people, the fair traders who once again bow to everybody and say: "We will lower our subsidies or we will cut them completely out".

Again I can relate the same experience to my constituency in terms of steel. The steel industry in the United States is subsidized to the tune of $30 million. In Canada if there is a very small intent to subsidize steel the Americans countervail and harass us with rulings that are actually frivolous. However, when it comes to the agreement and the dispute settlement they are not so frivolous because the panel rules against us.

Therefore, this subsidy issue is a very delicate one and very, very difficult to define. Our Canadian government always acts very sheepishly and non-aggressively in its dealings with the American government.

Dislocation of people is what we are talking about. The dislocation and the costs associated with the dislocation are nothing. They pale in comparison to what this At and East had accomplished since 1966.

Various people have mentioned the retroactivity of the bill. I have only been here two and half years and I only recall one other bill that was made retroactive. It is hard to imagine legislation that can be implemented retroactively. There is a great deal of legislation we would like to absolve or get rid of, take off the books retroactively, if only we could do that.

In closing, I apologize for my perhaps total lack of comprehension of this At and East subsidy and all the ramifications of cutting out this subsidy for eastern Canada.

I am beginning to comprehend it and I do understand the philosophy and the theories of this government that I know are detrimental not only to eastern Canada but to all of Canada.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I was not intending to speak on this bill but I have sat here for the last four hours listening patiently, together with my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, to all the arguments against this bill.

I have not seen any Tories with the courage to stand up to defend Bill C-11. If it is such a good piece of legislation, where are the Tories? Canadians have a right to know. If it is good legislation and if it is defensible then why are they not standing up and doing their job? They are getting paid big bucks to come to this Parliament to speak out on behalf of their constituents.

A good question is where are the Tories? Where are the ministers? We have two lousy Tories in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for York South-Weston would want to rephrase that part of his speech.

Mr. Nunziata: I understand it is unparliamentary to call a Tory lousy. I will withdraw the word "lousy".

The point is that we have four cabinet ministers from Atlantic Canada. Where oh where are they, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston has been in this House as long as I have been in this House. He very well knows that it is not parliamentary, and should not be done in a speech especially when it is done as wilfully as it is now, to mention the presence or absence of members or ministers in the House. The hon. member is very well aware of that.

As he has been in the House for the last few hours, I am sure he could find some other way to talk about the bill which is now in front of the House, or the amendment which his House leader has put on the table.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I was not commenting on their presence or absence in the House. I was commenting on their absence from the debate.

There is a distinction. There is a very clear distinction. I could pretend they are in the House but I cannot pretend that they have participated in the debate, which they have not. That is the point I am making, and that point is parliamentary.

I will speak to the merits of Bill C-11. I will make some very brief comments and I would hope that some cabinet ministers will stand up on behalf of the Government of Canada to indicate the reasons so many people must lose their jobs as a result of the end of the At and East subsidy.

Perhaps they can explain to the people of Canada why the government has chosen to pass the bill retroactively. As other speakers have indicated, the subsidy in fact terminated some two years ago. The government, in the last Parliament, introduced Bill C-26. Then it decided to prorogue Parliament.

When a government prorogues Parliament, legislation that is on the Order Paper dies. Bill C-26 ought to have died. It was down. It was out, and the government tried to resurrect it. In fact, it did resurrect it through some type of parliamentary boondoggle or mouth to mouth resuscitation. It brought the bill back to life.

Here we are debating the bill now known as Bill C-11 at third reading stage. Not only has this bill been resurrected but in effect it will be retroactive to terminate a subsidy that has been in place from the mid-1960s until two years ago.

The government has not provided a reasonable rationale for terminating a subsidy that amounts to anywhere from $33 million to $35 million annually. Now, to some people that is a lot of money. Indeed, it is a lot of money. But it makes absolutely no economic sense as to why this government has chosen to terminate that particular subsidy, again, as part of a systematic plan to destroy Atlantic Canada.

Does the government not realize the impact that this bill will have on the economy in Atlantic Canada? My colleagues have very eloquently pointed out the negative economic impact that this bill will have in Halifax, for example, and in Saint John. Export grain shipments to Halifax and Saint John, as you know, have been stopped, and as a direct result the Saint John grain elevator has closed, putting 55 people out of work.

Surely the 55 people at the Port of Saint John, the grain elevator employees, have a right to hear from their representatives on the government side the reasons why they are out of a job today. The government does not have the courage to stand up and tell those people. The continued viability of the elevator at Halifax is in question as a result of this particular bill as well.

Will the government explain to the 27 employees at the port of Halifax who have already lost their jobs why it is that they are out of work today? This particular bill will suck out of the Atlantic economy not $35 million, but maybe five times that amount, perhaps ten times that amount, in terms of the economic spin-offs as a result of that particular activity.

It makes no sense at all to put some 500 or 750 people out of work when the Government of Canada will end up paying much more in terms of unemployment insurance, much more in terms of other types of subsidies, to Atlantic Canada, the parts of Atlantic Canada that are affected by this regressive and unconscionable piece of legislation. Those people, if they are working, will pay taxes. That is why this bill makes no sense at all, it puts people out of work. And when you are out of work, you cannot pay taxes. So the government says: we want to save $35 million and so we are going to end this subsidy that has been in place, that subsidizes the transportation of grain to ports at and east of Buffalo, as I understand it.

The amendment posed by my House leader, the House leader for the Official Opposition, makes eminent good sense. What does that amendment do? It would put on hold this piece of legislation for six months. I am convinced that if government members thought about this a bit, if they reviewed some of the documentation that I have reviewed over the last number of hours, if they listened to the opposition members who have spoken, they, too, will become convinced that it is the wrong thing to do, and certainly at the wrong time. Canada is in the midst of a recession and here the government is simply compounding the problem in an area of the country that needs as much assistance as possible.

As I indicated, this is not the first action of this government which has shoved a further nail into the coffin of the economy off Atlantic Canada. There have been others. My colleagues from the Halifax area, for example, and other parts of Atlantic Canada, have stood up time and time again to defend their constituents, indeed the constituents of Conservative members who do not have the courage to stand up and defend this piece of legislation, if in fact it is defensible.

Here it is, Bill C-11. It is but two or three pages. What it does, the impact of these two or three pages of legislation, is significant, to say the least, in terms of the economy of two ports in particular and in all of Atlantic Canada.

I would ask, in closing, that the government reconsider this bill, to simply hoist it from the Order Paper for a six-month period as requested by my House leader, and in that period I am convinced that we on the opposition side will be able to convince government members that it is the wrong thing to do.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I sat here and listened to the excellent speech of the hon. member for York South—Weston and I note that the government introduced a motion yesterday to change the hours of sitting in this House to extend them to 10 p.m. throughout the bulk of the next two-week period.

The point of order, as the parliamentary secretary must know, is that there is not a single minister of the Crown in this House. While the rest of the members are forced to sit here until ten o'clock debating government legislation, the ministers go and tuck up in bed.

I resent that. The ministers have an obligation to be here. At least two of them should be here. They should not be home tucked up in bed while we are debating their crummy legislation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member does know that this is not a point of order and I must say that I am amazed that he would even consider thinking where ministers are or could be.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I, too, would like to join the debate at this late hour and wish as well, like my colleague, that the ministers from the government side would be here and listening to our points. What is raised in this debate is about the Canadian value of caring, about the Canadian value of fairness and equality for regions.

Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), also known as the At and East bill, is indeed an indictment, an indictment of our set of Canadian values.

Let me just tell the government opposite, the few members who are here, that to me, Bill C-11 poses hazards to people's lives, poses hazards to the citizens of the Atlantic region in particular, and indicates to me that this bill is an index of contempt by the government in this great institution, Parliament.

Why is that? Bill C-11 was introduced during the previous Parliament, as we know, as Bill C-26. It died on the Order Paper at third reading. Showing contempt for Parliament, showing contempt for Canadian citizens represented here in Parliament, the Tory government resurrected Bill C-26 following the commencement of the new session. The bill was resurrected at the same stage, trying to bypass the series of readings and debates so that Canadians may know more of the ills of this particular bill.

The government, I also submit, is showing contempt for Parliament as the rail subsidy for grain shipments was terminated in July 1989 and today, two years later, they are trying to pass legislation to legitimize what then was not legitimate.

I recall a fundamental teaching in high school that one of the principles in law-making is you do not pass a law that makes an act punishable that at the time was not. In other words, you do not pass a retroactive law.

What will prevent government in the future if we allow this bill to dictate on the events of the past by usurping the power and authority of law-making.

Export grain shipments to Halifax and Saint John have stopped and as a direct result the Saint John grain elevator is closed, putting 55 people out of work.

• (2150)

Perhaps 55 people in the eyes and minds and hearts of this government are not many but every citizen that suffers a job loss has to be taken care of by the government. There is no excuse. That person has a family to support, that person has a family to feed.

Truly, the economic impact on that part of our country will be devastating if we allow this to proceed.

Moreover, this bill in a sense reflects the mismanagement of agriculture by this government of agriculture. In a sense, it also tells of this government's undermining of orderly marketing in the country. It removes the storage option for grain, forcing the producer to sell at harvest time, producing a glut in pricing. We know the consequence of that.

It also will have a very serious effect, a negative effect, on our export capacity to export grains and flour.

When we recall that three government studies have seriously questioned the wisdom of removing the At and East bill, how can we tell Canadians that this government is listening to experts in the country? I think it shows the arrogance of this government.

As I said in the beginning, this bill is an indictment of the Canadian values of caring for our citizens wherever they are, of ensuring that there is fairness from east to west to north in Canada. We should really entrench in our thinking as parliamentarians the principle of equality of regions, the equality of provinces irrespective of their size. They are Canadians.

About a couple of weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting Saint John's and I was impressed by the beauty of that area. I was impressed by the sense of belonging and community in that part of the country. Let us continue to preserve that. Let us give hope for the citizens of the Atlantic region. I from the west, from the province of Manitoba, also a have not province, truly feel the pains of the citizens from the Atlantic region.

In conclusion, the Liberal Party wants to give Atlantic Canadians fairness. As a result, we have proposed an amendment that the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefore:

> Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies) be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Why is that? Why have we proposed this amendment? It is because we would like to give this government a last chance, a time to reflect and avoid regrets in the future, a time to repent and avoid remorse in the future, a time to retreat for this government so that Canadians may preserve their Canadian values.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and participate in the debate. I am glad that my point of order a few moment ago, which Your Honour said was unsatisfactory as a point of order, has produced results and ministers have appeared. I am delighted that the ministers were here to hear the comments of my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North and I am sure that the ministers will stay to hear my comments on this bill, in peril of having another point of order raised.

I know the Minister of Supply and Services—despite his penchant for the telephone, which I am sure is provided by his department—will want to remain and hear my remarks. I was polite enough to hear him out in Kingston the other night when he spoke at a meeting of the Kingston Historical Society honouring the 100th anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald's death. I know the hon. minister who was there on the occasion was pleased to be in attendance. I was delighted to welcome him to my constituency and hope he will pay another visit to Kingston in the near future.

The hon. member says definitely, he got to listen to me as well. I know he found it a treat then as he is finding it tonight.

What I wanted to mention about this particular bill was my concern with the way the government has proceeded with this legislation.

Mr. Vanclief: It is disgusting.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Prince Edward–Hastings says that it is disgusting. That is a very close description of the procedures that have been followed with respect to this matter.

Mr. Mifflin: Despicable.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Bonavista–Trinity–Conception uses the expression despicable. All expressions perhaps would suit in this case but I am restraining my language and am trying to use the words that I used before in this debate when we discussed the question of the admissibility of the motion that the government used to bring this bill back before the House.

This bill has a chequered history. It was introduced during the last session of this Parliament and proceeded through all stages to the third reading stage. It had not started debate on third reading. Indeed, the government was reluctant to call the bill at third reading during the last session because it knew there would be a protracted debate and probably a very vigorous debate, mounted particularly by those members who are from eastern Canada. It is not to be forgotten that the electors of eastern Canada saw fit to throw out most of the Tory hacks who were representing them in this House for the years from 1984 to 1988 during the 1988 election.

The hon. member for Bonavista–Trinity–Conception, my hon. and gallant colleague, is living proof. If any more is needed I could cite many others who were elected in Atlantic Canada to represent the interests of that region in this House. This bill is anathema to Atlantic Canada. It proceeded through all stages but third reading during the last session and now we are faced with a situation where the government, instead of calling for third reading and sitting an extra couple of days and enduring a couple more Question Periods, decided the best thing to do was get the House adjourned and then prorogued and start a new session and commence debate on this bill again.

It was quite unwilling to go through first reading, second reading, report stage, and committee stage with this bill. It decided it had better reintroduce it at third reading so it did not have to go through those other stages and listen to arguments that it regarded as tedious and dull. Rather than introduce it in the normal way, it decided to do something completely unprecedented in the history of our Parliament.

The hon. Minister of Supply and Services wags his head. I tell him this was completely unprecedented. If he would take the time to look at the precedents, he would agree with me. Never ever before has a government moved unilaterally to bring bills back into the House at a stage and ignoring all previous stages.

Mr. Sobeski: Tell us about the bill and not the procedure.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "Tell us about the bill and not the procedure". Never mind the procedure, he says. I remind the hon. member that procedure is a very important thing in this country. Arthur Meighen lost an election because of procedure. He called it constitutional froth and was defeated at the polls, and I remind the hon. member of that. It is a remembrance that might serve the hon. member well come 1992 or 1993. He may find that the procedures that he and the government he supports have adopted have resulted in such an abuse of the privileges of the members of this House that the Canadian people are sick to death of that kind of abuse and will throw this government out. The government will be lucky to hold as many seats after the next election as the Bloc Quebecois now has.

I do not want to get on to the next election. I would rather deal with the present, and I want to deal with the procedural aspect of the present. That is the argument that this bill has been brought before us in a way that is clandestine and wrong. The government has never ever before proceeded to introduce a motion to reinstate bills at any stage in the proceedings of the House without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Dick: See how reasonable we were when we were in opposition.

Mr. Milliken: Always, on previous occasions, unanimous consent was given.

The hon. member says: "See how reasonable we were when we were in opposition". Consent was very rarely given because it was very rarely asked for.

In the days when the hon. member was in opposition, we had a government in Canada that knew how to run the House of Commons. It organized its affairs. It organized its affairs so that when a session was prorogued the business was done and it started a new session with a new agenda and a new program, completely contrary to the situation we are witnessing today in this House.

There is no new agenda. There are no new programs. We are debating these old bills and they are being reintroduced by a short–circuit method to avoid legitimate debate and legitimate criticism in this House and in the country. That is what is going on in this case and that is what has gone on in several other cases. Five bills were introduced by this outrageous technique, a totally unprecedented technique.

We had the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader make—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Am I to understand that the hon. member has not concluded his remarks?

Mr. Milliken: Certainly not. The time, it seems, has run out.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I would like to discuss a matter I raised the other day here in the House. Canada is now experiencing one of the worst recessions in its history, further aggravated by the fact that it was created by the same Tory government that was elected to protect and enhance the well-being of Canadians. It is clear this government has failed miserably, Madam Speaker.

I rise in the House this evening to draw the attention of government members to the fact that some regions in Canada are worse off than others in these difficult times, and the Liberals are not alone in feeling this is so. The Conference Board of Canada also believes that Quebec has been affected more severely by the recession than other provinces.

On June 4, the Liberals spent a whole day drawing the attention of the government to the disastrous economic situation in the Montreal region which has been severely hit by the recession. One example is the manufacturing sector, where plant after plant is closing its doors. I am thinking of General Motors in Boisbriand, and Henkel in Ville d'Anjou, my former riding, right next door to Saint-Léonard. Pascal, one of the oldest hardware chains in Montreal, has closed its doors, and I could go on with a whole list of companies and plants where jobs have been lost, Madam Speaker. It is particularly ironic that we should be talking about employment today, considering that this government was elected in 1984 on a promise to create jobs.

[English]

Jobs, jobs, jobs. That was the slogan of the 1984 Tory campaign and look what happened today.

Montreal's hotel industry is also suffering the negative impact of this recession. In Montreal, more than 4,000 jobs have been lost in this sector since 1988. Last April, the unemployment rate in the Montreal region, a densely populated area, was 4 per cent higher than the unemployment rate in the Toronto region. Madam Speaker, this government has created a recession, and that is intolerable.

Perhaps we should also consider the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands, one of the most beautiful regions in Canada, which now has an unemployment rate of over 27 per cent. What hope do young people have for the future in an area which offers no opportunities for durable employment? We can't expect to revive the hope and confidence of these young people with the kind of empty shell offered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the end of last month.

The Tory member from Gaspé is well aware of the problems in this region. Unfortunately, he didn't have the courage to defend the interests of his constituents. I am referring to an article that appeared in the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil on March 7.

The privatization of bait plants by Fisheries and Oceans and Public Works seems to work in favour of producers, at the expense of fishermen. Nevertheless, this industry forms the basis of the region's economy.

Madam Speaker, how can the Minister of National Health and Welfare expect to convince the residents of this area that his recent announcement will help them, when he is doing nothing to support the economic base of this region?

I would also like to know what the government intends to do to prevent an exodus of young people looking for durable jobs because there are no opportunities in this region.

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up. Thank you very much.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few moments again to tell the government's involvement in regard to regions of Canada and the objectives in reducing regional disparities throughout the territory.

In order to reach our goal, we have created different ways and means, including the financial assistance program. It was within a concept of the Canadian government to announce nearly two weeks ago a series of measures which we intend to implement in order to lead support to economic development in the Gaspé—Magdalen Island regions and promote job creation.

I would like to tell once again the nature of the endeavours. The measures are related to the setting up of Gaspé–Magdalen Island Economic Development Corporation. This corporation, besides promoting economic development in the area will also be involved in prospective activities, investment and promotion of the fields of industry and tourism, not only in Canada but internationally.

Our government will assume the operational costs of the corporation during the next five years through contributions totalling $1.7 million. The government even goes one step further in offering a grant of $2 million to the same corporation, enabling it to sponsor a newly created organization known as Gaspé and Magdalen Island Investment Registration.

This limited partnership will invest blocks of capital between $50,000 and $400,000 to develop into expanding companies. Occasionally it may invest in a start-up stage of a corporation operating in the manufacturing or service sector. This investment will ensure healthy capitalization in most of the promising enterprises.

A new loan insurance program will also be announced. It will be an acceptable organization of the Gaspé—Magdalen Island region. This new program will allow the carrying out of many important projects which will be named and drawing the boards of inadequate funding.

The government will have a loan guarantee of $6.4 million between now and March 31, 1993.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, as you know, I have had the opportunity to ask the government a number of questions concerning the case of Mohamed Al-Mashat. He is the former Iraqi Ambassador to Washington who was fast-tracked into Canada.

We were in the process of investigating this particular matter when the government decided today to shut down the process. We had the opportunity to invite a number of witnesses before the committee. We had the opportunity to ask questions, and obviously we were getting close to the truth. The result is the government today decided that it has heard enough and it no longer wishes the inquiry to carry on, notwithstanding the very explicit promises of the government that it was calling the inquiry in order to get to the truth of what happened, to understand how it was possible for a former ambassador of a country with which we were at war, to gain access to Canada as a landed immigrant, within a matter of weeks, when it takes others months and at times years to enter Canada.

We embarked on the inquiry. A number of cabinet ministers were embarrassed as a result of some of the evidence that was heard. I guess the government is no longer interested in understanding completely what happened in the Al-Mashat matter.

We do know that the government has presented several versions of what happened. We had version A, then version B, then version C and then version D and we really do not know how many other versions are out there. We do know that on the evening of May 13, the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former Minister of Immigration, and several other ministers were present at a meeting with officials. At that particular meeting they decided to blame the nephew of the leader of the Official Opposition, Raymond Chrétien, who happens to be the second in command at the Department of External Affairs.

They also decided at that particular meeting to blame Mr. David Daubney, a former Conservative member of Parliament and the Chief of Staff to the former Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Daubney himself gave evidence at the committee that he was blamed for reasons of symmetry. In fact, that was the terminology that was used at that particular meeting. The government has not, in any way, allowed the opposition to understand completely what happened at that meeting on May 13. We do know that a report was rewritten by individuals in the Privy Council Office with apologies already in the report that a fellow by the name of Shortcliff was sent to visit Mr. Daubney and Mr. Raymond Chrétien to tell them that they had apologized. In fact, Mr. Chrétien indicated very clearly to the committee that he had nothing to apologize for and that he did not apologize.

Madam Speaker, I note that my time is up. Perhaps, the hon. member opposite can explain to the people of Canada why the government is shutting down the inquiry when it promised we would have a full inquiry into this matter.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it has been a long day and I appreciate your patience in the chair, particularly in re-answering questions that have been so often answered in this House.

I am responding now to questions raised in the House on May 30 by the hon. member for York South—Weston on the Al-Mashat case.

In an exchange with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the member asked about differences in the chronologies released on May 14 and on May 30. Since the parliamentary committee first began hearings on the Al-Mashat case, this question has been answered on several occasions by both ministers and officials.

I should emphasize that the government has responded to requests from the committee for documents on this case. I understand there is still a standing offer to Privy Councillors from both the Liberal and New Democratic parties which would allow them to pursue Mr. Al-Mashat's immigration file.

For the benefit of the hon. member, let me briefly summarize the facts. Auditors from both the Department of External Affairs and the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission were appointed as soon as minister Valcourt stated that an investigation would take place into this matter. This audit was completed on the basis of corroborated evidence and facts which could be confirmed at that time.

Following the release of the first chronology on May 14, new information became available as a result of public statements, some factual inaccuracies also were found in that document. This was acknowledged by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the parliamentary committee on May 30.

As a consequence of these acknowledged inaccuracies, ministers requested additional information and further interviews were carried out by auditors, including with persons outside of government. This resulted in a fuller chronology released on May 30, which provided a more detailed account of the handling of Mr. Al-Mashat's case and noted inaccuracies contained in the earlier chronology.

In a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, also on May 30, the member for York South—Weston had pointed out one such factual error between the two chronologies. He asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs on which date the defectors committee decided Mr. Al-Mashat was not a defector.

Again this question has come up before the parliamentary committee, but I would answer the question as follows:

The chronology released on May 14 unfortunately left out a key word. The defectors committee had determined on March 1 that Mr. Al-Mashat probably was not a defector. A final determination could be made by the defectors committee only after Mr. Al-Mashat had been interviewed by officials at our embassy in Vienna. This interview took place on March 5.

Vienna sent its assessment of Mr. Al-Mashat by telex, which was received in Ottawa on March 7. On that day, the defectors committee met to consider the report and concluded that there was insufficient intelligence value present to consider Mr. Al-Mashat as a defector.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, last week I asked the minister of health if the government would be willing to accelerate the phase-out of chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone-depleting chemicals from the present schedule of 1997, instead to the year 1995.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment replied and said, "no". Perhaps, if reasons are provided this evening, the government might agree to 1995 instead of 1997.

According to medical forecasts, more than 46,000 Canadians are likely to develop skin cancer this year. The incidence of melanoma, the most dangerous form of skin cancer presently known, has, in addition to that, more than doubled in the last 20 years.

The Canadian Dermatology Association says that these figures do not yet reflect the impacts of a thinning ozone layer, and that the risks of skin cancer will continue to rise into the 21st century. Our young people are particularly at risk.

In April of this year, scientists with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in the United States released new data showing that ozone depletion was occurring at twice the rate previously predicted. This has allowed the United States Environmental Protection Agency to conclude that ozone depletion over the United States will result in approximately an additional 6 million cases of skin cancer and 200,000 deaths over the next 50 years.

Compared to 10 years ago, there is now on average, according to the scientific community, 5 per cent less ozone in the stratosphere over southern Canada.

These findings therefore have very serious public health implications. The ozone layer is the earth's only natural protective shield against the sun's harmful ultraviolet radiation. Increased exposure to such radiation will increase the incidence of skin cancer and eye disease, weaken our immune systems and also decrease the yields of certain important agricultural crops.

Now, to return to the cause, which is chlorofluorocarbons. The Canadian government currently plans to phase out chlorofluorocarbons in 1997. Other countries are moving faster than Canada.

Germany will end its chlorofluorocarbon production in 1995. Australia, Norway and Sweden will all have eliminated 95 per cent of their chlorofluorocarbons by 1995.

In the light of these developments, the question is will the Minister of the Environment or the minister of health and welfare or someone on their behalf phase out by the year 1995 ozone depleting chemicals, specifically chlorofluorocarbons, halons and methyl chloroforms, to protect the health of present and future generations of Canadians?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the satellite data on ozone layer definition and the agreement with the data from Canadian stations do not significantly change our understanding of the state of the ozone layer but reinforce the need for strong international action.

Canada's consumption of ozone depleting substances is decreasing faster than required by the Montreal protocol. The 1990 Canadian consumption of CFCs was 33 per cent below that of the 1986 level used as the benchmark for the Montreal protocol.

We are committed to zero consumption of CFCs by the year 1997, three years ahead of the international schedule.

The objective is the ozone consumption by the year 2000, five years ahead of the international schedule. From the ozone depletion substance in general, we are now more than two years ahead of the international schedule.

Large decreases are occurring in several other industrialized countries as well. As a commitment in the green plan Canada will continue to work on the domestic reduction and recycling initiatives of CFCs and partnerships with the provinces.

The National Research Council is working with the industry to evaluate CFC alternatives. Our regulation program eliminates specific use of ozone depleting substances as adequate replacements become available.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I want to tell you about a constituent of mine named Hyacinth Vernon.

Ms. Vernon is a single mother, she has four children and she goes to work. Until recently, she and her children lived in an apartment near my constituency office on O'Connor Drive but she had to move because, quite legitimately, her landlord wanted to move relatives into her apartment.

There are very few places for a Canadian who is a single mother of four children and who is a member of the working poor to go to live these days. The vacancy rate until recently in metropolitan Toronto was less than 1 per cent. In fact, it was about .3 per cent. She had been on the waiting list for public housing in the metropolitan Toronto area since 1986, some five years. She was forced to move in with her cousin, the husband of her cousin and her cousin's two children in one bedroom.

There you are, we had three adults and we had six children in a one bedroom apartment. We know that that could not go not go on very much longer. She had to move out. Where could she go then? There was still nothing available in the rental apartment market, there was still no public housing available. Now she is in a one-room motel room in the Americana Motel on Kingston Road in Toronto with her four kids.

She continues to work every day. She hands her weekly cheque of some $283 net over to the social and community services department, the welfare department. They pay the rent on the motel, then hand her back enough bus tickets to get her back and forth to work every day and they give her $26 a day to feed, clothe and look after herself and her four children.

Now I am told by the welfare department in metropolitan Toronto that Ms. Vernon is only one of about 100 similar cases in metropolitan Toronto right now. Why in heaven's name Ms. Vernon does not just throw in the towel I do not know, but obviously she is made of pretty good stuff.

Ms. Vernon cannot get into public housing because she is one of some 17,000 Canadian citizens and landed immigrants who are now on a waiting list for public housing in metropolitan Toronto. On top of that, the Ontario Minister of Housing, because of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, has now said that he is going to admit refugee claimants to public housing as well. There are some 90,000 refugee claimants in Canada at the present time, 60,000 of those are in Ontario. They are now available for public housing.

Where in heaven's name are we going to put these people? Refugee claimants are the responsibility of the federal government. CMHC has no money. Employment and Immigration has no money. Where in heaven's name, Mr. Minister, are we going to put these people when refugees are a federal responsibility?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my colleague on the question of refugees benefiting from the security of government-assisted housing.

The hon. member is aware that the federal government, through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, shares responsibility with the provinces in the delivery and support of low-cost housing.

The National Housing Act in no way restricts these benefits to Canadian citizens or landed immigrants. In fact, putting restrictions in place would contravene human rights legislation.

The hon. member is quite correct in noting that demand for government-subsidized housing is great, especially in the Toronto area where so many refugee claimants reside. I am pleased to advise the hon. member that officials of CMHC, the Ontario Ministry of Housing and Canada Employment and Immigration are already working together to identify the extent of the demand and its impact on the availability of subsidized housing.

Throughout Canada, family members, church groups, multicultural societies and other non-profit organizations are working to improve the living conditions of recent arrivals to the country. We have seen remarkable examples of communities rallying to the aid of those driven from their own homelands by war or oppression.

The hon. member may recall the dramatic footage of a boat load of Tamils who had arrived on the rocky coast of Nova Scotia. The people of the nearby villages found them. They were sheltered, clothed, fed and given every possible form of aid and help.

These are genuine expressions of kindness and concern. It is a very direct and personal response to the need.

As the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation mentioned in his earlier response, when the Vietnamese boat people arrived in this country a number of years ago, they were desperate for housing. At the time, CMHC had some vacant apartments in housing administrations. Mortgage insurance operations with refugees are settled there.

It is interesting to note that very quickly they became established in the community and were able to find their own housing. In fact, it has been reported that some of the people who were helped in this way treated their assistance as a temporary loan and paid the government back.

I am pleased to be able to respond to the hon. member's question.

ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the chiefs of Canada gathered in Winnipeg to choose their new national chief. Six excellent candidates had sought this honour in a fine campaign. Early this morning, the chiefs made their final choice.

I want to offer my congratulations to all the candidates and to the new national chief, Mr. Ovide Mercredi. In these crucial times, a heavy burden lies on this country's leaders, both aboriginal and non-aboriginal.

As we seek the constitutional renewal of this country, as we strive to make Canada an even better country for our children, let us all work together with open-mindedness, generosity, truth and honesty. Canada is big enough for all of us.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and this government will be well advised to listen to Mr. Ovide Mercredi, and his acceptance speech when he talked about growing up in his early years.

Best wishes to the national chief.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Many Canadians who have lost faith in our political system and its leadership want to change not only the politicians who represent them, but our system of government as well.

Our present Canadian parliamentary system that has existed for 150 years is based on the union of the executive and the legislative branches of government. This means that every cabinet minister must have a seat in one of the Houses of Parliament and in theory at least that the cabinet as a whole is responsible to the House of Commons. In practice, however, the House of Commons is now actually responsible to the cabinet since the Commons enacts only legislation chosen by the cabinet within time limits set by the cabinet.

If we are to restore Canadians' faith in our political system, we must not only ensure that MPs reflect the views of those they are elected to represent, but also that the cabinet is responsible to those MPs in practice as well as in theory.

INDIA

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, last week was the anniversary of the storming of the Gold Temple in Amritsar.

June 4 to June 7 will stay in the memory of Sikhs throughout the world for generations to come. The desecration of the holiest shrine in Sikhism was a devastating event for Sikhs in Canada.

We share the grief of the Sikh community on the seventh anniversary of Operation Blue Star, the Indian government's code name for the storming of the Gold Temple.

[Translation]

Sikhs all over the world will never forget these events, this assault on their identity and their spirit. I share the memory of these tragic events with the Sikh community, and I hope all members will join me in commemorating that day.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last April, the unemployment rate reached 15.4 per cent in Abitibi-Témiscamingue. This was mostly due to the fact that more people were looking for work because of the economic slowdown.

If we compare April 1990 with April 1991, we see that the number of people in the labour force rose from 66,000 to 68,000. Economist Marie-Josée Marcoux sees some positive points in this year's statistics for April. She said that compared with last year, the region gained 1,000 new jobs. This is a recent development, since according to her, the Quebec economy recorded an increase in employment during the past three months, a trend that is expected to continue, which is something to look forward to.

The worst of the recession seems to be over, although the region's economy still has a number of problems, especially in the forestry industry. However, since all the cuts were made in this sector, the forestry industry will have to catch up.

The Quebec Minister of Forestry, Mr. Albert Côté, should listen carefully to demands coming from the industry in Amos, Senneterre, Barraute, Malartic and Matagami.

ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as was mentioned earlier, last night the Assembly of First Nations elected Ovide Mercredi from northern Manitoba as their new national chief.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, I would like to extend our sincere congratulations. As a result of this election, Ovide will be a significant voice in the upcoming constitutional debates which must include aboriginal issues and representation.

The new national chief, because of his education and experience, is especially qualified to provide this leadership. Yet, ironically, for most of his life the Government of Canada refused to recognize him as an Indian. After last night, that recognition can no longer be questioned.

This House congratulates Ovide Mercredi and the other candidates and expresses its hope that the government will deal positively with the new representatives of the First Nations of Canada.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the New Democratic Party issued a new, revised New Democratic Party dictionary at its convention in Halifax. Here are the changes: the word "profit": profit is no longer a taboo but indeed is now an acceptable, allowable, result of business.

The dictionary includes "capitalism". Capitalism is no longer a dreaded disease but now is a method for achieving excellence in creating new wealth.

"Free enterprise" has a definition as well. It is not the systemic destruction of humanity by robber barons in the form of corporate executives. It is now the method for expanding our economy, increasing our standard of living and generating new prosperity.

The New Democratic Party should have contacted me long ago. I would have sold them a Progressive-Conservative Party dictionary at a discount price.

ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the new grand chief of the Assembly of First Nations on his election to office. It was a hard way to do it, but he did it.

Chief Mercredi takes on the daunting task of continuing building and improving the relationship between almost 600 First Nations and the various provincial and federal governments in Canada.

In dealing with the three native organizations in my riding during my brief experience as a member of Parliament, I have come to realize just how different the cultures are and how they do not mesh together, but still must function in concert in the interests of all parties. Even at this level I can feel the frustrations and this is only a hint of what Chief Mercredi faces.

I have had the opportunity to witness Chief Mercredi in action at committee and in interviews and I have great confidence that he and his approach will be successful in resolving many of the outstanding issues between natives and governments. I wish him the most sincere good luck in his endeavours and hope that maybe I might be able to assist him in some way.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, today Friends of the Earth, Greenpeace and the Canadian Environmental Law Association banded together to condemn the export of a lead additive for gasoline.

Ethyl Corporation plants have doubled its production of this highly toxic tetra-ethyl lead for export to Asia, Africa and South America. In Canada, leaded gasoline is virtually banned because of the devastating effects of lead poisoning on young children. This double standard is morally reprehensible. How can we justify protecting the health and lives of our own children while profiting from poisoning the lives of children in developing countries?

• (1410)

Canadians want to know what this government has done since it was told about Ethyl's plans over a month ago. Will it serve notice that the export of this poison will be banned or does it perhaps believe that Canadians want jobs even when the cost is the lives of children.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to endorse a decision made last month by the two country music television channels.

The stations banned a music video which vividly depicted family violence.

Family violence is a problem with tremendous proportions throughout North America and, in my opinion, its depiction numbs us to the terror and pain it inflicts. How can we hope to overcome this problem if every medium of communication continuously bombards us with it?

The Nashville network and country music television have refused to be part of this desensitizing process any longer. For this I will applaud their courage and initiative. It is my hope that this will become a trend in Canada.

GROUP OF 22

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the matter is settled. There is no need for a constituent assembly, and certainly no need to get others involved.

We have the Group of 22, an elite group from the "old Canada" based upon two founding peoples, unperturbed and undiluted by participation of first peoples, ethnocultural or racial minorities, or the rest of the hoi polloi.

Speaking, ex cathedra of course, on behalf of all Canadians after heated debate among themselves, they have pronounced their vision of Canada. It is a Canada where the federal government withdraws from health care, education, and social programs.

Most Canadians say this will destroy Canada. Maurice Sauvé says the Prime Minister was impressed. No wonder. The Group of 22 wants him to finish his job.

ILLICIT DRUGS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, drugs and the illicit use and illegal trafficking associated with them are straining the resources of our police forces. I want to highlight two legislative changes which should be made to assist police forces in dealing with this problem.

Currently all moneys and/or goods confiscated must be submitted to the federal government and none of it is returned to the municipalities which bear the enforcement costs. As a result, they cannot afford to devote enough resources to drug related investigations.

Second, as a result of the Duarte case, it is illegal for police officers to use audio/visual devices as safety precautions during undercover drug trafficking investigations. This greatly hampers the work of the police and endangers their safety.

I spoke with Don Hillock, the chief of police for York Region this morning. He is very concerned about both of these issues, particularly the safety of his officers.

Let us support the fine men and women serving in our police forces.

I call upon the Minister of Justice to address both of these issues.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, backbench Conservative MPs, such as the member for Halton—Peel, are desperately trying to escape the sinking Tory ship of state and to appear not to be guilty of its demise.

On Monday, the member for Halton—Peel asked of the minister for privatization during Question Period: "Last week we learned the government raised $400 million more in 90 days than it was supposed. Does this mean there is now some hope for my constituents that there will ever be any relief for middle-class taxpayers?"

Has the idea of standing up for his constituents in this House finally occurred to the member? Were his constituents not among the 80 per cent of Canadians who opposed the tax in the first place?

I will remind his constituents that on October 2, 1989, the member for Halton—Peel had this to say about the GST he is now trying to dissociate himself from: "Will some people be hurt? Yes. Will some people benefit? Yes. Is it fair? Absolutely. It is fair".

The member acknowledged back then that it would hurt his constituents, but he voted for it anyway. Now the predicted cash-cow, as he calls it, from the GST has come in courtesy of the Canadian taxpayer. Let us just see how many other backbench Tories jump the ship with the certain approach of the next election.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, clearly the most challenging task before us in the mission toward constitutional reform and national unity in Canada is to ensure that all Canadians feel the right to be included in the process. While many citizens may choose not to participate directly in the constitutional debate, they must nevertheless be able to perceive that such an opportunity does exist for them. There are many innovative measures which we must initiate and many have already been introduced. The Citizens' Forum on the Constitution, for example, has served to involve ordinary citizens to a much greater extent than may yet be recognized.

Every member of Parliament has a role and a responsibility in nurturing the national consultation dialogue. Many already conduct regular town hall public meetings where constitutional and unity issues invariably come to the fore.

Another potential direction for every riding might be the convening of citizens' committees on the Constitution under the auspices of the local member of Parliament. That is an initiative which has worked well for my constituents on language and cultural issues in the past and I believe it offers similarly good prospects for constitutional dialogue in the future.

ORAL QUESTIONS PERIOD

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Today the trade ministers of Canada, the United States and Mexico will sit down in Toronto and begin the discussion on a new free trade deal. Six months ago an all-party committee report in this House blasted the government for not doing its homework. The report said, and I quote: "We were frankly amazed by the detailed lack of economic analysis of the costs and benefits of a North American free trade agreement".

I ask the Acting Prime Minister this: Why is the government pursuing these talks when even its own members admit that it has not done its homework?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident why these negotiations are necessary. We want to expand trade throughout North America. We want to protect intellectual property. And we want to improve mechanisms for settling disputes with the Mexicans within that context. That is a very good negotiating position and one that the Government of Canada is very proud to take into these discussions.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, 600 lay-offs this week in Montreal.

[English]

Even in my own riding of Hamilton East there was another steel plant closing this week.

[Translation]

Since the United States and Mexico seem to have a good idea where they are headed with these talks, I want to ask the minister this: Why have Canadians been kept in the dark by this government? Why is the government starting these talks at a time when its economic policies are destroying the manufacturing sector in this country?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not ask a question so much, she just makes some allegations.

The purpose of these discussions are clear. What is going to happen is that Canada, by being part of these negotiations, is going to be able to expand its trade further. We believe as a government that no country's economy has ever been hurt by expanding trade. The way you hurt a country's economy is by being protectionist and with restrictions.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, even the President of the United States has committed himself to minimum environmental guarantees. He has also promised specific worker adjustment for those American workers who will lose their jobs in continental free trade.

This Prime Minister has yet to answer to the thousands upon thousands of Canadians who lost their jobs as a result of the last deal and who were promised adjustment programs that were never delivered upon.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: Why are the Americans committed to environmental guarantees and worker adjustment programs, when our government is not prepared to make the same guarantee to Canadian workers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): This is the government, through the initiative of backbench members of this party as well as this government, that put in place the momentum for the most important acid rain agreement ever signed in North America.

We do not have to take lessons from the hon. member on how to deal with the environment. There is also a three or four stage process for discussion of environmental matters. It is going to be very thorough. It will be aligned with these discussions under NAFTA.

When it comes to adjustment programs, no government in North America has an array of adjustment programs that can match what we have.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Today Statistics Canada reported that its composite leading indicator, a measure of how the economy is expected to perform, fell last March for the 14th month in a row. These figures are for the month of March, after the government presented its most recent budget.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that his 1991 budget is proving to be the wrong budget for the wrong time? Will he present a new budget with a plan for a speedy economic recovery? Why will he not do more for the thousands of people suffering out there across the country from this government's misguided economic policies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. As the hon. member knows, the budget was brought down in the latter part of February. These are the figures for March.

I think the hon. member would agree that a number of the indicators that have come out in April and in May whether it be business confidence, whether it be housing starts, whether it be housing resale, and indeed, job creation, indicate there have been some 73,000 new jobs created in the last two months. The positive impact of the budget is being felt and there are many indicators which suggest that.

I know the hon. member would rather preach doom and gloom than be a little optimistic. Perhaps it is time for him to be a little bit optimistic.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my hon. friend I would like to be optimistic on behalf of the thousands of people unemployed in my own community and across this country. The minister fails to realize that the over-all indicator produced by his own government's statistical agency is down for the 14th month in a row. It shows the economy is still shrinking.

Why is the minister pursuing the same policies that got us into the recession to get us out of it? Why will he not admit that the economy is still shrinking and do something now to bring about a speedy recovery? Why is he simply standing back and doing nothing as he has been doing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the way out of the problems we are in are not the simple solutions that he is suggesting. We have to attack the underlying causes of inflation. We have to engage in fiscal consolidation. We have to have the fundamentals right. We are getting the fundamentals right because the April and May stats show signs of improvement. That is encouraging.

I wish the hon. member would share that view because many other Canadians do. Even though we are not completely out of the woods, there are positive indicators which suggest that the turnaround is very close.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today the Canadian delegation is in Toronto to begin the trade talks with Mexico and the United States, but Canadians have been left completely in the dark about what is on the table. There has been no real parliamentary debate here. There has been no vote on Canada going into these trade talks with Mexico. I think it is absolutely irresponsible that this government starts talks with the Mexicans and Americans before it talks to Canadians.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell Canadians today who put together this package that Canada is negotiating and what exactly is on the table?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to tell the hon. member that there is going to be a very continuous and intensive process of consultation with Canadians, through the SAGIT mechanism and other mechanisms with industrial groups, labour groups and Canadians generally that will accompany these discussions.

The broad principles which are being put in place before the Canadian people today in the House, but also in the meeting in Toronto, are clear: First, to try to improve trade by removing obstacles to trade, including tariffs and non-tariff barriers; second, to come up with a dispute settlement mechanism which will include Mexico; and, third, to see if we can protect intellectual property better. All of these principles will be done in order to increase benefits for Canadians.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We still do not know what is on the table. One of the minister's colleagues was saying during Question Period that everything was on the table. That is what we want to know. Is culture on the table? What is on the table?

Since the Canada-U.S. trade deal began, 315,000 Canadians have lost their jobs and in the last year 36 auto parts manufacturers have gone out of business. On June 9 the chairman of Magna International announced that Magna would be spending up to $15 million in setting up a new plant in Mexico. The chairman of Magna took a page from the government's book and said: "Profit means money. Money has no heart, no soul, no conscience and no homeland".

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: What is the Canadian government doing in these talks to ensure that jobs do not continue to move out of Canada but stay in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member really has gone too far. If she looks very carefully at what the Magna announcement said yesterday, it is very interesting what the chairman said. He said that none of the production which is going to be established in Mexico would be used to supply the Canadian or the American market. Assembly operations in Canada and the U.S. would continue to be served out of Canada.

Let me just quote the chairman of the company: "It is not a question of closing a factory and moving it down. I feel very strongly that I can maintain our employees here in Canada".

An hon. member: You don't want jobs in Mexico, Howard?

Mr. Hockin: The NDP theory is as follows. If there is to be a new business in a far away land, business we have never done before, Canadian companies should be prohibited from doing it unless it is done from Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister would want to tell those workers in those 36 auto parts manufacturing companies in Canada that have been closed why they have lost their jobs because of this government's policy.

[Translation]

Last week the Minister for International Trade told us it was hard to see the positive results of free trade with the United States, and I am sure 1.5 million unemployed Canadians agreed with the minister.

Could the government give us the assurance that before starting these talks on free trade with Mexico, it will conduct two exhaustive studies: one on the impact of free trade between Canada and the United States and one on the effects of free trade between the United States, Mexico and Canada?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Well, I would hope that the results of a Canada–United States–Mexican free trade agreement, if we can reach an agreement, would be as good as what we have seen in the last two years under the free trade agreement. What we have seen under the free trade agreement is that our balance of trade has moved from $14 billion to $17 billion. Net investment in the country was negative $2.5 billion three years ago. It is now a positive $4 billion. All this has helped in fact to strengthen us when we moved into a recession.

I am afraid the Speaker will not allow me to read it all, but I have a list three pages long of auto parts manufacturing firms in Ontario and Quebec, just to take those provinces which have expanded and added to their production since 1989.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On May 30 in this House the Deputy Prime Minister said about the Mashat inquiry, and I would like to quote directly from Hansard: "all the witnesses they require and/or demand will be available to respond".

Yesterday, on the instructions of the government House leader, Conservative members blocked the appearance of witnesses we asked to have before that committee, in direct contradiction of the commitment made by the Deputy Prime Minister on May 30.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is as follows. Why did the government direct its members to frustrate the work of that committee and the democratic process? What is the government trying to hide?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that allegation is absolutely false.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The government members shut down the committee. That is not false; that is a fact.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the government and the Deputy Prime Minister say they have nothing to hide, will the government—

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Show a little patience. It is coming. Will the government establish a judicial inquiry where oaths can be taken, where a proper investigation of missing memoranda can be pursued and where there cannot be frustration of an inquiry by government members? Will he establish that kind of inquiry?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me just address if I can this business of the memo that has been raised from time to time.

• (1430)

The first thing is that yesterday the hon. member, with his colleagues, could not decide whether this was a secret or a top secret memo. It is a secret memo and not a top secret memo. This is something we take very seriously, but it means that it is not tracked in the same way as a top secret memo.

The departmental security officials are looking into the matter. There is no evidence of any criminality in terms of the fact that the original memo cannot be found even though copies were made available.

Let me also quote, if I may, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway in terms of the committee's activity. He said: "Some Conservative members of the committee had suggested we hear from Allan Gotlieb, but I think Canadians expect us to report and to report soon on what went wrong on this and how Al-Mashat got into the country". The committee is made up of grown-up people. They are having a meeting tomorrow and they will make up their own minds.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On May 16, the secretary of state stood in this House and stated in reference to the public report on the Al-Mashat affair: "All the information regarding this situation is out and was made public. Ministers took the responsibility to ensure that the information went public and that that information to date has not been contradicted".

While the minister was out of the country the information was contradicted. We now know that there was no apology made by Raymond Chrétien as stated in the minister's public letter.

Will the minister now, before this House, correct the record?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that truly amazes me about the opposition is that I have been Secretary of State for External Affairs since April 21 and I have not had one single question on an issue of substance. That includes the reasons I was out of the country, which was a NATO meeting in Copenhagen and a meeting of the Organization of American States in Santiago.

I would certainly welcome questions on the foreign policy of this country. It is too bad hon. members opposite have no interest in foreign policy. What they are interested in is trying to continue to find some kind of malfeasance, none of which has been forthcoming.

The bottom line on this is that ministers came to committee and they were open. The members opposite chose to walk out. We came forward with documents. The committee will make up its own mind about the evidence that has been put to them by Mr. Chrétien and others.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, we were asking the minister to correct incorrect information.

My supplementary question is for the same minister on the same issue. On May 15 the secretary of state in this House stated: "I think the report speaks for itself. The report goes into some considerable detail in a very precise form as to what happened during the process of this incident".

We now know that the minister's report tabled May 14 did not contain all the facts provided to them on May 13 by their own investigators and, indeed, that all the major players were not even interviewed before the report was made public.

Will the minister now apologize for issuing an incomplete and inaccurate report?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was neither incomplete nor inaccurate. If you look at the first report, there is no difference in substance between what came out on that first report and what came out subsequently.

As the hon. member knows, the first report was based on what the auditors could corroborate with written, documented evidence some time after the fact.

Now if there is some differences in memory on dates, there is still no change in substance. That was subsequently corrected at our initiative. We were the ones who went through it and made that marginally corrected version public.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, since we have not been able to put questions to the minister any further in committee, I want to ask the minister a question that arose from the evidence given recently concerning a fundamental issue of ministerial accountability.

The minister knows that her legislative assistant on April 8 informed the legislative assistant to the then Solicitor General about the entry of Al-Mashat into Canada.

Could the minister explain why it was that her legislative assistant apparently informed the legislative assistant to the Solicitor General on April 8 of her concern about this matter, yet according to the minister's evidence her own legislative assistant did not even bother talking to her about it until some time later. What is going on in the minister's department?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the day in question I was not in town.

My legislative assistant did the appropriate thing. He was seeking more information before he brought the matter to me. Let me point out that this was, once again, well after the fact.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, certainly her officials knew about this well before the fact.

An hon. member: You know the rules.

Mr. Robinson: They were the ones who were not fingered.

My supplementary question is for the chair of the standing committee on external affairs. Would the chair of the standing committee on external affairs, the hon. member for Don Valley West, explain to the House why it is that he and his Conservative colleagues refused to allow that committee to hear any further evidence from witnesses—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is in order. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway may ask the chairman of the committee what it intends to do next or something like that, but that is a question which goes right into the heart of the committee. The hon. member may want to rephrase the question.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the chair of the standing committee if he could indicate what steps he and his Conservative colleagues are prepared to take to ensure that the committee is able to finish its work and call the witnesses who have to be called to get to the truth of this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member probably would have been in order if he had kept the question to what the chairman and the committee are going to do. That is a question that goes to something which is not solely a question for the committee acting as a committee.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Yesterday when I asked the Solicitor General why the RCMP had not been called to track down the whereabouts of the secret memo, he said: "Because I have not been asked to".

I have now formally asked both the Solicitor General and the Commissioner of the RCMP—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nunziata: —in writing to investigate the whereabouts of this particular memo.

Will the Solicitor General now give this House his undertaking that he will direct the RCMP to immediately investigate the whereabouts of the missing secret memo?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, no.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would now like to ask the government about its security policy with regard to breaches of security.

According to the policy of the Government of Canada, the loss of this particular secret memo constitutes a breach of security. The guidelines of this particular policy of the Government of Canada state that suspected breaches constituting criminal offences shall be reported to the appropriate law enforcement authorities. It goes on to say that a report should be made in writing 10 days after there is a breach of security. It also indicates the sanctions which must be applied.

My question is for the Government of Canada. In view of the fact that a secret memo went missing three months ago, can the government explain why the security policy which the government introduced in this House was not followed? In particular, can the government indicate why the RCMP was not notified and why sanctions were not applied to Mr. David Daubney?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in my hon. friend's letter he claims: "I believe that there are reasonable and probable grounds that the loss of the document is deliberate".

• (1440)

I know of no section in the Criminal Code that prosecutes anyone for deliberate loss of a document. I would suggest to my hon. friend that the Canadian public expects the RCMP to go after real crimes, just as it expects its elected representatives to go after real issues. I will tell you, on this issue my hon. friend is not hitting the news in Orillia.

An hon. member: Have they stopped reading newspapers in Orillia?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. In the light of what the Solicitor General just said, the matter is indeed a serious one because if the document was deliberately lost it puts a different light on the matter.

I wish the minister would tell us in no uncertain terms, considering the fact that in the Watergate affair President Nixon lost 18 minutes of tapes: Did he lose the secret memo in the Al-Mashat affair? Can he tell the House today, without any hesitation, that the secret document was never in his attaché case?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no and yes.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): The minister admits that the secret document we are looking for, a document that would clarify a great deal and would undoubtedly exonerate the officials but put the blame on the ministers, was in the minister's attaché case.

Ms. Copps: That is what you just said.

Mr. Ouellet: That is what the minister just told us. I would ask the minister to tell us quite clearly whether he can say this document was not deliberately destroyed, either at the request of the minister or directly by one of his political associates.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can say that, which should end the discussion. Perhaps my French is not sufficiently clear, at least not to members on the other side of the House. However, if the hon. member looks at the "blues", he will see he asked two questions. My answer to the first question was no. The Liberal Party does not take Parliament seriously, but I do, and that settles that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment who knows that lead leads to permanent and irreversible deterioration in the mental and physical abilities of children. Because lead's negative health effects far outweigh its benefits as a gasoline additive, the government severely curtailed its use in Canada in 1990.

Unfortunately those restrictions do not apply to the export of this toxic chemical, even though we know that lead poisons children.

Will the minister amend the gasoline regulations under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act to ensure that tetraethyl lead produced in Canada is exported only to those countries having environmental lead restrictions at least as stringent as our own?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the member related in his question that this government has effectively banned the use of lead in gasoline for cars as of December 1990. This represents, I think in the minds of all members of this House, a very important measure with respect to protecting the environment.

I will take his representation and maybe take this moment to advise him that the department will effectively examine the possibility of having import control mechanisms under the regulations of CEPA to deal with the export of such substances.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

It seems simple to me that if we ban a substance in Canada because of its negative and dire health effects, we cannot support the manufacture of that product for export.

I thank the minister for taking the representation and indicating that he is going to look into it. I wonder if at the same time he would consider ensuring that countries we do any exporting to adopt more improved, more stringent environmental health regulations similar to those in Canada.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): To be quite precise, Mr. Speaker, the government did stop the use of this type of substance in gasoline in cars, which is the main use. There were a few minor exceptions to that.

In the case of farming equipment and of planes, the substance was not disallowed as such. Once again, I am very sympathetic to the point of view put forward by the member. We will examine this issue as rapidly as possible within the department.

GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Grain elevator companies at the port of Vancouver have locked out workers in response to a contract dispute. The workers' contract expired some 18 months ago, illustrating the failure of the collective bargaining process.

On behalf of my rural colleagues and Canadian farmers, who will pay for the price of this industrial impasse? Will it be the farmer owned companies? Will it be the union? Or, will it be the farmers?

Is the minister able to respond?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): First of all, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his continuing concern for the western farmers of Canada.

We are indeed very concerned about the serious nature of the walk-out in the Vancouver port. We are concerned because of the potential loss of sales for Canada. We are concerned about the general economic loss to western Canada. We are also concerned about the tremendous reputation Canada has had about delivery of grain.

For these reasons I sent yesterday to Vancouver my senior officials in the mediation and conciliation service. They are meeting right now as we speak with both parties in Vancouver. I expect a report from them later on today.

I would urge the parties to settle this through the normal practice of collective bargaining, but I can tell my hon. friend that if they do not the government will act.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The minister's chief of staff, David Daubney, has publicly admitted that he not only received the missing March 8 secret memo but that he also read it. What is also clear is that David Daubney was the last person known to be in possession of the secret memo.

It is now lost, and we know that he did not tell his minister about it.

The guide book for public servants published by the Privy Council Office in 1990 states clearly: "Ministers are responsible to the House for everything that is done under their authority".

Will the minister accept responsibility for the negligence of his chief of staff?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say I appreciate that affirmation by a Liberal member of Parliament, that it is now known and accepted that the document was not passed to me. I assume that since the Liberal Party has now indicated that it is now known and accepted that the document was not passed to me that finishes the matter.

There have been questions raised about ministerial responsibility that I dealt within committee.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I asked very clearly if he would accept responsibility as the minister to this House for the negligence of his chief of staff, and he refuses to answer.

I ask my supplementary question. We know that the March 8 secret memo was forwarded to the minister's office in compliance with procedures put in place by Mr. Daubney and approved by the minister. The secret memo is now lost.

Will the minister at least accept responsibility for the incompetence of his own office procedures?

• (1450)

I would hope that a sense of parliamentary responsibility might show itself more evident—

Ms. Copps: You broke the habit, Joe. The word "lie".

Mr. Nunziata: What about your lie on television?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am asked in the words of the member for York South—Weston, repeated by the member for Hamilton East, about the word "lie". I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you would ask them to withdraw that language.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. members did make that allegation, I would expect that they would withdraw immediately.

Ms. Copps: I certainly withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I think for the moment we shall continue. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

CITIZENSHIP

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of multiculturalism and citizenship. This is a supplementary question to one I put to him two days ago.

In his response at that time the minister emphasized a commitment to the promotion of Canadian citizenship as a fundamental value of national unity. In that regard I believe that one of the most moving experiences for any MP has to be the citizenship ceremony for new Canadians.

Can such a confirmation and welcome to the rights and responsibilities of citizenship not also be made available to all Canadians, including those who are born here?

Is the minister prepared to consider ways by which a citizenship certificate may be presented to every Canadian child at the appropriate time in the grade school process?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the member's appraisal of the Citizenship Court ceremony and would encourage all members to attend such events.

The member has an excellent suggestion and I intend to meet with him very quickly to see what further information he can give me, as I am prepared to meet with other members of Parliament who have ideas on helping Canadians better understand how meaningful the process of citizenship is.

What a wonderful way to provide Canadian youth with a meaningful program of sensitization.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The minister will know that implicit in exercising his fiduciary obligations as a senior minister of the Crown is the issue of trust.

I would like to ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs if he would please explain to the House whether or not he has in fact destroyed the document, the secret memo of March 8, and, if not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: What's wrong with that? It's a straightforward question.

Mr. Speaker: An hon. member said: "What's wrong with that? It's a straightforward question". It is also a straightforward allegation. I ask the hon. member to put his question more appropriately.

Mr. Dingwall: Would the minister explain to the House whether or not he has destroyed the document or whether he has misled or exercised gross negligence—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That question is just a disguised outright charge. The hon. minister may wish to reply.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is neither. To make it absolutely clear to the House—and I say this as a member of Parliament and as someone who I think has earned a reputation for integrity in the country—I take the opportunity to advise the House—

Ms. Copps: You used to love it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If the member for Hamilton East will be quiet enough for a moment to let me answer—

Mr. Simmons: You're a snake.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Shame.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. minister could finish his reply.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I take the opportunity to advise the House that I first became aware of the document when I was in Iqaluit or in the Northwest Territories. I affirm that on my reputation as someone who has served in the public life of this country for 20 years and as a member of this House.

I have not seen it. I did not order anything done with it. I did not know it existed until after the controversy had become public. In any fair and honest place, that would end this matter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, a senior minister of the cabinet has responded in the negative on both counts.

Would he explain to Canadians from coast to coast, but in particularly members of this House, why the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has waited in excess of three months and has done absolutely nothing to track down the secret memo of March 8? Why the inordinate delay in trying to find the memo? What is the minister trying to hide?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think one thing is clear to Canadians from coast to coast, and it is that I have some very sensitive and onerous responsibilities given my responsibility for constitutional affairs. If this controversy is deliberately prolonged without reason, that could affect my ability to undertake those responsibilities.

Mr. Dingwall: Answer the question. You are prolonging the controversy.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I should say to the right hon. minister that the question was pointed, but nonetheless I would like the right hon. minister to answer the question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think most Canadians would hope that there are some limits to partisanship in this House and even on this issue.

With respect to the particular question, the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition, an officer of this House, knows that responsibility for tracing a document once it became known that it was lost would rest with the minister at the time. He knows that I was not the minister at the time.

The question was put to me deliberately. The question was put to me with malice aforethought. I am answering the question to make it clear that was a matter on which I could not take action for well-known constitutional reasons after I was no longer Secretary of State for External Affairs.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the chairman of the Standing Committee on House Management. This seems like a very appropriate day to put the question.

Several members including myself have made points of order regarding absolute consistent breaching of very clear rules of Question Period outlined in the annotated Standing Orders, No. 37, and Beauchesne's citations 409 and 410.

Is the committee on House management going to address these points of order? Would it consider a motion that all members of Parliament follow all the rules all of the time?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the hon. member that the House management committee has looked at the issue of Question Period and the performance of members on both sides of the House in Question Period.

We have not yet come to a consensus. We will continue to work on the issue, and I hope that we as a committee can put some semblance of rationality back into this institution to give us some credibility with Canadians.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

In October 1990, Copyright Board Canada set the royalties for cablevision. As a result of this decision, Quebecers now have to pay $11.8 million in royalties, 85 per cent of which go to the United States and Americans.

Now we all know that Quebecers do not watch U.S. television or at least very little, and in any case a lot less than English Canada. Mr. Speaker, as you know, French language television in Quebec needs those millions of dollars very badly.

How does the minister intend to react to the report tabled by the Quebec Minister of Communications in November 1990, because while people are looking at studies all those millions are going to the United States?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is a little bit late. Two days ago I made the announcement before the Canadian Cable TV Association that my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I would be issuing guidelines which would be helpful in terms of resolving the issue.

THE LATE SENATOR DAVID CROLL

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that Senator David Croll passed away yesterday, and I would like to pay tribute to a great Canadian.

This man devoted all his life to public life. He was from a minority group and had to struggle in the 1930s to get elected. He managed to attain very high offices in our land. He was Mayor of Windsor. He was the first person of the Jewish faith to become a member of the Ontario cabinet and the first one to become a senator.

I had the privilege to serve in the caucus of the Liberal Party with Senator Croll for more than a quarter of a century. He was an extremely impressive person. Senator Croll had only one preoccupation and it was to defend those who were defenceless in our society. It was to fight for those who needed the help of other Canadians. He was a promoter of all the social programs that we are so proud of today, and he had been a promoter of these programs since the 1920s and 1930s.

Senator Croll always said that in a country like Canada nobody should go to bed hungry, nobody should be homeless, nobody should suffer, because there is enough in this country to provide a decent living for any human being.

[Translation]

Senator Croll was one of those reformers who left their mark on this country. He was elected to public office as a very young man. He was mayor, minister and senator. However, the focus of his contribution was always to defend the rights of the neediest in our society.

As a political party, there have been times when we were unsure about the path we should take and every time we had doubts, when the Liberal Party was somewhat disoriented, Senator Croll would rise and tell us what to do. One of his principles was always to give the weakest members of our society the benefit of the doubt. He was a great Liberal. He was a great teacher for us all in this House. I think his sudden departure will be a great loss not only for my party but for the Senate and the entire country as well. There have been very few politicians of his moral calibre.

[English]

There is nothing Canada cannot do and do best. We have to do it when we can stand proud, remembering that there are those who have received less and those who have been put aside because of either faith, colour, sex or other differences because in Canada we are all equal.

What is important in human beings is always the human being itself. David Croll had almost been a father to me and many others, because whenever we were in doubt, and I was many times in my career, we asked David Croll what to do.

He always said: "You have to be on the side of those who need help, on the side of justice and dignity". This man has made a great mark on Canada, and I would like to offer his family our condolences. I hope there will be many more David Crolls in Canadian society in the years to come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to pay tribute to Senator David Croll on behalf of my party and on behalf of those of us in my community in Toronto who were admirers of the late senator.

He was, like many distinguished Canadians, not born in Canada. He came here from Moscow. He grew up and was educated here to have a distinguished career among us.

He was the first Jewish cabinet minister, the first Jewish senator in Canada, and within those offices he contributed vitally.

He also was a member of the Canadian army. He joined in 1939 and went to war for Canada. He joined as a private and retired at the end of the war as a colonel. He was a man of great courage, vision and distinction. I think that all of us in this House will miss the presence and the historical contribution that he has made.

Let me join the hon. Leader of the Opposition in hoping that there will be many more of his stature who will choose to serve in public life.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, we also want to join with our Liberal and Conservative colleagues in paying tribute to Senator David Croll, the dean of the Senate who passed away at the age of 91 years.

I remember when I was first elected to this House and after being here a couple of years, in 1971 he issued a report on poverty. He was the chairman of the Senate Committee on Poverty. His report was very revealing about the situation at that time. It made many recommendations about helping poor people in this country.

He was a man of tremendous dedication to a cause. It is important that we think of Senator Croll and remember in him that he had a cause. He had a purpose to be in public life, and he was in public life in many different capacities.

He started as mayor of Windsor in 1930. Later he became a member of the provincial parliament in Ontario. He was a cabinet minister with two or three different portfolios and in 1945 he was a member of Parliament for the federal riding of Toronto—Spadina. In 1955 he was appointed as a senator for the province of Ontario.

[Translation]

He was a great Canadian and a great democrat. He was an example to all of us here in the House, to those in the other place and to all Canadians.

On behalf of my party I wish to offer my condolences to his family and friends.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, during the 10 years or more that I was in the Liberal caucus, there were certain people who made an impression on us, and I think Senator David Croll was one of those people. Few politicians are perpetual idealists. Many of us become cynical over time, but I believe Senator Croll was a perpetual idealist. He had not the slightest trace of opportunism or political self-interest. He always acted according to his principles, especially where defending human dignity was concerned. Very few politicians earn the respect of all members of this House. I think Senator Croll led the way for many of us who believe in philosophy and human dignity. I wish to extend our condolences to his family, and I hope he will remain a guide for us all.

[English]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say what an immense privilege it has been for me to have been in Parliament and in the Liberal caucus with David Croll.

I will not review in detail the highlights of his career. Others have done that. Certainly we will be hearing more in the coming days.

• (1510)

I would like to mention that in 1971 at the age of 71 he chaired the Senate Committee on Poverty and recommended the implementation of a guaranteed annual income for all families and individuals. He said later it is the only way to give people the minimum living standards to which they are entitled.

What I really want to talk about is what it was like to hear David Croll speak. He was a gentle man with a sparkle in his eye. He spoke softly, but with such power. Every time he spoke, the room would fall silent. People would listen because they knew that he had something important to say. He always spoke about the needs of the elderly, the poor, the sick and how we had an obligation to respond to their interests.

[Translation]

I had a special affinity to and affection for David Croll. He was born on March 12, 1900, at the turn of the century, and my father was born on January 1, 1900. There was a certain similarity in the way they talked.

[English]

I would like to express my sympathies to the members of Senator Croll's family. We will remember him for a long, long, long time and we will honour ourselves if we can dedicate ourselves to fight for the ideals and the principles that David Croll stood for.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): So much of the life of Senator David Croll was connected with the city of Windsor, and part of his provincial riding of Windsor—Walkerville is located within my Windsor West riding. Therefore you will understand why I want to rise and for a minute or two say something by way of tribute to the late Senator Croll.

He was always to the end of his days a strong voice for social justice, a strong voice for people in need, the elderly, the pensioners, the handicapped and the poor.

It is remarkable that he passed away after a full active day in his work as a senator, and I am sure he looked forward to being in our Liberal caucus this morning. He was always the first to arrive there. I must say it will not be the same coming to our caucus and not seeing Senator Croll already there to take part in the work of our caucus. When he took part in the work of our caucus he was always a progressive voice, a voice of reform and a voice of liberalism, both big and small l, in the best sense of the term.

I am sure his point of view, his attitudes, reflected his experience as an immigrant child who came with his family to Windsor from eastern Europe. I am sure his views, his attitudes, reflected very much the values of his Jewish heritage. I am sure they also reflected the concerns of the Windsor area, a city of hard working people from all over the world who came together in Windsor to build better lives for themselves and their families.

Dave Croll always worked for equality, fairness and reform. Mayor of Windsor at only 30 years of age, he helped his city to get through the devastation of the recession. His work in bringing together the former border cities created the city of Windsor as it is today.

His work as a member of the provincial legislature and as a member of the provincial cabinet did much to help the province get through the troubles and travails of the Great Depression of the thirties.

You will recall that as a member of the provincial legislature and as a cabinet minister, he helped establish in the province of Ontario basic programs of labour standards and social welfare which are the foundations of many of the programs of which we are so proud today.

Dave Croll always put the people first.

This was shown by what he said when he resigned from the Ontario cabinet because he did not agree with the views of his premier on the organization of workers in the trade unions. He said that he "would rather walk with the workers than ride with General Motors".

A recent biography of Dave Croll is entitled The People's Senator. Before he was the people's senator he was the people's member of Parliament from Toronto, the people's member of the legislature, the people's cabinet minister and the people's mayor of Windsor. Windsor has always been proud of Dave Croll and Windsor will always be proud of him. The city was, as I have said, so much a part of his life and his career.

I want to express my deepest sympathy to his family, his brother and his daughters. I want to say to this House that the greatest and strongest way we have of honouring the memory of Dave Croll is to ensure that the ideals for which he stood will continue to inspire all of us who seek to serve the public interest in this House and everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would like to state a few words because Senator Croll, when he was a member of this place, represented the riding of which I am now the representative. This man was a different kind of senator when one recalls that he spent his last day as an 11-hour day. That indicates the devotion that he had to this place. He was so much a symbol of Windsor. His imprint upon Windsor was exceedingly strong. It was strong among those who were poor. It was strong among those who worked for a living. It was exceedingly strong among those of us of many ethnic and racial groups in Windsor who looked for a voice of equality.

We will all miss him, but we will not lose what he gave us in Windsor and that is a character of generosity and care which he brought to this place as well.

I would like to express on behalf of my community and my party our condolences to the family and we share their sorrow in this loss.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just want to bring to the attention of the House an infraction of Standing Order 37 today during Question Period and also Beauchesne's citations 409 and 410. Citation 409 reads:

> A preamble need not exceed one carefully drawn sentence—A supplementary question should need no preamble.

Citation 410 reads:

> Supplementary questions should flow from the answers of Ministers.

I just want to register my feeling that this rule was broken again today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about this point of order. I want to draw to the attention of the Chair that what the hon. member cites in Beauchesne's as being rules are not rules at all. They are guidelines that individual Speakers announced to inform the House as to how they would view Question Period.

It is entirely, under our rules, within the discretion of yourself, Sir, having been elected by the House with full authority in that regard, to act fairly with respect to Question Period.

I for one have full confidence in your ability to do that without the daily efforts of certain members opposite to try and create a case which does not stand on the facts about what Question Period ever was in this House, especially when the other side now in government was in opposition.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, all I would like to say is that I think we are all aware and it has been clear to us in many, many quarters that the public which watches this institution holds us in disrespect as a result of what it sees. I think what it sees is Question Period and what it sees about Question Period does not cause the public to have the respect for this institution it needs to have.

In that context, I think the answer of the chairman of the management committee that this is being looked at in an all-party committee in terms of what we can do to regain the respect of the public is a good suggestion and we ought to let that happen.

• (1520)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I want to say that we respect the decisions you make every day during Question Period. With regard to the opposition side as well as the government side, from time to time you see that it is appropriate to intervene and direct members of Parliament in either their questions or their answers. I consider this daily intervention to be a questioning of your ability and your decision. I think it is perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that you do the best you can to run this place as businesslike as possible.

I want to suggest to my hon. friend, the government House leader, that I do not think people are fed up with Parliament. I think people are fed up with the government and the fact that the government is ignoring the concerns of Canadians, whether on the GST, the free trade agreement or whatever.

I consider this type of an intervention a direct challenge to the way that you have managed the House on our behalf. I think it is very, very inappropriate.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order which was raised by my colleague from Nova Scotia concerning the appropriateness of the way Question Period is conducted in this House. I would have to concur with the sentiments expressed by my colleague the House leader for the New Democratic Party that this continual assault each and every day by government members concerning the propriety of Question Period really is a questioning of the judgment of the Chair.

We have complete confidence that the Chair will conduct the affairs of this House in accordance with the rules and in accordance with the traditions of this House. For the government House leader to continually say that the problem is that all members of Parliament are held in disrespect, I suggest that perhaps the hon. member is continuing to look in the mirror all too often.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

TABLING OF FEDERAL ELECTIONS FEES TARIFF

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the President of the Privy Council and Prime Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, I would like to table three documents.

The first document is tabled under section 198 of the Canada Elections Act. Attached, in both official languages, are copies of the Federal Elections Fees Tariff, the Northwest Territories Elections Fees Tariff and the Special Voting Rules General Elections Fees Tariff.

In accordance with the said act, I would ask you to make the necessary arrangements to have these documents laid before the House of Commons immediately.

NORTHERN PIPELINE AGENCY

TABLING OF REPORTS

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the second document, pursuant to section 72 of the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. We are tabling, in both official languages, copies of the reports of the Northern Pipeline Agency for the period ended March 31, 1991.

I would ask you to make the necessary arrangements to have these reports laid before the House of Commons immediately.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS BOARD

TABLING OF EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to table the third document, pursuant to section 72 of the Access to Information Act.

We are tabling, in both official languages, a copy of the eight annual report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the period ended March 31, 1991.

In accordance with the said act, we ask you to make the necessary arrangements to have this report laid before the House of Commons immediately.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, regarding the official languages legislation.

Section 49 says: "A commissioner shall be appointed under the great seal after approval by the appointment of a resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons".

We are all aware that the Commissioner of Official Languages will put in his last day this Friday. As of Saturday, we will not have a Commissioner of Official Languages.

I want to ask my good friend, the government House leader: Does the government plan to bring in a motion before Friday, or will there be a period of time before we actually have agreed on a motion appointing a new commissioner?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I cannot give the hon. member the precise date on which that will be done, but it will be done soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, could the government House leader just indicate to the House, perhaps elaborate if he would, what degree of consultations will be taking place with regard to this appointment?

The Commissioner of Official Languages, as the hon. member knows, is an officer of this House. I believe the tradition of this House has been that there would be meaningful consultations with the respective parties concerning this appointment.

Mr. Andre: I do not want to have to speak on the precise details, but it may well be that the travel plans of both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have made it difficult to have those consultations, but I know they are intended to be held.

PETITIONS

THE BURNING TIMES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to table petitions signed by 200 Canadians who are opposed to their tax dollars being used to fund and distribute the National Film Board's production of the anti-Catholic and historically inaccurate film The Burning Times. Through the presentation of historical inaccuracies and commentary entirely biased against and hostile to the Catholic Church, the film attempts to foster hatred and misunderstanding of the Catholic religion.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request the film The Burning Times be withdrawn from circulation and the National Film Board publicly apologize to Catholics.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, this petition is signed by 150 Canadians.

Whereas Canada has never recognized the forcible annexation of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia into the Soviet Union, and whereas the Government of Lithuania has responded with an urgent appeal for the immediate support of all democratic countries to protect independence, democracy and freedom in Lithuania, Estonia and Latvia, the petitioners call upon Parliament to immediately recognize and establish diplomatic relations with the legitimate, democratically elected Government of the Republic of Lithuania.

• (1530)

The petitioners demand further that the Soviet Union withdraw all its military forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania and that unconditional and international aid to the Soviet Union in the form of credit and feed grains be conditional upon the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Baltic states and resolution of the Baltic crisis.

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL PRIDE WEEK

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from the staff and students of the Streetsville Secondary School with 880 signatures who hereby declare their pride in Canada.

They perceive a growing lack of pride in the Canadian population. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to declare a national pride week. The purpose would be to encourage all Canadians and organizations within schools to celebrate the history, achievements and potential that is Canada.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, the petition is certified correct as to form and content.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is correct as to form and content.

People from the Ottawa community would like to signify that in their opinion Marie Sklodowska Curie must be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity.

They also believe that because Marie Sklodowska Curie discovered radium, was twice awarded the Nobel Prize and was the first woman to win a place in the history of science she deserves to be recognized by Canada.

They believe that this Polish woman, who was a servant of mankind and a scientist who fame could not corrupt, has been honoured by many different countries of the world and should be honoured by Canada. This House should humbly pray and call upon Canada Post to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is a pleasure for me to present a petition from the residents of Moncton and North Bay, Ontario.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petition is from 125 residents of many areas: Smiths Falls, Nepean, Ottawa, Greely, Kanata, Gloucester, Orleans, Hull, Almonte, Richmond, Vars, Gatineau, Aylmer, Stittsville and Cornwall. It is with regard to the Conservative government's intention to impose a freeze on federal Public Service wage increases for fiscal year 1991–92.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition to the House which is signed by a number of residents from the greater Vancouver area.

These residents believe that a great woman, Madam Marie Curie, must be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity and the gift of the discovery of radium and the application of that gift for the healing of the sick throughout the world.

The petitioners feel she needs to be recognized at this time by Canada. As we well know, Madam Curie was the discoverer of radium and has been twice awarded the Nobel Prize. She is the first woman to win a place in the history of science.

The petitioners are calling on Canada Post to honour Madam Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth which occurred on November 7, 1992.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have some 14 petitions with approximately 600 names of residents throughout the Okanagan—Shuswap, the communities of Sicamous, Tappen, Salmon Arm, Lunby, Celista, Enderby, Grindrod, Sorrento and Eagle Bay.

The petitioners are calling upon the government to reconsider its position in terms of the plans for the government to reduce its share of funding for RCMP services in communities throughout British Columbia.

They are asking for the government to restore the proper levels of funding in the ongoing negotiations as they proceed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of cities and towns throughout Canada, including a number of students, staff and faculty of St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia.

The petitioners wrote that in October 1985 the subcommittee on equality rights of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs submitted a unanimous report to the House recommending that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

They note further that in March 1986, over five years ago, the government accepted the report and its recommendations and said it would implement the report.

Finally, they note that the government has yet to introduce this important amendment, despite urging by the Canadian Human Rights Commission and others. Therefore, they urge the government to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops and the surrounding communities. They are concerned that the government is intending to cut back on financial support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They acknowledge the fact that has been put on hold for at least 12 months but are encouraging the government to continue with its full support of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to ensure that police protection is maintained throughout the area.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from a number of respected residents of Osoyoos, British Columbia.

These residents state that the tools for building a better Canada have been abandoned. Important national institutions have been underfunded and then privatized. This government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the last four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations in Calgary, Corner Brook, Goose Bay, Sydney, Sept-Iles, Toronto, Saskatoon, Windsor, as well as other areas.

The petitioners are urging Parliament to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada. Parliament must re-examine this government's priorities in terms of decreasing funding for Canadian institutions and its insistence on privatization.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise with reluctance. I know the parliamentary secretary does his best, but there is a question of mine on the Order Paper, No. 17, dated May 13. The government House leader may find this amusing but it is not.

This question in fact has been on the Order Paper since February 25. It was put on in the last session and I asked for a response within 45 days. More than 45 days elapsed in the last session. The government did not get around to answering it.

The question deals with the expenditures the government made for the purpose of getting the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean elected before they realized that he was in fact useless for their purposes. They spent a lot of money. The question asks for details on the expenditures, which programs that were promised were cancelled, which ones went ahead and how much was spent on each of the promises that the government made in that constituency.

This information cannot be difficult for the government to come up with. It has had months and months and months to do so and, with respect, I plead with the parliamentary secretary to crack the whip on the people who are supposed to be providing him with these answers. I know it is not his department, but surely to goodness this kind of question should not be left and this kind of negligence allowed to continue.

I know the government has trouble keeping track of papers and documents, but surely the answer to this question was prepared in the last Parliament and could be found and provided to the House on an expeditious basis.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention. I want to advise him that it was my intention yesterday to check into the very matter he raises but, as he may well know, Peter Gzowski had a very important tournament on illiteracy in this country and there were members on his side, myself included, who went out to support that cause. As a result I will have to check into that today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That this House affirm that Ministers are individually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons for the activities of government including the management and conduct of the Public Service; that, individually, Ministers are responsible for the administration of the decisions of the Government and the activities of Public Servants falling under their jurisdiction; and that, collectively, they are responsible for the decisions of the Government as a whole and the activities of their colleagues.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on May 8 press reports detailed how a former Iraqi ambassador to Washington by the name of Al-Mashat was given quick and accelerated access into Canada, apparently circumventing a number of the required procedures under the Immigration Act. It raised many questions about how preference and priority are afforded to special guests of the government.

Since that time the issue has become much bigger, much more serious, much more critical than the mere entry of Al-Mashat into Canada. In many ways it has gone to the very heart of accountability and responsibility of a parliamentary system of government. It has questioned the very credibility of several senior ministers of the present government. It has gone to the question of how trust and confidence, veracity and honesty have to be the currency of this House, and not a debased currency as is so often the case and as we have seen in the last three weeks.

Even today we saw the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs complaining, perhaps whining, that this discussion and inquiry has hurt his own credibility; as if it was the responsibility of the opposition, as if it was the opposition that was responsible for ducking, bobbing, weaving, and evading its responsibility.

It was an attempt one more time to deflect the responsibility for a serious decision which no one had the guts, the courage, the sense of ethics, or parliamentary morality to stand up and take responsibility for.

I was recently reading a comment made by Malcolm Fraser, the Australian Prime Minister in 1982, which I thought would be good advice for members opposite to take. He said: "This government has always upheld the fundamental principle of ministerial responsibility" and "the appearance and reality of integrity are indispensable parts of our system of government". Integrity and responsibility are indispensable parts of our system of government, one that we share with the Australians.

In all the thousands of words that have been exchanged I have never yet once heard any member on the opposite side understand or admit that integrity and responsibility are an indispensable part of our system of government. If they had admitted it we would have had a very different story. We would have had a very different chronology of events. We would have had ministers standing up and saying: "Yes, Al-Mashat came in. I take responsibility for it. If you do not like it, what are you going to do about it?" In other words, defending the actions of the government.

Instead, we have had deflection, hiding, and evasion. Perhaps the most smarmy move of all was trying to take a couple of public servants and put them before the public saying: "They are the ones who caused the problem. It is their error in judgment, not ours".

Let us get down to facts. Let us deal with the specifics of the issue. First, let us deal with the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present minister of constitutional affairs who keeps saying: "I see no evil, hear no evil. I didn't know anything about it, had no responsibility. Don't touch me, I can't be held responsible for anything. After all it was only a decision made by my chief of staff, the person whom I appointed, the person I put into place, not a public servant, not some anonymous foreign service officer way off in Ankara or Vienna but the person who has offices right next to mine". Yet he said he had no responsibility. That is a distortion of a fundamental principle of ministerial responsibility.

To compound the error, that minister, along with others, says: "It was the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs who did not inform me".

We even heard from the under-Secretary. It appears that in fact he was informed according to the procedures set out by the minister himself. It was not a matter of the Associate Under-Secretary forgetting. He did not say: "I am not going to tell the minister". He instructed a senior civil servant, the head of the Security Division of External Affairs, to write a memo detailing that Al-Mashat had been turned down as a defector and was now being considered as a possible retiree.

That memorandum went to the major departmental clerk of the minister's office who registered it. It came in an envelope marked secret, had a tab snapped on under red wax. It went from there to the office of a chief of staff who admits that he read it, but then he cannot recall what happened to it. All of a sudden he was struck with a fit of amnesia that has lasted for three months.

Actually, maybe the minister responsible is the minister of health and welfare. Maybe it is that he has not undertaken a major health inspection of all departmental assistants, all executive assistants, all chiefs of staffs and all ministers of the Crown who seem to have been struck by a mass epidemic of amnesia on the government side. All we heard in the testimony was: "I can't recall. I can't remember. I wasn't there. I don't know. I am not sure".

The fact of the matter is that the minister of constitutional affairs does bear full responsibility in terms of what goes on in his office.

I will take him at his word. He stood up in Parliament today and said: "I did not see it". We cannot dispute the word of a member.

At the same time it does beg a real question as to what happened to the memo. Does anybody in this entire country believe that a memo marked "Secret" sent under the proper procedures in the Department of External Affairs, which is probably the most self-conscious department in the entire country about security matters, all of a sudden just vanishes overnight? It just sort of flutters away.

No such thing happened to it. That security memo is somewhere, but this government has made no effort to find it. It has not made any. I make this additional allegation, charge and submission to the government. If it is trying to defend the performance and activity of individual ministers, how is it possible to do so when there has been no real effort to call in the RCMP to properly investigate what happened to the memo or who is responsible for it?

When there was a small budget leak that a reporter from Global Television, Doug Small, received, half the legions of the RCMP were scouring the country looking for it.

When members of the opposition are sent a brown envelope and it arrives at their desk with some kind of government document within 24 hours the RCMP is in our office saying: "How did you get hold of that?"

The government goes to extraordinary lengths to change its typewritten cabinet documents and secret documents so it can trace them. However, all of a sudden in this one case there is a cavalier, casual approach.

The present minister of external affairs says: "I don't know. I have been away. I don't know". This is a minister who is operating in a total fit of absence and is not fulfilling her responsibility to find that document so that we can find out what is the truth.

I just heard the parliamentary secretary say: "We have it". Once again, another big lie. Once again, another piece of mythology. Once again, we are engaging in propaganda because that parliamentary secretary knows full well that the original had disappeared and he knows the original—

Mr. Friesen: I think it would be proper, and I think the member knows that he has to withdraw the remark that he has just made. If he wants to keep it parliamentary, he ought to withdraw that remark.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think he called anybody a liar. I think he made a statement. Carry on. I will look at the "blues".

If the hon. member, who has been here for as long as many of us have and in fact longer, feels that he has gone beyond what he should be saying here in the House then I know he will withdraw it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Certainly look at the "blues". What I was saying was that this government, day after day, attempts to manufacture new concoctions about what went on.

The parliamentary secretary is attempting to intimate that we have the document when he knows full well the original document has disappeared and that original document has stamped on it who received it and how it was used. If there is going to be any apology it should be from that parliamentary secretary who is directly responsible for shutting down the committee of inquiry by saying he refused to answer any questions.

Knowing that hon. member, I know we will not get an apology. I know when the apology will come. It will be the day when he has to face his electorate back in his own riding. It is going to demand the ultimate apology, which is the fact that will put him into permanent retirement.

Let us go on to the second case of ministerial responsibility. I want to cite very clearly the circumstances and the events that we know about.

Once it was discovered that Al-Mashat was in the country and it became public, the entire government geared into massive damage control.

We know that on May 13, there was a meeting held of senior cabinet ministers, including the minister of external affairs, the former Solicitor General, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the minister for constitutional affairs, the Clerk of the Privy Council and the principal secretary to the Prime Minister. Did they get together to talk about, as we keep hearing, admonitions from the minister of external affairs to get down to the substance?

Did they get together to talk about what was happening in Kuwait or to the Kurdish refugees? No. They were planning on how they could issue a report that would be laundered and cleansed, and would carefully, selectively take the information which had been given to them by the pubic service auditors and refine it into a more acceptable document, missing key points, key facts, key elements and ingredients.

Those very same ministers had the unmitigated nerve and gall to come before the public on May 14 and say: "This is a complete document and it has all the facts, everything you need to know. Nothing more needs to be said".

The very day before this high level committee of ministers and senior officials had spent its time whiting out the important parts, twisting the words, rewriting and regauging. To compound the problem once again, it engaged in what I can only call an act of political extortion. The committee wrote into that report apologies or confessions for Mr. Raymond Chrétien, the Associate Under-Secretary and for Mr. Daubney, even though neither of those two gentlemen had ever been asked if they were prepared to apologize. They had never been given the opportunity to give their side of the case to that committee. This committee was a star chamber, a kangaroo court. It is running people out on a rail.

Once it was revealed, once that information came to light and we knew that a senior group of ministers and officials had engaged in this kind of political concoction, not one of them had the guts or the courage to stand in the House and apologize to the individuals involved for ruining their reputations. In fact those ministers and officials gloated over it.

The minister of external affairs in a press conference said: "Of course this is going to undermine their reputation". There are several people whose reputations have been undermined. It is not the Associate Under-Secretary. It is the minister of external affairs, the minister for constitutional affairs and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. That is really where the crux of this whole issue lies.

One does not have to take my word for it.

Let me just read, if I may for a few moments, the comments of other people who have had some serious and distinguished experience in government. Mr. Al Johnson, who was a former deputy minister, in a May 23 article in The Citizen, said: "The pick and choose approach to ministerial responsibility is lunacy. Ministers would be free to choose what they would accept responsibility for; everything that went well, of course, they would agree with; anything that went wrong it was the civil servants to blame".

Let me also cite the judgment of Judge Lieff in the Goyer case in 1978: "It is a long-standing convention of parliamentary democracy and the doctrine of ministerial responsibility which encompasses it that civil servants are to remain faceless to the public. A minister should not be able to blame or castigate personally any civil servant or department under his control".

We then come to a third authority, and this is an authority I hope the government will listen to because it was the authority cited ad nauseam by the minister of external affairs. Professor Kenneth Kernaghan, on the whole concept of ministerial responsibility, said: "In the event of maladministration by department officials, the conventions of both ministerial responsibility and political neutrality require that ministers protect the anonymity of the wrongdoers by declining to identify them publicly".

He goes on to explain that also the burden of proof is on the ministers to be responsible.

Let me also quote once again from J. R. Mallory who was the authority cited by the minister of external affairs as taking away her obligation to be accountable: "A minister alone is accountable for the policy of his department; the civil servant cannot be called to account for policy statements or his actions". That was J. R. Mallory, one of the distinguished political scientists.

The reason why it is important that this House face this issue and come to grips with it, and why members of both sides of the House must support this motion is in recognition of the damage that has been done. Until we reassert this fundamental principle of responsibility there is going to be a continued undermining of the confidence of the Public Service of this country. Officials in external affairs will never again be able to trust their minister after she railroaded one of their senior officials into the kind of public ignominy that she was responsible for.

All public servants across Canada are right now saying to themselves: "I am not taking the responsibility. I am not making the decision because I am going to be hung out to dry by those ministers".

That is one reason why this House must reaffirm this principle. We must also reaffirm confidence in the way that this government works because we see time and time again ministers evading the truth, not detailing the facts, blaming other people, and fingering public servants. We are all talking about this scepticism. The throne speech said in such eloquent words that we must restore belief in the parliamentary system. I can think of no more serious erosion to the parliamentary system than what has been constituted by these ministers not taking responsibility and accountability for their actions. That is where the real responsibility lies. That is when confidence is undermined; when ministers get up in this House and play deaf and dumb to their own responsibilities. That is not the way to conduct oneself.

Over the years this government has been on a wrecking crusade. It has undermined the CBC. It has undermined our public transportation system. It undermined the economy of this country and people are paying a heavy price for it. Now, not satisfied with ripping apart the economic and social fabric of Canada, it is trying to undermine the Parliament of Canada and the very system which we are all sworn to defend and protect.

Until we can reaffirm what is important to it and until we can say to Canadians very clearly that we are going to try to rebuild that system and show ministers who are elected to take accountability, that the buck stops at their desk and not at somebody else's desk, there will not be confidence in this system of government and there will not be confidence that people can be governed with honesty, truth and veracity.

The government shut down the parliamentary inquiry probably because we are getting too close to the truth. It can redeem itself by having a judicial inquiry where it is not subject to parliamentary majorities, so that there can be oaths of office, so that there can be proper investigation, so that we can get a kind of real insight.

If the government is not prepared to do that there is another way. I would like to cite the comments of Lord Carrington, a distinguished British minister and former Secretary of State for External Affairs.

• (1600)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. He will require unanimous consent to continue. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: No.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member please give us the citation that he was about to read?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Hamilton East for the courtesy which is denied me by the members on the government side.

I would like to read the statement made by Lord Carrington in his autobiography. He said: "The nation feels that there has been a disgrace. Someone must have been to blame. The disgrace must be purged. The person to purge it should be the minister in charge".

I would think that it would be good advice that the present minister of constitutional affairs and the Minister of Employment and Immigration should take to heart. Where there is a disgrace, it should be purged. It can only be purged by the minister in charge.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the member here, and we will all keep in mind, that we will look at the "blues" to make sure that when we get them and check them the member will withdraw that statement.

I want to come, first of all, to the whole harangue about the secret memo of which he has a copy, and all the members of his party who were on the committee have a copy, and the member for Burnaby—Kingsway has a copy. It is a secret memo, of which the press all has copies.

Ms. Copps: Where is the original?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to hear the comments and the question put. I cannot do it if there are going to be exchanges from across the floor.

Mr. Friesen: All these members have the opportunity of getting copies of that memo. They persist in talking about the secret memo that is missing. It is true the original is missing, after all the copies were made.

Could they tell the difference between one copy or another? Bring in the RCMP with the Xerox machines.

Ms. Copps: I thought you were a lawyer.

Mr. Friesen: No, I am not. I am clean.

Could they tell with modern technology the difference between the original and the copy? I doubt that they could.

This member began his address by inveighing against what he called the quick and accelerated access to Canada that Mr. Al-Mashat had. He talked about the special access and the high dudgeon, synthetic outrage that this member had against that particular process.

I want to take this member back a few years when there was real reason to express outrage. I take him back to Hansard, page 2646 of July 8, 1980, when he was minister of immigration. I have raised this before, and the member already knows what is coming.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again I would like to say to the hon. member for Scarborough West that I cannot hear if there is going to be yelling across the aisle. I would like to hear what the comment and question are. I may have to rule on something he is saying, so please.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, these are the ones who believe in free speech but shout down others who want to speak.

Mr. Gauthier: Be reasonable. I want to ask questions too.

Mr. Friesen: Okay. You will get your shot. You want to hear about Guiseppe Calamusa again, don't you? The member was asked about the special treatment of what we could call the quick and accelerated access, the special access that this member when he was minister of immigration gave to one Giuseppe Calamusa who moved from Niagara Falls to Winnipeg, presumably to be a little closer to the minister's office at that time so he could get quick and accelerated access to Canada.

Let me give you the credentials of this individual. He was asked about the record: high and upstanding. He had three criminal records in the former country where he lived. He was helped along, incidentally, by the member's campaign worker, who had given him lodging for that quick and easy access to Canada. When he was asked about deportation, here is what the minister said: "The procedure is to allow those who are given a deportation order", very carefully chosen words, "to be given a permit so that they can then present it upon re-entry".

Since when could somebody under deportation order come back into the country? That is the most fundamental rule, that people under deportation do not come back to Canada. This member not only gave him a permit to come back in, he provided immigration officers to ride in a government car to Emerson, Manitoba, do the loop around Emerson, do the re-entry and come back into Canada. And this is the man who is so offended that Al-Mashat had quick and easy access. Nothing but synthetic outrage from this man. After that kind of a record, how could he object to another man coming into Canada through the special access, the quick and accelerated access?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member is a student of history because I think he should learn something from that incident.

First, let us get the facts straight. I remember the case very well. The member quoted somewhat selectively, just as his ministers do in the Al-Mashat case. What he did not mention is that the Calamusa family also had a child who was near death and could only get treatment in Canada and that under the Immigration Act, the minister is obliged to give a permit in matters of humanitarian or compassionate means. Otherwise the child might have died. The only way they could have got the treatment was to have them stay in Canada and demonstrate if they would become good Canadian citizens, which, by the way, they have now become. I am glad to report that as far as I know he still owns and operates a bakery and is providing employment for several Canadians.

