Those are the three citations that I give to you Mr. Speaker and to the Clerk. A copy of the tape I give for you to review, and if you find that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

I stand in my place raising this because it has been the government House leader in the last 24 hours who has demonstrated to the House that he is concerned about the conduct of all members of Parliament. I wish to tell this House that after the remark made by the hon. member for Burlington, phones have rung in our offices on Parliament Hill calling to our attention the words which were used by the hon. member. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will give careful consideration to the evidence that I put before you, and I would ask as a courtesy that you would hear the hon. member for Hamilton East who was the victim of what I believe to be a slanderous remark by the hon. member opposite.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, frankly if it were just a battle between myself and the member for Burlington I would not bother to waste the time of the House in bringing attention to it. This is not the first time that he has used disparaging comments when they relate to women members, and I refer to the time he was forced—

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the House leader of the Official Opposition and I have recognized the hon. member who believes that she was the subject of the comment. I have to remind hon. members that I am now dealing with a question of privilege which arises out of Question Period just past and which has been specifically identified—

Some hon. members: No, no, this morning.

Mr. Speaker I am sorry, this morning. This is not a place to get into a long debate over what somebody did or did not say over a long period of time in the House of Commons. I want to just let hon. members know that I am taking the matter very seriously. I also am being very serious about confining the issue to that which has been brought in front of me.

The hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I was following the rules of the House. Since the comments this morning, my office has been inundated with calls from people who distinctly heard the member for Burlington call me a slut.

• (1510)

It is incumbent upon me as a member of this House to point out that that member should stand in his place and unequivocally withdraw and apologize for the insult of all women. It is not just an insult directed toward me.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, in analysing your rulings you are going to want to consider the fact that this is not just a one time incident and it is not just a one time insult directed toward a member. He has been called to task on this issue numerous times in the past. I hope that this time he will be person enough to stand in his place and apologize.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, after the exchange in the House, including part of the debate, as I resumed my seat I said: "What a pain in the butt". I do not think that is unparliamentary.

If the hon. member believes that is unparliamentary, I would withdraw the remark and apologize.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard from the hon. member for Burlington. I understand that the hon. government House leader has asked me to listen to the tapes. I will do so and report back to the House. There is no need for further argument.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS ALLEGEDLY MADE BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, during oral question period, the Minister of Transport said that I had lived in Montreal since 1988. I have lived in Montreal since 1966. Maybe for him I am not a true Quebecer, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am a Quebecer to the core.

[English]

This is not only a question of privilege on my own behalf. I speak on behalf of vast numbers of Quebecers who were not born in the province.

This minister implied that you cannot be a Quebecer unless you were born in Quebec and by extension that you cannot be a Canadian unless you were born in Canada. That is despicable.

Mr. Speaker: There was an exchange here in which both hon. members were of course expressing their points of view very vigorously. The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard may very well have a complaint but I find it very difficult to find that it is a question of privilege.

The hon. government House leader.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-29

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday by way of notice that it would have been my intention to stand today and move that government Motion No. 4 in the name of the government House leader be not further adjourned.

I have been talking to the President of the Treasury Board and he indicates that certain discussions are going on. There have been some consultative discussions between House leaders and myself. In view of those circumstances, I think it would be appropriate that we carry on with second reading debate on Bill C-29

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if hon. members would allow me to interrupt just very briefly. In view of what took place immediately after Question Period I felt that it had to take precedent.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mr. Ahmed Mohamed Al-Anessi, Minister of Communications of the Republic of Yemen.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

BILL C-29

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish just to confirm what the government House leader has said, that there have been some discussions between myself and representatives of his office, as well as members of the New Democratic Party. We would hope and understand that all are pursuing in the line of good faith and clear understandings and perhaps something may result in the very near future.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my hon. friend, the government House leader, that I appreciate his gesture.

It is certainly a gesture of good faith on the government's part. Discussions have been taking place. We are very hopeful and encouraged. I simply want to say thank you to him for taking this very progressive step.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and the amendment of Mr. Chrétien (p. 2227).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock there were five minutes remaining in the period of questions and comments following the intervention from the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

The hon. member for Regina—Wascana. I do apologize to the hon. member. There are many people standing around him and I could not be sure whether he was rising or preparing to leave the room.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Thank you, Madam Speaker. Being five foot eight inches I quite often experience that phenomenon. However, I find in the evening that equates to the great equalizer and we all acquire the same height.

I was in the midst of concluding my comments and was about to ask my hon. friend a question. I will get to the question right away. He made two points in his remarks that I would like him to comment on.

First, my hon. friend commented about the government and the private sector services not being different. I submit to him that they are significantly different. The second point was, and I believe his words were to this effect, that unless Canadians were hurt by a strike, a strike would not be effective. I would like to ask him if he supported Wayne Easter of the National Farmer's Union and Daryl Bean of the Public Service Alliance of Canada and its political allies at the time it held its news conference yesterday. Does he support that action that caused the non-delivery, the unavailability of grain inspectors to go to work and as a result caused Saskatchewan farmers to just sit on their grain?

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal with those questions very quickly. The first question relates to whether I feel that the labour force, the men and women in this country, be they in the private sector or the public sector, should have collective bargaining rights. The answer to that is yes, certainly. I feel very strongly that if the government of the day decides to allow its civil servants the right to strike, which it should unless it is absolutely essential that they be here to make the government run, then I believe there is no difference and we should not try and discuss it as if they are apples and oranges, the way the President of the Treasury Board has been doing over the last few days. The fact remains they are Canadians who live in a democracy and they are part of a collective bargaining unit and because they are, they should feel they have the same rights as anybody else in this country.

The other question was whether I believe it is necessary for strikes to hurt. I think the member took my remarks out of context. What I did say in my speech was simply that if they feel that a strike will not hurt anyone, then they really are living in a bubble called Ottawa. The fact remains that in the real world, whether it is the private or public sector, if there is a stoppage of work those people will be hurt. Others who are involved with those particular striking employees will also be hurt.

I think it has been interesting to note that the government opposite has been dealing with this in a very personal way, which is the way it does business on a regular basis and that is to try to divide and conquer. What it has been doing is suggesting that Daryl Bean has a political agenda and that most of the public servants do not agree with him. It was interesting to note there were over 10,000 people on the Hill yesterday and the reason for that was because they feel very strongly that they have been wronged and they are looking to the government to right that wrong.

I think it should stop trying to divide and conquer the Canadian people and start working with them to better this country for all of us.

• (1520)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my friend and my colleague a question with respect to the excellent address he just delivered to the House. I was particularly impressed with what he had to say inasmuch as he comes from a perspective of being in the trade union movement all his life and therefore has an understanding of the mechanics and the dynamics that are involved in this type of situation.

My colleague and I and many other people in the House fail to realize sometimes that we come from the majority of small communities within this country and at the end of this—and it will end soon we are told—these people in these small communities who are neighbours and live together must then get along in this terrible spirit of animosity that has been created by the government of the day. I would like this member to express what he anticipates will happen with all of the small communities in this country that are served so well and ably by the Public Service of our country.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his kind words and I would say very quickly that we are going to see some nasty repercussions to the kind of action being taken by the government.

The government has to understand that these things are not forgotten the day that legislation is passed and Royal assent given. It lingers on for years and years and years. A perfect example of that is Canada Post and what has happened with the labour-management relations there.

You cannot force people to be something they do not agree with. You have to convince them of the necessity to do something and what we are going to see in small-town Canada, and there is a lot of civil servants there, is a feeling of being very left out in the process and services will be hindered because of it.

I think we all have to understand and expect to see that because of what the government is doing.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, Canada's largest Public Service union, PSAC, is on strike and innocent citizens are suffering because of it. Thousands of Canadians, whether farmers paralysed by halted grain shipments, or commuters held up by airline delays, have been adversely affected by this unnecessary and regrettable dispute. Surely this strike has run its course.

Public servants who wish to work are fed up with the daily picket-line harassment. Farmers are fed up with feeling the grip of this union's stranglehold on their livelihood. Pensioners are fed up with government telephones left unanswered. Air traffic controllers are fed up with ridiculous airport barricades and the government is fed up with this strike as well.

I agree with some of my constituents who met with me on Saturday and said: "Enough is enough". Now is the time to send these strikers back to work.

Why is the PSAC on strike? Assuming that the numerous picket sign captions are a reflection of their carriers, the primary issue is the government's unpopular wage formula of zero, three and three. That is fair enough.

I, too, am not thrilled about my 1992 wage being frozen at zero either. I, like many Canadians, in the past always expected wage increases on a yearly basis. However, for the sake of our children, it is time to rethink this expectation. Past government cycles of spending and taxing, and taxing and spending, have produced today's overwhelming $400 billion debt, a growing debt that will be passed on to tomorrow's generations if not controlled today.

In the February 1991 budget the Minister of Finance outlined the government's plan for economic recovery. The plan which detailed measures and has successfully led the country out of its recession structured a design for renewed prosperity and competitiveness.

But no one promised when we introduced that budget back in February that it would be easy. Tough decisions had to be made. Habits of the past, which are always difficult to break, were cast aside and the government's commitments to deficit reduction and controlled fiscal planning introduced in 1984 were reinforced.

Specifically, the government's wage policy became an integral part of this seven-year strategy, a strategy that will affect not only the PSAC but all public servants, all parliamentarians, all Order in Council appointees, all Crown corporation employees, all military personnel and all RCMP staff. Unquestionably, this is a tough policy, but it is a fair one.

I agree with the President of the Treasury Board who said that the public servants deserve more, but our financial resources do not allow it.

Nothing we are doing in this legislation can be truthfully construed as union-bashing. Over the past seven years, as member of Parliament for the federal riding of Kitchener, I have come in direct working contact with hundreds of public servants at all levels.

The vast majority are excellent public servants. Further, I admire their tolerance and their patience with the many different demands placed upon them by the public and the policies which they must implement, given to them by government. On almost all occasions, my staff and I have received excellent service for our constituents from our Immigration, Canada Pension, Canada Employment or Customs and Excise public servants and many others in government departments I have not mentioned.

I also know that not all PSAC members want this strike. Not all are picketing. Some have tried to go to work and have done so. Some are picketing as a result of peer pressure and intimidation.

Further, I think it is essential that we quickly pass this back-to-work legislation. Just a little over an hour ago, I received the following facsimile message from a company in my riding. Here are some of the points made to me. Two names were mentioned and I will not read them. The message said these two people are not available due to the PSAC strike, so it is impossible to reach them at the local office of Revenue Canada. Customs staff at Toronto airport have just gone out, so we cannot ship anything to Czechoslovakia as part of our regular shipping schedule. The company is denied the possibility to exchange and to sell goods from Canada to Czechoslovakia.

Further, the company says cheques from the Export Development Corporation due from previous shipments to Czechoslovakia are being held up. And therefore, the end: "We are running out of time. The bank will not continue to simply extend their good will to us."

In other words, the bank demands the money and if it does not get it, the bank closes a company. Therefore, both the managers and the workers are unemployed as a result of this strike. That is why we are bringing in this legislation.

The country cannot afford this strike, workers at all levels in my riding want this legislation and they want it now.

The reality is that to govern one must choose. There are at least two alternatives we could follow. The way we proposed in this budget which will apply to everyone including the Prime Minister, the cabinet, members of Parliament, senior managers and all the bargaining units in the Public Service or the road chosen by the NDP government in Ontario. Those are two different alternatives.

It is very interesting and very informative to compare the federal government and six provinces which have followed the federal government's lead on the one hand, and the Government of Ontario on the other.

In the February budget, we proposed the zero, three and three for the next three years with some flexibility in other areas of the agreements with the different bargaining units.

Let us look at six examples of other provinces that have followed the federal government's lead. Nova Scotia has introduced legislation that will provide for a zero per cent increase in the next two years, 1991-92 and 1992-93. That is two years in a row at zero.

Saskatchewan introduced legislation of 2 per cent for this year and 2 per cent next year. Manitoba has introduced zero per cent for 1990-91 and that is back-dating it, and also 2 per cent for 1991-92. Quebec has introduced a zero per cent freeze from January 1, 1992 to June 30, 1992, followed by 3 per cent. Newfoundland has introduced zero per cent for 1991-92. New Brunswick has introduced zero per cent also for 1991-92.

When you look at more detail, say on the example from Newfoundland, on April 16, 1991, the government there passed the Public Sector Restraint Act which provides for no financial improvements to either salaries or benefits. We are looking at just the salary here, but they did it for both for the 1991–92 fiscal year. All salary increases which were due to occur during the financial year of 1991–92 were cancelled, even though they had agreements with those bargaining units. So that is what they have done.

Nova Scotia, in its budget announced on May 14, calls for a two-year freeze on wages of provincial employees and affects collective agreements which expire in the fall of 1991. So that affects some of the agreements as they come to a close and then it is a zero followed by another zero.

These are two examples, plus the other four that I gave of six provinces and the federal government, who are all following one direction of a zero per cent freeze, some for one year, some for six months, some for two years. So that is the one alternative.

Then there is the other route chosen by the NDP Government of Ontario which the federal NDP has endorsed. The NDP government in Ontario increased its program spending this year to the tune of 13.4 per cent. We, of course, brought in legislation to cap it at 3 per cent for the next five years and we have been running at 3.7 per cent for the last six years. The Ontario NDP government's present wage bill is increasing at 14.5 per cent. In its last budget it increased its annual deficit by 300 per cent.

So there is the one route that the Ontario government is following. That route was tried here in Ottawa from 1980 to 1984. In fact, we can compare this month today to 10 years ago and we can compare August going back to 1981. Look at a few figures here. Inflation in August of 1981 was 12.9 per cent and rising, whereas today it is 5.8 per cent and falling. The prime interest rate 10 years ago today was 22.75 per cent and rising, whereas today it is 8.7 per cent and falling. The unemployment rate 10 years ago was 12.8 per cent and rising, now it is 10.5 per cent and falling.

It is important to note that there have been settlements with Treasury Board and the bargaining units with Treasury Board that have respected the wage restraint program of the budget and several bargaining units. Let me give just a few examples. Two groups, the engineering and land survey group and also the physical sciences group, have ratified settlements that date back to September 1, 1990 and June 16, 1990 respectively. In those two they agreed to a 4.5 per cent for last year, zero per cent for this year and then 3 per cent following. So they are abiding by the zero and three announced in the budget. The physical science group is the same, 4.5 per cent, then zero, then three.

The translators have just come to an agreement and they are accepting 4.7 per cent for last year and are now in the zero per cent for this year and 3 per cent following.

Since the February budget, the air traffic controllers settled for 4.5 per cent last year, zero now, followed by three and three. The ships' officers settled for the same.

The PSAC, are at 4.2 per cent from last year and we are now asking them to accept the zero and the three program which others have concluded in various agreements with the President of Treasury Board.

Other points have been raised. One of the questions raised or points made by some in the media and even some here in the House, although I am amazed that anyone here in the House would dare to do it because the facts just do not bear it up, comparing MP's salaries and those in the Public Service.

Between 1984 and 1990, salary increases for MPs totalled 17.6 per cent. That is compared to inflation, which rose by 29.6 per cent. Wage increases for public servants, over the same period, rose by 25.5 per cent. In the public sector, salary increases over that period went up 29.6 per cent. So in all cases MPs are at the bottom of that list, not at the top, as some are suggesting.

The wage restraint policy announced in the February budget will further restrain salary increases for MPs. MPs are not asking public servants to accept anything that they are not prepared to endure. The bottom line is that MPs are going to be treated exactly the same as public servants. We will have to go into the zero for our next year which begins on January 1, 1992. For that year our increase will be zero. So we will be in exactly the same program.

Nobody has referred to something that happened historically. In 1985 the Prime Minister demonstrated leadership by accepting and putting into a budget a 15 per cent pay cut for himself, a 10 per cent for all cabinet ministers and then all MPs received a $1,000 pay cut. Nobody is talking about those things. Everybody conveniently ignores all of that. The truth is that the exact same program that applies to the public servants applies to us and I think it is time we say so.

Upper management in the Public Service is also being treated exactly the same way. So are the military, the RCMP, every single department that works for government. It is time we start saying that the only difference is when that calendar year begins. Everybody is affected by the zero, three and three. I think that is the key point which has to be put out so that everyone knows we are all being treated equally.

The fact that Canadians are forced to endure yet another postal and now a Public Service strike is deplorable and I think it is unacceptable for the 1990s. Surely it is time to bring in some new attitudes and policies that will make strikes in the public sector obsolete and regard them as a primitive and outmoded means of solving labour-management disputes. Strikes in the private sector have at least some disciplines placed upon them, such as competition with other producers, profit and loss margins and layoffs when a particular business, owners, managers and workers refuse to work together for the competitive success of their products and their labour.

The public sector, however, has few if any such constraints. Public sector employees rarely face competition or seasonal unemployment and they never worry about management going bankrupt. Governments and public sector bargaining units, therefore, either print more money or pass on the costs to their children through higher deficits and deferred taxation or they are forced to raise taxes which, historically, they rarely do.

In a private sector strike those who feel the brunt of the pressure are the workers on the one hand and the management on the other and both could lose everything if the strike is too long. However, in a public sector strike it is the public at large that suffers; innocent pensioners, the disabled, the unemployed, those requiring government services, businesses relying on customs clearances, air travel, and on and on it goes. They all suffer. The list is endless. The cost to Canadians in dollars and in morale and foreign competition is immeasurable. Therefore, I think it is time that we in this House, and I would invite all parties to consider this, and particularly the government, to correct what I think is a grievous error of the Pearson administration in 1967. The Public Service Alliance and the postal strikes and the bargaining processes, once those are all out of the way and we get this back-to-work legislation passed, and we hopefully bring back peace to our relationship with the PSAC, and once we get the postal thing out of the way through the bargaining process now under way, then I think it would be time to introduce legislation to replace the right to strike in all public services with dispute-settling procedures and firm arbitration deadlines. We will then restore Canada's international reputation as a nation where people work together in harmony and with realism and with acceptance of one another rather than the strikes, the confrontation, and the hatred we have witnessed over this past five weeks and unfortunately is repeated every two, three, or four years.

I say with all sincerity: let us get on with that agenda as well and reconsider the error that we once committed here in this House. Let us end that process. I urge everyone to quickly pass this bill so we can have the workers in the Public Service back serving the public as their name implies.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by reminding the hon. member that even though it was Mr. Pearson, as he mentioned, who introduced the right to strike, in subsequent periods of disagreement with the Public Service Alliance over many years of Liberal government, we never hesitated to legislate public servants back from a strike. What we always did was put a mediator in. That is the fundamental difference between our approach to this problem and the government's.

I have listened to the government speakers for most of the day and all of us in this House are well aware of the suffering that is going on in our communities, whether it is international airports that are being slowed down, or problems in the west with shipping our grain, and I am going to repeat this as often as I can this week. There is absolutely no way that we are less sensitive to these issues and the government should not suggest that we are less sensitive.

In my community of downtown Toronto the unemployment has never, ever, been as high as it is today. People are in pain. They are suffering and you cannot live in Toronto on an unemployment insurance cheque. You cannot live in Toronto on a welfare cheque. You just cannot do it. I cannot wait until we get focused in this House on ways in which we can put people back to work.

I want to ask this member who talks about the government's position so confidently that if he is so confident in his sense of fairness, if his judgment is that the way this is being handled is so fair, then why should he not want to put a mediator in to analyse all of the factors on both sides of this debate?

I do not think you should be putting in a sort of precondition. I have never been in any kind of a negotiation between labour and management where you put a precondition. I would like to ask the hon. member who is from Kitchener whether the just in time delivery mechanism is so important for his auto parts manufacturers. If these plants do not get those trucks just in time the whole factory shuts down. For the sake of pride, it is not the Public Service that is leading this country it is the government. When will the government take the lead?

Put a mediator in there so that those just in time deliveries can get going which will affect the manufacturing in his riding as well as in every other riding across the country.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the tone in which the member has asked the question. Also, I empathize with his constituents and the problems that they are going through. That is true for Canadians right across Canada which he has mentioned. It is serious, and I think that is what he is saying as well.

He is looking for a means out of this dilemma. It part of the purpose of his question.

I tried to suggest remedies in my comments. Let me just briefly reiterate that the President of the Treasury Board has tried through 60 days of negotiating sessions. He has tried through 30 days of conciliation proceedings. He has also made an offer as a result of the Public Service board which has Mr. Deans as the chairman. He suggested that negotiations should resume.

With respect to that, the President of the Treasury Board says: "Yes, we are willing to go back to the table without preconditions, except for what we did in the budget." You see there is another problem here, Madam Speaker. It is that Mr. Bean has also said that he does not want to go back, no matter with whom, if this zero and three is there.

What we have to do is bring in this back-to-work legislation and then say to the two parties: You must now talk. It is not as though we are the only ones doing this.

I pointed out how six different governments are doing this. Some of them have done it retroactively on agreements already signed. The reason for that is that we cannot simply keep going on and on piling up more and more deficit and debt because then we will never ever stop the inflation cycle. We will never regain the competitiveness for the workers who are unemployed in his riding or the workers unemployed in mine. That is also behind this.

We are saying: I am sorry. Right now it is going to apply to everybody and we must do this. We are willing to negotiate on all other issues, but on that one we must take a stand. Six other provinces have done the same.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I just want to make a comment and ask my colleague from Kitchener a question with regard to the back-to-work legislation.

As everybody has mentioned, it has hurt all of us right across the country. Coming from the west, of course, the shipment of grain out off the west coast is extremely important.

When the strike initiated, there were five ships in the harbour and there are 41 more coming and waiting to enter, which puts us pretty close to 50 ships that cannot be loaded. This means a great deal for our prairie farmers and indeed for all Canadians across the country.

I too have heard from a lot of constituents who feel very strongly that the Public Service should not really have the right to bring the country economically to a standstill. I am learning more. I think this is really a political strike, where things are different, and yes, my colleague from the other side mentioned that there was mediation some years ago when the Liberals were in power.

We are under a different set of circumstances and a different philosophy and, indeed, the right philosophy. It is called restraint. It is called deficit reduction and debt reduction. Our main goal is not to saddle our children and our grandchildren with the amount of deficit and debt that this country is now carrying. In order to do that, we have to act on every measure and every department.

As my colleague from Kitchener mentioned as well, every one of us in this House and every one of us working for the government is being subjected to the zero, three, three formula.

He mentioned something that was most interesting with regard to what he thought should come down the road in the future. Perhaps the right to strike that was given to the Public Service in 1967 should be removed and it should have binding arbitration.

• (1550)

I have to agree with him. I just wonder if he would comment on binding arbitration or the dispute settlement mechanism.

Mr. Reimer: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question and the comments made. I think it is time that we look at this question of strikes in the Public Service. In my mind, they should all be gone. We should take them away.

We have to change the legislation of 1967. I wish provinces would also look at it, with regard to teachers—my background was a teacher—and as they have done for other things. With all public servants, whoever they are, none should have the right to strike. That is my view.

The reason I say that is because the disciplines that take place in the private sector do not apply in the public sector. We cannot compare the two. That is the reason why we need a different mechanism. There are constraints in the private sector in a strike. They fall equally on both workers and management. They have to work it out or they both lose.

Who is the constraint in a Public Service strike? No one. There is rarely competition. Who goes bankrupt? No one. It is loaded on the future or if you have some sense of responsibility, you tax them. No one says that in here. I have not heard opposition members against us say: "We would like them to get more and we are prepared to say yes to higher taxes". No one has said that.

In other words, I think in response to the question, yes I would like us to revoke what we did in 1967. Take away the right to strike in the Public Service at both federal and provincial levels. Provinces would have to do that themselves, but we could take the leadership.

Then we bring in a system in which we know that a contract comes up to a certain date, then immediately an arbitration process kicks in, then immediately a conciliator process kicks in and if necessary, finally then a mediator closes and you must accept. I think we can do that. That is my response to the member.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I wish it were as easy and as simple as the hon. member for Kitchener suggests. All we have do is pass this legislation and there shall be harmony between government and its employees. I can think of many instances in which we would like to have that kind of a system. I can suggest places where they have tried to do it that way and those governments are now falling apart all over the world.

It is not that easy to say there shall be harmony. That is one of the things that worries me about the legislation we are considering right now.

It would seem to me that we are rushing toward a precipice. We are going to have a choice mighty soon of going over the edge or backing up. From the remarks I heard earlier today from the hon. House leader for the government, there seems to be some possibility that we will be backing up. I dearly hope that will be the case.

This legislation is doing something different. In spite of the remarks by the hon. member for Kitchener, and other speakers have said this in their own way, this legislation is different. It does not provide for any way of settling the arguments between the representatives of the employees and the employer. It simply says that the arguments shall cease and for a period of three years there shall be no bargaining rights. It wipes out all of those rights for three years.

As I said earlier, that has been tried in other countries and those countries are falling apart. In my father's native land of Croatia, look what is happening there where there was a decree that there shall be harmony between the various nations making up the Union of South Slavs, Yugoslavia. It just does not work.

That is what we are getting into, legislation that will wipe out all bargaining rights, legislation which will say what will be the position of the employees for the next three years, and we are going to make them like it.

The President of the Treasury Board said that once this legislation is passed, he is prepared to meet with the representatives of the employees and have a cup of tea, I suppose.

I do not know what else they could do together with that legislation facing the representatives of the public employees. We do not have to jump. As I said earlier, I am hoping that the discussions that are now going on will mean that we will not be jumping, we will be backing up and taking a saner look at what has been going on.

The representatives of the employees, to my knowledge, have always said they are ready to bargain. They have not set any preconditions, they have set certain goals. They wanted some progress toward equal pay for work of equal value, they wanted some progress toward privatizing government services, and they wanted job security. The President of the Treasury Board said: "We have been negotiating for 60 days and we have made no progress". What kind of progress, what kind of negotiations?

First let us look at the pay increase that, to the best of my knowledge, was never talked about by the union, but it is always one of the things that unions would like to bring up. The budget said you can have a 3 per cent pay increase in the first year, as long as you will accept the fact that the total cost of wages must remain the same. It is the ones at the bottom rungs who will be laid off because he also said we are going to have to lay off enough so that there will be no increase in the cost of wages. That would mean to the union that if you want to accept layoffs of perhaps one in twenty of the people working in the Public Service, then the remaining ones working can share a 3 per cent wage increase. In the second year, a 3 per cent increase again and another 3 per cent in the third year.

He said: "You have until June to accept this. No point in talking, we will not talk about it at all, that is the condition; you have to accept it now and know that one in twenty of your comrades is going to be laid off, or don't accept it and then you will get a zero per cent wage increase for those who are working for the government".

I have to wonder, was the government being deliberately confrontational? Was the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of the government hoping to push the union into a position where it could not possibly say yes? How could any union leader accept those conditions? A zero per cent wage increase and then 3 and then 3—up to 3. He never said they would get 3 per cent in the second year or 3 per cent in the third year; that was the maximum. It could be anything under that. One knows, too, what can happen to legislation in the second year and the third year.

Those kinds of conditions expect the union to accept that in the first year of a contract it is in effect going to be receiving dollars this year that will be worth 6 per cent less; for every hundred dollars it got it would buy $6 less in value than it would the year before. In other words, it is taking a pay decrease of 6 per cent in the first year, and it is supposed to accept that graciously, and then accept a further decrease in the second year of perhaps one, two, three per cent, we do not know. We do not know that it is going to be a 3 per cent increase, nor do we have any idea at all what inflation will be in the second year. The workers have to sign a contract saying that they are prepared to live within 3 per cent, but the government is signing no contract to say that inflation will not be any more than 6 or 5 or 4 or 3 or 2 or 10 per cent.

There is no agreement on the government side that it is going to control it. It wants to, it has set its targets, but certainly its success in meeting those targets in the last seven years of Tory rule would indicate to me that it is going to be somewhere in the vicinity—maybe half way or something like that—but certainly it has not met with any degree of success in reaching the targets it has established for inflation, for interest rates, for deficit, for debt. None of those targets has been anywhere near met. And yet the workers are supposed to believe that if they accept this sacrifice then the government will meet its targets and they will not be any worse off than the government predicts in making this offer to them.

Is the union leader supposed to accept that and go back to his union members, 150,000 strong, and say: "This is the deal I made, aren't I great?" Can you imagine just how long that union leader would last? Madam Speaker, if you were voting, would you vote for that kind of a leader? Nobody could accept that. The President of the Treasury Board knows that could not be acceptable. He knew that the union would never agree to those, could never agree to them, and yet went ahead as though we were marching—not realizing there was a precipice there—safely along and everything was going well, and the union would cave.

Did the President of Treasury Board have in mind that is what would happen? The PSAC would lead its members into a strike, a strike that would not be supported by the membership and that if some of them did go out for the first day or two then they would come back to work because they could see that their fellows were not marching with them on the picket lines.

It did not work that way. I think the government did make a mistake. I hope that is the case. I hope it did not want to have the kind of confrontation we are dealing with today. I am not sure, but I am hoping it thought it could destroy the union. To its credit, the union has proven that it is capable of taking on the government and surviving and growing stronger as the days roll by, rather than weaker. It is tough for it.

The hon. member for Kitchener again talked about the privation and the way people are suffering. Every union leader knows that no trade unionist on the picket line is going to come out of that strike any better off than he went into it. They are the ones who are guaranteed to lose. They cannot possibly get enough of an increase to make up for any length of a strike. It does not work that way. The ones who come behind them do gain. The ones on the picket line are not doing it for themselves, they are doing it for the principles involved and they are doing it for the people who are coming behind them.

In the private sector when there are these kinds of worker management disputes and disruptions, sometimes the employer wins and sometimes he loses. The workers always lose. In the public sector, generally the employer wins because he is paying less wages out, although there are costs associated with a strike.

I have forgotten which cabinet minister pointed out that they cannot allocate the profits from this to the debt reduction because they cannot determine just how much will be gained. There are losses. Everyone loses whenever there is any kind of a worker–management dispute that ends in a withdrawal of services. There is no question about that.

There are other people who suffer as well. There are people who are suffering because of this. There have also been some excellent examples, to me, of the way in which the trade unionists are trying to co–operate and trying to help. I visited picket lines in three communities in my own riding on Vancouver Island. I saw trade unionists talking with people who were coming to try to get some service from the government. I heard them telling people: "You can phone or write and tell us what your problem is and we will give you the best advice we have as to how you can get the service you need". In the event that going into the office and being serviced by one of the people working there was the best way of getting it, then they were invited to go through the picket line into the office and get what they needed.

There are stories in the newspapers about what is happening in other communities. I can only tell you what is happening in Nanaimo, in Duncan, in my own constituency on four different locations. They were cheering, good natured and looking forward to the end of the strike because they are not getting paid. They were doing everything they could to make it easier on the individuals involved.

If it were up to the union, I think there is no question that the farmers on the prairies would not be suffering. It does not want to take it out on them, but neither does it want to be taken advantage of by a government that could have acted on this much sooner.

If the government really wanted to keep the grain moving, as was pointed out earlier, a year ago it could have designated those people as essential servants and they would have been working.

Alternatively, the government miscalculated and thought there would be no strike. The strike started a week ago Monday. It did not have to wait until Monday of this week to call us together. It could have called us together on the Tuesday and taken action immediately. It chose not to. It wanted people to suffer some first in the hope that public reaction would be so damaging to the union movement that the union members themselves would cave.

I walk to these buildings every morning about 7 a.m., and I greet strikers as I walk along. They are getting positive honks from car horns and people are walking by with thumbs up. I know that was happening in my own riding of Nanaimo—Cowichan. To this point, at least, I believe from what I have observed that the strikers have public sympathy and public support. Certainly there are individuals who have criticized them, not because they are getting hurt, but because they just do not like people being on strike.

I had a discussion with one of those individuals and the hon. member from Kitchener reminded me of it when he spoke. He said they should not have the right to strike. That is not the point. They have, for 24 years, had the right to strike. It was given to them by government.

If you are going to take it away from them, be honest about it and say that with respect to public servants, we need a different way of handling things. It does not even have to be forced. These kinds of arrangements have been negotiated with employees previously by other governments and in other circumstances. It can be done by negotiation, by agreement and the procedure for handling disputes can be negotiated, but you do not, in spite of what the hon. member from Kitchener believes, get harmony by saying that from this day on there shall be harmony. It does not work that way.

But you can get it by sitting down with people and being reasonable with them. That does work. It can work. It is not the time to do it now, I would think, with the government having pushed the situation to the point that it has, but it can work. It is the method that I wish this government could have adopted from the beginning.

The minister of Treasury Board says he is happy to sit down with the PSAC, not necessarily himself, but certainly have his representative sit down with the union representative just as soon as we pass this legislation. I get the impression that events are overtaking that and that something else will be happening soon. In the event that it does not, I think it is too late for him to hope for some kind of improvement in relations because that is what he is talking about, improving the relations.

Why are relations so bad? Is it because they have not been willing to talk to each other? Why have they not talked? As I said, you cannot talk when one side says: "These shall be the limits on pay increases, the upper limits not the bottom limits." When it comes to the other factors, when it comes to job security, he said in his speech: "We will not accept." When it comes to equal pay for work of equal value: "That is not our business. It is up to the Human Rights Commission." When it comes to contracting out: "We must seek the most effective or efficient way." He did not say: "as we see it", but that is what he meant.

Having said all that, is he going to make friends with the representatives of the PSAC? Why does he not say: "We will not talk, but let us go to the room." That is not the way to establish any kind of rapport between the two groups. The minister has a long way to go if he is going to try to establish any kind of friendly relations with the trade union.

We have been told that we must pass this legislation. We have to have the zero, three and three limits or we will damage our road toward recovery. Is the road to recovery so narrow and so hard to traverse that a 3 per cent increase in salaries to public servants is not feasible? An amount that represents some two and one-half days worth of interest on the public debt, a debt which has been more than tripled by the Tory government in a mere seven years. In spite of that kind of a record, it says that we will damage our reputation internationally, we will damage the road to recovery if we incur expenditures amounting to another two and one-half days worth of interest. Alternatively, this is one-eighth of the amount that we have been spending to keep Canadian forces in Europe looking for Russians who are getting home just as fast as they possibly can. As soon as they can find some place to go to back home, they are going. They are running out of East Germany and running out of eastern Europe. Yet, we have to be spending $1.2 billion a year. I believe that is changing too. I have not heard the announcement, but I understand that is changing as well.

An hon. member: It is the same as it was.

Mr. Stupich: It is the same as it was. It is still costing $1.2 billion. A one-eighth reduction in that amount of money would provide enough to give the civil servants that increase. That is a lot of money to you and I as individuals, a lot of money to Canadians as individuals or as groups.

But to say that incurring expenditures of $150 million when the minister himself argues that we should be moving toward pay equity, when the Prime Minister said that the funds are available, have been set aside to achieve pay equity, a solemn promise during the election campaign—

An hon. member: During the throne speech too.

Mr. Stupich: During the throne speech as well, I am reminded. Is that price too high? Is that the price that is going to destroy Canada economically? If that is the case, then we are in a bad way. It is not because we have been in office. The Tories have been in office and have had complete control for the last seven years. If in that period they have brought us to that sad state of affairs, then they have a lot to answer for.

I do not believe it is that bad. I do not believe even the Tories could have us in that bad a position in seven years, as much as they might try. And that is another point. Why are we fighting this recession? Why are we asking the lowest paid people in the Public Service to contribute? We are not asking others to contribute.

There was a story in The Toronto Star that I used the other day where the recession is the headline: "The recession does not hurt bosses' pay." A survey shows Toronto executive raises averaged 7.7 per cent in 1990. That is the increase in pay. It was less than they expected, but then the bonuses, of course, made up for it to some extent. Bonuses were targeted last year at an average 46 per cent on a base salary of $131,200. The bonus last year for them was only $44,608 each. Why not ask them to contribute to the recession? It is only the ones we can get at so easily, the ones at the bottom.

We have to defeat this legislation if it comes to a vote, but I hope, Madam Speaker, that will not happen. I hope the legislation will be withdrawn, that another way out of this will be found, and all Canadians will be the better off for it.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, it was most interesting to hear the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan reflect on his position and that of his party with respect to the bill and the legislation that is before us today.

I am going to put a very simple question to my colleague in the House. I just received from a little weekly newspaper in my district up in the Interlake of Manitoba over my fax machine a paper article about the effects the strike is having on the grain farmer. The headline says: "Grain plugs elevators". Just a little article in today's paper said:

> Elevator managers Frank Fiarchuk in Arborg and Guy Bernier at Fisher Branch said operations were at a standstill with little to do other than field calls from impatient farmers wanting to know when they could bring grain in.
> "There is not much sympathy around here for the civil servants," said Bernier, referring to the nation-wide strike by members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, protesting a zero per cent increase in their salaries.
> "While farmers have had to take a 30 per cent cut, the civil servants are being asked to have their incomes frozen once in their lifetime. Producers are saying that the government had better legislate them back to work—

One thousand farmers at a meeting in Manitoba suggested this is the same situation.

These are ordinary Canadians who are trying to make a livelihood, trying to just make a living. In the fall they are to deliver their grain. He knows how seriously the markets have gone down in value for grain farmers. The question I ask: are these producers not within their rights to demand that these people return to work in the way we are going to legislate them back? Perhaps at some other given time we could maybe bring back a higher return on their wages. Nobody likes strikes. I do not like this strike. I do not think anybody in this room likes to see this happen.

I can recall, as can members opposite, that I was a farmer when the Liberal administration brought in the six and five per cent. You remember that too. I was absolutely shocked when they broke their own rules. The question then is: Here is some grassroots representation suggesting that the government does, in fact, legislate these people back to work, and do you not accept that they have an important cause to be concerned about as well?

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question as it gives me an opportunity to add a little to what I said. I would just like to say to the member that now he has participated in the debate in this House, now that he knows we are debating a motion that says this will come to a head next Monday—which is five days from now—then the bill will go to the Senate. Who knows how long or how short it will be there. In other words, it could easily be a week at least before anything is done legislatively. But he knows that his government could have a year ago easily made all of those people essential employees, when there would have been no cessation of grain shipping. He knows that this government could have recalled us a week earlier if it really wanted to get on with this, and chose not to do it. Where was his voice then?

I am sure he will go back and tell his constituents all those items so that they will know it was the Tories that held this up, not the opposition.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan. I listened to his remarks and he made a lot of sense. But I would just like to ask him a very specific question.

In Toronto right now we have almost a total shutdown of our economy because of the Toronto Transit Commission strike. The question that I would like to ask him is this. What kind of advice will he be giving to the Premier of Ontario to settle this strike?

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, the first moment that the Premier of Ontario asks me for my advice I will give it to him.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have a brief comment with a question to my friend from Nanaimo—Cowichan. First of all, let me congratulate the members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, especially if I can in Victoria, for the tremendous solidarity they have shown through this strike and the tremendous victory they have really won with the public and I think eventually with the government on this. They went out on strike to call on the government to negotiate, not legislate, and that point, I think, is finally getting through. They won widespread public support and understanding for their cause and I think they are to be congratulated.

When I was on the picket line I found that many of them were there for the first time, they had never been on strike before. They were terribly angry at this government in the way it was treating them and treating their fellow workers.

So I congratulate those who have been on strike. I think the government is finally getting the message that something has to be done and it is time to get back to the bargaining table.

My question to the member is really this, and goes to the human rights and pay equity issues in this. Many of the people who are on the line spoke to me about pay equity. This is a very, very important issue to those who are on the line. They have said to me that they want a message delivered to this Parliament that pay equity is important for the people in the Public Service of Canada who do such a tremendous job for the people of Canada. Could the member outline to us the recommendations of the Human Rights Commission on this and give us his comments on this aspect of this dispute?

Mr. Stupich: I recall seeing three conciliation board reports dealing with this issue, and one of them recommended an increase of some 6 per cent as being reasonable under the circumstances. It would be my hope that whatever amount of money is available, from whatever source, in the event that we get to that, that the money would be used in a way that would bring up the people at the bottom—and, of course, that is dealing mostly with the ones who are suffering from pay inequity. I would like to see that happen. Now, again, my advice has not been sought on this, but certainly, Madam Speaker, I think all of us would like to see more progress towards equal pay for work of equal value, and I would hope that the money would go primarily towards that.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I am worried. I wonder if the speeches being made now are for the gallery. Has the government resigned? No minister is present. Could you tell me whether this country still has a government?

• (1620)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see that the hon. member for Shefford has not lost his sense of humour over the summer. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture): Madam Speaker, it is with a great deal of concern that I rise in the House today to speak on the necessity for this bill.

I do not think that there is anybody in Canada who wishes that we were in this position, certainly not the government. I hear from the members across that they do not wish for this either. I am sure that government employees would rather be at work than out on the picket line and facing this legislation.

The government has been compelled to introduce this legislation simply to put an end to the strike. It is a very undesirable situation that nobody wishes they were in. This activity is threatening the livelihood of Canadians and it is disrupting many of the Canadian activities that we all wish to enjoy in perfect freedom.

The fact of the matter is that Canadians cannot get their wheat to market. The farmers are dumping their crops in the field. Whole shifts of auto workers and food industry workers are unable to go to work. They are being sent home because their products are caught in lines at the border. Air service has been disrupted, and people are having a difficult time getting passports to rejoin loved ones in other parts of the world because passport offices are closed and providing only essential services.

In addition to this, incidents continue to occur on the picket line and these are things that are very intimidating to the average Canadian. For example, government workers who are part of the essential service and who are supposed to go to work are intimidated from crossing the picket lines, and I think this is a matter of great stress to them.

As well, the elderly, the disabled and others who go out to do daily business and happen to have business in a building that may house government workers are intimidated when they see loud picketers carrying two–by–fours and waving signs angrily, forming a human barrier between the individual and their goal. It is very intimidating for them.

These are things that I think nobody here wants to see continued. This bill will extend the collective agreements of the Public Service workers, and therefore eliminate the legal right to strike.

The bill will also provide fines for unions and those public workers who do not abide by the legislation. As well, this bill will enable the government to implement the wage restraint programs that it must implement since it was not able to negotiate these restraint programs in the collective bargaining process.

Indeed, the leaders of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which is the largest government union, have steadfastly rejected the government's budget decision. It has rejected all attempts to resolve the situation and to avoid a strike. The Alliance negotiators have refused to lower their earlier demands. These demands increase the cost to the taxpayer by about 40 per cent.

They have insisted that there cannot be any agreement on wages. They could not reach agreement on wages without major concessions concerning things that would very much affect the ability of taxpayers to bear the burden. They want full job security, for example, in their collective agreements. They want the elimination of regional rates of pay. They want capitulation to the union's idea of equal pay for work of equal value, for pay equity, and they want a permanent end to the government's ability to contract out and to have the flexibility to hire at peak times when that becomes necessary. In addition to all of this as you have heard, they want economic increases equivalent to the increase in the cost of living.

The additional demands and the costs associated with the demands of the Alliance are clearly right now not affordable to the Canadian taxpayer. I think that most members, if they were being very direct and very honest, would agree. Nevertheless the Alliance called a general strike. It is telling that their leader has vowed that he will disobey the law and that he is prepared to go to jail if this legislation is passed. There are, I believe, many law–abiding civil servants in the Public Service and clearly PSAC's leader does not represent that element.

The reasoning behind the wage restraints is very simple and very well founded. Right now, and recently during the height of the recent recession, the high interest rate period, many informed taxpayers, many economists and many members of the business community and general public have continually demanded that government reduce its spending and that it take other measures to restore confidence in the Canadian economy.

We have also been asked to set an example, to get our own house in order in order to improve Canada's position and to help ensure in the future that we will be competitive, which will eventually result in more jobs for everyone in the country of Canada. Our response has been decisive but I believe it has also been balanced. We are determined to achieve maximum over-all improvement and to protect the interest of taxpayers while we reduce the effect on the individual employee.

That is why in the February budget speech the government announced the tough but vital package to cut the cost of its programs, to reduce the deficit, to reduce the rate of inflation, to create jobs and to create and to improve Canada's competitive position. These measures included a freeze on the operating costs of government, plain and simple. As a result salaries of employees, managers and federal services are being frozen this year. Salary increases will be held to 3 per cent this year and 3 per cent the following year. Salaries have also been frozen for the Prime Minister and his ministers, and MPs will shoulder their share of the burden as well with no increase next year.

The government's actions send a very strong signal to other levels of government and to other employees and employers that government will control its own spending and that we together can keep inflation down. In fact, other sectors have accepted this signal. Since the budget, seven provinces have also introduced wage restraint measures.

Taxpayers across the country want to see the country's financial house in order and they can see that the budget measures are beginning to benefit all Canadians.

Though unemployment levels are not yet reduced to acceptable levels, as the recent lay-offs at the airlines will certainly attest, we have made some progress. Interest rates are down, housing starts have showed a healthy increase this spring, business investment is up, use of plant facilities is up and trade figures are improving.

I understand that some public servants and their unions find this wage restraint program very difficult to accept. It is not a question of what individuals deserve. It is a question of what we have to do. I believe that the majority of public servants are dedicated individuals with families to support like the rest of us, but they understand these measures are necessary. Unfortunately, zero per cent is all the taxpayers of Canada can afford this year.

I know that federal public employees live in the real world. They pay taxes just like everyone else. I am convinced that many of these, if not their union leaders, realize and can accept why the government has had to take these tough measures. They know that these are temporary but necessary measures to control the government's wage bill and that bill of course is borne by all taxpayers including public servants and they know that it is important to help us reduce the deficit.

Most federal employees know that they already make a relatively good living as well.

I do not want to overstate it, but public employees work in safe environments, they have good pensions, they earn more on the average of $33,000 a year than most Canadians at $27,000 a year, and they enjoy a large measure of job security. There have been only 1,500 involuntary lay-offs in the work force of the Public Service out of about 315,000 employees. Despite the five year downsizing program that this government has been engaged in, I think that is a pretty good record.

I think hon. members would agree that few employees anywhere have better job opportunities than they have in the Public Service. Without fear of exaggeration I dare say that a million and a half out-of-work Canadians, including those who have recently been laid off at the railroads, would gladly trade a zero per cent increase this year for a job.

This is a very desirable place to work. Close to a quarter of a million Canadians, in fact 222,000, applied for jobs in the federal Public Service last year. That is a 38 per cent increase over the applicants the year before, so clearly this is a desirable place to work.

We cannot hire all of them. Only 11,000 appointments were made to the Public Service and that means about one in every 100 applicants was successful. It is pretty clear, as I said before, that federal government jobs are good jobs in spite of wage restraints and that they are attractive jobs and still in high demand.

The government's approach to wage restraint has been forged as I said before out of economic necessity to protect the interests of the taxpayers and it is balanced by a desire to continue collective bargaining with our unions on other issues. There are not all monetary issues. There are other non-monetary benefits and operational issues that will benefit public employees.

The government has a fight, but the fight is not with employees of the government. The fight is against recession and against inflation and we must all share the burden for economic recovery. We are asking public employees to tighten their belts with the rest of us, with all Canadians, and help us get over this particular tough time we are facing. We are simply asking that they help do their share in keeping the inflation to a minimum and we are asking that they work with the rest of Canadians who have been having a difficult time this past year to find a way, a road map, to economic recovery.

It is not easy sometimes to not accept what one has grown used to accepting, but I do not believe there was any guarantee ever written into any law of this country that says that all Canadians have a right to receive an automatic increase in spite of what is going on with the rest of the sectors.

I am confident that public employees will want to help us get through this recession, go back to work when the legislation is passed, and build a better Canada and fight toward economic recovery.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the member for Winnipeg South is a good member of Parliament and I have known her for her seriousness and her kindness. I know she has a heart. My question will deal with the question that begs to be answered.

I have heard several speeches today by members of the government saying that other provincial jurisdictions have imposed a freeze on public service salaries. I want to remind the House that the facts of the matter are that New Brunswick imposed a freeze and I want to read what that freeze also had. I quote from the June 7, 1991, of The Telegraph-Journal: "Wage Freeze becomes Law":

> The government will go ahead with its own plan for aiding low-income workers, Clavette said.

The Minister of Finance.

> Under the plan full-time employees receiving less than $17,500 a year will get a $600 bonus next year, while those earning $17,500 to $20,000 annually will receive $500.

My question is to the member from Winnipeg South, given that Bill C-29 treats everybody the same way, given that I know that she is sensitive to those who, as workers in the Public Service of Canada, are low paid. She knows, like I do, that most of them are women. In my own riding, 20 per cent of the families are single parent families, women mostly with children, earning less than $25,000. Today I have had calls from people earning less than $20,000.

Does she not believe that it would be the decent thing to do to have a kind of arrangement, a kind of an offer, a return to negotiations, a kind of opening to understanding that some public servants need to be looked after, that they are not all fat cats? Certainly she would approve of negotiations to give those people something more than zero next year with the taxes they have to pay like everybody else, with the increased inflation that we have to cope with and with all the problems that she knows exist in this country at this time.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is correct. I would never want to characterize public servants or all public servants as fat cats. Those were never my words and I have never used them.

He used the profile of some of the members of his constituency making less than the average public servant would make as certainly not being fat cats whether they work for the Public Service. I would like to remind the hon. member that many people in the private sector make considerably less overall, based on categories, than people in the public sector.

Generally, if one looks at a clerk working for the government and a clerk working for the private sector, the disparity between the two wages is quite wide. I would remind him that those people pay taxes and their interests are also being protected here.

I might also point out to the hon. member that in addition to that, our public servants enjoy benefits that people in the private sector do not enjoy, including those of dental care, health care, eye glasses and things like that. They do get raises if they are not at the top of their category. If they start and they are within the period of time moving from the beginning wage up to their category, they get an anniversary raise. I would dare say that there are some people right now on the picket line who have or are about to receive their raise when they come back to work.

So it is not quite fair to say that we are dealing with apples and apples. When we look at poor people or people living on less than living wage in the private sector compared to those who are lowly paid in the public sector, I think the public sector have a fair advantage.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may never have referred to people who work for the federal government as fat cats, but I wonder if the hon. member remembers sending me a note in the House last June when Mr. Loiselle announced that if there was no settlement between Treasury Board and the alliance by September that he would impose one. The note said: "Joy, everyone in Canada, including many public servants, agrees with the government on this matter. Your opposition is just helping us. Canadians are sick of seeing their tax dollars go toward protecting well paid employees of government. So you and Daryl keep it up, you are both winning us votes." It was signed Dorothy.

The hon. member on Friday on CBC radio in Winnipeg could not remember that memo and I would be happy to provide a copy of it to the hon. member. I would hope that she would stand in this House and remember it and not try to tell us that a Dorothy from some other place, possibly Oz, wrote this memo.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, as the member stands in her seat, I recall writing her a facetious note last June when she was in the midst of one of her usual rhetorical speeches characterizing, in her usual exaggerated way, the activities of the government against those of the Public Service. Mr. Bean, at that point had, without even going to the negotiating table, told the public that he would not negotiate and that he would defy the government and that he would take his members out on strike. He challenged us and I responded.

As far as my comments are concerned, as I said they were facetious and if they offend anybody, I am fully willing to retract anything that would be offensive, but I do think they are quite true. The majority of Canadians are not in favour of this strike. The majority of Canadians would like to see us use a little restraint, as I have just spent the past 20 minutes pointing out. The majority of Canadians want to see a government strong enough and honest enough to do what is right. I cannot retract those words because I think they are just as correct now as they were then.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member if she agrees that in the event of a dispute between two parties that the two parties have an option to either go to arbitration or to go to court. In this particular situation the government, by refusing to go to arbitration, is admitting that it is in the wrong.

I also want to ask her if she would agree with the member for Lanark—Carleton, who on Friday called the public servants fat cats. Would she agree that the hon. member, as a member of the cabinet, should retract that statement?

Would she not agree that pay equity, morale, lack of resources and contracting out are very important subjects for the government to look at in the very near future and that it has failed to do so in the past?

Finally, would the hon. member not agree that it is extremely important before we start cutting the salaries of the public servants, especially those at the lowest end, and before we start cutting jobs all across the board, that the federal government should somehow make an assessment to find out whether we have a surplus of public servants?

Just for the information of members, I would like to add that contracting out in terms of term employees and part-time employees has increased dramatically over the past five years, which leads the public and me to believe that there is no surplus of pubic servants. I would suggest that is very positive for the government to do a proper assessment to see what we have in terms of public servants and what we really need. In my view, it will find out there is a shortage.

The hon. member and many of my colleagues on all sides of the House will recognize that in departments such as employment and immigration, foreign affairs, health and welfare and many others, there is a need for more manpower rather than less. Situations like the one we are in certainly is not helping morale at all.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, I will just point out to the hon. member that last year, I believe, we spent $314 million in lump sum payments to members of the Public Service for pay equity and that there is another further $76 million per year being spent to try and equalize the wages between males and females. I do not think it is fair to characterize what we are doing as nothing, because we are doing a lot. We may not be doing precisely what the union is asking, but we are doing what we should be doing.

The hon. member made a comment about contracting out. I am very glad he brought that question forward. I think there is a very big misunderstanding out there. The accounting of contracting out, the number that is published, includes all contracting out, whether it is having garbage removed or whatever. I cannot think of any number examples, but it does not just include employment. It does not just include people coming in to perform term contract work. It includes purchases and other things that are characterized as contracting out.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and comments has expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nepean (Mrs. Gaffney)—employment; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Butland)—the steel industry; the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Rideout)—highways; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby (Ms. Black)—the Canada Assistance Plan; the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel (Mr. Ouellet)—the garment industry.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester.

Mr. Eugene Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House today to defend Canada's Public Service, since these are the people who enable Parliament to function.

Through Bill C-29, this government has decided to come down on its own employees. Yesterday, in front of the Parliament Buildings, I saw the RCMP, arms linked, to protect the government against a group of public servants who only wanted to tell the public at the top of their voices that they were setting the short end of the stick and that they wanted to be treated fairly and equitably.

That is how this government treats its employees.

[English]

This forcing of employees back to work with threats, not with sticks luckily, not with guns but with threats of $1,000 a day fines, I find absolutely abominable.

The government has decided to fight the recession which it created itself. It is a government created recession. It wants to fight it on the backs of employees.

An hon. member: On the backs of everybody.

Mr. Bellemare: Of everybody, someone suggested from across. That is what it has been doing. It has been picking on one group. It has been picking on the other group. It has picked on the fisheries. It has picked on the forestry industry. It has picked on the grain farmers in the west. It has picked on about anything that is moving but big business.

The government has brought in the free trade agreement which encouraged people to go to the United States to buy. It encouraged trucking firms to go across the border and register. It has encouraged people to purchase across the border. It has struck the—

—the fisheries, which affected the entire industry on the Atlantic and Pacific coast.

[English]

The government has struck hard at the unemployed. It costs more now to be insured in the unemployment insurance, and one gets less benefits.

The lumber industry has been affected. Agriculture in Ontario and Quebec has been affected. The potato growers in P.E.I and New Brunswick, where is the government protecting them? I do not see it protecting potato growers. The government is protecting only one group: its fat friends, big business.

Companies are all going south. Industries are moving south. It is to their advantage. Presently it is south of the border in the United States. With the free trade agreement with Mexico, it could be south of the second border.

[Translation]

The government is giving its public servants short shift. Public employees are there to serve the Canadian community and to look after our security and safety. This year, the RCMP will have 0 per cent. The cost of living has gone up 6.4 per cent. Meat inspectors, food inspectors and drug inspectors are being shafted by this government. Zero per cent is all they will get, while the cost of living has gone up 6.4 per cent. The government decided to increase the cost of living by introducing the Goods and Services Tax.

[English]

They want to reduce the deficit so they want to do it on the backs of public servants today. As a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I would like to suggest that they cut some foolishness instead, such as the junk mail they produce constantly. They produced over $25 million worth of junk mail when the budget came down. They produced and distributed it across Canada and they called it communications and education. I say that is waste, waste, waste. Imagine educating and communicating to people in a glossy form that you are going to tax and surtax them and knock them down and kick their teeth in.

I hear from across the way comments about communications and so on. I will communicate one item in particular that I saw at the public accounts committee meetings when this present government dedicated $200 million to the research of oil in eastern Canada. Most of it was wasted. One item in particular that sticks in my mind was building two bridges with no roads leading to or going away from the bridge. That is waste. Stop wasting money. They built a highway in the middle of a forest that belonged to one of their ministers. It led from nowhere to nowhere for no good reason that I could think of, except maybe to raise the value of the property.

That is the type of government we have. It protects its own, but it will bash anything and anybody that is in its way.

I find public servants to be honourable, professional people who work hard. Despite the fact that I am getting negative comments from members on the government side, I will tell them that public servants are there to serve them. They are the motor. They are the ones who protect them.

—who enforce your laws and regulations. These are the people who protect the community against fraudulent business practices. Who is going to protect us against people who want to sell tainted meat? I want to be sure my government protects me, and the people who enforce these laws are public servants. Not so long ago, you took on—

[English]

Not so long ago crew members of our Coast Guard ships who were making only $19,000 a year to risk their lives on the high seas saving other people were forced back to work. That is the kind of heart that they have. As a matter of fact, I would say they are heartless. That is called, in case they do not remember, search and rescue operations.

When they see airplanes crashing people out there who are not in the Public Service wonder who is inspecting the maintenance of planes? Who is checking the planes? Who is checking the fabrication of planes? What is being done to these people and their families?

Awhile ago it was mentioned that people are complaining because when they get to the airport they find a strike. Obviously, if there is a strike, it is going to be disruptive and it is going to be an annoyance. It is not the fault of the worker if there is a strike. It is because someone is terrorizing them, and that is called government terrorism. That is what it is.

When members of the public go to the pharmacy and purchase items they want to be assured that public servants are checking these drugs when they are initially produced in our country or when they are produced elsewhere and brought here. They want to know that. They want to make sure that what they are taking is correct and proper and that they do not get into problems like the Thalidomide problem of a few years ago.

[Translation]

Customs officiers are supposed to protect the economy of the country. Together with the police, they are also supposed to prevent drugs from being smuggled into Canada. There are any number of criminals who would like to smuggle all kinds of things into the country like arms, rifles, machine guns and especially drugs. We need protection against these people, against these criminals. Public servants are supposed to protect us, so cannot afford to come down on these people. We cannot treat them like machines. We cannot walk all over them just because the economy is in bad shape.

When the economy is in bad shape and the rate of inflation is 6.4 per cent and they get a 0 per cent increase, that is intolerable.

The government is responsible for interest rates. When interest rates are excessively high, the provinces, the country, municipalities, school boards, and so forth, are all forced to borrow at high rates. The provinces, school boards and municipalities then have to raise their taxes to be able to pay these interest rates. About one-third of all taxes raised by municipalities, provinces, and the federal government is used to pay the interest charges on the debt.

Public servants are supposed to serve the community. These are people who work very hard and who do a good job. I know what I am talking about. I have more than 20,000 public servants in my riding, and I have met several. They have a sense of duty, and they are very much aware of the spirit and culture of this country. They want to preserve and promote all the good things in this country. I know they are hard workers. I know they are honest people. I know they are people who co-operate with their employer, with governments. I know them as dedicated people. That is the only way I know them. I don't know them the way this government knows them, and in my opinion, the government has destroyed its relationship with its employees.

[English]

Yesterday, the Public Service Alliance of Canada was in court with the Treasury Board. They received a decision from the Public Service Staff Relations Board that said: "The obligation provided under the Public Service Staff Relations Act to bargain in good faith and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement is not substantively different for this employer than it is for any other employer in any jurisdiction in Canada. Accordingly the board declares that the employer", meaning the Government of Canada, "has acted contrary to section 51 of the act", its own law, "and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the act". This is an odd way to operate. Can you imagine the government being the judge and the player all at once?

• (1700)

An hon. member: Judge, jury and executioner.

Mr. Bellemare: It is the judge, the jury and the executioner.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I want to ask the government to be fair and equitable in the way it treats Canadians across this country.

THE ENVIRONMENT

USE OF RESOURCES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should require each government department and agency to include in their budget submissions an accounting of the use of resources whose use or disposal has an impact on the environment and annual targets for reduction and to report any associated cost savings.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I want to begin speaking on this motion by quoting from Gro Harlem Bruntland, the chair of the World Commission on Environment and Development, the landmark report that gave us the concept of sustainable development. To put it in every simple terms, it says that we do not have a paper industry if we do not have any trees left. Our economy depends on preserving our environment just as our environment depends on good economic practices.

With this principle in mind and with Canadians from coast to coast making a conscious effort to turn off lights in empty rooms, not run water, recycle as much as possible, one has to ask what is the federal government doing to keep tabs on its own wasteful or responsible environmental habits.

Last fall government members described as premature my private member's motion to establish the function of an environmental auditor general with responsibility for reporting environmentally unsound practices within federal government operations and recommending obviously positive improvements.

There is another opportunity this evening to show that government is prepared not only to legislate but to lead and that there is a real commitment to greening the government. I am seeking the support of all parliamentarians for a motion now that proposes a much more simple process that can be simply integrated into our existing budget process. What is proposed is progressive action that can save money, deal with the debt and the deficit, and help the environment.

The motion before us is that every federal department or agency should include in its annual budget an accounting of how much it spends on resources where the use or disposal of those resources has an impact on the environment, including setting annual targets for reduction and reporting yearly on how much money is saved.

Private sector companies are already realizing phenomenal savings and phenomenal increases in productivity and efficiency from pollution prevention. The 3M company, for instance, started with a program to reduce waste, reduce costs and improve efficiency called its world-wide 3P program—Pollution Prevention Pays. This program has resulted in savings of $25 million in the first year and a total to date of $500 million in new annual savings. That is counting savings only in the first year in which they occur, not in every year thereafter when they recur.

As the green plan pointed out, the federal government is the largest single business in Canada. It purchases more than $9 billion each year of commercial, consumer and industrial goods. Cutting just 10 per cent from that bill would mean a 3 per cent reduction in the annual deficit.

A preliminary inquiry to a sampling of departments revealed some surprising opportunities for reducing the depletion of natural resources and damage to the earth's ecosystem caused by government operations while saving large amounts of money.

Transport Canada, for example, consumes a whopping $41.8 million in energy for buildings and vehicles annually. Environment Canada, one of our smaller departments, adds nearly $14 million to the taxpayers' energy bill every year. Cutting back in energy usage across operations would save money and would cut the impact of operations on global climate change, ozone depletion, and postpone or eliminate the need for new and expensive electricity generation.

Paper use is another frontier for saving both dollars and the environment. We have to remember that every time we use a resource we have multiple impact. We have the impact of drawing the resource from the environment. We have the impact of the cost of that resource. We have the impact on the environment during the course of its use in the case of energy for instance, and we have the impact of disposing of it.

Environment Canada alone spends $2 million for paper every year, representing depletion of forest resources, damage to waterways in the manufacturing process, energy costs to process and then haul it away as garbage and an unnecessary load on landfill sites.

The costs of garbage disposal, water, sewage and virtually all products used in government operations, if we do not use them carefully and wisely, all these products derive from natural resources. Their use can be cut back by a careful look at how much is being used, how much it is costing and how we, too, like private sector companies, can reduce waste and be more productive and more efficient.

We recognize that the federal government is the major business in many communities across Canada. In this particular community of the national capital region it happens to be the largest business. But in many communities across Canada it is a considerable consumer of resources and generator of waste. Yet we do not participate in community blue-box programs across Canada and we are not providing leadership in those communities where we are a major influence in community reduction of the waste of resources and the damage to the environment.

Private companies are scrambling to do this kind of thing in their own operations, because, as 3M has demonstrated, employees quickly rise to the challenge of finding innovative ways to cut the waste of both dollars and resources. The workplace then becomes another way to answer "what can I do about the environment?" Most importantly companies are hiring consultants at a great pace to say: How can you help us save money by saving on resources and saving the environment? They are becoming responsible for their environmental stewardship and they are finding they are saving a lot of money in the process. Why not the federal government?

The federal government must lead by doing and where better for that leadership to start than by Parliament giving government departments a clear message that they and everyone who works for government must take responsibility for the environment and must take responsibility for the waste of resources.

I am therefore seeking the support of members on all sides of the House in having this motion approved. I would like to conclude by saying that we have to legislate on the environment, and we have to sometimes force people to do the right thing. Here we have an opportunity to provide leadership, not just legislation.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member for her initiative in the House of Commons on this very important environmental matter. The motion and the words we have just heard are certainly foremost in the progressive environmental thinking in Canada. Her initiative is correct, and at the right place at the right time.

Previous governments and this government have created a very large, strong body of environmental legislation, and that legislation is followed of course with regulations and standards. After the regulations and the standards, there is the implementation process.

Following the implementation process, I think we have too large a body of law in all fields because it is not necessarily fully employed and in force.

There will never be the employment or enforcement of new laws if there is not someone who has to provide accountability or some kind of an audit format. The audit format is something that is certainly coming to environmental law.

I remember in 1979 bringing before this House the first bill on compulsory environmental assessment. No one would even second the motion at that time because it was something that was still to come. Of course, I am very pleased that the House of Commons has passed compulsory environmental impact legislation now.

As I look back at that 1979 private members' bill that gave forward direction coming from the hon. member in her call for audit and accountability of legislation once it is passed.

I want the member to know that the government fully supports the concept of federal departments being accountable for their use of resources from the environmental perspective.

The green plan clearly emphasizes that every Canadian, each and every one of us, has a role to play in achieving the goal of sustainable development, that everyone is accountable for the impact of their actions as individuals on the environment. Therefore, it is only logical that in the green plan the federal government specifically acknowledged the need to demonstrate its commitment to sustainable development by making federal operations a model for that kind of development.

That was recognized even in the House of Commons by you, Mr. Speaker, in the fine work that you have done in bringing the House of Commons forward as an example of sustainable development in every way that all of us from the committee to the House of Commons could think of.

The government must lead by example. It can lead by advocating. It can lead by legislation. It can lead by programs, but first and foremost it must show the way by example. That example of course has to be followed with audit, otherwise it becomes relatively meaningless and people's initial enthusiasm soon wanes.

The government is committed to adopting a comprehensive code of environmental stewardship covering all areas of federal operations and activities. This code will integrate environmental concerns into both policy and program planning as well as day-to-day operations of the federal Government of Canada across our land.

It will also ensure that operations and activities of the federal government not only meet but exceed the standards and practices that the government recommends to others. Indeed, this is a tall order but it is a strong objective that we must put and hold forward in front of us all the time, working towards.

Like the green plan itself, the stewardship initiative will be comprehensive, covering a wide range of issues rather than just one or two environmental areas. It is also similar to the green plan by taking a long-term approach, recognizing that there is no overnight solution.

This involved not just the changing of law, but in fact it involves the changing of attitude of legislators, of Canadians and the whole society needs to start thinking in these environmental terms.

It is not going to be easy to change these attitudes, but if we do not start now, it of course is never going to occur. We have to do this in a comprehensive and methodical manner as well.

The code that we will first establish will be complimented by a list of specific targets or objectives covering a number of issues from waste generation to energy efficiency, both the kinds of things that have been talked about by the hon. member. These objectives will be government-wide, applying to all departments and all agencies. This kind of comprehensiveness was not thought of 10 years ago. I am glad to see that it is at least being thought of and I wish the government success and, in fact, being this comprehensive and all inclusive.

Because of the nature of departmental operations, some targets will be implemented to a greater extent in some departments than others. We have to recognize, in the initial years, that some departments have a greater capacity to respond than others but, of course, we have to take it as it comes and we have to be diligent to the over-all comprehensive view.

For example, only about 20 departments are custodial departments, meaning that they own real property. Of course, through that ownership, ownership is equated to control. An objective relating to real property management such as efficient water use, for example, could only be instituted by custodial departments. Therefore, we can move a little faster in these areas.

It might also be possible to realize more significant reduction in water usage in some special purpose buildings such as laboratories than others such as a general public office building where in fact we have public use of a public facility. We, again, have some limitations and that gets to the issue of educating the public generally.

Some other departments are tenants of Public Works Canada or even of the private sector. Tenant behaviour will always have a role in such initiatives, but not nearly to the same extent as facility modifications.

Each department and agency will be required to develop an environmental action plan, indicating how they will implement the code and the targets in their operation. These action plans will be made public and reports on progress will be made regularly. It will be in these plans that the unique aspects of departmental operations will be reflected since the government-wide objectives can only relate to common, environmental issues which apply to a broad scope of departmental operations.

Departmental action plans will be updated every year or, in some cases, more frequently if required. As departments assess their operations in greater depth, they will gain a better understanding of what needs to be done and appropriate time frames and cost estimates established. Some of the initial aspects of the plan will likely be assessing situations and gathering the necessary data and information to implement the targets.

To facilitate the adoption of the code and targets, an office of environmental stewardship will be established. This is a very important announcement and step to take. First of all, have to establish a structure and this will have to be done through this office of environmental stewardship. It will act as a focal point for the initiative providing co-ordination, information and guidance to the departments. It will also establish a series of stewardship directives at federal employees to raise their awareness and encourage their co-operation in implementing the codes and the target. I know we have spoken of this often in the environment committee. You can implement a program, but without an adequate education program to teach people how and why and the importance of it and to gain their commitment, in fact it will never be fully implemented. So I am very pleased that the government is recognizing the need for educational programs in the implementation of their objectives.

This will be further supported by the development of training courses for managers and officers making environmentally related decisions in the government.

The office of environmental stewardship will also be responsible for monitoring, implementation of code and objectives and reporting on the progress that has been made. Now I want to get that across to the member in particular because in fact the function that she assesses to her bill, what she is asking for the government is agreeing to and it is setting up the environmental stewardship office and committing to a process of reporting, of monitoring, implementation of objectives and reporting on the progress being made. So, undoubtedly, she will take great pleasure in the fact that this is being accomplished.

Common barriers to achieving progress can be identified by the office and resolved. Similarily, where there are opportunities for efficiency from joint action, these can be organized because we want to be concerned about waste, about inefficiencies and we want this co-ordinated role and approach going forward to garner whatever savings we can.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are giving me the time signal but this is an important government program that is being announced here today and it is in fact being announced in response to the work of this member and other members in the House of Commons who have recognized the need for auditing and the government is responding accordingly. We appreciate her initiative and look forward to it moving forward.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Ottawa West for putting forward this motion. Basically, what my colleague is putting forward is the fact that the Government of Canada put a green filter on every aspect of its operations. In other words, whether this be government purchases, government operations, that ultimately would lead to the relationship that government has in terms of its client list. We have a relationship, for example, in the Department of Supply and Services with people that supply the government. I think that we could ultimately lead to putting standards forward to the private sector.

What I think is quite significant about this motion is if the government uses all of its resources, as my colleague from Ottawa West said, the Government of Canada is really the largest company in Canada, if we can use that analogy. We are talking here of literally thousands of locations of government offices and buildings across the country: all of our national defence bases, all of our airports across Canada, those that have yet to be privatized.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, if we put a green filter on every one of those units? I believe that not only would this send a signal to the rest of our community in changing their lifestyle but I see the potential here for a mammoth job creation program, a job creation program for turning this country green for our youth, for our seniors. Just think of the number of audit functions that would happen in the process of converting government. Think of the number of manufacturing opportunities just in the area related to water, the amount of water that we waste in government buildings where we have lavatories, where the systems are working on a continual basis in terms of water flow. I mean there is technology today that can change that easily, instantly and at no cost and our savings would be mammoth.

I do not really see how anyone in this House could possibly oppose this motion. We have not been really leading this environmental debate in this House. We have been pushed into moving on this debate mostly by our constituents. I think it would be a tremendous example of getting into the lead again on this issue. By using all of these resources and putting in the audit function, putting forward a program and process of accountability, obviously those people who would not participate in this would be the odd one out. Very few men or women want to be the odd ones out when it comes to the environment today.

We also want to talk about the mammoth amount of conservation. My colleague from Ottawa West talked about deficit and debt. There would be tremendous savings for the deficit if we had a very progressive attitude in terms of converting to a green filter in government institutions and government operations.

My friend Patti Carson who just recently wrote a book, Green is Gold went through an entire list of companies across Canada which, after their conversion or after putting the green filter on their company, found that the savings were just absolutely staggering. Not only were the savings staggering but they found that the client support, because of their conversion, was dramatic. I think that when we have such a straightforward motion as this, a motion that will lead, obviously, to all kinds of new job opportunities, this ultimately will lead to an expertise in this country that we could export. All of a sudden the Government of Canada could be converted into a world class model operation, not only in terms of ourselves, but again I repeat, linkage to the private sector and how we put standards on those suppliers to government. Boy, oh boy, could you imagine what we could do with that in terms of our relationship to countries around the world? I think that would lead to a lot of new job opportunities. Jobs that are lasting, not just make work jobs, but jobs that have a long life.

I urge all members of this House to get behind this motion and put it into a state where it is not just rhetoric but real activity.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I, like the distinguished member for Broadview—Greenwood, would like to participate in this motion presented by the opposition colleague from Ottawa West here this afternoon. I would like to not only commend her but also the member for Broadview—Greenwood who just spoke. These can get to be tongue twisters. We should maybe bring in a law that allows just one name for a constituency instead of four or five and we might have less difficulty with them, or call them district number 1 to 295 or something. That would work a little easier.

This is interesting. I think everyone is genuinely interested and concerned about environmental issues. There are now so many rules, regulations and laws that have been drafted. It may be argued by many that we may have too many laws and possibly others may argue that if we just implement the rules and laws we presently have with regard to the concerns that different sectors of our country and our government has with the environment, we may not have to make another one.

I listened with interest to this debate. What I have just heard probably makes a lot more sense in terms of what we could do as a government just on some very simple things such as the conservation of water. Possibly there are many other areas.

We talk about buses and ministers' cars running for hours sitting out front in the event that someone may want to jump in and go to their office. Well, they are not exactly helping the environment. We are burning all kinds of fuel, but should we pass a law stating this should not be done? I think we have to use more common sense than legislation around here and show that kind of leadership as opposed to putting it down.

My colleague mentioned the green plan. I just wanted to point out that there are some pretty positive things in that particular piece of legislation that somehow covers, I believe, what was suggested in this motion.

It says: "It is the government policy that new policies and programs coming before cabinet for a decision be subject to an environmental review". That is there. "Each minister is responsible for doing an environmental assessment of the policy and program initiative prior to any final decisions being taken by the government and public statement on the environmental implications of the initiative is to accompany the official announcement of each initiative, especially where the environmental impact is significant".

It may be argued that is not strong enough. It may be argued that it should say "on anything". Who is going to decide what is significant and what is not? I think we get into a form of words.

I can tell you there is the other side which complicates initiatives of the government and initiatives of the private sector and initiatives of business.

• (1730)

In some cases, when you have ordinary citizens objecting to a project, there are so many rules and regulations they can hold up these projects through the courts, through some piece of legislation that exists today. I had this just happen in my riding where a very, very famous, in my view, organization and one very environmentally friendly to Canada by the name of Ducks Unlimited, created a marsh in my district and created a habitat for hundreds upon thousands of geese and ducks and, I think, something like 250 species of wildlife birds. It decided to share that with the public and put an interpretive centre and its head office right in the middle of the marsh, only to find out that there were all kind of organizations saying that they were not friendly with the environment and they were now, arguably to those people, going to in fact hurt the environment.

I tried to rationalize this. Why would an organization like that want to do it. They had environmental hearings and I participated because I basically support most of their efforts. Undoubtedly they have made some mistakes in some of their conversions of habitat and created some new problems, but I think they have a tremendous track record. Yet, unless the legislation was changed in Manitoba, it was very possible for a few individuals, only two or three sometimes, to stop an entire project that I see as being nothing but of benefit.

We have to question whether we should continue to make those kinds of rules that allow that to happen. In my view there has to be certain limits. I believe the pendulum has swung too far now in terms of all kinds of legislation to stop what I think sometimes is a very common sense approach to projects.

I am not going to take away from what is intended here because I think we all recognize that. We come here to make laws. That is what we were elected for. That is the only thing we really do. We are legislators. We make laws. But I often think we make too darned many laws. It confuses the entire operation of our country sometimes. If I have criticism of this particular piece of proposed legislation I think it is maybe just adding another law. I would hope not, but this is what I am saying. Maybe we have enough rules and regulations if we would only implement them. I think the hon. member opposite would admit that all too often we do not exercise the options available to us. She jumps up and down and says: "Is that right?" In that case, maybe I should amend her resolution.

An hon. member: It is not a law.

Mr. Holtmann: It is not a law, that is correct. The point is that Canada prides itself on being a great nation, but we have a lot of areas where we have probably neglected our environment, there is no doubt about it. We have had so many resources and so many companies in the resource industries that have violated the environment and hurt so many areas with no regard to anything but the almighty dollar. It happened to our rivers and streams in Manitoba. It happened to our Great Lakes in Ontario.

What is going to happen at Pearson International Airport? You see, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is happening at Pearson International Airport.

I think the point is that we have to look at this in a very sensible and logical way. We are not leaders in a lot of things. We produce more garbage per capita, we are garbage producers. We produce garbage by the megatonne. Maybe we should be charging not $40 a tonne for garbage but $400 a tonne and start making people pay for that garbage.

There is a different way of looking at it because I believe just west of this great city there is a mega mountain of garbage being produced and hopefully maybe there will be a park there. My colleague says this new law will prevent it. Well, there are no assurances of that, but I am not sure that with some common sense we can produce less of this garbage, but if that could be done it would be the route to go.

I thought I would just make a few comments on that subject, Mr. Speaker, and I would not like to see us bringing in more and more rules and regulations without making sure we know what ramifications they might have on projects that are coming onstream.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Ottawa West. I served with her on the Commons Standing Committee on the Environment and I have a lot of respect for her motion and her motives.

The member's motion requests that the House express its view as to whether the government should require all departments and agencies to carry out environmental assessments of their budget proposals.

I have no quarrel with the hon. member's underlying objective. There is a general consensus within Canada that the key to solving our environmental problems is better environmental decision making. This was stressed throughout the green plan consultations that were held across Canada last year.

We already have in place the measures necessary to ensure sound environment decision making within the federal government. In the green plan, the federal government announced its commitment to federal environment stewardship.

The federal government's goal is to ensure that all of its operations and procedures meet or exceed national targets and schedules for sustaining our environment.

The green plan provides for a comprehensive review of the environmental implications of existing statutes, policies, programs and regulations. Modifications will be proposed as necessary. While much of the initial work will take place over the period of 1991 to 1996, the review itself will be an ongoing process.

The government believes that the federal operations should be exemplary in meeting and frequently exceeding all national regulations and standards as well as being compatible with provincial and international environmental objectives. As the single largest business in Canada, it is the special responsibility of the federal government to lead by example.

As part of the green plan, the government will adopt a comprehensive code of environmental stewardship covering all areas of federal operations and activities. Federal departments and agencies will develop environmental action plans indicating how they will implement the code, and they will report regularly on implementation.

The code will be complemented by a list of targets or objectives. They will cover a broad range of areas from waste management to hazardous waste cleanup.

Projects involving the federal government will be subjected to the provisions of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Review bill. This bill will ensure that all federal departments and agencies conduct environmental assessments of all project proposals for which they have decision making authority and gives the Minister of the Environment substantial powers to ensure that this process is fair, efficient, transparent and allows for a high level of public input into decisions of projects which have a potentially significant impact on the natural environment.

Together, this bill and the policies of the Government of Canada will ensure that virtually every significant action considered by the government will be reviewed for its environmental implications. Canadians will have the right to either participate directly in the process or to have access to the results.

As essential as this process is, however, the government recognizes it is not enough. The federal environmental review process and its reforms will provide an effective mechanism for ensuring that environmental factors are taken into account in future decisions.

It is government policy that new policies and programs coming before cabinet for decision be subject to an environmental review. Each minister is responsible for conducting an environmental assessment of the policy and program initiative prior to any final decision being taken by the government.

Furthermore, a public statement on the expected environmental implications of the initiative is to accompany the official announcement of each initiative where the environmental impact is significant.

It is this process, for example, that will be applied to any free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States. Work is under way within the government and with the help of outside experts to develop the methods and procedures for effectively predicting and assessing the environmental effects of a policy or program initiative. I would note for the members that Canada will be among the first in the world to have such a process. Beyond these important internal measures, the government is committed to improving the ability of individuals to participate in government environmental decision-making. Such participation is essential to the environmentally sensitive decision-making. We can no longer rely solely on experts for the solutions to environmental problems. Instead we need input from a wider cross-section of the population.

Throughout the green plan consultation process, it was clear that Canadians wanted to be involved in major decisions that affected their lives and the lives of their children. Canada's green plan provides for ongoing consultations with Canadians as part of its regular review and updating of goals, targets, and programs. In fact, we want to build on the lessons learned during the green plan consultations to make our consultation process even more effective and to ensure even greater involvement of Canadians in the formulation and implementation of national environmental policy.

As well, we know that to be effective, Canadians need readily understandable information on the state of the environment and how it is changing in response to what we are doing. This kind of information provides them with a sound basis to make judgments about the adequacy of current efforts, whether they be by governments, industry, or individuals.

The routine provision of high quality environmental information is a major component of the green plan. Although there is much work to be done in this complex area, we are committed to providing Canadians with the information they need to make informed decisions about their own activities and about the environmental performance of others.

The government fully supports the concept of federal departments being accountable for their use of resources from an environmental perspective. The green plan clearly emphasizes that every Canadian has a role to play in achieving the goal of sustainable development and that everyone is accountable for the impact of their actions on the environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there are no more members who want to speak, the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. If there is no further private members' business, I am wondering if the House would agree to suspend until six o'clock as other things are evolving outside this House which will require some House time later on.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think that with unanimous consent, we can now proceed to the adjournment debate. Without it, I am going to suspend the sitting until 6 p.m. Is there unanimity? Is there consent that we proceed to the adjournment debate?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The sitting of the House is then suspended until 6 p.m.

At 5.44 p.m., the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.56 p.m.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the various representatives in the House and I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of this House, the House withdraw Government Motion No. 4 after the adoption of this order and that;
> After the return to work of the employees of the Public Service Alliance of Canada and other related unions, proceeding on Bill C–29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, be halted immediately after second reading and not proceeded further with;
> Should the PSAC and Treasury Board fail to reach an agreement with ensuing public inconvenience, then Bill C–29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, would be deemed referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and that, immediately at the beginning of Government Orders the House shall begin its study at Committee of the Whole of the said bill and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage and report stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m. that day.
> That the following sitting day, the House shall begin consideration at third reading to Bill C–29, and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage be put without further debate or amendment no later than 10 p.m. that day.

Mr. Speaker, I should also indicate that I believe you will find unanimous consent to complete the second reading of Bill C–29 now without further debate. I might add that the vote would be deemed demanded and deferred until tomorrow at three o'clock p.m.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, just in terms of a point of clarification because there has been a fair degree of communication from the government with regards to this particular matter, I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could confirm for members of the House that in point of fact the workers will be called back by the President of the Treasury Board for eleven o'clock tomorrow morning and that the government and the union representatives will resume bargaining without preconditions.

I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader could give us some reassurance on that.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the information I have is that the employees will be going back to work and that the government representatives of Treasury Board and the union members will be returning to the bargaining table, I assume very quickly thereafter, to accomplish what they can in terms of their negotiations.

Mr. Dingwall: I have a further clarification, Mr. Speaker. President Daryl Bean to whom I spoke just a few moments ago indicated that the parties were supposed to be going to a news conference to outline these various factors. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can confirm that both parties will be announcing shortly thereafter this particular order that in fact they will be going to press.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can again confirm that the information I have received is that both parties will be holding a joint conference in a few minutes, which will outline the conditions and understandings that they have entered into together.

Mr. Dingwall: Finally, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the parliamentary secretary has given those clarifications and those undertakings to the House, we are happy to be able to give our consent to this particular motion. They have accepted in its entirety the position of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to seek clarification. The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader indicated that the vote at second reading would be deemed deferred. There is an amendment that we must deal with as well. I assume that the amendment would be included in that and the vote will be deferred until tomorrow.

I simply want to say that this motion is possible today because of a tremendous amount of co-operation on all sides, to say nothing of the tremendous work done by my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam. This is possible today because of a generosity that was shown on both the government side as well as the union side, and this is witness to that co-operation.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, we, members of the Bloc Quebecois, are also happy that both parties went back to the bargaining table. My colleagues, the member for Laurier-Sainte-Marie and the member for Hull-Aylmer, have asked for two days that both parties go back to the bargaining table. In that sense, we can only agree with the process started today.

However, I know that there has been lots of consultations. In our case, they did not last more than a few minutes. I hope that the government will not use that as a precedent. I know that the situation in which the parties are today is delicate, inside as well as outside the House. I know that. But I hope that there will be more cooperation in this new Parliament and session, that we will have a little more than five minutes for speeches.

So we too are happy to give our unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the indications of co-operation. I want to also advise him that in dealing with him I never consider anything that he does with me a precedent of future behaviour. I also want to indicate that yes, it is our very clear understanding that all of the questions necessary to dispose of second reading of Bill C-29 will have deemed to have been put and deferred until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion.

Motion carried.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Sanding Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am rising this evening with regard to a question that I put forward on June 10, 1991 to the Minister of State for Youth. Unfortunately the House adjourned prior to my being able to put the question. Briefly the question asked about the difficulties faced by Canadian students, and in particular the students in my riding of Nepean, with regard to obtaining summer employment. Unfortunately this is all happening this evening after the fact. As I said earlier, I was unable to put the question before the House in June.

Rather than addressing the many youth employment problems of today, such as the large high school drop-out rate, the closing of university employment centres and the generally dismal state of the economy which this government has created for our youth, I will focus my discussion on the specific problem which existed this past summer for those students who had planned to return this fall to university.

I certainly hope they have been able to do this. It is quite possible that many of those who had those high hopes in June have been unable to do so, because they can no longer afford the increase in tuition fees, the books with the GST, their rent and their groceries for the school year.

A large source of funding provided by the Government of Canada to students is found in the Summer Employment Experience Development program which, in shortened form, is called the SEED program. The SEED program in recent years has been cut back significantly. In 1989, $118 million was allotted to the program. Last summer this figure was reduced to $77 million.

The government seems to take great pride in making it known that this year the program received a boost in funding. A more detailed examination reveals that this summer an extra $3 million only was supplemented to the fund, bringing the sum of the pool to $80 million.

The first observation to make in analysing these figures is that the funding for SEED this year still amounted to less than 70 per cent of the 1989 level of funding. Also, the $3 million increase amounts to a 2.1 per cent increase above last year's allocation. This is less than one-half the rate of inflation and means the program has actually seen a decline in real dollars that are being put into it.

I would like to give some specific examples. The National Capital Region in 1989 received an allocation of $1.4 million for the student SEED program. In both 1990 and 1991, that $1.4 million became only $424,000, a reduction of 70 per cent in the National Capital Region alone.

If I took the city of Nepean as an example, in 1989 the students received an allocation of $123,000. In 1990 and 1991 they received only $23,000.

We all know that $23,000 does not go very far to supply students in a city the size of mine with a population of 108,000 and I cannot quote the number of students going to university, but $23,000 would probably employ eight students over the summer.

If I could go further with my examples and comparisons, the two provinces I am most familiar with are the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In Canada, the unemployment rate for students 15 to 24 years of age is 16.1 per cent. In Ontario, the average is higher than the Canadian average of 16.3 per cent. In the province of Quebec it is a couple of points higher, at 18.3 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, are you interrupting me?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time is over. You know the rules of the late show. You have only four minutes.

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, could I just make a last point?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes, quickly please.

Mrs. Gaffney: The point of the matter is that there are 9.5 million people in Ontario and 7 million in Quebec. The allocation for the province of Quebec was $18 million. The allocation for the province of Ontario is $10 million. I would like the government to seriously look at the disparities between the two provinces, between the National Capital Region and my city of Nepean. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of State for Youth, I would like to give a more complete answer to the questions raised on June 10 by the hon. member for Nepean. The hon. member suggested that the Minister of State said one thing in this House while civil servants in several departments said the opposite. Those assertions are groundless. The hon. member mixes up different things and considers that the Summer Carrier-Oriented Employment Program of the Public Service Commission is included in Challenge '91 offered by the Department of Employment and Immigration. This program is not part of Challenge, it is a federal employment program offered by the Public Service Commission of Canada.

Again this year, it is estimated that over 6,000 students across the country have been hired by the Public Service Commission under the Career-Oriented Summer Employment Program. To this day, most of the federal offices cooperating with this program report they are planning to hire about the same number of students this year than last year, and this does not include the Cooperative Work Education Programs within Public Service or other Public Service summer employment programs. There also they hire students.

In June, the Minister of State (Youth) was perfectly right to say that there would be more money available for students in the summer of 1991 than in the summer of last year, and this under the Challenge 91 Program. Challenge 91 has a budget of $143 million, of which $80 million have been spent this summer under the Summer Employment/Experience Development Program. This latter program has two componets, one for high scholl students and the other for postsecondary students. The number of jobs created this summer under Challenge 91 is estimated to 55,000 compared with the 52,000 created last summer. Moreover, it is expected that 16,000 other jobs will be created this summer of 1991 for young drop-outs through the Work Orientation Workshops Program. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that 16,000 jobs had been created last year through that program.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, on June 18, I asked a question of the Minister of Finance with regard to whether the federal government would be participating in an employee buy-out, or at least trying to facilitate an employee buy-out at the Algoma Steel Corporation, once the second largest steel corporation in this country. On that occasion the minister suggested that he was personally in favour but suggested it was the minister of industry who should be responsible. The minister of industry had already said it was the responsibility of the Minister of Finance.

It would appear that everybody on the government side is very supportive of such a concept. We in Sault Ste. Marie and in particular the steelworkers, the whole community in fact, would like the opportunity to facilitate an employee buy-out. The largest employee buy-out in this country.

You may say that we are breaking new ground in setting precedent, but in the United States it is an every day occurrence and facilitated by tax credits. This time we are going to give tax credits to the employees rather than the corporations.

What we are asking of the government is: Will it participate along with the Ontario government to offer complementary tax regulations, to enact amendments that could be done without changing the whole income tax act, to give the employees a break? For example, on a $3,500 investment, a $700 tax credit.

Also, employees have told me they do not want to buy the company unless it is economically viable. I think we all agree with that. You do not want to buy something that is a bad investment and a waste of your money. The employees are already giving $3 of their wages to, hopefully, as a down payment on this company, if you want to call it that.

The federal government let us down just a little while ago because it would not participate in a $10 million loan guarantee when the employees, the banks, the unions, the parent company and the Ontario government did participate. Only the federal government said no.

I met with the finance minister this afternoon to once again appeal to him to look favourably upon tax regulations that would allow us the opportunity, just the opportunity, to involve ourselves in this employee buy-out, an initiative that I think, with imminent plant closures or plant closures that have already happened, surely the government could see its way clear to involving itself in.

I am going to ask the government to elaborate: What is it preparing to do? What is it prepared to do to encourage the people in Sault Ste. Marie and the steelworkers in Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the tax system already has mechanisms to encourage share ownership by workers, namely special rules for companies that undertake in share purchase option agreements to issue shares to their employees, and a lifetime capital gains exemption structured so as to favour the acquisition of shares by employees. Mr. Speaker, these mechanisms could help facilitate the plan of workers at Algoma to buy back shares.

These mechanisms are already in place in the legislation. Therefore no amendment is required to reflect recent events such as the situation at Algoma. In fact, both mechanisms are in line with the orientation that the government has given the tax system since the reform. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the government brought in the capital gains exemption in 1985. My colleague in the opposition challenged this exemption, Mr. Speaker, but he now sees that it may be worthwhile. Its purpose is to reward success, not to offer systematic tax breaks.

Under a share purchase option agreement, employees are entitled to buy shares from their employer. If the option price is not less than the share price when the option is exercised, the mechanism yields no tax advantage. In the case of a private company which is under Canadian control at the time the option is granted, the tax benefit accruing from the fact that the call premium is lower than the stocks' value at the time of their acquisition would become taxable only when these are sold. Moreover, when an employee sells his or her stocks, only 75 per cent of the tax benefit arising from the option, that is to say the potential surplus of the value of the stocks over the option premium when they are acquired would be added to the income of the employee when the stocks are sold.

Furthermore, any increase in the value of the stocks acquired, i.e. when the option is exercised, usually represents a capital gain for the employee and, as such, entitles him or her to the lifetime exemption I referred to earlier.

British Columbia and Ontario have a tax credit system which promotes employee stock ownership. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, my time is already up. I would simply add, if I may, that the existing system is complex but one that employees can easily administer.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and discuss the issue of the Trans-Canada Highway in the House.

I should say that on June 10, I asked a question of the minister concerning the Trans-Canada Highway and when the federal government would show its commitment to the safety and economic well-being as well as the health of all New Brunswickers by committing funds to the Trans-Canada Highway.

For those who have not had the thrill of driving on our Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick, it is probably the most deadly highway in Canada and one that obviously merits federal support and assistance.

There are numerous deaths on the Trans-Canada Highway, and in my question I refer to some of the headlines and to some of the people who have been killed on New Brunswick highways, particularly the Trans-Canada.

The headline of the editorial in The Bugle, the Woodstock newspaper back a few months ago read:"Is the Trans-Canada Highway a Killing Field?" That is about what it has become. The editorial comments further that perhaps a hotline should be set up for federal MPs in each riding so that people who see accidents on the Trans-Canada Highway call them so they would become aware of the problem and the carnage that is caused on that highway.

It is admitted by both the federal and provincial governments that it is the worst section of Trans-Canada Highway in the country. It has an adverse effect on the economy. The tourism industry and all those things that relate to highway traffic are adversely affected.

The federal government is talking about building the link to Prince Edward Island, so we will build a new superstructure that will connect Prince Edward Island with New Brunswick and there are not going to be the highways upon which to take the cars that come back and forth from the island. It does not really make a whole lot of sense to me.

The appalling thing about this whole situation is that the minister's response is that this is a provincial responsibility and really, the federal government does not have anything to do with it. Well, that is incorrect. It is the Trans-Canada Highway. It was built by a joint agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments of this country and it was to serve as a link between all parts of the country, from sea to sea to sea, and this minister's response that it is purely a provincial government problem is irresponsible in my view.

The provincial government of New Brunswick is exerting some efforts with respect to correcting the Trans-Canada Highway problem in New Brunswick. It was interesting to note that the premier wrote the minister immediately after seeing what the minister's response was to my question. He pointed out just exactly how much money the province put in. It had committed on the basis of the gasoline tax $32 million a year to help upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway. In addition to that, it has put forward a special fund of $100 million to be used in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway for the years 1990, 1991, and 1992.

If you lose perspective, that is a major contribution for any province the size of New Brunswick with a population of roughly 700,000 to make to this particular problem.

In conclusion, I quote from the premier's letter: "Your predecessors in the Department of Transport as well as the Prime Minister have conceded that New Brunswick has the worst stretch of Trans-Canada Highway in the country and that is why we asked for federal government assistance, and it is not just a provincial responsibility. It is time for the federal government to assume its responsibility".

It is true.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friend opposite would want to know, and I am sure that the people of New Brunswick would want to know, that since 1977, Transport Canada has contributed nearly $283 million toward highways in New Brunswick. Indeed, New Brunswick is second only to Newfoundland in the amount of federal funds received. The provinces, which do have responsibilities here, made the decision to spend the bulk of these moneys in the province's northeastern region, on Highways 11 and 8, rather than on the Trans-Canada Highway, for which we sent them the money.

At present, the federal government has a $145 million highway improvement agreement with New Brunswick. Under this agreement approximately $67 million, or 46 per cent, will be expended on the Trans-Canada Highway and connecting links, Highways 1 and 7.

The federal government is now being asked to commit funds to upgrade New Brunswick's Trans-Canada Highway to four lanes which incidentally would require over $2 billion.

Over the past year the federal government has received requests from other provinces and territories for highway contributions totalling $14 billion. Clearly, these requests cannot be handled in an ad hoc manner. Highway transportation problems, whether in New Brunswick or elsewhere in the country, will have to be dealt with in the context of a national highway program.

The federal government, in co-operation with the 12 provincial and territorial governments, is actively examining the magnitude of this problem. No decisions concerning the upgrading of New Brunswick's Trans-Canada Highway, nor any other portion of the national highway system, can be made until this process is complete.

We have a duty, especially in this period of budgetary constraint, to ensure that federal highway funds are spent wisely.

Adjournment Debate

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, some time go I asked a question about the government's hypocrisy in announcing a four-year $136 million program to fight family violence while, at the same time, cutting $155 million over two years in transfer payments to the provinces. Only $49 million of that family violence program is to be spent before the next election.

It does not take a mathematician to figure out that the Tories are cutting three times the amount that they are dishing out.

In fact the $155 million figure for losses in transfer payments is actually the government's own figure. The provinces estimate that they are losing some $2 billion in transfer payments.

The Canada Assistance Plan funds child care, shelters for battered women, and funds social assistance.

Why is the government fighting the deficit on the backs of battered women, on the backs of children, and on the backs of the poor in this country?

The former finance minister said the government is making these cuts so our children will not have to pay later. But our children are paying right now, children who are alone at home or in haphazard or dangerous child-care situations because there is no child care. Their families cannot find child care. Children who line up with their single mothers in a food bank line-up are paying right now. These are the people who in fact do pay for this government's policies.

The Conservative philosophy fundamentally seems to misunderstand what social assistance is all about. It is not to throw out scraps of money at people so that they can just scrape by, their self-esteem disintegrating day by day. It is there to help people to get back on their feet and to become self-sufficient. It is there to ensure that children do not go to school hungry and that they have a real chance in life. It is there to train people so that they have the skills and the education necessary to participate in the job market. These are investments for the future and you cannot build a strong economy without them. You cannot build a strong economy by leaving children without care, hungry so that they grow up on the fringes of society, chronically on social assistance or in conflict with the law. This is not the way to reduce the deficit.

The Tory way will only enlarge the deficit as our society attempts to cope in the future with increasing crime and violence in our society. The government has a choice now to help create high income taxpayers for the future or to create another cycle of poverty. In capping the Canada Assistance Plan, it has opted for the latter.

Let us have a national child care program now. The quality, affordability and accessibility of Canada's child care will ultimately determine what kind of future we have for our children when they become adults, not this maniacal bent that the government is on of ineffective debt reduction schemes.

Many women are turned away from shelters for battered women. Children do not have the child care they need. This government has put a ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan in three provinces in this country. Those children are just as needy as children in any other part of this country. Those women who are battered and abused are just as much in need of shelter as women who are badly treated in other parts of this country. It is time that this government took those concerns seriously and reversed its wrong-headed policy of cutting back on transfer payments to the provinces.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby knows, but I really want to tell the House or just perhaps remind them, that on August 15 the government reaffirmed its commitment to put an end to violence against women with the announcement of the establishment of the Canadian panel on violence against women. The member certainly contributed a great deal of time and effort with regard to the establishment of this panel. It is going to represent Canada's best knowledge, experience, sensitivity and leadership on the issue. It is co-chaired by Pat Marshall from Toronto, Ontario and Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt of Jonquière, Quebec. So we have two very good co-chairwomen.

This panel has a mandate to examine the issues of violence against women through an interactive, responsive and grass-roots type of dialogue. It is going to travel to large and small communities across Canada, making every effort to reach all interested persons, including the victims themselves, the victims of violence, the front-line workers, the social service educators, providers of health care, community members and also we will be looking at the child abuse area with regard to this.

The panel is going to seek three objectives. The first one is to encourage women to identify violence from their own perspective. The second one is to heighten public awareness. A lot of people are aware and then there are those who perhaps do not really know how great this issue is within the country. The third objective, of course, is to find solutions related to the root causes of the violence against women and a particular focus on preventive measures which I think we all realize is the best route to go.

It began its operations this month and it will be reporting back to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women by December 1992, including recommendations for a plan of action along with the timeframes and the federal government's action policy.

GARMENT INDUSTRY

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, following a meeting with the Quebec Joint Committee of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, I put a question to the Minister of Labour, in this House, on May 17. Basically, I asked him to review the regulations of the POWA, that is the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, a program for workers who have been laid off and, because of their age and lack of skills, have little or no chance to find a new job. The Minister told me then he wanted to discuss the issue with his colleague, the Quebec Minister, in order to revise the regulations and find a way to better help laid-off workers, especially in the Montreal area.

Well, I read a press communique released by the Minister of Labour, announcing that assistance would be provided to about 275 older workers laid off in the Province of Quebec. Among them employees of only five businesses which had to close in the Montreal area. I would like to congratulate the Minister. Obviously, helping five people is better than helping no one at all. However, I have to remind him that, with all the various problems in the Montreal area and throughout Quebec, helping 275 laid-off workers is really not enough. I would invite him to review the regulations as soon as possible.

In the beginning, POWA was an exclusively federal program, entirely financed by the Canadian government which could decide all by itself who would receive assistance and who would not. I do not want the Minister to tell me today that he has to consult Quebec before deciding who to help in that province. It may have been a good thing to ask the Quebec government to pay 30 per cent of the expenses.