But, here is the difference: I made that decision as the minister of immigration and I got up in the House of Commons and took full responsibility for that decision. I did not hide. I did not duck. I did not evade. I took all the heat that that member could give, which was not very much, because he is not capable of generating much intellectual heat in anything. But I took full responsibility and I did not try to duck and hide like his ministers did. I accepted ministerial responsibility. That is the difference.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to hear more about this case. I think the hon. member is putting a red herring here. I want to hear the member for Winnipeg South Centre tell us more about this case that he had to deal with.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, very clearly, there was a case which was transferred to me by the Department of Immigration with a number of recommendations on it dealing with the judgment that had to be made as to whether this gentleman, who had a large family of six children all of whom had been born in Canada, would be allowed to stay or be asked to leave.

We received differing opinions as happens with most immigration case, from security, from medical officers, and it came down to, and hopefully I will get back to the germane, responsibility.

After considering all the evidence, after taking the memo from my civil servant, directly by the way, not being screened by some assistant or chief of staff, but looking at it directly according to my own lights and taking it and pondering on it, I decided to let the family stay under a short-term permit to allow the child to have treatment and to determine if the family was then able to begin to establish its bona fides in Canada, to show its proper citizenship. They could have been sent back any time under that permit if they had not showed that.

Fortunately it was a good judgment call. Of course the real deciding factor, the real difference in all those immigration cases, is that I was prepared to come into this House every single day and take my responsibility for them. If the opposition did not want to help a child who was ill to get proper treatment that was its business, but I took that decision and I am proud of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker I remember that case. The individual in question had a criminal record, had been deported and had come back illegally.

• (1610)

There was no doubt that the overwhelming opinion of officials was that he should not be permitted in Canada because of his criminal record. The minister of immigration put him in a car, took him down. He says he did it for the right reasons. That could be, but for him to get indignant about special privilege in this case, considering what he did in that case, is a little bit—shall we say—questionable.

The motion today says:

> That this House affirm that Ministers are individually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons for the activities of the government.

In fact we do not disagree with the motion, but we are going to have to vote against it because this is a question of competence.

I wonder what the hon. member's former leader had to say about ministerial responsibility. I quote from Hansard of March 2, 1983 when we had the famous Gillespie case. As a matter of fact the member for Surrey-White Rock-South Langley brought to the attention of the House the quotes from the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, who said in Hansard on page 22938:

> Yes, Madam Speaker, we are collectively responsible for the policies of this government. . . The government as a whole is not collectively responsible for some individual agreement—

Then Mr. Trudeau went on to say:

> However, one could not condemn the whole government for some act of an individual unless the whole government itself had been part of the decision, much as on the other side of the House, if one Tory Member behaves illegally the whole caucus does not stand condemned.

Ah, ha, what about collective ministerial responsibility, Mr. Trudeau? No, no, no, you cannot condemn the whole government unless the whole government participated in the decision. Then Mr. Trudeau said:

> If the Hon. Member is talking about the meaning of responsible government, literally, it means that the Government of the day is responsible to Parliament and can only continue exercising its powers with the authority of Parliament, that is, with the support of the majority of the Members of Parliament. That is what responsible government means.

Nothing more, nothing less, according to Mr. Trudeau. Then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Economic Development at the time, Mr. Jim Peterson—who is now back in the House—said in a late show debate on March 15, 1983, quoting the Prime Minister:

> —the Prime Minister said: "If someone acts improperly in such circumstances, it is not the whole Government that is acting. If a Minister is acting improperly or illegally, he has to be taken to task. However, one could not condemn the whole Government for some act by an individual, unless the whole Government itself had been part of the decision".

Yet we have a motion and screaming and yelling from the hon. member opposite that the ministers are individually and collectively responsible for Al-Mashat. His former leader said absolutely nothing. That is absolutely absurd. I believe he supported his former leader at that time. I do not know if he still does. Going on to quote Mr. Trudeau:

> —literally, it means that the Government of the day is responsible to Parliament and can only continue exercising its powers with the authority of Parliament—

Nothing more than that.

> The Government does not accept responsibility for an error of judgment or bad administration by one of its members. The process of Government compels a delegation of authority. The Cabinet must leave to each Minister a substantial discretion as to what matters he will bring before it. If he makes a mistake, then he must accept the personal responsibility.

That quote is attributed to Sir Ivor Jennings, who Mr. Peterson said was the leading authority on responsible government in the 20th century.

It is interesting how perspectives on responsibility seem to change with time.

The New Democrats have been a part of this exercise. Let us hear what the premier of Ontario had to say about ministerial responsibility. Speaking about the Farnan affair, Mr. Rae is quoted in an article by Chris Hall in The Ottawa Citizen as saying: "Let's put some context here. The opposition talks about ministerial responsibility. I've looked into the precedents and there isn't a case that I can find in the last 50 years where a minister was expected to take the rap, the fall, because something was done without him knowing it. Hmmm, interesting how the standards change, depending on where you are and who the target is".

Let us not go any further than the McGrath committee report, which was endorsed by this House. It was an all-party committee. The hon. member for Papineau signed the report. Everybody agreed to it.

Ms. Copps: It was never adopted.

Mr. Andre: It was adopted by this House. The hon. member for Hamilton East says it was never adopted. She is skating backward. She is saying the hon. member for Papineau was not speaking for the Liberal Party then; he lost his head; he went out to lunch. He probably believed that Mr. Trudeau was right when he said those things. That is probably why. However, in the report it says: "The idea of a minister being responsible for everything that goes on in the department may once have been realistic, but it has long since ceased to be so. A minister cannot possibly know everything that is going on in a department. The doctrine of ministerial accountability undermines the potential for genuine accountability on the part of the person who ought to be accountable, the senior officer of the department".

My goodness, how times change. This was a wonderful doctrine in 1985 when all parties in the House agreed to it. Now it is an outrage, an insult, and something we must abandon.

Ms. Copps: You don't even know what you are talking about.

Mr. Andre: Yes, it was. It was a report put forward by the House to which the government responded and accepted the recommendation flowing from it. There was not one word of opposition from her party. She knows it.

Ms. Copps: It was not. That's a lie.

Mr. Andre: She says: "That's a lie". I would like her to quote one word of opposition anywhere because I have gone through the minutes. She knows she is wrong and she is caught out.

Part of the minutes of the McGrath committee report, interestingly enough, discuss this question of ministerial responsibility selectively, but I would like to quote from the committee proceedings of February 7, 1985, page 612.

Mr. Harvard: That is some kind of archaeological dig.

Mr. Andre: It talked about Doug Fisher, the columnist, who appeared before the committee and said: "Last Friday on my television program Gordon Robertson said the whole idea of ministerial responsibility is outmoded".

I think he is right. He said we had to start holding—

Mr. Harvard: Some kind of archaeologist. I will never learn from Doug Fisher.

Mr. Andre: Just a minute. Listen to this, John Harvard. You may learn something.

He said we had to start holding public servants accountable.

Mr. Harvard: I will never learn from Doug Fisher.

Mr. Andre: You're right. You can't learn anything. You need to have some intelligence to do that.

He is quoting Gordon Robertson, so if you would keep your mouth shut you might hear what I am saying.

What does that mean for you? Anyway, I think the case has proven that what we have here is an abundance of dual standards, to avoid using the word that starts with an h that describes this thing. We have dual standards. On the one hand the Liberals and the New Democratic Parties say the thing is outmoded. We agree with this.

The Fascists over there are trying to shout me down. That is typical of their approach. They do not like the message so they try to shout me down, the brown shirts in the Liberal Party.

Ms. Copps: A Fascist I am not and I want that withdrawn right now.

Mr. Andre: I have no trouble withdrawing it if she will promise me she will keep her mouth shut so I can finish my address. Prove to me I was wrong in my assertion; she is behaving like one.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I object strenuously to the term Fascist and I want an unequivocal withdrawal, right now, right here and now.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, seriously, this is a very important fundamental principle we are discussing, the principle of ministerial responsibility. It underlines our system of responsible government.

Recent events of which we in this House are all aware have given rise to considerable comment from members of Parliament, the public, the press, about the nature and practice of this principle. Indeed, the motion which we are debating shows that interest in this principle is alive and well in this Parliament, as it should be. I would note, however, that some of the comments on ministerial responsibility which we have heard and read in recent weeks have contained some misconceptions about the principle that have undoubtedly confused rather than clarified how it is applied in Canada.

I am pleased, therefore, to participate today in this debate and set out for the House, and through it for the Canadian public, the key elements of this fundamental principle of our democratic system of government.

I wish first to address the motion itself. On the face of it, it is a very straightforward motion calling upon members of Parliament to announce their support for the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. The vehicle being used, as has been conceded by the Liberal Party opposite in another supply motion earlier this year, the medicare one, is a non-confidence motion. Were it to pass, it would require the government to resign. We can hardly expect this as a straightforward attempt on the part of the Liberal Party to encourage non-partisan all-party support for the principles underlying this doctrine to which this government has adhered faithfully in recent events.

Let me therefore set out for the House the nature and elements of this doctrine.

Ministers exercise powers bestowed upon them by the Crown in Parliament and hold office at the pleasure of the Crown. The exercise of these powers for which ministers are constitutionally responsible to Parliament provides the foundation of responsible government.

The concentration of responsibility in the hands of ministers reflects the fundamental democratic principle that the power of the state must be exercised under the authority of elected officials accountable to the representatives of the electorate.

This enables Parliament to focus responsibility for the conduct of government on those of its members who hold ministerial office and who ultimately must personally answer to Parliament and hence to the electorate for their actions and the actions of their subordinates. Collectively ministers are responsible for the decisions of the government as a whole and the activities of all of their colleagues, even though Mr. Trudeau did not agree with that. This is the cement of our system of government. Although collective responsibility unlike individual responsibility is conventional rather than legal, it is fashioned through means that serve to make more effective the exercise of individual responsibility.

In this manner the constitutional responsibility of ministers, both individually and collectively, enables Parliament to satisfy itself that power is exercised responsibly through the system of government.

The direct responsibility of ministers to Parliament on a day-to-day basis is the essential strength of our system. The essence of the doctrine is that ministers, and only ministers, answer to the House for the way in which the authority conferred on them has been exercised.

The principles of responsibility, the concentration of the Crown's power in the hands of ministers and the subjection of ministerial power to parliamentary control reinforce the responsibility of ministers, requiring them to be in a position to assure the House that they are exercising powers responsibly.

Ministers fulfil their responsibilities and are called to account by the House of Commons for the exercise of their statutory authority in accordance with practice and convention. From the origins of our system, however, political circumstances rather than literal application of the principle of ministerial responsibility have governed the answerability of ministers. As Professor J. R. Mallory has noted, the minister has a political responsibility.

Ministers are responsible for all the actions taken under their authority. Although it is true that the degree to which they are required to answer for the actions of officials will depend upon the political circumstances and whether an official has, for example, acted in a clearly unacceptable manner of which the minister had no knowledge, the fact remains that the minister is constitutionally responsible. This is essential in determining who answers for what and to whom in the system.

Accountability in the system derives directly from the responsibility of ministers. Ministers answer before Parliament and are challenged to defend the way in which they or their officials have exercised the power that is made legitimate my their constitutional responsibility as ministers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: I see the brown shirts over there are still trying to yell me down.

Parliament expects and requires that ministers are responsible and enjoys ready access to ministers for the purpose of holding them answerable.

Deputy ministers derive almost all their authority from ministers. They advise ministers and administer the programs carried out under the statutory authority exercised by ministers. They are loyal to their ministers and are required to actively support and participate in the policy and administrative decisions taken by ministers individually and collectively. Put simply, deputy ministers are responsible to ministers.

Officials are not, of course, constitutionally responsible, but they play and have played a role vis-à-vis Parliament that in some important respects compliments the role of ministers. Although officials do not have constitutional responsibility or share the responsibility of their ministers, they do share to a degree in the answerability of their ministers to Parliament.

They support ministers in answering to committees of the House provided this does not draw officials into partisan controversy or undermine the authority and responsibility of ministers. This role of officials has been enhanced and strengthened by the McGrath report which recommended that public servants be made available to parliamentary committees. The government stated at that time that it supported this recommendation, and recent events have borne out our commitment in this regard.

The concentration of responsibility in the hands of ministers is the bedrock of parliamentary government. It is, however, a matter of observation that the government is a large administrative enterprise. It is not a modern phenomenon that ministers cannot know everything that is under their authority. The phenomenon is merely more acute today than it was a century ago, and not prima facie proof of the irrelevance of ministerial responsibility. Ministers spend much of their time providing information to Parliament, indicating a need for the minister's ability to answer and provide information to be shared without, however, sharing his or her responsibility.

The essential elements of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, therefore, are that: Power flows from the Crown and is exercised by ministers who are responsible to Parliament. Ministers are responsible for the actions of their officials, whether they had prior knowledge of them or not. Officials advise ministers and they are accountable to ministers.

When an error is made of which the minister is unaware, the minister acts to establish the facts, correct the error and satisfy himself or herself that it will not reoccur. The minister informs the House of the action taken.

I note that all the precedents at the federal level in Canada and Canadian authorities support this interpretation of the doctrine.

Professor Kenneth Kernaghan has noted it is almost universally accepted that it is unreasonable to hold a minister personally responsible in the form of resignation for the administrative failings of subordinates.

The usual practice is that the minister informs Parliament that the fault lies with his officials, and he promises that the offenders will be disciplined and their mistakes corrected.

Despite frequent calls by opposition parties for ministerial resignations on the grounds of actual or alleged departmental mismanagement, in practice ministers in Canada do not resign as penance for administrative bungling in their departments. They never have in this country.

Professors S. E. Finer and Geoffrey Marshall, leading British authorities, sum up the doctrine of practice of ministerial responsibility as follows:

> When we speak of minister's individual responsibility we merely mean that, for every act or neglect on the part of civil servants, some minister or other is charged to explain in the Houses of Parliament: and that only ministers may do so.

Mr. Milliken: They do not; they refuse to answer.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member knows that is not true and I wish he would quit interrupting. He will have his opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be a time for questions and comments if the hon. minister will be able to finish in another four minutes.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Marshall said:

> When action is taken of which a minister disapproves and of which he has not prior knowledge, there is no obligation on his part to endorse it, to defend the errors of his officers, or to resign.

There is not a single case since Confederation of a minister resigning because of an error of an official.

Applying the doctrine to the facts of the Al-Mashat case, I would note the following: Ministers did not know anything of the Al-Mashat affair until after Mr. Al-Mashat had entered Canada legally. That has been accepted by everybody. When they were informed, they took full responsibility by acting to establish the facts.

Mr. Milliken: To accuse other people.

Mr. Andre: There he goes again. The brown shirts are in action again. They will not allow me to speak.

When the facts were established, they took appropriate action to ensure there would be no repetition and sought an apology from those involved. Ministers informed the House of how they had fulfilled their responsibilities.

Given the ministers' commitment to a thorough investigation and to make the facts public, and given the findings of the investigation and the nature of the report flowing therefrom, it became inevitable that the identity of the officials principally involved would become public.

I have spoken at some length on the doctrine of ministerial—here we go again; they do not like—

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member keeps protesting he is being shouted down and yet we have sat here listening patiently for quite a long time. I want to remind him, since he is so keen on citing Beauchesne's and the authorities therein, of citation 473, and I would ask the Chair to bear this in mind:

> While it has frequently been ruled that in addressing the House a Member must not read from a written, previously prepared speech, Members have traditionally been allowed to make use of extensive notes when speaking.

I hate to say it, but I think the minister is reading verbatim from this and I ask you to draw his attention to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think those are selective notes. I would like to hear the government House leader. He has two minutes.

Mr. Andre: I do not understand. I sat here and listened to a lot of what I felt was pretty outrageous from the spokesman for his party. I wonder why it cannot extend the normal courtesy of allowing me to complete my remarks without interruption, barracking, shouting and yelling, but that seems to be the approach of the other side; if you do not like the message of the other side, shout it down, and this is all for responsible government.

When we talked about it in terms of the decorum and how people watching must feel about this, we get accused of there somehow being ill motives behind it. When I sit here and watch this going on I feel guilty about the sums of money we as parliamentarians collect from the citizens.

I have spoken for some time on the doctrine of ministerial responsibility and its direct application to the facts of the case that have risen to this debate in the House. I have set out the doctrine as it currently applies in Canada and I have demonstrated how ministers of this government have acted in accordance to its elements in the Al-Mashat case.

I wish I could be confident that hon. members would recognize—there is the talking, empty head from Winnipeg again.

The facts in this case are pretty clear for anybody who wants to see them. Phone calls were made to Mr. Raymond Chrétien. He started Al-Mashat on the fast track. He did not inform his minister. The ministers did not become aware of his being fast-tracked until after he came into Canada.

• (1630)

Some hon. members: What about the memo?

Mr. Andre: The memo they are talking about they had copies of as soon as they asked for it. I will let you in on a secret. A Xerox machine makes an exact copy. The original and the copy are the same. They know what is in the memo. They are simply off on a witch-hunt.

We agree with the substance of the motion but we have to vote against it because it is a confidence motion. I would remind members of what their former leader, Mr. Trudeau, had to say. I would refer them to citations in Hansard. I wish that they would recognize that sometimes a little bit of integrity and consistency and a little less high dudgeon and outrage, when in fact they have no basis for that high dudgeon and outrage, would better suit the country. There are important issues facing the country. Whether the Xerox in this case produced an exact copy or not is hardly an issue.

The former minister of immigration, who fast-tracked people by putting them in ministerial cars and driving them to North Dakota, is screaming in outrage about special treatment for Al-Mashat. This case did not involve ministers bending the rules as was done in his case.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, first of all I have a comment—

An hon. member: Will it be brief?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, it will be brief.

The subject before the House today deals with ministerial responsibility—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Please, I would like to hear the questions and comments of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. There are two important aspects to the question before us today. Ministerial responsibility implies administrative responsibility. In the McGrath report we all read in chapter I and following: "Ministers are held responsible for their actions and their department". They are also held responsible for the administration of that department. In the speech he just made, the minister confirmed that his opinion was not any different.

We have before us a motion that simply states a fundamental principle of Canadian democracy. I would ask the minister: Does he not think it is going a bit too far to say that this motion calls for a confidence vote? He knows what McGrath had to say about this. I will read it to him if he likes, but I do not have time so I will refer him to page 10 which gives an excellent explanation of the problem. There are five or six very clear resolutions that say that once the electorate has spoken and when the government in power has a majority, the government should not use the question of confidence to try to get rid of a motion which in fact, is an excellent motion in favour of ministerial responsibility. Again I ask him: Why does he keep causing us this kind of grief in the House?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, we have dealt with that already at least a couple of times this session. These opposition days are a replacement for the traditional way in which Parliaments held governments to account, which was by challenging the appropriations bill. It was introduced by the Hon. Donald Macdonald when he was House leader for the Liberal Party. The traditional way was replaced by opposition days, a number of which could have votes attached to them which are considered confidence motions because of what they are a surrogate for, namely votes on the appropriations bill.

As I indicated earlier, I think we should look at it. I have asked the management committee to look at it. However, those are the rules that the Liberal Party imposed in 1969 and they are still part of our system. They may well be outdated, and I agree they probably are, but those are the rules that we have at this point in time. Until they are changed we are obliged to follow them.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker mentioned this memo, Xerox machines and various things like this. I want to make a comment and then ask the minister and the House leader a very specific question.

The original of the memorandum of March 8 we know for a fact was sent from External Affairs in the usual course, as demanded by the minister who is now the minister for constitutional affairs, taken into his office and given to one of his staff. That person literally walked it into the office of the chief of staff of the then minister of external affairs and brought it to the attention of the secretary of the chief of staff. The chief of staff admits receiving it, the chief of staff admits reading it, that is the chief of staff chosen by the then minister of external affairs.

The chief of staff, the person who was the right-hand man to the minister of external affairs at that time, saw the document, saw the original, had the original in his hands. It has disappeared. The minister has stated categorically, and we accept the minister's word as we do all hon. members, that he never saw the memorandum. It is clear that his right-hand man did not bring it to his attention. This was at a time at least two weeks before Al-Mashat came into this country.

Is it such an unreasonable proposition to ask that in those circumstances the minister take responsibility for the negligence of his chief of staff in failing to bring that memorandum to his attention? Is that so unreasonable?

Mr. Andre: He spoke of the memo of March 8. He will know that the memo was dated March 8 but did not reach the minister's office until March 14. I think he agrees with that fact. He nods in consent.

It is interesting. How come it took six days? We cannot blame it on Canada Post. However, in any event those facts are true. The former Secretary of State for External Affairs was upset because he was at this very time in the Middle East meeting with leaders of the Middle East countries. He was understandably upset that he was not told by his senior deputy minister, by the deputy minister who initiated this memo, about this fact because it could have come up and been an embarrassment to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The principal secretary, chief of staff to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has testified before committee that he does not know what happened to it, that he did not recognize it for its importance because it was not flagged, it was not identified, that there was nothing on it that said "the minister must see this" or any such thing.

He recognized that perhaps he should have taken the initiative and done it anyway. That is one of the reasons for the apology.

Subsequent to that, as the hon. member knows, there was a cabinet shuffle. Undoubtedly there were conversations going on between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister in that regard. There would have been preparations; there were some changes of offices. In any event the document was a pretty common kind of document. Yes, it was marked "secret" but I get press clippings marked "secret". If it is something that is really important in terms of national security, it is given a much higher confidence category. The memo was in the machine, if you will, in the computer. There are many copies of the memo. It is available. Everybody sees it. It is not the kind of thing that would be treated as though we were dealing with state secrets.

It contained information that was not to be released to the press immediately. However, it was not a secret document challenging the security of the country for which the RCMP should be brought in.

That is probably the explanation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the current one, says it cannot be found. That is hardly relevant however because if you want another copy, if you have lost yours, we will just turn on the word processor and generate one.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment that is more a question for the opposition because I am absolutely convinced that if government members voted for this motion they would be calling for the defeat of the government. This is one of the days declared to be votable, and that is under our procedures. That is why we have to vote against it even though we agree in substance.

I have not been following this debate too closely. However I have not heard any members talk about the Supreme Court decision. There is a Supreme Court decision, as I recollect, on this issue called the Bhatnager case. Does that not impact upon this ministerial responsibility? Has the committee been briefed on that? The Bhatnager case is the supreme law of the country.

Mr. Andre: I do not know whether the committee has been briefed on it but the hon. member is right. That situation arose as a result of a court order requiring certain actions of the government.

• (1640)

There were charges laid that the minister of immigration and the then Secretary of State for External Affairs were cited for contempt for the failure of their officials to comply with that court order.

Their officials did not comply with it. They were charged with contempt of court. A Federal Court of Appeal found them guilty in that regard. It went to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court found them not guilty, saying that they could not be held responsible for the failure of their officials to act on the court order.

If that is true, and that is a decision of the Supreme Court, it is certainly equally true that they cannot be held responsible for an act of commission or omission by officials. The member for Winnipeg South Centre nods his head.

He invokes higher moral authority but the Supreme Court has said this. Incidentally this is similar to what his former leader said. If he will not believe the Supreme Court, will he believe Pierre Trudeau? Is he going to continue to take the politically opportune as opposed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I regret that in the period of time allocated to questions and comments that it was not possible to ask a question of the minister. I had risen to do that.

I am pleased that this House has an opportunity to debate this very important issue. I am particularly pleased that the House has the opportunity to debate this issue because unfortunately as a result of the strong-arm tactics of the members of the Conservative Party on the external affairs committee that committee is not able to do the job that originally was assigned to it, which was to get to the truth in this matter.

Unfortunately at this point the only option we have is to raise questions on the floor of this House.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked this House to look back in Hansard. He asked this House to look back at earlier events, and I want to reply to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and say: "Yes, I am prepared to look back in Hansard at previous events".

I want to remind that member and government members opposite of what took place in this House 15 years ago, almost 15 years ago to the day.

In June 1976 a Liberal cabinet minister, Jean-Pierre Goyer, had blamed a senior bureaucrat for a bungled deal to buy military aircraft. He was a fellow named Stopforth and was one of his senior bureaucrats.

The minister stood up and said: "No, no, it was not my responsibility. It was the senior bureaucrat's responsibility". What was the response at that time by members of the Conservative Party who were then in opposition, including the member for Surrey-White Rock-South Langley? What did he have to say about it at that time? I have the Hansard here that the member referred to earlier.

What did the member for Yellowhead, who was then the Leader of the Opposition say about this attempt to pass the buck to civil servants? He said that his question arose out of the attempt by the minister to transfer blame for this government's gross incompetence in the Lockheed affair to a middle ranking civil servant. He said it was shameful to try to pass that blame to a middle ranking civil servant.

The Conservative defence critic, Allan McKinnon, accused the minister of "trying to blame his own incompetence and lack of supervision on his subordinates".

It is interesting that when it is in opposition the Conservative Party is prepared to stand and defend public servants. When it is in government, what does it do? It engages in the sleaziest form of buck passing in an attempt to avoid its own responsibility in allowing Mohamed Al-Mashat to enter the country.

There is a double standard, and I think Canadians recognize very clearly that double standard.

I want to take a couple of minutes first of all to just put this question in context. The member for Winnipeg South Centre certainly did that in the course of his comments with respect to what took place before Al-Mashat got into the country, but also with respect to what took place afterward.

I think many Canadians are asking themselves two fundamental questions. How did the guy get into the country in the first place without any minister knowing? Second, what is this absurd, dangerous and destructive spectacle that we have seen in this country of ministers trying to cover up their own responsibility, trying to doctor documents, seeing documents disappearing and extorting confessions from public servants? There are two issues here. There is the original question of how this guy got into the country, but there is also the very fundamental question that members on the Conservative side of this House are refusing to allow the committee to deal with, the question of ministerial accountability.

Certainly the motion which is before the House merely reaffirms a principle which the Secretary of State for External Affairs set out as representing the policy of the Government of Canada in an appearance before the committee on May 30. In fact it quotes from that statement verbatim.

How is it that members of the Conservative Party now are going to vote against that statement which purports to represent the policy of this government? We are told by the government House leader that somehow the government will fall if they support this statement. The government members, including the government House leader in 1986, supported the McGrath report. What did the McGrath report have to say about questions of confidence on supply days?

It said that confidence on supply days was a question for the government to consider and that the motion is only a question of confidence if the government declares it to be a question of confidence. This nonsense that somehow the government is going to collapse, is going to fall if it reaffirms this principle of ministerial accountability, should not be accepted by this House.

At the conclusion of my remarks I will move an amendment to this motion that will make it very clear that by supporting the motion before the House, members of the House are not in any way considering a lack of confidence in the government. Not by supporting this motion alone. Certainly there are many other reasons for voting lack of confidence in this government, but it will not be able to say that voting for this motion represents that.

I want to look at the question of ministerial accountability. I want to look at the role that ministers have played in this process. Before doing that, I think it is also important to put this question in the context of what has happened here and the anger that Canadians feel and have felt since May 7 or 8, when they first learned that something had gone very wrong, that Mohammed Al-Mashat, the former Iraqi Ambassador to the United States, had not only been allowed to immigrate to Canada but had been given the royal treatment, the red carpet treatment.

We know that he had friends in high places. Apparently Allan Gotlieb and John Godfrey, and who knows who else, made representations to senior government officials urging that Al-Mashat be allowed into the country. We know only too well of the record of Al-Mashat. We know, for example, that when he was Ambassador of Iraq in the United Kingdom he actively encouraged a young reporter for The London Observer, Farzard Bazoft, to make visits to Iraq. After Mr. Bazoft had been arrested in Iraq and falsely charged with espionage, and many countries around the world including Canada condemned that, we know that Al-Mashat denounced him as a spy. He found the secret trial and the hanging of Bazoft thoroughly justifiable.

We know that this man was an important member of the ruling Ba'ath party. We know that he justified the holding of what he called "guests", hostages, including innocent Canadians during the period leading up to the war. We know of this man's record. We have to ask ourselves why it was that, despite this record, this man was given the red carpet treatment. What deals were made, for example, between the American State Department, American intelligence agencies and Canada, to allow this man to get the royal treatment, this special treatment?

This is particularly offensive to Canadians who, in many cases, have struggled with the bureaucracy of the department of immigration themselves for two, three or four years, seeking to be reunited with their families, with their loved ones. When they see this kind of thing happening, they are angry and they ask who is responsible and they see ministers running for cover.

Refugees who have waited in this country for fair treatment have, in some cases, out of desperation, committed suicide. Others ask themselves: why is Al-Mashat getting special treatment, when at the same time there is a system in which refugees are being denied justice. They know. They have seen the desperate Kurds fleeing from injustice and they ask themselves why there is one standard for Al-Mashat and another for the Kurds.

• (1650)

I might add that Al-Mashat, speaking of the Kurds, also denied that there had been any chemical warfare or any gassing whatsoever of the Kurds at Halabja in 1988, despite the fact that the eyes of the world saw exactly what was going on.

Why is it that this man is given the red carpet treatment? On May 8 the Minister of Employment and Immigration threw up his hands and said: "Nobody knew, Mr. Speaker. I just found out. We all just found out and what a terrible thing it is". I do not think Canadians accept that.

We have slowly been learning that in fact ministers did know earlier. We learned, for example, that the Solicitor General found out on April 11. We learned that the Minister of Employment and Immigration found out on April 16. What did she do when she found out? She said she hit the roof. She said she was angry. But did she order an inquiry to find out what went wrong? Of course she did not.

According to the documents and the statement made by that minister she said: "One of the responsibilities of ministers is when they are informed they must take full responsibility by acting to establish the facts". Did this minister do that? Did she follow her own guidelines? No, she did not do a damn thing when she found out on April 16. She did not tell the new minister, her successor, Mr. Valcourt: "Bernard, something went wrong here, get to the bottom of it and find out". She did not tell the Prime Minister or Joe Clark, the former Secretary of State for External Affairs. After all, she and Mr. Clark had earlier turned down another application by another Iraqi diplomat. She did not get on the phone to him or talk to him and say: "Something has gone wrong here". She did not talk to anybody. She did not order any inquiry. She did nothing. And yet she blames Raymond Chrétien and David Daubney and says that they are the ones who have to accept sole responsibility.

We are told that the Prime Minister only found out on April 30. According to the evidence that the committee has heard, the Clerk of the Privy Council knew on March 12 that Al-Mashat was coming into the country, well before he came in. The Clerk of the Privy Council knew that he had already jumped to the front of the queue. He had had his interviews, his medical and his interviews for a security check and everything had been done. It was a done deal.

Immigration knew and CSIS knew and yet we are asked to believe that nobody told any minister. That is what we are asked to believe. The fact is that, even after Al-Mashat got into the country and the Privy Council Office was informed on April 2 that the guy was in the country, it took 29 days. What did they do then? According to the Privy Council Office they did nothing. The Clerk of the Privy Council did not even tell the Prime Minister until April 30, four weeks after he found out.

The legislative assistant to the Prime Minister knew. The deputy press secretary to the Prime Minister knew. The Solicitor General knew. The Minister of Employment and Immigration knew. We are told the Prime Minister did not find out until April 30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the new Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, did not find out until May 7. Incredible, literally incredible.

We raise concerns about a meeting that took place of ministers, a cabinet lynch mob, that was deciding to extort confessions from senior public servants. They decided for the sake of symmetry that they would name the minister's chief of staff. It was a cabinet meeting that decided that they would deliberately issue a misleading and inaccurate document, an inaccurate chronology of events. What does the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs say when we try to raise questions about this? He says: "Don't touch me. Don't ask questions about my credibility because you might damage my credibility as Captain Canada". Unbelievable. That is what this minister says to Canadians: "Do not ask me tough questions. Do not put me on the spot because it might hurt my credibility".

His credibility and the credibility of his fellow ministers have already been damaged by their own incompetence in dealing with this affair.

What about the events that led up to the entry of Al-Mashat into the country? We know that a number of senior officials were well aware of the fact that he would be allowed into the country, fast-tracked. We know that there was a memo on May 7 that set out clearly that Al-Mashat had already been accepted provisionally as a retired applicant. He had had his medicals. Yet despite that immigration officials did not alert their minister. Privy Council Office officials did not alert their minister, the Prime Minister. The officials responsible for CSIS did not alert the Solicitor General.

The one public official who made an effort to alert his minister was the one public official that this government has attempted to blame. Shameful. The one public servant who not only followed the guidelines then in place, and it is ministers who are responsible for those guidelines, the one public servant who followed those guidelines is hung out to dry by these ministers.

Why did they do nothing whatsoever to finger Arthur Kroeger, the deputy minister of immigration, who admitted before the committee that he should have said something too but did nothing? Why did they not finger Paul Tellier who said: "Yes, I knew, but I did not tell the Prime Minister until April 30". It is pretty obvious why they only fingered one public servant.

Of course they also fingered David Daubney for symmetry. Why did they tell Daubney they were fingering him? Because of the fact that Raymond Chrétien happened to be the nephew of the Leader of the Opposition and they thought that would not look very good.

Mr. Speaker, you are certainly right. Canadians find that this whole matter does not look very good because they know that it is an attempt to evade and avoid the responsibility of cabinet ministers by blaming one public servant who, in fact, did follow the existing procedures.

In my mind it is not unreasonable to suggest in all the circumstances that given the seriousness of Al-Mashat's potential entry to the country Raymond Chrétien could have taken additional steps to ensure that this matter came to the attention of the minister responsible. I do not dispute that fact. I do not dispute the fact that apparently he agreed to have a memo sent by Mr. Vincent, but as I understand it there was no follow-up. There were a number of meetings between himself and the deputy minister, a number of meetings with the minister, and I do not disagree that it is not unreasonable to suggest that given the gravity of the situation identified by Mr. Chrétien himself that perhaps he could have taken additional steps to ensure that the minister knew.

But to single him out as the only person responsible and to issue a statement stating that Mr. Chrétien had apologized knowing full well that that statement was a lie, a bald-faced lie, is what Canadians find reprehensible.

In the time remaining available to me I want to remind members of this House what the now Secretary of State for External Affairs said during the press conference when she decided to pin the blame on Raymond Chrétien. She said: "I don't think anyone should underestimate the impact this could have on people's reputations. You know the saying about taking away my good name".

I think Canadians are going to judge this government and judge it very harshly both in terms of Mohamed Al-Mashat coming into this country, getting the red carpet treatment, and also in terms of the shameful way that ministers of the Crown have attempted to avoid their own responsibility and to pin that on others.

• (1700)

By trying to blame public servants they have very seriously damaged the relationship between the Public Service and the government, and the Canadian people are going to call them to account for that responsibility.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not go out of my way to agree with the hon. member very often, but there is one point that he did raise which I agree with. It is frequently the case when members of government, for example, will take positions they may have attacked while they were in opposition. Certainly members of the opposition will attack positions they were defending when they were in the government. That is true not only for the Liberals and the Tories. It is also true for the New Democrats. They are really no different.

I read where Premier Bob Rae, in the Ontario legislature said: "The opposition talks about ministerial responsibility. I have looked into the precedents and there is not a case that I can find in the last 50 years where a minister was expected to take the rap, the fall, because something was done without him knowing about it".

There seems to be a doctrine for Premier Rae and the Ontario legislature and another one for the New Democrats here in Ottawa. Why is it that Rae takes one position and Robinson takes another? It seems to me that if he wants to criticize people for taking opposing positions, depending on whether they are government or opposition, he should include the New Democrats. They are really caught in the same human web that we are.

He says that Canadians are angry that Al-Mashat came in too rapidly. You bet your boots they are angry. So is the government. So are members of the government. Every one of us here has cases in our files that we think have been there far too long and that we would like to see come in. We have constituents who want to see their relatives and friends come in, and they have not been able to. They are offended, as we are offended. Please, please, it is foolhardy for the member to go into high dudgeon, thinking that only the opposition and other people are offended. We are just as offended as they are and we want that to stop.

He began his statement by talking about the strong-arm tactics bringing the committee to an end.

Ms. Copps: He is right.

Mr. Friesen: We can count on the member for Hamilton East to echo that. She never fails us.

He is criticizing the committee for stopping and yet on June 7, almost a week ago, he said on CBC: "I do not think we have to prolong this thing indefinitely. Some Conservative members of the committee had suggested that we hear from Allan Gotlieb, but I think Canadians expect us to report and to report soon on what went wrong on this and how Al-Mashat got into the country".

He cannot have it both ways. I do have a question for him. He is offended by the fast-tracking of Mr. Al-Mashat, but I remember when he was first elected back in the dim ages of history, before the House sat. He encountered a Latin American seaman who had jumped ship in Vancouver. He had been in several countries after he left Latin America and jumped ship in Vancouver and the member for Burnaby—Kingsway all of a sudden on his own decided: "Here is a refugee". He took him to his apartment and sheltered this man and badgered the then minister of immigration to make sure this fellow whom he harboured was going to be declared a refugee.

Here today he is offended that Mr. Al-Mashat got a fast-track, and all the time in his own history he has been trying to fast-track people himself. Tell me, where is this guy coming from?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to respond to the questions of the hon. member.

With respect to Galindo Madrid, a young Chilean refugee who had been a student leader and had been tortured in Chile, perhaps the member recalls that Amnesty International, the United Nations Human Rights Commission and the United Nations Commission on Refugees said this was an outrage and that his life was in danger. The Conservative government however, which he was a part of, was prepared to send this person back to be tortured and possibly to be killed.

I and the many others such as church leaders from across this country, including Mennonite church leaders and perhaps the hon. member might have listened to them at the time, stood up and said: "We will not stand by while a Chilean refugee is sent back to a bloodthirsty and brutal military dictatorship to be tortured and killed".

I stand by that decision today and I am very pleased to be able to report that person is a fine and upstanding Canadian citizen.

What I think this government has to answer for is its own responsibility. It should not be hiving it off on to some other level of government, some provincial government. Maybe the hon. member could explain why the Prime Minister stood up in this House on May 15 and said that the Clerk of the Privy Council had said: "Do not let Al-Mashat in. Do not admit him".

We know very well that was not true. The Clerk of the Privy Council said before the committee on June 4: "I surely did not say that the visa should not be issued". That is what Mr. Tellier, the country's top bureaucrat, said.

I would invite the hon. member to answer a supplementary question. When we talk about consistency maybe he can explain why the Prime Minister of this land was not prepared to tell the truth to Canadians about the role of the Clerk of the Privy Council and why to this day he has not apologized for misleading the House.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a comment on the matters presented by the member for Burnaby.

I want to make it clear to him and to members of the House that when he refers to the dialogue between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Paul Tellier, Mr. Tellier said to the committee, and the member heard it, that what the Prime Minister said was 100 per cent accurate.

Read it. It is there in writing and it is in the public domain.

Let me add something else about the member's remarks. He enters into the area of personal judgment on immigrants. We do not do that. We have objective standards for immigration into Canada, and we want those objective standards adhered to.

It is ironic that in this case the member for Burnaby and the member for Winnipeg South Centre went to Baghdad. They said: "We have to deal with the Iraqis. We have to bring about peace. We have to negotiate. We have to talk".

The minute a former member of the administration in Iraq, the Ambassador to the United States, comes into Canada, they said: "That should not happen". I would have thought they would welcome him to Canada.

It was this side which decided to take action against Iraq. It was the government that entered into hostilities and it was the members opposite in the NDP who said: "No, no hostilities". The Leader of the Opposition said: "Bring our men home".

My question is on another subject. I want to refer to what occurred in the committee, and the member knows this. Mr. Anthony Vincent gave a statement to the committee explaining exactly what he had done and he asked to share with Mr. Raymond Chrétien any blame that should be attached.

He made it very clear when he asked to make this public statement: "Mr. Raymond Chrétien has been publicly associated with the Mohamed Al-Mashat case. I wish it also to be known that as Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Defectors I was directly involved in the management of this case".

"While I greatly appreciate Mr. Chrétien's readiness to shoulder the entire burden of public responsibility on behalf of the department, I consider it only just that the public be aware of my own role in the recent events".

It is very clear that the officials of the department took the position that they had taken the action which allowed Al-Mashat to come into Canada. Mr. Anthony Vincent made that statement in the committee. He referred to his relationship with Mr. Chrétien.

How can the member stand in this House and suggest that anybody but Mr. Chrétien and Mr. Vincent were responsible for the entry of Al-Mashat into Canada?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has one minute to answer that.

Mr. Robinson: The member for Halifax West has just made the point.

The fact of the matter is that one public official was prepared to say that it was wrong to single out Raymond Chrétien. He recognized that as being wrong. The government ministers who were responsible for deciding who to finger said: "No, we want to single out one person, Raymond Chrétien. We are not going to talk about immigration officials, Privy Council officials or any other external officials. We are going to put the rap on Raymond Chrétien".

• (1710)

Every member of this House knows why they put the rap on Raymond Chrétien. It is because he was the nephew of Jean Chrétien and that is the truth and that is what members should—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a very long presentation. It has been extremely well documented by the two previous speakers from this side what happened in the Al-Mashat affair.

For me, of course, it is unbelievable, and I know there are a lot of Canadians who cannot believe the story given by the government. We know there were apparently some problems in the Department of External Affairs, but there were three departments involved in that. We have now found, in the committee, that there were bureaucrats in every department who had been aware of the Al-Mashat application for a long time. There were all sorts of communications between departments and so on.

In one case there was a bureaucrat by the name of McCallion working in the office of the then minister of external affairs who was going on holidays and who was involved in security matters. Anybody who has been minister of external affairs or who has been a minister in any department, will know how serious the Department of External Affairs takes anything that involves security. It is for them an extremely important domain and they take it extremely seriously. Before she went on holidays she said to Mr. Daubney, who is the No.1 bureaucrat in the office of the minister: "Be aware it is a very dangerous problem and it is extremely urgent. I am going away, but make sure that the minister is informed".

However, to make sure that it would work properly, she decided on her own, according to her own testimony, to talk to other people in the office of the minister to make sure that the minister was aware.

It must have been the same story in every other department, but we do not know. What we know is that nobody from the other departments has been blamed for anything. We are all very surprised that the Solicitor General's department, again specializing in security matters, would not inform its minister. These are things that we cannot believe. There are dozens of people in the bureaucracy who must have known and suddenly we see that some junior people in the offices of the ministers make other departments aware of what is going on and it never goes to the top.

I have been a minister for 17 years myself and I know one thing that is very basic. The main document, signed by the official when it is decided it has to go to the minister, is the copy that eventually will be on the desk of the minister. It is the proper thing to do. We never gave a copy to the minister. We gave him the original document signed by the bureaucrats. This is the procedure.

The original is there and did not go anywhere but to Mr. Daubney. According to the rules decided by external affairs it went there, but the original document does not exist any more. It is, as it was raised in the House today, a question of security. For a much smaller thing, the whole government is getting very excited about security.

Do you remember what happened when there was a leak with the budget? We have never seen so many policemen involved in something on the Hill. Members who received brown envelopes were asked by the RCMP where they came from. Now we have a document that is at the heart of a major controversy and it has disappeared. Nobody knows where it is.

An hon. member: It is very strange.

Mr. Chrétien: It is very, very strange.

[Translation]

I find this hard to believe. When I was a kid, people would say it was a mystery. What is a mystery? It is something you cannot understand but you have to believe it because it was revealed by God.

In this case, the revealing was done by the Prime Minister or by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some mystery. Everybody in the department knew. As one member said not long ago, even the minister's chauffeur knew. Everybody in three departments knew about it, except the ministers.

One wonders, however, and this has not been addressed in the House, why the three ministers involved in the Al-Mashat affair were transferred all of a sudden. Why? According to parliamentary practice, the minister of a department is obliged to field questions on that department in the House. Meanwhile there were some changes in cabinet. The former minister for external affairs who is now Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs can no longer field questions about internal matters related to the Department of External Affairs. The minister who was responsible for immigration was transferred to external affairs so she can no longer answer on behalf of the Department of Employment and Immigration. Then, all of sudden, our Solicitor General who was doing a pretty good job disappeared. He got a nice promotion, but I am not sure to what department.

What happened? It is a mystery. We have to believe it even if we do not understand. It sounds slightly ridiculous. Personally I see an aspect that is even more troubling; We can debate whether Al-Mashat should or should not have been admitted to Canada, but it is obvious that at some time there was a conspiracy. How can we get out of this mess? On May 13, the day before the new Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the new minister for external affairs made their statements, there was a meeting. I think this is the most serious element, because the meeting included ministers and bureaucrats.

[English]

There were ministers there and there were bureaucrats and they decided at that moment: "How can we get out of this?" They had a report that had been prepared by very responsible officials. When they saw that report they gave instructions to change it. After they decided that they asked how they could get out of it. Suddenly they gave instructions to extract apologies. It was unbelievable that the chief of staff for the minister of external affairs, a former member of Parliament, was suddenly informed—he said nobody had asked him any questions, not one single question—that he had to apologize and that he would have to take the blame.

Ms. Copps: For symmetry.

Mr. Chrétien: For symmetry. After that they singled out a bureaucrat who had to take the blame. They told him to apologize and take the blame. Who did that? They were the ministers of the Crown of this country who gathered in the cabinet room to determine who were guilty and who were to be informed of their guilt without having a chance to explain themselves.

Some hon. members: Shame.

An hon. member: A kangaroo court.

Mr. Chrétien: That was the day when they decided to hang two honourable people out there. Suppose that Mr. Daubney who served in this House would like to run again. He cannot because he had to play dumb in order to save his government. You know they killed him. That is what happened.

I was a cabinet minister for 17 years and I took my share of flak. I have a lot of scars, but never, never in my life would I have dared to blame someone for something for which I was responsible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1720)

Mr. Chrétien: When you are a minister and your bureaucrats do well, you take the credit. I always took the credit. I never got up in this House and said: "Do not thank me for that; say thank you to this bureaucrat". Never. I said: "Thank you very much". I took all the credit. On the other side of the ledger, when I made a mistake I took the blame. I never ran away from it. It is the only way.

Today I was coming back from Atlantic Canada when I met a young bureaucrat from the Quebec government at the airport. He was travelling to Ottawa. We were waiting because the plane was delayed, and we sat together. I asked him about that. He said to me: "I do not know if I can still do the job I am doing; I am paid to make decisions on a daily basis". He gave me some examples and I understood the political difficulty of some of the problems he has to deal with. He said to me: "I do not know if I would still be able to do that, because I do not know if my minister one day would get up in the House in Quebec and say, I blame him, I am not responsible". He said he had been a bureaucrat for 20 years and had always presumed that when he was working in his department he had a minister who would come to his defence if he made a mistake. He would be reprimanded. He might have been demoted. He might have been changed, but nobody would have known that.

Now we have exactly the reverse situation. We have two people who have been blamed by this government, but they keep their jobs. They say it is just a little slap, take the blame. Normally if they have done something they should not have done, no one would know. One was appointed by the minister himself, the chief of staff. It was a job that was created by this government and in many ways it was a slap in the face for the bureaucracy. Government members felt that they needed a very senior person in every department who was not a bureaucrat, and everything had to go through that person.

For 17 years I was a minister in eight different departments. I did not need anyone between me and my deputy minister. I knew they were there to serve me to the best of their abilities. I knew that if they did well I would do well. And if I did well then they would do well too. I was to claim the fame if they did well, and I would have to take the blame if there was an error.

Today we have a certain number of ministers who met and we do not even know who was there. We do not know who was there.

An hon. member: They will not tell us.

Mr. Chrétien: A certain number of bureaucrats were gathered together but we do not know what happened. We had a committee for a few days. No one was sworn in. Sometimes in front of the committee when it was a very delicate situation, bureaucrats or others were invited to be sworn in to give them freedom. In that case there was no such thing. And they are closing down that committee as quickly as they can.

There were a certain number of ministers there. I do not know who they were. I have an idea. They are the ones today who are in very responsible jobs, who will be dealing with their bureaucrats, who will be asking these people to make decisions, who will be asking these people to use their best judgment.

How can they face them and say: "I have confidence in you" or ask them: "Have you got confidence in your minister?" This is the question, because confidence and trust are the key of public office. The example given by the member for Winnipeg South Centre earlier concerning Lord Carrington is a good example of what is noble in public life.

He said: "There is a mess. Somebody has to take the blame. I am at the top and I take the blame". He did not try to find anybody. He did not say he was not informed. He did not say he was not wakened in the middle of the night or whatever it was. He said: "I am responsible. I will do the honourable thing. I will get out".

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Pass the buck.

Mr. Chrétien: He did not pass the buck; it stopped with him.

The only thing I am asking these ministers is now that we are in a very difficult period of our history, can they really handle the job they have. After a mess like this one when the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, the secretary to the cabinet, the deputy ministers and the ministers gathered together and selected two bureaucrats to blame, they did not even ask them what they had done. How can the people of Canada trust these ministers today?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: When we opened this session the government came to us and said: "Let's work together; this country is facing a major problem", and we offered our collaboration because we felt it was our duty. But to be faced with a government that acts like this, the rule is very simple. You take the blame when something is wrong and you do not finger anybody else but yourself. This is what a person of dignity does.

That is why I did not get into this debate, did not ask one question. I have been around since 1963 and I know there is a principle. It is responsibility.

The minute you become a cabinet minister, you take responsibility and you discharge responsibility until the end. That is the rule that should prevail. That is the one rule that can keep the confidence of the people in any individual.

In my judgment, the standards of integrity and trust were breached on May 13 when senior bureaucrats and senior ministers gathered together, including ministers who have nothing to do with the file any more, to protect themselves, wrap themselves in the flag or whatever it is rather than face the responsibility.

That is why I am voting with my party on this motion. It goes to the heart of responsible government. If that principle is broken, if the people who are elected to serve the country cannot take full responsibility, cannot defend the personal staff they selected to do the job, cannot fire them after they have said they have made a mistake, but instead single out somebody in the bureaucracy is wrong. Of all the departments, only the Department of External Affairs took the step to make sure that the minister knew.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: To single out a bureaucrat in that department who has done his job, plus the people working for him who have done their jobs, is unbelievable. Not one person in Immigration was singled out and it was an Immigration case. Not one single person in Immigration has been singled out.

• (1730)

It is a case of high security and nobody in the Solicitor General's department or CSIS has been singled out. It is not acceptable that they sweep it under the rug. They can do it; they have the majority. We will vote against it.

However, I would like to tell the people of Canada that when we form the government, every minister in the cabinet that I will be presiding over will have to take full responsibility for what is going on in his department. If there is any bungling in the department, nobody will be singled out. The minister will have to take the responsibility. If there are errors, some people might be moved, but people who cannot defend themselves will not be singled out, and left hanging out there in front of the public. It is shameful. It is an indignity that we have not seen in Canada for a long time and it is why I stood today.

If the system of ministerial responsibility and integrity is not respected, if ministers cannot go home and look at themselves in the mirror and say: "Do I have the trust of my employees, do I have the trust of the people of Canada," if they cannot do that because they want to keep their little jobs, people will never have confidence in public servants in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to preface my question to the hon. Leader of the Opposition by congratulating him on a very eloquent speech in which he set out very well the fundamental principles of cabinet accountability, which I am sure that Prime Minister Audrey McLaughlin will implement when she forms the government after the next federal election.

The Leader of the Opposition has had 17 years, I believe, of experience as a minister. I wonder if he could comment on two particular aspects. First of all, the hon. Leader of the Opposition raised the issue of David Daubney and the way in which he was singled out in terms of symmetry. I think, in fairness, it has to be pointed out that Mr. Daubney was after all the chief of staff of the minister responsible at the time, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that he stated that he did not know who Al-Mashat was, that he had no idea, that it could be any one of a whole series of former Iraqi ambassadors to the United States. He said that the memo was not highlighted. He did not bring it to the minister's attention.

While I agree that he was singled out for unfair treatment, I think that the Leader of the Opposition would agree that in the circumstances he did not do his job, but it was the minister who should be responsible for that, presumably. It was the minister who hired him. It was the minister presumably. In fact I think it is the Prime Minister who appoints chiefs of staff. It is the Prime Minister in consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has kept this person in place.

I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition could comment with respect to that aspect of accountability, and particularly the accountability of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, now Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, for his own senior public servant.

Second and just briefly, perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition could comment on the defence that we heard earlier today in this House from the Minister responsible for the Constitution who said: "Don't attack me. You know it is not fair that you attack me because I am the minister responsible for the future of the country. I am the minister responsible for the Constitution". How does the Leader of the Opposition respond to the suggestion that somehow we should lay off questioning this minister because of his present constitutional responsibilities?

Mr. Chrétien: On the question of Mr. Daubney, I feel sorry for that gentleman. He has been put in an impossible position. He has failed to serve his minister so much that he should have been fired. There is something fishy there as to why he has not been fired.

It is probably because he decided to take the blame as he was asked. It was quite evident. "We need two scapegoats and you are one of them. But the price is, take the flak and we will keep you in your job". I think that it is a terrible position, that he did not even have the chance to talk to the people who were doing the inquiry.

He is the one person who admitted that he was not given the document and he does not know where the original is. He is the one who gets the originals of all documents on his desk and he does not know where it is. But he took the flak and he has not been fired. He is still doing that.

You cannot blame him. You can only blame the person who named him. Not him. I do not know how the minister today can say: "Do not ask me any questions". He still works for him. He evidently has confidence in him today. He must have had confidence in those days.

The relationship between ministers and personal staff is not like departmental relationships. The minister is absolutely responsible for his staff. Nobody selects them but the minister.

It is just like when I was a lawyer. In my firm, I was not always there. When a document was delivered to my office by a bailiff I might not have been there to receive it, but the minute the bailiff put the document in my office, I cannot go in front of the court the week after and say: "I am not responsible" because the bailiff said a document had been put in the office of Mr. Chrétien, or the firm of Chrétien-Landry-Duchesnes or Lang-Michener, or whatnot. I do not want to make publicity for anybody. The document belongs to me at that minute. If I have a deadline to meet, unless it is something of which I am sure the deadline has expired, I do not get up and say: "Sorry, I was not advised. You gave it to my secretary". That is not an excuse. It is certified that your office has received the documents. We have known some lawyers who had to pay big sums of money because documents were misplaced.

The minister said today: "Do not blame me. Do not attack me". Why? I never ran away from being attacked. I never got up in the House of Commons and said: "I am the first French Canadian to be Minister of Finance. Leave me alone. I might look bad. Poor little me, I am the first one. Suppose I fail, there will never be another one". I never said that. I took it on the nose. That is why I have a broken nose today. I replied in kind.

I do not understand, but it is quite evident that he feels terribly uncomfortable, just by the way he acted in the House. It is for them to decide. We cannot. I know that when we form the government, ministers will know. Twenty-five years from now we may train a New Democrat to be a responsible Prime Minister, but not before that.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my friends and congratulate the Leader of Opposition for an excellent speech.

The motion before the House reads:

> That this House affirm that ministers are individually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons for the activities of the government, including the management and conduct of the Public Service—

I want the record to show that not one minister was in the House during that speech and we resent this practice, this conduct and we absolutely condemn—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

• (1740)

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been many surprising twists and turns in this affair, commonly known as the Al-Mashat affair. The first surprise is that he was here. Obviously Canadians were not only surprised; they were shocked. There were a number of other revelations and surprises that came along the way as the committee met, not the least of which was the fact that the assistant under-secretary said in committee, emphasized in committee, how important it was for him always to put things in writing. He liked to do things in writing. He said: "I do not like to do it by phone. You don't remember phone calls, but you always have it on record when you put it in writing". That is what the assistant under-secretary of state said in committee. But there is not one scrap of paper on this case that he signed, not one scrap of paper.

How do you put the two together? It is surprising to me how that man can sit in committee and say he did more than necessary and yet there is no paper trail. How do you put the two together?

The biggest surprise for most Canadians who have been watching—and I doubt that as many people have watched this event as the opposition thinks—is the resurrection and the rebirth of the rat pack. We remember when the rat pack was born about seven years ago. Soon after the 1988 election a group of opposition MPs decided they were going to be the rat pack and they attacked ferociously. They did not care what they said. They did not care what kind of indignities they expressed, but they attacked.

It was not long until the people of Canada started asking two important questions. Where is the Leader of the Opposition in this? Either he knows and approves, or he knows, does not approve, but cannot do anything about it.

Now that we have the resurrection of the rat pack, sooner or later Canadians are going to say the same thing about the leader today. We have the rat pack carrying on and yelling all kinds of indecencies and pretty soon—

Mr. Milliken: Indecencies?

Mr. Friesen: That's right. You were not in committee.

Pretty soon Canadians are going to ask if the Leader of the Opposition of today approves of the way these people are carrying on, or does he recognize it and does not approve but cannot do anything about it. If anything has happened as a result of this we have seen a process of the rat pack destroying the present leadership.

We know that the former leader was a decent and honourable man and he did not approve, but he could not control those people. We know the same thing is true about this man. He is a decent and honourable man and it is going to dawn on the Canadian people very quickly that these people are uncontrollable and sooner or later it will bring disrepute on the leadership of the Leader of the Opposition.

We have a motion before us and as the government House leader has already said, we see nothing wrong with this motion. It states the obvious. In fact it was enunciated by people long before this motion came along and we approve of it. Essentially it deals with ministerial responsibility and it looks as though everybody in the House is in favour of it. But, seemingly, everybody has a different definition of it and everybody has a different time when they want to invoke it.

I want to go back as others have done to the McGrath report. I served on that committee as did the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and, I might add, he served very well as did the member for Winnipeg Transcona. I want to read into the record exactly what the McGrath report says on page 21:

> The idea of a minister being responsible for everything that goes on in a department may once have been realistic, but it has long since ceased to be so. A minister cannot possibly know everything that is going on in a department. The doctrine of ministerial accountability undermines the potential for genuine accountability on the part of the person that ought to be accountable—the senior officer of the department.

Clearly the McGrath committee was saying that if we take the view which some of the members today are taking, we relieve officials of the department of their responsibility and that is not serving Parliament nor the Canadian people.

Therefore the recommendation is:

> We recommend that all ministers co-operate with committees exercising their expanded mandates by making available public servants that may be called to testify before a committee.

That is what the McGrath committee said. I think, given different times, members of the House tend to agree with that. It is all well and good to agree with a ministerial responsibility and a statement on that in the heady summer days of parliamentary reform, but it is a little bit more difficult to agree with it when we are facing a winter of discontent.

The fact is that sooner or later we have to make this principle operate and that is what we have been trying to do and that is what the ministers have been trying to do. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stood in the House and said: "We have taken full responsibility". The doctrine of ministerial responsibility says: "We will examine what has gone wrong. We will deal with the public servants. We will correct the mistakes. We will bring in a new regime". That is ministerial responsibility.

What the opposition seems to want is for heads to roll; only it wants ministerial heads to roll, but that is not what the doctrine says. It is not what Former leader of the member for Winnipeg—St. James, said. "When there is a mistake in the department ministerial heads do not necessarily roll", Mr. Trudeau said, as was read into the record earlier by the government House leader.

Mrs. Finestone: Just say I made a mistake.

Mr. Friesen: That is right. Just say it was a mistake. There have been mistakes made. They were not made by the minister. How can you make a mistake when you do not even know what happened? I say to my friend from Montreal, how do you know? Members from her party and from the New Democratic Party have all admitted that the ministers did not know. How do you correct it if you do not know?

The motion today and the McGrath committee conform to the common practice of ministerial responsibility. One of the things we have acknowledge is that when you invoke ministerial responsibility, you also include the delegation of responsibility and if that minister is responsible surely that minister can delegate. If the minister delegates, they can hold that person responsible for the way they have carried out their duties. I think the member from Montreal will agree with that. It seems logical.

The business community out there understands that in a company, if the president delegates responsibility to the vice-president and the vice-president delegates it to the manager and the manager boots it, the manager is going to take responsibility and the vice-president is going to take him to account. Now it sees nothing wrong with that.

Out there, the public understands. It has seized that issue and it understands it. The public for the life of it cannot understand why people in the House here are questioning that when there is a mistake made all of a sudden a different regime comes into play. No, we cannot touch people who made mistakes, that would be touching the bureaucracy. We cannot hold them responsible, can we? The public is mystified by what is going on here.

• (1750)

When ministers delegate responsibilities, they have a right to demand performance. When that performance is not there, they have the right to demand an accounting. That is the process which the ministers have followed throughout this regime.

As I said, the business community understands this. The journalists understand this. This case came to the public attention because a journalist in Toronto called the external affairs department to alert it of an individual who might want to be a defector. It was a journalist.

After that journalist called external affairs, there were public panel discussions on television. There was public discussion in the printed media. There were editorial columns written about whether it was proper for a journalist who presumes to be speaking for the masses or for the newspaper to pay particular attention to one case. Should he plead or lobby on behalf of one person? Was there an impropriety on the part of that one journalist?

There was public discussion for a few days, maybe a week, on that. It is funny, but that person has already been taken out of that job. He is no longer the editor of that newspaper.

The press says: "Of course, it had nothing to do with the Al-Mashat affair". Wink, wink, nudge, nudge. "It had nothing to do with that". It is funny how the timing coincided.

An hon. member: He is on another assignment.

Mr. Friesen: Yes. He is already out of that office. I am informing my friend from Montreal that the member is no longer editor of The Financial Post.

Newspapers understand it. They know that you cannot be talking for the public and then lobbying for one. You cannot be speaking for the newspaper and lobby for one. You are accountable to the publisher. They understand it, and he is gone.

He has some other kind of a job, presumably in the newspaper. What I cannot understand for the life of me is why journalists understand it when it is one of their own but not when it is in the government.

Here we have roughly 40 ministers of the Crown. We have a bureaucracy of 250,000, a quarter of a million. Somehow people in the opposition and some journalists seem to think that 40 ministers ought to keep track of 250,000 bureaucrats. It is not logical. It makes no sense and it violates the whole concept of accountability which bureaucrats want to see.

I do not understand why the opposition cannot understand that. As I pointed out before in the question and answer period, Premier Rae of Ontario understands it very well now that he is in government. While he was in opposition he probably did not. Now that he is in government, he is saying something entirely different.

Now he is saying: "The opposition talks about ministerial responsibility. I have looked into the precedents and there is not a case that I can find in the last 50 years in which a minister was expected to take the wrap, the fall, because something was done without him knowing about it. It is not the ministers who resign. They deal with the people who are the subordinates. They make sure the systems work and they make sure the employees work". That is ministerial responsibility.

I have one further point, and it has to do with the minister's statement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared in committee and she read an eight-page document in which she outlined carefully ministerial responsibility.

She said, from page 4: "Public servants are responsible to the ministers. They advise ministers and administer the programs carried out under the statutory authorities exercised by the ministers. Those ministers, in turn, are responsible to the House of Commons. Officials do, of course, support ministers in answering the committee of the House provided this does not draw officials into partisan controversy or undermine the authority and the responsibility of the ministers".

That is the point, the key point. Officials come before the committees and they come with the ministers, provided it does not draw officials into partisan controversy or undermine the authority of their responsibility to their ministers.

We had a case last week in committee where the minister came before the committee with her officials. She read this statement and at the conclusion she said this: "Now, to place this case in the context of Canada's over-all immigration process, Mr. Kroeger will describe how that process works in all cases, and Mr. Marchand will review the key factual highlights of this particular case and the changes to the procedures that have been made since then. Then Mr. Valcourt and I will be pleased to respond to questions".

I want to tell my friend from Montreal that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said: "The officials will now elaborate", members opposite walked out.

An hon. member: That is false.

Mr. Friesen: The member for Burnaby—Kingsway was the first to stand. The member from Winnipeg followed him, as the rest of the committee did. They walked out. I am telling members opposite they cannot have ministerial responsibility both ways. If officials are going to be responsible to the minister, they have to be held responsible to the minister. If these officials come with a minister to a committee, they are under the authority of the minister.

I think that is logical. I think the members will accept that. They are under the authority of the minister and the minister is responsible for them. What the members wanted to do was to draw them out separately and make these public servants accountable not to the minister, but to the committee. There was nothing wrong, and the minister made it a point to underscore the fact that the officials from her department were going to be available to report to the committee.

There is a difference between reporting to a committee, imparting information to a committee, and being responsible to the committee. They cannot have it both ways. They say they want the ministers to be responsible, responsible for the Public Service, how they behave, how they produce and how they perform, but at the same time want them to be responsible to the committee. They cannot do that. Sooner or later they are going to have to make a choice.

It so happened that at that time they got a 30-second or a 60-second clip on television by walking out and having this high dudgeon outside in front of the television. They sacrificed the very principle they said they were working for: holding ministers accountable. As soon as they rejected that opportunity, they were saying: "We want them to be accountable to us and not to the minister".

Mr. Wappel: Were you there, Benno?

Mr. Friesen: I was there. These people have a choice to make. If they really believe in parliamentary and ministerial responsibility, they will take the committee work seriously. They will hold the minister accountable for the way the officials do their work and they will insist that the ministers hold those public servants accountable. If one of them says he would like to put it on record, he would like to put everything on record so that people can read it and so there is a record, but never writes anything down so there is no paper trail, surely the minister has a right to ask what happened to that official.

It is not an unfair question to ask, is it? If he says he does not like to use a telephone except in an emergency but he wants to put it on record, maybe we have a right to look for those memos which are not there, especially if his boss is travelling in the Middle East and does not know what is happening here.

• (1800)

I want to make one more point and that is the famous so-called secret memo, copies of which are floating all over the place, dated March 7, rewritten on March 8, kept the original date, rewritten again on Monday and did not arrive until March 14. It was written by Mr. Vincent and it was addressed to Ms. McCallion, not to the minister. It was not addressed to the minister and the member for Winnipeg is so upset because this very important secret document did not get to the minister, was not even addressed to him.

It was not even addressed to him and yet he gets into this synthetic rage because something has gone wrong here.

We believe in this motion. We may not be able to vote for it because of the conventions of this House but we believe in the motion, and we have performed according to the demands of this motion as the ministers can prove.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member's comments on ministerial responsibility. I am even prepared to go along with part of his comments, to the extent that the minister or ministers said they had not been informed.

How can we in this House and how can Canadians believe that at a time when we were at war with a country an ambassador of this calibre was not under surveillance by CSIS and our country's security agencies, that no one was aware of his activities and that he was able to enter a country like Canada? This is not a banana republic. He entered Canada. How can we believe that no one knew about it?

[English]

Mr. Friesen: I am glad the member asked that question because it underscores exactly the problem that we have been discussing in committee.

The first telephone call came on February 27. It came to the Assistant Under-Secretary of State. He did not bother calling the minister. What he did do was place a call to Vienna and alert Vienna that there was somebody who might come and want to defect, but he did not tell the minister upstairs. I think it was the next day the minister was going to Washington to meet with Baker and talk about Middle East issues. He let him go to Washington and did not tell him that somebody from Iraq was wanting to defect to Canada. He let it go by way of memos and discussions. Nothing, there was not one memo written to alert and warrant a response from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

General memos, yes. None of them said: "for the attention of", "we want a response", "we want to have some direction from the minister".

I will tell you why. A week prior to that two ministers had said: "There is a case coming before us, another diplomat from Iraq. He should have no special privileges".

They knew what the attitude of the minister was on this. He wants to know how this happened and I will tell you why. It all was steamrolled by the security division of external affairs. I am not saying this is inviolate. I am not saying that it was trying to do something tawdry, not at all. It was looking after what it thought were the best interests of an individual who felt that he was in danger. I think we have to get it out of our minds that it was trying to do something tawdry.

The security division checks on whether this person is really a defector. The word comes back that he is not considered a defector.

It deals with an immigration officer in Vienna. Vienna reports back to external affairs. It was never reported directly back to the immigration department. Never did a telex go directly from Vienna to the immigration department here, it always went to external affairs. By March 11 it was case closed. They had been provisionally accepted on March 5, the day after the first interview.

Mrs. Al-Mashat came in on the evening of March 4. Mr. Al-Mashat came in on March 5 and both were provisionally accepted at the interview, providing their medicals and their security checks were okay. The security division made sure that it checked out that section.

It was a quick adoption of the process. It was not illegal. It was, I think, improper, but it was not illegal and because the system was made to function extra efficiently these people got in while thousands of people around the world wanted to get in. It was terribly unfair. I want to underscore that the officials did nothing legally or technically wrong. They thought they were doing right, but it was wrong.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just wondered in the opinion of the hon. member if this does not appear to be blown out of all proportion. It seems to me that we are occupying an awful lot of our time here in Question Period and in the House today on this issue months after it has happened.

When I call back to the people in the riding and I ask "are you concerned about this" or "are you following this", I do not find that people in my riding are following it closely at all. There were some questions in the beginning and, as you just said, a lot of people who did have relatives and friends whom they wanted to have come to Canada and who have been working hard at it for years who perhaps were very disappointed to see this happen. I agree with that. In all fairness, however, is it not blown out of all proportion considering the fact that, as you said, there was no malice? Perhaps there was a difference of opinion in the judgment used, and I think that is true. Perhaps there were some mistakes made, but there was no malice and there was no intent to conspire or do anything wrong. Would you agree with that?

Also you mentioned a few moments ago in your first remarks a comment about Mr. Trudeau's statement in 1983 with regard to ministerial responsibility. I would like you to elaborate on that a little more if you could. That was an interesting comment and I would like to hear your thoughts on that.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, on the issue of fairness, I do not think that we can blow it out of proportion in terms of looking after what went wrong. That has to be taken care of. The minister has done that. We are dealing with human individuals and therefore things can go wrong, but we have to guarantee for Canadians as far as humanly possible that we will conduct a fair operation so that everybody across Canada gets the same treatment.

In that sense it is not overblown. In the sense of the publicity, yes it is overblown. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that she has in the meantime gone to Chile and dealt with incredible issues with the Organization of American States to ensure that becomes a more active and a viable union on behalf of North and South America, and maybe deal with some of the poverty issues and the security issues that face this hemisphere.

She has been to Copenhagen and she has been dealing with NATO issues; whether we ought to change the relationship within NATO. She has met with NATO foreign ministers. That has incredibly long range implications for our country. None of this gets any attention as long as we are dealing with "where is that secret memo". That is the destructive part of this debate. There is nothing wrong with holding ministers accountable, nothing wrong with making sure that the system remains fair. That is the way it ought to be, but it is wrong to distort the issue to such an extent that the issues which face our country and the world get completely obliterated and blotted out by this one issue, in order to get a few seconds of a television clip.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have two minutes left in question or comment period. I will recognize the hon. member for Mount Royal for a minute and then have a rebuttal for a minute.

• (1810)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague very much for addressing many of his remarks this way.

The issue of the memo is important, if I may suggest to my hon. colleague, because it is not an ordinary memo. The memo was dealing with a man that my colleague and I have talked about in international meetings, a really unpleasant, not very good, dictator in Iraq with whom we were at war. I think you could say that this man we were referring to, Al-Mashat, was an apologist for him.

If it was just an ordinary piece of paper or just an ordinary memo, I guess we could have said was, perhaps pushing the case a little bit too far. But this was not an ordinary memo. I would suggest that you should not distort it in that regard.

Second, like you and like most members in this House, we have hundreds and hundreds of immigration and refugee cases. I do not have to tell you, because you and I have discussed this, the number of married men over here who have not had the pleasure of being able to live and have their wives, and some of them their children here, for over three years because they cannot get through this refugee and immigration system.

When you read the minister's statement and she was bringing the members of her staff before the committee to discuss the process and the procedure, I think that was logical. We got lots of things to look at there and we have lots of reasons to be angry that this man, Al-Mashat, apologist for Saddam Hussein, was in here. There is good reason.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, just to put it on the record, I will be taking 10 minutes of the 20 minutes and my colleague for Northumberland will take the other 10 minutes, with your permission.

I would like to look at this entire issue from the point of view of two words; honesty and integrity. First of all, I look at precisely what we are talking about. In general terms we are talking about ministerial responsibility.

My colleague from Winnipeg South Centre moved a very specific motion. Lest the people who are watching and who will read Hansard not know, they may wonder where in heaven's name did this wording come from.

I would like everyone to know that the wording is verbatim, extracted from the white paper on the future of the Public Service which was tabled on the Prime Minister's behalf on December 12, 1990, and which was quoted favourably by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when she appeared before the Al-Mashat committee. Why is that important?

It is important because that statement is a statement of principle by this government of ministerial responsibility. Among other things it says that ministers are responsible to this House and through this House to Canadians for the activities of government and individually, and I quote:

> Ministers are responsible for the administration of the decisions of the Government and the activities of Public Servants falling under their jurisdiction;

That is a principle with which the members of the government do not have a quarrel, or so we are told. Indeed it would be very illogical if they did have a quarrel with it since their own minister quoted it favourably. However, how does it apply to situations like the Al-Mashat affair? That really is the key.

I thought in the time allotted to me I would just have a look at the calendar of events. Members on the opposite side are interested in history when it suits their purposes. I would like to deal with some facts.

Factually, let us go back to 1984. We will all remember that the Prime Minister of today, then the Leader of the Opposition, campaigned long and hard on the issues of honesty and integrity and on the faith that people should have in the government and on the faith that he would redeliver to people when he became Prime Minister. Unfortunately that has not happened and people are very disappointed. This Al-Mashat affair would have been and still can be a perfect opportunity for this government to rekindle faith in the political process with Canadians, to reinstill a feeling of honesty and integrity.

But how? By being open and honest about this matter and having some integrity.

Now let us look at the facts. We were at war with the nation of Iraq. This is a fact. Al-Mashat was the Ambassador to the United States of the country with which we were at war. When? In January and in February. On February 27, admittedly at a time when a cease-fire had been called, our government is notified that he wants to come here. That is fine. We know what happened after that, but where do ministers get involved? I would suggest that it would be between March 8 and March 14.

Why? A memorandum was written to the office of the minister of external affairs dated March 8. It stated in it: "You may wish to bring this to the attention of your minister". We know that the minister's procedures established by his chief of staff and approved by him specifically stated that all memorandums were to be brought to the attention of the chief of staff. The office procedures did not state that the memorandums were to be brought to the minister's attention. The office procedures did not state that deputy ministers and under-deputy ministers were to pick up the phone and call the minister. It stated specifically that all memoranda were to be directed to the chief of staff. That is exactly what happened.

We know that the chief of staff received the document because he has admitted receiving it in accordance with the procedures established by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs. We know he read the document. When? Well, he is not quite sure. He thinks it might have been Thursday the 14th. It might have been Friday the 15th. It certainly would not have been on the weekend he tells us, but more probably the 18th or the 19th, a Monday or a Tuesday. In any event, it is at least 10 days before Al-Mashat got his visa.

What Canadians want to know is why did this man get in here and how did he get in here in 28 days. Well, on the 14th there was a memorandum in the office of the then minister of external affairs in accordance with the then minister of external affairs own office procedures as approved by him. His chief of staff admits reading the document and does not tell him about it and does not show him the document, at a time when the then minister of external affairs says that he was concerned about these issues because he was travelling in the area.

That is a clear breach by the chief of staff. Who is responsible for breaches by the chief of staff? Canadians know the answer. You do not need professors, you do not need law degrees to know the answer to that simple question. Who is responsible for the chief of staff? The person who hired the chief of staff, the person under whose direction the chief of staff works. In this case it is the present Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

This is not some mysterious thing that we have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada for guidance. This is pure and simple common sense. The chief of staff reports to the minister. The minister is responsible for the errors of his chief of staff, period. No one can dispute that.

I leave it to Canadians to make that decision themselves because I know Canadians have common sense and that is a common sense position.

But what happens? The memo is not brought to the minister's attention. We will go to another department. On March 11, Paul Tellier is advised. The Clerk of the Privy Council on March 11, not April, not May, but March, almost 18 days before Al-Mashat arrives, is advised. Does he pick up the phone and tell his boss, the Prime Minister of Canada? No. And yet Raymond Chrétien is fingered as the person who should have picked up the phone and called the minister directly and told him about this; not Paul Tellier who should have picked up the phone and called the Prime Minister and not the chief of staff, David Daubney, who should have picked up the phone, but the only person who actually prepared or had prepared a memorandum which we know, in the ordinary course of events, according to the minister's own office policy, reached his office and reached his chief of staff.

• (1820)

That is the nub of the issue. Somebody should be taking responsibility for the errors made not only in the department but in the minister's own office. That is where the question of honesty and integrity comes in.

If you are a minister and your staff has made an error, have the integrity to stand up and face the music. No one has been talking about resignation. I think if we check Hansard no one has called for a resignation. I stand to be corrected, but I do not think so.

What we have asked for is someone to stand up and have the backbone to say: "I am the minister. I am responsible". We have not seen that, and that is lamentable to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. member for Scarborough West. I would ask the hon. member to name the activities for which a minister is responsible to the House and indicate what activity would be grounds for a minister's resignation.

[English]

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, let me answer the second question first.

I would certainly call for the resignation of a minister if a minister knew of a fact and then stood in this House and denied knowing of that fact. That, to me, is misleading the House and that calls for a resignation.

As far as the first question is concerned as to what the guidelines should be, it seems to me that the guidelines are very clearly set out in a little booklet entitled "Notes on the Responsibilities of Public Servants in Relation to Parliamentary Committees" issued by the Privy Council Office in December 1990.

I commend it to the hon. member for his attention. I will merely read one statement from it: "Ours is a system of responsible government, because the government must retain the confidence of the House of Commons and because ministers are responsible to the House for everything that is done under their authority. They are answerable to Parliament and its committees".

That does not mean they must resign every time something happens. What it means is they must stand up and face the music.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke is the immigration critic for the Official Opposition.

As he knows, there are thousands of cases in the refugee backlog who cannot see their relatives, immediate family, for three, four or five years because they have been here for so long.

As the critic, what complaints is he getting from Canadians? Is it the fact that Mr. Al-Mashat jumped the queue? Is it the fact that the ministers are refusing to admit fault in this House? What complaints are he getting? Is it more jumping the queue? Is it more the honesty and the integrity of this government?

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

In fact it is three things. Not only is it the complaints about honesty and integrity of the government, the lack of same or the appearance of the lack of same. Not only is it the fact that many thousands of Canadians are waiting for their relatives and cannot get them in for years on end. They do not even get an answer from the minister of immigration, and this person is fast-tracked in 28 days. Third, we are not talking about John Smith or somebody. He is the former Iraqi Ambassador to the United States from a country with which we were at war who was an apologist for that government and for the regime that runs that country. Those are the three things that are infuriating the people who are calling me.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask a question about the management and follow-up in this particular case.

We heard the hon. member talk about the importance of this individual. According to what I heard before the committee on March 7 a decision was made. They started to prepare a memo on March 7. The bureaucrats finished writing the memo on Friday, March 8.

Again, the member indicated it was a very serious issue. Yet the person whom they sent it to did not receive it until almost a week later. He acknowledged before the committee that he did not read it until maybe March 18 or March 19.

Are you telling me that when a bureaucrat sends a memo of that importance, following procedure, that it is not his responsibility to check six, seven, eight, ten days later that that memo has been received? Do you think it is proper for a bureaucrat to sit back and wait that long to follow up on such an important memo?

Mr. Wappel: The answer is that first of all I think it is quite proper for a bureaucrat to follow procedures laid down by a minister. Second, I think it is quite proper for a bureaucrat following such procedures to assume that the procedures will bring the memo to the attention of the minister who set the policies in place. Third, yes, I do think that follow-up should have occurred. However, such follow-up would not have been necessary if this memorandum had been put in front of the minister as it should have been, in which case this whole matter would have been over.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity after weeks of study on this issue to speak to our Official Opposition motion today. I am very pleased my colleague has mentioned that is actually verbatim from the government's own publication Public Service 2000, which was tabled in the House in December 1990.

We are here today discussing, via this resolution, an issue of ministerial responsibility. The issue is not just of ministerial responsibility. It is not merely as it is delineated in this resolution, but there are layers of ministerial responsibility which have been brought to focus over the last weeks.

If the ministers of this government had taken their responsibility as they have outlined in their own document, Public Service 2000, the Canadian public would not have been harangued and assaulted with this issue for so long. Certainly Canadian citizens wish that this government were able to get on to issues which they consider to be very important, such as the economy, the loss of important jobs in this country—every job is important to every citizen—and our constitutional affairs.

We have been side-tracked over the issue and the principle of ministerial responsibility as it is articulated in the resolution which we are addressing today. However, I would like to say that there is, beyond the principle of ministerial responsibility, another layer of responsibility. That is the responsibility that this government bears to the two officials who were named as being responsible for all of the Al-Mashat affair and were publicly blamed in a document that was presented to the public and tabled here in the House on May 14.

This document, which included a chronology of events as they occurred, supposedly well researched by the government, was preceded by a statement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That statement says: "The Right Hon. Joe Clark regrets the fact that the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Raymond Chrétien, did not exert effective control over this sensitive case. Mr. Chrétien has apologized. Mr. Clark also regrets the fact that his chief of staff, Mr. David Daubney, did not inform him of this case. Mr. Daubney has apologized to the minister".

We know from the history of this case that the previous Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is now the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, said on public TV that Mr. Chrétien had apologized to him.

In the House we have heard comments from the current Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the report that was prepared. She is quoted as saying: "I think the report speaks for itself. The report goes into some considerable detail in a very precise form as to what happened during the process of this incident".

• (1830)

She goes on further on May 16 in the House to say, referring to the report:

> Number one, all of the information regarding this situation is out and was made public. The second point is that ministers took the responsibility to ensure that the information went public and that that information to date has not been contradicted.

We now know that Mr. Chrétien did not apologize to anybody for his actions during this affair. In fact in his view he went beyond what was required of him as associate minister in external affairs, that he did everything that he could to inform ministers responsible of what was happening with regard to this affair. To repeat, he did not apologize for his role in this affair.

After that startling evidence was presented, we also heard from Mr. Daubney who, in response to the report itself, told us that he had not been interviewed by the auditor designated by the minister to investigate this case. He, the chief officer for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, had not been interviewed by the auditor although it was known that he would have had a role to play. He also stated that he had not agreed to the public statement attributing blame to him.

The fact is that a committee of unknown ministers and bureaucrats, as was stated here earlier today, met on the evening of May 13. They wrote the minister's statement that was to be made public the next day, and in that statement they attributed blame to Mr. Chrétien and Mr. David Daubney. Later that same evening the committee presented this statement to them for comment. However, in fact it was a fait accompli to which they did not agree at all.

The issue is large; it is larger than just how Al-Mashat got into this country. Canadians are very concerned about that. However, in my constituency I have spoken to constituents who have informed me that they are worried about the greater principle of ministerial responsibility. As has been pointed out here before, and the minister pointed it in her own statement to the House when she selectively quoted from Professor Kernaghan who said: "In practice ministers in Canada do not resign as penance for administrative bungling in their departments".

Why did the ministers not take the appropriate, as acknowledged by tradition, responsibility in this case and say that they were responsible, do their investigation, and allow us as a country to get on with other issues of importance? However, because the ministers did not take the necessary responsibility for this case, we have a serious change in what was formerly a respected procedure in this House of Commons and in this government.

In fact, the very notion of government in this country is questioned because it now appears that the less the minister knows, the less the minister is to be blamed; the less the minister knows, the more departmental officials will be hung out to dry, the more departmental officials will be blamed for what goes wrong. Ministers, of course, will take credit for departmental accomplishments.

There is a lot of concern, not only among constituents at large in this country but certainly among the Public Service, about the precedent that the government has set in the handling of this particular affair. It is something that is of distress to me.

Also, in terms of ministerial responsibility and levels of responsibility, it was interesting today in this House when the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, was questioned about his search for the missing secret memo. He cast the blame for the persistent loss of that memo on the present Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The present Secretary of State for External Affairs certainly did not look amused when she was blamed for being responsible for a memo which has now been missing for three months.

Canadians across this country are concerned and worried. They do have other issues that they wish this government would pursue and deal with. However, we are also concerned that this government has cut off our opportunity to try to find out more clearly what has happened. The minister and present Secretary of State for External Affairs made her statement to our committee. It was a nine-page statement and approximately seven pages of that were devoted to ministerial responsibility. Yet the government denies the committee investigating this case the opportunity to call forward Gordon Robertson, a very respected Canadian and acknowledged expert in the area of ministerial responsibility. The government is not allowing this important person to come and speak to the issue of ministerial responsibility.

There is an article in yesterday's paper that I think expresses very well what I have heard from many of my constituents. It comes from the Saskatoon Star Phoenix. It says: "Whatever the explanation, the most singular thing about the whole business is the way in which senior cabinet ministers have dismissed their responsibility with shrugs. McDougall, Clark and all other cabinet ministers are paid by us to know what is going on in their departments. This is the essence of responsible government. Ministers are responsible for everything that happens in the departments to which they are assigned. If something is messed up, they, not civil servants who are forced to sign apologies, are ultimately to blame".

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point once again in the House of Commons with respect to the action actually taken in the Al-Mashat case by the ministers involved, because the member once again reiterated the complaint that ministers should not have mentioned publicly the role of officials in the Al-Mashat case.

What ministers did, knowing of the arrival of Al-Mashat in Canada as an immigrant under the retiree provision, was cause for an investigation to be made within their respective departments. What that investigation revealed, and the member knows that because she sat at the hearings of the external affairs committee and heard the testimony, was that two senior officials, both in the Department of External Affairs, knew before the entry of Al-Mashat into Canada that he indeed would be likely to be granted status as an immigrant and would arrive in Canada before March 30, 1991.

Those two officials had been involved in the process from the outset. In fact one of them, Mr. Raymond Chrétien, had received a telephone call from Allan Gotlieb that started the whole process.

The member knows that and the member knows that those officials had the particular responsibility for notifying the minister, in that case the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The method that officials chose to notify the minister was a memorandum, a memorandum dated March 8, 1991, which contained reference to the fact that Al-Mashat would likely come into Canada by March 30.

In reference to that memorandum, Mr. Raymond Chrétien said in his presentation to the committee that he read the memorandum and concluded that since Al-Mashat was no longer a defector, normal immigration procedures would apply: the ministers responsible, namely the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would be informed of the case. That is what he said.

Two people—forget the ministers—Mr. Paul Tellier, Clerk of the Privy Council and Mr. de Montigny Marchand, an Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, two senior officials of the government, said that was an error in judgment to assume that the minister of external affairs would be notified. That was the reason why Mr. Raymond Chrétien was named in relation to this whole process.

Will the member answer this question? Are those two senior officials of the government wrong in saying there was an error in judgment? Who does she believe, Mr. Chrétien or Mr. Tellier and Mr. Marchaud?

• (1840)

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, obviously we have heard in the committee testimony from different witnesses who have given different versions of what occurred with regard to the Al-Mashat affair.

Certainly it is not necessarily for us to judge whether or not there was an error. In the Secretary of State for External Affair own statement to the House she said: "When an error is made of which the minister is unaware, the minister acts to establish the facts, correct the error and satisfy himself or herself that it will not recur".

Certainly, if an error is made or if something goes wrong and a mistake is made, the ministers are responsible after they have taken on and accepted their own responsibility for what has happened. They do have an additional responsibility to research what happened and to try to correct procedures so that a similar incident would never occur again.

What is also quite interesting—we heard testimony from different witnesses and departments before the committee—is that according to many committee members there appeared to be as much liability on other departments as there was on the Department of External Affairs. Yet officials in the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Privy Council itself bore no responsibility and no blame for what happened. That certainly is questionable.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the most fundamental principle underlying our system of responsible government, the constitutional responsibility of ministers.

Recent events, of which we in this House are all aware, have given rise to considerable comment from members of Parliament—as we see here today and in Question Period in the past few weeks—the public and the media about the nature and practice of this principle. Indeed the motion which we are debating shows that interest in this principle is alive and as well in this Parliament as it should be.

I wish to first address the motion itself. On its face it is a very straightforward motion calling upon members of Parliament to announce their support for the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. The vehicle being used, as is conceded by the Liberal Party opposite, is a non-confidence motion. Were it to pass, it would require the government to resign.

However, we on the government side of the House can hardly accept this as a straightforward attempt on the part of the Liberal Party to encourage non-partisan all-party support for the principles underlying this doctrine to which this government has adhered faithfully in recent events.

It is a political ploy to embarrass the government. That is all it is. Let me therefore set out for this House the nature and elements of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility.

Ministers exercise powers bestowed on them by the Crown in Parliament and hold office at the pleasure of the Crown. The exercise of these powers, for which ministers are constitutionally responsible to Parliament, provides the foundation of responsible government.

The concentration of responsibility in the hands of ministers reflects the fundamental democratic principle that the power of the state must be exercised under the authority of elected officials accountable to the representatives of the electorate.

This enables Parliament to focus responsibility for the conduct of government on those of its members who hold ministerial office and who ultimately must personally answer to Parliament and hence to the electorate for their actions and the actions of their subordinates.

Ministers fulfil their responsibilities and are called to account by the House of Commons, for the exercise of their statutory authority in accordance with practice and convention. From the origins of our system, however, political circumstances rather than literal application of the principle of ministerial responsibility have governed the answerability of ministers. As Professor J. R. Mallory has noted, the minister's is a political responsibility.

What that means is that it is a political, policy setting responsibility. It is not a day-to-day administrative responsibility of the running of that department. Deputy ministers derive almost all of their authority from ministers. They advise ministers and administer the programs carried out under the statutory authorities exercised by their ministers. The tradition is that they are loyal to their ministers and are required actively to support and participate in the policy and administrative decisions taken by ministers individually and collectively. Put simply, deputy ministers are responsible to their ministers and are accountable to them.

Deputy ministers also support their ministers in answering to committees of the House provided this does not draw officials into partisan controversy or undermine the authority and responsibility of ministers. This role of officials has been enhanced and strengthened by the McGrath report which recommended that public servants be made more available to parliamentary committees. The government stated at the time that it supported this recommendation and recent events have borne out the government's commitment in this regard.

The concentration of responsibility in the hands of ministers is obviously the bedrock of parliamentary government. It is, however, a matter of observation that government is a large administrative enterprise. It is very important to recognize that it is not a modern phenomenon that ministers cannot know everything that is done under their authority. The phenomenon is merely more acute today than it was a century ago, and not prima facie proof of the irrelevance of ministerial responsibility. Ministers spend much of their time providing information to Parliament, indicating a need for the minister's ability to answer and provide information to be shared without however sharing his or her responsibility.

Professor Kenneth Kernaghan has noted: "It is now almost universally accepted that it is unreasonable to hold a minister personally responsible in the form of resignation for the administrative failings of his subordinates. The usual practice is that the minister informs Parliament that the fault lies with his officials and he promises that the offenders will be disciplined and their mistakes corrected. Despite frequent calls by opposition parties for ministerial resignations on the grounds of actual or alleged departmental mismanagement, in practice, ministers in cabinet do not resign as penance for administrative bungling in their department".

Professor Geoffrey Marshall, a leading British authority, sums up the doctrine and practice of ministerial responsibility as follows: "When action is taken of which a minister disapproves and", here is the more appropriate part, "of which he has not prior knowledge, there is no obligation on his part to endorse it, to defend the errors of his officials, or to resign".

In point of fact there is not a single case since Confederation of a minister resigning because of an error by an official. Applying the doctrine just outlined in summary form to the facts of the Al-Mashat case, I would note the following. All the evidence heard by those of us who were members of the committee that has been looking into this matter indicates the following.

First, ministers did not know anything of the Al-Mashat affair until after Al-Mashat had entered Canada legally.

Second, when the ministers were informed they took full responsibility by acting to establish the facts.

Third, when the facts were established they took appropriate action to ensure there would be no repetition and they sought an apology from those involved.

Fourth, ministers informed the House of how they had fulfilled their responsibilities.

Fifth, given the ministers' commitment to a thorough investigation and to making the facts public, and given the findings of the investigation and the nature of the report flowing therefrom, it became inevitable that the identity of the officials principally involved would obviously become public.

• (1850)

Early on in the debate that began in the committee, I contacted the Library of Parliament and asked them to do a study on ministerial responsibility as it might relate to this case. I read from the conclusion of the documents they sent to me. It is a document entitled Individual Ministerial Responsibility, Resignation of Ministers in the U.K. and Canada. Page 18 reads:

> Individual ministerial responsibility exists in both Canada and the U.K. as an important constitutional convention to the extent that Ministers must answer for the policies and activities of their departments. The purported obligation to resign where departmental officials commit serious errors does not appear to be a duty in either country.

That quote is very clear.

We also have the study which was adopted by all three parties of this House of the McGrath committee which also looked into the question of ministerial responsibility. I quote:

> The individual responsibility of ministers concerns the administration of their departments. It is no longer reasonable that a minister be accountable or responsible when, through no fault of the minister, senior officials misuse or abuse their powers.

In the next paragraph it reads as follows:

> The idea of a minister being responsible for everything that goes on in a department may once have been realistic, but it has long since ceased to be so. A minister cannot possibly know everything that is going on in a department. The doctrine of ministerial accountability undermines the potential for genuine accountability on the part of the person that ought to be accountable, the senior officer of the department.

That last point is something we rarely hear from the opposition benches.

In looking at all of the evidence that we have been receiving in the committee, it is obvious that the ministers did not know until after Al-Mashat was in the country.

Mr. Flis: Nonsense.

Mr. Reimer: The member says it is nonsense. The member was not even there.

The second point, the deputy minister, Mr. Chrétien, knew from the very first day, from February 27, about this case and what was involved in this case. You cannot in any way dispute that because it is accepted by everyone who was there at the committee. That deputy minister also agreed that this was a very sensitive, political case.

The minister gathered all the facts. I commend him on taking the time to get all the facts, which took four days as determined by the defectors committee. Once he knew that our immigration officials in Vienna had already provisionally approved the Al-Mashats under the retiree category, what did he do?

I am going to come to that. That deputy minister also, in responding to me and to some of the questions in the committee, said that although the new system of reporting instituted by the chief of staff of the minister was in place by January 1, from January 1 through to February 27 that deputy minister quite often used other means of communication directly to the minister. He did it by telephone, by directly speaking to him and by memos.

Now we say that he has to hide behind this process. No, he admitted quite often that he used other means. I just cannot see why people are not accepting that. He said it to us and it is clear.

When I persisted in my questions to him, he admitted that he did not just follow the new procedure but also made other types of contact directly to the minister. It is not, as the member for Winnipeg South Centre says, that he only followed procedures. No, that is not correct. He used other means.