If the federal government does not pay the entire bill, that is fine. But if it pays 70 per cent of it, it should be able to make the appropriate decisions in order to ensure that a much greater number of Quebecers and especially Montrealers who are now unemployed benefit from this program. Finally, should I remind the minister of an article signed by Jean-Philippe Décarie in today's edition of the Journal de Montréal, which reads as follows: "Nobody gives a damn about Montreal. The Montreal area, which goes from one disaster to another, found out once again yesterday that it has no political weight in Ottawa to protect its industrial assets and its labour force, even if it is highly qualified."

I hope the minister read that article and I hope he is able to announce measures in order to help those ex-employees, the 2,000 employees from Vickers, from Canadian Steel Foundries, from Chem-Tech. I hope he does something about the 15,000 jobs or so that were lost during the last year in the textile industry, particularly in the northern part of Montreal. We must help not only those 275 persons, but the 20,000 who lost their jobs because the Tory government does not have any progressive policies.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as a former Labour minister, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel knows that POWA, the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, is a last resort program designed to assist older workers who have been permanently laid off and have no prospects for re-employment.

Lay-offs in private industry and commercial Crown corporations are considered under POWA.

The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel raised a question concerning the coverage under POWA of workers laid off due to plant closures in the Montreal region. Under POWA we have been able to help many older workers who would otherwise suffer severe financial hardship.

In the first two and half years of the program's operations, a total of $64.4 million of POWA benefits went to beneficiaries in Quebec, with the federal government contributing $45.1 million. Under POWA, the Montreal region has benefitted from $37.2 million in assistance for 808 older workers affected by major lay-offs. This represents 58 per cent of Quebec POWA beneficiaries and one-third of all beneficiaries across Canada.

Eligible older workers from lay-offs designated under POWA will receive assistance under the program till they reach the age of 65. Officials of the Canada-Quebec POWA Committee continue to gather the facts regarding lay-offs at a number of establishments in the Montreal region. As the committee completes the analyses of these lay-offs, I will re-evaluate the findings along with my counterpart, the hon. André Bourbeau, and at that time we will ensure that as many workers as possible will be eligible for POWA, always bearing in mind budgetary restrictions.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may remind the hon. member, who was a very influential minister in the Liberal Cabinet at the beginning of the eighties, that if at the time his government had done more to help industries in the Montreal area, including the petrochemical industry, perhaps we would not be in the kind of situation we are in today.

Mr. Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24 (1).

The House adjourned at 6.36 p.m.

ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY EXPRESSION

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of the House the hon. member for Burlington is rising on a question of personal privilege which arose out of a matter that was brought to my attention yesterday. I want to say to the House that I view the matter that was raised as grave and serious. I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Following the controversy over my remarks in the House in addressing the hon. member for Hamilton East, I have had an opportunity to review the television tape and wish to address the House on a point of personal privilege. I lost my temper and said something I should not have said. What is most unfortunate is that my choice of words has offended the hon. member and also has offended the temper of the House. I unequivocally apologize to the hon. member for Hamilton East and to all other hon. members who may have felt maligned by my remarks. I completely withdraw all of those comments made by me yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, I regret this incident and I want to assure all my colleagues of my respect for this institution.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond wishes to rise on the same matter.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton East is currently on her way to northern Ontario. However, she has advised me that she is prepared to accept an apology on this matter. But I would like to point out that while the hon. member for Hamilton East is prepared to accept this particular apology on this specific incident, the issue I believe before the House is far greater than that specific remark. The issue is the way in which women members of Parliament, indeed all women employees of the House of Commons, are treated by men.

Mr. Speaker: It may very well be that the hon. member and the hon. member who is unable to be here, the hon. member for Hamilton East, may wish to take up the issue of the treatment of any particular person in the House or group of people, but I am very much of the view that this probably is not the proper time to do it. I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond to conclude his remarks. I certainly feel that it is appropriate that he is able to speak within the limitations of this particular specific issue on behalf of the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, very briefly then, I will conclude. As I indicated to you yesterday, I would hope that you would review the tape. I would ask that you as the Speaker of this House review what has happened and to issue a statement to the House on a matter which is very serious, not only to the hon. member but, we believe, to all women.

Mr. Speaker: I want to remind the House and all who are listening that there is a long and ancient tradition in this place that when someone has erred and they come before the House and they unequivocally withdraw, and do more than that and extend an apology to the person whom they have perhaps maligned, or at least offended, and to the whole House, that has to be the end of that specific issue.

I indicated in my remarks a few minutes ago that I view what happened yesterday, and these are the words I said: "as grave and serious" and I think I would have the support of almost all hon. members in using those words.

The hon. member for Burlington has looked carefully at the words he has just expressed and has most unequivocally withdrawn all his comments—not just some of them—but all his comments and has given an abject apology not only to the hon. member for Hamilton East who, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond says accepts that, but also an apology to the House.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is raising another matter which may very well be appropriate to raise at another time on another occasion, but I would ask the support of all hon. members at this time in remembering that what is taking place here is consistent with the traditions of this place. I have to say that in my view, because as I have said I think it was a grave and serious matter yesterday, it was very important that it be clarified and dealt with at the very earliest opportunity.

I am going to proceed with statements by members, but I want to advise the House that the time that has been taken for this will be extended to both statements and to the Question Period.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, the Yugoslavian presidency under Stipe Mesic and the people of war torn Croatia have called on the international community and the United Nations to establish a peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia following what they have described as a military coup.

Croatian-Canadians in my riding and from across Canada want their government to do everything possible to help their relatives and friends in Croatia. In light of the daily bombings, razing of villages and death at the hands of break-away Yugoslav forces, Canada can no longer stand by and watch.

Given the admitted failure of the European Community observer mission, I urge the Government of Canada to use its influence at the United Nations General Assembly, the UN Human Rights Commission and its seat on the UN Security Council to bring about peace in war-town Croatia by immediately calling for the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in that republic.

THE SENATE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Australia has a federal parliamentary system. It also has a Triple-E senate. Australian senators are elected on the basis of proportional representation and not on a plurality vote. This guarantees that the political composition of their Senate will differ from their Lower House.

Each Australian state has an equal number of senators. Their Senate, because of its proportional representation and its veto power, requires their cabinet to publicly convince senators and members of Parliament of the need for each piece of proposed legislation.

If Canada followed the Australian model, our reformed Senate could be proportionally elected. Each region—rather than each province—could have an equal number of senators and with veto power our Triple-E Senate could effectively ensure that our cabinet is responsible to Parliament in practice as well as in theory and, at the same time, by creating a more open process help to restore Canadians' faith in our political system.

WOLVERINE TUBE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, in New Westminster, we are reeling from the blow dealt by Wolverine Tube. They are shutting down their factory, a key source of revenue and jobs.

To save the plant, employees went out and found a buyer. It is a progressive plan, a joint venture between business, unions and employees. Everyone would benefit. Jobs and revenue would stay and the company would get a good return on its investment.

Wolverine had a surprising reaction. They rejected the offer to purchase and insisted on closing the plant. Wolverine also stated they did not want any competition.

• (1410)

Since Wolverine bought this plant, the Bureau of Competition policy has monitored the acquisition. Evidently its work is not over.

The facts lead to only one conclusion: A full tribunal must be ordered by the minister responsible. The anti-competition allegations cannot be ignored any longer. It is a critical issue.

Wolverine is threatening to dismantle this plant today. Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs use his authority under the Competition Act to reopen this investigation immediately?

QUEBEC'S ECONOMY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last week the Quebec Liberal Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, Gérald Tremblay, described in alarming terms Quebec's economic situation with respect to productivity at the industrial relations consultants' convention. He based his reading on the fact that Quebec companies are behind in productivity, job training and research and development.

Mr. Tremblay predicted that if Quebec did not start to solve its problems right away, capital and the most mobile human resources would leave. He said that Quebec's quality of life would diminish considerably and that government deficits made it impossible to improve the quality of services and to reduce the dramatic impact of unemployment and poverty.

CRIME

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the metropolitan Toronto police department is one of the finest police forces anywhere in the world.

According to a public opinion poll last week, 89 per cent of Toronto residents felt that the metro police force was doing a good job.

Unfortunately, however, in spite of the very fine efforts of the metro police, crime is on the increase in Toronto. Drug offences are up 22 per cent. Robberies are committed at a higher rate than last year. The murder rate is higher than it has ever been. The public is very concerned and frightened about drugs, crime and the safety of their children in their very own neighbourhoods.

The police are doing as much as they can with the resources they have. Local police forces across the country are busy busting drug dealers, only to see the federal government lay claim to the confiscated money and property. This is unfair.

I call on the Minister of Justice to return the confiscated money and assets to local police forces across Canada. The federal government should at the very least reimburse the cost of an investigation that results in the seizure of drug assets.

Toronto is in a crime crisis and may soon be competing with Detroit and New York for the highest crime rate in North America. The federal government must take immediate action to properly provide for our front line soldiers in the war against drugs.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, it is just like the Liberals and the NDP to try to use the Public Service strike as a way of gaining political advantage behind the guise of compassion.

Well, we know better and the strikers know better.

We are not talking about Daryl Bean and his cohorts who insisted that the Public Service strike, no matter what the cost.

We are talking about public employees who were forced to strike out of fear of retribution.

Thanks to this government, union representatives are meeting at the bargaining table, strikers have returned to work and can resume earning the wages that keep roofs over their heads and food on the table.

Oh, you can be sure the opposition parties will try to take the credit, but we know better.

We know they would have seen the strike continue until they could squeeze every ounce of political advantage out of it.

A word of advice while they scramble to retrieve a few shreds of dignity: keep your petty political tactics inside these hallowed halls where the damage can be minimized by the Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has exceeded his time.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Earth Summit will be held in Brazil nine months from now, chaired by a Canadian, Maurice Strong.

Canadians deeply identify with our role as UN peacekeepers, with the role of the Red Cross, with the message of Greenpeace and other Canadian environment groups.

The world must join together to struggle for peace and environmental security. The time has come for a global green cross led by Canada to take on the crisis of the oil fires and spills in Kuwait and Iraq, to clean up the damage of toxic and hazardous wastes poisoning eastern Europe, to take on the spread of deserts and deforestation, to fight the contamination of the seas and the atmosphere, to take on poverty and population, the challenge of survival. It is to that that Canadians seek leadership, not the blind business as usual of James Bay II or Kemano II, not for hundreds of millions of dollars more for Canadian nuclear reactors to Romania rather than alternate energy sources, and a reversal of global warming, not an acceleration.

It is time for a Canadian led green cross and to wage peace for a living.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, through a campaign of misinformation the Conservative government would have Canadians believe that the recession has passed us by and the so-called prosperity agenda has kicked in.

Tory prosperity is hardly a picture perfect paradise for the people in my home town. Here are the unemployment rates in Hamilton: April, 8.1 per cent; May, 8.5 per cent; June, 9.7 per cent; July, 10.8 per cent; and last month the unemployment rate matched the rate of factory closures, 11.4 per cent. That means there are 38,000 unemployed people in Hamilton.

The Minister of Finance says the recession is over. Not even his own Tory backbenchers believe it. Permit me to quote one:

> People in my riding would probably disagree with the statement that the recession is history and I couldn't disagree with them—There are a lot of jobs that have yet to be regained.

That was said by the Tory member for Halton Peel.

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, during the last few years it has been discovered that the use of alcohol by women during pregnancy is responsible for the development of a condition in infants known as Foetal Alcohol Syndrome.

It is characterized by small size, physical and mental retardation and high mortality rate. It can be completely prevented by abstaining from alcohol during pregnancy. As many women are unaware of the problem, it is important that the government provide clear labelling of all alcohol products to warn of the danger.

Tobacco products contain warning labels and Canadian alcohol products exported to the U.S. must carry the label. Can we do less for Canadians?

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is with great relief that I rise today to celebrate the survival of free collective bargaining in Canada.

The leadership demonstrated by Daryl Bean and the Public Service Alliance, following the tremendous show of union solidarity Monday when Mr. Bean made a conciliatory gesture and announced that the lines would come down at airports and border crossings, was the first step toward getting collective bargaining back on track. That is responsible leadership.

The President of the Treasury Board's respect for the report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board was a responsible position on the part of the minister, and he is to be congratulated.

The events of yesterday have shown that where there is good will on both sides the toughest issues can be resolved. We wish those returning to the bargaining table well and hope that the commitment to a negotiated settlement will prevail.

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Public Service Alliance and Treasury Board agreed to resume negotiations.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–29, whose purpose is the return to work of federal Public Service employees, is suspended.

Furthermore, it should be noted that Treasury Board has agreed to resume negotiations with no prior conditions, although we intend to remain firm on 0–3–3.

These are clear indications of the government's good faith and show that we have favoured negotiations to reach a settlement.

Let it be clearly understood that we will always favour discussion over confrontation to end any disagreement.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, as the picket lines came down this morning, public servants returned to work and the negotiators prepared to return to the bargaining table, the question being asked is: "Who is the winner?"

Reporters anxious for a punchy headline or soundbite may identify the employer or the union or some intermediary. The truth is the Canadian public, the taxpayer, is the winner. The Public Service is back at work without adding to the deficit or increasing taxes. All of us in government are faced with zero, three and three: MPs, ministers, the Prime Minister, senior management, and PSAC.

Confrontation, not the Canadian way, is over. Dialogue, the Canadian passion, is resumed. Services essential to our physical and economic health will flow again. Canadians can get to and from work without hindrance. And, should it all come unstuck, Parliament is ready to act very swiftly.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, last spring we had a debate on Montreal's economic problems. The minister responsible for Montreal was present, very relaxed, and considered the situation to be normal. He had to be unconscious or deaf. Disaster was looming: the transfer of many Air Canada employees from Montreal to Toronto, the move of pilot training from Montreal to Toronto, the lay–off of at least 450 Air Canada employees and others that I do not have time to list.

Mr. Speaker, for the good of Montrealers, the Prime Minister should act quickly and replace this incompetent minister—I urge him to do so.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, last June, the government announced a $1.7 million program to establish a Canadian youth secretariat that would be in charge of organizing environmental seminars across the country, to prepare Canada's youth for participation in the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992.

Preparations started in Rouyn–Noranda last June, and after a series of six regional seminars, followed by a national conference, the position taken by Canada's youth is to be announced by the middle of October. All this was possible thanks to the Green Plan.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to our youth's commitment and involvement and the high level of their discussions by young people on environmental issues. I am convinced that the proposals made by our young people will lead to a world consensus on youth's role in the struggle to protect the environment and to promote sustainable development.

ANTUN KIKAS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated that her government is urging the Yugoslav army to end its use of what she calls "excessive force" in the conflict in Croatia. By this statement the minister implies that she accepts the role of the Yugoslav army but just thinks it should be limited.

The Yugoslav army, acting without legitimate political or democratic control, has bombed civilian targets and taken offensive and brutal actions that totally belie its claims to neutrality. These actions deserve the condemnation of this government.

Many Canadians are also deeply concerned about the welfare of Mr. Antun Kikas, a Canadian citizen recently captured by Yugoslav forces and reportedly tortured while in detainment. Mr. Kikas' circumstances are rife with rumour and uncertainty. Canadians who know Antun Kikas are anxiously awaiting a statement from the minister with regard to his current status and whether any steps have been taken by this government to safeguard his health, dignity and human rights.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the major national event of yesterday was a magnanimous victory for the Canadian taxpayer. The fact that the Public Service Alliance has agreed to return to work without preconditions except for the absolute understanding that a wage settlement will not vary from the zero, three, three formula is great news for the nation's economy.

That may appear to be a tough position on the part of the government; that is because it is a tough position. However, when balanced against the one example of 150,000 prairie farmers who will be suffering economic decline for more than a decade—many have had to abandon their farms—it would be unreasonable for the government to assure absolute job security and increased salaries for about the same number of federal public servants, when the only method of payment is higher taxes or a larger debt.

Public servants ought not to be a class immune to the realities of the world. Yesterday was a great victory for government. It was a victory in the battle against deficit spending. It was a victory for the taxpayers. A win is registered for the taxpayers in Canada. Clearly from that will flow a victory for the Public Service itself.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN PASSPORT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Canadians realize how important a passport is.

When new Canadians receive their passports, it is probably the greatest event of their lives. Today, however, this document is also coveted by drug traffickers and fugitives of every kind.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell us when his government became aware of this disastrous situation and what it intends to do about it.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the passport problem.

A Canadian passport is coveted the world over, and the problem is that it is a very popular item with thieves and people of that ilk.

[English]

I want to point out to the hon. member and Leader of the Opposition that security is a crucial element in the development of our passport policies. We try to provide good service for those who require passports. We issue 1.2 million passports a year. We are very concerned by the allegations about the Canadian passport and we are investigating them.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the Prime Minister if he will answer some of these questions.

The very people who are putting crack and cocaine in the hands of the children in our school yards are the same people today who are using the Canadian passport as a calling card.

When was the government made aware of this situation? Which ministers were aware of it? Why has nothing been done about this horrible situation?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is assuming far too much. The Canadian Passport Office has been aware of the fraudulent passport cases that were outlined in the article and it reported them promptly to the RCMP.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that it is not a very big problem. According to the Montreal Gazette this morning, the list of people who got these illegal passports reads like a directory of the international drug trade.

Who is running the department of passports in Canada? Is it the Colombian drug dealers? Which ministers were aware of this? Why has nothing been done? When will the Prime Minister take his job seriously for once in our lives?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not respond in the way I am thoroughly tempted to respond.

I have asked for a full report on this situation because, as I said in response to his first question, I do take the situation very seriously. I have asked my department for a full report.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are concerned about crime. They want our cities and communities safe. Yet today Canadians are outraged to learn that organized crime world-wide is using Canadian passports issued by External Affairs to conduct illegal activities all over the world. The minister has confirmed that she is investigating.

Why has this government allowed the Canadian passport, a symbol of our proud country, to be used as a calling card for international criminals?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we issue 1.2 million passports a year. There are 6 million in circulation. Security is our highest priority in the issue of passports. Eighty-three per cent of our passports are issued personally to those who apply for them.

I have asked for a full report on any allegations that have been made that this situation is a difficult one.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that security is a prime responsibility—

Mrs. McDougall: I said it was a priority.

Mr. Wappel: Priority, that is fine, as it should be. The minister has known since 1989, or her predecessor has known since 1989, from reports by the RCMP that this matter has been going on two full years.

What has taken so long to begin the investigation? Why are you investigating now? If you had started your investigations in 1989 when you should have done so, why is the matter still going on?

Mr. Speaker: I have to ask the hon. member to address his questions through the Chair.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what I said was that I am told that the passport office had been made aware of some of these cases and reported them to the RCMP immediately—immediately, I said, they reported these incidents—and I have asked for a full report on the whole issue. I should also point out that the article in the Gazette says that this is not widespread.

MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to personally thank the President of the Treasury Board for seeing an opportunity yesterday and for the good work he did. I would like to thank him on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. News reports yesterday and today indicate that there could be potentially a very serious resumption of conflict in the Middle East. We are all concerned about Iraq's persistent refusal to agree to inspection of their nuclear sites.

We understand that the United States is moving forces into Saudi Arabia and that U.S. planes are on alert for a possible strike on Bagdhad. Of course, everyone in this House is concerned about this. In a report from the White House, it did say that western allies have agreed to this operation.

Could the Prime Minister tell this House what Canada has agreed to, if anything, and could he give us some information on this situation from a Canadian perspective.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that Secretary Cheney of the United States has indicated that these reports are very considerably inflated in regard to what may or may not be contemplated.

What is taking place, as my hon. friend knows, is repeated violations by Saddam Hussein of United Nations' prescriptions and rulings pursuant to agreed upon resolutions of the Security Council in regard to implementation. He persists in violating and flaunting the will of the international body. The United Nations has conveyed to him the views that these must be accepted in their entirety. His attitude has been to understate the case and be extremely unhelpful.

I hope it was not lost on him what happened when he proceeded with imprudence the last time. If Saddam Hussein has any vestiges of intelligence, which many people doubt, he will immediately follow to the letter all of the rulings of the United Nations Security Council.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us specifically what Canada's response is and whether Canada would have a role in this. Could he tell the House specifically what his instructions have been on behalf of the Government of Canada regarding this?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Inasmuch as Canada has not been asked to play any given role, I cannot respond because it would be entirely hypothetical.

Canada was a member of the Security Council when the matter was resolved and the prescriptions were drawn up and designed. As a member of the Security Council and as a member of the General Assembly we, along with every other nation in the world, with one or two exceptions, insist on the full and strict application of those sanctions as they apply to Iraq.

I suppose the message all members would want to send to Iraq is that in their own interests, and the interests of all of their people, to urge their leadership to comply immediately and totally with the prescriptions of the United Nations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Did President Bush get in touch with the Prime Minister about the situation? And if so, what was the Prime Minister's answer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, President Bush did not get in touch with me about this, and in fact we are referring to resolutions already ratified by the United Nations Security Council. What we see today is a refusal by Saddam Hussein to comply with rulings already approved by the Security Council.

Three months ago, the President of Iraq refused to proceed with caution. He underestimated the political will of the civilized world. The direct threat to peace, to his neighbours and to Israel was very real. It was made clear to him what the consequences might be but he has refused to comply with the resolutions of the Security Council. He is now being urged to comply, fully and without delay, with those resolutions.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The government is playing the fiddle while Montreal burns! This summer, government members begged the government to do something about the situation in Montreal. It has done nothing.

This morning, the government of Quebec released a devastating report on the economy in the metropolitan area which totally contradicts all the claims made by Tory ministers. Things have never been worse in all the 25 years I have been a resident of Montreal.

My question is this, and I think the time for the usual stock answers is past, what specific plan—perhaps the Prime Minister would care to listen to what I have to say—what specific program is the Prime Minister prepared to implement and when, to guarantee that children in Montreal will no longer go to school on an empty stomach?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that the prosperity of Montreal is contingent upon the economic prosperity of Canada as a whole. This is the first step.

Second, last February when the Budget was brought down, we tabled an economic recovery plan for this country based on a number of principles. We had to reduce the deficit, bring down inflation and reduce interest rates, and are making considerable headway on all three fronts.

I may add that since the beginning of our economic recovery, 47,000 jobs have been created, including more than 27,000 in Montreal. So the government is doing a lot for Montreal, and it will do a lot more.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new minister responsible for Montreal.

The minister is right: Montreal is suffering the consequences of the government's policies: an excessively high dollar, cuts in research and development and no manpower programs. Make no mistake: the roots of our national unity crisis are economic as well as constitutional.

My question is this: When will the minister or the Prime Minister or at least someone on the other side finally realize that if Montreal is taken care of, Quebec will be in better shape and Canada will be better off?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the Liberal Party ask questions about Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention three instances in which this government wanted to do something and, in fact, did something for Montreal but was unable to get any co-operation from the Liberal Party.

First, when the time came to establish the Space Agency in Montreal, why didn't Liberal members from Montreal support the plan to locate the agency in their city? Second, in the case of Bill C-22 concerning drug patents, what did these members do? They were all dead against helping Montreal. Third—and these are just three examples—as far as the petrochemical industry is concerned, from 1980 to 1984, the Liberal government, and more specifically Mr. Lalonde, wanted to kill Petromont and the petrochemical industry in Montreal. Without the Prime Minister's intervention, thousands of jobs would have been lost. And we saved those jobs!

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, confidential revenue department studies report that the Minister of National Revenue knew that the GST would cause dramatic increases in cross-border shopping. Yet he has consistently denied that the GST is the main factor in this cross-border shopping increase.

If the Prime Minister still believes that his ministers should demonstrate integrity and responsibility, when will he ask his Minister of National Revenue for his resignation?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have always known that the hon. member is in the dark most of the time.

I was not so certain about my friend, Alan Freeman of The Globe and Mail, whose story the hon. member is referring to because the contents of this document were made public May 7 of this year. They were refuted by the Deputy Minister of Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, when she concluded in her public press release of May 7 that the study represents one person's opinion and does not reflect the view of the department or the government.

Further to that—I am sure the opposition members are not going to be happy with this news—today's Canadian Economic Observer from Statistics Canada reports that the GST was not to blame for cross-border shopping because cross-border shopping, according to Statistics Canada, is decreasing as of January 1, 1991 as compared to the previous three years. That is a fact.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not whether the minister can skate around his statements; the issue is that the minister knew what would be the impact of the GST on cross-border shopping because his own department had given prior warning.

He knew but did nothing. Worse, he continually told Canadians that cross-border shopping and GST were not related.

The behaviour has so incensed Canadians in the business community that today the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses called on the Prime Minister in the interests of decency and honesty to fire his minister. When will the Prime Minister act on the federation's advice?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I guess John Bulloch has been in the dark the same way as the hon. member because the statistics speak for themselves.

Canadian Economic Observer, a publication of Statistics Canada which was released early this morning—I am sure the hon. member has not read that yet—concluded that in 1987, the increases of cross-border shopping was 20 per cent. In 1988, it was 17 per cent; in 1989, it was 20 per cent; in 1990, it was 20 per cent and in the first two quarters of 1991, after the introduction of the GST and the scrapping of the unfair manufacturers' sales tax, the increase in the first quarter was only 2.3 per cent and in the second quarter, it was lowered to 1.3 per cent. That is progress.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, before the last election, the Prime Minister signed a land claims agreement in principle with the chiefs of the Dene nation.

He said he was building a lasting relationship with the Dene people and a more united Canada.

Three years later, the agreement has disintegrated, Dene funding has been slashed, the government refuses to discuss outstanding issues and the Prime Minister is too busy to meet with the leaders of the Dene people.

Will the Prime Minister commit himself to meet with Dene national chief, Bill Erasmus, who is in Ottawa this week to resume building what he called a lasting relationship and a unified Canada that includes the Dene people?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

It gives me an opportunity to remind the House of the remarkable progress we have made in dealing with land claims, introducing new specific claims policies, preparing in conjunction with aboriginal leadership new alternatives to the Indian Act and all of the debilitating impact that act has had on Indian people and on the new constitutional initiatives which my colleague, the minister responsible for Canadian unity has brought forward.

I meet regularly with the leaders of all First Nations people and have met Mr. Erasmus on numerous occasions. I find it unfortunate that he chose to persuade his people to abandon what was perhaps the most global and significant land claim agreement in all of Canadian history.

I hope we will have a chance to revisit that agreement in the not to distant future.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Twenty-four of 27 Dene communities have rejected the land claims agreement which extinguishes their aboriginal rights. In fact, no other group in Canada is required to surrender its rights under the Constitution or the Charter as a precondition of reaching agreements with the government.

Will the Prime Minister remove the extinguishment of constitutionally protected aboriginal rights as a precondition to settling land claims in this country?

Will he get back to the bargaining table with the Dene without the precondition of extinguishment?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the reality is that many First Nations people have defined aboriginal rights under treaty, including the Dene people of the Western Arctic.

Furthermore, where those rights have not entirely been respected by previous governments, this government has made tremendous progress, as we did in Saskatchewan just last Friday when we signed an historic cost-sharing agreement with the government of the province of Saskatchewan to settle treaty land entitlements with some 27 First Nations bands of Saskatchewan, something that previous NDP governments never had the courage to do.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. His standard line in his answer today is that everyone is in the dark. I submit to you that the Minister of National Revenue is skating on thin ice on this one.

Last fall, a study prepared by his own department warned that the GST could lead to an annual increase of two million travellers to the U.S. In fact, in the first six months of the GST, same-day cars to the U.S. increased by 4.8 million. Why did the minister go across the country saying that the GST would not be a factor in increasing cross-border shopping when he knew better.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will out-skate that hon. member anytime.

An hon. member: He is just an old referee.

Mr. Jelinek: Obviously he already had his question written prior to the answers I gave to his colleague. So instead of repeating my answer, I will just point to the Canadian Economics Observer from Statistics Canada which confirms the things I have been saying for the last 18 months.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are blowing the whistle on this minister.

An hon. member: They are going to throw him out of the game.

An hon. member: Put him in the penalty box.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of National Revenue. The bankruptcy rate among small and mid-sized businesses has reached a record high. Unemployment continues to rise throughout the country, particularly in border communities. Can the minister explain his inaction in view of the damages to the national economy? Will he now admit that the mayor of Sarnia was telling the truth when he said that Revenue Canada was aware of the problems and their consequences but that neither the minister nor his department did a thing about it?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): I have met with all the border communities and their mayors as well as the border business communities, including the Mayor of Sarnia, the former Liberal candidate in the last election by the way. We have come to the conclusion, and I believe, that there are many problems which are far more complex than just taxation and federal government policies. This problem of cross-border shopping spreads across all three levels of government, the private sector, labour and other organizations.

As a result, in co-operation with the Retail Council of Canada, with the chambers of commerce, with labour and the provinces and the communities, we have embarked upon a program which is resulting in the reduction of the cross-border shopping which Statistics Canada released this morning. I think we are on the right track.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have from the Minister of Agriculture a definitive answer on emergency assistance to farmers. I am not looking for information on what the government has done so far, nor am I seeking information on what the government might do under the new safety net programs over the next couple of months.

Mr. Speaker, I want the minister to address the $1 billion shortfall of the last crop year. That shortfall has left farmers in dire straits.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harvard: Shut your mouth.

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member that if it is necessary, he might ask the Speaker to intervene. Would the hon. member put his question, please.

• (1450)

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, the farmers are demanding emergency assistance, and I would like to know from the minister whether he is going to provide it, and if so, how much?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the hon. member does not want me to repeat the impressive record of this government in supporting farmers. I can tell him that that record speaks for itself.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the farmers already have certain information. The critical information they do not have relates to emergency assistance. They want to know what the government is going to provide. If the minister does not know, there have been numerous protests and rallies already to try to get through to this minister just how serious the situation is. In fact, there will be a major rally in Brandon, Manitoba tomorrow.

I ask the minister again to take this matter seriously and tell us now the kind of assistance he is going to provide to Canadian farmers.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I should assist the hon. member. If he is attending the meeting in Brandon tomorrow, he will be one day early. It is on Friday. From past experience we certainly hope he attends.

I can inform the hon. member of the assistance which has been made available by the Government of Canada, in co-operation with our partners, the provinces and the producers. Some $300 million plus in NISA will be provided between now and the end of the year. The first interim payment under GRIP, which is decided by the provincial governments and the provincial agency—

Mr. Harvard: I know that.

Mr. McKnight: He says he knows that. If he knows that, why would he continue to say we are doing nothing when over $2 billion will be provided to producers under those programs that have been worked out by the producers, by the farm leaders, by the provincial governments and the Government of Canada?

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As the minister knows, the Government of Canada was quick to support sovereign self-determination for the Baltics, to condemn and go to war over the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, yet our government has consistently supported Indonesia in its illegal conquest and brutal oppression of East Timor.

I want to ask the minister, whether in spite of Canada's substantial bilateral aid and billion dollar private investment in Indonesia, will Canada now act to support United Nations initiatives to free East Timor from Indonesia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada considers that Indonesian sovereignty over East Timor is a fact, recognizing that there has never been any history of independence or self-determination or self-government in that territory.

We do not condone the manner of incorporation and we deplore and condemn the loss of life that occurred, but we very much support the unsponsored dialogue between Portugal and Indonesia as the most promising means to reach an understanding in that very unfortunate and unhappy circumstance.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is reported that the Prime Minister is being pressured by External Affairs and the business community to visit South Africa this fall, despite the fact that the majority in South Africa are still denied their democratic rights on the basis of their colour.

Has the Prime Minister received a message from Nelson Mandela asking him not to visit? Has the Prime Minister decided to comply with that request and to withhold a prime ministerial visit to South Africa until the blight of apartheid is truly lifted in that country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is in error. I have been pressured by absolutely no one, least of all any members of various communities in regard to any possible trips to South Africa or elsewhere.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs returned from New Delhi where she chaired, as agreed, the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers Conference in respect of sanctions for which Canada has had the chair for some years prior to the conference in Harare. The recommendation from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to me, upon her arrival, was that in the circumstances, even though President de Klerk had made some very courageous gestures towards a reconciliation in South Africa, that a visit by the Prime Minister of Canada at this particular time would not be helpful. In consequence, and acting on the direct recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I advised President de Klerk of my intention to delay a visit to South Africa until some other time.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Would the minister agree that the United Nations Security Council urgently needs to consider the grave and tragic Yugoslavian situation and offer to mediate it and, should that mediation process begin, also offer to send a United Nations peacekeeping force into Yugoslavia so that the democratic process and the wishes of the people will be respected in determining their future?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me say, in response to this question, and also some of the remarks that were made earlier, that Canada very early condemned the violence in Yugoslavia in all its aspects and, indeed, the Prime Minister has written letters to the President of Yugoslavia. I have raised it directly with the foreign minister of Yugoslavia. We completely agree that it is time for the UN Security Council to consider the matter and indeed, the Prime Minister, in discussions with our ambassador there, has recommended that we explore with the President of the Security Council all avenues that are open to the United Nations.

We are very concerned about the situation. We have discussed it with the Croatians, who obviously are distraught about this situation. I have offered the resources of my department to try and help them stay in touch with their families. If a peacekeeping operation is organized, of course Canada will be there offering to help.

We are also in regular touch with the President of the European Community who is doing his best to try to manage this situation in the meantime.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for regional development, the Minister of Transportation, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Aside from ancient history, quibbling between the old parties and all the bragging, the fact remains that Montreal's economy is in a sorry state. Everybody agrees on that point, except for the minister responsible. You do not have to be a native of Montreal to know that Montreal is the motor of the Quebec economy and that, should Montreal's economy crumble, it would spell disaster for the entire province. I ask the Prime Minister: at long last, will you tell us, tell this House and tell Quebec what you intend to do to put Montreal's economy on track again?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that Montreal is going through a difficult time while adjusting to structural changes in the economy. In the early 1980's, when the manufacturing sector was very strong in Montreal, the members opposite who were then in power imposed upon Montreal a protectionist policy which is now proving to be catastrophic. What we have tried to do first in our February Budget, was to bring down the deficit, to curb inflation and lower interest rates. And we have no doubt that this kind of policy will bring about a strong economic recovery.

Mr. Lapierre: Platitudes!

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, same old tune! This is a serious question and I will put it again to the Premier Minister. He knows Montreal and its people well. He knows what the community thinks. He knows that the people are worried and wonder how much longer they will have to suffer from the incompetence and indifference of the present minister responsible for their area. When will the government and the Prime Minister appoint a minister truly responsible for Montreal, for Montreal's sake?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): We are doing a lot for Montreal, Mr. Speaker and always with the future in mind. Tomorrow's industries not yesterday's need our support. We are doing a lot to support them and my hon. friend knows full well that to speak of a space agency is to speak of an industry of the future. The same is true of pharmaceutical research and a bill was passed about this. Another industry of the future. Similarly when I talk about good jobs in the petrochemical sector.

So, we are indeed interested in the future of Montreal and we are indeed introducing legislation to enhance its future.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. To date, all Quebec agriculture ministers have supported the quota policies brought in by the previous government. I have met with the President of the UPA, Mr. Proulx, and the Quebec Department of Agriculture, and we are very interested to know unequivocally from our minister—we want the assurance that you will never drop Article XI of GATT and that you will strengthen more than ever our farmers' right to quotas, the pillar of our agricultural system.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that my colleague has consulted with the UPA president. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture and I met Mr. Proulx less than a week ago and spent three hours discussing all the issues affecting Quebec farmers.

I can assure him that if ever a government took an interest in Canadian and Quebec farmers, especially milk producers, it is this one, because we have implemented a long-term dairy policy. We have managed to take to GATT a national position that was supported by all Canadian farmers, whereas the previous government left farmers, especially milk producers, in limbo for five years with no long-term dairy policy—you never brought one in, but we did. We have maintained it. The Prime Minister is committed to having a long-term dairy policy. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian farmers know what we have done for them and we will continue to defend them. Only this government is able to do so.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Agriculture. Several senior members of our supply managed commodities told us that they have been told by senior Canadian officials that Canada is changing its position at the GATT and is now willing to give up Article XI in order to get an agreement at GATT.

I ask the minister: Will he make a commitment in this House today to stand up for Canadian supply managed farmers and say that he will not sign anything at GATT that undermines Article XI?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member in all frankness that whomever he may use as his source is factually incorrect. If they are representing themselves as officials from the Government of Canada, I would very much appreciate the opportunity to speak directly to them.

The Government of Canada has stated, as my colleagues have, its position on Article XI. We are not talking about weakening Article XI. What we have asked for, and what the policy of this government is, is that Article XI should be further clarified and strengthened. That has not been changed and will not change until the government says it will change.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. The minister is well aware of the devastating failure of the inshore fishery in some regions of Newfoundland and Labrador. Indeed, thousands of fishermen and plant workers in my riding in the Strait of Belle Isle and White Bay on the Baie Verte Peninsula are looking to the government for assistance.

I want to ask the minister of employment, who is a former minister of fisheries and is well aware of the situation in the province today, what measures are being contemplated to assist these inshore fishermen and plant workers and when may we expect some announcement of the government's intentions?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the government is well aware of the difficult situation in certain parts of Newfoundland and on the coast of Labrador in terms of the fishery.

As my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, indicated yesterday, we are considering with the provincial government and with the union in Newfoundland and Labrador the method by which we can help the citizens of Newfoundland and Labrador to meet that difficult situation.

As we are speaking, officials in my department and at Fisheries and Oceans are working on this. As soon as we are in a position with the support of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and the union to make public our recommendation, we shall.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Indeed it is encouraging to know that the provincial government, the federal government and the union are working together. I think what people want on September 18, at this time of the year with children just back in school, no income, down to their last dollars, is to make a decision whether to carry on fishing to put bread and butter on the table. What they want from the minister, understandably, is some assurance that assistance is going to be forthcoming soon, within a matter of weeks. Last year assistance was not forthcoming until the end of December.

Can we have a quicker response this year so that fishermen know they can carry on fishing for what little resources are left out there?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): If the hon. member is concerned about the timing, do not go back to December of last year. Look at the ice conditions of this spring. This government acted expeditiously to put in place a program of $18 million that benefitted 9,000 people from Newfoundland and Labrador.

I think those people of Newfoundland and Labrador know that the Conservative government in Ottawa works.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Two years ago the government gave $1 million to Kendall Canada to help it move from my riding to Peterborough, Ontario. A week ago Kendall announced it was closing its new manufacturing operation in Peterborough and moving its production to the United States, resulting in a loss of some 165 jobs in Peterborough, following a loss two years ago of some 700 jobs in my riding.

What steps does the government intend to take to stem the growing number of manufacturing job losses in this country? Also, can the Canadian taxpayers at least expect to get that $1 million back?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to my hon. friend and I join him in expressing empathy for those who will lose their jobs. He should know, however, that when Kendall moved to Peterborough, the whole operation would have gone to the United States. This was before the free trade agreement two years ago. The whole operation would have gone there. As a result of this contribution, Kendall was moved to Peterborough and a part of the operation will remain in Peterborough. More importantly, I will make sure that the terms and conditions of that grant are adhered to and make sure the control period is adhered to.

Also, under the over-all program, IRDP, Coca-Cola moved to Peterborough, Minute Maid moved to Peterborough, Royal Homes moved to Peterborough. Thousands of jobs were created under that program.

HOUSING

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. When will the minister direct Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to remove the high risk designation for mortgage eligibility from the city of Fort McMurray, a city of 35,000 people?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing this matter. I have every sympathy with the hon. member's eloquent representations in this regard. We are looking at the policy and if it is possible to do so, we will have another look and see if it can be effected.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The government has stated that it intends to stabilize Canadian carbon dioxide emissions at their 1990 levels by the year 2000. However, on Monday, speaking to a meeting of the Canadian Coal Association, energy standing committee chairman Al Johnson said: "This is an impossible goal".

My question is: Was Mr. Johnson's statement a signal from the government? Is the government abandoning even its wishy-washy capping goal? Or is the chairman of the standing committee simply personally repudiating his government's policy?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as they say: "none of the above" as to the options the hon. member put in his question.

The hon. member should know, and he and I have discussed this in committee before, that it is Canada's policy to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000. We are working on moving that toward a signature for Brazil in 1992. There are obviously great differences internationally as to how stabilization can be effected. I can give him, for example, the European proposal or the American proposal where they include CFCs and where Canada has not.

If we exclude some of those issues then for Canada it makes it much more difficult to meet some of the criteria that other countries have given themselves and for which they are given credit. When we look behind the veil, so to speak, it is not the same as it appears.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: The time for Question Period has, even with the extension, concluded.

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to designate tomorrow as an allotted day.

POINT OF ORDER

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Agriculture, in response to my supplementary question on the PVY-N virus, replied:

> —regardless of the strain of virus it is not accepted in the United States.

I would like the hon. minister to clarify that statement.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is not only the area of the United States. It is those in areas within Canada that are not looking forward and are resisting every effort to have a virus transmitted into their region. We hope that through the process that has been established by Agriculture Canada and the openness with the United States that there may be able to be a reopening of the table market for Prince Edward Island potatoes.

But I am sure the hon. member supports the efforts of the Government of Canada and the moneys that have been expended in eradicating the PVY-N virus which, although not dangerous to humans, is dangerous to the production and the ongoing support in the agricultural industry.

Mr. Speaker: I might just remind hon. members that I certainly would be prepared to hear points of order, but we do have an order which compels us to vote now.

If the hon. member feels it is of great urgency, I will hear it now or I will hear it later.

An hon. member: Later.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the main motion carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Tuesday, September 17, 1991, proceedings on the bill are halted.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was unavoidably detained, but had I been here for both votes I would have voted with my caucus.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

POINTS OF ORDER

CONDUCT IN CHAMBER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House a subject matter which I believe to be of great importance. The hon. member for Burlington made an apology earlier and it is totally accepted by the hon. member for Hamilton East.

I wish to talk about something which is beyond that. I ask the Chair for direction. I make a suggestion to the Chair, in view of the broader issue, for the Chair to take under active consideration the prospects of meeting with representatives of the three national parties, as well as members who are independent in this Chamber. I ask that the Chair sit down with those members at a time later this week or early next week and have a discussion with regard to some of the conduct of members on all sides of the House, as it relates to how females are treated in this Chamber.

It is becoming more and more apparent each and every day that sometimes there is hissing and sometimes there are certain catcalls, certain expressions which are not appreciated. Nor do we believe that they should be put forward on the floor of the House of Commons.

All of us, from time to time, in expressing our views may or may not use certain colourful language. There has to be a restriction and that restriction, Sir, I think, must be administered by you, the impartial person in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that you reflect on my suggestion—perhaps other members opposite or, indeed, other parties might wish to make a comment or two—but do so with some dispatch, and come back to this House and provide some rules and guidance on that particular specific issue.

Mr. Speaker, for too long I think those of us in this Chamber have not accorded the kind of treatment that human beings, whether they be female or male, ought to have in this Chamber. I respectfully request that you give serious consideration to this request.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, who kindly and courteously advised me earlier that he would rise on this matter. I draw it to members' attention that he has been very careful in what he said. This is not a reopening of the incident of yesterday which has been dealt with today.

I wish to say to hon. members that I would be very prepared to meet with members of each of the parties in the House and others for a discussion on this matter and, perhaps, on a wider range of matters that arise from it. I thank the hon. member for bringing this to my attention. My office will be in touch with his office and others in the Chamber.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order, who has very patiently waited until this moment to bring it to our attention.

REPLIES TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order. I know the hard working Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader bears a tremendous burden in this House, but I think his zealousness has carried him a bit too far.

I looked at Hansard and reviewed the answers to the questions that he so kindly provided in the House yesterday. They were numerous. I noticed that printed with each answer in Hansard is a statement of the time that some person took to prepare the answer and then the parliamentary secretary has deigned to provide us with the cost of providing the reply.

That is very, very nice, but I suggest that there is an ulterior motive here and that is to suggest that somehow parliamentarians, particularly opposition members, who after all seem to be the only inquisitive ones in this House, put forward questions and that somehow they are wasting public money in requesting information from the government. With respect, that is not so. In fact, the answers themselves give away greater evidence of waste than any cost of any of the answers provided. I could cite those but I would not want to do that on a point of order. It might not be fair.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to, first of all, look at the answers he provides. Second, I ask the Speaker, since we are not allowed to put partisan comments or assertions in our questions, to ensure that the parliamentary secretary is not permitted to include in answers extraneous material that has nothing to do with the question asked, namely the amount of time it took to complete and the estimated cost of completion, It is very nice of the parliamentary secretary to provide the information, but I suggest it is quite out of order and I ask Your Honour to so rule.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to reply. I think my hard working, very capable and outstanding parliamentary secretary is being much maligned unnecessarily. The member for Kingston and the Islands is correct that the answers he has received, and will receive, put down factual information. Whether the questions come from this side or that side, or wherever they come from, it is simply factual information. If it is as he alleges, the answers to the questions themselves that show great waste and so on, surely those who read Hansard diligently, as he does and I do, and I am sure millions and millions of Canadians do, can make their judgments as to the validity. But I find it passing strange that we have a member of the opposition standing up saying: "We don't want this information about how our tax dollars are being spent". Providing the information about how government spends the taxpayers' money is what we are prevailed upon to do constantly, and we are doing it as openly and as frequently and as thoroughly as we possibly can.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I would like to say that on the answers I received back yesterday, I was really surprised and amused to see the time, four hours, and the amount of money, $72 an hour, I think.

I would like to know if we can state in our questions, when placing them on the Order Paper, how many letters we have sent asking the minister's office or the minister for information, or in questions or in committees how long we have been asking for those answers. I found it very ironic that it took four hours of time of somebody in the department at $72 a hour to answer two of the three questions that I had asked. I also found it very ironic that I am not allowed to say how long my constituents have been waiting for some of the answers I got yesterday. I cannot believe that there was one involving a program that I have been asking since last year for the answer and I could not get it until I put it on the Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker, I think that my rights as a member of Parliament should be the same as those of the ministers or the civil servants who prepare the answers who have at their disposal those answers to those questions for a year, some of them, and I am not allowed to have them. How do you think my constituents feel when the government will not even respect the right of a member of Parliament in this House to have an answer and yet I am told it takes them four hours to prepare it. when we have been waiting a year in some cases to get answers.

I think that we should be able to put into the questions that we put on the written Order Paper how long we have been asking for such an answer.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the arbitrary change in the manner of reporting answers to the House disturbs me. The questions on the Order Paper are a tool provided to members of Parliament and, through them, their constituents, to seek information from the government of the day; information about programs, information about government practices, information about government spending.

It may be quite legitimate for this House to make a determination as to whether the cost of providing that information should also be provided as part of the response. But I do not believe it is up to the government of the day to arbitrarily provide the additional information, particularly because this House has no understanding of how it was arrived at, no assurance that it would withstand an audit, no understanding or knowledge of how the calculations are made. I mean, what are the rates? Also, Mr. Speaker, there is no indication of what this new process is costing the taxpayer in order to track this information.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to review this, and until such time as you have reviewed the correctness of this change—in fact, to determine whether or not the government can arbitrarily do this—that until that time this information not be collected and not be included in the answers to questions tabled in this House.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the House unduly. I just want to say very simply that I think this is the kind of information that the Canadian taxpayer has the right to see.

Second, I remind the Speaker that there is no restriction on the type of answers that I and the ministers provide to questions. I would want the Speaker to keep that in mind in the ruling he may make.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the comment by the hon. member for South West Nova, and the comment of course by the hon. member for Atikokan.

I have also listened carefully to the government House leader and the parliamentary secretary. It may be a fine point but I think hon. members would ask that I get a chance to read carefully the rule under which the answers are given. I shall try to return to the House with something which may be of assistance to all hon. members.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-270, an act to amend the Constitution Act 1867, oath of allegiance.

He said: Madam Speaker, since 1774, members have had to take an oath which has not borne any mention of Canada but to the Crown of Britain. Because of my respect for our institutions and traditions, this bill would not do away with the oath as it stands, but would build on it by having all members pledge allegiance to Canada as well as the Crown.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GARNISHMENT, ATTACHMENT AND PENSION DIVERSION ACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-271, an act respecting the diversion of pension benefits payable in respect of service in the Canadian Forces.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure a more equitable distribution of pension funds accumulated by members of the armed forces upon break-up of their marriages.

The government has indicated over the years that it intends to make changes in this area of the law. I am simply trying to speed up the process.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-272, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill is one to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. The amendments were inspired in the course of reading the annual report of the RCMP Public Complaints Committee.

The Public Complaints Committee recommended a series of changes to the act. I took the liberty of having the complaints drafted as legislation. I am introducing them in the House for the purpose of discussion. I believe that only by drafting these kinds of things into bills can we usefully use the reports that are submitted to this House. I felt it a useful exercise for the House to go through, to study the proposals in detail. That is the purpose of the bill and I invite hon. members to consider the changes to the RCMP Act in accordance with the report of that body.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FINANCE

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I seek consent for three motions which I will present one at a time.

I move:

That the Standing Committee on Finance and necessary staff be authorized to travel to Washington, to study the American experience with spending control legislation, from September 22 to September 24, 1991.

• (1610)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion.

An hon. member: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot take a point of order once a motion has been put. I will recognize the hon. member for Shefford later.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I would simply like to point out to the Parliamentary Secretary that it is much easier for us to give consent to motions members opposite have had the decency to give notice of than to motions we have never seen. I notice the Deputy Prime Minister is nodding. I know, this approach is so much easier for them and much less degrading too.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I wish to acknowledge the hon. member's intervention and thank him for his co-operation and, as usual, I will do everything I can to co-operate with him in a precedent setting manner.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary had another motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the consent of the House to move the motion?

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions which are in conformity with the rules and regulations of the House of Commons. The first one is with respect to the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that this is the 34th tax increase—they note, another one. They also identified that it contributes to higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

They appeal and ask the government to have the decency to withdraw a tax that hurts seniors, students, small businesses and others.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my second petition is with respect to education.

The petitioners point out that the government has reduced the transfers to provinces by $485 million. They are alarmed at the closing of campus employment centres, which they feel is a detriment to their employment possibilities and they are particularly angry at the 3 per cent tax on student loans.

I do not know if you knew this, Madam Speaker, but you have to put the cash out front before you can get the loan. It makes a mockery out of what the government talks about; learning, culture and competitiveness.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House petitions from my constituency of Hamilton Mountain and from other ridings in Canada. These petitioners support their right to collective bargaining.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to continue to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free, collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of residents of Nova Scotia, Quebec, New Brunswick and Ontario.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain where appropriate upgrade remote services upon which many Canadians rely and provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world. They want to put Canada back on track.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege today to present petitions signed by the Croatian community of the city I represent, Thunder Bay.

They implore this government to show their deep concern about the fate of the families and their compatriots who are suffering today in Yugoslavia and in particular, Croatia.

What the petitioners are trying to say in essence through their petition is that the Canadian government should realize its obligations in its peacekeeping roles that have been consistent throughout Canada's history since 1956 in its role in the UN, take its obligation seriously, provide the peacekeeping efforts that are so necessary to bring peace and order to Croatia, and recognize the independence and sovereignty of such a nation.

I have the privilege to present this petition on behalf of the Croatian community from Thunder Bay.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, while I am on my feet, I would like to present the following petition with over 1,000 names from the United Steel Workers in the area of Thunder Bay. They petition this government to reconsider its program with respect to the defence contract that is pending on the mine sweeper program.

The petitioners are concerned about the viability of the future of the shipbuilding industry in Ontario. They know that if Ontario is not the recipient of part of this government contract, part of this mine sweeper program, that the shipbuilding industry in the province of Ontario could very well close down putting out all of the workers, not only the iron workers who are presently employed by the boilermakers union in Port Weller but the shipbuilding industry in Thunder Bay.

Therefore, I have the pleasure of presenting this petition on their behalf today and implore the government to act accordingly.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present four petitions all on the same subject from my constituents of Kenora—Rainy River, specifically Ear Falls, Dryden, Emo, Rainy river and of course Fort Frances.

These petitioners humbly pray that the Parliament of Canada will reject the imposition of a wage freeze and will consider the importance of the collective bargaining process in this country and how fragile it can be for all Canadians.

While I am on my feet, I would like to take the opportunity to congratulate the minister on the job well done yesterday, for getting both parties back to the bargaining table and giving them an opportunity to get a collective agreement that will make everyone happy and help us to make this country as great as it can be.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too would like to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, over 800 signed petitions from my constituency of Winnipeg North and from across Canada.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm its support for the principle of collective bargaining now enshrined in law for all Canadian workers.

Like my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River, I would like to congratulate the President of the Treasury Board for eventually agreeing that the government will sit down at the bargaining table with the Public Service Alliance of Canada on behalf of its members. I am glad that the government has listened to the demand of the opposition led by my leader in this House.

I am proceeding with the presentation of this petition to safeguard the interests of all public servants, especially the women workers who also cry for pay equity, particularly in view of the votes of just a few minutes ago. Therefore the parliamentary sword of Damocles still hangs over Canadian workers.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from a number of residents of Avola, Clearwater, Little Fort and Kamloops who are concerned about a proposal to dam the North Thompson River at a community named Vavenby in order to divert water into the San Diego, California area through a series of canals and pipelines and river systems.

They remind us of the NAWPA proposal, which is of course to divert Canadian rivers into the United States and northern Mexico. They are simply calling upon the government to indicate categorically to the Americans that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States and to state clearly that Canadian rivers are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have petition on another matter to present on behalf of a number of constituents from a variety of communities in my constituency and elsewhere.

They are concerned of the possibility of still further cutbacks to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and are simply calling upon the Government of Canada to ensure that proper funding is provided to the RCMP to enable it to fulfil its mandate as expected.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today signed by hundreds of Canadians from across Ontario, particularly from Mississauga, Burlington, Caledon East, Brampton, Osgoode, Cornwall, Kitchener, and other places closer to Ottawa.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm their support for the collective bargaining process in Canada. I am sure they are delighted with the outcome of the negotiations yesterday and are pleased that we will not be proceeding with the bill, at least pending the resolution of the current labour dispute.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if question No. 94 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 94 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 94—Mr. Althouse:

For each year since 1989, has Agriculture Canada undertaken field testing of genetically altered crops and, if so, (a) what tests were done (b) were environmental assessment studies carried out before each test and, if not, why not?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To say that I was heart broken to see that my question was not answered yesterday is putting it mildly.

On May 13, I placed a question on the Order Paper which I had previously placed on the Order Paper on February 25 this year. I asked for a 45-day response. It is still unanswered.

The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was on his feet a little while ago asking about the situation in Montreal. I can understand why he was not asking about his constituency because my question asks about government largesse in that constituency in the by-election.

I ask what promises the government has made and whether they have been fulfilled. I think it is fair that the answer would not take eight or nine months. This is simply an abuse of the process, and I ask the parliamentary secretary to look into this matter and provide the answer at an early date. It has got past the stage where I should have to rise and object. I have done so on two occasions before and have had my pleas fall on deaf ears.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising his concerns. I must apologize to him. I am quite certain I signed that particular question off. I thought I had tabled it in yesterday's group. I will certainly check to see where it is because it was my understanding, if my memory serves me right, I signed off several over the weekend and I was quite certain that his was in that group. I will check.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

P-2—Mr. Murphy

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence and communications regarding the issue of Bill C-79 between the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister's Office, the Privy Council Office, and any Cabinet Ministers and/or their agents and the member of Parliament for Lévis, or anyone acting on his behalf.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, there was no correspondence or communications exchanged between the Privy Council Office and the member of Parliament for Lévis on the issue of Bill C-79.

A copy of Order in Council PC-1991-813 dated May 7, 1991 was faxed to the member of Parliament for Lévis on May 7, 1991 from the Privy Council Office. As for any communications between the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister's Office, cabinet ministers and the member of Parliament for Lévis, it is not the policy of the government to divulge communications between members of Parliament and ministers.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion and ask that it be transferred for debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Transferred for debate.

P-3—Mr. Murphy

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence and communications regarding the issue of Bill C-79, between the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister's Office, the Privy Council Office, and any Cabinet Ministers and/or their agents and the Member of Parliament for Lotbiniére, or anyone acting on his behalf.

Mr. Cooper: There was no correspondence or communications on the issue of Bill C–79 between the Privy Council Office and the member of Parliament for Lotbiniére.

As for any communications between the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister's Office, cabinet ministers and the member of Parliament for Lotbiniére, it is not the policy of the government to divulge communications between members of Parliament and ministers.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion. In the case of his absence, once again perhaps we can transfer that for debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received one application pursuant to Standing Order 52.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, this motion calls for a special debate under Standing Order 52 to address the serious problems facing the Canadian agricultural industry today.

Desperate financial cash flow problems are facing a generation of Canadian farmers. This is due to the government's drastic cutback in income support during the 1990–91 crop year, the lack of emergency transitional funding as the government was moving from an old system of ad hoc assistance to a new program for the new crop year 1991–92, and the lack of that additional cash. As well, the situation has been exacerbated by droughts in some parts of southern Ontario.

The crisis is very real. Canadian farmers are suffering. This issue needs to be addressed by the House of Commons. I call on the Chair and the government to debate this important issue so that farmers will know that members of the House of Commons are concerned and ready to act on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Algoma for his explanation. Coming from a rural riding myself, I know that there are problems out there and that some efforts are being made.

On the other hand, there other things that we could talk about today. Tomorrow being an allotted day, the hon. member may want to discuss this with his party and try to bring this subject to the House very shortly. I do hope that it is brought to the House very shortly.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT ACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to move second reading of Bill C–21, the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account.

The legislation we are dealing with today is part of the comprehensive package of policies and programs that date back to 1984, a strategy designed to put Canada on the road to economic recovery and restore long–term prosperity. It was particularly designed to help Canada meet the challenges of globalization, which all countries of the world have to face, especially those countries which are heavily reliant on exports, as is Canada.

The initiative begun in November 1984, as reinforced in the February 1991 budget, set out a comprehensive plan for economic recovery based upon controlling inflation, improving our competitiveness, and controlling government expenditure, with the objective of achieving sustainable growth with price stability.

This bill is part and parcel of that initiative, as is the proposed spending control legislation which is currently being studied by a committee of this House.

This government is committed to a policy of sustainable growth with price stability. We are committed to an economy that can support the social programs that have made Canada a good place to live. We are committed to ensuring that our tax system is fair and to deficit reduction and debt control. We are committed to this because we want to ensure that future generations will not be strangled by the huge overhanging burden of debt.

Fiscal responsibility is more than a matter of protecting the interests of the future generations of Canadians who are not here to speak for themselves. Greater fiscal responsibility is essential for improving the health of the Canadian economy in 1991 as we head into the next decade. Essentially it is important for a strong recovery, sustained growth, and renewed prosperity.

Since 1984 we have been taking a number of steps to reduce the federal deficit so that we can control and reduce the burden of national debt. We have done this by cutting waste and inefficiency, by controlling spending, and by imposing new taxes where necessary.

The recession that began in the spring of 1990 placed new upward pressure on the deficit. Government revenues have been lower than expected in the February 1990 budget and expenditures have been increased in order to meet the needs of the needy, particularly in the form of unemployment insurance payments to aid farmers who are plagued by low prices, particularly in the grains and oilseeds sector, resulting from the trade war.

In the plan for economic recovery that we introduced in the February 1991 budget the government renewed and reinforced its commitment to deficit reduction and debt control. The plan puts emphasis on controlling expenditures to reduce the deficit and help bring down inflation, which is obviously the key to lower interest rates.

We have already seen the effect of lower interest rates resulting from the reduction of inflationary pressures and inflationary expectations.

The plan severely controls the cost of government and extends the two-year expenditure control program which we introduced in the 1990 budget through to 1994-1995.

The debt servicing and reduction account is one of the important new weapons that we have introduced to help us in this continuing fiscal battle. To put it into context, we need to look at the origin of Canada's serious debt problem which began in the mid-1970s.

From 1950 through to 1973 Canadians enjoyed an outstanding record of economic growth and personal prosperity. Our standard of living virtually doubled in a single generation. Inflation at that time was less than 3 per cent. This kept interest rates down and governments generally lived within their means so that the annual federal deficits were small or non-existent.

Starting in the mid-1970s Canadians began to take prosperity for granted. Wages and prices began to climb dramatically. Each year the government began to spend more and more money than it collected. In fact, by 1984 for every dollar of tax the government collected, for every dollar it received in the form of revenue, it was spending $1.33 on its programs and services. The government had to borrow the money to cover this difference.

From 1974 to 1984 the debt rose from $27 billion to $206 billion. That is an increase of 800 per cent.

The plain fact today is that the interest payments on the 1984 debt of $206 billion which we inherited are the only reason we are in a deficit position today and the direct cause of the debt having nearly doubled in the last six years.

Since 1984 the government has turned a $16 billion operating deficit into a $13 billion operating surplus. That is a turnaround of about $29 billion since the 1984-85 fiscal year.

During that same period the annual debt interest cost has increased by $21 billion, leaving a net reduction of only $8 billion on the deficit. There is a continuing increase in the cost of servicing the debt which is being compounded and that increase has been the only contributing factor to the growth of our national debt.

Throughout this period the government has had to carry the growing burden of compound interest charges on the $206 billion debt it inherited. As a result, public debt today is in the range of $400 billion.

The government is now spending more on interest than on old age security, family allowances, veterans' pensions and unemployment insurance combined.

In the face of this mountain of debt our fiscal and economic strategy has resulted in substantial progress over the last six years. For example, program spending as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product has dropped from 19.6 per cent to 16 per cent. That is a 3.6 per cent difference which is equivalent to $24 billion less in annual spending.

That is the lowest level of spending as a percentage of GDP in 20 years. The average annual growth rate of program spending during this period of time has been cut from an annualized increase of 13.8 per cent. There was an annualized increase of 13.8 per cent in program expenditure increases for 15 years prior to 1984–85. It was 13.8 per cent. That has been reduced to a level of 3.7 per cent, well below the rate of inflation at 4.4 per cent.

We intend to reduce that to 3 per cent as a result of the spending control legislation which we will be introducing and dealing with later.

This compares to a 5.8 per cent figure in the United States for this year. The United States will be carrying a deficit of $350 billion in fiscal 1992, the year which will begin in October 1991.

This spending restraint has helped us to slow the growth of the national debt. In 1984–85 the debt was growing at an annual rate of about 25 per cent. Today, it is less than 10 per cent. However, as colleagues in this House know, it is still not acceptable.

With our budget measures, we aim to eliminate completely the need for new borrowing within four years and to begin reducing our outstanding publicly held debt by that time.

I should say that if we had followed the same policy course that was prevalent prior to 1984–85 and into the year 1984–85, had we done nothing, we would be looking at a deficit today of something in the order of $100 billion. That would be very, very serious.

Progress has been made and I know my hon. friend across will agree with that.

While tax increases have been necessary, government program expenditures have carried two–thirds of the burden of restraint. That is the ratio.

Expenditure cutting as we all know is a difficult exercise and it is becoming increasingly more difficult for the government and for Canadians.

We all know that a good portion of federal government spending is spent on fiscal transfers to people and provinces. Today, more than half of all program spending consists of major transfers to persons and other levels of government.

The tax points that are provided for, along with the transfers to the provinces and transfers to persons in the form of old age pensions, family allowances, veterans' pensions, et cetera as well as the Established Programs Financing and the equalization program, would amount to about $77.5 billion for this year. That is a huge amount of money in cash and in tax points.

The other large area of program spending is provincial transfers supporting health care, education, and welfare services. The two combined work out to about $77.5 billion. The rest of the program spending covers every other aspect of government activity, including national defence and the internal operations of government. If we take inflation into consideration, the cost of government operations has been reduced by about 25 per cent. We continue to work to cut out waste and inefficiency, overlap, and duplication.

As we all know, every time we go through the exercise of expenditure reduction, it gets increasingly more difficult. On the other hand, the pressure is always there to spend more. Managing the government spending priorities within a tight fiscal discipline is a pressing challenge that we face as a government. I think it is a pressing challenge that each and every one of us face as individual members of Parliament. It is a challenge that must be met.

I have already noted that Canadians have been called upon to pay more taxes to help deal with the deficit and the debt. The progress that has been made in dealing with the deficit has come from two sources: expenditure reduction and increased taxes. It is about two–thirds expenditure reduction and one–third from taxes.

If my hon. friend checks, he will find that is correct.

We should know and we must realize that every time the government is called upon to provide new programs they can only be funded two ways, either through new taxes or through an increase in the deficit. There are really no other options. We all have to face that task because all of us are being judged on how we contain federal spending and whether we are good custodians of the public purse.

How a country's tax system operates is critical to the economic well-being and that is why tax reform is such an important part of our economic strategy. We all know that we have gone through a number of changes in the tax system since we became the government in 1984, seven years ago yesterday.

Hon. members will recall that in stage one of the tax reform, we lowered and simplified the personal income tax regime. We replaced many personal tax deductions with tax credits, eliminated others, and eliminated or reduced many special corporate tax breaks and introduced a corporations tax. Stage two of the tax reform process was sales tax reform, which is also an integral part of our economic plan to eliminate the deficit and reverse the growing debt problem that we face.

We believe the goods and services tax is key to strengthening the economy and managing our fiscal problems in a way that keeps Canada growing, producing jobs and better living standards for all Canadians. By increasing Canadian competitiveness and by removing other economic distortions, the GST will create a healthier economy. Real domestic output is expected to expand by as much as 1.4 per cent annually or by some $9 billion in today's dollars as a result of replacing the old outdated federal sales tax with the GST. The old FST was commonly referred to as a silent killer of jobs.

This is an important structural change. It is an important structural change to make the tax system fairer and to enhance Canada's competitiveness. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has spoken out in the last couple of days to criticize the federal government. It had called upon successive federal governments to overhaul the federal sales tax and put in place a better tax system that would make manufacturers more competitive so that they could compete more effectively in the export market.

Obviously the ultimate design of the GST was a reflection of the extensive consultation that took place during the course of its development with business groups, Canadian Manufacturers' Association, trade associations, tax professionals, social groups, and ordinary Canadians to ensure that the new system put in place would be the fairest possible. It is a major, major undertaking to put in place a new tax system such as the GST.

As a result of this process we incorporated a number of special features in the design, for example the simplified accounting measures, the public sector rebates to municipalities, to universities, to schools, to colleges, to hospitals, the rebates to charities and non-profit organizations, the GST credit, the housing rebate, just to name a few. Now that the tax is being implemented, we are still making changes, fine tuning and ensuring that the tax is administered in a fair and equitable way. This is an ongoing process and will continue to be an ongoing process to ensure that the system works to the advantage of all concerned.

More recently we have been listening to many Canadians who are concerned that the revenues from the GST might be used to finance new spending programs instead of reducing the deficit. We know that during the course of the debate many Canadians said: "Look, I wouldn't mind the GST if I was assured that this money would be earmarked to pay down the debt or help defray the cost of carrying the debt". There was concern about the fact that it would generate more revenue than that which was projected. There were accusations it would be a cash cow.

In recognition of that fact the Prime Minister gave a commitment that the GST revenues would be used only to contribute to the deficit reduction rather than to provide the government with leeway to expand discretionary program spending. In this bill the debt servicing and reduction account delivers on that commitment.

To our critics who will maintain that the GST will provide the government with revenues to spend on unnecessary discretionary programs, I say this: The object of the government has been and continues to be to cut costs and control spending wherever possible so that the deficit can be reduced. The fiscal progress that we have achieved results in large part from a determined adherence to this objective.

We know that we will be judged, as will any other government, on how we stick to this course. I suspect all members of Parliament will be judged on this course of action and the results or the successes that we achieve.

The debt servicing and reduction account will receive the net revenues from the goods and services tax, net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations, and earmarked contributions for the debt reduction from individuals or businesses. It really will accommodate three specific cash flows.

By net revenues of the GST we mean that this will result in the flowing to the fund of the GST revenues after paying for the various rebates and credits that are directly a part of the goods and services tax, for example the low income GST credit, the input tax credit, the housing rebate, the tourism rebate, and the GST transitional grant to small business. In addition, private citizens and businesses will be able to make direct tax deductible contributions to the fund.

The revenues deposited to the debt servicing and reduction account will be used to pay the interest on the public debt and over time to pay down the debt itself. The bill requires that the account be audited annually by the Auditor General of Canada.

The debt servicing and reduction account we believe is a key step in assuring Canadians that the GST revenues will be used only for deficit reduction, rather than new program spending. To reinforce this initiative the government announced I believe a very important complementary measure, and that is legislated limits on program spending which will result in a program ceiling of government spending over the next five years.

Legislated spending controls will represent a fundamental change in how the federal government operates. Difficult choices and tradeoffs and reallocations will be required if spending exceeds the limits set out in the budget. This is especially so, bearing in mind that so many of our program expenditures are governed by statute and so many of them are indexed. It is going to take a great deal of skill and management to achieve these targets.

That places a greater deal of importance upon the need to contain inflation, because as we can contain inflation we can contain the costs associated with indexation. The fight against inflation is critical in terms of bringing down and keeping interest rates down. It is critical in terms of bringing down and keeping government expenditures down in the interest of fairness and equity for all Canadians, particularly for those Canadians who are on fixed incomes or our senior citizens.

It will take time, I am sure, for Canadians to appreciate fully what these spending limits mean. But, as a good illustration, I think we only have to look at the wage policy outlined in the February 1991 budget which limits Public Service salary increases to 0 per cent and 3 per cent.

Some would say this would cost a few hundred million dollars and we should have gone along with the PSAC. But, as I said earlier, to do this would mean we would either have to impose a new tax or increase the deficit; in other words borrow more money. Those are the two options.

Mr. Manley: Don't forget about cutting.

Mr. Mazankowski: Oh, yes, we have talked about cutting and we have heard from opposition members about cutting. We have heard their response. Every time we have tried to cut back we have heard the howls coming from across the way.

Mr. Fulton: How about the corporate sector?

Mr. Mazankowski: The corporate sector's profit and balance sheet does not look very good. The hon. member is the first guy to stand up in the House and cry for jobs. Where does he think we are going to get the jobs from if we are not going to get them from the corporate sector? Unless you have got healthy balance sheets in the corporate sector, you are not going to have any investment that will create the jobs. The hon. member speaks out of both sides of his mouth.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: We will see where the hon. members come down, whether they want to continue the old ways of spend today and borrow tomorrow that brought us that 800 per cent increase, that eightfold increase in the public debt in a 10-year period. That is when it all happened and that was in great times.

The proposed Spending Control Act will ensure that any government that tries to break the spending limits will be held accountable to Parliament for its actions. The legislation was introduced in draft form and it is now being studied by the House of Commons. We hope that we will be able to proceed with this bill very quickly in the House as soon as we get the report back from the committee.

Our intention is that both the debt servicing and reduction account and the spending control limits will be in effect for 1991–92.

Mr. Lapierre: Preston Manning wants it.

Mr. Mazankowski: He is talking about Preston Manning. I understand that there is an organic union taking place between the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party of Canada. That will be an interesting mating season, I am sure.

Mr. Mills: Be careful of those descriptions in this House.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, I guess so. In light of the debate that has been going on, I guess I will have to.

Working together, the two measures will ensure that the GST revenues will not be used to fund new programs but only be used to reduce the deficit.

As a result of these and other budget measures, the deficit will be held to $30.5 billion this year, then fall to $25 billion in 1992–93 for the first time in a decade. The deficit is then forecast to decline rapidly year by year to reach $6.5 billion by 1995–96. The net public debt will begin to decline as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product in 1992–93. By 1994–95, the need for additional borrowing from the public will be eliminated for the first time since 1969 and 1970. The government at that time will begin the painful process of starting to pay down publicly held debt, and that will be a alleluia day for all of us I am sure.

These are indeed challenging measures at challenging times. They are matched to the toughness of the fiscal challenge that faces Canada. They reflect the government's commitment to winning the battle against the deficit and the debt and they reflect the views of many Canadians who have told the government to lead the way and take decisive action necessary to get the job done. I think they have gone beyond the government. I think they have asked MPs to lead the way to fight the battle of the deficit and the debt.

Deficit and debt control are vital foundations for more than just our future economic prosperity. They can contribute directly to the bonds that link us together as a nation. One of the keys to strengthening the unity of our country is to strengthen our economic union and improve our fiscal position. This will help generate the confidence and make available the resources we need to address the regional aspirations and social concerns that challenge us all.

By putting our financial house in order, we can help to ensure a prosperous, united future for all Canadians. Unity, prosperity, economic renewal, political responsiveness, all of these are inter–related. These are the goals that have guided and will continue to guide our policies and the future we seek for Canada. By continuing to fulfil our commitment to these goals, we will ensure that Canada continues to provide generous social and economic benefits to its citizens.

This is an important piece of legislation. This is an important debate and I know that all members will take a very deep interest in it for what it means and what it will do. I urge that all members support this bill. I hope that we can move it through the House and through the committee with dispatch.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, today I would like to say a few words about the bill but also about our national debt and national deficit.

First of all, I want to say we intend to support the principle of the bill on second reading, so that it can be referred to committee for consideration.

[English]

We will support this Bill C–21 in principle at second reading so that it can go to committee and so that we can study it further. In doing so, there are two principles which we see at issue here that we are willing to support.

The first of these is that the revenue from the GST not be used to go into the patronage tank or the vote–buying tank that many of us suspect it was intended for when the GST was brought in. If a measure can succeed in doing that, it is worthy of our support.

The second principle we see in the bill that we are willing to support is that the growing problem of the government debt and the continuing problem of its deficit need to be addressed.

On behalf of my party I am prepared to say that we recognize that, indeed, the problem of the deficit which has been continuing over the years of this government is one that has to be addressed and understood by all Canadians.

There is a lot of misunderstanding about what the deficit and the debt mean and why they are what they are today. I would like to address some of those before I talk more directly about the bill that is before us.

I want to say that it is clear that Canada's problem with debt and deficit is one that has to be addressed, because in relative terms to other countries with which we compete in the Group of Seven, we are doing and have been doing rather badly.

For example, I will cite some of these numbers. They are not entirely up to date. In 1989 for example, the government deficit in Canada as a percentage of GDP was 4.9 per cent, including not just the federal government, but also the provincial governments.

Other than Italy at 10 per cent, that is worse than all other countries in the G–7.

Similarly, our total government debt, federal and provincial again, as a percentage of GDP in 1989 had reached 71.6 per cent. That too, is higher than all other G–7 countries other than Italy which was at 97 per cent.

For example, France in that year when we were 71.6 per cent was at 47.3 per cent. The United Kingdom, 39.6 per cent; Germany, 42.7 per cent. In relative terms, I think it is clear that the deficit, as it has accumulated and built into a debt now of about $400 billion at the federal level in Canada, is a problem that needs to be addressed by this government and by any government. It cannot be put aside, and it cannot be trivialized.

It is clear that our debt has to be financed out of either our savings domestically or out of attracting savings from other countries. This is contributing in part to the level of interest rates that we are having to pay. That is clearly acknowledged.

There are some things that I think have been misunderstood by Canadians. There is a popular fear and despair in Canada that if we do not pay off the debt, in some strange way we will not own Canada.

I would like to go back to 1984 when the then Minister of Finance presented his statement in November 1984, soon after the election, when he talked about the borrowing being analogous to a family with its mortgage.

He expressed the view that many of us have taken on heavy debts with the expectation that our incomes would rise and that we would be able to accommodate the debt load as our incomes went up: mortgages, consumer loans and so on.

He talked about that, and I think that it is an appropriate analogy in this sense. The problem that we are experiencing in Canada as we watch the total debt faced by Canadian governments rising in relation to our income, measured for example by our Gross Domestic Product, is the problem that we have to be concerned about.

At the federal level as we approach about a 60 per cent ratio of the debt to the GDP, we have a problem. We have a much greater problem than we had in the early 1980s when we went into the 1981 recession when that ratio was in the order of 30 per cent.

As we went into a recession a little over a year ago, the resources were limited to deal with that recession in ways that they were not limited in 1982.

I take exception to the rather simplistic explanations of the development of the debt situation in the previous recession, at a time when our abilities to spend in order to resolve the issue of the recession, which was very acute at the time, were much greater. In other words, the resources that were turned to fighting the recession in 1982 were available to a country whose debt was only about 30 per cent of the federal level, 32 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product.

We went into the recession in 1990. We were experiencing a ratio at that time in the mid–fifties. The minister has said that he expects that ratio is finally going to turn down as we approach the next year. We can only hope that he is correct.

The record of his government in making such projections is rather dismal at best. I go back to his predecessor's statements in 1984 when he said that if the current policies, the ones that he inherited, continued that the debt by the end of the decade of the 1980s would be approaching $400 billion.

In fact, he says that by 1990, it could approach $410 billion. Here we are in 1991 and by the end of this fiscal year we should be, I think, at about $419 billion. Again and again over the course of his years as Minister of Finance, the previous minister talked about deficit reduction and controlling the debt. He talked about it in his November statement. He talked about it in the 1985 budget, his first budget presented as Minister of Finance. He talked at that time about, and I quote: "a clear and realistic medium-term plan."

In that 1985 budget, with its clear and realistic medium-term plan, he said that the budgetary deficit, which had been anticipated for 1984-85 to be at $36 billion, would be reduced by 1990-91 by $20 billion. In other words, he was projecting back there with his clear and realistic plan a budgetary deficit for the year just ended this past April of about $16 billion. What did he accomplish? He accomplished a deficit in reality of $30.5 billion.

In his 1986 budget, the minister had adjusted his projections into the future that he had made in his realistic and medium-term plan. By 1986 he thought that by 1990-91 we would have a deficit of $22 billion. So he was about $6 billion closer, as it turned out, a year later. And so on it goes.

By 1989, after the election, he was no longer offering clear and realistic plans. He was offering, and I quote, "an ambitious five-year fiscal plan." Perhaps because his projections had been so bad in his realistic plan, he thought by calling it ambitious it would give him a little bit of an escape hatch if he missed on his projections that time around.

What he projected then was a budgetary deficit in 1990-91 of $28.5 billion. He was off by $2 billion as it turned out. He thought by 1993-94 it would be $14 billion and by 1994-95 he thought it would be $10 billion.

What happened under the ambitious five-year plan. In 1988-89 we had a deficit of $28.7 billion. In 1989-90 we had a deficit of $29 billion. In 1990-91 we had a deficit of $30.5 billion, and in 1991-92 we are expecting a deficit again of $30.5 billion.

So under the ambitious five-year plan for reducing the deficit, it rose from $28.7 billion to $30.5 billion, and I guess that is what the minister would have called progress.

With that legacy, Madam Speaker, it troubles me when I get out the 1991 budget, this year's budget, and see what he is promising under this five-year plan. I do not have an adjective for this one. Neither did he describe it as clear and realistic, nor did he describe it as ambitious. But here is what he is saying is going to happen. He said that between 1991-92 and 1992-93 the deficit would drop by $6.5 billion. It would drop to $24 billion. It would drop to $16.6 billion in 1993-94 and to $10 billion in 1994-95 and down to $6.5 billion in 1995-96.

If he had achieved what he had set out to achieve in 1984, we would not even be looking at these large numbers today. What is the history that has gone behind this. We had in the 1980s a period of exceptional economic growth, continuing and prolonged.

I am sure the current minister would agree that the idea is to reduce the deficit in good times so that you have got the resources to fight recessions in bad times.

What happened in the good times of the 1980s? This government talked about deficit reduction and managed while increasing taxes many times to increase the deficit virtually year after year, not quite but by the time we got into the 1980s it was going up each year, and at the same time to reach the targeted debt which the bad old Liberals would have produced if their policies had not changed in 1984. In other words, they failed totally in what they claimed to be able to do and what they set out to accomplish.

It does not give me a very good feeling about supporting this latest effort at convincing Canadians that we are bringing down the deficit.

There are some other fundamental concerns about the economic policies that have been pursued by this government and its ability to achieve economic projections based on what it has done in the past.

Let me start though by going back again to that 1984 statement by the minister. I am sure you hear, Madam Speaker, that the government has alleged that when it came into office the deficit was $38 billion. It has been said on the other side of the House.

That was the deficit at the end of the fiscal year 1984-85. This government was elected half way through that year. The Minister of Finance, when he came into the House in November, having looked at the books, proposed a number of serious policy changes. He said that had he not proposed those changes, and I quote:

"With no policy changes the deficit for this fiscal year would be $34.5 billion". That is in November 1984.

By the end of March 1985, he had managed to run it up to $38 billion. Then he spent the last seven years going around Canada claiming that the Liberals left an annual deficit of $38 billion.

In the interests of keeping the record straight, surely the government will take responsibility for the last $4 billion it added on between November and the end of March when it shoved through every possible expenditure in the hope that it could build up that deficit and then claim to have reduced it in percentage terms over the following years.

Let us look at what has been happening throughout its mandate. We have experienced a recession over the last year and a half that was clearly induced by the need, claimed by this government, to pursue a monetary policy that would control inflation.

You have to ask yourself how we got into inflationary times five years into the mandate of this government. I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that the answer lies in the economy of 1988. It was a very rapidly growing economy. It grew close to 5 per cent in 1988. What policies did the government pursue at that time?

It pursued policies of tax cuts introduced in the first phase of tax reform in 1987 and it pursued a policy of relatively lower interest rates. You will recall that the interest rates began to increase sharply at the end of November 1988. I find it passing strange that when the economy was growing that quickly that prudent managers of the economy would bring in both tax cuts and low interest rates.

The only explanation that I have been able to think of is that we had an election in this country on November 21, 1988. As a result by 1989 Governor Crow was appearing before the finance committee saying that he had brought interest rates up very sharply in order to address the very fast economy that we were experiencing and had been experiencing through the end of 1988, rapid wage increases, a very hot housing market in southern Ontario.

I suggest that more prudent policies pursued in 1988 might have been less popular at election time but would have preserved the growth in the economy on a more sustained basis through 1990. Our recession need not have been induced by the government. One and a half million Canadians need not have been put out of work, even if we are arguing on the government's own terms.

Furthermore, throughout its mandate the government has failed to ensure Canada's future economic growth by failing to pursue policies intended to build a skilled and adaptive work force, more scientific research and development and more aggressive multilateral trade relations.

Its policy has been quite clear. It addressed one kind of deficit alone. It only addressed the financial deficit. It has failed to address the deficit in spending on research and development. It failed to address the deficit in training, in education. Why is it that in a country like Canada 30 per cent of our high school students drop out before completing school? Why is it that we have a high illiteracy rate? How on earth are we going to compete, not with the Mexicans but with the Japanese and the Germans, and even the Americans? If the government only focuses on one deficit, it will create deficits in many other areas.

What about the deficit in our infrastructure? Why is it that across Canada roads and bridges and sewers are breaking down, and governments at every level are feeling the strain of maintaining those resources? They are key to our future economic development. Sometimes you have to spend a dollar to make a dollar. I think that is how the business community would describe it.

Why is it that this government pursued a bilateral free trade agreement with the United States of America promising, and I quote, "massive adjustment programs", and delivered on none of the training programs or adjustment programs that were so necessary to ensure that our work force continued to be employed during the difficult adjustment phase that necessarily followed the implementation of that agreement? When the agreement was combined with an increase in the Canadian dollar, from about 76 cents when the trade agreement was negotiated today at 88 cents, how on earth did the government expect Canadian manufacturers to compete without any assistance?

An hon. member: Talk about those numbers.

Mr. Manley: Government members do not like to talk about those numbers. They do not like to talk about the deficit in manufacturing jobs that they have generated through their policies over the last two years—300,000 plus jobs lost. That is a deficit.

So now we are presented with this bill, the debt financing and reduction account act.

An hon. member: Smoke and mirrors.

Mr. Manley: Well, I have said we will support it in principle but frankly I have trouble doing it with a straight face.

Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, what the 1991 budget says about the debt servicing and reduction fund.

After the first full year of operation, ending in 1992, the balance in the debt servicing and reduction fund will be a deficit of $26.85 billion. The second year $25.69 billion will be added to that. After five years of operation the fund will have a deficit of $121.765 billion. This is not my number. These are the government's numbers, page 94 of the budget. What kind of a debt reduction fund is that?

For that matter, if you remember, this GST tax was to be revenue neutral. Revenue neutral in relation to what? The government started talking about replacing the old federal sales tax with a value added tax at the time of tax reform in 1987. Then it put it off. It cut income taxes in 1988, as I have mentioned, just prior to the election and then introduced its technical paper on the goods and services tax about a year after the election in 1989. Government members did not want to talk too much about it during the election campaign, although the hon. member for Mississauga South managed to put his foot in it during the election campaign and said that the tax was going to bring in a lot more money than anyone was admitting.

An hon. member: An extra $10 billion.

Mr. Manley: He said an extra $10 billion and was promptly told to be quiet. He was right about those numbers.

What astonishes me is that a government that tried to finesse this tax through on the basis that it was going to be revenue neutral is now trying to finesse it through on the basis that it is going to be used to reduce the deficit. How can the government have it both ways? If it is revenue neutral then it is neutral in its impact on the deficit. If it is not revenue neutral, then why did the government say it was revenue neutral? Furthermore, as I said earlier, revenue neutral in relation to what?

When the Conservatives took office, the federal sales tax was 9 per cent. They raised it to 10 per cent. Then they raised it to 11 per cent. Then they raised it to 12 per cent. We must remember that all this time we were being told that the federal sales tax was a terrible tax. It was doing untold damage to Canada's manufacturing sector. It was unfair. It was terrible. When they went into the election at 12 per cent and still did not want to talk too much about the GST they just said: "There will be a new national sales tax and it will be revenue neutral compared to the old one". Then they raised this terrible tax to 13.5 per cent. It is still not revenue neutral because now they want to use it to lower the deficit.

With all these reservations, with my conviction that what is really going on here is a bit of smoke and mirrors, a bit of flimflam, another attempt by this government to fool Canadians into thinking they are doing something serious about the financial mess they have created while in office for seven years, why would I say that we will support it in principle at second reading? It is a bit of a stretch I have to admit.

The basis of our support in principle is that, first, the GST proceeds must not be spent on buying votes in the next election campaign by this government. Second, Canadians have to realize that the deficit and the debt is a problem recognized by national political parties and shared by all Canadians regardless of their political affiliation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood rising, but there is no period of questions or comments after the first two speeches at second reading. I will now recognize the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I am not sure what amazes me most, the spectacle of the government coming before us having doubled the deficit in its seven years in office and claiming to the people of Canada that this piece of bookkeeping subterfuge is going to do something about that deficit for which it is largely responsible—I am not sure if that is the most amazing and ridiculous spectacle—or the spectacle of the Official Opposition getting up and saying that they are going to vote in favour of this piece of nonsense.

I think that both represent an attempt to hoodwink the Canadian population with respect to this piece of legislation. More important, both seem to be supporting what is in effect a sugar coating of a very bad tax, the goods and services tax, which should be eliminated in this country, not used to exercise as some kind of pretence as a solution to the deficit.

The goods and services tax has been a disaster for people across this country. The vice-president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, who is not exactly a socialist or a supporter of the New Democratic Party, has said: "The GST is an albatross around the neck of the Canadian economy".

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which again is not exactly a group which sends in thousands of dollars to the New Democratic Party, has said, and I quote from their study of cross-border shopping with respect to Quebec "The introduction of the GST, has meant that the Canadian tax system penalizes small firms much more heavily than it does larger firms".

We are talking about a tax which has pushed people outside of this country, increasingly and in damaging numbers for our economy, to make their purchases in the United States.

The Minister of National Revenue got up today to try to suggest that cross-border shopping was not something that was increasing as a result of the GST, because the numbers of trips had not increased as significantly this year as they had increased in previous years.

What he did not mention was how much money was being spent by people on thee trips that are taking place. Using the figures provided by Statistics Canada for 1990 and comparing them with the figures for 1991, for the first six months of each year in each case, it will be found that the amount of money being spent by people making auto trips across the border has increased by 57 per cent. That tells me that the GST has done precisely what we predicted it would do. It has forced Canadians, especially in border communities, to look at their budget situation, which is especially serious for them in the middle of a recession. It has forced those people to make the decision, because of the GST, to cross the border and to increase their shopping, as these figures show, by 57 per cent.

Now anybody could have predicted it. You cannot introduce a tax on retail purchases and retail services in Canada when no such tax exists in the United States and not expect people to react to the market differential that is created.

The government establishes a situation that it says it can defend because virtually every country in Europe has a GST. It is right. And virtually every country in Europe is beside another country in Europe which has a GST so there is no market differential that pushes people from one side to the other side of a border.

But if we create here in Canada an effective rate of taxation, as is the case in our community of Windsor, of 15 per cent for consumers on goods and services and the sales tax in Michigan is 4 per cent, you do not have to be a rocket scientist to recognize that people will cross the border in search of bargains.

The further proof of this is the retail outlets. Services in my community and in communities across this country close to the border have now started to advertise with new approaches. They have said to their customers: "We will pay the GST." They have advertised that in newspapers, on television and radio, and the consequence has been to attract customers back.

I meet the constituents that I represent coming back from shopping trips to the United States and they tell me: "Steven, we would like to be able to shop here in Canada, but we have got kids." The unemployment rate in the Windsor area is 13.9 per cent. These people have got to get their kids ready for school. There never used to be any tax on clothing in Canada, no retail sales tax of any kind in Ontario. Now, with the GST, there is such a tax so they go to the United States. They do so directly as a tax revolt against this government, as a tax revolt against an unfair tax, a tax which cannot be justified in economic logic, which cannot be justified in terms of any solution to the economy itself, which cannot be justified in terms of fairness because what we have seen happen under this government is a whole set of tax breaks to upper income people, to large corporations and a whole set of tax increases through the GST to the ordinary, everyday person in this country.

We have seen, for instance, $100,000 in capital gains tax given to people who are rich enough to get capital gains increases from the stock market, the sales of yachts, the sales of whatever speculative investments they have kept. We have seen that come from this government. We have seen a decrease come from this government from 34 per cent to 29 per cent in the income tax rate for upper income people.

That is almost as bad as the decrease in income tax levels for upper income Canadians which the Liberals brought in before this government. Both these two parties here, which are supporting this piece of flimflam in front of us this afternoon, talk about their concern about the deficit. They created the deficit through the tax breaks that they gave upper income Canadians and large companies in this country.

In this country, we have seen, the statistics are absolutely clear-cut, if we go back to the 1970s, deficits which were sensible and which had some kind of relationship to what the country could pay. We saw deficits which, for instance, from the period 1966 up to the period 1975 did not at any stage exceed 1.4 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. There were very small deficits in relation to our national income.

We then saw a Liberal government which came into office and started to increase expenditures dramatically. At the time, it started to decrease tax revenues from large companies and from upper income Canadians. The result was that the deficit levels in this country escalated dramatically.

As of 1975, the total level of debt in this country was $47 billion. That is not a small level. It is not something massive that we would have to be as terribly concerned with as we are today. In 1975, the debt was $47 billion.

By the end of the fiscal year 1984, for virtually all that period the Liberals were in power, the deficit had increased such that our national debt was $175 billion, almost four times what it was just nine years previously. It was almost four times higher.

The Conservatives came into power in 1984. They wanted to make sure that they could give some tax breaks to upper income Canadians, so they cut the tax rates even further. They decreased the level of taxation for large scale corporations in this country.

If we look at the revenues which have been received, they have gone down dramatically from large scale corporations, while tax rates for individual Canadians have of course gone up dramatically.

But not to be outdone by the Liberals with respect to deficits, if we take the end of the fiscal year 1984 where the deficit was $175 billion, let us compare that with the end of the fiscal year 1990–91; in other words, the end of the most recent fiscal year under the Conservatives. As at the end of this most recent fiscal year, the deficit is $408.5 billion.

An hon. member: The debt.

Mr. Langdon: The debt is $408.5 billion. I must admit that it does take some doing to parallel what the Liberals did in terms of increasing debt, but the Conservatives have done it. The Liberals increased our national debt in their last nine years in office.

Mr. Speaker, I think, if you checked your time, you would see that I have more than a minute.

To make this point quite clear to people, what we have is $47 billion as debt in 1975, and that increased to $175 billion by the end of the fiscal year 1983–84. Then, taking the Conservative period, we see that increasing from $175 billion to $408.5 billion. In other words, a much greater increase in our national debt in seven years of Conservative government than there was in nine years of Liberal government.

The government comes before us today and says that here is a piece of legislation that will somehow magically start to do something about the problem. I say to people across the country that this piece of legislation which is in front of us, does absolutely nothing about the deficit. It does absolutely nothing about the national debt. All it does is try to sugar-coat a bad tax, the goods and services tax.

That is why, unlike the Liberal Party, we will continue to oppose the goods and services tax. Unlike the Reform Party, we will continue to oppose the goods and services tax, even if there is this attempt at sugar-coating. We will vote against this legislation because we think Canadians deserve to have things put in front of them in a straightforward, clear and honest way. This piece of sugar-coating of the GST represents exactly the kind of dishonest subterfuge which to us as a party and to us as a country is not acceptable.

I hope that when many Conservatives and many Liberals actually read this legislation they will see it for the piece of flimflam sugar-coating that it is. I hope they will vote against it to express their disgust and the disgust of their constituents with that unfair goods and services tax which was brought into this country by the government that sits in power but does not have a legitimate right to exercise power given its level of support within this country.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to compliment the hon. member for Essex—Windsor for his presentation to the House today.

I would like to make a comment, prior to asking a question, about some of the effects on my community of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, much of which is along the border as is the member's constituency of Windsor.

We have seen some difficulties over the course of time from the effects of the goods and services tax along with the monetary and fiscal policies of this government with the high interest rates, the increasingly high dollar rate as opposed to the United States dollar and the difficulties of course of the cross-border shopping as a result of that.

This summer I went to a number of industries such as the forest industry and value-added industries in the forest industry and other industries within my area that were supposed to benefit by manufacturers' sales tax being taken off and the goods and services tax being placed on them.

What I find over that course of time—I am wondering whether the member has seen the same problems in the Windsor area—is that these people are tied down now in higher costs because of the fact that they have higher costs of doing their books. They have to employ more people in the bookkeeping areas, and they are finding that the government is slower and slower in getting rebates back to them.

One of my constituents had been waiting for a rebate for over three months of over $40,000 from the government. One of the problems is that throughout the course of all of this it appears that the Conservative government has not been telling the full truth of all of the ramifications of this to the people of Canada.

I think the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has pointed that out in a recent letter to the Prime Minister asking for the Minister of National Revenue's resignation in saying that he certainly has not come clean with a recent report that showed that there was going to be a major effect. I think the study shows that it would be 3.8 per cent cheaper to buy goods in the United States as a result of the goods and services tax.

It appears that it has suppressed this over a period of time in bringing it in, as it has suppressed all of their studies that showed it was going to increase recessionary times in this country. It was going to increase many of the problems as opposed to assisting the people as they have told us it would be.

Can the member tell us some of what he has seen in his own riding of Windsor and the devastation that the goods and services tax has brought about, and whether he has a comment on what appears to be a fact that the government has constantly covered up what the effect of this is on people and how much it is going to use of this in debt and deficit reduction?

It appears that this is a shell game that it is playing with this. It is simply going to take money from one pocket and put it in the other. Would the hon. member comment on that for the people of Canada?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

Let me say just two or three things. First, I think to call it a shell game is a useful comment.

• (1750)

What we really have here is something which says that all GST money will go into this account and we will use this account for certain expenditures such as paying the interest on the national debt, such as paying rebates to certain income tax concerns such as paying off certain parts of the GST rebates. If we happen to have anything left over after paying all those interest costs and so forth—which will not be the case—but if we had, we would pay that against the deficit.

This is very interesting, but it does not really prevent the government from doing with other accounts other things. If it uses this GST account to pay for interest costs on the national debt, then it can take the money in its general account, which it would have used to pay interest costs on the national debt, and it can use those to pay for those election goodies which my friend from the Liberal Party is so concerned about.

I must say I am most surprised—and I have been thinking about it ever since I started my speech—not by the government's attempt to bring in this shell game piece of legislation before us, because that is par for the course as far as they are concerned, I am most surprised by the fact that the Liberal Party, which has claimed to oppose the GST, should say that yes, it is now willing to support the sugar-coating for the GST, the shell game which the government is carrying forward. I just hope, Mr. Speaker, there will be some effort on the part of some of the saner members of the Liberal caucus to get them to change their position.

Certainly as far as my constituency is concerned, which is what my colleague was also raising, we have had firms protesting this summer. We have a trucking protest which is taking place at the present moment. We have had manufacturing protests by manufacturing owners and by workers, all concerned with the incredibly heavy burden which the GST is placing on them. We have to get rid of that tax; that is what we should be talking about in this debate.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Essex—Windsor what particular training he has that allows him to so ably and capably give a speech with a straight face claiming that the NDP is interested in the national debt when, since the Parliament started, in virtually every example I can think of, it has asked us to spend more money.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, let me give a short history lesson to my Conservative colleague. When this new government first came into office, one of the things we suggested to them was that the Cape Breton heavy water plant should be shut. That was not anybody else's suggestion; it was not their suggestion, not coming from the hon. member. It was our suggestion. This was a white elephant that was costing this country incredible sums of money.

We have also suggested at various stages in recent years, but especially since the changes in eastern Europe took place, that there has to be a very significant cut in the defence budget of this country. In fact, my colleague, the member from Victoria has put some very strong points with respect to the need to do that.

An hon. member: He is the chairman of the standing committee.

Mr. Langdon: He made some very strong points with respect to the need to do that in response to the government's recent defence statement. This was a defence paper that has come out suggesting that we will cut the military, we will cut bases, but by gosh we will still spend more. Talk about Conservative financial policy. That seems to be the best example. We will get 8,000 fewer soldiers, two less bases and we will still spend more money.

If I might, Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the member that when we first came into this House after the 1984 election, we told this government that its attempts to manage the economy by cutting taxes and so forth for high income people, by giving benefits to the large—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions or comments has expired.

The time provided for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak at the second reading stage of Bill C-21. I did not intend to talk about the GST. I wanted to congratulate my Liberal colleague who supports the bill on second reading, and I hope he will do the same on third reading. However, after listening to comments by the member for the New Democratic Party, I feel I must get back to the GST, as the hon. member did, and set the record straight.

Mr. Speaker, the member for the New Democratic Party referred to the GST as an unfair tax. He overlooked the fact that the federal sales tax was most unfair. Mr. Speaker, when I was doing a master's in tax law in 1978-79 at the University of Sherbrooke, our professor told us in a course on federal sales tax that it had outlived its usefulness. It had to be changed, and he was anxious to see a political party that would have the guts to abolish a tax that hurt Canadian producers who wanted to export goods and gave importers an unfair advantage. Mr. Speaker, this was more than ten years ago. The tax remained unchanged. It was the wrong kind of tax. We were the only country in the world that still had a manufacturer's sales tax, a tax that was grossly unfair. We got rid of it, and all Canadians including the people in the riding of Trois-Rivières would have loved to get rid of the old tax without putting a new one in its place. Mr. Speaker, I think that you are like everyone else—you do not like to pay tax. We are all the same. There is no problem. Yes, there is a problem. The problem is that in taking revenue away from the government, expenses stay the same. Although we have made cuts and managed well, there are expenses and the money has to come from somewhere. From the GST. To whom does this tax apply? That is where I do not understand the New Democrats. The GST applies to the rich. The rich pay it. If you have a low income, before spending anything on the GST, you receive a cheque from the federal government four times a year to ensure that you do not have to pay the GST.

It does not apply to basic food; it does not apply to housing; it does not apply to drugs. To what does it apply? It applies to yachts, and as far as I know, some people can afford to buy them. It applies to cars and even reduces the price of them. It applies to a host of goods and services that high-income people use. They spend on them and therefore pay the GST. Low-income people spend on their needs and receive their cheques. So this tax is fair because it applies to people who have money. When I hear my NDP colleague say that this tax is unfair, Mr. Speaker, I have a big problem with that.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21, now in second reading, is an Act relating to accounting for the servicing and reduction of the debt. Why do we have it, Mr. Speaker, and what is the purpose of this bill? We have to go back to 1984. In November of that year, Mr. Speaker, the finance minister at that time, the Hon. Michael Wilson, tabled a strategy, a plan for the economic renewal of the country. Since 1984, we have followed that plan for the progress of our economy and our country, Mr. Speaker, to make Canada a good place to live.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Canada is a good country to live in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, during debate on a government bill, a minister must be in the House and I cannot see a single minister here, Mr. Speaker.

I am sorry to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but I am sure that he would want to see one of his colleagues from the Cabinet present in the House to listen to his good speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has the floor.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I take note of my colleague's comment and I hope he will do the same and stay here to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is a country where we have an economy and social programs. In the Spring, I had the opportunity to travel to Turkey and also to Russia. It is during such travels that you realize how lucky we are to be living in Canada. It's important to say so. There are very few countries in the world which have, on the one hand, our wealth, and on the other, our economic system and moreover our social programs and everything else around it.

When you say social programs, Mr. Speaker, you see a country which provides a lot to its people and this means also a country which has commitments to meet. Despite these commitments we have tried since 1984 to put in place a tax system which would be fairer and more equitable for all Canadians. Take for example the changes we made, like the deduction for dependents, for children, and also the changes relating to the tax credits. It's in that area in particular that we made the tax system fairer and more equitable.

We also reduced income tax, Mr. Speaker, in 1988 when we introduced phase I of the tax reform. The second phase of that reform was the creation of the GST which was done this year.

What else did we do since 1984, Mr. Speaker? We reduced spending and God knows that everyone in this House, on this side in particular, is aware of it. We not only cut spending, but we put government spending under control and then, of course, there has been some tax increases.

In February 1991, Mr. Speaker, during the last budget, what did we say? We said that spending control was of primary importance. What does it mean for Canadians? It means that inflation is under control and eventually reduced. If you look at the inflation rate since the Progressive Conservative Party is in power, you will see that our record is excellent.

No later than yesterday, the Minister of Finance was comparing the rate of inflation today and the one we had ten years ago to the day. I remember that in 1981, the inflation rate was around 12 per cent. An inflation rate of 12 per cent, Mr. Speaker, means that shortly it will get to 22, 23 or even 24 per cent. The members in this House, like their fellow citizens who are watching us, remember when interest rates were at 22, 23 and 24 per cent, in 1981. They remember how that hurt not only their wallets but also the Canadian economy. So, what we have decided to do is to take harsh measures to control government expenditures in order to curb inflation and bring interest rates down to a reasonable level considered normal for borrowers, businesses as well as individuals. That, is rule number one for a flourishing economy and a prosperous country.

In 1990, Mr. Speaker, we announced that the expenditure control program would be applied for three years. This year, in 1991, we figured this nation's economy needed a breather. So we decided to apply the program for two more years, until 1995, to make sure that the government will not overspend. This leads us to the subject of the debt, our national debt. The NDP does not care about the national debt. It is not important. In 1973–74, Mr. Speaker, the debt was $25 billion. In 1984–85, the year we took power, it had reached $206 billion. Now, in 1990–91, it is $388 billion.

The opposition parties will say that it has doubled. But,in all honesty, they will realize that simply adding the annual interest charges on $206 billion comes up to $388 billion by 1990–91. Since 1984–85, we have made difficult decisions—heaven knows that the Canadian people know something about it—precisely to make sure the debt we inherited would not grow by more than the interest charges. The situation is still serious, Mr. Speaker. As we speak, the per capita share of the national debt in Canada is $15,000. This means that the child born a minute ago already owes $15,000. That is what Canada's debt costs: $43 million a year just in interest charges. That is $80,000 a minute. That is the price the Canadian people have to pay now for the debt we inherited in 1984: $80,000 a minute. That is the cost of the interests on our national debt. And we have not started paying off the capital. We are just paying interest.

That is why expenditure control is capital, Mr. Speaker, to maintain inflation at a reasonable level so that our economy can grow and that some revenue can be earmarked for the reduction of the debt.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the total amount of the cuts made by this government since 1984 is nearly $25 billion, not $25 million, but $25 billion. The CBC was affected, some of our military bases across the country were closed—yet more closures were announced yesterday—, high income earners were told that they will received lower old age pension benefits or none and couples will not be entitled to family allowances when their yearly income is over $70,000 or $75,000.

Our spending increased by 3.7 per cent on average since 1984; a 3.7 per cent average is better than any province and is better, Mr. Speaker, than the party opposite, which in the 15 years up to 1984 raised spending by 13.8 per cent a year on average. That is what is called controlling spending, managing and running a country.

In 1984–85, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada spent $16.1 billion dollars more than it took in, not counting interest costs. In 1990–91, Mr. Speaker, Canada spent $12.4 billion less than it took in. This means that in less than seven years, we turned spending around by $28 billion, that is what it means. You see my figures, Mr. Speaker, and a few minutes ago, I told you that we had cut $25 billion. So you see we are balancing quite well.

They are not easy decisions and they do not necessarily please Canadians, I agree. But at the same time, if I want to be serious, the Prime Minister shows his leadership, his interest in the country and the need to administer and manage as he should, not by polls and opinion surveys but on the basis of the economic reality of the country, its debts and especially, Mr. Speaker, its future.

You know what the future of a country means: its ability to continue to progress.

Mr. Speaker, a country can be compared to an individual. The day an individual has so many debts that he can no longer make decisions alone but only take orders from the credit union, the bank and his credit card issuers, that day, Mr. Speaker, he has lost his freedom of action. He depends on his creditors. It is the same with a country, Mr. Speaker. We must have freedom of action. To have freedom of action, Mr. Speaker, we must not be so much in debt that our creditors tell us what to do. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have understood that.

In this way, Mr. Speaker, the legislation we have passed and will continue to pass will benefit the country. Mr. Speaker, when the bill before the House today was tabled, I was convinced the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party would love it. I thought they would be falling over themselves to thank us for tabling it. The Liberal party said thank you on second reading but not a word from the NDP. Perhaps I should explain why they should thank us.

We realize Canadians are doing their share with the GST. We realize they don't like taxes and neither do we, but at least what they spend on the GST will be used only to reduce our national debt. It will not be used for anything else. We have created a special account. All the money from the GST, the net revenue from the GST, will go into that account, and the money will be used to reduce our national debt.

Mr. Speaker, when I say our national debt, which is nearly $400 billion, it isn't your debt or the debt of the people in my colleague's riding of Terrebonne, it is the debt of every Canadian in this country. The problem is that it was accumulated between 1968 and 1984, and now we have to manage that debt.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is almost up. In concluding, let me once again thank the Liberal Party which told us it supported the bill on second reading, and perhaps I may urge the NDP to consider the importance of a bill that guarantees that the money Canadians spend on the GST will be used strictly to reduce our debt and not to increase program spending or other expenditures. Nothing like that, Mr. Speaker. It will be used strictly to reduce the debt. I would also urge them to read the bill and change their attitude, because this country's economy needs a lot of improvement and, above all, we have to get rid of as much of our debt as we possibly can.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments and ask a few questions. The speaker before the last one mentioned that they had fought very hard against the GST. Since he is considered to be a very honest man, I would have thought that he would admit that the Liberals worked at least as hard to control this debt. There is also another point inherent to this: I find it surprising that he would have taken this opportunity to allege that we were not against the government. They often use this approach to try to discredit the Liberal Party. Maybe you could make some political comments about that.

My second comment is that we also want to control the deficit and the debt as much as anyone else. But it seems to me, and this comment is now addressed to you, dear friend, that, too often, you somewhat use this excuse.

You know, people often say: I am as I am, because of the way I was raised, or I have inherited this from my father or my mother. So, in your case, you have inherited the debt, which is very high, exceeding $400 billion, from the Liberals. You repeat that so often that, frankly, it becomes annoying. You have a problem. You buy a plant which has a debt: you accept that debt. You have to administer: do it! Don't always use the Liberal Party as an excuse for a lack of success.

I have a third comment. I have a letter from the previous minister of finance, Mr. Wilson, that says that, at the end of the 1983–84 fiscal year, the debt was under $168 billion. Five months and four days later, you were elected to govern the country. You took office, which makes seven months. Again, you claimed that the debt that you had to administer was from the 1984–85 fiscal year. Did you not have any responsabilities during the 1984–85 fiscal year? You were in office for more than half that fiscal year. It is very unfair to use these figures, these statistics from the 1984–85 fiscal year as you were in office for more than six months, nearly seven months.

Finally, and it will be my last comment, I wonder if you will give me somes reactions. You say that, on the average, your government spending for the last seven years was less than 4 per cent. I would appreciate getting an extremely frank answer here because it is so crucial for all the Canadians who are listening. Was it not less than 4 per cent because you cut the transfers of funds? Because you passed the fiscal burden on to provinces, territories, municipalities, hospitals, colleges, and universities? Controlling the debt is easy if I take my responsibilities, my debt, and share it, pass it on to this one, and that one, etc. I wish to hear your comments, your reactions, please.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the questions asked by my colleague from St. Boniface and I thank him. He was talking—and I will take each point in order—I am not going to jump into the feud between the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, I think it is up to them.

• (1820)

The second point was that he is tired of hearing me say that we inherited the debt from the Liberal government and I agree with him on that, Mr. Speaker. I am willing to promise not to mention again in this House or anywhere else that the debt we inherited in 1984 amounted to $200 billion and that we were stuck with it. I am willing on one condition. That my friend from St. Boniface promise not to mention anymore that we doubled the national debt and that it was our fault, because, Mr. Speaker, when they say "You doubled the national debt" I must answer: Yes, but only because of the interest on your debt. That is the problem and that is what I must answer him.

Then, if he stops saying that we doubled the national debt, I will not mention anymore that it was his debt, Mr. Speaker.

His other point was about the 1983–84 or 1984–85 fiscal year. He was partly right, but I would like to expand a little on the 1984–85 fiscal year, because that is the year this government was elected—seven years ago yesterday since we officially took power on September 17, 1984—

Mr. Duhamel: Already seven years!

Mr. Vincent: Seven years. You see how fast it went.

Mr. Speaker, on September 17, 1984 his government, which had ruled up to that date, had already made commitments for the next fiscal year and you will understand that commitments made by a government have to be met, even if the government changes. This is why I say he was partly right as far as dates are concerned, but not as far as cash is concerned, Mr. Speaker because in 1984–85 we spent the money his government had decided to spend. This is also the kind of situation we have to live with and I even remember, Mr. Speaker, voting for the budget of Marc Lalonde. I held my nose, but I did it. When we were elected we had to pass the budget of Marc Lalonde. What could I say?

The answer to the last question, Mr. Speaker, is yes, spending increases have averaged less than 4 per cent in seven years. And we have cut all the federal government expenses. We did not cut transfer payments to provinces, as claims my colleague. We have reduced the increase in payments to provinces. The best example of that is the fact that Québec and Manitoba, his native province, will receive more money than last year. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have reduced the increase in transfer payments to provinces, I have said it many times in this House.

You are telling me again that I cannot speak anymore. Well then, I will sit down. Thank you.

[English]

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I would like to place a comment and then a question to the member for Trois-Rivières.

I liked his approach in explaining the historical development of the growth in debt that has occurred here in Canada. I think it is significant to note that we have an opportunity within four or five years to once again have a balanced budget in Canada. That is quite different than what we have heard over the last several years, and certainly a very different spending trend than had been established prior to 1984.

In the province in which my constituency is represented, Ontario, we have also seen in recent years a growth in program spending under the provincial Liberal government averaging about 10 per cent per year while the federal growth in program spending was at about 2.7.

Now, under an NDP government, we see a deficit this year of something in the order of $10 billion. Clearly, we must have learned that deficits are nothing more than deferred taxation.

Canadian taxpayers feel that they have been paying enough tax for many, many years. Of course, they find out that they have not been paying enough to pay all the bills. I would like you to sort of contrast the views, the opinions and the policies of the NDP in Ontario and what they are attempting to do and what the government here is attempting to do in bringing a balanced budget back to Canada within four or five years.

Mr. Vincent: One minute, Mr. Speaker, is not much for such an important question.

When the economy is as slow as it has been, Mr. Speaker, there are two ways to react for a provincial or federal government. Ours is to say: "Let us reduce inflation and interest rates and recovery will follow.' ' That is what we have done and it is starting to work.

The other way is that of the Ontario NDP government which says: "No, the government will put money in the pot." But which pot, Mr. Speaker? They spend, spend and spend again, as Liberals have done in 1981.

Mr. Speaker, when a government invests in a slow economy, it does not automatically mean that, on the long term, the country or the province will benefit. I had a meeting with some people in Trois-Rivières, Mr. Speaker, and let me tell you that the people in that area are very sensible, they are hardworking people and they really earn their money. They do not approve of a nosey government. These people do not agree when the government invests, and invests money coming directly from ever-increasing taxes.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives' approach at the federal level will give the expected results, and unfortunately the New Democrats in Ontario will probably have the same results that we have witnessed at the federal level, in 1981-1982.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I must stop here.

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the previous participants in the debate this afternoon have drawn attention to the essentially false nature of the motion now before us. It offers to reduce first the deficit and then the debt through the application of revenues from the goods and services tax without reducing government spending in other areas by the equivalent amount. Therefore, we are simply transferring revenue from one account, as it were, to another without achieving real control of government expenditure.

When the government first introduced its sales tax or goods and services tax, it should have detailed why Canadians should pay a tax on almost all goods and services. There was then the possibility that the tax might have been received, certainly not with enthusiasm but at least with somewhat less consternation. I speak of course of the possibility that the government could have made a real impact on the burden of debt which Canada is carrying, which every Canadian carries and which every generation ahead of us will carry, by applying the revenue of a sales tax to the reduction and eventual elimination of our debt.

What did the government do in introducing its goods and services tax? In fact, it explained to the Canadian people that it was to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, a tax that it had itself increased on four different occasions. It argued that the manufacturers' sales tax penalized exports and lowered incentives to invest in Canada. Indeed, all parties, the New Democratic Party, the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party in the previous Parliament agreed that that tax should be replaced by a more equitable sales tax.

The problem the government immediately encountered was that the manufacturers' sales tax was an invisible tax. I do not suppose more than a handful of Canadians realized they were paying such a tax. However, once the government introduced the goods and services tax, paid at the cash register, then Canadians realized that they were paying an additional new tax. What was the government's justification for the tax? To replace the manufacturers' sales tax. The finance minister of the day said repeatedly it would be a revenue neutral tax. The revenue generated by the new tax would be no more than that produced by the former manufacturers' sales tax.

There was no talk then, none whatever, of the government introducing the new tax as a method of reducing and eventually eliminating the debt that burdens this generation and future generations of Canadians.

Had the government at that time been candid with the Canadian people, it would have said: "We propose this new tax as a method of reducing the debt, and for our part as the government we will reduce expenditure. We will in effect enter into a social contract with the Canadian people, with the Canadian taxpayers, that in asking them to meet this additional tax burden we shall make a determined and visible effort to reduce government spending". Then the tax might have been received not with enthusiasm but with at least a little less consternation than it did receive.

At no time when introducing its new tax did the government speak of segregating its revenue into a separate fund for debt reduction. It in fact envisaged, as the minister so often acknowledged, that the revenue would simply be part of general revenue and would go toward paying the ongoing expenditures of the government.

Unless one believes that paying one-third of every tax dollar to cover interest on the national debt does not matter there are only three ways to cut the debt and the deficit. The government can either increase taxes or reduce spending or do both.

In his budgets the former finance minister made some cuts. He cut some military spending, some foreign aid I regret to say, and some other programs. He rejigged unemployment insurance. But who can show where this government has acted decisively to curtail operational expenditures? Initially, the Conservative government did make some limited spending cuts, but by 1986 it had clearly lost heart, despite a booming economy generating new levels of tax revenue.

Re-elected in 1988 the government spoke a lot about reducing the deficit but it did not in fact do so. The deficit today is just as high as it was several years ago. The government failed to reduce spending significantly and relied almost entirely on tax increases to generate more revenue to move toward meeting government expenditures. It did so presumably in the belief that Canadians would rather pay more taxes than see expenditures cut.

If that were ever true it certainly is not true today. Canadians know that we are more burdened with excessive federal and provincial taxes than at any time in our history, compared to the standards of our trade competitors.

There are many disadvantages to using tax increases as a means of generating revenue rather than countering the debt problem with spending cuts. The most problematic is the public perception that governments are not serious in their goals of attempting to reduce deficit and debt. They find it easier to raise taxes, but, among other things, the government in so doing has contributed to the inflationary pressures of which we have been uncomfortably aware in the recent years.

Sales tax increases are inflationary. Organized labour will understandably respond by demanding higher wages furthering inflation. The replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax by the goods and services tax pushed inflation above 6 per cent. Not only did inflation move above 6 per cent in 1991, but it was well advertised to move that high at least a year before. It is not therefore surprising that in such circumstances labour contracts throughout 1990 and again this year were based upon expected high inflation rates above the 6 per cent level.

At the same time that there has been inflation generated in part by wage demands which anticipate inflation. The Governor of the Bank of Canada, supported fully by the government, has assured Canadians that he will continue to use high interest rates to counter inflation setting the stage for continued high interest rates and a high value for the Canadian dollar. This completes a vicious circle where high interest rates increase the deficit by increasing debt service costs.

If the government has been intent on following the tax route when it introduced the goods and services tax to make a real dent in the deficit, it might have appealed to taxpayers then to accept a comprehensive retail sales tax and match that new tax with a very real commitment to address the excessive government spending that has marked Canada's recent history.

We have all seen how the tax has failed significantly because the federal government itself failed to do what might have made it more palatable by demonstrating austerity in its own spending in an effective way as part of a bargain in which the tax would have been accepted as an essential part of a greater national commitment to reduce both the debt and the deficit.

What has happened is that the size of the national debt has almost doubled. Unacceptably high interest rates and exchange rates have been maintained in spite of repeated warnings and have contributed to the recession.

Canadian competitiveness is further in decline. Bankruptcies have reached record levels. Unemployment has continued to rise, so has the tax burden and so has inflation. The balance of payments and Canada's foreign indebtedness have seriously deteriorated and the Minister of Finance will know that government revenues are falling, as we saw as recently as the last quarter.

That was the background to the motion which has been brought forward today: a major recession, public finance virtually out of control and the country itself in serious economic difficulties.

This government, finding itself in such serious economic difficulties, has complained that its problems after seven years in office are really the fault of the Liberal government which went out of office in 1984.

We have had this story repeated to us several times today from the government side. Surely after seven years the government has some better explanation for its policies, can justify its policies, can offer some reasons to the Canadian people for why we are in the situation we are than to say: "Oh, it really was not our fault; it was the fault of a Liberal government that went out of office seven years ago".

The government anticipated what it said in its 1984 publication A New Direction for Canada, it offered a document that contained a sharp indictment of Liberal fiscal policies. The government that went out of office in 1984 was alleged, and I quote, to be "the source of poor economic performance", "soaring government deficits", "rising unemployment", "sluggish economic growth" and "an economy dangerously off course".

If that sounds familiar it is because it is a very accurate description of this government's economic policies after seven years in office. Every one of those points that they allege were the characteristics of the government that went out of office in 1984, are the characteristics of this government's economic policy today: soaring government deficit, rising unemployment, sluggish economic growth, and an economy dangerously off course.

If we look back to 1984, since my friends on the government side seem to be obsessed with that mythical explanation for its own folly, the truth of the matter is that the Conservative government inherited a surging Canadian economy which was demonstrating a remarkable recovery from the 1981–82 recession, a recession that was as serious and as deep as any which the western world had encountered since the 1930s. It was a world–wide recession. It was generated, in part, by the volatile petroleum prices of that time. It was generated outside Canada. It was an imported recession, unlike the recession which this government has foisted on the Canadian people. It was not a made–in–Canada recession. It was a world–wide recession.

The fact is in 1984 the economy was growing at the rate of 4.7 per cent in real terms. That was the legacy that the Liberal government of the day left to its successor, the Conservative government, a growth rate that was never exceeded again except one year and that was marginally in 1988.

At the same time, unemployment had declined, inflation had reached the lowest rate since 1971. The trends were all positive. The merchandise trade balance had a surplus of about $20 billion, a near record level, and with a non–merchandise deficit of $17 billion, the balance of payments on current accounts showed a $2.7 billion surplus. That too was part of the legacy left to the incoming government by the outgoing Liberal government of the day.

Interest rates were falling, the domestic saving rate was increasing, and even foreign indebtedness was being reimbursed. I would like to hear any member on the government side of the House indicate in what way, in seven years in office, they have moved to reduce rather than increase, Canada's total indebtedness.

Perhaps myths die hard, but this is certainly a myth and we have heard it again today. I would repeat that the government must be singularly bankrupt in economic policies if the best it can do is to complain about a situation that did not exist but was allegedly left by a previous government.

It is evident to all of us that the record of this government does not include achievement in reducing and eliminating the debt and the deficit which remain such an albatross around the neck of Canadian business and the Canadian people.

In 1984–85, as my colleagues, the member for St. Boniface and the member for Ottawa South, have pointed out, the national debt was $199 billion. For this current fiscal year it has reached $388 billion. Next year it is estimated at $419 billion. Even on the assumption that the Conservatives had no responsibility for the 1984–85 year, which is not correct, Canada is paying interest this year on $189 billion of Conservative debt and next fiscal year will pay interest on $220 billion of Conservative debt.

So much for the accuracy and fairness of the government side in its footling allegations and pointless accusations about the situation it inherited when it came to office.

I see my time is just about ended but I want to say about this legislation now before us that it is essentially flimflam, it does not replace government expenditure. It merely opens yet another account, as it were. We shall support that this bill move into committee for closer study and examination because we are committed to ensuring that government expenditure is given the closest scrutiny. Any method that helps to encourage this government to rein in its excessive spending, we would support.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my friend's speech with great interest. He went through his history of the debt and how we got to our present position. He is right that it was $199 billion or $200 billion in 1984, and we are paying interest on that particular portion. With interest rates at that time it was approximately $22 billion.

The biggest indictment of the government of that time was the debt it left in the current account when it was not even paying for the programs it was providing. A $16 billion debt at that particular time and that aspect of its operations added together added up to the $38 billion deficit of that particular year.

Obviously, when you deal with it you have to close that program spending deficit. That has been done by this government and turned around. In fact, this year there will be a $13 billion surplus, approximately. In the meantime, of course, the national debt grows as a result of that. That is why it has reached the point it has now and that is why we have to pay interest on it.

I wondered why my friend did not make mention that particular aspect of the financial situation that occurred when this government came into office in 1984.

As far as the bill we are dealing with is concerned, my constituents have said: "Please use the revenues toward the reduction of the deficit and the debt". That came out of the entire debate.

My friend also mentioned the GST replacing the manufacturers' sales tax. He mentioned that the manufacturers' sales tax was a bad tax and was in fact hurting the economy. We know that by replacing it with the GST, a better form of tax, that the economy is going to grow by a significant portion as a result of that. In addition to the revenues from the GST there is an expansion of the economy. That was the reason the consumption tax was put in.

I would also like to know my friend's viewpoint on consumption taxes as a means of raising revenue.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite has raised a number of questions. If I do not touch upon all of them, I hope he will remind me of his points.

The idea that somehow a government can explain away or excuse its fiscal performance by referring merely to an operating surplus or even an operating budget, always strikes me as a bizarre procedure. Let me quote for the benefit of the member opposite the chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada who said recently that the government talks about an operating surplus. That is what the member opposite speaks of, an operating surplus. But what does that mean? It is like an individual saying he or she would have a positive cash flow if it were not for the mortgage interest. It is true but it is irrelevant. The government still has to pay the interest on the debt. There is no point saying that the interest payment is over there somewhere and look instead at the grand job we have done on operating budgets. The fact is that it is a total package.

If the member opposite wants to consider why it is that the interest payments on the debt are so high, he would do well to ask himself two questions: who is it who has increased the debt over the past seven years, and who is it who has pursued a high interest rate policy to the detriment of every Canadian? Who is it? It is the government. Do not tell us that it is not the Liberal Party. It is not the opposition that did it. For seven years this government has driven up the debt and at the last minute it says: "Let us use the GST. That is a great idea". Maybe there is some argument for using the GST. If one reduced one's expenditure by an equivalent amount one would be making a real impact. But this is not so. It is merely as if another bank account was opened, a second bank account over here, a third, fourth, fifth bank account. It is all the same. There are no changes being made. This is a flimflam.

Who has pursued a high interest policy in this country? Will the blame be put on Mr. Crow of the Bank of Canada: "Oh, it has nothing to do with us. We are just the government. It is Mr. Crow who chooses to pursue a high interest rate policy. He says that is the only way I can deal with inflation".

"I am the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the only way I can deal with inflation is to drive up interest rates". Do you know why he says that? This government has failed in its fiscal policies. He has pursued, and the government accepts this, a monetary answer to what is essentially a fiscal question. He pursues high interest rates in answer to what he perceives as an inflationary threat.

But the real way to deal with inflation in Canada is through fiscal policy, not monetary policy, and this government has consistently failed to do so. Do not talk to us about why interest rates are high. It is the government that has pursued high interest rate policies. It is not the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Do not blame him. There are procedures in place for the government to control and direct the Governor of the Bank of Canada. The government has endorsed and approved the high interest policy. Why has it done that? What have high interest rate policies achieved?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very brief comment and ask a question.

We have been talking a great deal about inflation. About a month ago I read an article which suggested that the major contributors to inflation were the 34 tax increases, including the goods and services tax, and I want to know whether he is in agreement or disagreement. I shall not be offended if he has a different opinion, but certainly that was the point.

The point was that the government's 30-plus tax increases were the major contributor to the high inflation rate.

The second point is that it seems to me when we talk about deficit and debt we really need to look at it in terms of the revenues that we have. If my memory serves me correctly—and I would be willing to bet that it does—the revenues for the government when it came into power were slightly about $70 billion. They will be approaching close to $130 billion this year, roughly twice as much. I have no problem in taking on a debt of $1 million if my salary is $2 million, but I have a real problem if I am earning $10,000 a year.

I wonder if my hon. colleague could perhaps make some comments with respect to inflation and the almost double revenues and what impact it has on deficit and debt.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I was quite enjoying my previous discussion and I would really like to pursue that. My hon. friend from St. Boniface, in his own excellent statement a few minutes ago, did draw attention to the inflationary effects of tax increases, and of course he is quite right. This government claims to have achieved so much. It never makes the one claim in which it would have some justification and that is tax increases. It has a history of tax increases that is unparalleled in this country. It has introduced taxes at every level and in just about every way that human imagination can devise.

One member has asked me what I think of consumption taxes. I would have the federal government out of consumption taxes. They are inflationary. There is no question of the inflationary impact of the GST. Look at your own numbers. Look at the numbers of the Department of Finance. Of course, we are told the impact is temporary. But tax increases with an inflationary impact have an unfortunate way of being a permanent feature of the economy.

The inflationary impact which my hon. friend raised is pervasive. It flows through the whole economy and it continues. The burden that the government has placed on the Canadian people is not merely in direct taxation or indirect taxation terms, that is, taking away more of their earned income, but it is also in its inflationary impact. Taxes drive up the cost of goods and services. That is inflation. The result of it is that the Governor of the Bank of Canada employs interest rates as a method of trying to counter what he sees as inflationary pressures caused by the government's own inflationary policies of higher taxation. It is a vicious circle and the government must get out of this vicious circle. The way to do it is to show fiscal responsibility and not monetary excess.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak on Bill C–21, and particularly as it is known as the debt servicing and reduction account act. I am sorry that you did not recognize me, Mr. Speaker, when it was time for questions for the previous speaker because I was going to ask him if this was the same House of Commons that I was elected to in 1988 and was I a Conservative and was it a Liberal that I was hearing speak? Is it true that he is a member of the Liberal caucus? I thought I heard an awful lot of things being said which would almost suggest to me that somehow this House had flipped over, that I was sitting on the opposition side, as a Liberal, and I was listening to a Conservative speak. It shocked me tremendously. I will not deal with prior to 1988. I was not a member of this House prior to 1988. I know that in the 1984–88 period neither was the member who just spoke. I will not refer to the record when he was in the House because that is not fair in the 1980–84 period.

I want to refer to the two and a half years almost that he and I have shared this Chamber. He said that the government has failed to reduce expenditures significantly. I think I heard him say that. I heard him say that there are serious disadvantages to raising revenues to reduce the deficit versus expenditure cuts. He wanted the government to demonstrate austerity.

My question to him, which I realize he now cannot answer, is how did he vote when the government restricted transfer payments? How did he vote when the government restricted VIA Rail transfers? How did he vote when we cut CBC? How did he vote when we closed the base in Prince Edward Island among other places? How did he vote when we restricted foreign aid packages? How did he vote when we froze government operations for the last year? Most importantly, today, how did he vote when we decided to pass a bill dealing with the Public Service Alliance of Canada?

I do not recall today him standing up voting the same way I did. He must have either not been here or, I am sorry, I do not know whether he was here or not. But if he stood up and voted with his party, then does his party totally ignore everything he is saying? Does he have no influence on that party because they have voted against everything that we have done to deal with what he says is the government's failure to reduce expenditures significantly.

Maybe he voted against it because we did not cut enough. Is that what I heard him say? Did he want us to cut further? I would like to speak on the debt reduction fund, and I realize I have a problem. I am out of time. I will be back here Friday morning, and I hope the member is back to ask me some questions when I next rise to speak.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON PRICES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a Royal commission on prices to examine allegations of excessively high prices of various consumer goods and services in Canada as compared to other jurisdictions and which would include considerations of such factors as costs generated by distribution mechanisms, excessive mark–ups at various levels, differential pricing, economies of scale, interest rates and the exchange rate of the dollar.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it should be quite evident that what has provoked this motion has been the vast increase in cross–border shopping which has affected many communities in Canada.

In Windsor, for example, it has been calculated that the city of Windsor will lose something of the order of $100 million a year to its retailers and quite a considerable number of jobs. In fact, if one goes down the main street of Windsor, one will find that something of the order of one–third of our retailers are closed or in the process of closing. Some of them have been replaced by other businesses that do not operate in the same market that relates to cross–border shopping.

There have been a number of factors to which the increase in cross-border shopping has been attributed. We note that there was quite a significant increase even before the negotiation of the free trade agreement which was in some measure stimulated by the remarks of the then minister of trade that there would be an open border between Canada and the United States. By that, people were encouraged to increase the frequency with which they purchased in Detroit.

Subsequently, the free trade agreement was in fact invoked. Subsequent to that, we had the introduction of the GST.

I note that today the Minister of National Revenue was saying that the GST really had nothing at all to do with the increase in cross-border shopping. He says that he consulted widely with everybody down in our area, and they all agree.

His submission was that there was a relatively slight increase in the number of automobile trips between Canada and the United States. He thereby concluded that the GST had no effect.

The fact is that between 1990 and 1991, over the first six months, there has been an increase of 57 per cent in purchases on the other side of the border. What we are really talking about here with respect to other jurisdictions in our motions is the United States.

Of course, we did not need to have those statistics from StatsCanada. In fact, the minister had in his hand a submission from the Chamber of Commerce in Windsor that clearly indicated in a graph that with the introduction of the GST, purchases in Detroit went sharply up.

It is not just the GST to which we attribute increased cross-border shopping. There is a vast difference in prices between the two, even apart from the question of the GST. There is the simple fact that most Canadians have the perception that they are going to get most of their goods cheaper in the United States than in Canada, that they will be cheaper in Detroit than in Windsor.

Almost everyone has attributed these differences in part to higher taxes on the Canadian side that retailers and others must submit to such as property taxes, excise taxes and duties.

There is also the question of higher transportation costs in Canada and, of course, we frequently hear of references to higher wages in Canada as being a significant factor in those price differentials. But there is also the question of the scale of the market in Canada versus the United States and a number of other factors. Of course the business sector, in particular, has made a great to do with the higher wage costs in Canada along with the tax burden.

The Chamber of Commerce in Windsor, in particular, took a position a little bit at odds with the general trend within the business community in Canada. It suggested that there are other factors that ought to be attended to over which it had more control in some measure, but there are other factors as well that this government should address in some way.

I would just like to give you an idea about what I am talking about. This tie that I am wearing was bought in Hong Kong last spring for $5.50 Canadian. When this tie arrives in B.C.. it is landed for $10. That is the price for which it goes to the first level of distribution, which immediately marks the tie up by 100 per cent and so that tie is now a $20 tie. It then goes to the next level of distribution where it is now marked up another 100 per cent and, magically, this $5.50 tie becomes a $40 tie and this is still at wholesale. If you go to buy this silk tie down on Sparks Street or in my home town, if you can find a store that is still open, if you can get it for less than $80 then you have made a very good purchase. So that is one dimension of the problem.

It is a fact that as a result of the auto pact most ordinary North American cars are sold at about the same price in Canada as in the United States. Of course, Canadians will pay additional taxes but the base cost of the automobile, a regular Ford Taurus, a Chevy or a LeBaron, will be about the same to the consumer in Canada as in the United States; the same factors with respect to transportation would apply. But if you go and look at the higher scale models such as a fully loaded Lincoln Continental, that devil is going to cost you $45,000 in Canada. It will cost $35,000 in the United States. That is a $10,000 differential, which is not uncommon on upscale vehicles. In other words, without the introduction of any additional factors, there is differential pricing of some products in Canada versus the United States.

Mr. Speaker, you do not have to take my word for this. I am sure that most Canadians who have shopped in the United States and shopped in Canada have some knowledge of the two countries and can cite similar examples of extraordinary differences in price. But we do not have to go to common experience. Recently, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology did what was billed as a small study. It is called a preliminary study of the competitiveness of distribution channels in Canada. This work was done by Ernst and Young. It is intended that a more expanded analysis be done, but their findings were very interesting.

First of all, they looked at electronic equipment. The interesting thing about electronic equipment that they found was that the prices were comparable within 15 per cent or so between the prices that one paid for audio equipment, video equipment, television sets and so on between Canada and the United States. In other words, those things were only about 15 per cent higher in Canada. That small difference represented such factors as taxes, transportation and the like. But only about a 15 per cent difference resulted from that.

Of course all of these things are important. For some things which have just one step in distribution in Canada, if one looks around one can probably get just as good a deal in most places in Canada as one can get in the United States. However, it is interesting to take a look at bedding and linen, along with other kinds of textile products, which are to a very large extent manufactured right here. What one finds is that the price differences for those kinds of goods, that is bedding and linen, between Canada and the United States is in the range of 200 per cent.

We heard some discussions about the loss of jobs in the textile industry and wages pricing workers out of the market, and so on and so on. That 200 per cent difference between the American product and the Canadian product has bloody little to do with wages. In fact, it has to do with two things. They are: a more complicated distribution system in Canada and higher mark-ups at each stage which result in Canadians paying 200 per cent more for a product in Canada than in the United States.

In the case of those products just one additional level of distribution with mark-ups ranging between 50 and 100 per cent is what hits Canadian consumers in the pocket-book and has them getting on the Ambassador Bridge or going through the Detroit-Windsor tunnel to buy linens and table-cloths and so on.

If one looks at women's apparel one finds that there is anywhere from a 40 per cent to a 100 per cent difference. In some respects, this is determined by whether that clothing is imported, whether it is name brand, or what. However the same things apply: additional levels of distribution and handling and higher mark-ups.

The Windsor Chamber of Commerce, although it is as concerned as any other group of businessmen and businesswomen about the usual targets of business—high wages and so on—and the big tax grab by government, said: "Look, there are some things that we can do ourselves as business people; some of it requires government action but some of it is in our bailiwick". What it concluded is that business is to some degree getting the business from business. Some businesses are making other ordinary businesses face really tough market conditions because they are too greedy at some stages. It is just that simple.

It is also true that in some instances the final line retailer is too greedy. There is a tendency in Canada to take big profits and keep the market relatively small through those big profits; whereas in the United States there is great deal more emphasis on rapid turnover at a small mark-up, a small profit. You see that in Pace, in the outlet stores and so on in the United States.

The Chamber of Commerce came up with the very interesting observation that under Canadian law and under the free trade agreement some of this could be dealt with.

We know that in some instances the manufacturers in the United States have a separate and distinct distribution system in Canada from the distribution in the United States. It is not uncommon to find that those special distribution establishments in Canada have much higher mark-ups and often represent that additional stage I was talking about.

The Chamber of Commerce in Windsor noted that under Canadian law, under section 75 of the Competition Act, as well as under section 102 of the free trade agreement, it could be argued that in areas where cross-border shopping is frequent there exists or should exist a single market. After all the purpose of the free trade agreement was supposedly to establish a single market. Why should Canadian retailers be expected to get their goods and products at a different cost or different availability than their neighbours across the river in the same market under the free trade agreement without some kind of government response? The government response should be an application under the Competition Act to ensure that if there is a good or a product sold in Canada that could be construed as being sold in the same market but under different conditions this government should ensure that the same conditions apply. Those products should be available at the same cost so that retailers can make them available to consumers at the same cost.

The Chamber of Commerce has alluded to a possible solution to this concern about price differentials between Canada and the United States. However, we have already indicated that there are a whole host of factors exclusive of those usually considered: high interest rates, a differential on the dollar, distribution systems, transportation costs, differential pricing and all of these things which should be looked at very carefully. That is why I have suggested that there be a royal commission on pricing in Canada.

My first thought was that a Royal commission to look at this problem was a bit bizarre. However this is not a novel, and therefore certainly not a bizarre suggestion. In fact, in 1934 there was a Royal commission on price spreads between producers and consumers. In 1949 there was a royal commission to examine the exorbitant price increases that plagued Canada in the wake of the Second World War. In 1959 and 1960 there was a Royal commission to examine why consumer prices for farm products were rising while the income to producers was falling.

I hope that this House will support my motion. It is conceivable that members can think of alternative approaches to the same issue which could lead to the same result. However, I submit that a Royal commission, as the precedents indicate, would be the most appropriate means to approach the issue of why, even when one takes into account taxation and takes into account transportation and other similar factors, even in the absence of those costs, the prices to Canadian consumers for too many goods are far in excess of those in the United States and far in excess of what they ought to be. This royal commission could determine what reforms in how we distribute goods in this country would be appropriate to make it more competitive to sell in Canada and more appropriate for consumers to buy in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. member from Windsor—Lake St. Clair's request concerning the establishment of a Royal Commission on Prices by the federal government.

• (1920)

For the benefits of all members, I think it is important to mention that several federal governments have appointed commissions of inquiry to monitor prices and other aspects of the Canadian economy. For example, the Royal Commission on Prices established in 1948, the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects created in 1955, the Prices and Incomes Commission of 1969 and Food Prices Review Board of 1973.

More recently, the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects, also known as the MacDonald Commission, has reviewed the whole Canadian market. This Royal commission highlighted the need to improve the competitiveness of the Canadian economy in order to meet the challenges of the global market. The Commission considered price competitivity as one of the main elements of the economic future of Canada. Mr. Speaker, common sense suggests that we don't need another commission.

The most important question is how to make sure that Canadian prices are competitive. One of the basic priorities of this government is its commitment to market forces. The whole question of the cost of goods and services is closely linked to this priority and no government in Canada has relied more on the market for the greatest benefit of the private sector and consumers. Market forces have brought a much greater flexibility in prices and hence flexibility and efficiency in the Canadian economy. This government has chosen the way of free competition as a mean to improve market efficiency, and the economic growth and prosperity associated with it.

Traditionally, only 40 per cent of Canada's national income came from sectors recognized as competitive. In the United States, however, 80 per cent of the national income is estimated to come from such sectors. Mr. Speaker, in the last budget, this government clearly showed its commitments to prosperity and competitiveness. We firmly believe that lower prices are not only desirable for the competitiveness of Canadian industry but that they are also very important for consumers, who account for nearly 60 per cent of the final demand for goods and services in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, as was mentioned in the last Speech from the Throne, we will soon begin a vast round of consultations on prosperity and competitiveness. We hope that this round of consultations will help us identify certain weaknesses in the Canadian economy and obstacles to competitiveness.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian businesses want to know what they must do to succeed and what policies of the federal government will best foster Canadian competitiveness.

I am very satisfied with this government's economic leadership. The hon. member's proposal shows a real concern for the welfare of Canadians. I invite him to cooperate with the government in implementing our prosperity initiative.

Mr. Speaker, the solution he wants on prices cannot be found in creating another Royal commission of inquiry or in government intervention but rather in a dynamic, productive and prosperous Canadian economy. That is the commitment we made to all Canadians in the Speech from the Throne and we will achieve it.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say that it is a pleasure to be back after a pleasant summer with constituents, but mostly with family.

I wanted to speak on this particular motion. Normally there is a gem of wisdom that I might be able to glean after a lot of scratching down on NDP motions.

I know the the hon. member's intentions are good, but I think he is being a little mischievous. He puts forward to the House a motion, which if it is ever adopted, if the government ever did do it, would cost the taxpayers of this fair land millions and millions of dollars. Surely to goodness the one thing that we do not need in this country at this particular time is another Royal commission.

Royal commissions are a convenient way for legislators, no matter if they are here or somewhere else, to take an issue they do not believe they are capable of dealing with, or that they do not believe they want to deal with because of the political implications, and they put it over to a body so they do not have to discuss it for two, three, four or ten, or God knows how many years. They do this all the time. The Royal commission goes on its way and leads Canadians to believe that it is something other than a depository for people's opinions. They cannot do anything about it.

After two or three years of study, the Royal commission will table a report which gathers dust in too many libraries across Canada and most particularly, the Library of Parliament.

I have heard the New Democratic member opposite speak eloquently in this House about his party's grave concerns for the people of Canada. I am not doubting for a moment that this member has those concerns and I am sure they are deeply felt.

We are in a time when there is not a lot of money. We on the Liberal side believe that if we were in government, we would spend government money a little more wisely and that we would, perhaps, have a better social conscience. We believe in a free market system but we also believe that government has a responsibility through its institutions and through various regulatory mechanisms to ensure that Canadians, no matter where they live, can share in the greatness of the country.

I remember at one time the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia used to be down on Cape Breton Island where I grew up, where we had great economic difficulty, a lot of hardships but they were very, very good people and we stuck together. The New Democratic Party would campaign and they would not only have one chicken in every pot if they got elected, they would have 10. They would go into an area where there was substandard housing and instead of being upfront with the people, they would say: "The day we get in, not only will you have a new house, you will have a pink Cadillac in your yard".

Now, the New Democratic Party, in this particular motion the hon. member puts forward is playing the old double standard game again that the New Democrats play so well.

An hon. member: You never make any promises?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The member opposite does not know when to keep his lips closed. I have just listened to him and I am trying to respond to what he said.

This motion is mischievous. This motion comes from a party that claims it is concerned about the government's cutbacks to women's programs. It claims that it is concerned about the government's cutbacks to post-secondary education and health care programs across Canada. It says this government has been wasting its money. The way it spends is misdirected. So, what does it do? It says another $20 or $25 million—I can hear the cash register going up and down—$25 million—another Royal commission. That is their answer to every problem.

I thought there had been a problem with employment for some of the senior New Democrats. Well, I know that Uncle Ed got his big job over at the international centre for God knows what. We have seen other hon. members from this House, like Mr. Deans, who has now found his pork barrel heaven over at the Public Service Staff Relations Board. It is very hard to believe they were New Democrats who sat in this House. Nevertheless, when duty called and the pay cheque was big enough they certainly went.

Then we have Bob Rae in Ontario. My God, there is Uncle Bob in Ontario. Uncle Bob in Ontario came forward and said: "We have the answer to all your questions. We are a believable alternative to the current old line parties". He got elected and what did he do? He took the economic engine of this country and he saddled it immediately after taking office with a $10 billion deficit in the middle of a recession and has been responsible for much hardship for the average person in Ontario. Industry is claiming that because the regime that the NDP government in Ontario has put in, it is not conducive to business. If it is not conducive to business, it is conducive to the consumers, those very people that this party opposite seek to get the support of.

I have no difficulty in using the traditional instruments that we have before us to solve the problems that the hon. member has mentioned. I have no quarrel with his concerns about price gouging. I have no quarrels with his statement that the GST and the government's statements on GST have been at best misleading, but that the GST has caused perhaps a window in the marketplace for abuse in the consumer price structure. I do not argue that. What I do argue for once, for goodness sakes, we are in a situation where we have debated over the last few days a very serious piece of legislation. The public servants of Canada are the people who serve every Canadian, serve every member of Parliament and make us look good. That is who we call when a constituent has a problem

We debated in here whether or not Draconian legislation to force them back to work was proper. The Liberals said no. The New Democrats said no. Let us look at the hypocrisy. The New Democratic Party said, and rightly so, the public servants deserve a much better break. However, what the New Democrats said was $144 million is not much to pay, and it is not. Instead of coming in and debating a motion here tonight to talk about the proper allocation of limited resources over to people like the public servants of this country, who have served this country so well, what do they do? Irresponsible again. They walk in after debating that on the one hand and say: "Another $25 million for a Royal commission, there is no problem".

I am trying to figure out where in the name of goodness their priorities are. My priority is to help Canadians. My priority is to help my constituents. My priority is to try to ensure that legislation that goes through this place is properly directed and the limited resources hit where they should, hit most, and that is positively with the people of Canada. But no. I heard the hon. member over here just a few minutes ago. This was amazing. They always talk about the corporate welfare bums.

Mr. Speaker, do you know what the hon. member used as an example as to why there should be a Royal commission? Because a Lincoln Continental costs $10,000 more in Canada than in the United States. Can you believe that?

I can give you many arguments as to why we should go and use the instruments at our disposal, such as parliamentary committees, such as the competition bureau—

An hon. member: Only Bob White can afford a Lincoln Continental.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Only Bob White or perhaps Ed Broadbent could, or maybe even Ian Deans, all those wonderful New Democrats who have the solutions for every problem in the world.

I have had a little difficulty in trying to figure out, because I think we should be realistic, if indeed we need a board of inquiry or, God forbid, a Royal commission. What do we hope to obtain by that?

I know better than anybody that there is always room for abuses and excesses in the free market system. Do not forget that the members who sit on all sides of this House are consumers as well. When those excesses take place in the marketplace, it affects everyone. It crosses partisan lines, but we had instruments to deal with that. Surely to goodness we have instruments to deal with that.

Given a choice between a U.S.S.R. style regimented economy—

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The hon. member is moaning in his chair. No wonder he is moaning. With the motion that he has put forward to us, he wants to go in and find out why Mrs. Smith at the corner store is charging 7 cents for the lollipop instead of 6 cents. Get with it. These guys are out to lunch on most things that come up. They claim to sit over there and represent the viewpoint of average Canadians.

The Lincoln Continental, I will never forget the Lincoln Continental. Perhaps just perhaps we should look and take their suggestion more seriously, if they could show me where we could find the money which would not take away from the just deserved wage settlement in the Public Service of Canada, the charge hands, and the dockyard workers and all those individuals. If they could show me that the money would not come from support for women's programs, for native friendship centres, if they could show me that it would not shut down more hospital beds, that it would not take away from the post-secondary education system, I would say maybe we could look at this. But maybe, they should have had an amendment. The amendment should have said: "subject to financing being arranged through a loan guarantee" or perhaps a co-signature by the premier of Ontario since he seemed to have so much credibility with the financial community in this country.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I think I have probably seen right now as my colleague who just finished speaking leaves the House one of the most deplorable exercises in insults to my NDP colleague who has tried to present a private members' bill which is not mischievous but is looking toward getting something for consumers across this country.

I am not going to respond to all of the Russian and socialist and other affirmations that I have from my colleague because I really think that this Parliament should be a Parliament of ideas and debate and not of gratuitous insults. I am tempted, but I will stay away from that.

I want to look at the question concerning prices in Canada because that, above all, is what we are looking at. A royal commission is what you make of it. On the other side, we were speaking about the Macdonald Royal commission having had some good aspects. I think it did have some good things to say.

We have had Royal commissions on the status of women which have actually led to a great deal of change in consciousness raising and change in our country.

To say that they are just going to gather dust and are of no benefit to the common everyday Canadian, I think that is wrong.

The question is: Is the subject of sufficient interest or urgency that it should be treated by a Royal commission? I am a consumer advocate myself, non-partisan. I have never been a consumer advocate for Liberals, the Conservatives or the NDP per se. I was a consumer advocate dealing with the questions that were coming in from consumers and trying to give them answers as to why automobiles and automobile repairs were much more expensive here in Canada than in the United States.

I can tell you that apart from the question of taxation and transportation, even in transportation, the reason has been brought out very eloquently by my colleague. It is pure, simple greed and it permeates throughout our entire society here in Canada where we do pay a lot more for products mainly because we have allowed companies to get away with it.

In certain industries, it is far more excessive than others. It is just common sense. We are being taken to the cleaners by this multiplicity of middlemen, of middle agents who add their percentage on top of the other percentage which means that we really, in effect, pay much more than the United States.

I believe if you ask the consumers from Cape Breton or the consumers from British Columbia, or particularly the consumers of Quebec that they would say: "When we go down south to Florida, one of the benefits we see is the difference in prices." We understand that there are some differences because we have perhaps a better, perhaps, social program in Canada. We have to pay for that. We have higher taxation. We have transportation and perhaps a shorter growing season as well.

All of that taken into account, it does cost us a great deal more for certain products and a satisfactory answer has never really been given to us.

Let me just tell you in the automobile field which I am most familiar with, it is not a question of Lincoln Continentals only. It is a question of the prices with the basic manufacturers' suggested retail price being basically the same in Canada as in the United States, once you add in the different things dealing with taxation as well as the question of transportation and those basic items.

As you get into those vehicles as they are sold by the dealers with the added equipment, you get into a labyrinth of price variations with which you would have a great deal of difficulty trying to discern what the real price of the automobile is. The United States has an act called the Monroney Act. It is interesting that we do not have federal legislation, as the United States does. That is not Mulroney but Monroney. The Monroney Act in the United States came about in the 1950s and required a sticker on every automobile sold so that the consumer could see basically what the prices are for equipment and everything else. This act, which applies in the United States, meant that cars which were transported from the States to Canada had that windshield sticker. However, these stickers were systematically removed in Canada so that the dealers and other middle suppliers could put on whatever price they felt necessary. Obviously that is unfair. Obviously that works against the interest of the consumers.

I think that a Royal commission could go into each one of these areas where we are really getting gouged and look at the extent to which we are getting gouged. As a result of a number of commissions that we held in Quebec dealing with automobile insurance, we actually had automobile insurance rates go down. I understand that for a certain period of time in Ontario, as a result of hearings being held, some of the automobile insurance rates went down. It is a case, as some people said, and as I believe, of the light being shone upon the practices of these insurers in the province of Ontario.

I believe a Royal commission on prices would have a salutary effect. I think it is important. It touches the lives of every single consumer.

I can tell you that as a consumer advocate in Quebec for the past 20 years and as my party's critic for consumer issues, I have always been intrigued by the difference in prices between the United States and Canada. I never felt the difference was justified in the case of cars or car repairs.

In the United States, there is a federal law, the Monroney Bill, that obliges U.S. automobile manufacturers to provide a label indicating the base price. We don't have that here. In fact, most vehicles imported from the United States into Canada have this label on the windshield but labels are routinely removed because first of all, there is no connection with the Canadian price and second, Canadian and Quebec consumers would start asking embarrassing questions about the gap between U.S. and Canadian prices.

I think the Private Member's Bill put forward by the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair is very sensible, in that it demonstrates that we, as Canadian consumers, are being exploited to the nth degree. I think we should find out once and for all how badly we are being exploited, and I think this would have a salutary effect in two ways. First of all, with a Royal commission of inquiry we can ask people, producers and consumers, to appear before us, which, because of all the publicity, may force producers to lower their prices.

Second, we could regulate disclosure of prices at each distribution stage. As I was saying, in the United States— Mr. Speaker, the United States is not a socialist country. However, it may be a little more realistic than we are as far as prices are concerned. And I think that consumers, especially in Quebec where we have had legislation since 1980 which obliges distributors to have individual price tags on their products— I think the same approach could be applied to automobiles.

Finally, to my Liberal colleague who made disparaging remarks and claimed that all we want is to spend money and not really help the consumers, I would say that is not so. The bill introduced by my colleague is reasonable. We are in urgent need of this kind of legislation, because Canadians and Quebecers have had it with paying ridiculous prices for goods they can buy for less down south, in the United States. Also, this bill could be good for our business people, especially those close to the Canada–United States border, since they would be given a level playing field if we can just force suppliers to charge reasonable prices to their Canadian customers.

I support my colleague, and I think, as I said earlier, that this idea makes a lot of sense.

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in accordance with Standing Order 44(1) which says:

> No member, unless otherwise provided by Standing or Special Order, may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his or her speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, and the Member is not to introduce any new matter, but then no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

It is quite clear that the hon. Liberal member did not understand that this debate was on the issue of cross-border shopping, the price differentials between Canada and the United States which impel it, the effect on consumers and the effect on business in this country.

It is unfortunate that he failed to do so. However, it is obvious that his comments, which were within the context of that speech irresponsible, could only be understood if he did not understand what I had said.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, you would obviously be aware that the member who just spoke on an alleged point of order in reference to rule number 44, which does not even apply in this particular case, was trying to find a way to get in the second speech. I hope that you would recognize that because other members would like to speak and make an important contribution to this debate and I happen to be one of them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): No other speaker having risen, the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair availed himself of one of our rules, Standing Order 44, and no one objected. So, the Speaker showed some flexibility in recognizing the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair.

[English]

There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of private members' business— Oh, I apologize, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I indicated when I rose on a point of order that I wanted to speak next.

First of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Dartmouth who effectively made such an important contribution, as he usually does, to this debate tonight. As the consumer critic for the Liberal opposition the member for Dartmouth is very concerned about prices in Canada, as we all should be. However, I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am a little bit concerned about a Royal commission at this time.

I say this because we are having a debate right now in this country as to whether or not we have the money necessary to give a very justified wage increase to our civil servants. We are having some difficulty in finding the funds to do that. We are having a hard time finding the money to participate in social programs and other useful measures. At the same time, I see this request for a Royal commission, and examine its mandate:

> —to examine allegations of excessively high prices of various consumer goods and services in Canada as compared to other jurisdictions—

Who knows that those jurisdictions are.

> —and which would include considerations of such factors as costs generated by distribution mechanisms, excessive mark-ups at various levels, differential pricing, economies of scale, interest rates, and the exchange rate of the dollar.

That is a mandate which would probably be twice as expensive as the Spicer commission on which we spent $27 million we do not have. I say to the hon. member, who I know is listening attentively to this speech, the member for Windsor—St. Clair, who presented this motion to us, that I, as much as everyone else, want consumers to be better protected in Canada.

I have a solution to offer. I think that this is the kind of mandate that our own Standing Committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations could perhaps undertake right here in the House of Commons, but not to spend whatever it would cost, $40 million or $50 million, to look at this thing.

We have stacks and stacks of reports of Royal commissions in this country, some good, some not so good and some totally useless. I say to you that the three Royal commissions that we had going at the time of the deposition of the last estimates, namely the Royal commission on reproductive technology, the Spicer commission for lack of a better name, and the royal commission on reform, between the three of them there is almost $100 million spent. I am very worried about us spending that kind of money at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that what we need in this country is better legislation to protect consumers. We especially need, as legislators, to protect the Canadian consumer. But for goodness' sake, Mr. Speaker, the last thing we need at this time is another Royal commission which will cost us, as I said earlier, God only knows how much. Fifty million dollars or so maybe. All that, of course, to produce a report which will unfortunately end up in file nine. We simply cannot afford such an expense, Mr. Speaker. Its mandate would be much too broad. I would suggest that our colleague withdraw his motion and move instead to refer the matter to the Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, which could examine consumer prices in Canada, maybe comparing them to prices in the United States but certainly not with those in the rest of the world. This would be almost cost neutral. By this I mean that the costs could be borne within existing budgets instead of wasting money on another Royal Commission.

[English]

In closing, I hope that all members will think very seriously about establishing yet another Royal commission. It seems that we hear about Royal commissions every second week in this House and it is, upon occasion, an almost sexy thing to bring up. Well, maybe it is, but I think members will agree with me that it is time we put an end to some of these kinds of expenditures and try to favour some way of helping our constituents at lower costs to Canadians. Probably, because of the influence that we have as members in this House, in which I hope that we do have, that if a committee of this Parliament would look into this issue instead, we would actually have more influence than a Royal commission in any case in terms of getting something adopted by the government to help out the consumers in this country.

In summary, let us narrow the mandate for what is being proposed here. Let us make a reference to a committee instead and let us get away from this business of spending another $50 million or so that we do not even have and that the taxpayers of Canada are tired of seeing us spend their money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): No other member wishes to speak on this issue?

There being no further member rising for debate, the time allocated to consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

RAILWAY ACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-273, an act to amend the Railway Act (Telecommunications).

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to do exactly what Bill C-41, introduced by the government in the last session, would have done and that is assert federal jurisdiction over Crown corporations that operate telecommunications companies.

The government introduced this bill with great fanfare following a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada in, I believe, August 1989, and then abandoned the legislation and let it die on the Order Paper. We frequently suggested that the government follow through with this, but apparently it lacks the backbone. This bill is designed to stiffen its resolve in that regard and place the matter up for discussion once again.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CONVERSION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS INDUSTRY

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-274, an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to assist in the transition from production of nuclear weapons to production for peaceful purposes. It requires a company in nuclear weapons production to establish a committee of management and employees and the community to plan for that transition. It also requires the company to deposit 2.5 per cent of its annual gross revenue into a fund for this purpose and specifically for paying benefits to employees who lose their jobs in the transition.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians from a number of provinces, all calling upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services that were cut on January 15, 1990 and maintain, where appropriate, upgraded remote services on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by residents of Val d'Or, Sullivan, Saint-Eustache, Dubuisson, Malartic, Senneterre and Barraute. During the review of the Canada Labour Code, Parliament is asked to consider the deficiencies of this legislation and recognize the need for including clauses on preventive withdrawal of pregnant employees with full pay.

CANADA POST

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions, first of all from residents of Port Alberni who criticize the unwanted and unfair cutbacks to postal service across the country, including the removing of mail sorting services from the community of Port Alberni against the wishes of residents without offering adequate justification for such a move, resulting in lengthy and unreasonable delays in mail delivery.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to request that the minister responsible for Canada Post authorize the return of mail sorting operations to Port Alberni and other affected communities on Vancouver Island.

Further, the petitioners request that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to halt privatization, cut-backs and centralization of services, and also that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to make efficient service to Canadian households its first priority.

Madam Speaker, I have a second petition from the residents of Ucluelet, also in my riding.

The petitioners call upon the government, whereas the government has cut back millions of dollars to postal services throughout Canada resulting in multimillion dollars loss for B.C. communities, and whereas the consequences of these cuts have been the reduction and erosion of service and the effectiveness of the postal service whereas the results of these cuts has also been the reduction in the number of branch post offices in small and rural communities in British Columbia.

The undersigned petitioners request and call upon Parliament to urge the federal government to restore proper funding to Canada Post so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only viable postal service for all communities across B.C.

We, the undersigned—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is getting to be two speeches from the hon. member, instead of presenting a petition.

Further petitions.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition today on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia who have heard rumours that the government plans to not fund the RCMP properly next year.

The residents are circulating petitions to ensure that it will not renege on support for the RCMP and are simply asking the Parliament of Canada to encourage the government to restore proper funding for the RCMP in the future to enable it to fulfil its mandate that we all know.

MULTINATIONAL RESOURCES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have a petition on another matter which is a very serious issue in British Columbia particularly regarding a company called Multinational Resources.

The petitioners are from Clearwater, Barrier and Vavenby, British Columbia. They point out that a Vancouver firm, apparently with the support of the provincial government, has announced its intention to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby and divert the river through a whole number of channels to San Diego, California.

The petitioners are asking the Government of Canada to speak out that Canada's rivers are not for sale.

AIR SERVICE

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege this morning to present, on behalf of the Finnish community in Thunder Bay, a petition requesting that the direct air link between Canada and Helsinki, Finland be maintained.

As you may not be aware, Madam Speaker, outside of Helsinki, the Finnish community of Thunder Bay is the largest Finnish community in not only Canada, but North America.

Since our direct air link will no longer be effective as of November 1, the petitioners request the members of the government to do something to maintain and retain that air charter between the two countries. It is entirely appropriate, too.

TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, while I have this opportunity, I would like to present another petition on behalf of those in northern Ontario who are forced to pay such high transportation costs. The cost of transportation from northern Ontario to other parts of the country is absolutely beyond reach of most average citizens. The air fares are horrendous. We no longer have VIA Rail. Now the price of gasoline is getting to a point where it is no longer economical for people to go back and forth to work. Therefore, 230 people in my community have requested this government to look at the cost of gasoline in northern Ontario and reduce the taxes accordingly.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have a petition here duly authorized under Standing Order 36 and signed mostly by constituents from the community of Dundurn. They point out that the recent actions by the government have been a direct attack on the rural way of life in Canada and those attacks include cuts to VIA Rail, abandoning the rail lines, neglect of the fishery, the forest, and agriculture, and particularly as far as their community is concerned, the closing of rural post offices. They call upon Parliament and the government to restore funding to VIA Rail and so on, but also to reverse this terrible stand that Canada Post has taken in closing down the rural post offices which are such a centre to rural life.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, in conformity with the rules and regulations of the House of Commons, I have a petition to present from students across Canada. There are over 4,000 signatures on these petitions which refer to the serious cuts that have been transferred to the provinces by the federal government, to the closures of employment centres, and most of all to the 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans. That is the one I referred to yesterday, Madam Speaker, where students have to pay cash up front before they get their loans. It makes a mockery out of competitiveness, the whole idea of a learning culture.

CANADA POST

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I am privileged and pleased to present a petition signed by some 1,100 residents of Gabriola Island, approximately half the adult population. They are complaining that actions of the government are a direct attack on the rural way of life, including cuts to VIA Rail service, abandonment of rail lines, neglect of fisheries, forestry, agriculture, and especially the erosion of rural postal service, particularly the closure of small rural post offices.

They complain that Canada Post Corporation has not even bothered to talk to a single resident about their needs, and they urge, pray, and call upon Parliament to instruct Canada Post to cease its closures and privatization of rural post offices, and to maintain the post office on Gabriola Island.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in view of the desperate financial cash flow crisis facing Canadian grains and oilseeds and horticultural producers in this transitional year to the new safety net programs, this House calls on the government to consider the advisability of providing, this summer, third line of defence cash assistance on an emergency basis so as to provide the same net level of support that would have been provided under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program (GRIP) and the Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA), had they been in place for the 1990-1991 crop year; and

That, in the spirit of House of Commons reform and in recognition of the clear and urgent need, the House does not consider this to be a question of confidence in the government.

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I simply would like to indicate to the House that according to the new practice, our agricultural critic will speak in the first slot of the New Democratic Party during the day. The second slot will be shared by the members for Essex—Windsor and Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, and the third slot will be shared by the members for Regina—Qu'Appelle and Nanaimo—Cowichan.

• (1020)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member and I do understand that the first speaker will be using the full 20 minutes and then the other 20 minutes will be shared. The Chair would appreciate, nevertheless, that the names of the hon. members be given to the Chair in advance. It would make things easier.

The hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Foster: The Official Opposition will be doing the same thing. I will be leading off for our party and taking the full 20 minute period and after that we will be dividing the time with 10 minute periods from our side.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. Debate, the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I think this motion we are putting before the House today may break some new ground in that it is a motion which has activity from all sides of the House, from all parties. The proposal probably originated this summer with a request from the member for Haldimand—Norfolk to the chairman of our agriculture committee, the member for Perth, requesting a meeting on the subject of the farm financial crisis that exists in rural Canada.

Our chairman, who is always forthcoming when it comes to addressing agricultural problems, called a special meeting before the House resumed. We heard from agricultural officials and members of the farm organizational community, and a resolution proposed by the member for Algoma and seconded by the member for Prince Edward—Hastings was put to the group. It was virtually the same as what we have presented to the House this morning. That motion was passed with the unanimous support of all sides of the agriculture committee because of the extreme urgency of the problems that exist right now in rural Canada.

I know that members from across the country will be addressing this problem today and I know that in the 20 minutes which I have it is extremely difficult to outline all of the background of the problem and give an overview for those members of the House and public who perhaps are not as well attuned to the difficulties that have risen in rural Canada. However, I will attempt to provide the genesis of the problems, what has been going on, and what is being proposed by the agriculture committee, the farm community and the population in general.

This particular income shortfall that is hitting rural Canada at the moment, and in fact farmers in a lot of countries, began with the resources boom in the early seventies when energy prices rose four, five, six, seven times; food, forest, fishery products and minerals tended to follow. As a result of increased prices, a lot of countries that had not been exporting food products became exporters in an attempt to gain some dollars through export trade.

In response to this, many governments in the western world responded with a monetary policy that used high interest rates as a means of restricting inflation and placing controls on their own dollars, or whatever their currency denominations are.

The effect of these two things was that prices went up in most countries because of the increased trade and the increased demand for these basic food products. As a result land prices went up a bit and there was a bidding war for the capital, equipment, machinery and so on that farmers used.

On the other side, the government reaction in many countries was to raise interest rates, which meant that the debt the farmers had incurred to recapitalize was costing them far more than they had budgeted for.

A third, and perhaps most important factor, occurred in the early 1980s when it became obvious to some of the so-called larger powers in the world that this was a power struggle of economic importance and of importance to the way they wanted to view themselves in the world order of things. European policies basically set up a restitution fund to handle the problem of low-priced imports coming into a high-cost market. If wheat hit the border of one of the European Economic Community representatives at $4 a bushel but was protected at a level of $8 Canadian, the importer had to contribute to the restitution fund the difference of $4 for every bushel that was imported.

That fund accumulated reasonably large amounts of money which were then used by the community to dispose of any surpluses that were generated from their domestic production.

The United States realized that now that Europe was beginning to produce enough grains and oilseeds to become an exporter, it would have to do something in response to ensure that its position as a dominant exporting power would continue. Therefore, it began to examine ways of ensuring that its farmers were well protected. It increased the subsidization levels internally and lowered the loan rate to farmers which, under stress conditions in the mid-eighties, became the world price.

When the U.S. farmer completes his harvest, he can lock his grain up at the loan rate which is currently just over $2 in Canadian funds, about $2.30 or $2.40. He gets the money. If the market price goes up he can pay off the loan and re-sell the grain at a somewhat higher price. However, under current conditions the internal market price has not been going up. As a result, the U.S. government is stuck with those stocks. It offers them to the international grain trade at the loan rate, or close to the loan rate, which means that all competing countries are going to have to meet a price just over $2 per bushel.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Althouse: It is ironic that if that loan rate was at $4 or $5 a bushel, the Europeans would have a depleted restitution fund because the importers of products from outside Europe would not be contributing to the restitution fund, and there would not be any money to finance the disposal of their surpluses at high subsidized levels. However, we are locked into this political power struggle between the two competing economic power blocs and Canada, Australia, Argentina, and the other traditional world grains and oilseeds traders are caught in the middle. Their producers are being asked to bear the brunt.

What has this meant for farmers and for rural communities and for the Canadian economy? I could provide all the statistics available from Agriculture Canada, the farm organizations and Statistics Canada outlining the billions of dollars of shortfall that have occurred, the billions of dollars of debt that have accumulated. However, because of the shortness of time, I will simply point out some of the things that I see happening around me in my community. I live on a farm in a rural riding and I visit the rural parts of Canada from Atlantic Canada to British Columbia quite often.

I see the same patterns emerging because this war has been going on for six or seven years.

• (1030)

A lot of families, a lot of communities and a lot of provincial economies are getting very war weary. First of all, you see a huge build-up of personal and community debt. You see businesses closing. Sometimes they are being closed because the bank tells them they don't have any credit and sometimes they are being closed because their creditors are tired of carrying them and force them into bankruptcy.

At the family and community level, people are withdrawing from the community. They no longer really communicate with their families. Their troubles are on their minds. They are worried about how they are going to be able to borrow the dollars necessary to pay the debts that have accumulated for that month, or for that season in the farmer's case.

Children sometimes do badly in school. Good students suddenly no longer can carry their class load. Families are breaking up. Businesses are breaking up. Families are leaving the community, sometimes in three or four pieces with the mother going in one direction, the father going in another, the adult or teenage children going someplace else, and the small ones having to decide whether they get taken with their fathers or their mothers.

You see alcohol abuse and worst of all, an all-pervasive sense of failure.

Madam Speaker, that has to be attacked if we are going to have economic recovery in this country and a sense that this country of Canada has a future as a country.

Rural Canadians are resilient people. They come from pioneer stock. They are optimists at heart. They do not mind working hard. They do not mind a few years of hard times if they think there is something at the other end.

The market fundamentals just now in the world for those who look at world trends and understand markets are sending them totally confusing pictures.

For three of the last four years, the world has failed to produce enough grains and oilseeds to feed itself. The carryover from last year was the second or third lowest carryover that we have ever had in history. Yet the price keeps falling because of this stupid competition between the Americans and the Europeans.

The market is not functioning, it cannot function because of political interference by those two large power blocs.

The first few years, all of us said that this would go away, that they could not afford to keep this up forever. They are ruining the whole theory of trade and market economics. In a period of time when we are watching competing ideologies, eventually the market is going to have to be permitted to function.

What we have seen instead is the apparent collapse of the price setting mechanism used in the communist countries, and at the same time, we in rural Canada are living the complete collapse of the market economy that our side was supposed to believe in.

Eventually to the credit of our governments, federal, provincial and local as well as our community groups, have decided to begin to take some action. Many people have been working at this for a decade or more because the whole of the 1980s was faced with the onset of this problem.

In the past year, beginning a bit over a year ago, farm groups and the governments, federal and provincial, worked out a series of safety net proposals which we know by the acronyms GRIP and NISA. They have been discussed in this House, so I do not think I have to explain what they are to the crowd which is here this morning.

Those programs were in place at the beginning of this crop year which began August 1, 1991. In the euphoria of looking to the future and preparing future programs, one of the side effects has been that the crop year 1990–91, which ended on July 31, has tended to be forgotten.

There is a net income shortfall of something over $1 billion at the present time. That income shortfall has meant, according to witnesses we had before the agriculture committee, that net farm incomes in the grains and oilseeds sector will be something under $6,500 per farm family in that crop year. There were some areas and some farms that had a more positive income, but that is the average. And when you look at a range of poverty levels running from about $18,000 to $22,000, depending on the number of children in a family and the region the family lives in, that is a devastatingly depressing statistic, Madam Speaker.

The agriculture committee was attempting to have a new focus on the third line of defence with their motion that is now before us here today. The third line of defence was what was being discussed as a last option, a last measure, an emergency measure almost, when the effects of normal government programs do not work in providing incomes to rural communities.

We think that is the case in 1990–91, that a special measure has to be introduced for that crop year. There has been some talk and some action along those lines, but the committee is aware that the announcements up to this point simply deal with ameliorating programs that had to be announced last spring. I speak specifically of the program to reduce the GRIP premiums and to provide a NISA payment for the year just past. The NISA payment is appreciated, the reduction in the GRIP premiums is appreciated, but from the farmers' point of view that reduction in the GRIP premium was simply a reduction to an expense that they had not budgeted for.

GRIP premiums will make up between 10 or 15 per cent additional costs per acre for most farmers in the season just completed. There will be no advantage from those payments until the following year—which is sort of normal in agricultural circles—but it is an expense that is tied to that tax year and that calendar year and that is the tax year and the calendar year that is already, as I have pointed out, short more than a billion dollars.

It is that gap that I and my colleagues from the agriculture committee and from my party are urging the House today to address, to have the government address that income gap before it becomes ancient history and the trail gets too cold. The farm communities and those rural towns and villages are hurting so much that they cannot drag an additional billion dollars plus of debt into the coming crop year. Things are not going to be that good financially, given the current set of projections that they can add even further debt loads to the small business community and to the farmers.

I hear from my friends and neighbours in the small business community terrible horror stories of relatively small businesses being left with outstanding accounts of $100,000, $200,000, $300,000 which they see no prospects of collecting. They carry them on the books so they can keep the bankers satisfied that they are still running a viable business, can keep their credit rating, and can keep the doors open. In this way, they do not have to abandon their house and take their kids to some other part of the country for education. But the prospects are not good.

I think that in keeping with the new sense of co-operation that has been suggested should occur in this Chamber, that is expected from our constituents and from Canada, that passage of this motion will set an example of the co-operation that can exist to help take the country toward recovery. We recognize at the agriculture committee level and in our party that recovery cannot come about if rural areas are left destitute. This motion is urging the government to take some action so that that destitution is addressed.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I noted with interest some of the comments of the previous speaker. I would like to ask him a question. Unfortunately, we now have an NDP government in the province of Ontario. Farmers in the province of Ontario are going through a very tough time this year as well. The minister in Ontario has had the opportunity to take part in the NISA program, which is one way farmers can get some assistance, albeit it is not all that should come forward and all that is needed.

To date the minister in Ontario and the Government of Ontario has failed to participate in that program to the extent that they had. For a very small investment by the Government of Ontario, they could assist Ontario farmers in obtaining tremendous numbers of dollars to help see them through.

I just wonder if the hon. member would care to address why he thinks that the Ontario government is not as supportive of Ontario farmers as it could be, and should be, and needs to be.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I cannot speak for the Government of Ontario but I would observe that the difference being discussed here is that $100,000 worth of farm sales would amount to about $500 of assistance. Five hundred dollars is not a huge amount.

What the Ontario minister seems to be attempting to do is get the debate shifted to a more major kind of general support. Instead he had already committed a certain amount of funds to debt reduction and managing of debt for those people who were having some problems financing and continuing in business for the year. He thought that was more urgent at the time of the budget and that money has been expended.

I think that province, as all of the other provinces, is open to other suggestions. Ontario, and indeed all of the provinces, continue to make the point that the main hurt in this grain war has been as a result of external factors, international trade, questions of monetary policy, all of which are completely within federal jurisdiction. They are saying that their moneys are supposed to be spent for production programs and they have diverted their funds to managing to get another crop in to support the financing of the coming year's crop.

There is still an argument ongoing among a lot of the provinces with the federal government as to just whose responsibility it is. I think that is still going on and that this motion will help bring everyone back to the table to once again do something about addressing the tremendous net income shortfall that exists.

Perhaps $300 to $500 per farm would certainly be appreciated. The issue is much larger than that when you are looking at average incomes for families in the $20,000 range, and there are farm incomes just over $6,000. We have to use a much larger club than just the $200 or $300 response.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the hon. member for Mackenzie. I applaud him for putting down this motion today because it is essentially the unanimous resolution that was put in the agriculture committee. He is in a position, because of his tremendous influence with the premier of Ontario and the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario to really pressure them for action.

What we are talking about here today is the third line of defence or emergency aid to compensate farmers for the extremely low farm incomes during the 1990–91 crop year. I know that we will have marvellous speeches from the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds to explain how there will be interim payments under GRIP and all of those things with names like FSAM and so on. The bottom line is how much funding is going to be provided as emergency compensation for the shortfall in incomes during 1990–91. Those shortfalls are to be shared by the federal and provincial government, whatever the arrangement may be.

The federal government has put forward a program under NISA which would provide cash assistance relating to the 1990–91 crop year. It is my understanding that if the Ontario government would opt into that program, it would require a commitment of between $8 million and $10 million dollars for the province of Ontario, which does not sound like too much, looking at the magnitude of the problem out there. For that kind of a commitment by the province of Ontario, there would be some $24 million to $25 million available to Ontario farmers, grains and oilseeds producers, for corn, wheat, soybeans and other crops.

There is an existing mechanism. What they have to do is opt into that 1990 crop year and give their contribution, which I believe works out to .5 or 1 per cent. The figures are there. It is a pretty significant contribution.

Another area where I think it is very important for the hon. member to try to use his influence with Mr. Buchanan, the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, is for special funding under the crop insurance mechanism. They have not calculated the total amount there but clearly, five counties in southwestern Ontario, especially Essex, Kent, Middlesex and Elgin and I believe one other, have suffered terribly. There is a need for special mechanisms under emergency funding or crop insurance.

I would ask if the member would try to use his influence to pry loose those extra funds.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I am aware of the problems in that area of Ontario. I was there a couple of weeks ago and I am going back this weekend. I should remind the member that when there are drought zones of that magnitude, the crop insurance program under the existing federal–provincial arrangements functions as it has in the past. The federal government has on a number of occasions provided assistance whereby they have ignored losses from the previous year so that the coverage levels stay the same. They do not lose the step of coverage which is built into the program, which the member will understand. I expect that since it is a long–standing program, it will come into place.

My experience in having gone through that several times in corners of Saskatchewan, that I do not reside in, is that generally, later on in the year you will see such an announcement. It will be in place for the use of the farmers some months down the road.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I think that this is an extremely important debate that is before the House because we are faced with a very critical time in Canadian agriculture this fall. I think that the motion today follows a motion which was put in the agriculture committee and was adopted unanimously.

The important part about this resolution today is that the member for Mackenzie has suggested that this is not a motion of lack of confidence in the government. I am sure that he did it deliberately because I do not think the people out there, especially in the farming community, exactly understand what goes on in Parliament. Maybe we raised their expectations too high because we passed a unanimous resolution in committee calling for special emergency assistance for compensation for the 1990–91 crop year.

Every time the agriculture committee passes a resolution it does not mean that the House of Commons, and most importantly the government, immediately responds. If this resolution were to be carried today, then I think that the government would be honour–bound to implement it in a fair way. It has a certain mechanism in it describing what amount of assistance is necessary, on the basis of the understanding that members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture had. So it is very important that it be done in a fair and honest way. If this recommendation and proposal to provide a net amount that would be available under the GRIP and NISA system had been in place for the 1990–91 crop year, those amounts of funds would be provided.

I know that there are debates going on between the government's minions and the agriculture community, arguing those figures and that, in my view, is really unseemly because of the desperate situation.

It seems to me that the motion that is before us today is about two or three things. It is really about human disaster in thousands and thousands of farming communities across Canada for hundreds of thousands of farm families. It is about a government's commitment and a government's word. It is about a trade war that has been going on in grain for the last four or five years. Most of all, it is about the government's response to that disaster, the government's commitment, whether it is going to honour its word and whether it is going to really move into a new era of support in an honourable and a clean way for that trade war. That is what this debate is all about. I want to talk about that today.

The human disaster affects literally thousands of farm families. I think that most of us who are from rural areas have talked to those people: people who do not have enough money to put food on the table; people who have diesel bills from last spring that they have not paid; people whose farm taxes are two or three years behind; people who simply cannot meet their debts. Something happened on August 1. The value of a bushel of wheat suddenly went from around $3 or $4 a bushel down to a couple of dollars a bushel. This was brought home to us very forcefully by Earl Geddes, president of the Keystone Agriculture Producers, when he was speaking before the agriculture committee on August 29. He pointed out that the value of his inventory in the bin that week had suddenly been devalued by 30 per cent. He also pointed out that the average amount of debt from the cash flow enhancement program was $9,000 for every farmer in Manitoba. Suddenly he is paying off those debts with grain worth $2 a bushel rather than with grain worth over $3 a bushel. The manifestation of that is springing up in communities across Canada.

Five farmers were sitting down having coffee in Lucknow or in that area of southwestern Ontario a few weeks ago and said: "We are in a terrible position. We cannot meet our debts. We did not get the special assistance from the last crop year. What are we going to do?" They said: "Let's each go out and get five other farmers and try to have a meeting and talk about this". They did. However, instead of having 25 people out for the meeting, they had 80 people. They said: "Gee, maybe we should have a rally to talk about this and to express to the Government of Ontario and the present Government of Canada how serious the cash flow problem is". So they did and a couple of weeks later they had over a thousand farmers out in Lucknow for a meeting.

Interestingly enough, I have talked to several of the farmers who attended. Something like 856 of them signed a petition saying that if the government does not act by the first of October there is going to be very dire consequences. They are talking about withholding their federal and provincial taxes. They are talking about more rallies. They are talking about the desperate situation in which Canadian farmers find themselves today.

It is not as if that is an isolated case. There have been similar meetings in Miami, Manitoba and in Russell, Manitoba. There is another rally planned for tomorrow in Brandon and another for early October in Winnipeg. Other rallies are springing up.

This is not all that surprising. Every farm group—and the chairman of the agriculture committee will confirm this—that came before the agriculture committee last February, March and April when that legislation was before the House indicated that they generally supported it. They had amendments and proposals, but generally they supported it as a new departure for safety net programs. But there is a problem. The value of a crop in 1990 dropped dramatically. At the same time that wheat was going from $135 a tonne to $90 a tonne on the world market, the government support programs dropped equally. They dropped by a billion dollars in western Canada and $300 million in eastern Canada.

We cannot sustain two drops like that without having dire consequences for every group. They told us that they supported the legislation but there had to be a third line of defence or special assistance for the 1990–1991 crop year.

The problem is that that assistance did not materialize. The government put out a program on April 18 called FSAM, Farm Support and Adjustment Measures. Farmers call it the federal smoke and mirrors program because much of it was to pay premiums for both the province and federal government and reduce premiums for farmers for these programs.

Some of it was to extend existing programs for cash flow enhancement and so on.

There is only one part that is considered, and that is a NISA program. That is the one that the Ontario government has not opted into for that year. It supposedly will provide some $337 million, according to the minister's statements this week.

That is the problem today, that these farmers entered into an agreement. They took out premiums in a long-term safety net program. The government did not meet its commitment to providing assistance for that shortfall in the past crop year.

That is what the rallies are all about and that is what the rallies will continue to be about. There will be rallies across this country until the government moves. I personally hope that the government will move before there are violent confrontations or other actions which are totally destructive and harmful.

Therefore, the issue here today is really about a promise made. I recall those great lines of Robert W. Service: "A promise made is a debt unpaid and the north has its own stern code" .

I believe if the government does not meet the commitment it made to Canadian farmers last spring, the north will have its own stern code. It is up to the government to provide the special financial assistance. It is not all the federal government; it is clearly a responsibility of provincial governments.

There have been various mechanisms suggested. A few days after our agriculture committee meeting in which we said that there had to be special financial assistance over and above the GRIP program, the minister's own advisory committee met in Winnipeg. It put forward a proposal saying there had to be special funding, that it did not want to destroy the GRIP, and that it wanted to have that special financial assistance provided now.

The assistance that is going to be provided in this coming crop year can be done under GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, rather than for this coming year.

One of the proposals it suggested, the third line of defence committee in Winnipeg, was in terms of the NISA program, the Net Income Stabilization Account program which was being used, that the provinces could opt in fully for 1990–91 and that program could be doubled. That would be a mechanism. It suggested that since the mechanism was in place, they should do that.

I have already suggested to the hon. member for Mackenzie that in the Ontario region it is essential that Ontario come forward. One mechanism it can do to help in that situation would be to opt in to the NISA program.

The Ontario Federation of Agriculture and four other farm groups in Ontario held a press conference yesterday. They talked about "no support, no farmers, no food". This is the logo of those five groups. They see the shortfall over and above what has been proposed under NISA as $124 million. They talk about the dire consequences if this shortfall is not met by government. They talk about having to get this situation fixed quickly and the effect on farm losses being felt right across the province. There are a lot of individuals and businesses that make a living from agriculture and the food sector and their livelihood is also at stake.

This is more than fulfilling a commitment for the 1990–91 crop year. Clearly, the issue is spelled out. The need is really desperate.

It is interesting that not only have government members supported the resolution, but they have spoken out about the dire consequences of lack of action this fall on this special funding.

The Minister of Agriculture, in his responses in the House on Monday of this week, used the old smoke and mirrors approach by saying: "We do not want to talk about this whole business of shortfall, the third line of defence and all that. We are going to be making an interim payment under GRIP", much of which will be used up by the premiums that the farmers have to pay.

The figure he quoted was $406 million. It is interesting that that is in the same ballpark as the $350 million premium that farmers will have to pay under the GRIP program.

I think it is important to remember that the need for GRIP, NISA and third line of defence really comes from the international trade war. We have never seen anything like it. Grain and wheat are at $2 a bushel. In real terms, they tell me that it is lower than it was in the 1930s. It just calls attention to the international trade war where some 300 billion in American dollars are being wagered or fought back and forth. It is probably one of the most expensive and most damaging trade wars in history.

Of course it is only one-third of the trillion dollars that is spent on arms, but for Canadian farmers it is a total disaster. They cannot meet their bills with $2 wheat in 1991.

We are hoping the talks at GATT will be successful this fall. I understand they are going into the final round in the next two or three months. The success there is absolutely essential because the United States, through its export enhancement program, is going to up the ante. It has moved from $600 million to some $900 million this summer and this fall for driving down the price of grain, oilseeds and other farm commodities.

Next March that goes up to $1.2 billion. Clearly it is going to escalate. As far as we know right now, the need for GRIP payments in the 1992 calendar year will be essential. If they are used through interim payments of the Gross Revenue Insurance Program to solve the shortfall and farm income, the cutbacks that the government implemented last year, clearly farmers are going to be in the worst possible situation next year, because of the funding that should be provided under that program is not going to be adequate.

It seems to me that the question here today is most of all: is the Government of Canada going to take its responsibility? How will it respond? Will it respond now in a fair and just way for the cutbacks it made in 1990–91 crop year? Will it be dragged, kicking and screaming, after thousands of farmers have rallied all fall in communities like Lucknow, Miami and Battleford, Russell, Brandon, and Winnipeg, Manitoba, and the Lord only knows how many other places in Ontario? Will it respond now in a timely manner for the shortfall that they suffered?

After all, the government has brought in a program where it is going to be putting up something like only 42 per cent of the premium under GRIP. It has offloaded drastically its support. It is 35 per cent to farmers, 25 per cent to provincial governments. The need is for transitional funding for the 1990–91 crop year.

When the minister for grains and oilseeds responds today to the unanimous resolution of the House of Commons, I hope he will respond in a full and forthright way. Otherwise, there is going to be chaos, disaster and personal hardship for hundreds of thousands of farmers across this country.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Algoma to comment on one dimension of the farm crisis. The agricultural community is now facing the loss of its best farmers.

The hon. member for Mackenzie mentioned in his speech a few minutes ago that this pernicious trade war has been going on for a number of years. It is not new. It has been going on now for about six or seven years. In that time it has had devastating effects on the agricultural community.

I understand that in the province of Saskatchewan alone two families a day are leaving farms. According to my calculation, over 3,000 families have left Saskatchewan farms in the last five years. Perhaps some of those were marginal operations. Perhaps a few of those were not the best farmers in the world. My understanding is that the situation is now so serious that some of our best farmers are teetering on the brink of bankruptcy. If something is not done very soon we will lose our very best farmers.

I would like the hon. member for Algoma to comment on that if he could.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I think the question the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James has posed is a very serious one. In fact, a great many of our farmers are part-time farmers. They not only have their farm income but their spouse works off the farm, and often they too work off the farm.

I was at a meeting just last Friday with a group of farmers. The argument that one put to me was: "I have a very good operation. I run a very efficient operation. My wife works off the farm. She brings in a pretty good income. I have been working off the farm because I have been having trouble making a go of it. We are still going backwards with two of us working off the farm and doing the cropping and seeding in the time that we are not working. We are still going backwards".

I think that is the argument. That is what those farmers were saying. Just three weeks ago the hon. member and I met with a group of farmers in Portage in Manitoba. The same argument was made. A woman there spoke for herself and her husband: "We are very good farmers. We are very efficient. We have not bought any significant new machinery in eight years. Yet we are going backwards. We are just grinding away at our equity".

That is the key point. People want a signal. There should have been a hiatus last spring when we were moving away from an old system of safety nets to a new system that required farmers to make a larger contribution, that required provinces to make a larger contribution. By its very nature the federal government was reducing its requirement. Yet we did not get a clean launch on the system because the federal government and the provincial governments did not provide the transitional funding.

It was laid out very clearly before the agriculture committee. The Ontario Commodity Council, which represents a broad range of producers, said: "For the shortfall we need at least $200 million", and things have gone badly since then. Crop prices have gone down. Western Prairie Pools Inc., all those groups from the west, Keystone, NFU and other groups were saying there is a shortfall of at least $1 billion. They are saying: "Provide us with the net difference". Unless we have that kind of assistance and have it quick and clean, the government's credibility and the government's support program, the GRIP program, is going to founder. As well, thousands of farmers are going to founder because they did not get that compensation, that transitional adjustment, for the 1990–91 crop year.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would just like to back up and support a couple of things mentioned by my colleague from Algoma. I would just like to emphasize to the House and to all who are watching today what is really happening out there. I have farmed all my life, though I have not farmed as actively during the last two or three years. I am absolutely astounded at the number of farm suppliers and people who do business in the agricultural community who are coming to me and phoning me and commenting about the level of their outstanding accounts at this time of year.

Farm fertilizer and farm supply people are saying that they are more than double what they were a year ago, and farmers know that the crops they have are worthless and they are not going to be able to pay those bills. Farm fuel suppliers are saying accounts receivable are an astronomical percentage. Bankers are already saying that if farmers do not roll and pay off their operating loans completely at the end of the year, whatever they carry into the next year will just be taken off of next year's operating loans. No business can go on like that. It is tearing the whole agri-food industry apart.

Farmers and the whole industry are disappointed. They were told they were going to have support during the transition from the old ad hoc system of support for agriculture to the new safety net program system. Everybody was led to believe and told that: "If you will help us get that together, we will not see you go down during that transitional period". That has not taken place. Quite frankly, no one can say that it has taken place.

One can throw around the figures of what the new program is going to do. However, I would just ask my colleague if he could briefly comment on the following question. There is talk of an interim payment on the GRIP program, which many of us supported. We may have some questions about it, but it is there. However, if we are going to put an interim payment of GRIP into place in October or November, is that not taking from what should be next year's pay cheque for this year? Is that solving the problem we have today, or are we just putting it off and hoping and praying that someone from on high will create a different situation next year?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Madam Speaker, I concur with the two previous speakers that this is a serious time for Canadian farmers. About half of the production annually of Canadian farmers is in the grain and oilseeds sector, and it is experiencing the worst prices, I would suggest, ever in the history of that sector of Canadian agriculture.

The prices that are prevailing on the world markets today are roughly the same as the prices that farmers received 20 years ago for their product. The farmer hauling wheat into an elevator in western Canada, for that matter in Ontario or any place else—Prince Edward Island produces wheat and wheat is produced from coast to coast in this country—is getting in the neighbourhood of $2 a bushel, and in some cases it is less. That compares to the full realized price for wheat in 1971 of $2.15 a bushel. Simply what is happening is that farmers are being asked to live on the same kind of income that they had in 1971.

I want to suggest that for a consumer or a taxpayer to put that into perspective, just think of where any of us would be if we were going to have to meet today's expenses of living, supporting a family, running a business and doing whatever on the same kind of income that we had in 1971. None of us would last very long and, quite simply, that is the situation that faces a big part of Canadian agriculture.

The other side of it is that when you look at it, and it has been stated here by the hon. member who just spoke, Canadian agriculture is pretty good at what they do. We produce a good quality product and, by and large—and I will speak as a farmer because I still farm—we are not bad at what we do. We get up in the morning and if you look around the country this year, and there are some exceptions because there has been some drought in some areas and some pretty severe drought especially in parts of Ontario, the fields are clean, the crop is off, the fall work is done to the extent that it is going to be done, We run a pretty good show, but when international prices are where they are, it does not matter how good you are, the competition we are up against has nothing to do with how efficient you can produce. The competition we are up against is run by countries and people with larger treasuries. That is what is very difficult to accept.

Just to make the point further, the Canadian Grains Commission, which is an institution in Canada that has been here since the early part of the century and is responsible for weighing, grading and seeing that the quality of crop we produce is handled after we produce it, estimates this year that this is probably going to be the best quality crop that we have ever harvested.

So we have got a situation where farmers are good at what they do. They have produced probably the best crop on record and yet prices are as low as they have ever been, I would suggest, and even lower than they were in the 1930s. I can give numbers that would suggest that in relative terms, and if you want to compare dollars in 1930 to dollars today, prices today are worse than they were in the 1930s.

Then you ask: "Why is that the case? Is the world awash in wheat? Is there no more need for additional food?" When you look at that side of it, it is even more puzzling because the world is going to produce somewhere between 30 and 40 million tonnes less wheat this year than last year. Our production is going to be down to something like 550 million tonnes of wheat nationally from 590-some tonnes a year ago. There are obviously more people around now than there were a year ago to be fed, so you ask: "Why are prices not going up instead of down?"

Quite simply, the situation that we are in makes no sense. We need more food because we have more people to feed. We produced less this year than last year. Our farmers are good at what they do and yet the prices are as low as they have ever been.

Quite simply, in my view, by far the majority of the problem rests with the European Community. It has since the start of its common agricultural policy, had some very high support prices. We do not object to the community paying farmers high prices, or however you want to talk about them, but high relative to the prices our farmers receive. We understand that Europe wants to produce food so that it can no longer worry about going hungry which it did right after the Second World War. But when those very high prices they paid caused large increases in production and those increases in production resulted in the European Community not only being self sufficient, but now being the second largest exporter of wheat in the world, then in my mind that is where, by far, the biggest part of the problem is and I think that is what we have to address to really solve this problem.

Just to tell you how critical the situation is, a European farmer producing Durum wheat—the wheat we use in pasta products such as noodles, spaghetti and lasagna, those kinds of things—this year is being paid $355 a tonne. Compare that to Canadian farmers who are coming out an elevator in southern Saskatchewan and getting something like $70 a tonne. If you compare that number to $355 a tonne, you can see the kind of problem we face.

On top of that very high price, there are what the Europeans refer to as disadvantaged regions in Europe that are receiving an additional, we have estimated, $111 an acre subsidy. That subsidy in addition to the very high price they receive has resulted in a dramatic increase in Durum production in Europe this year. Something like one third more Durum is going to be produced this year in Europe than last year. Where does it go? It is going to have to go on the export market. The export market is very thin, to use the jargon of the trade. There is not a lot of Durum wheat exported, only about 5 million tonnes annually in the world.

This year the Europeans, as a result of those very high prices and that per acre subsidy, are going to produce an additional 2.5 million tonnes to be put on the world market when the world market only absorbs about 5 million tonnes each year. The result, very high export subsidies that Europe pays when they export into markets that Canadian farmers compete in.

Quite simply, if our farmers are getting $70 a tonne and the European farmer is getting $355 a tonne in addition to a per acre subsidy, they have to export and we have to export. When we go to sell you can see the kind of subsidy that is going to be associated with that export sale from Europe. It is probably $250 or more dollars a tonne. This is absolutely outrageous. That is the problem we face.

Not only are they surplus in Durum, but the Europeans recently made a sale to China. The selling price was something like $85 a tonne Canadian. We estimate that the subsidy that went with that export sale was somewhere between $190 and $200 a tonne. Compare that to what our farmers are getting and you can see the kind of problem we face.

What we have is a situation where the Europeans believe, for some reason, that they can dump in third markets. Nobody agrees with dumping, which is selling in an export market below the price you sell in your own market. Nobody agrees with that. The Europeans do not agree with that. They take every opportunity they can to assail the Japanese or the Americans, or the Canadians for that matter, when they suspect that we are dumping in their market. Yet, when it comes to third markets, for some reason they think they have a God-given right to continue to do that.

That is what the GATT Round is all about. We absolutely have to address what is going on in these kinds of situations at the GATT Round that is as present still under way.

What the Europeans have done, with these large internal support payments to their farmers is increase their production dramatically so that they now are the second largest exporter—I am not only talking about grain and oilseeds—of sugar in the world, after Cuba. They account, I believe, for over half the exportable products on the dairy side. They are surplus in beef. They are surplus in pork. They are surplus, as I have said, in Durum and milling wheat. They have done this to totally distort world markets in agricultural trade and hence the situation we find here.

The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James and I were at a meeting in southern Manitoba, a week ago today as a matter of fact, and there were somewhere around 1,200 farmers there. The farmer is virtually—I use the word "afraid"—he is scared because he does not know what is going to happen. Nobody can survive for very long on $2 wheat. As I said it is the same price they were receiving 20 years ago for the product they produce. None of us could live today on the kind of salary that we made 20 years ago to bring it forward and have to meet today's expenses. That is the situation that is out there. What do we do about it? I have several suggestions.

First of all, in response to the member for Algoma when he made the point that if we pass this motion—and I want to conclude and say a few things about the way this motion is worded—I do not think that members should in any way, and I think he said, be honour bound to do what is suggested in the motion.

We have accepted our responsibility on behalf of Canadian farmers in the past and we have every intention of doing as much as we possibly can to keep our farmers in business in the future. Regardless of whether this is a motion that is passed or defeated as far as the opposition is concerned, I think our record speaks pretty loud in terms of the kind of support that we have for our farmers.

There are several things we can do. I understand the concern about the amount of money that should be there to meet the difference if GRIP and NISA had been in place for the previous crop year. I want to suggest that if in fact we were staring $5 wheat in the face and whatever that means in terms of corn prices or canola prices or soybean prices, I am just using $2 wheat as a means of pointing out how bad it is across the sector, I do not think there would be nearly the concern about last year's lack of income. Again, I think we had better be pretty careful about tying it to what GRIP and NISA would have kicked out a year ago because the Department of Agriculture has done some numbers to show that GRIP and NISA would likely have put out less money for the 1990-91 crop year than was presently available under several programs that were there. I do not think that is the point.

I think the point is that there is real concern in the farm community that with these kinds of prices if they prevail very long, there are not going to be very many farmers around. I for one am concerned that if farmers are staring at the same kind of prices in the face when they go to the field next spring as they are now, what is likely to happen. It is my view that we are going to see a big number of acres not seeded at all. That, in my view, would be a big tragedy, not only for the way we use our land, but for the whole infrastructure that is there.

I have numbers here to show that the number of farm machinery dealers is down dramatically, depending on the part of the country you come from. It is down probably as much as 25 per cent right across the country. The whole infrastructure gets to be questionable as to how long it can survive. If you start losing that, then no matter how quickly grain prices come back, it is going to take a period of time to get some of those farm dealerships, fertilizer people, the farm chemical people and all those people back into business.

In the meantime, I think we have to do everything in our power to point out to the Europeans that what they are doing is totally unacceptable. In many ways it is like an invisible invasion on us. They have destroyed our markets internationally and we are suffering the consequences at home. The evidence of it was there at the meeting we were at last Thursday in Miami. The evidence of it is here in the kind of debate we are having in the House today. What they are doing is totally, totally unfair.

Their tariffs are away out of whack. For instance, when we buy automobiles from Europe, the tariff coming in is 9.2 per cent. When we send automobiles to Europe, the tariff is 29 per cent. What I find even more despicable—and I could use stronger language, but it literally is despicable—when we send our wheat to Europe the tariff in some cases is as high as 200 per cent. How can that be fair?

We produce a high quality product as far as wheat is concerned. When we send it to Europe, the tariff, because of their variable import levies, runs as high as 200 per cent. When we buy cars from them—they make good cars, we are not saying they do not—the tariff is 9.2 per cent. When we look at the balance of trade, the balance of trade is in their favour. The European Community, the 12 countries, run a balance of trade surplus with Canada that has been running $3.5 billion or in that neighbourhood.

The tariffs are decidedly in their favour and the balance of trade is decidedly in their favour. Yet when we go to compete with them, we find it very difficult because of their size. We have to do everything we can to let the Europeans know that this cannot continue. We have been doing this at the GATT negotiations. We walked away from the table when we were in Montreal two and a half years ago because they refused to deal adequately with agriculture. We did the same thing last fall in Brussels and said that: "Unless you are prepared to do something substantial on agriculture that is going to stop driving our farmers out of business, we have no intention of doing anything on the other areas that Europe wants to be dealt with in this GATT round".

Germany is an example. I do not understand Germany. By its own admission in conversations, 1 per cent of the German economy is agriculture. It is 1 per cent. There are ways in which it could support its farmers with the same monetary value, the same amount of money, without tying it to increased production.

At the same time, Germany now is the largest exporter in the world, both in percentage terms of its economy and in dollar terms as far as absolute amount. The Germans, of all people, with 1 per cent of its economy dependent on agriculture, should realize that unless it is prepared to address some very reasonable requests by the rest of the world—I do not have time to get into what is happening in the Third World—are going to find that the rest of the world is not going to give access to Germans for some of the manufactured goods it produces. Its common agriculture policy is damaging its environment.

For instance, I have figures to show that Holland uses somewhere between 25 and 30 times as much nitrogen fertilizer as we do in Canada. It has problems with its groundwater damaging its environment. Its common agriculture policy makes no sense, whether it is on the environmental side or the economic side.

As far as the Third World is concerned, the IMF for instance estimates that if you deal properly with agricultural trade in this GATT round, that you would increase the amount of earnings of Third World countries by as much as $50 billion U.S. annually. Surely that should account for something.

We face a very, very large problem in this sector of the Canadian economy, not because we are bad at what we do. We are good at what we do. We have to address it, and we have to do everything we can at the GATT. In the meantime, we are going to do everything that we possibly can to keep our farmers in business until we get a solution at the GATT.

Again, I think we have a very good chance of doing something at GATT this time around so that we can finally get some rules in place for Canadian agriculture that treat agriculture in the same way that other commodities are treated.

We understand the problem. Our record is there to show what we have done. Our record is there to show what we have been able to do in terms of putting pressure on internationally, and we are prepared to continue to do that.

I want to take a couple of minutes if I can on the motion. Nobody can disagree with the import or the content of the motion "to consider the advisability of providing third line of defence cash assistance on an emergency basis to provide the same level of support that would have been provided under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program", et cetera.

I think we have to be careful on the numbers, because we want to stick strictly with the numbers. I can demonstrate that that same kind of support is there, but I do not think that is the issue. Farmers are concerned about cash, so nobody can find much difficulty with considering that kind of thing.

As I have already said, we are prepared to do as much as we possibly can. What I do have difficulty with is the last two lines of the motion I have in front of me: "in the spirit of Commons reform and in recognition of the clear and urgent need, the House does not consider this to be a question of confidence in the government."

The hon. member should know that this is not the case. He should know, if he wanted to speak to his House leader, that this is the kind of reform that is under consideration. If we were to vote for this motion because of the way the rules are in the House, because this is a supply day and because it is a surrogate motion if you will, on the budget, we are voting against our own budget.