He admitted that it was a very politically sensitive case. He also knew that his minister was going to Washington, to the United Nations and then to the Middle East. At that point he already knew what this case could amount to. He knew it was politically sensitive. Why did he not just pick up the phone and talk to his minister? Why did he not walk down the hall and see him? He could have. That is not being mentioned in here. I do not know why the opposition does not mention that.

Furthermore, he knew that CSIS had said: "He is not a defector". He knew it had said: "He has no value to Canada". He also knew that the PCO said: "No special treatment in this case". He also knew that the immigration officials said: "No special treatment in this case". He knew all of those things. Then, right when his minister is going to the most sensitive place related to this topic, right from where this ambassador came, he does not even tell the minister. I find that simply incredible.

The deputy minister knew where the minister was going and he knew that it could be politically embarrassing to that minister if it should suddenly leak out that Al-Mashat was seeking to come into Canada. He knew that could happen. What did he do? Instead of contacting the minister directly, which he did quite often, using his words "on other issues", he said nothing on this one. Instead of routing a memo directly to the attention of the minister he sent it through the system, to Mr. Vincent, then across to Ms. McCallion and then up to the chief of staff without even saying: "attention to the minister". That is incredible. It is almost as though he did not want the minister to see it.

If you wanted to subvert the system, delay it and put it aside for five or six days—it happened. I find it incredible because on other issues he talks direct.

An hon. member: That person is not here and cannot defend himself.

Mr. Reimer: Listen to the babbling brooks on the other side. They will get their turn. I did not interrupt them, Mr. Speaker, so I am sure you would want to point out that they should not interrupt me.

The debate today, instead of on ministerial accountability, should really be on accountability, by senior officers in their departments. Let me quote a person who has been at all of those hearings, one of the members of the media. In The Ottawa Citizen Ms. Marjorie Nichols says the following:

> In my opinion Raymond Chrétien, along with external's former chief of staff, David Daubney, ought to have been fired immediately when Brian Mulroney and Joe Clark discovered they had been betrayed by their own bureaucracies. There may be cause for the reprimand of others as well.

It is interesting that people in the immigration department accepted some of the responsibilities and apologized. I quote again:

> But there is no doubt that Raymond Chrétien is top honcho on the responsibility poll in this case.

You can hear the members of the Liberal Party babbling away over there. I am not focusing on Mr. Raymond Chrétien because he is the nephew of the Leader of the Opposition. I am focusing on him because of his position as the senior deputy minister in the department who quite often spoke to the minister, who admitted this was a politically sensitive case and that he knew more about it than anybody else in the whole Public Service. That is why I am focusing on him.

In conclusion, examining all the evidence we can see that: first, no laws were broken and nothing ethically improper was done in the handling of the case.

Second, there was no foreign influence nor any hidden espionage motives involved in any way in Mr. Al-Mashat's entry.

If the people on the other side would only listen, instead of always shouting from their seats, they would hear that I said that according to the evidence we heard so far this is what we know.

Third, ministers did not know anything about the case until after Al-Mashat had been in Canada.

• (1900)

Fourth, the issue was clearly embarrassing to the government: there is no denying that. It must, however, be kept in proper perspective. Canada's national security was not threatened and no laws were broken. Handling of this case outside the proper channels allowed a high profile individual to enter Canada quickly and without the knowledge of the ministers. As a result of misjudgement by senior officials, ministers were embarrassed by this case.

However, at a time when Canada faces major challenges such as the very unity of Canada itself and grave economic questions and competitiveness in the international arena, what are we doing here? We are spinning our wheels on a ridiculous case that is a simple comedy of errors. That is all we are doing.

The opposition wants to somehow get at some minister. The ministers did everything they could once they knew. The real problem is not ministerial responsibility but senior Public Service accountability. That is the issue. As I said in quoting Marjorie Nichols, I think there are two people who did not carry out their responsibilities and should be fired.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I can honestly say that I have never seen such a disgusting display of dumping responsibility on people who cannot defend themselves or protect themselves. In my view it is an abuse of the privileges of this Chamber.

The member has quoted extensively from various sources. I want to quote from government policy and show how government policy has been violated over and over and over again since this affair began.

Let me quote from Directions to Public Servants on how public servants should behave before committee: "The preservation of the relationship of trust and confidence between ministers and public servants is essential to the conduct of good government". This member is talking about the impact on the country at a time of great difficulty.

Let me continue: "Matters of policy and political controversy have been reserved more or less exclusively for ministers, principally because political answerability on the part of officials would inevitably draw them into controversy, destroy their permanent utility to the system, and indeed undermine the authority and responsibility of their ministers".

The carrying out of the will of this House depends on an impartial and anonymous Public Service. I want to quote again from Public Service 2000, which the President of the Treasury Board announced on December 10 with great fanfare as government policy. It says: "The Public Service is, therefore, central to the structure of our democracy. Power flows from the Crown and is exercised by ministers who are responsible to Parliament. Officials advise ministers and are accountable to ministers. The constitutional responsibility of ministers is the cornerstone of the accountability of public servants".

This is the policy of this government. It further says: "Ministers are individually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons for the activities of government, including the management and conduct of the Public Service. Individually ministers are responsible for the administration of the decisions of the government and the activities of public servants falling under their jurisdiction. Collectively they are responsible for the decisions of the government as a whole and the activities of all of their colleagues". That is all of their colleagues.

This is a statement by this government on what its policy is. I can only refer to Dian Cohen's comments last week on Canada AM who said: "How does this government expect, as it says in PS 2000, to transfer more responsibility, more decision making, more independence, more of the kind of creativity we need as the world changes rapidly, to public servants if they are then going to be dumped all over in public by members of the government, including their very minister who is there to be responsible for the conduct of their department's affairs?"

The government has made it clear it is violating its own policy. As Dian Cohen said, Public Service 2000 is dead in the water.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Questions and comments period is not the time for a new speech or address. It is time to ask a question or make a comment. If you want an answer from the previous speaker, it is time to end your remark or question.

Mrs. Catterall: What I would like to know from the previous speaker is: How does this government intend to repair the terrible damage it has done? Will it do as the public accounts committee has recommended and set up a special committee of the House of Commons to deal with these issues? Will it do something to start moving toward restoring some sense of confidence in the Public Service so that its members can make decisions, know that they are not going to be dumped all over in public and that they do not have to be paralysed by worrying more about whether their decisions are going to please their political masters than whether or not they are good decisions?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I am going to repeat one thing that I quoted which had the support of the member. Her party supported the McGrath commission report.

In that report it says the following: "The idea of a minister being responsible for everything that goes on in the department may once have been realistic, but it has long since ceased to be so. A minister cannot possibly know everything that is going on in a department". I think the hon. member would accept that.

It goes on to say: "The doctrine of ministerial accountability undermines the potential for genuine accountability on the part of the person who ought to be accountable, the senior officer of the department".

I did not hear her speak about that part. There are two things here. There is ministerial responsibility for all the policy setting and what goes on in departments. There is also a second factor which the McGrath committee, to its credit, mentions here, that there is also senior officer accountability. That is the other factor.

If we dwell only on the one to the exclusion of the other, how can we ever get true accountability within the person who in some cases is genuinely accountable, and that is the senior official in the department?

Therefore I think what happened in this case is very simple. The opposition is dwelling on one side of the coin. I am trying to dwell on both sides. Ministers are accountable, no question, but so are senior public servants.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, just let me say that the major speech of the hon. member was a hatchet job on public servants who do not have an opportunity to defend themselves. I agree with the previous member that is an unacceptable way for a member of this House to conduct himself.

The issue before the House is the accountability of ministers. The thesis that the member put forward would leave ministers to be able to just walk away from any decision that is made. The issue here that underlines this case, which so offends Canadians who have to see their relatives and friends stand in line for month after month after month, is that this particular person was allowed to skip the line.

This government and these ministers are responsible for that.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member raised the second point in his question.

There is no question that many Canadians very frustrated by the fact that their friends and relatives simply cannot get in. It takes months and months, if not years, and here is someone whom I do not think very many Canadians would want to admit into the country if they knew all of the facts, suddenly coming in very quickly.

That offends all of us, and I agree with the hon. member on that. I am terribly offended by the fact that person jumped the queue the way he did. I find that offensive. But the question now is: How did it happen? Who did it? Not a single minister knew about it until after the person was here. That is the key point. Therefore, how did it happen? It happened because some people unfortunately did not tell their minister.

• (1910)

I am convinced that if the senior official in that department had gone directly to the minister on this case, as he admitted to me he quite often did, the minister would have said: "No way do we admit him now when I am going to the Middle East. You put that one on hold and back to the back of the line and we will reconsider it later".

There is no question that is what would have happened. I agree with the hon. member that this member should never have been allowed to jump the line. Why did he jump it? Because some senior public servants allowed it to happen.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, a former cabinet colleague of mine in the Dave Barrett administration, Ernie Hall, when something went wrong in our government, once quoted what he called a Limey proverb to the effect that if something happens once it is happenstance. If there is a second happening that is a coincidence. If it happens three times then somebody is managing the affair.

The hon. member from Kitchener has described a litany of events which all conspired together to make sure that none of the cabinet members knew about this incident, this case, this person who wanted to come in.

We are asked to believe not one, not two, not three happenings but a whole litany of events conspired together to make it possible. It is difficult to believe. I am not saying it is not the truth, but I am saying it is very difficult to believe.

As I say, twice is coincidence. Third is getting unbelievable. When it gets to 13 and 33 then we have to wonder if somebody is not managing the events.

The question was asked earlier in the debate: "Are we not dealing with this out of all proportion to the importance of the case?" I am inclined to agree with that.

Certainly I am as concerned as other members are about the way in which one person was able to jump the queue in the way that person did. I must have close to 100 open files in my office where people have been trying to get admission to Canada. Some of them are from as long ago as the election of 1988. They still have not completed the process, yet this one particular person was able to do it within 28 days.

Had one of the 100 or so who concern me right now managed to jump the queue then I would say: Yes, something went wrong. The system broke down. It was just too easy compared to all the rest.

When a very high profile person such as this jumps the queue then I have to wonder. I cannot say all these people are not telling the truth, but I really have to wonder whether it is possible for all those events to come together. It was not just a casual person brought in out of all the people who want to immigrate into Canada. It is this one particular person who from all the rest is the fortunate recipient of all of these happy events which combined together to make sure that he was able to enter Canada legally.

It strains the bounds of credibility. I have a great deal of difficulty in believing that it could be so easy for one high profile person with a well-known name when none of the people with whom I am dealing can find a way of getting in even within the regular time.

Having said that, I still think we are spending more time on this than it is worth. The part that bothers me—I have highlighted just a few words in the motion introduced by the Official Opposition—is that ministers are responsible for the activities of public servants falling under their jurisdiction.

I was a cabinet minister, and I certainly believe that. It does not apply just to cabinet ministers. You can recall the Leader of the Opposition in his speech talking about his experience as a lawyer. If someone delivered a document to my office—I ran an accounting business until some time after the election when I had to give up that part of my life—even had I been away on vacation, it was still my responsibility. If the client came in and complained about me losing something that belonged to him or her, I would not go to my staff and try to find out which one it was and then tell the client that it was so-and-so on my staff. I would want to know. I would want to find out who received it. I would want to trail it and see if I could not find it or have them find it, but there is certainly no point in me telling the client who was to blame. I had the responsibility.

For a while in my life I was a poultry farmer, an egg producer. Eggs have to be candled to check the interior quality as well as examining the exterior. I did not lay the eggs, but if a customer complained to me about the quality of one of those eggs that I was selling him there was no point in me blaming the chicken, finding out which hen laid it and saying that she was to blame. I was responsible. I was the proprietor and it was my responsibility.

In the same way the cabinet minister is responsible. I was a cabinet minister and I had problems in my department. It never once occurred to me to find out who the offending individual was with a view to telling people outside my ministry who that person was and what he or she had done wrong. I was the one who was responsible. I suppose, in different circumstances, President Truman said it in less than 20 minutes, much shorter and very concise: "The buck stops here".

I was the minister of that department and it was my responsibility. Things did go wrong and I wanted to find out who and why and to try to set in motion procedures to make sure that those same things did not go wrong again, and I never had that third happening. Sometimes a coincidence but never to the point where I was suspicious of the whole process. That is the cabinet minister's responsibility.

In this instance we are led to believe, as I say, that cabinet ministers did not know. Four of them who have been identified in debates in this House, should have known something about it. There was a paper trail and they should have known. In some cases it was suggested they did not get around to reading their mail. A lot of us do not get around to reading our mail, but if it is important mail we see it and we see it promptly. If not, we want to find out why not.

If there is someone in our office who has not done his or her job properly, we have a way of dealing with that person. Depending upon the severity and depending on the incident, there are different ways of dealing with it. But it would certainly never occur to me to blame one of my staff members if a constituent was not served properly or if the job was not done correctly. I do not do it all and none of us can. We all have help to do our work, but we are responsible for everything that goes out of our offices and everything that is done in our constituency offices.

Not often but occasionally we do get some credit. If there is any blame we cannot pass it on to anyone else. It is our blame and it is our responsibility.

That is the way it has to be in cabinet. Public servants and public employees do not have any way of speaking out. If they do, it is cause for dismissal. When public servants were named in this case, individuals named before the committee started meeting and before they started getting into the evidence, those individuals were named. That is not fair to people who do not have any voice. They can speak to their minister. They can speak to the person to whom they are responsible, but they have no right to say anything outside the minister's office about anything that has happened. They have taken an oath not to.

There is responsibility and there is loyalty.

The people working with the minister have to be loyal to him or her. Otherwise they do not belong there and they had better find another job. The minister has to demand loyalty. He cannot afford to have that person going out and cutting the ground out from under his feet under any circumstance.

I had that happen to me just once. The offending person said that he was just joking and did not mean it seriously, but it never happened a second time to anyone in the department. The person was not fired, but certainly the message got around that kind of conduct was not acceptable.

On the other hand, nobody in my ministry ever had to worry that I was not supporting them. If anything went wrong then I would have it out with that person, but it never occurred to me to say publicly that somebody in my department had done something wrong or that it was not my fault if things were not done right: in other words, that I did everything right but some individuals whom I would name were the ones who did everything wrong.

It does not work that way. That is not acceptable. The public has a right to know who is responsible. The premier or Prime Minister has the right to know who is responsible and not to have to blame a public servant or anyone else. The Prime Minister or premier goes to the minister and should not go any further. The minister should not tell the Prime Minister who is to blame. That is between him and his staff.

The loyalty has to work both ways if it is going to work at all. What kind of loyalty is there within the departments that were involved in this? How can any of the senior staff feel safe about the work they are doing? We are told that they admitted their blame, accepted the responsibility, confessions were obtained, should I say extracted from them? Certainly indications were that they were not willingly offered.

Mr. Harvard: Extorted.

Mr. Stupich: The word extorted has been suggested to me and I think that is appropriate under the circumstance.

If confessions were obtained in that way, how can anybody working with that minister ever have any feeling of loyalty or trust in the minister again? The minister found an easy way out. If something else goes wrong, the minister will probably find that same way out again. Would that not be the fear of anyone working in the ministries or the departments of any of those ministers?

Certainly I could excuse a person feeling that way, but not one of the senior public servants involved, even when the heat was on as much as it was, even when their names were released publicly, and even when it was told how much they had done wrong, said anything publicly until they were called before a committee. There they had to. They had no choice. They were loyal to the minister, but the ministers, three or four of them, certainly had no feeling of loyalty to the senior public servants.

That is not good enough. It is not the public servants whose heads should roll. It is the ministers who should have from the beginning told us what happened and let it go at that. If they expedited his entry on short notice, why not say so and be done with it? That would have been the end of it. What can we do if they admit they are wrong? If they admit they did something they should not have done, that would be the end of it. We cannot pursue it any further once the whole story is known.

It has dragged on now for a month. Bit by bit we have found out more and more, but I suspect that we have yet to find out the whole truth. I doubt that we ever will, unless someone writes their memoirs and they are released some time in the future.

One of the hon. members suggested there is nothing wrong with the motion, that he or she accepts the principle of cabinet responsibility. We all have to accept that and, as I say, it goes beyond cabinet. It is in our whole lives. We have to be responsible to people, have loyalty to people working with us, loyalty to people who we supervise, and they have to be loyal to us, whether it is in business, at home, or whether it is as a cabinet minister. There is nothing really peculiar about it except that cabinet ministers have taken an oath, as have senior public servants. There is that exception, but there is really nothing new or different about the principle.

I welcome the comment from one of the government speakers saying that he could support this, would like to support it, believes it, but because of the nature of the operation of Parliament as a government member he has to vote against it.

The McGrath report has been referred to several times and one of the findings of the commission has been passed on to me. The report was endorsed by this House five years ago, I am told, in 1986. It specified that opposition motions should not be considered questions of confidence. I understand that since that report was approved by the House two opposition motions have actually been adopted by the House, not by voting but by unanimous consent.

That being the case and so that it will be possible for some government members or all of the government members to vote for this motion to show how they feel about ministerial responsibility, I want to move an amendment to the motion before us which would add the words:

> And that adoption of this motion not be considered a lack of confidence in the government.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will take under advisement during a few minutes the motion moved by the hon. member. We now proceed with questions and comments.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening most of the afternoon to the interventions by my hon. colleagues opposite. Just recently we heard from the member for Ottawa West and more recently the current speaker who may be able to answer this question for me.

Both these members seem to suggest that somehow ministers should always back up—I think those were the words used in one case—the decisions of their senior officials. I assume that they mean that the officials who have been chosen for their experience, their intelligence and their good judgment should be listened to in all cases. At least that is the impression I get from the hon. members opposite.

However, I think that if that were the case, if ministers should always agree with the decisions of their staff, always back them up, always stand behind the decisions of their staff, then the members must be telling me that they also believe that the staff, the senior public officials, made a good decision to let Mr. Al-Mashat into Canada without discussing this with their ministers.

I do not think that is what they mean. If that is what the hon. members mean then I take it that they are saying we should not have government by elected representatives but rather we should have government by bureaucracy, that the elected members do not have any position, that ministers do not have any position of authority, that ministers are not in a position to make critical decisions when critical decisions must be made.

I have some difficulty with that kind of logic. It seems to me that if the senior officials were concerned about a decision as critical as this one, concerned enough to write memos and to certainly document the fact that they were taking this under some serious thought, they would also have ensured that ministers were informed in person so that there would be absolutely no possibility of any mistake about whether or not ministers knew this was being contemplated.

The only other possibility that I can garner from this, if the members opposite do not agree, is that the member believes that we should be governed by our senior public officials who should not be accountable, who may have great authority and great power but who should never be held to account for the fact that sometimes they do make errors in judgment.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the member was in her seat all the time that I spoke. Earlier on I thought I made it quite clear that there is some doubt in my mind as to whether the ministers did or did not know about this. I explained at some length that it is almost unbelievable such a chain of events should have happened, so many coincidences, and none of the ministers even heard about it.

We are talking about the top level of public servants, the highest level. All this was going on around the ministers and they did not know anything was happening. I find that hard to believe for a start. However, the member asks: "Should cabinet ministers agree with everything that their senior staff do wrong?" Of course not.

What I am saying is that if something went wrong in my department as Minister of Agriculture, I was the one who took the responsibility. I did not try to find out which individual had done something wrong, or even if I knew. I was the minister, not somebody else. I would take it up with that person individually.

• (1930)

When the premier was expressing concern about it I had to take responsibility, not the person under me. That is all I am saying. It is a ministerial responsibility. The minister is responsible. The premier is responsible when we get to the top, or the Prime Minister. We cannot go any higher.

As Truman said: "The buck stops here". As long as I was Minister of Agriculture I was responsible.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my remarks short. There has been a lot of rhetoric on this issue but it seems to me that there are two answers. Either the ministers knew or they did not know. If they did know then we have a full-blown scandal. They say they did not know and a lot of Canadians do not believe that story.

I hear that there will be a poll coming out, perhaps tomorrow, that will say that 78 per cent of Canadians do not believe the government's story.

Let us accept the government's line for just a moment. The ministers say they did not know, the bureaucrats did not pass the information along to them. If they did not know, would it not have been the responsible thing to simply admit responsibility? "Yes, there might have been a mistake here. There might have been a bungle there. But we are the ministers and we are going to take full responsibility".

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member had a question to ask. I had risen to speak to this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question and comment period is not over. I will recognize the member for Winnipeg St. James again and ask him to please conclude.

[English]

Mr. Harvard: I will conclude in just a moment.

Instead of accepting responsibility for this, the government and the ministers were cowardly and craven. What they did was look for a scapegoat, for defenceless public servants who could not defend themselves. What upsets Canadians so much is the government's cowardice and the fact that it would not admit to this responsibility.

My question for the previous speaker is quite simple. Does the previous speaker not believe that the honourable thing to do was to simply admit responsibility?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, the actions of the ministers in identifying the public servants publicly before the committee ever met is totally reprehensible. The honourable thing for them to do was to accept the responsibility, as the member has suggested. Then they could deal with it in their department as a separate matter, and that is not a public issue. Publicly those ministers should have accepted the responsibility for what went wrong in their departments.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I am now in a position to make a ruling regarding the motion put forward by the hon. member for Nanaïmo—Cowichan.

His amendment is out of order on two counts. First, it introduces a concept irrelevant to the main motion and, on this point, I refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 579(1), which says: "An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved".

Second, in Beauchesne's sixth edition again, citation 929 states:

[English]

"On an allotted day, during consideration of the business of supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion".

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the most fundamental principle underlying our system of responsible government, the constitutional responsibility of ministers.

Recent events of which we in this House are all aware have given rise to considerable comment from members of Parliament, the public and the media about the nature and practice of this principle.

Indeed the motion we are debating shows that interest in this principle is alive and well in this Parliament. I may add that some of the comments on ministerial responsibility we have heard and read in recent weeks contain a number of misconceptions which have helped confuse the issue instead of explain how this doctrine was applied in Canada.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on this subject today. I hope to provide some clarification for members of this House and the Canadian public and address some of the key elements of this fundemental principle of our democratic system of government.

I wish to first address the motion itself. On its face it is very straightforward motion calling upon members of Parliament to announce their support for the doctrine of ministerial responsibility.

The vehicle being used, as is conceded by the Liberal Party opposite in the debate on a previous supply motion on medicare, is a non-confidence motion.

Were it to pass, it would require the government to resign. But we on the government side of the House can hardly accept this as a straightforward attempt on the part of the Liberal Party to encourage non-partisan, all-party support for the principles underlying the doctrine to which this government has adhered faithfully in recent events.

Let me therefore set out for this House the nature and elements of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. Minister exercise powers bestowed on them by the Crown in Parliament thus providing the foundation of responsible government, and under the Constitution they are accountable to Parliament for their actions and the actions of their officials.

The concentration of responsibility in the hands of ministers reflets the fundamental democratic principle that the power of the state must be exercised under the authority of elected officials accountalbe to the representatives of the electorate. Public servants, in turn, are accountable to the ministers. They advise them and administer the programs implemented by virtue of the powers exercised by the ministers.

Former Auditor General Kenneth Dye was fond of saying that some public servants knew what was going on in their departments but ministers did not because the machine had become top unwieldy.

These powers are therefore conferred on ministers by Parliament, and ministers are accountable to the House of Commons.

Public servants also support their ministers in aswering to committees of the House, provided this does not draw officials into partisan controversy or undermine the authority and responsibitlity of ministers.

Ministers fulfil their responsibility and are called to account by the House of Commons for the exercise of their statutory authority in accordance with practice and convention. As Professor J. R. Mallory has noted, the minister's is a political responsibility.

It is, however, a matter of observation that government is a large administrative enterprise. It is not a modern phenomenon that ministers cannot know everything that is done under their authority. The phenomenon is merely more acute today than it was before.

How ministers deal with their responsibility for their officials depends on the circumstances and whether, for instance, an official took action that was totally unacceptable, without the minister's knowledge. Of course if the minister was not informed he cannot be responsible.

Briefly here are the essential components of this doctrine. Authority is conferred by the Crown and exercised by ministers who are accountable to Parliament.

Ministers are responsible for the actions of their officials whether they did or did not know what those actions were. When a mistake is made without the minister's knowledge the minister must establish the facts, correct the mistake and make sure it does not happen again. The minister informs the House of the steps taken.

• (1940)

From what I can see, precedents at the federal level in Canada support this interpretation of the doctrine. Professor Kenneth Kernaghan, in an article entitled Power, Parliament and Public Servants in Canada: Ministerial Responsibility Reexamined published in Canadian Public Policy, volume 3, 1979, noted: "It is now almost universally accepted that it is unreasonable to hold a minister personally responsible in the form of resignation for the administrative failings of subordinates." It is on page 36.

The usual practice is that the minister informs Parliament that the fault lies with his officials and promises that the offenders will be disciplined and their mistakes corrected. That is on page 387.

Professor Kernaghan also said: "Despite frequent calls by opposition parties for ministerial resignations on the grounds of actual or alleged departmental mismanagement, in practice in Canada ministers in cabinet do not resign as pennace for administrative bungling in their department". This quote is from page 386.

Addressing the same issue in a book entitled Ministerial Responsibility, Oxford, 1989, Professors S. E. Finer and Geoffrey Marshall, both leading British authorities on the subject, sum up the doctrine and practice of ministerial responsibility as follows: "When we refer to the individual ministerial responsibility we simply mean that for any action taken by or omission on the part of a civil servant, a minister or someone else is expected to provide information to Parliament. This, only ministers can do". "When action is taken of which a minister disapproves and of which he has no prior knowledge, there is no obligation on his part to endorse it, to defend the errors of his officials, or to resign", said Marshall at page 386.

Applying the doctrine just outlined in some reform to the facts of the Al-Mashat case, I would note the following. First, ministers did not know anything of the Al-Mashat affair until after Al-Mashat had entered Canada legally.

Second, when they were informed they took full responsibility by acting to establish the facts.

Third, when the facts were established they took appropriate action to ensure there would be no repetition and they sought an apology from those involved.

Fourth, ministers informed the House of how they had their responsibilities.

Fifth, given the ministers' commitment to a thorough investigation and to making the facts public, and given the findings of the investigation and the nature of the report flowing therefrom, it became inevitable that the identity of the officials principally involved would obviously become public.

Given the political and constitutional history of Canada, we have to conclude that this government has acted according to the above-mentioned principles and doctrine because since Confederation no minister has had to resign due to an error made by a public servant.

I have talked at length about the doctrine of ministerial responsibility and its direct application in this case, as suggested in the motion. I have no doubt hon. members will acknowledge that this government, through its recent efforts, has fully abided by this doctrine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 7.45 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 81(14) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Accordingly the question is on the motion moved by the member for Winnipeg South Centre. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it. Call in the members.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I have been requested by the chief government Whip and the chief opposition Whip to defer the division until a later time.

[English]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at 10 a.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: I rise on a point of order. It was agreed between the government Whip and myself to defer the division until 10 a.m. tomorrow. I know you have already so ordered, but you did not specify when. You just said until a later time. Perhaps hon. members should be reminded to be here at 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): To make perfectly sure the hon. members know exactly, the bells will ring at 10 a.m., as usual. The difference is that the division will be taken at 10.15 a.m.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REMOVAL OF THE GST

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should envisage removing the GST because of its unexpected and negative effects on the Canadian economy that will inevitably prolong the current recession.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity tonight to speak on the GST because I would like to report a number of significant happenings since its implementation.

As the motion says, the GST is having unexpected and extremely negative effects on the Canadian economy. This is why I ask that the tax be removed, since it inevitably makes the recession drag on.

Of course, I do not expect the government to change the legislation overnight to abolish the GST, the goods and services tax. I realize it would not be realistic. I would not want hon. members or the public to think this is a simplistic motion. What do I forecast? The negative effects and their consequences for the retail business on top of the psychological effects of this new tax are like the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back.

• (1950)

We are still willing to discuss reforms, but I contend that we should consider reducing gradually the GST. I believe that, from a psychological point of view, this would be highly significant for Canadians and the economy. The GST has had a negative impact. Figures show that prices and inflation have surged ahead. When you look at the number of people crossing the border to shop in the United States, you get an idea of the degree of rejection of this new tax by the public. It comes a time when we are feeling the effects of a recession.

All the experts in the field, and I will read you some quotes later on, have demonstrated that the tax was introduced at a very inopportune time, when the economy was slowing down. While this new and substantial tax is going to produce billions of dollars, it has greatly hampered the growth of the economy.

Mr. Speaker, if you look at the statistics for the last few months, you will notice a very negative reaction on the part of Canadians. I would like to note that when this transition happened, when the manufacturers' sales tax was abolished, all companies and all retailers were supposed to reduce their prices proportionally to the tax they had paid on the manufactured goods. Indeed, the government had said many times in this House that the price of several products would go down. But that has not been the case, except perhaps for automobiles. We have not seen any price reduction in several kinds of businesses. Whether it was hardware, clothing or any other product, there has been no reduction. So it was unthinkable to believe that in the over-all Canadian economy there would be a price reduction on all products on which the manufacturers' sales tax had been applied, that businesses would reduce their prices, that the GST would be applied and that we would save money. It is not the case at all.

[English]

The motion I brought before the House concerns the goods and services tax, the GST. It is not only an extremely major tax increase, it has had a psychological effect. All you have to do is check the figures to see how the retail sales took a dramatic drop in many sectors of our economy.

There is no doubt there was a reaction, be it cross-border shopping or a reduction in consumer spending. We would have to say not only is there a reduction in consumer spending but the amount of money we have had to spend has been curbed substantially. If you take into consideration all these factors, the GST has done great damage to the economy.

At the time when we felt the economy was slowing down, that we were going into a recession, it seems that common sense should have dictated that there should have been a delay at least of the GST.

The effects were detrimental and they are compounding. There were alternatives to the whole affair. Figures do not lie and we are seeing the results.

If you take the fact that there was an alternative solution for the way we tax our people, we consider that the government could have found a simpler way of finding additional revenue without penalizing the whole country and affecting the economy to the point that we are into a recession. It took them many weeks to admit that we are into a recession.

In the literature that has been written on the subject, everybody who is aware of global economics has reported that the tax burden has increased substantially in this country. They summed it up in this way, and I could not find better words: "At the risk of over-simplification, my assessment of the Tory tax change is summarized in this fashion."

He says: "It is less equitable and more complicated. The corporate tax increase has improved their position. It is a more stable and predictable source of revenue. It is more neutral and hence more efficient." That is corporate tax. It went down. It says here that basically the GST has turned out to be quite complicated, and a large number of small businesses that never had to deal with the manufacturers' sales tax were the big losers in this whole affair along with the Canadian people.

What I contend is that it does not take a degree in economics to realize that basic common sense is always the best answer when dealing with anything, even economics.

The major factor is that the government came in with a major tax measure without going into any kind of basic tax reform. The best example of all is New Zealand.

Two years prior to putting in the goods and services tax, it had a major overhaul, a major tax reform. It was quite remarkable. Taxes were lowered considerably. Prior to the GST, it lowered personal income tax substantially—I mean substantially.

Lately I have read that the New Zealand government was not impressed with the way the Canadian government introduced its GST. The New Zealand government realized that public perception was extremely important. It wanted to cover up the loopholes and it wanted it to be a progressive tax.

Before implementing the GST, it lowered the personal income tax substantially. By doing so, a lot of people in the economy were paying taxes when probably they had not before. If the New Zealand government was highly successful with its transfer, why could we not have taken a cue from it when we were trying to put in the GST.

Basically the whole situation rested upon the fact that the government decided to put tax over tax. Therefore, we are left with a situation where not only are we saturated, but we have signs of a tax revolt on our hands. Of course, the government will not admit it. The figures are there. We know that taxes, direct or indirect, have been put on the Canadian people in the last years. It has been detrimental.

I am not saying that the government is totally responsible. For the last 10 or 15 years we have needed a profound tax reform which we have not had. We have an elite in this country which dictates to our governments. It literally dictates to our governments.

If there is something that is fundamental in a democracy, it is the way we tax our people. Yet we are going along half baked. No research has been done, no political will has been put into our tax system to make sure that it is fair and equitable. How many Canadians feel that the tax system in this country is fair and equitable? None.

• (2000)

We have a gentleman over there. Thank God I do not know your riding and your name because your electors would certainly be on your back. You had better listen to your electors more often.

Mr. Sobeski: Tell them that you want to tax food like New Zealand. Tell us about the New Zealand tax on food.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, we will excuse him for his ignorance.

[Translation]

As I said, one of the most fundamental elements in a democracy is the way people are taxed. For years, not since this government has been in power, but for at least 10 or 15 years there has been a need for a comprehensive reform of our tax system.

We have a tax system which has become utterly inequitable and unfair. It does not take a degree in economics to realize that changes are imperative. Everywhere in our country people complain that the tax burden has become intolerable, that they have less and less leeway. The middle class is the backbone of a society. If the middle class is overtaxed, how the economy could be sound and progressive? It is impossible.

The goal of the motion that I introduce tonight—and I really do not expect the change to come tomorrow—is that we recognize at least the need for a reform. We must repeat it because the financial elite of our country tells us that everything is as fine as it can be, but it is far from true. If anybody should be knowledgeable in Canada, it is we, because we represent these taxpayers and we are very much aware that they cannot take it any more.

No matter what political party we represent in this House, we are at the limit. People have had enough of the tax system and they want us to have the political will, the courage and the honesty to say: "We want a comprehensive reform of our tax system." If we, who represent the people, are not in a position to recognize the needs and real interests of all Canadians, what exactly is our role in this House?

Are we speaking on behalf of the financial elite in this House, or are we speaking for all Canadians, especially the middle class, the backbone of our society? These are the things we should be discussing among ourselves. We have to recognize that it is essential for Canadians that we bring about a reform. It will never be said often enough.

If the decision makers in the government do not listen to those who represente the nation's 295 ridings, what hope can there be?

With this motion, we hope to start a discussion that will keep on growing. We also want to make sure that all the financial and even the social organizations will recognize the need and that they will keep pressuring those who represent them in this House, to let them know that it is time to consider the interests of all Canadians.

[English]

In conclusion, I am amazed sometimes to see the reaction of some of my colleagues across the way. They cannot make me believe that the people in their constituencies do not want to see a reform of the tax system, that they feel it is no longer fair and equitable.

We are not spokesmen here for the financial elite in this country. We are the spokesmen for all Canadians and especially the middle class, which is the backbone of this society. If we cannot have the political courage or the honesty to reflect what the people in this country want from us, what hope is there?

I would like to know where the hope is going to be for the rest of the Canadian people in this country. If there is anything more fundamental in a democracy than the tax system, you tell me what. There are probably two great priorities in this country; the constitutional political issue and the financial problem that we have. Unless we can face up to it there is no hope.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if my time has expired, but I would ask you to give me a few minutes to sum up.

I think my colleagues opposite should go back to their ridings and poll their constituents. I do not have to tell them what to say; they know. But each and every one of us has a duty to fulfil here. Whatever party we represent in this House, we have individual obligations, and that is to reflect the concerns, especially the material concerns, of Canadians.

That is why I want all Canadians to put pressure on or seek the support of the member who represents them in this House to express their points of view. Together we could convince the government's mandarins, if you like, and say: Listen, we are not asking for miraculous changes, we are asking for a reform of our taxation system. It would be a first step. I am convinced that as soon as we consider a true reform of our taxation system, it will be a sign that we acknowledge the problem we are facing and that we have the courage and the political will to solve it.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit I prepared a speech to respond to my colleague, but, after hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, I must say he is right on two points. First, when he mentions—

Mr. Assad: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre on a point of order.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I think that under our Standing Orders there is no questions and comments period during Private Members' Business. If the hon. member wants to make a speech, let him do it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Vincent: I have a speech, Mr. Speaker, but I rather respond to the ludicrous comments of the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. So I was telling him that I agreed with him on two points. First, he mentioned that for the last 15 years we needed a tax reform in Canada. That is why we were elected in 1984. The second point, for which I will forgive my colleague, is that there was a tax reform, part I, in 1988—unfortunately, my colleague was not in this House at that time—where the personal income tax was reduced. My colleague not being here at that time, I can understand why he does not remember that.

He also talks about a fairer and more equitable system. It was the Progressive Conservative government that innovated after coming into office and that introduced a federal sales tax credit, the archaic tax that we had. It is this party and this government that introduced a tax credit. It was also the Conservative Party that took away the personal exemptions from all Canadians and replaced them with a tax credit, with the result that, before, under the Liberal regime, someone who earned $100,000 and had a personal exemption of $3,000, saved $1,500 in taxes. His neighbour, who had an income of $10,000 a year and the same personal exemption of $3,000, saved $200 or $300 in taxes. We have changed that, Mr. Speaker. Whether our income is $10,000 or $100,000, we are allowed a tax credit of $1,000 a year. It is advantageous for those on low incomes and it means as well that those who earn $100,000 a year will pay more taxes. This, Mr. Speaker, is how we make a system more fair and equitable.

• (2010)

The member spoke about tax reform. He forgot to mention his former colleague, Marc Lalonde, the Minister of Finance who, in 1984—

Mr. Della Noce: Oh, Mr. Petro-Canada.

Mr. Vincent: —created a tax credit for scientific research which, in 10 months cost Canadians, people from Trois-Rivières and Gatineau—La Lièvre ridings alike, some $10 billion. Minister Marc Lalonde made Canadians spend not $10 million but $10 billion for zilch over 10 months, one billion a month, Mr. Speaker.

That is one billion a month that the then government sent down the drain and it is this finance minister—and that was his first move—who put a stop to that scientific research tax credit which was draining the money of Canadian taxpayers.

I think that the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre has no lesson to give. He talks about the GST. I would like to correct him on a number of points.

First of all I invite him to come to my riding of Trois-Rivières and see for himself in hardware stores and the like how prices have really come down since January 1. At the drugstore, prices have gone down. You will understand that I cannot do any advertisement, but in the car industry, prices have also gone down. This is my first point.

Mr. Della Noce: And sales have gone up.

Mr. Vincent: My second point is that the federal sales tax was 65 year old; it was hidden, invisible. Everybody used to pay it without knowing it was there.

When I was a student at the University of Sherbrooke to get my Master of Arts of Taxation in 1978, there was a course specifically on the federal sales tax because of its complexity. The professor we had, a distinguished tax expert from Montreal, Mr. Normand Guérin, used to say in those days: "I hope the federal government will get rid of this sales tax which is bad for Canada, bad for the industry, bad for everybody." They were saying that back in 1978.

The Liberal Party was in power. They had been relected but they never had the courage precisely to abolish the federal sales tax which was responsible in Canada for a $9 billion loss every year in goods production. Thirty-five thousand jobs are going to be created this year because Canadian companies are going to increase their output. And why are they going to increase their output, Mr. Speaker? The reason for it is very simple: Canada was the only country in the world which still had a manufacturers' sales tax. The outcome of it was that a company from Trois-Rivières wanting to sell abroad, would go to Europe, to Japan or to the United States and it had to include in its sale price an additional 13.5 per cent due to the manufacturers' sales tax.

Often these companies could not compete internationally—

An hon. member: It's not true.

Mr. Della Noce: Of course it's true.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I have been polite and I have listened to my colleague. Perhaps he could do the same. At least be polite.

Mr. Della Noce: Liberals don't know the meaning of politeness.

Mr. Wappel: It's not possible.

Mr. Vincent: It's not possible to be polite. I understand that with Liberals it's impossible to be polite.

I was saying that the company from Trois-Rivières did not have competitive prices at the international level, so it could not sell outside the country. Worse than that, the European company which came to Canada did not have a manufacturers' sales tax built in its products because there was no such tax in Europe. Consequently, products entering Canada were cheaper than Canadian products. Canadian products were more expensive because of the federal sales tax.

A major reform was needed and we have done it. The GST will make Canadian companies more competitive at home as well as on foreign markets. It means that if they produce more goods, they hire more people. It is important to emphasize that.

My colleague opposite the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, said: "Canadians are overtaxed, they cannot take any more." We agree with him on that, Mr. Speaker, but if he wants to be serious—

An hon. member: Ask him to say why they cannot take any more.

Mr. Vincent: If the Liberals really want to be serious, why do they not co-operate with the government in doing two things: first, reduce the deficit; second, stop asking for more money for new programs and for all sectors of the economy. They should stop asking the government to spend more if they really want to stop taxing Canadians, because what can the government do? It gets the money from the taxpayers and redistributes it through all kinds of programs. There has not been one day, in the seven years that I have sit in this House, that the opposition, whether it is the Liberals or the New Democrats, has not asked for more money.

Canada's credit card has been used to its limit. The banker now says: I am not lending you money any more. Start paying off your debts. You start paying off the $3 million that it costs you, every hour, in interest alone. You do that, and then you can start thinking—

Mr. Della Noce: It is the Liberal heritage.

Mr. Vincent: My colleague from Laval East is quite right: It is the Liberal heritage. Then you can start thinking about implementing new programs.

I realize that my time is up but, in concluding, I would like to invite my colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre to take note of the economic realities of Canada, and to co-operate with the government so that we can first look after the deficit. If we do that, Canadians will automatically enjoy a better quality of life.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have tonight, I am pleased to get an opportunity to speak on this motion which we can certainly support because I think for the first time in some time we actually have a truthful motion coming from the Liberals.

Part of the motion deals with the impact of the goods and services tax on Canadians, as we have learned in the last few days. It was the government's own Department of Finance which last week revealed the contents of the motion, and that is how the government either deliberately or through its usual bungling has shown that the revenues to the government under the GST are considerably higher than they were ever predicted to be.

Net GST revenues totalled $2.2 billion in the first three months of this year, 22 per cent higher than the $1.8 billion the government predicted a few months ago in the 1991 budget. Gross GST revenues, including the GST low income credit, were $2.78 billion. We can see by looking at the motion that is actually the truth of what is happening in our economy because of the goods and services tax which was brought in and rammed through this Parliament by the Conservative government. Business communities, consumers and Canadians all across the country are now facing the trouble in our economy, the recession which is being led by the policies of this government. The recession is being encouraged by the policies of this government in bringing in the goods and services tax.

We had in this House a debate about the goods and services tax, in which the then Minister of Finance said there was no other alternative, there was no other way to go, it was the GST or nothing. "Give us your alternatives", he said, "Tell us what you would do instead".

We certainly heard from the government on how it is driving Canadian consumers into the ground. We also heard from the New Democrats who presented, and we were the only party to do so in this House, a detailed alternative to the goods and services tax. We laid out the plans that we said could raise revenues for government. We could reform the manufacturers' sales tax so that government would have those revenues and be able to implement the programs that Canadians need.

• (2020)

That is why I do not think you can talk about the GST in isolation from the general taxation policies that this government has followed. If you look at some of the policies and ideas that our caucus has put forward, there is plenty of tax revenue out there. The fact is that this government and its friends from the Liberal Party over the years have failed to collect those revenues from the wealthy corporations.

A graph that was produced with the information from the government's own department is a very revealing one. It clearly shows what all Canadians know, that under the tax policies followed by the Liberals and now the Conservatives, the personal share of income tax has been rising and the corporate share has been declining.

This is a very interesting graph, as is the background material which I would be pleased to send to anyone who is watching and listening to the debate tonight.

I would like to indicate just what this impact means in a community. What does the GST mean to a community such as Prince George? The estimates tell us that the GST will mean that individual Canadians will be paying at least an extra $600 a year. People tell me that is a conservative estimate and that it is likely to be much higher. What that means for a community such as Prince George, with 70,000 people at $600 extra a year is that the Conservative Party of Canada is sucking an extra $42 million out of that community. It is no wonder people are suffering. It is no wonder that businesses in the area, as was indicated earlier this week when we had the debate on youth unemployment, are suffering. They cannot hire those extra students because of the difficulties they are having with the goods and services tax.

In my riding in a community just west of Prince George at Burns Lake there is a gentleman, Mr. Brown, who is really putting his principles on the line. I talked to him on the telephone earlier tonight. He has a small business there called Process 4 and he is not collecting GST. He is not collecting it on principle because he does not believe in the tax. He welcomes the day when the government's tax collectors get around to seeing him and take him to court because he is prepared to fight for what he believes. Not a lot of people will do that but in this case he will and I think he deserves our support for that because in fighting this tax he is certainly living by his principles.

In fact it is an anomaly. He has people who are tourists who have heard about his cause and are dropping into his store deliberately purchasing items from him because he does not charge the GST. You must know, Mr. Speaker, from your own riding, how much Canadians resent this very unfair tax. In fact it tells us that Tory times are taxing times.

I hope that in the next election campaign when the policies of our party go up against the policies of the other parties, it will be very clear to Canadians that the New Democrats stand alone among all of the parties. Even the Reformers are fudging on the GST now—they do not know whether to support it or be against it—and we are never sure where the Liberals stand.

At our recent convention in Halifax there was part of a resolution from my riding wherein we said we would abolish the GST and bring in a fair tax system. When I am back on the doorsteps in that next election campaign, whenever it is held, that is going to be a message we will take to the doorstep. My advice to Canadians from coast to coast to coast is, when those Tories phone—you know how they bother you at suppertime—to try to get you to vote for them, you should ask for your money back. Canadians should tell the Tory canvassers that they want their money back because of the unfair tax policies of this government. At the next election when the New Democrats form the government, we will bring in a fair tax system, fair to all Canadians. We will ensure the revenues are there for government so that we can have the policies and programs we need. We can do nothing more than that.

I call on the government members opposite to get up their courage and support this motion. Their government's own information tells them that the motion is true. Join with the rest of Canadians. Reject the goods and services tax and bring in a fair tax system.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this private members' debate and to speak most definitely and vehemently against the motion put by the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

I am disappointed in the motion, which suggests that government should envisage the removal of the GST and, in keeping with Liberal policy all the way along, offer no alternative.

There is no way this government or any future government is going to envisage eliminating some form of sales tax. I think we learned from the experience of the past 50 years that the old form of federal sales tax, the federal manufacturers' sales tax was fundamentally flawed, was out of step with modern society and simply had to be replaced with something more up to date. That of course was the genesis of the goods and services tax.

None of the other parties came forward with any workable or viable alternatives. The Liberal Party had nothing whatever to offer and that is still the position of the Liberal Party.

The previous speaker from the New Democratic Party said: "Well, we had all sorts of alternatives". In fairness, they did. As I recall it, flawed as the old federal manufacturers' sales tax was, as bad as it was for Canadian manufacturers, putting them at a disadvantage with imported goods, in spite of all of that and understanding that, the NDP would still have retained that out-moded, out-dated, antiquated tax. They would have brought it back to 9 per cent from 13.5 per cent.

To make up the rest of the revenue which otherwise would have been gathered by the old federal manufacturers' sales tax, the NDP would, of course, have raised other income taxes accordingly and brought back estate tax. What a wonderful thing. It was the NDP in Saskatchewan which had the last estate tax, as I recall it and finally got rid of it in 1977 because it was so grossly unpopular.

The thought that after the toils of a lifetime, after paying income tax year after year, that the bit people could accumulate would be taxed away from them upon their passing is the NDP alternative to the GST.

I am really surprised that the hon. member has brought forward this motion after all we have seen and heard over the past number of months and years with regard to sales tax. It must be that the Liberal position simply never changes.

I recall a few years ago that the then finance critic for the Liberal Party, I believe it was the member for Etobicoke North, was dismissed from his position as the finance critic for the Liberal Party because he spoke the truth. He came forward with an honest assessment when he said: "Of course the deficit is a problem. Of course the deficit that we Liberals created over the last 20 years, the national debt, has to be addressed". He went on to say that there had to be reform of sales tax. For that and some other honest transgressions he was dismissed from his position.

It is interesting to note that the party's associate finance critic today, the member for Ottawa South, is quoted in The Toronto Star. We all know that if it is in The Toronto Star it certainly must be gospel, so I will not hestiate to repeat it here.

• (2030)

The current associate finance critic of the hon. member's Liberal Party says the Liberals have simply avoided the question of the deficit, simply accusing the government of mismanaging the nation's finances, but not saying what they would do themselves.

The party's associate finance critic, the member for Ottawa South, says this may work for an opposition party, but it will not convince Canadians that Liberals are capable of governing. He urged his colleagues to make the transition. That was a day or two ago, and it is unfortunate that the member who put the motion that we are now debating did not hear that, because the proposal makes a whole lot of sense.

Unfortunately, the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lievre has fallen into the old Liberal position of ignoring reality. Just do away with the GST, he says, we will not worry about $18 billion or $20 billion of revenue, and we have no alternative. We will just borrow some more. No problem. Perhaps by the end of the decade we will reach the point when every cent of government revenue will have to go to pay interest on the debt. There will not be anything left for the needed programs of government.

That will not matter, because maybe we can put a second mortgage and a third mortgage on the future of this country. That is the bankrupt position of the Liberals. It has been for the past 20 years. That kind of approach saddled us with a massive national debt. The interest charges on that debt are crippling the ability of the nation today and they offer more of the same.

I find that the position put by the hon. member in this private member's motion is certainly out of touch with reality. I was amazed when, and I believe I am quoting him correctly; he chastised this government for lacking the political courage and honesty to reflect what people want.

What an amazing statement, because time and time again people have indicated that they want to see the deficit dealt with. They view that as the number one problem in the country. They want that deficit brought down and they want it eliminated.

How on earth can you do that? How can you reduce the deficit unless you take in more revenue on the one side and either hold or cut spending on the other? Clearly those are the alternatives.

The answer from the hon. member and his party opposite is: "Well, no tax increases." He is going to get rid of the GST, put nothing in its place, lose $18 billion or $20 billion worth of revenue and at the same time, day after day in this House, he and his party oppose every single government proposal to reduce spending.

It seems to me that if we are talking about having the political courage and honesty to face up to the problem, the debt which the Liberal Party created during the Trudeau years and the interest which has to be paid on it, we have to cut spending on the one side and take in more revenue on the other. There is no alternative to it.

The only fleeting or passing alternative is to continue to borrow. That is the Liberal way. You just continue to mortgage tomorrow to pay for today's programs. That is out. I think everyone in the country realizes that is not on anymore.

It is pretty clear to most people that the GST had to come forward. It would be nothing less than irresponsible to consider removing the GST at this point. The amazing thing is to offer nothing in its place. That is incredible. Canada waited for 50 years for sales tax reform. Members opposite and everyone in this House knows that sales tax reform was first proposed back in, I believe, 1940 by the Rowell–Sirois commission. The federal manufacturers' sales tax at that time had been in place for about 15 years. Even then, 50 years ago, it was obvious that it penalized Canadian manufacturers and created problems in that sector. So it was recommended that there be changes.

Subsequent commissions, inquiries and experts for 50 years recommended that something be done. Successive governments looked at this thing and occasionally they came to the brink. The Liberal Party, the Liberal government of those days came to the brink a few times, but lacking the political courage and honesty which the hon. member proposed this motion talks about, it would back off and resort instead to the easy way of borrowing.

Just borrow some more and put out the programs for people. We will not face them with the necessary tax measures in order to pay the bills. No, no, we will borrow. We will mortgage tomorrow to pay for these programs today.

That is the tragedy. That is why our government finally came forward, faced the facts and accepted the recommendations that have been suggested for over half a century, fell in line with modern society, with 48 other nations, with 19 out of 24 of our partners in the OECD and with most of the industrialized nations of the world and introduced a value added form of sales tax to replace the antiquated tax that we had.

Time will show that this was the appropriate measure. It will expand Canada's manufacturing base. It will expand Canada's industrial capability. It will expand Canada's exports and it will place our manufacturers on a level playing field with their competition. Canada depends on world trade.

I see that you are indicating that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I just want to finish by saying that Canada depends very much on world trade. One out of every three jobs in this country depends on it. This is but one of a number of steps, including liberalized trade negotiations with other nations and with the United States, that we have embarked upon in an effort to to have a more competitive approach for our country leading to more employment for Canadians and a better future for our kids. That is what the GST is all about.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I think we have advised the Chair that I will be splitting the 10 minutes that we have allotted with my hon. colleague from Winnipeg.

May I begin by congratulating my colleague for bringing forward this motion. In the five short minutes that I have I want to make a few points, but I cannot begin without at least responding briefly to some of the comments that were made by my friends opposite.

I want to deal not with fiction, not with fantasy, not with fairy tales, but with facts.

The hon. parliamentary secretary had the audacity to say that this government has brought in fair taxation. In my view that is not a fact.

It is a fact that there have been at least 33 separate tax increases since 1984. It is a fact that the average middle income person in this country is presently paying approximately $1,500 a year more in tax than they were in 1984. It is a fact that, during that period of time, while the middle income Canadian has been paying more tax, the high income Canadian has been paying less tax. That, in my view and I would suggest in the view of many Canadians, is not fair taxation.

The parliamentary secretary indicated that there was a major problem with our exporters because of the manufacturers' sales tax. That is also not a fact.

The fact is that exports and exporters were exempted from the manufacturers' sales tax for the most part, except for fixed assets. This was a fiction in effect brought in to justify the scrapping of the manufacturers' sales tax. There is no question the manufacturers' sales tax needed revision, no doubt about that. Let us talk about facts and not about fantasy.

The hon. parliamentary secretary said that the hardware stores in Trois-Rivières immediately started to reduce their prices on January 1. I was not there, but I can tell the hon. member that I was in Prince Albert at approximately that time. I was told by not one, but two hardware store owners that they had absolutely no intention whatsoever of going through 10,000 items in their hardware stores and changing the prices, despite the fact that they would not have to pay the manufacturers' sales tax and would get an exemption. In fact, their prices did not go down. They may have remained the same, but they did not go down.

I have a great deal of difficulty in believing that if that is what occurred in Prince Albert, it did not occur in Trois-Rivières.

What about the effects of the goods and services tax? There is no doubt whatsoever that the government did not anticipate a lot of the problems that the goods and services tax introduced.

I want to raise one of them. It is that the goods and services tax was not supposed to tax necessary items, but if there is one thing that is necessary—and I raise this in all sincerity—it is feminine hygiene products. They are not a luxury. They are a necessity and this government chose to tax them. That is an abomination. When I was official opposition critic for revenue I got many letters from constituents and from female Canadians across this country complaining about this. Members on that side have brought this to the government's attention. So far I have not heard an iota of sympathy for female Canadians. It does not care.

What about the rest of the goods and services tax? The proposition was that the goods and services tax would reduce the debt. That is also nonsense because when the goods and services tax was brought in, there was not a word about a debt reduction fund. In all of the previous budgets that the Minister of Finance had, there was not a word about the debt reduction fund. But the government finally realized what a cash cow the goods and services tax would be. It knew that Canadians were up in arms to the tune of 80 per cent to 85 per cent against the services tax, so it said: "Oh, oh, we had better do something", and it came up with this so-called debt reduction fund.

How do I know this? How do I know that this was a last minute thing? Because I got a letter today from the Minister of Supply and Services suggesting that we as members of Parliament respond to our constituents in a certain way. The first thing he says is: "What about the debt reduction fund?" He admits that it was mentioned in the February budget of 1991 and the legislation is not ready yet.

Of course it is not ready yet because it was not even thought of until the last minute to try and save this government from absolute and certain defeat at the polls on this issue and many other issues.

Let us talk about facts and let us not talk about fiction. There is no question that everybody wants the debt reduced, and I for one applaud that if we are going to have this onerous tax, totally contrary to the will of Canadians, at least we should have a debt reduction fund and it should go to reduce the debt, not go into the consolidated revenue fund to be spent by this government any way it sees fit. At least I applaud that much for this government.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I hope I get my full five minutes.

I want to say at the outset that this is a timely bill and a timely debate. I want to thank my hon. colleague for Gatineau—La Lièvre for bringing forward the bill. I congratulate him on a fine presentation.

The goods and services tax is a very cruel measure. Consider when it was brought in, at a time of high taxation. We all know about this government imposing something like 33 tax increases since it came to power in 1984. We all know that since 1984, since the Conservative government came to power, that the income tax burden, the income tax load on the middle class has gone up $1,500 per family. That is why it is a cruel measure and that is why people are as mad as hell and they are not going to take it any more, to use a well-known cliché.

Another reason why this tax measure is cruel is because when it was brought in, it could not have been brought in at a worse time. It was at a time when the economy was going down and into a recession. Despite all the warnings from us, despite all the warnings from Canadians, the government went ahead and imposed this goods and services tax. That is how much it listened to Canadians and that is how much it is out of tune and out touch with Canadians. This is why I say it was a cruel, cruel measure.

The other thing, and this is why Canadians are so mad, is they feel that they have been had and that they have been betrayed. The Conservative members went around and said first of all that it was going to be neutral and then it was going to get a little bit of extra money but not a whole lot, and if there was some extra money, they would decide later what to do with it.

We hear the story that tracking shows they are getting something like $400 million more in the first quarter than expected and anticipated. The finance minister has the unmitigated gall to say that he is surprised. Tell me another one. If you can believe that, you can believe anything. It is not surprised. It knew in advance that it was going to get that kind of money. It knew in advance that it was an absolute cash cow.

Canadians are upset because the Conservatives promised us tax reform. Back in 1984, they promised us tax reform, and what did we get? All we got were tax forms that are even more complicated, not less complicated and higher taxes. That is an example of tax reform.

Let me just finish on a positive note. I cannot stand here and not offer some kind of alternative to the GST. This GST is not working. It is cruel, and Canadians want it to go.

We do have to look at the taxation system. People are very upset. They are paying too much. They are voting with their feet right now. That is why they are going to the border states. That is why they are crossing the boundary line.

Every time they go across the boundary line into the United States and buy something, they are telling those guys over there that taxes are too high, that the tax system in this country has to be overhauled.

I believe to my very core that the tax system in this country has to be overhauled. It has to be made more equitable. It has to be made more fair.

That is a pledge I make, and I think I can speak very fairly on behalf of everybody on this side. We know that the tax system is not fair. It must be overhauled. By golly, we are committed to it.

This tax is unfair. Canadians do not want it. They are telling Conservatives that over and over. Not only are they telling them with their feet as they go across the border to buy goods in the States, but they are also telling the Conservatives in the polls.

That is why they are down at 14 per cent. That is why they are going down to 10 per cent. Maybe they will even go out of sight. It is because of this darn tax system that they are using to beat us over the head.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That this House affirm that Ministers are indivudually and collectively responsible to the House of Commons for the activities of government including the management and conduct of the Public Service; that, individually, Ministers are responsible for the administration of the decisions of the governement and the activities of public servants falling under their jurisdiction; and that, collectively, they are responsible for the decisions of the government as a whole and the activities of their colleagues.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre), concerning the business of Supply.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

BILL C-9

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE F

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the report of the Legislative Committee F on Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime without amendment.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-22, an Act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say that that bill has a Royal recommendation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That bill has a Royal recommendation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition today signed by people of my riding and the adjacent riding of St. Catharines which has to do with Marie Curie.

It states in the citation that, "We believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized by Canada". I wholeheartedly concur with this petition and would ask the government to consider this petition in its deliberations.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Val-des-Monts, the Magdalen Islands, and other petitioners.

Your petitioners ask the government to reject wage controls and reaffirm its support for the exercise of bargaining rights by all Canadian workers.

EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a participant in an education initiative, I received an extraordinary response from petitioners across Canada.

Your petitioners argue that Canada wants to remain competitive on the international scene and maintain its status as a top-ranking nation and that Canada wants to reduce its functional illiteracy rate, which now stands at 38 per cent, in order to provide better training for its workers.

Wherefore, Mr. Speaker, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge this government to promote and encourage national standards for education, in consultation with provincial and territorial governments, education professionals, employers and workers, parents, young people, volunteer organizations and ordinary citizens.

Mr. Speaker, these petitioners, whom I have the honour to represent and on whose behalf I have tabled these petitions come from Quebec and Ontario, and in the latter province from Nepean, Ottawa Centre, Orléans and Gloucester.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to rise and present a petition today from people from Inuvik in the Northwest Territories, from Prince Rupert, B.C., Penticton, B.C., North Vancouver, Vancouver, Kelowna, and from Westbank, B.C., all objecting to the government's plans to introduce a wage freeze for its workers. They point out that such a wage freeze is an unwarranted interference with the collective bargaining rights of all workers across Canada. They believe the responsibility for inflation lies with the government's high interest rate, high dollar policies, and 33 new tax increases and not with runaway wage demands by workers from all parts of Canada. They also believe taking purchasing power out of the hands of consumers only deepens and prolongs the recession.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions I would like to present to the House today. They have both been certified by the Clerk under Standing Order 36. They are all okay.

The first petition is a very important one about RCMP services throughout the country.

The petitioners call on the government to ensure that there is proper funding for the RCMP. We know that a reprieve has been given on this for a year. We are thankful for that. Of course, it is most important that this government treat the RCMP importantly and provide the proper funding in British Columbia in particular, as represented by the NDP caucus there.

Supply

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is one related to VIA Rail.

It is part of the New Democrat's "get Canada back on track" with proper VIA Rail service. It is particularly important in northern B.C., given the decision to come from the government on the future of remote services.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Merritt, British Columbia; Hepler Creek, British Columbia; Savona, British Columbia; Vernon, Pritchard and Kamloops who again, as my colleague has indicated, are concerned that the government may be cutting back on RCMP funding.

As a result, they are concerned that this will add a considerable tax burden onto the municipal taxpayers. In the city of Kamloops, it would result in an additional $500,000.

The petitioners are asking the federal government to maintain its present level of funding in order to ensure a viable police force in our British Columbia communities.

Also, Mr. Speaker, as you would appreciate, the petitioners want a viable Canadian symbol of unity.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 33.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Starred question No. 33. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

*Question No. 33—Mr. Gauthier:

Does the Government of Canada intend to regulate the language of work and equitable participation as the Official Languages Act empowers it to do, and, if so, when?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)):

—The power to make regulations in matters of language of work and equitable participation was included in the Official Languages Act only for use in the case of demonstrated need to clarify these obligations in law.

—Key obligations and commitments are already set out in the Act as well as in longstanding government policies.

—We will of course continue to examine on an ongoing basis the issues related to language of work and participation and revise policies and guidelines as required.

[English]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1991-92

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since today is the final allotted day for the supply period ending June 30, 1991, pursuant to order made Thursday, May 23, 1991, the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill in view of recent practices. Do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 1 in the amount of $30,645,000, under Parliament—the Senate—Program Expenditures in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to seek concurrence for the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year 1991–1992.

The Main Estimates total $158 billion. Through these estimates, the government is seeking Parliament's approval for $47 billion in new spending authority. The remaining $111 billion represents the statutory payments that have been previously approved by Parliament. These main estimates reflect our continuing commitment to control the spending and contain the cost of government.

Since taking office in 1984, this government has given high priority to reducing the cost of government operations, while still providing Canadians with programs and services they need.

This indicates our commitment to good management and to the careful stewardship of the taxpayers' dollar. In this regard, much has been achieved over the past six years.

Annual growth in program spending has been reduced on average to 3.7 per cent between 1984–85 and 1990–91.

• (1050)

Annual growth in operating and capital spending, including public service salaries has dropped to an average of 3.3 per cent, which is well below the annual rate of inflation.

The public service has been reduced since 1984–85 to roughly the same size as it was in the mid–1970s. These achievements show the government's commitment to increased efficiency through the rigorous control of expenditures as well as the implementation of innovative management practices.

Mr. Speaker, our record is one of success and we are confident that we are on the right track.

Growth in the Main Estimates is the outcome of a number of decisions affecting the budgets of all 142 programs delivered through 118 departments, agencies and Crown corporations appearing in the estimates. This growth can be divided into two broad categories: adjustment of statutory items, which amount to $7.2 billion and changes to the voted items, which amount to $2.7 billion. Therefore, only 27 per cent of the growth in the Main Estimates relates to voted items.

These estimates fully reflect the second–year impact of the expenditure control program announced by the Minister of Finance in his February, 1990 budget and the 1991–92 expenditure savings flowing from the expenditure reduction and management improvement measures announced by the former President of the Treasury Board in December, 1989.

Had it not been for these measures, the 1991–92 main estimates would be higher by some $2.7 billion. Again, these changes demonstrate the government's commitment to restraint and economic recovery.

In his budget speech of last February, our hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, set forth a strategy for economic recovery. The strategy is designed to put the recession behind us and to move forward to continuing growth and renewed prosperity. Part of that strategy involves putting government finances firmly on the course towards a balanced budget. We are removing the build–up of the public debt as a source of inflationary concern.

In order to do this, the expenditure control plan announced in the 1990 budget is to be extended for three years, to 1994–95. The government is legislating mandatory program spending limits. This should provide Canadians with greater assurance that program spending will be managed within the fiscal framework.

We are establishing a debt servicing and reduction fund—and that was introduced yesterday in the House—solely dedicated to offsetting the costs of the public debt. By law, all revenues from the goods and services tax and from privatization will flow into the debt servicing and reduction fund.

In his budget, the Minister of Finance also announced a number of reforms intended to bring about both immediate savings and lasting efficiencies in government programs and services.

Apart from the measures I have just mentioned, the government is imposing tight controls on the cost of government operations, which are expected to produce a savings of nearly $870 million in the current fiscal year. Over the five-year planning period to 1995-96, cumulative savings will amount to over $5.2 billion.

The budget also contains measures that, beginning in the 1991-92 year, will restrain spending on programs and operations of federal departments and agencies.

First, over-all spending on operating and capital for existing programs will be effectively frozen to the 1990-91 level. This will be accomplished by a 3 per cent cut in the Main Estimates in the operating as well as the capital budgets of each department. We have frozen departmental salary budgets for 1991-92 and we have just recently advised the public service union leaders that we have lost the flexibility to negotiate any wage increase this year.

Second, the government will reduce the cost of grants and contributions by $75 million. The Hon. Harvie Andre, the government House leader, has met with his colleagues and discussed how these reductions can best be achieved.

Third, the government will streamline its operations by reducing the number of its executives by ten per cent. This reduction is being achieved through a government-wide program aimed at decreasing to three the number of levels of executives below the deputy minister. This will streamline departmental operations, reduce costs, improve the speed of decision-making and generally increase the authority given to public service employees in the regions and at the point of service delivery.

These three measures alone will generate savings of $760 million. These savings enable us to ease the pressure on essential programs and services. The battle to bring down the deficit continues, however, as does our search for ways to deliver programs and services better and more efficiently.

So, Mr. Speaker, innovative management practices will remain a priority for this government. The government has been increasing its effort to extend user charges within the principle of fairness and equity. Through these efforts, the burden of financing activities that provide benefits to specific users is being shifted more towards those users and away from taxpayers generally.

Revenues from external user fees now exceed $3 billion, which is more than double the 1984-85 levels. The government is continuing to seek out new areas where the application of user fees is appropriate. This program promotes greater management discipline and operational efficiencies, since market forces are brought to bear on both the demand for and the supply of services.

The government believes that many services and functions are best carried out by public service employees. However, to provide a full range of options for delivering services to the Canadian people, certain functions are better done through contracting out where this is in the public interest, either in terms of cost, efficiency or quality of service.

Special operating agencies continue to be a viable mechanism for improving the delivery of public services and providing good value for the taxpayer's dollar. Over the past year we have established five agencies, among them the passport office, which have had positive results. Six more agencies have been announced through these Main Estimates including the Canadian General Standards Board and the Canadian Conservation Institute. More candidates will be identified in the coming year with a strong emphasis on organizations that directly serve the public, where the potential for improvement is greater.

Privatization will remain a key priority. The government's program has already devolved more than 18 Crown corporations and other corporate holdings to the private sector and other levels of government. The government will privatize CN Exploration, an oil and gas company, and will wind up Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration. These measures reinforce the consistent action the government has taken since 1984 to control the cost of government operations. They are also expected to engender considerable changes in the way departments and agencies do business—that is, in the nature and type of resources used as inputs, in the technology applied and in the organization and methods of program delivery.

The Main Estimates you have before you are those of a government serious about restraint and serious about reform. We are determined to cut expenditures and to organize and operate government operations in a manner that suits the real needs of Canadians.

I note that one of the motions today, Mr. Speaker, is about the Senate. I don't know where the New Democratic Party stands on the Senate. I hope the hon. member for Kamloops will enlighten us, but it has always been my understanding that they have wanted to dispose of the Senate, to get rid of it.

• (1100)

Now we hear them saying— if I believe what I read in the newspapers—that maybe they do not want to get rid of the Senate; maybe they want the Senate to stay as one of the institutions of government in this country. If that is the case, I hope the hon. member will enlighten us and explain to us why they have had this change of heart. Since I have been here, and it has been a few years now, they have always believed that the objective of the New Democratic Party was to eliminate and abolish the Senate.

In that vein, I do not think any of them, or very many of them, have ever taken an appointment. We can speculate now that perhaps the New Democratic Party is hoping that somewhere down the line it will be able to take some of its senior and long serving members and appoint them to the Senate. I look forward to comments from the hon. member for Kamloops as to what the intentions of his party are.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, let me make the point very clearly to my hon. friend from Burlington—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there are no questions or comments, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: I appreciate the co-operation of my hon. colleagues to permit me to get to an important committee meeting. Let me say right from the outset to my hon. friend from Burlington that I consider the existing Senate of Canada to be a parliamentary obscenity.

I believe that the present Senate is undemocratic and has no place in a modern democracy. We have been on record since day one. I must say we have never accepted one of those obscene appointments as members of the New Democratic Party. We will not accept becoming some appointed hack, a bagman, or some kind of political flack to the Senate. The New Democratic Party will not accept an appointment to an obscene institution in our democratic parliamentary system. I think that makes our position relatively clear.

I want to say that my hon. friend from Burlington was pointing out ways that the government was hoping to save money. Let me give him an excellent way to save money. That is why I propose this motion that we save ourselves $30,645,000 by cutting out the operating funds for the Senate of Canada.

Some people might say: "Well, listen, those folks over there do a fair bit of work, don't they?" I am going to share with you some information which I think will make any decent Canadian sick. Is the Senate working? Are the senators working on our behalf, on behalf of the citizens of Canada now?

During the month of February the Senate sat for a total of nine hours and five minutes. All month long the House of Commons is sitting day after day after day. The committees are meeting day after day, and the Senate manages to sit for nine hours and five minutes.

On top of that, this is the same group of people who wanted to get themselves $153 a day bonus to show up to work in the Senate. They would not make much money considering how often the Senate even comes together.

I want to say that during January it was even worse. Some days it met for one hour. Another day it met for an hour and 40 minutes. That was a pretty major working day. Then in March the Senate sat for a total of 12 hours and 40 minutes. In April it sat for a total of 12 hours and 40 minutes again and in May it sat for a total of 15 hours and 50 minutes.

In other words, what most people would do in an average working week, the Senate took four months to accomplish. This is, as I say, a parliamentary obscenity. This is wrong. This is an abuse of the parliamentary system. This is undemocratic.

My hon. friend made some cynical comments about what he thought might be our position. This comment is from the member of a government that appointed eight more senators. It had too many senators, and the government said that in order to jam legislation through the Senate that the majority of Canadians oppose, it was going to have to do something never done before in parliamentary history. It was going to add eight new Tory appointments. It found some flacks out there who had been long-standing members of the Conservative Party and gave them, if you like—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I just must bring to the attention of the hon. member that whatever he may think, we still do have respect for the other place. I ask him to be very careful on how he expresses his views with regards to the other place. I would just like to bring that to his attention, and I think he understands what I mean.

Mr. Riis: Respect for the other place. From my comments, Mr. Speaker, it would almost reflect that I do not have respect for the other place, but technically speaking I suppose I have to say that I respect the Upper House, the Senate, the other place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Let me just bring to the hon. member's attention, who has been here for a long time now, that the word obscene, for example, with reference to the other place, is unparliamentary. If he wants to refer to rules of debate on Beauchesne's, page 112, he can see that for himself. But I would like him to make sure that he does have a little respect for those who are in the other place because I do not think they talk like that about us here in our Chamber.

Mr. Riis: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the ruling from Beauchesne's would read that you cannot refer to an hon. member as being obscene. I am talking about an institution that I consider to be obscene. I think, in terms of parliamentary procedures, that is appropriate.

If this is offensive to some people I can think of better words or other words.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who presently has the floor would check, I am sure he would find not only in Beauchesne's, but in Erskine May, in the Standing Orders of this place and in every other legislature in Canada, that it is not just a custom but written in the rules that you not make disparaging remarks in any way about the other place so referred to or about the judiciary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think I should go any further than that. The hon. member for Kamloops understands clearly. The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. Riis: I am just absolutely amazed, Mr. Speaker. We have the Liberals trying to justify their Senate appointments which are equally unacceptable.

Some hon. members: Just follow the rules of the House.

Mr. Riis: The rules? Listen, Mr. Speaker, the people who are suggesting that I should be following the rules are the people who abuse the rules often in this House.

Some hon. members: Who?

Mr. Riis: I am talking about the people opposite who from time to time have traded a new phenomenon and broken every tradition and every regulation that we have ever had in this House. All of a sudden I cannot refer and I cannot break any traditions.

Out of respect for this institution, I am not going to refer, as I did earlier, to the Senate in ways that reflect my views, but I simply want to say that the present government, naming eight extra senators, breaking long-standing conventions in terms of behaviour—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will just bring it to the hon. member's attention one more time. I do not want to be argumentative with the hon. member, but I would just like to refer to our new Standing Orders, Chapter II, Standing Order 18:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof. No Member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Mr. Riis: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I will follow the rules, but I will tell you I do not do it very enthusiastically. My views of that institution are well known and perhaps I do not have to reiterate.

Mr. Darling: Why repeat them?

Mr. Riis: "Why repeat them", my hon friend says. It is because I do not think he understands just what is going on over there. He is prepared to continue to shovel out millions and millions and tens of millions of taxpayers' dollars to keep that very gracious and appropriate and historic institution as it is. Well I say it is wrong. I say it is a waste of taxpayers' money and I bet if you went out across Canada and asked all 26 million Canadians, with the exception of about 112, that people would be in favour of disbanding the Senate in its present form. That is what I am suggesting in this motion.

Mr. Mills: They would like to ban us too.

Mr. Riis: "They would like to ban us too, my hon. friend from Toronto says".

I want to point out that with the senators working as I have indicated, nine hours in February, twelve hours in March, twelve hours in April and fifteen hours in May, it comes to about $2,425 a minute. I ask myself what we get out of the Senate. What do we get from the Senate? Do they criticize appropriate bills and so on? No, I do not think so.

• (1110)

An hon. member: They play with kazoos.

Mr. Riis: That is right. They blow kazoos and do all kinds of interesting things.

Is it worth $2,425 a minute? I say no. My party says no. That is why we put forward this motion—and we will ask hon. members to vote on this shortly—to remove from the act granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1992. We are suggesting that we reduce this particular bill by $30,000,645 so that the senators will not have any operating funds. That will send a pretty clear message as to what we in this House think of the other place.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, to me as one of those 26 million Canadians, this is news that the NDP is now viewing the Senate with this incredible eye and with this incredible vision.

As the hon. member was attacking the Senate and attacking the waste of time that happens in the Senate, I tend to agree with him. Also at the same time I would like to see the hon. member looking at this House and the waste of time that happens in this House from time to time, from both sides of the House, the government side as well as the opposition side.

To talk about accepting an appointment to an elected body, I thought the hon. member probably would not even raise this question, especially in light of the latest array of appointments that was given to members on both sides of the House, or to members who were in this House before and are now enjoying some high-profile appointments on different boards and agencies.

That is not to suggest that we do not have fine people in the Senate. We do have some of the finest people in our Senate who have served their duties both in the communities and in this House.

Therefore, I do not think it is fair to attack the Senate and attack the credibility of the Senate in terms of the quality of the people serving there. I think if we are to look at the issue, we should look at the system as a whole.

It has been echoed by the Leader of the Opposition. As well members of the NDP have been calling for an elected Senate for some time. I understand that now the government is addressing the question of an elected Senate. I think we should be moving forward in that direction. I do not think it will serve this House or the Senate to attack the credibility of the people who are there, although in every apple tree there are some defective apples. I think you will find that in every segment of our society. If there are those who are not effective in the Senate or in the House or on any other board, I think only time will tell and their term will come to an end.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member for at least addressing the issue, though I disagree with certain aspects of his presentation. I would hope that this opportunity will be taken by the government as well as the opposition to start bulldozing it through with reforms, in particular of the Senate and also of the House of Commons.

I want to take this opportunity to say how disappointed I was when yesterday I read in the newspapers, of the past few weeks the major assault that was going on against our senior public servants.

I will close very shortly. If there is any reform, that is the area we should reform. There is no minister, no member of this House, no elected official anywhere in either House who has the right to attack public servants. These people serve this community extremely well, and they are not and should not ever be again subjected to this assault.

I think that applies to all sides of the House, and we have all participated in this assault on our senior public servants. I just want to end by asking my colleague whether there is a change in terms of policy vis-à-vis the NDP views of appointment to boards and agencies or whether it has singled out the Senate in particular.

Mr. Riis: The motion singles out the Senate. I do not have a chance to talk about other appointments. I am not suggesting that no one should ever be appointed to any hard working contributory board; I am just saying that the Senate does not contribute anything to Canada.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I understood the hon. member for Kamloops, he was not taking a shot at the senators in a personal way. He was talking about the fact that there may be room here to eliminate some waste in terms of the money that is being spent.

Of course, with that concern for waste right now when everybody in the country is going through reorganization, there is no way we can exempt either House from that process of review.

I think he should also pass on these words of watching for waste or spending money that is not necessarily needed or that could be used more wisely. I think he should also pass on this concern to his friends and fellow NDP colleagues in the province of Ontario. We do not want a situation to creep into the province of Ontario. It can creep into anyone who has been around for a long time. Already, and we are not even talking a year, just this week it was announced that our premier, for whom intellectually I have a lot of respect, got a Question Period preparation team. They have calculated with this new budget he has acquired that it costs the taxpayers of Ontario close to $1,000 to prepare him for every question that we ask him.

Therefore, I think that yes, we have to eliminate waste in the Senate here. However, I think wherever we have friends in government right now we have to pass on that message I think Canadian taxpayers are equally concerned about all levels of government and the way we handle their money.

Mr. Riis: I appreciate the intervention by my hon. colleague. Yes, Canadians are concerned about how all levels of government are spending their tax dollars.

There is a reason for this motion today. If there is unanimity in the land on a single issue, it would be that the Senate as we know it today should be abolished. I have yet to run into a single person in my life who comes to me and says that he or she thinks the present Senate is doing a wonderful job and is worth $30 million a year in operating funds.

I have not found anybody who says the Senate is worth $2,425 a working minute. I have not found anybody. I have never in my life encountered a single person. That is why I say on this one issue that I think we can all agree the Senate as we know it today does not perform a valuable and useful function in a democratic society. As a matter of fact, it is an undemocratic society by definition.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Kamloops make the speech he did. Having heard his speeches on the subject of the Senate in this House recently, for him to have the gall to get up and make that speech has to be one of the most extraordinary performances in Canadian politics in recent years. He has shown himself to be as two-faced as one could be on this issue. The hon. member knows that. I know he wants to object to this.

An hon. member: On a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: There is no disorder here.

Mr. Breaugh: I rise on a point of order. I listened to the Chair chastise the member for Kamloops for using unparliamentary language. I would ask the Chair to listen very carefully and to read the transcripts of what the member for Kingston and the Islands has just said, and I think you will find without any question the language was out of order.

• (1120)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is well aware if he has said something that is out of order he will naturally apologize to the House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I referred to the other place as a parliamentary obscenity and I said it was an obscene institution. At that point there was an intervention that said the use of that word was unparliamentary.

I have referred to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms sixth edition and find on page 147, citation 490, that it has been ruled parliamentary to use the expression obscene.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member was getting awfully close to where he might have said something unparliamentary, and I thought I would bring it to his attention. That word at that time was fine, but under section 18, page 12, where I read the ruling, it was pretty well given an overview.

I am talking about when the hon. member started; he was getting right into condemning the other place, and I thought I would just stop him at that point. I understand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I have searched very carefully through the list of prohibited expressions in Beauchesne's and I regret to inform the hon. member for Ontario that "two-faced" is not there. I want to explain what I meant by the expression in relation to statements by the hon. member for Kamloops. He has now said he wants to get rid of the Senate and he has introduced a resolution today which will stop the payment of any money to the Senate. If by chance that is carried the Senate cannot carry on its work.

I recall not many months ago when he was urging the Senate of Canada, the other place; to use its full authority under the Constitution to block the goods and services tax.

His party, the hon. member for Kamloops claims, is committed to abolishing the Senate. How you could be more two-faced than, on the one hand, saying we want the Senate abolished and, on the other hand, saying we want the Senate to block a major piece of government legislation and urging the senators on a daily basis to block the legislation, I do not know, Mr. Speaker. It is as two-faced as—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Oshawa on a point of order.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, on a second occasion in a brief period of time you have allowed one member to accuse another member of being two-faced. If that language is appropriate in this Chamber I have no problem. I have a complete vocabulary and can use that. But in my view, having been in a parliament for some time, it is not appropriate and the Chair will know that it is context not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will naturally check Beauchesne's and Erskine May and also other parliamentary publications. I will check this out and if it is I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will come back and apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if it is unparliamentary, of course. I have checked the authorities and am satisfied from my checking of Beauchesne's that it is not. If Your Honour finds differently, of course I will respect Your Honour's view.

What I want to do is indicate the nature of that position that the New Democratic Party is putting forward. On the one hand, let us abolish the Senate; on the other hand, let us have the Senate block government bills. That is the—

Mrs. Catterall: And the trade unions asked them for it.

Mr. Milliken: Of course the trade unions supported the Senate on that. Lots of Canadians supported the Senate on that. That is why the New Democratic Party decided it better jump on the bandwagon.

Mr. Simmons: What do you call it?

Mr. Milliken: It decided it had better abandon its policy of abolition and go for supporting the Senate. When it was politically convenient to support the Senate they were in there with the best of them, harping away on how great the Senate was and how it had better block this bill. As soon as the Senate did not block it because it got stacked by a number of Tory hacks, then we were stuck with the proposition where the New Democratic Party apparently changed its tune again—at least according to the hon. member for Kamloops.

But he has been wrong on this point before and I brought him to task on it before. I pointed out that his position on abolition, which he espoused so vociferously in this House about a year and a bit ago, was not in accordance with the party's position. I have some evidence here about that. I have a newspaper article from The Toronto Star. The hon. member for Ontario must be very familiar with The Toronto Star; it is published in his part of the province.

It talks about the position the New Democratic Party was finding itself in just last week before its convention. We had the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville who was supporting the idea of a Senate and changing it around. He wanted to make the Senate an elected body but he was quite anxious that half the Senate seats be reserved for women. He was apparently chairman of some constitutional committee in the New Democratic Party, so he is something of an expert in the party on this issue, I gather. I presume he speaks with some authority—I suspect more authority than the hon. member for Kamloops who has gone on a wing and a prayer in his speeches on this subject before in this House. He has gone off the party line, with respect.

This committee submitted a report and apparently the report was prepared prior to the big pow-wow in Halifax last weekend. It says in this particular Toronto Star article that: "The committee, whose report will be considered at a party convention in Halifax this weekend, does not say whether it will be better to reform the Senate or retain the long-standing NDP promise to abolish it". In other words, they are dithering again. They are waiting to see what the Canadian people think, because if the Senate becomes popular, you-know-who will want to support the Senate. However, if the Senate stays unpopular, you-know-who will want to abolish it.

It is "sit on the fence" time, the new NDP technique. They have learned this from their colleagues in Ontario. They got elected with all these rash promises to do this and do that, but they are sitting on the fence on almost every one of them now because they know that those policies are very unpopular.

Mr. Simmons: What do you call it? The "old picket fence approach".

Mr. Milliken: It is the "old picket fence approach", as my hon. colleague suggests.

Let us hear more about this committee and what it isn't sure of. After all, this is the party that, according to its leader, the hon. member for Yukon, has become the White Knight of Canadian politics—dashing through, making decisions right, left and centre, slashing the other parties to bits. Well, we all know that is a lot of poppycock.

Here is what it says here: "There is no consensus in the party as to whether or not there should be one House of Parliament or two", the member for Yorkton—Melville told reporters. Boy, they haven't even decided on principles like that. Maybe there should be one House, maybe there should be two—maybe three. They don't seem to know. They haven't the faintest idea what to do with the Canadian Parliament. And this from a New Democratic Party that prides itself on principles. Where are the principles? What has happened to the principles?

The principle used to be that you could not have a Senate, it had to be abolished. Now, it seems to be in grave doubt. Boy, these principles are going down the tubes.

Then he says—and this is continuing to quote from the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville: "But it is probably the first time that a group in the NDP has floated the possibility of an elected Senate with certain powers".

It might be, except that at a previous convention there was discussion about this and I was able to quote for the benefit of the hon. member for Kamloops about a year and a half ago how this matter was under study as a result of some convention. I do not know what the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville is talking about, but perhaps it is the first time he had considered it.

Then he goes on with this. He said: "Proposals for a Senate with equal representation from each province are "absurd", but the committee ducked the question of just how many seats each region should have". Well, I can understand them ducking that. If they weren't prepared to go with the equal concept, they had to come up with something else, and that would be a bit difficult. You know, when you abandon principles and you have no principle to go on, how can you possibly come up with an answer to any question? We all know that the principles here were abandoned lock, stock and barrel.

I was hoping that the hon. member for Kamloops would enlighten us on what happened at the convention itself. I thought that perhaps he could tell us what happened with this committee report. But I understand that because the public opinion polls have not gone one way or the other, this issue like so many others was swept under the carpet. I think it was sent back to the committee so they could look at the issue again and come back with more.

The hon. members who are here were at the convention in Halifax. Perhaps they could enlighten us later in the day. I would be interested to know just what happened.

It is the old fifty-fifty routine, as the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood says. They really don't know what they are going to do; they are waiting to see how the polls go. If the polls go one way, the NDP undoubtedly will go with them. They are quite anxious to please the public at every turn these days, because they feel if they can please the public perhaps they can follow the example set by their colleagues in the province of Ontario and win an election.

Frankly, I do not believe that is likely. I think the New Democratic Party did better in getting its 20 per cent of the vote when it stuck to its principles, but it appears that it is willing to abandon those in a desperate bid to steal votes from the Liberal Party. I notice now that instead of us adopting their policies, which they always used to accuse us of, they are adopting our policies holus-bolus. I am delighted to see some support for many of the positions we in this party have advocated. The abandonment of the policy of nationalization of the banks, I notice, transpired in Halifax. All those socialist dogmas that have plagued the NDP since the 1930s are being washed away.

• (1130)

An hon. member: They are becoming Liberals.

Mr. Milliken: They are becoming Liberals. I am delighted to see this deathbed repentance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know whether this is going to be unparliamentary language or not. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I stirred up such a hornets' nest on my left.

I want to turn to the party across the way because after all they are the ones who are causing the real problem today and that is why we are discussing their estimates.

I sat here yesterday afternoon and listened in rapt attention to a delightful speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition on the subject of ministerial responsibility. In fact I think it could have been entitled, a speech on ministerial irresponsibility. I am sorry that the hon. member for Churchill was not here to hear the speech. He would have been entranced. It would have been an excellent lesson for him in constitutional law, which might have been helpful in this committee that I hope he is working on to try to solve the constitutional problems of the New Democratic Party.

The fact is the government got itself into a dilemma in recent weeks by its failure to deal properly with the persons working for the government and by its callous mistreatment of public servants. I think the opportunity that was presented yesterday to discuss this was a most worthwhile one. I feel that what the government is seeking to do is rewrite the rules relating to ministerial responsibility.

I note this morning the government members voted against the words taken from the Public Service 2000 report which is, after all, their statement of what ministerial responsibility means. They abandoned the concept and voted against it. This government is opposed to the notion. It is abandoning the parameters, the principles of our Constitution. The members who are supporting it should be ashamed of their conduct in supporting such an outrageous attack—and a consistent one I may say— in a pattern over the years that has helped seriously to weaken our democratic institutions.

I want to review briefly for members the list of things that I think could, at least, top the list of abuses the government has proceeded with that in my view have damaged this institution, both the Senate and the House of Commons.

I could start the list with the excessive use of closure and time allocation. We have never had a Parliament before where so much use of those tools has been made. Closure has been used 15 times now in this Parliament. That is a record. It has been a record for quite some time. I think it became a record on the seventh occasion it was used.

I do not have my list here to tell me how many times time allocation has been used, but I think it is seven or eight.

In addition, we have had unilateral rule changes imposed by closure in this House. There was negotiation on some of the points. I concede that. But on many others, the government knows that it proceeded unilaterally and against the expressed wishes of both opposition parties. Those rules were imposed through the use of closure after a very limited debate. They have restricted the rights of members of the opposition to carry on their responsibilities in this House. They have been designed to protect the government from criticism because the government, at 14 per cent in the polls, knows that it has a problem. Anything it can do to silence its critics is a blessing. That is exactly what they look for, an opportunity to silence the critics. We see exactly the same thing proceeding in the other place.

Until December of last year we had a majority that was made up of members of this party. Nothing could have been more upsetting to the government opposite than to have to face the music in the other place when bills were sent down there that were no good. The very effective Liberal majority in the Senate, which the hon. member for Kamloops now talks of in such disparaging terms, was in fact a very effective, capable debating body which gave a very sober second look at the dreadful legislation this government forced through this House. It held the legislation up to public scrutiny. It allowed the public to see how bad it was. It went on cross-country tours and heard the views of Canadians when this government ignored those views for months and months and days and days of debate in this House.

There were no months of debate, just days, but month after month in Question Period the government ignored them. The hon. member knows that. He knows what I am saying is correct. If stacking the Senate was not enough—because what they did, as we all know now, was stuff the Senate with an additional eight Conservative members so that they could obtain a working majority in the other place—they are now proceeding to change the rules of the other place. The new majority has come up with a new set of rules that will limit debate in the other place so that it will become a rubber stamp for this government's rotten policies that have done so much damage in this country.

I think it is just another shocking example of the abuse of Parliament and its traditions and its forms that this government has indulged in. First of all you stack it, then you change the rules.

Sure, I have no trouble saying it with a straight face, and the hon. member I am sure agrees with me. I am surprised that he would have voted against the doctrine of ministerial responsibility in that vote this morning. Those are words that his government put forward as their statement and yet he was there with the best of them voting against it.

I want to turn to the appointment of the privacy commissioner as another example of the abuse of the processes of this House. The law provides that in the case of certain appointments, and the privacy commissioner is one, a resolution of the House of Commons and of the Senate is required for the appointment. The Governor General in Council may appoint only after obtaining the approval of the two Houses.

What happened? The government introduced the motion to have the privacy commissioner appointed without any consultation with the opposition over the direct objection of the members of the opposition, and forced it through on a vote. In other words, there was no discussion. None of the usual parameters were followed.

The usual practice in all those appointments has been for consultation to occur between government and opposition and a consensus to be reached on the name of the nominee. Then, and only then, is the resolution normally introduced in this House, and it is normally passed then with a minimum of debate and by the unanimous agreement of all members.

No such discussions took place in this case. This was a case of a straight ram operation to jam this name through the House, a former employee of the Prime Minister rammed through the House. Favouritism and paying off debts, that is what this was. The opposition properly raised objections to this, and in the other place the matter was properly held up until once again the bully-boys from the government group forced the appointment through the Senate after the Senate had been appropriately stacked.

Then we could turn to the more recent attempts on the part of the government to change Question Period. They have decided that Question Period is the most damaging session of all for this government because there they have to stand and answer questions without notice, and they look so bad. It looked so bad just the last couple of weeks when questions have been asked on this Al-Mashat affair to see a minister of the Crown stand there and say: "I am not going to answer, Mr. Speaker. This matter is before a committee" and sit down. It is a complete abdication of their responsibility to this House.

Those ministers can answer in this House, and in case the public is in any way deceived ministers are entitled to give those answers whether or not the matter is before a committee. They have an obligation to do so, in my submission. They should have been here stating their answers in this House. They should be giving the facts to the House. Instead of that, they swept it off to a committee where they refused to allow the television cameras to go in order to ensure that the public could see how dreadfully badly these ministers have acted and how little they know about how to run their departments.

We could then also look at the fact that they introduced a motion to deem these bills to be adopted at many stages, at least in the early part of this Parliament, ones that had been discussed in the last session of this Parliament.

I spoke on that recently, about a week and a half ago, and I suggest to Your Honour that that is another case of contempt and abuse of the procedures of this House. They used a motion to reinstate five bills, and they used closure on the motion and thereby avoided the opportunity to speak and criticize the bill at each of the other stages.

Finally, there is their abdication of the doctrine of responsible government, their failure to defend the public servants who are working for them in the government where the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been trying her best to defend her former colleague who is now the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. He clearly should have said that the responsibility for the admission of Mr. Al-Mashat was his responsibility.

• (1140)

He should never have pointed a finger at any person working either in his own office or in his department. All the ministers have a collective responsibility. They cannot say that it is not their responsibility because they did not know.

There are lots of things that happen in the Government of Canada about which a minister does not know. For a minister to stand in this House and say: "I am not responsible because I did not know so-and-so or so-and-so, that person is responsible," is a complete abdication of ministerial responsibility.

It is a shocking, disgraceful way to conduct oneself. The ministers involved in this case, who in every respect may have been able to defend their actions and put up with some criticism from the public, are paid to take that kind of criticism from the public.

Instead of taking criticism they stood around and said: "Who can we blame? Who will we shuffle this off to?" They got into a little meeting. It was a star chamber court where they sat about and decided that so-and-so is guilty and so-and-so is guilty. "We will blame them and say they apologized and that will be that".

That is exactly what was done in this case. It was disgraceful. It was disgusting. Because of their conduct, all three ministers should resign immediately.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands through you, sir, that when it comes to the conduct of members of Parliament, it may well be that some of what he was saying is worthy of our consideration and reflection. It is inappropriate in the extreme for the member to believe that this is a need for change that takes place in only one political party.

I want to set before you, sir, some observations that I have made after having been here for about 17 years.

What is still, as it was when I first arrived in Parliament, a part of parliamentary rules in Beauchesne's and Erskine May today would be some of the following: In Question Period a question is not to be argumentative.

If the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands from the Official Opposition reflects upon it, has he heard an argumentative question? I believe that he has.

Questions are not to have preambles. Anybody who does an objective measure of Question Period will know that there is more preamble than there is question. These are breaches of the rules, breaches made principally by the party of the member who has just spoken.

It is inappropriate, improper and wrong according to the rules of the Table to have innuendo. I cannot remember the last Question Period where there were no examples of innuendo. People are being accused and stand almost convicted for no other reason than an accusation was made.

For the member for Kingston and the Islands to come here and somehow hold himself up in the holy sepulchre of purity and to pretend for the moment that he can condemn all others because he thinks there is some breach of the rules, when he says that we on the government side somehow are trying to change Question Period, I tell him that if he were to put all the people in Canada who believe that Question Period is an appropriate mechanism today in Prince Edward Island and all of those who think that there is something wrong and needs to be changed on Vancouver Island, Prince Edward Island would be 3,000 feet above sea level because the weight distribution would be so changed.

Canadians do not believe that Question Period is serving their needs or their aspirations as to where a country should be.

I say to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands through you, Mr. Speaker, that Erskine May says questions cannot be repetitive.

I came here when speakers used to say: "If the hon. member will check the records, he will see that that precise question was asked on Tuesday" and give some date two weeks ago. He would go on to another member. We now have Question Periods which repeat the whole question as many as five, six, seven times in a single Question Period.

The hon. member should know that any breach of rules is not a breach of rules that falls on one party, because he belongs to a party that is a principal partaker in the abrogation of the rules that have been so clearly and long established in this House. We cannot move when the mace is in motion, and yet members of Parliament here too frequently have disrespect for the mace. When the Speaker rises every member is supposed to be seated, yet often we see a Speaker rise and a member standing and the two are staring at one another. When The Speaker rises every member should be seated and there should be silence in the House of Commons.

I have spoken long enough, Mr. Speaker, and when you rise I will have to sit. But I say to the hon. member, could you answer me, in all clarity, is there not some reason for all of us to reflect on changing the rules of this House for more effective debate. It is a non-partisan issue, it is Parliament that is at stake and all of us, in the interest of our constituents in all parts of the country have a burden to make this place run better.

Mr. Milliken: I, of course, agree with that part of the hon. member's statement, Mr. Speaker. The last question he put to me of course I agree with. We all have that responsibility and we all take it very seriously.

What I do object to, and I think he should know this, first of all concerns his suggestion that somehow Question Period today is radically different. I do not believe that it is. I think Question Period was the same in 1984, 1983, 1982 and in 1981 when the party that he represents was in opposition. The New Democratic Party has been in opposition throughout that time and I do not believe its questions have materially altered in the course of the last decade or 20 years for that matter.

The hon. member thinks that maybe they have. If he looks at a recent article by Don McGillivray in, I think yesterday's, The Ottawa Citizen, he will see that on Mr. McGillivray's own checking over a 20 or 30 year period, I have forgotten how many years he went back—

An hon. member: Thirty years.

Mr. Milliken: Thirty years. He pulled out the Question Period each decade on the day and looked at what had happened and found that the pattern was very similar to what it is today. Almost all the questions were asked by the opposition. In fact, my recollection is that on two of the days every single question was asked by the opposition. We are now allowing some government questions which I think is a change. In addition to that, the questions were argumentative, they had preambles, they had innuendoes, they were partisan. All of that is part of the mix. There has been no change in that.

What has changed is the standing in the polls of this government. It has gone down to 14 per cent. So the Conservatives feel that something must be wrong with Question Period for them to be so bad, that is the fear.

I think it is wrong. I think the Conservatives should regard that and look at it very carefully and say: "Are we trying to change this for the wrong reasons?" If members look in their heart of hearts I think they will see that is exactly what is going on. They do not really care how partisan it was because they enjoyed it themselves when they were in opposition and had the opportunity to ask. They are so bad in government that they just keep slumping in the polls and Question Period does not help them get out of the slump. That is why they want to get it changed. They want more softball questions from their own members and the backbench so that the ministers can look good once in awhile when they answer a question. They do not look good when they answer our questions because most of the time they do not answer them.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I thought the member for Crowfoot would sit down when the Speaker recognized me.

What I should remind both members is that the issue before the House is the proposal by our party that the government can save on its expenditures by reducing the amount of money allocated to the Senate. It is interesting that every time we make this proposal the Liberals rush up to defend the Senate and then slam us for whatever particular reasons they can.

The reality is that a body that has worked so little over the last four months cannot be justified. The reality is, and the reason the Liberals get up and defend the Senate is, that not only has it been used for patronage, but it also provides Liberal election planning. The Liberal Party of Canada, at this time, cannot survive without the Senate because it would not have an election planning body.

If you take a look at various senators—I will not go through them name by name nor province by province—their reasons for being there are to raise funds, to organize campaigns in various provinces or to be campaign managers either at the provincial level or at the federal level.

• (1150)

I noticed that the Liberal member from Kingston and the Islands said that the NDP is always plagiarizing their ideas. He used the word "hypocrisy." I think perhaps he should look at himself. I remember reading the Liberal proposal to the Royal commission on the Elections Act. The Liberals took my private member's bill, added four words to it and pretended that it was their own legislation. He says they gave us credit. They said that we had dealt with a similar matter.

I have a proposal. I should give the member for Kingston and the Islands a chance to hear about it now so he can draft his own legislation. We are introducing changes to our definition of what election expense is, so when we do that I hope he will be ready to follow suit.

I think one of the suggestions we could make is that the cost of the Senate be divided. The Tories would allocate their senators as part of their election expenses and the Liberals would agree to count their senators because they are involved, paid for by the public, and spend full time working on elections. I think it is only fair that since they like to steal our ideas with regards to election expenses, they would voluntarily include the cost of each and every one of those Liberal senators as part of their election expenses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give the hon. member a minute to finish.

Mr. Milliken: I should hope so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, it is two minutes overtime now as far as questions and comments are concerned.

Mr. Milliken: Well, you recognized him, it wasn't my idea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the NDP as usual has put down what I think is an absolutely fascinating proposal. I want to say a few words about it and some other things in the few minutes I have at my disposal.

I want to say to my friend from Kingston and the Islands, who has great knowledge in this whole area of how Parliament functions, that I thought he over-reacted. I say to him in generosity, I thought he had over-reacted this morning to the NDP shenanigans. Surely that is all they are. They are shenanigans.

An hon. member: Now he is being parliamentary.

Mr. Simmons: The member for Oshawa talks about what is parliamentary. I thought he would have done well this morning to know the rules himself, to have realized that if he is going to get up and repeatedly interrupt what was a good speech by my friend from Kingston and the Islands, he ought to at least have a citation. He quoted no citation. The word "two-faced" is perfectly legitimate. It is also very accurate in the circumstance.

What more could you ask of a vocabulary than it be, first, legitimate, and second, suit the purpose, that it be appropriate. What could be more appropriate than two-faced when you talk about what the NDP is doing in this particular amendment.

Let us understand what they want to do. They want to wipe out the operational expenses that would be provided under the main estimates for the current year, as they relate to the Senate's operation. To do that, the member for Kamloops cites—he has done some arithmetic and we will assume his arithmetic is correct—that it is some $2,000 a minute. Of course, what he has done to arrive at that, I suppose, is to take the number of hours or minutes the Senate sits and then this operating amount that is in the estimates, and divided one with the other and come up with a couple of thousand bucks a minute.

An interesting question arises. He is telling us that it is his view that the only time the senators are at work is when they are in the Senate. That is what he has done in his bit of arithmetic; he has taken the number of hours they are in the Senate and divided it into the total expense of operating the Senate. And so he is extrapolating that the only time these senators are working is when they are in the Senate.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, and I put it to him, wherever he is now, the member for Kamloops, since he is not physically in the Chamber right now, is he not working either? Is that what he is telling us, that he should probably not be paid for that? I mean, how ridiculous.

Mr. Gardiner: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have two quick points. One, I think the hon. member knows the rule in the House about referring to the presence or non-presence of members in the House; second, the member for Kamloops is attending a very important meeting at this moment. He knows that very well and he should not abuse the rules of this House.

Mr. Simmons: I thank the gentleman from Prince George—Bulkley Valley. He should not be telling us that the member for Kamloops is attending a meeting because in so doing he is drawing attention to his absence from this Chamber, and he is breaking the rules, you see.

However, let me thank the gentleman from Prince George—Bulkley Valley. Let me use him as an example. You see, he is in this Chamber. I am allowed to note the presence of somebody. He is in the Chamber. I see him. He is bodily in this Chamber.

The question is, and it is an entirely theoretical one, if the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley were not in the Chamber—which he is, I point out—then by applying the arithmetic and the logic of his colleague from Kamloops, who I have to assume is in the Chamber except I was told just now that he might be at a meeting somewhere, who says that the only time you ought to apportion cost is when they are in the Chamber, then I put it to you, sir, as a theoretical question understand, that if my friend from Prince George—Bulkley Valley were not in the Chamber then should he be paid?

Maybe he wandered off to attend a meeting somewhere, maybe to talk to a constituent on the phone, maybe as a member of a standing committee, maybe doing one or the other 114 things you do which are pursuant to your membership in this Chamber. Is that the thesis being espoused by the gentleman from Kamloops, that the only time you work in this place is when you are physically here yelling your head off, as I am doing now, or sitting in the Chamber? What utter nonsense. What utter hypocrisy. What utter two-facedness.

I should perhaps tell my friend from Oshawa the latest story making the rounds about his friend—and I see him there so well— from Kamloops. It was said about him recently that if somebody on the government side, with all the extra money they are making with the GST, if somebody decided that maybe what we needed on this Hill was a swimming pool—

An hon. member: Did you say swimming pool or cesspool?

Mr. Simmons: Swimming pool. The member wants a cesspool, no problem. But let's stick with the swimming pool first.

Now it is suggested that if the government decided what we needed here was a swimming pool, the member for Kamloops would do two things immediately: He would jump up immediately and put down a motion condemning it, and then he would phone his secretary and say: "Would you go over and buy me a swim suit?"

An hon. member: Could we use Pierre's pool perhaps?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, that member will never get to use Pierre's pool.

However, I digress. I make the same mistake I had accused somebody else of making. Why do we get excited about a party whose slogan is "Having our cake and eating it, too". Why do we get excited about a party that has all kinds of principles, some of them are even compatible, but most of them are mutually exclusive. Of course, they are for the Senate and against the Senate. I say to my friend from Kingston and the Islands that he ought to know better. This crowd is for and against everything. They are against the Senate today in their motion, because it gives them a chance to get up and talk. But on Saturday in Halifax I read in the paper they were for the Senate.

• (1200)

An hon. member: That is what I heard, too.

Mr. Simmons: They were for NATO and they are against NATO. I have resolutions from the Montreal convention of the NDP a couple of years ago and another one showing they are for NATO and they are against NATO. They are for a united Canada, unless you listen to the member for Chambly, who is for Quebec sovereignty.

I say to my friend from Kingston and the Islands; Do not get excited about the crowd whose slogan is: "Having your cake and eating it too". Do not get excited about the crowd that has all kinds of principles, most of them contradictory. Do not get excited about the NDP, a party that can come up with a new principle any day of the week, just by negativing the existing principle. No problem.

An hon. member: Get around to the banks. Get to the good stuff.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a nuance here. It is a new refinement in the way the NDP writes its policies. They are not just simplistic and for and against things any more. They want to keep the Senate today; they just do not want to fund it. They want a kind of charitable, voluntary Senate.

They tell us the Senate is not doing anything. That is right, the Senate is useless. I just heard the member for Kamloops tell us the Senate is serving no useful purposes. Listen to their comments three days ago in Halifax, when they wanted half of the Senators to be women. Is that their commitment to equality? They want to put them in a useless organization, do they?

Sometimes if they were not so treacherous in the venom and the deceit they spread they would be funny. The deceit that the member for Kamloops spread just now about the Senate spending $2,000 a minute skates deliberately misleading some essential elements of the Senate; one is that when the Senate is not physically meeting as a Senate many other committees are meeting.

Secondly, many of those Senators have their constituents, whether organizations or individuals, who come to them, much as they come to members of Parliament. It is cowardly and dishonest for a member of any party to stand in this place and take the other place and the individuals in it apart in their absence. Particularly, when you tell deliberate, direct, falsehoods. That is one of the more cowardly things I have seen.

I have my views on the Senate and I can give them to you. In short, first of all, they ought to be elected. In terms of our present Senate, is it serving a useful function? Yes. Anybody who thinks it is not should go back and see what the Senate is there for in the first place. One of the reasons it was put there in the first place by Macdonald and the Fathers of Confederation, was to see that the regions were protected.

We from a smaller province like Newfoundland and Labrador look to the Senate, and have always looked to the Senate, for some of our regional protection. Is it doing its job as well as it could? No. But the same question could be asked about this Chamber too.

I come then to what my friend, the Conservative member for Crowfoot, was just saying because it relates to the point I want to make. He was talking about Question Period. He said that Canadians do not believe that Question Period is serving their aspirations. That is a fair statement. He said: Canadians do not believe that Question period is serving their aspirations. I would say that if he wanted to be completely accurate about it, he ought to be saying "some Canadians". Whether that "some" is 99 per cent or 15 per cent, "some" Canadians believe that.

I happen to run into many Canadians who want me to raise certain issues in Question Period, people like the columnist who said yesterday: "With all its warts, Question Period is a very good institution. Let us keep it".

That is an aside to what I really want to say to the member for Crowfoot.

He says that Canadians feel that Question Period is not serving their aspirations. He is right in that some Canadians feel that. Maybe more Canadians feel it than we would like to think.

I have a question for him, and it is a question that comes to the specific issue of the GST. Since when did he and his colleagues on that side give a hoot about what Canadians feel?

About 85 per cent of Canadians told him in a poll that they did not want the GST, but the government put it through anyway. I do not see what the rush is to get out and alter Question Period just because Canadians do not like it, if I were to follow his strategy to date.

If Question Period needs some change, I am sure it will get changed. Let's not do it for the wrong reasons. The way this place is being castrated by the government, Question Period is one of the few remaining opportunities for some accountability. Yes, it is a bit untidy at times but let's not use the argument to change and improve it as an excuse for making a eunuch of it.

When I hear a government member talk about change as it relates to Parliament, you can usually decode that to mean "muzzle". You can assume, can you not, that if everything is going well for the government, it would not be talking about change. Why would you want to change something that is working well for you?

The very fact that members talk about change day in and day out tells me that somehow they may not be enjoying the experience any more. Maybe all is not well over there. When I hear them pontificate to me in flowing terms about change, I decode that to mean muzzle the place. I am going to oppose them at every turn on that.

Let's remind ourselves that in addition to that mischievous little motion put down by my ever present member and friend from Kamloops, this debate is all about the main estimates and the billions of largess that this government would want to expend on all kinds of schemes: $157 billion.

The former Premier of Newfoundland, Joey Smallwood, had a way which I cannot really imitate at all, much as I would like to do so, of drawing attention to a large sum of money. In Newfoundland terms, $157 billion is an astoundingly large sum of money. Joey would do it by backing away from it and coming at it a step at a time. He would say: "Do you realize that we are not talking here about $157 billion. We are not talking $10 billion, $20 billion, $30 billion, $50 billion or even $100 billion. We are talking $157 billion." Then he would proceed to translate that into thousands of millions of dollars and so on.

The point needs to be made to the people of Canada and to us in this Chamber that we are dealing with one awful large lump of money here: $157 billion.

One of the things I ought to ask on behalf of the 85,000 people who sent me here, fishermen, farmers, shipyard workers, railway workers— until the government got rid of the railway a couple of years ago—ferry dock workers, unemployed, students: Is the government spending this $157 billion in the best way?

Certain of these expenditures are statutory. Certain of them we could hardly change even if we wanted to, but the government does have some flexibility. The government will be the first to point out that a large percentage of that goes to servicing the debt that the debt has doubled. The government does not point out but some of it is in the area of having some flexibility.

• (1210)

I want to come quickly to two or three issues. One is the issue of the fishery. I realize from your signal, Mr. Speaker, that my time has all but elapsed and I wish I had a few more moments, but I do not, so very quickly let me say that I would want to have said more about the issue of the fishery and what is happening to it in these times of stock collapse. This is at a time when people need help to bridge the gap –fishermen, plant workers and communities—and a time when the government is not making the best use of its limited funds to assist that sector of the economy. I could talk about how students, and university students in particular, are left high and dry because the government, through a sleight of hand, has actually cut back the amount of transfer payments for post-secondary education. I could talk about the new anxieties that are created among senior citizens and others because the government has cut back medical care expenses to the provinces.

The list goes on. There are so many things that we will want to raise during the course of this day before we give our concurrence to the passage of any estimates. I recognize my time is up for now, but maybe we will have another go at it later in the day.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, but I regret the fact that the issue of program spending, which he was in the middle of discussing when he was cut short by elapsed time, is an issue that is not only important for his riding, but is also important for all of our ridings right now. We are dealing with a government that has not only decreased program spending dramatically over the last five or six years, but, in the process of decreasing that program spending in light of the deficit that has been doubled, it has also increased the revenues that it receives by almost 50 per cent since it took office.

The government is not only taking less out of the economy in terms of stimulation, but it is also taking a lot more out of the economy in terms of its tax programs.

I would like the hon. member for Burin—St. George's to expand a little bit on the importance of this program funding and maybe the fact that there are some areas which are statutory and which the government cannot and should not touch. It has tried to grab some of the statutory payments to seniors, et cetera, and, of course, our established program financing. I think it is important for him to elaborate on the importance of where this money goes in terms of stimulating our small businesses and all sectors, whether it is the fisheries or tourism. Maybe he could elaborate a little bit on that.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Broadview—Greenwood. It is only in the last day or so that he and I were comparing notes on the severe downturn in the economies of our respective regions. He represents an urban riding in downtown Toronto and I have the pleasure to represent a very rural riding, 158 communities, the largest of which has a population of about 8,000 and the smallest a population of about 12 people.

So we are talking of two very different worlds, but it was interesting in our chat a day or so ago, to note that because the economy is in such devastation there are similarities emerging in what is happening and how people are coping.

He made the point to me, and I am sure he would not mind my mentioning this, that the small business sector is having some real difficulty. He said to me, in passing, that people in Toronto are now beginning to realize what rural Canada has been talking about. In rural Canada there is often a cycle of activity; if the fishery is good then small business thrives and if the fishery is bad, either through market or the health of the fish stock and so on, then small businesses experience a very depressed situation.

To turn specifically to his question, we had to back off and say what is government all about? Government, I believe, is a free enterprise or ought not to be doing anything that free enterprise can do better.

I believe government was put in place primarely, and its continued reason for existence, is to do things that private business, small or large, cannot do for us. What better time to have a government that you can turn to than when the economy is at its worst and you need something to bridge the gap?

Specifically, I want to come not only to small business as it relates to my riding, but to the fishery. We have a situation in the fishery in Burin—St. George's and all over Atlantic Canada where 100,000 people, men and women, plant workers and fisher persons, including men and women, depend on the fishery. So it is a very big industry. One out of every four jobs in Newfoundland is in the fishery, for example.

When the economy is in a downturn is the time you most need a government. That is when private business cannot help and that is when government ought to be able to step in and help bridge the gap.

There is an argument the former Minister of Fisheries and now Minister of Employment has been espousing. To his credit, the new Minister of Fisheries, my pal from Newfoundland, from St. John's West has not been espousing this argument yet and I hope he has the good sense never to start it, because the government tells us that in four or five years the fish stocks are going to rebound.

If they are going to rebound and the fishery will be healthy in five years, why are we in such mad haste to dismantle the processing capacity? Why are we in such mad haste to retrain all those fishermen as labourers for southern Ontario or Alberta or wherever else they are shipping them off to? Why do we not find a way to bridge the gap over the next four or five years to keep those processing facilities up to scratch? We may have to mothball some of them, but let's not put the wrecking ball to them.

Why don't we find a way to keep at home those people who have a lifestyle in Gaultois and in Grand Bank and those other communities in my riding that are under the gun? Why don't we find a way to keep their skills and their lifestyle intact for the next three or four years? We may have to find something for them to do in the meantime. We may have to do some training. That is fair ball, but let's not ask them to walk away from their life skills and their whole value system and way of life.

That is where a government in tough times ought to be expending some of its money. When I see the kind of money that we are talking about here and the fact that an extra $400 million more was made than they thought they were going to make in the first four months, I ask how that is for pocket money, an extra hundred million a month more than you thought you had in your pocket.

Surely Lord, surely to goodness, having that hundred million dollars a month, they can find a few shekels to help those poor fishermen, those poor plant workers I am talking about, instead of saying: "You have got to pack your bags and say goodbye to your loved ones forever." I hope that answers your question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend and I have a short question to put to him. He was going on at some length saying what a fan of the Senate he was. I think that is an interesting position for somebody to take. It must be very lonely, I would think, taking that position. I wonder if my hon. friend could comment whether he thinks it is getting good value for money when the Senate managed to sit for nine hours during the month of February, 28 calendar days, and they managed to sit for 12 hours during the months of March and April. Then in May they went all out and actually were in session for 15 hours for the entire month.

My question to my hon. friend is this: Based on this working of the Senate, the amount of time that senators have spent working on behalf of Canada, his being a believer of free enterprise and wanting to make sure we were getting good value for money, does he think paying nearly $2,500 a minute for this kind of performance is worth it?

Mr. Simmons: First of all I say to my friend for Kamloops that it is not at all lonely saying we need an elected Senate. Many thousands of Canadians are saying that we need an elected Senate. Almost every thinking Canadian who understands our process of government will tell you we need a second Chamber. People in his own party as recently as this weekend will tell you that we need it elected and that we need a second chamber.

• (1220)

I come to the real point of his question about the $2,000 per minute. He might have listened to my speech, but he missed that sentence because I addressed that very particular sentence. I said to him and to the Chamber that I thought he had been quite dishonest to suggest that the only time senators worked is when the Senate is physically sitting. I turn the question around on him. Is he suggesting that the only time he works is when he is sitting in this Chamber? I understood if he is doing his job as a member of Parliament because I happen to be a member of Parliament too and when I go out of here there are a few other things I do. Sometimes people call me. I actually spend some time on the phone. I actually sign a few letters once in a while. I actually go to a committee meeting, and I know a few senators who do the same thing. I actually saw a senator in a meeting once.

An hon. member: Once.

Mr. Simmons: As a matter of fact I saw them several times. The point I make is that the gentleman from Kamloops knows he has lost this particular argument completely and so he gets up one more time and regurgitates his $2,000 a minute.

He is going to have to get more convincing or go off and buy those swim trunks I mentioned earlier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments have now terminated. Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I think what has transpired here this morning is perhaps what is troubling the people of Canada. The member for Burlington stood in his place and introduced the government's motion in a very casual way and it did not seem to cause much of a ripple in the Chamber. He indicated some of the difficulties the Government of Canada was having at the moment dealing with its financial problems.

He said, almost as a throwaway line, that they have come to a position where they cannot offer people who work for the Government of Canada any wage increases this years.

I think that is a remarkable statement. It is a statement of some financial difficulty. It is certainly an insult to all of those men and women who work for the Government of Canada, all of those who are on the front line of providing government services, because those poor people are unlike members here; they do not have the luxury of reading in a public opinion poll that the people of Canada are unhappy; they do not have the advantage of being able to send out a staff person to write a letter to some disgruntled constituent. These are all the people on the front lines. They are the ones who stand at a wicket somewhere and take abuse from the people of Canada over a system they did not devise, over policies they may not agree with. I have often thought it would be a useful exercise to take the Minister of Finance and put that individual out in a parking garage collecting the GST as people drive their cars out of the garage and listen to the comments that people make face to face, not an opinion poll, not modified in the staff report, but listen to it. He should get right in their faces and hear what the people of Canada have to say about the policies of this government.

Yet those who do that will get no wage increase. That is an insult for the work that they have done. Of all the people you could think of in our society who could perhaps get themselves in a position where they do not need any increase, who did not have any cost of living problems this year, whose rent did not go up, whose food cost did not go up, to whom the GST did not get applied, last on that list would be the people who work for the Government of Canada. They are out there every day whether they like it or not, representing the Government of Canada because they have a little badge on their sleeve that says, "We work for the Government of Canada", or because they work in an office with a sign that says, "The Government of Canada operates something out of this office".

Every day they hear the frustrations about a million and one problems, about immigration, for example. They listen to all the tragedies right in front of them from the individuals and the families who face an immigration system that is extremely complicated and, by many standards, rather unfair. They take that abuse first-hand.

For them the government says there is no money in the kitty to give any increase at all this year.

The second thing I heard the member say, again almost casually, is that the government is very attracted to the notion of user fees. Having been around parliaments for a while, I have seen this debate in other chambers. It always sounds attractive for governments to institute user fees because it has that wonderful notion about it that you can charge people a second time for a service they have already paid for.

I know that the argument on the other side of the coin is that while they may have built and paid for the hospital, now that they are actually using the facility we are going to get them again. If they have the audacity to use a hospital we will charge them another user fee. If they have the audacity to go fishing we will charge them another fishing licence. If they have the audacity to drive on one of the roads we built with their tax dollars, we will charge them again. It is another great source of income.

Well, we are turning the corner in Canadian politics when we enter into these concepts. One of the things that makes Canada different from many other nations in the world is the concept that we, collectively as a nation, pool our money and our income tax and we build different kinds of things for our people. We build roads and hospitals and we provide services. People have a reasonable right that, having paid for it once, they really should not have to pay for it again. A user fee is a polite little word that suggests one other method of taxation.

I, like many Canadians, have begun to investigate the process of just how much taxation people can take. Just because you call it by another name, just because you call it a user fee, does not make it anything other than what it is. It is a tax. When Canadian consumers go into stores these days they are getting to the point where they are recognizing that when you charge a provincial sales tax and a goods and services tax and any other kind of tax, there is a dramatic impact on what you pay for goods or services you receive. It is getting to the point where people can see that clearly on their bill and they are starting to say: "Wait a minute. How stupid does the government really think I am? Just because it calls it by another name, does it think I will not recognize that it is a taxation process"?

Does it think they will not know the difference between shopping in Kingston, Ontario, and anywhere along the Thousand Islands, in Clayton or in Alexandria Bay? Does it think people will not see the difference in the taxation process between two countries? Well, of course they will. Does it think that by setting up some kind of border process which collects even more taxes that it will stop people from shopping in the United States when they have a chance? Well, it will not.

People should simply understand that the taxation levels in this country have gotten to a point where those who are left paying taxes, that broad band of people who have, perhaps, a weekly pay cheque or an hourly rate, sometimes known as the middle-class, are really beginning to feel the pinch of taxation at all levels. If one could simply define: "It is fair. We are going to do this on the income tax. If you make more money you will pay more money in income tax". People would not like that very much, but they would at least understand that there is a logic there, that those with an ability to pay, ought to pay. What they are objecting to is that every time they turn around they are getting hit with some other form of taxation and they know it.

They do not care whether the kid who pumps the gas into their car looks like a tax collector or not. They are beginning to understand that he is a tax collector. They do not care whether the woman who works in the little corner store looks like an agent for the Government of Canada. They are aware now that that person functions much of her day as a tax collector for the Government of Canada and they are mad about that and they ought to be.

Also they ought to be mad about this. They ought to be mad that services they have already paid for are being taken away from them or that they are being charged extra for those services. They ought to be angry about that and they ought to tell this government. This government ought to drop the opinion polls and drop all the people it hired to do public relations work, go back home and listen to them.

In the last few days I have heard Conservative members, a long way in the backbench, albeit, but Conservative members, stand in this Chamber and reflect some of that frustration. Maybe it is true that it is not good enough to hear from the opposition side that your financial policies are unpopular. I am sure, having been around Parliament for a while, that they have heard this in their own private caucus meetings.

Now you are beginning to hear it here in the Parliament of Canada. The message is not getting through. There are some who would be callous enough to say—and I would be one of them—that what is happening here is that the government is not popular at the moment, that it is gathering up a war chest, a kitty for the next general election, and that between now and election day there will hardly be a Canadian left standing who will not get a cheque from the Government of Canada for something, some rebate, some grant, some award, some giving back of their own cash.

I would say to the Canadian people, think about this. If somebody robs you on the street today, holds your money for two years and gives you back a portion of it two years from now, should you be happy about it? I do not think you should, and I would bet that by the time the next general election rolls around, the people in this country are going to understand that basic, unalterable fact that you have taken money out of their pocket now and it really does not matter whether you give them back a portion of that before the next election or not. They ought to remember what you did now, and what was the end result of your financial policies.

In a very casual way, the member suggested that the government has to look at some alternatives, some contracting out. When I was first a provincial member and saw this little exercise being tried, it looked to me like something that maybe we should think about. Then I discovered some odd things happening. When governments talk about contracting out, what they mean is that they are going to take people from permanent, paid position here, they are going to leave them right there, right at that desk, but they are going to call them by a different name, and they are going to call it contracting out. The next week that person will do exactly the same job in exactly the same place, and what they have lost is their status as an employee.

Governments like to pretend that they can then write up huge reports at the end of the fiscal year and say, look at how much we have cut the civil service. I do not know what the parliamentary word for that is, but I do know that the same people work in the same buildings, do the same jobs, and someone has found a device for calculating that they are really not there, that somehow they have disappeared. Oddly enough, it always turns out to be friends of the government who run the companies that get all of these contracts. It always turns out that it costs more money and not less.

So what governments try to do is focus your attention on the notion that there are less people working for the Government of Canada. You have to read the fine print and find out that no, there really are not, and it does not really cost less money. They are just called by a different name.

It is the same process that they are using now in taxation, that somehow if you call a tax by a different name it is no longer a tax. The people who are paying out the change every day are beginning to smarten up. They are beginning to understand that it does not really matter whether you call it by a different name, it is a tax. It does not really matter whether you pass a law saying: We are going to put all of this money into a special fund, not the Consolidated Revenue Fund anymore, and we are going to pay down the deficit. It does not take very much reading of the fine print of that law to discover what is happening is that it is business as usual. All the money goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and then they are going to set up a new accounting process which puts it into another account. Before the end of the fiscal year, they are going to take that money and pay down some part of the deficit. They make a promise in that bill that will crank up the same kind of idea next year.

People understand it does not matter whether you have one piggy bank on the kitchen table or two, it is the amount of money you put into piggy banks. What happens is that it costs you more money to buy the second piggy bank. That is the kind of shell game that this government has embarked upon.

One of the things that I hear constantly where I work, in my own constituency when I walk around, is that people challenge the role of all the institutions we have. If they have watched this debate this morning, they have a good reason to challenge that. They have a good reason to say: Did we actually pay somebody to go to Ottawa and stand up and play those kinds of silly games, that you can call people two-faced, but you cannot say they are hypocrites? Does that make any difference anywhere in the world? No, it does not, and they know that.

You can quote Beauchesne and Erskine May until you are blue in the face. It works in here. Try it in a pool room. Go into a local bingo and tell them: Listen, the words you just used are not on the list. Beauchesne does not approve of those words, so you cannot use them. See if that changes the course of the argument. Well, it will not. The shame of it is that there are people in this Chamber who believe that somehow if you learn how to play the word games, it changes the nature of it all. It does not. You can delude yourself into thinking that a Parliament is about reading Beauchesne's, about finding a list in Erskine May or that it is some kind of game about whether everybody is an honourable member. It is not.

People watch every day and see the kinds of words that come out of this Chamber. They say: "What a bunch of foolish people. Don't they know there are serious problems in this country? Don't they know that we have to stop and look at all of our institutions?"

Do you not really know that people all across Canada are asking the interesting question: "Why are people in the Senate playing kazoos?" Is that what it is about? Is the Senate such a valuable institution? How is it that the government can simply decide one fine day that the Senate is not doing what it is supposed to do, and therefore we ought to put some more people into the Senate?

Do you think people do not understand the game called stacking the deck? Sure they do. They have seen it a million times where they work, whenever they have had an argument, whenever a debate was going one way and all of a sudden somebody decides that the debate is not going that way because they are bringing in more troops.

They have probably seen a write-up of a Liberal nomination meeting. They know what stacking the deck is. They have been in a debate like that. They understand all of that.

There is something missing in this Chamber, at least I have not heard it because we do use parliamentary language. Maybe the country would be better if we set aside Beauchesne's for a day and said: "Let's just get together and report to the people of Canada what we have heard on the streets in our constituencies last week."

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Breaugh: It would be an interesting debate, I must say. I am sure there would be many across the country offended by the language that would be used, but there is a certain tenor to all of that that you really have to hear. Maybe it cannot be expressed in parliamentary language.

Maybe those who are big fans of the Senate would care to go out on the street in your community and express the fine words about the sober second thought and all of that.

What we are trying to do as a political entity is what I am sure every political entity in the country is trying to do. I do not understand why people really believe that electing a Senate in its current form is going to solve its problems.

This much I do know. There are people in this country who fervently believe that regional differences which have not been addressed by the Government of Canada over a long period of time can only be solved by somehow redesigning the second Chamber. I am not that dumb. I am at least prepared to listen to what they have to say. I am at least prepared to hear their arguments. If someone would figure out a way that we can elect a Senate, fine. If someone can figure out what they are going to do after we elect them, I think that is pretty important. If someone can suggest some changes in the relationship between the Senate of Canada and the House of Commons that would work, I am prepared to hear that argument and to accept it. Everybody else in this Chamber had better be prepared to hear it and accept it as well.

Governments at all levels in this country are being challenged and not in polite academic ways. They are being challenged on the streets, in the factories, in the playgrounds, in the arenas every day all across Canada, and it seems that governments cannot hear it. That is a tragedy.

I have followed for some time the government's frustration with the Question Period. I have seen it here and in the other Chamber. I am amazed that somehow anybody in his or her right mind feels that if we limit it to 30 seconds, that will solve the problem. That is not the problem.

I have heard really good questions in other chambers go on much longer than 30 seconds. If people know what they are talking about, are reasonably secure in their facts and are putting forward good arguments, it is not a question of whether it is 29 seconds long or four minutes long. It is a question of relevance.

As I listen to my constituents talk about this Chamber, that is the question they have on their minds: "What the hell is going on down there?" I have to admit I am hard pressed to explain what is going on down there. I do not know. I am listening to it. I am there every day. I am watching it all unfold. It makes no sense to me.

I saw a headline the other day. I think it was Preston Manning who accused this Parliament of being a "disgrace". I admit he has got me. It is a disgrace that this is the national Government of Canada, the biggest Parliament we have, and it cannot get its act together. Why not? I do not know, I just got here.

• (1240)

Is it because people are so mesmerised with their own wonderfulness? I have been in politics for awhile. There is nothing wrong with a big ego in politics. If you do not have one you will not survive. But is that all there is to it? Is it just word games? If it is, let us do it on the cheap. Let us take all of these wonderful wordsmiths and find them a nice place to go for the summer. It will cost them $1.95. Give them a free lunch and let them get out there, and we will call it our constituent assembly.

I can find you all kinds of people who will serve in that constituent assembly for nothing. We do not have to call it the Senate, we do not have to pretend that it is a Parliament. It is a bunch of people yakking in a field.

For those who think that parliaments are distinguished places, I want to remind you that the very first Parliament was exactly that, a bunch of people yakking in a field, and the field was called Runnymede. They had a great argument that there was no one in their jurisdiction who could address the needs of the common people, and so they called it a House of Commons.

They then wrote books about it. Perhaps that was the downfall. Perhaps it was the downfall of the parliamentary system that someone wrote a book called Beauchesne and another guy wrote a book called Erskine May. Somehow these have become almost biblical in stature, rule books for a Parliament, and Parliament does not have to be relevant, it just has to follow those rules.

I would bet if you took any person from across this country and brought him or her to this door over here and said: "Okay, you have a couple of minutes. Tell these people what you think of them." I think I know what would be said. It probably would not be parliamentary, probably a great deal of frustration and disgrace that this is their country, that they have a say, that they thought you were a decent human being, that you had a contribution to make, and they cannot see you making it.

I am an advocate and always have been of the parliamentary process. I think it is much better than the congressional process, but it has its warts. There is something about a parliamentary process that means once you get elected your brain is removed and that somehow, when you leave your caucus room where you have had your great arguments about the issue of the day, you are no longer allowed to speak to that.

In part, our little motion says: "Let us begin to investigate the institutions of Canada. Let us see if we can find a better way to construct a role for a Senate, if that is what you want. Let us see if we can at least make it democratic. Let us see if we can find a function for that."

But I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, number two on my list is this place; this place is a disgrace and it ought not to be.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have only been in this Chamber for just under three years, but I want to say that the hon. member for Oshawa, who is a member of the New Democratic Party, has made one of the finest speeches that I have heard in this place. I want him to know that everything that he has just said is exactly what I hear in my riding. I would not argue a comma with this member.

But I do want to ask him a specific question. In the beginning part of his speech, he talked about the frustration that people are having with the tax system, and he specifically referred to the middle class. Again I agree with him totally. In the last two and half weeks, when I have not been in the Chamber but in my riding, I can tell you that everyone, whether they are in small businesses, medium sized businesses, large businesses, everyone is so frustrated with what is happening.

In relation to the complexity of the tax system, we have just come through a period where people have just finished doing their tax returns, so naturally that frustration is intense. It is even more intense when you think that a lot of these people right now have either lost their jobs or they are afraid of losing their jobs. There is a lot of tension in the community and morale is at an all-time low. Part of our responsibility as leaders of our communities is to deal in hope. We seem to be having a difficult time, as the hon. member has said, in putting it together. I would like to ask him a very specific question: Because he has had experience in both chambers, provincially and nationally, does he have any specific ideas on how we might be able to reform the tax system so that the concept of fairness, the concept of efficiency, and all those things that might put some hope and motivation back into a community can exist? Does he have any ideas on that?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance to observe legislatures and parliaments around the world now for a fair bit of time. They are all different. They have their own little customs. They all develop their own taxation processes. The test the public puts them to asks: Is this fair?

At the moment I believe it is accurate to say that the taxation process in Canada is unfair every time you turn around. What angers people, as well, is that it is all-pervasive.

An hon. member: What should we do?

Mr. Breaugh: For example, when the major thrust of your taxation process is something like a goods and services tax, which is collected at the corner store, people object to it. People go to the corner store to buy goods and services, not to pay taxes. When there is a developing thrust in your taxation process which does not include sitting down at the end of the year to decide what is fair, that everybody is paying their fair share, then that concept of fairness is totally lacking in the taxation process in Canada.

I have heard some people talk about a minimal tax or a flat tax for everybody. That is perhaps a little simplistic for the world. But there is merit in that, and it is simply this: when people look around and see others making far more money than they are and paying absolutely no income tax, they think there is something wrong with the system and they are right. There has to be a base level of taxation based on income, I believe.

Second, I am constantly lost by governments at all levels with their little schemes about avoiding taxes. I think that message has got out to the Canadian public as well. Canadians do not understand, nor do I, how it is that the wealthiest people, the wealthiest corporations in our society, can wind up paying no taxes at all when they pay taxes every time they turn around?

I think the first principle that has to get injected into this system is some sense of fair play. Because, to be blunt, people think they are being screwed, and the truth is they are and they know it. They also know that collecting taxes at the corner store is wrong. They have to be declined dramatically.

I do not suggest for a moment that this is a simple thing, but I think that if you do not get back to a fairness principle, you will never have a taxation process that will be accepted by the population at large, because it should not be.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question concerning his comments regarding this Chamber, Parliament and legislatures in Canada. If you go back over debates in this Chamber, and debates I suppose in practically every other provincial legislature, you will find that the same criticisms were made of the Canadian system as the Canadian system has evolved.

Since the hon. member has visited other legislatures and passed an opinion a few moment ago on the congressional system, I wonder if he has come to any conclusion as to what procedure should be followed to change, as he puts it, the procedures in the House of Commons to make it, as he also wishes, more relevant to the year 1991. What should some of these major changes be, and why does not he like the congressional system? As he pointed out a moment ago, he said our system was better than the congressional system.

Does he think perhaps one of the major problems is the fact that individual members of Parliament do not have the ability under the present rules to investigate the administration or to change legislation in their legislative role?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been in legislatures and parliaments in Canada literally drool when we go and see an American congressional system that concentrates a lot of power on the individual member. You look at the kind of facts and figures that they get out of their governments and say: "Boy, would it ever be great if we had a finance committee that actually started off the budget year with every scrap of financial information that the government had, and then made recommendations about what we should do." If only that were our starting point. The big flaw in the congressional system, of course, is very simply that everybody is an individual player. If you go into a legislative chamber in the States where there are 100 members, there are 100 political parties at work and they are all free agents.

The big advantage of a parliamentary system is the cohesion. When you go to Westminster and watch the British system at work you say: "You belong to a party system as I do, in a parliamentary system as I do, how dare your Conservative members get up and challenge your government?" Why is it that when you watch Westminster at work there is as much laying of the lash from the Conservative side of the House as there is from the opposition side. Somehow we got diverted from the parliamentary system in Canada and we are more devoted to our parties than we ought to be. It is our curse.

I know it is a shocking thing to say, but it would be delightful if in this Chamber members on all sides rediscovered their brains and used them and used their human skills. It would be delightful in this parliamentary system if the government of the day had first to convince ordinary members on its own side, its friends, that the directions and the policies of the government, that the laws they wanted to propose were the right ones and if they could not get it through their own caucus they did not bring it in here.

I have been around long enough to know that that is the theory. That is the way the books write it up, but in practice what happens is the minister walks in and says: "This is the way we are going, folks" and everybody goes out over the cliff. If somebody just had the common sense to say: "Wait a minute, that is a cliff there; I don't want to jump off that cliff. Convince me. Don't tell me what I have to do. Convince me." Then the parliamentary system would work as it was originally designed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question? I am sorry there is no more time left. Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to stand and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is this a point of order or on debate?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, when you said shall the question be put, is it correct to assume you were referring to only the first portion of the entire question? By accepting your motion and voting on it by a voice vote, were we to then move on to the second portion of the same question which is under consideration in the House? Does this mean that every member can, after that vote, then proceed—in fact some members have already spoken—and speak again to the same main motion under a different heading?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, this is true. We are on Motion No. 1. With this motion, whether it carries or not, we just carry on to Motion No. 2. We have until 10 o'clock tonight. Does the hon. member still want to speak on Motion No. 1? If not, I will put the question.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the representative of the Chief Government Whip to defer division until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 10 p.m. later this day, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Shall I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative chair of the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has condemned this government's decision to gut Canada's international radio broadcast service.

Senator Finlay MacDonald says Canada's voice to the world has been silenced. Radio Canada International has now eliminated seven foreign language services and three-quarters of its foreign programming. These drastic cuts to a service with a world-wide reputation have sparked national and international outrage.

It was front-page news in Japan, where the Prime Minister recently opened a new embassy.

It is ironic that a government which is obsessed with broadening international trade fails to see that RCI is the best way Canada has of promoting itself to the rest of the world.

I urge the Prime Minister to listen to his colleague's warning. RCI is Canada's link to the world. Our policies and our industries were effectively explained on a world stage. Let us not cut an invaluable service which gives Canada an international identity.

TAXATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, middle income Canadians feel that they are overtaxed. They feel that the tax system is unfair and much too complicated. They know they bear a heavy burden because of the excessive spending of the previous government, but there is no excuse for unfairness and complexity.

We have family allowance, the child tax credit, the dependent child tax credit, the equivalent to married credit, the child care deduction, the GST credit, the spousal deduction, and a plethora of shared cost programs. This is only the tip of the iceberg.

Middle income Canadians also know that the system is unfair. A married two-earner couple, with a combined income of $60,000 and three children, pays up to $5,500 more in taxes than an unmarried couple in exactly the same circumstances. More extreme differences exist when comparisons are made of other family structures and tax inconsistencies.

I urge the government to act quickly to simplify the tax system and make it fair for everyone, regardless of the lifestyle they choose.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, the Commissioner of Official Languages, reaches the end of the mandate he was given by this Parliament in 1984. A new Official Languages Act, the delay in producing regulations, the Conservative goverment's failure to act decisively, court challenges, language conflicts—these are some of the major obstacles and challenges that marked Mr. Fortier's term. His position has certainly not been an enviable one.

As the Liberal critic for Official Languages, I can testify to the tremendous effort and legal battles it took to defend minority rights. The courage shown by Mr. Fortier during the past seven years, against all criticism and despite emerging radical groups, has been remarkable, Mr. Speaker, and we are truly indebted to him.

The new commissioner will have to act with as much energy and vigour and have the same dynamic approach as Mr. Fortier. Only with people like him, who truly respect Canada's legislation on linguistic minorities, will we be able to ensure some day that both official languages in this country are treated equally. Thank you, Mr. Fortier, and the best of luck with your future plans.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tabled a new bill on bankruptcy and insolvency.

On November 29, 1985, under No. 245, I presented a notice of motion, and on May 20, 1988, I tabled in the House of Commons a motion, which was adopted, asking the government to consider establishing a special wage insurance fund that would be responsible for paying workers any wages pending when a Canadian employer goes bankrupt.

Mr. Speaker, I must say I was very pleased with this bill which contains measures dealing with business restructuring, winding-up arrangements and personal bankruptcies; creates a wage claim recovery program; legislates the rights of unpaid suppliers; and finally, includes various technical changes designed to make it easier and less costly to administer this legislation. This is the kind of initiative designed to help all businesses and all Canadians through a difficult period.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today the headlines in the local newspapers of Northumberland give no assurances to students looking for work this summer.

Over two-thirds of students registered at a student employment centre are unable to find summer jobs. Meanwhile, there has been no increase in the Summer Employment Experience Development Program, otherwise known as SEED.

The fact is that unemployment levels in my riding are higher than the averages used to calculate the SEED allotments.

In addition, there was an unexplained dramatic decline in allotment between 1989 and this year. This has meant many important programs in my riding have had to suspend summer programs which not only employed many students but benefited communities in important, economic and social ways.

The minister has made the commitment to redistribute funds to areas with the greatest change in unemployment above the provincial average, and therefore I strongly urge him to review the figures in Northumberland and increase SEED funding to more adequately reflect the desperate situation facing many young people in Northumberland.

CAPTAIN ROSELLA BJORNSON

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, Captain Rosella Bjornson was the first female in Canada hired to fly a commercial jet. She was recently honoured during National Transportation Week when she received the National Award of Achievement in Halifax on May 30. In Winnipeg, she received the Manitoba Award of Achievement on June 6 of this year in recognition of her exceptional leadership and success in opening the aviation door to women.

Captain Bjornson was born and raised in Alberta. She was first hired in 1973 by Transair, now Canadian Airlines. Today, 18 years later, she is the only female jet captain employed by a scheduled airline in Canada.

Well done, Captain Bjornson. Well done, Canada.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, June 12 is an historic day for Filipino Canadians. Although we are now Canadian citizens, we carry in our hearts the memory of that day, 93 years ago, when our great-grandparents freed themselves from Spanish rule.

At that time, the Filipino people came to understand independence did not mean being alone, working in the interest of yourself; it meant standing together to attain greater goals.

Today, though we stand on Canadian soil, we carry from our motherland that spirit of independence.

Indeed, we believe the meaning of independence is unity, working together for the greater whole. This is one of the values we bring to Canada, along with goodwill and and understanding toward others. Happily they are values shared by all Canadians.

I hope the Filipino people in Canada and all Canadians will join us in celebrating Philippine Independence Day as we join together in our common search for national Canadian unity.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, on December 5, 1990, the CBC closed its three television stations in Eastern Quebec, depriving the people of the Lower St. Lawrence, the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands of a vital communications medium.

This situation has led to a dangerous level of underbudgeting for the CBC's radio stations, because initially, managers of television and radio stations had restructured their operations so that radio operating costs would be largely absorbed by the television budget.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents are worried, and they are afraid that what happened to television will happen to radio as well.

Mr. Speaker, I share their concern, and I want to ask the minister responsible for the CBC to do something about this right away.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my what an interesting course has been followed in the privatization of de Havilland.

First the government sells it to Boeing, or should we say pays Boeing to take it of its hands. Investment Canada thinks it is great—it always does—but Boeing decides its hands are full and sells it to the ATR consortium. Hence, privatization leads to government ownership, only not our government.

The opposition identified trouble ahead from the very beginning in lost jobs, lost research and development and lost production of the Canadian Dash-8 series. After all, ATR's commuter plane competes directly with the Dash-8.

Our government saw no problem because privatization is good. Investment Canada saw no problem because foreign ownership is good.

The European community is as concerned as our government is not about the reduction in competition in commuter aircraft and will examine it.

The sale delayed, de Havilland's survival is now endangered by the loss of orders caused by uncertainty and doubt and the stupidity of this government.

What will the government do to make it right? Buy de Havilland?

REFORM PARTY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Reform Party gave a speech on Tuesday night right here in Ottawa. He spoke at length but never once mentioned that he was in favour of controlling government expenditures by cutting thick layers of middle management in federal administration. That is his policy and it affects the residents of this city of Ottawa.

He also never mentioned his policy of a 15 per cent cut to federal program spending across the board in every area. This 15 per cent cut means seniors receiving the OAS and GIS would have their incomes reduced by $120 per month or $1,427 per year. It seems to me the Reform man has one message for Calgary and another message for Ottawa.

Why is he not consistent across Canada?

CO-OPERATIVES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an issue which is of great importance to my constituents, many of whom belong to co-operatives.

The co-operative is very important to Atlantic Canada. People in local communities, farmers, fishermen and consumers studied the problems that faced them and decided to solve those problems through the use of co-operatives. They have had great success. Today more than 174,000 families own 174 co-operatives.

With the GST, this government has created an unfair and unacceptable tax system which tilts the playing field against co-operatives. Today, if someone in Shediac or Buctouche wants to buy a share in a co-operative, they must pay GST.

On the other hand, someone wishing to invest in a large multinational corporation can buy the shares without paying the GST.

[Translation]

Furthermore, the GST is applied to certain foods purchased directly from a co-op, but it does not apply to the same foods purchased from a multinational chain. Because of this double standard, co-ops in the Atlantic provinces stand to lose over $1 million. This region needs a strong co-operative movement.

I feel the government should review this problem and give co-ops throughout the country a fair deal.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Conservative member for Bellechasse, the Hon. Pierre Blais, tabled new legislation on bankruptcy and insolvency.

It introduces provisions to protect workers affected by bankruptcy who lose their jobs and, in many cases, the wages they are owed.

From now on, these workers will be able to seek reimbursement for their unpaid wages up to a maximum $2,000, plus $1,000 for expenses in the case of travelling salesmen. They will receive this reimbursement within four to six weeks.

Mr. Speaker, this is a measure designed to help all Canadian workers.

I say: congratulations to the Tory government!

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the last edition of the cross-border report outlined the critical role of the Canada Customs in addressing the cross-border shopping issue.

In Sarnia—Lambton, cross-border shopping is visible through the line-ups at the Blue Water Bridge and the worrisome impact on local businesses.

The problem is serious, with no quick fixes. It will require effective, collaborative action by a number of players. This, however, does not preclude the federal government from seriously looking at our policies as they contribute to cross-border travel. This includes Canada Customs.

Locally this may include the trial of a PACE amended type program, the trial of tourist lanes or the use of new technology. Some or all may help improve service at the border, especially for our commuters and American travellers to and from the many tourist attractions in our area.

At the Blue Water Bridge, more personnel will help us address the line-ups. I have written directly to the Minister of National Revenue requesting more Customs personnel at the Blue Water Bridge.

With more personnel and other initiatives, the objective must be the collection of all applicable duties and taxes. We want no more wave-throughs and the absence of excessive line-ups at the Blue Water Bridge.

S. O. 31

BELLA COOLA

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, for many years the native and white villages of Bella Coola shared the same water supply.

However, when the federal government put in a new system on the reserve, the white village was left with an inadequate, badly contaminated water supply. Now the native supply has also been found to be contaminated, requiring much more work.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is now working with both parties to resolve the problems. It makes good sense for both villages to co-operate to establish one good, safe system rather than duplicate costly installations.

I call on all parties to work together to provide a safe and secure water supply for all, not just for part of the populations. We need more examples of native—white co-operation, not confrontation.

MEME BREAST IMPLANT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, despite the removal of the Meme breast implant from the market, thousands of Canadian women remain deeply troubled by the lack of information available on the safety of breast implants.

It is now apparent that research into the Meme is being guided not by the desire to provide impartial and factual information, but by political considerations.

A woman in Montreal has been told by a surgeon that he will remove her Meme implant only if she agrees to donate that implant to a research project at McGill University, headed by Dr. Carolyn Kerrigan, who is doing research funded by the manufacturer of the Meme and is the same doctor whose report on the Meme for the Department of National Health and Welfare claimed there was no health risk with the Meme.

Are members of the medical profession now more concerned with manipulating research than finding the truth and allaying the fears of Canadian women with the Meme implant? Are they being aided by this government which has demonstrated over the last several years that it has neither the resources nor the intent to give us the answers regarding the Meme implant?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I know that the minister said in the House yesterday that he does not like to be put under pressure during Question Period, but I would remind him of the advice of Harry Truman: "If you can't take the heat, get the hell out of the kitchen".

Yesterday it was announced that Mr. Gordon Smith, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal–Provincial Relations, was being reassigned overseas. Can the minister tell the House why Mr. Smith was let go? Why is the senior constitutional adviser to the government being sent overseas less than 60 days before the government tables its position before the country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that a great, well–known Canadian nationalist like the Leader of the Opposition would have to quote an American. Can he not find a Canadian to quote if he is trying to throw a jab across the House? He does however ask a serious question.

It should be made very clear that everyone in this government, and I am sure the hon. member who has had the opportunity to work with Gordon Smith, has the highest regard for his professional abilities. He is a first–class public servant and we look forward to continuing to work closely with him in his new assignment.

This is the number one priority file of the Government of Canada. We thought it made more sense to have the senior public servant in the country who is well experienced in this file working with me, working with the Prime Minister and working with our committee to ensure that we make the most progress possible toward renewing this country in the way that I believe the Leader of the Opposition and certainly members of this government want to see happen.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): What the minister is trying to tell us is not quite clear. We don't know whether he was fired or not. I would like to ask the minister: Did he discuss career plans with Mr. Smith yesterday? Or did he let Mr. Tellier do the dirty work and tell him he had been transferred? Or did Mr. Smith himself asked to be transferred to another position? What happened? Canadians want to know the facts. Why are we asking Mr. Smith to go overseas, far away from these issues, when the government called him back less than a year ago to work on this important dossier?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at least the Leader of the Opposition is now quoting Canadians, not Americans. At least that is something.

I think I already answered the question. A decision was made by the Prime Minister. I was consulted. As usual and as is normal in the circumstances, the first conversation was between the clerk and the deputy minister. And then I had a personal conversation with someone for whom I have a great deal of esteem and whom I consider as friend: Mr. Smith.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of the Prime Minister's right–hand man, Mr. Tellier, as Secretary to the Cabinet on Federal–Provincial Relations, means that the Prime Minister has retaken control of the constitutional file.

The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was appointed precisely because he was supposed to have some credibility and because he was not directly involved in the constitutional process last year. How can the minister operate at arm's length when he and the Prime Minister both have the same right arm?

I used to be in that job. I have been there before, and I want to ask a very serious question of the minister of constitutional affairs. How can he stay on as minister when the Prime Minister has so little confidence in him, when the Prime Minister made him his dignified parliamentary secretary?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been circumstances in this country when two parliamentarians, two Canadians, ran for the leadership of a party and one won and the other went away and sulked.

The example that the Prime Minister and I have set is that we both ran for the leadership of our party. When the Prime Minister was chosen the leader of my party and the Prime Minister of my country, I worked very closely with him. I continue to do that. I have no worry about that at all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Bring in the coffee, go get the coffee, very close.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Before the minister assumed his new responsibilities, the newspapers reported that he insisted on working at arm's length from the Prime Minister. How can he claim today that he is still working at arm's length, when his deputy minister no longer reports to him but directly to the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, here at least we work as a team, and I am absolutely confident we can continue on that basis.

I really would like to know, since the hon. member is his party's critic for constitutional affairs, whether the Liberal team can be as united and as effective as our team where constitutional matters are concerned. I hope so, because in that case, it will be good for the country.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that today, the minister is having a lot of trouble maintaining the semblance of credibility he wanted to have in the constitutional dossier.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Clearly, the answers he has given during the past few days and especially today cause one to question his ability to take care of the constitutional dossier himself, without having right behind him a Prime Minister who is prepared to gamble, to roll the dice on Canada's constitutional future.

My question to the minister is this: Could he confirm to the House that his suggestion was that the Prime Minister appoint Mr. de Montigny Marchand as the new deputy minister and that the Prime Minister refused and appointed Mr. Tellier instead?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's information on the situation in External Affairs is as incorrect in this particular case as it has been in other instances.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Following yesterday's meeting on the Canada-U.S.-Mexico trade talks I understand there were six committees created which defined the priority areas for the talks, but nowhere on this priority list were environmental issues, workers' standards or indeed social standards.

Will the minister give this House some assurance that he will work for an agreement on workers' rights, on environmental standards and on social standards, or will he say there will be no trade deal until we have those for the people of Canada and for the people in Mexico and the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the discussions that we had yesterday were related to the trade negotiations themselves. They were not related to the parallel work that we will be carrying out with the Mexicans and the Americans on questions that she has just raised on labour standards and environmental standards.

As I am sure my hon. friend is aware, we have a memorandum of understanding with the Mexicans where we are discussing—and we have had it in place for a little over a year now—environmental issues. That work will be going on.

I had a discussion with my colleague, Mr. Serra, and told him that we would like to have a group come down to Mexico City and discuss the work of that group in relation to the process of the trade talks.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, continually during the Canada–U.S. trade deal the minister said that it was just a commercial agreement and that it did not affect these other areas. However, if we talk to the 313,000 unemployed right now who have lost their jobs since the trade deal or the 1.5 million unemployed in Canada, if we talk to those people who had manufacturing jobs—and since 1989 one in six of those jobs has gone—clearly this government has to take seriously the concerns of working people and their futures and the futures of their families.

Many of the jobs, and the minister knows this, have already gone to Mexico. I could give a long list, but there are jobs from Burlington, Cambridge, Waterloo, Penetanguishene, and across Canada. We have seen companies moving out of this country. As one company official recently said: "These are jobs that will never come back to Canada".

During the last trade talks we talked about—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. leader to put her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: The minister has said there is no need for worker adjustment programs during these talks. Will the minister stand up for Canadian workers and make sure there are adjustment programs here in Canada? He certainly did not do it before. Will he take workers' concerns seriously this time?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me point out that the impact of the trade talks with Mexico is quite small in relation to the size of the free trade agreement with the United States.

In this case we are talking about $2.2 billion trade with Mexico, two-way trade; with the United States it was over $200 billion.

Since the free trade agreement with the United States we have increased the amount of funding for training programs by some $500 million to $800 million. We have responded to the needs of people who are moving from one job to another.

My friend has referred to the impact of the free trade agreement. I understand her difficulty in differentiating the effects of the recession and the effects of free trade.

• (1430)

I commented the day before yesterday in the House that the impact of the free trade agreement has resulted in our trade surplus with the United States growing from $14 to $17 billion and our exports to the United States growing by 12 per cent, both since 1988. In addition to that there has been a positive swing in Canada's direction of some six and a half billion dollars of foreign direct investment. There are many examples and I have a book here which outlines them.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that all unemployed workers across this country would love to see that book, but they cannot eat it. They need food on the table and they need jobs in this country. On another matter, Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Yesterday, Carla Hills, the U.S. negotiator in free trade talks with Mexico and Canada, his country, told journalists that according to her, everything was on the table. Nothing is excluded. Yesterday, however, the minister refused to say whether culture was excluded from the talks on the agreement with Mexico and the United States. I want to ask the minister responsible for these negotiations: What is he going to do to make the United States understand that culture is not negotiable?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have said time and time again culture is not negotiable. What Mrs. Hills said yesterday is that these matters were not discussed because it was not the forum for that type of discussion. If I asked Mrs. Hills whether marine transportation was on the table, she would say absolutely not. If I asked Jaime Serra Puche from Mexico whether the ownership of the oil energy reserves was on the table, he would say absolutely not.

Similarly, if I am asked by either of them whether culture is on the table, I say absolutely not.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to public documents, on April 30, Paul Tellier, the Prime Minister's chief public servant, gave advice to the Prime Minister that the press line on the Al-Mashat affair was, and I quote: "That ministers would respond that Mr. Al-Mashat met requirements as a retiree, was processed under minimal standards and was not accorded preferential treatment."

Today in press reports the Minister of Employment and Immigration has stated that this press line was a lie. The minister has said in effect that the Privy Council Office, which reports directly to the Prime Minister, was counselling ministers to tell a lie to Parliament. What has the Deputy Prime Minister or the Prime Minister done to investigate these extraordinary allegations?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will preface my answer by immediately stating that maybe my choice of words yesterday to a reporter—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: —was poor or too severe. I never intended to say that officials came to me and said go out and lie to Canadians.

What I meant to say was that if we had bought the media line that was offered to explain the entry of Mr. Mashat into Canada we would have misled Canadians. That is why, on May 14, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I gave a report as to how this happened. All the facts are before the committee and nothing has changed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the last three weeks we have seen ministers of this government committing acts of verbal gymnastics.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: There may not be anything wrong with it, but I did not know where it was going. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is where it is going. I think it is absolutely essential that this government, under the circumstances of these allegations and the statement made by the minister in the House, that once again he is changing his story. Is it not absolutely imperative this government reopen the parliamentary inquiry that was shut down this morning by its own members? Are we going to get to the truth or not of this case? Will the Deputy Prime Minister have the inquiry meet this afternoon to question this minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my sense is that the opposition is really not interested in the facts, they are more interested in pursuing their own theories and allegations, allegations which have yet to be substantiated.

Ministers have appeared before the committee. They have outlined a chronology of events. Officials have appeared before the committee. Still hon. members opposite are carrying on a witch hunt based upon their own allegations and theories. Well, they had their chance; why did they not do their job properly?

If hon. members of the opposition could not find evidence to substantiate their theories and their allegations, then why don't they knock it off?

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it concerns the astonishing statement that he is reported as having made today. I quote it verbatim because it is not a very complicated phrase. "They wanted me to lie."

There is no explanation in the story by way of direct quote as to who "they" are. Therefore, this statement is profoundly disturbing—calling into question the very integrity—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, the statement calls into question the integrity of civil servants and politicians alike. We on this side are interested in the facts. Will the minister give us the facts as to why he said "they wanted me to lie"?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that maybe my choice of words yesterday were poor. I did not mean to cast any implications.

He talks about the integrity of the Public Service, and I know the high esteem the hon. member—especially of the Liberal Party and the NDP—have for our Public Service. I saw how they treated Mr. Tellier so I understand his concern.

I never meant to cast doubts on the integrity of the Public Service. The words I should have used were that if I had followed the line suggested I would have misled Canadians, and I did not want to mislead Canadians. Hence, we are before a committee. They have all the facts, but he is still on his witch hunt. Go ahead.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the words are clear: "They told me to lie." There is no explanation about who "they" are. Talk about an innuendo against the entire civil service.

What is the minister going to do? These people do not have a public forum to defend themselves. What is the minister going to do to remove the cloud of suspicion he has placed over their heads with his cavalier phrase.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already explained that maybe the words were a bit harsh. But if the member really cares about the facts, let him look at the evidence before that committee. Take the media line that was offered and tell me, if I had come out and told Canadians that line what would I have done? I would have misled them and I did not want to mislead Canadians. The government does not want to mislead Canadians, and we haven't. The facts are there but you seem to like to continue keeping Canadians in the dark. Go on.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

The minister has said "the media line that was offered was wrong". I want to ask the minister a very straightforward question. In view of the fact that according to the evidence the committee has heard, the media line that was offered on April 30 was that which was prepared by Paul Tellier, the Clerk of the Privy Council.

I want to ask this minister a very straightforward question. Who were the officials to whom he is referring when he says "they wanted me to lie; I refused to lie". Who were those officials who wanted him to lie, that offered him a media line? Who prepared that media line that he was going to be offering up at the advice of public servants? Either come clean or stop the innuendo.

• (1440)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the question. If the member is really interested in knowing the facts, let him go to the evidence that was presented before the committee which, by the way, still has to report to this House.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have referred the minister directly to the evidence before the committee which indicates that the press line that was prepared for the Prime Minister by the Clerk of the Privy Council indicated that ministers were to lie and say that he was not accorded preferential treatment.

I want to ask this minister a straightforward question. Who was it that told the minister that the media line was in fact to indicate that there was no preferential treatment for Al-Mashat? Who told him to lie and who prepared the lie in the first place? Was it the Clerk of the Privy Council?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the committee is considering all the evidence before it. I think the answer to the hon. member's question is in the evidence that was given before that committee.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, at the committee the ministers were not under oath.

Yesterday, the minister said—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Just for a moment, I want to make a comment. Hon. members know that when we have an intense issue there are always temptations to either be very aggressive or to respond accordingly.

Second, we have been trying over a number of days to deal with the not altogether easy issue of how to handle the matter, some of which is outside the committee and some of which is in. I want it made very clear that I do not believe I would be doing my duty as your Speaker if I allowed preambles, no matter how well disguised, that amount to an accusation that somebody is not telling the truth.

I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind. I would hope that the hon. member for York South—Weston did not intend that. Please put your question.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister said: "They wanted me to lie. I refused to lie." A few minutes ago the same minister said: "If I followed the line I would have misled Canadians." It means the same thing. He is accusing civil servants of counselling him to tell a lie.

I would like to ask the minister, if that is the case, if in fact he was counselled by officials to lie to Canadians and to this Parliament, why did he not say so in version A or version B or version C or version D? Why did he wait until yesterday to make that allegation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for anyone who cares to look at the facts that are before the committee, he will see that I said nothing new yesterday. Everything is before the committee and the committee will draw its own conclusions and hopefully Canadians will do the same.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the minister today is confirming why 71 per cent of Canadians have formed the opinion that this government is not telling the truth in the Al-Mashat affair.

I would like to put a question to the minister again. I would like to ask the minister very specifically, when he made that statement yesterday about civil servants lying and when he repeated it again today in the House, exactly what did he mean and why did he not inform Canadians sooner that senior civil servants were counselling him to tell lies?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals give truth to the adage that truth is often stranger than fiction. They do not seem to be able to swallow the truth. They have it, the committee has it and it will report to the House.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this minister is having trouble keeping his story straight for more than 30 seconds.

The fact of the matter is that the minister is quoted in the newspaper as saying: "They wanted me to lie. I refused to lie". Now the minister says: "I did not mean to use those words". The minister was on Radio Canada today at noon, reaffirming this story about being asked to lie, in both official languages. In English and en français the minister has claimed he was asked to lie.

I ask the minister: Who asked you to lie? What was the lie? Will you come before a parliamentary committee?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave earlier still stands.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Let me be kind and say, with whatever word, with whatever adjective the minister cares to describe what people tried to influence him to do, we will accept any adjective he wants. But will he tell us, at least, what it was that certain people who are now unnamed, tried to influence him to do and why did he not tell the parliamentary inquiry when he appeared before it about this undue, improper influence exerted upon a minister, by whatever name he wants to categorize it? There is only one name Canadians understand. It is a whitewash and a cover-up and a lie.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, because of my great respect for the Chair, I withdraw the word "lie".

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

The government has expressed great concern about cross-border shopping by Canadians. With that in mind, how can the minister explain why most Canadian mail, including mail from Toronto to cities like Vancouver, Winnipeg and Calgary, is trucked over American highways, therefore avoiding using Canadian goods and services, purchasing Canadian gasoline or paying any Canadian taxes?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I assure you that Canada Post pays Canadian taxes. Indeed, under the direction of this government, it has gone from being a recipient of Canadian taxes to the tune of $400 million to paying a dividend last year of some $50 million and showing a profit of $150 million.

Canada Post is committed to delivering the mail within the standards that have been laid down. Every quarter auditors measure the performance. It is now the most efficient postal system in the world. They deliver the mail from Toronto to Calgary or Toronto to Vancouver and vice versa, as quickly as possible through private carriers. Most of it goes by airline, as a matter of fact, for those distances. Sometimes the airlines fly over the United States on the way to their destination.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Why would the Government of Canada encourage, or for that matter force basically through their bidding system, companies to drive through the United States? It is a lot of the mail, not just a bit of the mail that is going right through the States; therefore, they are not paying Canadian taxes on the services they buy. They are not providing jobs for Canadians. What kind of policy does this government have?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I really wonder where the hon. member is coming from in terms of this question. Canada Post is endeavouring to deliver the mail as quickly, as efficiently, accurately and as cheaply as possible.

• (1450)

Ninety per cent plus goes by air. Ground transport is usually for parcels and so on, but they try to get it from point A to point B as quickly as possible. They use Canadian truckers, Canadian drivers and, indeed, they are now returning profits to Canadian taxpayers who suffered too long because of the way the post office used to be run.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Canadians are feeling taxed to death and are demanding that cuts be made in the huge federal bureaucracy. I was pleased to hear last February that civil servants' pay will be frozen this year. The February budget also included a commitment that several layers of management will be eliminated and that 10 per cent or at least 475 executive jobs in the Public Service will be terminated.

Many business people have had to downsize their companies and lay off employees in order to survive, and they had to take these steps quickly. It is over three months since the budget announcement. I want to know if the government has made substantial progress in its commitment to cut at least 475 executive public servants and eliminate layers of management.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that based on the information we have gathered from various departments, I would say that the reduction is progressing rather well.

I have asked for a report to be made to me by September 1, 1991. I would like to remind him that we have indicated in the budget that a reduction of 475 managers would have to be achieved over a period of two years.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The government has known for more than a year that the term for the Commissioner of Official Languages would expire this week, yet, there have been no consultations with the opposition and no parliamentary resolution to appoint a new commissioner has been tabled.

Considering the constitutional discussions taking place and considering the attacks that are being made on linguistic duality, this level of incompetence is not acceptable.

When will the government commence negotiations or consultations with the opposition for the appointment of a new commissioner? Will we have that resolution to appoint a new commissioner before the House adjourns next week?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot assure that such a decision will be made before the end of the week, but I certainly will take the hon. member's question as a representation.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out, the government has known for a long time that the appointment would expire this week, and there is no excuse for this delay.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, minority language communities in this country are keenly aware that the situation is delicate and urgent. Is the government prepared to propose a successor to Mr. Fortier before it adjourns next week? This is very important.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member, I am sure that the matter is in hand.

I do not have all the facts at my disposal at the present time, but I will certainly get back to him as soon as I can.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications, and it is in one carefully crafted sentence as outlined in the Standing Orders.

The weekly newspapers were pleased to learn that current postal rates for Rate Code 2 weeklies were extended to March 1992. Some weeklies under Rate Code 3 cannot realize the benefits. Will Rate Code 3 weeklies be given some consideration as Rate Code 2 weeklies?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thought the question was excellent.

A program announced a few days ago deals with Rate Code 2, or community newspapers. In the case of Rate Code 3 newspapers which are regional and national weeklies, on March 1 my predecessor announced a program to assist them to the tune of some $2 million a year for the next three years.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are paying millions and millions of royalty dollars to American broadcasters because this government did not understand, did not consult and did not adequately defend Canadian cultural industries in the last round of the free trade negotiations.

Why do Canadians in Toronto, or anywhere else in Canada for that matter, have to pay twice as much as Americans for every single channel that they watch, the same ones that they watch. What is the minister planning to do about that?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, when they negotiated the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement did an excellent job in protecting Canadian culture. That is precisely why Carla Hills is attempting today to reopen the issue and why we are saying no.

As it relates to the issue of retransmission on cable, I am pleased to say that my hon. friend was at the luncheon at the Canadian Cable TV Association three days ago where I gave an excellent speech and outlined all of our positions on this.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister was satisfied with his performance. I can only tell you that the cable industry is not as satisfied as the minister is. The cable industry has been waiting six months for this minister to keep his promise, to keep his word, and to issue guidelines that can be used by the copyright board in the setting of royalty rates, which he has not done yet.

Is not the real reason why this minister cannot set those regulations and has not presented them because the Americans want to pluck even more than the 75 per cent to 80 per cent that they have plucked to date from Canadian pockets? When is this government going to say enough is enough. Do you not think that $38 million out of $51 million transmitted is just too much?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I watched my friend closely during that speech. She did not choke on her dessert when I got to that portion. She was very happy and looked very content with the initiative being taken by the government.

If the industry was waiting six months for me to take this action, the first four and a half were taken waiting for me to become minister. I have only had this job for about six weeks now. What I indicated in the speech was that my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I would be giving guidance to the copyright board. We will be doing that. There will be public hearings. They will have an opportunity to take on board all the concerns expressed by my hon. friend.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday, the Citizen's Committee of Guybourg sent the Minister of National Defence formal notice demanding that decontamination of the Longue-Pointe garrison property be started immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the minister intends to do about decontaminating this property.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter, and both the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Environment are concerned about a situation that is the result of many years of industrial development in the region.

A number of studies have been made in the past few years, and another study is currently being conducted to determine what action should be taken. I can assure the hon. member and the people of the area that we will do everything we can.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the chairman of the defence committee, the member for Crowfoot. I congratulate the hon. member on his re-election as chairman of the defence committee.

Does the hon. member intend to have the defence committee sit during the summer months to consider Rear Admiral Thomas' resignation and/or the defence paper and position before cabinet comes out and tells us all what is going to be done?

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it is the present intention of the defence committee to consider veterans affairs, which we have been doing. We will be going to Sunnybrook Hospital this coming Tuesday.

The hon. member asks me to answer the question and that is next. I think the question put by the hon. member for Annapolis—Hants is very appropriate, that we as a committee take a look at defence policy. We have indications that there will be a policy pronouncement coming very soon, in the early summer. It is the intention of the committee to take a look at that policy when it is there, to be a vehicle through which the public of Canada can make a response. The committee can then put its analysis to it and make recommendations.

BANKING CENTRES

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Finance). In December 1987, the Prime Minister announced in Montreal, with a great deal of media fanfare, that the city would become an international banking centre. Today, three years later, I would like to ask the minister how many Montreal banks are operating as international banking centres, and how many jobs were created thanks to his government's plan to establish international banking centres.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question is getting very close to the kind of question that should be on the Order Paper. If the minister wants to deal with it—

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that we, as a government, acted in response to a request from Montreal to make certain mechanisms available to them. We did, and I think it is up to Montreal to comment on the results of our co-operation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member will appreciate that I wait until the House is a little quieter so that I and others may hear him.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I would appreciate it if the government House leader would indicate the business for tomorrow, Monday, and for the remaining part of next week.

While the minister is on his feet, I would ask him a follow-up to what I had previously asked him and to a question that was directed to the Deputy Prime Minister today concerning the appointment of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Could he give us an update in terms of the process that will be put in place for this particular appointment, when in fact members of the opposition, particularly the opposition leader, would be informed and consulted on this most important matter? I understand the Deputy Prime Minister took it as a representation but I had asked him.

Would the government House leader indicate whether he intends to have some discussions later this day on the terms of reference with regard to the motion concerning constitutional affairs? I am in the process of writing a brief letter to the minister indicating some concerns that we have on this matter. Perhaps he might want to receive it before replying in detail.

Finally, would the government indicate whether or not it will be tabling a bill before June 21 with regard to freezing salaries of public servants? Is it the minister's intention to table a bill, or is it his intention not to proceed with that before June 21?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, today we will be continuing debate under the order of Supply which will conclude at 10 p.m. with the introduction and passage of the appropriations bills that follow from the estimates.

Tomorrow, pursuant to a House order, we will proceed to complete third reading of Bill C-11. Then I would like also to complete second reading of Bill C-10, the Excise Tax Act, as well as complete report and third reading of Bill C-2, the National Energy Board bill. There have also been discussions with my colleague, the Minister of Labour, and members of the two parties in respect of legislation to bring to an end a grain handlers' work stoppage on the west coast. This is causing considerable financial harm to the farming community, which does not need any more bad news in terms of what has been happening vis-à-vis international prices and markets.

On Monday it would be my intention to call for continued second reading of Bill C-20, the budget implementation bill. In terms of the remainder of that week, I would hope to have discussions with opposition House leaders to determine how we might most expeditiously complete the program for the following week.

In terms of the Commissioner of Official Languages, as I have indicated the Prime Minister certainly intended to have the discussions with the leaders of the parties. I know that there has been difficulty in terms of travelling plans. While the Prime Minister was in the city, the Leader of the Opposition was not, and vice-versa. But there will certainly be those consultations in respect of naming a commissioner, and I will have to get back to the hon. member to tell him specifically what efforts are being made to conclude those as early as possible.

The terms of reference for the joint committee on the Constitution I believe have been made available to both parties for examination. The President of the Privy Council has had discussions with the constitutional spokesman for the Liberal Party, as well as with the leader of the New Democratic Party, about these terms of reference. I understand there is general acceptance, but if there are recommendations for improvements I am sure those will be entertained.

The desire of the government is to get this committee sanctioned by Parliament so it will be in a position to work in the fall when the federal government's paper is available. We all hope and pray that the work of this committee will come to a successful conclusion resulting in a more unified country.

I am not able to confirm or deny the question of whether a bill will be tabled respecting a freeze on the Public Service other than to make the general commitment that the policy and the intentions of the government outlined in the budget continue to be in effect. There has been no change in the government's position in respect of what was announced in the budget.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, through you to the government House leader, I appreciate his remarks with regard to business for tomorrow, but I am wondering if you might consider, because of travel plans of some of our critics, that we could proceed with Bill C-10 and perhaps with Bill C-11 thereafter.

The minister has referred to the terms of reference of the constitutional committee. Quite rightly there have been discussions among the various parties. We have a number of concerns that I will put in writing and deliver to the government House leader forthwith, and then perhaps later this day if we could peruse those that would be very helpful.

Finally, with regard to the appointment of the new Commissioner for Official Languages—and I say this quite seriously—I would hope that the government would proceed expeditiously and provide the necessary information to opposition members on this matter. Although members are travelling and schedules are varied, perhaps if the Prime Minister were to initiate in writing his concerns and his perspectives on this matter, this might help to facilitate a decision which we believe is fundamental to our country and of course to official bilingualism.

• (1510)

Could the government House leader give us some assurances with regard to the bill, the constitutional committee and the Official Languages Commissioner?

Mr. Andre: Certainly in terms of the bill I would concur with that suggestion. There is no problem in that regard. In terms of the table officers the order would be Bill C-10, Bill C-11, and Bill C-2, perhaps altered, depending on discussions in respect to the bill to end the work stoppage and the grain handlers 'strike on the west coast.

In terms of reference I really do not have anything to add. I cannot speculate what might be in the hon. member's letter, but I am always pleased to receive mail from the hon. member. I just hope he gets the postal code right.

The third point dealt with the Commissioner of Official Languages. I will certainly pass on the representation of the hon. member to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, on this same point, the last point the government House leader addressed with regard to the Commissioner of Official Languages, I wonder if the government House leader could assure the House that the position will not be left vacant over the summertime. He knows that a resolution of both the House of Commons and the Senate is required in order to make that appointment, so I wonder if he could just assure us that this position will be filled over the next week.

Mr. Andre: I can certainly assure the member every effort will be made in that regard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

VANDALISM

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, earlier this week I provided the Speaker with a letter outlining a question of privilege that I wished to raise today.

The matter involves events last week where several members' constituency offices were targeted for vandalism which involved gluing posters to the windows. I learned over the course of the weekend through an article that appeared in the newspaper that a staff member from the constituency office for the hon. member for Edmonton East said she had participated in the planning of this.

I believe it is totally inappropriate for a member of this House or their staff to be involved in the wilful vandalism of government or House of Commons property. I have had to have these posters removed, and other members have, and bills have been incurred which will ultimately be paid by the House of Commons and thereby the taxpayer.

I think there are precedents involved where contempt has been found involving the placing or the publishing of posters. I do not want to take the time of the House today to outline them all, but they are mentioned in, among other places, Griffiths, Parliament; Functions, Practice and Procedures.

There are two points here I would like to make. First of all, I think this could be resolved in a number of ways. If the persons responsible are prepared to pay for any damages, then that could be satisfactory. However, Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member and a person working, employed and paid by the House of Commons should be willing to provide the names and details and information to you. If it was thought appropriate, it could be taken up by the Board of Internal Economy and/or the Management Committee of the House. I think there is a responsibility to do that.

Madam Speaker, beyond that, if it is found by you to be a case, I would naturally be prepared to move the appropriate motion. However, as I said, there may be other ways to resolve this matter.

It is important to deal with it, however, because we in this House know what happens with precedents, even when we transgress a line and it is not that substantial a transgression. The fact is we must deal with this matter because we realize the kind of escalation this could lead to. I ask that you consider this matter and the references to Beauchesne's on this and on the fact that in the past there have been instances of contempt found relating to this sort of thing.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, as is often the case in such matters, I fear the dispelling of the charges made will take slightly longer than the making of the charges. I would like to say at the outset, for myself and for all members of my staff to the best of my knowledge, I neither advocate, support, nor condone vandalism, the wilful destruction of property, public or private.

Having said that, I would like to deal with the question of the vandalism committed against the hon. member's office, who did it and how it was arrived at. I had hoped that in his presentation to the House today, the member would offer research evidence on the matter somewhat greater than simply reading an article from the June 7, issue of The Edmonton Journal. Unfortunately, no such evidence was forthcoming. Let me put him straight on a couple of counts.

The first deals with the meeting identified in the article. I shall read the sentence. I quote: "Curran", that is my constituency assistant, "who is a member of the network", which is to say the Action Canada Network, which does not, properly speaking, have members, but we will let that pass, "said she attended the meeting which planned the poster campaign as a private citizen".

In speaking to my constituency assistant, I found out that the meeting referred to and, in fact originally raised by the reporter and not by her, was the annual general meeting of the Action Canada Network in Alberta held several weekends ago over the course of a Friday, Saturday and Sunday. I attended the same meeting. All kinds of things were discussed at that meeting and absolutely no particular actions were decided upon at that time.

As well, I have through conversations with others determined that members of the interim steering committee of the Action Canada Network, of which Ms. Curran is not a member, were the ones who decided that the printing and circulation of a poster to Action Canada Network sympathizers would be undertaken. What those sympathizers then did with that poster was left up to them. Again, Ms. Curran had absolutely nothing to do with that.

Finally, I would note that Ms. Curran is not alleged by anyone to have actually taken part in the postering that has so distressed the hon. member. That is good, because I can assure that she did not.

For the hon. member to say, and I quote exactly his submission in this House, that Ms. Curran was involved in the planning of this is utterly incorrect.

Mr. Dorin: She said it herself.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): No, I am sorry. What she said was, and it is not a quote, it is a paraphrase. Ms. Curran "said she attended the meeting which planned the poster campaign as a private citizen". What was meant by what my assistant said to the reporter at the time was that she was present at the Action Canada Network annual general meeting in which all sorts of things were discussed. And had the hon. member taken the time to talk to either the reporter or the constituency association or, I would hazard, anyone involved with the Action Canada Network at the leadership level, he would have been able to discover that for himself. However, failing that, we are burning the time of the House in this pursuit.

In any event, I would conclude by noting that there is no hint anywhere here that can be sustained that my constituency assistant was in any way involved in any improper activity and I greatly resent the implication that she was.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest brought to the attention of the Chair the fact that there was some vandalism recently at his constituency office in Edmonton. In his presentation he said that there seemed to have been a possibility that someone who works in the constituency office of the hon. member for Edmonton East may have been involved.

I did allow the hon. member to answer. Of course it was his right.

The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest may have a grievance. But the notion of privilege extends to his role in the House or in committees. I can understand the way he must have felt arriving at his office and finding vandalism. He certainly has a grievance. He may even want to seek redress through the courts, but I cannot see how his privilege has been affected either in the House or in committees or how this could be in contempt of the House.

• (1520)

Mr. Dorin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want in any way to disagree with the opinion of the Chair, but I would like to file, in this particular case with the Table, a research report done for me by the Library of Parliamentary as background on this matter. It is for the information of the Table and the Speaker.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order. To start with, is there any rule under which the hon. member can table something like this with the Table? Assuming that he can, I had asked that he supply me with a copy and he agreed to. So that is fine.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member has offered to table it, but it would not be an official tabling.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1991–92—CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. Pauline Browes (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 1, in the amount of $56,606,000, under FINANCE—Financial and Economics Policy Program—Program Expenditures in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 (less the amount voted in interim supply) be concurred in.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today on Motion No. 2 in today's order of proceedings before the House.

The motion suggests that the government should abandon its financial and economic policies. On the contrary, it is vital that we continue to implement these policies for the very good reason that our financial and economic program is working directly at getting Canada out of the current recession and back to growth and job creation.

The government's plan for economic recovery, introduced in the February budget, emphasizes controlling expenditures and reducing inflation. This is the key to the lower interest rates that will boost consumer spending and business investment to fuel growth and new jobs.

This approach has its critics and of course that is no surprise. After all, for nearly 20 years through the early 1980s, Canadians were accustomed to a federal government with fiscal philosophies that could be summed up in two words: charge it. In fact, in 1984 the government was handing out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected in taxes. That philosophy has had harsh consequences.

We are now paying the price over and over again for too many years of consuming more government services than we are willing to pay for. This is the reason our national debt will reach $400 billion by mid-year; about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. That does not include another $100 billion in debt by other levels of government.

The interest costs alone on the federal debt lead up over $43 billion next year. That is equal to 36 cents of every tax dollar Canadians pay. It is more than the government spends on Old Age Security, unemployment insurance, veterans' pensions and family allowances combined. That is why the federal budget refuses to buy short-term recovery at the cost of a return to surging deficits and runaway debt. The lessons of the last 20 years make that point bluntly. This spendthrift approach only creates a vicious circle of higher inflation and interest rates, leading us back to the inevitability of economic decline, lost jobs and lower government revenues.

We have instead taken a different path based on a continuing commitment to deficit and debt control. The February budget severely restrains the cost of government, including wages and salaries for the Prime Minister, the cabinet, for members of Parliament and for the federal Public Service. It extends the two-year expenditure control program introduced in 1990, including limits on the growth of transfers to provinces, so that it will now continue through 1994-95 and the saving achieved will total more than $15 billion.

What makes this a watershed budget is that it also takes dramatic measures to achieve nothing less than a fundamental change in the political culture of government spending. These interlocking measures will transform good financial management by government from the realm of promise and political will into a matter of law. By so doing, they can play an important role in changing the expectations of Canadians regarding government spending, municipal and provincial as well as federal.

As part of this fundamental change, we will introduce legislation to impose mandatory limits on the annual program spending for the next five years. Flexibility will be confined to a very limited set of contingencies. It will not preclude new programs to meet new needs, but these must be funded from within the total legislated spending ceiling. In short, it will soon be against the law for the federal government to overspend.

The second leg of our commitment to guarantee spending control lies in the proposed debt servicing reduction fund introduced in the House yesterday. This fund ensures that all revenues from GST will be used to service debt and reduce the debt, and not to fund new program spending.

The third thrust of our strategy was to announce specific inflation targets to bring inflation down to 2 per cent by the end of 1995.

By working to meet these targets, we can establish the conditions that will make possible a sustained and lasting decline in interest rates. This will help control the interest charges on the national debt.

This interlocking strategy will deliver concrete and decisive results. The deficits for 1990-91 and the coming year will be held to $30.5 billion despite the difficulties caused by the recession. That is down from the $35 billion we were looking at when we started the budget planning process.

Then, for 1992-93, with economic recovery, lower interest rates and restrained government spending, the deficit will fall sharply to $24 billion. Three years after that, by 1995-96, it will have dropped to just $6.5 billion, the lowest deficit in nearly 20 years.

As well, the need for new government borrowing on financial markets will be eliminated even sooner, by 1994-95. This will meet the goal we first set out in the 1989 budget and will represent for the first time in 25 years that no such borrowing is needed.

Last, we will no longer be borrowing money to pay the interest on the money that we have already borrowed.

Underlying these results will be the truly revolutionary change in the politics of budget making that the plan launches. I want to be clear about what it means. It means any federal government that wants to exceed the specific limits or to use the GST revenues for a purpose other than debt reduction, will have to go to Parliament to change the law.

• (1530)

It will have to explain to the taxpayers of Canada why it plans to spend more of their money, and the government will have to justify publicly the consequences that this will have for the deficit and the debt, for taxes and for its own credibility.

I have said that these spending controls make this a watershed budget. At the same time, they build on the commitment of good financial management that has been the basis of this government's program since 1984.

Some people do not share that view. It is easy to use hindsight to say we should have taken even tougher steps than we did, but it is important to recognize how far we have come, the real progress made in dealing with financial problems the government inherited nearly seven years ago.

The fact is that the federal government's spending programs and service have been under tight control since 1984–85. This has required tough and often unpopular measures.

Payments to VIA Rail and CBC have been scaled back. We have eliminated programs on home insulation and oil substitution. Military bases have been closed. The structure of the Old Age Security and family allowance programs were changed to recover these transfers from high income Canadians who did not need them. We reduced the size of the Public Service substantially to the level of the early 1970s.

Thanks to these measures, we were able to hold increases in spending to an annual rate of just 3.7 per cent. That is well below the rate of inflation and the growth in our economy, and is well behind the growth in the over–all provincial spending.

By contrast, in the 15 years prior to 1984–85, the federal government program spending increased on an average yearly rate of 13.8 per cent. We have achieved a really remarkable change.

The results of our spending restraint have been substantial. As a share of Canada's economy, spending on programs has fallen from 19.6 per cent in 1984–85 to 16 per cent this year, the lowest level since the 1960s.

Without this restraint, federal program spending this year would have been $30 billion higher and our deficit would have more than doubled from what it is to nearly $70 billion.

This spending restraint has also substantially slowed the growth of the national debt. In 1984–85, the debt was growing at an annual rate of about 25 per cent. Today this is down to less than 10 per cent, but this is still not acceptable. With our budget measures, we will eliminate completely the need to borrow money within four years.

When they hear these figures, many Canadians then ask: "Why is the deficit so high and the debt still growing?" The answer lies directly in the impact of compound interest on the $206 billion debt we inherited. The fact is that the interest payments on the 1984 debt are the only reason for our deficit position today and the direct cause for the debt having nearly doubled.

The next question people often raise is: "Why are you not making absolute cuts in total program spending rather than just restraining its growth in order to bring the deficit down even faster?" The answer lies in what the spending involves and the important public needs it serves.

More than half of all the program spending consists of major transfers to persons and to other levels of government. The transfer to individuals includes monthly Old Age Security benefits, family allowances, veterans' pensions and unemployment insurance.

Since half of these transfers are directly to the elderly, it is a combination of an aging population and full indexation of benefits to inflation that have made this the fastest growing area of government spending.

The other largest target area of program spending is, of course, provincial transfers. This is designed to support health care, education, welfare and other services of direct benefit to Canadians. Growth in this area over the past six years has averaged 6 per cent, just behind the growth in the transfer to individuals.

The rest of the program spending covers every other aspect of government activity including national defence, the internal operation of the government, foreign aid and programs for science and regional assistance. In many of these areas we have imposed dramatic disciplines. For example, transfers to business which cover regional development and science and technology spending has been cut from $4.7 billion in 1984–1985 to just $3.6 billion this year. Over the same period, spending on the operations of government has grown an average of only 1.2 per cent a year. Taking inflation into account, this means that the real cost of government today is actually 25 per cent less than six years ago.

These figures should drive home just how little room is available to make further cuts. An absolute reduction in total program spending simply could not be sustained without a serious impact on programs to help Canadians in need and on other essential services.

This does not mean that the deficit battle cannot be won. Rigorous spending restraint combined with the impact of lower interest rates and the higher revenues made possible by economic recovery will do the job. It is to make sure the job is done that we are instituting the legislated spending limits proposed in this budget.

Again I want to emphasize that there is no misplaced optimism or mathematical mumbo-jumbo at work when I say that the deficit will come down to $24 billion by 1992-1993. We will no longer be faced with the transitional costs of the GST, representing a $2 billion saving. The gulf war spending is behind us. The expenditure control plan will deliver savings of another $2.3 billion. Lower interest rates will ease the burden of servicing the debt, and economic recovery will reduce unemployment insurance costs and strengthen government revenues.

In turn, this sharp drop in the deficit combined with national recovery will see the debt begin to shrink as a portion of our economy. This threshold step will mean that government revenues, combined with the continuing benefits of lower interest rates and government spending caps, will be sufficient to eliminate the need for new borrowing in 1994-1995 as the budget states.

The legislated spending limits and the inflation targets we have set out should encourage all Canadians to recognize that we can no longer afford to buy government services on credit. They are also powerful tools that the budget provides Canadians to continue challenging their politicians about spending.

Our program of financial and economic policies is already proving its worth. While there is still real weakness in our economy, we continue to be confident that growth will resume in the second half of this year and rebound strongly in 1992.

This is not just a government perspective. The World Economic Outlook published by the International Monetary Fund this spring shares that view, projecting 1992 growth for the Canadian economy of 3.5 per cent, a growth rate that, according to the IMF forecast, would lead all G-7 nations except Japan.

Looking further ahead, the continued easing in inflationary pressures expected over the near term will set the stage for strong growth over the medium term. We expect the real GNP growth to average at a rate of 4 per cent over the 1993-1996 period.

As I said, there is real evidence that we are indeed on track for that return to growth in the next six months.

Short-term interest rates have fallen over 5 per cent since their peak in May of last year. The real rate for 90-day commercial paper has declined from 9.6 per cent a year ago to 3.2 per cent this April. The Canada-U.S. interest rate differential has narrowed from the peak of over 500 basis points to under 300 basis points.

Reduced interest rates have helped generate a welcome upturn in the Canadian housing industry, a leading indicator of recovery. In April, housing starts were up more than 30 per cent over March. They increased another 16.4 per cent in May to an annual rate of 149,000 units. In fact, the total number of housing starts this April and May were 42,500 units higher, a more than 44 per cent increase over the same period last year. Employment has continued to increase for three consecutive months to 34,000 jobs in May, virtually all of them full time. And, while the unemployment rate edged up slightly last month after falling to 10.2 per cent in April from 10.5 per cent in March, it was the result of an increase in the labour force itself and not because of job losses.

There are other positive sides. The manufacturers' shipments of automotive products, another important indicator, increased sharply in March. The Conference Board of Canada index Business Confidences increased 29 per cent in the first quarter, with more executives expecting economic improvement than at any time since 1984.