If the hon. member wants to do this kind of thing, I would put a lot more stock in what he is saying. He could have phoned me up an offer or whatever for a kind of bi-partisan—if that is the right word—or all-party support. I have had some of those calls from the Official Opposition.

When he comes with this kind of a motion, I have to think that he is trying to play politics with Canadian farmers. As a farmer himself, he knows there is a desperate situation out there. Farmers do not need this.

To suggest that "in recognition of the clear and urgent need", the House does not consider this to be a question of confidence simply is not the case because this is an Opposition Day. This is a supply day. It is really a motion that is attached to the budget.

I suspect there is a lot of sympathy for the concern that is expressed in the main body of the motion.

To attach that on at the end really does not do any good in terms of sending out the right kind of signal from this place, which is that we understand the concerns of our farmers and that we are going to do everything we can to support them through this difficulty. I believe we will get through it, and I believe we are going to see improved grain prices.

In the meantime, as I said, and just to say again, we are going to do as much as we possibly can to see that our farmers get through this difficulty so that when we get better international prices and we can have some sanity in the European community—and I did not talk about the Americans or the Japanese, which I very much could—that we are going to have our farmers out there to take advantage of some of these better prices.

Again, I wish the NDP would stop trying to play politics in a very, very difficult situation out there with our Canadian farmers.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. Near the end of his remarks, the minister did raise something which I think is a point of order. As you know, being Speaker of the House, the whole motion itself ploughs new ground in terms of procedures in this House. The committee passed this motion, which under normal circumstances and under normal times would probably not have been considered a proper motion.

It is offered as an all-party proposal. It was discussed as such in the agriculture committee. These types of initiatives have been discussed as long ago as during the McGrath commission report and was in fact a part of the recommendations from that report which have not yet been enacted or taken up.

I think the fact that all three parties saw fit in this case to take up the suggestion of McGrath, and to blink their eyes at the existing rules to permit this kind of wording to pass the committee and be submitted again to the House, and because it had passed the committee the House accepted it, that the minister should be aware that this was an all-party proposal from a very important committee and that we had discussed it informally yesterday.

This proposal had the added words to make it very clear that it was not the purpose of the committee or any members of the committee or any of the members or parties in the House that this should be an embarrassment to the government. What it should be is simply a reflection of, first, what the Standing Committee on Agriculture thought was a clear statement of what we thought. We are referring it today, which is the first opportunity we can find under the existing rules to bring it before the House so that the whole House may have an opportunity to discuss the issue as well.

I would hope that the minister and his cabinet colleagues would accept it as that. It is nothing more devious or less than simply an attempt to have the issue discussed in the broadest way possible, and in the full knowledge of the House and the public who watch the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will, of course, listen to the hon. minister and I will also listen to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan or to any representative of the other party as well.

I have been listening very carefully to the hon. member for Mackenzie. I do understand very well what he is saying and what he means, but my problem is one of procedure. In matters of procedure, I cannot take this really as a point of order because there are none of our rules that mention what the hon. member was saying. In practice, there is some kind of a convention in this House that the government does decide on occasion what the government will consider or not, a confidence motion.

Strictly speaking, I am in a difficult position as far as procedure is concerned. I will listen to the hon. minister and will listen if someone else wants to be heard, but I think we should be careful. The Chair cannot let this go on very long because it is not really a point of order.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the member for Mackenzie said. Again, I am not in any way talking about the substance, the main body of the motion. I read some of the transcript from the agriculture committee, of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, the chairman, both members of the government. There was a unanimous vote and I think that some of the farmers I spoke to who were there appreciated very much the way it was approached, and I think we have had quite a good discussion here this morning.

That is not what I am speaking about, Madam Speaker. What I am suggesting is that the hon. member should know and he should check with his House leader that by definition a supply day, as part of the budget, which goes back to King John at Runnymede, by definition is a vote of confidence. So no matter how you couch it, and no matter how cute you want to be with the wording, if the government votes for this motion they are voting to defeat itself.

The message I want to leave to Canadian farmers, who we are talking about here and who we want to reassure, that by the government voting against this motion, which we have to do by convention—and if we could get together and get our rules sorted out so we don't have to do some of these arcane things, it would be better for everybody. But, in the meantime, I want to suggest to the hon. member that he learn the rules and that he stop trying to use the rules to play politics at a time when Canadian farmers need reassurance and not politics. When we come to vote on this motion, which I understand is going to be deferred until next week, we are going to have to vote against this—not because of the content of the motion but because of the way the NDP put this motion forward, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This point of order that is not a point of order is really taking a lot of time. If the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan who had asked to be heard before would agree, I think we should go to questions or comments following the speech by the hon. minister and get into substance instead of procedure.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I do wish to rise on the point of order because there is one element that has not been offered to you for your consideration and that of the government.

The motion as it is written—

An hon. member: We have already ruled on that. Are you challenging the Chair?

An hon. member: Why don't you listen?

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would listen instead of bellowing he might learn something. What I want to offer to the Chair—and I did not notice that you had ruled, you just wanted to move on to questions and comments—this House—

An hon. member: The Chair ruled on the point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Athabasca is making my job more difficult than it should be. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and in no way am I challenging your decision, if it in fact has been made. What I want to remind the House is that this House is its own master. Irrespective of whatever the convention has been, by motion this House, with unanimous consent, can do as it pleases. In the motion offered by my colleague it says very clearly that this House does not consider this to be a question of confidence in the government.

Madam Speaker, I suggest to you that the motion as worded gets the government off the hook. It was offered in a spirit not of partisanship but as a way to have this whole House follow the example of the standing committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will, if I may, read only three lines from Beauchesne, which says:

> The determination of the issue of confidence in the government is not a question of procedural order and does not involve the interpretive responsibilities of the Speaker.

So it comes back to what I said earlier, that the government and the government only can decide whether a question is or is not a question of confidence. I would imagine that all parties will at one point talk about it and make their own decisions. But this is not something that the Speaker can do for the House.

We will go into questions or comments. The hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, although I do not think the government would have fallen if this motion had been carried, I think it becomes a fruitless debate to spend very much time arguing. If the government decides that this is a question of confidence, then it is going to vote against it. I think your ruling is sound there.

I am really interested to know something from the minister. He certainly gave a great description of the problems that the world faces with the EEC support programs and so on. I think the key issue after all is that he is the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds, and along with the Minister of Agriculture, carries the prime responsibility to cabinet. I am encouraged if press reports are right, that he has been waiting on his colleagues in cabinet to find additional funding. Although the minister says that he can prove that the assistance in the 1990–91 crop year was equivalent to GRIP, I do not think he can persuade many farmers of that. If you look at the government's own data book on farm incomes and financial conditions, you will see that during 1990, government support programs dropped by some $1.275 billion. Of course, this spring we have seen the dramatic drop in the price of corn and other crops which carries over into that crop year.

I think it is generally felt by the farming community that of the emergency cash assistance which they had expected and hoped would be paid this spring, only a reasonably small portion of that, some $300 million, will be forthcoming through the NISA program. I am interested to know, since the press reports indicate that the minister has taken the issue to cabinet and is being supported by the hon. member from Regina, the hon. member from southern Saskatchewan and the rural caucus, how much progress he is making with regard to getting emergency financial assistance and whether that can be put in the hands of farmers in the very near future? That is really the basic issue of this debate, not whether it is a matter of confidence in the government or not. That issue is a really difficult one.

The question is, can we get new emergency funds to cover the shortfall, transitional funds for last year's crop, and can we get it to the farmers before many more of them go down the drain in their payments for their crops, supplies and taxes this fall?

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is right. I think the concern we have and all of us have is over the immediate financial situation out there. Somebody used numbers here showing that the average farm family net income for living expenses is something like $6,300. So that is obviously something that is going to cause and is causing some pretty significant difficulty right now, let alone what is going to happen as winter months get closer to us.

With regard to what we can do, the member knows that I cannot stand in the House here and talk about what in fact is likely to happen. We are aware of the problem. We are going to do, as I have been saying, the very best we can to address the problem. In the meantime, we have been encouraging some of the provinces and I would hope that the NDP here would be talking to their provincial counterparts in Ontario to put up the extra 1 per cent on NISA. We know that in terms of the overall amount of money that they need, it is not going to solve all their problems, but an additional 1 per cent by the provinces on NISA would trigger an additional .5 per cent by the federal government which would mean 5 per cent. Without getting into the technicalities of it, it would mean 5 per cent of your eligible income as opposed to 3.5. That would help. I think there are some other things we can do, but in the meantime we understand the problem quite well. Given the fact that it is a very difficult fiscal situation that the government finds itself in, and we all understand that, we are going to do the very best we can to address the problem.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I just want to comment and ask a question of the minister.

He has given us a very reasoned approach and a very clear definition of the reason why we are in this situation. But that very reasonable approach has indicated that there is a shortage in income and he has accepted the fact that there is a shortage as far as income for farmers is concerned. The statement in the motion is correct.

By his very reasonable approach, he has told us rather indirectly that the government is unwilling to make the kind of commitment to Canadian farmers that the U.S. government and the EC are making to theirs. I guess the farmers in Canada are not expecting that kind of commitment, but they are expecting a commitment which would allow them to survive. That kind of a commitment would be very much less than the EC or the U.S. commitment.

I recognize also that the funds taken from GRIP and NISA for the 1991–92 crop are borrowing from the future. I recognize that money is being put forward that is new money, I suppose, to the farmers but the real problem is still last year's crop, where the billion dollar shortage is not being made up. Even if you take it from next year's crop, you have not solved the problem.

I guess what I am asking is: is the government at least studying the need for more money without taking it out of the 1991–92 crop income?

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, just to comment on what the member said about not expecting us to do what the European Community does, I should give you a number.

It is estimated that this year the European Community is going to spend $42.5 billion on its common agriculture policy. That is more than our deficit—$42.5 billion the Europeans are going to spend on their common agriculture. That does not include some of the countries specific subsidies and some of the other things that go on. That is the kind of league that we are in.

Just to respond in the same fashion as I did to the member for Algoma, we understand the problem. It is there. You do not have to be a rocket scientist to figure out that a family cannot live on an average income of $6,300. You cannot live on an income of 20 years ago with today's expenses.

We have looked at all the numbers and as I have said, we are going to do the very best we can to address the problem so that our farmers can stay in business until we get to some better international prices, which I believe we have a very good opportunity of seeing before spring comes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is over. We will resume debate. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor will be speaking for 10 minutes, which will be followed by a five minute period of question and comments.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I think it is especially useful, perhaps, to follow up the minister who has made some reference to the province of Ontario and the Government of Ontario's policy toward farmers. I think it is often forgotten that the very difficult situation facing farmers throughout this country is not confined to western Canada. In fact, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture this past summer declared what it called a state of emergency in Ontario agriculture.

It appeared before the agriculture committee along with the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board, and the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board, all of the major agricultural groups in the province of Ontario and commodity groups affected in the province of Ontario. They presented an agreed-to statement that put things in very tough terms. They said the income situation for thousands of Ontario grain and oilseed producers is desperate. They said that statutory programs and interim measures announced on April 18 do not come close to providing "a transition from income levels attained during the pre GRIP-NISA period based on those expected with GRIP-NISA in future years for Ontario grain and oilseed farmers".

They go on to say that without immediate government action, thousands of Ontario family farms will simply not survive through 1991 to realize the promise of improved safety net programs. They will enter 1992 in such a weakened condition financially that no safety net program will be able to prevent their ultimate demise.

I know that the minister has had discussions with the president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, Roger George. I know that the president of the OFA has reported that the minister has taken a very hard line toward some of his cabinet colleagues, that the minister has said there has to be action with respect to what is taking place in the province of Ontario. I had very much hoped that this week the minister and the Minister of Agriculture would have had something to say to farmers across the province of Ontario to give them some hope as we head into the winter because what we face is, as they have said, a desperate situation.

They have suggested various things that need to be done so that Ontario farmers are treated the same way as western farmers. They have suggested for instance that there needs to be a top-up of ASA support prices to the 95 per cent level. There needs to be interim payments issued on 1990-91 crop sales, as was done in early spring under the Western Grain Stabilization Act program. The estimated cost of that is $36 billion.

They suggested that there has to be an incremental increase in the initial payment for 1991-92 Ontario wheat sales with an estimated benefit to Ontario farmers of something in excess of $4.5 million.

These kinds of points are what they have stressed to the agriculture committee. They have also made requests to the Ontario government. They have made requests for an immediate interim payment under the Ontario Grain Stabilization Program, for the waiver of the one-third producer premium deduction with the Ontario program. They have also asked, if the federal government increases its ASA payments to the 95 per cent level, that the Ontario government agree to maintain its payments at the present level, which had been promised.

The minister suggested that the province of Ontario needs to take action. I want to tell the minister that this is a message which has gone to the Ontario government from members of all political parties, including myself. We have said to the Ontario government that this is not action that should just be the responsibility of the federal government.

The other side of that point is that this is not a desperate situation which can be dealt with only by the Ontario government. The federal government must provide part of the assistance to Ontario farmers.

That is the general situation in the province of Ontario. There is a special situation in my area. We face in southwestern Ontario, especially in Essex County, but also in Kent County, parts of Lambton County and parts of Elgin County, severe drought conditions this year. These drought conditions reflect the lowest levels of rainfall ever recorded in Essex County, for instance, in the month of July and just about the lowest levels that have ever been recorded in the month of June. I think there was one year that was lower in the 1940s.

Farmers have been devastated, not just by the conditions that have hit prices, which are also hitting western Canadian farmers and farmers elsewhere in Ontario, but they have been devastated by the fact that the yields which they expected to receive have been a minuscule proportion of their hopes.

This is the fourth year in a row in which they have received very serious weather problems. As a result, for many of them their crop insurance has faced penalties which has reduced crop insurance protection to a 70 per cent level.

With the low prices which exist and the fact that crop insurance, even where it is held by farmers, is only going to give them 70 per cent of those low prices, it is easy to see that farmers in Essex County and elsewhere in southwestern Ontario face the very real possibility of being wiped out this winter.

I have written to the Minister of Agriculture about this. The minister replied to me in a letter which reached me yesterday. His letter unfortunately concluded, after a good deal of discussion of the potential benefit of crop insurance, not recognizing that people have been hit so hard in recent years by these weather problems reducing their crop insurance protection, that: "At the present time I do not believe that further federal action is warranted".

That is an attitude which does not respond to the very critical situation in southwestern Ontario.

I appeal to this government to make such a response as the Ontario government will be doing. Please make such a response. The minister agreed yesterday—if I could just finish the last sentence, Madam Speaker—to meet with farm groups from Essex County. I think that is an important step. I urge him and this government to listen seriously and to respond urgently to that severe drought crisis which has hurt so many people.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I asked a question of the previous speaker's colleague a few minutes ago concerning the Ontario government contribution.

It is my understanding that if the Ontario government was to support the NISA program that is available to it—the offer is still there from the federal government—with the contribution of another 1 per cent, that would trigger another half of one per cent contribution by the federal government. That would very quickly put some $24 million into the hands of Ontario producers.

I know we are all in this together. The federal government, the provincial governments, we from all parties and the industries are all in this together. Why can the member not convince his colleagues in the Ontario government that it would be a good investment in this important industry and his farmers in the Essex area? Why will they not do that? It boggles my mind that that small investment is not seen as a good investment by the Ontario government.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I would not want to get partisan in what should be a non-partisan debate.

The same problems in convincing provincial governments that NISA is something which is worth the extra payments have been experienced in trying to persuade the Prince Edward Island Liberal government, the New Brunswick Liberal government and the Quebec Liberal government to participate completely in the program.

I would say from my discussions with the minister's office—I am meeting the minister on Saturday—that the Ontario government's concern is to see to it that the greatest possible increase in cash flow can be generated by the province of Ontario in response to the problems of the past crop year. It is not convinced that NISA is necessarily the best way to do that.

It is reviewing a number of different options. The federal government has tried to persuade it that an investment in NISA is the best approach. Frankly, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has suggested that the Ontario government should look at NISA, but there are some other things that it should look at which might be of more use.

The National Farmers' Union has suggested some points that might be of more use. All of the points are being looked at and I expect an announcement very soon. I expect an announcement particularly with respect to the drought situation as it exists in southwestern Ontario.

However, I make the point again which I made earlier. This is such a serious and severe situation in southwestern Ontario that it cannot be the responsibility of a provincial government alone.

It must be the responsibility of both provincial and federal governments. At this stage the federal government, witness the recent letter of September 18 from the Minister of Agriculture, does not seem prepared to move.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The five-minute question and answer period has expired and we will resume debate for 10 minutes.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, after listening to the minister's remarks, I think there is something that must be clarified for the people who are watching this debate today.

The minister made a comment in his speech that the government cannot vote for this motion because it considers it to be a motion of non-confidence. I think it is important to review some of the history and some of the detail for people watching this debate today.

The motion before us now is almost verbatim a motion that was passed unanimously by the Standing Committee on Agriculture at the end of August. That meeting came about as an emergency debate on the agricultural situation. At that time we had representatives from most of the farm groups across the country calling upon this government to take some action with respect to the third line of defence.

In that spirit, and after listening to the various groups, there was a unanimous vote by the members of the standing committee. The standing committee, as you will know Madam Speaker, is made up of all three parties. As a matter of fact, the majority of the committee are Conservatives. They saw fit to vote for that motion.

I am surprised that the minister stood in his place and said that the member for Mackenzie is trying to play petty politics. That is absolute nonsense. That is hogwash. The fact is it is the minister who is playing the politics here. We came to this House with this motion in a sense of fair play and openness, hoping to highlight the problems that are being felt in agriculture and looking for support from the government, particularly when its own members on the standing committee had voted for this motion.

When the minister rises in his place and says it is politics on our part, that is hogwash. That is nonsense, and it is simply not the case.

The McGrath report was a report by a committee of the House of Commons dealing with parliamentary reform which made its report in 1985. I would like to refer to page 106 of the McGrath report, paragraphs 40 and 41 where it says:

> In keeping with the desire to make the House more relevant to Members and to the public, your Committee believes that matters of confidence in the government should at all times be clearly subject to political determination. Motions of no-confidence should not be prescribed in the rules but should be explicitly so worded in the text of the motion itself by the Member presenting such a motion.

Paragraph 41 goes on to state:

> Your Committee notes that the Standing Orders, as presently worded, declare to be 'no-confidence' those votable motions which are moved by the Opposition on allotted days.

Today is an allotted day, Madam Speaker.

> We repeat that a question of confidence should be expressed in precise terms in the motion, and not prescribed as such by the Standing Orders. Previous Speakers have indicated that determination of what is, or is not, a question of confidence is not a matter for interpretation the Chair. We agree that this expression ought not to be used in the Standing Orders to predetermine the nature of a motion.

In other words, prior to 1985 it was stated in the Standing Orders that on any allotted days—and this is considered an allotted day—a motion put forth by the opposition would be considered a vote of non-confidence. Therefore if the government voted for the motion the government would presumably fall.

The whole McGrath report was not adopted by the House. However, portions of it in essence were in that in 1985 the Standing Orders were amended by removing the no confidence reference. That was removed in 1985. There is no mention of no confidence in the Standing Orders with reference to allotted days. The fact is that the determination of whether or not a motion is a matter of confidence or non-confidence lies with the government. It is not in the rules. It lies with the government. It is the minister of grains and oilseeds who has chosen, on behalf of his government, to make this a non-confidence motion. No one else, certainly on this side of the House, believes it to be a non-confidence motion. For the minister to stand up and say that he is required or that it is history to do such a thing, is nonsense, is not correct and the people of Canada should be aware of that.

• (1220)

I am really surprised that the government would take the position it has on this particular issue. It is certainly my hope that the government will see its way clear to decide that this motion is not a matter of non-confidence. It is in the best interests of agriculture across this country to do so.

It is not the New Democratic Party playing politics, it is this government that is playing politics and the minister playing politics, and he knows it.

I do appreciate some of the comments. In fact given some of the comments the minister made, I am surprised at the attitude he has taken. I appreciate the fact that he indicated that the farm communities across this country are in a terrible situation, that in fact the infrastructure is disappearing and if something does not happen very soon, the dealers in fertilizers, chemicals, fuel and so on are going to disappear and we will lose an infrastructure that will be very difficult, if not impossible to replace.

There has been a tremendous amount of interest in the recent past by academics and others in finding ways to save rural Canada with respect to not only agriculture but also to fishing and forestry and so on.

It is essential that we maintain a viable economic base and viable farm families in rural areas where agriculture is an important industry. I appreciate the minister's remarks in acknowledging that. That is important. It is a first step.

With respect to other comments made by the minister, it is true that Europe has caused Canada a lot of grief with its programs. I am surprised that the minister did not go on to mention the United States, which is also causing problems, particularly with its export enhancement program. The United States has been moving into this area, which really has not been an area where the Europeans are dealing. Their export enhancement program provides a subsidy on grain sales which makes it very difficult for the Canadian Wheat Board and others to sell grain from this country. The express purpose of the export enhancement program, as indicated by the Americans some time ago was to compete with the Europeans.

It is very clear now that the use of the export enhancement program has expanded to countries where the Europeans are really not a major competitor. In fact, it is where Canada is a competitor and where the EEP has hurt us directly.

The other factor is that under the free trade agreement, I believe it is Article 701.4—I stand to be corrected on that, but I believe it is the correct article—in agriculture, neither country shall interfere with respect to subsidies, in the markets of the other party. The United States has clearly done that and there are many examples where the United States has moved into countries that have been traditionally Canadian markets, have implemented the export enhancement program and have cost Canadian farmers sales.

There is a remedy under GATT which we have to pursue, but there is also a remedy under the free trade agreement. I am surprised that the minister and this government are not taking stronger action with respect to the lack of compliance by the Americans with the free trade agreement, their lack of respect for the free trade agreement and their lack of respect for Canadian agriculture. I wish the minister had expanded on that.

I believe I only have a minute or two left.

I would just like to close by saying this and reiterating my opening remarks. I am disappointed in the comments of the minister with respect to calling this a matter of non-confidence. I do hope that members of the agriculture committee on the other side of the House will be making positive comments with respect to this matter. I really wish and really hope in the spirit of openness and fair play that the minister will please retract his remarks and make it clear that the government does not consider this a vote of non-confidence because no one else does.

The fact is that if there was a vote today and the government voted for it, there is no way the Governor General is going to call an election. The minister knows that. The minister should make some comments with respect to that and let Canadian agriculture know that the government is going to vote for this motion in the spirit of co-operation in this House.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the remarks the hon. member made as far as procedure is concerned. If the NDP wants to make this a non-partisan issue, then I suggest they do one of two things. First, make it a non-votable motion, and we speak the way we have been speaking. Every one knows the concern and I suspect I know it better than the hon. member because I farm and he does not. If the NDP want to be really serious about making it non-partisan, do not make it a votable motion.

Second, if the NDP wants it as a votable motion, it should not try to be cute and hide the fact that this is essentially a vote on the budget and as such is a confidence motion. If the NDP wants to do that, fine, but do not get up and grandstand in the meantime when it has done some things to be very cute at a time when we do not need to be cute in this place. We need to do everything we can to support Canadian farmers who need our support.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I do not appreciate being called cute, but I think the fact is that it is very clear, and the minister knows, that this does not have to be a vote of non-confidence. This is a motion that was a result of an emergency meeting of the Standing Committee of Agriculture, whereby most of the farm groups in the country appeared before the committee or had representation in front of the committee and called on it to take some action. They were expressing their concern over the lack of response on a third line of defence and over the desperate straits that many people in agriculture right across this country are in.

As a result of that debate, there was an all-party committee that unanimously endorsed the motion that is before us. We have brought this into the House today to further acknowledge the problems that exist in agriculture and in the spirit of non-partisanship brought it forth. Our motion states that it is not a vote of confidence. The minister knows that.

I am beside myself to understand why the minister is the one that is being cute. He is the one who is playing petty politics. I do not know why he is doing it. It certainly does not help Canadian agriculture.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can enlighten my friend across the way. When a House of Commons standing committee makes a motion and presents it to the government, it has nothing to do with confidence. It is the position of the House of Commons standing committee and it was unanimously done and presented. The government took the motion into consideration.

What the NDP has done on an opposition day—that is what it says, opposition day—is made a votable motion and taken the motion from the House of Commons standing committee but added to it:

> That, in the spirit of House of Commons reform and in recognition of the clear and urgent need, the House does not consider this to be a question of confidence in the government.

It stated this knowing full well that the motion itself refers to the budget. The committee can comment on and put it forward to the House and no confidence is involved. That member should know that this is a confidence motion.

If the NDP wants to make it a votable motion and remove the bottom part of it, make it a votable motion. Then we know it is a non-confidence motion and it is done with. If you really want to make it a non-partisan issue, as it was done in the House of Commons standing committee and brought forward to this House, remove the bottom portion and make it—the member is not listening, obviously he does not want to listen. I am suggesting that if you want to make the motion non-partisan in this House, remove that sentence at the bottom and make it non-votable. Then we can all stand and address this very serious problem plaguing the agriculture industry right across this country and get on with the work, instead of becoming partisan the way we are doing today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): I regret the time for questions and comments has elapsed. Very well, a very short comment.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed. This is a party that talks about open government and more reform and they are the ones who are stalling it.

I am sure that the people in western Canada will be pleased to see this debate where this government is refusing to allow a vote in a situation where it is clearly allowable. The member can keep playing politics all he wants but the people of Canada see clearly what they are doing. This is a time to move to a more open government. The New Democratic Party believes in that and I wish the member would as well.

Mr. Angus: On a point of order. Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, in order to assist the hon. member, if he wishes that sentence out of the motion he can move an amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): We will move on to debate. The member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand and discuss this topic today because it was generated from my standing committee.

The motion before us is essentially the same, with that little add-on that seems to be picking up most of the emotional debate today, whether it is a matter of confidence of not. It places me in a difficult position. If it is a confidence motion, do I vote for the motion and, therefore, vote against my government? That is difficult. But I am thinking it is almost as difficult as the problem the member for Mackenzie had, and the member for Algoma, both of whom spoke earlier, when for the last nine days they supported a strike by the Public Service Alliance that was crippling the ability to ship grain and was costing the farm community some $36 million a year.

So it is one of the conundrums all of us have, particularly in my committee, which is so concerned about the farm industry. We speak to these people on a regular basis, an every day basis in our ridings. We held a special meeting—not an emergency meeting per se, but a special meeting—in August and listened to all the farm groups.

The member for Mackenzie in his introduction has very fairly stated a good part of the genesis of the problem we have in Canada at the present moment. I would like to go a little further with the genesis, however, because it goes back into the seventies when people in the farm business, and indeed they are in business, were encouraged to get bigger. Basically, several factors did this; governments did this, farm communities did this, circumstance did this.

In the seventies and the early eighties, I guess mainly in the seventies, farm land prices were increasing, often at the rate of something like 22 per cent a year, so farmers had to buy more farm land. They borrowed money because farm profits were very high. The bankers basically said to the farmers; well, don't borrow just the $25,000 that you need now, borrow $50,000 and do it right and do it bigger".

The whole psychology—government, bankers and farmers—led the farm community into a very high debt situation. Our study last year shows that there is about $5 billion in non-serviceable debt, and many of the farm leaders—at least one significant farm leader at the moment—is saying that that is one of the major problems that has to be overcome in the farm community, to get rid of that debt. Somehow that debt has to be eaten by somebody like it was in the States—although we do not want the trauma that went with that down in the States. How that will occur I don't particularly know.

Part of the reason for the large debt increase in the seventies was the fact that we changed policy; we allowed the banks to get into lending money as well. Prior to that point they could not lend long-term money to buy land.

We know as well that farmers vary in efficiency. There are larger differences in what the same two farmers, farming the same type of land side by side can produce on their land. We know that there are people out there hurting more than others because their efficiency is not as great as others but, indeed, we also know at the moment, like the member said, that even many of our very best farmers are now having problems.

We are into a circumstance in Canada where it is difficult psychologically for the farmers because all around the problems are there, not just grains and oilseeds which we heard about this morning and I would like to talk about a little more later, but the pork industry right now is having very low prices. The situation in Ontario, for instance, where shipping 75,000 hogs a week would normally mean a peak in prices, but the prices coming to the farmers are quite low.

In Canada, we often trigger the Canadian price by what we can export to the United States. However, for reasons I do not totally understand, prices in the United States are low as well. Perhaps it is because of things that are happening in North Carolina, for example. When pork farmers from my riding of Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, but primarily from the county of Perth, went down to the Carolinas, they visited a farm called Murphy Farms. That one farm has 80,000 sows in production at the present time. They plan to expand their operation from 80,000 to 100,000 sows this year, and I am told it will be from current profits with no further financing. Now you can imagine the efficiencies of this. They would have their own feed contracts. If they do not have their own mills they can deal with the feed dealers on a very big basis. They can construct their barns in a manner that is cheaper than ours because of weather. It is something like $600 a sow.

I suggested to our farmers that if we had the same size and the same efficiency the price in Canada, and in Ontario particularly, could be brought down below the $2,200 we pay now per sow to perhaps $1,800 or $1,700. But you can still see the great advantage that those producers have and the great expansion that is going on.

So the pork farmers, sitting beside the grain farmer or perhaps also a grain farmer, is also depressed. Even dairy, with its supply management, is suffering from a reduction in quotas. There is not enough consumption taking place so that they can ship the full amount that they can produce. They are also concerned with GATT, the concern we addressed yesterday, that was reasonably dispelled as far as an agreement at the moment between Europe and the United States on tariffication, but the thought that that may occur, the ice cream and yoghurt and, of course, there is steady competition. The dairy industry competes very strongly with itself in its cost to production formula. So they are not very high psychologically right now.

The egg producers have problems within their group with surplus removal. Their boiler quotas are having difficulty in adjustment across Canada. The horticultural area is not good. There are so many segments in horticulture it is hard to pick them up and to measure them totally, but we know about the apples and their need to go into a controlled production, but that industry as well is depressed.

In the the middle of all of this farm unhappiness comes the grains and oilseed producers. They have been exposed to poor prices for something like seven years, based on the problems around the world or, at one time, it was drought in our own country. We have kept giving them support each year hoping that next year would be better, but the next year did not turn out to be better. Last year the big disappointment was when the GATT agreement did not take place. We were there and saw the European farmers, and sadly I must say even some Canadian farmers, over there demonstrating against any agreement by the European Community. But we did not get that agreement and that certainly hurt the farmers psychologically.

Now we are topped with this very difficult cash flow problem for the 1990 crop year.

The increasing production by countries like China and India so they are not buying as much grain from us are other pressures that the grain farmers have had. Indeed, we are going to see the same thing now from the Warsaw Pact people, the Iron Curtain countries, as that institution breaks down. It is interesting to know that our technology in fact probably helped China and India to increase their production. As our western technology creeps into the Iron Curtain countries, as well as modern equipment, communication and roads, will mean that they will produce for their own market what we have been supplying for quite a while. Indeed, I suspect they are going to produce for some of the world market that we have been supplying.

We heard the problems of no new machinery on the farms. The fact that if we get a better income for the grain sector, it is going to take a lot of that just to keep in business and keep some equipment there.

I must say our grain farmers, like all Canadian farmers, have responded very well to the pressures. They cannot respond totally, but they have done a great job in improving their efficiency so that if prices had been low they produced more and more of the product with less and less labour.

In fact I think I saw a figure that in the European Community, because of their lack of efficiency, the fact that they do not produce grain as efficiently as we do, it takes a lot less subsidy per farmer to keep them going. Of course they have so many more farmers there that they spend a great deal more money than we do in this particular area.

I want to add to this debate a not very happy note about agriculture. It is not a happy note, but I think we are in for restructuring. I think there are going to be changes coming in the whole of agriculture, and I do not think anybody really knows what that restructuring will be. Perhaps in the pork industry we have to do something to get into a size of buying power that will compete with the people across the border. I do not know what they will be but I think we are on the edge of a restructuring in farming. GRIP and NISA will certainly assist, but there is still only a percentage of income for their previous years and it will put a bottom on the amount of money that the farmers will receive. It will guarantee an amount of money but I am not too sure that is a solution for the very long run.

We passed the motion in the Standing Committee on Agriculture which everyone has seen. In that standing committee I asked the officials from the Department of Agriculture how much money did come to the farmers in the 1990 crop year. That is the year we are most concerned about. The farmers believe that if they do not have assistance for that crop year they will not have any money to go into subsequent years that do not promise to be very good either.

The minister has already alluded to this this morning. Since I asked that question in the committee, since the committee as a whole asked the questions of the officials, they have been trying to generate some figures. I have not questioned or edited these figures, nor have I done anything with them. I understand there has been about $1.3 billion paid out to Canadian farmers in the 1990 crop year.

The motion then does have a problem in that it asks that we as a government provide the farm community with an amount equal to what we would have given had NISA and GRIP been in full operation this year. It does not, however, take away from the problem. It does not take away from the fact that there is not the cash flow out there right now in the 1990 crop, and it does not take away from the fact that the farmers have not seen any of the benefits of the subsequent help coming to them, and it does not take away from the despair.

By the way, I am told on the same set of figures that had NISA and GRIP been in place in this particular year, the amount that would have been paid out would be $1.1 billion or about $170 million less than what has already been received for the 1990 crop year.

We have heard from the member for Essex—Windsor on the matter of equality. I want to report to the House and to the people watching that when I called the standing committee meeting on agriculture, I knew that there would be a motion coming out of that meeting similar to what resulted.

I knew that people on the government side of the committee had a motion ready and I suspect that the people on the NDP side did as well. Certainly, we did have the motion from the member for Algoma.

I knew that was going to happen and I wanted it to happen. I also called the meeting because there was a suggestion by the Ontario crop group that there was an inequality in the amount of support given across Canada.

I could not get anybody to talk about equality at that meeting. In fact, when I spoke to the chairman of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, he simply said that it was not a thing to do.

When he would not discuss it, I knew his main point about equality was the matter of the NISA plan and the fact that Ontario was not contributing to it.

I am in another difficult position asking for more assistance for Canadian farmers, particularly the grains and oilseeds people for the 1990 crop, because of our deficit. I preach on a regular basis that we simply cannot be spending more money, borrowing it to allow our children to repay it later. They are deficits which now are demanding so much of our money and causing us to have to raise taxes as high as we have. We still have not covered all of the cost.

I have often said that there are two situations where I can agree with deficit financing: first, for capital goods or for things that generate income in the future, and second, in an emergency.

I must say that I believe that we are now in an emergency in the farming community, both on a cash flow basis and on a psychology basis.

This motion then encourages the government to assist the farmers, and I am going to support this particular motion. I know that the matter of farming is not just a matter of business. It is not just a matter of what you do day to day to earn a living.

The member for Algoma has talked about the desire of farmers to farm. He was talking about a man and wife would go all day, all night or all week to a job some place just to maintain a farm.

The farmers want the farm. We absolutely need the farms and they are in an emergency situation now. I certainly want them to have that help.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member on the debate on agriculture.

Being from the province of Prince Edward Island, which is an agricultural province, I want to make a few comments on a very difficult situation which the potato farmers are experiencing at this time.

They are experiencing this because of what Agriculture Canada diagnosed as the PVY-N virus. It now appears that Agriculture Canada may have misdiagnosed it, maybe it was not the PVY-N virus. However, this has created a lot of problems within the province.

Many of the potato farmers have ploughed under their crops. They did this on the diagnosis of Agriculture Canada and because they were instructed to do so by Agriculture Canada.

Many of the potato producers have lost their markets simply because Agriculture Canada told the United States that we have the PVY-N virus. The reputation of the Prince Edward Island potato industry has been destroyed. It faces a major crisis.

I know my time is limited for these comments but I just wanted to ask the hon. member of the government a question. How would he feel if he was a Prince Edward Island potato farmer and he ploughed under 200 acres of potatoes because he was told by Agriculture Canada that his potatoes had the PVY-N virus and that he had to plough them under? How would he feel if he found out now that the tests are in question?

Mr. Brightwell: That is not a difficult question to answer. If I were that farmer I would feel very, very badly. I would feel outraged, I would feel misused. However, the member has raised the question and it is certainly just a question at the moment. I am told through sources that it may not be, that in fact it is probably not true that there was a mistake in the testing.

I have had long-term experience in agricultural testing in Canada, usually in the animal health field, and I have developed a great deal of faith in our scientists. In fact, I still have that faith. I am sure if there is an error in this particular situation, and I say only if there is, there will be a fair solution for this other branch of horticulture, one that I really should have mentioned because it is brought up quite frequently in the standing committee discussions. In fact, there is a proposal at the moment that we consider the testing process for this particular virus.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in my brief comment I would like to thank the hon. member for assisting the committee, as he always does as our chair. He has taken a very courageous position both in bending the rules slightly to have us use the procedure we used in the committee and to permit it to be presented in that form here today. If we could have more members like the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo in this House, it would eventually reflect the true need and requirements of Canadians and make this House a much more functional place. I congratulate him and thank him for the actions he has taken, both in the committee and today in this House.

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments, but I must say that I was surprised to hear that I had bent the rules in committee. The member for Mackenzie is much more experienced than I and apparently he let me bend those rules without telling me at that particular time. However, he is telling me now. In fact, I have great faith in every member in this House. They are genuinely concerned about the people of Canada and particularly with the farmers of Canada. We are in a position now where all of us have experienced situations where we had to go along partisan lines and indeed it created some difficulty for us. So, I thank the member for his comments.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the previous speaker concerning the possibility of restructuring which he had mentioned. I think he is right, and I do not think there is anybody in this House, perhaps anywhere in this country, who knows exactly what the restructuring will be like, what form it will take.

It may depend, for example when it comes to grains and oilseeds, on the success or lack of same at the current GATT negotiations. One of my concerns is that even if restructuring does come, who is going to be left? Who is going to be around when it takes place? Farmers are just going through an absolutely dreadful period, an absolutely dreadful time. It seems to me that with or without restructuring we have to support the farmers until that happens, whenever that happens.

I would like to know whether the hon. member shares that point of view?

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, it a question that should not have to be asked, but I am delighted to answer it. Certainly, we have to support the farming communities. My riding is one of the great farm ridings in Ontario and, I am sure, in Canada. I am totally on their side. We have to help them through.

On the other hand, the restructuring that is going to take place is going to be farmer driven. They are the people who know the demands and will find the solutions. They helped in creating the GRIP and NISA programs which are coming in next year. Those programs are going to be a major part of keeping the farmers in place until something else happens in in the world and in Canada.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, just a couple of comments to the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo. I just want to first of all thank him for the efforts of him and the agriculture committee staff to get the meeting together in August. It was one that was badly needed. I hope before we are through this crisis it will prove to have been more effective than it has to date. That is certainly no fault of the committee itself. I think the committee did what needed to be done and we did it quite well. It is just getting the follow-up.

Furthermore, the minister of grains and oilseeds made it very clear this morning that he understands the problem and that is of some comfort to us. However, what the minister did not address was what he is going to do about it, other than talk to the people in the European Economic Community. He did refer briefly to the United States and I think he should have referred to the Americans more. They are no angels on this issue with their export enhancement program.

I will ask the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo what he feels is going to be done. He certainly disappointed me when CBO-FM Radio reported on September 14 of this year that: "Ontario Tory MP, Harry Brightwell says an interim farm aid package from Ottawa would not include special relief for Ontario farmers". It went on to say that the support would come from Ontario.

As a member of this House and as a member from Ontario, in particular, I was hoping that he would go to bat a little bit more for Ontario farmers than is evident from this quote. I would just ask the member if he would care to comment on that.

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to recall the two particular instances where I was misquoted on the radio and in the press. In my experience, if we let everyone mention misquotes, we would have a few hundred. This is twice on the same issue in the same week, both from the same area. The situation with the newspaper arose when a reporter called up and asked if there was going to be a special package of assistance for the drought damage in southwestern Ontario. He said as well that there would be a package of assistance for western grain farmers. I said: "No way. It would be for all grain farmers if there was such a thing". By the way, the rumour of such an announcement was coming from a member of Parliament on the member's side of the House. He started the particular rumour.

I told him if it were true, it would be for everybody including Ontario farmers but would not be especially directed at the drought area. I do not know how they chose to quote me but that is the background of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van de Walle): It being one o'clock p.m., I now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at one o'clock.

AFTER RECESS

SYDNEY-TRURO LINE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, Canadian National has announced its intention to sell the rail line that presently runs from Sydney to Truro, Nova Scotia, to the private sector. The sale of this line will have a very damaging effect on the maritime region. CN says that the private sector will keep this line going.

However, we heard this a few years ago when Canadian National decided to sell its trucking firm, CN Route, which became known as Route Canada, to the private sector. The sale was approved by this government and shortly thereafter, 15 months, the new owners filed for bankruptcy and laid off 2,000 workers.

Now CN wants to privatize a line which it admits is profitable and provides much needed employment in Nova Scotia. Not only is it profitable, but CN is not marketing the line and is in fact discouraging business to make the bottom line look as bad as possible.

I would urge this government to do the right thing for eastern Nova Scotia and Canada and stop the wholesale dismantling of our rail system. I would ask the government to stop the privatization of the Sydney–Truro line.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, sometimes we wonder where the Secretary of State for External Affairs' head is at when she answers questions about foreign policy. Many Canadians were astonished at how blasé she was about the coup in the Soviet Union.

Anybody who knows anything about East Timor would have been equally astonished yesterday when she said that there was no history of independence or self-determination or self-government in that territory and that the Government of Canada regarded the Indonesian occupation of East Timor as a fact that it could not do anything about. The fact of the matter is that East Timor was a territory with its own integrity. Just because it was a Portuguese colony does not mean that it had no history of independence.

If Canada is prepared to send Canadian troops to participate in the liberation of Kuwait, why is the minister not even prepared to adopt a policy of non-recognition such as we adopted with respect to the Baltics? Why this incredible ignorance and neglect when it comes to this small South Pacific territory which is desperately in need of global attention?

WOLVERINE TUBE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster made a very accurate statement regarding the corporate irresponsibility of the Wolverine Tube Company which is shutting down a tube mill in my riding of Delta, British Columbia, throwing 160 people out of work when there is absolutely no reason to do so.

This company has produced substandard tubing in the B.C. mill, and now it has been found that 55 per cent of 82 tubes produced in the London, Ontario mill failed to meet the minimum standards, 40 per cent just met the minimum standards, and only 5 per cent exceeded the minimum standards.

With such shoddy practices the government should make in-plant independent testing mandatory. Likewise, all tubing imported into Canada must conform to the national standards in order to protect Canadian consumers from such irresponsible manufacturers.

DE HAVILLAND

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the situation at de Havilland calls for greater hands-on participation by the federal government. This government has never recognized how important a role government plays in the success story of aerospace in other countries.

With no plan but to get rid of what it perceived as a liability, the government sold out to Boeing. Boeing tried, but it has not been able to profit from the deal. As Boeing leaves, the government should be certain that all de Havilland's intellectual property, including augmenter wing technology patents, be not taken home by Boeing.

As to possible purchasers, our government needs to be certain that the Canadian public interest and our future in aerospace is at least as well protected as the interests of Italy and France whose taxpayers are backing the bidders.

The Ontario government seems the only party willing to ante up as a shareholder. Public ownership lies in the face of this government's philosophy, but surely the record of the Mulroney government disasters shows the shortcomings of its philosophy.

As to the plant, it needs to be recognized that there is no such thing as guaranteed—

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at Lucien Bouchard, the Leader of the Bloc Quebecois, and his attitude to the strike by PSAC members.

I wonder why he voted against the Public Sector Compensation Act? According to an article published in the Chicoutimi Le Quotidien on May 23 this year, the great defender of the interests of Quebecers received, in addition to his usual legal fees, more than $250,000 from the Quebec government to impose a 20 per cent wage cut on teachers, nurses and all social sector employees, when he represented the employer for the PQ government in 1982-83.

Mr. Speaker, the government is taking a very serious approach to the deficit and government spending. This public sector wage restraint program is part of our economic recovery plan, and it also applies to ministers, senators and members of this House.

So far, six provinces have followed our lead by introducing a wage freeze in the provincial public section.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the provincial ministers of health and the federal minister of health at their meeting in Winnipeg reaffirmed their commitment to a partnership among federal, provincial and territorial governments for a universal health care system.

They have called upon the federal government to ensure stable future funding and to uphold national standards as set out in the Canada Health Act. This act specifically prohibits user fees.

However, the two provinces that did not attend the conference, Quebec and British Columbia, are the two provinces which are promoting user fees.

I call upon the minister of health to inform Quebec that he will proceed immediately under the Canada Health Act to penalize Quebec for Bill 120 which imposes user fees in emergency wards.

He should also inform the premier of the province of British Columbia who has been advocating user fees that he will not accept user fees in that province.

All Canadians, regardless of where they live, must be assured of universal, accessible health care.

MONT TREMBLANT SKI RESORT

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, on September 11, I attended a special evening to mark the purchase of the Mont Tremblant ski resort by Intrawest, a group from Vancouver.

This group is a major Canadian resort developer and also operates the Blackcomb ski resort in British Columbia. The purchase represents an investment of several million dollars, which will stimulate the economy of the region and consolidate the local market.

I would like to point out to the House that Intrawest, by focussing on the Laurentian area, made a very substantial investment. The Laurentians are a vacation paradise, and our region is attractive to entrepreneurs looking for a good business investment because of its potential for growth and development. Intrawest's investment is a case in point.

MICOT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the press today there were three reports concerning Mr. Glen Kealey's Micot project in Hull.

Looking at a translation of one news item by Telemedia reporters, Yves Bellavance and Carole-Marie Allard, I read that according to testimony and correspondence of ex-employees of Mr. Kealey, Mr. Kealey ordered the falsification—I repeat, falsification—of his company's accounting books.

It would appear that in order to avoid embarrassing explanations about the company's performance in the project presumably by his associates and investors, Mr. Kealey ordered the falsification of his accounting books.

A similar report in the Journal de Montreal states that small investors in the Micot project lost more than $160,000.

One can only wonder if Mr. Kealey's cries of injustice are merely an attempt to deflect attention from his own failures.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the GST has become an economic disaster for Canada and for Prince Edward Island in particular. All areas of the economy are suffering, particularly the tourism industry.

• (1410)

When our American friends come to Prince Edward Island and sit in a restaurant and order a meal, GST is added. This leaves a bad taste in their mouths.

Canadians used to visit the United States for a vacation, not to outfit their children for school. Recently, the director of the Maine State Publicity Bureau said he was very sorry that Canadians could not be patriotic and support their own businesses, but one can only be patriotic so long. It is unfortunate that the economic policies of this government are hurting the Canadian people so much.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, to maintain consistent production values and ensure the renewal of mineral reserves, mainly in the precious metals sector, Quebec must do a certain amount of off-site exploration costing from 250 to 300 million dollars a year, with 80 per cent in Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

In 1990, only $145 million worth of off-site exploration was carried out in Quebec. In 1991 things seem to be even worse. For several months, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec has been trying to find new sources of financing but the response from Ottawa has been negative. According to Mr. Jean Rainville, the problem seems to be with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, where the oil industry appears to come first and the mining and exploration sector in Quebec is no longer a priority.

TOURISM

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian tourist industry has just recorded its poorest summer in more than a decade. Canadians travelling to the U.S. on a regular basis continues to spiral upward, while American tourists continue to avoid Canada.

Canadian retail sale losses continue as Canadians are lured to the U.S. Same day trips to the U.S. rose to 5.9 million in July, our busiest tourist month, up almost 10 per cent for the same month in the previous year.

When will the minister of revenue offer more than a mere acknowledgement of the problem and offer instead some new initiatives to help retailers in the tourist industry regain some of the lost revenues that they have experienced, particularly now that the full impact of the GST is taking its toll on the Canadian retail sales and the Canadian tourist industry?

UKRAINE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, 10 days ago I had the honour of assisting our external affairs minister in opening Canada's new Consulate-General in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine.

Among the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe, none has closer ties to Canada of blood and culture than Ukraine. Today, a million Canadians proudly claim Ukrainian ancestry, among them our distinguished Governor General.

This month marks the centenary of permanent Ukrainian settlement in Canada at Edna-Star, just northeast of Edmonton. And so it is timely that as Ukraine asserts its independence, its current leader, the Chairman of the Supreme Rada, Leonid Makarovych Kravchuk, pays an official visit on Monday to Ottawa.

Chairman Kravchuk was a hardline ideological Communist until one month ago today when Ukraine proclaimed its independence. Now he proclaims himself a Ukrainian Nationalist.

Ukraine will shortly hold a referendum on independence and a presidential election. Kravchuk, the born again nationalist, might win. Whoever is chosen president, Canada should move quickly to respect the outcome of the referendum and transform that Consulate-General in Kiev to a full-fledged embassy.

KOREAN WAR VETERANS

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, on June 17 of this year it was announced that a medal would be struck to recognize and honour those Canadians who served in the Korean war.

Though this announcement was long overdue and anxiously awaited by our Korean war veterans for years, little if any action has taken place on it. Three months have passed and the process for distributing these medals has yet to be determined. In fact, the application forms were finalized only a couple of weeks ago.

In my conversations with officials at the chancellery it was revealed that the medal itself has yet to be struck. Moreover, I was told that the medal, which was scheduled to be presented at ceremonies throughout the country on or about Remembrance Day, will not be anywhere near ready by then.

Why has it taken so long to act? Why have Korean veterans associations across the country not been consulted to facilitate and expedite this process?

It seems that the officials responsible for administering this award are focusing on why this honour cannot be processed on time instead of how it can be done.

Nobody is interested in pointing fingers and assigning blame. All we simply want is for our Korean war veterans to get what was promised to them and what they deserve without further delay, because after three decades I believe they have waited long enough.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, if you are thinking of becoming a grain farmer and if you bought a membership in Preston Manning's Reform Party, here is what would be in store for you:

(1) A shift from a government supported agricultural industry to an industry shaped by market forces only.

(2) The removal of agricultural support programs.

(3) A reduction of marketing boards as a federal cost reducing measure.

(4) The PC government is spending $2 billion on farmers.

Preston Manning would hold a referendum and let the people of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver decide it.

With policies like these, Mr. Speaker, you would need to win at least one 649 lottery per year just to stay in business.

I dare Preston Manning to try his policies on the farmers of Brandon, Manitoba this coming Friday. They will likely run him right out of town.

HOUSE OF COMMONS PAGES

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing Question Period, I should like to notify hon. members that we have the pleasure of welcoming 43 new pages who join us this year.

[Translation]

More than 400 young Canadian men and women across this country submitted applications, and the young people with us today were chosen after a vigorous selection process.

[English]

I assisted at their swearing in ceremony on Monday. I know hon. members will be impressed with the calibre and enthusiasm that these young Canadians will bring to their duties.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

There are press reports falsely suggesting that the Liberal Party of Canada has agreed in advance to support the constitutional proposition of the government.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that he does not have and will never have a blank cheque from the Liberal Party when it comes to constitutional reform.

The Prime Minister knows that in order to avoid another constitutional disaster he has to work with both opposition parties.

The Prime Minister promised to brief me and the Leader of the NDP on this proposition. I want to ask the Prime Minister when he will keep his promise.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never asked the Leader of the Liberal Party for a blank cheque on constitutional reform or anything else, and he knows that.

Second, with regard to his second statement that on constitutional reform we would have to learn to work with the opposition parties, he may have been absent from the House, but the Leader of the Liberal Party, as he then was, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party and almost every single one of their members, endorsed the last constitutional position brought forward by the Government of Canada. My hon. friend will want to reflect on that.

With regard to the briefings that we agreed upon, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and I will be in touch with both opposition leaders later on today to suggest some times that we hope will be mutually convenient so we can proceed within the next few days to do precisely that.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am glad he realized that today's newspaper reports were not correct and that he has the benefit of our party's position put before the public on April 21, which is clear and to the point. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he can guarantee that the constitutional proposals he will table will respond to the legitimate aspirations of Quebecers, reflect the legitimate aspirations of the people of Western Canada and the Maritimes who want an elected and reformed Senate, and also, by means of sound proposals, respect the aspirations of Canada's native people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition took the titles from three speeches made recently by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, in which he referred to issues concerning native people and Quebec and also to Western Canada's desire for an elected and reformed Senate.

Since the minister has already stated what our intentions are in this respect, I would imagine that considering today's statement by the Leader of the Opposition, this should be exactly what he had in mind.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to learn that the minister is reading my speeches before he makes his, because that is exactly what we have done.

We stated our position a long time ago because we wanted to make sure that this time the people would know ahead of time that there would not be a deal cooked in the backrooms and there would be participation by the Canadian public.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I have to give credit to the minister. He is listening to that. The other day he said in the House that the way it was done the other time was completely wrong, and I agree with him.

I want to ask the minister or the Prime Minister if he can give us a guarantee that they will take the proposition that is part of our nine propositions to make sure there will be a real economic union in Canada and the movement of goods, people, services and capital in Canada will be free from sea to sea to sea.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is clearly very offended by deals cooked in backrooms. What does he think about deals cooked in kitchens?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I did not want my hon. friend to get exorcised. I was just asking for his opinion, because the only one who has really had experience with that kind of deal is my hon. friend. But I take in good faith the suggestions that he is making.

The minister has tried to make the point time and time again across the country that the document which will be tabled hopefully early next week by the government will be the beginning of the process and not the end. We think it is a sensible document and a sensible approach, but we are inviting constructive criticisms.

Mr. Chrétien: You are learning.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that I am learning. I hope so, I hope so. Most people of various kinds try to learn as they go along in life. That is something I recommend to my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition. It is not bad.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We look forward to constructive ideas from the NDP, from the Liberals, and from all other people in this country who believe in Canada and who believe in one Canada; not one English and not one French and not French hived off into certain parts and not the west against the east. One Canada solidly united and prosperous, that is what we all want.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada today reported that Canadian family incomes grew by 34 per cent in the sixties, 22 per cent in the seventies, but less than 1 per cent in the decade of the eighties despite world-wide prosperity.

This government's high tax and high interest rate policies stole from Canadians real improvement in their financial situation and creative massive unemployment.

Is this what the Prime Minister meant when he said he would impose prosperity on all parts of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the study, she will learn that the Statistics Canada study uses as a point of comparison the incomes of families prior to the 1981-1982 recession.

As a matter of fact what has happened since 1984 is that there has been real growth in family income at the rate of 2 per cent per annum and that is continuing.

With the economic policies that we are following, not policies of inflation but policies of prosperity, competitiveness, and growth, we will not only sustain that level of growth we will probably exceed it.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, amazing exaggerations and a lack of understanding of what Statistics Canada said.

You are always busy blaming someone else for the insensitive approach you have taken.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put her question through the Chair.

Mrs. Finestone: In Quebec, 700,000 people are unemployed!

Does the Prime Minister agree with his Minister of Transport, his minister responsible for the Montreal area, who said yesterday that nothing could be done for Montreal and that it was up to the people of Montreal to create their own jobs? Is that what he means by a policy for prosperity?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the—

Mrs. Finestone: In French!

Mr. Mulroney: The hon. member says I should answer in French. But of course!

I can inform the hon. member for Mount Royal that thanks to a decision made by this government and rejected by the Official Opposition here and in the Senate on two occasions, we passed Bill C-22. I will be in Montreal on Monday to announce 300 new jobs and investments totalling $200 million, which will directly benefit the pharmaceutical industry and research and development in Montreal.

This is only one example of the thousands of new jobs being created in Quebec and across Canada, thanks to the policies pursued by this government. I would like to mention the aerospace industry and the petrochemical industry—the Liberals voted thumbs down, as they always do—patents and the pharmaceutical industry, where they also voted against the government.

We now have a serious problem in Montreal. Industries that have become obsolete must be replaced by new aerospace technology—

TAXATION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada reported today that the average Canadian is no better off in 1991 than they were in 1980. The Minister of Finance says that in fact they are 2 per cent better off. That is the poorest who are 2 per cent better off, but the rich in Canada are 10 per cent better off. Under the Liberal and Conservative governments what has happened is that the rich have become richer.

Is the Minister of Finance now prepared to look at a fair tax system, because it is the tax system that ensures that the rich continue to get richer? Will he institute a fair tax system? Will he start by establishing a fair tax commission to study this issue?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there has been a great deal of change to the tax system that has made the tax system not only fairer but indeed simpler in many respects and more broadly based.

I repeat to the hon. member that the government's efforts to sustain growth and prosperity have shown up in an increase on an annualized basis of incomes of 2 per cent per year since 1984. That growth is continuing and we hope it will continue. With the turnaround in the economy and the need to improve our competitiveness, we believe we are on the track to sustained recovery, sustainable growth with price stability. The price stability is the most important factor because it is inflation that hits the low income and middle income people the hardest.

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Last year the Prime Minister attended the world summit on child poverty. We all had great expectations that that would result in some changes for all countries including Canada. Yet, a major study of eight industrialized countries shows that Canada has the second worst record on child poverty of those eight industrialized countries.

We must address that issue now. I want to say that so far the government's response to poverty has been to extend the cap on CAP, to take billions of dollars away from social assistance for Canada's poorest.

Will the Prime Minister stand up today in this House and say that he is prepared to do something for child poverty in Canada and he is prepared to do it now, not tomorrow's agenda? What is today's agenda for the children of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the enhancement of the child tax credit and other changes in the tax system have been very helpful in terms of improving the income levels for families.

I draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that the United Nations, using a human development index that measures incomes, education, quality of life, environmental considerations, health and longevity, voted Canada number two out of 160 nations as the second best country in the world in which to live.

What is more important, according to the UN report, Canada's ranking improved from seventh in 1970 and sixth in 1985 to number two in 1990, and only Japan had a higher ranking than Canada in 1990. I think that is a pretty good record.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Finance that I do not think the poor children in this country want to hear us exchanging statistics. They would like to know that there is a future in this country. I would like to say that this government has a responsibility to those children.

However, the minister knows perfectly well the best way to stop being poor is to have a good job. Exports create those jobs, but our exports to the United States are now at their lowest level in 10 years. Where are the jobs the government promised Canadians? What is this government going to do for the unemployed?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in just the last couple of days the OECD has presented a report on the Canadian economy. It is headlined: "OECD says Canada headed for recovery. Canada appears headed for a moderate export led recovery over the next several months with growth reaching an annual rate of 3.5 per cent by the end of next year and a further deceleration of inflation".

Not only did it say that, the OECD endorsed the Canadian government's position on monetary policy. It was very supportive of the fiscal policy and the fiscal direction that was contained in the February budget. It was very supportive of the structural policy changes, i.e. the free trade agreement, the GST, the changes to the unemployment insurance program. Yes, it was critical of labour efficiency, critical of interprovincial trade barriers, critical of an over-generous UI system.

We find this report to be very objective and we will be analysing it closely. It is not all gloom and doom. It is positive and it is full of optimism for the Canadian economy.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. By the way, the OECD report also says that it does not expect any improvement in jobs in this country until the middle of 1992. That will not sound optimistic to very many Canadians, except the minister and his government.

Today, Statistics Canada reported that in July Canada's trade balance with the world fell to only $63 million, the lowest in more than 10 years. How can the minister continue to talk about an export led recovery in the face of these disappointing figures? Why will he not admit that his high dollar policy is holding back our exports and our entire economy and do something about it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very much aware that there has been a substantial increase in the level of imports, I believe by $773 million dollars. The imports are essentially machinery and equipment for the manufacturing in the industrial sector. That is a positive sign, not a negative sign.

Exports have not gone down. They have remained constant. Imports have gone up because there is a confidence in the economy and there is a growing belief that the recovery is under way. In order to fulfil and capture the demands that are being created, not only in Canada but indeed outside of Canada, it is important to gear up to take advantage of these opportunities, and that is precisely what is happening.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to look at the Statistics Canada report. It said that the exports of machinery made in this country fell by $165 million in July. How is that good for this economy? Forestry products exports fell by $91 million, and the minister says that is good for our economy. Nobody is going to believe that.

I want to say to the minister that Canadian factories are operating at only 71 per cent of their capacity. More than 1,300,000 Canadians are out of work. How can there by a recovery when these people are out of work? Why is the minister willing to continue to inflict the pain and suffering of this level of unemployment on Canadian men and women right across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that there was a 4.9 per cent annualized growth recorded in the second quarter. We expect that growth to continue, albeit somewhat at a more moderate level. I do not think that that is unusual.

Furthermore, he talks about industrial capacity utilization. He would be interested in knowing that last month the industrial capacity utilization rate went up by 1.7 per cent. That is a clear indication, a clear, positive indicator, and that ties in precisely with the importation of machinery and equipment to gear up for a sustained demand and a sustained recovery.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in November 1990 the Department of Transport commissioned a report on the competitiveness of Canadian ports. Today

Ports Canada confirmed that this report, although finished, will not be tabled in the House of Commons and will not be given to MPs for their perusal.

My question if for the Prime Minister. What is in this report that is too sensitive for the public to see? What is in this report that is too sensitive for the duly elected representatives of the people to peruse?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Transport, who are both travelling in the country, meeting with constituents in the industry, I will take that question under notice and try to get back to my hon. friend.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, while I thank the hon. minister for his response, this is the third time this year that I have posed a question through you to the government on the question of the port of Halifax and been told that I will get an answer at a later date.

Is there no one on the government side who is prepared to talk about what the plans are from this government for the port of Halifax? The litany of disasters is beyond belief. What does this government have in mind for the port of Halifax, and when is this government going to do something for a dying port?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend would be perhaps interested and I think pleased to know that I had a lengthy meeting last Friday with Premier Cameron of Nova Scotia who made—

Ms. Clancy: It warms my heart, Brian.

An hon. member: So you don't want an answer?

Ms. Clancy: Yes, I do.

Mr. Mulroney: I am trying to answer her question. As soon as I begin to answer, the member for Halifax indicates she is not interested.

Ms. Clancy: I am interested.

Mr. Mulroney: All right. If you are interested now, I will try to give you the answer.

Premier Cameron, the premier of Nova Scotia, has devoted a great deal of time and energy to the problem of the port of Halifax and has made it the highest priority of his government. He has come forward to the Government of Canada, not with criticism and uninformed comment but with some precise, constructive points of view as to how Halifax and the port of Halifax can benefit greatly from co-operation by the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia.

We have taken his views very seriously. We are going to act upon them to the benefit of the port of Halifax.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): All day, Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to persuade the Department of Transport to agree to meet with truckers' representatives from Windsor so that the truck blockade with its adverse economic effects would come down. That is all these truckers want—a chance to be listened to.

I want to ask the government why it has now refused to set such a meeting. Why will it not make this simple gesture to give people a hearing and end this blockade?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Transport has continued the task force on trucking which was set up when I was the minister. There has been a great deal of effort put into it. It represents all of players in the industry. That is forum within which independent truckers and all players in the industry have been working.

I would think that it would be appropriate for my hon. friend to suggest to the truckers who are blockading the bridge and throwing thousands of Canadians out of work, to work through the recognized trucking associations. That is the way we will get progress in this matter.

• (1440)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, on the same question, there is no question that the blockade is causing a great deal of economic harm.

But does the government not understand that this is an act of frustration that involves not just truckers but farmers, pensioners and workers and it is symptomatic of the explosive conditions that this government has produced in this country as a result of a seething anger among Canadians that you refuse to answer to them?

Why can you not do this simple thing and agree to meet with the truckers when they come here? Why can you not become a government that listens?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I should tell my hon. friend that when I was Minister of Transport I went to Windsor and cut a deal and the Independent Truckers did not keep it.

CANADIAN PASSPORTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It pertains to the issuance of fraudulent passports.

Yesterday the minister said in this House:

> Security is our highest priority in the issue of passports.

Yet her own aid says that they cannot afford to hire enough staff to ensure each application is genuine.

Is security the highest priority or not?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, security is a high priority.

The reason it is the highest priority and the evidence of it is in the answer that I gave yesterday, that the people in the passport office in the consular division, when problems are brought to their attention, immediately report them to the RCMP.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, we know from the four versions of the Al-Mashat report just how accurate the minister's investigations can be.

I want to draw to the minister's attention that the 1991-92 estimates show that the minister has almost $5 million in the passport office revolving fund. For half that she could hire at least 50 security people to check the documents and guarantors.

Will she protect Canadian security and assure this House that these people are hired at once?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not need any lessons from the hon. member on doing my job.

Second, I am satisfied that the passport people who work very closely with the RCMP when there are questions of security will continue to do their job as they have in the past.

I have indeed discussed this within the department as to further steps that may be taken. As I said yesterday, I have asked for a report. We will continue to ensure that the Canadian passport is secure, and security will continue to be our priority.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Again yesterday Canadians were shocked and angered to learn how lax and inadequate government procedures are allowing, this time, drug dealers into our country.

Last June 10, 11 and 12 the Secretary of State for External Affairs, responding to the Al-Mashat inquiry here, told the House that she had a team of officials urgently looking for a secret memo, a memo she was confident would be found.

My question is: where is the memo?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of the missing memo has already been thoroughly canvassed.

It is a secret memo, not top secret as members opposite have continued to say. The department has made every effort to find this memo, and it has not yet been found.

We did have an internal investigation on this and, as the hon. member knows, the internal investigation did not produce any evidence of any fraud or anything that should not have existed.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Six months is a long time to be looking for a memo. Although the minister states that the memo in question has not been found, surely the officials searching for that memo have made a report to the minister.

I would ask that the hon. minister make public to us that particular report made by the officials about their search.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the report that was made was a normal one through the internal security of the department and the security within the department, as the hon. member knows, is an internal matter. I will not be producing a report, although I will be producing a formal reply.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Canadians hope that the present mediation process will resolve the postal dispute. However, this summer pensioners, the disabled, veterans and others faced a real mess with regard to the mail delivery system.

Will the government and Canada Post respond positively to the request of anti-poverty groups and others and sit down with postal workers in order to work out an agreement with regard to the delivery of pension and other cheques?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, along with the hon. member and I am sure all Canadians, I am sincerely hopeful that the mediation effort will result in a conclusion to this dispute and a contract mutually satisfactory to both sides. That is what is to be wished for.

If there is another strike, and heaven forbid, I do not think we can stand idly by and see anybody hurt, pensioners or anybody else. But I have to say to the hon. member that if there is concern on the part of the union about cheques being caught in the system and not available to those who need them, all they need to do is give 48 hours' notice before going on strike and the cheques will be delivered to every pensioner and they will not be hurt as result of the strike.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if anyone can predict exactly when a strike would occur, so I do not know if the minister himself could deliver on that promise.

Therefore I would ask again that the government and Canada Post agree to sit down with representatives of CUPW. Surely, if those members are willing to deliver those cheques, the government and Canada Post are able to sit down and try to negotiate this before there is any dispute.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not predicting that through his sources there is going to be another strike.

I repeat, the problem last time was that cheques from the government were trapped in Toronto where strikers refused to allow anybody to go in and recover the cheques. They illegally blocked entry and the police would not break the entry.

To avoid that happening again, all that needs to happen is 48 hours' notice so that cheques do not get trapped in the system. Perhaps he could use his channels to communicate that. If there is concern about the pensioners, give us some warning and we will make sure that pensioners are not hurt.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Could the minister inform this House how a Canadian Reform Party policy of a reduction in agricultural support programs and a reduction of marketing boards would benefit western grain farmers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, that is quite a challenge. It would probably be better directed to the hon. member for Beaver River.

Mr. Speaker: It is a challenge to me too, but do the best you can.

Mr. Mayer: Beyond their policy of advocating a reduction in support to all industries, you have to think that what they are presently advocating on behalf of agriculture would be very damaging at a time when farmers need our support.

I would suggest, giving that we are going through an opposition day with a debate on agriculture—and we have had some pretty good debate here this morning—it might be appropriate for the hon. member for Beaver River to enter into that debate to tell us what her party would do to support Canadian farmers in a time of great need.

EDUCATION

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, in April 1989 the federal government arbitrarily changed the policy for post-secondary education for the funding of aboriginal students. Now its latest action has created a waiting list of up to 400 in the Atlantic region. I know the minister will say 100, but that is doctoring the numbers. As well as there is a 30 per cent reduction of post-secondary education funding for aboriginal students.

• (1450)

Why is the government sloughing off its responsibility to the bands and these students under various arrangements? Why has it not lived up to its obligations to aboriginal peoples as guaranteed under section 35 of the Constitution?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this is a very timely question. I want to assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada is very proud of the leadership we have taken in increasing the funding for post-secondary aboriginal students from some $50 million a year, as it was at the time when the previous government left office in 1984, to almost $200 million this year, rising to $240 million by 1995.

The number of aboriginal students presently enrolled in post-secondary programs is 22,000 compared to 5,000 in 1984 and less than 1,000 when the Leader of the Opposition had the portfolio I presently preside over. Of these programs, 70 per cent are administered by aboriginal leadership and aboriginal organizations.

We would like to see all of these programs administered in the spirit of self-government by aboriginal leadership because this is a management problem. All aboriginal student in Canada can have access to a post-secondary education under the program that has been put in place by this government.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The math does not compute. On April 23, the Prime Minister announced to the chiefs at a First Nations Congress meeting in B.C. that a $320 million increase would be made to post-secondary education for that budget.

Nonetheless, we have a 30 per cent reduction or shortfall and we have students on the waiting list. This is totally unacceptable and this is a breach of the fiduciary that the government has for this responsibility.

I want to ask why there is such a blatant contradiction between the fine words of the Prime Minister to make this increase and the actions of that minister.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if we are talking about math, I think it is the math of the hon. member that is faulty. In fact on average every aboriginal student in Canada, over and above the normal support their receive in their communities as aboriginal students, receives an average of $10,000 per year to attend university, which is four times the cost of tuition and books.

As I said previously, this is but a management problem: 70 per cent of these programs are managed by aboriginal leadership and we are happy to work co-operatively with that leadership to ensure there is no hardship to any qualified student who should be attending university this year.

RACISM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This summer there were several ugly incidents of racial conflict in Montreal, Halifax and other cities. Unfortunately, there are signs of growing intolerance and racism in Canadian society.

Under these circumstances I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would show leadership by bringing in new measures to combat racism in Canada and, in particular, more effective affirmative action for the justice system, especially for the police, the courts, the prosecution and the parole system. Would he do that, please?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, since 1988, we have effectively moved the program of my department, the new Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, to combat racism and help eliminate racial discrimination and to bring forward programs that will help in integration and equality.

The member is referring to Halifax. We recently put together a small working committee with the province, of course. The Attorney General and the mayor were very co-operative and helpful. Black community leaders working together came forward with some 94 recommendations which are now being examined very carefully, a process that can help a whole community in its coming together to help overcome decades and decades of that inequality.

We have a very active plan for Montreal as well.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this supplementary question could be for the minister of employment.

As the government knows, racial conflict is often related to high unemployment. Since there is a clause in the Employment Equity Act requiring a full review of that law this year, would the government help these unemployed Canadians by proposing stronger sanctions to enforce this employment equity law?

I remind the government that the present law has not been successful in providing more jobs for the racial minorities in Canada and the other target groups.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that we are aware the Employment Equity Act is to be reviewed after five years. This timely social measure was introduced by our government. We are making gradual progress, and within the next few weeks we intend to announce on the floor of the House how we intend to revise this legislation, in consultation with those for whom the measure was intended, to make it more effective and ensure the kind of working conditions to which the four groups concerned by employment equity are entitled.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Last summer, the minister appointed the Lacoste Commission to review the Great Whale Project. My question to the minister is this: does he really think he has the right to do an assessment of the Great Whale project? What right does he have to examine Quebec's energy policy? And what right does he have to review Hydro-Quebec's business plan?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with its obligations as imposed by the courts, the federal government announced on July 10 that it intended to proceed with a comprehensive environmental assessment of the Great Whale project. We did so, keeping co-operation with Quebec foremost in our minds. In the mandate of what today is referred to as the Lacoste Commission, it says clearly that the commission will not examine the energy policies of the Government of Quebec.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Hydro-Quebec representatives told us they would refuse to appear before the Lacoste Commission because the Government of Canada was exceeding its authority, which is limited to migratory birds and marine mammals, and to Hudson Bay.

Could the Minister of the Environment explain why his Lacoste Commission is exceeding its mandate? And why does he want to force Hydro-Quebec to justify its business plan before a federal commission, something it is under no obligation to do under the present Constitution?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that in addition to the federal environmental assessment process provided under the agreement, we must comply with the terms of the federal environmental assessment and review process.

The hon. member for Shefford says no, Mr. Speaker. I just quoted a letter to the Quebec Environment Minister, dated November 20, 1989, and signed by Lucien Bouchard.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Last week Colgate Palmolive closed a plant in Toronto and moved some 250 jobs to the United States. The minister is aware of the fact that there is a growing concern in southern Ontario about the fear of permanently losing our manufacturing base.

We know that the minister has a strategy for competitiveness for the long term, but in the long term we are all going to be dead. What is the government going to do right now about this situation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what we are doing right now is getting interest rates down as much as we can. The Minister of Finance has commented on that on a number of occasions.

We have been promoting trade aggressively. I have been in five different countries in the last six months promoting international trade, promoting our exports, which will help our manufacturing community. In addition to that are some of the structural policies that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has just talked about and the GST which is designed to help the competitive position of manufacturers. All of these combined are what we are doing now, but I should reinforce the point that my colleague has made that the medium and longer term policies are equally important.

That is the essence of the consultation that we will be announcing with Canadians in general to have a national action plan to deal with this problem.

JUSTICE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Many people in Saskatchewan were appalled when the Minister of Justice recently appointed Devine cabinet minister Gary Lane to a position on the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, a position that Lane himself created.

The Canadian Bar Association has called for a two-year cooling off period before politicians can go to the bench. Why has the minister allowed her political partisanship to infringe upon the credibility of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: I am deeply concerned with the tone of the question. The minister may want to deal with it, but I am certainly not satisfied with that approach on the appointment of a judge.

TRANSPORTATION

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Transport.

This morning on Annapolis Valley radio, a source was quoted from Transport Canada as saying that the ferry service between Saint John, New Brunswick and Digby, Nova Scotia would be greatly reduced in that they would eliminate truck service as well as put it on a seasonal basis for car passengers. The source went on to say that it would not impact in the area.

Can the Prime Minister allow somebody from the department, a source, to talk about how this would impact on an area, whether it would impact or not, and will the Prime Minister tell this House that this is not a valid source and that this is not a policy of this government to cut off an area?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take note of that question for my hon. friend and will try to get back to her as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my regular question to the government House leader with regard to the business of the House for Friday, Monday and Tuesday.

While I am on my feet, I wonder if the government House leader could inform the House as to whether or not Monday or Tuesday of next week will be set aside for the introduction of the government's comprehensive position with respect to the Constitution, whether the government House leader could indicate to the House if they have reached a decision with regard to the funding that will be made available for the committee, and whether or not there can be further discussions between respective House leaders of the various parties in order to make sure there is a clear understanding of the nature of the funding, where it will be going, and the amounts that will be involved.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in terms of House business, let me say that it is my intention to call Bill C-21, the debt servicing bill, tomorrow for completion at second reading. Hopefully we will also be able to deal with the completion of third reading of Bill C-11.

On Monday it is my intention to begin second reading on Bill C-32, and I would like to have the usual discussions with opposition House leaders in terms of the business for the rest of the week.

With respect to the constitutional committee and its announcements, perhaps you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to let the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs answer those questions.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not do this very often, but just for greater certainty could I have the questions again.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the minister who is now listening could inform the House as to whether or not Tuesday of next week will be set aside for the Prime Minister and respective leaders, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of the NDP, and perhaps himself in terms of the government laying its proposal before Parliament with regard to constitutional reform, whether or not all the arrangements for the committee in terms of the funding and membership will be announced forthwith, or whether they are going to require further discussion among all parties.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his understanding of my brief predicament, which he has resolved.

It certainly would be our intention to have the Prime Minister present to Parliament on Tuesday morning, September 24, proposals for renewal of the Canadian federation with the expectation that that would provide an opportunity for the Leaders of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party to respond.

It would be my hope that there would be meetings with the relevant committees of the House today or tomorrow to give effect to the creation of the special joint committee that had been agreed to by the House earlier in the spring. I would hope that that committee would be in a position to hold its first meeting on Wednesday, September 25, when I would like to have the privilege of coming before the committee to present the proposals in more detail.

With respect to funding arrangements, those are matters that would have to be worked out by a committee of the House. I want to state a general inclination on the part of the government with regard to the functioning of this committee to seek for the most reasonable ways possible in which members of the three parties with standing in this House can work together to ensure that we achieve the kinds of reforms and changes that Canadians expect of us, and indeed, that we can involve to the greatest degree possible the imagination and the understanding of the people of the country in this process.

I have had some discussions with the Leader of the New Democratic Party regarding a particular question concerning participation of members who are not formal members of the committee. I think there has been an agreement worked out there that I trust and believe would recommend itself to all members of the committee.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to belabour the point. The minister has made reference that the committee will decide with regard to the funding for the purposes of research.

It was my understanding, and maybe I was under a false premise, that when I exchanged letters with the parliamentary secretary, which I believe the government House leader has, that we were going to have a decision sooner, as opposed to later, and that funding and the funding arrangements would not be funding which is going directly to the committee. It would go directly to the three parties which are represented in the House.

The government House leader and I have debated this point in private, but that was my understanding back in June.

I am wondering if the minister or, indeed, the government House leader could amplify that point.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there is no reluctance on this side to pursue funding of the form that the House leader of the opposition talked about.

It is a question of source and process. As he knows, the process is for the committee to meet to make a request for funding to meet its obligations and to be used for whatever purposes it decides. That request then comes back to the House. We usually deal with the House leaders first. If it is satisfactory, a motion is put to the House to request the funds.

There are no other pockets of money so to speak that we could get the funds to by-pass that process in order to provide the funds.

That is the process. There is no reluctance to proceed in a way that will facilitate the work of this committee and ensure that for the benefit of Canada, the right outcome occurs.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to put words in the mouth of the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, but am I right in assuming that we are looking at Tuesday, September 24, for the Prime Minister tabling the comprehensive position that the government has with regard to constitutional reform? Is that right?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is correct.

• (1510)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I wonder if he is in the position today to announce who the co-chairs of the special joint committee will be and if he cannot do it today, can he tell the House when that will happen?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do that at this moment.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the House leader or the minister responsible. The Constitution is so important that I am sure without requesting permission we could ask questions directly without giving notice. Having had a long time interest and having been a member of the committee in 1972 that travelled across Canada, am I to understand that on Tuesday there will be a debate or just a statement by three ministers and no questions by interested members? Is that the understanding? I did not check with my House leader because I did not expect this to come at this time.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the process is, using the rules of the House in the usual procedure, a statement by ministers, the statement by the Prime Minister in this case, at the end of which time he will table the paper which will then be referred to the committee set up by this House for consideration and initiation of public debate, discussion and consultation.

It is not intended, and indeed the hope is just the opposite, that we do not on that day at that precise time get into an extensive debate either about the contents or about the whole general constitutional situation. There will be ample time for that. This is simply the traditional mechanism of releasing a government document of some importance, a statement by ministers. That will be done.

As a senior parliamentarian, the hon. member will appreciate that there will be no press lock-up, that the only people who will see that in advance are the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party. Everyone else will receive it at the same time, including the media, whom I am sure will be surprised that they are not getting the favoured treatment they usually get.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prevail upon the government House leader too much, but since he has been somewhat generous in sharing with the House the activities which will take place on Tuesday, perhaps he and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs could indicate to the House as to when the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party will see the proposal of the Government of Canada?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the schedules of the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party allow, that there would be a full briefing for each of them on Monday. I think it is the expectation that there would be a briefing without a document available to each of the spokespersons of the two official opposition parties probably earlier in that day on the Monday.

John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 84(1), I have the honour to lay upon the table copies of the notice of ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act and related acts, and I ask that pursuant to Standing Order 84(2) an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of said motion.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse (p. 2361).

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, so far, on this particular motion, I think we have had a very good debate. It has been quite stimulating and somewhat illuminating. I must say that to some extent I have mixed feelings about the motion. On the one hand I wish that it were not necessary to have this kind of debate. If things were not so difficult down on the farm, I guess we could be dealing with some other matters, talking about some other important issues. So that is on the negative side.

On the positive side, I welcome this motion. I welcome the debate around it because the motion reflects something that was already done some days ago near the end of August in a meeting of our Standing Committee on Agriculture. What we did was pass a motion almost identical to the one that is before us now. What is so encouraging about that is we had all-party support for that motion in the Standing Committee on Agriculture. It would be very encouraging if the same thing happened here in the House of Commons because, after all, the purpose of this motion and the purpose of this debate is to help the lot of farmers, to help them face the challenge that is before them right now and it is a very difficult one.

The hon. Minister for Grains and Oilseeds has already indicated that the government will not be supporting this motion. I find that discouraging and I will tell you why. I think what it does is it sends mixed signals to the agricultural community. On the one hand we go out of our way to listen to the farmers and hear what they say, to recognize the terrible problems that they face. Yet, when it comes to a motion like this which, in effect, says there is a problem out there and it has to be addressed right now, the hon. minister of grains and oilseeds says: "I cannot support that."

Now the minister says he cannot support it because of rules of the House and rules according to parliamentary procedures that go way back to Runnymede, hundreds and hundreds of years ago. But the fact of the matter is that the motion points out and really says, on behalf of the House, that if it is passed it is in no way an expression of non-confidence in the government. So I cannot see, for the life of me, why the government cannot support the motion. It does send a mixed signal to the farming community.

Now there are other mixed signals too, distressing signals that I want to point out. For example, the important issue, the issue that is concentrating the minds of farmers at this moment has to do with emergency assistance.

Yesterday, in the House, I said to the hon. Minister of Agriculture that we do not need any more information as to what has gone on in the past few months. We do not need any information with respect to what farmers might expect under the safety net programs GRIP and NISA. We have that information already. What we do not have is what the government is going to do in the way of emergency aid, that is what we are looking for and that is the information that we want. Yet, the Minister of Agriculture, yesterday, refused to deal with that question.

I must say, and again it is discouraging, that the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds stood up in the House today and he spoke for a long time, 20 minutes or more, and hardly addressed this matter of emergency assistance except to say that he recognizes the problem, he has great feeling for it and they will do as much as they can. Well that is not a lot of information.

It seems to me that if the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds have some very serious problems in cabinet or elsewhere, I think they should be telling us what those problems are. You never know. We might be able to help them a little bit.

• (1520)

There was a mention in the House this morning about playing politics with this issue. Yesterday I said in the House, as part of a question, that there was going to be a rally in Brandon, Manitoba, today. Actually, it is tomorrow. That was an inadvertent statement on my part.

Yet the Minister of Agriculture chose to play politics with that. He chose to score brownie points on me because I inadvertently gave the wrong date. The Minister of Agriculture can go around and abuse me, and that is fine and dandy. However, he should not be playing politics with farmers, and he should not be trivializing the situation faced by the farming community.

Mr. Duhamel: It was a cheap shot.

Mr. Harvard: I wanted to put those remarks on the record because I think farmers can be somewhat confused by what is coming out of the House. On the one hand we say we are concerned, that we are listening, and we recognize the problems, and want to do a lot. Yet we hear some of these remarks which, if not 180 degrees, are at variance to some of those expressions.

I think we should, as best as we can as politicians, as members of Parliament, be very clear in what we are saying because we are dealing with an extremely serious situation down on the farm. I know that the member for Mackenzie was extremely eloquent this morning when explaining the kinds of problems faced by farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you that there have been changes in the way we help farmers. We have gone from an old ad hoc approach to providing assistance to something that is a little bit more predictable called GRIP and NISA. The old program is gone. That was for the old days. GRIP and NISA are for the future more or less, even if that is the immediate future, a few months down the road. The problem we have, and this is why the farmers are crying out for emergency assistance, is what do we do in the interim. What do we do to tide the farmers over from the old system to the new system? This is where the so-called third line of defence comes in. This is where transitional assistance comes in, or call it emergency payments. Call it what you will, but the farmers are in desperate need and they need that help now.

There is a shortfall there of $1 billion, maybe a little less, but it is around $1 billion. What we have been trying to do is get the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds to address that shortfall of about $1 billion and let there be no question. There was, there is, there remains on the record a commitment from the government to provide that assistance, to provide that so-called third line of defence payment.

It must happen and it must happen soon because if we wait for GRIP, if we wait for NISA, it is going to be too long. There are going to be some farmers gone, some very good farmers gone, by the end of the year if we wait around. There is no time to fool around.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to go through a litany of figures to tell you just how serious it is. But let me touch on a paragraph in a statement made by prairie pools not too long ago. In fact it was August 29, the very day the Standing Committee on Agriculture met here in Ottawa. Let me read one paragraph: "The five-year-long trade war has taken a significant toll on the grains and oilseeds industry. Net cash income in 1991 will be 5 per cent less than it was last year and 39 per cent lower than the average for the last five years. If the cost of investment and machinery, equipment, and buildings is taken into account there will be only about $1.1 billion to grains and oilseeds producers to cover living expenses". Put another way, said vice-chairman Leroy Larsen, and I quote: "Unless they have some other source of income, the average farm family will have to live on between $5,000 and $6,000 in 1991"—$5,000 and $6,000 in 1991. That is less than one third of the low income cut-off or poverty line for a family of four, which has been set at just over $19,000.

We have a serious situation. I am glad that this kind of a motion is before us. I am happy that we have had this kind of debate. I just hope that we can come to grips with this situation as soon as possible.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on his remarks. We know this member has a tremendous amount of experience in the area of communications.

Speaking as one urban member of Parliament, we quite often sit in this House and listen to these debates on agricultural matters and are naturally not as knowledgeable as many of our members who have rural ridings. I also believe that many of our constituents in urban areas are not as familiar with the complexities that surround this issue.

For example, when I listened to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board this morning, he talked about the tremendous subsidies that the European countries were giving to their farmers and said they were virtually holding our farmers in this country hostage. They were creating a situation where even with all the cash assistance that hopefully this government will be advancing soon, it still does not correct the problem in the long term.

I was wondering, as I was listening to the minister for the Wheat Board this morning and my hon. colleague just recently, if it would be more effective for us as a country to have these meetings debating agricultural subsidies not just with the bureaucrats and the politicians. Somehow we should communicate to the communities at large, not only in Europe, but also in our country, just exactly what is going on in terms of subsidies.

I know how effective the Greenpeace campaign was in terms of the baby seals. There are many other examples in terms of the rain forest.

I wonder if the hon. member could react to what his views would be in terms of communicating these problems to major urban markets, not only here but also in Europe.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague has made a very good suggestion. I think we have to communicate better on this issue. This is not just a farm issue. It is an urban issue. It is a national issue. The farmers feed all of us. They feed themselves and they feed the people who live in the urban areas of the country. In fact, this is really a food security issue. That is how important it is. We are not just talking about saving a few farmers. We are talking about the very security of the country.

I have said this before and I will say it again. If a country, be it Canada or any other country in the world, cannot feed itself, if it does not have a stable agricultural community, if it does not have farmers who can make ends meet, that country is in terrible shape. If the farm community goes down, the rest of the country will not be far behind.

I think that my hon. colleague from Toronto is absolutely right. We do have to come together on this issue because we are all involved in it.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the contributions of farmers and the agri-food industry is this nation's lifeline. We just heard a minute ago how important the food industry is to any person in this world. It is very clear in Ethiopia how important food is. It is very clear in the Soviet Union how important the food and agricultural industry are. It is important to the European Community because it suffered 40 years ago with no food. It must be important to all Canadians.

The Canadian food industry as well as the farm community in this country today is in jeopardy. All Canadians must share a common goal of making certain that the farm community is raised to much better status than it is presently. I believe that the people in government, the people in the opposition, can all agree to that tenet. We must agree to that and we must work toward that today—not tomorrow, not in the future sometime, but today.

In my riding of Essex—Kent we have a very, very bad situation in the agricultural community. In the last four years poor weather has caused disaster in the agricultural community. I have seen plants leave my riding. Nabisco is one good example of a plant that was very productive and had to leave; Hunt-Wesson, another one that was very, very important in producing canned goods; Olinda, which is on the verge of being brought back. We are talking about hundreds of workers being laid off in factories in my riding, hundreds of farmers losing contracts, and certainly a disaster in the drought right now.

A lot of people would say "well, the farm community is protected a bit by crop insurance". Well, let me tell you and tell the people of Canada that crop insurance is based on the average of the last five years production. In my riding it happens to be that we have had disastrous weather conditions in four of those five years—drought, floods, drought, hail, all things which the farm community could not control, and yet things that have caused the dollars and cents coming into my community, into Essex County and into Kent County, to be far diminished.

This year I understand if we were to look at the local situation in Essex County alone, we are talking about 40 to 60 per cent of our farm community in dire financial straits. Half the people in Essex County in agriculture are in dire straits. Essex and Kent counties are, without a doubt, the best agricultural producing counties in this country, and yet they feel this pressure, they feel these problems.

Why has this occurred? We know that there are disastrously low prices throughout the world on many, many commodities. A colleague of mine, Ralph Ferguson, has written a document using Statistics Canada documents and co-ordinated that material. He has called it Compare the Share. In this document he very clearly points out that we have farm commodity products which are basically the same price today that they were ten years ago. Minor increases in some of those products, but the cost to the consumer out of the farm is the same. Our consumers, looking on the grocery shelf, would never visualize that to be the case. We have seen high increases in the products that Canadian consumers are buying, yet at the farm gate those prices have not increased.

When I look at the soya bean, the corn and the winter wheat commodities in Essex County alone, we have a $40 million loss in just those three commodities.

I think that when we realize that and we add to it—the vegetable processing industry down $6 million in 1989 figures and the tender fruit industry down $1.6 million—we certainly realize that there is a disaster in my area.

We can look at how the farm is operating in a riding such as mine. What have the farmers done over the last four years when they have had disastrous conditions and disastrously low prices because of climate? They have gone out and borrowed money to plant more crops. They have borrowed money to make sure that the debts on the farm are paid.

As a result, all the past reserves of funds they have are now gone. Older farmers who have retired have taken money out of what they considered their retirement funds, and have put it in to help the younger people who are farming in my area.

When we look at the total situation, we certainly realize that our farm community today cannot survive if it does not receive some pretty strong help very quickly.

Off farm income is being affected as well. Many farmers kept their farms going by working in the small store, in the manufacturing industry or by having a job in a factory. That is not happening today. In my riding of Essex—Kent because of free trade, because of the recession, many of those jobs have been lost.

We are talking about thousands of jobs lost in almost every community throughout my area. At the same time, the small business person is feeling a tremendous amount of pressure because that small business is not having the same dollars flow into it.

People are being laid off in the manufacturing sector. People who are not receiving decent farm incomes are not buying the products in small stores. They are not buying the products on main street in small towns.

The result is those merchants are suffering tremendously as well. They are laying people off, and therefore, what might be considered a job that a farm wife, son or farmer himself could have has been lost in my riding. Add to that, the cross-border shopping crisis and you have a major disaster, one that we really must look at and treat very carefully.

It is not a situation where we can sit back and say: "Well, we put a program in place and there will be dollars coming next year to answer some of these problems." That is nonsense.

We applauded the putting into place of the GRIP and NISA programs to help the farm community. However, from the 1991 crop, no dollars appear except in some possible interim payment. No dollars appear until 1992.

There was a year in there. The 1989–90 crop year was never addressed. The minister said that there would be money for that 1989 crop year. They would treat that as a third line defence, and they would make sure there were funds available for the farm community then.

Many people in my riding still have their commodities in storage. Many of them have sold them for far less dollars than the cost to produce them, and they are in dire trouble. I talked to a farmer the other day who said: "My crop is sitting in storage. I owe more in storage than I can sell that crop for." When we realize that those are normal situations for a lot of our growers, then we know the disaster that people are in. We realize this nation has to come forward and help those farmers.

That does not even deal with the horticultural problem. There are no GRIP payments for the horticultural problem. There are no support payments in that area to help other farmers who are finding it just as disastrous.

I believe that our federal government must very seriously consider the problems that our farming community is facing and act accordingly, or we will have a national disaster concerning food. When we stop and think about it, I do not see a younger farm community coming up. I am seeing older farmers having tremendous problems surviving on the farm and younger people not willing to take on those burdens.

I see my time is getting a little short. I also believe that it is not just a federal problem but that it relates to the Ontario problem as well. I must make a point of the fact that our Ontario government, at the same time, must make certain that they do their fair share of support.

When I looked at the program in NISA that is available, the federal government will put in .5 per cent more money if the province would support the NISA program as well, meaning a fair amount more dollars. Some $24 million could be brought into the Ontario farm community if our provincial colleagues would come up with a fair bit more funding in the NISA program.

I also believe that the government has offered to bring up the $50 million which it offered in farm support for our community. Those dollars are sadly lacking and should be brought forward at this present time.

There is also some question about the stabilization payments. The federal government has asked that the provinces top up stabilization by 5 per cent if the federal government tops it up from 90 per cent to 95 per cent, which would bring Ontario farmers into 100 per cent stabilization payment. I believe that should occur.

There are many things that both levels of government should be doing which I, unfortunately, feel they are not.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by sincerely congratulating all the members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I believe the motion that was passed unanimously in that standing committee of the House, the motion presented by my hon. colleague from Algoma and seconded by my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings, was somewhat instrumental in leading to the motion we have before us today brought forward by the member from Mackenzie.

Like many other parts of Ontario, my riding of Stormont—Dundas contains a number of producers who face a rather bleak economic future if third line of defence emergency cash assistance is not made available to them by the government.

Producers throughout Ontario have been hit hard and many are facing severe cash flow difficulties. GRIP is too far off to help at this time. There must be some sort of transitional assistance.

There is also concern in the industry that the government may take money from GRIP to give producers money now when it will be needed for the next crop year. This would not be appropriate in my estimation. Emergency assistance must be based on the principles of GRIP, but not obtained from GRIP.

I would like to ask my colleague from Essex—Kent what he believes will be the long-term consequences for Canadian agriculture if—and I hope not—the government fails to implement emergency assistance at the earliest opportunity to cope with the crisis which is now facing Canadian producers?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the very astute question that he puts forward because, when we look at dollars and cents that are put into programs, if we are robbing next year's funding in order to keep somebody floating or keep somebody economically viable today, we are really not supporting that person. We are throwing a lifeline only it is going half way out to the person who needs the lifeline.

What must happen—and I believe there is no question in the agricultural community—is that they have to look at the crop that is presently there, the one that no support has come forward for, and apply GRIP principles to that, the same as if GRIP was in place and not just borrow from next year's GRIP payments to keep somebody in a position where they can make their NISA payments this year.

The reason that the interim payment was suggested, in my opinion, is that the government felt we must have some funding available so farmers could pay the NISA payments required to enter the program. As a result, an interim payment was suggested in GRIP. That interim payment in GRIP will only go back into the government coffers to cover the NISA costs. In many cases, therefore, the farm community will not come up with any extra dollars, will not have the dollars to plant the crop next year. They will have a few dollars to enter and pay into a program.

I think it is inherent upon all of us to realize that we have a crop that has been there for a year, that has been promised some support and that support is not forthcoming. My colleague is suggesting to me what possibly could happen if those payments are not made or if the support does not come.

I can clearly suggest that if half the farmers in my riding are in serious financial difficulty, adding more dollar and cent pressure to them will only put them under. Therefore, our agri-food industry is in jeopardy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order the hon. opposition House leader.

Mr. Dingwall: I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the government is going to be able to have a minister sit through the proceedings for the remainder of this day which is an allotted day to my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. There was a period of time when there was no member of the cabinet on the front benches. I am just wondering if perhaps, Mr. Speaker, through you to the members opposite, you could ascertain whether or not ministers will have the time to participate in the proceedings that are taking place here today.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition, who knows the Standing Orders very well, that one cannot point out the presence or absence of a colleague in the House.

I am pleased to recognize the Minister of State for Agriculture. Resuming debate.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as Minister of State, I want to add to what my colleagues have said about the situation facing Canadian farmers, which is the subject of the motion by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Speaker, we must admit that the difficulties are not confined to one region of Canada. At the present time, grains and oilseeds in Ontario are in a similar situation to the one in the West. Horticulture has very varied problems, including adverse weather conditions in eastern Canada. In your very beautiful riding, Mr. Speaker, it has delighted vacationers, but we must also admit that it has been the despair of the many market gardeners in your riding and the horticulturists in mine.

The motion before us, however well-intentioned it may be for farmers, suggests that governments are indifferent to the situation, are doing nothing to remedy it or are sitting on their hands. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. Previous speakers have shown that. The federal government has dealt with the need for various types of transitional programs for the implementation of measures to help farmers across Canada.

Farmers are expected to receive $3 billion in income support for 1991, of which nearly $2 billion will come from the federal government. This means that 61 per cent of this aid will be redistributed by the federal government throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, the complex problems facing modern farming were never really attacked on so many fronts at once before we did. I remember that with the previous agriculture minister nearly two years ago, we set up twelve task forces to analyse all the programs for farming across the country. These task forces have done outstanding work over the last two years; the reports are not all in and have not all been implemented, but they helped us see the complexity of the problems.

It is not always simply a matter of giving money but also of protecting farming on a long-term basis.

The motion before us today, Mr. Speaker, suggests that we have not provided any third-line assistance under our general income security plan for farmers. This overlooks the farm support and adjustment program. Like a third line of defence, it adds $600 million to the total aid given under our two basic programs, more than $400 million of which will be spent in 1991. It also overlooks all the adjustments already proposed by the national horticulture income security committee for 1990 and 1991.

It is true that we use regular programs including NISA as a vehicle for several of these support measures. It is also true, Mr. Speaker, that discussion with the provinces on their participation in the NISA program is dragging on and has not yet given all the results expected of it. Nevertheless, it is estimated that it will provide $356 million in aid to farming in 1991. I am not unduly surprised that it takes some time to implement these programs. They were developed and prepared by the farmers themselves, who worked with us, the provincial and federal governments, in preparing long-term defence programs for farmers. They made these programs; the government did not impose them on farmers. The government did not. Farmers themselves prepared them with us.

Of course there is an adjustment period. It is natural, I believe, for a government that listens to the provinces and the farmers' associations to hold effective discussions with the provinces and have adjustment measures that give it and the provinces some flexibility.

La Presse agricole de l'Ontario said that grain growers in that province hoped that an agreement on the Net Income Stabilization Account would be reached as soon as possible. Ontario has already announced that it would make interim payments to its farmers under GRIP. Mr. Speaker, under this program, grain growers in Canada may have earned as much as $6.5 billion for the last crop year. We may regret the long and demanding process involved. We can't afford to short-circuit the process or get rid of it altogether or jeopardize its effectiveness by making decisions on the spur of the moment which, I admit, is sometimes tempting in the circumstances.

What the government is trying to achieve in the agricultural sector is the kind of stability that is economically sustainable and does not have to be constantly challenged and rebuilt. The whole point of linking third-line-of-defence assistance programs to existing, longer term programs is to help producers in all regions, in Quebec, Ontario, Western Canada and the Maritimes, opt into long-term protection programs, so that in the middle or at the end of the crop season, the government does not have to intervene with ad hoc programs, something everybody in this country deplores. That is exactly why we set up long-term programs, and now we are being criticized for using those programs as a vehicle for providing assistance to farm producers.

The process is a lengthy one. We must be patient and prudent, at a time when the finances of both provincial and federal governments are under severe constraints. The multifacetted measures we are trying to introduce are intended as a response to an extremely complex situation. Their efficiency and effectiveness can easily be compromised if we fail to act cautiously. If all the gears are not carefully adjusted, we may end up with a machine that won't run. The intricacies of this process were explained by Mr. Mazankowski, Minister of Agriculture at the time, at the federal-provincial meeting of Agriculture ministers in Regina last March. On that occasion he reminded his audience that it would be simplistic to calculate farm assistance on the basis of a comparison between 1990 and 1991 incomes. He said that this approach had been tried for the past five years and had always left us with a problem. We could no longer afford a stop-gap solution that would only be effective for another year.

The 12-point program he proposed at the time was built around the two new programs we are trying to implement systematically today. There would also be a third line of defence which for 1991 would have a component that would apply to the grain and horticultural sectors.

Mr. Speaker, this has been done. In fact, we are ahead of schedule because the program will apply to 1990-91. We cannot do more without jeopardizing the structure of the program, especially if we act without good reason.

Mr. Speaker, hasty actions and generous hand-outs are no way to provide our farmers with a lasting solution to their problems. Many conditions were identified as essential to the success of farming, that we care about, but they are far from being met. A lot needs to be done yet, Mr. Speaker. Take the unfair trade practices which are responsible for the hardship suffered by our grain industry. They have not been eliminated, far from it. The GATT negotiations resumed this week, thank goodness, albeit at a snail's pace. Undaunted by the opposition it faces, Canada fiercely carries on to have its position recognized.