The negotiated wage settlements, an important source of the inflationary pressure that pushes up interest rates, increased only by 3.4 per cent in April, down substantially from 6.2 per cent average increase in the settlement during the first quarter.

Let me say that we are not out of the woods yet. We could still lose the path to recovery if we abandon our commitment to restrain spending and bring inflation down. We must not let that happen. This government will not let that happen, because it would mean abandoning our commitment to the economic future of all our citizens, including those still facing hardships.

There is ample evidence to suggest that our financial and economic policies are working to put Canada back on the path to sustained growth and productive economic activity in the years ahead. I would ask the hon. members to bear this evidence in mind when the motion is put before this House.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. parliamentary secretary could comment on the subject of government finances and cutbacks that members of Parliament are being lobbied about at this very moment by the Canadian Nurses Association. The report by the Canadian Council of Welfare just a few days ago predicts that very shortly transfers to the provinces for health care will be reduced to zero at various times for each province. Specifically this is a great concern that we have with many people, including our nurses who have been leading the charge in the last couple of days here in Ottawa.

I would like the hon. gentleman to comment on that concern about medicare. With his many years here in this Chamber, I wonder if he could comment on the question generally and on what the government's position is.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, generally speaking our major concern—and while I know there are specific instances of nurses and other groups who may feel that they are being disadvantaged by not having a rise in their wages— is the long-term effect that continued growth in the public debt and continued growth in the deficit is going to have on this country in the long term.

We are moving into a new world, a global economy, and we are seeing massive changes in manufacturing styles in the world. We are seeing new productive facilities coming into place that require massive capital expenditures by people in business, and we are seeing an ever increasing debt load of services that the general public is demanding.

We have to try and find a balance between these things, and we are doing that to the very best of our ability. It may mean that there are some people who may feel that they are disadvantaged by the course that we are taking. But our objective is to get more people working, to see that our industries are re-equipped in the proper way so they can compete in the global market, to see that we can knock down the barriers between our provinces and get trade moving fluidly across the country. That is what our objective is. We are not taking a swing at public servants or nurses or anybody in particular. We think the matter is so serious that it has to be shared around the country. I know that when you ask someone who feels they are on the edge, that they have nothing to share, then we feel for them and we do what we can through whatever programs we have available to assist them.

On the other side, if you look at the revenue we have had coming into the government over the years and the fact that for a number of years we have had to go offshore and borrow $30 billion, it is almost a locked-in position.

You bring out a budget and what happens? Your revenue is $30 billion under what you take in, so you just continue to allow that to grow until you have a massive public debt on which compound interest works miracles and makes it double and quadruple in a short period of time. The first thing you know, it affects your ability to operate outside the country. It affects the rate of inflation and the interest rates in the country. It has just gone far enough and we have to do something about it. That is why we have put these various programs in place to try and rectify what has happened in the past.

I do not want to comment on why it happened, how it happened, or the political climate of the time or the social climate of the time. I lived through it and the hon. member lived through it, so we both know it very well. I think we are doing the right thing. I guess time will tell.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, first of all, before I go into another matter, in the member's last response, he referred to borrowing money offshore. The implication I got from that response was that we were borrowing approximately $30 billion offshore each year. That concerns me somewhat. I wanted to give the member an opportunity to correct that, if in fact, that was not what he said. I think he probably would want to correct that. My understanding is that somewhere between 18 and 25 per cent of the deficit is borrowed offshore now, as opposed to the rest being borrowed domestically.

I throw that over to the member for his opportunity to clarify for me what he meant by that.

Second, he has talked in his speech today about getting the deficit down to a more manageable position. I specifically wanted to have him talk for a minute to this House and to the people of Canada about the legislation that has been proposed both in the throne speech and the budget, the debt servicing and reduction fund. There have been various interpretations of this.

Mr. Belsher: It is on the right track, is it not?

Mr. Whittaker: The member for Fraser Valley East said they are on the right track. I think if they did get the deficit under control, they would be on the right track. What I want from the member for Burlington is some indication that this is not simply a shell game. It seems to me that in the budget they have talked about various moneys going in to be used to service the national debt.

Quite frankly, right now we are servicing the national debt. That is the interest charges we pay; 35 cents on each dollar we take in is paid in servicing our national debt. Is this debt servicing and reduction fund simply a public relations thing to show the people that money is going somewhere where it is already being paid?

I am a little confused and I think the people I have talked to around Canada are a little confused. Is the government trying to pull the wool over the peoples' eyes? I would like the member to respond to this.

• (1550)

Mr. Kempling: When I made reference to borrowing $30 billion offshore, I was speaking in very broad terms. I know that the percentage we borrow offshore will vary from year to year according to domestic conditions and markets offshore.

What we have done in the last few years is to move from medium term notes and bonds to rather short-term money. We have been able to ratchet that down and we are not borrowing that total $30 billion offshore. In fact, since I have been in this House, I can remember a time when the Government of Canada encouraged provinces to borrow offshore because that would put pressure on the Canadian dollar and drive its value up. That is gone now, and we are not interested in pursuing that avenue any more.

As far as the other part of his comment goes, the debt servicing and reduction fund is not a shell game. We are in better shape than some of the provinces are, because a lot of them have issued bonds of a fairly long-term nature. They have to let those bonds mature before they can pay them off, or pay a penalty for paying them off early. Most of our dead instruments are relatively short term, many of them less than a year, many of them less than two years. As the money comes into the debt servicing and reduction fund we will be able to pay those obligations off, and therefore will not require the amount of servicing as far as the deficit is concerned. Of course, this will reduce the national debt at the same time.

You can stand in your place and say: "Well, we are going to bring the deficit down". This is my 19th year here and I have heard it so often that it is almost tattooed on my forehead. But to do something to convince people that we are going to bring it down, I think is worth while. That was the purpose, to say: "We are going to devote the revenue from the GST into the debt service and reduction fund".

I had many people say to me: "I do not mind it. If you are going to do that with the GST, I do not mind it at all. And the same with the sale of Crown corporations. Well, what do you do with that money? If you are going to dedicate that money to debt service and reduction, that is fine, that is okay with me". And so that is what we have done.

All I can say to the hon. member is that it is not a shell game. I would just suggest that he watch it closely, keep his eye on it, and I am sure he will because I know him to be a member of honesty and integrity. We will see how it goes a year from today.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am speaking to the estimates of the Conservative government. One of the reasons I wish to address this question is due to the myth this government has tried to create.

This government first came to power in 1984 on a program of fiscal management. It told the people of Canada it could manage the monetary aspects of our economy far better than the people before had done.

I must say that in 1984 I was quite naive and I thought perhaps the Conservatives might accomplish that. I must say I have been extremely disappointed, as have the rest of the people of Canada, because they continue to do and say one thing and do whatever they feel like doing behind closed doors.

One of the first things they do is they come up with stacks of estimates. These estimates are a bunch of figures and they look not bad. But the first thing you have to realize is that these are not necessarily just the moneys they are going to spend. These figures are often misleading, because it takes nothing at all for this government to bring in Supplementary Estimates. All of a sudden it is a whole new ball game, and the government has not really explained to the people of Canada what it has done.

The other thing that I wish to address is this: I first came to office in 1988 and in early 1989, I was assigned to the public accounts committee. I was very interested in hearing many of the Auditor General's reports and they are all public. Since then I have taken on the task of going over many of the Auditor General's reports.

One of the things discovered is that if one takes the Auditor General's reports from 1985 through 1989, one finds a long chronicle of moneys mismanaged, expenditures inadequately disclosed or not disclosed at all and cost overruns. All of the items are on public record and many of them have been the subject of news coverage in the past. The cumulative effect of all these items is mind-boggling.

If one goes through and quietly adds some of these numbers up, one realizes that had these problems been addressed right from beginning, one would have saved billions of dollars. It is no laughing matter. It is certainly something that they could have done had they wanted to when they first formed the government.

The other thing that has happened is that they have used creative bookkeeping. I like to use that term because it is something that accountants can relate to. When one does not want to really disclose something one changes the format by which one presents it. That makes it very difficult for people to compare year to year.

I decided to try and review the budgets of the government from 1985 to 1989. I picked those years because the Auditor General's reports were present for those years. I wanted to review them sequentially from 1985 to 1989 and to find out the yearly increases beyond the level of inflation in each year. Then, I wanted to break these down into spending areas: defence, health, welfare. I subtracted amounts that related to transfer payments because obviously the government has very little control over funding in this area unless it just decreases it. It cannot control its spending as much as it would like to I am sure.

One of the things that surprised me was that one could not do this. One could not compare year to year. Do you know why? Prior to 1987–88, government budgets were prepared according to program envelopes, nothing wrong with that, namely: economic and regional development, social development, services to government, Parliament, defence, external affairs and fiscal arrangements. This permitted expenditures within each area to be tracked from year to year.

In 1987–88, however, a brilliant move: the federal government introduced a different format, supposedly for better bookkeeping, I would think. Who knows? One never knows for sure.

Only defence spending remained in the program envelope. Other more generalized categories such as major transfers to persons and transfers to other governments replaced program envelopes, whereas earlier fiscal plans contained additional tables relating specifically to program expenditures by category. These too were removed.

In 1989–90 the budget format was again altered, this time to include three new categories: subsidies, Crown corporations and other operations. These three categories had not previously existed and accounted for approximately $32 billion in government spending.

Do you understand what I am getting at? It is very easy to generally say: "See what great guys we are", because there is a lot of room for hiding and manoeuvring and all the rest of it.

The result of these format changes, of course, is that while cumulative program expenditures can be compared from year to year, it is no longer possible to determine the increases within any given area of spending. Strange, isn't it?

It is worth while noting that program expenditures which amounted to about $87 billion in 1984–85, the year the Conservative government came to power, have increased to an annual amount of $103.5 billion. Just interesting. We are not talking about interest charges here; we are talking about program expenditures. There is a little bit of difference. Why the huge increase? It may be justified and it may not be, but at least, when you look at the auditor's report, $500 million annually could have been saved within these program expenditures if moneys had been managed with regard to economy and efficiency.

• (1600)

Many times when one looks at the Auditor General's reports one realizes that program objectives are not met, maybe due to political interference. The Auditor General infers that but does not necessarily say it. It is quite obvious when one considers the building of a correctional centre in an inappropriate area and it just happens to be the region of the party leader's riding.

I have got details of it here. This was reported for the year 1986, as having happened in 1986, which is before my time. I am just repeating what the Auditor General said in those years. It states:

> Political objectives outweighed program objectives. Correctional Services was required to build for no program reasons and was required to build institutions at certain economically depressed areas to increase employment.

This may be a good idea, but it certainly is not good fiscal management.

This meant that Correctional Service Canada had to build at higher security levels than needed, such as protective custody, when it already had surplus capacity. That was in 1986.

Ten billion dollars was lost due to a late decision to cancel the special handling unit at the Atlantic institution, creating a contingent liability of $1 million to the contractor. One goes on and on.

One hears about additional costs of $4.6 million due to major design changes. That is not a small amount of money, think about it, $4.6 million. A drop in the bucket. We talk about deficits and how well we manage things. We have another one here that says $1.7 million went for brick cladding for concrete walls. Additional.

What I saw when I was looking at all this is that it is almost a given that when a government contract goes out, whoever gets the contract gets cost plus. One wonders. One gives out a contract and then one comes back and adds in one's extras. There are examples of that everywhere. One does not have to go very far. Every year it seems to happen.

Now what kind of controls it has over its tendering process, I do not know, but there are very good examples of it. One can go through the Auditor General's report and it is very obvious.

One of the ones that just happened, I think it was reported in 1990, was the amount of money paid by DRIE in February 1987 to a company in Alberta for the development of a turbo–charger, despite the concerns of the NRC. In January 1989, the new Department of Western Economic Diversification took over this program and made a second payment despite information not being provided in accordance with the agreement. To add insult to all of this, in March 1989, it learned that the prototype that it had been funding had been destroyed in 1987, but the final payment was made anyway. After all, it was a buddy. Who knows? What is the justification?

These are examples that are taken directly from the Auditor General's report. Each and every one of you can get the reports out yourself. Some $148,500 was approved to construct a golf course, including the retroactive reimbursement of cost despite program criteria requiring that no significant contractual commitment be made prior to a request for funds. When they went out and asked for the money the project was almost finished. Kind of a neat deal, eh? I would like to do that. I will go out and build myself a house and then I will go and ask people for money and they will give it to me. I think a lot of people in Canada would like that.

An hon. member: Sure.

Mrs. Marleau: Those are the kinds of things that have been going on, despite all the claims of great management and great fiscal responsibility.

The first myth that this government brought forward was that the Liberals were such terrible spenders. They were such terrible spenders that they took over this terrible debt. One of the things they failed to mention was that for 1984–1985, Marc Lalonde, who was then finance minister, had projected a deficit of $29–some billion, which was very high. It was the end of a terrible recession.

What they failed to tell people was that they allowed this deficit to rise to $38 billion because it gave them a cushion, a real neat cushion. At the end of 1984–1985, rather than having a deficit of $29 billion, it was $38 billion. Let me point out that the recession was well on its way to being over. Things were coming back, things were looking very good.

Let us just set things straight here. We went from a projected deficit of $29 billion to a deficit of $38 billion, and they say: "Well, it was the Liberals that did it", except they formed the government in September 1984. The fiscal year goes for longer than that, much longer than that. They had a party and they paid off whoever they had to pay off and built whatever they had to. And I love it when I get them responding because it always tells me—

Mrs. Maheu: It means it hits home.

Mrs. Marleau: —that it is hitting home. This is one of the truths that has not been said.

Then this government continued to spend, continued during the best years that we have had since the Second World War, having high deficits despite increasing taxes more than 31 times, till it brings us to today. We now have these extremely high taxes, where we are asking Canadians or telling the Public Service: "Tighten your belts, you cannot have an increase, you cannot do this".

Does this government do it? Does this government lead by example? Absolutely not. Just think of it for a minute. This is a country with a population of 26 million people. We have how many ministers? Is it 40? Correct me if I am wrong. There are so many of them, it is difficult. They add them and subtract them, and there is always a new one somewhere. There are 40-some ministers. In the United States, with a population how many times larger—

Mrs. Maheu: Some 150 million.

Mrs. Marleau: It is larger than 150 million. How many ministers do they have to run that country? Under 20. So I wonder, if the Americans can do it with under 20, why cannot we? The Conservatives like to do everything that the Americans do. As a matter of fact, if they are in power much longer, that is where we will be. We will be with the Americans, we will belong to them.

In this case, maybe they should be following a little bit in their mode. If I can tell the people of Canada what happens in ministries, each minister has to build himself a little power base. If you have a very small staff, then you have no clout. You have to build this power base and have all these big offices, and you have to have all of this staff. You have to justify your existence. Therefore, your budgets have to be larger. And the fight goes on. Then this minister writes to that minister, and that minister answers back, and then there is a lot of justification for jobs.

If you want to create employment at that level, that is fine, but you should not run on the fact that you are fiscally prudent because that is not a fiscally prudent method of behaving. I am very interested in seeing this government finally come out and do something and really show the people of Canada that they can be fiscally responsible, not just tell others to be fiscally responsible. That, to my way of thinking, would be the way to go. We create ministries so we can supposedly help areas of the country. We call it regional development and sometimes the grants are good. Often they are not worth much of anything.

• (1610)

In terms of some of the things I have uncovered under the Auditor General's report, bridges that lead to nowhere. We have all heard of that. Highways that are built for reasons that do not follow the criteria of the program. There was a host of them in 1989 that were reported under energy, mines and resources that were under the Canada–Nova Scotia Development Fund.

Many questions were asked in the House of Commons at that period of time. Of course there was a non-answer.

When we say that the people of Canada have absolutely no faith in this government, we know why. It tells you one thing and does exactly the opposite. It tells you that the GST will be revenue neutral. Obviously it is not.

Their own member who is the chairman of the finance committee said over and over again that it was going to be a cash cow. Everywhere else that the program was brought in, large amounts of money were brought in that were supposedly unforeseen.

I am waiting to see what the government is going to do because now it has seen the light. It now has a deficit reduction account. I just love it. I think that is a great idea. When I go home, I am going to open myself another account and I am going to start putting money in that account.

The only problem is that if I do not have more money coming in, how am I going to cover the other account? It is going to get larger. You only have so many pockets and you only have so much money. You can play around all you want. The fact of the matter is that we still have a problem.

You have to be more responsible. That is what we are saying. Whether you like it or not, you have not been responsible I ask that you go back to your ministers and tell them to get together, streamline.

I am supposed to be speaking to Madam Speaker. I am sorry, I had forgotten in the moment I have. My colleagues on the other side are so happy with my speech that I understand they are going to go right back to their ministries and ask them to streamline things, to quit pretending, and to start being honest.

Maybe the people of Canada will like this a bit better. It cannot get much worse.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I have listened attentively to the hon. member for Sudbury. She has asked us to go back and streamline ministries.

Streamlining ministries in order to save money means you have to cut out public servants. Is that what the hon. member is asking us to do? Is she asking us to cut down the size of the Public Service? I suspect that this is what she is inferring today.

I think she inadvertently is making that as a suggestion. I am not sure that she predicts that.

She talks about the projections when we came to power of what the former finance minister in his budget address in the spring of 1984 had made in this House of Commons. She failed to realize the economic paper that was put out by the finance minister under the capable leadership of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre in November of that year, how we set in train and how we were going to try to get our arms around money that was being spent.

In today's edition of The Citizen, if she were to read it, it says that the Tories have literally reversed the country's fiscal picture by adding $30 billion annually to the credit side of the country's ledger.

In other words, there was more money going out to pay for the programs and transfer of payments to individuals than what was coming in to the tune of $16 billion. Add that to the interest charges of the $200 billion debt that was there and you have quite a difference.

That has been reversed. That has taken a lot of hard work and is taking place. If per chance there is more money that comes in through the GST than we had planned on, we are going to put that money against the deficit reduction so that it does not go into paying for more programs.

The Canadian people have been asking for this and I suspect if the hon. member were to be honest with us today, she would have to admit that her constituents are telling her that about the GST. My constituents are saying that and I suspect that her constituents are not that different. She said she has made a study of the various Auditor General's reports. I would ask her, did she not realize that the Auditor General, about three years ago said: "At long last, I can now say that the money is being spent where it was allocated to be spent". That was the first time in his tenure, and he had a contract for six years; I think it was in the fifth or sixth year of his contract—that he was able to make that statement.

Does the hon. member not admit that is a very positive remark from the Auditor General and goes a long way to signifying that at long last the government now knows where its money is being spent? True, too much is being spent. I agree with her. The hon. member will have to admit that there were already pieces of legislation that had been enacted and so we had to turn around and change the structure. That is precisely what the GST was, a structural change. That is difficult. Structural change is difficult.

I might add that the hon. member's party did not try to help us. They had a lot of criticism, but never any constructive suggestions as to how we might improve it. It was just a case of: "Do not do it. Leave things the way they are". However, things were not working.

I have to end my remarks at this point. Does she not admit that what she reads in today's The Ottawa Citizen and on page 28 of our Quorum really is quite factual? I would encourage her to possibly consider mailing it out to her constituents asking for their comments.

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I am going to start with the first item he addressed himself to: Did I want to lay off all of the public servants who work for all these ministers?

What I say is that it is not the public servants who are at fault in this whole thing; it is the ministers. When you have a minister of native affairs and a minister of state for native affairs who do absolutely nothing or next to nothing, I cannot figure why there has to be two of them with their chauffeurs, their cars and their big offices. That would send a big message; I like the idea of cutting back.

On the contrary, this government has tried to blame the public servants. I think it is an absolute shame they are projecting to freeze salaries of public servants, especially the very low-paid public servants.

Do you know that a large number of public servants in this country earn below the poverty line, and you are freezing their wages? Yet you come to us and tell us what a great job you are doing. If you really want to freeze wages, then do it for everyone. Do not single out one group of people who have worked very hard for you. That is another problem you are creating by being that difficult to deal with, your people cannot work properly for you.

If you are always giving your public servants a hard time, how do you think they are going to feel? Do you think they will go to work every day and be happy and super-productive? I tell you, absolutely not.

On the question of taxes and the great fiscal management, I am going to tell you what is happening in my riding and it is happening all over Ontario.

In the early years of the recession, especially in the riding of Sudbury, we were very hard hit. As a group of people, we worked together to build on our strength, our resource sector. We had an entrepreneur who did a very good job. His name is Ken Burgess. He started a business and he went into manufacturing. It was a spectacular success. He expanded and he opened six plants across Ontario.

I am going to tell you the announcement he made on Tuesday of this week. He is closing all of his manufacturing plants. He says increases in taxes, and the higher Canadian dollar are hitting that group of eight companies hard and they have decided to just plain close up shop.

One of his businesses was in Cambridge. I quote from an article in The Sudbury Star, quoting Mr. Burgess:

> Every third building in Cambridge is empty right now. Hundreds of companies a week are moving out of the Toronto area and to the United States—I think the manufacturing days in this country are numbered unless our governments wake up.

Tell me, is that not an example of the kinds of things that are being said everywhere? I hear it in the House every day. I do not know what you are hearing but I heard of this man who was successful in very difficult times and now suddenly in 1991 he is closing all his manufacturing plants because he cannot compete.

When is this government going to face what they have done to the people of Canada with these taxes? It is an absolute shame that our own people cannot compete because the environment has not been created for competition. The day they start recognizing this and doing something about it we will all be a lot better off. It is not just a question of saying one thing and doing another. It is a question of all of us working together. None of us is perfect, least of all the people across the way.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member implied in her comments that we had somehow or other added another $9 billion to the deficit when we came into power. I want to tell her how that $9 billion came about and she can go back to the auditor general and get his explanation.

We came into power with a budget that was already in place, a $29.5 billion deficit—

Mrs. Marleau: I don't believe that for a minute. You would say the same thing about the NDP.

Mr. Kempling: The Auditor General came to us and said there are $9 billion of expenditures that have been included as capital expenditures and are no longer capital expenditures. They are straight-line expenses. Therefore you are going to have to increase the deficit by $9 billion. That is how it came about. It was nothing that we did. It was money spent by Marc Lalonde and his people. That is the first thing.

Go back to the Auditor General, check it out, and he will tell you the truth.

The member talks about reducing the number of ministers. When I came here years ago we did not have a Minister of State for Small Business. Through pressure from a variety of people we suddenly had a Minister of State for Small Businesses. He used to send questions and notes across the floor to us: "Please ask me a question. I haven't anything to do". In 1979 when we went into his office to see what we would do with his operation we found there was a Minister of State for Small Businesses, a secretary, a speech writer, a driver, and one researcher. That was the total ministry. He had no line responsibilities. He was not responsible for any legislation. He came in the House of Commons, sat in his seat and sent notes to the opposition which said: "Please ask me a question. I am lonely".

That is what your government did.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I leap humbly into the breach. I have heard some interesting things about debts and deficits today so I think I would like to start speaking today about the deficit and deficit reduction.

What I have seen since being here, and particularly since 1984, of course started long before that. I agree, with the member for Fraser Valley East that it started before that. It seems to me that what has happened over the course of time is that both of these parties, the Conservatives and the Liberals, can take a lesson from the squirrels. During the summertime when food is bountiful and the nuts are plentiful they go out and gather nuts and they save for a winter day so that they have something to eat.

It seems to me that both the Liberals and the Conservatives have forgotten that winter is just around the corner. In the good times, since 1984, the economy has been fairly buoyant and the present Conservative government has forgotten the winter—we are now in the dead of winter—and there are no nuts. They haven't collected them, they haven't saved them; they have been eating everything in sight. This party hasn't paid any attention at all to what is going to happen later. They have not paid attention to history and learned that at the end of every upswing comes a downswing. They have continued in this way each year that I have been here. I have looked at the budgets and have seen that they are going to reduce the deficit. At the end of the year when we got the figures in, I found that no, the deficit has not been reduced. In fact, because of this or that or the other thing, whether it be the Persian Gulf war, the interest rates, or whatever, we haven't been able to reduce the deficit.

If I recall correctly, two years ago it was going to be $28.5 billion. Last year it was up to almost $31 billion again. Now this year I heard the same figures again—$28 billion—and maybe this time the government will make it. They finally listened to the opposition. They listened to the New Democratic Party and are starting to drop the interest rates.

I remember when the Minister of State for Small Businesses was before the committee on his estimates two years ago. In questioning him he threw a question back to me and asked: What is small business looking for; what do you say they are looking for? At that time I remember I told him that they were looking for lower, stable interest rates. Well, they are starting to get lower interest rates. And if the minister did it, then congratulations to him. But they have finally started listening to us, after two long, hard years. The Minister of State for Small Businesses talked to the Minister of Finance and convinced him that was what small businesses wanted. They needed it, they needed it to survive.

But before the minister gets too blown up with importance, I want to read a little quote to him from a research paper from his favourite institution, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, prepared for their offices back in January, I believe. It says: "Business conditions have undoubtedly been worsened by government policy, most notably the federal government's monetary and tax policy. The high interest rate strategy has placed a particularly heavy burden on small businesses which do not enjoy the financing flexibility open to large firms. The impact has been particularly severe in construction, manufacturing and the retail trade. In addition, the detrimental effects of the stubbornly high interest rates, coupled with a high Canadian dollar at a time of economic recession, has been exacerbated by the federal government's goods and services tax."

Madam Speaker, we now have lower interest rates and hopefully they will get lower and stabilize for the sake of the small business community. But we still have the goods and services tax. No matter where I have gone in Canada since January, since the implementation of this dastardly tax, I have heard the small business community complaining about the implementation, the administration and the cost to them of the GST. I have spoken to lawyers and small business firms, I have spoken to medium sized firms, the ones with computers, the ones that say "we can do the work, but it costs us heavily in time and money management."

The criminal lawyers tell me that they give a single quote—$1,000, $2,000, $3,000, $2,500, whatever it is—to defend a person on a criminal charge. Well, they either raise their rates by $500 to round it out, and they don't feel that they can do that in today's recessionary times, or they eat the GST. The criminal lawyers I have spoken to in the last couple of months tell me that they are, in fact, eating the GST.

I have spoken to insurance agents in small communities across Canada who tell me that as a result of the exempt provisions in the goods and services tax, they cannot write off their capital investments or they can write them off but then can't take the rebate for the GST, the input tax credit.

• (1630)

This causes an undue burden. What do they do? They have to pass on that cost once again to the consumer or cut back in their meagre profits.

Food retail outlets in my province and in my communities such as Super Values, IGA and Giant Foods all sell a combination of foods, prepared foods and items such as women's hygienic products, tampons and the like. These have GST attached to them. In this particular case, one of the examples I gave is unfair to women. It is as important to women as sustenance and food. This government should consider that in looking at where it is going and what it has done with this tax.

It goes on. It was interesting in going to a couple of places recently and seeing the small family shops shut down, and talking to the people about it. They were saying that they had shut down just after the Christmas trade of 1990 and prior to the GST in 1991 because they were not willing to go through the hassle at that stage in their lives. Some of them were older and had been in business for a number years and did not want to go through the extra burden of trying to look after this tax.

Talk to the farmers who are members of the small business community. I think it was stated well by a potato farmer in Prince Edward Island when he said: "We work from dawn until dusk. We come in, we eat, we go to bed and the cycle starts again. We do not want to have to come in and have to do this extra bookwork after a full, long day's work in the fields to keep up with the GST." That is what has happened under this tax. The government has continually hurt the small business community.

It is interesting to note what has happened as a result of the fiscal and monetary policies of this government. We warned the government some two years ago that if it brought in the GST at that stage, we would be in the depths of a depression. That was two years ago. I am no economist and I knew it and this government continued to ignore it. Now what has happened is that we have the highest rate of bankruptcies, business failures and personal bankruptcies that we have ever seen in Canada. The rate is higher than it was in the depths of the 1981–82 recession.

The last figures I had show bankruptcies for 1990 total 11,642 and they have increased some 32 per cent already this year. They surpassed, for the first time, the 1982 recessionary peak of 10,765 business failures. This is an increase of 34 per cent.

This government is proud of its fiscal and monetary policies. It tells us how great it is doing and yet at the same time we are watching the business community taking a bigger beating than it has ever taken in Canada in modern history in this made–in–Canada recession. It is unbelievable.

The government continues to tell us how great things are going, how good its monetary policies are and how wonderful its fiscal policies are. I have got one word for it, hog–wash, simply hog–wash. We have got major failures.

I will refer again to this document from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business: "There is however a sharp contrast between the position of the banks today compared with the early 1980s."

Does it ring a bell? Who puts $30,000 a year into the coffers of the government? Certainly not the small business community. We see a sharp contrast in the position of the banks today as compared with small business.

I quote further. In referring back to the 1980s, they say:

> At that time the banks were burdened by losses they had incurred from their massive loans to large corporations and Third World countries. Today, the banks are in a much better position, and could well afford to be more patient with firms struggling to survive in an uncertain and difficult business environment.

It appears that the friends of the government, the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. The tax policies of this government have shown that. The figures over the last few years show that the burden has shifted to middle and low income Canadians and away from the top wage earners.

If we couple the banking situation and the GST, we note that in the use of credit cards, VISA, Master Card, American Express, the merchant fee that is paid, whether it be, depending on the card, 2 per cent up to 5 or 6 per cent in some cases, is added at the end of the tally which includes both provincial sales tax and the goods and services tax. So on a large ticket item a merchant can end up paying 2–1/4 or 3 per cent of the 7 per cent that has been paid on the item.

If you look at the figures of what is charged to credit cards throughout the course of a year in Canada and look at what the GST is on those figures and then you multiply it by the percentage that they take up in a merchant fee, we know that the banks now, as a result of the goods and services tax, are getting somewhere in the area of $16 million extra as a result of the merchant fee on top of the goods and services tax. That is using 1989 figures. The figures for today, I would suggest, would be higher, given the fact that there is an increase or has been an increase in the number of credit cards outstanding in Canada and the number of transactions going on those particular credit cards.

It is interesting to see how closely aligned are the government and the big banks. In going further with that and talking about bankruptcies, the government today tabled the new Bankruptcy Act. It is interesting because they have set up another fund, which is a good idea, to ensure that wages of those working for firms, corporations or others which declare bankruptcy or go into receivership get paid something for their wages.

What the government did was interesting. It set up a fund and it is now going to cost the employers 10 cents per week per employee to be paid into this fund. As I understand it, this will also be paid by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

Once again we look at the trickle down effect because the municipal governments cannot deficit finance as can the provinces and the feds. They are going to have to come up with the money out of their budgets. Where do they get the money? They increase the property taxes to the ordinary citizen of their communities and the small business person.

I want to ask why they have not set up a priority system? The Minister at Consumer and Corporate Affairs essentially told us, "Well, it did not seem to be the route to go, that if they set up this, it was a separate system, self-administered." If you look into it deeper, what it comes down to is the banks did not want to give up their priority to a preferred creditor such as a wage holder.

Yet if we look at labour standards legislation in all of the provinces, it ensures that wages are looked after in priority to everything else that they have jurisdiction over.

Of course, the provinces do not have jurisdiction over the federal government and Revenue Canada. It was also interesting that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has looked after the revenues of the country. That is admirable, to say that the directors and executive members of a corporation will be jointly and severally responsible for the debts of that corporation.

I could not find anywhere in that legislation anything that gave the small business person the same kick at the cat as the federal government. That is something the government should look at if it really, truly believes in the small business community.

If I look further into the estimates, it reminds me in looking at cutbacks, the centralization of services and what not, that we often have a tendency both in power, I suppose, and with our bureaucrats who assist us in our legislation and in our policies to ignore the small communities and how important various services are.

In Penticton, the largest community in my own riding, there are rumours running rampant that an old age pension, guaranteed income supplement and Canada Pension Plan office will be closed and centralized to Kelowna, up in the next riding up.

You might say well, it is all in the Okanagan Valley. Fair enough. But if you look at it in people terms, it is totally different. In those areas, about 35 per cent of all citizens are over 65 years of age. They often do not care to talk on the telephone. They like to catch a ride with their neighbour or drive themselves and go see someone face to face in a small office. When you are on a limited income, and you have to drive from Osooyos to Kelowna, about 140 or 150 kilometres, it is a great imposition. It is four hours of driving time in order to see the person you want to talk to about a problem with the old age security.

My office is in the same building as that particular office, and I see the number of people who go in. I have a number of those people coming into my office when they have difficulties. It is a real convenience. It is not as if it was a small community. It services a very large area.

Sometimes I wonder about some of the policies of the government. It has to pay more attention to people and less attention to policy and friends. The estimates and where the government is going, both fiscally and monetarily, leaves a lot to be desired. I believe I speak for the people of my riding. I speak reasonably for the people in the small business sector as the critic for my party, the New Democratic Party, when I say that something has to be done.

We have started, as the minister has told us, in getting lower interest rates. That is a start. But if we are going to continue, if we are going to start putting people first, we have to start here in Parliament.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I just want to pose a couple of questions to my hon. friend who made a number of philosophical statements at the beginning about the way he believes the fiscal policy of the government should be operated to help the small business community.

The hon. member mentioned deficits and expressed his concern that the federal government has been spending too much money. It is amazing to hear that from an NDP member because never, since I have sat in this House, have I ever had an idea yet from the NDP on how to cut spending. Their proposals are always to increase spending.

Anyway, he says we should have cut spending more than we did although they never helped us with any ideas on how to do it. I want to bring him back to a different province, the province of Ontario which now has an NDP government.

I have a press release here that announces that the Moody Bond Rating Service has lowered the province's credit rating by two notches. It has been followed by the Canadian Bond Rating Service, the Dominion Bond Rating Service and Standard and Poors.

Standard and Poors said this about the NDP government: "The lowering of the rate reflects the large budgeted increases in operating an over–all deficit in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992. Very modest declines in these deficits are planned for three succeeding years."

This is an NDP government in office doubling the debt of the province of Ontario in four years. It has moved the deficit to historic levels. As a result, Ontario no longer has the highest credit rating of any province in Canada. The rating cut will cost the province an extra $15 million this year alone in added interest costs. Every time Ontario Hydro borrows an extra billion, it will pay out $2.5 million in extra interest costs.

Governments are like anybody else. The higher the risk, the more they pay to borrow. The federal leader of the NDP sitting in this House says that she is proud of the approach to fiscal management of Ontario's NDP. Proud is her word.

The NDP is raising spending by 13 per cent in one year. It is bringing in a record annual deficit. Scaring off investors and losing your credit rating is nothing to be proud of.

I want to ask the hon. member whether NDP really stands for no down payment. You and your children pay later.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to answer this question.

It is wonderful to have a cabinet minister stand up and bare-facedly tell the people of Canada that the policies of the Tory government are working.

It has been recognized in Ontario that this made-in-Canada recession is as a result of Tory mismanagement since 1984. We see the minister stand up and preach to us about where we should be saving money when this government pitches out truckloads full of goodies to its corporate friends and ignores the people.

This Government of Ontario finally put people first. It finally put people first, after following on years of Liberals and Tories, and Tories and Liberals. We have had the same old nonsense for years and years.

When you come down to it, we are going to see the fact that Ontario has now levelled out as far as the line of credit goes with other provinces, provinces run by Conservative governments who have run their provinces down the drain over the years. This debt which the minister has talked about is not nearly as bad as he makes out. It is less per capita than what the federal government has racked up over the last few years.

Let me talk just briefly about what I call a corporate mentality where this government thinks nothing of shovelling money out for little perks for its friends. It still has not given consideration to small business or the regular people. Give the regular people a break.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am sorry I did not hear all of the member's speech. I was coming from another meeting.

I think he should be aware of the fact that in the province of Ontario—he has sort of baited me on this—one of the problems that we have right now with the NDP government is that it is afraid to make decisions.

• (1650)

I want to deal with one specific sector. That is the housing sector in the province of Ontario, which is almost equal in creating wealth and jobs, from dump truck drivers to plumbers to carpenters. It affects consumer goods, etc. The Government of Ontario, the Bob Rae government, has not signed off on one plan of subdivision since it took power almost a year ago. There are literally thousands and thousands of affordable houses in these plans of subdivisions which would create jobs overnight. This would mean that the deficit attack the province of Ontario took in its last budget would not be necessary.

Rather than making the taxpayer pay put those people who can go out and create wealth and create tax revenue to work. They want to work. They would rather work than sit back waiting for the Minister of Municipal Affairs to sign off on plans of subdivisions. In a market where people are crying for housing, especially affordable housing at $150,000 a home, the government is sitting idly by. I think you have to be very careful when you tout your NDP government and justify its deficit because there are many, many things it could be doing to unleash the productive capacity of that province, which needs to be unleashed so desperately.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, it is interesting that we have a member of the Liberal Party talking about expecting miracles from a government in a very short time. We almost have that with what, as I understand, the Ontario government has done. It inherited approximately $2.5 billion of this deficit, it had transfer payments cuts of $3.5 billion—

An hon. member: Cuts.

Mr. Whittaker: They were cuts directly from the federal government. As I understand it—

An hon. member: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Whittaker: As I understand it—

An hon. member: Keep the Liberal Party.

Mr. Whittaker: It is wonderful—

Madam Deputy Speaker: For some reason, I do not feel very involved in that exchange. I think everyone is supposed to be talking to me.

Mr. Beatty: It is a lovers' quarrel between the Liberals and the NDP.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is one minute left for the hon. member to conclude.

Mr. Whittaker: There has never been any love between the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party in spite of what the minister says. There has been no love between the New Democrats and the Conservatives either. We will continue to fight both the Liberal and the Conservative regressive and repressive policies toward ordinary Canadians.

The budget of Ontario builds on the $700 million anti-recession program announced last year by providing a total of $4.3 billion for capital spending on hospitals, schools and other infrastructure this year and by initiating programs to help workers and struggling businesses through the recession. This government in Ontario has shown what a New Democratic Party government can do in trying to clean up a mess left by the Liberals.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, perhaps our colleagues across the floor would like to take note of some of the figures and facts that I shall be giving and see how a very efficient government operates. At the same time, I would reserve a couple of my comments for the end, since I did not have the opportunity to ask a question of my colleague.

This year the main estimates totalled $158 billion. Through these estimates the government is seeking Parliament's approval for $47 billion in new spending authority. The remaining $111 billion represents statutory payments that have had previous parliamentary approval.

These main estimates demonstrate our continuing commitment to control spending and contain the cost of government, the need for significant changes in the way government operates, and our commitment to deliver services to Canadians in the most efficient manner.

Since taking office in 1984, this government has given a high priority to reducing the cost of government operations while still providing Canadians with the programs and services they need. In this regard, much has been achieved over the past six years. Annual growth in program spending has been reduced, on average, to 3.7 per cent. In this regard, we have to look at annual growth in operating and capital spending, including public service salaries which we have dropped to an average of 3.3 per cent; and the Public Service has been reduced since 1984-85 to roughly the same size it was in the 1970s.

These achievements show the government's commitment to increased efficiency through the rigorous control of expenditures as well as the implementation of innovative management procedures. These achievements also reflect the government's commitment to good management and to the careful stewardship of the taxpayers' dollars. Our record is one of success.

The year-over-year increase in the main estimates is the outcome of a number of decisions affecting the budgets of all 142 programs delivered by 118 departments, agencies and Crown corporations appearing in the estimates. This increase can be divided into two broad categories: adjustments to statutory items, which amount to $7.2 billion, and changes to voted items, which amount to $2.7 billion. Therefore only 27 per cent of the growth in the main estimates relates to voted items.

Statutory spending is $110.6 billion, or 70 per cent of total estimates and will grow by 7 per cent. Spending in this category includes such things as major federal transfers to Canadians in respect of Old Age Security, guaranteed income supplements and family allowances, and transfers to the provinces for health, education and social assistance.

It is important to note that the major factor underlying the growth in the voted portion of the main estimates is the carry-forward items, funded initially through the 1990-91 supplementary estimates. Items previously approved through supplementary estimates account for 44 per cent of the year-over-year growth of voted main estimates. The other categories such as higher personal costs, increased workload and new program initiatives, play a relatively minor role.

On a consolidated basis, four areas account for more than 80 per cent of total allocated budgetary spending: public debt charges take up 27.4 per cent of the total; social programs 36.1 per cent; fiscal arrangements close to 11 per cent; and defence spending 8.1 per cent.

Social programs are the largest component of over-all spending. During 1991-92, the federal government will direct $57 billion, which is 36 per cent of its allocated main estimates, to improve the social conditions of Canadians. The departments of Health and Welfare Canada, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Employment and Immigration Canada make up over 90 per cent of the spending in this sector.

Through these social programs, the government is continuing its efforts to help those in greatest need through programs of assistance to the economically disadvantaged. The government's programs and policies will continue to ensure equality of access by all Canadians to the benefits of Canadian society.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that it is unparliamentary to read a speech in this House. Therefore I must conclude that the hon. member is reading from a document. If he is reading from a document we can read it ourselves, and for that purpose I would ask him to table it for our benefit.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will allow his colleague to do as others do at times and speak with notes in front of him.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, as I said at the beginning of my speech —

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles de la Madeleine.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, I had a lot of figures in my speech, but obviously, the opposition doesn't like figures and doesn't like facts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): However, that is all part of my responsibility, Madam Speaker.

[English]

I will send a copy of my speech to the hon. gentleman across the way.

These estimates fully reflect the second year impact of the expenditure control plan announced by the Minister of Finance in the 1990 budget. In the budget the Minister of Finance announced a number of reforms intended to bring about both immediate savings and lasting efficiencies in government programs.

The key to this program of restraint is a continuation of the expenditure control program together with tight controls on the cost of government operations which are expected to produce a savings of nearly $870 million to Canadian taxpayers in the current fiscal year.

Over the five-year planning period, 1995-96, cumulative savings to Canadians will amount to over $5.2 billion. The expenditure control plan is extended to 1995-96. The budget also contains further measures beginning in 1991-92 to restrain spending on programs and operations of federal departments and agencies.

Over-all spending on operating and capital for existing programs will be effectively frozen as of 1990-91. This will be accomplished by a 3 per cent cut in the 1991-92 budget and capital budgets of each department.

In addition, departments will be required to absorb any increased salary costs arising from new collective agreements. As a result any wage increases will be paid for by a corresponding reduction in the number of jobs. Depending on the results of collective bargaining, this could entail a reduction in employment affecting as many as 6,000 jobs in the civil service.

Together these measures have reinforced our message to Canadians that the days of easy spending by the government are long past. The reality is all the more significant as we come through a period of economic recession and downturn coupled with unforeseeable external pressures for new spending.

Our budget also contained other significant initiatives. First, the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government is bringing forward draft legislation to put statutory limits on spending. This should provide Canadians with greater assurance that program spending will be managed within the fiscal framework.

Second, the government will reduce discretionary grants and contributions by $75 million. The hon. House leader, Harvie Andre, has been discussing with colleagues how these reductions can best be achieved.

Third, the government will streamline its operations by reducing the number of its executives by 10 per cent.

These reforms are necessary to make funds available for essential programs and services. However, reducing costs is only one aspect of the reforms of this government. These measures also reflect a profound realization that the present cost and complexity of government operations can no longer be justified to Canadians. If this government is to serve Canadians well, we must do it through new forms of service delivery and through organizations that are more efficiently managed.

Therefore, to improve efficiency within the Public Service, innovative management practices will continue to remain a priority of this government.

The government has introduced a wide range of initiatives since taking office in 1984 to improve the management of the expenditure of our budgets. The actions have been taken and will continue to be taken and they will produce results for all Canadians and Canadian taxpayers.

For example, revenues from external user fees now exceed $3 billion, which is more than double the 1984–1985 levels. The government is continuing to seek out new areas where the application of user fees are appropriate.

The government, through initiatives such as this has adopted a management strategy based on a more businesslike and frugal attitude to its operations. This, I understand, goes against the policies of our counterparts, the New Democratic Party across the way.

It has implemented measures to realize cost savings and improved administrative practices to deliver programs more effectively. This has been achieved through such initiatives as contracting out, special operating agencies and privatization.

The government believes that many services and functions are best carried out by public service employees. However, to provide a full range of options for delivering services to the Canadian public, certain functions are better done through the private sector, through contracting out.

Special operating agencies continue to be a viable mechanism for improving the delivery of our very important public services to the Canadian public.

Six more agencies have been announced through these main estimates, including the Canadian General Standards Board and the Canadian Conservation Institute. More candidates will be identified over the coming year, with a strong emphasis on organizations that directly serve the public where the potential for improvement is greatest.

Privatization will remain a key priority for this government. The government's program has already devolved more than 18 Crown corporations that have other corporate holdings to the private sector and other levels of government. The government will privatize CN Exploration, an oil and gas company, and will wind up Petro–Canada International Assistance Corporation and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration.

The initiatives reviewed have helped move the government a considerable distance in managing itself more productively. The government will maintain its two–pronged approach of top–down restraint on departmental budgets and of management policies that modify the institutional and working environment of public service managers.

These measures reinforce the consistent actions the government has taken since 1984. We must control the cost of government operations. We are also expected to engender considerable change in the way departments and agencies do business, that is in the nature and type of resources used as inputs in the technology applied and in the organization and methods of program delivery.

By changing the atmosphere in which government business is transacted, it becomes easier to make the structures more business–like. In keeping with the business–like environment, the government will be eliminating person–year controls and moving toward operating budgets.

Person–year authorities are a control mechanism used to limit the average number of employees that a department or an agency can use in the delivery of its programs. A person–year represents the employment of one person full time per year or for one year the equivalent of three persons for four months.

Controls on person years are used by the Treasury Board to complement conventional budget controls. This system of controls has served over the years to limit the size and cost of the Public Service and encourage the search for labour–saving efficiency which we can also use in cost saving factors. This has been confirmed by the Public Service 2000 task force report and the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

• (1710)

The Treasury Board has begun to withdraw its control of person–year authorities in cases where suitable budget–based controls and incentives are in place to induce cost–effective, management decisions and the most efficient use of resources.

I would close by saying that when we speak on behalf of the government in terms of Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates, that this movement toward operating budgets is a reflection of our commitment to Canadians to promote efficient practices within the Public Service. As I mentioned, the PS2000 task force and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts agreed with this.

The government is confident that operating budgets will promote more effective use of the taxpayers' money. This change is another example of our government's commitment to reform that will perform better service to Canadians.

I have listened to the other comments that were made by my hon. colleague across the way and will not go into more details concerning the New Democratic Party government in the province of Ontario. However, one thing I have learned since 1984, being a member of Parliament and, of course, we know that sometimes if we come from Quebec it makes it a little hotter than if we happen to come from other parts of the country, one thing that my people have told me at home since 1984 is that they want to pay, they want a service. If they do not pay then they have to cut back.

There are two methods that this government or any government can use, we can tax or we can cut. Our government is, in the most humane way, trying a little of both, which we have tried to approve and apply on behalf of our government. The NDP government can only talk about corporate bums, but the corporate bums supply thousands upon thousands upon hundreds of thousands of jobs in this country. Ontario is going through the situation now where business is going against them because they do not like their budget.

We cannot insult everyone, but what we shall do as the government is be very human and very Christian, if I can speak from the Christian point of view. Being a Christian of persuasion myself, and God fearing of any religion, without insulting any religion across Canada, we will administer this government so that all Canadians can have services that they need and we will be there.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, excuse me, I thought the initial reading of the document that the hon. member presented was fairly sterile and lacking all evidence of the humanity that he claimed at the end. I suspect that there are a good many Christians in this country. Perhaps we should subtract 14 per cent from all the Christians in the country who will be dearly offended by the claim that this government's policies are based on Christianity.

I would just like to take a moment to deal with the Ontario budget, it having been raised. I think it bears justification to reflect upon the components of this $9 billion deficit that has raised the ire of the wealthy Liberals and the wealthy Conservatives.

Let us just point out first of all that sneaky, little $2.5 billion deficit that the Liberal Party left behind when it was so brutally rejected by the people of Ontario. Let us also keep in mind, Madam Speaker, as I am sure you have, the $3.8 billion in transfer payments withdrawn from Ontario by this government, remembering that Ontario pays the fat portion of transfer payments to the other provinces.

Let us also take into account that something in the order of 200,000 industrial jobs were lost in Ontario. That translates into two things: a vastly increased burden on social assistance; and dramatic cuts in the revenues available to Ontario. Ontario is confronted with a situation in which it has had to prepare the damage done to ordinary Ontarians, who are Canadians, by this government that seems to insist that Ontario somehow does not fit into its equation of what Canada is all about when it comes to economic policy.

I did not hear anything here about the dramatic need for example of a government involvement recognized by studies from the department under this government, that is industry, science and technology, about the necessity of this government getting started with a program to enhance research and development in the parts industry. I doubt that I will ever hear it since this government has abandoned any notion of targets for R and D.

I did not get up here in order to engage in a long speech that would have me engaged in the rather easy ridiculing of both the Liberals and Conservatives for their perfidy, but I want to ask just two questions. First, the hon. member made mention early in his reading of savings to the taxpayer. There has been a good deal of discussion over the last couple of days about possibilities for providing savings to the taxpayer. I think that among his colleagues there are those who look at that already existing $400 million excess from the GST and say: "Well now, why don't we cut that GST to 5 per cent?" I am wondering whether the hon. member agrees with his colleagues, some of them very illustrious colleagues, some of them well read in the field of financing, who have suggested this. I wonder if he agrees with that.

Second, I wonder if he could enlighten us, after having given us a very complete, albeit unnecessary definition, of what a person year is, as to whether he has taken into account the number of person years that have been substituted for by other budget items, that in fact lead to the same number of people working in various departments. But these are not counted as person years because they are contracted out, part-time—usually part-time for women by the way, Madam Speaker—exploitative of women. I would like to see if he has an estimate of how many of those person years have been substituted for by other expenditure lines for people who are not counted at all in the process.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague is of course very wise in the way of his words. I was just wondering as he was talking about the GST if in some instances he is suggesting dropping the GST from 7 per cent to 5 per cent. Perhaps if we did do that the extra 2 per cent would pay off the NDP budget in Ontario.

We are serious when talking taxes; Canadian taxpayers pay it across the country. The serious thing is that we have in excess of $400 billion that we have to pay. I will leave the question of whether GST comes down from 7 per cent to 5 per cent to the recommendation of all Canadians whether they want to pay it off with the new fund or whether the Minister of Finance decides that he wants to drop it to 5 per cent. That will be one thing.

One thing we can be sure of is that the NDP government will not drop its income tax in the province of Ontario.

With regard to contracting out, the question that I would ask my hon. colleague, if the process that the federal government has brought in since it has been in power for contracting out in terms of efficiency and in terms of money savings and what has been done for the service of Canadians, if he has any proof——that it doesn't work, Madam Speaker, I would ask them to give me the information. Thank you.

[Translation]

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member about something that happened here over the last two or three months. It appears that the government agenda over the last two or three months has basically hijacked and removed the parliamentary procedure of supply, the means by which Parliament, through its committees, scrutinizes government spending.

• (1720)

In the very small area that I work in, in the justice area, I can say that we have had total committee time to scrutinize government expenditures in the very supply process that we are debating here today, of 1.5 hours. That is virtually nothing in the face of budgets of several billion dollars.

I will be fair to the government and recognize that in a number of ways its ongoing initiatives to reduce the deficit and the current made-in-Canada recession, in part by government policies, has impaired that. However, I wonder if the member could comment on how we could in this House improve these procedures in such a way that it could never happen again, the hijacking of that estimates scrutiny agenda that I have just described, so that we can do our jobs on both sides of the House as parliamentarians. What would he suggest that we do to avoid this ever happening again?

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, I think if my hon. friend in posing his question would look at the recourse there is still available through the House of Commons, with the standing committees, with the government operations committee, which I understand has fairly equal representation from all parties involved in it, perhaps another time around, according to the polls, you might have to have more parties involved in it.

In terms of the input, it is there. As for the scrutiny, to say it will not happen again—of course the ultimate scrutiny lies always with the Canadian population. What does not get said in the House of Commons, what does not get said in committee, as the gentleman knows being a member of the opposition party, obviously gets said in public through the media. So there are many checks and balances in it.

In spite of the frustration of sitting in opposition, which my party has done also, I would say to the hon. member that the way the procedure works at the present time, he can see that with the checks and balances, it balances out fairly evenly, probably I would say to my liking as a Conservative member of Parliament, more even for you than for me.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as I listen to the member wax eloquent on the government's program of expenditure restraint, which every household and every business in the country is going through, I think he put it forward in a way that I would have to challenge. The program spending for 1984–85 was $86.6 billion. For the current fiscal year, it is $108.3 billion, an increase of $22.3 billion. Now, the budgetary revenue in 1984–85 was $70.8 billion. The current fiscal year budget revenue is $120.7 billion, an increase of revenue of almost $50 billion.

Really, what you have done is you have not only increased your program spending from 1984–85, but at the same time you have taken an extra $50 billion out of the economy.

My question to the hon. member is this. What do you tell your constituents when they must say to you: "My goodness, you are taxing us to death. The paper burden on the GST and other tax systems is driving us crazy. You are turning us into bureaucrats." What do you say to those people when they are going through the deepest, darkest recession that this country has ever had?

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, What I would tell my constituents would be that in 1984, when I was elected, we were looking at a budget from the former Liberal government with an annual deficit of about $40 billion. In 1988–89–90, we are down to $28, $29 or $30 billion. A reduction of $10 billion.

You mentioned an increase in program spending, whatever the amounts are. Unfortunately, sir, I do not have them before me.

On new programs, I ran my campaign in 1984 saying that we had "Canada Works". The only thing we could do in my area on the Gaspé in the Magdalen Islands, was build picnic tables so the boys and the women could get 10 weeks of unemployment insurance stamps. We have changed that through our Jobs Strategy Program.

If new programs have been introduced, which I believe are to the benefit of all Canadians, then there will be an increase in that.

One thing is certain, the budget, from $40 billion, is down around $30 billion, which is to the respect of my Prime Minister and our Ministers of Finance, because we have cut back in spending as opposed to the increased spending of several other provinces. That has now happened.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to stand to talk to this issue today. We have many, many matters we could look at concerning the government's budget. We could be looking at the choices that government makes in many areas and its impacts on the daily lives of people across this land.

I just have to look in my own riding at the food banks, at the number of students who cannot find jobs, at the tax burden businessmen have been talking to me about, at the concern the hungry, the poor, the sick and the elderly are expressing with respect to the health services and the cuts to equalization payment funds, the capping of the kinds of transfer payments that we are helping out with in many areas.

Today I have really chosen to focus on the approach of this government in the field of culture and communications over the past seven years as is highlighted particularly, in its budget.

In the throne speech there is not a single word about culture. There is not a single word about this enormously important industry in the throne speech and the budget, which are supposedly focusing on national unity, on rebuilding consensus in this country, on the Constitution. We have not seen one new word about building this new Canada. There is not an ounce of mortar to hold the bricks together in this country.

It is true this government has a majority in a democratic society. We have to respect their right to govern. But you can also question their right to the poor choices they have made in public policy for the people of Canada. There is no place that it can be reflected more clearly and more succinctly than in the field of culture.

I can say that this government has been in receipt of a wealth of knowledge and incredible benefits which have come from information from an infinite number of task forces and studies. These have cost, through the three ministers who have gone, well, two, the third one is just in, two Ministers of Communications and Culture, have spent over $10 billion in studies and examinations—

[Translation]

And all this to see what is happening in communications and culture. This is all very well, except that we need action, positive action, not this hacking away at the roots of a country.

[English]

Do you know that these task forces cost $10 billion? With all this time and effort, with all these so-called consultations and with all the standing committee work, this government has had no excuse to delay facing its responsibility in the area of communications and culture, which I said, I feel personally, and I think our party has demonstrated, is vital to the building of a sense of national identity and national unity.

There is little doubt of the importance of this sector to our economy, to the workforce, to the tourism industry. It provides us not only with that sense of Canadian identity and Canadian uniqueness, but it presents a very distinguishing mechanism by which we can identify ourselves on the world stage as Canadians.

• (1730)

There is no doubt that these means of expressing who we are, whether it is through the dance, theatre, song, songwriters, television, film or radio, are how we can identify ourselves so succinctly. My colleague here knows that very well and is a strong supporter of French songwriters and French singers.

[Translation]

I am thinking of Michel Séguin, but there are many others who are very important to Canada's cultural environment.

[English]

Not only is culture a very vital element in nation building and a unifying force, but I would like to underscore its importance to the Canadian economy. Do you know that it has been the fastest growing element in the Canadian economy? Did you know that? It is absolutely fundamental. In 1987, the labour force engaged in cultural activities was estimated at 400,000 Canadians. So says Stats Canada, according to Allen Gotlieb, the present Chairman of the Canada Council.

Arts related employment was as large as the agricultural sector in terms of employment. In fact it was the fourth largest sector of employment in Canada. Cultural revenues were estimated at $13.7 billion in 1987 and have grown immeasurably, as I will point out shortly, since that point. There has been an incredible ripple effect on the over-all economy. The income in this sector, with tourism and all the other benefits—whether they are the hot dogs or the peanuts sold, or the popcorn in the theatre that we all like, or the Coke or Pepsi—is in the range of $29 billion. Those are a lot of zeros. The industry buys a lot of food, provides a lot of jobs and is on a par with the metal and mining industry, in terms of revenues.

Mr. Belsher: So whatever we are doing with culture, we are helping it.

Mrs. Finestone: It is a very big, important and beneficial area of our society. I would like the hon. member to read the Masse-Levesque commission report on national development in the arts, letters and sciences which was tabled in the early 1950s at a time when there was very little federal involvement in the arts. That report realized that Canadians' cultural identity, if we were to survive, required an activist role—one of partnership between the federal government and the provincial government, municipal governments and the private sector. That is how we have established Canada on the world map. We have produced, and can be very proud of, artists who are the expression of who we are within Canada. I am sure you would agree with that point of view.

This is not to say, when I talk about the federal role, that the provinces must not play an important role in cultural endeavours. However, I would caution that provincial initiatives are most effective when they are complemented by a federal presence in the sector.

For example, restraining the flood of foreign cultural activities would overwhelm the capacity of any single provincial government. Our proximity to our friendly neighbour, the United States, poses very special problems that are best met collectively right across this land. The pervasiveness and the power of the American cultural machine—through its film industry, television industry, music industry, the integration of those industries, and its distribution and marketing—is such that a fragmented system of cultural support and promotion would be easily overwhelmed if we did not stand together as Canadians shoulder to shoulder, coast to coast, en anglais ou en français, n'importe.

We need to be vigilant in this government. A headline in The Globe and Mail today reads: "First day of trade talks produces discord". What does that headline go on to say? It says: "Canada-U.S. disagree over cultural industries". Sure they disagree because Canada has been able to and—if it continues to stand tall—can stop the overflow of American cultural homogenization around this world by saying that every country has the right of access to a certain percentage of its own market. If America has 94 per cent of our film market, how much does it want—100 per cent, or should we be allowed to have 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 6 per cent? Could we go on to 10 per cent of our own market? That is something we should be allowed to do. If the American people, the average people in the United States, understood what the Jack Valentes and Carla Hills of this world wanted to do they would say: "Quit it, stop badgering your good friends and neighbours, the Canadians".

I believe that where we have now had the Constitution of Canada dominating our agenda with the Belanger-Campeau commission, with the Allaire report, the current discussions around the devolution of culture and communication powers to the provinces are very worrisome.

The total removal of the federal government from these cultural fields would have a devastating impact on national unity and on cultural sovereignty in Canada, leaving us with an arrangement of a purely political and economic nature.

I would like to quote the Canadian Conference on the Arts which says: "Canada would cease to be a nation and would become a corporation." This side of the House sees a public federal role as necessary and complementary to the provincial, municipal and private sector initiatives to ensure viable, cultural activities. We see the role of the CBC, the National Arts Centre, Telefilm Canada, the museums, the National Archives, the library, the National Film Board and Canada Council as well as other federal institutions and programs as important and key.

They must be kept to reflect Canadians to Canadians. Without an activist federal government in the cultural arena, Canada will be nothing more than an association of economic states. There will be little opportunity to develop in the way of foreign influences and in the way of our personality.

The federal government's recent actions in this budget of 1991 hit the arts community very hard. In total, culture has lost $169 million for 1991-92 and the carnage may not be over. The big losers will be the four large projects: the performing arts buildings for Toronto, Edmonton and Montreal as well as the cultural research institute announced by the former Minister of Communications only days before the budget.

We need that research institute. I do not care where you put it, but you need to put it in and you need to integrate it into the kind of work that we are doing so we can do our work intelligently with the proper number crunch figures and the proper goal set for the future within this country.

These four projects totalling $151 million have supposedly only been delayed, according to the government. The main concern to the arts community is the government's intention to reduce its over-all grants and contributions to all sectors by $575 million over the next five years.

This year, grants and contributions will be cut by $75 million and each year thereafter by $125 million. It is still not known how Canada Council, Telefilm Canada, the Museums Assistance Program, the Cultural Initiatives Program and the postal subsidies program will be affected.

With regard to the postal subsidies program, we heard the minister today talking about how marvellous the post office has been since it was privatized, but he forgot to mention that he saved $110 million on the backs of the Canadian cultural industries, newspapers, magazines and community newspapers of this country.

If you look at the graph which was presented to us this morning in committee, it is extremely interesting to see that the government can talk about how good it has been in terms of allocation of current dollars. That is lovely, except it forgot there is an inflationary factor. Every one of us knows that it does not cost the same amount of money to buy a bottle of milk and a loaf of bread today as it did in 1984–85.

Here we are in 1991–92. If you look at the current dollars versus the purchasing power of the constant dollar, you would see that this government's allocations have gone down significantly.

I will not give the figures now but if someone wants to ask me after, I would be happy to give a breakdown of these figures. What has gone on here is that the decisions by this government are now going to be reviewed on a behind-the-scenes basis by the hon. Harvie Andre, the government House leader.

I would like to suggest that he may not be in the best position to review a lot of the things that we have been talking about. His review would remind me and hearken back to the Nielsen review, which was rather dramatic and Draconian.

As well, I have been hearing how we have been so good to our youth. We well know that there is a Canadian Jobs Strategy allocation program and a Summer Opportunities program. They all have special fancy names, but what they mean is that students and community groups need help and extra manpower during the course of a time frame which is generally the summer time. That money has been cut in my region alone by close to 20 per cent. That is a serious concern to the arts and cultural community because that jobs strategy cut will be in the amount of about $100 million. It represents a cut of about 5.5 per cent and it occurs at a time when cultural organizations have been pushing for new training and for human resource development programs for the burgeoning youth and cultural communities, which are really vibrant, exciting and dynamic. I know if you go, as I do, to youth theatre programs, to the amateur development programs, to the parks and the playgrounds, to the CEGEP level and see some of the productions that have come out—

Mr. Mills: Degrassi Junior High.

Mrs. Finestone: And today, thank you, Degrassi Junior High is a perfect example. There is so much talent out there, but we need to find the tools to enable them to demonstrate and produce and direct at a national level.

When I look at the CBC, the government's lack of vision and commitment has produced a starveback of our national broadcaster. In fact since 1984, this government has been slashing away at the CBC. If government cuts, inflation and increased costs due to the government's GST, and lack of action in providing for ephemeral rights in copyright are all taken into account, the CBC has lost between $240 million and $400 million in only seven years. Last December, because the government throttled the CBC, the corporation was forced to take measures to address the shortfall of $108 million by closing stations in Goose Bay, Matane, Toronto, Cornerbrooke, Sydney, Rimouski, Sept-Îles, Windsor, Saskatoon and Calgary.

[Translation]

I was in Rimouski when nearly 5,000 people demonstrated against this decision. They were furious. I went to Newfoundland, in Cornerbrook, and I had the same experience with hundreds of people who demonstrated their objections to cutbacks that were both inevitable and intolerable. There were petitions, and action was taken by both employees and listeners. However, this government is deaf and dumb. It doesn't understand the issues, it didn't do anything about it. Meanwhile performers were in a bad way. And they still are, with an average salary of about $15,000 a year.

[English]

So local productions for the most part have stopped. Radio Canada International, Radio-Canada international, has been reduced, as has the parliamentary channel. We pick this up on a temporary basis. We are still talking about privatizing the right of elected members of Parliament to speak to their constituents without worrying about whether the private sectors like how we put it on, the hours we have used, whether we have exempted their time and who shall be seen. It is ridiculous.

As a result of these cuts, 1,100 jobs have been lost, all because the government does not understand why we need a public broadcaster. They do what no one else can do. They bring us the voice of Canada from coast to coast to coast. No private broadcaster can afford to do that. The public broadcaster does it, and does it well. It is important that we keep that link and allow among the exploding spectrum of choices that we have, from America, Europe, Britain, France—all wonderful, and choice should be there—a national voice which sets standards. We cannot afford to continue decimating that service across this land.

Now we have the status of artists legislation, which is welcomed in this House and by the arts community, but I wish it was a little bit more substantive. A lot of it is smoke and mirrors because the concrete ability to realize an improvement in the effective spending power and income of the arts community is not there yet. We have forgotten about income averaging. This arts community knows very well that this year you may be well employed, this month you may have a job but next month you do not. There are good artists and those who are learning to be effective, who are painting and starting to sell. This year they sell well but next year they do not. They have to have income averaging.

This government will not hear of changes within the revenue code or the Revenue Act, which would only be sensible if you addressed the arts community and its particularity.

We did not do anything about bankruptcy protection, which is fundamental. We have done nothing about the public lending rights. We are moving to an open shop from a closed shop and you, Madam Speaker, understand l'Union des artistes et ACTRA who know about ensuring their own artists a job before foreigners come in here. The Americans have moved from an open shop to a closed shop. So thank you very much. There we go, we will not even have access to the American stage, but they can come in here and take jobs from our workers.

With Radio Canada International I guess the best argument is that the Prime Minister's own friend, the Senate chair of the Transportation and Communications Committee, Findlay MacDonald, spoke about it in the media and was quoted widely and wildly. I would read into the record some of what he had to say, but I just want to make a point of bringing to your attention as well—I have one minute left—that we cannot forget the National Arts Centre and the museums.

We have a War Museum. We sent our troops to war. We have pride in these people who represented us and defended us. We treat them so shabbily with the way we look at our museum, but we put millions and millions and millions into bricks and mortar in Quebec. I do not care if you want to move the War Museum to Quebec, but at least let's have something that will honour our citizens and the work that they have done and the valour that they have displayed, not disgrace them. Do not hide from view the beauty and the wonders of the arts and the artefacts that we have from the efforts that they have put in.

The National Arts Centre is also of great concern. There is a $369,000 deficit and there is no accountability in the system that was set up and complete disregard on the part of that board of trustees and its directors. That is worrisome.

I would love to have read what Findlay MacDonald had to say because I think that it displays the inability of this government to have a cultural vision, to understand the importance of Canada's voice, not only provincially, not only federally, but internationally. That is what we went ahead and cut as well. We cut our own throats. We are perfectly ridiculous in the way we manage our budget and make choices.

It is not to say that I do not understand that we need deficit cutting—yes, we do, and we have to be better managers—yes, we do, but you have an opportunity and you have choices in the course of that opportunity. This government's choices have been disgraceful, particularly in the arts world where the bricks and mortar have to be held together so that this country is a country that can stand tall in the world of nations.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I rise first of all to express my congratulations to the hon. member for an excellent speech and presentation on the whole spectrum of subject matter in the ministry of Communications and Culture. It was an education to listen to her and I will read her remarks with great interest. I have the honour to serve with her on the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. Twice today I have enjoyed a very educational experience as we had a presentation earlier this morning from the officials of that department and that was also very informative, interesting and wide-ranging.

I would like to ask the hon. member if she could—

Mrs. Finestone: What is his riding?

Mr. Bird: Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Mrs. Finestone: All right. Thank you.

Mr. Bird: I would like to ask the hon. member if she could identify those areas in communications and culture where indeed the deficit could be attacked, where the soft priorities are as opposed to the high priorities. I may have missed areas of her presentation, but I also share her general views that we do have to be financially responsible in Canada. I thought she spoke almost as a Conservative in the closing comments of her speech and I would be interested again, for my information as a neophyte in the area of communications and culture, to understand where those areas of deficit reduction might be found in the ministry, in the terms of reference of the Ministry of Communications and Culture.

• (1750)

Also, while she is at it, she mentioned, and I think very correctly so, that there are certainly issues and opportunities in the whole spectrum of communications and culture to make a significant contribution to the resolution of our Constitution into national unity. Perhaps she could identify for my information and the information of others in the House where those particular opportunities may be.

I look forward to working with her closely in future months on the committee and I would listen with interest to her response at this time.

Mrs. Finestone: I welcome the question from my colleague from Fredericton.

As the House draws to a close and we are all getting a little bit overwhelmed with the number of meetings and the hours that we are spending, I appreciate more than ever the kind of work that we have to do, although the public thinks we do not work and I have tried to calculate what our 18 hour days really add up to.

Through the ability to respond to my hon. friend who is now the chairman of this committee, and I wish him well in that task, I would like the public to know that together I think that we can look at the kinds of questions he just asked me.

He made a cute little comment. He said: "You almost sounded like a Conservative", because I talked about fiscal responsibility. I guess, my hon. friend, the difference is that I am definitely not a Conservative, nor am I an NDPer. I am not frozen in either ideology. I chose to be a Liberal because I believe in fiscal responsibility. I believe that one must support the social needs and the social values of this country while balancing them on the scale of justice with respect to economic need.

You need to have that scale go in a fair measure and in a fair balance in the course of a mandate. In the instance of the Conservative government we have had, you have been blessed with seven rich years. If you had been fiscally responsible as a government over those seven rich years, during the coming seven lean years, I hope it will not be that long, we would have had the kind of cushion that would have enabled us to live much more sensibly in the years ahead.

With respect to this scale of justice and where I would have looked to cut or to have been more fiscally responsible, I tried to indicate this morning that I thought the Department of Communications ought to look at how we use our money in the production of film, which would be video, one of the communicating tools that is most effective and has the greatest impact on our society. We know that adults watch about 24 hours a week of television. We know that children spend more time watching television than they spend in school. Therefore, the production and distribution of those communication vehicles, television and videos, are very key. If we look at it and priorize where we are going to put our moneys and use them effectively and not scatter them in a variety of programs and institutions, then I think we could be more effective.

Over all, I would suggest that my choice is no deficit, no cuts and careful scrutiny of where we spend it. The goal is the growth and development of a Canadian cultural industry which will cement this nation through knowledge, understanding of its growth, its beautiful history, its wonderful stars and the role models whom we have in every field of endeavour, just as much as in any other country. Certainly we have just as many super stars as the Americans have except we have not promoted them.

I would not cut in actual dollars anywhere. I would refocus my priorities because I think that there is something we cannot afford to do; we cannot afford to cut in our cultural properties and in our cultural agencies. We can afford to cut elsewhere. It is a matter of priority, and that is how I would look at it.

I think I pointed out in terms of the hon. member's third question on federal and provincial that it is absolutely fundamental that we maintain a national presence and national institutions which show and encourage the presence of excellence across this land. This does not remove obligations and rights from provinces and municipalities to foster the kernels of greatness, the folklore and the general culture within their own area of expertise.

I think that where you can run complementary programs such as Quebec does in film development you also see the potential. Money is put in through the potential of capital cost allowances and tax write-offs. They know. If anyone knows, it is Quebecers who know, and I include myself in that Quebecer scene.

We know that it is those instruments of song, dance, film and video that absolutely protect and enable the growth of the culture expressed through those artistic endeavours. They have used fiscal policy to enable the growth and development of those instruments. That is what I would do in terms of federal-provincial relations.

I certainly would not remove the federal presence or the national institutions. I would support a shared jurisdiction along with the private sector.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Maurice, for a short comment or question.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I have already said in the House that I thought it was unfortunate the government did not maintain some of Radio Canada International's services. The hon. member for Mount Royal made a reference to the Polish service, which until quite recently, had 2,926,000 listeners in Poland who were able to listen to the voice of Canada on radio.

I thought it was really unfortunate, and I deplored this withdrawal from the airways. However, I have the following question for the hon. member, the opposition critic for communications. Wouldn't it be time to realize that short wave, in particular, is no longer as effective and as valid a communications medium as it was a few years ago? One example is France. Before, the only contact the French had with Quebecers was through Radio Canada International, on short wave. Today, Madam Speaker, the French can watch Le Téléjournal as well as a whole series of television productions from Canada,thanks to TV5.

The best way for Canada to become known throughout the world is via television, not short wave, since ratings for the latter have gone down considerably throughout the world. This medium is now used only in Africa and Asia.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): That is one way, but there are others as well. I can tell you that what we are coproducing with France, and France will certainly carry out the distribution of cultural products in terms of films and music as well as videos around the world, will be distributed in French world-wide. I hope the day will come when there will be more English coproductions to reflect our reality too.

That being said, the fact remains that we certainly looked closely at all the precious tools we have and the most efficient use that could be made of them here in Canada. I appreciate the hard work our colleague from Saint-Maurice did with regard to CBC International. I know how much he wanted this important international tool to be maintained. I know he fought a pitched battle both in the Committee on Communications and Culture and behind the scenes with the minister and others.

I know that he did not want the elimination of the service in 19 languages and the accompanying staff cuts, heralding the disparition of this marvelous tool which had put us on the map. I think his views were shared by some, seing that even Moscow complained about this cut.

So, I would like to thank my colleague for the work he has accomplished and I hope that he will keep asking for the reinstatement of all the funding and staff required to allow CBC International to fulfil again its role as the voice of Canada abroad, which made us an internationally-known dreamland.

• (1800)

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. The motion before the House fails to take into consideration all the positive aspects of our economic and fiscal policies. To start with, I would like to say that it takes a lot of patience and willpower to listen to speeches like the ones we heard from members of the Liberal Party of Canada and from the hon. member from Mount Royal in particular, about the cuts made by our government in areas as important as, among others, equalization payments. This afternoon, I checked with the Department of Finance about transfer payments to the provinces. They are in three parts, and I think there is a lot of confusion amongst Liberal and NDP members. The first part is the Established Program Financing, the second equalization and the third the Canadian Assistance Plan.

I listened to what the hon. member for Mount Royal was saying about equalization. I wish that, in the next few days, she would check the actual figures because, in Quebec in particular, they increased from 3 billion dollars in 1984 to 3.8 billion dollars in 1991–92, and now 4 billion dollars. That means, for Quebec, an increase of 100 per cent in equalization payments over just eight years.

In politics, it is very hard to avoid being overly partisan and saying just about anything, but I urge the Liberal Party of Canada to analyze the figures concerning transfer payments to the provinces. Since 1984, there has been an increase of up to 6 per cent per year. It is an area where our government has been most generous. I have all the figures here and I might come back to them later on, Madam Speaker. Still, I believe that when you say something in the House, you should have the correct information.

Regarding Quebec in particular, the transfer payments were 8.153 billion dollars in 1984, Madam Speaker, and they will reach close to $11 billion in 1992–93, an increase of almost 35 per cent. I do not see any reduction there, it is a rather substantial increase.

In a speech putting into question the financial management ability of our government, there should not be any question regarding the significance of our economic development program, as outlined in the February 26 budget. The objective of the Budget is crucial: to get Canada out of the present recession and put it back on the road to growth and job creation.

We must emphasize that our government is trying to completely change all the political culture that had been built and nurtured by the former Liberal government. This policy recognizes that the key to economic recovery and durable prosperity during the next few years is the development of a climate which would help bring down inflation and interest rates and keep them down.

All Canadians gave us a clear and strong message during the consultation period that was conducted by the former minister of Finance, and the future will tell how effective his actions and his management are. The clearest message was the need to reduce the interest rates while, of course, taking the free market into account, so that all Canadian businesses could be able to compete internationally.

In order to reach this objective, the plan sets out specific goals whereby inflation would be gradually brought down to 2 per cent by 1995.

Our main actions deal with three particular areas, Madam Speaker. The first one relates to federal spending control. We should emphasize that it is the federal government which, in the last six years, has shown the most restraint in its spending, as opposed to the municipal and provincial governments. Government spending growth has been kept below a 3 per cent. No other government, Madam Speaker, has maintained that rate. This performance has been recognized by all world organizations and by OECD, among others.

There is also the second aspect, the deficit and debt reduction. It takes a lot of gall, Madam Speaker, for a Liberal member to say that the government should have acted more responsibly. They went as far as mentioning the name of Marc Lalonde who pushed the debt from 18 billion dollars to 200 billion dollars and who doubled the deficit in one year, from 14 to 28 billion dollars. They dare to tell us that we have no sense of responsibility! I find it unacceptable for a member to stand up in this House and say such exaggerations and inaccuracies. As to our strategy of drastically cutting the costs of government operations, especially salaries, Madam Speaker, of course, we hear attacks mostly by Liberal and NDP members. It is normal coming from opposition parties because for 20 years, we saw a management philosophy that could be called "put it on my account". We kept spending without ever paying. It is unbelievable! We have even been held responsible for the 1984 deficit of $40 billion, a few minutes ago. And it is when our government came to power that the deficit started to decrease. It went down 25 per cent since we came to power.

It is the reason why, Madam Speaker, our plan for economic recovery and our budget rejected specifically this approach of irresponsably increasing public expenditures and the deficit. Such spending would inevitably bring back higher deficits and a galloping debt that would in turn lead to another period of economic slowdown. The budget rather reaffirms the fact that a better control on public finance is an essential element of the balanced economic framework that we must put in place to insure a permanent recovery and prosperity.

The public will be confident that our progress in reducing inflation and interest rates, and in increasing productivity and personal prosperity, will not be engulfed in the quicksand of deficits ans public debt, with the resulting tax increases necessary to face the situation left behind by irresponsible people.

To develop our plan for economic recovery, we turned to the future, but we also drew lessons from our past economic development. It required a lot of courage, Madam Speaker, to redress the situation left by Marc Lalonde and associates. During nearly 25 years, from 1950 to 1973 inclusively, Canadians saw their national economy and personal prosperity improve considerably. Canada's standard of living nearly doubled within one generation. The growth did not happen by chance, it was not accidental, it resulted from sound economic policies. Inflation rate was then less than 3 per cent, which helped maintain interest rates low. Federal government annual deficits were low or non-existent. I recall that unrestrained and uncontrolled deficits appeared in 1974, particularly under Messrs MacEachen and Marc Lalonde.

As I said, federal governement annual deficits were low or non-existent. Companies increased their investments considerably. We became more productive and more prosperous, and employment progressed markedly. Unfortunatly, these lessons were forgotten from 1974 to 1984. Governments had let inflation go sky high before trying to control it with restrictive monetary policies. However, those policies were always relaxed before prices had really stabilized. So the net effect of each series of policies was to have them firmly ingrained in the public inflationist wishes and bad habits, and the governement only compounded the problem by spending more than he received in taxes.

The philosophy of the day was to live beyond one's means. That is why, Madam Speaker, it was so difficult for us in 1984 to be a responsible government and to commit ourselves to controlling the deficit. That is why the deficit escalated to 38 billion dollars, almost 40 billion dollars, Madam Speaker, with a budget of about $100 billion or 105 billion dollars while the national debt shot up from 27 billion to over 200 billion dollars. It is no wonder then that economic growth and production went down between 1974 and 1984. Businesses had to fight on two fronts: on the one hand, stronger government interventions, tax collections and the national debt—clearly, the government had no choice—and, on the other, growing competition world-wide. Heaven knows that factor is not decreasing.

The weakening of the Canadian dollar was not sufficient to stop those trends. We are still paying today for that incredible period. If it was not for the service of the debt that we inherited in 1984, Madam Speaker, there would be no deficit and our debt would not have reached the $400 billion mark it will cross this year.

Since 1984, the government has been busy rebuilding the foundations necessary to support a sustainable economic prosperity. Our record shows the very real progress we have achieved. I take this opportunity to mention to you again, Madam Speaker, that international organizations, have acknowledged that Canada has now a policy and a plan for economic recovery which is the envy of many other countries, particularly if we consider the initial situation which we had inherited.

The debt growth has been considerably reduced from a 22 per cent annual rate to about 8 per cent, Madam Speaker. The deficit, though still too high, has been reduced by half in relation to the national revenue. Inflation has been brought down to a level equivalent to about half of the average rate in the 1974–1984 period.

However, to help our country overcome its current problems and achieve a long-lasting prosperity, we must work harder to put our public finance on a sound basis. The economic recovery plan suggests basic and decisive measures to that end—and, Madam Speaker, I am pleased to mention them: the capping of wage increases for members of Parliament and federal civil servants over the next four years; the extension until 1994–1995 of the expenditures control plan established last year with a view to bringing the deficit down to $6 billion from a level of $40 billion it reached when we came into office, Madam Speaker; the adoption of legislative measures setting absolute caps to the federal government programs expenditures over the next five years.

Unbelievably, Madam Speaker, this is the only government in the world to legislate in order to push its economic renewal plan through.

We will use the GST surplus, among other things, to better control the federal debt. That is unprecedented in this country. Under this legislation, GST revenues will be allocated only to reduce the runaway debt, and not for new expenditures as the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party ask us to do repeatedly.

With these measures, Madam Speaker, we will achieve real progress. For 1990–1991 and the next fiscal year, our deficit will stay at $30.5 billion, despite recession-related problems. We could well have had a $35 billion deficit because of this recession, but thanks to the government expenditure control program, the deficit stayed at $30 billion.

Then, in 1992–1993, the deficit should fall considerably and drop to $24 billion, and then fall, three years later in 1995–1996, to its lowest level in 20 years, $6.5 billion. For the first time in 25 years, the federal government will have no new loan to incur at that time.

What we have to deal seriously with is the credibility of our goals for deficit reduction and debt control. From 1985 to 1990, Madam Speaker, our annual projections for the Gross Domestic Product growth, the inflation, the unemployment rate and the interest rate have always been quite accurate, compared to forecasts made by 14 private organizations.

In fact, a recent study published in the Quarterly Economic Review, from the Department of Finance, shows that over the entire 1985 to 1990 period, our global forecasts have been the most accurate. So, we should really look forward to 1995 with confidence.

At the same time, we consider ourselves realistic when we say that the deficit will drop to $24 billion by 1992–93. It is easy to understand, Madam Speaker. We will no longer have to support the transitional costs for the GST, which will represent a $2 billion savings. Obviously, there will not be another war in the Persian Gulf. The expenditure control plan will help with further savings since we are keeping increases in expenditures by departments to a bare minimum. The increase is not to exceed 3 per cent.

There have been years, particularly under Marc Lalonde as Minister of Finance, when expenditures increased at a rate of between 15 and 19 per cent a year. That was quite an achievement. The decrease in interest rates will also reduce debt charges. It has already started to do so. The economic recovery will help reduce unemployment payments and increase government revenues.

In turn, this large reduction of the deficit, combined with the recovery of the national economy, will favour a reduction of the debt in proportion to our economy for the first time since 1974–1975, when the disaster started under the government of Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

This major reorganization will mean that government revenues, combined with the sustained benefits accruing from lower interest rates and expenditure restraints legislation, will be sufficient to eliminate the need to borrow by 1994–1995, not 2020, Madam Speaker, but 1994–1995. That is in line with the goal set in the 1989 Budget in spite of all the problems encountered since. Because of higher interest rates and the recession, we did not change the date; instead, we took appropriate financial means to put our economy back on track.

I would like to point out, Madam Speaker, that all the salary restrictions we are imposing on parliamentarians as well as on the entire public service tell the Canadian people, both in the private and the public sector, what the markers should be in Canada in terms of salary increases if we are to succeed in bringing down inflation and the interest rates. We simply cannot afford to grant raises that promote inflation.

This leads me directly to the other part of our plan for economic recovery. As I said at the beginning of my speech, the result of lower interest rates translates into a reduction in inflation expectations and a change in our habits as a society. It is no wonder that, for the past decade, the countries with the lowest inflation, namely Germany and Japan, have enjoyed the lowest interest rates. The lesson is good and we should persist, Madam Speaker.

Federal expenditure control and salary restrictions are important steps in alleviating inflationary pressures. But the economic recovery plan goes even further. It sets out specific targets to bring inflation down to 2 percent by the end of 1995.

These targets will add a public dimension to reinforce and support our government's financial and monetary policies, Madam Speaker. Setting out clear and realistic targets will encourage Canadians to lower their inflation expectations and help us stabilize prices more quickly and with much less disruption.

We will make it, because these targets reaffirm and make clearer than ever before this government's commitment to price stability. With the full support of government, the Bank of Canada will make sure that these targets are achieved and the copying of expenditure will only reinforce this commitment. These measures will revive the confidence of Canadians and encourage them to change their behaviour, whether we are talking about prices set by companies, long-term contracts, negotiated wage settlements or the inflation risk premium demanded by investors. They will be less demanding when they realize that the value of their income, their investments and their savings will be maintained. That will ease the transition towards lower interest rates and strengthen the competitive position of companies and workers vis-à-vis the international competition that is invading our homes, Madam Speaker.

The economic recovery plan is more than just a commitment to economic progress and sound financial management. It is a concrete and durable strategy aimed at creating confidence in the economy and economic growth, and in the long-term prosperity and security of Canadians, on a sound foundation, a strategy initiated in 1984.

The plan for economic recovery is based on the fundamental realities of today's world. To remain competitive in the global context, countries and companies must put this at the top of their list of priorities in their policy planning process. This conviction was the driving force of the agenda for economic renewal we tabled in 1984 and the structural reforms we implemented to get rid of obstacles to industrial efficiency and to stimulate our economy and our ability to compete.

These structural reforms include deregulation in the energy and transportation sectors. All Canadians are aware of the consequences of those measures, Madam Speaker. As for measures to help the unemployed acquire new skills and obtain the training they need to find jobs and keep them in a rapidly evolving global economy, we have changed the old Liberal approach that allowed people to work a few weeks and then live off the government for the rest of the year. That is not what Canadians want. That is why we put the emphasis on training.

We have invested several billion dollars in training, because people change jobs more frequently than they used to, an average of every five years, so we had to make funding available to retrain Canadian workers, and we did that, Madam Speaker.

I would have liked to expand on certain statements made by the Liberals this afternoon about the financial situation of this country, which is steadily improving. The deficit was about $40 billion when we came to power, and a few years from now, it is expected to be about $25 billion. I would have liked to talk about transfers to the provinces, which have increased steadily since 1984. There is a lot of rhetoric about this particular issue, but I can say that in Quebec transfers have increased 35 per cent since 1984, and I am very proud of that.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my colleague mentioned the national deficit, indicating that it was high when the Liberals were in power.

As the hon. member will recall, in 1983 or 1984, the debt was approximately $170 billion. Between 1984 and 1991, the accumulated debt increased to $400 billion, which it about three times the amount of the debt inherited from the Liberals.

I simply want to tell the hon. member that, if we cut government jobs and stop producing and providing services to the Canadian people, we are sure to be able to pay off the deficit and the debt within five years, more likely ten. But that it not what a sensitive government, a people-oriented government truly concerned with the social welfare, the well-being of the population, would do.

As one of my colleagues pointed out, we should not have to sell the furniture in order to pay the rent. But that is precisely what has been going on since 1984. Just think of the cuts in health care and education, of the expenditure freeze imposed upon these two areas over the next five years. That is incredible, at a time when we should be investing even more in these areas.

And what about the universality of our health system, put in jeopardy? That is incredible, especially at a time when western and even eastern countries are looking to the Canadian model. In education, the government is contemplating a bill to deal with productivity and education over the next ten years. That is a rather ambitious program. On the other hand, cuts have been ongoing ever since 1984.

As for housing cuts, this is a question of special concern to the Liberals and the Canadian people. There are presently some 230,000 homeless people throughout Quebec, Ontario, Western Canada and the North. So, cuts in housing are surely not the reasonable or logical thing to do.

The public service suffered cuts too, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, it was not the right area. I would have liked the government to carry out a study to find out if indeed there was a surplus.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I may remind the hon. member that this is the period for questions and comments, not for speeches.

The hon. member should either put his question or finish his comments, since other members would also like to ask questions and make comments.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not really want to get involved in this debate, but since the hon. member spent almost 80 per cent of his time attacking Mr. Lalonde and Mr. Trudeau and other distinguished members, I really had no choice.

So my question is this: Since recently, the tax rate here in Canada has become the highest of any western country, could the hon. member indicate what his government's intentions are regarding a national strategy to deal with matters of inequity and regional economic development across Canada?

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I knew the old Liberals weren't very good at figures, but I didn't think the new ones were as bad. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that they are hardly in a position to accuse us of being unable to control government spending. If you don't have the figures, if all you have is a ball park figure, I have them. This afternoon, I took the trouble to go to the Department of Finance and ask for them. Your old friends MacEachen and Lalonde were there in 1981–82, when the deficit was $15 billion. A year later, it was $29 billion! Not bad, a 100 per cent increase in one year.

You asked me if we have acted responsibly. Yes, we have, because since we came to power in 1984, the deficit started to go down and it will continue to do so, because two or three years from now, we hope to bring the deficit down to zero and have a balanced budget, Mr. Speaker. And what about transfers to the provinces? They don't have the figures either. They say whatever they like, because they never have the figures. I have them, Mr. Speaker, and I can table them. These are some very recent figures on transfers to the provinces. I can give them the figures on established programs financing, for example. I can give them the figures on equalization; I can give them the figures on the Canada Assistance Plan. This is an area that concerns health care, education, welfare and in fact any sector where there is a transfer of funds. I can tell you there has been no reduction in funding in any of these sectors. In fact, there has been an annual increase in funding of nearly 6 per cent since 1984.

However, as a responsible government, our message to the provincial governments is to ask them to try and cut spending and rationalize costs in areas where they have full jurisdiction, even if we do participate in the costs. As for regional development, I would ask you to analyze carefully all the agencies that were created in the West, the Maritimes and also in Quebec, where in co-operation with the government of Quebec, we spend several hundred million a year on development in peripheral regions, something the Liberals never did. Funding for specific programs has been frozen, Mr. Speaker, especially in my region, but with the co-operation of the Government of Quebec we are able to deliver the goods.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to continue in this vein, but we will have a chance to get back to this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Abitibi, very briefly.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): I would like to comment and ask a question about the Liberals who were talking about the financial situation. Mr. Speaker, if we go back to 1983-84, in January 1984, Marc Lalonde introduced the Scientific Research Tax Credit. He said that this innovative measure to encourage private research would cost the government about $100 million a year. It ended up costing $200 million! They passed the $100 million mark on the very first day. It was a mad rush, because this turned out to be a stupendous tax loophole. Companies, big brokerage firms and big law firms went on a roll, at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. They made millions risk free, even before the actual scientific research started, and then there were the others, the people who committed fraud.

Mr. Speaker, an item in L'Actualité said it was the robbery of the century, perpetrated by the Liberal government. In fact, Conservative minister Michael Wilson had to put on the brakes in a hurry. It was his first official act, but it was already too late. In nine months the bill went up to nearly $3 billion, one-tenth of the national deficit. This is enough to build 50 hospitals in Canada.

My question is this: Could the hon. member for Chicoutimi tell us this evening whether this disastrous Liberal program, implemented in 1983-84, contributed to the federal deficit?

• (1830)

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and allow me to thank the hon. member for Abitibi who does a tremendous job for his constituents and is very much involved in all the issues. He works very hard every day for the people in his riding.

I can inform the hon. member that this was the Lalonde shortfall: an extra $3 billion of federal debt, Mr. Speaker. That was the kind of disaster, the kind of neglect the Liberals institutionalized. The day before the budget, it was discovered that they would cut $200 million, but so what, millions or billions, the Liberals were not particularly concerned. That is why we needed a more responsible government to get on with the job.

Regarding research and development, I would like to point out that our strategy is to help small businesses, not to throw money at the multinationals for research but strictly as an incentive to do research. We give up to 100 per cent of the funding allocated to research and development. This is good for the Canadian economy, because we are convinced that people in the business—small businesses and company owners—will do research in advanced areas that are more likely to create jobs.

[English]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): We are here tonight to talk about the government's estimates. Having listened to my colleague across the way on the debt, I am still waiting—and have been since February—for the bill that would ensure that all those extra GST revenues would go to pay off the debt. That is what I call irresponsibility on the part of the government. It is allowing those funds to go into general revenues instead of paying off the debt. We will get the bill in September and let's see if it is retroactive to January.

This government does not know what responsibility is all about. We have had to listen to aspersions on the civil service, we have the GST against the people's will. This government does not know what responsibility is, either to the civil service or to the Canadian people.

I want to talk about two areas of irresponsibility here tonight, relating to defence and to the fisheries in an area that should not have the problems that this government has created.

We know that this government is supposedly doing a review of our defence policy, the second in four years. It cannot even plan long term. It is doing the review to determine what the goals should be for our defence policy and how the department spends its almost $12.6 billion budget in the 1991-92 Estimates that we have before us.

We have heard all sorts of rumours in the media and leaks from the Department of National Defence as to what this review will mean. It might mean base relocations, it might mean base closures, it might mean withdrawing from NATO, it might mean anything. However, it is all speculation. This government loves to play with people's speculation.

However, the government has not involved the Canadian people in deciding what the role of the Department of National Defence should be. We do not know whether it is a cost-effective review. We do not know if it is just a trial balloon to see how the Canadian people will react.

Canadians want a review, they want to know how this government plans to spend the almost $12.6 billion budget. They want to know where our defence policy is going to be in the next 20 years and what purpose Canadians think the military should serve for Canada. In other words, they want a review process that is going to be open, fair and responsible.

To date they have not seen this. They want to see that they are getting the best bang for their dollars, and to date they have not seen that.

In the United States, where a similar process appears to be going on, the elected people are going to the people to see what the effects are and what the defence policies should be. Not here in Canada. We do it by speculation in the press.

There are a number of areas where money could be saved or reallocated without cutting our military muscle. Indeed, I think we could save enough to reverse the trend and actually start building up our military again.

Let us look at these figures. A March 1988 survey in Armed Forces International ranked Canada highest among all western nations with a ratio of 16.2 generals for every 10,000 active duty personnel. At that time, I think the active duty personnel in Canada was roughly about 80,000 to 85,000 people.

That ratio of 16.2 generals for every 10,000 active personnel is higher than the United States. It is higher than the United Kingdom and it is even higher than the Philippines. Donald Grant, in The Globe and Mail on May 27, had an excellent review of this point. He said: "In 1990–91 we had 122 people with a rank"—in Canada, not somewhere else—"of Brigadier General or higher. They had average salaries ranging from $94,000 to $131,000 per year".