On that point, Mr. Speaker, I must say that Canada was most careful in developing its position to be put forward at GATT. We brought together farming groups from across Canada; we established an advisory group; we met with the provinces. The position we put forward and still defend, Mr. Speaker, has not changed. The Minister of Agriculture reaffirmed that fact in this House yesterday, in response to a question from the opposition. Our position has not changed, Mr. Speaker, and it will not change. We realize that our position is miles away from the American and European' positions. Changes have been taking place recently, and Canada is now somewhere in the middle. Based on a basic principle of physics, we are pretty confident that, if the parties are drawn closer together, they will necessarily adopt positions closer to our own, since we are in the middle. We will certainly do our best to make that happen. We will spare no effort, hopefully with the support of the opposition parties and the members of this House, to ensure that the Canadian position is recognized at the GATT. Because it is sensible, of course, but mainly because it reflects perfectly Canada's historical position as well as the farm producers' position.

As far as international trade is concerned, the Canada US trade agreement which has proven beneficial nevertheless confirms the need for constant vigilance. You know, the funny thing is that the members opposite who were against the Free Trade Agreement strangely enough keep pretty quiet when it comes to the Canadian agri-food industry. The reason is, Mr. Speaker, that agri-food products exported to the US have increased by approximately 30 per cent over the first two years since the FTA was implemented. More than 30 per cent, Mr. Speaker! Now, the deficit we had incurred because of the need to buy fruit and vegetables out of season, that $700 million plus deficit was brought down to $300 million by the end of last year which means that we had already done a lot of catching up as a result of our export increases.

It was constructive and positive long-term work because we need to ensure our farmers' income security. That is a long-term proposition. It does not involve temporary measures adopted ad hoc every year, not as part of an overall plan.

As has been said many times, we cannot help it that our competitiveness is an "in" topic in all regions of the country. We realized that despite the considerable efforts made in recent years, we had forgotten that Canada could not afford to lose its competitiveness. You cannot export or sell your products elsewhere in the world, even to another province of Canada, if you do not remain competitive. That holds true for the agri-food sector, Mr. Speaker. It is especially true for farming because we, western farmers in particular, will depend very heavily on exporting our products abroad, not only in the West but also in Ontario and Quebec. We are exporters. The strength and vitality of the Canadian economy has been its ability to export.

Mr. Speaker, it will not be possible to remain strong, to remain the exporting country we have always been, if we do not act quickly, taking drastic action in some cases, to ensure that Canadian industries are competitive.

Our competitiveness will depend on quality products that attract increasingly well-informed consumers. I believe that the markets have room for higher-priced upscale Canadian products in some cases. However, for the same quality, needless to say, lower production costs will always carry the day. To stay ahead, we must find ways to produce at lower cost and always remain on the alert to be ready to use the most efficient and productive methods.

Farming feeds the whole food-processing industry. Processing can be the key to success for the whole agri-food sector. If it can rely on high grade commodities produced at competitive costs, a creative industry can work wonders on the market and promote both production and economic diversification. It was the case, I remember, with the chicken industry and the poultry industry as a whole.

I think that about 40 per cent—give or take a couple of per cents—of all poultry products on the market today were not available just five years ago if they were produced at all. This goes to show that, owing to the vitality of that sector, product diversity was increased, products became more easily available to consumers and the needs of the consumers were better met. That is tomorrow's challenge, Mr. Speaker. When our log exports were frozen in 1985 or 1986, we ended up increasing our pork processing activities, therefore creating new jobs in this country to process the products, give them added value and export those products to the United States and to Japan. That is the kind of challenge facing our farm industry. I think that there is no two way about this. These are tomorrow's challenges. We should not delude ourselves in thinking that we can maintain the same farming system and keep our borders more or less closed forever. That is just not possible. We must use whatever means at our disposal—the quality of our products and of our workforce—to ensure we are capable of facing the challenges of the 21st century.

We will have no choice either but to support, in a creative way I might add, our Canadian agriculture where the marketing boards are very active on the domestic market. They too will have to adjust to new realities and, in many cases, to a shrinking market. To ensure our survival in that context, we will need high grade products and a greater sensitivity to market trends.

The point is, if only it could be conveyed to the entire nation, that the growth of our farm industry depends on the confidence the farm producers will have in their industry in the years to come, and their ability to adapt to new realities.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to hear the minister's comments. I would like to ask the minister this. A couple years ago there was the Growing Together paper and a number of task forces were announced which were going to change the face of agriculture. To date we have had just one piece of legislation, that being the GRIP and NISA farm income. Farmers across the country are very concerned about what is happening next, in particular with respect to farm finance and transportation. I think those are two of the areas that have caused a lot of concern.

I am wondering if the minister can say when we can expect some legislation with respect to farm finance under the Growing Together task force report and with respect to transportation. Is it going to be coming soon? There is a piece of legislation that is before the House that is going to limit spending in this country by 3 per cent. I understand that GRIP and NISA legislation are exempt from that bill, but what effect will that piece of legislation have on any farm finance or transportation bills that will be coming forth?

Mr. Blais: First of all, I would say that those two programs, GRIP and NISA, were designed by the producers themselves. In agriculture we have the chance to have three, four or five meetings of ministers of agriculture every year. We are in touch all the time. We met in Kananaskis, Alberta and in Regina last year. In Kananaskis in July the ministers and the deputy ministers agreed to look at transportation. Not the federal government unilaterally, it is not working that way. We are working together.

We received information on that. Not everyone agrees on how we should address the situation. What we want is a real consensus from all parties. The pay to producer formula has been raised. We do not have an agreement from all parts. We have different opinions from all parts of Canada. What we are trying to find is one way to deal with the transportation situation to ensure that by doing something in one region of Canada we are not going to put pressure on another region, or resolve a problem in one area and create another problem in another area, in Ontario, Quebec or even Saskatchewan. Some provinces do not prefer the same approach for those problems.

What we have to do is get opinions from the provinces, from the producers, groups of producers and work together to find a final solution. The work that has been done by the task force was very good and very helpful. We are still working on that. On the finance side I would say that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, will announce very good news for Saskatchewan today, but I will let my colleague—

An hon. member: It has been announced.

Mr. Blais: We have moved the headquarters of the FCC to Regina. That is good news for Saskatchewan.

• (1610)

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to question the Minister of State on that last point. He mentioned during the course of his speech that he did not believe in ad hoc measures and that he did not believe in benefitting one area to the detriment of another.

I find it rather interesting that there is a Saskatchewan election on the way and that very recently the premier of Saskatchewan announced his fair share program which moves jobs out of Regina and into rural Saskatchewan. At that time there was speculation that part of the deal was that his friend the Prime Minister would then move jobs from other parts of Canada into Regina to fill the void left by the moves of his friend, Premier Grant Devine.

I, and I think all my colleagues in the official opposition, find this playing ping–pong with peoples' lives to be rather cruel. It is a hoax that has absolutely nothing to do with good agricultural policy, and absolutely nothing to do with good management of the government. In his reply to my question which will come momentarily, the minister might want to tell us what the cost of this move is and how much of that money might otherwise be going directly to farmers. He might also want to tell us exactly why he and his minister and the Prime Minister are playing politics with peoples' lives in trying to buy Grant Devine's election.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit surprised that the hon. member would take such a partisan approach. Maybe the hon. member who just put the motion should have listened to what was said. We have tried to answer to the concerns of farmers all across the country. It would be better for them to talk to the provinces that have really not put their fair share of money into agriculture in Canada.

Look at the debt. We should be very proud of what we have done over the years, very proud because the federal government has put a lot of money into agriculture. If the hon. member would look at the data, the provinces did not really put in their fair share. In some areas, particularly in Saskatchewan over the last two or three years, a lot of work has been done to provide funds in order to answer the needs of farmers. I would say that the data speaks for itself. When more than 60 per cent of the loans are made in Saskatchewan, it might be a good decision to transfer the headquarters of the FCC to Saskatchewan.

If the hon. member thinks it is not a good idea, perhaps it is because she is from the Ottawa area. The hon. member has the right to her own opinion, but I think a good decision has been made for the farmers and for agriculture in Canada.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the participation of the hon. minister in the debate and the brief outline of the government's positions on international trade.

He said that the Canadian tradition is reasonable. I was pleased to hear that because this morning we heard the view of the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds which was definitely anything but reasonable. He was not taking a position between the Americans and the Europeans as this minister describes the official government line to be. The Minister of Grains and Oilseeds was damning the Europeans outright and blaming all the trade war on the Europeans. He was ignoring the marketing facts, that 40 per cent of the grains market in the world is controlled by the United States. Only about 20 per cent, usually slightly less, is made up of sales from the dozen or more countries making up the European Economic Community and approximately the same by Canada.

The U.S. dominates the trade. They set the price.

If we are going to do anything about price, raining our damnation on the Europeans is not going to solve the problem. I hope that this minister will be a little more forthright at the cabinet table and make certain that some of the rest of his colleagues follow what he says is the government line once we get beyond the borders of this country.

When I hear him, it makes much more sense than when I listen to the minister for grains and oilseeds whose position makes no sense at all and defies reason.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would say to my hon. friend that we have been in that business for years and years. He knows very well that when I say that we are between the Europeans and the Americans, what I ment was that with the balanced position we have with the supply–management system where we ask to strengthen and clarify Article XI of GATT, we are put in the middle because we have some allies in Europe, in Asia and other areas. The Americans are very cold to the Canadian position. That is what I mean.

For the grain sector, I agree with the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds. Obviously, we have defended our position for years and years for the export subsidy war that we have. We all ask for those subsidies that destroyed our agriculture in the west to be put aside.

What I meant when I said that was that it put us in the middle. On the other side, the supply-management system is supported by the opposition and the whole agriculture community across the country. It put us in a more delicate situation and more in the middle. I do not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, with leave of the House, do I have your permission to put a question to the Minister of State (Agriculture)?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre to exceed the ten-minute period for questions and comments?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Agreed. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Minister, in your answer yesterday regarding Canada's position on Article XI in the present GATT talks in Europe and our concerns in this respect, you said in concluding that until the government decided otherwise, it would defend Article XI. I would appreciate an answer from the Minister of State (Agriculture). Does this mean that despite any pressure from other parties, you still have a moral commitment to Canadian farmers to maintain this article which is extremely important for the agricultural industry? Do you have a moral commitment?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question put by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, and I would like to clarify Canada's position, because I know there are various rumours doing the rounds about Canada's position on Article XI. Mr. Speaker, Canada's position on Article XI is clear and has not changed one bit. We support Article XI. We want it to be clarified and reinforced, because its present wording, and everyone is agreed on this point, does not give us the kind of flexibility we would like for our marketing board programs.

The problem, Mr. Speaker—and I think it is useful to repeat this, since it is an important point—the problem is that among those who support this position in Europe and elsewhere, some parties may be more reluctant to support us. However, although some people might have changed their minds, this does not mean that Canada has changed its mind. We have not changed our position. We have no intention of doing so, but we must be vigilant, and I am sure I can count on the hon. member's support. We must be extremely vigilant to ensure that we can maintain a strong position in the international community among 99 or 100 other countries, a position that will be and that continues to be to defend Article XI and to reinforce and clarify it. That is where we are now.

A week or two from now I will in Geneva, Mr. Speaker, to meet the Director General of GATT, and I will also be meeting the President of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec very shortly, in Europe, to discuss this matter.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate today which I think, without question, concerns a very, very important motion.

At the outset I think we should emphasize that this motion was passed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture in the last week in August. It was passed unanimously, which means that all members present and all parties supported this motion at that time. It disappoints me greatly that the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds this morning told this House and Canadians why today his party cannot support the motion. It makes it very clear that in the motion and in the statement following the motion, it would not be considered by anyone as a vote of non-confidence in the government. I think we should make it very clear that the government members said on August 28 or 29—I forget the date—they support the motion, but today they are indicating that when they vote on it next Monday night—I believe it is going to be a deferred vote—they are not going to support it. I think that begs the question of Conservatives, did they mean what they said at the standing committee or not?

Anyway, on with the topic. What we are talking about here, Mr. Speaker, is a very, very important industry. It is a wealth-creating industry in this country, and there are only four of them: fishing, farming, forestry and mining. Everything that we have, as I said before in this House, before us and used as Canadians comes from one of those basic natural resources. We go on with farming and with all of them. We provide for the needs of ourselves and our society from that. We have an industry here that is in bad trouble, a bad financial situation.

There are 425,000 to 450,000 Canadians involved in the industry. There are many total communities that are involved in that industry. At the present time, we have a tremendous amount of disappointment in the government and what it has said in the last two or three years and what has happened. The minister who just spoke said that the plans and the support programs that have been put in place for the future were done in conjunction with and with the assistance of the farming community, and indeed farmers themselves and their organizations. I agree, that did take place, Mr. Speaker. But when those groups were asked to come forward and take part in planning their future and come up with the right ideas, they were told and they were led and they were shown very clearly by the government that in the transition from our old ad hoc type assistance programs to agriculture to a new safety net program, that in that transitional period they would not be let down.

However, that let-down has happened. Producers in this country, primary producers in the agricultural industry, are asking the government to reconsider and to live up to that promise and that commitment, and that has not come forward.

That is why I am getting phone calls from farm suppliers. That is why I am getting phone calls from individuals, from farmers who say "Lyle, I took over my father's farm. My father had some savings and some equity in the business, but I cannot survive. My parents are putting more money into my business every year and now they are having everything they had disappear". In the meantime our food producing abilities in this country are going down the drain and closing up every day, day after day.

I just want to give the public some information to look at. Ontario soft winter wheat farmers this year got $75 a tonne for the wheat they delivered in August from this year's crop.

Last year I believe that was $115 per tonne or $120 per tonne. I asked how many people took that type of drop. If we just want to convert that to what the farmer gets out of that, in a 500-gram box of cereal which is said to be 100 per cent wheat, at $75 a tonne the farmer got less than 4¢ for the wheat that was in that box of cereal that probably sold for three dollars-plus in the grocery store.

In 1933, if we look at the figures, the price relative to what farmers are getting for their products compared to the cost of living and the cost of doing business today is as bad or worse than it was in the dirty thirties.

In 1933 it took about three bushels of wheat for a man to get a haircut. Today it takes five. I am using wheat, although I could use other crops, but that seems to be the one we use as a yardstick.

For an average retirement home in 1933 it took less than 7,000 bushels of wheat. If a farmer sold that, he could buy an average retirement home. In 1991, instead of less than 7,000 bushels of wheat, it will take 60,000 bushels of wheat. That is some comparison.

In 1933 the average man's dress shirt would take five bushels of wheat. You could sell that and go to town and buy a dress shirt. Today it takes 15 bushels of wheat. I could go on, but I think that brings home the point.

There is another matter. Farmers keep saying to me: "Lyle, we have concerns about the environment, but are we not a little bit out of whack? Where are we here?" We talk about sustainable agriculture and sustainable environment, et cetera. Yes, I agree with this sustainable environment and I promote it and I support it. But I maintain that unless an industry is sustainable economically, it cannot sustain the environment as well. If the industry is not there, so what?

I have farmers and individuals and other business people who have nothing to do with agriculture coming to me and saying: "Are we not a little out of whack?" In society today it takes between $150 to $200 to dump, or the term that is used is to "tip" a load of garbage. That is on average what it takes to get rid of a load of garbage in today's society.

The Ontario farmer gets $75 for a tonne of wheat. As one chap said to me the other day, why do we not eat the garbage and dump the wheat? We cannot survive on that. Nobody can survive on that.

The other fact I want to mention is that the average farmer in Canada today feeds between 95 and 100 Canadians. That is their production. We are in an incredibly efficient, excellent industry. The average farmer feeds between 95 and 100 Canadians, while the farmers' spouses, be that the man or the lady in the house, goes out and finds work off the farm so that that farmer can afford to put groceries on the farm family's table. There is increasing difficulty in finding jobs out there in the rural communities, because we are losing jobs across this country.

We are now in a situation where the spouse cannot even go out and find that farm. As the minister of grains and oilseeds said this morning, the average farmer in Canada today has $6,300 left after they do their business in order to maintain their homes and in order to look after their families. We talked a lot about fairness this week. I do not think that is fair.

We are talking about interim GRIP payments coming forward. Yes, that money is going to be welcome, but it is not providing the transitional assistance for that one year gap until the GRIP and NISA gets up and running and does what we all hope it is going to do. There is a big let-down here.

What the government is saying is that it will make an interim GRIP payment this fall. That is the same as me saying to you that I know you are having difficulty making your November mortgage payments on your home this year, but I tell you what we will do, we will bring your next year's November cheque to you and you can have it this November to use. But just remember, there will not be a pay cheque next November.

So what we are doing and what the government is doing is saying that we are prepared to reach into next year, bring next year's income back to this year and hope that somebody looks after you next year.

I would just like to make one other statement before I sit down. We know there are a lot of farmers going out to meetings. In Lucknow, Ontario last week there were over 1,000 farmers out. In Miami, Manitoba last week there were over 1,000 farmers out. But I think it is summed up by a statement, and I will quote, from a Mr. Bev Hill, who is quite well known and well respected and a very clever young chap in Ontario, and I will close with this. He stated this at a meeting last week in Ontario and I think it sums up the feeling of the total farm community: "Our fields of dreams have become acres of anguish".

• (1630)

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments. I too would like to participate in this debate, which I truly think is about the current plight of the farmers and what the government has for them in an emergency.

When we heard the minister telling us earlier that he would not take ad hoc measures, I wondered if the minister had understood the meaning of an emergency.

One imagines in a health setting that you know the diagnosis of the patient and then somehow something happens unpredictably and there is an emergency. You take an ad hoc measure. You take an emergency measure to avoid the imminence of death.

To the issue before us today, there is no doubt about the diagnosis. There is a crisis among our farmers. There is a shortfall of cash flow. The standing committee of this House on agriculture has made that ascertainment. So, there is no doubt about that. We, in fact, know the two fundamental causes.

First, because of the non-resolution of the international trade war. That, to me, is a failure of leadership on the part of this government for not being able to bring this forward to a speedy and complete resolution.

The second major cause is that this government has failed to have real, meaningful support programs for 1989 and 1990.

Just in my province of Manitoba, concerning the 1991 cash advance of over $300 million, I am advised that over $63 million is still outstanding, and you are asking the farmers to absorb the whole gross income decrease of 25 per cent in 1990 and a 30 per cent drop in 1991.

I would like to ask my colleague for his comments. What is the value of making a special grains payment at this time as an emergency to allow us a transition before we allow the support programs to take their natural course of support. I would like to ask my colleague to please respond to that.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to respond to that.

I think, without question, that requirement of that transitional payment is absolutely necessary. I recognize that during this time we are in a bad deficit situation as a country. Even in those situations there are emergencies, whether it is in our personal life or in our business. We are at a real crisis. I have farmed all my life and we are in a crisis such as we have never seen before.

The agriculture community went through a shake-down in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, part of which I went through. It was said then that we will shake it down. There will be some fall-out. The inefficient will fall out and what is left will be our efficient farmers and we will go on from there.

We are going through a worse shake-down than that. We are tearing families and homes apart. We as a House of Commons, as a Parliament and Canada as a country need now to make that decision. It is a very simple question. Is agriculture and food security, and I could go on and on, important to Canada or is it not? To me the answer to that is very simple. It definitely is, not only in the short term but in the long term. If we do not keep that industry and all the spin-offs through manufacturing et cetera that is involved with it, it will not be here for our children and our grandchildren.

This government and all governments like to talk about what we are going to do for our children and our grandchildren. I maintain, and I speak very strongly on this, this is one thing we had better do for those who follow us, maintain this industry.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings for sharing his time with me this afternoon.

I am happy that the House of Commons has set aside the time to address one of the most important issues facing our country, the farm financial crisis. The crisis is not exclusive to the prairie provinces or to Ontario and Quebec. It also includes the maritimes in most sectors in the industry. It is a national crisis. It affects farmers in the agri-food industry right across this whole country.

There is a great deal of uncertainty in the dairy industry, one of our most stable sectors, because of the GATT negotiations and the rumours that have been emanating from Geneva. I hope that the mandate given to our negotiators is an inflexible one. Article XI of GATT must be protected and extended. The retention of Article XI is paramount if we are to keep our supply managed commodities, which guarantee at least the cost of production for the farmers involved in these commodities.

I urge the government to hold fast to the position of retaining and strengthening Article XI. It would be a sad day for Canada if our dairy industry was reduced to the chaotic state that the American dairy industry is, where bankruptcy is a very common occurrence.

I want to address my main remarks to the unfolding tragedy of the potato industry in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and especially in Prince Edward Island where potatoes have been the cornerstone of our economy since the colonial days.

P.E.I. basically has two wealth-generating resources, agriculture and fisheries. The health of these two industries is vital to our whole economy. We have no mining in Prince Edward Island. We have no rivers large enough to harness hydroelectricity and no gas and oil deposits. Agriculture is the industry which is most vital to P.E.I. and our table and seed potato industry is the most important sector of that industry.

We have long enjoyed a world-wide reputation for our seed and table potatoes. Our seed is in demand in Europe and South America, in Africa and Mexico, the United States and the rest of Canada. Potatoes growing from P.E.I. seed out-produced seed from any other source in the world, including Holland, the next most important source of seed. The potato industry has been an industry which has competed in a world market for many years virtually on its own.

If you are looking for an example of an agricultural commodity which is operated in a free-market system, the capitalist, international, non-subsidized milieu, you will find it in P.E.I. seed and table potato industry. Rarely, and only in times of world over-production and two-cent a pound potatoes, have Prince Edward Island producers looked for government assistance in order to survive.

For the most part, the industry has competed head to head with the world with little extraordinary assistance from the Canadian taxpayer.

P.E.I., Canada's smallest province, competed against a nation, the Netherlands, in seed quality, and won.

The victory was not won overnight. It took years and the efforts of generation of farmers to achieve this position. It took support from Agriculture Canada over many years in developing new seed varieties, identifying new markets, inspection and protection services. It took many years of support from the provincial government which augmented and facilitated the efforts of the farm community and Agriculture Canada.

This combination of ideal soil and environmental conditions, with industrious, progressive farmers, who are committed to quality, disease-free stocks, in co-ordination with governments, has enabled the potato industry in Prince Edward Island to withstand the ups and downs of a very volatile industry. There were many poor years, and fewer good ones, but enough to sustain the industry over the long term.

But this scenario has been brought to an abrupt halt with the discovery of the potato virus Y-N strain in our potato crop. There is zero tolerance for this virus in North America. This discovery has closed the door to the exports of our potatoes to our largest markets, the United States and the rest of Canada.

Europe, which has had the disease for over 50 years, has established a tolerance level for the virus which has enabled the European community to live with the virus which they had to do because its elimination and eradication was impossible.

I must remind the House that the potato virus Y does not affect human beings in any way, shape or form.

All potatoes have the PVY virus of one strain or another. The problem with the potato virus Y-N strain is that it is deadly to tobacco. It destroys tobacco.

The transmission to the Americans of the information that P.E.I. had PVY-N resulted in the immediate closure of the American border to P.E.I. seed. The embargo was soon extended to include table stock unless sprayed with a sprout inhibitor. Canada, after protesting to Washington about how unfair this was, followed the American example and closed Canada's borders.

These actions, of course, brought the potato industry in Prince Edward Island into chaos.

The lack of time prohibits me from going into a step-by-step unfolding of the drama to this point in time. It is sufficient to say that an eradication compensation program was put into effect for the 1990 crop in an effort to contain and eliminate the disease. A massive leaf testing offensive was put in place for the 1991 crop. Millions of leaves were tested in P.E.I., but considerably less testing was done in other provinces.

Ninety-six new cases of PVY-N were discovered in Prince Edward Island, ten in Ontario and a few in the other provinces.

PVY-N was said to be found in varieties which were PVY-N-free last year. The eradication program for the 1990 crop seemed to have been a failure, that is until the validity of Agriculture Canada's testing methodology was brought into question.

Independent scientists have brought into question Agriculture Canada's methods and results which, if proven correct, means that there has been a misdiagnosis of the virus.

Agriculture Canada's 96 positive cases may not be PVY-N at all, but rather a fusion of other PVY strains which can produce the same result when swabbed on tobacco leaves.

As one commentator said, the Island was ploughed down for nothing and its main industry destroyed. This whole sad tale has produced a whole series of questions which have not and may never be answered.

(1) If PVY-N was rampant on Prince Edward Island, why has there been no infection of the P.E.I. tobacco crop, no infection whatsoever? Our tobacco producers have absolutely no fear of infection saying that if there are PVY-N infected potatoes, a regular spray program will take care of the aphids.

(2) Where did the PVY-N virus come from in the first place? How was it introduced to Prince Edward Island? One thing is sure, this government with its centralization program and taking scientists and virologists from the provinces to Ottawa only means that it will be easier to have diseased stock coming into this country in the future.

(3) Why has the state of Maine been able to dictate to the USDA and Agriculture Canada on the lifting of the border restrictions? Maine has tried for years to prevent P.E.I. potatoes from entering the state or passing through the state. They have tried anti-dumping procedures and border harassment. You name it, they have tried it and have failed.

Maine was losing out badly to Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick seed and table producers, and indeed to table producers from the western U.S. states. They failed to keep up with advancements in the industry and their products could not compete.

As far as Maine is concerned, the PVY-N crisis is the best thing that has happened for them in years, and they do not mean to let go. They and Senator Mitchell are calling the shots on this one, and our government does not have the political or moral courage to take them on.

(4) Are Agriculture Canada's testing procedures up to date and accurate? Other scientists think not and, if proven correct, this could be the cruelest cut of all. It is possible that the whole problem has been blown vastly out of proportion and the reputation of P.E.I. potatoes and Agriculture Canada has been destroyed.

(5) Why has the United States not tested for PVY-N? After all, if we have it, they have it because we have been shipping potatoes into the United States since the time we are told it was first discovered in P.E.I. in 1987. Therefore, they have PVY-N if we have it. As long as the United States does not test—they say they do not have it—is this really logical? If we both have it and it cannot be eradicated, why not strike a tolerance level?

(6) Why has it taken so long to get the 1990 compensation cheques issued? Why are there no forms for the 1991 compensation claims?

How would you, Mr. Speaker, or any of us in this House like not to have been paid during the past year? These farmers are living on bank loans for over a year. This must be corrected.

To conclude, I want to make a few remarks about the farm financial crisis in general.

It is a fact that our farm debt is $24 billion. Interest on this debt at the rate of 10 per cent is $2.5 billion. That means the over $2 billion the government bragged it is going to put into the farm sector this year is merely going to pay the interest on the farm debt. The only ones really getting paid are the bankers.

Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I would like to say a few things more, but you have indicated that my time is up. Thank you.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Egmont and the speaker before him have demonstrated how productive farmers in general are. There is no doubt about that. In turn, our colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings described production, past and present. There is no doubt that they are indeed very productive.

I have a question for my colleague at this point. About the answers the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State (Agriculture) provided yesterday, the problem is that farmers or producers are requesting protection. We know that agriculture has become as important as national defence. There is no doubt about it, we cannot rely on production from abroad as regards agriculture. We must be self-sufficient. That is a steadfast rule. Here is my question. The Quebec UPA made several representations and, contrary to what I was told in both answers I received yesterday, they asked for our borders to be protected so as to prevent dumping. According to the UPA, the former Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Eugene Whelan was a man of great convictions. I was told that he was the father of joint programs. He is. However, what Canadian farmers need right now is protection.

So, I ask my colleague: is protection provided for in joint programs, is there a moral commitment on the part of the government or is it just left open in the free market? We suggest that government involvement is required to keep the market in line. However, would the government not endanger the Canadian farm industry by claiming that the best approach is to force farmers to produce beyond their capacity?

[English]

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain. That is if Canada continues on its present road, it will not be self-sufficient in food, while at the same time the Americans have made it much easier for their farmers to become more productive and to shed their burden of debt.

For example, the Americans have set up a system which includes debt forgiveness and they have restructured their debt forgiveness procedures putting their farmers at a considerable advantage over ours. They have, over the long term, come to the conclusion that the debt load their farmers were carrying was just too heavy. They took the attitude that the situation in the United States was like an airplane flying at 30,000 feet which was absolutely certain to come down. The choice was whether it would have an easy glide and a fairly soft landing, or it would crash. These are the same options that our government has today. Is it going to make the landing a little softer, or is it going to let the agricultural community crash and be destroyed, thereby making Canada reliant for her food resources on other countries?

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to take the opportunity to compliment the hon. member for Egmont, from my province, for his comments on this very serious issue.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Ms. Callbeck: I especially appreciated his comments on the PVY-N virus, the crisis we are having in our province at the present time.

• (1650)

I know my time is limited so I just want to mention one thing that the member referred to, and that is the compensation claims that the potato farmers have made for their 1990 crop. Four hundred compensation claims were sent to the government and at present only a hundred of our potato farmers have received any money. That seems like a long time to wait for the money, and certainly it is putting many farmers into very serious financial problems. I think it is very unfair for the government to expect farmers to wait this length of time and I would call on the government to do everything possible to speed up this process.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth while to review the resolution: "In view of the desperate financial cash flow crisis facing Canadian grains and oilseeds and horticultural producers the House of Commons calls on the Government of Canada to consider the advisability of providing cash assistance that would have been provided under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account, had they been in place for 1990-91".

I read that resolution to remind members in the House, all 295 of us, that we are not instructing the government, that is the cabinet, but we are simply asking it to consider the advisability of helping at this time. That is why various members have expressed their disappointment that the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds chose to say that this was considered by the government as a matter of non-confidence. He said that the rules and the procedure in the House required it to be so. However, the Speaker at that time did not rule that way. The Speaker at that time, quoting from one of the books of authority—and I do not recall exactly which one—said that the government can decide whether a vote is or is not a vote of non-confidence. This leads me to believe that the minister at that time could have said: "We agree, it is not a vote of non-confidence, we agree that it is simply advising the cabinet of how the members in the House feel; that they think it is an emergency and that they think it is an emergency that can be helped by a cash infusion at this time and that we think it is proper that cash infusion be made at this time".

However, presumably the minister, on behalf of cabinet, did not want the members to be able to vote that way. What he was really doing when he said it would be considered a vote of non-confidence was reminding the members on the Tory side of the House that they would be required to vote against this resolution when it comes to a vote. He did not want them to have the right to vote for it because in committee they expressed that right by voting for this very same resolution. He did not want them to have that right in the House.

One can only wonder why. One can only hope that the government does have plans to make this kind of cash infusion. One can hope that it is going to use it for political purposes just as it did five years ago when it approved during an election campaign in Saskatchewan a cash infusion of one billion dollars under similar circumstances one week before the farmers went to the polls and voted, along with the other voters in Saskatchewan.

Let us hope that it has the same plan in mind this time and that some time during the election campaign, which is to be announced momentarily just as it is in B.C., the government will decide: "Yes, it is just and proper that we help the farmers not just in Saskatchewan but all over Canada at this time. So we have decided that we are going to make this kind of cash infusion". That it will happen one week before election day is perhaps fortuitous for the Tory government in Saskatchewan but even more important for the farmers, in particular the wheat producers, in that province. Farmers all over Canada are suffering in the same way, and the resolution speaks of them as well.

The Minister of State for Agriculture toward the close of his remarks—he did not say it really—hinted that there was going to be an important announcement in Saskatchewan. When he was told that it had already been announced, then he said: "This is certainly going to please the farmers of Saskatchewan".

I am talking about the just announced move of Farm Credit Corporation to Regina. This is supposed to make the farmers happy. I do not know what it is going to cost to make that move. We have heard of other government agencies moving. Here is another one. Is it going to cost $5 million, $50 million, $100 million? We do not know at this time. We have not found out yet what it is going to cost in total to move the Energy Board to Calgary.

At a time of restraint, to put those millions of dollars, however many they are, into moving an office, when that money could be used to good effect to help the producers seems to me to be a poor example of restraint.

It was suggested by my colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie, that perhaps the reason that Farm Credit is moving to Regina is because it would be much more efficient for them to deal with the foreclosures of farm properties in Saskatchewan if they are right there on the scene. One wonders just why at this particular time have they decided to spend money on that kind of a program as opposed to doing something productive and proper to help the farmers in Canada at this very bad time.

A farmer's life anywhere in Canada is not a happy one. I think I am paraphrasing a line from Gilbert and Sullivan when I say that. There was discussion earlier today about marketing boards and about supply management.

The supply management farmers generally have it easier than the others, but even they do not have it easy. They do not know what they are going to get for their product, but they have some control over the selling price to the producer as opposed to the example given by the member for Prince Edward—Hastings. He said that a $3 box of cereal might return four cents to the producer.

There is one interesting thing about that that he did not mention. That is that everyone other than the producer gets a fair return for his or her labour. The only one who does not get anything near the cost of producing that grain is the producer. Everyone else gets it because they have a guaranteed mark-up. Right up until the time that the consumer purchases that box of cereal, everyone gets a mark-up, everyone other than the producer because the producer has no control over his or her price. Everyone else has that control.

With supply managed products the producers generally have enough control that they do get the cost of production out of it. It is the one area in agriculture where consumers are paying what it costs to produce the product. In every other area of agriculture the producers do not always get the return equal to the cost of production or anything near it.

Certainly that applies to the grain growers, it applies to fruit growers, it applies to horticultural crops generally where there is not this protection that is afforded to those farmers who are able to engage in supply management.

Even with supply management, farmers cannot be sure of getting a decent return. They are fighting the elements. It is said that Canadians have a higher per average cost of energy than people in any other industrialized nation in the world. We do live further north. It does cost more for energy. We need more energy in almost everything we are doing.

The Minister of State for Agriculture talked about the efficiency of Canadian producers and that is true. They are very efficient. We are very efficient.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is about up, and I will just say this. Of all the people in the community who cannot have any control over the selling price, the producers are the ones that at the present time need this cash infusion. The government is abandoning its responsibility to a large section of the community when it says that its own members will not have the right to simply advise cabinet at this time. This responsibility should be recognized by letting the members vote and give the cabinet this kind of advice.

• (1700)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his address. Having listened to his as well as to a number of other statements in the House today with respect to the farm situation, the farm crisis, and addresses by my colleagues from Winnipeg—St. James and Essex—Kent I suspect that the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds will not want to go to the Brandon farm rally tomorrow. I wonder if he will want to go to the rally that is going to be held in Winnipeg in October. Some members will know of the rough ride he had in Melita, Manitoba, just roughly a week ago.

My question, however, is why the government is unwilling to support this particular motion. It is not a motion of confidence. It is one it could support if it chose to and still continue to sit as it does and be the government.

I want to make sure that I understand the points that he made. First of all, if I have understood him correctly and interpreted his comments accurately, the hon. member is saying it would be afraid of the support this motion would get from its own members, from the members of government. The minister would then realize that his own members support this kind of emergency assistance. Of course, once that vote had been taken the farmers would have clearly proven the point.

There is, in a significant sense, politics being played here. Is there not? I wonder if my hon. colleague would care to respond to the remarks I have made and to the questions I have raised.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that I am hoping the reason the cabinet is reacting this way is that it believes there will be a resounding vote in favour of this resolution if all the members were able to vote.

That would eliminate the surprise and political advantage if it were announced here and now. If the government acted positively to that request, it would be acting in response to a united vote from the House, from all three parties, all saying it would be a good idea. However, it wants to be able to wait until the election campaign is well under way and at the most auspicious moment from the point of view of re-electing the Conservative government in Saskatchewan then announce the same kind of program it announced five years ago, a $1 billion or $2 billion program to help the farmers. For partisan political reasons the government is instructing its own members to vote against this resolution today so the cabinet can make it public some three or four weeks from today.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his remarks. I would like to focus on one comment he made with respect to the comments of the Minister of State for Agriculture regarding the movement of FCC workers to Regina. In fact, it was his response to a question I had placed before him about farm finance.

We have had a bill presented on GRIP and NISA which deals with farm income but there is still great concern about farm finance. When I asked the minister what this government would do about farm finance or when we could expect something on farm finance, he said there was something happening today with respect to FCC.

I would like to ask the member, who was a minister in British Columbia, how the move of the head office and some employees to Regina at the cost of a few million dollars is going to make farmers happy and make them feel more comfortable with their financial situation and the fact that there is not going to be another dime put in their pockets. How does he think the farmers will react to moving the head office of FCC to Regina?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I can only anticipate that the farmers will be very disappointed when they hear about the resolution that has been debated and is still being debated in this House today, when they see us vote on it and the government members defeat it.

I am very disappointed that the government feels proud about spending another x millions of dollars to move an office from one part of the country to another when it could have been spending that money in announcing a program to help the farmers who are desperate for that kind of assistance. I expect they will be disappointed. I hope they will react properly when they get the opportunity to vote.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today and speak in favour of this motion which is asking for a third line of defence cash assistance on an emergency basis to provide certain levels of support to the farmers who are facing crisis in Canada.

Although the concentration so far has been on grains and oilseeds, the resolution also refers to other horticultural producers. It is some of those other horticultural producers that I hope to speak about and bring to the House's attention. Although in Canada we have a concentration on the bread basket of Canada, being the prairie provinces, and our grains and oilseeds area, a very important sector of our community, we often have a tendency to forget that there are other pockets of agriculture and horticulture throughout Canada, areas such as the Okanagan, Similkameen, the Nicola Valley and Merritt area and the boundary country of which I am the representative. There are also areas in the Niagara Peninsula and Annapolis, fruit-growing areas of this country and the cattle areas of this country.

We know that the producers of grain on the prairies are hurting. This is in response to that. However, I am here to tell this House and the people of Canada that people in my area, the grape growers, the fruit growers, cattlemen and women, farmers of all stripes and descriptions are hurting. They are looking for help and guidance. They are tired of the bankrupt ideas of this government and governments of similar ilk who continue to tell them not only to make it on their own but continue to turn their backs on them in their time of need.

In my area we have just come through the second summer after the free trade agreement and have seen some of the problems it has created. It may perhaps be only a perceptual problem but a problem nevertheless. Last summer, for instance, the cherry growers in my area witnessed a massive dumping of product from the United States into Canada at well below production cost not only in Canada, but well below the production cost in the state of Washington. Although there was not that much of a benefit to the Washington growers, they perceived that because of the free trade agreement they had a new and open market. They gave benefits to their purchasers that the growers in Canada could not touch.

We witnessed toward the end of last summer and throughout the fall and winter acres of cherry trees being ripped out. This was just directly after, in my area, watching approximately 2,000 acres of vineyards being ripped out as a result of the free trade agreement and GATT rulings.

Over the past year I personally have watched some young farmers, up and coming, advanced, enthusiastic farmers, losing their enthusiasm for the land. There is not a farmer out there who can make it on agriculture alone. Either he, she or the spouse has to go and find another job in order to try to make a little extra money to keep their families and pay for their mortgage. When you are a farmer, it becomes a labour of love as opposed to a way of making a living.

I have watched these young farmers not only lose their interest in the land but turning their backs on the land, letting the banks take it back or trying to sell it. That becomes a very great problem also, because right now it is often difficult to sell 10, 15 or 20 acres of orchard land because everybody knows you cannot make a living as a fruit farmer.

There are things this government must do. We must face up to the reality that we want to continue to be able to produce food in Canada. Most Canadians want to ensure that we have a viable agriculture industry. We have to look at short-term benefits for these farmers as set out in this motion, not just to the grain farmers, but to other farmers in Canada, the fruit farmers, the grape growers and the cattlemen.

Lately in the fruit farming area they have run into low prices. They have run into the usual things farmers can expect, inclement weather, massive destruction as a result of hail; low crops in some cases because of a late spring and a freeze-out of various crops or a very cold winter during which a number of farmers lost trees.

The farmer is told to get up to date on what is being sold. In British Columbia they were offered $3,000 for each acre of replant, but it costs anywhere up to $11,000 or $12,000 an acre and they are told by the banks that they are not good risks. Well, where do they come up with the money to improve their lot, to ensure that they have a product that meets the needs of the market?

I spoke recently to a farmer from Oliver, B.C., and he told me how he has over the last little while diversified into a number of different apple crops in order to get a higher price. But the cost of that is enormous.

The Minister of State for Agriculture has talked to us about competitiveness, yet these farmers run into problems with the high cost of borrowing and the high cost of storage. In order to get a higher price for their product they have to have conditioned atmosphere storage, the cost of which is enormous. Again, they have to borrow money. With the various problems in marketing, they are having difficulty repaying some of these loans.

Whether we look at it in the short term or the long term, the agricultural industry in Canada is in major difficulty. They need a hand this year to assist them to pull themselves up by the boot straps so they can live to fight another day. Just as important, they need a government that is feeling and sensitive to what is required in the long term.

In our area it is education. The farmers need assistance in running their farms as a business. They need education in new and upgraded methods of agriculture. They need the time and ability to get that education. They need the assistance in investigating new markets. Although they have to be expected, to some extent, to find some of those markets, they have to be given proper assistance and show of support by this government to find those markets.

I cannot emphasize enough how important this particular motion is to the farmer, because of its over-all look at agriculture and the long-term needs of this country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate on a motion asking the government to assist the Canadian agricultural industry. This afternoon, I would like to raise a few points in connection with grain production and subsequently, I intend to discuss the present and future status of GATT talks. Finally, Madam Speaker, I think I should tell the House about some rather depressing events in the agricultural sector in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Madam Speaker, this has been a difficult year for Ontario grain producers. For instance, the price of corn, soy beans and wheat is 35 per cent below what it was last year and 45 per cent less than the 15-year average. If the prices of these commodities remain uncharged, Madam Speaker, Ontario farmers alone will suffer a $175 million shortfall this year, compared to last year.

[English]

I have before me a chart. It compares the cost of corn flakes with the price of corn. In 1980, corn sold for 15 cents a kilogram. Corn flakes sold for $2.21 a kilogram. In 1990, corn sold for 14 cents a kilogram, less than 1980 by 1 cent. Guess what happened to the price of corn flakes. It jumped from $2.21 to $4.28. In other words, while the price of this particular product to farmers was decreasing, the price to the consumer doubled.

Canadians have reason to complain about the prices, but it is not the farmers who are getting the money. Of course, notwithstanding the fact that some of those middle people are getting more than their fair share, we still manage to have the second lowest food prices as a proportion to our income of any nation on earth.

On August 29 this year, the hon. member for Algoma moved a motion at an emergency meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture of this House. In his motion, the hon. member asked the government to provide emergency assistance to grain producers, starting this year, because there would a gap between existing programs, or rather programs that existed until quite recently, and the new programs that will be introduced next year.

We need an emergency program during the transition period. As I said earlier, the hon. member for Algoma moved a motion asking the government to take this kind of action, and of course, the committee adopted the motion unanimously. And I congratulate members on all sides of this House, the Conservatives, members of our party, and all the others who voted, asking for government action. So far, however, no answers have been forthcoming.

[English]

We have a few more problems on the horizon.

• (1720)

Canadian farmers are very worried about what the Government of Canada intends to do at the GATT negotiating table. As you know, we are presently in the so-called Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations. In this round, there is tremendous concern, and rightfully so, about the price of agricultural commodities, prices which have been deflated as a result of the subsidy war between countries, more particularly the EEC nations and the United States.

Canada has been the victim of this. Canadian farmers are afraid, and I think they have every reason to be concerned, about the future of Article XI of the GATT agreement. Article XI presently permits supply management in agriculture. In simple language, it permits farmers to have quota systems where they wish to have them as producer organizations.

The negotiating team right now before the GATT is having discussions. That team was brought before the Standing Committee on Agriculture yesterday. Members of Parliament tried desperately to obtain assurances from our negotiating team that we had not offered to sacrifice Article XI of the GATT in exchange for something else.

Despite the best efforts of all MPs from all political parties, no such assurance came forward yesterday. I can tell you that I am very concerned. Usually when someone refuses to tell you something, there is a good reason for it, and I am very afraid about the future of Article XI.

Two members yesterday, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk and the member for Gatineau—La Lievre both asked in this House for the assurances of the government that Article XI of the GATT would be protected and strengthened. Do you know the answer they received? The Minister of State for Agriculture said, roughly, as follows: "There will not be any changes until we announce that there are changes." Well, that is a great reassurance for the dairy farmers of Canada.

The government has to announce clear policies, and has to assure the farmers that Article XI will continue and will be enhanced and not be done away with.

Madam Speaker, finally I would like to raise in this House a tragedy that happened in my riding about an hour ago. A reporter told me that a slaughterhouse in my riding, Viandes Saint-Isidore Inc. of St. Isidore de Prescott, Ontario, was closing down tomorrow, resulting in the loss of 40 jobs.

This company slaughtered about 5,500 pigs a week, Madam Speaker. At the end of the day today, while we are making speeches in this House, slaughtering operations will cease in St. Isidore. Tomorrow evening, the factory will shut down completely. Of course, in my riding, with such a high unemployment rate, this bad news will be very hard for us to take.

In this case for once, at any rate, it does not seem to be due to free trade or something like that, but other government policies influenced the outcome, such as the policy of too high interest rates that hurt this company. Of course, there were other problems along the way.

But, Madam Speaker, it would be important to point out the price of farm products again. As I did earlier with corn, I will compare the price of bacon. Once again, I have here in front of me a diagram that compares prices in 1980 and 1988. In 1980, bacon sold for $1.30 a kilo—that is the price the farmer received. In 1990, he got $1.38 and today, as we speak, the price is about the same, $1.38 a kilo. The consumer, however, paid about $5.54 a kilo in 1980 and now pays about eight dollars. So in 1980, the consumer paid about four times what the farmer got. Today, it is more than six times. We need help for agriculture, Madam Speaker. I hope that the government will listen to the needs and for once try to help Canadian farming.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague once again on addressing the issue with specifics. I want to ask him a very specific question. One of the problems of those of us who spend most of our time in urban markets is our lack of information on the specific reasons why we have a farm crisis in this country. Many times today we have referred to the problems being caused by the European Common Market approach to agriculture and the tremendous subsidies.

Does the hon. member not think that as part of our strategy to win support for correcting this problem in the long term might be to develop a communications plan explaining this problem that is happening in rural Canada, in agriculture in Canada, which goes beyond that community itself? In other words, we go into the major markets not only here but also in Europe and explain exactly how these subsidies are putting our young farmers and our experienced farmers out of business.

Maybe through that kind of process we might get a more rational approach to the subsidy program that is being handled all over the world. I wonder if the hon. member could speak to that.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. My colleague comes from an urban riding. One thing that I appreciate particularly is the fact that he as an urban member is always here when we are discussing agriculture. Whereas I cannot speak of the presence or absence of any member singularly, I must tell you, Madam Speaker, how pleased I am when members who are from urban areas take that kind of an interest. That is the first step and I congratulate him for it. I wish all members had that same kind of interest.

Our colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, produced very good documentation about how in fact farmers are not getting their share of the revenues of agriculture. I for one will be putting out a householder to my constituents shortly to explain just the discrepancy, just like I described for the price of corn and the price of hogs how the discrepancy between what the farmer is getting versus what the consumer has to pay and how it is progressively getting worse. We must continue to say that to all Canadians so that they understand.

We must do it not only in our agricultural constituencies. All MPs should do this across Canada. As well I think it is the duty of our government to try to make other nations understand what it is that we are doing. Effectively what we are doing is we are whipping each other with our dollars. That is what we are doing. We are completely inundating the situation with subsidies.

Farmers in other countries, particularly the United States and the EEC, are receiving huge subsidies. Those subsidies of course benefit nations which then purchase those commodities. It is unusual to see, for instance, that countries, what we used to refer to as eastern bloc countries, are buying food that was subsidized by the countries of the west because they are arguing with each other as to who should have the so-called rightful share of the market.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I just want to remind the member that in his comments about Article XI and our Canadian position at the GATT talks, the minister, if he would recall, was very adamant yesterday on the position of the Canadian government and our position there. I would just like to read part of that answer of yesterday.

> The Government of Canada has stated, as my colleagues have, its position on Article XI. We are not talking about weakening Article XI. What we have asked for, and what the policies of this government is, is that Article XI should be further clarified and strengthened. That has not been changed—

That is the position of the Canadian government. I would not want the message to go out from this House of Commons that that has been changed. We do support it. We have been consistent. This has been developed with the producers in consultation with the stakeholders of that industry and with the government as to how that position was developed, and that position has not changed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I will only read the following sentence. It goes like this:

> That has not changed and will not change until the government says it will change.

That is the assurance that the minister gave yesterday, and it is not good enough.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, the last few words of my friend here relate to one of the questions I wanted to ask the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday, I and my colleague from Ontario asked for assurances from the Department of Agriculture that the government is committed to preserving quotas and defending, strengthening and clarifying Article XI of GATT which deals with quotas which impede the free market, etc.

Madam Speaker, if you look at the history of agriculture in Quebec, it is the whole history of Quebec you are looking at. In 1950—and this is not very far back, I am quite sure that most members here recall those years—there were 240,000 farmers in Quebec. Some 40 odd years later only about 45,000 are left. It is true that the average productivity has increased tremendously, much more than it was thought possible 40 years ago, nevertheless, agriculture remains one of the extremely important elements of a nation. No nation wants to depend on another for its daily bread. All want to be sure that their agriculture is in good health. One has only to look at the Common Market, where there is a real agricultural war, if I can use that expression, where all the members want to protect their farm production.

Here in Canada, we created, under the previous government, a system of quotas for milk, pork or other commodities like grain. This is extremely important for our farmers and for the farmers of Quebec. We had a system which was more rational, where the government could intervene not to control the market but rather to discipline it, make it more human, if I can use that expression. There are three elements, for when you talk to farm producers, and I very often had discussion with them on this question, they say that there are three fundamental principles. The first, according to them, is that you must always have the guarantee that borders can be controlled, that is to say that you can prevent dumping on your own market. You know that all sorts of explanations are used, like globalization, etc., but you would be surprised to learn that, when they use the term "globalization", other countries make nice sentences, speak of productivity, and so on. All countries, of course, have ways to protect their own market. One must not be fooled by these words, but look at the reality.

There is one more thing that must be protected in the farming industry, it is the fact that Canadian producers—and I know the situation of farmers in Quebec—have always wanted a form of protection which I always considered as totally realistic and that is to guarantee their production cost. That has always been, if you will, their basic argument.

If a farmer could be sure from the beginning to recoup his production costs, he could survive, and someone would take over after him. That argument is familiar to all of us, except that, to this day, our neighbours in the South have never really applied the program of quotas.

I heard on the news that milk producers from the State of Vermont, will meet in the coming weeks. They even made known their intention to carry out some form of strike because Vermont farmers, mostly milk producers, have benefitted from a quota system similar to the one we have in Canada. Obviously, Madam Speaker, I wish them great luck. It will be a start. They will make Americans aware that a quota system which guarantees production cost recovery is undoubtedly a sensible thing.

But that is where a moral commitment is needed with all this argumentation by the government, with the answers that the Minister of Agriculture gave us when he said: "As long as the government does not decide otherwise, we will keep protecting Article XI of the GATT." But during the consultations known as "Growing together", a leader from the Union des producteurs agricoles pointed out to me that they had been consulted on that issue. We surely want a growing agriculture, not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada. But they said that they never felt that their production costs were guaranteed. And I think that we should address that issue. Farmers do not have that guarantee. We hear about productivity almost every day. But if farmers are not sure of getting back their production costs, if they are subject to the law of the jungle, as it is the case in the United States—When you consider that over 100,000 farms have been lost in the last few years in the States, you get an idea of how the big multinationals came into the agricultural world. They are literally quashing the family farm in the United States. However, here in Canada, we have a different way of seeing things.

We would like to have a guarantee, a moral commitment from the government, that we will not expose our farmers to the law of the jungle. We would like to offer them the support that is vital for the survival of agriculture, and that is what we would do by ensuring them the production cost. If it is impossible to give them such a commitment, that in my view is a moral one, what future can they hope for in farming?

That is basically the question we are asking in this House. If the Minister of Agriculture, his Quebec counterpart and the Minister of State for Agriculture would provide an answer, I am sure farmers throughout Canada, and especially in Quebec, would be very happy to have it.

But the two answers we got yesterday are not enough. We want support for our farmers, not just for today, but for the future, especially to assist the next generation.

Madam Speaker, I will ask again the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague, the Minister of State, to make a moral commitment to really support our farmers, to ensure they cover their production costs, since we know that our farmers are efficient and productive.

[English]

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, there are a couple of conversations around the House. The hon. member for Beaver River has not had an opportunity to speak.

I wonder if there might be agreement among the parties and the members to allow her 10 minutes. Most of the speeches this afternoon have been that length. We might just not see the clock for 10 minutes to allow her to make her speech. Then, we can proceed with the regular proceedings of the day.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, we would agree to the recommendation that the member for Beaver River be allowed to speak for 10 minutes and then, as the member suggested, proceed with the normal closing of debate.

Mr. Laporte: Madam Speaker, in the spirit of co-operation we certainly would be willing to let the hon. member for Beaver River have 10 minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see that there is unanimous consent. Do I understand that we forego the period of question and comments following?

An hon. member: Yes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will not see the clock until 5.50 p.m.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I would just like to thank all parties for allowing unanimous consent for me to carry on. Surely that, if nothing else, is a good example to the Canadian public who is watching that this place can work and we can work together effectively.

I would just like to put on record some of the Reform Party's policies regarding agriculture because I heard some comments in statements this afternoon and also in Question Period by the member for Portage—Interlake and also the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds reflecting the fact that I should perhaps answer the questions in Question Period on behalf of the Reform Party.

There are policies, facts and global things that are happening that we simply cannot deny. What we need to do is be very frank and honest in admitting that some things are happening around the world that we need to be very clear on and realize that they are happening.

First, I would say that there is an increasing need, both internationally and domestically, to reduce rather than increase government subsidization of agriculture due to the inability of governments and the community at large to finance such subsidization in the long run.

Whether we like it or not, because of our national debt and the way things are going around the world, this is the way things are happening. We have to agree that whether we like it or not, that is what is happening.

The Reform Party recognizes that there is a need for transitional support to protect agricultural producers against policies over which they have no control, including international subsidies that increase supplies and depress prices. We have certainly seen that with the price of wheat and barley in this latest crop year.

We recognize that we cannot just completely eliminate subsidies, that simply cannot and will not happen. We need to provide transitional support.

As well, the member for Portage—Interlake made some comments quoting the Reform Party, leaving out some very important words. I will just quickly go over those.

The Reform Party believes that the agricultural producers should offer the rest of the world and the rest of the country a deal leading to a step-by-step reduction of government agricultural support, at home and abroad. Yes, we need to be leaders in this. Yes, I believe the agricultural sector is willing to make that step and become a leader in a step-by-step reduction if other economic sectors and our trading partners will do the same. That is where the hon. member left off his sentence half way through.

I believe the agricultural sector is willing to do that if, and only if, every other sector will do it at the same time. Then we would see an equality of sacrifice right across the country.

Looking internationally again, the Reform Party supports a trade distortion adjustment program to compensate for the adverse effects of subsidies by other countries. If we were looking at a ratio, for roughly every $5,000 that Canadians are subsidized in our agricultural industry, the figure is approximately $10,000 for Americans and $25,000 for Europeans. We ask: "How could those figures balance out?"

We need to see a government that is very aggressive dealing with Article XI that is firm at the GATT negotiations. We are looking to this government to be very tough, as the hon. member mentioned earlier, to go to the GATT and say: "We simply will not give up these things, we will be tough and we will continue to press for lowering subsidies around the world".

The Reform Party supports an agricultural policy based on market mechanisms with the objective of meeting the needs of consumers for safe, affordable and secure supplies of food.

"Where circumstances allow" is another phrase that my friend from Portage—Interlake left out. That would mean a shift from a government supported agricultural industry to an industry shaped by the free operation of comparative advantage between regions and commodities, free entry into all sectors of production and marketing and free trade on a global basis.

If any opposition party is opposed to free trade, that is its political prerogative. With the global economy becoming so small, we realize that with trade travelling so quickly, with communications travelling so quickly we are looking at a global market whether we like it or not.

Again, my friend mentioned this afternoon that the Reform Party is going to absolutely reduce and eliminate all subsidies whatsoever. He left off the first part of that sentence which was "if other domestic sectors and countries will do the same". Now, we are looking at an "if then" clause grammatically. If this happens at the national and at the international level then of course the Reform Party supports the phased reduction and elimination of all subsidies, support programs and trade restrictions.

This is what farmers are concerned about. These are what farmers in Beaver River are talking about. These are what farmers who in fact developed the Reform Party agricultural policy are concerned about.

When I look at what is happening in the agricultural sector, and at what is happening in my riding of Beaver River, which is very much agriculture intensive, people are saying they do not want handouts all the time, but that they are facing a very difficult time right now with cash flow. We are looking at depressed prices for grains and oilseeds. We are looking at a government that is going to the GATT negotiations. However, the Uruguay Round has come far short and almost stopped in its proceedings.

We are looking at a people who are proud of their heritage. We are looking at farmers who are very proud of their Canadian heritage and what they are doing in this country. They are saying they are willing to adopt some of these measures if, and only if, everyone else is willing to do that.

It makes me proud to be the member of a very agriculture intensive riding, a riding which this summer was stricken with such serious drought that we had barley crops in the heart of Beaver River which were four inches tall. They were not even good for silage because they were too short for cutting and too dry for making silage.

I understand the problems because I was there and went on tour after tour looking at farmland in my area which suffered so devastatingly. For example, in the area of Two Hills and Willingdon, a large meeting was held at which farmers said: "We do not want handouts forever. We want a transitional program here before GRIP and NISA kick in".

These people do not want to have to give up their farms and they are concerned whether they will be able to participate in the programs and will get transitional support. That is the key word I would like to say on behalf of the Reform Party, as well as member of Parliament for Beaver River.

I wonder about criticisms of the Reform Party but that is fair enough, I can appreciate that.

I would just like to say in closing that these are policies which have been put together by farmers, and of course our blue book is on display for anybody to look at. That is something I have never found from any other political party. Nobody has sent me anything telling me what they really believe and what they really stand for. These are things which were passed by the general membership at our assembly in Saskatoon this year, and that, of course, represents the 90,000 members that now belong to the Reform Party.

The September 9, 1991 issue of the The Alberta Report, a magazine from western Canada, says that northern and southern farmers in Alberta are supporting the party at 39.4 per cent. These are people who are proud and are very willing to say they are willing to tighten their belts if everyone else across the country does the same.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 81(14).

The question is on the motion. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the government whip has asked me to defer the vote. Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday, September 23, 1991 at 6 p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will suspend this sitting until 6 p.m. this day when we will proceed to Private Members' Business.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 5.53 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

PROMOTION OF GLOBAL SECURITY

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government promote a summit level meeting at the United Nations on global security, to examine ways of implementing and strengthening the United Nations peacekeeping and enforcement mechanisms.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is timely that this motion has been drawn for debate today, timely because it affords us with an opportunity to sustain the momentum that has been building in the aftermath of the gulf conflict, in favour of strengthening the United Nations.

It is also timely in light of today's call for a UN force to intervene in the conflict in Yugoslavia. I think also of events in the Soviet Union, peace efforts in the western Sahara, Cambodia and Angola and the simmering situation in Iraq and the threats of further violence.

The motion that I present for the House today reads, as you have said:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government promote a summit level meeting at the United Nations on global security, to examine ways of implementing and strengthening the United Nations peacekeeping and enforcement mechanisms.

Here, in this motion, we are presented with an opportunity, a golden one at that, to encourage the building up of a mechanism that can allow the United Nations to fulfil its intended role.

We Canadians have a responsibility to use our prestige and expertise in the area of peacekeeping. We can use our reputation as a devoted member of the United Nations family to ensure that this historic opportunity is not lost. It is a responsibility that Canada and other governments should seize. Canada's participation in the gulf was done, as we recall, in the name of the United Nations. And when it was argued that the operations against Iraq did not follow the UN charter to the letter, the reply was that the UN security mechanisms were not in place. It was, therefore, impossible to expect to the UN Security Council to have full command and control of the enforcement of its resolutions.

Has the lesson been learned? The answer, as we stand today, months later, has to be no. The UN is today being called on to perform peacemaking duties in the tragic conflict in Yugoslavia and, once again, the excuse back to the European community and to others is that the UN is not prepared. This has a hollow sound to it and it puts at risk the credibility of the union to maintain security and peace.

It is important to follow up the criticisms of the gulf action with constructive action. Clearly our world needs a functioning UN security mechanism. It is a responsibility not only of governments but of individual parliamentarians to seize this moment to help build a reliable collective security system of enforceable international law. If we do not rise to this challenge, succeeding generations may well scorn us for having missed so great an opportunity to bring about an international system of law that can reliably prevent aggression.

Bernard Wood, the chief executive officer of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, has offered this warning to Canada: "There will be another test before very long and probably it will come in some region that is not as much of an economic or strategic interest to major world powers. If at that stage this international consensus and the international security structure fail to respond with equal vigour and even-handedness, the cynics will then have been vindicated and more importantly, the world will have been plunged backward".

Canada should not allow this to happen. We have invested too much in working toward the dream of a strong and effective United Nations to allow this moment to pass without undertaking a major effort to build up security mechanism of the UN. We are investing too much of our resources, talents and hopes, whether it be in Central America, in the Middle East, in Cyprus, in Angola or elsewhere not to act now, now that there is a genuine openness about reforming and renewing the United Nations.

There are no lack of ideas for strengthening the United Nations in the aftermath of the gulf war. New and old proposals are finding a renewed interest. A mechanism for preventive peacekeeping is being promoted, for example, whereby as a deterrent to aggression, UN troops could be deployed along the border of any nation that is being attacked. Others are beginning to look seriously at implementing the provisions of Article 43 and 47 of the UN Charter. That would enable the UN to mount its own force rather than having to rely on a major power.

There are still other discussions of an early warning capacity for the UN to ensure that developing conflicts can be detected and prevented from escalating. The question is: how do we turn these ideas that have been thought through, plans have been laid, how do we turn them into political realities? Surely, that is a job for politicians and political leadership. The tired pace of diplomatic discussions in the cavernous committee rooms of the UN will not bring the UN into the 21st century. What is needed is an infusion of political will.

We recall that in the 1960s people spoke of a rising tide of expectation. That was in relationship to development and decolonialization. We need today a rising tide of expectations that the international institutions that we have will be strengthened. What is urgently required is an infusion of vision, innovation and a renewed commitment to the ideals of the UN Charter. The spirit of San Francisco, that lofty idealism of the founders of the United Nations, that was of course one of the first casualties of the cold war, must be rekindled. To relaunch that spirit, we need to focus high level political attention.

That is why I have proposed in this motion that the Canadian government promote the convening of a high level meeting on global security. Earlier this year, under the auspices of parliamentarians global action, legislators from Latin America, Europe, Asia and Africa gathered here in the House of Commons to discuss this issue. We were briefed by UN officials, we had members from all major parties and across party lines from abroad and the focus of our discussion and time together was UN collective security. We were looking at it in the perspective of the aftermath of the gulf conflict.

Two days later, after these briefings, we agreed on the Ottawa declaration on UN collective security. The key recommendation of our time together in that representative meeting is a call for a special session of the UN General Assembly on International Peace and Security. The need for such a high level meeting has been recognized not just by our group and by parliamentarians, but by eminent persons here in Canada and abroad. The World Federation of the United Nations Associations, headed by Canadian Maurice Strong, has called for a major conference on the UN in 1995, the 50th anniversary of the UN. On April 22, 32 leading spokespersons, statesmen, including Maurice Strong, Stephen Lewis, Sonny Ramphal, Edward Heath, Jimmy Carter, Robert MacNamara, Sir Brian Urquhart and Eduard Shevardnadze, called for a world summit on global governments. At their July summit meeting in London,

Prime Minister Mulroney and the leaders of the G–7 industrialized nations devoted unprecedented attention to the question of strengthening the UN security role. Listen for a moment to the G–7 political declaration. Here is what the G–7 leaders, including our Prime Minister, said:

> We believe the conditions now exist for the United Nations to fulfil completely the promise of its founders. A revitalized United Nations will have a central role in strengthening the international order. The UN's role in peacekeeping should be reinforced and we are prepared to support this strongly.

• (1810)

A month earlier, in Berlin, our Prime Minister echoed the sentiment that no step could be more important in strengthening the international order than strengthening the UN itself. He said Canada would like to see the UN's capacity to prevent war enhanced. We would like to see the role of the Secretary General enhanced and the organization's peacekeeping capacity increased.

There is then, clearly, a great deal of enthusiasm. The groundwork has been put in place for political work, for the generating of political will.

Here we have the world leaders looking at how to strengthen the UN. What is needed today is for Canada and supportive governments to organize ourselves, to formally present a proposal at the current session of the United Nations General Assembly. That session opened earlier this week in New York, welcoming as we saw with world attention the Baltic nations, South Korea and others. There is a good chance that Canadian leadership will be supported and we can be instruments in the process of change.

But, in politics, as all of us in this House know, timing is everything, timing is crucial, and we must act now while there is still momentum behind strengthening the United Nations. For I fear that in a year or two that this present window of opportunity will have slammed shut.

And, what might this summit level meeting focus on, the summit level meeting that the motion encourages Canada to work for? Well, global security is, of course, a multifaceted concept and the issues of environment, development, disarmament and human rights are all key. But I think there can be a broad agreement on a starting point. The issue of strengthening the UN's peacekeeping and other security mechanisms has been sorely neglected and I believe the circumstances are particularly auspicious to remedy this problem at this time. I believe that the establishment of an effective UN security system is, in many ways, the key to many of the other problems we face, providing a reliable alternative to the bloated military budgets that nations rely upon for their security.

Here is the challenge. A mechanism of collective security is the precondition for an extensive disarmament to take place. Governments, like citizens of any community, need to be able to call 911, they need to be able to summon an international fighting force or police force. This security mechanism, in turn, would free vast resources that are needed to meet the host of domestic and international problems of environment, of education, of health care. And so I am urging the Government of Canada to seize this opportunity to develop, in concert with others, the idea of preventive peacekeeping. This could have deterred Iraq from aggression. It could avoid future bloody conflicts. The UN should have this capacity. We cannot expect the United States of America to be the world's policeman. This is unacceptable to Canadians, unacceptable to the world community, as well as to many Americans.

Ironically there has never been a high level political meeting, never been high level political attention devoted to the question of strengthening peacekeeping and international security.

If we think back for a moment, there have been special sessions of the General Assembly devoted to disarmament. There have been a number of sessions devoted to development. We are now in the midst of preparing for a second major conference on the world's environment to be hosted in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

But there are no such plans to devote this kind of attention to the issue of how we strengthen the security role of the United Nations and so strengthen the sense of security and confidence of the nations of the world. This is in spite of the fact that the maintenance of peace was intended to be the primary function of the United Nations. This was its raison d'être.

Such an initiative would give the entire international community an opportunity to shape the new world order of which both President Gorbachev and President Bush have spoken. There is a good deal of healthy scepticism of this concept. The concern is that the new world order will be dictated by a single power.

By launching a global intergovernmental conference, all nations will participate in the shaping of this order. They can insist that it meet their immediate needs and the needs of the global community.

As a result of the Ottawa workshop of parliamentarians sponsored by Parliamentarians for Global Action and CIIPS and other agencies here, that several of us who are here in the House tonight attended, there is a network of parliamentarians around the world organized to promote this kind of initiative. The broad representation of our Canadian group and our international network gives me confidence that there is a high degree of receptivity to and enthusiasm for this initiative, not just by the leaders as we have heard their statements, but also potentially in the Parliaments of the world.

One nation needs to take the lead. It needs to be a nation with an international reputation for support of the United Nations. Canada is in that position. As parliamentarians we owe it to the people of Canada and to the people of the world to press our government to show continued leadership in the creation of an effective United Nations for the 21st century.

So this evening I am asking for colleagues' support, and as I speak in the House and also across Canada for concerned and interested Canadians' public support, in urging the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be proactive. When Canada addresses the United Nations General Assembly in New York next Wednesday, I urge Canada's voice to be heard in calling for a UN summit on global security and committing resources to see it come about and lead us to a secure 21st century.

Madam Speaker, colleagues, I thank you for the opportunity to introduce this motion and for your kind attention.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the hon. member for Waterloo for this important motion which he has put before Parliament today.

• (1820)

In his motion, as he said, he is asking the Government of Canada to promote a summit meeting at the United Nations on global security and, in particular, to search for ways to prevent aggression by an improved peacekeeping policy and through the enforcement of international law.

Let me acknowledge immediately the outstanding work done so far by the United Nations in peacekeeping since 1956 when we had the first real peacekeeping operation to solve the Suez crisis. Of course, the proposals for that peacekeeping operation were put forward by our foreign minister of the day, Lester B. Pearson, who was, at the time, the President of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

As we all recall, Mr. Pearson won the Nobel Prize for that initiative. There is a long tradition for Canadians taking the kind of initiatives that the hon. member for Waterloo suggests today in his motion.

Over the years, these peacekeeping forces of the United Nations have monitored ceasefire operations. They have supervised elections in countries. They have monitored the withdrawal of armed forces from certain countries. They have also been there to govern the transition of certain colonies to self–government.

In fact as you will recall, UN peacekeeping forces won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1988 for the outstanding work they did over the years in bringing about peace.

All along since 1956, Canada has been one of the great leaders. Since 1948, Canadian peacekeeping forces have participated in 30 countries in peacekeeping operations. Over 80,000 Canadians have been involved in peacekeeping. This year, there are 2,000 of our troops involved but unfortunately again over that time, 81 Canadians were killed in peacekeeping operations.

As I said, what has been done so far has been good, but we have to admit it is still limited. Improvements are necessary and that is why this summit meeting at the United Nations is essential.

The gulf war in February, the war between Iraq and Kuwait, demonstrated this. The main problem at that time, you will recall, is that the UN peacekeeping forces had to go into operation once Kuwait was occupied by Iraq. It came in after the fact. What we are seeking is a type of UN peacekeeping force and a preventive peacekeeping policy which would have prevented that aggression from taking place in the first place. We are not to act after the fact, after the aggression, but prevent the aggression from taking place.

What we need is a new world order that would provide for preventive peacekeeping. What do we mean by that? We mean a process whereby there would be early warning on potential aggression that would provide for certain peacekeeping. There is no doubt that it is easier and less costly to prevent the occupation of a country such as Kuwait than to evict an aggressor once that occupation has taken place.

How would we set up such a preventive peacekeeping policy, or operation? I might mention that I have a private members' motion before this House which is motion 535 which sets out some of the details for preventive peacekeeping such as I will now discuss before the House.

What we need are, first of all, regionally located standing UN forces made up of national contingents on a rotating basis. When an incident takes place, the Security Council decides that we need a peacekeeping force, and the force is drafted from national contingents at the time.

What I and other experts are suggesting is that UN peacekeeping forces would be stationed on perhaps the six continents of the world in certain friendly countries with contingents made up of many countries. They are trained and they would be trained by special UN training units on how to properly carry out peacekeeping operations, but they would be there ready to respond if a nation felt threatened by the aggression of another country. So, if there was such a threat of aggression, the threatened nation could call upon the Secretary General and the Security Council and there would be a force in that region of the world to immediately go to the border area and patrol the border under the UN flag, the UN helmets and uniform patches and so on, and with weapons, not heavy weapons, but to deter the aggression.

Now imagine if we had had such a policy before the Kuwait war. If Kuwait, seeing the build-up of forces and the threatening action that was made against it by Iraq, could have called for a regional UN force that would have already been in place in the Middle East somewhere or close by in that part of the world which could go there and station itself along the border between Kuwait and Iraq. It is very unlikely in those circumstances, despite the character of Saddam Hussein, that he would have invaded against a multinational UN force that was already on the border under the UN flag. Not under the United States flag or under the Canadian flag, but under the UN flag. That is what is suggested as a part of a preventive peacekeeping policy.

There would also be, in different parts of the world, probably in the same place as these regional forces, stockpiles of equipment ready to support the forces. Now these forces that would be permanent with national contingents of UN armies or national armies could be supplemented by additional forces from the countries of the world if the thing escalated beyond what was originally considered necessary.

Once the UN force was on the border to deter aggression then you could immediately refer the outstanding issues of the dispute to the Security Council, to the General Assembly, perhaps to the World Court, the International Court of Justice, for mediation, for arbitration to resolve the underlying causes that might lead to that aggression that would have been under way, but which was prevented by the UN force on the spot.

Other things that have to be considered of course are proper financing for such UN operations. Unfortunately, at the United Nations now there is a large sum of arrears for UN peacekeeping operations. I believe it is over $800 million. Most of this, again unfortunately, is owed by the United States and the Soviet Union. That is what I think has to be pursued at greater length at the summit suggested by my hon. friend. As he said, many of these recommendations came out of a forum sponsored by Parliamentarians for Global Action here in Ottawa on May 21 and 22 of this year when 21 parliamentarians from 15 countries, parliamentarians who specialized in these things, came together and discussed this matter with experts for two days and then produced what is called "The Ottawa Declaration on United Nations Collective Security".

I fully support the hon. member's proposal. As I say, there are a lot of good ideas that could be put into more concrete form at such a meeting at the United Nations and all it requires really is the political will. As I say, let us look at the example of Kuwait, how less expensive it would have been in human lives, how less expensive in financial resources if we had had such a preventive peacekeeping policy in force there to prevent the aggression of Iraq. We would not have had to dislodge them from Iraq, we would have prevented the aggression in the first place.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to support this motion moved by the member from Waterloo to establish a UN summit level meeting on global security. This motion has our support and we would hope that all members of the House will not only support it but restrain their oratory to the point that before six o'clock this bill can receive unanimous approval of this House. I am sure it has that. Those who observe Private Members' Business will know that there is too often a propensity to talk a bill out. If we could have some discipline, perhaps we could put on the record of this House this very important motion, which I am sure reflects the hopes and aspirations of all Canadians.

It is important I think in analysing the motion before us to keep in mind the different concepts of peacekeeping and enforcement that are embodied in the motion which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government promote a summit-level meeting at the United Nations on Global Security, to examine ways of implementing and strengthening the United Nations peacekeeping and enforcement mechanisms.

Canadians are very familiar with the peacekeeping role and potential of the United Nations. We have been involved since the beginning when we were involved in the innovative approach to the UN Charter and the way in which the UN works to get around the rigidities put in the Charter in Articles 43 and 47 to allow the UN itself to play a direct role in keeping the peace. Invariably this role has been confined to coming in after hostilities have broken out to essentially police the peace by putting a UN force between the previously warring parties in the hopes that its presence would deter any future outbreak of hostilities. That is a very important role and one in which Canada has played an important part over the years.

There are important ways in which this role can be strengthened. In passing I note with regret that the government in its defence statement of two days ago included UN peacekeeping only as an afterthought, a paragraph stuck in the statement. It made no commitment to improve the work of the Canadian military in training and preparing itself for a role in peacekeeping.

The government has put a cap on the contributions that Canada will make to peacekeeping, contrary I believe to the will of most Canadians. It is a role that would be very, very effective and important in actually preserving lives and keeping the peace, far less expensive than the waste of money which is reflected in most of the rest of the defence policy of this government. Instead of emphasizing this constructive role, the government is just carrying on.

It is important that we devote much more attention than we have. It is being said privately by generals of other countries that Canada's capacity to contribute in peacekeeping has deteriorated, that we are not doing as good a job as we could.

Our individual soldiers who go overseas do a good professional job, those who are working specifically do a good professional job. However, the collective effort of Canada in this area, the level of training and so forth is not what it should be.

As well, I note we have had a lot of discussion about base closings. The people in the Annapolis Valley have come up with a proposal for long term development of the base in Cornwallis for a number of training purposes, including that of a multinational training centre. It is an idea the government should follow up very quickly and not wait for the report of the advisory committee.

As sort of an extension of peacekeeping, the UN has got into other very important areas, such as the monitoring and verification of elections and the work in Namibia with the police, in which Canada made a contribution.

The motion goes on to talk about enforcement. This is the area which is going to need an enormous amount of international effort if we are to achieve any significant improvements. The concept behind enforcement is to get involved in a potential military dispute, a potential war, before it breaks out and/or to have sufficient military capacity to enforce the will of the United Nations and the international community where a breach of international law has occurred.

We have had some examples of UN involvement in this way. Neither of the examples reflect an exercise of the UN Charter as it was originally contemplated. The first major one was in Korea where the United Nations Security Council happened to be missing the Soviet Union, which had gone off on a boycott at that stage. The remaining members of the Security Council were able to get together and agree that the response to the North Korean invasion of South Korea would come under UN direction. The command in that case, while it was really American, was officially that of the United Nations. That particular instance has never been duplicated.

In the gulf war, while the Security Council agreed in effect virtually unanimously—and certainly the superpowers, the permanent members of the Security Council all agreed—they were able to get through Security Council resolutions. However, the direction of the forces in the Gulf were not that of the UN but rather that of the member states which decided to contribute to the military response in that case. Therefore, the effect was that the Americans provided the military direction and leadership in concert with the other individual members of the UN who participated. That was not a direct UN operation.

It is probably beyond our hope in the immediate future that a global summit or any other political activity is going to produce such a dramatic change that a military operation the size of the Gulf operation will come under direct UN military supervision. Apart from anything else, the political problems are enormous.

It would be highly unlikely that a government such as the United States, which made such a huge contribution militarily in the Gulf operation, would be prepared in any future operation to turn over the direction of its forces in such a sizeable conflict to the UN or to any other command. However, the UN may be able to move step by step into a far more effective role in less significant conflicts, in more minor conflicts where the size of the military operation does not have to be as large as in the Gulf where there were 500,000 troops and a major connection between the various forces working together in that particular conflict.

While I support this motion and I support the idea of a global summit, I am inclined to think that the Canadian government should not just leave it at pushing for summits. As we have seen in the case of the arms sales issue, the government's call for a global summit there has evaporated into thin air. It is very hard to get the nations of the world to come together for a global summit unless there is a strong common will. The political effort involved in simply getting them all together, while it is important, should be directed toward more incremental gains and to work at the UN for the development of a UN force that operates in a similar way to the peacekeeping forces where various nations contribute forces to a UN command to work in a specific conflict or dispute. It seems to me that working on that would be a progressive step.

As the member for Waterloo mentioned, I think the UN may also have a role in international surveillance, security communications and development of an exchange of information, in confidence building measures and in other ways to head off disputes.

I recently attended an interesting conference in Windsor on civilian based defence. We heard an interesting address from Gene Sharp, who has written on the subject. There is in fact a civilian based defence association which promotes a series of useful ideas for heading off violent conflict and offering the potential for resolving disputes more effectively without resort to military means.

My final point, if I can, is to relate this motion to the debate that goes on in this House and elsewhere on the future of NATO and the role of NATO and other possible forces in regional conflicts in Europe.

As the cold war is now over and the threat of a Soviet Warsaw Pact invasion into western Europe, if it ever existed, is now gone, what is left in Europe are totally different security questions.

Again, the member for Waterloo mentioned Yugoslavia. That is a totally different security problem from that posed by the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact: a massive invasion similar to that in the Second World War.

What is needed to respond there militarily is a small force which can move quickly into that area. The issue then becomes: who runs it? The desirable answer for that is the United Nations. It should have a force which could go into Yugoslavia and deal with it.

Short of the United Nations in the interim, it should be all the nations of Europe including the United States and Canada that have some sort of security arrangement. The least desirable result, in fact non-desirable result, is to have NATO, which was designed for a totally different purpose and has a narrow base of members in the new Europe, taking on the responsibility of being the region's police force.

I urge the House to support this motion. I urge the Canadian people to support the direction of this motion. It is a very important one with great hope for the future of the world.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I too wish to lend my support to my hon. colleague's motion. It is very important.

The United Nations, as the international community's guardian of peace and security, has obtained a new lease on life from the end of the cold war and a successful outcome of the gulf crisis.

The United Nations can now start to deliver on its promise as the only organization able and mandated by the whole international community to deal with the global issues and challenges.

The Security Council of the United Nations is empowered to recommend and decide on action to be taken to preserve and to maintain international peace and security.

During the cold war it was literally crippled. It was prevented from agreeing on tangible responses to acts of aggression or other threats and defiances. Consequently, the provisions of chapter 7 of the charter of the United Nations was almost never used.

With the end of the east-west confrontation, the world has witnessed a rare degree of co-operation among the council's permanent five and the other non-permanent members of the council.

The ability of the Security Council to act in concert is a testimony to the new era of co-operation which is now open to all of us. In fact, the international community was able last year to deal with the severe Iraqi threat to international peace and security in an unprecedented manner, a manner that gave the whole United Nations system a new lease on life.

Iraq's aggression was a litmus test for the United Nations. The successful outcome to that aggression sent a clear message that the world has changed, that it will not tolerate aggression and that international law cannot be ignored.

It is clear that peacekeeping and peacemaking must remain the focus of the council's mandate. Recent events have underlined the promise of peacekeeping. Future trends for peacekeeping operations are to combine traditional military elements with political, humanitarian, economic and sometimes social.

We need those mechanisms. More advanced planning and financing will be needed. However important peacekeeping is, peacemaking must take on a more important role. We all agree that long-term security depends on the development of a more comprehensive apparatus that enables the Security Council to manage not only the crises that have already erupted, but also disputes which threaten to degenerate into crises.

The United Nations' previous inability to bring its members to respect the council's decisions meant that the organization was never able to achieve its potential as a peacemaker. It has never put in place the machinery which would allow the organization itself to enforce peace.

Now that the United Nations has the potential to act in this area, it is important to look at the arrangements that were foreseen in the United Nations charter which could enable the organization to meet its obligations in this regard. These are foreseen in chapter 7 of the charter.

Should we consider activating the provisions of article 43 which ask all members of the United Nations to:

> —undertake to make available to the Security Council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or arrangements, armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

> Such agreement or arrangements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.
> Agreement or arrangements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the Security Council. They shall be concluded between the Security Council and members, or between the Security Council and groups of members, and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

This is what article 43 of the United Nations charter calls for.

The first request is to make armed forces available to the United Nations. Once this is decided, this route would require the negotiation of agreements specifying the numbers and the types of forces, degree of readiness, the general location, and the nature of facilities and equipment to be provided.

Such an agreement might have the following advantages. The nature of the commitment would be determined in advance, which is very important. Defence authorities would be able to allocate the necessary resources and develop and exercise operational plans. It might be possible to avoid a need to relocate resources on an emergency basis as has often been the case for major Canadian participation in a United Nations peacekeeping mission.

Such an agreement would also allow participation by contributory states in the Security Council's deliberations and decisions concerning the employment of those forces. They would thus have a seat at the table which might not otherwise be available to them.

The events of the past two years have raised the expectations of the people all over the world. The international community now expects stronger council actions and a wide variety and range of conflicts that could jeopardize the international peace and security in a broader sense than was ever envisioned. In these, those events have led to a process of reconsideration of some of the reference points of international relations, including the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of member states.

In terms of foreign policy, Canadian participation in peacekeeping has always served to reinforce our status as an international player of consequence, and our reliance on multilateralism. I believe that Canadian participation in a renewed concept of international peacemaking under the United Nations auspices will also serve Canada's image and policies well.

It is my conviction that the United Nations has to change, it has to evolve, so as to be able to execute the mandate given to it by its founders. The strengthening of the United Nations organization and system should become one of our main objectives in the current General Assembly. The strengthening of the United Nations enforcement or peacekeeping mechanisms will be an evolutionary process.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure this evening to support the motion before us put by my colleague from Waterloo across the floor. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government promote a summit level meeting at the United Nations on global security, to examine ways of implementing and strengthening the United Nations peacekeeping and enforcement mechanisms.

It is not my intent this evening to talk out this issue because I think it would be an important signal for the Parliament here to approve this motion. I hope that we get an opportunity to do so on this.

When the United Nations was founded at San Francisco on June 25, 1945 its charter was signed by 51 states, primarily the nations of the western hemisphere and Europe. Now, close to half a century later, there are over 160 signatory states, representing all regions and peoples of the globe. The delegates at San Francisco met in the face of a world very different from that facing the delegates today in New York.

Although the original challenges identified at San Francisco, such as economic development, peace and security and human rights remain; many others have risen. The concepts of sustainable development, third world debt, self-determination and high technology were unknown to the framers of the UN Charter. The emergence and persistence of these and many other challenges, coupled with momentous global political change in the last two years, let alone in the last half century, have contributed to a sense of crisis today which did not exist in 1945. There is an increasing demand for a rethinking of the means by which humankind orders its affairs.

The role of the United Nations, the largest multilateral organization in the history of civilization, is both central and critical to this task. As a fundamental supporter of the United Nations system since its inception, Canada's contribution to United Nations reform and an enhanced United Nations presence in world affairs is both necessary and vital to Canada's national interests.

Madam Speaker, I am also, besides being pleased to stand in support of this motion this evening, very pleased to say that I am a member of the organization Parliamentarians For Global Action, an organization which represents a large non-partisan group of parliamentarians from around the globe. As was mentioned by other speakers this evening, representatives of this organization met in Ottawa on May 21 and 22 and produced the Ottawa declaration on UN collective security. Perhaps I can outline just a few of the points that were made in this declaration, which in some respects go a little bit further than the motion before us this evening that we are debating. One of the points made in this declaration is that the rule of law ultimately will prove less costly than the chaos of war.

Earlier this year after the gulf war crisis the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade met on February 6 to hear witnesses from non-government organizations working in Third World countries speak to the problems that the gulf war created for many Third World nations.

It has been suggested that the gulf war, the crisis we have lived through this year and are happy to see the end of, could be only the beginning of north-south wars in our world. Nobody would want to see that happen, but I think it is true that that is a possibility given the amount of militarization and the amount of arms trade that goes on in this world and the frustration that is experienced by so many nations of the south. Unless we are very vigilant and determined that war will not occur again and carry through on such proposals as is presented in the motion this evening, it could be the first of the north-south confrontations in our world.

When the non-government organizations came before our committee and spoke of the cost of the gulf war, not to the developed nations but to the developing Third World southern nations, they spoke of the fact that that war threatened and affected the lives of millions of people in nations all over the world. Who would have imagined that a war that took place in the Middle East would affect countries so disparate in location in our globe as Brazil, Bangladesh, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and the Philippines; but that in fact is what has happened.

It is these wars that create more difficult economic circumstances for these already struggling nations, causing standards of living to deteriorate and immediately causing for our own concern large numbers of refugees and insecurity globally speaking.

The declaration that was made in Ottawa spoke of different initiatives that could be taken: preventive peacekeeping where UN troops could be deployed along the border of a nation legitimately fearing attack, to be backed as necessary by forces authorized by the Security Council, as a deterrent to possible aggression by another state and a signal of the resolve of the international community to remain seized of the situation. It requested particular parliamentary initiatives and it stated specifically: "We call upon our colleagues in Parliaments, assemblies, and congresses around the world to begin a major review of the structure of the United Nations with a view to broadening the political legitimacy of the United Nations collective security actions and to ensure that those actions reflect the interests of all member states".

In response to that, the first paragraphs that I read as I stood here in the House this evening were from a notice that was sent out internationally and to colleagues and friends across this country announcing that the Liberal Party of Canada is sponsoring a public symposium entitled "Canada and the United Nations System in the 21st Century", which will take place in Vancouver, British Columbia, beginning on United Nations Day, October 24, and going through to October 26.

At that time we are hoping to discuss the topics of the maintenance of peace, environment and development, trade and development, the movement of peoples, leadership, the UN role in world society, and the role of law.

The very first workshop of that session to which all are invited is entitled "The Maintenance of Peace".

The role of the United Nations in maintaining international peace and security, the powers of the Security Council under chapters 6 and 7 of the charter, residual powers of other organs such as the General Assembly, peacekeeping, the role of the secretary general, options for reform of charter provisions, Security Council membership, and UN versus regional arrangements will all be on the agenda in that workshop.

I encourage anybody interested in supporting this motion and seeing the necessary reform that is required in the United Nations to try to attend.

I cannot say often enough how important I feel the text of this motion is and what it implies for our future. It is significant that Parliaments around the world are promoting this in hope for world peace and improved security.

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–21, an Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ontario has 16 minutes left. The hon. member for Ontario.

[English]

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to continue debate on this bill which we started on Wednesday. At that time I made some comments relative to some past performances and will carry on from where I left off.

What we are talking about is taking all of the revenues of the goods and services tax, revenues from the sale of various Crown corporations and other gifts to Canada and putting them aside specifically targeted and earmarked to be put against the debt of Canada. It is with that in mind that I would like to carry on my comments.

We all have to appreciate and understand that we are not talking about one particular bill, although that is certainly the subject that is in front of us. We are talking about the over–all policies of the Government of Canada.

Without some of the other pieces of proposed legislation, this bill in itself would be ineffective. We have to control government spending. We have to keep the revenues of the government reasonably stable, and therefore, this bill will have some effect.

Another proposed piece of legislation that I am involved in is receiving some representations. It represents the dilemma that all Canadians face, certainly. I was involved in the hearings concerning the establishment of the goods and services tax, as well as back in my own constituency.

One of the fears of Canadians is that if this ends up being a "cash cow", the Government of Canada would simply create all kinds of new programs to spend all this new–found wealth, if we can describe it that way.

In my constituency, Canadians said: "We understand we have to pay the debt. We understand we have to address the deficit, and if you can assure us that the revenues you get from the GST will not be spent on new programs, that it will be used to address the debt, then, we might not like the goods and services tax, but we will be able to accept it much more readily because we all know that we have to sometime pay the bill." This bill does that.

To give you the alternative, in the finance committee hearings this week dealing with the control on government spending, we have had some excellent representations. I think it reflects the concern in the country because we had appear before us, a group called the Canadian Taxpayers' Federation.

I would just like to quote one paragraph from its representation: "We support the principle of the Spending Control Act because it represents the beginning of a solution to the prisoners' dilemma. While all of us collectively might agree that the federal government should reduce its deficit, each of us individually has been unwilling to suffer cuts to those programs from which we, as individuals, have benefitted".

I think that is very well said. Certainly in the last few days in the Windsor area, we have had another manifestation of the problem. We have had the truckers closing some transportation routes, demanding that the government cut taxes. They were demanding that this spring in my riding, the heart of where the trucking industry started the blockade in Ontario. They were demanding that the government cut taxes. That is one side of the coin: cut taxes. This groups says they collectively are not willing to absorb their share of that cut.

This week we have had in the finance committee an alternative presented to that of cutting taxes. That view was presented by the taxpayers' coalition about Canadians not willing to share their concern. In fact we have had people lined up trying to get their share of this "cash cow", if I can describe the GST as some others have.

To give you the best examples of the alternatives, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture this week appeared before the committee and said: "CFA is concerned that these programs will be considered under the new policy initiatives enrichment provision section which are not exempted from the proposed legislation and will therefore bring some cuts in other agricultural programs or elsewhere." It went on to talk about how it needed more money.

There was another group that appeared before us as well and that was the Canadian Association of University Teachers. I would like to quote a sentence from their presentation: "We also feel that the government is dangerously limiting its own room for manoeuvring in the years to come and we fear that once again higher education will be forced to pay the cost". Their presentation talked about how they needed more money.

Yesterday the National Action Committee on the Status of Women appeared before us. They came to comment about their perceptions with regard to child care. They had a tremendous program of additional demands for money from the federal government. You can see that just this week throughout this country the debate rages; one side saying do not spend it, cut taxes, and another side saying they want more money.

That is the dilemma we face and that is why I think we have made the right decision in dealing with the GST; that the funds generated from the GST have to go into that special account and just cannot be spent anywhere.

It is not just the GST revenues. I would like to relate some other revenues that might be going into this debt servicing reduction account.

In the past the Government of Canada has sold off some corporations that we, collectively, paid for with Canadian taxes: Nordion Corporation, Air Canada, de Havilland, Canadair, just to name a few. The Canadian taxpayer, having paid for these corporations for all these years, when we sold them, where was the benefit to the taxpayer? Did we get a dividend? Did we get a reduction on our debt? We got nothing. The money was put somewhere in general revenues, and it disappeared. Nobody can identify specifically the dividend from our investment in that.

Let us look a little further because we are now embarked on the sale of a Crown corporation, Petro-Canada. Taxpayers have put a tremendous amount of money in that. I would think that when it is ultimately sold that Canadians would want to know that the money from the sale of the corporation has gone to reduce the debt that in fact was incurred when we purchased the corporation in the first place.

Could you imagine some other corporations that we might sell? Can you imagine selling CN Rail? Think of the billions of dollars that would generate if we ever got around to talking about selling it. The CBC—I am not sure anybody would want to buy that—but think of the potential revenue of selling CBC. VIA Rail is another Crown corporation we could get rid of that Canadians might be willing to buy privately. We could put all of that money, however much there might be, into reducing the debt that we incurred in owning those things in the first place.

How about the Royal Canadian Mint? Can you imagine if we sold that how much we could get for it? People might be interested in selling all of those things if they knew that when we sold them the revenue would be used to reduce the debt that was incurred.

Mr. Mills: Why don't you sell the House of Commons?

Mr. Soetens: Well, now we have heard from the Liberal Party opposite. They want to sell the House of Commons. That is the level of debate they put into this thing. They should know that the House of Commons is not for sale. They have often tried to sell it, tried to get people to buy it with money but it is not for sale. Anyway, that is the process.

There is another program. In fact this week the Fraser Institute appeared before the finance committee and it talked about a program where they would establish a prize of $40,000 for the individual who could come up with the best savings each year in the operations of the Government of Canada without a commensurate reduction in the level of service. For any Canadian, whether it be a constituent from my riding or any other riding, or even a member of Parliament, who can come up with a particular program that will reduce costs without reducing level of service, there is a $40,000 prize. The member for Ottawa Centre, I believe, came up with a suggestion, as he put it, of a gift to the Government of Canada to reduce the debt that exists. Rather than have it spent someplace else, it would be donated. He retracted on that because he said: "Well, first we have to reduce the debt of the Liberal Party", so he would donate it there.

The idea is that there are people willing to make contributions to the Government of Canada to reduce the debts of this country. Rather than have it simply spent on some new program, have it spent somewhere in this country on some spending that may not be commensurate with the idea of the person who gave the money in the first place. We now have put in place a mechanism so that money just is not spent that comes out of it.

Now, you have also heard, Madam Speaker, all of these Canadians talk about the GST as a great generator of revenue. Well, that might be true but I guess we should look at the first four months of this fiscal year. I saw a report in The Globe and Mail this morning which suggested that net revenue on the GST to the end of July, which is the most recent available, amounts to about $4.6 billion. Our budget for the year is just over $16 billion. If this great generator of extra revenue is going to generate the billions that people are lining up to spend, they had better look at that July number again. It says that we are basically on target, that we are generating the revenue we said we would generate in the first year, and I think that is heartening to know.

More important, even though the facts do not yet point that way, if those who suggest this is a great generator of revenue are right, is it not great to know that this debt reduction fund account will be in place and it will prevent the Government of Canada from simply creating a new program, from simply spending it someplace else? Very clearly, this money will be earmarked exactly where the constituents in my riding have said it should be. If we have to pay this tax, and if there is extra revenue, we want to know that the Government of Canada is not just going to frivolously spend it. That is what we will accomplish when we finally pass this bill.

The debt burden has been built up over years. Some 20 years has seen a tremendous amount of growth in that debt. There was some debt prior to the seventies, but basically it has been a growth of debt over the last 20 years. It is a result of Liberal spending and Conservative spending. It is a result of 15 or 16 years of deficits and compound interest on debt that existed over the years. So, that is there. How it got there I am sure all Canadians are aware.

But it has to stop. You cannot do it instantly, you cannot just wipe out that debt, you cannot just wipe out the deficit, because there are many Canadians who rely on the very important programs for their particular needs. So it will take many years of fiscal responsibility based on tough committed action to reduce the debt to a more manageable proportion.

I think the debt servicing and reduction account is a threshold step to make certain that we continue and accelerate and progress toward this vital goal that all Canadians have.

It was some 60 years ago that Prime Minister Mackenzie King told this House that "the promises of yesterday are the taxes of today". This legislation takes a different course. It is a promise of action, made concrete by law, that the burden of deficits and debts will be reversed so that they do not add to the taxes of tomorrow. It is further hard proof of our commitment to the fiscal responsibility that is a key foundation for future economic growth for Canada and increased prosperity for all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, I want to conclude by thanking you for the opportunity to address the House on this very important bill, and also to encourage all members of this House to support, not just the bill but the concept that revenue to the government has to be specifically earmarked so that we can reduce the debt—the deficit first and ultimately the debt—of this country, so that our children, my children, your children, do not have a burden to face.

When they, in the future, run for Parliament as undoubtedly they will, they will not find themselves faced with the fact that 35 cents out of every dollar has to be spent on the interest before they even start to look at any other expenditures. That is a burden that we all find, Madam Speaker, and I hope that when all is said and done, we will keep that thought in mind: that the children of the future should not have the burden that we have today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I am going to try and keep my sense of humour here today; it is the end of the week. However, I cannot believe the charade that is being put before us by this bill.

First of all I want to say there is absolutely no way that this government can possibly understand the way this GST is breaking the morale of this country. There is absolutely no way that this government can understand the fact that the creators of wealth in this country are those people who go out and work hard and, through incentive, create the revenue that allows us to pay down the very debt we are all concerned about.

Conservatives are not the only ones concerning themselves about debt. We concern ourselves with debt as well. Yes, we did leave a debt of $180 billion at the end of 1984, but from 1980 to 1983 we had one of the worst world recessions. From 1984 to 1988 you doubled the debt, so let us not throw daggers at each other on the debt.

Where I have problems with the Conservative government is its total lack of imagination. It thinks the way you eliminate debt is sell off Via Rail, sell off Air Canada, sell off the Royal Canadian Mint, sell, sell, sell. That is the extent of their creativity, one word: sell.

I know this member sits on the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance. He has listened to pleas from all sectors of this economy. My simple question to him is this: at what point in time does he feel that he can stop pushing the morale of this country further down? At what point in time does he feel we should stop doing that, and get back into a more hopeful, wealth creation mode? I do not think he or his party realizes—or at least I am not seeing any demonstration of it—that the pain out there right now, because of the people unemployed, because of the many small businesses that are just hanging on by their fingernails, is being exacerbated by this GST. This debt reduction fund has absolutely nothing to do with reality because the money you receive on the excess GST, if it went into general revenue, still goes against the debt.

The general revenue fund is not some separate institution. It is all part of the same balance sheet of the Government of Canada. Why you are setting up this bogeyman called the debt reduction fund is beyond me. Why could you not use the same kind of creativity to put some job creation plans forward? I am not saying spend more, but let us put our energy back into putting people back to work.

Again, my specific question is, how much more do you really want to push the morale of this country?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the member started off and threw a bunch of daggers and then said he would not throw any daggers on the debt, so I will not throw any daggers either.

I would just point out that when the morale of this country was good—and I will acknowledge that—the deficit went. We doubled the debt in the period up to 1977, in two years. We doubled it again three years later and we doubled it again four years after that. Within a period of about eight years, the opposition quadrupled the debt. Perhaps that is even quadrupled. Anyway, it is a big number.

You ask how we are going to change the morale? Well, we are changing the morale because we are making long-term decisions.

The GST is not just an isolated program. There is a number of companies in my riding which were real winners by the GST because we got rid of an unfair manufacturing tax. That is how to start to improve situations in this country. That is how to help those people who create the wealth you were talking about. There is no other way to get out of the dilemma this country faces other than improving the over-all wealth of Canada, the over-all generation of funds through job creation and through investment decisions. It is the GST that has made a lot of those decisions easier. People will be willing to make those decisions and spend the money on GST as long as they can be assured that the money will be targeted against the very thing that you and I have raised, and that is the debt. This bill guarantees that will happen.

The alternative is we could tell the truckers tomorrow that we will reduce the taxes on their concerns. It is easy to do. It just raises the deficit. Morale would be great, but you know my kids do not want their morale shattered like that.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a brief comment in this debate.

The member from the government side speaks of the deficit of money. I wonder why he neglected to mention a very fundamental deficit and that is the deficit of the people, the poor of our country. To me it is a real deficit. Because of the poverty of over 1 million Canadians, many of our children drop out of school. When they drop out in alarming numbers, they develop no skills to prepare them for the work force.

Does the member not see that preparation of our youth for the work force will guarantee the future of our country, guarantee their employment and guarantee our productivity?

The Senate of Canada recently issued a report and I wonder if the member has read that report on poverty. In it is mentioned very clearly that if we invest $5 billion today, 20 years hence we will have a return of some $28 billion to this country in terms of increased productivity, increased taxes from the revenues that will be generated from these workers, reduced payment to the welfare assistance program because these people will be productive, and so on.

I ask the member what proposal would he have to solve the problem of poverty out of this GST income? I would suggest that for this to proceed, a fund from the GST has to be earmarked for the poor of our country.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, in my speech I made a comment about people lining up to spend money that was not there and you have just had another example of people lining up wanting money. This money has simply replaced the federal sales tax. So, to this point there is not all this extra money.

The member talks about the deficit of the people and I understand his concern and it is a very legitimate concern. He says there was a report that if we simply threw $5 billion at the problem today, we would get $28 billion back, I believe, in 20 years is what he said. That $5 billion today is $5 billion that is borrowed. Compound interest on that $5 billion over 20 years, I do not know what it would be worth, but it would be a lot more than $28 billion. So it is a net loss.

The point is that we are not short of money in the education system. That point has been made. Canada has one of the highest per capita expenditures on education in the world. Our problem is that we are not educating the students with the money we are putting in the system. Maybe that ought to be reviewed. There are a lot of students coming out of schools who are unable to read or write. How come? How come they can go to school and not come out at the other end with a useful skill? So, I do not think throwing money at it is the solution. Perhaps we have to readdress just how the money is being spent to ensure that we in fact accomplish some of the things that the hon. member is concerned about. Yes, there is a deficit, but simply throwing money at the problem is not the answer.

We have to invest money wisely in job creation. We also have to invest money to ensure that those creators of wealth have the opportunity to multiply their successes to address the very concern that the member has raised.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I have just a few words on this bill at second reading stage. Of course, at second reading stage we are debating the principle of the bill.

I presume, after reading the title of the bill, that the principle of the bill is that 7 per cent tax that everyone pays. No matter where they go they cannot avoid that 7 per cent tax. If they go into a store they pay the 7 per cent tax. If they get into a taxi they pay the 7 per cent tax. Why, we even pay it when our life is ending. It is everywhere. The principle of this bill is to take that 7 per cent GST and eliminate the debt of Canada over a period of time.

It strikes me that there is something seriously wrong with that approach if the tax is unevenly distributed throughout Canada. In other words, people in northern Canada or British Columbia or Newfoundland, people at the far extremities of this nation, cannot just go down to the factory or close to a factory and purchase an item. In between the point from which an item is manufactured in Canada and the point at which someone buys it, in between that space, there is a proliferation of that 7 per cent GST.

In other words, it could be argued that someone who lives in British Columbia pays more into the GST fund than someone who lives where the item that person is buying is manufactured. Someone who lives in northern Canada would also pay more. The item has to be manufactured, trucked to a distributor, taken by the distributor, moved to the retailer and then sold to the individual.

Is it really fair for the government to say that it will retire the debt of Canada by means of the GST and as a result have people in the far extremities of this country shouldering a greater percentage of the national debt on a per capita basis than other people? The actual principle of the bill is faulty.

Living in provinces that already have a high retail sales tax is quite different from living in a province that has no retail sales tax. It started with the telephones. People picked up their telephone bills and saw that the federal government had now gone into retail taxes on long distance telephone calls. They looked at the bill and saw one tax added to the total cost and then another tax, and they were paying double on that tax. It was not just 8 per cent plus 7 per cent to make 15 per cent. It was 8 per cent on the total amount and then 7 per cent on that total amount, which added up not to a 15 per cent tax but a 16 per cent tax and a 17 per cent tax.

When you look at the tax itself, it is unfair because—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member for St. John's East is pointing out, and I agree with him, that in Newfoundland we pay a very high provincial sales tax and now this outrageous 7 per cent GST on top of it. We end up paying over 20 per cent sales tax because there is a tax on top of a tax. The tax idea of the GST was faulty right from the beginning in that it presented a situation where the GST would generate a 7 per cent sales tax in Alberta but people have to pay 20 per cent in Newfoundland because there is a provincial tax on top of a federal tax.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member from Alberta is pointing out that one tax is provincial and the other one is federal. I already said that.

Is it really fair to have a bill like this that says: "Well, all right, we are going to take all the revenues from this and we are going to retire the national debt on that basis."

The ordinary Canadian must be sitting back and saying: "Well, my goodness, if that is going to take care of the national debt then what about all the other things that the Government of Canada brought in which it said were to take care of the national debt?"

The government totally changed the unemployment insurance scheme in this country on the basis that the national debt needed to be serviced and it could no longer afford to contribute to the unemployment insurance scheme. Day after day in this Chamber we listened to the minister saying: "We have got to get out of unemployment insurance because we have got to retire this national debt. We cannot afford to be part of the unemployment insurance scheme any more and we are now going to make it more difficult to get unemployment insurance". It then brought in this outrageous scheme where people now have to figure out which side of the line they live on. If they live on this side of the line they need 13 weeks to qualify, if they live on this side of the line they need 10 weeks to qualify. That was all in the name of retiring the debt. Every public servant was sent these memos saying that they were making a great contribution toward retiring the national debt.

In the case of the unemployment insurance bill—I recall it was C-21 and this one is C-21—the government had a gold button it sent to all the public servants, or gold plated I suppose but not really gold, saying C-21. Everybody got it this past year. Lo and behold, open up the button and it says: "Made in the U.S.A.". It sent them mugs that said: "Working together for the retirement of the debt". If you turned over the mug it said: "Made in Taiwan".

We have listened to the government say: "We are going to retire the debt, get rid of the debt and that is why we changed the unemployment insurance scheme". The government even removed the railway tracks in some provinces on the basis that it could not keep making those expenditures because the national debt was too high. It discontinued the railway services. We can no longer go to North Sydney, Nova Scotia by railway because that service has been discontinued from Truro. In Newfoundland there is no more freight service at all and practically all the tracks are up now. I think the tracks are being sent to somewhere in Venezuela. The railway ties are being piled up but they are not much good. It left a big roadway across the province. I only wish Newfoundland had made a settlement with the Government of Canada to pave them or something so at least it could be used instead of just having some crushed stone there.

All of this was done in the name of the national debt.

• (1040)

Madam Speaker, I can recall them standing in this Chamber and saying that they must now impose great restrictions on our postal service because of the national debt. That was the rationale.

Canadians would turn around now after hearing about this bill and say: "Oh, does this mean we are going to get back our post office now because we lost it because there needed to be payments into the treasury because of the national debt". They lost their post office because of the national debt.

It takes two weeks on average for a letter to be sent from point A to point B in this country because of the national debt. I know members of Parliament get these surveys all the time conducted by learned consulting groups and accounting firms that say: "The service is great." That is only if the letter is addressed and typewritten, put out by a computer and the address is directly in the centre of the envelope. Not if one sits down and writes the address.

Every member of Parliament is being phoned by students saying that their student loans have not been approved although the notification has been sent to the university. As one knows, students go and pick up their student loans at the university. Notification has been sent, but it has not arrived there yet. It was sent out two weeks ago. So and so wrote a letter to her granddaughter last Christmas some time and it arrived just the other day. All of this was done in the name of the national debt.

The transfer payments to provinces for health and education were cut in the budget because of the national debt. Does this mean now that the Government of Canada is going to turn around and reinstate the transfer payments to the provinces for health and education, for the running of our hospitals, for equipment in our hospitals? Hospitals today are under this incredible squeeze, all by provincial governments, because the provincial governments were cut back by the federal government in the name of retiring the debt.

Every budget speech, if one goes back over and looks at them every year, and that was the rationale. There was no other rationale. It said: "We have to cut down on transfer payments to provincial governments for hospitals, health and post-secondary education. Why? Because of the national debt. It was not because of anything else. That was it. That is all.

Does this mean now with this 7 per cent of everything in this country, when an individual walks into a store anywhere, he or she pays 7 per cent and all this money goes into the retiring of the debt? And this is going to retire the debt, this is what is needed to retire the debt?

Does this mean now that the federal government—it would make sense— would turn around and reverse what it did in the previous budget, which was to state that in order to retire the debt, it had to reduce the payments for health and post-secondary education in the provinces?

It is one or the other. Either this is going to reduce the debt, or it is not going to reduce the debt. Either this is the sole means of doing it, or all of these other things have to be done as well to do it. The question is: What is it? Why is the Government of Canada behaving every single day like some massive tax grabber?

Madam Speaker, here is a good one for you. You will be interested in this, coming from Montreal, Quebec. I obtained a copy of a proposed new cost recovery policy. Why is it there? It is there because the federal government continues to say day after day, month after month, to the Public Service of this country: "Look, you've got to find ways of raising more money. We want you to collect more money. We want you to cut back."

The federal government brought in a scheme three years ago to give a manager in the Public Service a bonus if he could find ways of collecting new taxes, to give him as bonus if he could get rid of more people. They called it a productivity bonus. In other words, if you cut down on the numbers of employees under you then you received a cash bonus before Christmas, a productivity bonus. It was really pay-offs for lay-offs. That is what it was. You cannot blame the Public Service.

Now here is a good one for you, Madam Speaker. This one was just the other day. Here is the statement: "Earmarked taxes," which is what this is in this bill, "could take the form of a charge on commercial carriers or on shippers in relation to the value of the cargo, or to the water transport charge, or a charge based on fuel purchased."

Of course what this is is a discussion paper, a proposed new cost recovery policy for the Department of Transport. As you know, there were various measures enacted recently by Transport Canada to increase the taxes at airports where airplanes are charged a fee for landing and then new airport taxes were put on top of that and existing ones were increased. The authority to do that was found under the Aeronautics Act. It is quite simple.

Beyond that authority one finds in individual acts the Government of Canada was stymied, it did not know how it could extend that principle which was contained in certain pieces of legislation to a broader spectrum to allow government departments and civil servants in managerial positions to be able to come up with ideas to have more taxes, to earmark more taxes for specific reasons. It found the solution in this session of Parliament and it went through this House in the Financial Administration Act, and members who were on the finance committee would know what I am talking about. The Financial Administration Act was changed to encourage and to allow government departments to seek ways of raising new taxes within their department.

Here is one of them. Now what is this? What does it mean? What it means is that the federal government is now going to have an earmarked tax on buoys. On buoys. Not on men or women, but buoys. These are buoys. Of course I looked it up and it said they do not call them buoys, they call them floating navigational aids. They say here, here's a brilliant statement: "In many parts of Canada most floating navigational aids are removed during the winter." A very intelligent statement, especially when the ice is around. A continuing "nav-aids" charge would still be justified because non-floating navigational aids remain available and winter replacements are installed in many cases.

Well, it is kind of difficult when there is ice for a hundred miles. How does one navigate over ice or under ice for 200 miles? One is still going to be charged for it. Yes, one is still going to be charged.

I notice you telling me two minutes, Madam Speaker. I have not even got to the point of the bill that I was going to talk about but I will continue with this point. The federal government is in this psychology of earmarking taxes, of having government departments devise means of taxing people.

• (1050)

Here is one here that says it is now going to make a charge on cargo. Here is the suggestion to the government. I do not know whether it is going to do it. Some of the companies think it is going to do it. Companies right across Canada were sent letters by the government saying it was going to do it. It is going to tax you for using buoys in the water, so much per nautical mile.

It comes from this order by the federal government that you have to tax everything. You have to collect more money to pay for this, pay for that, pay for something else.

An hon. member: At least we are paying for it.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says: "At least we are paying for it." Well, Madam Speaker, if you add up all the things that it brought in taxes on, and you add up all of the things it has cut out, if you add up all of the things it has removed, now it says: "Oh, no, we did not get any money from that at all, now we are going to get it from a new 7 per cent tax."

I would strongly suggest to the Government of Canada that it restore all of these things it has cut. Why not be honest with the Canadian people? Stop wasting money, stop wasting the taxpayers' money everywhere one looks, and stop overtaxing the people of this country.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker—

An hon. member: Run up the debt.

An hon. member: That is what we would call an incestuous—

Mr. Reid: Yes, incestuous, but I will not go into it in this House. I will be apologizing later.

It is a great pleasure as usual to follow my friend and colleague and countryman, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls. I had the privilege just last week to be driving on the Trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland. As I came up the hill out of Benton, it was very confusing all of a sudden. It was mid-day. I thought for a second I was in the middle of the big runway at the international airport in Gander. Here was blacktop, pavement, six lanes of pavement. I did not know where it had come from. It had no lines on it. I did not know which was the passing lane, which was the new shoulder. We do not have shoulders on the paved roads in Newfoundland much. But now we do. All we have are little yellow dots down the road. As sometimes is the case, some people were driving a little quickly. There was an RCMP officer coming and we all slowed down and I had the opportunity to look. There is nothing but pavement.

Do you know what the big issue is today in the town of Gander? The bypass. Where are we going to put the road: through or around Gander? But, Madam Speaker, as you know, except at certain times every four years in Newfoundland, pavement just does not arrive from nowhere. Pavement is paid for. It is very expensive. We are talking over $1 million a mile. That is for what we are used to, which is two lanes, but now we are going four lanes right across the province. All through my constituency it is four lanes. Into Gander it is four lanes.

You should see what they are doing in Corner Brook with bypasses and overpasses and underpasses. Do you know where that is coming from Madam Speaker? That is coming from the $800 million that this government was able to pay to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador: "Let us sign an agreement. The railway is not being used, it is a disincentive to industry, it is a disincentive to transportation. Let us build the roads that are essential through this province so that we have half a chance to transport goods around the province."

Very quickly if I may, Madam Speaker, on this GST. We are talking about cuts in the government. This government has not cut 2,500 jobs out of its Public Service, just like that. Like the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador has done, just like that. Just like that, 2,500 jobs gone this year. And what, in the name of good financial and fiscal management?

Wage freezes. We live in a small society in Newfoundland and Labrador. We tend to know each other. We have neighbours, we have friends, we have relatives that come and go in our lives in politics and in business and that sort of thing. That gives us an opportunity to speak to these people, people that we went to school with, our cousins, perhaps our brothers even. It gives us the opportunity to pass messages along.

If my brother were the President of the Treasury Board in Newfoundland and Labrador, I would tell him first of all that he should not cut these jobs, he should not close six hospitals, he should not close technical schools. The last thing I would tell my brother if he were President of the Treasury Board is that I would not take the goods and services tax and harmonize it with the provincial sales tax, as is happening in Newfoundland and Labrador. But my brother is not the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Baker: I thought the hon. member heard me when I said that I was not my brother's speaker. But I might remind the hon. member that when he referred to Benton, the community of Benton is just outside of Gander, and he is correct, it is on the Trans-Canada Highway. I must admit when you do go up over the hill, you are confronted by all of this blacktop. Now, in Newfoundland when you have got good pavement that is what you call it, and everybody just looks forward to having paved roads. I mean, there are parts of my federal riding that have these dirty rotten dirt roads and you are down to the crank case in mud in the spring and you cannot move, and this sort of thing.

But I must admit that when you come up over that hill in Benton and you see all of that beautiful new pavement, well there is a reason for that. That is the beginning of the riding of that great Liberal member who called the tenders and his name happens to be Winston Baker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I would like to get back to the bill. It is all very well for us to have an historical accounting of how they build roads in Newfoundland, but I want to ask my friend and colleague about the bill.

The annual deficit is the object here of this initiative. I want to ask the member, if he really believes this is nothing but smoke and mirrors on the government's part, in his opinion will this change the debt position of the government in any way? Will this create any new income? Will it bring in new revenues? Will it prevent it from spending further than it has spent, like it announced today, or yesterday? Rather, they are moving 200 public servants from the riding of Ottawa—Vanier to Regina. Welcome: "Oink, oink, oink," as Jeffrey Simpson says this morning. Welcome again to Brian Mulroney's Ottawa.

Ladies and gentlemen, you haven't learned anything yet. It moved 200 public servants to Regina and it found $236 million for the so-called TRIUMF KAON particle accelerator.

I just wonder if the member could comment briefly on how this bill is going to prevent this government from going: "oink, oink, oink," come every election time.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I must admit, and people looking at this must think it is quite a coincidence, all of a sudden for the Government of Canada to find all of this money to develop an industry that has been demanded in British Columbia for years. The scientists out there have been demanding it. They have been demanding it year after year after year after year to create those jobs. All of a sudden, what a coincidence. The day the election is called out there, yes, the very minister who used to be in the cabinet out there with that government goes down and announces that particular expenditure.

Meanwhile back in the hon. member's riding now, what do they have? They have all of the employees there being offered zero per cent wage increases. And all at the same time, we have 4,600 of the upper management people getting their bonuses. So that is the Government of Canada's way, it is entirely political, and I am sure that all we can look forward to for the next two years are political announcements, loads of money to spend, because they have taxed everybody to death.

INFLUENZA INFORMATION MONTH

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House and Canadians in general to the fact that September is influenza information month, jointly sponsored by the Canadian Diabetes Association, the Canadian Lung Association, the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Public Health Association.

The purpose is to promote the vaccination of high-risk groups, and I am sure you will agree, from personal experience, Madam Speaker. People at risk are usually those over 65 and and those suffering from chronic illness such as asthma, heart disease or diabetes.

These people should get a flu vaccination to protect themselves against infection and avoid often serious complications. All high-risk individuals are urged to make an appointment with their doctor or call their public health office for further information. The flu vaccin is now available and all those —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time is up, but I would like to thank him for his excellent advice.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, on Tuesday on behalf of the Liberal Party, I called on the Prime Minister to support the ceasefire in Yugoslavia, and to act on the request by the presidents of Yugoslavia and Croatia for peacekeepers from the United Nations. I congratulate him on the speed with which he acted on our suggestion.

I trust, however, that Ambassador Fortier will do more than just inform the United Nations Security Council and the European Community. Canada's position, in light of the new internationalism, must be to place individual and minority human rights above the absolute rights of sovereign states.

I met yesterday with representatives of the Canadian Croatian Information Centre. These Canadians, many of whom are sitting in the gallery right now, know it is possible for all people to live in harmony when there is true democracy. One woman said: "This war should not been seen as Serbs against Croatians. It is democracy against communism".

If true democracy is to prevail, the UN must act now.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, two days ago in this House the hon. member for Hamilton West quoted some of my words to the press. It was his intent to demonstrate that I did not agree with the Minister of Finance that the recession is over.

This was a highly partisan attempt to gain a few political points, and the member ought to be ashamed of himself. As usual he was ill-informed and misinterpreted my statement.

As both he and I know, leading economic indicators show the recession is clearly over. Unemployment figures also show that it will take some time before all of the lost jobs are regained. Until those jobs come back, neither of us I am sure, will be satisfied.

I have no hesitation in saying that the policies of the Minister of Finance, including spending restraint, falling interest rates, low inflation and deficit reduction are the very reasons those jobs will be regained and will be permanent.

LINGAN MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the closure of the Lingan mine in my constituency of Cape Breton—East Richmond will undoubtedly have a negative effect on our economy, an economy that is already hurting.

On previous occasions in this House I have warned both the federal and provincial governments that the opening of the Westray coal mine in Pictou County, Nova Scotia, would mean in effect the closure of the Lingan mine in Cape Breton.

On several occasions, both in Question Period as well as statements, I have brought this to the attention of the Prime Minister. I am supported by senior management of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, a federal Crown corporation, which has supplied information to the Government of Canada that if the Westray coal mine proceeded, Lingan would have to close.

Details of the compensation package which was worked out between union and management for the displaced workers at Lingan has yet to be announced. I insist that the president and the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, as well as the minister, honour their commitment and provide the details of that compensation package immediately and not waste any more time in providing those answers.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, for over 124 years, Canada has been closely linked by interprovincial trade. Six provinces; Quebec, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta trade more within Canada than they export to foreign countries.

Of the three largest manufacturing provinces, only Quebec is more dependent on trade with other Canadian provinces than on foreign trade. Quebec's manufacturing shipments are roughly split between international markets and the rest of Canada. In 1989, 14.5 per cent of Quebec's shipments of manufactured goods went to Ontario. Only 5.9 per cent of Ontario's went to Quebec.

Interprovincial trade is vitally important to all provinces. If Canada breaks up and trade flows are disrupted, each and every one of us would personally be worse off than we are today.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, the co-chair of the International Joint Commission Science Advisory Board has called for a declaration that chemical contaminants in the Great Lakes are a hazard to human health.

Some 37 million Canadians and Americans are facing health threats ranging from infertility to birth defects from the toxic wastes dumped into the five lake system. This adds to the urgent IJC call for an outright ban on the 11 most persistent toxics and demonstrates once again the need for a zero discharge timetable, solemnly promised by the Prime Minister four years ago. Further delay would be criminal.

On Wednesday, the minister of energy attempted to abandon Canada's commitment on global warming. He said, and I quote: "It is Canada's policy to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000".

On November 7, 1990 in Geneva the Minister of the Environment stated, and I quote: "Canada has pledged to fully eliminate controlled CFCs by 1997. We have also committed, as a minimum, to stabilize at 1990 levels all other greenhouse gases, most notably carbon dioxide, by the year 2000".

Let us trust that Canada did not lie in Geneva.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I applaud the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture that FCC headquarters will at long last move to the prairies.

The bulk of farm credit business is on the prairies. The base of Saskatchewan is agriculture. The move makes sense. However, it will come as no surprise to westerners that the opposition parties are bellyaching about this long overdue decision.

The Liberals call it a crass effort to buy votes. What hypocrisy. Ottawa Liberal members should stop toadying to Daryl Bean long enough to understand that a considerable part of Canada lies beyond the lush pastures of the national capital region.

The NDP are no better. They have 10 members from Saskatchewan who should be elated about this relocation. But no, they are so tied to the apron strings of the Public Service Alliance and the big Ontario union bosses that they are forced to do what they do best, criticize, find fault and be negative.

I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on this relocation, which demonstrates the continuing commitment of this government to bring federal institutions and agencies close to the people they serve.

EASTERN ONTARIO'S ECONOMY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the economic recession has again hit the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Yesterday, St. Isidore Meats Inc., the only pork abattoir between Toronto and Montreal, announced it was closing, laying off its last forty employees. A few months ago, thirty more people lost their jobs in St. Isidore.

Madam Speaker, it seems that every week another disaster strikes the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and eastern Ontario. This morning, I would again like to tell the government opposite that my colleagues from Stormont—Dundas and Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, I and twenty-eight municipalities of eastern Ontario asked the government to act and set up a development program for our region. We need it now.

DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, the Mulroney government is literally draining the national capital with its decentralization policy, which I have decried many times. After the move of the National Energy Board to Calgary in July, the national capital is now dealt another blow with the announcement of the transfer of the head office of the Farm Credit Corporation from Ottawa to Regina. Quebecers will have no alternative but to leave Quebec to pursue their career in Saskatchewan. Since the constitutional offers are about to be presented, we can expect this haemorrhage to intensify and in the worst case, gifts to be given across Canada to help the "pill" go down. The decentralization of thousands of jobs has very serious consequences for the Quebec side of the Ottawa River. It is high time that Quebec took back all its powers and became sovereign.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, women are marching this weekend in cities across the country to take back the night. Shelters for battered women are unfunded. Women's sexual histories are on trial once again.

An all-party report of the House of Commons subcommittee on the status of women called for a strong rape shield law, adequate funding for shelters and crisis centres, mandatory gender sensitivity training for judges and members of Parliament. The need has never been more evident.

Recent events here have shown Canadians the type of behaviour that is sometimes directed at women members of Parliament. It is not hard to see why there is no pay equity when a government representative, responsible for pay equity, makes offensive comments about women.

New Democrats call upon this government to implement the recommendations of that report now.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, this week saw 15 innocent people charged and summoned to appear in criminal court. Among them was the Commissioner of the RCMP and two members of the force.

[English]

These charges resulted from private prosecutions under section 507 of the Criminal Code. This section allows a justice of the peace, who sometimes has no legal training, to determine if a summons should be issued. It should be changed to require a judge or a Crown attorney to review the evidence and charges before they are continued.

Fifteen people spent an intolerable summer with their reputations tarnished because of the media's misunderstanding of private prosecutions and the vengeful mind of one person. It even hurt our entire country by causing an unwarranted run on our dollar.

This misuse of our justice system should not be allowed to happen to any citizen of our country again.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, the city of Cornwall and other communities in eastern Ontario need a federal economic development program now.

Federal programs such as FEDNOR and the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement have proved to be beneficial to northern Ontario and particular regions of Quebec. A similar program is required for economically depressed areas in eastern Ontario.

Unemployment is well above the national average in Cornwall, where over 1,500 lay-offs and job losses have occurred in the last two years. The absence of an economic development program has inhibited businesses and investment from locating in eastern Ontario.

The negative impact of cross-border shopping and the geographic reality has eastern Ontario up against northern New York state and western Quebec in attracting business and investors. This places border communities like Cornwall at a distinct disadvantage.

Cornwall, and cities like Pembroke and Hawkesbury, need an federal economic development from this government immediately.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the Conservative government continues to attack the Ontario government for its budget deficit and, at the same time, faces a situation where its own deficit is rising far faster than it projected in the budget last year.

The latest figures show that for the first four months of this fiscal year, the budget deficit that the Conservative government is running is twice as high as the budget deficit which it ran last year. At that rate we are looking at a potential budget deficit of over $35 billion.

This is not something this government can use as ammunition if it seeks to show the rest of the country that fiscal rectitude is an important consideration.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, an extraordinary event will take place next year when more than 100 world leaders will meet at an earth summit in Rio de Janiero. We will be discussing preservation of the ecological integrity of the planet. We will also be discussing the integration of the environment and the economy in both developed and developing countries, and the need for a partnership between north and south.

The earth summit is officially called the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development. It will take place in Rio de Janiero June 1 to 12, 1992.

The Government of Canada is actively preparing for the conference in concert with partners in the provinces and the territories, in industry, in environmental and development groups. We are working with our aboriginal people, Canadian youth, women's groups, religious and peace organizations, scientists and academics, all of whom are part of the Canadian team. The delegation has requested that this example be emulated at the international level.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, Canadians reeled in shock this past summer at the tragic deaths of several young Canadians. In southern Ontario two young women, Leslie Mahaffy and Nina DeVilliers, and a child, Kala Klaudusz, met violent and needless deaths.

Canadians have expressed shock and horror at these incidents and are asking themselves where is the justice. People see the perpetrators of violent crimes released prematurely from jail, violent offenders are walking the streets on day passes.

Canadians are asking themselves: "Why is our justice system working against us? How can we be protected against violent offenders today and in the future?" Both society at large and the victims of violence are demanding that justice be done. We must remember to put a face to these tragedies.

During this fall session I will table a private member's bill dealing with the rights of victims of violence. It will give the victims of violence a stronger voice in the disposition of convicted offenders and will return to society a sense of security and faith in their system of justice.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The government says that the recession is over, but the economic indicators say otherwise. Manufacturers' deliveries are down. The trade surplus is at its lowest level in ten years, and unemployment continues to increase. When will the government at least admit that its policies are harming the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, quite the contrary. The hon. member knows there was substantial growth recorded in the second quarter. The budget projections of February 1991 assumed that recovery would start occurring in the second half. Recovery has actually started one quarter earlier than that which was projected and it was at a very robust level of 4.9 per cent on an annualized basis.

We projected all along that the recovery would be modest to moderate and we projected growth in the order of 3.1 per cent in 1992. We now anticipate that growth will be something in the order of 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent in the second half.

Export volumes have increased by over 25 per cent at an annual rate in the second quarter. Business confidence is up. Consumer confidence is up. Housing starts are up. Housing sales are up. All of these are positive indicators that lead me to believe that we are on the road to a sustainable moderate recovery.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Canadian dollar closed at 88.09 cents. Will the Minister of Finance give to this House the name of just one Canadian industrialist who has come up to him and said: "Thank you, Minister. Your high-dollar policy is really helping us to compete and to create jobs in Canada".

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is intelligent enough to know that you cannot artificially manipulate the value of the dollar. There are market forces at play that contribute to the value of the dollar, and I remind him that notwithstanding the fact that interest rates have declined by over 5.5 per cent, or 550 basis points, from last year, the spread has declined from about 565 basis points to 280 basis points.

Notwithstanding that fact, when we had the high spreads and the high interest rates the dollar was worth 84 cents. Interest rates have come down. The value of the dollar has gone up.

This tells us that there is confidence in the Canadian economy and strength in the integrity of the Canadian dollar. That should be applauded and not be criticized.

• (1120)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, for this minister to support his high dollar policy is totally wrong.

Labour does not like it. Small business does not like it. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association said: "It is putting Canadian manufacturers out of business and their employees out of work." Who is wrong, Canadians or this government?

Will this government reverse its high dollar policy to help resuscitate Canadian industry and get Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, one of the contributing factors to the upward pressure on the dollar is the fact that the provinces have been borrowing very extensively in the international marketplace.

As a matter of fact, in the first half of this year, they have borrowed $10.9 billion in new debt issues. That is double the amount of the whole year of 1990. That puts upward pressure on the dollar.

The other fact is that North America is a safe haven for investment when there is uncertainty throughout the world, and that is another contributing factor.

I remind the hon. member that the President of the National Bank, Andre Berard, as reported in Le Devoir as reported this morning, said that reducing producing production costs is just as important to economic recovery as readjusting to the high value of the Canadian dollar.

It is not just the value of the dollar that is contributing to our difficulties. It is production costs. It is labour efficiency. It is labour cost components. Those are the things that we must address together.

My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, will be unveiling a strategy to improve our competitiveness and our prosperity. That is a positive sign.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the head of the second largest newsprint manufacturer in the world, Hugh Fletcher, speaking in Toronto said: "The difference between an 88–cent dollar and an 80–cent dollar is the difference between disaster and reasonableness."

Why is this government running an economic policy that international business leaders who have to make decisions about investing in Canada are calling a disaster? That does not sound like confidence to me.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, these same business leaders were complaining about high interest costs a year ago.

Interest rates have come down by 5.5 per cent. They are still coming down. The Bank of Montreal announced that its prime rate would be 9.25 per cent. That certainly is a far cry from the 22.75 per cent when that minister sat over here on the treasury benches.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, Canadians watching will note that the Minister of Finance neglected to respond in any way to the comments of Mr. Hugh Fletcher, international business leader and head of the second largest newsprint manufacturing company in the world.

Mr. Fletcher also said, speaking of the monetary policy, the high dollar policy of this government, that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is "killing prospects" of international investors putting more money into our crucial forest products sector.

Why is this government acting to kill prospects of international investment in the forest products sector if it is interested in international confidence and business leaders like Mr. Fletcher investing in Canada? Why does it not reverse its harmful economic policies right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, perhaps I should remind the hon. member and Mr. Fletcher that the average value of the Canadian dollar over the last 40 years was 92.6 cents.

When he talks about the value of the high dollar, on a historical basis he is right out of kilter on this thing. The fact of the matter is that the dollar, as he knows, is set in the marketplace. There is intervention by the Bank of Canada to ensure that there are not erratic ups and downs in the level of the interest rates. It is the marketplace that establishes the rate.

In so far as investment, there has been a turnaround of about $7 billion since the free trade agreement came in. Before the free trade, there was a net outflow of investment dollars. As a result of the free trade, the investment policies and the confidence that business has in this government, there has been a net inflow of investment dollars.

POVERTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, we again heard that nearly one-third of single parent families live in poverty. One child out of five lives in poverty. Here is my question. We are about to debate the future of our country, and during this debate, we cannot afford to ignore these frightening figures because these children are our future. For many years, this government has failed to take any new measures to deal with a disastrous situation. What is the government going to do, not in a couple of years but now?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As I indicated yesterday, Madam Speaker, this government has initiated a number of programs that has improved the situation of children. I agree with the hon. member that children and the family unit are basic to our society. We have attempted through tax reform to try to improve the lot of families, in particular with respect to children.

I also want to remind the hon. member that since we have come to office, more than 1 million people have been taken off the poverty roll, which includes over 300,000 children. The changes to the child tax credit and the various tax credits that have been provided to lower and middle income people and the refund of the GST tax credit, all of these things are in recognition of the very important fact of family life, and particularly those families who live on lower and middle incomes.

Always we wish that we could do more. The minister of health is currently looking at a number of child initiatives which are being developed. When they are developed, they will be announced in the House in the appropriate fashion.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, this government has been in power since 1984. It is time to stop wishing and put in some initiatives for these children.

On November 24, 1989, this House unanimously—including the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister Responsible for the Constitution and the Prime Minister—voted unanimously to make a commitment to eradicate child poverty by the year 2000.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: As well as the initiatives that absolutely need to be taken now, and as we move into the constitutional debate, is the government seriously considering a social charter which would give specificity to these fine words that were uttered in 1989, two years ago, to really address the basic issues that will unite this country?

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Will his government seriously consider a social charter which will include the right of children to have a decent standard of living and to have food and shelter and education in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, one of the best ways that we can improve the lot and the confidence of children and future generations is to deal more effectively with the burden of debt which has been inherited by this government and which this government is trying to deal with without very much support from the New Democratic Party.

In so far as her question about a social charter, the hon. member will have access to the document next week. It will be presented in the House. It will be debated. I am sure that the hon. member will have an expressed point of view at that particular time.

As the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has stated on many occasions and as the Prime Minister has stated, this is a beginning and not an end. What the government is proposing is an advancement of proposals which we hope will find favour and we hope the hon. member and her party will engage in a further discussion to develop the kinds of programs and policies that will lead us to the kind of Canada that we all aspire to achieve in terms of a strong economy, a sensitivity to social concerns, but most important, a strong political unit.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Canadians are very concerned that our health care is in jeopardy, there is no child care program, that poverty still exists in this country despite the words that we have said in this House.

Clearly we all agree that this country needs a shared commitment to making Canada the best place possible. I want ask the minister: Is he seriously considering, and will he consider in principle, that a social charter would give form and substance to those sentiments, and is he considering that now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, one of the advantages of having specific propositions on the table, as there will be next Tuesday, is that some of the concerns that might have been raised about the contents of the proposals of the government will be allayed, will be answered by the publication of the specific document.

The hon. member will know that Premier Rae, in Ontario, who I understand is planning to publish a document with respect to a charter, had at one point been interested in bringing forward and devising a charter itself. His officials, as I understand it, encountered some difficulty in translating that interesting idea into a charter that would work and would be acceptable within the Canadian system.

I want to repeat what the Deputy Prime Minister has just said, that the proposals that we put forward on Tuesday are proposals that will be considered, that are designed to achieve real change in the Constitution, that are firm but that are not final. If it is the view of members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution that there needs to be improvements brought to that package, certainly we will look with an open mind on all practical improvements.

I emphasize that we are interested in improvements, things that will work, not simply proposals for change.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Science.

For the past seven years, members of this government have told Canadians time and again that there is no money for the National Research Council, no money for industrial research, no money for medical and environmental research.

My question to the minister is: Where has the government suddenly found the money to fund the KAON project?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, as the member knows, in the last budget of February there was $1.5 billion set aside for science and technology initiatives in this next several years. That funding is still in place and has nothing whatsoever to do with the KAON project.

KAON project funding, as far as the Government of Canada is concerned, would come in in later years and that funding is not at all a part of the $1.5 billion.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the government has suddenly found a rich uncle. I would like to tell the minister that the line starts right here.

Is the minister saying that the government has now found money to support adequately university research, industrial research, medical and environmental research, or is this just pure political opportunism?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I think it would be just as well if the hon. member would wait until he sees the proposals for spending the $1.5 billion.

Furthermore, I think it would be just as well if he waited until the consultations with respect to prosperity and competitiveness are over, until we see what further funding may be needed to do some of the things he has on his plate.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The news that the Farm Credit Corporation headquarters is being relocated to Regina has sent shock waves rippling through more than 200 families of public servants in the national capital region.

My question is: Why is the government fuelling public cynicism by announcing this move on the eve of a provincial election, and where is the immediate real support for which farmers are asking?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I want to inform the hon. member that the most valued resource that the Farm Credit Corporation has are the employees of Farm Credit Corporation.

The move and the relocation of some 200 headquarters staff to Regina will take place over the next 12 months. We hope it is concluded prior to the crop year.

The NDP seems to object to putting 200 jobs into the province of Saskatchewan, locating Farm Credit Corporation where 60 per cent of the clients that Farm Credit serve reside, where over 50 per cent of the dollars are lent out by Farm Credit Corporation. I do not understand why the NDP objects to it so much.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, as we know the Farm Credit Corporation runs on a non-deficit basis. The minister also knows that the cost of the move and future expenses will be borne by the farmers through higher interest rates. Clearly, the relocation is of no benefit to the farmers whatsoever.

So I repeat my question and ask the minister to answer me and not the NDP. Why is this government using public servants to interfere in provincial elections?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows and as everyone in the House knows, the policy of this government is to locate the services that the government provides closest to those clients the department serves.

I draw to the hon. member's attention the relocation a of the National Energy Board to Calgary.

I draw to the hon. member's attention for the same rationale that over 60 per cent of the client group served by Farm Credit reside in the prairie provinces. More than 50 per cent of the dollars lent out by Farm Credit are in the prairie provinces. That will bring the Farm Credit Corporation and its headquarters staff closer to producers.

I say to the hon. member that he has recognized that Farm Credit operates on a break even basis or operates on a basis of no cost to the taxpayer. It also operates on a competitive interest rate policy. Its interest rates are competitive with any commercial institution in Canada.

The savings that will be acquired over the life of the corporation, as they are amortized over the life of the corporation for this move, will be consumed within the corporation and will benefit the farmers and the clients of Farm Credit.

MEME BREAST IMPLANT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responding for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In April Surgitex withdrew the Meme breast implant from the market.

On June 5, Carol Cyr was implanted with two Memes in a hospital in Montreal.

My question to the minister is: How could this happen? Is the Meme off the market or is it not?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, the Meme breast implant was recalled and to my knowledge it is off the market.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the hon. minister should know that in fact the Meme has never been recalled by this government. It was withdrawn voluntarily by Surgitex.

On August 7, in a press release the minister said the Meme implant is not currently available and cannot be reintroduced until evidence is reviewed by Health and Welfare.

On September 5, the director of the minister's Bureau of Medical Devices said on CBOFT Radio when asked about Carol Cyr: "It is in no way the business of the federal department of health and welfare".

Could the minister tell this House just who is responsible?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Again, Madam Speaker, some of the statements made by the hon. member are correct. It is off the market. The minister of health has ordered his department to look into this issue again, as it has been raised on a number of occasions and it is of concern not only to the department but to all women in Canada.

With respect to whether or not a doctor proceeded after the recall, doctors were informed of the recall of the Meme breast implant. If a doctor did go ahead with such an operation, I would suggest that the person in question contact the appropriate medical college in order to file a complaint.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, Canadians are awaiting the announcement next Tuesday of the proposed changes to the Canadian Constitution. From what we hear so far, the west will get an elected Senate, Quebec will get distinct status, and aboriginal people will get self-government.

My question is to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Will middle-class Canadians also get something they deserve: the entrenched right to own private property, including the right not to be deprived of that property without just compensation?

• (1140)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I very much hope and believe that all Canadians can receive from this package and this process a country that is united and prosperous and that will be able to look to the future, turning all of our attention to means by which we can grow stronger and more prosperous without diversion of constant constitutional problems.

With regard to the specific question respecting property rights, I appreciate the strong representation that has been made by the member and by others in this House.

I cannot divulge the contents of the package until it is released by the Prime Minister on Tuesday, but I can tell the hon. member that the concern raised by him and by hon. members has been taken seriously by this government.

ROMANIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade in the absence of the energy minister, and it relates to the announced $315 million Cernavoda nuclear power station in Romania.

A report of the International Atomic Energy Agency last week indicated that fully a quarter of the station's safety problems has not been dealt with by the present government in Bucharest.

It would also strongly appear that the management of the Export Development Corporation is privately very hostile to this proposed loan.

Will the minister deal with both of those issues please?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, there has been a report by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

In this report it has noted a significant degree of progress from this time a year ago when it set out its proposals as to what should be done to put the Cernavoda proposal in a position that it could be actively pursued.

We have followed this carefully. We believe that there is still further progress that must be made, but it is on this basis that we have moved forward with the financing from the Export Development Corporation in order to allow the proposal to be completed.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, I am not aware of any opposition.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the Iliescu government in Romania continues to inflict what are most often considered to be anti-democratic and authoritarian measures against many of its citizens.

What guarantees has the minister received that once the Atomic Energy Commission of Canada's management contract expires that the government there will continue to show concern for both the safety and human rights of the Romanian people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, as I indicated, the international agency has observed some improvements in things in Romania.

It is a question of human rights that the hon. member has raised. This is something that has been a concern of the federal government. We will continue to make representations in that regard to the government.

As my hon. friend knows, there can be no guarantees in the future. However, what we can be sure of is that since this particular project will be very supportive of improving the standard of living of people in that country, and improving the standard of living almost inevitably leads to fewer excesses in the area of human rights difficulties, we are confident that that will take place in this regard as well.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The 1991 economic rendez-vous organized by the Conseil du patronat du Québec this week generated 48 job-creation projects, since no action plans were forthcoming from the Tory government.

Would the Minister of Finance be willing to lower the value of the Canadian dollar to help support projects that will boost the economy in Montreal, Quebec and Canada?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, perhaps I may respond on behalf of the minister responsible for the Montreal area, who this week attended the economic forum referred to by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard.

The hon. member knows as well as I do that Montreal's economy is going through a very difficult period, largely as a result of structural changes. To help Montreal's economy back on its feet, we included in our February Budget a number of measures to reduce the deficit, bring down inflation and reduce unemployment. That is what we did. The hon. member asked what we are going to do now. If the hon. member would like to wait until Monday, when the Prime Minister will be in Montreal, he will see the results of our economic policy. for Montreal.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, we already know what the Prime Minister will do Monday in Montreal: He will put on a big show to say that— We know what the situation is like in Montreal, Madam Speaker. It is pretty bad! Will the governement act responsibly and support these 48 projects or is it going to put them on the backburner, like it did with the Picard Report?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we intend to give very serious consideration to every project that is brought to our attention.

I would like to ask the hon. member who is so fond of talking about Montreal where he was when the Conservative government voted in favour of Bill C-21, which made it possible to invest more than $55 million in occupational training in Quebec? He was against the bill!

When we transferred the Space Agency to Montreal, what did the hon. member have to say? He was against the transfer. When we passed Bill C-22 on drug patents, what did the hon. member say? He was against the bill. Only two Liberal members supported the bill. One is unfortunately no longer with us, and the other one is sitting next to the hon. member. Obviously, every time we do something for Montreal, the hon. member says no!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, some months ago Canadians and Parliament welcomed Nelson Mandela to speak of change in South Africa to the Canadian Parliament and people.

This week Canadians are learning from his deputy, and for 26 years his fellow prisoner, Walter Sisulu and his wife Albertina, about the progress and the change toward democracy and the development needs of the future of South Africa.

I know that members will join in welcoming them here in the House today and on their tour of Canada.

I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week the Commonwealth committee, which she chairs, spoke of resource needs and the Commonwealth meeting it.

What will Canada do to contribute to the resource needs of a democratic South Africa?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think all members of the House can be proud of Canada's role in fighting apartheid for many, many years. I think that the changes that have been made in recent months and recent years, thanks to outside pressure as well as support for the democratic forces inside South Africa, have been an important factor.

This year, Canada will be providing $15 million in aid specifically for human resource development and education and other aspects of that issue. While I was in Delhi, I announced that we would be giving $1.5 million to the UN High Commission for Refugees to help the political exiles whom we can all help to celebrate on their return home. We will be helping with their resettlement.

There is no country more pleased than Canada about the progress that has been made, but we continue to look to further sanctions to continue the pressure until full democracy reigns in South Africa.

EDUCATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the House, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said that all aboriginal students in Canada can have access to a post-secondary education under the program that has been put in place by this government.

I cannot say that the minister deceived the House, but the communications branch damage control strategy from his own ministry, which the minister cited from memory in many parts, indicates that as many as 3,000 students will be unfunded this year. That is 3,000 potential students who, rather than going to school, will end up on social assistance which costs the government roughly 10 per cent less than a post-secondary school education.

Bands and tribal councils, including Squamish, Nanaimo and other bands in the minister's riding, have been handed actual budget cuts by his department this year, contrary to the minister's assurance yesterday and the Prime Minister's promise in Victoria.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member does have a question some place, somehow in there.

• (1150)

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): My question to the minister is: Will he undertake to reverse these post-secondary education budget cuts to bands and tribal councils and assure that the 3,000 underfunded students will be able to enrol in school in the 1991-1992 academic year?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has decided to re-ask the question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Western Arctic.

Again I repeat the answer, that this government has made the most generous program in history on behalf of aboriginal students. In fact the funding for the post-secondary program has been increased by almost 400 per cent since 1985. The number of post-secondary students enrolled in these programs has increased by more than 300 per cent to over 22,000 in the present year, and cabinet agreed in the spring to increase these funds by an additional $320 million over the next five years, increasing the total commitment to well over $1 billion.

The problem raised by the hon. member is one of the management and distribution of funds among the regions and the question of which students are more qualified, which others are less qualified and which ones submitted their applications late.

I can assure the hon. member that according to the list in front of me something just slightly over 1,000 applications are—

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we all can see, long preambles and long questions bring long answers. I still have quite a few names on my list. Can we please go to a question right away? The hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): But, Madam Speaker, truthful answers bring information to the House and that is always helpful as well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will put his question right away, or I will go to someone else.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I asked the minister about his own department's communication strategy which indicates that as many as 3,000 students will be unfunded this year.

My question to the minister, given his answer yesterday that all students will be funded, is: Are those 3,000 students who are projected to be unfunded this year going to be funded?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I do not know what document the hon. member is citing or the date of it, but I have a note dated September 13 which indicates that approximately 1,200 students will not be funded for reasons of late application or other reasons. I have asked my officials, as indicated in the House yesterday, to look carefully at the regional distribution of funds and to deal with individual applications.

I can assure the House that all continuing students and all high school graduates coming from aboriginal communities will be funded under this program. With the additional $200 million available per year under the Pathways to Excellence Program, there is no excuse for a post-secondary student and young Indian—

STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

A student from Winnipeg called me today, one of over 100 calls I have received, to ask the Secretary of State to remove the new 3 per cent tax on student loans, this unfair, discriminatory tax imposed on the poorer students who need to borrow for college and university education, one that needs to be paid up front and in cash.

Will the minister remove this brutal damaging tax today?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to refer my hon. colleague to the answer I gave him last Monday on this issue.

The Canada Student Loan Program is a program introduced 27 years ago. It is under full review. The administrative costs have been rising very sharply. The 3 per cent has been imposed because of that rise in administrative costs. We are reviewing the whole program.

I have talked with the Canadian Federation of Students and within the very near future I will be proposing amendments to the program to cabinet, and I will be tabling those amendments in the House.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Hopefully, the tax will be removed, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

When the minister was President of the Treasury Board, he introduced this new discriminatory 3 per cent tax on student loans and said that it would compensate for bad loans. Why impose this new tax when the vast majority of students do pay back their loans? Isn't this immoral, in any case insensitive and perhaps even illegal?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I will repeat in French what I said in English. This program was introduced 27 years ago and is now under full review. Obviously, it is going to be amended to reflect the current situation. These amendments are about to be submitted to cabinet and will be tabled in the House.

SEED

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of youth.

On June 10 and September 17 last the minister in this House twice denied that there had been funding cuts to the SEED program.

Let us use the national capital region as an example. According to the minister's own figures, federal funding for the SEED program, which is a student summer employment program, has been cut in this region from a 1989 level of $1.4 million to $424,000 in each of the last two years, a 70 per cent reduction. Hundreds of students could not find jobs in this region.

Will the minister reinstate funding to at least the 1989 level?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As I have indicated before, Madam Speaker, the budget for the Challenge program was increased for this year.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, deny, deny, deny. The figures are here in the minister's own ministry. These cuts have caused tremendous hardships and lost opportunities to the young people of this region.

I ask the minister again: In preparation for next year's budget, will the minister reinstate the moneys to enable the youth of our region to have some hope for better job opportunities in 1992?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, considering that the premise of the question is based on the Challenge budget, the Challenge budget for this year was increased and the numbers show that.

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The rise in racial violence and multicultural intolerance in Canada was inflamed this past summer by the Conservative convention resolutions. Will the government implement these resolutions which stated that the multicultural department should be closed down and multicultural funding should be cut?

If not, will the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of the government affirm today what it intends to do to promote greater understanding of multiculturalism and to implement the Multicultural Act actively?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for the opportunity to reinforce the commitment of the government.

The new department was confirmed on April 21, and I serve as the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. We have been very active in promoting the vision that I know the member is very supportive of, to help Canadians understand how important our diversity is and how it contributes to strengthen and enrich this nation.

More and more our program areas have been working to combat racism and racial discrimination and work to promote equality, equality of opportunity. The basic right of all Canadians is the opportunity to participate. Of course our programs of integration are working very well, our citizenship courts, the pride we all have in our citizenship. Just watch our continuing efforts as we go across the country, building important partnerships with all Canadians.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I think it is incumbent on the Prime Minister to reaffirm his policy on behalf of the government as a whole. It is a very serious concern to people.

The Manitoba native justice inquiry and racial incidents in Halifax and Montreal this past summer are evidence that problems are very serious and that the federal government must act more aggressively to enforce minority rights and eliminate racism.

I ask the minister: Will the government initiate a major public education campaign and also establish a representative citizens' panel to investigate causes of racism, to consult with minority communities and make recommendations for government action?

• (1200)

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, it is this government that began the whole March 21 initiative some three years ago, which is a national awareness program to help Canadians understand the devastating effects of racism and the need to erase it from our society.

In fact, last March 21 we were pleased to welcome one of our very important partners, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, an idea that had its birth in British Columbia, in the hon. member's province, and it contributed some $10 million of support to a very active program to help Canadians understand the benefits of our diversity.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, this week we saw charges against 15 individuals dropped after they had been approved by a justice of the peace. The crown attorney involved in the case described some of the charges as a gross miscarriage of justice.

I recognize the value of private prosecutions in our justice system, but will the Attorney General review section 507 of the Criminal Code in order to ensure that this type of abuse of process does not happen to any individual again?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am not sure that the difficulty that we saw described so graphically by the Attorney General of Ontario arises necessarily from the statute but more with how it is implemented.

As a British Columbian, I can say that these matters are handled very differently in my own province from the way they are handled in Ontario. I believe they are also handled very differently in Quebec and in Alberta.

What I have indicated is that this is a subject that I would like to see discussed by all of us who have the responsibility for the enforcement of the criminal law—I have it in the territories; my provincial colleagues have it in the provinces—to ensure that a device which I think is an important part of a democratic justice system is not used to create injustices. I think that could probably be done without legislative change but with great care in the role taken by our prosecutors.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

When Mrs. Joyce Milgaard met the Prime Minister recently and asked about her son's wrongful conviction, he said he would look into it right away which gave Mrs. Milgaard a good deal of hope.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday, the minister said that the Prime Minister merely said that he would look into the state of his health, which I think is very cruel and misrepresents what actually took place.

This case must be reopened. I want to ask the minister: When is she going to stop playing God and reopen the David Milgaard case?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, first of all, I have looked very closely not only at the comments of the Prime Minister but at subsequent comments of Mrs. Milgaard which confirm the Prime Minister's commitments with respect to David Milgaard's health. I have already indicated in the House the steps that were taken.

The Prime Minister I think had a very humanitarian concern and communicated with me immediately. I communicated with the people in Correctional Services Canada, and my understanding is that no request has been made by David Milgaard to change his location.

I do not play God with these applications. I am bound by the law and by evidence. I will review every application that comes to me on that basis as fairly and equitably as possible.

The first application that came to me did not meet the threshold. If another one that comes does, it will be granted. If it does not, it will not.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notices of two points of order. I will first recognize the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, during his response to my question in the House a few minutes ago, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicated he was reading from a document dated September 13 of this year.

I would like to refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 327 on page 115, which states:

> (1) a Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it on the Table.
> The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

I would ask that the minister table the document he was referring to, and I would be fully prepared to table the ministry's damage control communication strategy which I referred to in my question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was on his feet with his request for tabling and withdrawal. Having Beauchesne's in his hand, he might have looked at those sections of Beauchesne's which state that it is not permissible to say in the House that somebody has not told the truth, which I heard him say about the Minister of Indian Affairs.

Will he withdraw that statement?

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Comox—Alberni have anything to add?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I am not sure what point the hon. member is making. Is he suggesting that I indicated that someone was not telling the truth?

I indicated in my question that I understood that in this House it is impossible for a member to indicate that another member deceived the House. I did not do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is also what the Chair has heard.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I certainly heard the hon. member say quite clearly that the minister was not being truthful with the House. I will review the record of Hansard. I certainly do not intend to make a federal issue of this. However, I can assure the hon. member that when I table the document he has requested, he will find that there are no 3,000 unfunded student applications.

I am prepared to table that document but not until we review the transcript of Hansard, because if the member said what I thought I heard him say, he will have to withdraw that reference.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened to both the hon. member and the minister with all the attention possible. It was not my understanding at the time but I will review the "blues" as well.

Will the hon. member please resume his seat.

It is not my understanding that the hon. member said that the minister was not telling the truth. This is not what I heard but the "blues" will be checked.

The hon. member seemed to want the document tabled. If the hon. minister said he was not quoting anything, this is what the Chair will accept. If he thinks there is a document which he should table, it would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I certainly have no difficulty acceding to the request. I have nothing to hide. These figures speak for themselves.

However, I repeat that I expect the hon. member for Comox—Alberni to do the honourable thing. I intend to review the record of Hansard to ensure that he does.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the minister seems to think that it is his right to determine whether or not he will table that document. That is not his right. There may be another dispute which is separate from the tabling of the document. He referred to the document in the House and Beauchesne requires that the document be tabled.

The other dispute can be settled separately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I may want to tell the hon. member that the minister has tabled the document. I think this point is closed. As far as the other one is concerned, we will all check the "blues".

I have another notice of a point of order. The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, I would like to introduce a group of young Canadians of Croatian descent who are in the gallery today. These young people have been visiting with members of Parliament throughout the last few days and I would like to welcome them to Parliament Hill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I know that the hon. member, who has been in this House for quite a while, knows that this is not his place to do so. He has found a way, which was out of order, to do what he wanted to do in the first place.

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, on April 11, 1991 Royal Assent was received for the Farm Income Protection Act, which provides legislation for federal programs to provide long term stabilization and support for farmers.

This act also provides for the implementation of special measures to respond to short term needs not addressed by other programs.

Last spring, the farm support and adjustment measures were introduced to respond to such short term needs. Pursuant to subsection 12(7) of the act, the Orders in Council related to the implementation of any short-term measures under the act are to be laid before the House of Commons.

• (1210)

Eight Orders in Council were approved May 30, 1991, by the Governor in Council pursuant to subsection 12(5) authorizing the minister to enter into agreements with the provinces or take any other appropriate action such as the implementation of initiatives under the farm support and adjustment measures.

It is my pleasure to table these orders in both official languages on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary. It is very rare that we do or should get a speech with the tabling of documents.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to five petitions.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could direct an observation to my hon. friend, the government Whip. The press release that the Minister for International Trade released regarding his recent visit to Iran does not include any figures in terms of Canada's contribution to Iran. I understand it was in the nature of $1 billion in terms of lines of credit and refinancing operations.

Would the minister at some point explain to the House what that $1 billion commitment to Iran included?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, it would have been a courtesy if I had a copy of whatever it is that the member is reading from. I gather it is a press release of some kind. He said two things simultaneously. He said that there are no figures in the press release and that he wants the minister to explain the $1 billion.

If it says $1 billion then there is a figure in the press release. If there is not, there is not.

I am not sure exactly what he is asking the House.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am sorry for not making it clear. Apparently Associated Press picked up from Teheran Radio that the Canadian government had committed $1 billion in export credits and refinancing. That is where it came from. Teheran Radio apparently was the only place where the amount was actually mentioned publicly.

The minister in his press release—and I apologize for not providing a copy to my hon. friend, I assumed that he would have the minister's press releases with him—does not make any reference to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops, I am sure, knows very well that this is not a point of order. We are getting into an extension of Question Period. This is certainly a question which he may want to ask Monday. The hon. member for Calgary West may want to answer but he is certainly not obliged to do so.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I think I now understand the question. He wants the Minister for International Trade to explain a radio report from Teheran news which the minister may or may not have had the opportunity to hear.

I would suggest to the member that if he wants to leave the Chamber and phone the minister's office, he may have what is bothering him cleared up in five minutes. If he does not have an answer by Monday, I would be happy to bring it to the attention of the minister and see what the minister might be prepared to do.

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS CONFLICT OF INTERESTS ACT

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-275, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to establish a conflict of interest commission and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to introduce at this time a bill to do as you have just described. It shows the ability of the private member to be able to introduce matters of extreme interest and concern to the country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-276, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (extremity pumps).

She said: Madam Speaker, this bill is as you have outlined. Some people, for health reasons, are requiring a piece of medical equipment called an extremity pump. We are simply asking that it be included in the Income Tax Act for allowance for deduction.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-277, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (air conditioners).

She said: Madam Speaker, again this bill is as you have outlined. It is simply that those who suffer from multiple sclerosis or any breathing disease require an air conditioner in the room, and it is being included under the Income Tax Act for assistance.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

OMBUDSMAN ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–278, an act establishing the office of the ombudsman and amending acts in consequence thereof.

• (1220)

She said: Madam Speaker, by way of explanation, these bills are all being reintroduced as they were all lost on the Order Paper. I think the way it reads it is self–explanatory.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–279, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (breast prostheses).

She said: Madam Speaker, as you know, this bill states that a moratorium be placed on the Meme breast implant until it is proven to be a safe product. The minister of health has, momentarily, taken it from the market. This bill is being reintroduced to make sure that the Meme's removal is entrenched in law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension).

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill is aimed at correcting a long–standing, but I believe only a technical injustice in the limitation period for making application for the Canada Pension Plan for disabled people. Unfortunately, the way the legislation reads now and has read for many years, provides a barrier for disabled people to apply for their Canada Pension Plan benefits if, for some reason or other they have decided to delay their application even though they have contributed for years and years and years to the fund. It may be for many legitimate purposes, including the fact that they do not want to be a drain on the public purse and on the public fund until they need the money.

The legislation now bars them from a later application. This would allow them to do it in the event they have made contributions for at least one–third of their contribution period. Then they would be eligible to receive a pension.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INDOOR AIR QUALITY ACT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–281, an act relating to indoor air quality.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to reflect the concerns of many Canadians, most of whom spend approximately 90 per cent of their time indoors. This bill authorizes the Minister of National Health and Welfare, among other things, to establish a national research centre to study issues related to indoor air quality and indoor air contaminants and authorizes him to take other action which would ensure that Canadians enjoy a safe environment not only outdoors, but indoors as well.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES FOUNDATION ACT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–282, an act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation.

She said: I am very proud to reintroduce this bill, an act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation. This is a bill that has widespread support across this country.

The purpose of the Foundation is to facilitate throughout Canada the acquisition, retention and use of aboriginal languages that contribute to the country's aboriginal heritage by ensuring the perpetuation, revitalization, growth and protection of aboriginal languages. This would be in concert with what has been done for heritage languages, of which there is an institute and of which there is none for the aboriginal languages.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–283, an act to amend the Electoral Act (election expenses).

He said: Madam Speaker, following the private member's bill introduced by the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn on conflict of interest for members of Parliament and the Senate, this is companion legislation with regard to cleaning up the Election Act. It calls for strict controls on election expenses and legal enforcement for those election expenses.

As the Speaker is aware, ever since 1984 we have had a very large loophole in the definition of election expenses. This has to be cleaned up. I am afraid that the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing will not be able to finish its work in time, and the government will not pass legislation in time for the next federal election. Therefore, I have included a very comprehensive definition of election expenses, including polling by political parties, and I would hope that we would have all-party consent to have this legislation passed in time for the next federal election.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Routine Proceedings

TOBACCO RESTRAINT ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–284, an act to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act.

He said: This bill rose from a survey that was done recently in western Canada which indicated that a substantial number of retail outlets sell tobacco to young people of age 15, 14, 13, 12, 11 and 10 years. This is against the law. Madam Speaker, probably one of the reasons these people were breaking the law is that the fine is only $10 if convicted.

This bill raises the fine from $10 to $1,000 for a first offence; $2,000 for a second offence, and $5,000 for a third offence for the selling of tobacco products to minors. I think it is time that we take this seriously and do what we can collectively to ensure that young people are not encouraged to smoke.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, next year Canada will be celebrating its 125th anniversary of its birth. Many organizations will also be commemorating the 125th anniversary of the birth of a world renowned scientist, Marie Sklodowska Curie, who discovered radium which healed the sick of the world and of Canada. Presently a successful play is being performed in Quebec depicting her life. It will be performed next year across Canada. A senior citizen's home in Montreal bears her name and a charitable organization in Toronto is also named in her honour.

These 500 petitioners are adding their names to the other 5,000 plus Canadians calling upon Parliament to convince the Canadian stamp committee to issue a stamp honouring a great scientist, Marie Sklodowska Curie.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present a petition on behalf of the citizens of the first nations across this country who number 480 on this petition and are protesting against the GST being imposed on first nations. Whereas the first nations of Canada are immune from taxation by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights, whereas these rights have been in part affirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, the Constitution Act of 1982, section 35 and by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, specifically the Sparrow case, I appeal to the government to remove this tax immediately.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a similar petition to the one just presented in which several hundred aboriginal Canadians from across this country in virtually every province state: Whereas the federal government has set in place a goods and services tax on January 1, whereas the first nations of Canada are immune from such taxation by virtue of aboriginal and treaty rights, and whereas these rights have been in part affirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, the Constitution Act of 1982 and recent decisions of the Supreme Court, the undersigned, your petitioners, are calling on Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of the first nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of first nation citizens, both on or off reserves, including those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserved lands.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are urging the government to remain firm and maintain the adequate levels of funding for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable the force to fulfil its mandate.

MULTINATIONAL RESOURCES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Madam Speaker, I wish to present a petition from constituents of Barrier, Louis Creek, Heffley Creek, Kamloops, British Columbia, as well as Birch Island and Red Deer, Alberta who are indicating their concern with the intent by a firm called Multinational Resources to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby, British Columbia in order to divert the water to the San Diego, California area. The petitioners are calling upon the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States of America.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEBT SERVICE AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate today. This legislation sets up a special fund or a special account within the government accounts to receive in part the huge revenue overruns from the goods and services tax. The government at one time led us to believe that this tax would be revenue neutral. Now we find out that through deceit or incompetence the goods and services tax is yielding far more revenues than the government was willing to admit to the Canadian people and these revenues are flowing into the general accounts of the country.

It creates a problem for the government when it is intent, based on its Tory ideology of cutting back programs in health care and social services and education, to cry poverty in order to justify the cutbacks in these social programs. I guess it is a bit embarrassing when these huge volumes of revenue are flowing in through the goods and services tax, which the government denied was going to happen. Now people are justifiably arguing that if there is a surplus of revenues, how can it justify cutting back on those social programs, when the revenues of the country are increasing.

Many of the things this government does are reminiscent of the old days of Social Credit in British Columbia and some of the financial stunts pulled there by the government in order to justify the continuation of that right wing conservative cost-cutting ideology it used, not necessarily to try to control the finances and balance the books, but to serve its ideology, which is to cut programs designed to serve people and at the same time reduce the tax burden and the regulatory burden on the people who serve them. That is the corporations and the wealthy families of Canada.

The Social Credit in British Columbia set up what they called "rainy day funds." This was so that they could set revenues in these special funds and bring them out during a rainy day. Well, of course, under the Social Credit it was always rainy in British Columbia and the finances were always in a situation that could be called "rainy day." Unfortunately, it was never rainy enough for the Socreds to use these special funds in order to serve the purposes they were set up to serve.

An hon. member: Not even at election time?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Well, I will get into that later on.

In fact a most recent example of this kind of budgetary flim flam was the so-called budget stabilization fund which was set up by one of the Ministers of Finance who have gone through the revolving door of that office in British Columbia over the last little while. It was called the budget stabilization fund, or as these things are commonly abbreviated, the BS fund, which more appropriately names the fund.

The account is designed to serve two purposes, as members will know. The first purpose is to set up an accounting fiction so that the government can take its surplus revenues and put it in this account so that it will not be seen by the public as being available for expenditure on social programs.

What the government does is it takes the cash in that special account and by selling the account treasury notes, it gets the cash back into general revenue where it is spent. We have had a couple of examples recently such as the $273 million KAON project in British Columbia on the threshold of a provincial election where the Conservatives are trying to help their friends the Socreds in British Columbia to get re-elected in spite of all the things they have done in the past five years.

It was suggested by some of our members last night who were asking for aid for the farmers in the prairie provinces to assist them to overcome some of the problems of world market conditions and the conflict of subsidies that were taking place that payments be made to the farmers immediately rather than waiting until the time that it was most politically expedient so that the government could support its crony out there, Grant Devine, to try to get him elected. Therefore, the purpose of the aid to the farmers is more to elect Grant Devine than to provide any kind of assistance to agriculture in Saskatchewan.

The Socreds used the funds for the same kind of purpose. They used to stash away money into special funds, or rainy day funds, or political slush funds. When it came close to election time they took the money out of those funds and used it to improve their chances of getting re-elected.

This time I do not think they are going to be that successful. I am convinced they are not going to be that successful, so we will see an end to this kind of nonsense at least in the province of British Columbia.

There is a second purpose for the use of these kinds of funds and accounts, this flim-flam accounting, which is to deceive the people of Canada as to the actual volumes of revenue which are flowing into the federal treasury. The government would like to, because it has embarked on a cost-cutting program, cut programs in education, in health care, in social services, cut services to women and unemployed workers and training programs and that kind of thing. It wants people to believe that there is actually a tight revenue expenditure situation in this country.

It diverts a substantial amount of the revenue generated by the goods and services tax into this special fund and it is able to tell the public: "Sorry, you can't have a national child care program because the money is already spoken for. Sorry, you can't have a literacy program that is designed to achieve the objective of cutting illiteracy in this country in half by the year 2000 so that maybe we can approach the literacy rate of Mexico. We can't do that because the money has already been designated into this fund to pay off Canada's debt".

The idea is to keep the revenue and expenditures as close as possible so that people will not be able to petition the government to set up programs like child care, which the government has been promising for the last few years.

This goods and services tax will probably bring in sufficient revenues over this year to pay for the full cost of that program. What the government has to do is divert those revenues into this debt payment fund so that it will not have to pay for the child care program it has been promising for years and years and years.

It is a method of deceiving the people of this country using the kind of economic flim-flam through special accounts and special funds that the province of British Columbia under Social Credit has been using for years and years and years.

Anybody who understands British Columbia politics, surely most people west of the Rocky Mountains in this country, are going to understand that this is flim-flam. They are not going to believe it and it is not going to work.

I have a second concern about this proposal to set up a special fund in which to put all the surplus GST revenues or the revenues from selling Crown corporations and other revenues which may come to the government from other sources. That is that it does not address the real causes of the debt. While we may be putting these funds into the debt payment account, the real causes of the debt are still operating to increase the debt of Canada.

As one of our members pointed out this morning, when the Conservatives came into office in 1984 the debt of the country was $180 billion. In a recent report by the Department of Finance that debt load has now risen to over $400 billion. Under the Tories, from 1984 to 1991, the debt has risen from $180 billion to $400 billion.

It has more than doubled now to the point where the debt of each and every Canadian man, woman and child is $15,000. That is the accomplishment of the Tory government over the last decade, to double the debt and saddle $15,000 on to every man, woman and child in this country. That is the Tory record.

Statistics Canada did a recent study that was suppressed by the Tory government because it did not want the results to come out. That study showed what the causes of the debt actually were.

Frances Russell released the study in the Winnipeg newspapers back in March of this year. She talked about the suppressed Statistics Canada study which indicated that 44 per cent of Canada's national debt is not due to program spending. It is not due to runaway expenditures on such programs as health, education and welfare.

According to StatsCan's study, 44 per cent of Canada's debt is due to tax concessions to large corporations and wealthy individuals. That is one of the roots of the debt problem in this country.

This legislation does not address that problem. While we are setting up this fund, while we are paying the GST into this fund, and while we are paying revenues from the privatization of corporations into this fund, the real root of the problem is not being dealt with at all. That debt is going to increase and increase until the government actually deals with the root of the problem.

The second major contributor to the debt, according to Statistics Canada, in fact responsible for 50 per cent of Canada's public debt, is the high interest rate policy. Both of these policies, tax concessions to corporations and tax giveaways to corporations, were pursued by both the Liberal and the Conservative governments over the last three decades.

The high interest rate policy is the same. It has been pursued by Liberal and Tory governments over at least the past two decades. According to Statistics Canada, it is that high interest policy which is responsible for something like 50 per cent of the total public debt in Canada, that huge mushrooming debt which has reached over $400 billion under the Tories, or $15,000 for every man, woman and child in this country.

There are two issues. First, tax concessions to corporations which account for 44 per cent of the debt, and second, the high interest rate policy that causes that debt to mushroom is responsible for 50 per cent of the debt.

What about the social programs that the Tories like to talk about and the Socreds in British Columbia like to talk about? What about those social programs that are accused by those political parties of being the major cause of our debt in this country?

According to the Statistics Canada study, which the Tories attempted to suppress, program spending accounts for only 6 per cent of the total debt problem in this country.

If program spending is only 6 per cent of the problem, why do the Tories haul out 100 per cent of their big guns to deal with that problem and leave the problem of interest rates alone? Why do they leave the problem of generous tax concessions to corporations alone?

Why do we not deal with the real issues, the things that are the root of this debt problem, root them out, solve those problems and reduce the debt that way?

Of course, that counters Tory ideology. We run up against a bit of an ideological road-block. If there is one thing that justifies the existence of Tories, it is cutting programs. They love to cut programs.

It does not matter whether we have good times or bad times in this country. Tory times are always bad times. In good times or in bad times Tories love to cut programs, in particular social programs. How have they opted to deal with the national debt? They have attacked transfer payments to the provinces. Most of those transfer payments go to pay for health care, social services, education, post-secondary education, programs and services that are needed by people all across Canada. These are programs that are very difficult to cut without decreasing the standard and quality of life in this country. Yet those are the programs the Tories have targeted with 100 per cent of their big guns.

Why not attack the problem of corporate tax concessions? We see all across this country the difficulty people are experiencing in shouldering the burden of taxes that Tories have loaded on them over the past decade. Income taxes, excise taxes, sales taxes, all the taxes that people pay have increased dramatically. People in the small business sector are complaining about the huge burden of taxes that the Socreds and Tories have placed on them. I hope this is not reported in British Columbia. If so, I withdraw the name Socred.

People all across the country are complaining about the burden of taxes that this Tory government has imposed on them in the small business sector. In the wage-earning sector, hourly paid workers have tried to get increases in their wages just to maintain pace with inflation and with the cost of living. Yet every time they make ends meet, every time they see the possibility of being able to put a little more food on the table, of being able to move ahead a little bit and aspire to the Canadian dream, the Tories come back and crush them with another load of taxes, increased income taxes and the goods and services tax. That area of Canadian society is being beaten down the worst.

I have a letter here from one of my constituents discussing the goods and services tax and the impact it has had on old age pensioners. It says: "Mr. Skelly, I am an old age pensioner trying to do my darndest to stay in my old house. I have had some work done on my house and I am shocked to see how much GST I have paid out. I have hired a plumber, a carpenter and an electrician to do some work. So far this year, not counting the small amounts of 50 cents to $3 I have paid in GST, I have receipts totalling $351 on GST alone". That is what she has paid out on GST alone.

We were told by the Minister of Finance and by every Conservative speaking in the House in favour of the goods and services tax that the poor people, the pensioners in this country, would be getting a tax credit that would help offset the problem of the goods and services tax.

Well, this lady gets a tax credit too. In fact, her tax credit is $254 a year. She has to pay $110 of GST more than she receives from the tax credit. In fact she is farther behind than she was when the goods and services tax was brought in. This woman suggested to me that as a result of GST she may be forced out of her own home and may have to go to a senior citizens' home or institution as a result of the tax burden that, along with the GST, this government has imposed on senior citizens.

I had to laugh at the member for Halton—Peel when he was talking about having protection for private property in the Constitution. The goods and services tax has virtually told pensioners in this country that if they are not able to afford to pay this tax and cannot repair their house, this government is going to take them out of their house and put them in institutions and senior citizens' homes.

How differently we have treated the wealthy in this country. We have given the wealthy all sorts of perks, such as travel perks. People can fly in corporate aircraft and have it deducted from their expense account as a cost of doing business. In entertainment expenses, this government concedes to corporate Canada something like $3 billion in two-martini lunches. I recall a book written by an expert on taxation who was talking about a birthday party that was held for a corporate executive in downtown Toronto, orchestras were hired and champagne came in tubs. There were hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars in expenses. Yet, because some corporate customers were there, the party was written off against the taxes of the company.

Mr. Speaker, please allow me just a few seconds to wind up. This bill is not going to solve the problem of Canada's debt. It is not going to pay off Canada's debt because it does not deal with the root problems of the debt. The root problem is the unfairness of the tax system which allows the rich to get off with no burden of tax at all while the poor are stifled and have a huge tax burden on them. It does not deal with the problem.

Until we restructure and balance our tax system so that people who have the money and have the economic power are paying the revenues then the debt is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): Questions and comments.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not catch the whole presentation but it is always interesting to listen to NDP members talk about the poor people of this country and how they have to defend them. Then he even proceeds to talk about this letter he has received from a very poor constituent of his who had to pay this terrible amount of $354 in GST.

Let me just explain what that means for that poor person he is defending.

In order to spend $354 in GST in a six month period she would have to buy $5,000 worth of taxable goods. If that was the only income the person had and the only expenses the person had I would agree with the member that obviously this person is a very low-income person. I will presume that person lived some place and paid rent of $500 a month, which is a very difficult and low rent to find in Canada, but for argument's sake that may be the rent in that part of Canada. That is another $6,000 a year that person spent. Of course there is no GST on the rent. The person now has a place to live and has bought these lovely things, $5,000 worth of goods to sit on, to watch television, to wear or whatever those items might be used for. Now she has to eat.

We do not have to pay GST on the food we eat at home. I do not know how much to allow for that, but for argument's sake let us presume that people pay about one-third of their income on food. If I add the $5,000 and the $6,000 to another $6,000 that person has now spent up to $17,000 in the first six months of this year. That is really a remarkable number. Multiply that figure by two and that is $34,000 for the year that this person, who the member is defending, makes. Of course, that is $34,000 after tax.

Now we ought to say: "Well, what kind of taxes does that person pay on income tax?" Let us be generous and say that it is only 30 per cent. This $34,000 all of a sudden jumps up to $45,000.

Lo and behold, I am listening to the NDP talk about the poor people of this country and the member uses an example of a person who probably has a $45,000 income. That is our point. It is the people in the $20,000, $25,000 to $30,000 income area who need the help. They get the GST credit. We need this particular bill to ensure that we do not go out and spend all this extra money that they think we are getting, which we are not.

I would like to ask the member if he really believes that it is the higher income or middle income Canadians who are being disproportionately penalized, as his presentation argues, or is it the low income Canadians who benefit from the tax credit we ought to be speaking on behalf of?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely astounded by the question from the member. Not only did he come late, but he was a few sandwiches short of the picnic.

As I pointed out, this person lives on an old age pension. She does get some help from her family. Can the hon. member tell me if a $45,000 income-earner in this country is entitled to a $254.10 GST rebate? He had better check his own documents before he starts inventing this straw person of a figure because it certainly does not relate to the conditions that this woman lives under.

• (1300)

She says that if it was not for the health of her son who is also attempting to send two kids through university and pays enough taxes for three old age pensioners, she would not be able to do even the kind of work she is doing. I take your remarks as an insult to my constituent, and I am certainly going to send it to her.

It is typical of the lack of understanding of the circumstances and the situation being faced by poor people in this country by those Tory people opposite as a result of the policies that they have imposed on poor people in this country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I found myself agreeing with an awful lot of what the member for Comox—Alberni said when he talked about the accounting fiction that is involved in this, but I would like to get a point of clarification on some remarks he made toward the end of his speech when he talked about business expenses.

Do I take it from the hon. member that the NDP is against legitimate business expenses? It is a fact of life that when we promote and try to display and demonstrate what our product or services are that—whether it be in this country or in any other part of the world—we have legitimate business expenses.

You have to fly to these places. You talked about travel. Sometimes you bring your sales staff or marketing staff together to celebrate, maybe, a particular achievement of a corporation, or levels of quality or performance that have been met. I was getting a sense from the member that he really was not committed or supportive of legitimate business expenses. I would like to hear his or his party's view on that.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for that question.

It was not my intention to suggest that those type of expenses be done away with entirely, or scrapped, or that they are even part of the problem of the unfair burden of taxation that we are experiencing in this country.

What I am looking for is a little more balance. I think you will find from some of the studies that have come down recently, including this one by Global Economics Limited, that Tory taxation policy has resulted in a huge burden of taxes being imposed on small business, on wage earners and on people at the lower end of the income scale, whereas there has been a lifting of the tax burden on the wealthy families in this country, and on large corporations.

There should be more of a balance, which would result possibly in more examination by tax auditors of things like business expenses or travel expenses, to make sure that when those tax concessions are granted by government—this was the policy of Ed Broadbent—there is an actual return to the country and to the business from those expenses.

That is why I quoted the story that appeared in the book Behind Closed Doors, which you may have read, about how the rich had hijacked the tax system in Canada. It described a private birthday party of a very wealthy Canadian with champagne in buckets, orchestras and invited guests which ended up being deducted as a business expense. The cost of that party ended up being shouldered by the people of Canada because of the foregone taxes from that corporation.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise today to make a few comments on Bill C–21.

I would like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I will be sharing this time with my colleague from Nepean. I will speak 10 minutes with five minutes questions and answer, and my colleague will do the same.

This bill is the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act. I want to take a minute to explain to people who are watching today what this bill is.

Most of us have been in business and we certainly all run our own personal accounts. When we have money come into our bank account or into our business, we apply it against the debts we owe. It is very seldom that we set up a special bank account from which to make mortgage payments.

This is a marketing plan and a marketing game by the present government. It is saying to Canadians that it is going to take special money and use that money to pay against the deficit. What else would the government do with income other than to pay its bills? And part of its bills is the interest on the accumulated debt the country carries.

This whole bill is an absolute farce, absolutely needless. In the same light it is not a bill that, as a member, I can oppose. But it is needless because if I was to stand up here and say I was opposing the bill, the members on the other side would say that I did not want to pay off the deficit.

First Canadians were told, back when the government started to talk about the GST, that it would be revenue neutral, that as a country we were going to do away with the federal tax that was there before and replace it with a goods and services tax. The net $18 billion that the previous tax had raised was going to be raised by the GST. The GST was going to raise about $24 billion and the tax credits, et cetera, that would be returned to low income people would account for about $6 billion and so the net would be $18 billion.

Well, the truth has come out, Mr. Speaker, and the GST is raising more than that. It is raising more than that in a recession, so it is quite obvious that if and when—and hopefully that is soon—the economy turns around, it is going to be a cash cow. Some of the government members said that right from the start, and I applaud them for their honesty. Now I think they had their knuckles rapped by the powers that be in their caucus, but they were honest enough to tell Canadians that.

Naturally, if this account, if that section of income from the Canadian government brings in an extra $3 billion or $4 billion or whatever the case may be, where else would it go? Why would it not be applied against the bills that the government has? One of those bills is the interest. If we pay off a bigger section of our bills, then naturally the annual deficit of the country will be less.

So let us not be fooled by what is actually happening. I am very sceptical about what the government is telling Canadians, that they do not trust themselves to allow this to go into the regular funds in the regular bank account of the government, so they are going to put this in a separate account in order to make sure that they themselves keep themselves honest, if that is possible. They are saying that the only thing that account can be used for is to pay off some of the debts.

I hope that is the case because Canadians have become very sceptical. I hope that the government shows Canadians that they are not going to use that for patronage handouts and to come up with election promises as time goes on. That is what Canadians are saying, Mr. Speaker, that if the GST raises $4 billion or $5 billion more than the government has been up front in telling Canadians it is going to raise, it will put $2 billion or $3 billion of that against the deficit and take the other $1 billion or $2 billion as an election comes close and come out with election goodies. That has been done before, and I can tell you that all of Canada is going to watch that.

All that being said, Mr. Speaker, I do recognize that we do have an extreme deficit problem in the country. The deficit is nearly 5 per cent of our gross domestic product and there are very few countries—probably only Italy—that has a higher annual deficit in proportion to the gross domestic product than does Canada. That is the serious problem we have to address.

Unfortunately, the present government has failed to live up to the promises it made prior to 1984 and in 1984. Quite frankly, had it done that, had it lived up to what it told Canadians it would do, had it lived up to the reason Canadians elected one of the highest—if not the highest—majorities in this House for any political party in Canadian history, we would not be in the problem we are in at the present time. Within 24 hours of getting elected, it got too concerned about getting elected another time and said: "Okay, here goes the patronage and here come the handouts".

Canada went through six years of the best times this country has ever gone through. Any sound business or company would take advantage of the opportunity when they are making money to pay off some of their bills. This government did not do that.

Instead of fulfilling the promise to Canadians to have the deficit down to $16 billion by 1991, where are we? We are predicting a $30.5 billion deficit again in this fiscal year. When we look at the figures that are coming out now, in the first four months, the Canadian deficit is over $12 billion. I can figure it out. That is over $3 billion per month and 3 times 12 means a $36 billion deficit, not $30.5 billion.

Some very highly regarded people in the banking industry are saying that in all honesty, we are probably heading toward a $35 billion deficit, not a $30.5. Therefore, we have to address that.

It is time for some accountability. It is time to look after that account which is going to be set up, albeit needlessly. But if the government wants to set it up, I will support the setting up of it, but I am still very sceptical of why the government feels it is necessary.

The government has to address the problems that we have in this country and spend the money wisely. In its agenda it declared a number of years ago what had to be addressed. There has been a failure to reduce the deficit. There has been a failure to improve spending on research and development. There has been a failure to improve education and training. There has been a failure to improve the national infrastructure and a failure to assist the transition during implementation of the free trade agreement.

I cannot stress strongly enough, that unless we address all of these items and others, these I have just mentioned in particular, we are not as a country going to be as competitive as we can and should be.

I am embarrassed that I cannot remember the name of the gentleman who wrote it, but I recommend an article which was in The Ottawa Citizen a couple of days ago. It was an excellent article on the tools that we are missing as a nation. We are not addressing the 30 per cent drop-out rate from secondary schools. That is a resource we are not using in this country. It is a resource this government is not even giving lip service to as far as further education and research and development. Unless we train ourselves and train our people, we will not be competitive in the future.

I do not think I need to take time to say much more. We have to address these things. I can say that Canadians will be watching this present government. I stress to the government: Why not be candid and forthright with Canadians and explain to them: "Yes, we have failed to achieve our goals. No, we have not met the goals. We want you to help us to meet those goals". Be right up front and say: "Yes, we want to use the GST. Yes, it is not going to be revenue neutral. But we will take the extra money and we will not have to lock it up in a safety deposit box so that in a weak moment we do not get our hands on it in order to use it". Try to give Canadians that faith in themselves and tell them how it will use that money.

I hope the government can understand why the opposition parties and the general public are sceptical of this government's plans. After all, the government has not done what it promised to do in the first place. If it had, we would not be in the position we are in right now.

In closing, I would just like to stress that Canadians will understand if the government is forthright with them and tries to show that it can be trusted. I ask the government to make that effort.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague brought a very important point to the attention of this House. That was the fact that the economy of this country between 1984 and 1988 was one of the most successful economies we have had in this country for many, many years. During that period of time the government not only refused to address expenditure control, but it never ever talked about the fact that it doubled the revenue, that there was close to a $50 billion grab through increased taxes from mostly middle income Canadians and small businesses.

My question to my colleague is this: Don't you think that that would have been a more legitimate debt reduction fund, the middle income and small business debt reduction fund, which could have lifted the morale of those people who are basically carrying the tax burden of this country and who basically doubled the amount of tax they put into the treasury during that heated up period?

I think that would have done a lot more to advance the trust factor of this government. But, no, they walked on by and failed to give that credit to small business and to the middle class taxpayer. I think that is one of the reasons why this government has such a very low trust factor.

So my question to my colleague is: What does he think about setting up not just the GST debt reduction fund, but the small business debt reduction fund, or the multinational debt reduction fund? After all, all of these are sources of income not unlike the GST.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, in response to my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, there is no question that he and some people with him in addressing the problem of how we as a country address our national debt have just done a tremendous amount of work on that.

He is so right. I guess in a slang term we have all heard that there is more than one way to do something or, as one of my colleagues says there is more than one way to skin a cat. As a country, we have to look at all the different methods and ways that we have of doing that. We have gone through, as he has said so clearly, six or seven years of tremendous success in this country businesswise, et cetera, a boom time when no one took advantage of it as a government to pay down the debt, to pay off the mortgage that we are carrying as a country. During that time all that the government could see was some way in which it could better itself and try to make itself look better down the road.

Then, when we got down the road and reality hit home, it tried to put something in. Indeed, it did put something in, such as the GST. But instead of putting that in, if it had insisted on putting it in a few years earlier when the economy was going up—and it knew it would have a detrimental effect on the economy and it might level it off, but albeit at a decent level—it waited until the economy was on the downslide and then it kicked it in, and boom, the bottom dropped right out of the economy and where are we now? It has pushed the economy over the edge to the extent that all of the small businessmen and indeed the large as well, but the small ones in particular that are the ones this country operates on and which contribute to the debt reduction of this country, are no longer able to stay in business.

So, as a government, it has bitten the hand that feeds it, and now all Canadians are suffering the consequences of such disastrous management of the national economy.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand here and share this time with my colleague. I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak to Bill C–21 which is before us this afternoon and which is an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt in Canada. At the same time I am pleased to speak to this, I am somewhat sceptical of the government's motives. But I was pleased when in the February budget we were told they would create a fund which would credit all revenues from the GST, all proceeds from privatization and all gifts to Canada would be placed in an account for the purposes of reducing and servicing the debt.

I think not just I but all Canadians rejoiced at that planned initiative of the government.

The constituents in my riding have always expressed to me their particular concern about servicing, reducing, and eliminating the debt so I am pleased that I am able to present their collective views today. I am pleased to offer in this House my support in principle to Bill C–21 at second reading so that it can go to committee and be closely scrutinized. I mentioned earlier that I am also sceptical about the ability of this act to actually reduce the debt.

My scepticism flows from the government's dismal record on bringing forth the kind of responsible fiscal policy that it has always tried to claim as its trademark. The government in 1989 introduced a very ambitious five-year fiscal plan to begin the work of getting rid of the deficit and eventually the debt. What happened? As we know, in 1988–89 we had an operating deficit of $28.7 billion, in 1989–90 a deficit of $30.5 billion, and we are expecting $30.5 billion in 1991–92. The operating deficit has risen nearly $2 billion.

Herein lies my scepticism. Under this new ambitious plan of deficit and debt reduction of which Bill C–21 is a part, how much of a tab will the government run up in the next few years?

We already know that this new account itself will be in a deficit of at least $20 billion per year for the next five years. The deficit has continued to go up and down. During the years this government has been in power, it should have been reduced in better times during the 1980s. It was not.

What happened during the 1980s? We know that this government took office in 1984. From the period 1984 to 1988, and it was just alluded to by the member from Broadview—Greenwood, this country saw unprecedented growth, higher than ever before in the history of this country. I know that my colleague mentioned $50 billion. My understanding was that it was considerably higher than that.

What did they do? Did they put any of this excess revenue beyond all their wildest dreams, excess revenue over anticipated revenue, against the debt? Not one penny of it went against the debt. What did they do? I would like to know because I have never seen an accounting of it and I know that I and my colleagues, and certainly Canadians, would be most interested in seeing how that money was spent.

During 1984 to 1988 this government was certainly the last of the big time spenders.

This government has chosen over those years to stick it to Canadians when they are down. Between 1988 and the period we are in now, the economy is down. Inflation is high. Bankruptcies are soaring. People are out of jobs. They introduced the GST during a recession. They pursued a high dollar, a high-interest policy when people could barely, if at all, make ends meet.

We have had no fewer than 33 increases in taxes in the last seven years, furthering the burden on the average Canadian, and yet no reduction. In fact there has been an increase in either the deficit or the debt.

The recovery from this recession is expected to be slow and uneven with unemployment, the worst aspect of recession, being one of the last vestiges to recover.

The government should have been reducing the debt as I mentioned earlier during the 1980s, which were the good times, and using available resources to help people in the economy during the bad times.

I would like to mention some of the things that the government should have been looking at and probably funnelling money into and yet has reduced granting moneys to these particular areas. As I mentioned earlier about the work force, unemployment is on the rise.

Research and development: we should be expanding our industries here in Canada and yet we have withdrawn money and reduced our input financially.

Education: our young people are the biggest resource that this country has and yet moneys have been reduced drastically to the provinces in the area of education.

Illiteracy: can we Canadians afford to have a high percentage of our Canadians illiterate? I would think not.

Infrastructure: a couple of years ago one of my colleagues and I travelled this country talking to people in municipalities and to mayors of municipal councils. We asked them what was the biggest problem they had with increasing the economy in their own particular area.

Over and over again we were told it was Canada's infrastructure. I am talking about roads, bridges, sewers and adequate water supply that they would not have.

I recall in Cape Breton visiting the mayors of different municipalities there. They were not able to entice industry to their island because they did not have the adequate sewage treatment plant, nor did they have the money to build those sewage treatment plants. Businesses would not locate or relocate to the island of Cape Breton unless they had those services.

There was no money forthcoming from the federal government to attract industry to Atlantic Canada at all. I think this is a disgrace.

Canada in its federation is here to help depressed areas or areas where the economy is most suffering. Certainly this government has ignored that since it has come to office.

We have had no fewer that 33 increases in taxes in the last seven years furthering the burden on average Canadians and yet again no reduction—and in fact an increase—in either the deficit or the debt.

I would like to focus on a particular clause of this bill which is clause 4. It would establish the very sources of revenue to be credited to the account in addition to income from the GST and revenues from any unconditional gift to Canada or gift which has had as an express purpose the servicing or repayment of debt or reduction of the deficit.

A third source of income from this fund would be the net proceeds from the complete or partial privatization of a Crown corporation, specifying only those proceeds in excess of the value listed as assets in the accounts of Canada would be credited to this account.

There is one fund which I would like to draw to the attention of this House to enter into debate. That is a little known account called the Canadian ownership account.

Over the summer after discussing with a constituent, Mr. Leslie Bennett, I wrote to the Minister of Finance asking for complete and detailed information about a huge sum of money which sits in this account. I have yet to hear back from the minister.

The best information available to me is that as of March 31, 1990 the fund totalled $1.9 billion. This money comes from a levy which was set in June 1982 retroactive to May 1981, which was rolled into the domestic price of oil and gas consumed in Canada to finance "future acquisition of foreign owned assets by federal Crown corporations in the energy field", Petro-Canada. Its purpose was to help meet Petro-Canada's goal of 50 per cent ownership.

The amount of $1.9 billion is a lot of money in my books. I have yet to see it show up anywhere with respect to deficit or debt elimination.

Perhaps it was to be earmarked to pick up the slack in the loss of money for discretionary spending this government has. I hate to use the word "patronage", possibly, or "slush fund".

In any event I presume, since it was designed with respect to a Crown corporation, that it will be used in this fund. At least I sincerely hope that the government is serious in this and will redirect that money for that area.

I will be keeping an eye on it. I am here to make sure that the moneys which Canadians and certainly my constituents so dearly want to see go for debt reduction are going to that area. I will also anticipate an answer from the minister to the question which I have directed to him in this regard.

In closing, I would like to say that while I support the principle of the bill and will support the bill at second reading, I also have many concerns. I will be carefully monitoring the progress of this legislation when it goes before the committee.

I think all Canadians—and I hope this government is serious too—are deeply concerned about the economy of this country. These are very tough times with the recessionary period we are in today. Bankruptcies are soaring. My colleague mentioned the importance of small business and how this recession has hurt small business. We know that small business accounts for 80 per cent of the jobs created in this country. They are created by those businesses that have 10 or less employees. Most of them are mom and pop organizations.

I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the time you have allocated to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-21, an Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of being here Wednesday, during the Finance Minister's speech.

[English]

It was the longest, pious nonsense piece I have ever heard in this House. I was astounded that the Minister of Finance could maintain a straight face in the course of his remarks, because what he said was absolute nonsense, garbage. It did not reflect what he said it was saying all the way through. I must say that is the position of the Progressive Conservative Party in this country. It says one thing and does exactly the opposite. It is amazing, the statements that are made, and I will refer to those in the course of my speech.

However, first I want to quote from the words of the Minister of Finance. He sounded like his predecessor. I thought that having realized what a series of mistakes his predecessor had made he might have changed the word structure a bit, but he did not; he stuck with his words. This is what he said, and I am quoting from page 2326 of Hansard.

> This government is committed to a policy of sustainable growth with price stability. We are committed to an economy that can support the social programs that have made Canada a good place to live. We are committed to ensuring that our tax system is fair and to deficit reduction and debt control. We are committed to this because we want to ensure that future generations will not be strangled by the huge overhanging burden of debt.

Then he had the unmitigated gall to say:

> Since 1984 we have been taking a number of steps to reduce the federal deficit so that we can control and reduce the burden of national debt.

If they have taken those steps, it is patently obvious to every Canadian that they have not worked. In fact it has been a colossal disaster.

I want to deal with the issues that he said he had performed so brilliantly on. He listed six. He listed sustainable growth; he said that sustainable growth was one of them. That was a commitment and a policy. He listed price stability. He listed social programs so that we would maintain our nice place to live. He listed fair taxation, deficit reduction and debt control.

I would like to deal with each one of those, and I would like to present some figures that will make the hon. member quiver in her boots.

On sustainable growth, he talked about how he was maintaining growth at a sustainable pace in Canada. Certainly until the latest recession which the government induced, we did have reasonable growth in this country. I do not deny it. Everyone said it was a period of great economic growth and prosperity in our country.

That was quite true, and I may say that it was the good Liberal policies of the previous government that brought about that sustained period of growth. In fact the government is always quoting 1984 figures as though that were the annus mirabilis. It was in 1983 when the economy came out of recession. Things turned around and we had great growth and it continued for many years after.

This government, through its botched policies, has failed to capitalize on that growth and make it continue throughout this period and has induced a recession instead. The figures I am quoting from are the government's own figures. They are published by the Department of Finance. The minister himself released these in the Quarterly Economic Review annual reference tables dated June 1991. Government expenditures on the national accounts bases increased from a figure of $106,527 million in 1984 to $151,847 million in 1990, almost a 50 per cent increase.

The minister calls this sustainable growth. I call it government overspending on an impressive scale, and I think most Canadians and most economists do. They say the government has not brought spending under control in spite of the minister's absurd assertions to the contrary.

Let us turn to price stability, the second great thing that the minister has pronounced as a sign of great Tory management. What rubbish. He says that we have had price stability. CPI increases since 1984 have been over 4 per cent in every year but one when it was 3.9 per cent, and that was in 1985.

Again, I am relying on the government's blue book of statistics; I am not making these figures up. But, in spite of the claims of price stability which he made with a straight face in this House on Wednesday, in May of this year the increase year over year in the Consumer Price Index was 6.2 per cent. That is in May of this year. The increase over last year was 6.2 per cent. That is the government's own figure. That is a shocking abdication of responsibility.

We know why it happened. If the hon. member had been here and listened to our speeches day after day, she would know why it happened: GST. The GST drove up the Consumer Price Index. We all said it would and the opposition, throughout the debate on that bill, maintained that prices would skyrocket as a result of the GST. But the Minister of Finance said: "Oh, no, we have it all planned; everything is planned. It will be just peanuts. Maybe 1 per cent at the most. It is peanuts. Don't worry about the GST". We are worried about the GST and Canadians are worried about the GST. They know they have had the wool pulled over their eyes by this government and the GST in more ways than one.

Now I want to turn to social programs. The minister says the government has maintained social programs for the benefit of all Canadians. Tell that to the people who are trying to collect unemployment insurance today and are told they cannot because they have not worked enough weeks. The government extended the working period for qualification. Ask those who are off unemployment insurance today because their benefits have run out since the government shortened the period of payment of the benefits. Ask the people who are working today who are paying the huge increase in premiums as a result of this government gouging them out by making them pay more and abandoning the commitment of the government to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund from other government taxation revenues. Ask those people if they think social services have been maintained in Canada.

Ask the senior citizens of this country who have had their pensions clawed back if they think social services have been maintained. Ask those who are receiving family allowance who are suffering the clawback if they think that social services have been maintained. Ask the hospitals of this country that have found their funds cut from the provinces because the federal government has abdicated its responsibility to make the transfer payments under the various agreements that have been entered into. Ask them if they think social services in this country are being maintained.

Nobody in Canada, except the Minister of Finance, thinks that social services have been maintained. Everyone thinks they have been cut, but the Minister of Finance buries his head in the sand and pronounces that everything is as it was. What utter hogwash. How could he make such a speech with a straight face, I say to hon. members opposite.

Some hon. members: Name one that has been cut.

Mr. Milliken: Unemployment insurance. I have just been through it. Hon. members have clearly been talking among themselves and paying absolutely no attention to my speech, which is typical of government backbenchers. If government backbenchers in this House listened to the opposition, they would vote this government out of office. We would have an election tomorrow and we would solve the problems of this country in one fell swoop. Most Canadians want one. If these people knew what Canadians wanted, they would be voting for an election. They would vote non-confidence in this government so fast these ministers would not know what had happened to them.

Let us turn to number four of the minister's great planks. He referred to fair taxation. He said he has maintained fair taxation in Canada. The figures do not support this. Let us look at the figures. He says that taxation is fair. Yet, in 1984 the direct taxes levied on persons in Canada, as opposed to corporations, amounted to $37 billion and change. In 1990, $73 billion and change, on persons. Got it?

Now, let us turn to corporations. Direct taxes in 1984: $11.319 billion, in 1990: $10.885. They went down. The taxes on corporations went down and the taxes on individuals almost doubled. That is tax fairness Tory style. Gouge the people and let the corporations off scot free. That is the message of the Tory government in this country. That is the way it believes in fair taxation.

Let us turn to indirect taxes, if you want another indication. Indirect taxes are the things like sales tax and excise tax, as well as customs duties, but they are perhaps not included in this figure.

The 1984 indirect taxes in Canada were $18.124 billion, in 1990: $26 billion. Individuals pay a good chunk of those indirect taxes, in case the hon. members opposite are unaware of that fact. Corporations do too, but that is the kind of tax increase Canadians have had. However, the Minister of Finance, with a straight face, maintains that this government has provided fair taxation for Canadians. No one in Canada believes it. No one, except, perhaps, the minister. I am not sure. I do not know how he could believe it if he looked at the figures.

Let us turn to number five in the minister's litany, deficit reduction. He talks about the government's success in deficit reduction. Indeed, I quote his great statement: "Since 1984, we have been taking a number of steps to reduce the federal deficit."

On a national accounts basis, and again I quote from the blue book the government produced: "In 1984 the deficit was $30.024 billion, in 1990 it was $25,000,000,534." It has been reduced, I grant you that, by $5 billion, but it has never been below $19 billion and change since this government took office on a national accounts basis. This is not deficit reduction. This is just deficit carry-on. The government has failed to reduce the national debt.

Number six in his litany was debt control. He says: "We want to reduce the federal deficit so that we can control and reduce the burden of national debt." Well, the burden of national debt, again using the government's own figures on a national accounts basis, was $167 billion and change, almost $168 billion in 1984 and $357 billion in 1990. Almost $358 billion.

As a percentage of the Gross Domestic Product, the national debt has risen from 51 per cent in 1984 to 61 per cent.

An hon. member: What about the deficit?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member just now asked about the deficit. I just gave the figures for the deficit. Honestly, if she would pay more attention to my speech. It appears that my figures go in one ear and out the other. I wish she would pay attention. She can read it in Hansard on Monday.

The fact is that the government's economic policy has been an utter and complete disaster. I am not an economist, I do not claim to be gifted in this area, but I have some understanding of simple facts and figures, which obviously the Minister of Finance has missed in his presentation.

I want to quote from a statement issued by the Toronto-Dominion Bank, Department of Economic Research, its commentary on the 1991 federal budget.

I know that the Minister of Finance did not deliver this budget himself, it was his predecessor. But when he took office, he said he agreed with everything his predecessor had done, which I thought was a bit generous.

I would like to read just a few sentences from this statement.

> The 1991 budget of the Minister of Finance moves from an unrealistic short term scenario to an "Alice in Wonderland" medium term outlook. The 1990–91 budget deficit seems to be understated by close to $2 billion as the increase in interest costs are stated at only $1.8 billion when the government's sensitivity analysis would indicate at least twice that amount.

I will skip a bit.

> The main problem of this budget is that it addresses none of Canada's major economic problems.

As I said, this is exactly the position we have been placed in by this government's inactivity. I know figures are a little bit boring, but I have to go back in reading the Minister of Finance's comments to the government position paper announced in 1984, A New Direction for Canada: An Agenda for Economic Renewal. That was the title of this document introduced by the Minister of Finance's immediate predecessor.

Of course in this document they gave the worst case scenario for Canada. I have quoted some of these figures previously in this House. It is almost tedious to have to go back to a document like that, but yet the government said this was its policy. It claimed it was going to work. The Minister of Finance had the gall on Wednesday to claim that it had worked when patently it had not.

It said that the worst thing that would happen if it did not take control of the economy, as it claimed it was doing in 1984, was that program spending would reach $103 billion by this year, in fact by last year. It is a good deal over last year's figure. It went to $109 billion, that is program spending. It also said that government revenue in 1991, if it did not do something about it, would be $100 billion. It did something about it. It raised it to $120 billion, that is taxes gouged out of the Canadian public.