He said that we have more generals than we have tanks, 122 generals to 113 tanks. That is okay, it is important to have a back-up general in case one of the tanks breaks down.

We have more officers than we have privates, 16,096 privates to 18,861 officers. To top it off, Donald Grant—and I thank him for his analysis because he writes on military affairs and he is in The Globe and Mail and if he is in The Globe and Mail it has to be real—writes that the almost $12.6 billion budget for defence supports only 10,000 service people who are combat ready or who support combat ready troops.

Mr. Grant has described our Armed Forces system as a triumph of bureaucracy over common sense. I agree that this government is allowing this to continue. As long as we do not have a public and fair debate across Canada on what our military should be we will continue to have a top heavy military, a top heaviness that is unmatched anywhere in the world.

I ask the minister of defence whether he is looking into this factor. Will he give us a cost effective military that is oriented toward active duty soldiers and training. Let us look at the figures in the estimates again to see where else we can find questionable spending.

In the 1990–91 estimates we find that $90.4 million was spent on other professional and special services. This is a military that is top heavy with generals already. There is no specific accounting for these services, just a figure in the column.

We also find that $21.8 million was spent on consulting services, whatever that means. It should have been defined.

Another $30.4 million was spent on contract administration. These figures alone total $182 million and none of it goes directly to putting sailors on boats, soldiers in the field or pilots in planes. In short, none of it goes to defending our country.

The Department of National Defence does not need to spend millions on consulting. Just go and ask the Canadian public what its priorities should be. Ask the generals to go to the public with their defence policy to determine whether it matches what Canadians want.

I could bring a panel of housewives from South West Nova who know how to spend their budgets better than the Department of National Defence does. I guess the minister does not see the relevance of a real public debate on national defence. I do not claim to have all the answers but I think I know what some of the right questions about our defence policy should be.

I hope the minister will look first at improving efficiencies within the existing budget before he cuts further into our military muscle.

• (1840)

I hope he will also look at the purposes of our national defence policy.

Canada is the second largest country in the world by land mass. We have a huge coastline which needs defending against commercial and military threats, to defend our jurisdiction within the 200–mile limit. We have a claim to Arctic sovereignty which is not accepted by our closest and strongest neighbour and yet we cannot control it. We did away with the Polar–8.

We have an enormous air space. We have national emergencies in which the military is needed to give a hand. We have an expertise in international peacekeeping which could soon be in great demand given the end of the cold war. However, when it came time to sending combat troops over to the Middle East we did not have enough.

These are the proper ends of a Canadian defence policy. These are the proper ends which I think all Canadians want to have a public and open discussion about.

How to put a priority on these things is what we should be debating here publicly and across Canada, but if we are to meet these needs we will have to increase what we spend directly on recruiting and training service personnel, not decrease. We will have to greatly increase the size of our active duty service component.

The 1989 figures show that Canada ranked second to last among NATO countries, with 1 per cent of the labour force being defence personnel. This puts us behind Greece, Belgium, Turkey and even Portugal.

Looking at NATO, Greece's defence personnel as a percentage of its labour force is 5.6 per cent. Canada's is 1 per cent. It is at the bottom, except for Luxemburg which is pretty close to Canada with 0.9 per cent. We have the biggest country in that group of NATO countries and we cannot come up: Greece, Turkey, Belgium, France, the United States, Portugal, The Netherlands, Italy, Norway, Germany, Spain, the United Kingdom, Denmark and then Canada and Luxemburg. The average for those NATO countries is 2.5 per cent.

It means that we need to have more people in our Armed Forces, not cut back as seems to be the remedy of the top–heavy generals as they are looking at it, rather than looking at a realistic approach of a $12.6 billion budget.

We have to protect our sovereignty. We do not need to disgrace the role of our trained seamen and our other forces with not having the ability to have backup. When it came to sending the three ships over to the Middle East, they had to be trained on the way over. Fortunately, the equipment had been sitting around waiting for a contract, which is still not complete, to put that equipment on and they had to be trained on the way over. That does not seem to be very logical training.

Before I move to fisheries, I just want to say on that subject that I think it is most unfair of this government to allow speculation to be part of its review process in the department of defence policy. It is unfair to Canadians who want a full and public debate about the objectives of our defence policy. It is unfair to the military personnel who have served Canada so well and it is unfair to the many Canadians who directly and indirectly depend on the military.

I think Canada wants a military it can be proud of, one which can answer the needs as I have already said.

Now I want to move to another area, the fisheries. I want to talk about it because the question the fishing industry is asking is: what is the fairness of asking an industry which is only getting by to pay for a monitoring system of which it is not able to offset the cost? The market will not return the cost that it has to pay per pound for the monitoring system.

The boat quotas are one third of what it caught in the past. The one or two cents a pound it has to pay for the monitoring in the future are the profits it would have made.

I would hope that this minister of fisheries will last longer than his two predecessors. In two and half years we have had three ministers of fisheries. It shows how bad the fisheries policy is. I would hope that this minister, who has been asked to meet with all parties involved in the industry, big and small, large companies, small companies, big fishermen, small fishermen, inshore and offshore, will discuss the stupidity of this policy. He has not met yet. It is a most important issue. We saw what happened in Newfoundland.

Right now, in the Scotia Fundy, he has not even appointed someone in his office to whom they can talk. He has no assistant responsible for the Scotia Fundy. How is he going to deal with a problem when there is not even somebody within his office for the people to talk to, to ask him to come and deal with it, let alone for me, as a member of Parliament, who asked him since the beginning if we could have a meeting? I have given up asking for that meeting.

I want to explain the system of dockside monitoring which I have been talking about. This system is being implemented in Scotia Fundy by an employment program from manpower. It is now training 133 new people, but not for the Department of Fisheries. These fishermen and these companies will have to pay in the future to have somebody come down and monitor and weigh their catches.

I will get to where it is coming from. The industry did not ask for this. I want to explain what happened just this Sunday in one small harbour. A boat was coming from George's Bank. Think of a 65-foot dragger coming from George's Bank with only the 30,000 pounds of groundfish it could have because of regulations. It had probably travelled 12 hours to get there and it phones in. This is what the dockside monitoring does. You have to hail. Hail is picking up a phone which some of the small boats never had to have before. They need to have a phone system so they can phone onshore. It has to be six hours before you can land your fish. Six hours before, regardless of a storm or whatever, and you have to wait outside that dock for three hours after you get there if it is not within the full six hours.

This boat was on time. It had said it would be there at 8.30 in the morning to be weighed. Now, this is Sunday. The boats cannot tell when they are going to go fishing. The weather has a lot to do with whether they can go fishing in the course of a week. It had gone. It was quite warm in Nova Scotia last week. Most people would say it was one of those beautiful times when you would not want to have fish waiting in any hold because of the heat. It would start hurting the price of the fish on the market.

That does not matter to the Department of Fisheries. That is inconsequential. The boat came in with 30,000 pounds, arrived, as it had hailed and told it would be, at 8.30. Nobody was there except the company, the loaders and the unloaders for the company who were getting paid double time because it was Sunday. No one came. Finally, the owner had to get in his truck and go down the road quite a distance to get a fishery officer to come back and make sure he had the same amount in his log that he hailed six hours before. There was nobody there to check it.

I know you are giving me a signal, Mr. Speaker, but this is quite important. I want you to get the right picture. It is that additional insult to people that this minister has got to come down and take a look at.

There are two things that have to be remembered. This is a program imposed by the department to help it monitor the fish.

• (1850)

It is a program that no one goes out to fish. It does not look at it that no one would go out to fish unless there were fish to catch. I do not know any fisherman who would go out to fish if there were not fish to catch.

I do not know any fisherman who would not have abided hailing his load in, by a log book and a random inspection of his load. That department does not look at that. It has to have people go down there, look at it and weigh it.

I have one more minute, but I hope somebody in here will ask me a question on this because I could go on for quite a time on this.

On top of all that the minister has got to come down. He has got to walk around these streets. He has got to go into the restaurants and see the insult to the communities.

One of the municipalities wrote to the minister a while back:

> The Municipal Council for the District of Digby wish to object to the Fishery officers wearing sidearms, especially in public places such as banks, post offices, stores—

This minister of fisheries has a lot to learn and a short time to learn it in. The first thing he could do is start consulting with the people who want to consult with him, the people in the industry, and he is not going down there, to talk about this dockside monitoring and the threat of somebody with a gun to an innocent fisherman.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. I would like to first point out to her that I received today a copy of the number of licences issued in 1990 by the Scotia Fundy Region for foreign vessels associated with the fishery in Nova Scotia. There were 80 factory freezer trawlers from foreign nations fishing national allocations. There were 36 large vessel licences for what it calls supporting fishing fleets. There were 18 foreign vessels fishing and doing research work with no observers aboard. There were 48 special fishing factory freezer trawler licences to foreign vessels, a total of 249.

I also received, and the hon. member would be interested, what they call a herring by-catch licence amendment which says: "While conducting the silver hake mackerel fishery, the vessel", in this case foreign vessel, "is permitted to take an incidental catch of herring that may not exceed 30 per cent of the total weight of mackerel".

It appears to me, and the hon. member can correct me if I am wrong, that shows an incredible favouritism toward these large foreign vessels which have Canadian licences fishing on the hon. member's coast in Nova Scotia.

I wonder if she could comment on the favouritism shown to the foreigners and the discrimination against Canadian fishermen.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I appreciate my colleague's question. I know that I share his concern as to the numbers. Just looking at that, once it got beyond 106 to the foreigners, I thought of the letter which came in today from one of my constituents. I will get back to the mackerel. In other words, they could catch all the mackerel and still catch 30 per cent more herring. I would think that every person in my riding who relies on the herring industry should be very upset and, as the hon. member knows, we have quite a good herring fishery.

I want to just say something about those. After I did 80 factory fishery ships and 36 large vessels, I gave up counting because in this letter I received dated June 10, it talked about boat quotas. In 1990, the same year the hon. member is talking about for all these foreign ships, of the 105 C-1 specialists, and I am sure that my colleagues know what a C-1 specialist is, it is a 45 foot boat, around 50 per cent of the 105 were independent. Now six months into boat quotas for 1991, there is only 10 per cent left.

You tell me how you can explain to somebody that you can have only 10 per cent of C-1 specialists left when there used to be 105. You are telling me that there are about 165 foreign licences fishing where these boats used to fish. What is the sense of the policy?

I do not want to go into that. The reason for this is that these licence holders received very low boat quotas. The quota was less than 150,000 pounds per licence. I want to say that those 36 large vessels are on a by-catch. Their by-catch in the groundfish will be more than the 150,000 pounds. The boat quota went to these people.

It is sad to think that we have come to this point, that we give to foreigners and do not allow the people in our area to fish within our own waters. It is sad to think that we cannot have a policy from the Minister of Fisheries that would answer the people, and a minister who would look at the policy and say: "This is crazy."

I am hoping that the Minister of Fisheries, who comes from Newfoundland, is going to be able to say it. Certainly, the other two could not, and they got kicked out of that position.

When you have a policy that gives more off-shore quota in a by-catch—we do not have a marketing policy to market the fish—to those foreigners who come over here, there is something wrong with Canada.

It goes back to the responsibleness of this government, a government that will not listen to our own Canadians. It will listen to the Americans.

I kind of laughed this afternoon when the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs quoted an American in answer to my leader. The Americans are the only people this government listens to. Maybe he would listen to an American in the quote. The government does not want to listen to Canadians.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for South West Nova on such a fine presentation.

I would like to take note of the comments that she made at the beginning of her speech with respect to the defence policy, the military budget and the importance of the Canadian Forces Base Cornwallis which happens to be in her riding.

Mr. Speaker, if you will give me a couple of minutes, I will use that base and relate it to defence policy in such a manner as to let you and the House know why we do have concerns about the policies and where they are going.

Right now, Canadian Forces Base Cornwallis is the training base for anglophones in the Canadian Armed Forces. It has been that way since World War II. I do not have to tell you what the impact of the economy is for a base that size. It is a major base.

Roughly eight months ago, the hon. member discussed with me the possibility, the likelihood and the rumours of the base closing. My response was: "We do not have to worry about that yet, because we do not have a defence policy."

Until we do get a defence policy, I do not imagine that there will be any additional bases closed to the ones that were closed in 1989. Mr. Speaker, I hope I am still right, and so does the hon. member.

Now I am hearing all kinds of spurious rumours about Cornwallis. Cornwallis happens to be the one because it relates to the hon. member, but there is CFB Calgary, CFB Shilo, CFB this and CFB that. This is not the way to run a defence policy. This is not the way to run a country.

You have military bases there and first of all, those people in the military get terribly upset, insecure and over wrought by those rumours. I do not want to bring the gulf into it but quite frankly, I think they deserve better than that.

You are always going to have rumours in government, but I do not see this government putting any filter on the rumour. I do not see it squashing the rumour, and I do not really hear much talk about a defence policy.

My point here is really on question and comment. I would ask the hon. member to respond to this. If she believes that there will be a defence policy, before the announcements of everything that is going to happen that have been rumoured for the last three or four months, what impact will this have on her riding right now and in the future?

• (1900)

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member, the defence critic for the Liberal Party, who has done a very fine job. South West Nova did have CFB Barrington at one time but then the boundaries were shifted. I know what it was like for Barrington to lose that. We have Greenwood and the spinoff. CFB Cornwallis is in an area that services perhaps 20,000 people. Its workforce I would say probably gives to that area directly and indirectly in economic spinoffs 30 per cent to 40 per cent of the local economy.

The reason I am saying that is because we used to have a fishery but the largest employer in the area is Cornwallis in Annapolis West, the riding of the Minister of Finance of Nova Scotia. It is there as well as in the part that is the spinoff into the Digby area.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. There is a very effective committee working with officials and others in the area to see that this government is well informed and trying to take part in the public discussions that should go along with national defence policies.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak in today's debate.

The motion before us offers the opportunity to review the trust of the economic policies followed by our government over a number of years and extended in the budget measures of February 1991.

It is important in approaching this debate to be very clear as to just what the subject is. It is certainly not the details of the program spending of certain departments and in the case of Motion No. 2, specifically, the program spending of the Department of Finance.

The items in the estimates to which objection has been taken are those which concern primarily the development of economic policy, not specific areas such as taxation or federal–provincial transfers, but economic policy generally and as a whole.

It is therefore a real pleasure to participate in the debate because I can take some time to reflect on our government's approach to the economy in the broadest sense possible. To do this I want to start at the beginning. For the government, that was the state of the economy and the government's finances when we took office in late 1984.

We all remember the recession of the early 1980s with the extremely high interest rates and inflation, the loss of jobs, and the unwillingness or the inability of the government of the day to take effective action to deal with the underlying problems of the economy.

The government came to office determined to deal with those problems, to make our business more competitive and our economy more efficient. I remember well the extremely difficult state of the government's own finances. Program spending by the government had risen to 19.6 per cent of the GDP in 1984–85, compared with an average of 17.7 per cent in the 1970s. Of course that does not take into account the money which had to be spent on servicing the growing public debt.

Our revenues and expenditures were so out of balance that the revenues did not even pay for the program spending, much less meet the requirement to pay interest on the public debt.

The deficit for the 1984–85 fiscal year turned out to be $38.5 billion or 8.7 per cent of the GDP. This was an enormous amount of money and evidence of a profound malaise in the nation's finances.

In 1984 the debt was growing at an annual rate of about 25 per cent. In approaching the situation the government did not allow itself to be panicked into hasty, piecemeal action. We did not start throwing money at every problem, hoping that somehow it would go away. We recognized that there had to be order and clear guidelines.

Having taken the necessary time, the then Minister of Finance came to this House and the people of Canada with an agenda for economic renewal. This was in November 1984. In it he set out the principles which underline the actions taken ever since that time and which still form the basis of our policies today.

That agenda clearly pointed to the need to restore competitiveness in our economy and order to the government's finances. In formulating policy and developing measures, those two imperatives have been constantly in the government's mind. They have shaped the way we have approached problems and have enabled us to make difficult and unpopular decisions, knowing at all times that they were part of an over–all plan to do what had to be done for Canada.

Now I want to go over, very briefly, the key measures and the policy which have marked the years since 1984, years in which there has been great economic progress made by individuals, the government and the country as a whole.

Our policies have dramatically expanded the economy's potential to grow and create wealth. This is the result of consistent, comprehensive action by this government to bring our national deficit under control and to free the private sector from structural barriers and burdens that impeded its efficiency and its ability to compete.

One important goal is to preserve and create jobs. To do this we must be competitive. One of the prerequisites to ensuring our competitiveness is a stable and healthy economic environment that encourages productive business investment. That is why the overriding agenda of this government since 1984 has been to create a more favourable economic environment for business by taking action in the two areas where we have a direct impact on the economy and where we can achieve the greatest long–term benefit.

The first of these areas has been to take action to reduce the deficit. Fiscal soundness is a key to our competitiveness because it will free up domestic savings needed to finance the deficit. These savings can then be channelled into more productive investments creating a more efficient and more vibrant economy.

We have made significant progress in this regard. We have cut waste and inefficiency in the operations of government. We have been successful in forcing the federal government to live within its means, especially on the operating side. A full 70 per cent of this progress results from expenditure restraint and not from revenue increases.

Success in restraining spending will help to make the economy more competitive and create a climate appropriate to economic growth. It will provide more savings for productive investment and create wealth and jobs for Canadians. It will, in short, make the economy more competitive.

Along with our work to control government spending we have also moved to strengthen the ability of the private sector to compete and create a bigger economic pie for all Canadians. We began by transforming a chilly investment barrier into a positive screening and review mechanism, Investment Canada. Investment Canada is now fostering a friendly, receptive and helpful investment climate.

We have also moved to strengthen and improve the climate for free enterprise through new business framework legislation that safeguards fair competition. The new Competition Act is providing long overdue stability to the competitive environment. Similarly, amendments to the Patent Act strengthen intellectual property rights, which for a long time had been asked for.

To encourage a more dynamic and active private sector, we have been overhauling and reforming much of Canada's regulatory framework. Wherever possible we are eliminating unnecessary restrictions and discouraging new regulations that are not necessary.

Perhaps most dramatic has been our deregulation of the energy and the transportation sectors which permitted a more market-oriented and market-driven approach.

Measures of reform of the financial sector have also been presented to this House. Our policies to reform this sector will ensure that it remains healthy and competitive. In doing so we are building on one of the most sound and reliable financial systems in the world.

We have a strong deposit-taking system, we have a strong capital market, we have world-scale life insurance companies. We possess the ability to finance our capital requirements in a very effective and efficient way.

Another important way in which we are reducing the government's role in the economy is by selling government-owned corporations to private interests.

Since 1984 we have privatized more than 20 Crown corporations. We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and we will sell investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet the public policy objectives.

At the same time, we have promoted economic growth through a variety of means to encourage business. We have also taken steps to stimulate greater private sector research and development. Next to Australia, Canada provides for the most favourable tax treatment for research and development expenditures in the industrialized world.

To be competitive in today's information intensive economy requires a skilled and a flexible workforce. That is why we have put forward a proposed labour force development strategy. This strategy, which has been before the Senate for almost a year, places a strong new emphasis on worker retraining and upgrading of skills. The strategy provides for increased federal funding for labour force upgrading and seeks ways to encourage the private sector to double its training effort.

Central to our government's efforts to build a stronger more competitive economy, with greater potential for economic growth, is the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. As Canada depends on trade for 30 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product it is vital that we secure access to our largest and most important trading partner. Gaining broad secure access to a large American market means additional sales and more jobs.

It means greater productivity. It encourages investment in world-scale plants and state of the art technology to meet the international competitive challenge. It allows greater economies of scale and specialization. That means increased economic growth.

Together with the U.S. and Mexico we are now looking forward to a North American free trade agreement. A trilateral accord would transform a free trade area of nearly 275 million people into one of almost 360 million, larger than the 12 countries of the European Community.

Trade liberalization has been a key element of our economic success. That is why we will continue to take an aggressive approach in pursuing opportunities to secure and expand access to our most important markets.

If we are to have a healthy growing economy, we cannot have a tax system that distorts economic decisions and penalizes economic initiatives. Again, this is why we are committed to continuing the process of tax reform. Under our corporate and personal income tax reforms implemented in 1987 we created a tax system that is fairer, simpler and more effective. It is a system that has helped strengthen the economy and improve the quality of Canadian society. A system that is internationally competitive.

We have also moved forward on the major challenge of sales tax reform when we implemented the goods and services tax. In today's fiercely competitive global environment the GST is a vital tool for economic advance. Fifty years of studies and reports called for an end to the existing federal sales tax.

• (1920)

The former federal sales tax was antiquated and unfair, nothing less than a job killer and a growth destroyer. There is not a single industrialized country in the world today that still maintains a tax like ours at the manufacturing level.

In its place we have developed the GST, a modern efficient tax of a kind that has been adopted by 48 other countries. It eliminates completely the hidden burden of tax that previously applied to so many goods and service businesses. It ensures that imported goods no longer receive an unfair advantage over those we produce at home. It will strengthen the ability of our exporters to profitably pursue international markets. At the same time, because of the refundable GST credit, it will also be a fairer tax for lower and modest income Canadians. In fact, three-quarters of families headed by seniors or single parents will have more after-tax income under the GST than under the old system.

The February budget marked a further stage in the development of economic policy. In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance produced evidence that, despite a recession—and we must always remember that we are in a partial recession at this time—the policies of the government have indeed been working. He has also presented measures to strengthen and expand the effectiveness of that policy.

The plan for economic recovery has three main elements: one, clear, achievable inflation targets; two, putting the government finances firmly on a course to a balanced budget; and three, severely restraining the operations of government.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for an encouraging presentation. If one did not have the background knowledge about what has happened in this place for the last couple of years, I would say that we are on a pretty good track.

I do not want to belittle anything the hon. member for Wild Rose said but I do want to set the record straight on a couple of things that were mentioned. I am sure it was not intentionally out of context. However, I would like to put it in the context that I believed it was in when I heard it.

First of all, I want to go back to November 1984 and the first budget of this particular government. I think it is not conjecture or wild guessing on my part that it is fair to say that the Conservative government inherited a growing Canadian economy at the time—it was growing at 4.7 per cent, in real terms. That was really a remarkable recovery from the 1981-82 recession. As is the case today it was a recession, but it was different because it was one of the worst recessions to hit Canada since World War II. However, it did not just hit Canada, it hit the United States, it hit North America, it hit the European community, it hit the world. The parallel is not quite the same.

This one is different, at the government's own admission. This is a recession that has been made in Canada. The government even boasted about creating the circumstances which have caused the conditions in which this particular budget has been put forward. That is point number one.

The second point: I would like to again remind the hon. member about some facts and figures. We have heard them various times but I will put them in a slightly different context. When Mr. Wilson presented his first budget in November 1984 he projected a deficit of $34.5 billion. He went on to say that with this set of projections and no policy changes the deficit for the fiscal year would be $34.5 billion. He said: "This is what we inherited", and I think that was suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker, $34.5 billion is what was established at that time as the benchmark, but we know that in 1984 the deficit in fact really climbed to $38.3 billion and that has now become the benchmark. Well, that benchmark was not established by a previous government.

It has been suggested that the government has had to borrow to pay off the debt. In 1984-85 the debt was $199 billion. At the end of this fiscal year it reached $388.5 billion. Next year, of course, it is going to be more than $400 billion.

I think the point here is servicing the debt. Next year it is going to be around $419 billion as projected by the government's own figures. On the assumption that the Conservatives have no responsibility at all for the 1984-85 deficit—which may or may not be correct—Canada is now paying interest on $189 billion of debt and the next fiscal year on $220 billion of Conservative debt.

First year, second year, third year, I could understand. Blame it on the Liberal Party. But come on, guys, four years, five years, six years, seven years, is it not time to take on the responsibility? When are you going to stop?

Mrs. Feltham: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer my hon. colleague's last question first. Perhaps inadvertently I will also answer his first question.

My hon. colleague talks about the year 1984 and a debt of $199 billion. I, as a small business owner and as someone who has always been interested in finances, can sit down and very easily understand how a deficit that was in place, or a debt that was in place in 1984 could have accumulated with the interest that has been attributed to that $199 billion, in these many years. I think it is very easy to ascertain how we are in a position of $400 billion.

What I also wanted to touch on is that this government not only inherited $199 billion in debt. If we did, I think today we would be looking at a zero debt. What we took over was not only a national debt, we took over a program deficit. We respond, as we read today in a local newspaper from a top writer who said, it was like going out and using your credit card. When you use a credit card and you purchase things, you know in the future you are going to have to pay for them.

Now we are not only trying to pay off all of the purchases that were made prior to 1984, but we still have an interest that is growing daily on those purchases. Also, I think it is very important that all sides of this House look at what we have done with this $16 billion that was in place as far as program spending. No business, no one, could possibly inherit programs and a policy in place and say that any government must continue to give the services that had been established. We could not cut back $16 billion in one year, two years or three years.

As I have said so ably—I think so—in my speech, this government came in with a pattern. We came in with a purpose and unfolded the way we are going over the years. We have stayed with that policy.

• (1930)

Today we feel very confident because at this stage we now have the money in place to look after the programs. We are also putting some money each year towards the debt. This is a remarkable challenge and I think we have handled it very well.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): I would like to say that the hon. member has as I see, given great enthusiasm to her colleagues across the way with a nice reading of her speech. I heard her talk about the advantages of privatization, among other things, and I would like to ask a question about deregulation and its great advantages.

I was wondering whether she could provide what she sees to be the advantages in the sale of de Havilland to Boeing. The government paid Boeing substantially to take it off its hands and is now about to sell this privatized company to a government consortium involving a French company and an Italian company.

In other words, we have sold our own aeroplane manufacturer, via the United States, to the Europeans. That of course means a sale of the Dash-8 to the makers of the ATR commuter plane.

Now the EEC executive has said that this might be a non-competitive arrangement.

I am just wondering if we could have a brief description of the advantages of this sale. What advantages are going to accrue to the workers and research and development in Canada and what is going to happen if the European community executive re-examination leads to a rejection of the sale as unfairly limiting competition.

Mrs. Feltham Mr. Speaker, my colleague has asked me a question on which he has evidently gathered a lot more information and a different version than what I have.

I have not seen the figures that he is talking about and if they do exist, again they are open to interpretation. However I would like to say to the hon. colleague that when the NDP forms the government, maybe they will be able to give us some points on how to sell off our privatized items.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to contribute my few comments to the debate tonight.

I would like to try to frame my comments about the government spending priorities, which of course is the issue that we are discussing. I would like to try to frame those comments in the concept of community values.

I hope to be able to demonstrate that when you look at the spending priorities as determined by the estimates of this government, you can demonstrate that this government really does not understand nor does it really care about community and about community values.

What does it mean, first of all, to care about community? What does community really mean? First of all, it means supporting the corner store in your neighbourhood where your children might go in the morning in the summer to buy a popsicle. It means hoping to make the kinds of policies and programs at the federal level that will ensure that that corner store can remain viable. That it does not go out of business because you are choking it with red tape and extra taxes and taking any of the ability away from that individual entrepreneur to make a living in that community.

What does community mean? It means supporting your local RCMP services. It means ensuring that the funding for adequate policing is there in all our communities so that the officers have the budget and the manpower or the person power, if you like, the staffing, to ensure that they can get out into the community. That they have enough officers available to respond to the emergency needs that arise, but also to be out in the community, walking the streets, talking to the people, to have a demonstrated presence, a physical presence of local policing services. I will get back to the RCMP a little bit later. They are a very visible aspect of our Canadian identity, right there at the local community level, whether you are talking about a small community in the Maritimes or a small community in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap. The presence of the RCMP is a visible aspect of our sense of Canadianism.

Community means supporting our local community newspapers, through the provision of the kinds of subsidy programs that have been made available to them so that they can ensure the mailing costs are not so staggeringly high that it puts them out of business. Until recently we had a reasonable program, I think, of helping those community newspapers, and the government is wont to eliminate those subsidies. Thankfully it has now backed off on that for the next little while, so that many of the newspapers that were looking at a very, very bleak future indeed, have at least got some breathing space. The members and my colleagues on this side hope to be able to convince the government that taking away those programs of subsidies to the community newspapers is going to harm communities throughout Canada.

Community values also means supporting your rural post offices, making sure that they remain a part of the community. In many small areas throughout British Columbia, and I am sure many other provinces, people in the small rural communities meet on a regular basis at the local post office. That is almost the hub, the social centre if you like, of the day-to-day business of the community. People meet there, pick up their mail, pick up their parcels, they chat about what the weather is today, they might talk about what is happening around them. It is a social centre for the community. And this government has shown that it does not understand that sense of community, because it wants to take those rural post offices away, as it has. I think over 500 to 600 of them have now been closed. If the government has its way virtually every rural retail outlet across Canada will be shut down. And that centre, the heartbeat of the community, will be taken away from those people, and the service will be contracted out to various retail operations.

That demonstrates to me, and it certainly demonstrates to my friends and colleagues in Enderby and Sicamous and Salmon Arm and up in Celista in the north Shuswap, and Sorrento, in areas like Lumby, like Falkland, those small communities, that this government simply doesn't understand the sense of community.

Supporting community and community values also means programs for regional job creation, retraining of people who have been put out of work by the fiscal and monetary mistakes that this government has made over the past years. It means getting those people back into the workforce, back into the employment stream, to give them a sense of pride and meaning. That is what community is—regional job creation programs for the forestry workers and the mill workers who have been put out of work in my community, up in the area of Canoe and Sicamous and Salmon Arm. Unemployment levels in some of those small communities unbelievably reach upward to 40 per cent. I am speaking in particular of the community of Sicamous and Malakwa. Those people have been out of work since before Christmas.

Why? Well, it is because of some of the fiscal priorities that this government has set. I will talk about those in a little while and get back to them.

But supporting community and community values means finding a way of getting those people back to work, and it is something that this government, for whatever reason, simply does not understand. Community means making sure that our young people in the interior of British Columbia do not have to leave the towns in which they grew up in order to find a job. It means they can obtain the training in job training programs and post-secondary education programs that should be available to them so they do not have to leave and go to the larger urban centres such as Vancouver or Edmonton, or wherever, so there is not this migration of young talent out of our rural communities into our urban centres.

• (1940)

That is what supporting community means, allowing our young people to stay in the communities that they grew up in so they can take pride in that community, feel a part of that community, and work for their own future within that community.

A Mulroney vision, this government's vision, is not one which reflects community values. It is not one which, I might hasten to say, Canadians share. This government's vision of Canada and the future of this country enshrines what you could only describe as being the corporate agenda where success is measured in monetary terms rather than in social and socio-economic terms.

Canada is much more than the bottom line on a corporate balance sheet and what is good for Bay Street and what is good for the fat cats here in Ottawa is not necessarily what is good for the rest of Canada and the people out there in the regions of Canada understand when I speak those words because they know it right in their guts that the people, the system, here in Ottawa does not reflect their aspirations. It does not reflect their priorities. It does not reflect their sense of community and what this country means to them. That is why this government is headed hell-bent to defeat in the next election.

The policies dreamed up by this administration in the smoky back rooms of the Langevin Block across the street, the policies dreamed up by the backroom boys of this government do not reflect the goals, they do not reflect the aspirations, they do not reflect the concerns of average Canadian people, whether you are talking about a small community in British Columbia or a small community in Labrador.

It has been more than 50 years, almost 60 years now, since the social democratic movement in Canada was born. It was born out of the politics of that kind of alienation. There was a fundamental dislike and distrust back then in the early 1930s of the elitist powers of Ottawa and the Bay Street fat cats. That movement way back in the 1930s formed in the tough times of the 1930s by a coalition of western farmers, western workers, Canadians from virtually all walks of life because they cared about their community, the future of their community, the future of their province, the future of the regions. They recognized that this country was being run by an elitist group for its own self-aggrandizement. They said back then that it had to stop.

Fifty years later we are still fighting that battle. We are still fighting the tendency toward a central Canada fixation where the people who are making the decisions in this country do so on the basis of what is best for central Canada rather than what is best for Canada as a whole.

The social democratic movement way back then had a simple principle upon which it was established. That principle was that this country should be run for the benefit of everyone, not just the benefit of an elite few.

The social democratic movement, under the old CCF, now under the New Democratic Party, never had the opportunity to form a national government in Canada but I want to say also that throughout the years, this traditional reform movement, if you want to put it that way, has played a pivotal and crucial role in enhancing community values. It has pressed the governments of the day to implement programs of real social and economic reform.

I want to say that the New Democratic movement, the old CCF and now the New Democratic movement in Canada has been the real movement of social reform in Canada. We have been the pioneers in advocating progressive programs like public health care—

An hon. member: What are you talking about?

Mr. MacWilliam: You know very well, sir, what I am talking about. Just look back at M.J. Coldwell, just look back at Tommy Douglas. You know very well that those were the voices of concern for social democratic principles in Canada. They were the ones who pressed for public health care. They were the ones who pressed for old age pensions. They were the ones who pressed for equality rights in Canada and the protection of workers in this country. These were programs that recognized and stressed the value of community.

Those same programs that were fought for long and hard over the years have now been jeopardized by this administration and this government which has no sense of what community means.

I must be twitching a nerve over there. The rhetoric is getting heated indeed.

An hon. member: You woke up the member from Cariboo—Chilcotin.

Mr. MacWilliam: At long last, they have wakened up to the reality.

One look at the spending estimates and the fiscal priorities of this government demonstrates to me, very, very clearly, that this government does not care about community. This government does not care about the erosion of a first-class health care program in Canada. It does not care about the increased burden and the increased cost to post-secondary education that our students are having to bear more and more.

It does not care about the scientific community. Just look at the amount of research and development that is going on in this country compared to the GNP. It is a disaster. Canada, one of the OECD nations, has one of the lowest priorities for research and development. That is why our scientists are leaving. That is why we have a brain drain of scientific and academic talent from this country.

This government does not understand the need to support basic research and development, the need to support the academic and scientific communities in Canada. That is why we have got such a difficult problem ahead of us.

The government wants us to be competitive on the international market. I heard the member, who spoke before me, talk time and time again about the need to be competitive. Well, you cannot have a competitive society if you do not have trained people. The only way you can train those people is by providing them with a sound education.

An hon. member: And all you have got to do is look over there and see how much it hurts.

Mr. MacWilliam: Oh it is hurting indeed. Look, they are leaving already, they cannot stand it any longer.

This government also does not care about our cultural community. Look at the cuts to the CBC, $108 million. They rolled over and played dead. When the CBC board of directors came to them and said: "We are short $108 million, we are going to have to throw 1,100 people out on the street and we are going to have to cut 11 regional stations, help us". The government turned a deaf ear. It rolled over and yawned.

The government does not care about Canada's cultural community. It has been freezing funds for our cultural community. It has been freezing funds for Telefilm Canada. It has been starving our performing artists. Do you know that the average income for an actor in Canada is $15,000 and yet this government slashed $18.1 million from the cultural sector, on the ground program delivery funding. Cut it, slashed it, killed it, and, at the same time, it awarded its own bureaucracy in the Department of Communications a 13 per cent increase, $41 million. Is that talking about community priorities? It does not understand the cultural community. It does not understand the scientific community.

I said I would come back to the question of the RCMP. It will give you a good example of what I am talking about.

• (1950)

Last year this government cut $19.4 million from the RCMP, supposedly to help pay for the cost of the gulf war. That cost British Columbia $4.1 million in funding for the B.C. region of the RCMP. As a result of that it had to trim programs. That meant it had to cut or close RCMP detachments in many smaller communities throughout British Columbia.

In my own constituency, Falkland, Enderby and the community of Lumby, three smaller communities, had their detachments closed. The administration centralized into a larger community. Why? Because it did not have the money to spend to do the job it had to do. That is what happens to small communities when you start to withdraw the necessary funding required to put those programs on the ground.

The former Solicitor General came to the conclusion: "Gosh, it worked so well when we cut $19.4 million, let us try and redo the contracts because they are expiring on March 31 and we will withdraw 5 per cent of the funding and put that 5 per cent on to the backs of the province and on to the backs of the municipalities". That 5 per cent cut-back federally meant that small communities throughout British Columbia, communities like Vernon and Salmon Arm, would have to bear from 10 to 25 per cent increases in their local tax base in order to keep their police force. Does that give any indication that this government knows anything at all about the sense of community values?

Post office closures. I talked about that before. This government has closed hundreds of post offices. One of the largest rural closures is in the town of Enderby which also got nailed by the RCMP cutbacks. The community of Enderby is really wondering just what this government is up to. It feels completely and totally abandoned. It has lost its post office and its RCMP services. Is it any wonder it asks: "What the devil is going on in Ottawa"?

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the signal there was a time indication. I wonder if you could give me some indication as to the time I have left, if there is time. I was not sure if you were signalling to me or just scratching your ear.

I see that my time is up. If I could just summarize. The best way to summarize exactly what I have been saying, and I do not very often quote Proverbs, but I think it is a very appropriate quote in this case. That quote simply says, and I refer to this government: "They have no vision, and when there is no vision, the people perish".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, my NDP colleague just made some general points which I think are very easy to reverse. He wants more expenditures. He does not want to pay any kind of taxes. He does not want to reimburse the national debt. Even the convenience stores in this country cannot work that way.

There is one thing he said about the CBC; $1.4 billion a year. That is the expenditures the Canadian taxpayers are paying, $1.4 billion per year. Look at the ratings of CBC Radio in St. John's, Newfoundland. Seventy-five per cent of Canadians living in St. John's, Newfoundland never listen to CBC Radio. In Grand Falls, Newfoundland, 90 per cent of people living there never listen to the CBC Radio. In Toronto, 77 per cent of people there listen to the CBC Radio. In Edmonton, 89 per cent of people living there never listen to CBC Radio. In Prince Rupert, 61 per cent of the citizens there never listen to CBC Radio. The CBC and CBC Radio are very important to Canadians, but we must retain one thing. We also have private radio and TV stations in this country and these radio and TV stations never receive one dollar from the federal government.

They are there. They are very competitive. They are making good programming, but the Liberals and the NDP never talk about the private stations we have in this country which are doing very good work.

[Translation]

All they talk about is the CBC, Mr. Speaker. I think this is an important point. This government is spending $1.4 billion yearly for the CBC. That is a lot of money for one network considering all the other ones. I think that is very generous, that this government is giving very generously to Radio-Canada and the CBC.

My NDP colleague mentioned also, and I will conclude on that, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian health care system. He is scaring the seniors by telling them that we are destroying the system and that we will not treat them.

The fact remains that, this year, the federal and provincial governments will spend $91 billion on the national health system, or about $2,800 per person, from the infants to the seniors. That is still a fair amount of money!

The difference between the New Democratic Party and us on this side is that they want to spend more money on health while we maintain we are already spending enough in that area and that that money must be put to more efficient use.

I think that the government's solution is better than the one put forward by the NDP who want to spend more money but are not ready to rationalize.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. When an hon. member rises in this House and reads statistics from a document, he cannot just read the statistics without tabling that document or at least saying where those statistics came from.

He said that the people in Newfoundland do not listen to CBC Radio when that is the only station a lot of people can get. The hon. gentleman cannot just quote statistics which do not exist.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would the hon. member from Saint-Maurice tell us briefly where the figures he is quoting are coming from?

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of quoting for the benefit of the hon. member, figures from the polling firm BBM, which operated not only in Quebec and in Ontario, but also in the west and in Newfoundland. These figures are in the public domain. Any member of this House can have access to them.

The hon. member from Mount Royal has the figures for any city across Canada and she will gladly give them to him whenever convenient.

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Pronovost: All the hon. members have to do is to check the figures. They are available and in the public domain.

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Pronovost: As annoying as it may be for the Liberals, Mr. Speaker, this is a fact. It is not my fault if Canadians are not listening to CBC Radio, but it is a fact—

Some hon. members: Order!

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The point of order should not be deducted from my colleague's time. That was unconscionable. The response should have been to table the figures as he is supposed to according to parliamentary rules.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to rise in support of the last point of order because I would like to hear an answer to the very eloquent question which was put, to see if the NDP can muster one.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to try to answer the allegations made by my colleague.

I do not know where he gets the figures, but it does show his lack of understanding of the essence of the $108 million cut. He makes the argument of the $800 million cut and the fact that nobody listened to CBC Radio here, there or the next place.

He does not know what he is talking about, because we are not talking about cuts to CBC radio. We are talking about cuts to CBC television. He is trying to build an argument about the lack of audience for CBC Radio justifying the cuts when it does not have anything to do with it.

It does not demonstrate that he does not have very much knowledge of the essence of the argument.

In terms of the member's comments regarding Canada's health care system, the member seems to fail to recognize that the cost of the health care system in the United States per capita is some 25 per cent above the cost per capita of the universal medicare system that we have here in Canada.

• (2000)

The member seems to have completely ignored the fact that the United States is now looking at Canada's medicare system as a possible model to emulate because of the fact that the unit cost, the cost of delivery for each individual in Canada, has been recognized as being so much lower for the equivalent level of care in the United States. That does not indicate to me that because we happen to have socialized medicine in Canada the cost structure has gone wild by any means. It is a very responsible program and the member simply has failed to recognize that.

Just one last point that the member made because he wanted to talk about the fact that the government cannot continue to spend, spend, spend. We are not suggesting that. We are suggesting the government maintain the spending levels that it has traditionally had in support of those programs. The problem is that the government has its tax priorities all backward. The fact is the corporate taxes in this country are now only about 14 per cent. Eighty-five per cent of the tax burden in Canada is borne by individual taxpayers, and that is the problem. We need real tax reform in this country.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacWilliam: Until we get real tax reform, we are going to have those kinds of inequities.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Very briefly, I would like to say to the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap that I get a little troubled when I hear someone stand in this House and let on that a particular party is the only one that has values and start quoting other famous New Democrats. I would like to remind the member from the New Democratic Party that it was a New Democratic Party in Toronto that just a few months ago worked through the night to help destroy our bid for the 1996 Olympics, which would have affected jobs from coast to coast. It would have brought tourism dollars here, and there was absolutely no support from the New Democratic Party on that. So do not talk about your budget.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if you can hear me but I will try to answer the question. The member raises a point regarding recent decisions made by the provincial government in Ontario.

An hon. member: No, no, the city government.

Mr. MacWilliam: It was the city government, right. All I can say to the member is that sometimes those tough decisions have to be made.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure today to participate in this particular debate on the spending estimates. It was just some months ago that I had another opportunity to rise on this debate and at that point I was fortunately able to save the taxpayers a couple of million dollars.

I do not have any immediate suggestions which will do that at this particular point in the debate, but I do want to start off with a couple of very direct comments which I think are very relevant to the debate we are facing today.

Recently, Mr. McKenna, the premier of the province of New Brunswick, made some very appropriate comments which were quoted in The Globe and Mail on February 28, which was about the time that the budget discussions were going on. He said: "Governments must conduct themselves like private citizens: borrow if necessary for capital assets such as a new home, but pay as you go for current expenditures like the groceries".

I thought that was a really appropriate statement by Mr. McKenna and I thought I would follow that along just to see what happened in the spending estimates which we are dealing with today and the spending estimates which we have had in the past. It is coincidental that today in The Ottawa Citizen there was another article which I would also like to quote. It also has very direct relevance to the debate we are involved in right now. It is an article written by Marjorie Nichols, a staff reporter for The Ottawa Citizen and I would like to quote from it very briefly. In the article she said: "The budgetary deficit numbers actually distort the fiscal truth. In fiscal year 1984–85, the Liberal budget deficit was $38.3 billion of which $16 billion went to pay for groceries, federal programs and salaries. In fiscal year 1991–92, by contrast, the Conservative deficit will be $30.5 billion, all of which is interest charges on the national debt."

I find it interesting that Mr. McKenna said that governments should not borrow to buy groceries—which is obviously what previous governments had been doing—and now Marjorie Nichols in response says "Isn't it great, the government isn't borrowing money to buy groceries, it is borrowing simply to pay the interest on debt"; debt going back to the early seventies and going on from there.

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate, and I guess there is another series of reasons. First I want to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for inviting me to participate in this debate with such extensive notice. It certainly gives me an opportunity to pass my notes on to you.

But what we are dealing with is, in fact, estimates that deal with about $158 billion in spending. As is typical across the way, there has just been a family squabble between the two parties and now another of the family says "peanuts" to $158 billion. Well, that is what they thought when they were spending $100 billion and now they think it is $158 billion and it is still peanuts.

Within that there are two aspects, and $111 billion of that money is in fact money that is very directly targeted for items that have been approved in previous budgets, and are ongoing expenditures year after year; the other $47 billion is in other spending programs.

Really it is these spending programs and controls that bring government expenditures totally in line. One of the things I find interesting is that last year the government tabled a document called Where Your Tax Dollars Go in conjunction with the budget. There is an interesting chart in this that I am sure you have had an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to peruse. It shows the various program areas of government spending and how the government has, in fact, spent the money.

The interesting part of the chart is that section dealing with the cost of operation of government. It deals with the cost of the civil service, government travel, government advertising, the office buildings, the telephones, the paper and the cost of the operation of this place.

It shows that the government is in fact spending less in 1990–91 than it did in 1984, and that is after absorbing some 35 per cent inflationary increases. So, when you talk about spending controls of those very things that Canadians expect us to control, those things dealing with simple operation of government, I think we have done a remarkable job. I am talking about 1990–91 in this particular book, but what is more interesting is that dealing in the 1991–92 estimates we basically have frozen that cost of government. Here after six years we haven't increased the cost and in the seventh year we are not going to allow it to increase any further.

That is unfortunate in one sense, because I do have some very direct concern and sympathy for many civil servants who are affected by that particular freeze. It is unfortunate that we have to say to the employees of the Canadian government that we are sorry but we don't have 3 per cent, 6 per cent or 9 per cent salary increases to give you. This year we have no more money available than last year. That is not an easy thing to say to them. But we have to restrain expenditures and so we are doing that. Yes, it is unfortunate that they are affected, but I guess you would agree, Mr. Speaker, they are affected and we here in this House will be affected in exactly the same way. So what we are asking our employees to do, we the management—if you want to call us that—are also doing.

So I think the restraint that we are preaching is, in fact, the restraint that we can be very proud of because we are doing it right here in our own operations.

• (2010)

But it goes further than that. When we talk about spending estimates, we have to talk about a whole series of other things. I find it interesting having just listened to my colleagues opposite. They are talking about how we, the terrible Tories are doing terrible things to all of these social programs in Canada.

Of course, our contribution to many of the social programs is through transfers to provinces. I would like to talk particularly about one province, and it happens to be the province that I live in. I would like to relate it to my riding, and to the Treasurer of the province of Ontario who, of course, is a member for another riding in Ontario.

In their budget presentation, a great portion of it was a huge deficit. That deficit, I can tell you, is unacceptable to the constituents of Ontario riding as I am sure it is unacceptable to the constituents of all of the province of Ontario. What did they say in their budget presentation? They said that the Government of Canada was reducing its transfers to the province of Ontario and it was because of those reductions, to the tune of $3.4 billion, that they had a deficit as large as it was. Now, that is what they said.

I happened to have an opportunity to check this out. I noticed that in 1984–85 when we were first elected and 1990–91, the Government of Canada increased its transfers to the province of Ontario by $3.2 billion which, at an average rate, was 7.3 per cent a year. Imagine that in an inflationary time of 4 per cent to 5 per cent, the Government of Canada was increasing its transfers to the province of Ontario by 7.3 per cent. I would be hard pressed to say that the Government of Canada was dishonest or unfair to the province of Ontario by transferring it that much money.

The leader of the NDP in this House said: If we were the Government of Canada, we would spend the money just like they are doing in Ontario. That means that she would give them that $3.4 billion. I guess they feel they are short. What does that mean? It means that this year, in this year's budget, the Government of Canada would have had to increase its transfers to the province of Ontario by 42 per cent. Can you imagine that, 42 per cent. And they have the gall over there to say that is the kind of increases we should have. Yes, 42 per cent in a 5 per cent inflationary environment.

Maybe that is not what they mean. Maybe what they mean is if the government had not cut back a little bit every year for the last seven years, we would not have to give them 42 per cent in one year. Well, what does that mean? I can tell you what that means. What it means is that instead of in the last seven years increasing the transfers to the province at a rate of 7.3 per cent a year, we would have had to increase them at a rate of 14.6 per cent a year.

Now, is that not a tremendous number, 14.6 per cent a year rate of increase to the province of Ontario? I do not know where they think the money comes from, but I know my constituents are complaining about where it comes from: that trucker's strike that you all saw a few weeks back. It started at the corner of Wesley Road and Highway 401 which is right in the heart of my riding. I can tell you there are an awful lot of my constituents who are rather upset about the spending that exists at all levels of government, including this one right here, but also including the one in the province of Ontario.

When you listen to members opposite carp and cry about the rate of spending, I can tell you that the Government of Canada has nothing to be bashful about in our transfers to the province of Ontario. This year, in fact, our transfers to the province of Ontario will go up by some $220 million. Not down, but up $220 million. So when they talk about programs being devastated, it is certainly not being devastated by things that the federal government is in fact doing in the province of Ontario. It is coincidental that I have these numbers for everywhere else in Canada .I note, for example in British Columbia, that we increased transfers there at a rate of 5.6 per cent a year for the last six years. Again, this is a number that is rather substantial.

In Newfoundland, I am happy to tell you, we increased it at a rate of 7 per cent a year. Again, it is not a bad number considering a 5 per cent inflationary environment.

Having said that, we are aware that there are sacrifices that we are asking Canadians to make in this particular concept of getting our financial house in order. We just cannot ignore it any longer.

Financial management, responsible financial management, was our commitment in 1984. I was not here in the first four years so I am not going to really comment about whether it was good, bad or indifferent. What I will say is that in 1988 I stood for office and was subsequently elected in November of that year. So I am here and I can say, "all right, I might have had some input". I did have some input in the '89 budget, the '90 budget and the '91 budget. I had opportunities to do so.

I do not have a problem standing here in the House saying "I was involved in that budget. Here is the money we are spending. Here is how we are spending it." Is it perfect? Of course not. We all would like to say, "Well, we could do a little more here; we could do a little less there", but we are Conservatives. We only get 98 per cent. That is the best mark we could get.

I compare that 98 per cent to the mark I would give the NDP in Ontario and although I might be biased, I would suggest that they certainly would not get a passing mark. Maybe the hon. member from the NDP might want to get up and give a comment.

What did we do from there? In 1989 we brought in our budget which set out some medium term fiscal plans to reduce our deficit and bring an end to government borrowing in markets by 1994–95. The budget reaffirmed this plan in 1990, as it said it would in 1989, and of course, here we are in the 1991 spending estimates and we are doing that.

In 1984 the federal government was handing out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected in taxes. Can you imagine that, $1.33 for every dollar it collected. That was a real bargain for Canadians. They did not realize what kind of a bargain it was. Unfortunately, they should have all been standing up yelling and screaming in 1980, '81, '82, '83, '84, "enough of these bargains. Cut it out because we know it is not going to be a bargain in the future." Unfortunately, that is where we are now. It is no longer a bargain. No wonder Canadians are dissatisfied when for every dollar of taxes they pay, they now only get 66 cents of service.

I would be dissatisfied. If I walked into the local convenience store, the local grocery store, the local men's wear store to buy something and you put something in your hands and the guy says, "well, that will be $10." You give him $10 and he takes the scissors, cuts away $3.40 worth of it and gives it back to you and says "here is $6.60 worth of the $10 item."

That is what we are doing now with the taxes we have and that is why I am pleased that in this debate, we are talking about expenditure. That is the subject we are dealing with here and I think the government is being very responsible in controlling that expenditure so that at some point in the future when Canadians in fact walk out to spend that dollar of taxes, they will ultimately achieve a dollar of service.

That is a challenge. It is a very serious challenge, but without addressing it today and tomorrow as we did in '89, '90 and '91, it just would not work. But we are not without heart. We are not without conscience. I notice that the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds is here in the House. He has comments and concerns and you know, it would be really easy for me as someone from southern Ontario to simply say, "why did we have an extra $3 billion in the spending to help the farmers of Canada in their time of need?"

I know that members opposite do not want to talk about the fact that we do have concerns. We could have come in with a $27.5 billion budget deficit, but we said, no, that is an expenditure to help the farmers of Canada. I do not have a problem supporting that.

That is one area. The other area was referred to previously when we were talking about some of the areas where government spends money. There was a comment about the fact that the Government of Canada does not do its share on research and development, and we are compared to the OECD countries.

The member was right when he talked about whether Canada contributes as much in research and development as other countries. In total on a per capita basis, no, we do not, but if you take it back a little further and look at the taxpayer contribution per capita, the Government of Canada does very well, thank you very much. What is missing is the business community, the business environment. What they need, some way or another, is encouragement to do their share in research and development to make sure that the whole Canadian level of research and development is done appropriately. It is certainly not a problem of federal taxpayer dollars. The federal government is very clearly contributing in a very appropriate fashion.

So, where are we? Well, today with this budget, some time in mid-year, our total debt will reach $400 billion, which is about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest alone on that debt will be about $43 billion.

It happens that last Monday or Tuesday I had a school group here from Bayview Public School from the town of Pickering, in my riding. There were about 40 of them from grade 8. I asked them: "Are you kids aware that each one of you has a debt of about $15,000"? They kind of looked at me and said: "No. Why do I have a debt? I do not have a debt". I said to them: "Well, you do have a debt, because we, your parents, are spending money on things, some of which you take advantage of, but we are spending money faster than we are willing to pay for the services we are providing". The kids kind of looked at me and said: "Well, is that not your role then, Mr. Soetens. Is it not your role to make sure that we do not spend money faster than we should so the debt does not go up"? I said to these students, "Yes, certainly, partially, it is my role". That is why, in 1988 when I was elected, the major item in my campaign was my comment that if I was elected I would do my utmost to make sure that the Government of Canada restricted its spending, held its spending in line so that we reduced the deficit.

I stand here ready to conclude that this Canadian government has the best record of all government levels, provincial or federal. Certainly, over the last seven years we have controlled our spending and kept it substantially lower than the rate of inflation. Although we have not solved the ills of of the country when it deals with fiscal or debt problems, I am comfortable to say that we are certainly going in the right direction.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am sending over to the hon. member who just spoke some information from the Department of Finance. These are the charts from the federal Department of Finance for this year in transfers to the provinces, 1990–91, compared to 1991–92. He is now having the two charts placed on his desk by the page.

I just wanted to bring to his attention that in 1990–91, compared to 1991–92, this year Newfoundland is receiving less in equalization payments, less in total transfers. The minister in the front row is trying to tell the hon. member that, indeed, the Government of Newfoundland was overpaid. Is this what he is trying to say, overpaid? But it is not true. No, because I can also table a letter from the Minister of Finance that says in addition to these estimates cuts, Newfoundland has to pay back $71 million at a rate of $34 million a year. The minister is nodding his head, so now he knows what I am talking about.

In other words, the Province of Newfoundland is quite different than the other provinces in that we are receiving less in transfer payments. I wanted to ask him whether he is aware that his colleague who spoke before him who is now talking to the minister, just provided me with a sheet that he was quoting the BBM rates. He mentioned Newfoundland as having CBC Radio stations that had very small percentages of the market. What he was quoting from was a document which said that in Gander–Grand Falls the CBC has only 10 per cent of the listening audience and that there are a number of stations in the market, 11 radio stations in Gander, Newfoundland, and 11 in Grand Falls, Newfoundland. That is the market and therefore the CBC only had 10 per cent of that market.

The hon. gentleman should know that there is no such thing as 11 radio stations you can pick up anywhere in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

I want to ask the hon. member who just spoke as he has had a chance to look at these documents, will he now not admit that the province of Newfoundland is receiving far less money in transfers this year than it did last year. That is different from every other province in Canada.

Mr. Soetens: I want to thank the hon. member for sending over these charts. As you can see there are a lot of very small numbers on them but I will be glad to respond because I note on the 1990–91 estimates, if I read your chart correctly, it says that there is a transfer of $1 billion and $5 million. Or, if you want to take the total of cash and tax, it is $1,461,000,000. If you take the next chart, using the cash and tax combination, it says $1,454,000,000 which is a reduction of about $7 million.

That, I grant you, is less, but what the member does not mention in his submission is that the reason it is $7 million less is that last year and the year before they got $71 million more. The fact of the matter is, looking at this, the numbers are, in fact, not anywhere near that.

Unfortunately, I did not have a chance to send this chart over before I spoke, so I will send it over after I speak. I have a chart which I will bring over to you personally which shows that, in 1990–91, Newfoundland received $2,427 in per capita transfers from the federal government. That is the largest transfer from this chart which I got from the finance department. I will share this chart with you. It was $2,427 in 1990–91, and in 1991–92, it is $2,474 per person, an increase of about $50 per person in transfers from the federal government to the province of Newfoundland.

I appreciate that the member may say that a $50 increase is not enough and I wish I could stand here and say we have sent you $500 per person more, but we just do not have the money. I hope that has clarified that position, but I have some other lovely charts here as well.

All I can say is that I understand that the Minister of Finance in the province of Newfoundland said we had a good budget. If he thought it was a good budget, and 47 per cent of the money he uses in his budget comes from the federal government, he obviously cannot be complaining about our budget at all. And why are you? You are from Newfoundland.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member to whom I listened with great interest gave himself a grade of 98 which he admitted was only a subjective guess. We can lend some objectivity to this estimate. The real grade is 14 per cent. That is the grade given to his party by the people of Canada right now and I suspect that that means that he will not have to worry about the next four years.

The hon. member has been at great pains to suggest, and causing all of us pain I must say, that those of us who argue, not that the deficit should be increased but rather that priority should be changed, are in some fashion arguing for an increase in the deficit.

Let us dismiss this out of hand. He was saying that he was asked by some children what he was doing about that $15,000 debt. In typical Tory exploitive fashion they are trying to convince children to be propagandizers. I wonder if he was able to explain to them how in the world they were going to earn the $15,000. What he did not address is that it is going to be very difficult 20 years from now for those kids to be earning enough to pay $15,000, even for a Honda, so long as the present government's policies with respect to science and technology continue.

Now, he does not seem too concerned about our relative position with the OECD. Everybody in the OECD is interested. Almost everyone who has looked at our economy is interested. I would dare say that those kids are interested in the fact that if things keep on going as they are there will be no jobs.

I want to understand what priorities justify spending in the order of $1.7 billion on a space program that the Americans are not even convinced should be set up. I want to understand what priorities have us move a science establishment 100 miles at a cost of almost $500 million. I want to know what priorities have the government investing $2.7 billion in an oil field that is going to mean more technological development in the United States than in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond. I have to acknowledge what the member said. I do not know whether it is 14 per cent or 16 per cent but we are down there somewhere.

The only thing I would comment on is that before the budget and then after the budget we stayed at 14 per cent. Before the budget in Ontario it was at 56 per cent. I would hazard to say it is falling like a stone. If you get down to 14 per cent it will be as you are passing through on your way to lower numbers.

There is another point I wish the member had talked about. He criticizes our policy because he is afraid that those poor kids will not be able to drive a Hyundai. I only wish the member would have, coming from such a large automobile manufacturing community, that he had talked about buying some inexpensive Ford or Chrysler or GM product. But no, that is not of interest to him. He would sooner be talking about an imported car. That is an example of what we are talking about.

We talk about priorities. Let me give you one further priority because I know there are other speakers. The member has criticized our budget for our priorities.

In the province of Ontario we have a very serious problem in the manufacturing sector. We will all acknowledge that.

If that problem is such a priority you should know that in the Ontario budget the only departmental budget that was cut was the budget of the Ministry of Industry. The very department that has problems is the only department the NDP cut. Now we know where its priorities are.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his kind comments.

I had prepared some notes, but in view of the high level of discussion and the intellect that has been passing me by this evening, I have decided that I am going to take a slightly different tack from what I was planning. I am going to have to resort to a few statistics—

An hon. member: Get the RCMP to look for your notes.

Mr. Mifflin: No, no, I do not need that, I can find them myself. I will be forced to use a few statistics because, like my hon. colleague from Gander-Grand Falls, we always use statistics that matter. The statistics that I will use, for all those who are interested, come from the budget books that were prepared by the Minister of Finance.

Before I talk about them—and I am going to watch the time very carefully, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want you to have to cut me off one more time—I want to talk about predictions. For the viewers in Newfoundland, sometimes we get confused when we hear about GDPs, EEC, OECD. Some of that stuff is gobbledegargon to me sometimes, and I am sure to a lot of other people.

I want to talk about something that takes me back to my Newfoundland background, the background of a simple sailor.

I try to look at things in the smallest and most simple terms. I am looking at predictions. In the business of being at sea—most Newfoundlanders by definition know all about the sea—if you make wrong predictions, you are going to have to suffer dire consequences.

Let me give some examples. If your prediction on the tide is wrong—and the tide has a big range—you can end up by going aground, high and dry. That has happened to a lot of people.

If you predict that the weather is not going to come on and you have your ships, or boats in the case of fishing boats, alongside you will be blown adrift because a storm will come up overnight and your lines will break.

If you are at sea and your prediction about where the eye of the storm is going to be is really wrong, you are going to end up in the eye of the storm and not know it. You might sink or lose a lot of equipment and perhaps a few people.

If you make a wrong guesstimate on all of these various factors that influence mariners, you are going to arrive at your destination at the wrong time. Give or take a couple of minutes, that is okay, but we like to have arrival times within about five minutes. Even that is considered on the border of being professional.

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine somebody with a nautical background who is used to making predictions and has seen predictions pretty well on tab coming to the House of Commons and hearing predictions? You listen to them with great intensity. You take notes, go back and look for trends and projections, and then you hear another prediction. You say: "Good Lord, this cannot be the prediction that was made before."

I will be honest with you, Mr. Speaker. I have been very confused in the relatively short time that I have been in this House. Let me explain why. I think it is only fair that I go back to 1983–84, and I do not want to repeat what I said here earlier this evening.

In summary, the last Liberal government projected a deficit of $31.3 billion, and the deficit rounded out to $32.4 billion. That was not right on, but it was not too bad when I look at some of the other predictions.

I want to look at the 1984 budget. I do not want to go into the details, but I will say—the hon. minister was commenting on how close or how far off we were—that the projected deficit in 1984, the first budget of this government, was $34.5 billion. What did it turn out to be? It turned out to be $38.3 billion.

As a matter of fact, this government now uses $38.3 billion as a benchmark, as opposed to the previous figure. That is a prediction. Some predictions do not go right. I do not want to go through the succeeding budgets. However, I want to start when I really got into business in the election year 1988. I arrived in the House of Commons in 1988. That was my year.

During the campaign, there was some confusion as to what was happening in the budget. In February 1988 the Minister of Finance predicted that there would be a 2.8 per cent growth rate that year. In fact, the actual growth was 5 per cent. That is an indicator to me, with my simple sailor background, that there were forces of inflation that should have been and could have been recognized at that particular point in time.

Were they recognized? I remember very definitely promises being made of a prison in my riding in the town of Harbour Grace. There had not been so much excitement in the town since the town was set afire in the 1900s.

The prison was promised and there were other promises made. I think they worked out to around $13 billion at the time. Somebody estimated them at that.

• (2040)

During the 1988 election I tried to stay on top of all the issues, but I never once heard the terms "the problem we have with our deficit, with our budget, the problems we have with the national debt". They never arose once, they were never in an election campaign.

I arrived in this House shortly after the 1988 budget, and what did I see? I saw a budget introduced called Canadian Economic Prospects in the Nineties. Then, all of a sudden, we heard all kinds of new terms which I had not heard during the election campaign. There were a number of problems identified. There were inflation increases, the interest rates were rising and then the word "deficit" came out, the big deficit that we had, the weakness in the domestic saving and the growing foreign indebtedness that we had. These were all new things to me.

I listened with great interest as the emphases on the 1989 budget, not surprisingly, were the following: the need for this and the need for that but still encouraged were the high interest rates, the high exchange rates, taxes were to be increased and expenditures restrained. The Minister of Finance thought that growth and demand would be moderate, growth in consumer spending would be moderate but resilient, I think was the term used, and labour market pressure would ease as would the cost pressures.

What happened? This is not conjecture, and this is not partisan politics, these are facts: By the end of 1989 the deficit remained the same as it was in 1984; the exchange rate moved up from 75.4 cents to 84.5 cents on the American dollar, and growth was reduced from 5 per cent in 1988 to 3 per cent.

We had the warning signs that economic times were going to be tough. The Minister of Finance really did have a chance to correct this, because the warnings were unmistakable. What did he do? He pursued the same policies, and if you look at the 1990 budget, it would appear to be a continuation of the chapter of the 1989 budget without any notice of a time warp. If you put the two budgets together, you would think that the 1990 budget was a continuation of the 1989 budget, despite all these warnings that were afloat, if I could use that term.

In the 1990 budget, the Minister of Finance exuded confidence, confidence that "after a short term of economic slowdown in the first half of the year, the imbalances would be corrected by the natural forces in the economy," and I am never sure what that means, and "sound growth would be resumed by 1991".

Inflation was projected to decline from 5.5 per cent in 1989 to 4.5 per cent by the end of 1990, and to 3.5 per cent by the end of 1991. The decline in interest rates was predicted and growth of 1.3 per cent was projected. The unemployment rate was then 7.5 per cent. It was projected to be 8.5 per cent, and then declined to 7.6 per cent. Why 7.6 and not 7.5 or 7.7 or 7.8? I do not know. 7.6 per cent in 1992–1995.

Even the most benevolent of the economic observers regarded these predictions as totally out of whack. Had these predictions worked, and at the time I hoped they would, we would not be in the state we are in today. I would also remind the House that the prediction for the deficit at that time was that in 1990 it would be $28.5 billion and by 1993 it would be down to $14 billion.

We now know that the recession really started in about the second quarter of 1990. It may not have technically started, but the beginning was back there. As much as a year ago the economy was sliding downhill very fast.

I remember being here at Question Period for so long and the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister would not even use the word "recession". They did not identify it. They talked about all kinds of euphemisms and this, that and the other thing.

The expression that I remember so well was "a period of adjustment." What in the name of heaven that means is beyond me. You have to die to go to heaven.

Let me give the backdrop for the 1991 budget. It is not pleasant, but I have to remind us all. Unemployment is rising. The tax burden is so high that people are starting to do strange things. Inflation is rising. Bankruptcies have reached a record level.

We are presently in the middle of not a minor recession but a major recession, made in Canada and not world-wide like it was back in 1981–82. Public finances are running out of control and the country is in serious trouble.

This is the background for the 1991 budget. This is the background which the government admits it created. It even boasts about creating it. This is the sad tapestry against which the mosaic of the 1991 budget was created.

I am not going to go through the budget of this year because there have been many speeches made on it. I think really on all sides of the House, depending on your view, members have quoted things and taken different viewpoints and I am sure it has been very instructive to the Canadian people. I am not going to engage in partisan debate about who did what, why it was done and so on.

I am going to stick to the projections and the predictions. In going back to 1984–85 I am amazed, I am aghast at the predictions that were made and how far off the mark they were. By golly, if a mariner made the kind of predictions that were made over the last six or seven years, we would be aground. We would not be afloat. We would be cut adrift. We might even be sinking.

I hope that this is not the condition we find ourselves in today. I am more optimistic than that. I believe strongly in this country. I believe we are going to be able to pull ourselves out of this mess, but we are going to need something better to do it.

Whatever has been tried in the last six or seven years has not worked. I am not being partisan now. Going back to being a mariner, when you take over the watch from the officer of the watch or when you take over a ship from a captain, for a couple of weeks you can blame it on the guy who was there before you. You try not to do that, but there are certain things. If the drogues are missing you have to say "well, they were not there when I took over".

After six months in command you cannot turn around any more and say it is the skipper's fault, the one who left. You cannot do it. If you did, you would not be credible.

I wish, of all the things that I wish from the other side of the House, that it would stop blaming any government after a certain period of time. It is just not credible to the Canadian people, so it is not helping itself in doing that. I wish it would not do it because it is absolute and utter nonsense.

I want to remind the Chair before I get into my concluding remarks here that in the 1985 budget the Minister of Finance predicted that he would reduce the annual deficit to $20 billion by 1990. It is now 1991 and the deficit stands at $30.5 billion, the same as it was the second year that this crowd was in power.

If you want to make predictions, you could make all kinds of predictions. If I had more time I would answer some of these intellectual and perceptive questions which have been put in front of me, but I know that we are all interested in time and I may even quit a few minutes ahead of my time.

I engage in music from time to time, as we do in Newfoundland. I am a Newfoundlander. I love the sea. I make predictions about the sea. I like to play music. I like to sing. If you ask a Newfoundlander what he thought of the budgets we have had—if you pay attention, I want to say something to you over there—what would they say about these budgets?

They would say that the tune of the budgets for the last six years has been "Happy Days Are Here Again", budget number one, number two, number three, number four, number five, number six, "Happy Days Are Here Again". What are they saying to this budget? They are saying: "It ain't necessarily so".

• (2050)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to pick up on one of the points that my colleague from Newfoundland raised. He seemed to provoke a certain gaggle of comment from the other side when he discussed the financial year 1984–85, which was the first financial year the Conservative government was in office. Since that is, as he said, often referred to by it as kind of a benchmark year I think it is important. I think it is important for the people of Canada to understand where we are at and where we came from. The government keeps referring to that year as being the last year of Liberal deficits. It talks about $38 billion plus as the final deficit of the Liberal administration.

I would like my colleague to pick up on this theme. The concern I have is that we are in a time in Canada when people are getting a little bit fed up with the fallacious myths that the government promotes in order to defend itself when it is indefensible. The last budget for that year projected a budgetary deficit of $29.6 billion for 1984–1985.

Mr. Belsher: Whose budget was that?

Mr. Manley: The hon. member is trying to listen, but he is talking at the same time and he is finding that difficult.

In November 1984 the new government brought in an economic statement in which it said: "Yes, the deficit was going to be in excess of what Mr. Lalonde had predicted". He predicted $29.6 billion. By November 1984, Mr. Wilson, then Minister of Finance, said that for the current year, which was then more than half over, the deficit would be $34.5 billion. He said in his economic statement, and I quote: "With this set of projections and no policy changes, the deficit for this fiscal year would be $34.5 billion. This is what we inherited".

Within a few months of that statement, the government reached the end of the year and managed to spend another $4 billion. That is where it got its benchmark.

I would like to ask my colleague whether he agrees that was a deliberate attempt by a new government to ram every expenditure it could into the expenses of the Government of Canada for that year in order to establish the highest watermark possible and forever after say that is the reason it has to pay such high interest charges.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for making that point clear. Governments are very clever at doing things. Sometimes they are opaque and sometimes they are not quite as opaque as they either could be or should be. However, in this particular instance it is blatantly obvious what happened. Now, one does not want to suggest that the methods are here, there or everywhere, but I would have to agree with my colleague that, in what was it, four or five months, a relatively short period of time, with no changes in policy—as was indicated by the Minister of Finance of the day—we went from $34.5 billion to $38.3 billion. That became the benchmark. That, to me, was very similar to the budget of 1988, the election year, when all the indicators said that inflation was going to be a lot higher than predicted. If the proper action had been taken at that particular point in time we would not have found ourselves in the position that we found ourselves in 1989, 1990, and 1991.

One has to understand the motives of the government and—without trying to make accusations one way or another—one has to say: "Well, this is what has happened in the past". I am not going to predict the future but I get worried when I see $400 million extra being collected. Now that $400 million does not mean anything unless it is put against the base. That is against a base of $1.8 billion, $400 million more than was projected on a base of $1.8 billion. That is 22 per cent more.

We have a lot of experts in the Department of Finance and I am not attributing any partisan politics to them. I am saying that they are experts, probably as good as we have in the world, and the best they can do is predict and be off by 22 per cent in three months, revenue neutral. If that is a prediction and if that is how close they are to what is going to happen in the next year, my God, we are in trouble.

However, we are not in trouble because there is a reason for that $400 million. I would suggest there is a little war chest put away somewhere. When the time is right we will not hear too much about the debt created by this government, we will not hear too much about fiscal responsibility, we will not hear too much about extra GST money. We are going to have to find out how much it is going to take to build another prison in Harbour Grace for example, maybe build a few schools—in short, to buy peoples' votes with their own money. Shocking, despicable, and wrong.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for the excellent address he gave here today. I only wish he had another half hour or hour so that he could talk about the problems in the fishery that we have.

I want to ask the hon. gentleman this question, if he cares to comment on fisheries policy. The hon. gentleman heard the exchange here earlier on. A member of the government stood up, a member of the communications committee. There is circulating a document which I have seen which quotes the BBM, the official service that surveys all radio stations in Canada. The committee is given a document that says that CBG in Gander only has 10 per cent of the listening audience, CBT in Grand Falls only has 24 per cent, and CBN in St. John's has 25 per cent. He says with that percentage it is a waste of money. Then he said that in this document—given to members of Parliament, given to the committee, obviously with the intent of trying to close them down eventually—it says that there are nine AM stations in St. John's, Newfoundland competing with the CBC. There are 11 AM stations in Gander, Newfoundland competing with the CBC and there are 11 AM stations in Grand Falls, Newfoundland competing with the CBC.

I am wondering if the hon. gentleman will pass judgment on this? Are there 11 radio stations in Gander, 11 in Grand Falls, and nine in the city of St. John's? Can he pass judgment on this serious question?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member I drive in my riding in my car. We can pick up three radio stations. If we are lucky, maybe four. Where are the 11 stations in Grand Falls? Where are the nine stations in Gander?

They came from the same place as the projections came from in the budget, exactly the same place—in their minds.

On a serious note, and I do want to talk on a serious note, in the Speech from the Throne made when I first came to this place there were a number of points made. There is really one point that I want to comment on very seriously. In the 1989 Speech from the Throne there is a paragraph I want to read: "My government will propose amendments to the unemployment insurance program in order to improve the program's effectiveness and its fairness. These changes will—"

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you what the government did, what it said it was going to do. Everybody said: "Oh, wonderful. This is great".

What it did was the following. At that time UI worked this way: the employer paid 43 per cent, the employee paid 31 per cent, and the government paid 26 per cent. At that time in 1989 the government's contribution was $3 billion out of $13 billion.

In less than two years, to cover the cost of the government's withdrawal—it did not say it was going to withdraw, in fact in October 1988 it said it was not going to change a thing, not a thing. Everything is going to be fine. Don't worry about free trade. UI will never change.

• (2100)

If this is not a change, it is like another projection. It is something I do not understand. In less than two years, to cover the cost of the government's withdrawal which has happened in two years, for every $100 of employable earnings from the employee, the premium rate rose from $1.95, that was written, to $2.80, an increase of 85 cents or 45 per cent.

The employer's contribution rose from $2.73 to $3.92, another 45 per cent. I am going to make a prediction. I do not think it is over yet. I think there is more on the way whether it is called inflation or not. I will just finish off with that particular point.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of the main estimates and for supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1991–92.

What I would like to do is take a little time. Unlike the last speaker, I prepared some notes and I am going to stick with them.

What I would like to do now is quote a Labour Prime Minister from Britain in 1976 at a Labour Party conference. This is what he said: "We used to think you could spend your way out of a recession and increase employment by cutting taxes and boosting government spending. I tell you in all candour that option no longer exists, and insofar as it ever did exist, it worked by injecting inflation into the economy. Each time that happened, the average level of unemployment has risen. Higher inflation followed by higher unemployment. That is the history of the past 20 years."

That is James Callahan, the British Prime Minister speaking to a Labour Party conference in September 1976.

A finance minister in a budget speech said the following. You will also enjoy this. The finance minister said: "We intend to continue severe restraint. Our experiences this past year and our prospects next year force us all to recognize the central problems of control of public expenditures."

Many of you might think that sounds like the current finance minister, but it was Edgar Benson in October 1968.

An hon. member: Wasn't he a Liberal?

Mr. Sobeski: He was a Liberal finance minister, speaking 22 years ago, saying: "Hold the line".

This is from another budget. The hon. member does not want to listen to this one. In this budget speech, the finance minister said: "Cutting taxes instead of increasing spending reflects the government's determination to oppose restraints upon its own spending." That was in February 1973, and the finance minister was John Turner.

In May, 1976, when the Liberals introduced wage and price controls, they said: "In recognition of the widespread feeling among Canadians that present circumstances demand restraint in government spending". If you take a look at spending in 1973 and 1976, we are not surprised on this side. Canadians were not surprised, because we did see a lot of government spending.

I have another article here that is by Mike Duffy. We all know Mike Duffy, the twin brother of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sobeski: In this article, he said: "For a nation that has been truly blessed, Canadians are in a terribly foul mood. Over and over, Canadians keep being told there is an easy way out, but those Mulroney Tories are too stubborn to try it." Duffy says: "Give me a break. I do not know of a single politician who would rather make a tough decision if there were easier, simpler answers to the problem. The fact is that in our current economic situation, there is no easy answer."

Later in the article, he says Canadians did have a choice.

The hon. member is having difficulty believing a journalist said this. Ten years ago, when John Crosbie was the finance minister, he said it best when he brought in a budget in 1979 that has been referred to, the first time we heard it: "Short term pain for long term gain". That was the budget of 18 cents a gallon.

What happened in that election? Canadians said: "I am sorry. We do not want to pay". And what did they do? They re-elected the Liberals. After the Liberals were re-elected they continued to spend money they did not have. They took out the little credit card and kept moving it through.

In 1980 the deficit of Canada was $11.5 billion. Canadians said: "No 18 cents a gallon. We do not want to face up to that". So, they re-elected the Liberals and the deficit went from $11.5 up to $38.3. We might even discount it back with the comments from the member for Ottawa, but the annual deficit tripled in those four years.

Those are comments from British Prime Ministers, finance ministers, but I have some comments from some Canadian constituents. Last November, I asked my constituents to give me input that I could pass along to the finance minister when he was preparing his budget. These are comments that came in to me three or four months before the budget came out. These are comments from Canadians. I do not know which party they support, but they probably support Canada. These are ordinary Canadians.

Here is one quote: "When my budget is tight, I have to cut charity donations and cut out non-essentials. Charity begins at home. The government must as well. Keep all program spending to pre-1989-90 levels". That was one constituent.

Another one said: "A further general tightening up is necessary to bring spending under control". There is a constituent with common sense: "Tighten your belt".

Another one said, and this is a good one: "There is no easy way to cut costs when your spending has already outstripped your revenues. When it comes down to the nitty-gritty, then all Canadians must bite the bullet".

Another constituent wrote in saying: "I am getting sick and tired of carrying the bulk of taxes and wish the government would practise what they preach and start cutting back".

Finally, another constituent wrote in and said: "It takes courage to tell the nation that we must live within our means and act accordingly or face the devaluation of our currency to dissolve the national debt, but in doing that you would ruin people like myself who have saved responsibly".

This person recognized that if you do not get the debt under control, if you allow inflation to grow and inflation grows to 20 per cent, those Canadians who have saved responsibly are seeing their savings eroded away because of inflation.

Canadians might look at the projection of the $30.5 billion budget deficit for the fiscal year 1990-91 and 1991-92, and wonder how the government earned the reputation as a resolute fighter against excessive spending.

The amounts are the same so how can the government say it is fighting the deficit? Well the yardstick by which progress must be measured is the level the deficit could have risen to had we followed the free spending ways of previous governments.

In the current fiscal year, Ottawa must turn to the public financial markets for only 15.7 per cent of its cash needs, compared to 27.3 per cent in 1984-85.

An hon. member: Remarkable progress, excellent.

Mr. Sobeski: To put that in terms to understand, what we are saying is that in 1984-85, when the government was spending money they had to go out and borrow 27 per cent of that in the public market. Today, in this budget here, we are out borrowing 15 per cent, because the government revenues have also grown.

• (2110)

I think if Canadians look at it in those particular terms, they can understand that if you have to borrow less money, you must be controlling your deficit.

When we took over, Ottawa was forced to borrow enough money to cover all its debt servicing costs and the $16.1 billion in program savings on top of that. In 1984–85 the government was bringing in revenues of approximately $70 billion. Government spending, not including interest on the debt, was some $87 billion. Here we are as a government, as a nation, bringing in $70 billion and spending $87 billion on programs which Canadians at the time had voted their governments to provide.

There is a shortfall in those programs of some $17 billion. What has happened over the past seven years is that government revenues have increased. Why have they increased? Because more Canadians are working since 1984 and the government has increased taxes. No one is denying that. What has happened is that instead of running a deficit of $17 billion on programs, we now have a surplus of some $12 billion. So we have seen on program spending, improvement. Because of that improvement we are able to take that excess $12 billion, and are we spending it on new programs? No, we are trying to control our expenses and what we are doing is using that money to pay on the interest which has accumulated over the years.

We have also seen many different ways of looking at the debt. Some people have suggested that the debt in 1984 was some $200 billion and they say the debt has doubled in the last seven years. That is true, the debt has doubled. Why has it doubled? Partly because there is $200 billion sitting there and whoever the government was it would have to pay the interest on that $200 billion.

For those Canadians familiar with a simple thing called compound interest, they would know that you have to carry that burden and that accounts for a large portion of the debt we have today.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has called on Canadians to go on what it calls a deficit diet reduction plan. Being on the deficit diet simply means that we have to curb our appetite for government programs.

The Chamber of Commerce said that we can no longer assume that we need something, a new community program, for example, for which we can automatically turn to any level of government for the cost. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce said that all Canadians must reduce their expectations of government. The business community is first in line to cut back on its consumption from the public purse. It says we need broad public support if governments are going to bring all government spending and consequently the deficits and the debts under control.

As major transfers to other levels of government represent almost 25 per cent of all federal program spending, these programs definitely have to come under review from the finance minister. Under the Established Programs Financing, the federal government provides equal per capita financial assistance to all provinces to carry out responsibilities for health care and post–secondary education.

Since 1984–85, the amount spent on established programs financing has increased by $5.4 billion to almost $20 billion. There is another transfer payment called "equalization" which provides substantial additional assistance to lower income provinces through the equalization program. Its purpose is to enable all provinces, rich and poor, to provide reasonably comparable public services, including health and post–secondary education at reasonably comparable tax levels.

Equalization payments, which have increased to about $8.2 billion, represent an average increase over the past six years of 7.1 per cent.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government reimburses provinces for 50 per cent of the eligible expenses for social assistance payments and services to persons in need.

The Canada Assistance Plan programs have increased from $4 billion to just under $6 billion in six years.

As my time is concluding, I would like to talk about the cost of financing the debt. Again, we talk in terms of billions of dollars. It is difficult for anyone to understand exactly what a billion dollars is. The cost of financing the debt back in 1968 was about 12 cents on every tax dollar. By 1984, 32 cents of every tax dollar went toward interest on the debt. Today, it is close to 35 cents on the dollar.

What that shows is that once you have this debt around your neck, this burden of debt, it is difficult to move out unless you do one of two things. What we are trying to do is control spending.

Deficit reduction is not easy. Tough choices have to be made. The budgets of the last few years and these estimates are part of a total package that is balanced. What we are trying to do with these budgets is build on the future not borrow from it. That is why this government is taking aim at the prime objective for the future: the problem of a growing debt. Our debt is a problem and we have to work toward it.

While some may think that the cost of successful debt reduction may seem high, the price of failing to get our debt under control is unimaginable.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your recognizing me.

I just want to make some comments on the debt and the deficit. When we, the Conservative government, came to office in 1984, the national debt was around $180 billion. It was not $200 billion as was made out in one of the comments. The annual debt at that time was around $41 billion. So from that time on we increased the debt to $400 billion, but our revenues in 1984 were $70 billion and we had a negative balance of $40 billion. So the total budget was $110 billion.

If you compare our revenues right now they are about $110 billion or $120 billion and the deficit is still over $30 billion annually. It is the same thing if you had a mortgage for instance of $180,000 and after six years you had to borrow because your mortgage went up to $400,000. In the meantime, your income had increased by 40 per cent. How would you judge a person like that? You would say he is drinking, he is spending like a crazy sailor.

So this is the way that this government has been handling the economy. The Conservatives say that they inherited a national debt of approximately $180 billion, but do not forget that this debt came along because there was a lot of spending in the last 20 years before.

• (2120)

It did not happen suddenly. The Conservative government doubled the debt while increasing taxation in about six years.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he thinks this is responsible management of public finances.

Mr. Sobeski: It is a pleasure having a question from a member who twice has been elected to the House of Commons, and both times he ran as a Conservative but he forgot to mention that. I do like his example of a mortgage, because this is something I think every Canadian can understand. A person goes out and buys that first house. Let us say they buy that first house for $150,000, their income is $30,000 and they take a five-year mortgage. Every Canadian understands that. What happens during the first five years of that mortgage is that based on that income generally they can pay the interest and at the end of five years when that mortgage comes due on that house they have paid off very little of the principal. When they renew that mortgage, their income has gone from $30,000 maybe up to $37,000 and so for the next five years they are in a little bit better position and they can pay more off on the mortgage. Then when they renew that mortgage again in the third term their income is up to $50,000 and then they are in a position in which they can really start to pay off that house.

The hon. member knows that. Every other Canadian understands that. The member in his question acknowledged that the revenue from the government has grown because since 1984 there are about 1.2 million more Canadians working, and so government revenues have gone up. The strategy of the Conservative Party is no different than the strategy of those Canadians who are buying their houses. Their income grows and then they are in a better position down the road to pay off their mortgage, and that is exactly what this government is going to do. The only difference is that when we have our mortgage burning party, you will not be invited to the party because you do not deserve to be invited.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): To the person who just spoke, I have The Economist for June 8 and it has some interesting statistics. I would like to get his comments.

In terms of industrial production, Canada is down minus 7.4 per cent over the year. The only OECD country that has done worse on the list is Spain, at minus 10.

GNP or GDP: Canada is down minus one over the last year. The only countries that have done worse, as I look at the list quickly, are the U.K. at minus 1.5 and Australia at minus 1.5.

Retail sales: Canada is down 15 per cent over a year. I do not think there is any country that has done worse in the last year.

Unemployment: Canada is at 10.2 per cent. The only country of the OECD countries that has done worse appears to be Spain with 15 per cent.

Prices and wages: Canada plus 6 per cent—these financial geniuses over here. Italy is the only country that has done worse at 6.8 per cent; Sweden, 10 per cent; U.K., 6 per cent.

In the broad definition of money supply, Canada is up 8 per cent; again the only countries that have done worse are Italy, Spain, Sweden and the U.K.

I know that the only subject those opposite like to talk about is the deficit, and if any of them think that is going to save their political necks at the next election, I wish they would raise their hands. No hands are going up. One hand going up.

Will the member tell us about this sterling financial performance that his government is giving to Canadians versus all of the other OECD countries?

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, again I appreciate the question. There is a tremendous question in our minds because we are curious as to what party this member will be in when the next election comes around.

He asks a question and I will give him a serious answer. My riding also includes the city of Kitchener. Everybody in this House knows that the city of Kitchener, with B.F. Goodrich–Uniroyal, is possibly going to lose 2,000 jobs. The potential is there. The question is about long-term investment, what direction should we go.

In the mid-1970s the Liberal government's strategy was: "Let's build a competitive industry in Nova Scotia with Michelin. So let us move Canadian tax dollars to build tire plants in Nova Scotia even though we have tire plants in Ontario." That was the Liberals' strategy.

As a result we have in Ontario an old industry competing against new industry funded by Canadian government money. Here we are, some 14 years later as a result of that investment strategy—

Ms. Clancy: What are the statistics on the service side?

Mr. Sobeski: The bottom line of that investment strategy was that it was good for Nova Scotia but the people who paid the price were the people in my riding in Kitchener.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and put a question to my good friend from Cambridge. He and I have a special relationship in that I represent Newfoundlanders and so does he. In his constituency of Cambridge there are many thousands of Newfoundlanders in exile.

I have a question for the member for Cambridge. There is such excitement on that side of the House. I have never seen people go so enthusiastically to their electoral doom.

The member for Cambridge made a fine speech. He did not tell us about the windfall of $400 million in GST that has been garnered over the—

Mrs. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): That's great news to bring the deficit down.

Mr. Simmons: I know the Minister of Justice would love to make her maiden speech and I invite her to do so when I sit down, but in the meantime if she could keep her little trap shut.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Before resuming debate, on a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to revert to—

Ms. Clancy: A point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will listen to the point of order of the hon. member.

Mr. Kempling: I would ask the unanimous consent of the the House to revert to reports from committees.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House heard the motion. Does the House agree with the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BILL C-2

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Legislative Committee C on Bill C-2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act without amendment.

The Legislative Committee C on Bill C-2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act, has the honour to report the bill to the House in accordance with its Order of Reference of Thursday, May 23, 1991. Your committee has considered Bill C-2 and has agreed to report it without amendment. A copy of the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence relating to this bill are tabled.

SUPPLY

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1991-92—CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle (p. 1646).

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that I was in the midst of a question. I yielded the floor on the instruction of the Speaker to allow a point of order. One would assume that once the so-called point of order has been dealt with we would go back to where we were.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. When I gave you the floor I said very briefly. The questions and comments period was over when I recognized the hon. member for Burlington.

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, I would be more than happy to listen to the question and respond to it.

• (2130)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting point that the members on the opposite side of the House appear to be caught in a time warp. They do not appear to be able to see very far beyond the date of 1984.

I think, in particular, that the member for Cambridge is caught in some sort of a time warp. I begin my remarks on the estimates with my lack of understanding that if everything is as wonderful as that member would have us believe in his remarks, why are he and his cohorts not more popular? This may be because I come from the maritimes and we sometimes have difficulty in understanding these things. It is, in the words of a famous King of Siam, a puzzlement.

I want to know if everything is so wonderful, as the hon. member suggests, why we have had 32 or even 33 tax increases over the last six years. I want to know why subsidies have been cut. Most particularly, I want to know why the At and East subsidy to the eastern ports on the carrying of grain has been cut. I want to know, if everything is so wonderful and this government is in control, why there has been no help for the port of Halifax.

Indeed, I want to know why we cannot even get an answer as to why there is no help for the port of Halifax. I want to know why there is not a fairer tax structure for Canadian National so that the port of Halifax does not lose business hand over fist, as it has been doing in the last several months. I want to know, if everything is so wonderful, why the foreign fleets are over-fishing in the Atlantic fishing grounds and why Atlantic fisherpeople have to stay at home, why they cannot catch anything close to their quotas.

I want to know, if everything is so wonderful, why unemployment insurance was gutted so that seasonal workers in the Atlantic region are facing at least half a year with no jobs, no UI, no training programs, no nothing from this government. I want to know, if everything is so wonderful, why we only have three VIA Rail trains out of Halifax in the run of a week now, when we used to have two a day.

An hon. member: That is all the ridership they had.

Ms. Clancy: No, no. That hon. member over there is incorrect. There was a 98 per cent ridership on VIA Rail in the Atlantic. In the words of Casey Stengel: "You could look it up". Well, maybe you could not but maybe somebody could.

If everything is so wonderful, why has the CBC been slashed to bits by this government? If everything is so wonderful, and perhaps this is the most telling point of all, why are the hon. members opposite so exorcised? Why do they not just ignore what I am saying? There must be some truth to the comments I am making for there to be such an overwhelming response from my hon. friends on the opposite side.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, he would like a point of order. Give it to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the member has spent five minutes asking some very important questions. I would ask if I could have 15 minutes of her time to respond to those questions, so that she knows exactly why.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It was not a point of order.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I again make my point that if the member of Terry Toones over there keeps on making so much noise there must be something that is getting on his nerves, if indeed such nerves exist. Perhaps, the only thing that does exist over there is nerve.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: If everything is so wonderful—and there they are. They are still upset. I do wish they would calm down.

In the last couple of days I have crossed the country from east to west and back and I have talked to Canadians. I have talked to Canadians in Vancouver. I have talked to Canadians in Ontario. I have talked to Canadians in Nova Scotia. I have talked to Canadians from all over this country; cab drivers and waitresses, people who work in hotels and people who work in convention centres.

There is still one thing that can only be described as a burr under the saddle of the average Canadian and that burr under the saddle is the GST. The GST, the tax from Hades. If you do not understand that reference, gentlemen, you again could look it up.

This tax has created some of the most unmitigated hardship this country has ever seen. We have seen businesses going under at a rate heretofore unknown in Canada. We have seen depression.

Mr. Pronovost: We have to pay interest on your debt.

Ms. Clancy: It is clear the hon. member, or I should say the hon. current member for Saint-Maurice, is particularly upset over something, but I would rather he did not take a point of order. He can talk to me later or he can write me a note. He can write.

This tax has caused unmitigated hardship. I listen to cab drivers. I listen to people who work at minimum wage jobs and I hear the hardship that this government has perpetrated upon them with this, the worst tax in the history of Canada.

I go back now, I go back as we talk tonight on the estimates, on these nefarious estimates that are being put forward by the Government of Canada.

Of all the things that are unacceptable to me as the member for the great city of Halifax, I come back once again to the question of the At and East grain subsidy.

I have risen in this House five or six times in the past several weeks and questioned the Minister of Transport and the Associate Minister of Transport about help for the port of Halifax.

I wonder about those members over there as they go on their merry way destroying this country as we knew it, removing any trace of infrastructure.

Mr. Belsher: Trying to make it better, Mary.

Ms. Clancy: Twenty bucks, five bucks over world price for 20 years, Ross, just remember that.

The government is trying to succeed in taking the infrastructure of Canada and laying it to waste from coast to coast; the ports, the trains, privatizing Air Canada, privatizing Petro Canada, turning this country into their view of a free market economy with no government intervention and no government caring because it says to the strongest goes the battle and the devil take the rest. The devil take the weak, the devil take the poor, the devil take Atlantic Canada and the north and parts of the west. I will tell you, the devil is going to take somebody and he is going to take them pretty quick.

I look at those members over there and say if everything is in such good shape, why are you so upset? If I were in your position and believed that everything was in such good shape, I would sit there and smile beatifically and say "oh well, the opposition has nothing to complain about because we are doing such a wonderful job for the country that the Canadian people all love us and will re-elect us."

I do not know the actual figures for the rest of the country. I do know that in Atlantic Canada my party stands at 61 per cent. That was yesterday. It may be 63 today.

Mr. Hudon: There is no re-election today.

Ms. Clancy: No, but it is coming and probably sooner than you might think.

If these gentlemen and ladies on the government side are so happy with everything that is going on in this country today, why are we hearing excuses? Why are we hearing everything but the actual truth of the matter?

• (2140)

Why are we hearing defensive responses to the questions of the opposition? Why are we hearing these things? We are hearing them because the Conservatives know they are in trouble. They know that the average Canadian considers them to be unworthy of their trust. They know that the average Canadian considers them to be unequal to the task of putting this country on the road to recovery and on the road to success, whether we are talking economically, constitutionally or whether we are talking decently.

It is indecent what the policies of this government have done to this country, indecent. There are people in this country who are suffering, living lives of quiet desperation because of government policy. There are women in this country who have lost jobs. They were not great jobs to begin with because this government has never been all that hot at creating great jobs for women, but they have lost the jobs they had.

We have heard of the number of bankruptcies in this country, the small businesses that have closed and the retailers going out of business. Well, who do you think works in most of those buildings and businesses? I will tell you who works in most of those low-paying jobs. I will tell you. Women. Women have been among the greatest victims of this government from its first days in office to this very day.

Is the hon. member getting tired? I am so sorry. Why do you not go and take a nap?

I want to say that this government will be remembered. This government, to borrow the words from Franklin Delano Roosevelt, will live in infamy for what it has done to this country. There is a famous statement—

Mr. Kempling: B.S.

Ms. Clancy: Try to use the English language and not scatological terms.

There is another famous phrase but I do not know who coined it. The first person I ever heard use it was a Tory cabinet minister in Nova Scotia: "If it is not broke, do not fix it". It is something that this government should be more familiar with because Canada was not broke in 1984. It is sure on the verge of total breakup right now. It is sure on the verge of a transformation into something, probably a parking lot for our neighbours to the south, deliberately created by the policies of this government over the past seven years.

The subsidies are gone; the infrastructure is gone or going; the traditions and the beliefs of Canadians have been shaken to their very foundations. There is nothing being offered by this government that Canadians can look to and say: "There it is. That is something I can hold on to. That is something I can believe in. That is something that can give me some faith and belief in the future; for me, for my family, for my children and for generations to come".

It is a terrible thing to do what this government has done in destroying the infrastructure of a country, but I suggest that it is a more terrible thing to take the dreams, ambitions and hopes of an entire nation and dash them to the ground. That is what this government has done and what it continues to do.

They are quiet on the other side now, which is nice for a change, and I am glad. In this silence from the other side, in this inability to respond to the charges I have made, I say to the members of the government: reflect well, think on it, not for your electoral future but for your belief in a country which we are all supposed to represent.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, a very short question for the hon. member. She talked about the dreams and hopes of an entire nation. I thought that was very interesting because it seems to me that the previous Liberal regime lived on dreams, pipe-dreams, and created illusions for the country that were absolutely impossible to realize.

They created such a sense of expectation that could never possibly be fulfilled that there was no possible hope for Canadians except to have those hopes dashed.

I would ask the hon. member why she would think that the practical, pragmatic, down-to-earth, realistic vision that we are building for Canada would not be something that would have a better expectation of having some ultimate result. The hon. member talks of dreams and hopes and visions as if those were realities. I would suggest to her that reality is what we live every day, bread-and-butter issues, not spending beyond our means, not telling people that they can have what they cannot have and that somebody, something wonderful in the future, will pay for what we are going to give them today in order to get re-elected.

This government has had the common sense, the will, to do what we think we must do because we know what is absolutely necessary for the future of the country. The country is not built on dreams alone, it is built on good, solid, financial, economic policy. I would ask the hon. member to tell us what her good, solid, financial, economic policy would be.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, there are two questions in that. First, I would like to say that I, too, believe that governments are built on good, sound financial management, and it would be nice if this government knew how to do it. It clearly does not, and has not for seven years. She talks as if this government has done some of these things absolutely deliberately, which I did not even accuse them of. I am thinking of the cancellation of At and East, for example, which will close the Halifax grain elevators now working at a quarter capacity, and lose 426 jobs in Halifax. It has closed the Saint John elevator, lost 80 jobs in Saint John, New Brunswick. I think I could be wrong, one of my friends will correct me. We are looking at the loss of 250,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector in the province of Ontario in the post-free trade era.

These are just a few bagatelles, no doubt, to this government, but there are human lives and human stories behind every one of those lost jobs. I would like to see the member from Winnipeg come to Halifax and talk to the 426 families that do not have a pay cheque and cannot even look forward to UI to get them over the hump because of the policies of this government. If that is its vision, if that is its sound financial management, well, I say it is spinach and I say to hell with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I think some comments are in order, when we consider some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax.

She started her speech by referring to the ridership on VIA Rail trains in the Halifax area. She said that before the cuts at VIA Rail, VIA trains had a ridership of 98 per cent in the Atlantic region.

I am sorry to have to correct the hon. member for Halifax but this is just not true. It was 38 per cent, Mr. Speaker, and these figures are in the public domain; they can be checked at any time by any person in this country.

The highest ridership was between Montreal and Toronto, but in the Atlantic region it was 38 per cent. She referred to VIA Rail but forgot to say that this government took the bull by the horns, because in 1988 it costs Canadian citizens, who are here this evening and who are listening, $1.2 million to keep the line open between Senneterre, Quebec, and Cochrane, Ontario, although the railway line in question raised only $69,000.

I think we should be reasonable. Furthermore, 65,000 Canadian citizens have free passes for travel on board VIA Rail trains. These people are part of the ridership statistics. These are facts that must be considered.

The hon. member for Halifax also told us that the government was destroying Canada's health care system and social safety net. This year alone, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government and the provincial governments will spend $91 billion on health care. This represents $2,600 per Canadian. I think our government is generous.

In concluding I will repeat what she said about the CBC, that we are destroying this corporation. This year, Canadian taxpayers will spend $1.4 to keep the CBC alive. I will give you an example. We are generous because in Halifax we have CBC radio and 80 per cent of the people never listen to CBC radio. Ninety-three per cent never listen to CBC stereo FM, Mr. Speaker. That is the truth.

• (2150)

Ms. Clancy: That's not true!

Mr. Pronovost: The hon. member for Halifax says it isn't true.

In concluding, I will say these figures are in the public domain. They were published by BBM, a polling firm, and your colleague from Mount Royal will confirm that any time.

[English]

This government is very generous to the CBC. This government will continue to be generous to the CBC but there are also private broadcasting companies in this country that receive no money from the federal government. They are doing a very great job. The Liberal Party and the NDP never recognize the contribution of private broadcasters in this country.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the comments from the current member for Saint-Maurice. I just want to say these statistics are wonderful. First of all, these are the statistics brought to you by the same wonderful group of people who think there are 11 radio stations in Gander, Grand Falls, Newfoundland. They also think there are six radio stations in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. Since Glace Bay is my home town, and one of the central towns of the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, I am quite sure that our hon. House leader would be surprised to hear that. We would have a lot higher advertising bills in our election campaigns were this the case.

I think consequently that statistics from the current member for Saint-Maurice are possibly slightly suspect. If he would like to check his statistics on the Scotian and the Ocean, he would find that indeed there was a 98 per cent ridership and those were the trains out of Halifax.

I cannot let the comment go unmarked that 83 per cent of Haligonians do not listen to the CBC. This is a base canard that cannot be allowed to go unargued. I can say, as the only member of Parliament as far as I know to have received flowers from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when she was elected, that when I worked for the CBC in Halifax we had an 84 per cent share of the market in Halifax at the time. That may have diminished since I have taken my golden tones to another House. However, I still will tell you that last Friday morning, I, along with thousands of other Haligonians and Nova Scotians attended the CBC Information Morning birthday party. If nobody was listening, why could you not get a parking space for miles around; why were the Sheraton Hotel and environs jammed to the doors by happy CBC listeners? I have no idea, if nobody in Halifax is listening to the CBC, why everybody talks about what they heard on the CBC wherever Haligonians meet.

I suggest that the current member for Saint-Maurice, if he perhaps ever came to Halifax, would know a little bit more about the situation. But in the meantime, he should perhaps leave the representation of Halifax to me.

Oh, wait, sorry, one further comment. I want to say that I did not—and I apologize—make a single comment about what this group has done to the health care system in Canada. I certainly could have. I will be happy to, because it is a disgrace and a disaster. But the member was clearly either not listening or listening to someone else.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you a little story. I hope I have enough time to get to the happy ending, which is when the Conservative government took over the reins of this country.

Let me go back just a little bit in time and talk about a regime that saw itself slipping from power. It said: how do we keep hold of the reins of power?

I hate to attribute motives that may have been less than honourable to past members of this House, but I think evidence shows that there was a very deliberate plan in place by previous governments of this country to keep the reins of power. They used the opiate of the people, their own money, and the federal government's spending power, to keep them sedated, to keep them feeling that somehow everything was rosy, that all things were wonderful and that the time to pay the piper would never come.

I lived in those times. I was a young girl, in fact, when those times occurred. I remember the days in 1967, for example, when we were right at the peak of our international power when we actually had a surplus in this government.

The dream merchant came along who had wonderful things to peddle but did not have anything very solidly founded in reality. He convinced Canadians that if they would just follow his plan for this just society, this new Canada, that somehow all their dreams would come true.

Mr. Speaker, I would remind you that there was something else happening in the world in those days. It was the time of flower power. It was the time when everybody was on something a little strange, smoking weird weeds and things like that. Canadians and the rest of the world had lost touch a little bit with reality.

Canadians can be forgiven for following the song of the pied piper, for getting carried away on these Utopian dreams that said: "We can have it all right now. Everything we want will come to us and it will be ours. Nobody ever has to pay."

Nice story, but like all fairy stories this one had to come to an end. In fact, the pied piper of Hamelin did not have a dream to lead us to. The money he was spending on us kept us sedated, that opiate of the people, our own tax dollars that we use to feed people, to keep them quiet and make them feel secure that everything is all right.

All of that bubble burst, and we came in touch with reality. In 1983–84, I remember as a member of the Chamber of Commerce in Winnipeg and as a member of the community, the absolute desolation that people felt. There were no jobs out there. There was no hope for our youth. We did not think that Canada had a future. We were mired in debt, and worse, we had no leadership. There was no plan. There was no vision. There was no future for Canada.

That changed in 1984. The current Prime Minister came around. This government was elected. It had a plan. It had a sense of the future. It had a sense of direction. We are taking the country toward a goal that has promise, vision and reward. This is not just an illusion. These visions and these promises are based in firm, solid reality.

I am proud to be part of that reality and very proud to be part of that government. I hope that I did not bore you with my speech. The hon. member opposite obviously enjoyed it very much. I saw her applauding. She agreed with every word I said as she so frequently does.

I think that if Canadians at large would really listen to what we are saying and see what we are doing, they would understand that we are building a very firm foundation for the future. There is a Canada out there that we can all feel proud of and one that will give everybody, all of our children, some kind of hope for the future.

Canadians are proud. In two weeks, we will be celebrating Canada Day, and Canadians will have an opportunity to think about what it is that gives us this sense of pride, vision, the future and nation. Part of that will be their own sense of having a firm economic foundation and a government with a sense of leadership, direction and vision. They will be glad that the fairy tale was over in 1984.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 81(16), and order made Thursday, May 23, 1991, to interrupt the proceedings and put forward every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

[Translation]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion no. 1 standing in the name of the hon. Président of the Treasury Board.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1—NATIONAL REVENUE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved —That Vote 1, in the amount of $820,602,000, under NATIONAL REVENUE—Customs and Excise—Operating Expenditures in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.—

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, you will find unanimous consent, I believe, that the vote on the Main Estimates will apply to the Supplementary Estimates, the Appropriation Act on second reading, report stage, including committee of the whole and third reading.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I direct my question to the government House leader as to whether or not the Appropriation Act is in its usual form.

Mr. Andre: I can give the House leader of the Official Opposition that assurance.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, laid upon the table Monday, May 27, 1991, are being concurred in. Accordingly, Bill C-24, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1992, is deemed read a first time and printed, deemed read a second time and referred to committee of the whole, deemed reported back to the House without amendment, deemed concurred in at the report stage, and deemed read a third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (for Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill C–10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have a chance to speak on this important piece of legislation which will implement the budget measures which increase the excise taxes and duties on tobacco products.

All members of the House are aware of the vital link between deficit reduction and economic recovery, and there is no question that these changes in tobacco taxation will have a very beneficial effect on our efforts to get Canada's public finances under control. I want to stress the fact that the reason for making these changes was not essentially to raise taxes or to generate more revenues; it was because of the fact that each year some 35,000 Canadians die as a result of tobacco related illness.

This is an issue that should be of concern to every Canadian. The tax measures themselves will raise additional revenues of $1.4 billion in the 1991–92 fiscal year, declining progressively to $980 million by 1994–95. It is clear that in the language of dollars and cents this initiative makes good sense, but I believe the case for this bill is made in a far more eloquent way when we look at its likely effects on the health of Canadians.

One thing that became abundantly clear to me in my two years as Minister of National Health and Welfare is the inexorable link between tax policy and the reduction of tobacco use. The facts speak for themselves: we brought forward a significant increase in tobacco taxation in the 1989 budget. We combined this action with extensive health promotion programs, a law to end tobacco promotion and regulations requiring health messages on tobacco packages. It was a potent recipe for success.

The result was that in 1989 we saw an incredible 8 per cent drop in per capita tobacco consumption, the largest in history. It is a question of some pride for Canadians that over the last two years, successively, this country has led the world in reducing the use of tobacco. The effect of this is that it will help us to bring down our medical costs in Canada. More important, it will help us dramatically in terms of keeping alive thousands of Canadians who would otherwise have been lost to cruel diseases caused by tobacco.

In terms of taxation, the formula is very simple: when cigarettes are less affordable they are less attractive, especially to our children. Based on previous tobacco consumption trends and estimated deaths from tobacco use, it is likely that this bill will save up to 125,000 young people from becoming hooked on tobacco, meaning at least 35,000 fewer deaths among this age group alone.

If the numbers are hard to understand, imagine an airline passenger jet crashing every second day, or to put it another way, imagine the entire population of a city the size of Cornwall being wiped out each and every year. If these deaths were taking place in that way there would be headline news, not just around Canada but around the world. Because of the nature of the deaths caused by tobacco, it tends to be something that is private, not seen by everybody, personal and individual, the silent mortality that takes place year after year, the tragic waste of human lives, the immense human suffering, both for those who are afflicted by the disease itself and for the survivors who have to manage without their loved ones, often go unnoticed by the rest of us.

It is time that we as a people and as a society begin taking stock of the tremendous cost that tobacco use inflicts upon our population. It is particularly important to those of us who believe that the most important thing we can do for our children is to give them a society in which their health comes first. It is surely time for us today to take this measure to do what we can to reduce tobacco use and to help to save lives in Canada.

To return to the financial realm, consider that each year diseases caused by smoking, such as cancer and heart disease, cost our health care system untold billions of dollars, to say nothing of the lost productivity and the incredible heartache for the families involved.

Let us take a few minutes to look at the mechanics of the legislation. The bill provides for an increase in the excise tax on cigarettes by 3 cents a cigarette, or $6 a carton, as well as a proportionate increase in the excise levies on other tobacco products. This means that the excise tax on manufactured tobacco, which includes loose, fine cut tobacco, will increase by $4.08 per 200 gram container. The ad valorem excise tax on cigars will be raised from 40 to 65 per cent. These tax increases were effective on February 27, 1991.

The bill also addresses concerns about the unequal tax burden on loose tobacco for traditional roll-your-own cigarettes and preportioned tobacco sticks. Prior to the budget, tobacco sticks were taxed as a fine cut product on the basis of weight. However, because tobacco sticks generally weigh less than roll-your-own cigarettes, they were generally less heavily taxed on a per cigarette basis.

Tobacco sticks will now be taxed on a per unit basis, and the excise tax and duty will equalize those on other fine cut products at approximately two-thirds of the rate on fully manufactured cigarettes. Since the excise levies on tobacco products are imposed at the manufacturers' level, the higher tax rates announced in the budget would apply only to tobacco products sold by manufacturers after February 26.

To ensure that the tax increases are applied in a consistent manner at different trade levels, the excise tax increases proposed in the budget will apply to wholesalers' and retailers' inventories held at the time the new rates took effect. To simplify compliance for small and medium sized retailers, the tax will not apply to the first 1,000 cartons of cigarettes or the equivalent volume of tobacco products held in inventory in retail outlets on budget day.

Consistent with the treatment of remittances of income taxes, this bill also imposes interest on any delay in payment of the increases in excise taxes and duties on tobacco products beyond the time within which existing levies are normally remitted, as well as on late or deficient instalments of the tax on tobacco inventories. Imposing interest on delayed payments will ensure that taxpayers voluntarily remit the tax increases announced in the budget, and that those who withhold payment until the tax increases are enacted are treated equally.

This bill is an important part of the government's plan to ensure that Canada's economy is soundly run, but as I mentioned, it is an even more important element of our strategy to reduce the consumption of tobacco in Canada. In both areas, we have a chance to do an enormous amount of good in ensuring the health and prosperity of our children.

By bringing our nation's finances under control, we can ensure that our children have access to the same programs and prosperity that most of us have enjoyed throughout our lives. By ensuring that our children are Canada's first smoke-free generation, we will bequeath them a far healthier society than the one which we inherited. In this latter field, I believe that we have made encouraging progress. It is clear, however, that much work remains to be done. This bill, with its measures to make tobacco less affordable for our children, is an important step in that direction.

Let me simply conclude by saying to the House that in whatever time any of us have to serve as members of Parliament in this institution, the most important contribution we can make to our country is to take measures which markedly improve the health and the longevity of our citizenry.

This is an opportunity for all members of Parliament to speak with one voice to help ensure that Canadians live healthier and longer lives. This is an opportunity that each of us has, on either side of this House, to do what we can to promote the health of our children. It is an opportunity to reduce human suffering.

I believe that if this House speaks unanimously and strongly today in support of this legislation, we will be making an important contribution not just for this generation but for generations yet to come in Canada.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, hon. colleagues and government members, thank you for the opportunity to rise today on debate of Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

This bill promotes a tax which by some is called a "sin tax." Others label Bill C-10 a "tax grab." As the Liberal critic for national health and welfare, I see this bill from a different angle. For me it is a bill with the potential to become a health tax. More than that, it has the potential to be the bill to show that this government truly cares about Canadians.

Money from this bill should go to health promotion, education of the dangers of tobacco addiction, aid to tobacco farmers and workers in the tobacco industry and to medicare, to provide the best care possible for people struck down by smoking related illnesses.

If the government would allow this bill to become a health tax, as the minister who has just spoken would like it to be, then Bill C-10 would be a further sign of promise in the fight against disease due to smoking.

This year alone, because of higher tobacco taxes, 700,000 Canadians are expected to quit tobacco. That is over 200,000 people who will be saved from death. One-third of that 700,000 would have eventually died from diseases related to smoking addiction.

In the first quarter of this year, Statistics Canada reported an all-time low in tobacco sales with a drop of 12.2 per cent. These statisticians believe the figure may drop because of people who quit short term for only one or two weeks because of the increase in the price of cigarettes.

What happens to these people? Surely they are more than a statistic. They are people who want to be free of tobacco but cannot break the chains. Why? It is much more than a question of will-power. Addiction to tobacco is one of the strongest addictions known, comparable to alcohol and heroin addictions. We are all acquainted with someone who is trying to quit or who has quit. The ordeal is a painful, arduous journey back from the control of nicotine. Sometimes it takes many attempts before someone is finally able to free himself or herself from the grip of tobacco.

Smokers face three barriers. There is the nicotine addiction, a physiological craving for it. There are habits and lifestyles such as smoking after a meal or with friends on coffee breaks. There is an emotional reaction which can be as strong as the grief for a lost loved one. We realize that.

Some people try to break the ties but they are unable. These people need more help. They need to learn the nature of the enemy, how to best combat the addiction. Acupuncture, laser therapy, cold turkey and hypnosis; are these the ways people are trying to deal with this addiction? This is a medical problem and it needs medical support and education resources.

Most of Canada's 6.4 million smokers hate the higher taxes, seeing themselves as targets in a make-money revenue scheme. Why? Be reminded that the government has raised taxes 32 times since it came to office in 1984. Others view tobacco taxes as an assault on their rights and freedoms. Nothing is ever that simple. Non-smoking advocates are not lifestyle police, they are simply people who care for the health of themselves and others. They do not wish ill to the men and women who work in the tobacco industry, but there are some facts which cannot be denied about the nature of the tobacco companies.

They target children. They flaunt government laws and they have blatant disregard for the serious health risks posed by tobacco addiction.

I truly believe that if they were interested in the well-being of their workers they would put some of their money and profits toward retraining in other skills.

Interestingly enough, the president of the Tobacco Manufacturer's Council, a close personal friend of the Prime Minister, will never admit smoking causes disease. In a letter to the former finance minister he commented on the "alleged risks of smoking". I would like to underscore the word "alleged", the alleged risks of smoking. In Canada each year 35,000 smokers die. This is not some happenstance coincidence. This is not an alleged risk. This is a real risk. These people die from diseases caused by their addiction.

Death is never pretty, we all know, especially death due to smoking. The tar and chemicals of decades destroy lung tissue, leaving it blackened and cancerous. Emphysema chokes off the smoker's air, leaving him gasping for life's breath. Only heart disease sometimes strikes quickly. At other times it merely cripples, with the patient living in fear of that paralysing pain shooting through the left side of the chest.

Non-smokers are not immune to smoking diseases. Second hand smoke is also a killer, causing an estimated 53,000 deaths in the United States each year. In Canada, with a smaller population, it is roughly one-tenth the American figure; five thousand Canadians.

Smoking harms the innocent; family members and co-workers. Even the unborn cradled in the womb of the mother can be harmed as chemicals pass from her bloodstream to the developing child.

You must never forget the children. They could be your children or they could be mine, lured to tobacco because of the look, the feel and the cachet of a cigarette. Maybe they are drawn to tobacco because their parents smoke or because all their friends do. Perhaps they are the dupes of the tobacco industry's advertising campaigns, which display smoking as glamorous and cool, the adult thing to do.

Maybe these boys and girls never planned to become smokers with a pack a day demand on their lungs, but it happens. That is the nature of addiction. It pulls youth in and it takes their lives away from them.

In this country a half million children are addicted to tobacco. Because of higher taxes, this year alone 100,000 of these youths are expected to quit. Another 30,000 will never begin, dissuaded by the cost of tobacco.

Your kids and mine could be the smokers of tomorrow unless we move to stop them.

This bill is inherently flawed in its follow through. It is a deterrent to smoking but it offers no help for the people who are most affected by it.

I believe in higher taxes as a deterrent to smoking, as has been shown by a study by the Addiction Research Foundation of Toronto, the health promotion branch of the Ontario Ministry of Health and the tobacco products section of Health and Welfare Canada entitled "Effects of Pricing On Cigarette Use among Teenagers and Adults in Canada, 1980-1989", released February 1991.

I do not believe in taxing people on the back of an addiction and then leaving them with nothing. This tax should not be another GST. The government calls this tax "part of a comprehensive strategy for reducing tobacco consumption in Canada".

Then why does the government not go the extra mile and put the tax money back into helping the people? Is this a tax grab disguised as health policy? I have here a description of the bill given to me by the office of the Minister of State for Finance. In the second last paragraph on the last line it says: "As well these taxation measures reinforce the government's comprehensive strategy for reducing tobacco consumption in Canada". This seems suspiciously like an afterthought.

Revenues from Bill C-10 should go toward four causes or programs if this government truly is sincere in helping smokers quit and not letting this be a tax grab. First, health promotion and education to give people the facts about smoking. A recent poll showed that the dangers of smoking have not yet registered with the majority of the smokers. The word must get out. People must be informed.

Second, support programs to help people quit. Tobacco addiction is one of the strongest known. To quit requires the help of many people, family and friends, plus health care professionals. Today the resources are simply not there.

Recently I received a report from the Canadian Nurses' Association, released in October 1990. Canadian nurses across the country tell us they need help. They need help with their programs to help nursing students and to help nurses quit smoking. We should support this.

Third, we should establish special funds for medicare. It is cruel for the government to take the tax money of a smoker and not offer him or her any help to break free from nicotine. It seems that the government wants these people to stay addicted, perhaps to line the coffers with tax revenues. Money should also be given back to the medicare system to provide the people and equipment to save as many smokers as possible.

Fourth, there is another group drastically affected by the decrease in smoking, the tobacco farmers. As demand for tobacco decreases, what will happen to these men and women? They need programs to find alternative crops. Diversification will be a necessity in the years to come.

It is my understanding that two programs were established to help tobacco farmers. The Tobacco Transition Adjustment Initiatives program or the TTAI was meant to ease farmers out of the tobacco market. It was meant to retire quota, buying it from farmers and writing it off the books, truly a worth-while initiative.

It was established in 1986, but funding did not start until 1987. In March of next year what is left of the program will die. Ontario, with over 1200 tobacco farmers, will lease the TTAI in March, while New Brunswick lost it in 1989. Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, which together have fewer than 150 farmers, have had the program extended until March of next year.

This is a program which had a budget of $53.2 million. From C-10 alone the government will earn $1,400 million in one year. I would like to call to the attention of Canadians that this government must be called to task whether this is really a health tax and not a tax grab.

The other program, called the Alternative Enterprise Initiative program, was opened to tobacco farmers to help search for alternative crops. Tobacco grows on a light, sandy soil which few other crops can tolerate, I am told by one report from Agriculture Canada, but there is hope another commercially viable alternative can be found. That is where the research component of the AEI comes into play. Years of research brought canola to Canadian fields. More research might bring help to tobacco farmers.

How much is the government spending on this type of research, development and study? Only $15 million, of which, according to sources at Agriculture Canada, only $10 to $11 million has been allocated. Meanwhile, the government will make $4 billion this year in tobacco taxes alone.

There is one more thing we should know. The government is cancelling the AEI program at the end of this fiscal year.

What are the government plans for the future of this business? Can a "comprehensive strategy" include aid to tobacco farmers?

In March tobacco growers met with the former finance and agriculture ministers to ask for support. To renew TTAI and the tobacco component of the AEI would be one way the government could show its support and true genuine sincerity to the cause.

I have been told by the office of the Minister of State for Finance that together the changes in the excise levies on tobacco products and the new tax on tobacco inventories will raise an additional $1.4 billion in the 1991-92 fiscal year. In the following three years $1.14 billion, $1.03 billion and $980 million will be raised respectively. As I said, this year alone the government will realize $4 billion from taxes and tobacco.

Surely, some money from these billions can go toward helping those saddled with addiction, for education of everyone in every aspect of society, and tobacco farmers. The government must show sincerity and earmark this money for those in need. There is no doubt that taxes on tobacco bring in big money for the government—thousands of millions of dollars. It is also clear that, by the law of diminishing returns, as tobacco taxes increase more people will quit smoking until the revenues realized by these taxes will be diminished.

So what? An estimated $7 billion per year is spent to heal people suffering from diseases related to smoking. There is no possible way to measure the value of these lives to society and to their loved ones. These are real people, not cash cows ready to be milked because of an addiction. There are others already taking advantage of these people: the cigarette companies. These companies target children in their campaigns while arguing they are trying to convince people to change brands. That simply does not compute. Roughly 10,000 Canadians per month light a cigarette for the first time. Most of these people are under the age of 18.

If the companies did not attract kids to smoking they would have no customers, hence no industry. All the smokers will eventually quit. The tobacco industry needs new blood to fuel its business, but unfortunately its business is not what Canadians want at this time. We should help them search for other types of business.

Only then can we truly have a comprehensive strategy against smoking.

With C-10 the gap between the cost of tobacco sticks and loose tobacco is closing. This could break the market for tobacco sticks, indeed. I believe Canadians should have every right to protest taxes, but they must not use this protest in a way that would jeopardize the anti-smoking campaign to save the lives of our youth. The government should not put profits before people. The government, if it truly cared about Canadians, would take the opportunity of this debate to prove itself an ally of the people of Canada, all of them. There is no excuse.

I ask the government to take necessary action. I also urge the government to help the people of this country be free from tobacco. Educate everyone, warn everyone. Do not be confused by the industry's smoke-screen. Take revenues from C-10 and use them to break the cycle of addiction. Help farmers find alternative crops. Do not settle for half measures if you are truly interested in saving Canadians.

I will end by reading from a story in The Ottawa Citizen that appeared last week, entitled Heavy Smoker—My Father by Janice Kennedy, and I quote:

> My father's last four months were spent inside the hospital. He was too weak to get out of bed. And besides, most of the time he was hooked up to some kind of apparatus. The final month he couldn't even speak, having undergone a tracheotomy that eased his painful breathing a little but silenced him.
> His final days were marked by a strange, wild-eyed look. It came over him as the plastic breathing tube filled and he fought in desperate silence for air.

The bill before us, if it is truly to be a health tax, must be earmarked for people who would like to stop smoking, for people who are ill as a consequence of smoking. We should also help the industry to find alternative business. In this way we can all be true Canadians concerned for the health and livelihood of all.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, there have been some discussions to approve the following motion.

> That, not withstanding the Standing Orders and usual practices of the House, on Friday June 14, 1991:
> In "Routine Proceedings" a government bill placed on notice on Thursday June 13, 1991 be introduced and read a first time and deemed printed, such bill to be in respect to British Columbia grain handling operations; and
> No later than 12.30 p.m., the Minister of Labour shall move second reading of the said bill; and
> No later than 1.30 p.m., the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then underway and put forthwith and successively without further amendment or debate, all questions necessary to dispose of the said bill at all stages, provided that any request for recorded or deferred divisions on any of the said questions not be receivable; and
> That the regular Friday order of business then be called; and
> That if the normal hour of daily adjournment is reached and a message from the Senate has not yet been received respecting Royal Assent, the House will suspend to the call of the Chair until such message is to be received; and
> That upon returning from such Royal Assent, the Speaker shall forthwith adjourn the House until 11 a.m. on Monday June 16, 1991.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, we have a problem with the very restrictive House Order that has been presented to the House, for a number of reasons.

First of all, the wording of the House Order as it is presently does not guarantee that any member of the New Democratic Party will have a chance to say anything or ask any questions of the minister. Therefore, before we can agree to this House Order we have to ensure that we have an opportunity to participate, that our positions are stated and that the questions we wish to ask of the minister are asked.

Second, and this is just as important to us, our labour critic has a number of questions that she wants answered by the minister before we can agree to a House order.

We want to ensure we know what we are entering into and what the minister's intentions are before we agree to something which in effect prevents any chance by the opposition to really delay the government's intentions.

We want to know exactly what the minister is up to, what he is going to guarantee to the workers and their families in this situation before we agree to any particular House order.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my colleague has indicated our concerns about this legislation. I have three questions that I would like to ask the minister for a clear response before we proceed with this motion.

The first question is will the minister assure the workers in the Grain Workers' Union and their families that he will not accept an arbitrated 12-hour award, which would be in contravention of other legislation, unless the two parties have agreed to the 12-hour award?

Second, will he, if the arbitrator suggests it, agree to an independent commission to look at the impact of the 12 hours on workers' health and safety and on their families? Would that commission be made up of something like a lawyer, a doctor and one other? In addition, would he agree to work with me to improve legislation in the federal jurisdiction in the future to try to avoid some of these kinds of situations?

Third, would he agree not to proclaim part two pre-emptively prior to there being a dispute in Prince Rupert?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, with regard to the three questions asked by the labour critic for the NDP concerning the continuous hours of work and the 12-hour shifts, the Canada Labour Code prohibits such a practice now unless both parties agree.

If they agreed, through a voluntary collective agreement, to such a system of work then most likely I would also agree. My interpretation would be this. If a 12-hour work shift, 12 continuous hours of work, was imposed by an arbitrator in a collective agreement, then to me that would not have been voluntary agreement by the workers. In that particular case, it would still be contrary to the Labour Code and in that case, of course, I would not breach the Labour Code.

• (1040)

The second point is that the hon. member asks whether I would be agreeable to an industrial inquiry if asked for by the mediator arbitrator. I would like to remind my hon. friend that I gave instructions to my top officials about this issue when they went to Vancouver earlier this week to meet with the parties. When Mr. McDermott met with the unions, this idea of an industrial inquiry was well received by the unions. It was not well received by management.

Of course, if asked by the mediator-arbitrator to proceed on that route, I would certainly be very agreeable to facilitate that.

With regard to her third question, whether I would agree to work with her with a view to improving industrial relations in the federal sector in Canada, I would certainly be willing to do that. At the same time, I would remind her that Labour Canada has definitely the best record of any provincial jurisdiction in its settlement of collective agreements as we do settle over 90 per cent of them without work stoppages. But that does not mean that there is not room for improvement. Of course, I would be very happy to work with her to study that matter and see how we can improve our industrial relations contracts in Canada.

With regard to her last question, how we would proclaim Part II of the proposed legislation, I can give my word to my hon. friend that there will be no proclamation of that, until and if, there was a work stoppage. Even then, there will be no proclamation until there was consultation with my friends from the opposition.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate there is a further question regarding an opportunity for the New Democratic Party to speak.

I want to indicate that we on this side are quite prepared to go with the 10-minute speech from the minister. It is my understanding that the Official Opposition is prepared to co-operate to the same degree. Certainly, what we want to signal to the New Democrats is that we are more than willing and will do everything in our power to make sure they have time to make some remarks and to ask the questions they feel are necessary during the Committee of the Whole stage of the bill.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I would first like to thank the hon. minister for his forthright answers. I appreciate that he has put those answers on the record. I believe that he will live by those responses, and I thank him for that.

I would also like to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary, the equally as short person as I am, for his agreement to ensure that the New Democrats have an opportunity to put our views forward on the bill in terms of the questions in Committee of the Whole. On that basis we will agree.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I understand there is a disposition to proceed with this bill at this stage. In view of the assurances given by the minister and by the parliamentary secretary, we are prepared to give our co-operation by seeking an agreement where all three parties would each have a 10-minute speech, subject to questions that may be asked in Committee of the Whole, which I think is a separate issue.

I am happy to concur with the motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion, as read by the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I rise to resume debate on Bill C-10. I find myself in the strange position of being in full support of the government on this piece of legislation.

I think legislation that increases the tax on tobacco, if it is viewed properly as a health measure rather than as a revenue measure, is to be applauded. Of course, the bill will increase the tax by about $6 a carton, or 3 cents a cigarette. It will raise approximately $1.4 billion this year, reducing down to $980 million in three years. It will raise $1.4 billion in the first year.

It is interesting, of course, that the Minister of Communications and the former minister of health spoke on this bill. I think he should be congratulated because when he was the minister of health he brought forward a number of anti-smoking initiatives that have paid off for Canadians.

One of the things we have learned in relation to cigarette smoking is that there is a correlation between the tax rate and the number of people who smoke. An increase in cigarette taxes will immediately reduce consumption by 8 per cent to 12 per cent. It has been estimated that if cigarette taxes are increased 20 per cent, it would reduce the total number of smokers by 800,000 if you added together those people who would quit smoking and those who would not start smoking.

Since the government has initiated a combination of accelerating tax increases and anti-smoking campaigns, including bans on advertising in 1984, there has been to the end of 1990 a decline of 40 per cent in Canada of smokers. This is one of the better records in the industrial world.

It is important that we put into perspective what the implications are for Canadian society of the use of tobacco. Tobacco-related illnesses now kill 38,000 people in Canada a year, 38,000 Canadians. It kills more Canadians than alcohol, drug abuse, car accidents, industrial accidents, fires, murder, suicide and AIDS combined. So it is by far one of the major causes of death in Canada.

In addition, it costs untold billions of dollars within our health care system to treat people who have smoke-related illnesses. At a time when our community is trying to grapple with the increase in our health care costs, and trying to develop efficiencies and ways of reducing expenditures, there is probably no more positive step that the government can take to reduce health expenditures, than to reduce the consumption rate of tobacco.

I do want to spend a little bit of time talking about the reactions from the tobacco companies. The tobacco companies, led by that friend of the government's Bill Neville, have started a mail-back campaign to try to convince the government that it should reduce the tax on tobacco products.

• (1050)

This mail-back campaign is in clear violation of the Tobacco Control Act. I still feel that the federal government should have immediately initiated court action seeking an injunction to prohibit this mail-back campaign pending the decision of the Quebec court as to the legality or the charter worthiness of that piece of legislation.

It is interesting that the tobacco companies had maintained that one of the reasons they were opposing the Tobacco Control Act is that they did not have the technical capability to put inserts in tobacco products with health warnings on. They did not have the ability to do that by the deadline of June 1, and therefore were delaying it.

At the same time, how hypocritical they were when they, all of a sudden, decided that they would have a mail-back campaign. They had the immediate technology to print and put inserts into tobacco packages to direct a message to the Prime Minister.

It is this kind of hypocrisy from the tobacco industry that is so characteristic of its approach. It is very important that Canadians fully realize what the tobacco companies have been doing in relation to promotion of their products.

Documents filed before the Quebec Superior Court indicate very clearly, I will use the words of the member for North York, insidious, pernicious and unethical tactics used by the tobacco industry advertisers to sell death to youths and to other healthy consumers.

The documents filed in that court very clearly spell out what the tobacco industry and the health community already know. To get people to smoke, one must get them early. Ninety per cent of all smokers start before they are 18. A study was done in the United Kingdom that clearly documented this. Ninety per cent of all smokers started before they were 19.

I guess I have something to relate to that. I started smoking when I was 13 or 14, and I smoked for far too many years, up to my early thirties, two or three packs a day. I know the kind of image that the tobacco industry portrayed. It was geared to young smokers, and that was one of the reasons I got involved in smoking. This is repeated time and time again.

The tobacco industry, from the confidential memos that were obtained in a court in Quebec, clearly indicated that they were targeting those as young as 12 years old. Some of the things that were revealed in the court case were that when numerous studies were linking smoking to death by cancer and heart attacks, tobacco companies were still conducting extensive research on young smokers.

It clearly showed that that industry is dominated by companies which respond most effectively to the needs of young smokers. What the tobacco companies found is that if they are going to survive, they have to cater to young smokers. Studies in England showed that they have to recruit 300 new smokers a day to replace the ones who are dying off at the other end. This is what the companies do. They realize that the youth is their major target group. Documents before that court stated very clearly: "Young smokers represent the major opportunity group for the cigarette industry. We should therefore determine their attitudes to smoking and health and how this might change over time."

It goes on to say that they realize serious efforts to learn to smoke occur between the ages of 12 and 13 in most cases. It also says that they have been able to document among users that starters no longer believe the dangers of smoking and they universally assume that the risks do not apply to themselves.

This is one of the characteristics of young people. When one talks about all types of hazards, they have a tendency to assume a sense of bravado, of risk taking. They think that risks apply to somebody else, whether that is driving a car fast, taking risks in outdoor adventures or starting smoking. They like to take risks, so they simply say: "Those risks don't apply to us and we are willing to take that risk if it gains us something".

One of the things that the tobacco industry discovered in its research was that very young starting smokers choose Export A because it provides them with an instant badge of masculinity, appeals to their rebellious nature and establishes their position among their peers. In other words, the tobacco industry did research on the dynamics of teenagers and adolescents and then developed a product that would appeal to that rebellion, to their masculinity and to their acceptance among their peers, all of which are very, very important to teenagers.

The tobacco industry is certainly, at this point in time, desperately trying to protect its share of the market and its profits. It is initiating the mail-back campaign, not because of any concern about taxes in Canada, but because it is frightened that the government's efforts to reduce cigarette smoking are being successful. Those government efforts are based on a double-barrelled approach of raising taxes and prohibiting a type of advertising.

One of the things on which I think the government has not been aggressive enough is in the matter of tobacco advertising. It has brought in some legislation under the Tobacco Control Act, but it has not rigorously pursued the enforcement of that. It has not taken the initiative and proclaimed the regulations that were supposed to be in place on June 1. It has not stopped the tobacco mail-back campaign and it has not proceeded with other recommendations.

The health committee has looked at this issue and people have said repeatedly that there should be a total ban on all tobacco advertising, including a ban on promotion. One of the things that the companies like to do very much is say: "We are not advertising, we are promoting a sports event, or a cultural event". But, of course, their brand names, their company logos, all of the things, their colours that are identified with their brands and with cigarette smoking, are used to promote their product.

New Zealand did a major study of 33 countries, looking at the impact of the banning of tobacco advertising. They found conclusively that the banning of tobacco advertising does have a dramatic impact on the number of smokers and the recruitment of new smokers.

I want to turn my attention now to what I think the government should be doing in relation to the revenues which it has—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

SYRIAN JEWRY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, the North American High School Organization network is a Jewish student movement with representation across Canada. The issue of Syrian Jewry is of great concern to them.

At present there is an urgent call for action against the Syrian government due to the torturous acts and oppressive conditions which Syria is inflicting upon the Jews living there. These Jews are not allowed to emigrate; they are often beaten, tormented, abducted and imprisoned. They are denied the basic human rights, according to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights to which Syria is a signatory.

An example of this is the case of Elie and Selim Swed. They were imprisoned for three and a half years without being charged and were constantly tortured. They were recently sentenced to six and a half more years in prison in a trial where they were not allowed a lawyer or to speak, and no charges were made public.

The Government of Canada has always supported the cause of oppressed Jewry and human rights. Along with all members of this House, I call upon the government of Syria to comply with the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and allow those Syrian Jews who wish to emigrate to do so freely.

PARLIAMENT OF UNITED CANADAS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, on this date in 1841, 150 years ago, the first Parliament of the United Canadas opened in Kingston, Ontario. The opening of Parliament marked the reunion of Upper and Lower Canada in one province and established the ground work for Confederation some 26 years later.

Though the new Parliament started slowly with newspapers of the day referring to it as the "do nothing but talk session", spurned on by the development plans of Governor General Sydenham, it eventually passed acts which provided for the purchase of and expansion of the Welland Canal, for improving navigation aids in the St. Lawrence River, and for building new roads. In addition, a new Board of Works was established to oversee ambitious new construction projects.

Madam Speaker, as Canadians debate the future of our country, let us remember the work of our ancestors 150 years ago. They knew then what we must remember today, that our future prosperity lies in a united Canada, not in a nation divided.

CHINA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, having had an opportunity recently to visit the People's Republic of China, I rise today to encourage the Government of Canada to move toward normalization of trade relations with China.

Northern Telecom, Ingersoll-Rand Canada, Alcan and Lamko Tool & Mold are examples of recent successful joint ventures in China.

My recent visit demonstrated to me that more trade with China would in fact be helping the people of China raise their standard of living, not to mention that it would create jobs in Canada also.

The policy of reform and opening to the outside world should be encouraged as it is the road to lead China to economic and social prosperity.

Japan, Italy, Australia, Britain and the United States have taken steps to normalize relations with China. I encourage Canada to do the same.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise today to denounce one aspect of a recently issued report by a group of former politicians and industrialists who refer to themselves as Group 22. This group calls on the federal government to completely withdraw from the national health care system. The report states that the federal government should have no role to play in health care and that existing federal involvement, namely maintenance of national standards and banning of extra billing and user fees, should disappear.

We know that the Prime Minister was personally briefed by members of this group and it is reported that he was "genuinely interested" and "impressed" with the report. Canadians would like to know exactly which recommendations the Prime Minister is interested in and impressed with.

Madam Speaker, on March 29 this year the government voted against a Liberal motion stating "that this House reaffirms its commitment to medicare". The recent comments by the Prime Minister reinforce his government's lack of commitment not only to medicare but also to the well-being of all Canadians.

I urge the Prime Minister and his government to disregard this aspect of the report and maintain national health care standards under the Canada Health Act and more, restore adequate funding for Canada's medicare, the envy of the world.

S. O. 31

ERITREA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise to support the Eritrean People's Liberation Front in its call for a free, fair and open referendum on the future of Eritrea.

Forty years ago, the great powers forced an unhappy Eritrea to join with its traditional enemy, Ethiopia. The ensuing war caused between 250,000 and 350,000 deaths in Eritrea alone.

Now the war is apparently over, but long-term stability is far from guaranteed. Sectarian fighting continues, and millions of people are still dying of starvation and avoidable disease in the Horn of Africa. A secure lifeline of assistance to these people is possible only if Ethiopia's wasteful and destructive civil war comes to a permanent end.

[Translation]

More specifically, obtaining a permanent solution to the problems of this region will require a peaceful settlement of the status of Eritrea that respects the wishes of the majority of the Eritrean people.

[English]

I therefore urge the Canadian government to follow the example of Sweden, Denmark, Norway and other countries in upholding the right of the Eritrean people to define their own future.

REFORM PARTY

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Madam Speaker, I was both amazed and disappointed when I heard the Reform Party's narrow-minded and outmoded views on multiculturalism.

The party's statements merely help spread misconceptions about our policy in this area. Multiculturalism is based on the concept that all Canadians have the same economic, political and social rights. It is a concept that favours equality and is opposed to racism and discrimination.

The Reform Party and its leader are urging Canadians to believe in myths that can only breed discord. At a time when Canadians are trying to strengthen their unity, multiculturalism remains one of the most powerful tools this country has ever had to achieve that goal.

I would like to repeat, for the benefit of members of the Reform Party, that this government is intent on using every means at its disposal to help create a Canadian identity that everyone of us can truly share.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is about to impose another disastrous policy on Atlantic fishermen, user pay dockside monitoring.

The government had two alternatives. It could have retained the past system of hailing, log books and random checks. This would have meant a bit of work for fishery officers. It could have gone to a system which the industry wanted called the "paper chase" because of so much paperwork for the fishermen and the processors to keep accurate records for the Department of Fisheries, because it does not trust anyone.

What did the fishermen get? They got the weigh master system, an employment program sponsored by the Department of Fisheries which the department wanted and which will mean longer waits and much higher fees to the fishermen who have to foot the bill.

No one supports this new system, as has been seen in Newfoundland, and will be seen in Nova Scotia and other areas.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has once again ignored the fishermen and gone ahead with a policy that has no benefit for those involved.

THE PRESS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, after reading Marjorie Nichols column in the June 13 Citizen, I was gratified to think that there is at least one member of the media who is willing to take the time to research its articles and to print the true facts instead of distorted untruths.

Is it any wonder that we hear so much negativism from Canadians across this country when they are exposed to a steady diet of gloom and doom, distortions and misinformation.

The media must start taking its role in society seriously and start acting in a non-partisan, responsible way, giving Canadians the facts and nothing but the facts, and letting them make up their own minds as to the effectiveness of this government's policies.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, the spirit of multiculturalism is ultimately the spirit of Canadian unity. Multiculturalism makes it possible for all Canadians to fully contribute to the building of a stronger and more united Canada.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act unanimously adopted by the Parliament of Canada seeks to remove the barriers that divide us from one another, barriers such as racism and discrimination.

In its repeated attacks on multiculturalism the Reform Party and its leader shows it knows little or nothing of what this great country is all about.

On the other hand in the Globe/CBC poll in April 84 per cent of Canadians, 84 per cent said any new constitutional arrangement must reflect the multicultural nature of Canada. It is very easy to appeal to people's fears and uncertainties. It is very difficult to build a society of fairness and equality of opportunity for all. Mr. Manning has chosen the easy path. This government, which has done so much to bring a new vision to Canada, will not.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I have raised the issue of Montreal and its dramatic economic situation in the House many times. We have had a debate in this House on the situation in Montreal, and the people of Montreal are becoming increasingly concerned. Recently, the Quebec Caucus, which I have the honour to chair, discussed the sad fact of a declining economy, increasing poverty and lack of employment in the Montreal region. I had the privilege of seconding the motion in which the leader of our party, Jean Chrétien, took an active part. And now we have the minister responsible for Montreal, the hon. member for Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies and Minister of Transport, again saying sorry, he is not responsible and the economy in general is to blame, this at a time when jobs at Air Canada and at the Bank of Canada's branch for foreign exchange services are being moved to Toronto. Once again, the minister has not been doing his job.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, up to one third of Quebec's bookstores might have to close because the GST is causing such a drastic drop in sales. Across Canada, publishers report that revenues are down 20 to 30 per cent.

The Coalition against Taxes on Books claims that plunging book sales can be directly attributed to the GST. Canada's magazine industry despairs and publishers are reeling from a triple dose of gloom and doom: recession, impending postal rate increases and the hated GST.

Some time ago the Prime Minister mused publicly that his government would reconsider the wisdom of this tax on literacy, and in the recent Throne Speech the Prime Minister gave his commitment to develop a learning culture and enhance Canadian literacy.

I appeal to the Prime Minister to demonstrate this commitment in a tangible way by seizing this opportunity for action. Repeal the GST on books and magazines immediately and help breathe some life back into the Canadian publishing industry. Stop this unfair and punitive tax.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, for a few moments yesterday I saw some common sense in politics. It involved the Liberals and the NDP in the Ontario legislature, no Conservatives. When Premier Rae announced that two new ministers had tendered their resignations as a result of each making a mistake, I was pleased and even proud to be a politician when the Liberal leader, Bob Nixon, stood in his place and suggested that it might be appropriate for Mr. Rae to refuse these resignations. I thought this a common sense approach.

In no other reasonable human endeavour that I know of would someone be required to lose their position for one mistake. There is a difference between mistakes and the intent to do wrong and they should be treated differently.

I applaud Mr. Nixon's first position on this issue because it is the position that most Canadians would take in real life, but then again politics is not much like real life.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, often the role of our artists is overlooked. Recently, the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres eloquently expressed that role with which I concur and promote.

They said:

> Artists are the imagination of a culture, of a country. Through their creative endeavours, artists keep a community in touch with where they have been, where they are and the possibilities for the future.
> The government's cuts to Canada's cultural institutions are squeezing the life out of Canada's arts organizations and independent artists. And without artists, who will reflect the unique, diverse, rich experiences in all regions of this country?
> As Canada faces the complex challenges of the next millennium, the country needs to further unleash the powers of the artistic imagination, not strangle it.
> As theatre artists, we call upon the federal government to reinstate and increase funding to the Canada Council, the National Arts Centre, the CBC, the National Film Board, and Canadian museums. We call upon the government to pay more than lips service to developing a creative vision for Canada.

I add, as a word of warning to this government, in the interest of national unity and Canadian identity—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Oral Questions

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, the extraordinary challenge of the committee reviewing the free trade agreement panel decision in the pork industry case has sustained Canada's position.

Let me tell you the importance of this to Canada. It tells everyone in Canada that the free trade agreement will work, given a fair opportunity. Obviously we are pleased with the decision that the committee made. The result proves the value of the free trade biannual panel, in fact it sustains itself and will do so in other cases.

Good luck to Canadian pork producers. Their pork is going to now go across the line free of any encumbrances.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Two days ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration said the government had been counselled to lie in the Mashat affair. Yesterday, the same minister said that the government had only been counselled to mislead. There is no distinction between lie and mislead.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm to the House whether the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who stated in the press yesterday that the misleading advice was contained in so-called "House cards" advising ministers to respond, and I quote: "Mr. Al Mashat met the requirements as a retiree, was processed under normal standards, and was not accorded preferential treatment".

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration responded to questions of that nature in the House yesterday, and I believe he responded outside the House. I have nothing further to add.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has told members of this House and has told the national media that the Government of Canada was counselled to give misleading information to Canadians.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister explain to members of this House exactly what information was the misleading information?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member would have to direct that question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who unfortunately is not in the House.

Mr. Tobin: Which far away country did you send him to?

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. minister is a member of Parliament and also a cabinet minister. He has important duties to discharge. I think my hon. friend from Newfoundland would understand that.

He did explain the position, and also his poor choice of words as he suggested he may have used, thereby resulting in a misinterpretation. I think that he has come forth in a manner that befits the integrity of the institution and befits his own integrity.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, as defined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on May 30 states:

> When an error is made of which the minister is unaware, the minister acts to establish the facts, corrects the error and, in addition, promises that the offenders will be disciplined and that their mistakes corrected.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. When the government became aware that a minister had been counselled to mislead the people of Canada, what action did the Government of Canada take against those who counsel such misconduct? Can the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House of the action that was taken? Can he also inform the House what actions have been taken against the senior public servant in this country, Mr. Paul Tellier?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is precisely what was done. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated in this House that corrective measures were taken so that this kind of issue would not occur again.

The hon. member may have some deviation or some suggestion with respect to how ministerial responsibility should be performed within the context of our parliamentary democracy. I think it is quite clear that the McGrath commission brought down some explicit terms of reference and guidelines, which indeed are followed. If the hon. member has some suggestions to make or wants to pursue the whole issue of ministerial responsibility in the context of parliamentary reform, I suspect that that is a suggestion that could very well be put to the appropriate committee. Perhaps we would be interested in knowing.

Mr. Tobin: What committee? You would close it down.

Mr. Mazankowski: A procedural committee. There are many standing committees. We would be very interested in seeing what sort of deviation from existing principles of ministerial responsibility he would like to see changed.

• (1120)

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister is unclear in his answer. The official chronology, version B, suggests very strongly that it was Paul Tellier, the Clerk of the Privy Council, who counselled cabinet ministers to mislead Canadians.

I would like to put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister of Immigration said that he was counselled by government officials to lie to Canadians. Was the minister of external affairs counselled to lie to Canadians, and if so, who was it that counselled her?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, all of this was made clear by the minister when he rose to speak in the House yesterday, that there was a House card prepared. That is clear in the chronology. That has been before the committee. The minister yesterday made his own statement in this regard and there is nothing further to add.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, is it any wonder that Canadians from one coast to the other do not believe what the government is saying on this particular matter. Is it any wonder that editorial opinion right across the country is condemning this government for its handling of the Al-Mashat matter?

Madam Speaker, referring to cabinet ministers of the government, the Montreal Gazette today says "They behaved more like cockroaches scurrying for cover when the lights—"

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will put his question now, please.

Mr. Nunziata: "Scurrying for cover". Will the minister of external affairs—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Statistics Canada confirmed again today that inflation is still at 6.2 per cent. What Canadians have known for a very long time is that it is getting tougher and tougher to make ends meet and to put food on the table. While inflation is at 6.2 per cent, wage increases are half of that.

Clearly the government has decided to attack the wrong problem in attacking wage levels. Rather than attacking the wrong problem, why does the minister not do something to get on the right track and bring in real policies, and change policies like the GST, lower the interest rates and get the Canadian dollar down so Canadian families can make ends meet again.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the decline in inflation is encouraging. It has dropped from 6.3 per cent to 6.2 per cent. It is a small decline, but at least it is going in the right direction. I think we should recognize that included in the inflationary figures are the direct and indirect impacts of the various budgets across the country. In this case, this reflects the budgets of Ontario, Quebec and others, which have to be worked through the system.

Yes, as a matter of fact it is the GST and that has been recognized at the very outset. My predecessor indicated and we have confirmed that the GST would indeed have a one-time effect upon inflationary pressures. However, it was important to have this institution put in place for the benefit of our manufacturing industry. I say to the hon. member, who is suggesting we need to have jobs and improve our competitiveness, the GST does just that for the manufacturing sector.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Madam Speaker. I would suggest to the minister that he should go to some of the border towns across this country and look at the bankruptcy statistics and see how much good his policies have really done for the Canadian economy.

I would address my supplementary to the minister responsible for trade. Since the Canada–U.S. trade deal, Canadian wages have been falling as well, and trade experts now say that the trade deal with Mexico will result in a further decrease in Canadian workers' wages.

I want to ask the Minister responsible for International Trade what assurances he can give Canadian workers that wages will not fall. If he cannot give those assurances, will he stop the negotiations until he can come up with those assurances for the workers of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member would draw that conclusion. Since the free trade agreement with the United States came in, Canadian wages have gone up faster than those in the United States. So clearly it does not have anything to do with trade negotiations or trade deals themselves.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, in Montreal, 200,000 people are out of work. One person out of four is either on unemployment insurance or welfare.

A few weeks ago in Montreal, I met employees in the garment industry. For these employees, free trade with the United States and Mexico will mean more jobs lost, but the government is going ahead regardless.

Will the minister have the decency to talk to these people whose jobs are being threatened, before continuing these talks? Look at the facts!

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, it might be of interest to the hon. member if she realized that John Forsythe Canada Limited is looking at the possibility of opening a plant in Mexico. The purpose for that is to transfer jobs from countries in the Far East into Mexico so they can serve the Canadian market better from Mexico than from places like Taiwan or Hong Kong.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Earlier this week, the Minister of Finance introduced legislation to create the debt reduction fund that was previously announced in the February budget. Will the minister confirm that this debt reduction will itself be in a deficit position of almost $27 billion by the end of the current fiscal year and that after five years, the debt reduction fund will have an accumulated deficit of almost $122 billion? If we reduce the debt at this rate, we could be in big trouble before long.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question because he simply demonstrates the magnitude of the problem that we have. Day after day after day, we have the Liberals and the NDP calling for the expenditure of more money. We have got to start putting a discipline on our expenditures.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, over 90 per cent of the increase in the debt that has occurred since we have been in office is as a result of the compound interest on the debt that we inherited, and Canadians had better not forget that.

In the days of the Liberals, the annualized increase in program spending was 14 per cent. Under the days of the Tories it was 3.7 per cent. We are exercising fiscal discipline, they did not.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I know that 1984 seems like yesterday to the minister, but it is time he started to take account for what he has been doing over the last seven years.

Now that it is clear that the government is going to have to borrow money to finance the debt reduction fund, will the minister admit that this is simply an attempt to use the statement of Public Accounts of Canada as another press line to distract Canadians from the real issue of this government's mismanagement?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, with those kinds of calculations, it is no wonder that we saw the national debt triple between 1981 and 1984 under the Liberal regime.

The fact of the matter is that it is costing this year $43 billion to pay the cost of servicing the debt. What we are saying is we want to carve out the amount of money that is collected from the GST to apply to that and eventually to apply to the pay-down of the national debt. I hope we have the support of the hon. member opposite, particularly when we bring in legislating spending caps because that will provide further discipline and further integrity and credibility to our program of fiscal consolidation.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last December, the President of the Treasury Board released Public Service 2000 as the government's policy for the renewal and revitalization of the Public Service. The lines of responsibility were clearly spelled out as: "Ministers are individually and collectively responsible for the activities of government, including the management and conduct of the Public Service."

Given that the government unanimously voted against the motion affirming its own policy, I ask the minister: If this statement of ministerial responsibility is not the government's policy, what is?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think that the position of the government as expressed in the white paper of PS-2000 is absolutely clear.

We have indicated in that white paper the massive changes that we want to bring to the administration of this government, and we are going to do it with the Public Service. I can tell you that after having visited a large number of cities all across Canada, I am convinced that they are in this with us, participating fully.

I can report today that this is progressing, well even though we have a very difficult environment.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the minister obviously has no explanation for the conflict between the government's policy and the government's vote on Wednesday.

PS-2000 also says: "Public servants will be empowered and encouraged to be innovative, to show greater initiative and greater flexibility. Risk taking will be encouraged and rewarded".

Will the minister admit that in the wake of the Al-Mashat affair, risk taking and innovation are the last things on the minds of Public Servants? Will he admit that PS-2000, to quote Dian Cohen, is "dead in the water"?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I will agree to no such thing, because the hon. member knows full well that this is not the case.

She referred to a vote that was taken in this House. She knows it was a vote of confidence. These are usual little tricks that are well understood by us. They may not be understood by everyone, but we know very well that we can read through that.

As for PS-2000, I can again repeat what I have said. It is proceeding with the full assistance of, I do not know how many thousands of civil servants, I have met. We are working at improving the empowerment.

It is a difficult change to go from a control-oriented organization to a citizen service concerned organization, but we are doing it and it is going on very well.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that the lie to which the Minister of Immigration referred yesterday was based upon an external affairs house card. I have a copy of that house card, and nowhere is there any lie on that document.

In view of the fact that the only lie that has been told was on the document which was prepared by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Paul Tellier, when he indicated that Al-Mashat got no preferential treatment, my question to the minister is this.

Was the minister also advised by officials to mislead or lie to Canadians and, if so, by which officials? What action has she taken to follow up on the statements made by her colleague?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, all of the things that relate to the house card were made clear in the chronology and were made clear in committee.

They have been available to the public for some time, and I am sure the committee will have its comments to make on them. I do not have anything to add to what my colleague said yesterday or to what I said in committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister's colleague yesterday said that he was briefed by external affairs officials to mislead Canadians. My supplementary is very straightforward.

Has she spoken with her colleague? Has she determined which officials briefed her colleague to mislead or lie to Canadians? Was she also briefed the same way?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I find the questions a little difficult in this House, given that all of these issues have been dealt with in committee and it is clear in the chronology. I will be interested to hear what the committee has to say about this. My colleague and I have conferred on any number of aspects of this case, as the hon. member knows, and we have put procedures in place to ensure that this kind of thing does not happen again. That is what we are here to do and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Later this day I will be tabling a petition of 50,000 or more signatures from Canadians across the country who are urging the government to remove the goods and services tax from feminine hygiene products.

Given the apparent discriminatory nature of this application of the GST, and since the petition is directed to the Minister of Finance, I will be giving it personally to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women in a few moments.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, will he remove the GST on feminine hygiene products?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. First of all, I don't believe that there is discrimination in the application of feminine hygiene products. As the hon. member knows, the purpose of the GST was to establish a broader base tax at the lowest possible rate. So the GST covers a broad range of goods and services.

It would be very difficult to consider a broad base of exemptions without affecting the actual rate of the GST. So the more exemptions that one would provide, the higher the rate would be. And, so, it would be very difficult to consider that at this particular time.

There are many basic necessities that bear the GST and, while I sympathize with the hon. member in this particular case, it would be very difficult to engage in a broader exemption than that already applied, which is essentially food and medical services.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, or perhaps to the Acting Prime Minister.

Approximately 2,500 Canadian men and women will receive their well-deserved volunteer service medals on June 22, a week from tomorrow. These medals are coming from the Canadian government for their contribution to the Persian Gulf war.

Will the minister advise the House why the government cannot at the same time either present or announce when the Canadian men and women who served in the Korean war will receive their well-deserved, distinctly Canadian, volunteer service medals for their contribution in the Korean war on behalf of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that that issue is under very active consideration, that is the voluntary Korean service medal. I hope that we will be in a position to announce it in the not too distant future.

I appreciate the hon. member's support in this particular area. I have been personally involved in it and I can assure him that they will be duly recognized, as they should be.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): In view of the Deputy Prime Minister's answer, would it be safe to assume that the government is going to look favourably and generously toward these Korean veterans very, very soon? If that is a fair assumption, will there be an announcement soon telling Canadians when the medals will be presented, where they will be presented, by whom, and will medals be presented posthumously to the families of Korean veterans who were killed in Korea or who are since deceased?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I am pleased to receive the representation from the hon. gentleman.

I can indicate to him that the whole issue is being studied very closely by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and by the Minister of National Defence. They will be making an announcement to the House as soon as possible and certainly will take on board any representations made by my hon. colleague.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): My question is to the Minister of Justice.

As the minister knows, the government co-sponsored and signed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child; yet in that convention it says that "any child that is deprived of liberty shall be held separate and apart from adults unless it is not in the interests of that child to do so".

• (1140)

Yet this government proceeds to house and jail children and young offenders with adult criminals. This is going to be made worse by the government's policies in Bill C-12, the amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

Why does the minister not just admit that the reason the government cannot ratify this convention is that it is prohibited from doing so by the government's own policies?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member's reference to the amendments to the Young Offenders Act is not in order for Question Period since it is before the House and he has the opportunity to make his representations there.

I think the hon. member will also recognize that it was his party which brought in the Young Offenders Act and that there are enormous difficulties presented to society in trying to draw distinctions between adult and young offenders and just create a system or regime that is fair and equitable.

I know my colleague, the Solicitor General, has considerable concern about the facilities for the incarceration of all people in Canada who come into violation of the law. I would say that we are very much committed to trying to have a system of justice that does justice to people of all ages in Canada. It is an ongoing preoccupation both with myself and my provincial colleagues to provide the appropriate facilities for young offenders.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, we finished the legislative hearings on Bill C-58, the predecessor legislation, in December and still we are waiting.

Also when this bill was passed by the former Liberal government it was the intention that young offenders be housed separate and apart from adult criminals.

It has been over a year since this convention was signed and co-sponsored by this government and yet it has not been ratified. I realize that the provinces have to agree, but the provinces also had to agree to housing young offenders separate and apart, which this government has just insisted on letting slide.

Why does the government not admit that it has no intention of fulfilling the mandate of the UN charter on the rights of the child? When, if it does have an intention of signing it, is this very important convention going to be ratified in this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister made the Minister of National Health and Welfare responsible for the children file. As my friend said before, the convention has been accepted and has been given to the provinces. We are still working with the provinces toward the ratification of the convention. It should be done normally this fall. It is going well.

I believe that the provinces give good collaboration, but I believe my friend will understand that if I work with the provinces we have to take the necessary time. The last summit was last September. We are looking forward to being able to satisfy my friend and all Canadians. Once again I believe that the question of convention will be ratified. It will be over, I believe, at the beginning of the fall.

TRADE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister for International Trade.

One of the very positive aspects of the free trade agreement is a dispute settling mechanism. As we all know, Canada and the U.S. have been embroiled in a battle over pork imports to the United States. I understand that the results of the tribunal have been released.

I was wondering if the minister could give us those results and how they affect Canada and the viability of the pork producers across Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think that this is an extremely important question. I might say that we on the government side are very pleased, as I am sure colleagues on the other side of the House are also very pleased, with the results of the extraordinary challenge result that we heard today. We expect that this will be the end of the matter. The extraordinary challenge committee ruling today was binding. The countervailing duty will be revoked. It was a 3–0 decision on the matter.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I think the important thing is the result of this decision today, and I want to quote very briefly from the decision as follows: "The request for an extraordinary challenge is dismissed for failure to meet the standards of an extraordinary challenge set forth under the free trade agreement".

I might say that the system has now been tested. It has been proved, and this confirms very clearly that the position the Government of Canada has taken all along in the court decision has been in the—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who suggested in an answer to my leader that in fact inflation had fallen his month.

After no change in prices in April, inflation was up by .5 per cent in this latest month of May. The increase over the past year, if we want to take those figures, was especially high in Quebec City at 8.4 per cent, Montreal at 8.1 per cent and St. John's at 7.7 per cent, all provinces where the GST was integrated with the provincial sales tax.

Will the government now concede that it is the GST which is pushing up the cost of living most, and will it act to cut the cost of living by cutting the level of the GST?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, just to make it very clear, the year–over–year increases in all items in the CPI was 6.2 per cent in May, down from 6.3 per cent in April and in March. It is a small modest decline, but it is a decline, and my hon. friend would agree with me that it is going in the right direction.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, let me quote the first line of the release this morning from the government's own statistical agency. It says: "The all items Consumer Price Index for Canada rose by .5 per cent between April and May after having shown no movement the month before". That is an increase, and the minister should recognize it.

In face of that increase and the possible consequences of that for increases in interest rates in this country, will the government commit itself to keep lowering interest rates so we get a lower dollar, more jobs, more export expansion, and help to end this recession?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member, I am sure, would have noted that the Bank of Canada rate went down four basis points yesterday, which is again probably the 13th or 14th successive decline, and as inflationary pressures recede so will interest rates drop. I think that is the most encouraging note.

Inflationary pressures are receding and the actual inflationary statistics prove that out. It is encouraging to note that it could then follow that interest rates could be reduced further still. At least that is obviously our hope and expectation, but it must be accompanied and it can only happen if we attack the root causes of inflation, the inflationary pressures and the inflationary expectations.

I am sure my hon. friend would welcome the fact that interest rates have declined over the past year by more than 5 percentage points and that the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates on three-month commercial paper is about 2.5 per cent. That is a dramatic decline from the 5.6 per cent it was over a year ago.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, once more I rise in this House to remind the government of the crisis in the port of Halifax.

It was more than a month ago that the Minister of Transport promised to do all in his power to assist the port of Halifax.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why this government has done nothing? Why does the port of Halifax continue to decline? Why will the government not give assistance?

• (1150)

Oh, good. Nobody knows the answer again.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the question has been answered time and again by the minister.

I am sure the minister will be pleased to respond again when he returns on Monday.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am almost, and I say almost, speechless but not quite.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, it is funny, it is very funny to this government as the port of Halifax closes and 500 jobs are cut adrift. Well, you cannot build a nation by cutting a region adrift.

Atlantic Canadians and Halagonians know that only federal government action can save this great port. Why does this government, if it even knows anything about it, continue to refuse to act? Why will it not do the right thing? Why does somebody over there not have some idea of what is going on?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Transport have been very actively involved in this issue. As the hon. member knows, it is not a situation that can be solved with one simple solution. It is a complexity of issues.

One of the factors is the fact that there is excess tonnage capacity on the high seas which is driving down ocean rates.

In addition, Minister of Transport has in fact been meeting with CN. They are working toward the development of double-stack container rail carriers which will improve productivity and efficiency.

I know that CN and the container companies are negotiating a new series of freight rates, which hopefully will be competitive and hopefully will be able to save that business for Halifax. I agree with the hon. member that it is very important, and this government takes it seriously.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Attorney General, in the absence of the Solicitor General, and it is about Kitty Nowdluk-Reynolds, an Inuit crime victim.

Ms. Nowdluk-Reynolds was improperly arrested last summer on a material witness warrant. She was then taken in handcuffs from Surrey, B.C. to Edmonton, to Yellowknife, back to Edmonton, to Ottawa and finally to Iqaluit over a nightmare week for a trial at which she was not even called to testify.

An hon. member: In handcuffs?

Mr. Kilgour: In handcuffs. Will she tell us why no official, including herself or the Solicitor General, has until now, 10 months later, made an apology in this matter or done anything to ensure that it will not happen again?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question and I welcome him to this issue which I have been involved with actually for several months. It has been a matter of public record for some time and it is interesting that it has finally come to his attention.

I have before me my own letters to Ms. Nowdluk, written in March of this year. In fact I have done something.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Why have you not done something if it has been that long?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I wonder if the members of the opposition are interested in hearing the answer to this very serious question.

I have been in correspondence with Ms. Nowdluk-Reynolds and I have in fact written to the Solicitor General urging an inquiry by the RCMP into the activities which are complained of in her case.

I would agree that it is an extremely important issue. I have in fact taken it under advisement and acted on it. As I said, I welcome the hon. member's somewhat belated interest in this subject.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the minister's father is a Crown attorney and has been in British Columbia for many years. I wonder who brought it to her attention.

The only correspondence she has had up until now is a quote from a B.C. RCMP inspector who said: "No matter what you are arrested for, all prisoners are treated the same way".

Does the minister stand by that kind of guff from an inspector? What is her policy? Is she prepared to have an independent inquiry done, again to repeat, to ensure that this sort of thing does not happen again.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that my father would be enchanted to be remembered by the hon. member so kindly.

I do not, regrettably, have jurisdiction over the RCMP as the Minister of Justice. So when the request was made of me to take an interest, I drew this to the attention of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who has taken it under advisement. I believe that an inquiry is being made in the RCMP into these activities. I am sure that my colleague will report to the House or to the appropriate authorities when there is a result of that inquiry.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Ontario government announced it will begin negotiations tomorrow on the land claims of the Algonquin Nation of Golden Lake.

The traditional lands of the Golden Lake Algonquins comprise 14,000 square miles of the Ottawa Valley and in fact Parliament Hill, upon which these proceedings are taking place, is a part of unceded Algonquin lands.

In spite of the Prime Minister's trumpeted, new native agenda on land claims and the government's clear interest in the assets of the national capital, the federal government will only be sending an observer to these negotiations without a full mandate to negotiate.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: Why is the federal government refusing to participate fully in negotiations of the Algonquin claim when it could have such profound implications for the Ottawa Valley, for the national capital and for the national interest?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows that this government is very committed to land claims. He knows that we have evolved a policy that has been quite successful over a period of time and that that policy continues to evolve. There is a number of things happening on an ongoing basis.

I know that the minister is as concerned and as interested in this as anybody, and I know he will respond to the member when he returns to the House next week.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, last summer we saw, within an hour's drive of the capital, the results of the federal government's delay and duplicity in dealing with Mohawk claims.

Aboriginal frustration ultimately resulted in the expenditure of millions of dollars, the loss of Canada's reputation internationally, and the death of a Quebec policeman.

Does the minister not think it important, given the federal government's interest in the national capital area and its jurisdiction over aboriginal affairs, that it should be a full participant in tripartite negotiations with the Algonquin people of Golden Lake?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the events of last summer were a Canadian tragedy. The events of last summer have taught all Canadians that we have many lessons to learn. I do not think you will find, Madam Speaker, that this minister has any lessons to learn more than he has.

The government will take whatever action is essential to ensure that land claims right across this country are settled fairly and equitably and with as greatest dispatch as possible.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

In its February budget, the government announced it would release a document on Canada's economic prosperity in the spring. Summer starts next week, and we have yet to see this document.

We know that talking about prosperity is embarrassing for this government. Could the minister tell us whether the government still intends to publish this document, and if so, when?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I thought the question was going to be a good one until he put in the pejorative words.

Our intention is to get this paper out as early as possible. It might not be possible to meet the objective of doing it before the end of the spring, but the paper is quite well advanced.

I would hope that we would be able to get launched on this with an opportunity of having broad debate and discussion across the country, including members of Parliament on all sides of the House.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, a newspaper reported last week that officials were scrambling to develop papers for a target deadline of June 19, but there is "intense disagreement inside the bureaucracy over whether the ideas have been developed enough to meet that deadline".

Will the minister admit that this disagreement within the bureaucracy reflects the confusion of its political masters, and that the government does not know what to do to ensure the prosperity of Canada and to provide jobs to Canadians?

• (1200)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would look at the policies we have been following as a government, the hon. member would see that they have all been designed on the economics side to improve our competitiveness as a nation and, through that improved competitiveness, build on the prosperity that we all want to see. The range of policies, whether the broad policies of deficit control and inflation control, deregulation, tax reform or other policies related to the more specific areas of the impact on the economy, are all designed to improve the competitive position of the country.

This new document is designed to carry forward from that. There is no confusion whatsoever. There has been a very consistent theme, starting back in 1984 when we were first elected, and carrying us through to this dialogue now, which will set in place the policies that will carry us through to the end of this decade and into the next century.

FORESTRY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade which also touches on his responsibilities as Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

My question pertains to the growing trade resistance to Canadian forest products in Europe as the result of the deliberate promotion of a boycott by certain misguided Canadian environmental interests. How is the Canadian forest industry and the Canadian government responding to this very serious trade problem with respect to our most important export resource?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as my friend, who has taken a great interest in this particular issue and has a broad and very intense interest in the future of the forest industry, well knows we have been attacking this problem in a broad way.

Many members of Parliament met with representatives from the European Parliament during the course of a visit some weeks back. I believe the results of those discussions were instrumental in causing the European community to back away from the intentions they had prior to their arrival.

We are also taking this fight to the various capitals in Europe through our trade commissioners. The Prime Minister will be addressing this in his visit, if he has not already done so, in Germany this week. We reject the position taken by people who are in disagreement with the approach we have taken, and we will continue to fight that position as vigorously as we can.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF DELEGATION TO BRAZIL AND CHILE

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask permission of the House to table the report of a parliamentary delegation. I had to go out to the lobby to get the documents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House will agree to revert to presentation of Interparliamentary Delegations.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of a parliamentary delegation to Brazil and Chile which occurred earlier this year, comprising two members of the government side, one member from the Official Opposition, and one member from the New Democratic Party.

BRITISH COLUMBIA GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order adopted earlier today, Mr. Danis, seconded by Mr. Andre, asks for leave to table a bill.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-25, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations in the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, could I ask that you please clarify something for me. It sounded like you said: "Ordering the workers back to work." This is an order to order the employers to resume operations. There is a lockout going on, not a strike.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The bill reads: "To provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations". That is what it reads in English. I did read it in French and it could be difficult for our translators.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1) the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to disrupt but I want to be assured that in fact the French version of the bill is clearly not saying: "Ordering the workers back to work".

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, it does mean the same thing in both languages. To my knowledge of both languages, it does.

Motion agreed, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time? Later this day pursuant to orders made earlier.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-234, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act (appeal procedures).

He said: Madam Speaker, in 1988 the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Statutory Instruments or Regulations adopted a report which recommended changes in the regulations dealing with the way the Public Service Commission deals with appeals.

The report of the committee was apparently adopted in the House. A response was required. The response came in the dying days of the session before the election in 1988 and the commission, which reports to Parliament, decided not to proceed with any of those recommendations.

In view of the intransigence of the commission, this bill is introduced in order to make mandatory in the act those items recommended by the committee in its report to Parliament. I hope that the bill will commend itself to all hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-235, an act to amend the Criminal Code (offences of sexual nature).

She said: Madam Speaker, the current justice system unfairly treats victims of sexual offences. The two measures outlined in this bill will address that inequity to a degree. The first measure will assure victims that their right to privacy is given consideration. The second will require that defence attorneys prove to a justice that their clients are not a hazard to their victims or other members of the public.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by citizens primarily from Edmonton and Toronto calling upon Parliament to recognize the democratically elected government of Lithuania and establish diplomatic relations with it.

As well, the petitioners are calling upon the Soviet Union to withdraw all its military forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. They are asking that in all negotiations between the Soviet Union and Lithuania that international mediation be provided.

Finally, they are asking that all international aid to the Soviet Union in the form of credit and feed grains be conditional upon the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Baltic states and resolution of the Baltic crisis.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 50,000 Canadians from coast to coast demanding that this government remove the goods and services tax on feminine hygiene products.

The petition was launched by a group called Taboo. Jackie Burnett of Sarnia and Barbara Saunders of Kitchene0zr believe that feminine hygiene products are health related necessities.

There is no choice for 53 per cent of Canada's population when it comes to boycotting these products. When single servings of yoghurt, chip dip and donated male sperm can be GST exempt, 50,000 people and I feel that this is one case where an exemption should be made.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I submit to the House a petition on behalf of the First Nations of Canada regarding immunity from the GST.

The First Nations of Canada are immune from taxation by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights. These rights have been affirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, the Constitution Act of 1982, section 35, and by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Spiro case.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a duly authorized petition on behalf of residents of Saskatchewan, mostly from my constituency, the towns of Dundurn, Allan, Hanley, but also from Saskatoon and Moose Jaw.

The petitioners are condemning the attacks on the rural way of life by this government in so far as the cutbacks to VIA, the abandonment of rail lines, the neglect of the fisheries and forestry, but particularly the closure of rural post offices.

They call upon Parliament to reject the actions of this government in the closing of the rural post offices.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by approximately 100 Albertans concerning primarily the situation in Lithuania.

They call for the Canadian Parliament and Senate to immediately recognize the legitimate democratically elected Government of Lithuania and to establish diplomatic relations with it.

The petitioners demand that negotiations between the Soviet Union and Lithuania begin, and want it ensured that international mediation is provided during the negotiations.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I want to present a petition in the House today from a number of residents in the Williams Lake area in British Columbia.

These residents are very concerned about the application that is currently before the CRTC regarding the bid by Unitel Communications for entry into the long distance telephone market.

The petitioners are asking the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in the long distance market. They are asking and urging the Minister of Communications to hold public hearings throughout our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunication system.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I also have the privilege to present a petition signed by a large number of people in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

The petitioners again urge the federal government to become involved in the Unitel application before the CRTC. Particularly, they want to ensure that there will be public hearings throughout this country so that the community can be consulted before our phone industry is destroyed.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to present petitions, first of all from the community of Simpson in my riding. One hundred and nineteen residents of that area who use the local post office are upset with the fact that Canada Post is unilaterally removing their post office. They are very concerned about the future of postal service in that riding and call upon this government to provide postal service as a service and not as a profit-making venture.

As well, I have a petition from a number of people from the community of Bramalea, also in my riding, who are also concerned about the post office. They have experienced the absence of a post office. They have not had a post office since 1990, when the retail postal outlet closed. There have been a number of problems with mail service in Bramalea, including access to mail during the winter, confusion about parcel service, and it is causing very serious difficulties with the residents. They call upon this government to put in place a proper postal service for that community.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Finally, I rise to present a petition presented to me by a number of farmers in Saskatchewan. They call upon this government to give farmers in this country the opportunity to have oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and to protect them by amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act to give oats and barley the same protection as wheat.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present a petition on behalf of residents in rural parts of British Columbia. Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Ministry of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service; urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside of Canada's urban areas, who will be impacted severely by deregulation; and urge the Minister of Communications to hold hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunication systems.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of petitioners from the lower mainland and the interior of British Columbia, who are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

These petitioners are most concerned about what the impact of the deregulation of the telephone system will be to those citizens who live outside the urban areas and who are really very much dependent on telephone communication for their livelihood.

Routine Proceedings

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Question answered orally is indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, question No. 44 will be answered today.

PENSION PLANS

Question No. 44—Mr. Gauthier:

According to the most recent information available to the government, what is the percentage of employees covered by pension plans in the private sector who belong to (a) non-contributory plans in which contributions for plan benefits are provided entirely by employers (b) plans in which employers finance more than 50 per cent of required employer and employee contributions?

M. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry Science and Technology): By the honourable Micheal H. Wilson, minister responsible for Statistics Canada reports: At January 1, 1989 there were 2,753,756 members of pension plans sponsored by employers in the private sector.

a) Almost 54 per cent of these members belonged to plans to which contributions for plan benefits were provided entirely by the employer (non-contributory plans)

The remaining 46 per cent belonged to plans to which both the employee and the employer were required to contribute (contributory plans)

b) The percentage of employees belonging to contributory plans in which the employers finance more than 50 per cent of the required contributions is not known. However, legislation now in effect in six provinces and for federally regulated plans stipulates that employees' contributions with interest cannot constitute more than 50 per cent of the commuted value of pension benefits accrued after a prescribed date.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are five minutes remaining in the speech by the hon. member for Surrey North.

Mr. Dingwall: Just a brief point of order, Madam Speaker. Of course, we will hear the hon. member who has the floor with regard to his remarks on C-10. I am wondering if, following that, we could hear the member from our party and then proceed to the motion with regards to the port of Vancouver, which may mean we may not see the clock exactly at 12.30 p.m., but extend it for a few moments afterwards. I am wondering if there might be a disposition in the House to proceed in that way.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, of course we would have no problems in doing that to co-operate with the New Democratic Party and to allow the Liberal speaker to complete his remarks on the firm understanding, of course, that what we would do is just simply shift the clock back the five or ten minutes that would be necessary. The full hour would still remain.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, as a result of the parliamentary secretary's explanation that we would in fact shift the whole hour, that we would still have a full hour's debate, we would have no difficulty co-operating with the Liberals to allow their speaker time.

An hon. member: Agreed.

• (1220)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I will wrap up my remarks fairly quickly. One of the things we should be looking at is what the action is of the government in relation to the resources it has to deal with the question of tobacco.

I think we have to put into perspective that this increase in taxes alone, not the total revenue from tobacco taxes, but the increase, will be $1.4 billion in the first year and it will drop down to just under $1 billion a year. Spending, in terms of dealing with this major health issue, should be balanced against that.

For example, this year, it is spending only $3.3 million on the national strategy to reduce tobacco use. That is a very, very small amount, particularly when it is compared with some other expenditures in the health area. It is spending $41 billion on the national drug strategy and $38 million on the AIDS program.

Both of those are worthy programs and I would certainly encourage the government to spend more in those areas. But when you look at the expenditures in the tobacco area of $3.3 million, compared to a $1.4 billion increase in revenue, one really begins to wonder what its priorities are.

Knowing it has this massive revenue to do it, I would like to see the federal government become far more aggressive in the following areas: the promotion of health in general and healthy lifestyles, which is something it could do positively, promote the reduction of the consumption of tobacco, particularly programs aimed at reducing the initial addiction of youth and, third, develop programs to assist those people who are addicted to tobacco to withdraw from tobacco consumption.

We spend many, many millions of dollars on drug treatment centres, drug counselling, but as a national government, we spend almost nothing to assist people who are addicted to cigarette smoking to withdraw.

It could spend money on health research. In the last two years the government has dramatically reduced its expenditures on health research at a time when we should be increasing expenditures. These are areas in which it could use this massive increase in revenue, $1.4 billion, to do something positive.

The last area should be pursued aggressively. It should be assisting farmers and workers in the tobacco area in positive adjustment programs by assisting the tobacco growers to develop alternative crops and markets for those crops and tobacco workers to develop adjustments and training programs so they can go into other types of employment. Let us remind ourselves, they have an increase in revenue of $1.4 billion so they can do it.

This type of approach has tremendous public support. Environics polled Canadians to find out what kind of support there was for using the increase in tobacco revenues in various areas. They found out that 84 per cent supported its use in research into disease. Another 84 per cent supported its use in preventing smoking among young people. Seventy-eight per cent supported its use in helping people quit smoking and the same number supported the use of that money to promote healthier lifestyles.

It is quite interesting that one of the things the public did not support the use of this money for was to reduce the debt.

In other words, the public sees this as a health tax not as a revenue tax. It does not want it used as revenue for the government to try to reduce its deficit or reduce the impact of its fiscal mismanagement on the economy. The public is quite prepared to support it as a health tax.

I guess, I and my New Democratic colleagues would also support it on this basis and that is why we support this government's legislation.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for the excellent presentation he made on this issue.

As you know, I have made a number of presentations before in this House in an attempt to reduce the amount of smoking this addictive substance that takes place in Canada, and I certainly strongly support the increase that is proposed for the excise tax on cigarettes and tobacco products.

But I believe, as my colleague believes, that this tax should not be called an excise tax because it leads people to believe that this is simply something that goes into the national treasury and, like everything else that seems to go into the national treasury, disappears from view from the point of view of public programs.

Maybe there is an opportunity in committee stage to label this tax as a supplementary medicare premium, because, as my colleagues who have spoken on this issue have pointed out during the debate, smoking costs thousands of lives throughout Canada. It also damages the health of many tens of thousands of Canadians and, as a result of that loss of life and as a result of that damage to health, it incurs the expenditure of hundreds of millions of Canadian tax dollars on things like health and hospital care. Those have to be shouldered, not simply by smokers, but by all Canadians.

If we had a supplementary medical premium attached to cigarettes instead of calling it excise taxes then people would get a clear grasp as to what the problem is in this case.

I do hope, as well, that the government will carry on this philosophy into other areas. It should stop subsidizing the growing of tobacco and stop subsidizing tobacco advertising through the tax system. It should gradually phase out the import and the export of tobacco products from Canada. It should establish adjustment programs that will assist farmers who are currently involved in growing tobacco to shift to other crops. Also it should help workers who are involved in the tobacco industry at the current time so that they can leave that industry with retraining and other programs and not experience any loss of income or socioeconomic standing.

So I congratulate the speakers who have spoken today on the viewpoints they have presented and I certainly congratulate my colleague from Surrey North for the excellent information that he has given to this House.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I must say that the member's very imaginative idea of having this tax designated as a health tax or a health premium would be in line with the feelings of the Canadian public because the surveys and polling on this clearly indicate that the public supports this when the money is directed towards the health of the public, including preventing young people from smoking, helping people to quit smoking and promoting healthier lifestyles.

But, at the same time, the public does not support its use to reduce the deficit or to replace the advertising revenues for sports organizations that tobacco companies are now doing in promotions.

There is one other very interesting thing that I think relates to this. The public not only does not like this money being swallowed up into the government's revenues, it clearly said that it felt independent, non-government bodies should be responsible for the expenditure of these dollars. I think that is an indication of the lack of confidence that Canadians now have in the wisdom of the expenditures of this government.

So the public is saying that it supports the idea of a health tax, but it thinks the expenditures should be under the control of somebody we can reliably trust.

• (1230)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise today to voice my strong objections to Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and Excise Act.

Let us be clear about this bill. The government has attempted to cloud the issue and cover up the real intent of this bill. This is nothing more than a tax bill, a tax grab.

This bill proposes a 3 cent per cigarette increase in the federal excise tax and, by its own estimates, this increase will mean an additional $1.4 billion in the federal government's coffers.

The real intent of this bill is to increase the government's revenue, not to help the health of Canadians. Its aim is nothing more than to take money from the pockets of ordinary Canadians. It is a regressive tax. It is an unfair tax and it is an unnecessary tax.

I, as the spokesperson for Haldimand—Norfolk, want to tell this government that the people of Haldimand—Norfolk oppose this tax. I am opposed because what it will not do is encourage people to stop smoking as much as it will encourage them to get their cigarettes elsewhere, to cross-border shop or to buy smuggled or stolen cigarettes.

I am opposed to this bill because coupled with this government's abandonment of transition programs, it leaves tobacco farmers high and dry.

This is not a health bill. The government certainly has a right and a responsibility to show its view on smoking and to alert Canadians to the potential health risks of smoking. That is not what is at issue here.

What is at issue here is the use of the tax system to impose an incredible burden on Canadians who supposedly considered these warnings and exercised their ultimate right to choose to smoke.

The government is concerned about the young starting to smoke. It should be implementing programs like the one in the United States in which starting in the first grade students enter a program educating them on the dangers of smoking and offering certificates for the completion of this program.

In a recent article, Herbert Laframboise, a former Deputy Minister of Health and Welfare says that this U.S. program will give students a "continuous bombardment as to the ills and dangers of smoking and would be the nucleus of a smoke-free society." According to Laframboise, one reason this deterrence program is not pursued by the government as an alternative to raising taxes is that "it costs money and it does not generate revenue".

I welcome any government's concern for the health of Canadians, but I think its concern should not be limited to those matters which will just fatten its own coffers.

It strikes me as a little bit ironic that this government on the one hand attempts to pass off major tax grabs as a health measure when it closes its eyes to other major health programs or other major health concerns facing Canadians.

I am thinking of the real concern posed by the additive MMT now being used in Canadian gas. The members opposite must surely be aware of the significant health danger posed by MMT. Its dangers have been brought to their attention numerous times by my colleague, the member for Lambton—Middlesex.

The U.S. banned MMT in unleaded gas in 1978. A subcommittee of the House energy commerce committee in the United States wrote last year a letter to the Environmental Protection Agency which said: "We are extremely concerned about the substantial serious health impacts from the introduction of MMT gasoline. Manganese is listed as an air toxic capable of serious neuro toxic effects".

This government knows this and yet it does nothing about it. I urge the government to address all the serious health concerns facing Canadians, including the use of MMT, and not to limit its health concerns only to those which will enable it to justify a $5 billion tax grab.

Tobacco consumption rates in Canada have declined. Cigarette consumption in Canada has fallen from $63 billion in 1983 to $47 billion in 1989. This decline is due to rising health concerns, government smoking regulations and taxes.

According to Mr. Laframboise:

> Many of the people who have quit have been people whose attachment to smoking has not been strong.
> A surprising number of former smokers smoked casually as a social habit, and for reasons yet to be explained, never became addicted to nicotine.

Mr. Laframboise then goes on to talk about the people who are not so lucky, those who are addicted to nicotine. He writes: "It is these hard cases who are most trapped and punished by high taxes on tobacco. They are smokers of relative long-standing. Burdening them with the present level of taxes can fairly be described as a cruel exploitation of a population addicted to a legal product".

Tobacco farmers have been equally exploited by this government. With this latest tax increase the government will be collecting over $4 billion a year in tobacco taxes; $4 billion a year from the sweat and labour of my tobacco farmers. What part of this $4 billion-plus has it given back to tobacco farmers this year to help them cope with what is for many of them a loss of livelihood? Nothing. Absolutely nothing.

Last March, this government stopped accepting applications for the REDUX program which helps farmers exit the tobacco industry. There are now over 600 tobacco farmers on the waiting list for the program, even though it ran out of money months ago. The government has yet to allocate any new money for this program. Tobacco farmers are hanging on to a financial shoestring and this government is content to leave them twisting in the wind.

The same sad story of this abandonment of tobacco farmers is told by the government's handling of the Alternative Enterprise Initiative. This program was designed to help farmers find alternative crops to tobacco. It ran out of money months ago and the government is giving no clue as to its future. A tobacco farmer with 18 acres produces about 45,000 pounds of dried production of which the farmer's gross revenue before cost is $66,000. Of that, this government makes a tax profit of $4.5 million. That is 68 times what the farmer makes on his own product.

Per package, the farmer's revenue is 7.3 cents. The federal government's tax revenue is $2.31 and the provincial government Ontario's revenue for instance, is $2.04, $4.35 in Ontario alone.

Since 1984, 900 farmers have abandoned tobacco leaving about 1,200 attempting to hang on. The transition has been very large and very rapid. Nowhere has this rapid transition and displacement been felt more strongly than in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk, which traditionally has been one of the largest tobacco growing regions in the country.

Many farmers have lost their farms. Some have struggled to start anew with a different crop, buying different tools and equipment, learning a new crop and usually taking a loss for the first few years. There are only so many farmers who can find a new crop without flooding the market and very few have actually succeeded.

Farmers are a vital part of the economy of Haldimand—Norfolk, and of Canada, and when they suffer the people of Haldimand—Norfolk suffer. The people of Canada suffer. The corner stores that used to supply farmers with their groceries suffer. The small businesses where the farmer used to buy his tools suffer. The students who worked in the fields and needed money to continue their education suffer. All Canadians suffer.

After collecting billions of dollars each year from the labours of these hard working farmers and Canadians, the government is now putting them in a situation in which they cannot leave the tobacco industry without losing their farms and retirement funds. Even when this government had in past years allocated money to these programs, the funding was woefully inadequate. For every $300 it collected from tobacco it gave less than $1 back to farmers who had produced it and had lost their livelihood. Now this government contents itself with stalling tactics and the continuation of these nickel and dime programs.

The Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board has worked long and hard to receive just treatment for the tobacco farmers from the federal government. They have asked the government countless times to end the ad hoc, piecemeal approach to tobacco compensation and, yet now, when the entire state of tobacco is uncertain, this government even refuses to give the board any indication what compensation farmers leaving the industry will receive this year.

• (1240)

Imagine the uncertainty and the stress this lack of government compassion is causing the stricken farmers this very minute. These farmers want nothing more than to be treated fairly.

This is the same government whose current Minister of Finance and former Minister of Agriculture said to tobacco farmers in my riding two and a half years ago, just before the election: I quote:

> Ottawa wants to send a strong signal to the industry that we are here to support tobacco producers in their time of need and adjustment.

I ask this government and I ask the minister: What happened to this promise?