It said that public debt charges, if it did not do anything about the situation in 1984, would reach $34 billion by 1990–91. Well, it has not. They were a little lower than that last year, but they are probably going to be that figure this year, which is a sad commentary on the government's incompetence and ineptitude.

Finally, it promised that it could bring program spending under control and fight the deficit. Yet program spending has increased consistently throughout the government's term in office.

It has been a botched and total failure in terms of the objectives set out in the 1984 document. Either the 1984 document was another fraud perpetrated on the Canadian public for public relations purposes or else it had some meaning. If it had some meaning, clearly all of the objectives that were the worst case scenarios have been met and exceeded by the government except one.

Let us talk about this bill. This is another one of these public relations gimmicks that this government is so keen on pushing on the Canadian public. The purpose of the bill is to establish a fund called the debt servicing and reduction account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

The government is proposing to put certain funds in there, principally the GST revenues, and then say those funds will be applied to reduce the public debt and they cannot be applied for any other purpose.

I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to consider your position. I do not know how you keep your money, but suppose for the purposes of my discussion you have all your funds, however much that may be, in one bank account. Out of that bank account you pay all your expenses. All your paycheques go into the bank account. All the expenses are paid out of the bank account. But you decide for the mortgage on your house or for the rent you have to pay on your house, whichever it may be, but let us call it a mortgage for the purpose of my argument, to set up another similar account at the bank. You open a new chequing account. The purpose of that is to pay in a certain sum of money each month and then write the cheque for the mortgage payment on that account each month or have it deducted.

That is what the government in effect is doing in this case. The only hitch is if you were opening an account to pay your mortgage, as the government is doing in this case, surely you would put into the account as much as you would expect the mortgage payments will be. After all, most people have fixed mortgage payments or fixed rent payments. They may change annually but they are generally fixed for a period of time.

If you had a mortgage payment of say $1,000 a month, you would not put in $500 a month and then allow the account to develop a huge overdraft because pretty soon your banker would phone you up and say: "Mr. Speaker, we want you to transfer funds from your big account into the other one to cover this imbalance".

What the Government of Canada is doing to bamboozle the Canadian public is opening this special account and not paying in enough money to the account to pay the interest charges on the public debt. It is far below. In fact, at the end of five years, on the government's own figures, it is estimated that this account will have $100 billion deficit. That is how far short the payments that are going into this account are. Why bother opening it in the first place? What is the purpose of this?

This bill is being passed in this House for the sole purpose of convincing Canadians that the money they are paying in the GST is going to deficit reduction. They can say it is going into this special account. Well, any shortfall in this special account is either going to be made up out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada or in further government borrowing. That is where it is going to come from. To argue that somehow this money is saving the taxpayers of Canada anything or is committing their GST dollars to go to any particular thing is absolute rubbish and nonsense.

For the Minister of Finance to consider introducing such a bill as this is just pie in the sky, and he knows it. He knows this is a waste of money.

I would be interested in knowing from the minister at some point—and perhaps the legislative committee when it studies the bill could get these answers—how much more it is going to cost to administer this special account in a Consolidated Revenue Fund. I would like to know how many additional public servants are going to be hired to administer this special account. I would like to know how much more—

An hon. member: Tax police.

Mr. Milliken: They have already hired 3,000 tax police to collect the GST, and it may be up to 4,000 by now. It is the most expensive tax grab in Canadian history, but they think that is good value for money. Who are we to argue? They do not listen to our arguments on that point.

How many additional employees are going to be required from the Auditor General to audit these accounts annually as is required by this bill? What are the additional expenses of passing this silly act of Parliament? How much is it going to cost to have it printed in the Statutes of Canada and carried there for years and years when it is doing absolutely no good at all?

Any reasonable person in this country, had he or she an account at a bank for paying mortgage payments, would put enough in it to defray the mortgage costs. This government is not even proposing that in this bill.

I suggest that the bill is a waste of the time of this House. It is silly and the government ought to withdraw it.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the presentation. As is always the case, the member presents his case rather well. I am not going to debate all those statistics that he used, and some of them are probably accurate, but I would like to ask the member about two particular points.

I have been listening to not only his speech but a number of others on this bill, and I was not sure whether I was still sitting on the Conservative side of the House or the Liberal side of the House. What I was hearing was items like expenditure restraint, cut in programs, irresponsibility on the part of government with regards to spending, that we have increased spending 50 per cent, and those numbers that make it sound like we were spending like drunken sailors or socialists.

I have a question for the member and I would really like him to respond. We still have a $30 billion deficit and we are not going to debate that, I hope. At least that is the projected deficit. I would like the member to suggest to me and maybe to all the House how we can make his speech believable, because I think he used that word in the context of the finance minister's presentation. So that we can understand his speech to be believable, I would love for him to say now, very specifically, none of this balderdash about that if we improve the economy this will go down, which program it is that he can find. In fact I would love a series of programs that would get rid of that $30 billion. Do not just say cut the interest rate in half because that, as you know, will only save some $15 billion.

I would like to know where he would find the other $15 billion, even $10 billion or, as a matter of fact, $5 billion worth of programs that any member on that side of the House would support in the way of a cut.

I have listened to his argument about revenues. He complained that we have jacked the revenues up tremendously, so naturally he is not going to want to raise taxes. I would like to know where he is going to cut, to make his speech even partly believable.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member has missed some of my previous speeches because I have preached for restraint from this government before. I have urged the government, for example, to cut the interest rate which would reduce the interest payments as the hon. member has indicated by about half and thereby reduce the deficit by about half. I would start there.

In Question Period today the finance critic in our party criticized, very roundly, the government's high interest–high dollar policy which is causing such havoc in Canada and defeating any benefit Canada might have received from the free trade agreement.

In addition to that, I would slice the cabinet in half and I would save many hundreds of millions of dollars in payments to staff, in payments to additional high ranking public servants and so on. This cabinet is so oversized and overblown that it is unbelievable.

I would reduce the number of parliamentary secretaries and save another swat of money. I would reduce the government advertising budget. I think this government spent $91 million on the advertising for the goods and services tax alone. The total advertising budget of this government is gross. I could list a host of government publications that are some of the biggest wastes of money, clearly put out for public consumption to make the public believe something is being done, when in fact the government has not the faintest idea of what it is doing but puts out a nice glossy booklet to indicate that action is being taken. Those are other significant ways of saving money.

I would also suggest that the government could reduce its costs significantly by avoiding waste and duplication. The waste between government departments, the overlap between services provided by various government departments is very great, and then there is the goods and services tax, 3,000 new tax police hired by the government, hundreds of millions spent on new facilities across the country.

The government patted itself on the back before this recent strike, claiming what wonders it had done in Canada by reducing the Public Service by 15,000 over the last six years. It boasted about this as though this was some kind of triumph of reason over justice. I don't know which it was, or justice over reason perhaps. Whichever way it was, it promptly hired 3,000 more tax police to enforce its new goods and services tax.

It should have had the wit to bring in a proper tax that melded with provincial taxes. There is a whole taxation collection in place in most of the provinces of Canada, all but one. They could have made contracts with the federal government for collection of this tax. Any government but this one would have made that kind of arrangement. But this group fumbled and bungled the thing so badly, as typically as it has done with almost every other program it has touched, that one is not surprised that Canadians are saddled with hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars of extra expenses because of its inability to take control of the situation and make proper deals with the provinces.

Those are the places where I would save money. I am not advocating wholesale cuts in programs. If the economy were properly managed we would not need them.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. and learned friend on such a responsible address, on such an outstanding recitation of the facts, which I am sure are honest, correct and total, and indeed on the thrust of the presentation that he has put forward. I am particularly pleased and gratified that the hon. member has made it clear in the form of question as to why this government would see the necessity to introduce this kind of legislation. This is a legislation introduced by the government to legislate itself to make sure that the revenue neutral promise that it made a few years ago is now not going to take place.

There is no wonder people are confused as to why this bill is being introduced. As somebody put it earlier today, it is like passing a law that says if you are drowning you should try to swim to shore and rescue yourself. Why is there a need to legislate that? Can we not trust the government to try and keep its word and reduce the debt, as it said it was going to do? Why do we have to pass laws? I mean, are we going to have to pass other laws to make sure that the government does what they say they are going to do? Perhaps that is not a bad idea after all.

In particular, by way of a question, and I would like my hon. learned friend to comment on this, he is as aware as I am that during the election a few years ago, in fact three years ago almost to the day, the government was aware of the condition of the national debt and the burden of debt that is still upon us. In fact it has doubled in that relatively short time. I have before me today a release on the concern of the Canadian public over a child care program. I recall, as I am sure the hon. member does, when we were doing our campaigning the government of the day was making promises to the tune or in the vicinity of $4 billion for a child care program. What is now going to happen to those programs? What is going to happen to those promises?

If my figures are right—I did not do the sums myself but I am quoting reports in the media that I remember very well—the spending promises added up to somewhere in the vicinity of $12 billion depending on how the extension of the promises was worked out.

I do recall the Minister of Finance at the time saying that they were not promises and that they were all there in the budget. What was the concern?

Here you had a statement that $12 billion was being added to the then national debt, which did not seem to be of any concern. It was never an election issue. It never came up as a point of discussion.

All of a sudden, on November 22, we found we had this great national debt and all those great promises suddenly disappeared. Would the hon. member care to comment on that?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. and gallant colleague from Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception for his very perceptive question.

Of course I am pleased to comment on this. The last election was another case of the government promising pie in the sky to Canadians when it had no intention whatever of delivering on the promise.

The hon. member I am sure remembers that the government introduced legislation in this House to establish a child care scheme. The legislation was sent to the Senate two days before Parliament was prorogued.

The Senate offered to sit through the weekend if the Prime Minister would delay the prorogation of Parliament in order to pass the legislation. The hon. member for St. John's East knows this. However, the Prime Minister said: "No, no, no. We will prorogue. We are going to the people". Off he went to the people.

Then he blamed the Senate for the lack of a child care program. He said: "It is the Senate's fault". I would have thought that a Prime Minister who made that kind of assertion in an election campaign would have introduced a bill on the first day reconvened and said: "Let's get it through now". Not this one.

Now we are told it may not happen at all. Why? Because the Conservatives botched the country's finances so badly. It was not just in 1988 that they promised deficit control. They promised it in 1984. They did not do it then. They did not do it in 1988, and no Canadian thinks they will do it the next time around either. No Canadian believes what they say.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: If the hon. member who is protesting so much would simply vote the government out tomorrow or on Monday when we have a confidence vote, if we vote it out of here, I will go against the government and I will invite her to do so. Let's have an election and see what happens.

She will lose her seat and so will three-quarters of the members on that side of the House and properly deserved because they have been so bad.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I want to make just two or three main points.

This bill's stated purpose is to create a new account called debt servicing. Into this account the government says it would put surplus revenue from the GST, money from the sale of government assets and gifts to the Crown for the purpose of reducing the debt.

I agree with my colleagues in the NDP who have said that this whole project, or this fund, is a phony. I believe it will not make any difference to the size of the debt or even to the deficit as some of my colleagues have explained. In fact, it is an attempt at brainwashing.

It is not the first that I have seen. Ten years ago we had the six and five legislation from the Liberal government. That ensured that people on pension, people receiving child allowance and all sorts of people of poor and middle income had their income chopped by 5 or 6 per cent one year or the other.

As I understand it, this did not result in any significant reduction of costs. It tried to brainwash poor people and middle income people into thinking that they were responsible for the financial crisis.

I remember a month after the debate on six and five talking to an elderly man looking rather grey standing on an unpainted, wooden porch in front of his poor home. He said: "We have been living beyond our means". That was an instance of the success of the false propaganda put out by the Liberal government to blame the victims for the recession we had in 1981–82.

This is a similar attempt in a similar recession to tell the victims that it is their fault that the economy is in a mess. Therefore, I heartily support all those who vote against this bill. I have to be absent on Monday, but if I could be here I would be voting against it, as my colleagues well know.

I do have a suggestion as to how the government can fill this fund if it really wants to. However, first I want to point out what caused the deficit. The former Minister of Finance and his colleagues say that it was caused by overspending on programs such as health, welfare, housing, education and so on, which benefit the very large majority of people of this country. Therefore, the people are to be made to feel guilty because that money was spent.

In fact, Statistics Canada has shown that there was no significant increase in the size of government spending in relation to the growth of the Gross Domestic Product. In other words, the economy was rising, people were working, goods and services were being sold in increasing amounts. The economy expanded and those programs, more or less, kept pace with the economy. They were not the cause of this $400 billion debt, as the government would have us and the public believe.

The cause was not poor people receiving pensions or welfare or unemployment insurance. It was not working people on middle incomes who received some benefits such as declining child allowances and health care, which the government has been cutting back and plans to cut back completely by the end of this decade, as far as the federal government is concerned and then dumping it on to the provinces. That was not what caused the deficits and the debt.

According to the report of Statistics Canada to which my colleague earlier referred, 50 per cent of that debt was built up by high interest rates, interest rates that were unprecedentedly high for an unprecedented or unstated purpose. Normally, interest rates float 1 or 2 per cent above inflation.

When I came here, the then Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, answered my first question in the House by saying: "We cannot bring down the interest rates", which were then floating up between 15 and 20 per cent. "We cannot bring them down until inflation comes down". He said that throughout the rest of the term of the Liberal government. I have been hearing it from beginning to end from the Tory government and it is false. The interest rates bear no relation in this case to inflation. They have usually been four to six points above the inflation rate, rather than one or two points. That spread, which places our interest rates above the United States, has caused half of our $400 million public debt.

Forty–four per cent of the debt, nearly all the rest, was caused by tax giveaways in the last 15 years to the richest corporations and to the richest individuals in the country. Some of it filtered down almost to the middle level but most of it went to the richest. For example, the capital gains tax which mostly went to real estate and investors not to some poor farmer or worker in the city selling his home.

Also, there is the business entertainment tax, $1 billion per year for things like a seat at a football or a baseball game with guests, or birthday parties with guests, some of whom included corporate representatives. Therefore, it was called a business expense and subsidized to 80 per cent by that billion dollars out of our federal funds.

There are other matters similar to that, but I will not go into it at great length. It is all there in the public record to be found. There was, for example, the dividend tax credit of $1 billion. There was interest deductibility for $750 million and so on and so forth. There were smaller amounts, but those are some of the big ones. It was those giveaways to the wealthy corporations, giveaways to wealthy individuals which ran the government deeper and deeper into debt while the programs that helped the vast majority of the Canadian people on low and middle incomes scarcely increased at all as a percentage of the economy of Canada.

There is also what has come to light recently, $5 billion or more that has been spent on contracting out work that is normally done by civil servants, a speech writer getting $700 a day, that sort of thing; a lawyer working for a fee for the government getting $840,000 in a year. That, of course, in many cases replaced work that would have been done by public servants of one or another group. While the government was reducing the number of public employees, it was paying not as much but more to get that work done by the people who were able to influence the government to give them contracts.

In fact, the government spent more on the contracted out work, over $5 billion, than it spent on the whole salary of the Public Service in Canada, which was $4.8 billion. It spent $200 million more paying other people to do the work than it spent on 150,000 public servants who are still on salary. It is the government's determination to milk the public treasury for the benefit of its friends, whether through tax giveaways to the corporations and rich people or through these fat contracts for work that could have been done and is often better done by the civil servants who are trained to do it and who have a conscience about how they do it.

What we have apparently—I cannot prove these details—looks as though it is a case of double dipping. The rich individuals and rich corporations whose tax rates were brought down, both the personal tax rate and the corporate taxes through all these tax giveaways, had money left over which no doubt many of them were able to lend to the Government of Canada at these lovely high interest rates. In other words, they got paid twice. They got paid once by the government when they gave them that tax giveaway, billions of dollars of tax giveaways. They got paid again when they invested in the government debt at an extortionate rate of interest to be paid by the taxpayers who were paying their taxes.

My suggestion, if the government is serious about actually filling this fund and not just putting it out as propaganda, is that it could very easily recover a large amount of that fund if it would send a letter to those corporations, to those individuals who received those billions of dollars in total of tax benefits and say: "Look friend, we helped you out. We are in difficulty now. Will you help us out by donating back to the government the taxes that you ought to have paid, but from which the government excused you", and the interest rate which was extortionately high. "You businessmen know that it was extortionately high, you were feeding on a gravy train, and now the people of Canada and the Government of Canada need that money. We will not charge you interest on what you held over the years and should have paid in morally, politically, socially, and economically. We will not penalize you for damaging this country's economy by persuading your cocktail pals in the government to rig the tax system so that the burden fell on the poor and the middle". There were thousands of individuals and corporations paying no tax at all. Even banks, some years, made $200 million or $300 million profit but paid no tax.

We are not asking them to pay a penalty for what they did. What they did was legal, but we are asking them in the name of the need of Canada, the need of the Canadian economy, to give back that money. It would go quite a distance, if not all the way, toward removing this year's deficit. If the government then restored the taxation, even if it restored it to the taxation level for the rich that was the case in 1984 without going back to 1974, because these tax grabs were given both by the Liberals and the Tories, if the Tory government only went back to 1984 and started taxing those people at the level they should have been taxed at, we would see our deficit declining year by year.

That is my suggestion. If the government wants to convince us that this bill is not a fraud, a scam, an attempt to propagandize and browbeat, and blame the majority of people in the country who are the victims of this recession and the victims of this tax scam for 15 years, if it really wants people to believe it is asking to get that debt reduced, that debt that is so profitable for many of the wealthiest people in Canada, that it really plans to reduce that debt, then it could ask those rich corporations and rich individuals to give back the money that the government originally excused them from giving.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Trinity–Spadina for a very astute analysis of the situation which the treasury of our nation has found itself involved in and also a very astute analysis of the government's rationalization for trying to get out of it and blame and put the burden on those who are absolutely blameless insofar as trying to reduce the national debt or the annual deficit.

I am not sure if the hon. member pointed out that under successive governments, Liberal and Conservative, as demonstrated by the Stats Canada study which was done pointed out, 44 per cent of the debt which this country has accumulated is directly attributable to tax concessions to the wealthy, which includes individuals of course and corporations, directly attributable to that, 44 per cent.

Another 50 per cent is attributable to the high interest rate which can be laid at the doorstep again of successive Liberal and Conservative governments. There is no doubt whatsoever that this present government was tardy in bringing the interest rates down to a level which was commensurate with the ability of this nation to be able to sustain and was tremendously damaging thereby.

The Stats Canada study also found that a mere 6 per cent of $400 billion, a pittance in the whole scheme of $400 billion, was directly attributable to living beyond our means.

Yet, if we listen to successive finance ministers of this present government, they have tried to make Canadians believe that they are directly responsible for this by living beyond their means. Of course what they are implying is that we have to cut back on social programs. That is the context in which they put every criticism of the financial destitution of this country.

What has happened is that it has led Canadians to feel guilty about going to their doctors, and medicare is a social program. It has made Canadians feel guilty, as if there was not enough self-imposed guilt, for being unemployed. They make Canadians feel guilty for being on welfare or social assistance. Those programs account for a mere 6 per cent of our federal debt, through absolutely no fault at all of those people who go and see the doctor, no fault at all of those who become unemployed and certainly no fault of those on social welfare.

We have heard a lot within the last couple of days about children. My leader today referred again to children, for the second successive day, in the lead-off questions from my party. Fifty per cent of the people receiving welfare in this country are children. Yet this government says that those children ought to feel guilty for having been so irresponsible as to have to go on welfare, to receive public programs. By implication it implies that 50 per cent of the people receiving welfare who are children ought to be guilty and feel guilty for receiving that money from the public purse.

I would like to ask the hon. member from Trinity—Spadina whether or not there are many people in his constituency who would agree with what he and what I have said. Perhpas he can give us some examples of people who are suffering at the hands of this government and perhaps are even compelled to feel guilty, through no fault of their own, by programs which this government has foisted upon Canadian people.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for reinforcing what I was saying about the general origins of the $400 billion national debt. He has asked about examples, perhaps from Trinity—Spadina.

I have been talking this summer with a number of people who have been thrown into unemployment by termination, not layoff, in plants that have been closed very often directly and solely due to the free trade agreement with the United States. Sometimes, in the opinion of those workers when I talked with them, they blamed it on the GST and the high tax. That is why their little firms, firms with maybe 50 or so people making clothing, closed down forever, permanently, because of the GST and the high Canadian dollar and the high Canadian interest rate.

It is all one package by this government for the same purpose, to weaken the power of working people and to strengthen the power of multinational corporations, whether they be American, Canadian or Mexican. It is all part of a package.

I want to give a few contrasts which people in my riding are noticing. The government increased unemployment insurance premiums by $180 a year for each Canadian worker, but it increased also the more than $2 billion capital gains tax exemption for Canada's wealthy. It cut $340 million in social assistance funding that goes to Canada's poorest, but it kept the $1 billion subsidy to business entertainment expenses. This is the government that is trying to cut expenses? Give me a break.

This government cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy for retraining workers, but it kept the billion dollar manufacturing and processing tax credit. It reduced support for social housing by $32 million, but it kept the billion dollar dividend tax credit. Those are the giveaways to the rich, while it was taking from the poor, upside down Robin Hood. That is what this government has done. That is why this country is in financial trouble. All except the richest. They are doing just fine.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as I have been listening to this debate over the last two days, I have been struggling to find anything good about why we are taking the time to do this, in light of the fact that there seems to be so many other important issues pressing us in terms of the country today.

It sort of dawned on me as I listened today that the one benefit of debating this bill is that it gives all of us in this country and this House the opportunity to review the tax policy of this government since it took office.

When the member for Etobicoke Centre took office, he promised comprehensive tax reform. I do not think that there would be anyone in this country who would agree that he has achieved any kind of comprehensive tax reform.

Comprehensive tax reform has to meet certain tests. One of those three tests would be simplicity. We certainly cannot say that anything he has done on tax reform is simplicity. We will remember that he did take over a tax regime that had been built up for many years. He did have a big challenge in front of him.

When most Canadians actually take a look at the Income Tax Act of Canada, they are horrified—15,000 pages of rules, regulations, exceptions, exceptions to exceptions. Even the best tax lawyers and the best tax accountants in this country say that they have a difficult time following the Income Tax Act of Canada. He had a chance to simplify the tax system and he did not achieve that.

The second test is fairness. That is where I think the government is really boxed in because without fairness in the tax system there can be no productivity. In fact, without fairness in the tax system, there is basically a system that is a disincentive to productivity. Because he did not simplify and put a fair income tax system in place, he has even exacerbated that problem by bringing along the GST which even amplifies the fact that the whole tax regime is not fair.

The third test is efficiency. There is no way that anyone would say that this government has done anything which even resembles efficiency which it comes to the tax regime, whether it is on the income side or on the GST side. That is where we have a problem in this country.

As I was walking the streets of my riding this summer in downtown Toronto, the east side of downtown Toronto, Queen Street or the Danforth, yes, there are a lot of concerns in the country today in terms of the environment and national unity. But one of the biggest complaints I heard from my constituents, and I know most other members have heard it well, was: "Taxes are killing me. The taxes in this country are causing me to consider whether or not I even want to stay and do business in this country".

People are losing their sense of drive. They look around and they see that the harder they work the more taxed they become when it should be the reverse. The harder they work, there should be a system whereby they are rewarded for that work rather than punished.

That is where I think this government has really failed.

• (1430)

It is not as if we on this side of the House or we in the Liberal Party are not concerned with the deficit and the debt. We are concerned about the deficit and the debt.

There is one thing that we do realize, that is in order to attack that deficit and debt the most important thing is to make sure that the human capital in this country believes that it is being treated fairly.

When we have a tax system where just three years ago there were close to 8,000 Canadians who made in excess of $250,000 a year and who through legal loopholes in our current tax system did not pay any income tax, that is not perceived fairness. Three years ago we had over 2,200 corporations with retained earnings in excess of $25 million and did not pay any tax at all either.

What we have is a situation where people feel that they are not being treated fairly. When people do not feel like they are being treated fairly, that affects productivity. That has to be one of our biggest preoccupations today as a country.

Canadians want to be global traders. They want to be internationally competitive, but it is incumbent on all of us in this House who are legislators to create the environment that motivates our work force.

Is it a motivational plus when we are in the midst of a recession to hit people with the GST? Is it a motivation for small retailers, small restaurateurs, when times are tough as it is to hit them with all of the bureaucracy of the GST?

That is what is wrong with our country today. They have forgotten to treat the human capital of this country fairly. Unless they start going back to that human capital, unless they start listening to what is really bugging people, what is causing people to feel so low, I think the problem we have in this country is going to continue. We are not going to get out of this deficit and debt situation.

I do not share the view of the Conservative government that the way to attack the deficit and the debt is by dismantling. Government by retreat, government by dismantling programs and services, government by just selling off Crown corporations for quick cash, that is not the way to do it.

I am absolutely supportive of the government when it tries to look for ways to eliminate waste and make our Crown corporations more efficient. Anybody who would not agree with that would be nuts.

This is a government that is not using the creative process. It is not encouraging the creative process. It is not trying to figure out ways to get productivity into this country. It is not a government that is trying to stimulate entrepreneurship.

I have heard members of the Conservative Party today ask us on this side of the House what we would do to try to reduce the deficit and the debt of this country. It seems to me that one of the things that we are going to need is lots of foreign capital in this country, if we are going to attack the problems that we have in terms of reducing the deficit and debt.

Before foreign capital makes its investment, it looks at the working environment. It looks to see if there is a productive labour force. It looks to see if it is a happy, motivated labour force. If foreign capital sees that that condition exists, large pools of capital will move to our country.

We are hearing it from every economist right across the world. We have an amber light right now on investing in this country. I suggest that one of the reasons we have those amber lights is because they are concerned about our productivity. They are concerned as to whether or not we have a motivated work force.

The only instrument that this Parliament has to motivate the work force of this country is our tax system. I would bet you, Madam Speaker, and I would bet anyone in this House, that if we had a simple, fair, efficient tax system the productivity levels in this country would increase dramatically. That productivity will send a signal to foreign investors.

What happens when foreign investors come here and bring those large pools of capital and put them in financial institutions and put them in sectors of our economy that need help? They compete to put that money out into the market and that is what puts downward pressure on interest rates. Those pools of capital will put downward pressure on interest rates. When downward pressure on interest rates is there, what does that effect? It effects the attitude that bankers have toward entrepreneurs. Small business loans are more readily available. Mortgages on homes are lower. That, in turn, leads to a quality of life, an attitude which is so desperately lacking in this country today.

I daresay that if that condition existed, where our motivated work force was there, foreign capital, as a result of seeing that we have that asset, that human capital turned in the right direction, then all of a sudden costs of goods would be lower and exports would be higher. All of these things will come together. But we are starting backwards in this thing.

The Conservative government right now expects the morale of this country to be totally indifferent to the 32 tax increases that it has imposed upon it during the last seven years; 32 tax increases plus a poorly designed GST. I am totally opposed to the GST, but I could actually see a situation, if we had a fair, simple, personal and corporate income tax system, of Canadians reacting to a GST in a positive way if it was a well-designed GST. This GST is a nightmare. It is cruel.

In my riding, I have over 300 restaurants and 150 of them have patios. There are a lot of very small breakfast restaurants. Do you know what they do in my riding right now, Madam Speaker? In the old days people would go for breakfast three or four at a time in the early morning or on a Saturday. One week one person would pay and the following week another person would pay. It would be one bill for the waitress. Now, do you know what they do? They all ask for individual bills to avoid the GST. Do you know what a nightmare that is for a small restaurant where the average bill for bacon and eggs and homefries might be about $3.25 or something like that, when instead of making up one bill for three or four people everybody wants an individual bill? Madam Speaker, it is nuts. It is not fair, it is a disincentive to productivity, it hurts the morale of this country and it hurts the attitude. There is no way that anyone on the Conservative side of this House could ever argue this. I believe they are sensitive to it, but somehow they have just swept it under the table. That leads to another point. When we have a tax system that is unfair, it leads to an underground economy. I am sure you realize, Madam Speaker, that the underground economy in this country is growing by billions of dollars.

There is a Professor W. E. Diewart at the University of British Columbia who has spent many years of his life studying the underground economy in this country. Do you know, there are estimates right now that the underground economy in this country is running between $50 and $80 billion? Most of that economy is there because people believe that the current system is not fair. The favourite trick is someone will come around to your house and says: "I tell you what, this paint job on your home would normally be maybe $3,000, but because this government is gouging us with the GST and it is not fair, and you agree it is not fair, I tell you what I will do, I will reduce the cost to about maybe $1,500 or $1,800 cash. And what will happen is that you don't have to pay the tax on the normal $3,000 but I get the break because you have given me the cash".

Madam Speaker, that is what a poorly designed GST does to the underground economy of this country. It is absolutely disastrous, and I can tell you— Excuse me, sir?

Mr. Brightwell: What about the income tax?

Mr. Mills: Well that is the point. That is what an underground economy is all about.

Mr. Brightwell: It's not all GST, that is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. Mills: You are absolutely correct. But my point is that it is not just the poorly designed GST, it is the entire tax system. It is not simple, it is not fair, it is inefficient, it is complex.

The central issue facing all of us in public life today is trust. There is no other issue. When I stand up here and plead with fellow colleagues in the House of Commons, I am not speaking as a Liberal. I know that I was part of a government that helped make this tax act complex, helped make it inefficient. That is not where I am coming from. I am coming from the fact that we have reached the end of the line. The morale of this country has never ever been this low, it has never ever been this tough out there, there has never been this much pain.

I think that it is now time for all of us put our heads together and really come out with a comprehensive tax reform that will ultimately effect the morale, the productivity, which will ultimately address that concern we all have, and that is eliminating the deficit and the debt of this country.

In closing I want to say that this bill is—I don't know what to call it—smoke and mirrors. There is absolutely no useful exercise in having this bill. If you want to credit a tax and the revenue that it is bringing in, why don't we have deficit reduction funds from the small business taxes that we collect in this country? Why don't we have the senior citizens' deficit reduction plan for all the taxes they bring in? Why are you trying to give this GST some special fund classification? Why not give credit to everyone in this country who is paying taxes? Why not give credit to those manufacturers who are no longer paying the manufacturers' sales tax, but maybe because they are more competitive are paying a higher corporate income tax rate, why not expose what they are bringing into the treasury?

I don't understand where the government is coming from. The member from Ontario earlier today referred to the fact that in the old days when we took in revenue it just went in to the general revenue fund. It is all the same balance sheet. It is the same set of books. Why create this special fund? It is a diversion. It means nothing. If we are going to go back to the point of trust, that is an action which decreases the trust factor of our government.

Therefore, I along with my colleagues will be supporting this bill as it goes to committee. As one member, I can tell you that when this bill comes back here for third reading, unless some miraculous thing happens in committee, there is absolutely no way I am going to support it. It is smoke and mirrors and it does not address the fundamentals. There is no way I am going to be anything other than crystal clear in opposing this poorly designed GST, which is a monster and a disincentive to the productivity of this nation at a time when, instead of getting kicked, we should be encouraged.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to what my colleague on the other side of the House had to say with regard to the debt servicing and reduction fund. I note he speaks with great care and sincerity.

The one thing I have to say is that the word "trust" is quite right. I really look forward to more trust and all of us here working together to rectify systems and policies. If you do have a more efficient and better way to run a GST or a tax system of this sort, I look forward to sitting on the committee with you, because I think these are the kinds of things we are all interested in.

We have never said it was perfect. What we did say was that the old manufacturers' sales tax was wrong and pointed out the difficulties we had in raising the funding from one industry that represented 20 or 22 per cent of all the economy of Canada. We were burdening one industry, 20 per cent of the economy, with $18 billion. We could not even sell our products abroad competitively. GATT rules one way and you move into a value added tax or a GST which is accept by GATT.

By the way, it is interesting to note that the European market, as they move in 1992, make it mandatory that all their members have a type of a value added tax.

My colleague suggested that we are a government in retreat. I really take exception to that. I do not think this is a government in retreat. In fact, I think we have made many bold moves that are not popular with the people but, indeed, are right for Canada. The first thing was getting rid of the National Energy Program, which really devastated the province I come from. It was the first major move. Free trade is necessary if we are going to compete globally. Life has changed and all international trading has changed so much that, indeed, it is going to be one area that will force Canadians to become more competitive.

Deregulation is another area we moved in and is an area I support. Fear did cause a great number of problems in the country. I am pleased to note that Investment Canada has made a great deal of progress.

I believe you were referring directly to privatization and, indeed, I support the privatizations we have made and really look forward to completing more of them.

You talked about foreign capital, and you are right. Foreign capital can really create the environment for our labour force. But the labour force has to be good. It is part of the stability of this country, with the infrastructure and with the governments.

We do need a tax system to motivate. I know you have spent a great deal of time and energy with regard to a flat tax, which is one way to go.

• (1450)

I happen to believe it is the fairest way to go. We should treat everybody equally with no write-offs and no deductions. I would pro-rate it according to gross income because we should be helping the lower income people and maybe asking the high income earners to contribute a bit more.

As for debt servicing and reduction from the GST, it replaced the manufacturers' sales tax and will be one of the strong support systems in getting the deficit down. When we get that down, we can lower taxes.

I agree that we have to lower personal income tax to create the incentive. Which route would the member take to lower the income tax rate without doing what we are doing to get it down? I believe in our philosophy and I have been here since 1984. We have to reduce the deficit and the debt and we cannot increase taxes. I am not sure the member gave me the direction for us to go.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the member for Calgary Southwest.

First of all, not one of the European Common Market countries has a two-tiered value-added system. They all have single-tiered systems. The bottom line is that we have a two-tiered system, different from most of those countries. However, let us not get distracted by that because the other question was a more relevant question.

I want to address the retreat from governance. I really cannot figure out what the member meant by saying the government is not retreating. This government has retreated from its national responsibilities on a list of issues so long I could probably spend the rest of the day talking about it.

This central government is so decentralized that the provinces of this country are now running this town. I just have a philosophical disagreement with you. I happen to believe in a strong national government.

An hon. member: You are a socialist.

Mr. Mills: I am a socialist. Can you imagine the member from Calgary calling me a socialist?

An hon. member: I cannot believe it.

Mr. Mills: I cannot believe it. Thank you very much. That really helps a lot in Broadview—Greenwood. Would you say again that I am a socialist? Not too many people in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood think I am a socialist.

I think Investment Canada has not done such a great job, actually. I used to be a big fan of Investment Canada, but I think it needs to be recharged with man-years and more money. Right now we need so much foreign capital that I would plead with the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology to quadruple its budget so that it can go out and hustle foreign investment.

I am not going to argue about FIRA and Investment Canada. I like to have controls on things. I do not like people coming in here and buying things up holus bolus without us having some say in it.

I want to make one last point. I have talked about dismantling and giving away. The member mentioned free trade and gave me sort of a low ball there. If the member could prove to me with clarity that our water was not included in the free trade deal then I would probably shift my attitude on the free trade agreement slightly.

I am telling the member right now that this government has given away water. I swear by it. There is absolutely no way.

I want to answer the member's last question. I believe that—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mills: What was that, minister from Fergus, where your farmers are going dry right now and you need water but we have given it away to the Americans?

My point about tax reform is that I would go to the human capital and turn it on before I would stick it to them with the GST. That is just a fundamental difference.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I was recently in British Columbia.

Do you know what they are calling Canadians in Bellingham, Washington these days? They are calling us "cheese heads". Do you know why they are calling us cheese heads?

An hon. member: No, why?

Mr. Kilgour: Because thousands upon thousands of lower mainland residents are driving down to Bellis Fare near Bellingham in Washington State to buy cheese and every other product under the sun. The label that stuck is cheese heads. I am told before we had the GST there was a great deal less of this traffic going back and forth across the border.

I remind the hon. member of that because I know that the member for Calgary Southwest is in favour of whatever Uncle Sam says in Washington. Why is it that even Ronald Reagan did not bring in a sales tax similar to the one we have?

I have to ask a question of my colleague—

Madam Deputy Speaker: You do have to ask a question because the time has expired. After the question there will be a short answer.

Mr. Kilgour: I talked to a member infinitely less partisan than I am about the government which has more underestimated the intelligence of Canadians than any other in history.

Would he favour some type of sales tax, for example, that might apply at the end of the year to manufacturers' sales based on sales without having to go through every layer of the system? Does he think that would be an improvement over the GST, as they do in Washington State? They simply tell manufacturing company x that at the end of the year they have to send a cheque for 1.25 per cent of their sales, the same as the GST.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, that is a great question. It is a complex question. I cannot answer it in the time I have left. I have a colleague about to speak. Stay tuned for the next round and we will address it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Who says there cannot be good civilized fun debate in the House of Commons on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, Bill C–28 is an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada. They call the act the debt servicing reduction account or reduction act.

What an insult to the intelligence of Canadians.

I will refer to one scenario. Mrs. Smith has an account in a bank and she earned $10,000 a year. Her expenditures exceed the amount of revenues. Whether Mr. and Mrs. Smith have one account, two accounts, or three accounts, the bottom line is that she has a deficit at the end of the year.

If the government sets up this account and goes to it on an annual basis to borrow from it then the account would become redundant. If the government were to set up the account and go outside to borrow without taking from this account then it will pay unduly high interest rates on money it probably already has in an account.

Again, it does not make any sense at all.

I have spoken to a number of accountants, those who are chartered, those who are not chartered, and they all agree that this act is a public relations gimmick. The reason it is a gimmick is because in their minds, whether the Minister of Finance or the cabinet or the government in general, they thought they could respond to the public cynicism with something that might attract some support or some attention by saying that all of the revenues from the GST would be put toward the deficit reduction.

That is simply because a lot of people we spoke to in the past couple of years, vis–à–vis the GST, said that if their money was going toward the reduction of the deficit they would have no problem with it. Rightly so, but that is not the case simply because there is an existing deficit in excess of about $28 billion every year.

Regardless of the surplus, whether from the sale of a Crown corporation, gifts to the Crown, revenue from the GST, whether the government wants it or not, that money indirectly is going toward the general revenues. The government can call it account a, b, c, d, but in general terms they are still general revenues.

At the end of the year there could be a million accounts and still be a deficit. It is deficit. I do not understand for the life of me why the government is trying again to mislead the public with the enactment of an account. It is misleading. The hon. member knows from the figures of the Minister of Finance this account will not even be functional until 1996, simply because we are in the position of a deficit between now and 1996.

There is no such thing as servicing the debt because the over–all revenues are going to go to the account which is whatever you want to call it. You have on the balance sheet a deficit, whether it is $1 or $28 billion. I would ask the hon. member to review the finance department information sheet, which clearly states that between now and 1995–96, we are in a deficit position. If that is the case, why are we—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but it being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of

INCOME TAX ACT

INCOME AVERAGING

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose income may fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

He said: Madam Speaker, this motion I believe is of interest to a great many members of Parliament who will have been receiving correspondence, had calls at their offices and have been stopped in the streets as this particular part of the tax reform package that has been ongoing has come into place.

The background is that the government set out in a tax reform paper in June 1987 its intention to remove the block averaging provision that existed at that time in the Income Tax Act and in fact still exists and will until the end of 1991.

If the House can persuade the government to change its position with regard to block averaging, there will not be a hiatus between tax years so that the tax application will continue to be run in an even-handed manner, if we can persuade the government to change it for the 1992 tax year.

The people who are affected tend to be people whose incomes fluctuate wildly. I am going to be directing most of my remarks to the effects that this policy change has on farmers. It is equally difficult for people who are in the business of entertainment, artists, professional athletes, writers, real estate people, sales people, freelancers, consultants, as well as farmers, ranchers and fishermen. In short, the proposed changes affect anyone who has the likelihood of a very large income one year and then several years of almost zero or very small incomes.

The provision of the Income Tax Act which used to permit five-year block averaging, as it is known in the agricultural community, permitted you to average out the incomes for those five years and pay the tax according to the tax bracket that you would fall into with that averaging.

The government in its White Paper argued because they were changing the tax brackets, reducing the amount and making the steps somewhat smaller that it was not going to hurt anyone to be caught in a higher tax bracket one year versus a much lower one in following years.

When you add in the effect of provincial tax, it still makes a difference in most provinces of about 18 percentage points when you move from one bracket into one of the higher ones. So it is still something of great concern.

At any rate, I digress. I was telling you the background to the proposal which, as I said, began with the 1987 tax reform paper. It was subsequently put into place through a Ways and Means Motion in 1988. We will still be able to have an effect on continued tax policy if we can convince the government before the end of 1991 that it should continue with this.

The government said it really was not a terribly important thing because only 3 per cent or 4 per cent of farmers and ranchers used it, but I will present some actual cases that show that for those five or six it can create very real hardship by not having that option available to them.

The advisers to the department I think engaged in some very creative means of accounting. I have not been able to produce the results that they published which showed their estimate of the effects. I cannot find any other people in the tax field or any other economists who can generate the high figures that they have to show how much money the government thinks it is losing through the averaging provisions. Any realistic view, using the government's own data, does not generate the amounts of money it says it would lose if it continues to have five-year averaging.

The government came up with figures that approach $100 million. Yet, when you look at the fine print of the studies they have done, it is probably only somewhere between $8 million and $17 million of those figures that actually apply to block averaging. So the numbers that are put out as information are, I think, exaggerated badly.

Along with the proposal to do away with five-year averaging, we had a proposal which is being implemented. It would force farmers wanting to use the remains of the block averaging to also include inventory in that year's income, which again skews things quite badly.

I would just say as an aside that the arguments that the people who advise the government brought out for collecting extra money due to the move to including inventories as income each year, have also, I think, been sadly over-estimated. Farmers and fishermen have been on a straight cash accounting method. They can file income tax on the basis of how much cash was taken in and how much cash was spent during the year. If they intend to use any of the loss provisions or averaging provisions, they have to start including inventory. The government estimates that as they switch inventories into the calculations that there will be more tax collected. Yet, anyone who is active in the field of farm accounting and tax consulting says that if there is any advantage to the government in collecting more taxes, it would only occur in the first year and after that there is no more advantage. The amounts that the tax people presented to Finance, which made the decision based on those figures, were extremely optimistic, to say the least.

At any rate, the farm groups and some individual farmers have been quite vocal about the effects of this change. I wanted to put on the record briefly a few of the comments that accompanied the announcement in 1988. We had, for instance, the Alberta Wheat Pool which noted that "These income averaging provisions were originally allowed by the governments as a recognition of the cyclical nature of the agriculture industry, where incomes often fluctuate considerably from one year to the next. As the industry has not changed in this regard, Alberta Pool firmly believes that these averaging provisions should be retained for farmers and that the livestock inventory provision should be extended to non-livestock inventory, including crop production".

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture said: "Net farm income is subject to very large year to year swings. There are currently provisions in the Income Tax Act that are designed to deal with these factors. These provisions are very important and their continuance is strongly supported by farmers. Five-year block averaging is one of these provisions".

With this motion I am urging members of the House to support a review of the government's intention to do away with the five-year block averaging provision and to make it a continuing process so that there is no lapse in the program in the tax year beginning in 1992.

There were other groups as well which had things to say about the proposed loss of the block averaging system. The rural and municipal associations of the three prairie provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, say: "The five-year block averaging provisions were originally introduced into the Income Tax Act in recognition of the cyclical nature of the farming and fishing industries. One or two years of prosperity is often followed by years of distress. Despite the reduction of personal income tax rates proposed in the white paper, farmers require relief from the imposition of high tax rates in good years. Such high tax rates ignore the fact that farmers must be able to set aside some of their cash flow in good years for the years when the cash flow is reduced or non-existent. The five-year block averaging provisions are heavily relied upon by farmers and their removal would be a crippling blow to the industry".

Even one of the farm groups which has aligned itself traditionally very closely to the Conservative Party, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers, had this to say: "Farmers require the relief offered by the ability to block average income. Under the cash method of accounting, farm income shows a great deal of volatility. Under the accrual system," which I might point out is the system of including inventories which the government is proposing that farmers now switch to, "there is even more volatility. The impact of this could be to thrust farmers into the situation of wide income fluctuations between marginal tax brackets and consequently a higher tax burden than should be applicable. The rationale in the tax reform 1987 paper is that with reduced brackets and only 12 per cent spread between the highest and the lowest there is no need for block averaging. When provincial taxes are added the spread becomes 18 per cent and in many cases this could amount to a significant tax payable".

There are other tax problems that are accentuated by the government's intention to get out of the block averaging situation. I would like to just present, in the minutes that I have left, some cases that have come to my attention.

In the current economic recession that farmers in my province have been in for some time, the inability to five-year average becomes even more crucial. For instance, one of my constituents gave up land because he was pressured by his creditors and received a $30,000 debt write down from his bank. Under section 80 of the Income Tax Act, his non-capital losses of preceding years wiped out any gain on the debt and he may in fact eventually have to pay tax on the full writedown that the bank gave him. In other words, the bank wrote off $30,000 worth of debt and said it could not be collected. They wrote it off but the income tax department, through section 80, may in fact still want to collect taxes on that because it considers that the writedown was income and wants its tax on that income even though he never saw it.

Several other producers are being assessed because of paper profits as well. For instance, one producer had to declare a capital gain after he transferred land to the bank, because the land had been purchased at a lower price many years ago than what the bank took it back at. Since his paper income is now over $50,000 because of the paper transaction of the new value of the land, he is subject to the clawback provisions and has to repay his family's tax allowance and child tax credit advances.

In other words, the man did not get any money for his land, but in the process of taking it back on him the bank showed the recovery value as more than what he had originally paid for it. The difference was considered to be a capital gain and that was applied against his income. The man has no money and needed those child tax credits and the family allowances. He in fact had spent the money and is now being asked to go find money to pay taxes on that because under section 80 of the Income Tax Act he is required to consider that as income. If this continues there is no way that he could even use the averaging provisions to get out of this, if we had a similar case in the future after block averaging is no longer available.

I have a similar case. A man was losing his farm. These things in my province take a couple of years of process because of the provincial laws that we have. We have had them in effect ever since 1944. He had actually gone out to work one winter to raise some money to keep his family alive. He had worked for eight or ten months and then the job played out because he was working in the far north and when it starts to melt they lay everybody off. He went on unemployment insurance because he had no money coming in from the farm. It was in process, the bank was in the process of taking it over.

When his tax year was finally finished and the disposal of the land had occurred, the department said that he had a taxable capital gain and his taxable income was considered to be above $44,000, even though his real cash income, cash in, cash out, the amount of money that he had to work with, was in fact $27,000. Since this occurred in 1988 he was able to average his income due to the phasing in period. It helped him avoid the minimum tax. However, he was forced to pay back $4,269 on the unemployment insurance benefits he had received.

There was a clawback because it was construed that even with averaging his income had exceeded $44,000, even though in reality his family had $27,000 before tax to spend simply because of the application of capital gains to the disposal of assets as banks and credit institutions move in and reclaim farm land.

I raise this along with the issue of five-year averaging, because we are entering a period when farm debt continues to be high, the prospect of farmers facing foreclosures is increased in the coming year. All projections point to that. If we lose the ability to use five-year averaging, the inequity that will be visited upon these people who are now finding themselves in 1992 and beyond facing farm foreclosures will be even greater than the inequity that I have just outlined here. The five year averaging did allow these people to mitigate their circumstances a little bit. I believe this provision should be continued, and I urge the hon. members to support my motion to have the government revisit the question with a view to continuing five year averaging after it would have been phased out at the end of this tax year.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on Motion No. 81, presented by the member for Mackenzie. The motion is to consider the advisability of reintroducing amendments to the Income Tax Act to allow some form of averaging.

One of the fundamental principles of our income tax system is that the tax burdens of Canadians should reflect their ability to pay. In other words, the proportion of the income paid in tax should increase with income. This is achieved mainly through a progressive tax rate structure with tax rates ranging from 17 to 29 per cent, as was alluded to by the hon. member.

Another fundamental principle is that ability to pay is measured on the basis of income earned or received in a year. Only in a very few cases, such as the lifetime capital gains exemption and the cumulative net investment loss rules, are income and personal circumstances of other years are taken into account.

When income of individuals fluctuates significantly from year to year, the total of the income taxes they pay over several years may be greater than if their income stream has been more constant over that period. This is because in those years when incomes were high, they are subject to higher marginal tax rates and thus pay a greater proportion of their income in tax. In such circumstances, averaging the income over a number of years would result in lower taxes each year, thus lowering the total tax burden over the period.

An understanding of the underlying objective of averaging measures is essential in considering the need for the reintroduction of explicit averaging measures such as those referred to by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Equally crucial, however, is an understanding of the circumstances that may result in an individual's income fluctuating over a lifetime. Specifically, who is most subject to those fluctuations, in what circumstances and how does the tax system currently treat those individuals.

It is not my intention to review all of the circumstances in which Canadians may experience large year over year changes in their incomes. The hon. member has referred to farmers. Madam Speaker, you may be more familiar with the fluctuations in the incomes of artists or performers.

However, I believe that most would agree that retirement is the most frequent and significant cause of such a change. At retirement the vast majority of Canadians experience a reduction in their incomes.

I would like to take this opportunity to remind members of the existing tax assisted measures for retirement saving and the improvement to the system adopted by this House last summer as part of a major series of pension reforms that have been introduced in recent years. All are aimed at improving the income security for Canadians in retirement.

Tax assistance for retirement pensions is based on a simple principle. Within limits, amounts set aside for retirement should not be taxed when saved, but rather when received as pension income. Thus, tax assistance for pensions allows averaging of income between higher income years when an individual is working, is employed and low income year of retirement. The benefits of this averaging are compounded by the fact that the investment income earned on retirement savings is not taxed until income is paid out after retirement. The result is a significant reduction in the over–all tax burden to retired individuals.

These tax advantages are extremely important in providing income security for Canadians in retirement. They also represent costs to the federal and provincial governments.

For the federal government, these advantages to individuals amount to $5 or $6 billion a year and for the provinces, an additional $3 billion a year.

I noticed last year this House adopted changes which improved tax assistance for retirement. These changes had two key objectives; to increase the fairness of the system and to make it more flexible.

To increase fairness, the new system established uniform limits on the tax assistance for all Canadians. The benefits are now the same whether a pension saving is measured in terms of contributions or promised benefits and whether it takes place in one plan or more than one. Over a career the new limits will allow individuals to save, free of tax, amounts sufficient to provide annual retirement income amounting to 60 to 70 per cent of what they earned before retiring

In fact, these measures allow Canadians to average their incomes between active and retirement years to benefit from the associated reduction in tax.

To increase the flexibility of the system, last year's reform also introduced a new carry forward provision. As we know, it is not always possible to put aside a set proportion of earnings for retirement each year. Circumstances such as a temporary reduction in income, purchase of big ticket items or unforeseen expenditures may prevent individuals from saving as much as they would like through tax assisted retirement saving vehicles. Prior to these reforms, the unused contribution room was lost if that room was not used in a given year. However, the enactment of these changes to the Income Tax Act means that taxpayers are now able to carry forward unused deductions for up to seven years.

Many Canadians, especially those starting out in employment or facing fluctuations in earnings for any reason, will find the new carry over provisions of unused RRSP contribution room a great advantage. Similarly, the flexibility for those who lose or change jobs will help them maintain their pension savings.

The new higher contribution limit to the RRSP—$15,500 in 1995—will be of particular benefit to self-employed individuals. Farmers, for example, will be able to mitigate the tax consequences of year by year fluctuations in their incomes while at the same time saving for retirement.

In closing, I would like to stress that as a result of the changes adopted last year, the system of tax assistance for retirement saving is second to none in the world. It provides millions of Canadians with the opportunity to provide equally and adequately for themselves in their retirement. It also provides all Canadians, including those with large year over year fluctuations in incomes a vehicle through which they can average their incomes over their lifetime and benefit from the associated reduction in their tax burden.

I think it is clear, Madam Speaker, that the objective set out in Motion 81 is largely met by the current tax assistance system for retirement savings embodied in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to salute the member for Mackenzie as well. At least, I think the member for Calgary Southeast was saluting the member for Mackenzie.

The sophistry, Madam Speaker, that we just heard from the member, and I say this with respect, having known the member for a long time, but I think I detected a speech that was being read, rather than being given spontaneously, but I was too polite on a Friday afternoon to get up and ask him to stop reading a speech that no doubt he prepared, rather than somebody in the Department of Finance.

I would like to pick up a thread that was made, I think, yesterday by a member. Right now the average farmer in Canada produces food for about 95 to 100 Canadians. At the same time, since most farmers are men, his spouse has to go off the farm to earn money to feed the family on the farm. That, Madam Speaker, is a catastrophe. I am sure it is the case in Quebec, but I know it is the case in parts of Alberta, throughout Saskatchewan and throughout Manitoba and throughout much of Ontario.

I think it is in that spirit that the member for Mackenzie has put the motion. We simply have to do something to help farm families who are not going to be here too many years if we do not do things like this proposal to help them.

You probably saw, Madam speaker, the Canadian Press report that came out earlier this week saying that family incomes from 1980 to 1988 have gone down in Canada, down after taxes from $40,200 to $40,000. I might point out too, Madam Speaker, that the share of after tax income going to the 10 per cent of families with the highest incomes rose to 22.4 per cent from 21 per cent in that period, while the share going to the lowest 10 per cent of Canadians also increased to 2.9 per cent from 2.5 per cent.

The 32, 33, or 34 tax increases we have had from those opposite have obviously had a significant effect on the plight of the Canadian family, including of course, farm families. The fact that people in parts of Canada are suffering enormously through the various policies of the government, including high interest rates, higher and higher taxes on middle and low income Canadians, is something I think should disturb everyone in this House.

Madam Speaker, I would refer you, if I could, to another matter that recently came up, which was a statement by Statistics Canada in June that 58 per cent of married Canadians have less disposable income after taxes than if they lived in a common law relationship. I believe most members would agree that marriage should be encouraged by any prudent national government and not penalized as it is now in our country.

Tax reform, as we heard from the member for Broadview—Greenwood today should mean—and I think he means—moving some of the present burden away from those who cannot afford to pay more and more taxes, middle and low income Canadians, to those who can, successful firms and high income individuals.

As I said before, there have been 32 or 33 tax increases by this government since 1984. In closing I would simply say I hope that all members here—there are members here, Madam Speaker, in the House this afternoon—will see fit to vote for this motion when it comes for a vote, particularly because it will help the farmers in western Canada that the member for Mackenzie and I try to represent.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this afternoon to Motion No. 81 in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie, which concerns the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers will be able to average their income when it fluctuates over a certain number of years.

Before 1988, the Income Tax Act contained two provisions for averaging income over a number of years: forward averaging and block averaging. Both methods were based on complex calculations and allowed taxpayers whose income fluctuated substantially to average their income tax over a number of years.

More specifically, individuals whose income in a year exceeded 110 per cent of their average adjusted income of the preceding three years could chose to average the excess.

Averaged income was deductible in computing taxable income but gave rise to a special tax at the highest marginal rate of the year. In subsequent years, the averaged amount was brought back and taxed as regular income with a refundable credit provided at the top marginal rate. Furthermore, before 1988, individuals whose chief source of income was farming or fishing could average income from all sources over a five-year period. This provision involved a calculation whereby the taxpayer recalculated tax liability as if one-fifth of his or her total income over the period had been earned in each of the five years. An election to block average was made in the last year of the five-year period and reduced taxes payable in that year or resulted in a refund of taxes paid in the earlier years of the period.

As hon. members are aware, in 1988, the government proceeded with a reform of personal and corporate income tax. The purpose of personal income tax reform was to make Canada's tax system more equitable, strengthen our competitive position and stimulate growth and job creation.

The reform provided for lower tax rates and a broader tax base. The lower rates demanded by hon. members opposite stimulate employment and investment, which helps improve our standard of living.

A broader tax base, achieved by eliminating special tax benefits, makes our tax system less complex and more equitable, in addition to limiting opportunities for fiscal planning by mainly wealthy Canadians, something the hon. member for Mackenzie has always criticized.

So, starting in 1988, the old system with its 10 tax rates from 6 to 34 per cent was replaced by a three-rate structure: 17, 26 and 29 per cent. Another key element of this reform was the conversion of personal exemptions into often increased tax credits. Contrary to the exemptions, which tended to favour high-income earners—something the opposition always denounced—the credits are fairer in that they provide equal tax relief across the board. The third major change was the elimination or reduction of many tax benefits. For instance—and this affects businesses and business owners—tax deductions for business expenses such as meals and entertainment were considerably limited.

Because of the fewer tax rates and income brackets, the opportunity of the forward averaging provisions was called into question and eventually abolished as part of the tax reform. Income averaging has not been allowed since the 1988 tax year, while the averaging provisions relating to farm producers and fishermen do not apply to five-year periods starting after 1987. The averaged amounts deducted previously can be added to the year's income until 1997 and the taxpayer will remain eligible to a federal tax credit at the current marginal tax rate at that time.

Let us now examine, Madam Speaker, why it is that the new tax rates and the fewer income brackets resulting from the tax reform make the averaging provisions less relevant. Before the reform, there was a 28 percentage point difference between the lowest tax rate (6 per cent) and the highest (34 per cent). It was huge. Thus, there were huge variations in the tax paid by taxpayers whose income fluctuated from one year to the next. With the reform, the difference between the minimum (17 per cent) and maximum (29 per cent) tax rates was reduced to 12 percentage points. So, fluctuations in revenue are less likely to noticeably affect the tax burden.

Combined to the conversion of exemptions into tax credits, the fewer rates enhanced the fairness and progressive character of the tax system.

Doing away with the averaging provisions also helped simplify the system as well as compensate for the reduction in the number of tax rates.

While there are no averaging provisions in the current system, strictly speaking, income and tax can easily be deferred under other provisions.

More particularly, tax assistance for retirement savings has enabled taxpayers to spread their income over the years in which they earned it and those following their retirement. Tax assistance is based on the principle that retirement savings are taxed when they are withdrawn and not when they are accumulated. This means that someone who has a very large income today can obtain the maximum, as my colleague just explained, and enjoy it later, at the same time paying much less tax on it.

Therefore, contributions to registered retirement savings plans (RRSPs), registered retirement plans and deferred profit sharing plans are not taxable when they are paid. Similary, investment income in these plans is not taxed as it is earned. Retirement savings are taxable only when benefits are paid by the plan. For the great majority of taxpayers whose retirement income, and thus marginal tax rate, is lower, tax-assisted retirement savings are a good way to spread income and defer tax.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the limits on tax assistance for retirement savings were recently changed. The new regime that takes effect this year corrects all the shortcomings of the old system and gives Canadians fairer access to tax-assisted retirement savings. Before the reform, taxpayers whose employment situation was different did not enjoy the same level of tax assistance. More particularly, those whose employer did not provide a pension plan could not benefit from tax assistance in setting up an adequate retirement fund. Those with relatively modest pension plans could contribute more to an RRSP than taxpayers with a very good pension plan.

I believe this was a satisfactory response to the demands of our friends opposite who during the past few years have constantly asked for a fairer and more equitable system that would take more from the rich and give more to the poor. The tax reform does just that.

Because of the current limits, the number of tax planning measures available has tended to increase. Before, some taxpayers did not have access to appropriate tax assistance while others benefited to an extent that in some cases was downright outrageous.

The key element of the new system is this: A maximum of 18 per cent of income is eligible for tax-assisted retirement saving, regardless of the type of plan.

Thanks to deferral of the unused portion of RRSP contributions, the new system will be more flexible and allow taxpayers to adapt retirement savings contributions to their current and future financial needs.

This will be of particular interest to taxpayers whose income fluctuates. The new limits will eliminate the barriers that prevent many individuals from taking advantage of tax-assisted retirement saving. They promote autonomy and encourage people to save now for tomorrow's retirement.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the durable benefits of tax reform and the attractive prospect of income deferral offered by the new tax-assisted retirement saving system will respond more effectively to the needs of Canadians than would a number of complex averaging measures.

As you know Madam Speaker, in the past governments have been criticized for the unfair aspects of the system. The richer you were, the less taxes you paid, and the poorer you were, the more you paid. This tax reform helps to avoid the incredible differences that existed in the past. In fact, I am surprised the NDP member for Mackenzie should wish to reinstate a system that was abolished at their urgent request.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to salute the member for putting this motion forward on income averaging. I think, as you said earlier today Madam Speaker, this has been a good afternoon because we have been focusing on an issue which I think is priority one in this country. I salute the member who is bringing to the forefront an issue which is not only of concern to farmers.

In my riding, Broadview—Greenwood, which is downtown Toronto, there are many people in the motion picture industry, artists, and entertainers. This is an industry where it is either feast or famine, it can be a terrific year. It is the home of Degrassi Junior High, and we have many large film studios in the riding. This problem about income averaging is talked about all the time. We have many entertainers in our riding. Our riding is the home of Kim Mitchell, a Juno Award winner, who decided last year decided to do a lot of touring. He had exceptional success and a couple of good hits. Of course he had a balloon year in terms of his income, as Blue Rodeo, who are from my riding, did the year before.

This is an area where, not only farmers but also artists, really have to put a tight focus on income averaging. This goes back to the point that many of us in the House were making earlier, and that is fairness. Being an artist can be a tough, lonely grind. Quite often people go many years, thousands of hours, when they do not make anything. They work from hand to mouth, pay cheque to pay cheque. It is a very tough game. Then all of a sudden they have a successful year. It seems that the averaging concept is not really addressed.

I salute the hon. member for this. I hope that we can get this idea to a point where we can not only deal with it in a fair way but also in a simple and efficient way.

It has been a strange afternoon in terms of tax reform because things react so quickly in the country now with fax machines. As we were talking this afternoon about tax reform and fairness in the tax system, I received a fax from the Toronto Construction Association. It is pleading with all of us in this House, not only about averaging but also concerning the payroll deductions the minister has currently put forward in his latest budget and the fact that he is not allowing the provincial payroll tax to be deducted under the federal system.

The Toronto Construction Association, which is on its knees right now because of a lack of activity, is begging us in this House to plead with the minister and his officials in finance to review this situation. I will send over the letter from Mr. Roly Nicholls, the chairman of the board and vice-chairman of the Toronto Construction Association, and ask the minister to hear their plea concerning fairness for their sector.

It has been a constructive afternoon. I hope we can continue to put this hon. member's motion forward to the next stage.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Mackenzie for trying to get reinstated, starting next year, something that has long been of benefit to many thousands of farmers, fishermen and entertainers since the early 1950s.

When I was a station agent in a little prairie town in the 1950s and early 1960s, I did income tax returns for many farmers. In one year they would have a gross income of $10,000 or $12,000 and that would happen one, two or three years in a row, mainly because of low quotas and no boxcars and that sort of thing, or the quality of the crop. Then in 1952 we had a bumper high grade crop and incomes jumped up to $30,000, $40,000 to $50,000. The fact that they could average saved them thousands of dollars in income tax. In some of those years when they got little or no crop, they had to pay little or no income tax.

As a result of the very nature of agriculture, the fishery and the entertainment industry, incomes fluctuate wildly, from year to year to year. There is nothing new about that.

I listened to the minister of grains and oilseeds yesterday when he was responding to the NDP opposition day motion, again moved by my colleague the hon.

member for Mackenzie, in which he wept as many or more tears as anybody else in the House about the plight of agriculture and what a tough time farmers were having. He railed against the European Community and the American subsidies. He said: "We have got to do everything we can do".

Most of what he said none of us could disagree with. We have to do everything we can to ease the burden, no matter how small or large, on the agricultural industry.

While he was making his speech the government's law does away with five-year averaging for farmers, fishermen and entertainers. It does away with it. That is some way to help agriculture. Is that what he means by doing all we can do to help agriculture?

I had understood the government was going to call for third reading today on the bill concerning the At and East freight rates. However, there is some fuss being made about that in New Brunswick. There is an election on in New Brunswick so it has been put off. It will not be called until next week at the soonest.

• (1550)

The At and East freight rates have meant an up to $40 million a year benefit for grain producers. It meant a benefit to Saint John and Halifax in milling wheat and flour. It was a benefit to Halifax in feed grains.

Is this the way the government is going to do all it can to help agriculture? By doing away with the At and East freight rates? It is a benefit to both grain producers and the ports of Saint John and Halifax.

The terminal at Saint John has already closed down. It has been closed for a year. Is that what the minister means by "doing all we can to help agriculture". I think it happened a year and a half or two years ago. We had what was called a two-price system in which we charged ourselves—Canadians charged Canadians—anywhere from $6 to $10 a bushel for grain consumed in Canada for human consumption.

That was the one area where the farmer got his cost production and some profit. That meant up to $200 million a year for grain producers. What did the Tories do? The minister of grains and oilseeds just sat and took it. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture, who have been there and are prairie farmers, did not say a word.

There goes up to $200 million a year of benefit for western grain producers. Is that what the minister means by "doing all we can to help"? There is the bridge rate, the movement of grain by rail cars in the winter months from Thunder Bay east. That is no longer available.

Is that what the government means? Is that what the minister of grains and oilseeds means about doing all we can to help? I can recite a list of items as long as your arm that the government of this day has done over the last several years to hurt agriculture, and in particular the grain industry.

For example, freight rates. I remember the hon. member for Vegreville, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, and the then member for Swift Current—Maple Creek screaming just as loud as I did when the Liberals did away with the Crow rates. We fought that battle for three years against the Liberals.

The Tories take over and what do they do? They keep it. What has happened since the Tories came in? The freight charges for grain producers have gone up and up every year. Want to do something to help agriculture? Why not put a freeze on those freight rates? Why not say that there will be no increases until farmers are getting a price for their commodities that gives them the cost of production plus something to live on?

How about freezing those grain rates? How about keeping the At and East rates? How about restoring the two-price grain system? How about paying some of the storage costs in the terminal elevators in Vancouver, Thunder Bay, Prince Rupert and Churchill as the government used to do under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? How about it? This is not any big, multibillion dollar subsidy, because we cannot compete with the treasuries of the European community and the United States. We know that.

There are a host of smaller items that when together mean something to our agricultural community. I am particularly surprised and flabbergasted that rural members in the Conservative Party would accept this government measure and not demand a reinstatement of the five-year averaging provisions. I do not understand them. As one of my aboriginal friends said: "They speak with a forked tongue. They have a hot mouth and a cold heart". That speech yesterday by the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds was a classic example of the hot mouth and cold heart of the government. There is absolutely no reason why it cannot allow averaging. It is not as though it is going to mean an horrendous loss in tax revenue for the federal treasury; the amount it will cost will be infinitesimal compared to the current deficit alone.

My hon. colleague for Papineau and I believe the previous government speaker got into retirement plans and the benefits there are to this. I suggest to those gentlemen that they go into their ridings and see if they can find a farmer who has any money to put into a retirement plan. I don't have any in my riding. They took a 30 per cent cut in their grain prices this year. You won't let them average and you are telling them they have all these benefits of putting money into retirement savings, up to 18 per cent of their income. Hell's bells, 18 per cent of their income is all of the net income they have to pay for their operations.

Madam Speaker, we can do no less than what the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds said we should do; that is, all we can. Well, this is one of the smaller items that will contribute to doing all we can for grain producers and fishermen, by restoring the averaging provisions.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have just a few moments to discuss this topic today, introduced by the hon. member for Mackenzie. Indeed, this member seems to have dominated the House, because all day yesterday we debated a motion on farm income that he had introduced.

Madam Speaker, today we have a person with cultural background in the Chair in yourself, and the speaker from Broadview—Greenwood was mentioning the cultural aspects. Indeed in my great riding I have the Stratford Shakespearian Festival. Culture and agriculture seem to go together today, as they always do in my riding.

In this motion that the member for Mackenzie has brought forward he is asking the government to consider the advisability of introducing amendments to the Income Tax Act so that taxpayers whose incomes fluctuate from one year to the next would be able to average their income over five years.

Well, it is a good motion and I can see the rationale for it. But it is similar to the five-year block averaging for farmers and fishermen that was introduced in the Income Tax Act in 1946 and eliminated in 1988 as part of tax reform. Those provisions allowed individuals whose chief source of income was farming or fishing to average income over five year blocks. When income fluctuated significantly from year to year, block averaging reduced the total tax payable over the five-year period. This was particularly applicable to farmers whose income does vary a great deal because of drought, disease, or price fluctuations.

I must say that after the debate yesterday, and in fact after the many discussions we have had across Canada, that the member for Mackenzie, when thinking about averaging income for farmers must be thinking of better times. Because just lately it seems incomes have dropped rather than going up or ever going very high. So perhaps the member's concern is for farmers in the future.

Because I am only going to have a minute and I cannot really talk about the motion too much, I do want to set the record straight on some of the things the member from Regina said. He stood in this House just minutes ago and said how this government had taken away $40 million in benefits from the farmers through the At and East Program, a bill that is still to come before the House.

Well, Madam Speaker, there was a benefit for farmers in the At and East. It was about $8 million as I recall. The other $32 million was filtered off to transportation agencies and other people and not for the farmers—hardly an efficient way to spend government money to help farmers.

He talked as well about the two-price system and how we took $200 million out of the hands of the farmers. We studied that issue, I think, about five years ago. This two-price system, by the way, was first brought in to hurt the farmers because they were getting too much for their wheat and they wanted to have local wheat sold at lower prices. So, over the years it was off and on hurting or helping the farmers. At the end, of course, it was helping farmers but was, in turn, hurting the processing industry who had to compete with pasta made from our wheat shipped back into Canada. So it was helping the farmers, but hurting another sector of the Canadian industry that really should not be allowed to be hurt.

Perhaps I could go back to discussing the motion for that minute I have left. I must say that block averaging was used only by 4 per cent of the farmers and fishermen. Hardly crippling, Madam Speaker, which was the way the member for Mackenzie introduced it. I assume it was used by the bigger and better farmers, farmers who would use all of the things associated with registered plans.

I am sure I have now expended my time so thank you for that little bit of time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAY EQUITY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider abolishing the regional rates of pay, now in force for certain federal government employees, in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pride that I rise once again to speak in this House about the issue of regional rates of pay. Some people might remember, I think it was June last year, when I had the pleasure of rising in this place to address a similar motion concerning this foreign practice.

I looked at Hansard from June of last year, when this motion was up in the last session for debate. I noticed that there was a consistency in the approach by members opposite on the government side and that they did not want to speak to the issue of regional rates of pay. They wanted to play semantics dealing with whether or not this was a pay equity issue. They spent a considerable period of time missing the issue.

Before we start today I would like to say, right off the bat, what I believe this is all about. The lack of national rates of pay in some categories within the federal Public Service means that we do not truly have pay equity. What pay equity means is equal pay for work of equal value.

It is the stated belief of the government, and governments across this country, that people should be paid for the effort and skill they put into their work, not based on the colour of their skin, their gender, and certainly not on their language. It appears that there is an anomaly in this one situation because this government continues to support a system of regional rates of pay.

Quite simply what that means is that a pipefitter in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia gets paid considerably less working for the Government of Canada doing a contract job as described by the government than an individual in any of a number of regions as defined by the government. In particular, they get paid about $6 an hour less in some circumstances than those people doing the same job, with the same skills, for the same government in other places, particularly on the west coast.

We have to look at the history of this. The government is going to get up and tell us that regional rates of pay have been there for a long period of time. At one time there were 30 or 40 different regional rates. That is what they are going to tell us.

Then they will come back and say that they are working toward that and there are only 10 or 12 regions left whereby by legislation we discriminate against individuals.

I want to make something very clear. Wage discrimination that is based on where a person lives is no less abhorrent than wage discrimination based on gender, language, or skin colour. There is no difference. Maybe what we have to do down on the east coast—and I say it tongue-in-cheek; perhaps the government is simply not moved by the argument—is speak some type of pig Latin or perhaps adopt Gaelic as our language in places like Nova Scotia. Then we could go to the Human Rights Commission and get an order that says to this government that it cannot discriminate against this particular group of workers. It cannot pay workers less on the east coast than it does in other parts of the country.

In the dark old days it was acceptable to do that, but the country has changed. Tomorrow proposals will be tabled in this House in an effort to try to keep this country together. What we always hear in proposals that come forward to rebuild a country is that we must, through our Constitution and through our legislation, inject equity and fairness to all Canadians. It is interesting to note that when this motion was debated by me the last time, we were in the midst of the road running between the Chateau Laurier and the Congress Centre. It was a year ago June, when Meech Lake was just about to hit the rocks. I noted then with some irony that the first ministers of this country were down the road talking about drafting a document to instil fairness and equality, but their members were standing up in this House and saying no to pay equity in regional rates of pay.

• (1110)

I want to list a couple of groups, and I will do this rather quickly because I have a lot to say on this issue. There are a number of groups that are paid, not according to the job they do or the quality of their skills but by where they work. They are all employed by the federal government. Scientific and professional category, education, seven different regional rates; nursing, eight different regional rates; occupational physical therapy, seven different regional rates. The list goes on. Occupational categories, I am going to spend most of my time dealing with this. General labour and trade—ten different zones.

It means that a pipefitter or a sheet metal worker can get any one of ten different rates of pay. I can guarantee that in almost every single case a pipefitter in Atlantic Canada is going to get the lowest rate of pay. That is what regional rates of pay have done to us.

Way down at the bottom is ship repair. There are only two rates, east and west. The Halifax—Dartmouth shipyards, the government shipyards, are the ones that the Prime Minister during the Persian Gulf situation got up and applauded in this House for the incredible effort that they put into refitting the vessels that we were sending over into a theatre of war. He said what marvellous men and women they were and they rose to the call of duty. It doesn't sound like the type of individuals to me that are so bloody greedy that they are absolutely intent on screwing the government out of a few dollars in the interests of fairness and equity. But yet those same dockyard workers down in Halifax—Dartmouth, over 1,200 of them, are currently without pay equity.

I want to refer to a paper here. I met with the unions and I talked to them and said: "Look, you know regional rates of pay are going to go by way of the dinosaur, but we have got to push on it". But I look here and see on a wage scale chart that the same workers, federal government dockyard workers on the west coast, in May 1990 were paid an average 14 per cent higher than those on the east coast. By January 1991—and keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the government says it is trying to collapse these regional rates—the discrepancy rose to 19 per cent. In October 1992 it will be up to 28.35 per cent difference, and yet the government gets up and talks about its absolute commitment to pay equity. Absolute hogwash, Mr. Speaker.

A couple of interesting things have happened. Back in the fall of 1989 we had a situation arise where the ships' crews, normally designated as essential employees so that they cannot go out on strike, were without a contract for a significant period of time. These men and women who worked on ships' crews on the east and west coast, mostly on the east coast, made a decision that enough was enough. They were no longer going to sit back and be loyal little lap dogs to the government and accept significantly lower salaries for a dangerous job that they did on behalf of the Canadian government and the Canadian public.

They went out on strike. It was not because they were looking for massive increases. The government opposite had painted these employees as greedy. Do you know how much they got paid, Mr. Speaker? The average pay for a ship's crew employee on the east coast of Canada was between $19,000 and $22,000 a year. Boy, they had cushy jobs, too, you know: all they had to do was risk their lives for the people of Canada! They were on Coast Guard vessels and when there was a storm and there was a ship in trouble, they went out on the high seas and risked their lives for $19,000 or $21,000 a year. But this government, as callous as it is, was then and continues to be, absolutely refused the one small request to pay the people on the east coast who risked their lives for this country and this government the same as the people on the west coast.

They forced them out on strike and we saw this awful legislation introduced in the House, strike breaking legislation, to force them back to work. The Liberals and the New Democrats opposite held that legislation up, and we forced the government every step of the way to invoke closure every step of the way.

When it was all over and done with, my colleague here from Ottawa, who is a Public Service critic, filibustered in this House to ensure that the rights of those workers, the ships' crews and other public servants were not going to be trampled on easily in this place.

So what happened? They went to arbitration. The government refused to close a wage rate between the east and west coasts, perhaps causing a problem with public safety. At least it claimed it at the time, although we objected and said that was not the case.

What happened when it went to arbitration? I want the members opposite to listen. The government refuses to negotiate in good faith when it is dealing with regional rates of pay or with any public servant, as we saw with the recent PSAC strike.

The binding arbitration report, after this government legislated those $19,000 to $21,000 a year employees back to work, said clearly that effective the date of the signing of this collective agreement the following would happen: (a) it would bring east coast rates of pay to parity with the west coast rates of pay.

It is clear. A three-party arbitration panel with a member of the government could not even justify the further discriminatory practice of allowing regional rates of pay. It was an unnecessary strike it forced those workers out on, because it really does not care.

There is another thing that is interesting if you look at the guidelines, and I want to read this one: "Federal Public Service compensation policy—guiding principles". These are pretty interesting. It says that the employer's approach to compensation determination for federal public servants shall follow some guidelines: (a) that public sector compensation be fair to employees and to the tax paying public. We hear them twist that one around all the time and say that the poorest of the poor are not worthy of a decent liveable wage—we heard that last week when we had the strike—and (b) that public sector compensation be related in a reasonable and acceptable way to the private sector, with compensation not exceeding that paid for similar services by the private sector.

I want to highlight that because when this motion was put last June all we heard from the members opposite reading by line from a speech prepared by Treasury Board was that they cannot do away with regional rates of pay because if they did, the private sector in those areas would collapse as the rates of pay would be too high.

One cannot have it both ways. I want to go back to the ships' crews strike. It is pretty interesting. The government refused to admit that the binding arbitration was found to be factual. In dealing with the ships' crews strike it says when the government refused to pay them a living wage: "We are also satisfied in the peculiar circumstances of this case that there is legitimacy to the alliance claim that a significant and glaring disparity has developed over the past several rounds of negotiations with respect to the compensation paid to government ships' crews as compared to ships' crews in the private sector".

It goes further somewhere else in the decision to say that if allowed to go unchecked it would reach 38 per cent disparity. The government wants to claim that it cannot touch these regional rates because somehow it is going to have a massive negative impact on the private sector. Hogwash. Nonsense. This government continues to perpetuate a policy that should have died in the dark ages of wage discrimination based on where an individual lives.

Back over to the dock workers, 1,230 or 1,240 souls, the same people who fitted up in record time the Canadian navy in its valiant effort with the UN in the Persian Gulf. Those individuals are now negotiating a contract again. The charge hands who were sort of the supervisory personnel went straight to binding arbitration. I do not have a copy of the report with me, but my understanding is that that binding arbitration when it came down a week ago Friday clearly and up front said that the regional rate of pay had to be collapsed and that a national rate of pay had to be instituted.

It is not just me standing here telling this House of Commons that this motion should be acceptable and that the government should look at it. The government's own process of arbitration in dealing with many of these groups that are affected, particularly on the Atlantic Coast, in a very negative way by the discriminatory practice of regional rates of pay, of paying somebody less for a job based on where they live, has gone the way of the dodo bird.

It has got to go. Maybe the message, if the government did not have before us some Draconian legislation, could basically destroy the collective bargaining process. All of those groups affected by regional rates of pay should simply say: "We want binding arbitration".

The record since a year is clear. In each and every case where regional rates of pay were an issue and went to binding arbitration, the panel said: "Enough of this. We have to close that wage gap". That is exactly what we have to do.

There are a couple of other issues here that have to be addressed. One is whether this government is truly concerned about fairness and equity. I did not have a chance in the short debate that we had on the awful back-to-work legislation this government put forward to challenge or question the government's credibility when it talks about its wish to have pay equity.

It wants to look at pay equity as a gender problem within the federal Public Service. It talks about how it wants to get rid of discriminatory practices and what wonderful people it thinks our public servants are.

I will read a couple of quotes by our own Prime Minister. I think they clearly indicated the disdain and the disgust with which this government treats public servants, most of all those public servants who do a damn good job for this country for very little remuneration and very little credit from the current government.

As reported in The Ottawa Citizen, April 9, 1983: "Any bureaucrat who did try to oppose him (Mulroney) would be greeted with the words 'Voila ton pink slip'".

Another interesting quote from our Prime Minister, the head of our government which espouses that it truly believes in and is in pursuit of wage parity, "pay equity", is from CBOT, Newsday, May 26, 1983. Talking about the Public Service, he said: "They have never worked a day in their lives. They have never done a day's work". That sort of says it all.

This government under the leadership of this Prime Minister is absolutely intent. It always has to have an enemy, and the enemy that it has chosen in the last number of years is the federal Public Service.

An hon. member: One of many.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): One of many.

In conclusion, I would urge the government, if it does not want to listen to me, to look at its arbitration reports. Will the government for once do the right thing and agree that in 1991 there is no place in a modern democracy for a system of pay by the federal government, the people who legislate laws in this country and pass laws and codes of behaviour by statute, which is abhorrent and discriminatory, a rate of pay which does not pay individuals for the work they put into products but rather pays them according to where they live in this country.

I would hope, now that it is the second time around on this particular motion, that the government would look at the record and see fit to announce forthwith through President of the Treasury Board, in spite of the regressive freeze legislation that it has on, that regional rates of pay are going to be exempt from that and that the gap will be closed.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this issue as the member has said is on its second trip around the racetrack. It was featured during the 1988 election, particularly in Halifax.

It has been the policy of various governments since 1967 and continues to be the policy of the government today to reflect local rates of pay for Public Service employees in occupations where outside data indicate significant variations from the national average.

In other words, we tend to reflect the regional rates in the wages that we pay for the various jobs. It is not just ships' crews and repair crews and so forth. It covers a whole range of public servants in various regions of the country. We cannot say that it just covers two groups, because that would be another case to be made.

My remarks are somewhat constrained, but I do note that a small group of employees in the Saskatoon area is challenging the regional rate policy of the government under section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Since the court proceedings have commenced on this issue, it would not appropriate to get into anything more than generalities and general comments on this issue.

In his comments the member mentioned and equated regional rates with equal pay for work of equal value. He knows full well that the government has passed legislation pertaining to equal pay for work of equal value. He knows also that there have been considerable payments and adjustments made as the result of that legislation.

I am just looking for the bill here. I think it was June 1986 that the bill was passed. The member should recall the comments of the President of the Treasury Board of the day in January 1990 regarding equal pay for work of equal value. He announced that the first phase of lump sum payments would be $317 million and it would be made as quickly as possible. This is a gender difference in wage rates, where men and women are doing essentially the same work. The feeling is and the government policy is that they should be paid the same rate.

In the announcement that the President of the Treasury Board made on January 26, 1990 he said that the rates would be retroactive to March 1, 1985. The retroactive payment will average something like $4,800 per employee affected. The affected employees work in all parts of Canada and therefore it is not reasonable in that sense.

The second phase involves $76 million in annual salary adjustments effective April 1, 1990. The amount of wage adjustments and retroactive payments will vary depending on the pay disparity identified for any particular occupational group and the amount of time an employee has been in a particular position or positions.

We have moved substantially on pay equity. My secretary was telling me the other day about a young lady who worked on the Hill, then left the Hill to work in another government department and has now returned to the Hill. To her surprise she received a cheque in the amount of something like $3,700. When she inquired as to what it was for, she was told that it was pay equity. It is going on and it is working.

This matter of regional rates is a difficult one. Living conditions vary from one part of the country to another. I do not suppose there is a trade category that could be imagined, whether it is auto mechanics, plumbing or any craft or trade in which the rates are uniform across the country. They are not uniform across the country. They are not uniform in the private sector across the country.

The concern, not only of this government but of previous governments, has always been: Are we going to distort the local situation? Are we going to cause a distortion in the private sector if we pay a rate in Halifax that is paid in Vancouver?

The other thing the member is missing in his comments are the fringe benefits. There is no regional disparity in fringe benefits whatever, and he knows that. He should reflect on that as well. There are substantial fringe benefits and they are all subject to negotiations. I do not suppose there has been a negotiation between the Public Service unions and the government in the last many years that has not had this issue of regional rates as part of the discussion. I have no doubt in my mind that the discussions going on this very day, probably this very hour, between the President of the Treasury Board and Daryl Bean and the PSAC negotiators have the regional rates on the table and are being discussed.

Since we have been in government, since 1984, we have followed the practice established in 1967. That is not to justify it in any way, but that is the practice and that is what it has always been. I believe the concern is that in an area where there may not be absolute boom conditions and tradesmen are not paid substantially higher wages than Public Service employees, if we moved to raise those rates beyond the local rate that is being paid, we would cause some very serious economic conditions within that area.

The other point that the member has not talked about is skills. These rates are based on base rates, but there are skills rates beyond that which he has not dealt with. Many of those persons, by updating their skills, could have an increase in their wages.

First of all, I reject the comparison of pay of equal value to regional rates. I just do not think it is a valid comparison.

As I said, the matter is before the court in Saskatoon and we will have to see where that plays out but, at the present time, that is where the policy of the government lies and we will reflect local rates in our regional rate efforts.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the motion put to the House by the member for Dartmouth.

Primarily what this motion does is try to bring together the outlying areas of our country to the central part of our country. We are trying to bring people together.

What I hear from the government side is that we are going to cause an imbalance by agreeing to this motion. We are going to cause an imbalance in the area that we are servicing. The private sector will not be able to afford to keep up with the rates of pay.

The member from the government side just indicated that the government has already introduced pay equity for gender reasons and it has sent cheques out to various regions. I did not hear him saying that it has caused problems in the private sector. It brought them together.

When we look at the trades and we talk about skills, if I were a tradesman on either coast or anywhere in this country, I would take personal offence at the comment that was made by the member opposite when he said that skills enter the picture. I was a plumber before I became a politician and I am as much a plumber on the west coast as I am on the east coast as I am in Ontario. My skills do not vary. Why is there a difference in the rates of pay for shipbuilders, for pipefitters, for electricians and for other trades? A buck is a buck and a pipefitter is a pipefitter.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think what this government is trying to do is to create, with these regional rates, dissension within the ranks and keep them arguing between each other so that they can pit one against the other and have them say: "I am better than you are because I am getting paid more." I think we all have something to offer. I think we are entitled to equal pay for work of equal value. To tell someone that their work is not as valuable as someone else's is a severe slap in the fact to that individual.

We cannot continue to have these regional rates of pay because we are classifying when we do that. No one in this House or in this country is any better than anyone else and is no worse than anyone else.

I would like all members in this House to ask themselves this question. Would they consider taking less pay as members of Parliament because they come from different regions of this country? I think the answer is quite clear. We all figure we are doing as good a job as the other person and we want to get the same amount of money as that person. That is no more or no less than any other government employee is asking for.

I think my comments are relatively brief but to the point. I think that we need to have a national rate of pay for all our government employees. They contribute as much as anyone else in this country and they do not deserve to be treated any less or any differently than anyone else. I certainly hope that the Conservative members will come to their senses and support this very important and very needed motion.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this motion by the hon. member for Dartmouth. The hon. member for Dartmouth has been pushing this issue ever since he became a member of Parliament.

Coming from Newfoundland, I appreciate having a fellow member pushing the issue as hard as he has pushed it. I have watched him in caucus as well make the same points over and over and over again. I think that the message is getting through.

If you are a machine operator with the same employer, working in Saskatchewan, you can go up to $15 an hour. But if you are working in British Columbia, excluding metropolitan Vancouver and metropolitan Victoria, you can go up to $18.84 an hour, a difference of almost $4 an hour. If you are an electrician, you can go to the top of your scale to $16.31 if you work in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, $16.31, but if you were in metropolitan Vancouver, metropolitan Victoria, you could go up to $20.71 an hour. That is a difference of $4 an hour.

Some occupations have a difference of $5 an hour. Some of them are $6 an hour, doing the same job with the same employer. It depends on where you are working. These are all tradesmen, receiving $3 or $4 an hour difference, depending on where they are working.

The federal government, as the member for Dartmouth knows, keeps coming back as the representative of the government said a few moments ago, and saying: "We want to keep it down to the going rates in the area so that it will not be an unfair competition with the private sector in that area". That argument fails and it fails badly because of a couple of points. Number one, the federal government turns around in some of those same areas where the wages are being paid are low because of the going rates, says the government, and gives them environmental allowances on top of the wage or gives them isolation pay on top of the wage. There is no logic behind where the dividing line is, Mr. Speaker. I cite you an example. A few moments ago the hon. member representing the New Democratic Party said that he was a plumber before becoming a member of Parliament. If he were a plumber in British Columbia working for the federal government, excluding metropolitan Vancouver he would start at $17.11 an hour. But, if he were working in metropolitan Vancouver, he would be making $17.69 an hour. In other words, if he were working in metropolitan Vancouver he would make more than if he were working in B.C. outside metropolitan Vancouver as a plumber. If he was a pipefitter he would make $12.09 an hour if he was in British Columbia excluding metropolitan Vancouver, he would make less than that, $11.92, if he were in metropolitan Vancouver.

An hon. member: It makes no sense.

Mr. Baker: Here we go. We have a plumber who is paid more if he is in metropolitan Vancouver than if he is outside and we have pipefitter who is paid less if he is in metropolitan Vancouver than if he is outside. It is utter nonsense. It is complete and total nonsense. It is a violation of the human rights of an individual.

Some reference has been made here to the fact that the Human Rights Commission has always turned around on the basis of what is in the Human Rights Act. They cite section 11 of the act, and I don't have to cite section 11 for the hon. member for Dartmouth or for any other member. They know that it says that an employer cannot pay different wages to a male and female if they are working in the same establishment and doing the same work or work of equal value. They say that is not a violation of the Human Rights Act.

I suppose we could say that they are not working in the same establishment. They are working for the same employer and there is a dividing line. It is not only by province, but if one works inside or outside a metropolitan area. However, certainly, the principle of fairness is absent in regional rates of pay.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a group of federal employees who are sent to a location on a big job, and you have one from this area and another from that area and they are all carpenters, say, and every single one of them is making different wages because they have been sent in from their home territory where they normally work to do a job? Can you imagine how people feel who are mobile in the Public Service, as we had the case a couple of years ago of the crews where they would all meet in Cambridge Bay up in the Northwest Passage? They would tie their boats up, and one fellow was making $3 an hour more than another fellow. The ship repair crews—the hon. member for Dartmouth has 300 or 400 or 500 I suppose in his riding— have different rates depending on where they are from. It just so happens that the hon. member is representing the lower end of the scale. These people are doing the same work, the same job as everybody else is doing.

This has led to a demoralization of the Public Service. The Canadian public expects service from the Public Service; they expect service from them. Here are public servants working in Gander, Newfoundland or in Grand Falls, Newfoundland or Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and they are doing the same job as somebody living in another province and they are being paid less. They are being paid $7,000 a year less than somebody in the same classification, but they are working in a different area of Canada. It is demoralization of the Public Service.

The Government of Canada is always trying to do things to increase productivity. It paid out big productivity bonuses recently to the fat cats, the big guys making all the money. It paid them these big bonuses, payoffs for layoffs, to get rid of people.

You are always looking over your shoulder wondering who is making judgment on you today. Here you are sitting down doing a job somebody else is doing, same classification, same work, and receiving $4 an hour less because of where you live in this country, with the same employer. Then you have a manager looking down your shoulder and you know that if that manager manages to get rid of you he gets a bonus a Christmastime.

The Government of Canada should not just pay attention to what is in the Canadian Human Rights Act. No act of Parliament is without its mistakes, and there were mistakes made when this legislation was passed. Surely by strict common sense no member of Parliament would like to be paid on the basis of regional rates of pay. Mr. Speaker, on a scale of 12, your province is about number three from the bottom.

Just imagine if members of Parliament were paid on the basis of regional rates of pay. It would not be a very attractive business for somebody from eastern Canada, I can assure you of that.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, the member for Dartmouth, in bringing this matter to the attention of the House of Commons, namely the subject of pay equality across the nation, joins the ranks and choruses of a number of members who have raised this point in the past including myself.

I want to begin by telling all members that I have canvassed this subject from a to z and all aspects of it. So I make the comments I make today on the basis of that study over a period of time.

First of all let me make it clear there is a principle involved which the Canadian Public Service has accepted for decades. That is that public service compensation must be fair to both the employer and the employee and to the taxpayer.

The second aspect of that principle is that public sector compensation should be related in a reasonable and acceptable way to the private sector. We have to keep that as the guiding light. We cannot simply abandon those principles to appease workers in a particular area because, as I have pointed out on occasions in the past, it can have a detrimental effect. The member for Gander—Grand Falls never mentioned this aspect. On whether he knows about it or not I will not comment, but I will take two minutes to explain to the member what happens.

First of all, if you grant rates of pay that are out of context with the private sector in the regional area, you definitely create two kinds of havoc. First you will raise compensation for trades people beyond reasonable levels applicable to that region. You will have every plumber, every electrician, seeking employment in the public sector and leaving jobs in the private sector. The only way the employers in the private sector can compensate is by providing higher wages which increases the prices to consumers, that is the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada. They will pay more for services in their region because the Government of Canada has artificially increased compensation in trades and occupations in that area. That is number one detrimental effect that I hope the member for Dartmouth recognizes and realizes, because the member for Gander—Grand Falls apparently does not.

The second point is this: everybody agreed—and I am sure every member of the Liberal Party including their leader, House leader, and officials would agree—that the taxpayer of Canada is entitled to the best deal possible in terms of economies for government services. You have to face the fact that if the government can provide a service at less cost to the taxpayer in a certain way, then the government has some obligation to adopt that way of providing that service.

What does that mean in terms of compensation? That means very simply that if you pay higher rates than are justified in a region, the government will be paying more for the services it is acquiring.

• (1150)

If you pay painters at CFB Halifax more money than painters normally receive in the Halifax—Dartmouth area, you will raise the cost of painting in public buildings, or at least the buildings at CFB Halifax. What is the result of that? Painters in private industry will come to the government and ask: "Why are you paying so much extra to paint buildings in the Halifax—Dartmouth area when we can do it cheaper?" It does not make any difference what parliamentarians say. It does not make any difference what the member from Dartmouth says, because people in the private sector will come to government and say: "Why are you paying $1,000 or $10,000 or $100,000 extra for painting services in the Halifax—Dartmouth area when we can do it for less? We will employ people. We will cause industrial expansion and create local economic benefits and you do not have the right as the government to stop that".

When the member for Dartmouth stands up to defend what he calls pay equality, which means substantial increases in pay for people in his constituency and people in my constituency, I want him to say at the same time and at the same place: "You realize that in doing this we will be paying more taxpayers' money out than we need to pay and it will have a detrimental effect on the private sector". There will be painters, for example, in the private sector unemployed. There will be painting contractors without work because we have taken it upon ourselves to artificially raise levels of pay and to cause that havoc to occur. He has to take both sides of the coin.

If I had my choice, I would simply sign an equality of pay order for the whole Public Service and let the chips fall where they may. Why would I do that? Because that is the easiest way out for me. That would make life easier for me. Just give it away. Give the employees what they want. Make them happy. They would be patting me on the back. They would be inviting me to their union meetings. They would be sending me Christmas cards. It would be wonderful.

However that is not my obligation as a representative of the public. My obligation as an elected member of Parliament is to do the right thing, to weigh all the factors and make a decision on the basis of all of those factors.

I have pressed time and time again in this House and in all channels and corridors of government for equal pay with persons on the west coast, and every time I have had my foot caught in a trap. When I stood in this House and other places and asked for equal pay with ships' crews in British Columbia, did they say: "yes, that is fine, thank you very much", when they got equal pay? No.

You can get equal pay simply by equalizing everybody's pay. You can reduce wages on the west coast compared to wages on the east coast and create equality. Does anybody want that? Has any union member ever come forward and said: "Look, we will use the same amount of money but we will equally divide it among us"? No, no, no, that is not the kind of equal pay. They are simply talking about an increase in pay. I understand that. I would like to have an increase in pay. I know they would like to have an increase in pay. Everybody would like to have an increase in pay, but we have to look at the political realities, at the economic realities.

When we raised the pay to equal levels for the ships' crews as the member for Dartmouth well knows—and I think I had a great part in that action—what happened? We simply gave Daryl Bean and the Public Service Alliance of Canada an opportunity to say that everybody should get that increase. The man who said he wanted equality of pay for ships' crews then turned around and said that everybody should get a similar increase right across the Public Service.

That was my sojourn into the area of collective bargaining. I am content to leave it now to Treasury Board officials because after that they reminded me: "See what you did. All you did was discolour the waters of collective bargaining, of bargaining back and forth, by insisting on wage equality".

If the member for Dartmouth or the member for Gander—Grand Falls wants to step in there and disturb these relations, deal with them politically, not economically, not sensibly, then let it be on his shoulders. Let him ask for increases that are going to cause all kinds of turmoil. Does he think that painters at the dockyard are going to be happy with the increase they get if they reach equality without any effect on painters in other areas of the government, in other areas such as the hospitals which hire hundreds of painters and the private sector? No, it will simply cause a wage escalation.

While we would like to see equality, while we want to see fairness, we can only achieve that through sensible bargaining. The members at CFB Halifax in the ship repair unit know that, because I told them that. I told them that time and time again: "I will do what I can for you. I will advocate your cause, but we are up against a system that was brought into force many years ago by the Liberal government". It is okay for those Liberals on that side and the NDP to say they want pay equality. They not only denied pay equality in the Liberal term of office, but they refused to move toward equality. All I have ever asked them to do, and I told this to the representatives of the dockyard workers union, the ship repair unit, Jim Henneberry and his colleagues, that I would simply ask the government to move towards pay equality, to approach it and to keep it in mind as a goal or an objective to win.

Of course, we fought this all out in the 1988 election. We had parades and demonstrations. I never varied from my position. I told the dockyard workers exactly what my position was and I am telling them again today, for the umpteenth time, that I believe we want to work towards equality but we cannot reach it all in one jump. By the way, they accepted that position on December 6, 1988, when they accepted the pay increase. After rejecting it, they accepted the pay increase.

Jim Henneberry and his colleagues at the dockyard and labour leaders throughout the Public Service realize what is at stake here. They realize what principles are involved. If they can get yet another politician to come forward and say: "We want it now", I do not blame them for doing that. I think in their hearts they know it is something that has to be achieved through a gradual, evolutionary process.

I would like the member from Dartmouth to say: Work with me to try to move the dockyard workers and other public servants on the east coast towards equality. We are not going to get it in one jump.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to support the motion put forward by my hon. friend from Dartmouth.

The issue before the House is fairness. During the recent Public Service strike, one of the key union demands was the elimination of regional rates of pay. This is a system that discriminates against people on the basis of where they live.

Something has to be made perfectly clear. The elimination of regional rates of pay is not about equal pay for work of equal value. It is about paying people the same wage for doing exactly the same job for the same boss regardless of where they live. The federal government pays people a different salary depending on whether they live in Montague in my riding or Toronto or a community like Terrace, British Columbia.

The people who suffer the most from this unfair system are the people of Atlantic Canada and of course, the people of my riding of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island. Of the 17 job classes in the general labour and trade section of the federal Public Service, seven groups have their lowest rates of pay in Atlantic Canada.

We are not talking about paying somebody a few cents an hour more because the cost of living is much higher in Toronto. We are talking about paying an electrician in Souris, Prince Edward Island 20 per cent less than an electrician in Revelstoke, British Columbia, who is doing exactly the same job for the same boss but is being paid over $3 an hour less for doing the same job.

People in my riding would like to know where the fairness is in this system. I want to assure members that I have nothing against the people of British Columbia. The people of British Columbia are as honest and hard working as the people of Prince Edward Island.

The electrician in Prince Edward Island works just as hard as his counterpart in British Columbia, yet this government insists on paying the electrician from Souris, Prince Edward Island, 20 per cent less. This problem not only deals with electricians, but it deals with boilermakers, tool and die operators, farm hands, plumbers, mechanics, carpenters and others, all who suffer from this discriminatory policy of the federal government.

I am not suggesting that the people in Toronto or Revelstoke should take a cut in pay and be brought down to the level of the people in Atlantic Canada or, in fact, the people of Saskatchewan who suffer the same discriminatory practices. Rather, I suggest that the people of Atlantic Canada, Saskatchewan and other places have their pay raised to the level enjoyed by their fellow Canadians elsewhere.

For years governments have been trying to do something about the lower standard of living in Atlantic Canada. If the government would take the simple step of raising the pay of the employees in Atlantic Canada there would be more money in the region.

• (1200)

Simple economics tell us if there is more money in the region, people will probably buy a new car, a new microwave or possibly extend their home which, of course, will stimulate the economy and get dollars moving. That is exactly what we need to have happen.

This week, we will be debating a new constitutional proposal from this government, a document which will outline the principles by which this country operates. One of the guiding principles of Confederation is that all Canadians are equal.

Many of our programs are designed to preserve this equality between people. Medicare ensures that all Canadians have universal access to the health care system, if it is not cut to pieces. Equalization ensures that the have not provinces have enough money to provide the same level of service across the country, again, if equalization payments are not cut to pieces.

Why then is this government treating Canadians differently on the basis of where they live? Two years ago when the ships' crews started negotiating for a new contract, they demanded an end to the regional rates of pay.

If you give me 30 seconds, I will wind this up as my time has run out. My colleague has explained the motion so I will not go through it. What I would ask the government to do is not to leave it to the arbitration boards, unions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to move second reading of Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. As part of the government's restraint program, this bill will continue the ceiling on the growth of the federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan to the provinces not receiving equalization payments.

Under the Government Expenditures Restraint Act passed last year, a 5 per cent ceiling on transfers to these provinces was set for 1990–91 and 1991–92. The legislation will extend those ceilings through to 1994–95.