The people of Haldimand—Norfolk feel betrayed by this government.

As a last resort, some tobacco farmers have joined together in defiance and disillusionment. Some 950 farmers, 30 share growers and 20 small business owners have joined together to file a law suit against the federal and provincial governments. They call themselves FACT, Fair Compensation for Tobacco. Under the leadership of Fred Homeniuk, they are seeking justice in our courts where they have not received it from our governments.

Mr. Homeniuk says the law suit is, and I quote: "An attempt to regain our dignity".

They want to know whether the governments have a constitutional right to tax a legal product to the extent that its growers are deprived of their right to earn a livelihood and to gain just compensation.

How did our governments respond to their quest? They tried to have FACT's lawsuit thrown out of court before it was even heard. Luckily, the government's attempt has failed and the lawsuit is proceeding.

Farmers are not the only ones fed up with this government's tax grabs. Canadians have responded to the current campaign against unfair tobacco taxes with an enthusiasm that could only be a result of a deep-felt anger and frustration.

The tax protest forms being mailed to the Prime Minister, which I understand are sitting a room in the Langevin Block and not even being read by the Prime Minister, say:

> I am of voting age. I want you to stop unfair taxation of tobacco products in Canada. What are you going to do about it? I expect a reply.

In the first two weeks of the campaign alone, 453,600 protest cards have been processed. Depending on the province a Canadian lives in, 70 to 80 per cent of the cost of a typical $6 package of cigarettes is tax. For a pack-a-day smoker in Ontario, taxes amount to $1,599 a year.

When taxation reaches excessive levels, black market activity flourishes and Canadian cigarettes are no exception.

Recent studies show that last year, an estimated 11 million cartons of stolen cigarettes were fenced in Canada. According to officials, cigarette theft has risen sharply since the latest tax hike which is the subject of the bill being implemented today and talked about today.

A recent article in the Western Report says: "Criminals, always responsive to the demands of the marketplace, are stealing cigarettes at an unprecedented rate". Calgary sees an average of six robberies a day involving cigarettes.

In February, 13 people were caught as they attempted to steal $3.6 million worth of cigarettes hijacked from two CP Rail trains.

In March, two thieves hit a wholesale warehouse, held a clerk at gunpoint and escaped with $25,000 worth of cigarettes. "Cigarettes are the hottest target around right now", says Calgary Police Superintendent Gerry Baxter.

The smuggling of cigarettes across the Canada-U.S. border has risen dramatically since this latest tax increase.

A recent study done by Peat Marwick Thorne finds:

> This additional tax burden effectively increases the demand for the smuggled product to avoid the significant tax burden.

Ray Thibault, an intelligence and interdiction officer with Customs Canada says: There's been a definite increase in seizures in the last three months."

The Peat Marwick Thorne study quotes law enforcement estimates of a 10 per cent to 20 per cent increase in cigarette smuggling in the last few months. The study estimates the loss in tax revenue from increased smuggling caused by this tax increase will cost the federal government $30 million.

The differential between Canadian and U.S. tax rates has become so large that smuggling and cross-border shopping are causing real damage to the Canadian economy. On the British Columbia-Montana divide, each package of Canadian cigarettes has $3.06 more tax in its price than its U.S. counterpart. On the Ontario-Michigan border, the additional tax burden on cigarettes is $2.93 per package. In comparing New Brunswick and its border state, Maine, Canadian cigarettes have $3.59 more tax per package.

Our tax rates on cigarettes are inviting Canadians to head down to the U.S. to buy them. They stand to save $20 to $30 off the price of a carton of cigarettes alone. That would more than cover the gas used to get there for most Canadians.

Besides, while they are down there they can fill up their tank and they can save another bundle. And while they are down there, who knows what else they will buy which they might otherwise have bought in Canada, in fact, within my own riding, which is an hour's drive from the border.

There are winners and losers with any piece of government legislation. I oppose this bill because I have problems in it with who wins and who loses.

The winners with this bill are the federal government's coffers, U.S. cigarette retailers, tobacco smugglers and thieves. The losers are law-abiding Canadian taxpayers who smoke and law-abiding, hard-working Canadian tobacco farmers, manufacturers and workers.

It is because of the serious oversights and inadequacies of this bill that I intend to propose amendments in committee and at third reading stage.

I will seek to amend this bill so that tobacco farmers are no longer made the scapegoats of this government. I will propose that the $1.4 billion in additional revenue per year that this government collects from this latest tax hike be given back to the tobacco producers so that those who wish to leave can do so without losing their farms or without losing their pensions and those who wish to stay can have a sustainable industry in which to produce.

I will propose that this government, in conjunction with this tax hike, commit itself to informing tobacco farmers on a 10-year basis of its plans for tobacco tax increases so that they will no longer be the victims of ad hoc increases and will know what their future holds.

Madam Speaker, I see my time is up and I want to send one final message to this government. Canadians will not stand for these tax increases hedged in health legislation. As a matter of fact, Canadians are fed up with this government and their increased tax bills.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to take a couple of short minutes to respond to the member and address some of the concerns that he has raised.

First of all, I think it is very important to note that concerns about the serious health hazards of smoking and recognition of the significant contribution that taxation can make in addressing the problem were the key factors in the government's decision to increase tobacco taxes in this budget.

It is expected that the consumption of cigarettes and other tobacco products will decline by about 9 per cent in the next fiscal year as a result of the increases in tobacco taxes proposed in this legislation and other government initiatives to reduce tobacco use in Canada.

I think it is important to note that higher cigarette prices are particularly effective in discouraging young Canadians from starting to smoke. A 10 per cent increase in price will reduce consumption by young Canadians as much as 14 per cent.

Will Osler advises me that as a result of the tax increases announced in this budget, it is estimated that 100,000 fewer young Canadians will smoke.

• (1250)

I can appreciate the concerns of the member for Haldimand—Norfolk who just spoke. He represents a tobacco producing area. The government has also addressed that concern. As part of its comprehensive strategy to reduce tobacco consumption in Canada, the government established the Tobacco Assistance Program several years ago to assist tobacco producers to leave the industry and to encourage economic diversification of tobacco regions. As a result of federal and provincial assistance, nearly half of all the tobacco farmers in Canada have left the tobacco growing industry over the past five years.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I am the member for Haldimand—Norfolk, not Northumberland.

I am somewhat surprised, to tell you the truth, at his comments. Had he been able to talk to the two members on his side from tobacco growing areas, the member for Oxford and the member for Elgin, and had they been in the House to tell him, they might have told him that in fact, the money has run out for the specific programs which he just talked about.

The fact of the matter is that there is no money this year to help tobacco farmers exit tobacco. The fact of the matter is that there is no money this year to help the alternative enterprise initiative and to help farmers divert into other initiatives.

I want to say to the hon. member that before he gets up in the House and spiels off the government lines, he might want to talk to the members from Elgin and Oxford when they get back to this Chamber.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I always find myself quite amazed when the Liberal Party can stand up and passionately debate both sides of the issue. But after two or three years in this House, I guess I should no longer be surprised because that is normally the Liberal stand.

An hon. member: They are good at that.

Mr. Karpoff: I would also like to say to the member that he forgot to mention the losers, the 35,000 Canadians who die every year. What about their families, their loved ones, their parents, their children? Those are the losers.

You pretend there is no connection between the increase in the price and the reduction of smoking and yet it has been clearly demonstrated that there has been. The only place I would agree with you is in your discussion about the negligence of the Conservative government concerning adjustment programs as they relate to farmers. They could take that $1.4 million and guarantee that there is no sustainable tobacco industry in Canada. That should be our goal, that there will never be any sustainable tobacco industry in this country.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I take exception to the member for Surrey North for challenging my right to stand up for my constituents in this House. I thank God I have a leader who allows me to stand and represent my constituents.

My constituents are concerned about this. They know that this is nothing more than a tax grab couched in health legislation. When that hon. member allows his leader, and when the Prime Minister allows his members to stand up in this House to speak out on behalf of their constituents, then maybe this House will be a better place for all Canadians.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I should encourage my colleague not to be too surprised. The member for Surrey North often demonstrates that Marxist/Leninism is alive and well in the NDP. In any event, I share the concern that he has expressed.

I want to say first of all, though, that I support the approach to encouraging non-consumption of damaging substances through taxation. I think that has been proven, as has been said, to be a successful strategy.

What concerns me in this legislation is two things, one of which the member called to mind, the historic alliance that existed in Ontario between the temperance movement and the bootleggers, who had a mutual interest in trying to exclude alcohol. The concern we should have is that at a certain level, taxation as a deterrent stands to benefit others than those whose health is being affected by the consumption of tobacco.

The other thing that concerns me—I see it in the budget which I have in front of me—is that when you look through the budget, it is very hard to accept the premise that this is merely a health tax.

The budget highlights the desperate financial position that the Government of Canada is in. It says that one of the fundamental problems is the state of the public finances. It sets out the need to create the Debt Reduction Fund which is going to be in a deficit position itself of $122 billion within five years.

Then it reveals the tobacco tax which will generate over the course of four years, according to the budget, over $4.5 billion, none of which is going to any of the programs either for encouragement of non-consumption or for adjustment for the tobacco farmers.

I would like the member for Haldimand—Norfolk to respond if he would do that. I find it surprising, since he is not the only member in this House from a tobacco producing area, that nobody else, particularly on the other side of the House seems to be raising the concerns of the farmers in this situation.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, it is funny where the morality in this House comes from sometimes.

I want to thank the hon. member for his comments. The Minister of Agriculture is sitting in the House now. I know he is new to his portfolio, so he might take some of my comments back to the people in his department and get them moving on this.

Frankly, if he is going to take the line on that side that he does not want tobacco in this country and he does not want smokers in this country, he might be well to help move some of these farmers out of tobacco. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture has discussed this with his officials.

I just want to say to my hon. friend that he is right. It is nothing more than a tax grab. If this government really wanted to stop smoking in Canada, particularly young people, why is it not outlawed? Why does it not do a number of other things that can stop people from smoking in Canada? This is nothing more than a tax grab. The government knows it.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I too am somewhat amazed at the defence of the tobacco industry. Certainly when we put in the program to help tobacco producers to change professions, that was their opportunity to get out of this business of selling death.

As far as I am concerned, I think the overwhelming evidence is that public costs for tobacco are outrageous. The government can simply look at the health care budget, but there are other budgets that have to be looked at as well. Indeed, when one looks at the public maintenance budgets around this place, when one looks at the floors, when one looks at any kind of public building, there are enormous costs. We see fires. There are many fires created through cigarette smokers and so on. I particularly find the health costs to be odious but those other costs are public costs as well.

If this was a drug that was being considered for introduction today, it would be banned. There is no question about that. There is tremendous public cost and no value at all. It does not help smokers relax. It does not help them to do anything. It is an addiction that even smokers do not want to have.

What I find particularly insidious is this campaign suggesting that smokers are being encouraged to send in protest documents. What tobacco producers and protest companies are doing is putting in another insidious campaign that is associating smoking with rebellion, particularly against government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and comment has now expired.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I just feel that in light of openness, I should inform my colleagues that I as the newly appointed Minister of Agriculture suffer from a lethal addiction. It is called smoking.

• (1300)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and comments has elapsed. I am sure the House would allow the hon. member 30 seconds to comment, should he wish to, and then we will move on. If the House will give its consent?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I want to point out to you that the member for Don Valley, whatever, challenged me on a question and then refused unanimous consent to have me answer her. That speaks well for how things are done in the Conservative Party in this country.

Ms. Greene: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, the member had all kinds of time to answer and there is no answer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Am I to understand that the hon. member is ready to allow the hon. member a few seconds to answer?

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, the point is that her party, her government, if it wanted to ban tobacco in Canada, it could. The point is that if she wants to put up arguments like that, she should be making arguments to the Minister of Agriculture, telling him that what he should be doing is taking the $4 billion a year he gets from taxation and giving it to Canadian tobacco farmers to help them out of the business.

Her point is ludicrous and the fact that she points out that her own two members, the member for Oshawa and the member for Elgin, are not here because they feel that it is in their best interest to stay away, I think is wrong, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish the hon. member had not made the point of noticing the absence of members in the House.

The time for question and comments has now expired. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

BRITISH COLUMBIA GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-25, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations in the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, British Columbia be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, in that the debate on the previous matter has taken a fair amount of time that was not allotted in the House Order, I would assume that all parties agree that the total time allowed for debate will be started as of this time.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I would agree wholeheartedly with my colleague from the New Democratic Party that we will have a full hour's debate, if need be, on the subject matter that the Minister of Labour will be raising.

Mr. Danis: I also agree, Madam Speaker, with the recommendation of my friend from Churchill and the House leader for the Official Opposition.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is what the Chair understood as well following the point of order from the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam earlier.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, nothing would have given me greater pleasure today than to be able to rise at this time and inform hon. members that a negotiated settlement had been reached in the grain handling dispute on Canada's west coast.

Unfortunately, that is not the case. I find that instead I must address the House in the context of introducing legislation to bring about a resumption of grain handling operations in the port of Vancouver.

The introduction of such legislation is necessary in order to ensure that economic hardships placed on Canada's agricultural producers as a result of the work stoppage be removed and the country's reputation as a reliable exporter of grain not be placed in jeopardy.

Most hon. members will be aware that the labour dispute in question involves the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators' Association representing five grain elevator companies in the port of Vancouver and the Grain Workers' Union, Local 333, representing some 650 grain workers.

The previous collective agreement between the two parties expired on December 31, 1989 and the parties met in direct negotiations between February and November 1990 in an effort to arrive at a new contract. Despite these efforts, the two sides were unable to reach agreement and a conciliation officer from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of Labour Canada was appointed on December 4, 1990 to assist the parties in resolving their differences.

Even with the provision of third party assistance the association and the union were unable to find a common ground to settle the dispute.

Following the receipt of the report of the conciliation officer, I notified the parties of my decision not to appoint a conciliation commissioner or establish a conciliation board.

As hon. members are aware, the collective bargaining process provided for under Part I of the Canada Labour Code places the onus on the bargaining parties to make the required compromises to arrive at a mutually acceptable solution to their differences.

In not actioning this particular dispute, I indicated to the two sides that I expected them to make their responsibilities seriously and to make the process work for them as opposed to relying on the government to get them off the hook.

[Translation]

In May 1991, the parties met in direct negotiations but failed to make any progress. On May 8, the Grain Workers' Union prohibited its members from working overtime. During the period from May 30 to June 4, the parties met before a mediator from the private sector, Mr. Vince Ready, who subsequently withdrew from the dispute, indicating that the positions of the two parties on the matter at issue were too far apart for the mediation process to proceed normally.

After the mediator left, work slowdowns occurred at a number of grain elevators, and on June 10, the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators' Association locked out workers at all its facilities.

[English]

Given the serious consequences of such a work stoppage action I instructed two senior officials of the federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to travel to Vancouver and meet with the parties in order to fully assess the situation. Michael McDermott, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, and Warren Edmondson, Director General of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service met with the two sides in Vancouver on June 12 and conveyed to them my strongest possible concerns over their failure to resolve their contract dispute.

The parties were also made aware that the government was not prepared to sit back and watch grain exports from the west coast be paralysed by a lengthy work stoppage.

They were also aware that the government was not prepared to tolerate the economic cost to western Canadian farmers, to suffer the potential loss in grain sales and to allow Canada's international reputation as a reliable supplier to suffer.

Despite these urgings, the parties still were not prepared to make the necessary compromises to bring about a resolution of the differences impeding a settlement of a contract dispute. Following consultations with my officials, I have come to the conclusion that there is virtually no prospect of the two sides resolving this conflict in the foreseeable future.

• (1310)

As I have indicated, this government is not prepared to passively stand on the sidelines and witness the tremendous damage which a stoppage of this magnitude is capable of inflicting on the country's economy.

Therefore, I am confident that hon. members on both sides of the House will understand that, while regrettable, the introduction of the British Columbia Grain Handling Operations Act is an action being taken by this government on behalf of all Canadians.

The proposed legislation before the House makes reference to two grain handling disputes. As I have indicated, the dispute between the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators Association and the Grain Workers Union, Local 333, is currently at the lock-out stage.

Hon. members will know that the other dispute referenced in the bill involves Prince Rupert Grain Limited and the Grain Workers Union, also Local 333, and is currently at the conciliation officer stage. This dispute, however, bears similarities to the terminal elevator operations dispute in that the issues for the most part are analogous. Part II of the legislation, if proclaimed, enforced by Order in Council, would provide for resolution of the dispute through the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator.

Of course, we would only seek proclamation of this part if the parties remain unable to settle their own differences and a work stoppage seriously affecting the movement of export grains were to ensue.

Part I of the proposed legislation provides for the immediate resumption of grain handling operations in the port of Vancouver and provides for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator to deal with all matters remaining in dispute between the parties. The bill extends the term of the collective agreement to include the period beginning January 1, 1990 and extending to December 31, 1991.

Under the terms of the legislation, the mediator-arbitrator is given 90 days, or such longer period as the minister may allow, to endeavour to mediate all of the matters in dispute. In the event that the mediator-arbitrator appointed under the legislation is unable to bring about agreement on any such matter he or she is required to render an arbitral award on the issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House does not preclude agreement by the parties to amend any provision of the agreement, excepting the one setting the term of the agreement. The bill also contains provisions obliging both parties to comply with the legislation.

[English]

The British Columbia Grain Handling Operations Act, while bringing about an end to the current work stoppage, does provide the parties with an alternative to an imposed settlement. By providing for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator the legislation presents the two sides of the grain handling dispute with a further opportunity to avail themselves of neutral third party assistance in arriving at an acceptable solution to their differences.

I urge the negotiators for the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators Association and the Grain Workers Union to seize this occasion and make every effort to reach an accommodation on the outstanding issues in dispute.

For the information of hon. members the main issues in dispute during this round of negotiations involve wage parity with the west coast longshoremen, continuous operations and employer contributions to the pension plan. These issues are not new to the bargaining relationship between these parties.

While there has been no work stoppage at the Vancouver terminal elevators since 1974, labour peace has often been maintained by setting critical issues aside for further study. Such has been the case with the overtime hours of work issue that underlies the current employer demand for continuous operations. This issue has actually been discussed in one form or another since 1971. In both the 1982 and 1984 bargaining rounds conciliation commissioners recommended further examination and established procedures accordingly. However, the procedures were not followed up in any meaningful fashion and the issue has been left unresolved.

Hon. members may question why the proposed legislation does not contain a provision for a specific study of the continuous operations question, the key issue in the current dispute.

All of the outstanding issues in dispute are essentially of an economic nature and as such they cannot be separated from one another in the legislation. However, should the need for an in depth review of this issue become apparent during the course of the mediation arbitration proceedings, and if the mediator arbitrator asks, I will certainly be happy to give whatever assistance Labour Canada can offer.

As I indicated in my earlier remarks, it is not a pleasant task for me as Minister of Labour to introduce such legislation. However, the parties in this dispute have had ample opportunity, including extensive third party assistance, to resolve the issues in dispute and have failed to do so. They have imposed the consequences of their dispute on the western grain producers, while continuing to reject every opportunity for a settlement through accepted dispute resolution mechanisms.

This government has an obligation to act to protect not only the economic interests of the agricultural sector of this country, but also Canada's reputation as a reliable grain exporter. This legislation serves as evidence of the government's acceptance of that responsibility.

In closing, I would like to thank the members of the government's agricultural caucus for their support of this action today and particularly the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, there is no joy in the immediate task before us. There is no glory to be sought here. There is no joy for me in this bill and there is no joy for my party in this bill. There is no joy because we have far too much respect for collective bargaining, too much respect for workers and their rights and too much respect for grain farmers. There is no joy in stepping in where collective bargaining has failed. There is no joy in forced solutions.

We are called upon to carry out our duty and carry it out we will. Our duty, as we see it, is to restore grain handling services at the port of Vancouver. Our duty, as we see it, is to support the bill before us and secure the re-opening of grain handling facilities at Vancouver.

Allow me to offer a personal perspective. I have been a member of a union. I have had the honour of being a president of a union. I have a great respect for workers and their rights and I have great reluctance to interfere in the exercise of those rights. They have fought long and hard for what they have got and no one on this side of the House wants to see a diminution of those rights.

I also have a profound respect for farmers, my father was one. My family farmed. I spent my youth on a farm. I know, as we all do on this side of the House, the current precarious situation of farmers. We know how reliant they are on international markets. We know how important it is for them to get their grain through the port of Vancouver. Farmers are near the close of their current crop year. They are busy moving out the grain in preparation for yet another harvest.

I am torn, as I am sure we all are, but we cannot shirk our responsibilities. The Vancouver port must be re-opened. I shant chronicle all the events leading up to the current stalemate. Suffice it to say that the grain handlers have worked without contract for about 18 months. Negotiations, along with conciliation, have gone on for months, yet the two sides are no closer on the thorny issues of wages and converting the grain handling facilities into a full blown, seven day operation. There is a deadlock. There is a stalemate. We are persuaded that the port must re-open now so that the grain can get moving again.

Our hope is that the government will name the mediator arbitrator, as provided for in this bill, and that the government will appoint that person very quickly so that he or she can begin the difficult job of finding a solution to this very difficult problem. The existing lock-out began last Monday and the effects of that lock-out have been dramatic. I would like to put it into perspective.

• (1320)

At the present time there are 21 vessels waiting to be loaded in the port of Vancouver, 35 are to arrive by June 30. Exports through the port of Vancouver for the month of April totalled 1.7 million metric tonnes, in May it was 1.6 million metric tonnes. The forecast for the month of June is 1.6 million metric tonnes, for July a little over 2 million metric tonnes, and in August 1.6 million metric tonnes.

There was a slowdown in work at the port before the lock-out occurred. The actual number of cars unloaded in the week ending May 11 was 2,908. The target for that period was actually 3,550. In the week ending May 18 the actual unloading of cars was 3,191 while the target was 3,550. That story can be told all the way through the month of May and into the month of June.

Of course now with the lock-out there is nothing, nothing going through the port. That means that the port is losing about 54,000 metric tonnes a day—54,000 metric tonnes. To put it in dollar terms, that is about $7 million a day lost by the agricultural economy in western Canada. That is an enormous economic hardship.

We all know the significance of agriculture in the Canadian economy, particularly in western Canada. Farm cash receipts for 1991 were set at $21.7 billion. Farm exports have made up between 40 and 50 per cent of cash farm receipts and 8 per cent of Canada's total exports in 1990.

Approximately 70 to 80 per cent of wheat sales, 65 per cent of canola and 40 per cent of barley comprise a major part of total farm exports. At last count there were 459,000 jobs in the primary farm sector. In the food processing sector, the second largest in the country, there were at last count 225,000 jobs, worth about $43 billion to the economy. Of the 250,000 farms in Canada, cash crop farmers make up 52 per cent.

We all know the precarious situation of the farm economy. The realized net farm income in 1991 is forecast to drop by 22.5 per cent, compared to 1990. Saskatchewan will drop 145 per cent, Alberta 43 per cent, and Manitoba 35 per cent. This reduction in total net farm income is mainly the result of low international grain prices and a dramatic reduction in the federal support programs over the last two years.

A lot of Canadians do not realize that, despite the fact that the average income of farm families is a little over $37,000, 55 per cent of that income actually is derived from income made off the farm.

One more indicator which demonstrates the difficult times down on the farm these days is the number of bankruptcies. In Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta from January 1, 1990 to March 31, 1990 there were 113 bankruptcies. In the same period for 1991 that figure has soared to 140.

When all is said and done, we believe that the case for immediate resumption of grain shipments through the port of Vancouver is compelling. We believe that this bill is very, very necessary. I want to touch on a couple of other things. The bill includes a provision to include the terminal at Prince Rupert. As you know, there are labour difficulties there as well. It is possible the same thing may happen in Prince Rupert. The government is proposing that it applies this law to the terminal at Prince Rupert. We have some grave problems with that and we will pursue that in just a few moments when the bill moves on to report stage.

Another thing, this bill in effect asks parliamentarians to be the deciders. That causes concern for us because we really wonder if parliamentarians are the best deciders in a case like this. I would like to ask the government, particularly the hon. Minister of Labour to look at this situation, at possible legislation that will rid parliamentarians of this particular kind of responsibility. At least there should be some kind of probe or investigation to see if there is a better model or system to obviate the need for parliamentarians to be put into this kind of role.

In conclusion, I want to say that the grain must get moving to the port of Vancouver for the sake of farmers, the farm economy, and the whole Canadian economy. The port of Vancouver must be reopened. We support the bill and urge its immediate passage.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the grain workers' union and the B.C. terminal elevator operators are faced with legislation after having been at the bargaining table for 18 months. I think it is important that in beginning this discussion we are very clear that the union did not strike, the employers did.

The union is aware of the needs of the farmers in this country and aware of the needs or the wants of the employer. But in this dispute there appear to be two solitudes. The farmers in Saskatchewan who are barely surviving for earning $2.50 a bushel for their wheat, which is likely to go down to $1.75 a bushel in the next couple of days, and who, in 1947, were earning $2 a bushel for their wheat.

The grain workers in 1947 worked 12–hour days and a 48–hour week. The employers at the elevators in Vancouver are demanding that the union return to the 12–hour day, 48–hour week.

Mr. Speaker, it might be of interest to you, the hon. minister, and other hon. members in this House to know that in 1948, the newly founded Grain Workers' Union struck for six months, without strike pay, to win the 8–hour day, the 40–hour week.

Six months is a long time for a family to survive without income, no income for six months to earn the 8–hour day, 40–hour week. Today the union is asked to turn its back on something for which tremendous sacrifices were made. Moms could not put food on the table. Children were going to school hungry. People were being evicted because they could not pay their rent. They were on strike without strike pay.

Some might ask why the farmers should care about that. It happened in 1947. In fact, the farmers today are fighting a terrible struggle just to survive on their farms. On the other hand the other solitude might ask why the grain workers should care about the farmers who are heavily subsidized anyway.

I believe that the grain workers and the farmers do both care about each other. Many grain workers come from farming backgrounds, and from the prairies.

• (1330)

Many, many, of the farmers whom we are talking about have relatives who are working at the terminals. I believe that both the workers and the farmers are the victims. They are victims of this government's inadequate grain marketing policies.

The price is down largely because of the dispute between the European Economic Community and the U.S. In particular, the Americans have been directly subsidizing grain sales into traditional Canadian markets. To retain markets, the Canadian Wheat Board has had to slash prices. The shipping delay caused by this dispute will cost farmers $9 million a week.

We need a government which will concern itself with promoting the viability of farm families and rural communities at the same time as it concerns itself with promoting good industrial relations in this country.

We also need an industrial relations climate which will ensure that for the grain workers, and other workers in federal jurisdiction, there is a reason to bargain. We have the proof of that need in this bill. If the union strikes, it will be legislated back to work. If the employer strikes, it will be legislated back to work. No one needs to bargain.

I think it is time that this Parliament says: "Parliament should not be the labour court or tribunal of Canada". It is time we look at the process and say that labour legislation must provide a forum for free, good faith collective bargaining in the federal jurisdiction.

The minister said that 90 per cent of negotiations are settled through the collective bargaining process in the federal jurisdiction. I think both sides can be justly proud of that. Among the 10 per cent that do not settle, that come to this forum, there are those who arrive here regularly before this House for legislated solutions because the system fails them.

I am not going to attack the employers in the grain industry here, because I think they, too, are caught with bad grain policies. But I am going to say to them that their need to provide a 12-hour day, 48-hour work week, to provide security for continuous operation, is an understandable one. However, I am also wondering why we are talking 12 hours a day, 48 hours a week.

I am pleased that the minister has assured us that he will not accept an arbitrated award because of the Canada Labour Code restrictions, and that both parties will have to negotiate that.

Recently a number of unions have negotiated 12-hour days and, because they freely negotiated it, that is fine if it is right for them. But, in fact, it is only now that the long-term effects of 12-hour days are being rediscovered. Fatigue, illness, stress, sleep disorders, digestive problems and workplace accidents. It is no accident that the mood in the workplace over the last 40 years has been to shorter, not longer hours. Why was it so important for us to hear the minister say that he is in favour, if proposed by the arbitrator, of an industrial inquiry commission into health and safety for the family life of this worker. It was important because we cannot afford unsafe work places, sick workers. We cannot afford that in this industrial society.

I know, just as the minister and the hon. member from the Liberal Party have said, that there is a tremendous cost to this dispute. But I also know that they used to ship through the port of Vancouver, 5 million tonnes a year, with thousands of workers. Today, they ship 17 million with 750 people. In fact, the union believes that it is possible to ship 20 million tonnes with the introduction of proper technological change.

What we need is good will. What we need is some understanding that there is a long-term relationship between the settlements of the teamsters and the settlements of the grain workers. In fact, the grain workers had a three-year agreement with zero per cent in 1987, 2.1 per cent in 1988, and 2.8 per cent in 1989. The longshoremen at the same time got 7, 7, and 7. In this round of negotiations the employer has offered 4 per cent, when the longshoremen are already about 18 per cent ahead.

The same is true in Prince Rupert. The negotiations are not going well in Prince Rupert. For the government to undertake a pre-emptive strike before a dispute has taken place and to put legislation in place is merely the thin edge of the wedge. Maybe the minister is working toward having legislation in place: we can pass it all and the minute there is a dispute we can just impose it, we can proclaim it. That does not provide for free collective bargaining. We oppose the pre-emptive strike at Prince Rupert, Part II of the legislation.

In closing, I would like to say clearly that we are as opposed to legislating employers back to work as we are to legislating workers back to work. We are opposed to pre-emptive legislation, as shown in Part II of this legislation. We expect the minister to encourage the independent inquiry to look into the health and safety of family life of the worker it is facing in this legislation.

All the statistics in the world, all the legislation in the world, will not make a work place flourish. Only good will at both sides of the bargaining table will make that happen.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-25, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations in the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

On Clause 3—Definitions

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, I have just a brief question for the minister on the definition of mediator–arbitrator. Would the minister just briefly and succinctly indicate what will be the intentions of the mediator–arbitrator in the days following the passage of this particular bill.

Mr. Danis: I would hope, sir, that the person who would be appointed would do everything in his or her power to get the parties to agree to a mediated settlement. I would think that would be the first phase of the operation. Only after that person found that there was no possibility of an agreed upon settlement would we possibly go into the arbitration phase.

Mr. Dingwall: I certainly do not wish to jeopardize anything that the minister might do in terms of the mediator–arbitrator. However, I am assuming that the mediator–arbitrator will move forward with some dispatch in terms of these issues.

• (1340)

I hope it is not going to be a long period of time one is going to attempt at mediation when, at the end of the day, it may not be there. Perhaps the minister will elaborate on that.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

An hon. member: The minister has not answered.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, the person whom we are referring to here is one person, the arbitrator.

In terms of time, I agree with my hon. friend, the House leader. I would hope that the person in question would act with dispatch with regard to the first phase. There is a delay of 90 days for this whole operation. It is possible for the person to ask the minister for more time. I am sure that when the person is appointed, he or she would be aware that there is a 90–day delay.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—Resumption of grain handling operations

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. minister if, under clause 4, he would clarify just why this reference is to "employee". Could he clarify for us why it is worded in this way? I think he knows what I am concerned about.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, I understand that this is the clause that is put generally into this type of legislation because of the fact that it is an even–handed clause that applies to both parties equally whether it would have been a strike or whether it is a lockout like it is now.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On Clause 5—Obligations of employers

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, with regard to Clause 5(1):

> 5.(1) No employer or officer or representative of an employer shall

What are the sanctions if that is not complied with?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, the sanctions are listed in the enforcement section 11. This would constitute fines of not more than $50,000 for someone who contravenes any provision of this act and who is found guilty:

> where the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of an employer or the union when the offence was committed; or
> (b) of not more than $1,000 in any other case.

Plus there is the Enforcement section, section 11(2).

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On Clause 8—Appointment of mediator–arbitrator

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, under clause 8(4):

> (4) Any amendment agreed to by the union and the employers' association pursuant to mediation under this section and any decision of the mediator–arbitrator in respect of a matter arbitrated by the mediator–arbitrator may be made applicable for part only of the term of the collective agreement.

Would the minister please clarify what that means? I think he understands what I mean there. It was my understanding that there would be retroactivity back to, certainly in our discussions, the expiry of the last collective agreement.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, the way the section is written does not prevent whatsoever the arbitrator going about it through the retroactive route, going back to when the collective agreement started or also during the course of the agreement. This would give more flexibility to the arbitrator but it does not bar what my hon. friend is suggesting.

Ms. Langan: I am quite concerned about this in terms of the retroactivity. The workers are being put under arbitration with a clear time line at both ends, or, at least, yesterday there was a clear time line at both ends. Today we have a clear time line saying that only some of it may be retroactive. If it was not spelled out I would not be concerned. Maybe the minister can give us some specifics about how this will work.

Mr. Danis: This clause is a permissive clause only put in there for greater certainty. What I would suggest to my hon. friend would be if we could stand 8(4) with unanimous agreement, I would like to proceed with the rest. We will get back to 8(4) later on.

Mr. Murphy: We would agree to standing this clause. It is our understanding that this clause was not there when there was a discussion over the legislation earlier. It creates one of the problems that we have when legislation is introduced into the House and the minister wants it passed in all stages at the same time. We would like to know why it was put in and why there was no warning it was coming.

Mr. Danis: I ask my colleagues to stand the clause and we will get back to it after we do the others.

The Deputy Chairman: Stand, Clause 8.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 11 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Langan: In view of the fact that three of us were in the House speaking on the legislation, it would be nice if we at least had the time to see which clause we are talking about. We have not even had an opportunity to read this bill.

I know the minister is in a great hurry to get this through, but it would be, I think, only considerate and courteous to allow us to at least know what each clause is before you pass on. I cannot even look at it and tell what it is before you say "carried". I would ask, with great respect, that we could slow this process down a little bit. I do not think we are in that big a hurry.

Mr. Dingwall: While my colleague is making reference to the particular section that is now before us, perhaps I might come back to the clause which was standing and I would make this observation.

In terms of my interpretation of that particular clause, which I know is standing at the present moment, each of section 4 may be made applicable for part only of the term of the collective agreement. It means that any changes thereto would be only in effect for the term of the collective agreement which is from point A to point B, whatever that might be, which means it can be retroactive.

Mr. Danis: I also understand we stood the clause, but when I use the word "retroactive" I meant whatever the arbitrator would decide from the time of the beginning of the collective agreement until the end. We agree on that point.

The Deputy Chairman: Now we will get back to the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam on Clause 11.

On Clause 11—Offence by individuals

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, on clause 11, under the enforcement I also note there has been a reduction in the penalty and I am not sure whether to be grateful or appalled at that.

What I wanted to say is that I find it very interesting that a corporation in this country can dump into lakes, rivers, et cetera, and get a $20,000 fine. A worker can refuse an order, or in this case an employer, and get a $100,000 fine. It seems to me that our priorities might be just a tiny bit interesting. I know that this dispute is costing a great deal, but I wonder if the minister could speak to that fact, that we would penalize a worker maybe five or six times more than we penalize a major corporate polluter.

• (1350)

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not want to get into the environment debate. I can only tell my hon. friend that the numbers that she is looking at right now are maximum penalties. It would be wrong to say that when we look at an amount of $50,000 or $100,000, these are strictly maximum, that a worker would be fined $50,000 or $100,000 right off the bat. Maximums in this country, generally, as far as other laws are concerned, or criminal law, rarely occur.

The Deputy Chairman: Could the Chair carry on with clause 12? The hon. member for Mission–Coquitlam.

Ms. Langan: We are just going too fast, Mr. Chairman, we cannot keep up with names here.

I can appreciate the minister does not want to get into the environmental debate. I also appreciate that these are maximums. But I guess the difficulty I have with these kinds of fines and penalties is the difficulty of the whole attitude of this kind of legislation, and that is that the worker, or the employer in this case, are somehow the villains and need to be beaten up to make them comply. I find this particular situation goes a little bit beyond what is necessary to enforce the law.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. Minister of Labour, any further comments?

Mr. Danis: Just to state, Mr. Chairman, that in the law, for the workers themselves, the maximum is $1,000. It is the corporate entities that have the maximum big fines.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 12 agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On Clause 14—Definitions

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, my colleague and I—

Mr. Cooper: Quite concerned here.

Mr. Dingwall: —are quite concerned. We thought we would join together in voicing our opposition to this particular section, in this part, which includes clauses 14 through to the end of the bill, and the schedule thereto, clause 25.

I understand the minister's reasoning for wanting to pursue Part II, with the Prince Rupert grain handling operations, but in view of the fact that we respect the collective bargaining process, we thought that the process should run its course before any pre-emptive strike, and I use that term quite liberally, any strike that occurs either way, on the management side, or indeed on the labour side, that the minister ought not to proceed with this particular part. However, we will listen to the responses that the minister gives in terms of the rationale for the Prince Rupert grain handling operations, but I wish to say to him, as I have said privately to the minister, we do not agree with the Prince Rupert grain handling operations provisions under Part II at this time.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to also raise some concerns about clause 14 and the whole section, Part II, on Prince Rupert. It absolutely goes beyond the pale to suggest that workers who are not yet at a dispute are in fact having this legislation held over their head. I am pleased, and I am sure the minister will reiterate it here in this forum, that the minister has no intention of proclaiming this legislation prior to consultation with the opposition parties and prior to a dispute taking place in Prince Rupert.

To say, well, we have precedent, this has happened before, does not make it right.

Again, I get back to the argument and the concern that in fact the whole process of legislating collective bargaining instead of having collective bargaining take place in a free forum where neither party can rely on this government to intervene or any other government to intervene to settle its disputes for them is not enhanced by something like Part II. I wonder if the minister might like to comment.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would have preferred not to have a Part II to this bill. As a matter of fact, I would have preferred not to have a Part I either, but I think the government has no choice in the matter.

I can only refer to what I said in my speech a few minutes ago, that it is not the intention of the government to proclaim Part II. I told the House that the problems with respect to Part II in Prince Rupert were very similar to the ones in Vancouver. We think we are doing the correct and the right thing, and again, I assure my hon. friend from Mission—Coquitlam and the House leader and the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James, who has spoken on behalf of the Official Opposition that if there ever comes a time of a work stoppage where the government is considering the proclamation of Part 2, we would certainly not do so prior to consulting both opposition parties.

Clause 15 agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On Clause 17—Extension of collective agreement

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, on clause 17. Here we are with the term of the collective agreement extended to include the period beginning on January 1, 1990, and ending on December 31, 1992. Under the Prince Rupert section, does this then mean that the collective agreement is in place and there is no need to negotiate at this time? Usually a negotiation does not start a year and a half prior to the conclusion of an agreement. I wonder if the minister could explain why this particular section is in this Part II.

Mr. Danis: The collective agreement in Prince Rupert expired on December 31, 1989. It is exactly the same as the Vancouver situation.

Ms. Langan: I understand the collective agreement has expired in Prince Rupert, but in fact, they are still at the bargaining table. It is not like Vancouver where there has been a stoppage by the employer. So we still have these people at the bargaining table and now they have, in essence, a collective agreement imposed upon them until 1992 unless the mediator arbitrates.

What I am saying is at this point Part II interferes or imposes itself unless the collective bargaining fails. So what we have said is, here is a blueprint, you folks in Prince Rupert, here is a blueprint. You can just sit back now and it will all be taken care of for you.

Mr. Danis: The case in Prince Rupert is not as if they had not started to bargain. I understand that they are at a similar impasse as the people in Vancouver. That is what the difficulty is in Prince Rupert.

Mr. Dingwall: On that point, the Minister of Labour is correct. There are difficulties there. But the collective bargaining process has not come to a complete halt at this point in time. Therefore, it is somewhat pre-emptive, and we can couch our language in different terms, but in point of fact, it is pre-emptive and the collective bargaining process has not come to its complete end.

Mr. Danis: I am not sure I will be able to convince my friends on the other side on Part II, but when, my hon. friend, it is pre-emptive, I remind him that this will not be proclaimed if there is a work stoppage.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Clause 18 agreed to.

On Clause 19—Appointment of mediator-arbitrator

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I have a number of things under this section.

• (1400)

I would like to ask the minister if the mediator-arbitrator requests the commission, which we had talked about—and he has already said in the House that he would agree to the establishment of an inquiry commission looking at the hours of work, the health and the family life of these workers—will the minister give us some indication of how he would encourage it to take place? Would it be independent? Who would be on it? I am not asking him to prejudice but to at least give us some indication that if this were to take place it would be independent and the arbitrator would not be doing this inquiry.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for that question.

The question of an industrial inquiry commission was discussed by Mr. McDermott, who is with me now, with the parties earlier in the week. I thought at the time that if there was any way to settle this dispute this might have been it.

Mr. McDermott suggested the industrial inquiry commission to both parties. It was well received by the unions but it was not well received by management.

I still favour that course and I can assure my hon. friend that if the arbitrator asks or requests me, as Minister of Labour, to proceed by way of the Labour Code and appoint an industrial inquiry commission, I will do so.

I assure my hon. friend that the members appointed at that time would of course be independent.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the hon. member for his response.

One of the only advantages to having the port of Prince Rupert included in this legislation is that we get a second kick at every clause as we go through clause by clause.

This is the equivalent of 8(4). Are we revisiting that now or can I revisit it at this time, Mr. Chairman? I have a concern that we are going to run out of time to deal with 8(4).

The Deputy Chairman: I would suggest that you get with it right now. There are only three minutes left before I have to put the questions. Use your own discretion.

Ms. Langan: I will direct a question to the minister because we did get an undertaking that this would be revisited. This clause is very restrictive. It could in fact be used to limit retroactivity on wages and that is kind of a neat way to tidy up that whole area.

I would like the minister's assurance. It does not need to be there, it is redundant. The discretion for retroactivity already exists without this clause. I would hope the minister would consider actually removing this clause.

Mr. Danis: In the spirit of co-operation with the members on the opposite side I have no objections in withdrawing 8(4). If I could get unanimous consent I will move:

That Bill C-25 be amended by deleting clauses 8(4) and 19(4).

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 19, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 2.05 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of all the stages of the bill now before the House.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Danis moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read the third time and passed; and on the amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p.1498).

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. With regard to Bill C-11 there had been a motion, which was passed by this House, which said in effect that if the debate were to elapse it would continue thereafter on Friday afternoon with one speaker from each respective party.

I submit that motion is not in order and has no effect on our proceedings here today in terms of precluding members from speaking to the bill. The reason is that there are two parts to that particular motion. I am glad the parliamentary secretary has returned, because we have had some discussions about this particular bill. The most important thing is that the first part of the motion was not arrived at. The debate did not elapse. In point of fact, the debate continued until ten o'clock. As has been indicated, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands had the floor, is here and is prepared to speak in the time he has remaining.

Mr. Speaker might be aware from information from the table that we have exhausted a number of speakers and we are on 10 minute speeches. The debate did not elapse.

I suggest that the second part of the motion cannot apply, in view of the fact that we have not achieved its first part, namely the debate being elapsed.

The parliamentary secretary will rise and say that the motion itself has contained two separate motions. It is not two separate motions because it was not put to the House as two separate motions. It was not unanimously agreed to as two separate motions. It was agreed to only as one particular motion.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker, I know you have a very important role to play as the arbitrator of our deliberations. You are quite well aware of Beauchesne's in terms of trying to protect the minority and also in enhancing every opportunity for members to participate in debate which they believe to be germane.

I wish to inform the House and the Chair that my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, my colleague from South West Nova, my colleague from Halifax, my colleague from Cape Breton Highland—Canso and others are here this afternoon on Friday to participate in a very, very important debate with regard to Bill C-11, respecting the At and East.

I would hope that you would give due consideration not only to those members here who wish to speak, but also to the procedural case that I have made, that this motion is not applicable in view of the fact that its most essential element was not complied with, namely that the debate on Tuesday evening did elapse prior to the adjournment hour normally set at ten o'clock, and my colleague for Kingston and the Islands still has the floor.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Table for the exact page that motion is on?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Tuesday, June 11.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do want to make a couple of comments on this motion if I can find it. The first one I want to make is that there had been discussions among all three parties.

We had come to an agreement that the debate would continue June 11 and at the end of that debate, whether it was early or late, we would adjourn the debate. We would then pick it up today with one speaker from each party and a limit of 10 minutes.

The first argument I want to make is that the House was working under an agreement reached by representatives of the three parties.

The second argument I want to make is that this is designed to be two motions. If you look very carefully at it, and I am going by memory because I do not have the motion in front of me, you will find that those two paragraphs are separated by a semicolon and the word "and" appears; in other words, two distinct clauses.

My argument is that the design of the motion set up to allow the House on Tuesday to adjourn the debate, should it come before ten o'clock, without forcing the debate to continue, was done to protect members and to protect members' opportunity to speak this afternoon.

For my friend from the Liberal Party to turn around now and try to change that agreement and to argue that because one part of the motion did not finish exactly the way it was anticipated and therefore the second part is inoperative, is very clearly out of order. If you read the particular wording of that motion, it says "when no member rises to speak on debate on Tuesday, June 11, 1991".

What is very important about that particular wording is that perhaps the Speaker should not have seen the clock at ten o'clock and we should have continued to sit and to follow that part through to make it operative and then end up with the situation which is what we had previously agreed to.

I argue that we are dealing with two separate motions, that there was an agreement between the three parties, and that I think the House ought to honour that agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. House leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member deserves his title, as the hon. member for Peace River and as the hon. member who is representing the government House leader. I do not wish to unduly reflect on what was said among House leaders and representatives of the respective parties pertaining to this particular bill. I cannot recall whether the hon. member was in the room or whether he was absent during those deliberations.

Let us assume that he was in the room. The hon. member knows that with regard to the motion, the one which was subsequently introduced I believe on June 10 or thereabouts, it was supposed to be introduced after the debate had elapsed. The hon. member introduced the motion prior to the debate having elapsed, and I think if one were to check Hansard, one would find that I stood on a point of order and made that particular point in the presence of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. That is point number one.

Point number two is that if the hon. member is now saying that we can place five different motions in five different paragraphs on one piece of paper, and that all it takes is for us to agree that all of those motions will pass without being read individually, without the Chair seeking unanimous consent individually for each of them, I think he is breaking a practice of parliamentary procedure.

The hon. member put forward a motion. The first part of the motion said that the debate must lapse. It did not do that. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands had the floor.

There was no agreement as suggested by the parliamentary secretary. Only in agreement if the debate had elapsed would the motion then be triggered. If the hon. member was not certain of that, he should have sought unanimous consent for another motion.

My colleagues from Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso, Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member from Halifax, in the time remaining, I believe ought to be given the opportunity to participate, as I am sure my colleagues in the New Democratic Party would want, in a debate which is very, very important for those of us in Atlantic Canada.

May I further add the unnecessary unfairness and bullish tactics of the government opposite, particularly when you view this subsidy at $32 million and subsidies that we give to the western farmers of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I want to thank both hon. members but before I make a ruling I think I will let debate continue, then I will rule on it. If I may have a few minutes to rule on this, please, and I will let the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands have the floor.

Point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): We should be clear here as hon. members who despite the fact that the opposition House leader may have felt he found a loophole in an agreement made in good faith on Tuesday, I would simply refer to the dialogue that continued after that motion in which the House leader of the opposition agreed here to the intent:

> Once again to demonstrate our co-operation to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, we would concur with the intent of this particular motion.

The intent of the motion, as clearly agreed to by all members in the House, was that we would end the debate and come back today and have three speakers. That was the intent. If there is a minor technical problem with the wording the fact is that we all agreed on the intent, and it would only be going against their word to go against that now.

• (1420)

Mr. Milliken: A point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, if we continue points of order, the hon. member could get his 10 minutes in. I hope it will give me an opportunity to review before I make a decision on this. Is that sufficient?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will follow your directions and give the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands an opportunity to complete his speech. However, I hope that before you make your ruling that you would give us additional time on this side to make our points of order with regard to a particular provision.

The hon. member who has just spoken—and I will leave it to your interpretation—has impugned the motives of myself with regard to the remarks I had made, and made reference to discussions at a House leader's meeting, at which the hon. member was not in attendance, when there was no consummation of any agreement whatsoever, other than the fact that once the debate elapsed the motion would trigger. That was the intent.

I would like to have an opportunity, perhaps later in the day, to provide additional information and points on this point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If they are going to be brief, I will listen to the arguments right now before I make my decision.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I took the motion to mean that anyone who wanted to speak would have a chance to speak. I am sure that the others who were here when last this debate was going on all thought we would have an opportunity. The debate did not lapse that night. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands was here debating and the time ran out. It was not that the debate lapsed.

I would hope that you will take into consideration that there are other people here who wish to speak on this important piece of information, and on how it affects the east in particular.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to turn your attention to the words of the motion. The opening words are: "When no member rises to speak in debate on Tuesday, June 11, 1991". That is what it says. Those are the words. Members rose to debate until 10 o'clock. I was on my feet and had the floor at 10 o'clock on Tuesday, June 11. It follows as night the day, that if members were rising to speak at 10 the motion is inoperative. It is a dead letter, it is null and void. I think it is perfectly clear and I am not going to get into any kind of partisan argument about what the intent of the motion was. The words are there. Your Honour is not privy to any discussions that may take place back and forth between members in this House. The words are brought forward. The words are agreed upon. The words are there and the words are very clear. Members rose to speak until 10 o'clock. The motion is therefore, inoperative, null and void. I ask you to so rule.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All right, I am prepared to rule. On Tuesday, June 11, 1991, a motion was agreed to by unanimous consent which stated that when no member rises to speak in debate on Tuesday June 11, on the motion for third reading of Bill C-11, the Speaker shall adjourn the debate and certain other events would then ensue on both Friday, June 14 and Tuesday, June 18.

Members will recall that the expectation on Tuesday last was that debate on C-11 would collapse some time before the adjournment hour of 10 p.m., and the provisions of this special order would then take effect. However, the House reached 10 p.m. Tuesday last and debate on C-11 was still in progress. The House will recall that at 10 p.m. the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands still had the floor and when I interrupted him in order to adjourn the House, pursuant to standing orders, I asked whether or not he had concluded his remarks. He replied he had not.

No point of order was raised at that time to suggest that the special order should still apply. The question I am now being asked to decide is: If the first part of the special order did not take place Tuesday last, does the rest of the order still have effect.

My opinion is that it does not. The order is one sentence. It begins by saying: "When something occurs, then two subsequent events shall follow". It is my view that if the first event did not occur the subsequent events logically cannot follow pursuant to this order, and another order shall be required. Therefore the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to continue my remarks from the other night that were interrupted by the adjournment of the House. I had the pleasure at that time of the presence of the Minister of Supply and Services, who was heckling me in a most entertaining way, suggesting somehow that I should be discussing the merits of this legislation instead of the procedural aspects of it, which have caused grave concern on this side of the House.

As hon. members will recall, this is one of the bills that was subject to the notorious reinstatement motion that this government brought forward.

Ms. Clancy: Shame.

Mr. Milliken: It is a shame, as the hon. member for Halifax says.

Mr. Mifflin: It's a disgrace.

Mr. Milliken: A disgrace, as the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception says, because the government brought forward this motion to reinstate certain bills after prorogation, to reinstate those bills on our Order Paper at the stage they were at at the time of prorogation of the House on May 12 of this year.

This particular bill was reinstated at third reading stage, in other words as though it had been reported to the House and all amendments and debates at report stage were concluded. Of course that was not the expectation of members on this side of the House.

We wanted to discuss this bill from its inception at first reading again because it is a particularly pernicious bill. It deprives Atlantic Canadians of their livelihood. That is what it comes down to.

Ms. Clancy: Indeed.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Halifax agrees, and I know they have had particular difficulties in Halifax of late which would be ameliorated considerably if the provisions in existing legislation were applied and the subsidies that were available and that still are available were made available to Canadians.

This tight-fisted bunch on the other side have it in their power to dole out money to assist in rail transportation, transportation generally, of grains from western Canada to eastern Canada.

Indeed the provision is in the law today that those funds are available to be spent for this purpose. However, for over two and a half years that tight-fisted Minister of Finance and his cronies, the tight-fisted Minister of Transport and his cronies, the minister for Atlantic Canada who is part and parcel of this whole group—the Minister of Public Works now has that responsibility—and the minister of fisheries—all who supposedly represent the interests of Atlantic Canadians in the cabinet and are supposed to be doing something for this country from the geographical perspective, if nothing else—have been sleeping on their hands doing absolutely nothing to represent their constituents either in the cabinet or in this House.

The member for Cumberland-Colchester is a prime example of someone who has dithered. On Tuesday night when we debated this bill he sat here and said nothing. By his silence he consents to this pillaging and rape of the people in Atlantic Canada who are being deprived of their livelihood by this government's tight-fisted greed. What it has done to his own livestock farmers, he should be ashamed of himself. I see him smiling and smirking on the other side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I cannot really hear the hon. member's speech. I know it is a great speech, but there is so much going on here in this Chamber on a Friday afternoon I just cannot believe this.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am having trouble hearing myself think, but I do not mind saying to Your Honour that part of the problem seems to be that this is a very emotional issue. Certainly this bill has caused a great deal of heartache across the country, but particularly in Atlantic Canada. I see that a lot of the members from Atlantic Canada are here and naturally they feel very strongly about it, at least on this side of the House. The surprise to us is that no one on the other side is rising to defend the government's dreadful policies.

Ms. Clancy: It's a scandal.

Mr. Milliken: As the hon. member for Halifax says, it is a scandal, and it is a scandal. I think part of the reason they are not rising to defend it is because they do not want to defend the indefensible. This bill makes legal what the government has been doing for two and a half years. In other words it is an ex post facto legalizing a bill.

• (1430)

Ms. Clancy: The worst kind.

Mr. Milliken: The worst kind, as the hon. member for Halifax says. She is knowledgeable in these matters; she is a lawyer. I know she studied at Dalhousie University Law School. She knows what the worst kind of bill is. They teach that in law school. Some members opposite might well have gone on in law school and learned something about it and maybe they would not introduce this kind of bill.

The fact is, as the hon. member for Halifax says, this bill is of the worst kind because it legalizes the actions of this government for the last two and a half years in not making payments out of funds which this Parliament authorized it to make.

Ms. Clancy: Exactly.

Mr. Milliken: Parliament said you can pay these people this money as a subsidy. Then the government said it was not going to and now we are going to pass a law to make it illegal for us to do so. That is the thrust of Bill C-11.

In fact it is so disastrous for Atlantic Canada for it takes $35 million out of the pockets of people who might have received these subsidies. To think that government members elected from Atlantic Canada—admittedly there are not many—would sit here in silence and allow this legislation to go through without a whimper of protest—

Ms. Clancy: And it hurts their ridings.

Mr. Milliken: Hurts their ridings? It shakes the entire region.

To think that the members would sit here in silence, saying nothing, speaks something about the quality of the representation the people of Atlantic Canada get from their Conservative members of Parliament.

Ms. Clancy: It's sad.

Mr. Milliken: They should be ashamed of themselves. They should be up on their hind legs braying about the evils of this legislation—that is what they should be doing—and saying how dreadful their cabinet is for even considering introducing such a bill as this.

Instead of that we have mute—

Ms. Clancy: Sheep.

Mr. Milliken: —silence, sheep. Sheep led to the slaughter. The hon. member is grinning over there. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception knows better than that.

The loss of employees in this case has been amply evidenced by previous speakers and I want to reflect on it. The economic impact on the Halifax elevator has been the loss of 27 employees— all as a direct result of the government cutback in this particular area exemplified by this bill.

The direct result of the cuts in this bill and the government's predated policy is $14.4 million to the Halifax economy alone. The closing of the Halifax elevator which will follow the passage of this legislation will mean another $13.2 million loss. This is not peanuts. If this happened in my community of Kingston and the Islands we would have the city hall draped in black.

Halifax happens to be a much larger community. Maybe it can absorb this a little bit more easily, but not much. Instead of some objection from hon. members opposite all we get is stony silence and indifference.

Indeed, there is no evidence that in the course of meetings of the Conservative caucus or the cabinet there is any rebellion, any objection. Usually we have someone like the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth who gets up and presents a petition decrying the legislation and urging the government to change its mind, but on this bill we have had nothing—

Ms. Clancy: Nothing, not a word.

Mr. Milliken: —dead silence, zero. The only objections raised have been from the gallant members on this side of the House who have the courage to stand in their place day after day and condemn the government for its atrocious attitude to this House.

I want to go back to the atrocious attitude of this government to this House exemplified by this bill because here we have a case that would never happen in any other Commonwealth Parliament.

In fact, it has not happened in any other Commonwealth Parliament where a government, over the objections of the opposition—and I note it was the opposition that objected for once again this is a case where there was not a single objection from a member of the government —who introduced a resolution to reinstate this bill and four others and passed it with closure in this House. There was not a peep, not a peep, of objection from the other side of the House.

Mr. Weiner: Not you.

Mr. Milliken: Et tu, Brute! Et tu, Brute I say to the minister. He knows that he was part of that. He helped stab Parliament in the back on that occasion. He supported that resolution. He supported the use of closure on that resolution. It was an outrage and the minister knows it. Now he is grinning and laughing about the outrage as well.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is time that the government sobered up. It is time they stopped playing fast and loose with the rights of Canadians, with the rights of parliamentarians, and abandon this bill. I call on the minister now who is the only person here who can take this step to stand up and withdraw this bill. Reinstate the payments in this case. Stop being greedy and hamfisted with the people of Atlantic Canada and give them what this Parliament has voted to them in terms of subsidy and allow the moneys to go out.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak to this bill for, I suppose, the final time. One thing I find simply amazing, and I am very glad, is that the Liberal Party has actually discovered that the At and East bill actually exists.

Ms. Clancy: Get out of here, get out of here.

Mr. Laporte: This is a party which for two years said virtually nothing on that legislation. I am glad it is speaking on it, but this is a party which represents that region of the country and has paid virtually no attention until the last few weeks. I am glad it is finally doing it. The reason it is doing it is because the New Democratic Party has been the party that has—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Halifax on a point of order or point of privilege.

Ms. Clancy: Question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I feel that the comments made by the hon. member are a direct attack on the members from Atlantic Canada, and in particular on the member for Halifax, myself. Having sat on the legislative committee when this bill was C–26, its previous incarnation, I think the hon. member goes too far and I am particularly upset. I ask for an apology.

An hon. member: That is not a question of privilege.

An hon. member: It is a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is quite a debate. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to sit down and look at the debates in Hansard, look at the debates in the transportation committee, look at the debates in the agriculture committee and look at the debates in the legislative committee and see how many times this member has spoken, or any other member of the Liberal Party. It has twice the members that we have in this country. We have no members in Atlantic Canada, but we have spoken many more times on this issue. We are the party that raised this issue and I am glad that the Liberal Party has finally discovered it. I commend the member from Halifax for finally taking some interest in her own riding.

This is a piece of legislation which this government should have no pride in. This is a piece of legislation that should send shock waves across the country in the way it has handled itself with respect to this legislation. This is a very important bill for the maritimes. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission came to this government and said: "You are wasting money. You should be doing this in a different fashion. We can show you how to cut this program by up to 60 per cent and still provide that program to the maritimes". The government ignored it. Finally in 1989 when it did bring it in during the budget, there was actually no recognition of the work done by these good folks in the maritimes. When the matter was raised in the House and raised in committee, it had no idea that these studies had taken place.

This program was announced with obviously very little consideration, if any, to the various effects it was going to have on the region.

I know that the member from Halifax is upset with a few facts. She has a very good voice. If she wants to speak, I am sure she will have a chance later.

This has had a tremendous impact on the port of Halifax and on the port of Saint John. Enumerated many times by members of this party have been the cost in jobs, the cost in dollars and the potential future impact on that region of the country from the long-term closure of the grain elevators in Halifax and Saint John. It will potentially have a devastating effect on the livestock industry and on the dock workers in the maritimes. This is a bill with many tentacles. The loss of that program is going to wreak some real destruction in that region of the country unless there are some alternatives put in place.

When you look at western Canada, in my home province of Saskatchewan and throughout the west, it causes a lot of concern as well. We have in this country today a very great problem with the marketing of grain. There is a whole host of issues, a lot of it dealing with the European and the American trade war which has been going on for a while.

• (1440)

One of the important factors that has allowed us to maintain our market share is the Canadian Wheat Board. It has been working very hard to maintain the market share for western grain producers.

As the Canadian Wheat Board said when it was in front of our committee, the loss at the ports of Halifax and Saint John hurt the export grain industry. It hurt Canada's chances for grain export because those are the only two ice-free ports in Atlantic Canada.

As the Canadian Wheat Board told the legislative committee, all things being equal, a country with warm water ports would very likely not want to go to Montreal because it would have to deal with the ice in the wintertime and it may well cause the Canadian Wheat Board to lose sales.

The Canadian Wheat Board is doing what it can to ship grain to the Halifax elevator each year. It cannot afford to ship grain by rail during the wintertime and in the long run this could cost and will cost sales.

The other aspect is the long-term future of the Halifax elevator itself. Unless there is more grain going through that elevator, it will be closed. It was only through embarrassment of the government that it decided to call for a study on the future of the grain elevators in Atlantic Canada.

Saint John has already closed, and the study concluded that the long-term viability of Halifax, unless there is more revenue through that facility, will be threatened and it will ultimately be closed. That would simply be a tragedy not only to Atlantic Canada but to all Canadians.

It has been very frustrating dealing with this bill and it is not because there were no alternatives. There was a very viable alternative. There were some very serious issues. These were raised in the House and they were raised in committee, but the government chose to ignore them. It has ignored them at the peril of Canadians.

What it says to me and to many Canadians is that this government really does not give a damn for most regions of this country. It is a callous, mean-spirited government which is going to put through whatever it wants, period. It is a government with a second majority mandate mentality which is not good for Canada. It is not good for the regions of this country.

I would think that a good government is one that takes into account all relevant factors and then takes the course that will benefit the most people while inflicting the least harm on others. This is something that this government simply fails to do time and time again.

There is a real concern about unity in this country today. The Constitution is an extremely important document and issue. It is something that demands our attention, but there are some other areas in national unity that are also important. I would suggest to many Canadians, just as important.

This government, in many ways, has done as much to destroy national unity as it has ever done to promote it. There are concerns with communication and transportation, but there is a lack of concern for the regions of this country.

There was a time when Parliament concerned itself with the regions of this country. In many respects the national dream of John A. Macdonald was a regional development policy which encouraged the growth of western Canada.

It is only when governments stop paying attention to the regions of this country that this country is in real trouble. People in the maritimes are asking me: "What have you done to this area of the country?" Through the loss of the At and East, there has been a lot of movement of grain on the CN line to Halifax. VIA Rail has been cut. That cost money.

With the free trade agreement in place now, the CPR which has now purchased track all way through the United States to the eastern seaboard is promoting movement of goods from Montreal to New York. It is half the distance from Montreal to New York than from Montreal to Halifax. If that line loses any more goods being hauled on it, it will be the subject of an application for an abandonment by CN rail.

What we have is a situation in which this free trade agreement, this so-called right wing mentality, is destroying national unity and many maritimers are saying: "Why should I be part of Canada when I am paying huge taxes, GST, et cetera. I could buy my grain from Europe for $60 a tonne. I could haul corn in from the U.S. and it would be better for us."

I see my time is up. I would like to take just a few more seconds to wind up by saying this. There is another debate coming up on the transportation of grain. It is coming up in western Canada with respect to the Western Grain Transportation Act. I really hope that this government pays a little more attention to that region of the country than it has to the maritimes. In committee, the member for Halifax told the government if that it is going to remove the At and East, it should remove the Crow benefit. That is the wrong attitude. I hope the member changes her mind.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would participate for a couple of moments in debate.

I want to indicate that this particular bill was around prior to prorogation. It had hours of debate, hours of time in committee and a great deal of time spent on it in this House. We had to then turn around and pass a special order of the House by motion to allow this bill to be picked up so that we would not end up having to waste the time of the House by repeating stage after stage after stage of this particular bill.

I would like to indicate to the people who watch this House, to the people who are concerned about this issue, that what has happened is that we have given lots of time for debate on this. From the arguments we heard before today, there was clearly from our perspective and from my perspective an understanding of an agreement which we felt we had lived up to. I understand the hon. members have been demonstrating by their actions their great interest in this bill and how much they want to debate it.

I want to give them that opportunity. Earlier today we passed a House order and I want to make sure it is clear that no matter what happens in the next little while, the motion passed earlier, the House order regarding Royal Assent continues to be in effect. I want to at this time under Standing Order, I think it is 26.(1), move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of the third reading stage of government Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies) and all amendments relating thereto.

Some hon. members cry "shame" while I move that. I do not understand when members who have sat here and lectured the rest of the House on how much they want to debate this bill object because we on this side are prepared to give them more time to do just that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than 15 members have risen

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 26.(2), the motion is adopted.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth or fifth time I have risen to speak on this bill either in its present incarnation as C-11 or in its previous incarnation as C-26.

I want to pay particular tribute to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands for his eloquent remarks made earlier, and for his defence of the institution of Parliament and connected to that defence, his defence of the people of Atlantic Canada.

• (1450)

I would just like to set straight the hon. member to my extreme left over here with regard to the number of speakers who have spoken on this bill over the past year and a half. On second reading of C-26, which took place on February 12, 1990, February 20, 1990 and April 30, 1990, there were in total 24 speakers. Of the 24 speakers, 15, lo and behold, were members of the Liberal Party. Modesty forbids that I tell you how many of those came from Atlantic Canada, but I can assure you—

An hon. member: He just left.

Ms. Clancy: Well he did not like to stay and hear the truth so he fled, he fled in the face of the facts.

Fifteen of the 24 were Liberals, six of the 24 were New Democrats. In two of the three days of debate the debate was ended by three Liberals on the first day and two Liberals on the second day. This means there were obviously no New Democrats in the House to take up the cudgels. They fled as well.

At report stage there were 13 speakers, seven of whom were Liberal, four of whom were NDP.

Mr. Milliken: They were the ones who carried this, they said.

Ms. Clancy: Indeed, they carried it. Poor things, I guess they did not realize where the rest of the package was.

Bill C-11, as it is now known—but under whatever title it is known it is a bill that strikes at the very heart of the survival of Halifax, the port of Halifax and indeed many spin-offs throughout Atlantic Canada. Export grain shipments to Halifax and to Saint John, New Brunswick have stopped. As a direct result of this—and I hope the ministers are listening—the grain elevator in Saint John, New Brunswick has closed. It is closed, gone, finished. There are 55 jobs gone, 55 people out of work.

Last night, when I spoke on the estimates, I asked questions in my speech and I said: "Do they care?"

Mr. Milliken: And what did they say?

Ms. Clancy: They did not answer me. I put the question again, 55 jobs gone in hard-pressed Saint John, and do they care?

Some hon. members: No.

Ms. Clancy: I do not think so either.

In Halifax the economic impact upon the Halifax elevator has been devastating. Thus far there is a direct loss of 27 employees and $14.4 million to the economy of my city. Now there is no question, and my colleagues from Cape Breton—The Sydneys and Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, will agree that the city of Halifax has been and remains the most prosperous area of our beleaguered region. The most prosperous, yes, but as a nephew of mine said when he was small: "A boss over nothing is not boss over very much". We may be better off than the rest of our region. However, it appears to me that with bills like C-11 this government is doing everything it can to remove any possible sense of financial security the Haligonians might feel they could depend on. It has certainly done it to Saint John, and Halifax appears to be next.

When this elevator closes, and close it will if this government does not do something and do something quickly to alleviate the situation and to increase grain shipments to the Atlantic port, there will be another $13.2 million loss to the economy of Halifax.

In the space of a year and a half that is $27.6 million out of the economy of a city which, with the most generous estimate, has a population of 250,000 for the whole metropolitan area. That is a lot of money. That is a lot of economic loss. It is not something that Haligonians can take without some sort of reaction.

It is more than just this direct and concerted attack on the eastern ports, and in particular the port of Halifax, because I, my colleague from Dartmouth and a number of others in this House have been calling upon this government for two and a half years to do something for the beleaguered ports in the east.

The sense of fairness is something we talk about a great deal. For Atlantic Canadians any belief that this government could generate about being fair toward residents of Atlantic Canada is now gone. It is gone, destroyed. Any confidence, any trust is gone. Too much has happened. It is over.

There is not even any sense of history or sense of the country or sense of where we come from or even common sense.

Halifax is the closest port to Europe. Halifax is the most historic port on the east coast of Canada. Halifax is the largest ice-free harbour in the world. Not just in Canada, not just in North America, but in the world. The navies, the largest navies in the world can ride at anchor in Bedford Basin behind Halifax harbour. Ships can sail in and out of that harbour. They can be dealt with. They can be sent on their way again, having been serviced and taken care of in the port of Halifax, 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. There is no ice in our harbour. The harbour is ready and open and able to work at all times.

The people of Halifax and Dartmouth are a port people. They depend upon that port, not just for the basis of their livelihood, not just for economic prosperity, but a great deal as well for their pride in the city, for their sense of place in Canada and for their sense of worth.

I see my colleague from Newfoundland has just come into the House. He too knows a great deal about the pride of place in the city of Halifax, having served there with the Royal Canadian Navy. He knows what the navy means to Halifax and vice versa. He knows what the port means and what it should mean, both in its commercial and its historical context, to this country.

It should mean something to this government, a little something now and again. However, for weeks now I have been standing in this House pleading with the government. It is not easy for Atlantic Canadians to plead. We are pretty proud. We do not like to have to plead, especially not with the likes of this government.

I and my colleagues have been pleading for assistance to the port of Halifax. What has been forthcoming? Nothing. Empty promises, empty words.

Four weeks ago today the Minister of Transport said to me here in this Chamber that he would do everything in his power to assist the port of Halifax. Well, all I can say is, I guess we have seen the power of the Minister of Transport. Four weeks have passed and nothing has happened.

Today, in response to a question, the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada got up and clearly the government did not have a clue. There was nobody in the House who had any clue about what was happening in the port of Halifax. Nothing, absolutely.

Mr. Milliken: Shame, shame.

Ms. Clancy: Thank you, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

The government had no clue. The Deputy Prime Minister got to his feet and said: "Well, we are working on something about freight rates". Freight rates between Atlantic Canada and the centre of the country have been a national disgrace and they are getting worse and the port is in danger of closing altogether. We could lose it all, everything.

I appeal to the members on the other side, wherever you are from, whether you are from Ontario, Quebec, Alberta or wherever. Canada with no port of Halifax?

An hon. member: One of the best ports in the world.

Ms. Clancy: Absolutely.

Mrs. Sparrow: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Do you have a port in Alberta, Bobby? You could not even find a wharf. You would not know a fish if it came up and hit you in the mouth.

The Port of Halifax is absolutely intrinsic to the fabric of this country. It is something that every one of us, not just me as the member for Halifax, but every one of us has a vested interest in.

To pass this bill, to pass this piece of legislation, which has been rammed through to this point in the House, is not only unacceptable, it goes beyond that. To pass this bill is un-Canadian.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CHILD POVERTY

PROGRESS RESPECTING ELIMINATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should set specific markers to gauge the progress of the fight against child poverty in Canada so that it can be successfully eliminated by the year 2000.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take this opportunity to try to set the government's course for responding to the all party commitment that was made just a short time ago to end child poverty by the year 2000.

We all know that unless we set some agenda, some targets, some markers, it is very unlikely that we will know exactly where we are heading in the fight to eliminate child poverty.

I would like to take this opportunity to tell the House about Jessica, one of the 913,000 children in Canada living below the poverty line, one of the 560,000 who rely on food banks to provide their basic nutrition.

It is children like Jessica who form Canada's single largest group of poor people and the single largest group of food bank users. I will use Jessica as an example in order to put a face on poverty. This face is neither a "she" of statistics nor figures, which I will get into later, no, this face is of a four-year-old little girl, this face of poverty wears a small, sweet smile with baby teeth and big brown eyes looking to us for help. Jessica needs our help, as do the other 913,000 children living in poverty in Canada.

Her mother had to quit her $28,000-a-year job because she could not afford to pay $800 out of her $1,800-a-month pay cheque for child care. Her mother now receives welfare benefits to support the family but it is clearly not enough. Studies have shown that children from families who receive welfare benefits have one and a half times the rate of chronic health problems faced by other children, and 31 per cent of the children on welfare between the ages of six and 16 suffer from some psychiatric disorder. Children in the lowest income category are twice as likely to die before their 14th birthdays as children of wealthy families.

The problems do not stop there. Jessica will be four times as likely to do poorly in school, twice as likely to drop out before completing high school, and will have a high probability of underemployment or unemployment. She will also be more likely to turn to criminality or alcoholism when she grows up.

Surely, for none of us in Canada is this acceptable.

I am not only speaking about the plight of Jessica, but also the plight of one out of every six children in this country. We know the statistics and the consequences of these statistics, and we must do something other than lament about the problem in this House. This is a whole generation of children who need our help, and things are not getting any better. Current trends indicate that families' income status is deteriorating in Canada. Despite the government's enthusiasm for increased employment figures, the great majority of new jobs have been in the low-paying, part-time sector.

Let us look at what the government has done. The Prime Minister, as we all know, during the 1988 election campaign, said: "We will implement and build on our national child care program, the most innovative social advance in Canada since the Canada Pension Plan a quarter century ago".

Well, in November, 1989, the former leader of my party, Ed Broadbent, introduced a proposal to end child poverty by the year 2000, and the House unanimously adopted that motion. Following this with a speech to the United Nations Children's Summit last September, the Prime Minister spoke of the need for political will in meeting children's needs and challenged our children to listen carefully to what we say in the coming years to hold us to our commitments. And he said: "I hope we find that none of us will be wanting".

Actions taken by the government over the past year have not only not improved the situation, as promised, but in fact worsened it. We are now looking forward to challenge the Prime Minister and the government to own up to their promises and commitments and prove to Canada that these words were more than just a public relations ploy.

The children of this country need a lot more than just words to get them through each day.

The government established a children's bureau last year and the minister has been designated as the minister responsible for children, but we have not seen results from this bureau nor have we seen from it strategy to eliminate child poverty.

If such a plan exists, I hope we will see it, but we have no sign of that plan yet. I certainly hope that the bureau would not be advocating the policies of this government which are clearly throwing more children into poverty day by day.

In order to end child poverty by the year 2000 as the government has promised, as all the members on the government side and the opposition side have promised, something must be done now.

Just look at some of the facts. According to data recently released by Statistics Canada, the government's own statistical collection organization, in the first week of December 3.5 million Canadians or 13.6 per cent were living below the poverty line. There were 934,000, almost a million children under the age of 18, or 1 in 6 living below the poverty line.

Native babies in this country have about as much chance of living beyond their first birthdays as those in Jamaica and Costa Rica and at a higher risk than babies born in Cuba and Singapore.

The same sorts of figures apply to poor, urban children in Canada too. In other words, our infant mortality rate does not compare very favourably with those of developing countries.

These figures clearly indicate a crisis situation. The only way to address the issue of child poverty is to examine the root causes of poverty.

The House subcommittee on poverty was told that children living in poverty are the sons and daughters of parents living in poverty, as one might expect. They were told that the economic status of children cannot be separated from the economic status of their parents. Any policy or program designed to eliminate child poverty, if it is to have a chance to succeed, must, of necessity, address the underlying reasons for poverty and its effects.

Far from doing this, through a series of legislative measures, the present Conservative government has made a lot of poor children poorer. To begin with, there is Bill C-69 which cuts funding, as we know, for health and post-secondary education in all provinces and caps the Canada Assistance Plan for British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

Over half of all welfare recipients, of all poor Canadians, live in these three provinces. Canada's child poverty rate does not fare well at all by international standards. Among industrial nations, only the United States has worse levels of family poverty than Canada. Our rates are three times those of Scandinavian countries for all families living in poverty and five times the rate for lone parent families.

Even Britain, having suffered under a decade of Thatcherism, has a poverty rate which is only half of that in Canada.

There has also been an attack on children by this government through inaction and omission. I am referring specifically to the lack of a national child care strategy. This must be a priority if we are to have any hope at all of ending child poverty in Canada by the year 2000 as the government has promised.

We have lived through decades under successive Liberal and Conservative governments who have followed policies which serve the corporate agenda rather than serve Canadians, especially those least affluent Canadians.

How much longer do we need to wait to see that these policies are not effective and are harmful to those who are most in need of help?

There are as many children living in poverty today as there were in 1980 and the acuteness of poverty felt by children and families is increasing. What is particularly alarming is the increase in the depth of poverty. The number of people who live at 50 per cent and 60 per cent of the poverty line has increased.

We are now faced with a recession. We have been in a recession and the number of children living in poverty is on the rise again. Over a decade of Liberal and Tory governments and there has been no real change to this situation.

Poverty can be defined as insufficient access to basic goods, services and opportunities which are commonly available to non-poor Canadians and which are accepted as necessary to maintain a decent standard of living.

However, the implications of poverty go much further than this. Children growing up in poverty tend to have behavioural problems, low self-esteem, less motivation to learn, delayed cognitive development and lower achievement in school. They are at an increased rate of dropping out of high school and have a rate of poor health that is 150 per cent higher than the national average.

In December, 1990, the Canadian Association of Food Banks released preliminary figures from its 1990 hunger camp showing that half a million Canadians rely on food banks each month, a figure which is up 30 per cent from last year and between 40 and 50 per cent of the users are children. When asked what she wanted for her children, Jessica's mother said just that life be normal. Not that they have everything they want, but just what other kids have: warm clothes for the winter, good snow boots, nutritious food and a decent life. The sun and moon would be nice but let us be reasonable, just the basic necessities.

What Jessica's mother is asking for is not very much, I think, but it is more than she has now. In fact, the basic necessities are not things anyone should have to ask for. They should be taken for granted, especially in a country as wealthy as ours.

Article 27 of the recently adopted International Convention on the Rights of the Child states that every child has a right to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual and social development, and that it is a duty of countries within their means to see that this right is fulfilled, including the provision of material assistance and support programs particularly with regard to nutrition, clothing and housing.

Since the government has committed itself to ratifying the convention, I and Canada's children wait to see the actions and results. I ask the government to prove it is not just interested in talking about caring for children, but that it will also take an active role in caring for them. How else does the government propose to end child poverty by the year 2000? As we have seen it certainly is not going to go away on its own. Ignoring the problem will only make it worse.

Headstart type programs such as nutritional supplements for pregnant mothers and pre-schools for disadvantaged children are an approach apparently serving to lessen the burden on the poor in the United States. Better education, higher employment rates, and improved health are benefits of programs like this.

While this may be a quick fix for the program, longer term solutions are needed. Needs of children must come first on the political agenda. Problems like workplace, day care, flexible time, and extended parental leave are needed to assist parents when their children need not only material comfort but parental care also.

Children who are already living in poverty will need special assistance programs, not so much to give them a headstart but to let them catch up to their wealthier counterparts. A comprehensive strategy for addressing child poverty will require a concerted effort by government, industry and the Canadian public at large.

I would like to take this opportunity to make some suggestions to help eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. That is only eight and a half years away and there is a great deal left to do. There is no question that many working Canadians are now at a greater risk of poverty than ever. Although there are no quick fixes to the problems of the working poor, the major focus should be on education and job training.

Since the risk of poverty and unemployment is greater for those with less schooling this means a direct reversal of present government policy and it most definitely means the scrapping of Bill C-69 and Bill C-21.

Over the past few years there has been an erosion of support for families under the Conservative government. It has seen fit to take away from some the family allowance, a long-time accepted universal recognition of the importance of roles that parents play in our society.

We in the New Democratic Party believe that universal family allowance is a right that should not be taken away from parents. To take it away from so-called privileged families would be to turn it into another form of social assistance, something that would be available only to the downtrodden in society and yet another means of stigmatizing the poor. The family allowance has always been accepted by Canadian taxpayers as a legitimate social program because everyone receives it, rich or poor. The moment this is taken away from some and given to a few is the moment that it is seen as a charity, not as a right.

In the short term the clawback of family allowance should be reversed and the allowance should remain fully indexed to inflation. There are advantages to this beyond just putting money in the hands of those who need it; family allowance payments provide a recognition of the important role of parents in our society in addition to putting money in the hands of consumers who will spend it and thus generate activity in the economy.

In the long term the government should focus its energies on a full employment policy. Those who would say that full employment policies have been attempted and have never worked are simply not aware of the facts. In truth, no Liberal or Conservative federal government today has paid anything more than lip service to the notion of full employment. Think about the philosophy of it; it clearly makes sense and it is clearly possible according to the most recent studies that I have read.

While it is true that many who are employed live in poverty is it still logical to assume that reducing the level of unemployment is a good strategy to reducing the level of poverty? The wage is the most stable source of income available to Canadians and providing all Canadians with a wage is the best way to ensure that all Canadians are provided for. Canada's economy must be made to work for Canadians. For governments such as this to consider 10 per cent unemployment normal while exporting jobs all around the world is remarkable and cruel. Full employment does not consider jobs created at minimum wage or part time to be particularly useful. Approximately half of Canadians living in poverty are employed and surely this would indicate some major problems.

Clearly if minimum wage jobs were to be offered as a viable employment alternative then the minimum wage must be raised substantially.

The concept of full employment does not end with providing jobs. It involves a commitment to providing sufficient social support systems to those who are unfortunate enough not to have jobs for a long or shorter period time.

A sustainable economy needs affordable, high quality, non-profit child care in sufficient numbers to meet the demands. It needs employment equity and decent wages, pensions and working conditions.

We should be instituting non-profit day care and universally accessible facilities and setting a time line for their installation. Full employment policy also requires a commitment to education, training and retraining.

Another tragic legacy of previous Liberal and Conservative governments is the rise of food banks in Canada. They started in the early eighties to help people through that recession. It has been almost a decade, and that recession has come and gone. We have had other recessions, and the demand for food banks is still rising.

Unfortunately, it is easy to see why food banks are needed. Social assistance rates across the country on average bring people up to half the poverty line. If a single mother is living in Prince Edward Island, she can receive 70 per cent of the poverty line on social assistance. But if she lives in Manitoba she will receive only 50 per cent of the poverty line.

The group of people in need of social assistance, thanks to the recession, high unemployment, aggressive changes to legislation, has grown. In Ontario, municipalities are finding welfare rolls are increasing at an alarming rate as more people move into the province hoping to find work.

A large number of children are included in these welfare figures, and as I said, children comprise the single largest group of welfare recipients across the country.

What is the government's response? The government says it is concerned about child poverty, and yet it chose to slap a limit on transfer payments to Ontario, Alberta and B.C. where half the poor in Canada live.

The government is probably hoping to pass the buck by expecting the provinces to pick up the pieces. Yet, these provinces are no better off financially than the federal government. They are finding it increasingly difficult to keep the social assistance system from collapsing. The end result is that children suffer and children remain in poverty.

How can this government say: "We are going to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000," when it is busy putting even more people in the poorhouse. I am always happy to hear words of support for children, but in light of this present government's record, I say that children should not be holding their breath and waiting for action.

Instead of the backward steps that this government has taken, what are some of the forward steps we can take? How can we measure our progress? A number one priority as mentioned must be a full employment policy. Getting Canadians back to work is a sure way to see poverty among children decrease.

A national child care strategy with universal availability is needed. The development of low income housing must become a priority. Social assistance rates must be raised, and the government can encourage the provinces to do this by returning the 50-50 transfer payments to the provinces that the Canada Assistance Plan mandates.

The level of the federal minimum wage should increase substantially. Family benefits should return to full indexation and the clawback of family allowance must be revoked. The most obvious way to measure success in these areas is to monitor the number of children living in poverty.

Surely we can say that by the year 1995, which is half way to the end of the century, we should have reduced child poverty by half. We will not have achieved success if the numbers go down when the economy is good and up when it is not as has happened in the 1980s.

We should also set specific targets for percentages of needed child care spaces. By 1995, we might for example argue that half of these needs should be met. Similarly, availability of low income housing could be measured in the same way.

There is no question that any effective strategy to deal with child poverty will cost money. A government that has the courage and foresight to spend this money now as an investment in the future is a government that will receive the support of Canadian children and Canadian families.

Spending this money is critical as a necessary investment in Canada's future and will in the end provide Canada with a healthier economy and Canadians with a brighter future. The alternative is to live with child poverty and to sacrifice generations of Canadian children.

What I hope we can do in the context of this issue, one which has received non-partisan support across the House for all parties support eliminating child poverty by the year 2000, is to find some understanding of the need to set standards and targets so that we can eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

• (1520)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to speak today on the important social issue of poverty among children in Canada that was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

His speech was very moving and there was a lot of well thought out information. I think all of us listened very carefully because we know that poverty and its effect on children and on families is a major concern for everyone.

For me, it is really a single issue which stands out as needing more time, more effort and more attention from all Canadians so we can put together a proper program. In fact, one of the major objectives of this government is to invest in our children and see them better educated, better protected and better nurtured so that they too can make their own contribution to our future here in this country.

In 1990 we watched children take on a new importance in world politics at the World Summit for Children, which was co-chaired by our Prime Minister. Leaders of 70 nations adopted the declaration on survival, protection and development of children and the action plan.

By signing this declaration Canada was urged to develop a plan of action and that is presently what we are doing.

Following this summit the Prime Minister asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare to undertake the task of presenting to the cabinet recommendations on these documents. One of the minister's priorities is to ensure better co-ordination and better consistency in areas addressing children's issues.

To this end, a children's bureau was recently established within the Department of National Health and Welfare.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 14, 1991

Mr. Speaker:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter de C. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 14th day of June at 3.20 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to a bill.

Yours sincerely,
Judith A. LaRocque,
Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of his honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1530)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bill:

Bill C-25, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations in the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, British Columbia—Chapter 25.

CHILD POVERTY

PROGRESS RESPECTING ELIMINATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) (p. 1778).

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was just mentioning the establishment within the Department of National Health and Welfare of the children's bureau.

Since 1984 the federal government has embarked on a series of initiatives to improve the situation of Canadian families and protect the future of their children.

In the first instance, this government's approach has been to support self-sufficiency among Canadians through economic and social policies which have helped to create a climate in which job creation can prosper. In this regard, central to the recent federal budget is a plan for economic recovery that will put the recession behind us and will lead us forward to growth and prosperity.

This plan outlines strong actions and measures that will be taken to ensure fiscal responsibility in the government and legislated limits to government spending. We all know that the deficit and the debt are serious problems which must be solved. Each year we spend $1,650 for every Canadian man, woman and child on just servicing the debt.

We simply cannot go on living on borrowed money, money our children will have to repay.

Even in a time of necessary fiscal restraint, however, the government has acted to better support lower income families with children. This government has increased by more than 50 per cent the maximum value of the child tax credit since 1984 and has introduced a new child tax credit supplement for pre-school children. We have also eased the economic effect of marital breakdown on lone parents by offering services to help locate defaulting spouses and garnished federal moneys.

We have introduced the goods and services tax credit which ensures that families with incomes of less than $30,000 are better off after tax reform.

In addition, the federal government recently announced a four year, $136 million program to continue the effort at reducing the level of family violence in Canada. The new initiative addresses violence against women, children, seniors and the disabled, and within the Indian and Inuit communities.

Social assistance and social services are matters of provincial jurisdiction. Provinces determine policies with respect to the services. Nonetheless the federal government does cost share in eligible provincial expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan. Federal expenditures under the plan were about $6 billion in 1990–91.

Moreover, the federal government in co-operation with provincial governments is working to address the housing needs of disadvantaged Canadians. In 1990 through construction or renovation, over 42,000 new households were funded through federal social housing programs, and most of these programs were cost shared with the provinces and*or the territories to address their shelter needs.*

Over 640,000 households are now being assisted on an annual basis. Canadian children and their parents have also benefited from a series of new programs which will better prepare parents for participation in the labour force. These programs include employment ability in agreements with the provincial governments which help those people on social assistance with a transition from, say, welfare into the workforce; enhanced maternity and parental benefits to ease the transition back and forth from childbirth to the workplace for thousands of parents; and, the stay in school initiative which will combat the dropping out of school and will therefore better prepare the new labour force entrants for employment in the future.

As a result of these and other policies, there are some 956,000 fewer lower income people in Canada than there were when we took office in 1984, 300,000 of whom are children. Moreover, we are committed to a Canadian action plan for children which will address a broad range of issues which affect children, including child care.

We are also now actively working with the provinces toward the ratification, which is anticipated in 1991, of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. The convention is an important milestone in the expression of human rights for children. I can assure Canadians that a fundamental objective for this government is to protect the needy and enhance the well being of children in this country. This objective will be fully reflected in the plan of action in which we will spell out how Canada intends to implement the ten points of the world declaration signed by our Prime Minister at the World Summit for Children last September.

We are committed to prepare this plan by the end of 1991. We are looking ahead to the end of the century and that is what our plan will involve.

We all have to recognize our duty to find innovative and effective solutions to break the devastating cycle of poverty.

• (1540)

I believe Canadians also recognize that the federal government alone cannot solve this problem. We cannot solve all the problems facing Canadian families and their children. We need teamwork between the Canadian families and the federal and provincial governments. We need the private sector and we need voluntary agencies. We all must work together. We will continue to do this to improve the well being of all Canadians.

In summary, I have to say to my colleague from the NDP Party that he has raised some very interesting and well constructed points. He said there is a need to set goals and targets, which is true. I look forward to the plan which will be put to the House at the end of 1991. We have taken steps to improve the economic well being of children and their families and the government is committed to continue its effort in this direction.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on behalf of my party on this very important subject of child poverty. I want to begin by complimenting the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing for having introduced this motion and for his very well crafted and sincere words on a very, very important and disturbing subject for all Canadians; child poverty. I also want to commend him for the way in which he has crafted his motion, which speaks to the solution of the child poverty problem as opposed to simply describing the problem in more detail without having a thought of a forward plan.

The magnitude of child poverty in Canada is devastating and it ought to be at the top of the public policy priority list for all governments, in particular for the federal government, given the size of the problem. I just want to recite a few more statistics to give the House an idea of what the magnitude of the problem is. 3.5 million Canadians are living below the poverty line, 1 million of whom are children. That is a ten-fold increase of children living in poverty since 1980 and a higher proportion of Canadian children living in poverty than in four other western nations, including the United States. Canada has the second highest rate of children living in severe poverty, which is defined as a family whose income is 75 per cent of the poverty line. Sixty-four per cent of poor Canadian children are rated as severely poor, with only the U.S. scoring higher at 57 per cent.

Clearly, these are devastating and stark statistics in a country which is as prosperous and as wealthy and has the abundance of natural resources that Canada has at the end of the 20th century. It clearly must be intolerable for us as Canadians to endure and to continue to accept this reality facing so many of our children, particularly in view of the fact that so many other things are correlated with child poverty: crime; the fact that poor children become poor adults; illiteracy; and the fact that so many of our poor children are native children. The consequences of poverty on our reserves are a national disaster and a national affliction.

One would have thought that the elimination of child poverty would be at the top of the government's priority list. I was looking for some statement to that effect and for some indication in the Speech from the Throne that the government was actually committed to a plan to eradicate child poverty by the end of the decade, particularly given the fact that the government has started to become specific with indicating performance targets and measures of performance for other aspects of its policies.

For example, in the last budget it was quite specific about its plan to reduce and eliminate federal deficits. Notwithstanding the fact that the plans of the previous finance minister, over the last seven years, have been completely and utterly off the mark the government did, in its last budget, produce very detailed, short and mid-term plans for reducing and eliminating the deficit. It apparently is soon to come forward with legislation which will set spending limits for itself.

In addition, it has talked about job creation by the end of the century. It has put a target on job creation and a target on education and the attainment of certain specific goals relating to illiteracy, to the number of Canadians with high school diplomas, and the number of Canadians with post-graduate degrees in mathematics, sciences and engineering. These goals are to make Canada more competitive internationally. We cannot fault the government for setting those kinds of targets. We may want to dispute the nature of the targets, but clearly that is something that should be in the Speech from the Throne.

Unfortunately, although the Prime Minister chaired the children's summit in New York last summer and the government had made specific commitments as a result of that summit, there is very little in the Speech from the Throne committing the government to really tackle the problem of eliminating child poverty in a very concrete way.

Instead, there are some very vague references to the need to move toward implementing these commitments and ensuring that Canadians are better educated, which is part of eliminating the problem of child poverty, but it did not really commit the government to address that fundamental problem head-on. That is really what is needed and is what the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing addresses in his motion.

If this government is serious about confronting this plight of child poverty, it has to place it at the top of its policy agenda. It has to ensure that the debate on child poverty has the highest priority. It has to ensure it is right up there with eliminating the federal deficit, which I acknowledge is important. This issue has to guide the policies of the government.

If it does not guide the policies of the government there will be policies introduced which will be in opposition to the target of eliminating child poverty and in fact will make the child poverty problem worse, as many of the policies of this government have done.

My colleague from across the way, the member for Calgary Southwest, mentioned the goods and services tax. She referred to the credit as an initiative to eliminate child poverty. I must say I am quite baffled by that because the tax itself is a tax which will increase child poverty in this country. It is part of many other taxes which have been directed specifically at the poor in Canada and at individuals who are caught in circumstances out of which they cannot extract themselves.

We had a debate earlier today in the course of Bill C-10, which is a bill to increase taxes on cigarette smoking. I agree that we must do all we can to eliminate cigarette smoking in this country and taxes are one way of achieving that objective. They are not the only way, by a long shot.

• (1550)

One reality which one has to confront oneself with, as my colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk raised, is that those people who are caught in that trap, who happen to smoke, will be constrained even more in their incomes. The burden falls back on the children.

Those kinds of regressive measures in their application which, if they are not counteracted by other measures that put money into the pockets of the poor, allow them to have income opportunities, to have jobs, and to give real, concrete opportunities to their children to reach beyond high school to attain—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has more than expired.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member was unable to finish his speech, but I also have some very important things to say, because eliminating child poverty by the year 2000 is very important, and I am sure we would all like to see that happen.

A country's children are the foundation and the future of that country. That is why during the past 150 years, governments throughout the world have taken steps to provide support for families and their children. The most recent manifestation of this philosophy was the Convention on the Rights of the Child, established by the United Nations. Canada has taken a systematic approach to family support. One of the key elements of the Canadian support system is the sharing of responsibilities by the federal governement and the provincial governments.