Starting off this debate, I would like to remind the House that all Canadians and all levels of government stand to benefit from the wide–ranging measures that this government has introduced to put this country's fiscal House in order.

The federal debt we inherited in 1984, compounded by heavy interest payments over the last six years, represents one of the greatest dangers to this country's social and economic well–being.

Canada's $400 billion debt burden and the deficits that add to it are a national problem affecting all Canadians. It results in higher taxes, inflationary pressure, increased interest rates and, of course, long–term uncertainty. Because interest costs are such a large share of the budget—$43 billion this year or 27 per cent of our total expenditures—the debt consumes funds that might otherwise be used to assist Canadians in need and to support programs Canadians want and reduce taxes.

In sum, Canada's deficit and debt represents a major threat to sustainable economic growth and the ability of this government, and of all governments across the country, to provide the social services that we are so proud of as Canadians.

To effectively deal with this program, we must get back on track in reducing the deficit. This is the threshold step, to get the debt under control and on to a downward path. Deficit reduction requires spending restraint. That is why we brought forward this legislation. It is part of a broad program of spending control needed to establish a positive, economic environment for the country. National problems demand national solutions. For this government to live within its means, spending restraint must be shared with the provinces. Federal transfers to other levels of government are simply too large to ignore in this effort.

Members of the House should bear in mind that for decades the federal government has provided considerable financial support to the provinces and that support, by the way, has grown significantly; by almost 6 per cent annually from 1984–85 to 1990–91. That is a much higher rate of increase than the 3.7 per cent growth in over–all program spending over the same period.

As a result of this growth, total federal contributions to the provinces, both cash and tax transfers, will reach nearly $37 billion this year. The cash component of these transfers will represent about 20 cents of every federal revenue dollar.

We simply cannot afford to let this spending grow without some limits. With this in mind, Bill C–20 has already been introduced to control the growth of Established Program Financing and to provide for other restraint measures outlined in the budget.

Complementing this legislation, the bill before the House today would continue the ceiling on the growth in federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan to the three fiscally strongest provinces. Even with the measures that we are proposing, growth in federal transfers is expected to run at 3.7 per cent annually between this fiscal year 1991–92 and 1995–96 in contrast to just 3 per cent for all federal programs over the same period.

The level of CAP spending and the rate of growth over the past few years has meant that we cannot ignore this program as we work to contain expenditures. Since 1984–85, federal CAP contributions have grown at about 7 per cent annually from $4 billion to more than $6 billion last year. In contrast, total federal program spending has grown, as I mentioned earlier, at only 3.7 per cent over the same period of time.

Simply put, this government would not be a responsible custodian of the taxpayers' money if we allowed these contributions to grow without any restraint at all. We cannot spend our way out of problems with money we do not have and funds we cannot borrow except at a very high price for us today and, I guess more importantly, for our children tomorrow.

This bill has been carefully designed to balance our concern for needy Canadians and our desire to avoid placing unnecessary burdens on Canadians in the future. We know how important these dollars are in providing assistance to the neediest Canadians. We all know that in our constituencies as we experience it on a daily basis. CAP contributions help provide the most basic requirements of life: food, shelter and clothing, as well as social support in a variety of ways.

To me, the success of CAP is not measured by how many people are dependent on it, but by how many people it can help to regain personal independence. That is the important aspect of this. This independence would be worthless without a healthy economy and the jobs that go with it. It is to ensure the long-term health of the economy, threatened by the debt problem we have inherited, that we must put certain limits on the funds we give the provinces for these purposes.

• (1210)

Bill C–32 is part of a comprehensive responsible plan for fiscal consolidation and economic renewal, a plan based on the philosophy that has inspired this government since we came to power in 1984. We have reformed the tax system to increase its fairness and to improve the international competitiveness of our manufacturing sector. We have reduced waste and inefficiency in government operations. We have taken measured steps to reduce government spending so we can live within our financial means.

We continued our balanced approach to spending restraint even in the face of the recession we have just weathered. We kept to our course because we knew it was the only way to build a stable, long–lasting recovery.

We did not, however, embark on a wild spending spree as many of our critics demanded, especially the former premier of British Columbia, who would love us to just throw money at any problem and try to spend our way out of it. We have resisted the harsh calls from the other extreme, and that is to rip apart the social safety net on which many of our fellow citizens depend.

None of these steps we have taken compromise or will compromise our high, nationally consistent standards for health and social programs. Rather, they ensure that we will have a strong economy, that we will be able to afford these programs in the future and provide opportunities for those in financial difficulty to find independence and self–respect.

The balanced, prudent measures that we have taken, including those announced in the budget last February, will ensure that the deficit this year does not increase over last year, despite the effect of the recession that has just ended.

These measures, combined with economic recovery and lower interest rates, will push the deficit down sharply. For 1992–93, we are forecasting a shortfall of under $25 billion, the lowest in more than 10 years. By 1994–95, we will have eliminated the need for any new government borrowing on financial markets for the first time in 25 years.

During the recession of 1981–82, the government of the day chose a different path, allowing the deficit to balloon by $23 billion from 1982–83 to 1984–85, to a total of $38.5 billion. It is this burden of debt that we have inherited, that all Canadians have inherited from the previous government that has made the legislation we have before us today so necessary.

I would like to assure the members of the House, and of course all Canadians, that the limits on CAP growth do not put this nation's welfare system at risk. The assistance provided under CAP by the federal government will continue to grow in every province. For seven provinces, no gross ceilings on federal contributions will apply. We will continue to match eligible spending on social assistance in these provinces dollar for dollar. In the three richest provinces, CAP contributions will also continue to grow but to a limit of 5 per cent annually. Even with the gross ceilings outlined in this bill, we estimate that during the five-year period in which the cap will be in place, federal CAP contributions to all provinces are expected to grow from $6 billion in 1990-91 to more than $7.3 billion in 1994-95.

CAP contributions to these provinces will continue to grow at a rate that is even faster than the growth in total program spending by this government.

As I am sure all members are aware, we have introduced legislation to restrain the growth in most areas of government spending to 3 per cent annually after the year 1991-92. The three affected provinces are those best able to share in the restraint necessary to build a stable fiscal foundation for this country's economy. Each of these provinces faces interest costs that are considerably less than those of the federal government, and these costs represent a much lower percentage of provincial spending.

For example, the national debt now totals $400 billion—equal to almost 60 per cent of the country's Gross Domestic Product. Interest payments will consume 33 cents of every dollar of federal revenue in this fiscal year 1991-92. In contrast, the combined debt of all the provinces will total about $113 billion this year, or 16 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product, and provincial debt payments will represent about 11 cents of every dollar of provincial revenue. In particular, these charges work out to 11.6 cents of every revenue dollar for Ontario, to 8.3 cents of every dollar for Alberta, and to 4 cents of every dollar for British Columbia.

Before I outline the amounts transferred by the federal government to these provinces, and how these contributions will be affected by the legislation, let me briefly remind hon. members how CAP is administered.

Every month each province and territory sends an advance claim to the federal government. This amount is subsequently adjusted to reflect actual expenditures, and the over-all account is balanced at the end of the year. The annual claim is certified by an auditor designated by the province and accepted by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

While the federal government specifies the conditions under which a particular program is eligible for cost sharing, the provinces are responsible for designing and delivering the programs and ensuring their comprehensiveness. And it is up to the provinces, in this time of fiscal restraint, to ensure that every dollar of assistance is targeted at needy Canadians and not siphoned off by individuals taking advantage of the system. When program dollars are limited, stringent enforcement and monitoring of payments to eliminate abuses is a must.

The actual financial impact of the 5 per cent ceiling on the affected provinces will vary with its level of spending. I see the Liberals disagree with eliminating abuses to the system. The actual financial impact, I repeat, of the 5 per cent ceiling on the affected provinces will vary with its level of spending. We estimate that social assistance spending in Alberta has grown less than 5 per cent since 1990-91. Consequently, we expect that federal contributions will continue to match the growth in Alberta's spending, dollar for dollar, for that year. The total federal contribution will be about $530 million. For 1991-92 the federal contribution will reach some $565 million.

For British Columbia, it is estimated that the province will be entitled to about $50 less in federal contributions in 1991 than it would receive if there were no growth ceiling. However, federal contributions will still top $715 million and for 1991-92 they will grow to more than $750 million.

Ontario will receive in 1990-91, $2 billion—about one-third of the total federal CAP contribution. This amount is about $450 million less than it would be if there were no growth ceiling. For 1991-92 Ontario will receive $100 million more for a total of $2.1 billion; by any measure a lot of money.

By taking this measured step we are seeking to live within our means—and the means of the Canadian taxpayers because they are the ones who foot the bill—while still ensuring that those most in need are fully protected. The financial discipline that we are asking for is essential if we are to reduce inflation further and interest rates. It is only in this way that we can strengthen the economic recovery that has already begun.

The fiscal responsible approach we have taken offers the only way that we can generate productive long-term jobs and ensure renewed sustainable prosperity. It is the only way to bring down inflation and create a positive environment in which all Canadians can confidently plan for their future. And it is only by ensuring that we have a prosperous Canada with a sound financial foundation that we can maintain a strong social safety net for Canadians in need.

As announced in the budget, there is a review of all major federal transfers to provinces under way with an eye to improving their effectiveness and tailoring them to the changing needs of the 1990s.

As part of this co-operative agenda the Minister of Finance will be meeting with his provincial counterparts again later this fall. Our goal is to maintain the principles and standards that are the basis of Canadian citizenship, while at the same time respecting provincial flexibility and tailoring services to best meet local conditions.

We are undertaking this consultation not because we lack a strong, positive vision of what needs to be done nor because we lack ideas on how to regain our fiscal balance. Rather, we recognize that for these ideas to be effective they must reflect the shared vision and mutual commitment by all levels of government and by all Canadians.

On the fundamentals of our discussion I am sure there is already full agreement. The success and permanence of Canada's social programs depends on the wealth and prosperity of the country as a whole. I need not remind my fellow colleagues that prosperity cannot be legislated.

As well, I am sure that all members of the House agree that the best assistance for Canadians in need is meaningful, permanent jobs, and job creation through sound economic management has been a priority of this government from day one.

The government's restraint efforts are even now showing results. The economy began to turn upwards in the second quarter of this year and continues to grow. We are expecting Canada to finish in second place among the G-7 in economic growth in 1992, with a growth rate of around 3.5 per cent.

The positive signs of growth we are now seeing are a source of encouragement, but we are all well aware that many Canadians are still experiencing the effects of this past recession. Without a doubt, we still have work to do to ensure that economic growth continues and that the recovery is sound and long lasting. If we waver, if we let the deficit rise, inflation and interest rates will follow, choking off growth.

We do not intend to let this happen. We have already laid the groundwork for sound economic growth and, if we were to listen to our critics, we would squander the sacrifices Canadians have made so far.

There are no quick, painless fixes to the deficit and debt problems we have inherited; only difficult responsibilities that we owe to Canadians. The extension of gross ceiling on CAP transfers flows directly from those responsibilities. I urge all members of the House to support this motion and to join us in accepting our fiscal responsibility to all Canadians.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech by my colleague, the minister opposite. What this government and what some of these comments have shown is that the government has not understood that reducing a deficit is not a social or fiscal or economic policy, but a policy that will affect the lives of average Canadians across this country. You cannot replace a fair and satisfactory social policy that prepares looks to the future with a policy that merely reduces a deficit. A government worthy of the name would try to achieve a better balance between economic and social objectives, objectives that are worthwhile, and this means not only acting responsibly, as the hon. member just said——about not compromising the health of the community, not compromising the economy, finding the way in which one would deal with the deficit.

I listened very carefully to this minister. He talked about the fact that prosperity cannot be legislated. That is true. But prosperity can be foreseen by proper economic policies, fiscal policies and social policies that are married and interrelated one with the other so that we end up with a country prepared to face the future, not frozen in the ideological mould of this particular minister who cannot seem to see beyond the dollars and nuts and bolts of a supposed dollar economy without looking at the people who make up that dollar economy.

I listened with great interest to better understand this government and to find out how this government was going to reconcile its general economic policies with its social policies, with its political policies, with the state of the nation, and in particular with respect to this Bill C-32; this policy of the government with that of keeping this country united, with helping the underprivileged, the underemployed, the unemployed and the poor in particular adjust to the changes that are taking place both interprovincially and internationally in the trade area.

This bill is supposed to deal with the poorest in our country. That is the goal of this particular bill. Whoever wrote the speech for the minister seems to have forgotten what the goal in this bill was all about.

I was curious and hopeful that the current political agenda be not totally dominated by our constitutional arrangement of where, what, and who sits in which rooms of our house. That is important to be sure, but the house is for the people, all people in all stages of their lives as they journey through life.

It is for the people in this house, in our house, which is covered with a common roof, a common set of practical values and that we build the foundation for a solid country where we are going to manage our house for all the people as they move from room, to room, to room, or whether they moved upstairs or downstairs as the world changes around them both inside and outside its borders.

The taxpayers' pocket is one pocket. The federal government in lauding how it has cut its deficit just completely ignores how it dumped that deficit on to the provinces which then subsequently dumps it into the municipalities. The long-term effect of that is that the same person has three people tearing at its pockets if he or she has any pockets left at all from which to pay the taxes.

Peoples' needs, economic and social, cannot be sidelined with the level of unemployment at 10.6 per cent and higher in certain areas—certainly higher in Montreal—with the level of the underemployed, with youth and immigrants feeling rejected, neglected and depressed, and even with those highly trained and highly educated who cannot get jobs, who move around looking for work. They move to those provinces which seem to be the provinces of higher prosperity: Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. They have had the major burden to bear of people looking for jobs as a result of this government's very poor policy.

How government runs and manages its economy has and will have a great impact on how we will want to keep that roof over our heads as a nation. If this is nation building according to this government, I think it is a pretty sad beginning to a very important week in the history of this country.

My theme is one of economic and social policy which go hand in hand; one complements the other. They are not mutually exclusive, and this is what this government does not seem to understand. Given the made-in-Canada recession, high unemployment, the free trade agreement that has severely dislocated our manufacturing base, the goods and services tax, and the unemployment insurance changes, provincial social assistance case loads are increasing at a much faster rate, particularly in the three affected provinces where people moved to find jobs that have now disappeared.

I have had some experiences about the impact of this government's fiscal policy. I have seen the street people in Montreal. I have seen those who sleep on the heat outlets, in the doorways. I have seen those who go to a place called Chez Doris—and there are places like Chez Doris everywhere across this land—and other centres where they get a meal. Sometimes they are lucky enough to get a bed. Believe me it touches our hearts; not that minister's but most people in this country. It raises questions in our minds. These people are the visible testimony and the example of the holes that we now have in our social safety net due to the poor policies we have seen from this government.

• (1230)

Mr. Kilgour: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. After last week you would think that the minister of fisheries would know better than to say, as he just did, "silly woman" to the speaker on our side of the House.

I would ask that you rule on whether that is a sexist remark made by a donkey from Newfoundland, if I can put it that bluntly.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should get his facts straight. I have not opened my mouth or said a word about anyone whether they are silly or not silly. So his statement is completely false and should be withdrawn.

Mrs. Finestone: Not only did you call me silly, you called me stupid. I think you should think about what you are saying. It degrades you and this House.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I, along with other colleagues who are sitting here listening to the member for Mount Royal speak, distinctly heard the member for Brampton, in a very condescending way, refer to the hon. member as a silly woman. He would not have called a male member of Parliament a silly man. He said so in a condescending way.

An hon. member: And you are a silly man.

Mr. Nunziata: He also referred to the member as stupid.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, in view of what has transpired in this House over the last number of days, that you take immediate disciplinary action and require that member, who is also a minister of the Crown, to apologize to this member immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask the collaboration of all hon. members because some of the words said in this House cannot be heard by the Speaker.

[Translation]

And I am sure you realize that the Speaker cannot— A lot of inaudible remarks are made which I can't hear when the microphone is closed. Consequently, I would ask both sides of the House to co-operate so that debate can resume in a spirit of harmony. If any members would like to withdraw or correct their remarks, they may do so, but so far I have not heard any unparliamentary language as defined by Beauchesne's.

The member for Mount Royal has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I would like to apologize, without equivocation to the minister of fisheries. He is seated about three metres away from the minister from Brampton. You, sir, and I are seated about four metres apart. I heard the expression very clearly, but I am advised by members in my party that it was not the minister of fisheries who made the comment; it was the minister from Brampton. I would submit, sir, that it was audible to you, Mr. Speaker, and this side of the House.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, whether or not the Chair heard the comment, I would submit to you is not relevant. Those words were spoken. Members on this side of the House heard the words distinctly. The member has not denied making that condescending reference to my colleague. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that just because the Speaker does not happen to hear a condescending expression from the member opposite does not mean that it did not happen. We heard it and we would ask that the member apologize.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I repeat that Hansard will show what was said, and for the time being, although the Chair did not hear the remarks, it reserves the right to check Hansard for additional information of the kind mentioned by the hon. member. Meanwhile, I may remind hon. members that in the House it is customary to take members at their word, and for the time being I consider the incident closed, subject to more extensive checks as soon as Hansard is published.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I do not deny making the statement "that was silly" and "silly woman". I also called her mate across the hall a silly man as well, because his statements were silly as well.

I apologize if I have offended the hon. member. I am not sure that I did, but she accused me of not caring for the poor.

Anybody from my constituency who knows my work in Brampton for those less fortunate than the rest would absolutely deny that. For her to make a statement like that in the House is silly.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask the hon. member to co-operate. I think that what the minister just said should normally be considered to close the incident.

The hon. member for Ottawa West.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, you had ruled the discussion closed, but since it has been reopened by the last point of order, I am going to intervene at this point.

Until now, only men in the Chamber have spoken on the intervention by the member, and frankly it is only women who can feel the sick feeling in the stomach when our gender happens to be a factor in our performance and in how our words are received in this House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but members cannot do indirectly what they are forbidden to do directly. After the minister's remarks, I consider the incident closed, and I suggest we resume debate.

The hon. member for Mount Royal.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, the fact that I am offended, the fact that it is an offence that gender is always pulled in by some members in this House and the fact that this person happens to be a minister of the Crown, I think are to be taken into consideration. I am glad you are going to review the tapes and then make a decision.

With respect to Bill C-32, the act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, we must consider our concerns about the deficit in far greater balance with the long-term social needs that Canada faces.

We are not here cleaning up a corporate balance sheet for an upcoming annual meeting. This is a country that we are building for the long term.

The Canada Assistance Plan was created in 1966 to permit the federal government to enter into cost sharing agreements with provincial governments for the provision of social assistance and social welfare services for Canadians in need.

CAP is one of the major cornerstones of the social security system in Canada. This program is a reflection of our widely shared values that are at the root of our political culture.

CAP is a service of last resort. It is one to alleviate poverty. The bottom line is that this federal government is abrogating another sacred trust of Canada's social programs. It abrogates this trust by amendments in a small, two-page finance bill.

It has violated the spirit of federal-provincial co-operation which has marked the 24-year history of CAP, and it acted unilaterally for the first time in the history of CAP.

This bill is a companion to that nefarious bill, Bill C-69, which was so capably analysed by my colleague, the member for Winnipeg North Centre. I hope he is feeling much better today. We miss him.

The CAP cuts were just a giant leap backward. It is an unwise, short-sighted counterproductive policy. It is not smart economic policy, which I will debate later.

CAP was designed to address the consequences and causes of poverty due to illness, disability, family break-up and unemployment. It was to be quite simply Canada's war on poverty. CAP allowed Canadians to share in the benefits and obligations of common nationhood and to strengthen their identity within Canada.

What does this bill do? It reaffirms the agenda this government has been pursuing for seven years now, which is to attack the fundamental social safety net of this country that has been established over decades, to pursue a financial debt and deficit reduction in a clearly unbalanced way, ignoring the tremendous social debt and deficit we also face in this country.

Yes, fiscal responsibility is one objective, but along with good social policy we can get a balance. Good government requires a balanced pursuit of both economic opportunity and social justice.

This bill, introduced under the Minister of Finance, implements a measure announced in the 1991 budget and will drain the federal government contributions to CAP by billions. The federal government admits this. You heard it in the speech today; it will save billions in federal transfer payments to the affected provinces over five years, through 1995-96. It will contain at most 3 per cent any potential growth that may be required as we have to restructure and face the internationally competitive world. As I said before, it dumps more responsibility on to the strained provincial budgets. You cannot get blood from a stone. The affected provinces, Ontario, Alberta and B.C., for their part, expect the actual lost dollars to be much higher than what this government has stated. We know how often the Minister of Finance has had inaccurate predictions and has had to correct them after the fact.

• (1240)

The provinces affected by this restraint measure are home to about 46 per cent of the poor families in Canada. Fifty-four per cent of all welfare recipients under CAP live in those provinces; 40 per cent of those receiving welfare payments are children. It is they who will suffer.

Who are the people most affected by this bill? Who suffers the most when government fails to take its proper economic and social responsibility, in balance with deficit concerns, not outside of it? It is the children of this land. If Canada wants to have a strong, creative society tomorrow, it must invest in its children today.

The federal government continually says that it wants to target social programs to the people who are most in need. The capping of CAP will do the exact opposite. It will take away help from the people who need it most, our children. Not only is this inhuman, it is not smart economic policy. To create a productive society and a sound economy tomorrow, we must provide today's children with the tools they need to be creative, contributing citizens. That is why Bill C-32 is entirely counterproductive.

That is why we say, along with the deficit concerns, that we have to balance them with the long-run social and economic goals of this country. That means investing in our children, not cutting back the tools with which they need to live and to prosper in this country.

It is not only children. It is young adults, university students and immigrants who have come here for a new life. It is the whole gamut of underemployed, unemployed and those who fall outside the social safety net who need our help.

The result is that the majority of the most vulnerable people living in this country are very hard hit by this measure. This bill brings into question this government's lack of morality in not treating all Canadians, wherever they live, fairly and equitably.

Of course, the impact of this bill must be added to a similar measure passed as part of the 1990 budget, known as Bill C-69, which cut the growth of the same CAP transfers through 1990, 1991 and 1992 for these three provinces. That nefarious bill, put through on closure, also accelerated funding cutbacks for medicare and post-secondary education to all provinces, jeopardizing the ability and quality of those programs across Canada. In that bill, federal money paid to the provinces for these programs are reduced each year from the 1989-90 level of about $9 billion to zero by the year 2004. However, this government wants us to believe it is taking care of and looking to its responsibilities in building a nation in containing and enhancing this country.

Would you mind telling me what the federal government is targeting for cuts with this measure? I will tell you what they are. Under the CAP plan, the federal and provincial governments share equally in the cost of basic necessities, such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies needed by those most in need and the most needy in our society. Only a Conservative could question that these vital programs are luxuries or frivolous or are misused, but that is the conclusion from C-32. That is the conclusion from what this minister's message was this morning.

Under CAP, services are provided for children who are in care or are in need of protection due to abuse or neglect, mentally and physically disabled people, one parent families, the aged, the unemployed, families or individuals in crisis, low income workers, battered women, and rape crisis centres. Do these people sound like the kind of people with the luxury of tightening their belts, as the Minister of Finance keeps saying and keeps espousing? CAP services include essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, subsidized child care for low income families and dental care.

Many Canadians agree with financial responsibility in government, but do these sound like programs where federal dollars are being squandered or wasted? Hardly I would say. It would take a Conservative to think that way. I would suspect that most Canadians would agree with me.

The restraints in Bill C–32 are bad enough in their own right, but they also confirm once again to this whole country that this government's approach of attacking the most vulnerable of society seems to be a mindset with them. It reminds those at the bottom of the income ladder that Tory times are very tough times. It tells those who today must look to government for a hand to get in line behind this government's crusade against the deficit. It says once again that this government will pursue the deficit problem alone and above all others.

As important as it is to address the deficit, it is only half the answer for a strong, competitive, productive Canada for tomorrow.

[Translation]

In the early 1990s, we have good reasons to fear the destruction of our social safety net, due to this Conservative government's approach.

Indeed, since 1984, this government has pursued a legislative and fiscal agenda that breaks systematically and radically with the traditional values and priorities of our country. For example, we can mention the abolition of universality for family allowances and old age pensions, which are now a thing of the past for thousands of beneficiaries who have to pay them back on their income tax.

There is no doubt that many of my constituents in Mount Royal agree with this observer who said recently that the government seems to have shifted responsibility for social programs from the Department of Health and Welfare to the Department of Finance, which does not have a reputation for very advanced social thinking or for being the government's conscience. Only now, after seven years of this Conservative government, do we start to realize the consequences of this decision to entrust our social policies to economists, lawyers and tax specialists in the Department of Finance.

The government has not yet understood that reducing the deficit in itself is not a social policy.

[English]

This government's record in a relatively seven short years stands as a clear rejection of Canada's proud record in advancing the cause of social justice and enhancing our social safety net as a symbol of a caring and just society. Just look back. The forties brought the Unemployment Insurance Act, universal family allowances, the National Housing Act, Central Mortgage and Housing, all steps and all measures to decrease the gap between the rich and poor in this country, something this government has managed to increase.

The fifties also extended the social safety net in this country, including income security provisions for the elderly and for the disabled, 50 per cent cost sharing with the provinces for social assistance payments and a share in the cost of provincial hospital insurance programs. But this is all weeping lilies and weeping willies. According to this government, this is not good social and economic policy for a country. We must have deficit reduction at all costs, it says.

The sixties brought the Canada Pension Plan, old age security, guaranteed annual income and the CAP plan, the Canada Assistance Plan. Through the seventies these programs delivered to Canadians the kind of society they wanted and believed in. The early eighties continued this trend with the Canada Health Act, reaffirming universal medical coverage and an end to provincial extra billing.

• (1250)

Who would argue today that those were not good steps for Canada and every Canadian? Certainly not our Prime Minister. He thought they were wonderful, that they were a sacred trust. Yet this government appears to believe its greatest achievement has been in reversing this proud record and often in sneaky, back–handed sorts of ways. It is never through the front door, never as a policy choice during an election.

This government has seen fit, since 1984, to attack Canada's achievements as a country instead of pursuing a balanced agenda between economic opportunity and social justice. It is an attack that continues through this small two-line bill, Bill C-32.

Canadians will remember the regressive steps taken by this government, cuts to medicare and post-secondary education through the EPF restraints, clawbacks of old age pensions and family allowance benefits, removal of the interest income deduction from the income tax form measure which so helped our seniors, cuts to unemployment insurance programs which affected every part of this country, special fees on student loans that make the burden of education even higher, deindexation of the child tax credits, abandonment of child care, not once but three times, and cuts to housing programs. The list goes on and on.

[Translation]

This bill is only another in a long list of initiatives affecting our social programs that this government has put forward in recent years in the name of budget restrictions and deficit reduction. However, this bill is very representative of the government's short-sightedness in choosing to ignore the many real problems facing us, in order to concentrate all its energy on reducing the deficit.

When I see ministers get out of their luxury limousines in the morning, I tell myself that at the same time hundreds of thousands of Canadians have also got up but cannot go to work as before because they no longer have a job. They are unemployed, thanks largely to Brian Mulroney's government.

[English]

This government, as the ministers opposite are whisked off to work, just does not consider that there are families in turmoil out there, families that cannot pay their bills. They are losing their homes. They are sending their children off to school hungry and they are losing dignity and hope.

This government thinks it is doing the right thing. At least, it has a philosophic bent that seems to be frozen. This government appears oblivious to the plight of the beggar on the street. It is oblivious to the family slipping below the poverty line. It has little feeling for the family that cannot adequately feed and clothe itself.

It is demonstrating all of this in this small little bill. Its aim is to limit the benefits to those in this country who need help the most. I have told you that 40 per cent of the people being hit are children. These are the people whose children need clothes, bread on their tables. These people want desperately to work, and yet deficit reduction is the top priority of this government. It is important that it be a priority, but not the only one. The Prime Minister has said it is. The last Minister of Finance said it was. The new Minister of Finance says it is. This minister—I do not know of what—says it is.

What the government has not learned is that deficit reduction is not a social policy. Yes, you can ensure that good financial management is among your goals, but it is just one. You cannot substitute good, sound, forward-thinking social and economic policies with only a policy of deficit reduction. You cannot simply use deficit reduction as an excuse to do nothing. You cannot ignore the need for adjustment programs and for sound restructuring policies to ensure a productive, competitive work force in the new global economy.

Good government, to me, requires a vision for people, a plan that puts in place a commitment to that plan that really makes it work. Good government always requires a more balanced and broader approach.

This government has failed to learn that you have to consider, along with the country's economic and financial deficits, the tremendous social debt and deficit that we face now and which will become worse in the future if we do not do something about it now.

These social debts and deficits, whether in education, whether sending a child to school hungry, whether if ignored will grow and be exacerbated in the long run by a narrow vision and no foresight by the government opposite, are the real fundamental issues. We cannot abandon social targets and social policy goals in order to accommodate some sort of blind, narrow-minded view that the deficit should be our strait-jacket.

This government has made the mistake of not forging a balanced approach. This government's economic agenda has stolen from Canadian families any real improvement in their fiscal situations and created massive unemployment. It then makes the poorest in our society pay for it and pay the biggest cost. It then tries to give us an argument that it has created jobs, jobs, jobs, and that it is thinking of the future and it has good plans. It is funny nobody can see it but the government. It is like the emperor without the clothes.

[Translation]

By itself, the deficit reduction policy favoured by this government cannot solve our problems and meet our many needs right now in research and development, education, manpower development and retraining. Well thought out and well considered policies are what is needed now. We cannot address appropriately the market's structural problems nor ensure the much needed competitiveness of our manpower on the world markets with inadequate programs. This obsession with deficit reduction does absolutely nothing in terms of improving the skills of a single Canadian worker. This fixation does nothing either for all those people who stand in line at soup kitchens, food banks and shelters for the homeless.

What is needed to address the most urgent of our social problems are clearly defined and effective policies that blend with our economic policies and are just an afterthought.

If we want to build a caring and compassionate nation then people must come first and priority must be given to those in need the men, women and children of this country at the same time as we address the deficit. That is what slipped their minds, they forgot to take that into consideration.

This government believes that we can afford the luxury of waiting until the deficit has been eliminated before considering any assistance to the million and a half unemployed in this country. I say to this government that they are wrong, dead wrong, that we cannot afford such luxury. They also think that they can remain unruffled. Does all that misery not bother them? They concentrate exclusively on the deficit while a growing number of Canadian men and women have to queue up at food banks and while in greater number they have been reduced to begging to survive. Fewer and fewer Canadian children can dream of having a decent future. Their poverty is not only physical but also moral, since they have become hopeless.

I am telling the departments and the ministers who are here today: you are making a mistake. You have strayed. You must get back on track and understand that your first obligation is not to beat the deficit but to take care of the people you are responsible for. These two responsibilities should be better balanced. One is not exclusive of the other.

[English]

This government mistakenly believes that blindly paying attention only to the deficit will somehow magically stop children from having to go to school hungry each morning. It will not. Will it find shelter for the homeless? It will not. I simply say that we do not have the luxury of playing which comes first, the deficit or the strengthening of the social fabric of this country and the upgrading of the skills of its people to face the international and interprovincial trades that we require in this country. It is a trade-off this government is making every day and it is totally unacceptable.

• (1300)

Mr. Boyer: Did you like the announcement 10 days ago about the disabled?

Mrs. Finestone: You did a few things right, Patrick. I did not say you did everything wrong, but very few things. The disabled in terms of housing are not particularly happy. Come and speak to the disabled and those who are in charge of housing in my riding. Find out what they have to say about the degree and the condition of the infrastructure and the apartments and the housing which you have stopped financing.

Mr. McDermid: This is a provincial responsibility.

Mrs. Finestone: Oh, dump it on the provinces again. If you did not keep cutting, the provinces would have the money to do it.

I read the Constitution very well. It is too bad you do not know how to read the Constitution. Your first try was very ineffective. I hope the second one will be much better. We are all hoping that.

While this government is focused so blindly—Mr. Speaker, I will take it up again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You have seven minutes left.

Mrs. Finestone: Do I have it left now or after? Plus tard ou maintenant?

I know I have discomforted the people opposite, some of the ministers, the minister who is in charge of fisheries out on the east coast and the west coast; the minister who was once in charge of transportation, which is now totally dishevelled and upset. A number of these ministers have recommended that we go through belt tightening, and it is slipping from belt tightening to a belt around the neck for millions of Canadians, choking them now and maybe permanently.

This government uses rhetoric of equality to mask an agenda that widens the gap between rich and poor, through arcane tax changes and the slow elimination of publicly funded programs. This is not acceptable.

In the end, what is this bill? It is one more instalment on the Tory agenda which Canadians have been living with for seven years. It is an agenda which has as its main focus a sort of blind, narrow-minded preoccupation with the financial debt and deficit, ignoring the social debt and deficit. It is one in which market forces alone are supposed to carry the day and in which survival of the fittest replaces the goal of a caring, compassionate Canada and a more just society.

The result has been an era in Canada in which tremendous social and infrastructure needs have been ignored. The message is that we in Canada have always had a balanced agenda. I suggest that in the end Canadians will agree that deficit reduction fails miserably as constructive social policy or a social policy of any kind.

The total debt and the annual deficit are to be treated in a most serious way. They are real problems. There is not much room for fiscal manoeuvring if that is your only concern. However, relative to other industrial countries I would remind you that Canada spends a much lower percentage of its GNP on social programs. I also think that Canadians agree that you cannot substitute deficit reduction for policies that actually help people.

I do not think that Canadians like the image of people lining up at food banks, of people needing clothing, of people being homeless, of people being hungry. That is the other side of the reality facing this country every single day.

My last words with respect to this national government is that it should start to reflect the concerns of the people and respond to their needs. That is why it was elected. This bill fails to reflect the true needs of Canada. It reaffirms this government's failure at balancing deficit concerns and our economic and financial deficit with social concerns.

Do not forget that losing a job is for many people a sort of death sentence. The dignity of the unemployed who do not have the choice of working and earning their living honourably is removed.

Mahatma Gandhi was once asked what he thought of western civilization. He paused, and then he said: "I think it would be a good idea". This government would do well to consider a more civilized approach, one that takes into account the concerns I have outlined and accepts its social responsibilities.

I would recommend the government take its ideological blinders off, withdraw Bill C-32 and go back to the drawing board so that Canadians might be again able to look to their national government as a true reflection of the values we share as a people.

It has a fiduciary responsibility for the poorest in this country. That is what the Canada Assistance Plan is all about and that is what it should have done; a more equitable place in society where economic, fiscal and social concerns are part of the national agenda.

I finish with three thoughts. What this government has not learned is that deficit reduction is not a social policy, that to survive in the international and national arenas, we must restore a sense of balance between economic and social goals on our national agenda if we want to build a nation. You cannot substitute good, sound, forward looking social policy with a policy of deficit reduction. Good government always requires a much more balanced approach between economic and social goals for our nation.

[Translation]

I would have repeated this in French had I had the time, Mr. Speaker, but I think that I made it clear and that others will have to repeat it time and time again to make this government realize it has made a mistake and it is going the wrong way. I certainly hope that this country will survive, in spite of the way it is managed and the decisions this government has made.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate. I want to thank the previous speaker for presenting her party's point of view on this current situation. Many of her comments I agree with. I think it is important that we hear all sides on this issue, but I know the government will have its way with this legislation, as it does with its overwhelming majority.

A lot of curious things are said during a debate to bolster an argument. I want to go over a couple of things said by my good friend, the member for Brampton. In making his point the minister said that the servicing of the federal debt took 33 cents of every dollar that Canadians contribute to governments. Then he went on to explain to Canadians why three provinces were under the cap, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

I can speak certainly for British Columbia, but I wanted to make just one observation which seems to be a bit paradoxical about Ontario and perhaps some people might think hypocritical. Since I am in politics I understand the difference between hypocrisy and paradox. Perhaps the Chair could explain how it views it.

In suggesting that the federal government is burdened with having to put 33 cents of every dollar on to the federal debt and rationalizing why there was a cap on Ontario, he said: "They only have to pay 7 cents for every dollar of debt". How can that be when the Prime Minister of this country has gone around scorching the Government of Ontario for its deficit extension of $9 billion when this government is going to have a deficit of $35 billion this year and yet admit that it is paying more than four times per year to service the debt than what Ontario is? Hypocrisy or paradox?

I think the member has been attacking the Prime Minister behind the Prime Minister's back, going around saying that Ontario is paying one-quarter of the debt servicing even though it has a deficit this year that is going to serve people, while it is cutting services to people and paying 33 cents per dollar. Hypocrisy or paradox, Mr. Speaker, I leave it to you to judge.

Second, when this government came into office it said that it was going to campaign to cut the deficit, cut the accumulated debt of this country through deficits. When they came in the deficit was a little over $100 billion.

• (1310)

An hon. member: Two hundred billion.

Mr. Barrett: Yes, $200 billion. They have managed to double it, more than double it, in the time they have been in office.

My friend is quibbling with me about what the federal deficit will be this year. I said $35 billion and he says $30 billion. What was the name of that famous cabinet minister who said: "What's a million?" C. D. Howe said: "What's a million?" These guys say: "What's five billion?"

There is a $30 billion deficit. They have doubled the national debt since they have been in office, and they have the gall to come in here and lecture people on how tough it has been for them to double the debt and the deficit.

An hon. member: All interest.

Mr. Barrett: All interest. Now we get to this cry—all interest. If they wanted to avert some of the problems of internal interest, why in the world did they maintain the high interest rates that were bleeding Canadian businesses, Canadian citizens and Canadian taxpayers in accumulating this debt? Then they come in here and say: "Well, it was all interest". It is like the person who goes out and kills his mother, kills his father, and then goes to court and pleads for mercy because he is an orphan. I find that kind of logic frankly absurd, but it is Tory logic. They are on this maniacal drive to cut back services to people on a right wing agenda that Milton Freedman would applaud. It has gone so far that they make Margaret Thatcher look like Florence Nightingale when it comes to services in this country.

I want to tell you that the absurdity, the paradox and the hypocrisy of this government show no limit. But there is a tender heart in this government's body for one sector of the community. Let us hear it, Mr. Speaker, for the downtrodden corporations of this nation that have been so oppressed under a previous Liberal government, which had a bit of a social conscience—not enough, but a bit of a social conscience. But let us examine the record of this government when it comes to fair share in taxes. Oh, squeeze the little guy, squeeze the GST, cut back in provincial transfers, but let's take a look at just one year with corporations under the Conservative government.

These corporations never have to go in front of a social worker, never have to show what their food budget is, never have to show what their housing allowance is. They just go on a wink and a nudge between the corporations and this government.

Using the government's own statistics, because I find them convenient, I want to point to just one year, 1987. These figures are from Statistics Canada, before the minimum tax, when you were piling up deficits. Then you were adding to the debt, then you were pouring it on to the debt. You called the Liberals all kinds of names, names that I could agree with for I am not a Liberal, but at least have some decency to admit the names you were calling them had no foundation in fact when you come to this part, of how you have messed up the economy of this country as my colleague said through the GST, through the free trade agreement and now capping the provinces.

I know there are a lot of Canadians out there who will never vote Tory again after I read this information from Statistics Canada. As a matter of fact, there are very few Tories left. Has this government ever pondered why they are at 16 per cent in the polls—16 per cent in the polls? The Canadian people are telling them that they are fed up. Here are some of the reasons why.

I am glad the member is here, and I will send him my autographed notes after because he wants this material to back up his speeches.

In 1987 they had 362,828 corporations that reported $87.7 billion in profit. Now of course that was before the minimum tax. The effective tax rate at that time was supposed to be 36 per cent. That is right. Thanks to a leaky system the effective rate of taxation of these profits was 17.7 per cent. A net of $15 billion was payable. They did not pay their fair share then. They are not paying their fair share now. If we are going to pay down the debts of this country piled up by an insensitive stupid Conservative government, at least make it a fair share. The corporations still are not paying their fair share.

Let me go further, Mr. Speaker. The best is yet to come. Despite combined profits of $25 billion, fully 118,000 corporations, or about one in three, paid no corporate income tax whatsoever. When the debt was piling up because of fiscal policies that were frankly so right wing it made Milton Freedman embarrassed, they were still letting the corporations off the hook.

Tell that to the mother on welfare when she cannot feed her two kids and has to line up in the food bank. Tell that to the unemployed in Montreal and the shopkeepers who have had to close up in downtown Montreal. Tell that to the prairie farmers who are trying to eke out a living at the lowest price wheat in history since the 1930s. Tell them you could not hit the corporations while they were piling up the debt. There were billions and billions and billions of dollars in favouritism to those corporations, while the average Canadians had to carry the can for their stupid fiscal policies.

Who piled up $400 billion in debt? They did. Who is it that is causing us to pay 33 cents on every dollar on debt charges? They are. Who is it that attacks Ontario because they pay 7 cents on every dollar? They are. Who are the hypocrites, Mr. Speaker? I ask you to ponder that question. I only raise it as a paradox.

I find it less than amusing that this government forces that poor unfortunate minister into a position of defending a policy that is another cut at Canadian federation.

If you want to keep this country together, Mr. Speaker, the way is first of all to come clean about how the debt was accumulated.

Who was responsible for these fiscal policies, and how we are going to get out of it? It is not good enough to come in here and suggest that three rich provinces have to carry more of the can while the other seven do not. We all agree with that. When we bound ourselves together as a nation in Confederation we said in good times in some regions; we would share bad times in other regions.

There is not a taxpayer in this country who would not at any given time understand the need to share right across the board. Under the former Liberal administration there was a move to put a cap on health care spending, to put a formula in on the richer provinces. Ten premiers met with the then Prime Minister and in concert they rejected the formula and went back to the standard concept that a Canadian is a Canadian is a Canadian, and in good times we share and in hard times we expect to be shared with. That concept is being destroyed by this bill. Amid all the flimflam about constitutional debate and regional concerns, this government has made a mess of the economy. They have piled up huge deficits, accumulated debts in this country, and now they are going back to the ordinary people, not the corporations, and saying: "You carry the can". Some regions have to carry it more than others.

Nothing could be more divisive. Nothing could be designed to destroy this country more than the very idea of this legislation. It is not just its application, but in the abstract the concept of this legislation is giving the idea that we will permanently have in this country have and have-not provinces.

That is wrong. That is foolish. We should understand that Canadians are the same from coast to coast and, if you are going to put in Draconian legislation on three provinces, you create divisive attitudes about where you live and regional fairness.

I want to go on to that other group in this country that does not pay their fair share, the chartered banks. In this instance I am not going to savage the current government, but I am going to chide the previous Liberal administration for setting the pattern of allowing the banks to get off the hook. In their last years in office from 1981 to 1984, the Liberals in the same circumstances, moving toward deficits for the first time in large numbers, tried to control the deficit without even touching the banks.

• (1320)

In 1981 to 1984 inclusive, Canada's seven largest banks made profits of $5.37 billion and paid taxes at a rate of 1.34 per cent.

Shame on the Liberals. Shame on the Liberals for giving the banks a break. There is a recession today. That is what they are arguing.

An hon. member: They made it.

Mr. Barrett: They made the world-wide recession? Oh, come now. I can blame the Tories for a lot of things, but they are too incompetent to create a world-wide recession. They have just done it here in Canada. They have only done it here in Canada. They would not have the competence to do it internationally.

To suggest to me that the Liberal's response was to the recession, recession or not the banks made the $5 billion profit. Why did the Liberals not tax them? I know why. When the Liberals are in office they are very right wing. When they are in opposition they are very left wing. That has been the pattern of this country. That is the Liberal schizophrenia that I just had to remind the House about casually when I speak about paradoxes. Should they be returned to office and there is a breath in my body, I will remind them word and paragraph and chapter of the statements they made while they were in opposition. Oh, will I remind them.

Nonetheless, the Tories did not create the recession. What was their response to it? They dug us in even deeper. The high dollar a former minister of Crown suggested was a fixed deal with the United States. Mr. Sinclair Stevens said it and the government denied it. I am inclined to believe Mr. Sinclair Stevens. I have not met the gentleman and so that is why I believe him. I have met the other Tories, so I will pick the one I have not met yet. If I have to do it on that scale it is very easy.

The gentleman said there was a fixed dollar and I agree with him. Why else would the Canadian dollar be going up, up, up like that?

An hon. member: There are lots of reasons.

Mr. Barrett: Lots of reasons. Has the government ever heard of pegging the dollar? Has the government ever heard of the fiscal instrument of leading the nation by saying that the dollar will be traded at x amount?

An hon. member: Is that NDP policy?

Mr. Barrett: Is that NDP policy? I will say this: I would never have signed a softwood lumber deal as dumb as this government did. It pegged the dollar on the day and the dollar was on a rise and there was nothing in the deal to accept or adjust for that rise. Only Tories could make that kind of a decision.

An hon. member: You did not answer my question.

Mr. Barrett: I will. I would peg the dollar. I would also limit interest rates. I would never have allowed them domestically to go the way they did. We would have had a two-level interest rate policy in this country.

Total intrusion in the market. What is the bill? It is a total intrusion in the budgets of the 10 provinces that we are trying to keep together as Confederation. If you say that we are intruding on a market, what in the world are you doing interfering in provincial budgets? The provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia do not need it. You are giving lessons to the provinces that you will not keep yourself.

I find it hypocritical or paradoxical. Back to the banks and what the Liberals allowed the banks to get away with. Not again.

An hon. member: Are you going to nationalize them if elected?

Mr. Barrett: They are already nationalized, only it is a private sector nationalization. Those five banks do not enjoy any competition at all. Try and get some regional competition in banks.

An hon. member: Would you nationalize them?

Mr. Barrett: I would allow the provinces to expand like Quebec has done with the caisse populaire. I would allow the provinces to become far more aggressive as Quebec has done in its economy. Give them some competition. The one thing you free enterprisers do not believe in is competition for those monopoly corporations.

An hon. member: Tell us what you did for them.

Mr. Barrett: We tried to get the Liberals to open up the banking system. I understand that your government may be doing that. If that is the case, congratulations to you.

An hon. member: What do you think of Bob Rae these days?

Mr. Barrett: He just proved the case against Bob Rae. You were not in here. It would help you grow hair.

I will just remind the hon. member of the comparison he gave of Ontario paying 7 cents on the dollar. It is up to 33 cents a dollar and they are cluck-clucking about Ontario. That is hypocrisy or paradox.

The record is replete with how this particular government has made a mess of the economy. It has destroyed almost every one of the fiscal attachments that make this Confederation an attractive place to be for all citizens. It has assaulted the poor and small businesses in this country and then has come along with this bill and said: "Now, you will have to pay for all the insults we have given you".

This government is no longer fit to govern. This government does not have a mandate with the Canadian people. It is not popular in any section of this nation.

I think the best and the healthiest thing that could happen in this country is not this kind of stupid legislation but an immediate election. Let the chips fall where they may.

My God, if a government has ever outlived its time, it is this one. Was it Cromwell who said: "For God's sake, go"? If I may invoke Cromwell, you should have gone months ago.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I am always interested in listening to the member from British Columbia because I share his concern about the banks.

The banks, as he knows, are paying very, very little in terms of income taxes and from all indications have a great many Canadians very unhappy with them.

Will he tell us specifically what his party would do with respect to the banks? Would he nationalize one or all of them? While he is at it, would he tell us why it was that during the three years that he was premier of British Columbia there was such a precipitous loss of confidence in that province? I think he will acknowledge that, or I hope he will because I am a friend of his successor, Mr. Harcourt, and have high regard for him.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, first of all, let us deal with the myths about British Columbia.

I will put my seat up against any member of this Chamber who claims that we did not have balanced budgets in the province of British Columbia during the NDP administration.

The fact is we did. We also left $600 million in assets that were later dissipated under the British Columbia Resource Investment Corporation into which poor, unfortunate people were inveigled to invest $30,000 of their funds under a right wing government known as Social Credit. Now BRIC shares are down to about 80 cents.

I can give you a litany of the other assets that were left. The British Columbia Petroleum Corporation. A book which one of the retired executives of West Coast Transmission has written points out that it made $700 million just by marketing natural gas back to the people of British Columbia.

Enough said. If you want to stake your seat on our financial record, do it, but let us put the myth to rest.

The banking system: I personally do not believe that we should buy a bank. I do not believe that, and I do not believe that we should bail out banks either, like the Tories did. In a free marketplace, you have a God-given right to lose money. I find it interesting that they only help the rich when they lost money, not the poor.

What are the alternatives? One of the simple alternatives is to have the logic and the common sense to use internal Canadian financing, just as the Liberal administration started using the Canada Pension Plan in a very, very good way. The step further from the Liberal policy of using the CPP would now be to allow those investors in RRSPs to have access to municipal bonds at 5 per cent and give them a tax credit holiday while the money is in the RRSP and the bond money is being used locally.

There is $90 billion in the hands of the private banks, half of which is only self-directed in the RRSP. If you used the other half and made municipal bonds available—I have spoken on this at some length—it would take that money away from the banks which have nothing innovative at all other than to make massive amounts of profit on interest with no social policy attached.

This is not socialism or free enterprise. This is common sense. Use the indigenous pool of capital that exists in this country to start creating jobs so people can pay taxes and we do not have deficits. People unemployed create deficits because they are not being productive. There is one way.

• (1330)

The second way is to examine the possibilities of Ontario treasury boards, to examine the possibilities of the caisse populaire in Quebec and also the treasury boards in Alberta, indigenous financing for local projects on a long-term basis, the kind of imaginative use of Canadian capital which is not at the vagaries of international capital. It is not offshore borrowing. It is using money here in this country the best we can to buffer ourselves during a recession. It is nothing magical. It is just a little bit of common sense.

The last point is fair shares. Make the banks become competitive by paying their fair share in the tax system. What is wrong with that? Nothing is wrong with it. Also the credit union movement must be strengthened in this country. Extol the virtues of how co-operation among ordinary depositors can be a powerful instrument in fiscal policy.

None of these ideas has been considered by this government. It makes the ordinary people carry the can while its rich friends get off on a free ride.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to have all the answers to the economic problems facing this country.

Can he explain to me, if his economic policies are so sound, why his government was defeated in British Columbia? Is he suggesting that his economic policies were accepted by the people of British Columbia? Did his economic platform in any way contribute to his defeat?

Mr. Barrett: I love to hear that question from my colleague who is a Liberal member. Five prominent citizens in British Columbia were elected as Liberals. Within months they walked across the floor and sat with Social Credit. They changed their policies by changing coats. They are the ones who defeated the New Democratic Party before the government had a chance to extend itself.

An hon. member: And the people were defeated.

Mr. Barrett: Sure they were. There is no longer a Liberal Party in British Columbia. When the chips were down the Liberal Party in British Columbia went right wing. Four of its members crossed the floor. One of those who crossed the floor was Dr. Pat McGeer who wrote one of the most vicious books on Social Credit, condemning it from head to toe, scandals, payolas and everything. As soon as the Liberals got elected, they joined Social Credit.

While they sat in the cabinet, did they destroy the British Columbia Petroleum Corporation which they voted against and made $700 million for the people of British Columbia? They did not destroy it. Did they destroy the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia? No, they did not destroy it. Did they destroy the Small Development Corporation established by the province of British Columbia? No, they voted against it but did not destroy it.

Every single one of the fiscal initiatives of that government was voted against by those same Liberal members and when they came to power, they kept them and smugly laughed about the profits they made out of them.

I am not cynical. I welcome the questioners question. He is ignorant of his own party's duplicity, but I am just enlightening him a little bit. I would hope that once he gets elected as a Liberal he would stay there, instead of being hypocritical as the Liberals in British Columbia were.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult in this House to sit down and not ask some questions of the former speaker. I just have one. It will probably be quite easy for him to answer. Since really not much of what he said has much to do with the bill, I thought I would deal with one of the aspects of his comments.

I can remember back before I was a member of Parliament the policies of the now Official Opposition and the policies of the now New Democratic Party in this House. I would just like a very basic simple explanation as to why they continually fought campaigns showing a replica of the Canadian dollar. On that replica of the Canadian dollar they showed and used extensively across Canada a picture of the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. In that dollar they had the corner folded over and a piece of literature said that the dollar was now only worth 97 cents.

I campaigned against NDPs who thought that the dollar had come down too far. I campaigned against Liberals who said the same thing. What changed your view today, to say now it is a plus when before you said it was a minus in economic development. In your speech today you referred to the dollar being high and strong and said that was causing us all our trouble. You did not mention how it helps fight inflation and how it helps to buy American products on which we depend extensively.

The question to you, and I repeat it because you very seldom stand up and answer the question, why did you not like a deflated dollar in the 1950s and the 1960s and now think the deflated dollar is the only route to go? You were blaming the Conservatives in those years for having a deflated dollar.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the Diefenbaker dollar, but I will give him a simple explanation. The dollar was—

Mr. McDermid: You are much too young.

Mr. Barrett: I was much too young. Thank you very much, Mr. McDermid.

A 97 cent dollar internally is worth a heck of a lot more than a 77 cent dollar internally. Thirty-three cents of every dollar is going on that national debt. Diefenbaker did not pile up that national debt, this government did. It doubled Trudeau's national debt. The 97 cent dollar you are talking about is now a 77 cent dollar; that is internal debt.

I want to tell you that joining us in the House today is the former Liberal leader who knows even better than anyone how the Tories have messed up the economy since that time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting that the hon. member for the opposition should talk about everything except Bill C-32. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to get back to the bill itself and take a very good look at what this bill is supposed to achieve and consider why the government introduced this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32 concerns the Canada Assistance Plan, and most Canadians—I think more particularly of the people in the riding of Trois-Rivières—find it difficult to understand exactly what the federal government does for the provinces and how it all works. Perhaps I may take a few minutes to provide some background.

Mr. Speaker, in Canada, Ottawa or the federal government makes two types of payments to the provinces—the first kind is called equalization, which is probably the better known of the two. Equalization payments go to the so-called less wealthy provinces. Seven provinces receive equalization: the four Atlantic provinces, Quebec and Manitoba. Three provinces do not receive equalization payments: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

There is another program called the Canada Assistance Plan, which means transfer payments made by the federal government to all the provinces. For instance, my own province, the province of Quebec, would theoretically receive two cheques a year from the federal government: one for equalization payments and one for transfer payments to the provinces.

The bill before the House today, Mr. Speaker, applies strictly to transfer payments to the provinces. This bill provides that the so-called wealthy provinces—Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia—will see the annual increase in the amount of money they receive from Ottawa capped at 5 per cent. That is the purpose of this bill. Why? Why these provinces in particular?

As I said before, these are the wealthiest provinces, and in fact, Mr. Speaker, at the rate annual transfer payments to the provinces are increasing, they cost a lot of money. For instance, in 1984–85, the federal government gave the provinces $25.6 billion annually, and this was for all the provinces; in 1990–91, we are talking about $36.3 billion.

• (1340)

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia, since 1984 spending by all the provinces increased by an average of 6 per cent. Ontario, for instance, has an average annual rate of 10 per cent; British Columbia, 7.6 per cent; and Alberta, 4.3 per cent. Meanwhile, here in Ottawa, this government has cut increases in government expenditures down to an average of 3.7 per cent annually. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this government has taken draconian measures to ensure its expenditures do not increase. It has done so, Mr. Speaker, because in 1984, we had a national debt of a little over $2 billion, a legacy from the previous government, and since 1984 that debt has increased. The opposition often says it is all our fault. Mr. Speaker, if the opposition or anyone for that matter were to make a fair and accurate calculation of the increase in the national debt since this government came to power and also computed the annual interest payable on the debt we inherited, they would see the amount is the same. This means that if we exclude the interest on the debt, since 1984 we have managed to control spending by dint of good administration.

In 1984, Mr. Speaker, the federal government spent $16 billion more than it was getting in revenue. This year, the government will spend $12 billion less than it is getting in revenue. Mr. Speaker, this shows that in seven years we managed to get the administration of this country under control.

However, we still have a problem: the national debt is still there and the deficit is still there, and we must take steps to deal with the deficit and the national debt. One of the ways to do so is Bill C-32, which, I repeat, does not reduce the amount of money transferred to the three so-called wealthy provinces every year. What it does is cap increases in the amount of money the federal government sends to these provinces. The less wealthy provinces which, as I said earlier, receive both equalization payments and transfer payments will not be subject to capping. These provinces will receive the full amount to which they are entitled according to the formula and will not be capped at 5 per cent like the other three provinces.

Another thing we must understand Mr. Speaker, is that the government has frozen all increases in government spending at 3 per cent, until 1994–95, with the exception of transfers to the provinces, while transfers to the wealthy provinces will be capped at 5 per cent, not 3 per cent. Mr. Speaker, you will ask me: Why penalize three provinces? As I said earlier, these are fairly wealthy provinces. We must consider our financial situation. As you know, we often talk about the national debt and the deficit, and as far as the opposition and some Canadians are concerned, it is our problem, not theirs. It is no one else's problem. That is false, Mr. Speaker. The national debt belongs to all Canadians. Each and every Canadian has a $15,000 debt, his or her share of our national debt. It costs the federal government in Ottawa 35 cents of every dollar; 35 cents of every dollar received by Ottawa go strictly to pay the interest on our debt.

Mr. Speaker, Ontario's debt costs that province 11.6 cents per dollar; Alberta's, 8.3 cents per dollar; and British Columbia's, luckily for it, 4 cents per dollar.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that these three provinces together still pay less interest on their total debts than we do in the federal government. Perhaps they were better run in the past, I agree, but the problem is real. We are asking Canadians to tighten their belts. Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine returning to my riding of Trois-Rivières and telling people, "Look, 35 cents of every dollar you send is used to pay interest charges. I would like to raise your taxes a little to be able to give more to the provinces that pay between 4 and 11 cents per dollar as interest on their debt. These provinces are one tenth as indebted as the federal government." We have a social choice to make as a government. We can raise taxes again. I think that no one wants that, Mr. Speaker; you don't want it, I don't want it, Canadians don't want it.

But at the same time, some provinces have low debts, and thus little interest to pay and less to spend on finance charges. Mr. Speaker, those are the provinces that, like the majority of Canadians who are able, must help the federal government solve the problem of the debt and the annual deficit.

Mr. Speaker, that is where Bill C-32 comes in. Again I repeat it, because the difference between equalization payments to the "have not" provinces and the Canada Assistance Plan that benefits all provinces must be understood. The purpose of this bill is to restrict the increase in transfers but not to reduce them. We have heard the opposition say that we were taking money from the provinces. That is false. We are reducing the increase that they would have.

Three so-called rich provinces, Mr. Speaker—and looking at their debt rate, I would call them rich—are affected by this bill: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that as Canadians and as people who care about Canada's long-term economic and fiscal health, not simply tomorrow morning but the long term, we must pass this bill as soon as possible.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, allow me to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough:

That this question be now put.

• (1350)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising indeed, but this government has made a habit of imposing a time limit on any debate that bothers or disturbs them in any way.

I cannot understand why this government which has a lot of explaining to do to the people of Canada, a lot of problems to deal with, does not want to discuss this matter and wants to impose a time limit on debate by putting the question. This prevents any further amendment from being made and means that the vote will be taken as soon as we are through debating.

I listened carefully to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. I have noticed that he has not explained the object of Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. He talked about the economy, about equalization and many other things. Now, I would have a question to ask him to put in context this much emphasized economic question on which he spent the 12 or 13 minutes of his speech.

Since 1973, Mr. Speaker, assuming that the Gross Domestic Product gives a good enough picture of the goods and services produced in Canada, how can this wealth created by the Canadian people be compared to the national debt? In other words, what is the rates debt GDP?

According to the figures I have—I had the time to do a little research during his speech—in 1973 the debt was equal to 2.7 per cent of the GDP. In 1985, one year after the Tories took office, it was 10 per cent. In 1987-88, it had reached 32.5 per cent. And it is estimated that, by 1995, just a few years down the road, it will be 41 per cent, that is to say that 41 per cent of all the goods and services produced in Canada will constitute debt, Mr. Speaker.

So, I ask the hon. member: Is he defending a good thing or does this economic slump simply go to show that this government is totally incompetent at managing this country on a day to day basis? I ask him candidly.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. We always have interesting exchanges together. However, I have to admit I am surprised by the question, especially coming from someone who has been a member of this House for nearly 25 years—

Mr. Gauthier: Nineteen years.

Mr. Vincent: Nineteen years then, Mr. Speaker. He comes and talk to me about the GDP, the national debt and the deficit? But, Mr. Speaker, until 1984, his government increased its spending by 15 per cent annually. That is right, Mr. Speaker, 15 per cent a year on average between 1968 to 1984. They increased spending, Mr. Speaker. But revenues were not necessarily coming in at the same rate. That is how we ended up, in 1984, with the Liberal government's credit card limit stretched to $200 billion—not $20 billion, but $200 billion.

When this government came into office, it inherited an unpaid credit card bill of $200 billion. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, they were spending $16 billion more than they were taking in every year. So, not only did they leave us with a credit card at its maximum, but they kept at it. In just seven years, by 1990–91, we managed to bring government expenditures down to $12 billion below revenues.

Now, we can take these $12 billion and start applying them toward reducing their debt, by paying their debt charges. That is what is called good, sound management, Mr. Speaker. It is not easy. There were cuts over the past seven years, as you know, and there are yet more to come. Sound management is a must if we want to ensure the future of this country. And sound management requires that we stop spending and start paying our debts.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would have a question for my colleague. At the beginning of his speech, he mentioned equalization as well as wealthy provinces, referring to the rich and poor provinces of this country. I know that, throughout the proceedings of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, some specialists and so-called economists have argued that rich and poor provinces are really not all that different, except for a few clearly identified cases. But Quebec has always been considered one of the rich provinces and, thus, expected, along with the three other provinces mentioned by our colleague, to provide for the not so wealthy. Could my hon. colleague give us again the objective data?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the knowledge and experience of the hon. member for Outremont. Perhaps I may explain this in simple terms. When the federal government gives money to the provinces, there are two ways it usually does this.

The first is affected by Bill C-32, which we are discussing today, and is commonly referred to as transfers to the provinces. Ottawa gives each province the same amount of money per individual. Suppose this is $10. There are 6 million Quebecers in Quebec so Ottawa will send a cheque for 6 million times $10. There are 8 million Ontarians in Ontario, so Ottawa will send a cheque for 8 million times $10. That is what we call transfers to the provinces.

There is another system for the less wealthy provinces which is called equalization payments, and these are intended to help provinces and their residents whose income is below the Canadian average. The Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Manitoba and sometimes Saskatchewan are eligible for equalization payments. These are computed according to a very complex formula—I don't want to get into the details—but it is based on how the revenues of the provinces compare to the Canadian average. So this is another way the provinces can receive money.

The hon. member pointed out that Quebec is considered to be a wealthy province. Quebec does have substantial revenues. Nevertheless, compared with the national average, it is entitled to equalization payments. I imagine that is what the hon. member for Outremont wanted to clear up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there is hardly a minute left before question period. I could start my speech, but once I start, I would like to be able to continue. Perhaps this will give someone else a chance to make some more comment. Considering the time, I move that we call it two o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So if the House agrees, we will now proceed to Members' Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Department of External Affairs reported that with the exception of a few pockets of fighting, the latest ceasefire in Yugoslavia is holding. This was confirmed by both the Yugoslavian embassy and the Croatian Agent General to Canada.

But this is only the beginning. We must seize this opportunity and actively pursue a settlement. Canadians can be proud of the fact that we were the first country to ask the United Nations to become actively involved in a negotiated settlement of the crisis.

We are pleased that on Thursday a special meeting of the United Nations Security Council will be convened to discuss the situation in Yugoslavia. Today, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to contact our Canadian ambassadors around the world and the diplomatic corps here in Ottawa, asking them to do whatever they can to urge the United Nations to work toward a resolution of the crisis in Yugoslavia.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, if Quebec separates it will assume its fair share of Canada's national debt. According to the Bélanger–Campeau commission, that is 18.5 per cent. Other Canadians say it is 25 per cent. Obviously this would be settled by negotiation.

But what happens if there is no agreement? Even if we do agree, Quebec cannot legally assume any of Canada's national debt without the consent of our creditors. Likely Quebec would have to make side payments to Canada for its share of debt retirement and interest.

What happens if Canadian interest rates rise before the debt is paid? What happens if Quebec defaults on its payments? Who knows for sure. What we do know is that the credit rating of both Quebec and the new Canada will be lower than it is for our present Canada and that will hit each of us personally in the pocketbook and reduce our standard of living.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, once again Canada is following the FTA rules and getting the back of the hand from the United States for doing so.

This time we are being shafted on softwood lumber. The United States complained about a subsidy. Canadian provinces responded in good faith. Now there is no subsidy and no need for an export tax.

How does our partner in the FTA react? Seventy senators demand that Canada be slapped with a 25 per cent duty. We have lost trade disputes over steel rails, lobsters, parts of construction equipment and west coast salmon. Even our so–called big win in the pork dispute is a testament to U.S. willingness to back Canadians against the wall even when America's complaint is totally ridiculous.

The FTA is more than we bargained for. We lost 7,000 jobs in the lumber industry. We have seen scores of companies flee south. Over a quarter of a million jobs nation–wide have gone. We have seen our communities devastated by job loss and capital flight. Enough is enough. Abrogate the free trade treaty now and let Canada have a sovereign economy the way it should have had all these years.

QUEBEC'S ACCESSION TO SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, an independent Quebec would be economically viable but the price to pay would be relatively high, according to Patrick Grady in a study published today by the Fraser Institute. This economist predicts that Quebec would suffer a serious recession and that Canada would face economic difficulties.

If Quebec became sovereign, the consequences for Canada and especially Quebec could be serious, he concludes in this 168–page study. The deficit of an independent Quebec would increase and its interest rates would rise. Businesses and individuals would leave, Mr. Grady predicts. He says that if the province separates, its economic activity could decline by 10 per cent in the short term and 5 per cent long term. The economic situation would thus be three or four times as bad as the recession that Quebecers are now barely getting out of.

NATIONAL WOMEN'S CENTRE DAY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today women in communities across Canada are celebrating the first annual National Women's Centre Day. Single mothers, homeless women, abused women and their more fortunate sisters, can all find strength at women's centres. There they will be met with caring faces, supportive voices, and needed information.

Women's centres are at the very heart of our communities. Yet last year this government cut funding for women's centres by 100 per cent and only restored it after a national outcry.

It is clear that women's centres must have core funding. Just having year to year funding is not sufficient. Last week in this House there was much discussion about showing how much members of this House respect women in Canada. Actions speak louder than words. I call on this government to institute core funding for women's centres. That is what will count with the women of Canada.

NATIONAL WOMEN'S CENTRE DAY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, National Women's Centre Day is being celebrated for the first time today to recognize women who are helping other women to help themselves. Many of these women are volunteers.

By providing information, referral and support services, women's centres play a significant role in identifying and addressing the many problems that specifically affect women and in finding solutions to those problems. They also deliver a wide range of education and advocacy programs which support equality for women.

It is time that we acknowledged their important contribution and help in their financial struggle to keep the doors open. Instead, this government has cut funding to advocacy groups by $25 million, forcing the closure of many of these centres which are already barely surviving on short-term grants and endless fund raising. In fact, in several provinces women's centres receive absolutely no ongoing support from the federal government.

The theme of this year's Women's Centre campaign is "Keep the Door Open for Women". I ask the minister responsible for the status of women to stop closing that door and to implement core funding for women's centres in all regions of Canada.

S. O. 31

NATIONAL WOMEN'S CENTRE DAY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, today is the first official day we recognize the work being done in women's centres across Canada by dedicated volunteers.

The theme of this year's campaign is "Keep the Door Open for Women". In Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, for example, the Second Storey Women's Centre has organized a variety of projects. Sometimes it seems to take a great tragedy to focus our collective attention on the violence and institutionalized inequalities that are faced by women every day in our society. We act surprised and ask ourselves how wanton acts of violence can occur in our modern society. And yet, how can these things not happen when satirical magazines incite their readers to rape young women in the name of humour, and there is little public outcry.

We must work together to change old attitudes and to banish harmful stereotypes. To do this, we must ensure that our centres receive adequate funding from both public and private sectors. I encourage all members of this House to work with the women's centres in their areas to ensure that they have the funding necessary so that women can take back the night and feel safe in their homes and their places of work.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the government's recent announcement to support the upgrading of the existing cyclotron at the University of British Columbia and to build the world's first KAON factory at TRIUMF, the Tri-University Meson facility.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, as the member for Vancouver South, this joint venture of the universities of Alberta, Victoria, Simon Fraser and British Columbia is located at UBC in my riding of Vancouver Quadra.

I have been aware of the work at TRIUMF for many years. I have toured the facility with its director, Dr. Erich Vogt, and have discussed the planned upgrade.

The House will know of my long-standing commitment to this project, as I have raised the subject here in this House on several occasions.

With this project, Canada takes its place at the vanguard of the new technologies. The study of sub-atomic particle physics at TRIUMF facilitates research in the fundamental forces of nature. Information gathered here has been used in medical, biomedical and geological research, and has led to breakthroughs in cardiac diagnosis, radioisotope treatment, positron brain scanning and the destruction of cancerous tumours in humans.

The impact on scientific research and related technology in Canada will be tremendous.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, Alain Noël writes in La Presse that the eastern part of Montreal is suffering from a serious shortage of occupational training. Job training is a key issue, says Claude Pichette, president of a committee to revive the economy and employment.

The challenges of training and employment thus also become priorities. All sorts of analyses show that we need to implement a program based on continuing education. Such programs must reach not only the unemployed but also workers who will have to change jobs as our industrial structure modernizes; this means almost the whole labour force every fifteen years or so. The conventional concepts of "upgrading" and "retraining" are no longer adequate because they have a connotation of being exceptional, even marginal. We need a new industrial culture where everyone takes it for granted that they will have to review their training regularly throughout their working life.

• (1410)

Some talk emphatically about the German, Swedish, Japanese or even Swiss models. Mr. Speaker, we should invest in occupational training as those countries do.

SPORTS

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the 35th Hockey Hall of Fame induction dinner will be held here in Ottawa tonight. The ceremonies will also feature a salute to the Ottawa Senators hockey club of the past as well as the new addition to the NHL.

First and foremost, however, the dinner will induct NHL players Denis Potvin, Mike Bossy, Bob Pulford, and Clint Smith; coach Scotty Bowman and a former colleague of mine, linesman Neil Armstrong, into the Hockey Hall of Fame.

I know, Mr. Speaker, you had the honour to host a reception for these individuals today. Many Canadians recall their exploits as they participated in the game at which Canada excels. The recent Canada Cup victory proves once again that when it comes to hockey, Canada is number one in the world.

Hockey is also an integral part of Canada's culture and the game has united Canadians from across the country. Over the years, hockey has provided a source of physical fitness for millions of Canadians and countless hours of enjoyment for both player and spectator.

Congratulations to the inductees and a warm welcome to the Ottawa Senators, which will begin play in the NHL's 1992-93 season.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, since the House of Commons recessed for the summer the problem of cross-border shopping has continued at a significant pace. It is a fact that the large price differential in gasoline between Canada and the U.S. is a major motivational factor in the cross-border phenomenon.

Canadians are flocking to the U.S. in greater numbers, lured by lower gas prices and once they are there they are buying other retail goods.

The severity of this problem is captured in a study done by the consulting firm Ernst and Young on the effects of cross-border shopping. It estimated that retail sales losses to our Canadian retailers is in excess of $2 billion nationally. The Retail Council of Canada put retail losses in Ontario alone at $1 billion in 1991.

This phenomenon cannot go unaddressed. Cross-border shopping creates negative economic activity, especially in border communities like Sarnia.

Both the federal and provincial governments must take a serious look at the taxation of gasoline in an effort to help alleviate the problem of cross-border shopping.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is has been projected that farm families in the grains and oilseeds sectors will have incomes of about $6,500 for this last year. That is about one-third of what we consider to be the poverty income in Canada.

The previous Minister of Agriculture, now Minister of Finance, promised that his government would provide a third line of defence which would make it possible for these farmers to survive. The government has reneged on that promise.

The all-party House of Commons agriculture committee met in August and unanimously passed a resolution pleading with the government to honour that promise. Today the House will vote on that resolution.

I hope that government members will support the grain farmers by voting for that motion and that governments, both federally and provincially, will extend some hope to those thousands of desperate farmers by taking action now on the third line of defence.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 30 organizations from the municipalities of Colchester county met to discuss the area's qualifications as a location for the proposed facility for federally sentenced women. These organizations represent the people who would deliver the services that would provide the benefits that would benefit the lives and futures of the women inmates.

There were members of church organizations, correctional services personnel, law enforcement officers, women's' centres, children's organizations, health workers, emergency measures groups, educators, community service groups, all levels of government and certainly representatives of the native community, truly an impressive group that showed true community interest in providing a home for this institution and the people who are to use it.

Truro and the surrounding area is an ideal community in which to locate such an institution. It enjoys easy access for the majority of inmates and their families. It can provide low cost accommodation for visiting families. It is a positive community with a positive people who will provide assistance and be role models as these women move back into society.

I urge the Solicitor General to approve Truro as the site of the Atlantic women's correctional facility because it is simply the best place for it.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, these are confusing times to be a Canadian and to be debating the possible breakup of our country.

On the one hand there are people telling us that if Quebec leaves Canada, we would probably all be better off. Certainly that is the message of the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party.

On the other hand, groups such as the Fraser Institute are now warning that Quebec separation would mean a stock market crash, higher interest rates and a deep recession for all parts of Canada, including my riding.

I do not know who is giving Canadians the best vision of the future. Canada should not stay together just out of fear. I ask all Canadians to stop and think about these two conflicting positions. Whichever they end up choosing, they will at least have taken some action to form Canada's future instead of just letting it happen. Hopefully, Mr. Speaker, they will choose Canada.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the 1991 fishing industry along the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador will be recorded as disastrous, potentially the worst in memory.

This failure is mainly the result of heavy pack ice and icebergs which persisted in some areas until now, resulting in cold water temperatures that disrupted the inshore fishery and the migratory presence of cod, capelin and other species, and the continued plundering of transboundary stocks by foreign fleets. The impact on those communities dependent on the fishery is devastating.

Inshore landings are considerably less than one-half what they were last year and, as a result, thousands and thousands of fishermen and plant workers are without their incomes. Their incomes have been wiped out and there is not enough work to qualify for unemployment insurance.

These are extraordinary conditions and they require extraordinary measures. I join my colleagues in the Liberal Party in calling on the Conservative government for a comprehensive strategy on aid to those engaged in the fishing industry in Newfoundland and Labrador who are in dire need, and for an immediate response to this crisis.

KIDS CARE WEEK

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, this morning, Consumer and Corporate Affairs launched the second annual Kids Care Week. I know this House shares my dismay that approximately 400 Canadian children die and some 54,000 are hospitalized each year as a result of accidental injuries. Kids Care is a response to this tragic reality.

During Kids Care Week, events will take place all across Canada to reach out to communities and to parents to raise awareness of every day dangers and to stress the message of Kids Care. Children are our most precious natural resource. We must do what it takes to keep them safe. I applaud this vitally important program and wish for a very successful Kids Care Week.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the government will table its constitutional proposals. I would like to warn the government that constitutional change will be difficult to implement in Canada if the government does not show Canadians it also understands the need for rapid economic change. In the present context, Canadians are not feeling very generous. I therefore ask the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister, considering the fact that the unemployment rate is rising instead of going down, what kind of concrete measures the government intends to take to reduce the number of unemployed Canadians which today reached 1.5 million.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the key to bringing about growth in the Canadian economy is the reduction of interest rates, and the key to reducing interest rates is bringing down inflation and inflationary pressures. Both have happened and to the extent that has had a positive impact upon the economy, we have seen growth emerge in the second quarter on an annualized basis of 4.9 per cent. We expect that growth to continue, albeit in a modest and moderate way because there are some other difficulties that exist within the Canadian economy, namely, the balance sheets of corporations and a burden of debt overhang, as well as a shortage of credit available to consumers. So it is tempered with that.

The important issue is to get the fundamentals right. We are getting the fundamentals right. Sustained growth and price stability can occur through the containment of inflation and fiscal consolidation. That is the policy we are following, and that is the policy that will produce results.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, these are the policies the government is following and these policies are not working. I want to tell the government that 1.5 million unemployed Canadians will not be swept under the rug because we are again beginning the constitutional debate.

I want to serve notice to the government that we will not let it off the hook with its very bad economic policies and with the mess it has created in Canada.

• (1420)

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Now that we have the free trade deal, when will we see the adjustment programs that the Prime Minister promised to Canadians during the last election in order to face the problems they have today as a result of losing their jobs? The government's promise to give them help is not being fulfilled.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are existing programs within Employment and Immigration which have been very effective in terms of providing adjustment measures. The government has provided adjustment in the fisheries sector, the agriculture sector and the shipbuilding sector. All of these things have occurred.

I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition has decided to support or continue to oppose the free trade agreement, but I want to tell him that in Edmonton the other day Dow Chemical announced that it was going to build an $800 million petrochemical plant. The president and chief executive officer, Mr. Wilcock, stood on the platform and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, this facility would not be built here had it not been for the free trade agreement because it has reduced tariffs and given us access to the marketplace." Now, is that what the hon. member is opposed to?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance that there are farmers in Canada who are waiting for help from this government. There are fishermen who help from this government. There might be the creation of a few jobs here and there, but there are hundreds of thousands of people who are losing their jobs because of the mismanagement of this government.

I would like to know if the government will soon present us with an economic plan because we not only need a constitutional plan, but an economic plan to keep this country together.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member, who was the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, and has had some interest in this issue, will find it very revealing, when he sees the document, that we are taking some very important steps in terms of strengthening the economic union.

I think that will be very positive. I think it will allow for a greater degree of fiscal and monetary co-ordination which I think is necessary in this country. If we are doing it at an international level, surely it has to be done at a domestic level as well. I think that we can build on that.

I agree with the hon. member that the unemployment rate is too high, but I also ask him to remember the fact that over the last six years this country has had the best job creation rate of any nation in the OECD. It has had the second best growth rate. It is the seventh largest economy and the seventh largest trader in the world, and we intend to maintain that leadership.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who likes to cite facts. Well the facts are that in eight of ten provinces, unemployment went up not down in August.

The minister knows as well that in six of ten provinces, unemployment exceeded 10 per cent in August. He also knows that unemployment hit a six year high in August, and yet he declared the recession over. Unbelievable.

I want to ask the minister whether 10.6 per cent unemployment, 1.5 million lost souls in Canada, is now the acceptable level of unemployment in this country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no one likes to see a level of unemployment that high. I do not, and the hon. member does not. It is not as simple as just simply snapping your fingers and all things come into place.

The German electronic giant, Siemens, wants to quadruple its 3,000 strong work force within the decade.

Some hon. members: Where?

Mr. Mazankowski: Oh, where. "A large number of these jobs would be in Ontario," Mr. William Waite, President of Siemens Electric of Mississauga, said yesterday. He said: "There is one catch, the jobs will materialize only if Ontario can generate enough skilled people able to use the latest technologies. My problem is not with an 88 cent dollar, my problem is with the lack of skilled workers." That is clearly part and parcel of the problem. While we have one million plus people unemployed, there are many jobs that are available but they are not filled because of the lack of training and skills that needs to be provided. That is an issue that is being addressed by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and it is one that is going to require the co-operation and the partnership of all components of society.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am from Newfoundland, not Disneyland, and I recognize a Mickey Mouse performance by a Minister of Finance when I see it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Does this Minister of Finance not realize that it is very difficult for 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, for farmers in need and fishermen in need, to be tolerant and generous toward this government and its policies, including regrettably its constitutional policy, when the Minister of Finance has shown nothing but contempt for the unemployed of Canada?

I ask the Minister of Finance: Will he produce an economic plan to help put this country back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government has created an economic climate that has produced the best job creation rate of any country in the OECD. We have gone through a recession. The recession has been deeper than was originally expected. We are coming out of it. We are going to have, we believe, sustained growth in the order of 2.5 per cent, achieving 3.1 to 3.5 per cent in 1992.

According to the OECD and other informed observers, it is pretty clear that this country is on the right track in terms of its economic and fiscal policies. We intend to follow that because it is the only way that we can build an economy that will provide sustainable growth with price stability. That is our goal. That is our objective.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister has just said that they have the best job creation program ever. One and a half million Canadians are asking: "Where is this job from this job creation program?"

The Deputy Prime Minister says we are on the road to recovery, but the statistics say something else. Last week, the international trade figure, particularly our trade with the United States, was the lowest in 10 years. Today, we see that retail sales are still at the recessionary level. The Deputy Prime Minister knows that what this means is lost jobs for Canadians.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister redirect his economic policies so that we can get Canadians back to work and stop just catering to the powerful and wealthy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that there is a certain lag time. When there is growth that is recorded in the economy, there is a lag time until that is translated into jobs. That is what we are seeing.

With respect to her point with regard to the merchandise trade balance, I remind her that in the second quarter exports grew by some 22 per cent. It is not that exports have fallen, but that imports have increased because of the influx of machinery and equipment to gear up for the demand that is being created. I think that is what has to be taken into consideration.

Obviously, the recession, as I said, was deeper than was expected. It is going to take a little longer to get out of it. We cannot remove ourselves from addressing the fundamental issue. The fundamental issue is that we must contain inflation. That is the trick to bringing down interest rates. Interest rates have come down by 5.5 percentage points. That trend is continuing. The spreads have come down and that trend, hopefully, will continue. That is the way in which we will get the economy back on its feet again.

We are convinced that there will be sustained recovery, but there must be price stability at the same time.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the only trend that is continuing is that unemployment remains in double digits and more than 1.5 million Canadians remain out of work. That is the trend that is continuing, despite what the minister says.

[Translation]

I have another question for the Deputy Minister, who keeps reciting the same old statistics. What does he have to say to employees at Angus, Kemtek and Dominion Textile in Montreal? What does he have to say to employees who have lost their jobs like so many others in this country? What does his government have to say to all these unemployed Canadians? What does it have to offer: statistics or jobs?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party that the Conservative Party has done a great deal for Montreal. And since she wants some facts, I can inform her that today, Merck–Frosst is investing $239 million in current research activities in the pharmaceutical sector. According to the company, this major project was a direct result of the passsage in 1987 by the government of Bill C–22, which enhances protection of intellectual property rights in the pharmaceutical sector. This measure encourages businesses to invest in major research and development activities in this country.

• (1430)

We supported Bill C–22. Where was the New Democratic Party when it could have done something to help Montreal?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This is good publicity for the government, but it doesn't produce jobs for Montreal's unemployed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. The Prime Minister has said that a Constitution without a vibrant economy is "just a pretty piece of paper".

As we enter another round of constitutional discussions, many Canadians across this country including the ones we have just been speaking about, those without jobs, are preoccupied just with survival, with putting food on the table.

What real economic option such as jobs or a child care program is this government prepared to bring forward so that those Canadians who are living in need can have their basic needs met, can have a job and a decent child care program? Then, they can work together on the unity of this country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the points that are made by the hon. member.

I take no comfort in having an unemployment rate of more than 10 per cent. I also recognize that the hon. member disagrees with the fiscal and monetary policies that the government is following. That is fair ball, but I think that she should recognize the fact that the OECD, which is an international organization, did its report card on Canada and said that it endorsed Canada's monetary policy as being necessary.

It was very supportive of the fiscal policy action and the thrust of the February budget. It was very supportive of the structural policy changes that we have brought forth, i.e. the free trade agreement, the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the GST.

All those things were necessary, including reform with respect to the unemployment insurance program. They were critical about our ability to be productive and in terms of our labour efficiency. They were critical about our unemployment insurance program that they considered was too generous, so we take this as an objective assessment. The hon. member should not ignore that.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is this: The vast majority of Canadian economists believe the Canadian dollar is overvalued by at least 6 cents. Does the Minister of Finance agree?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada does not have a set exchange rate for the dollar.

It is established in the marketplace. The hon. member can have an opinion on that, but it is established in the marketplace. There are many factors that are taken into consideration, i.e. capital flows, interest rates, inflation rates, merchandise trade balance and all those things. The hon. member should know that.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Everybody knows that the value of the dollar is as a result of a series of conflicting factors, but it is also clear that this government has tilted the balance the wrong way.

As a result, it is fighting inflation on the backs of the unemployed and it is pillaging our export industries. I did not ask the minister why the dollar is up there; I asked him whether it should be up there.

The vast majority of Canadian economists thinks it is over-valued by at least 6 cents. Do you agree with him?

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the brevity of the question, but I would ask all hon. members to put the question through the Speaker.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can have an opinion about the value of the dollar.

The value of the dollar is established in the marketplace. Quite frankly, if the hon. member believes that the dollar is over-valued by 6 cents he might want to enlighten me as to how he would bring the dollar down by 6 cents. How would he keep it there?

I think Canadians will realize—

An hon. member: Resign.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says "resign". I am not a finance minister who is going to come along with simplistic nonsensical solutions that will not stand up to international scrutiny.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. During the last two weeks, 2,300 Canadians lost their jobs at Air Canada, Canadian and Nationair, in addition to the 3,000 jobs lost last summer.

Today's reports indicate that the government at the open skies negotiations is on the verge of giving full cabotage rights to American carriers, full accessibility in Canada.

Given our industry's serious state of health, the continued loss of thousands of jobs, there is the fact that our industry is so much smaller than the American industry. I ask the minister how the government can even contemplate offering American carriers full accessibility across Canada.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern about the airline industry in Canada, just as we have concerns about it.

The reason we entered into the negotiations with the United States was to ensure a more viable service between the U.S. and Canada where Canadian industries could get a larger share of the pie.

The hon. member mentions that we are going to put that on the table and I am sure he is getting that from an article in The Financial Post, but I would also like to quote what was said by the speaker referred to in that article: "Canada presented a paper on cabotage at the third exploratory round which outlined controversial aspects including legal, technical, and regulatory implications and, in particular, conveyed the economic concerns raised by Canadian stakeholders that cabotage should not threaten the viability of Canadian carriers".

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, that is the same talk that Canadians heard before the federal government entered into the free trade agreement, and now those same Canadians are paying the price.

I go back to the same minister: Given that an all-party committee, including Tories, and most of the industry is flatly against cabotage, will the minister categorically state in the House for Canadians that during the open skies negotiations, the Canadian government will not sign an air agreement that will give Americans full cabotage rights in Canada? Yes, or no?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, this government in its agreements with the United States will not sign anything that is not good for Canadian airlines.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport. I want to remind the minister that the current imbalance between Canada and the United States shows a favourable balance of $500 million a year on the Canadian side. This is not something we have to get into in order to protect our carriers.

I also want to remind the minister, through you Mr. Speaker, that we have seen thousands of Canadian workers in the aviation industry thrown out of work in the last year alone, that the airlines are operating in the red, passenger loads are down, and the only solution that this government has come up with is to turn over our domestic and international travel to the Americans.

I want to ask the minister what is in these negotiations for Canadian airlines and Air Canada, if anything.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the very reason we are in negotiations is to make sure there is a better share for Canadian airlines. In the transporter market, we have not given away cabotage. We have not signed an agreement. We are in exploratory talks.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the article this morning in The Financial Post made it very clear that not only was cabotage now on the table with the agreement of the Canadian negotiators, but that Canada offered up the so-called fifth freedom, the rights of the Americans to stop off in Canada and pick up Canadians and take them on to a third country.

Given the fact that we saw during the free trade negotiations that this government cannot be expected to work on behalf of the Canadian people, and we are now seeing what is happening with the open skies negotiations, I want to ask this minister, through you Mr. Speaker, if it is not now time to do what the Americans did a number of years ago and walk away from the table while we still have a domestic industry.

• (1440)

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the fifth freedom rights are a standard agenda item for any international discussion, whether it be with the United States, with the United Kingdom or with any other country.

We will walk away from the table when the agreement is not good for Canada. We will stay at the table until we get one that is good for Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this morning Statistics Canada reported that retail sales for July were down from June, were down substantially over May, and were down 5.3 per cent over the year.

Just last Friday in this House the Minister of Finance declared, and I quote: "Consumer confidence is up". Can the minister explain how consumer confidence can be up when consumer purchases are down, or was he just wrong?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statistics that I have show that consumer confidence was up by 11.7 per cent and business confidence was up by 17.3 per cent.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, that is so-called confidence that is not expressed through the dollar and through purchases. Canadians are not prepared to put their money where the minister tells them they should be putting it, because they have no confidence in him.

In spite of lower consumer spending, in spite of a ten-year record fall in the trade surplus, and in spite of rising unemployment, our dollar continues to go up. How many more jobs must be sacrificed in the name of this government's economic policies? Just how much unemployment is too much for this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the official policy position of the Liberal Party is. The hon. member who just spoke said that the dollar was over-valued by six cents. I am not sure what the other hon. member who has just asked the question considers the dollar should be. I ask him this: If he has an evaluation, he may want to explain to the House how he would establish that figure, how he would be able to reach that particular figure, and how he would be able to keep it.

Is the hon. member proposing a fixed exchange rate? If he is and if that is Liberal Party policy, why does he not come clean and tell us what he is talking about?

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows full well that this government's policies, including the high interest rate and the high dollar, have been responsible for the loss of at least 209,000 jobs in Ontario alone since March 1990. When will the Deputy Prime Minister realize that you cannot have reconciliation in this country if you ignore the unemployed in Canada?

When will he implement the adjustment and retraining programs which were promised over and over again, both during the last election and immediately following it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while it is true that there have been some substantial job losses during the course of the recession, and I think in the manufacturing sector that has been the predominant case, but when it is compared to the recession of 1981–82 I think the decline in manufacturing at that period was about 19 per cent and the decline in manufacturing during this period was 11 per cent.

The peak to trough decline during this recession was about 2.8 per cent; the peak to trough decline in the 1981–82 recession was 5.5 percentage points.

Mr. Speaker, we are coming out of the recession. Growth has been registered in the second quarter. That is one-quarter sooner than we had projected. Growth will continue in the third and fourth quarters, and all reliable accounts would lead us to believe that there will be growth in the range of 3 per cent to 3.5 per cent in 1992. Now, that is cause for optimism and that is cause for confidence.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Deputy Prime Minister stated that the recession was over. Now he is saying we are coming out of it. Have you changed your mind?

An hon. member: Right on. He does not know if he is coming or going.

Mrs. Marleau: Let me remind the Deputy Prime Minister that—

Mr. Speaker: I want to remind hon. members to put the question to the minister through the Speaker. The hon. member can finish her question.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I ask if the Deputy Prime Minister has changed his mind. Just last week there was an announcement of another thousand jobs that were being lost in Toronto at McDonnell-Douglas. When will the government stop ignoring the unemployment disaster that it has created and implement new training and retraining programs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what I said and what I will say today is that we have experienced a growth of 4.9 per cent in the second quarter on an annualized basis. We expect growth to be in the order of 2.5 per cent in the third and fourth quarters of this year. We expect growth to range in the area of 3 per cent to 3.5 per cent over the course of 1992. Those are figures that are supported by the OECD and by many other economists. That will give us the fastest growing economy in all of the G-7, if not the OECD.

SOVIET UNION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I have just returned from the CSCE conference in Moscow where we heard first hand about the very serious economic crisis which faces the people in the Soviet Union this winter with widespread shortages of food, power and medical supplies. As Alexander Yakovlev has said: "Empty pans are more dangerous than tanks".

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Will Canada now show leadership in the G-7 by supporting the urgent request of Soviet leaders, including the Prime Minister, mayors of Leningrad, Moscow and others for major food and other aid now to avert this looming crisis facing the Soviet people who showed such courage, as winter approaches?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the leadership for the co-ordination of this particular initiative is in the hands of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, John Major, who is the current chairman of the G-7 group of countries. He has been there. My colleague, the Minister for International Trade has been there, our deputies have been there. They are looking at ways and means of putting together a package, but also, more important, looking at ways and means of distributing such food aid, medicines and other support measures. What is really important is to establish the mechanism.

I think, as the hon. member knows, that the system for distribution is not very sophisticated. Unless there are mechanisms to ensure that the aid, food and medicine get to the right people at the right time, it will go of little value. That co-ordination is taking place and Canada is very much a part of that exercise.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Five years ago the tragic explosion at the nuclear reactor at Chernobyl resulted in thousands of deaths and widespread illness, environmental damage and homelessness in Ukraine, Byelorussia and Russia.

Given this devastation, will Canada respond positively to the urgent appeal which was made last week at the United Nations General Assembly by these republics for a $646 million fund to help eliminate radioactivity from the food chain and to resettle the homeless victims of the Chernobyl disaster?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can report to the House that in my meeting today with members of the delegation of Ukraine, the president, the minister of health and others, we discussed the exact issue that the hon. member has raised. I pointed out to them our interest to help.

The hon. member would know that on September 20 there was a pledging conference in which Canada participated. I would also draw to his attention that through the World Health Organization and the International Atomic Energy Agency, we have been using our participation and membership there to help.

I also have instructed my officials at the Atomic Energy Control Board and will speak to AECL on whether or not we could help in a technical way the people of Ukraine. The last point I would like to make to him is I discussed this at the IAE at my recent meeting in Vienna, as well as with Canada's membership of the working group of the European Energy Charter in which we are now responsible for chairing the nuclear working committee. We look forward to very close co-operation with the delegation and the people of Ukraine.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, when the Quebec caucus met in Rivière-du-Loup in August, members from the island of Montreal presented a study on Montreal's economic situation. As chairman of the Montreal caucus, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Montreal area.

Could the minister tell the House about the government's latest initiatives to give back to Montreal its assets, its economic advantages, and to restore it to the place it always held and should still hold?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, let me reply on behalf of the minister responsible for the Montreal area who is now with the Prime Minister in Montreal, where Merck-Frosst will announce this afternoon that they will invest over $200 million, raising the number of researchers from 200 to 300. Mr. Speaker, that is a direct result of a policy of this government.

Were it not for this policy and Bill C-22, we would not have had that investment in Montreal. It is thanks to that policy. Mr. Speaker, we know that the situation in Montreal is difficult; we know that very well, but we will try to improve it with policies like Bill C-22.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has asked for the co-operation of the national parties in this House when it comes to the Constitution. The government has asked for our good faith and it has pledged to us the spirit of non-partisanship.

In that spirit, the Leader of the Opposition has agreed to be briefed on the government's constitutional proposals this afternoon at 4.30 p.m.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister please inform the House, at what time they brief members of the Business Council National Issues?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no briefing of the Business Council on National Issues that would be similar in any way to the extent of the briefing that is to be presented to the Leader of the Opposition.

If the House leader of the Official Opposition is interested in continuing the practice of non-partisanship that we have sought to establish on this issue, I would certainly be interested in the opportunity to discuss this matter with him directly and privately. If he has a problem, he knows, as other members of the House do, that all they have to do is raise it with me and we will resolve it.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the first responsibility of any government is to act in good faith as an agent of all the people. That is why on this side of the House we are alarmed at the reports that the government has chosen to provide a confidential briefing on constitutional proposals to Canada's major business corporations before briefing members of this House or, indeed, provincial premiers.

Will the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs stand in his place and deny categorically that there have been no briefings put forward by him, the Prime Minister's Office, PCO or any other officials for members of the Business Council on National Issues.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): I will not try to rescue the member from his double negatives, but I certainly am prepared to stand in the House and say that I personally have been involved with briefings of the president of the Canadian Labour Congress. I have spoken to the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Today I have been in touch by telephone with heads of the two territorial governments and with a number of premiers. The Prime Minister has been in touch with a number of other premiers.

I, personally, have not been involved in discussions with BC&I but I have certainly authorized discussions that would ensure that there is a wide understanding in the country of what it is we are trying to achieve with these proposals.

There was an arrangement announced some time ago and established with the Leader of the Opposition and with the Leader of the New Democratic Party with respect to briefings that will be much fuller because of their parliamentary status than that of others.

I am very encouraged by the non-partisan approach that has been taken on this issue by the New Democratic Party. I hope that will be followed by the Liberal Party of Canada.

COSIC

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or, in his absence, for the Deputy Prime Minister.

My question concerns the COSIC computer boondoggle. Reports over the weekend inform us that this project has now been halted. I want to ask how it is that the government has spent $140 million of taxpayers money on the first phase of a $28 million project, and ends up with something that does not even work.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Regrettably, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not sought the facts. If he had sought the facts, he too would have realized that the reporter made some grievous errors in reporting, because in fact the Fenco Engineering contract of COSIC, and where Fenco was joined by Honeywell, Canac and Digital Equipment, is a project in the first phase of some $38 million, and which was estimated at $42 million with some add-ons.

The over-all project budget will be $56 million of which so far only $53 million has been spent.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but wonder what the mystery lobbyist lunch guest is feeling about this project now.

[Translation]

I would ask the Minister of Supply and Services whether he is prepared to table in this House a complete report on all cost increases related to this project.

Canadian taxpayers want to know who has wasted their money and why this project is not even working.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Regrettably, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did his supplementary and had it prepared before he heard the answer to the first part. This project is within budget and the thing does work. It is at $53 million and not at $56 million. The report was wrong.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, a new study done for the Fraser Institute predicts tough economic times for all of Canada if Quebec separates. If the separatists have their way, says the study, Canadians can look forward to a recession, a trade war, higher interest rates, a stock market crash and a flight of capital from Canada.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Is this report an example of needless fearmongering, or do Canadians really have some reason to economically fear Quebec separation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we hope that is a hypothetical question. We clearly hope that the proposals that will be announced in the House by the Prime Minister tomorrow will set the stage for the kind of debate that we, as Canadians, want to renew the Canadian federation.

I think it is fair to say that if there should be any breakup of the country, all regions in all provinces would be affected in a very negative way because I think if you look at it, Mr. Speaker, you will find that provinces like Alberta, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Quebec itself, rely to a large extent upon the internal market for their economic activities.

I think at this juncture we would do well to heed the advice of Sir John A. Macdonald, our first Prime Minister, who said 130 years ago, and I quote: "Whatever you do, adhere to the union. We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken."

I think that is a very profound statement. It was accurate 130 years ago; it is accurate today; it will be accurate tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

MALAGASH HARBOUR

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. First of all, I want to say the people of Malagash Harbour welcome the recent announcement of the money made available for dredging the harbour. However, this only exacerbates the problem of the Malagash wharf which was substantially damaged in a storm over a year ago.

Will the minister commit that the wharf at Malagash will be a priority and included in the next year's budget for repair or replacement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I understand and sympathize with the hon. member's position. There has been a dredging project approved for the harbour in the amount of $50,000, the work to be undertaken in October. I certainly hope that we can proceed with the rest of the work next year. However, it will depend upon our budget and regional priorities. The hon. member will certainly get every consideration in connection with his intense representations.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. He said earlier that a number of groups or organizations had received a briefing. I would like to ask him, in the spirit of openness with which we are all trying to approach this issue, if he can tell this House exactly, since we have seen media reports, what media have been briefed, what organizations have been briefed and who exactly has already received the document that is going to be presented to the House tomorrow?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no one has received the document apart from the Prime Minister, myself and two or three of the ministers who have been centrally involved in the committee. There was, of course, a last discussion last night on the part of ministers of the whole cabinet.

The document, to my knowledge, and I am sure that I would know, has not been circulated to anyone else. I have made arrangements to have the document delivered by special courier to the head of every government, including the two territorial governments, by nine o'clock local time tonight. That will be after the briefing of the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

With regard to the list of individuals, I should perhaps make a distinction between the kind of briefing that the hon. member will receive later today and the conversations that have been had with a number of people outside government. We have indicated in fairly general terms to a number of organizations, including as she would know the Canadian Labour Congress, where we intend to move in this document. But the document has not been circulated. It will come first to the House of Commons, with the exception of those 12 copies that will be sent, as I am sure the House would agree would be appropriate for them to be sent, under embargo to the premiers and heads of government of the provinces and territories.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new minister responsible for Montreal. Last Wednesday, all the members from the Montreal area who spoke on the economy of that area considered the feasibility study concerning the very-high speed train, referred to in French as the TGV, as a priority to promote economic recovery. Can the minister tell us today if the federal government is willing to take part in this study alongside all the other interested parties?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the minister responsible for Montreal who, as I said earlier, is consulting with the Prime Minister about an important announcement, I can tell my hon. colleague from Rosemont that, if I remember correctly, 48 of the 66 recommendations that came out of the Montreal Economic Forum were passed on to this government. I can assure him that all of them will be given due consideration, including the one he has just mentioned.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-285, an act to amend the Citizenship Act (oath of allegiance).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to become a Canadian citizen under the existing Citizenship Act, an individual must pledge allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, her heirs and successors.

This bill to amend the Citizenship Act would require a pledge of allegiance to Canada and the Canadian Constitution.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West) moved for leave to introduced Bill C-286, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (addition to the official list of electors).

He said: Mr. Speaker, members will remember during the last election the difficulties we all faced with electors who had been left off enumerators lists and were not able to vote on election day because they were deprived of their right to vote.

The purpose of this bill is to make sure that such a travesty, such an abuse of democratic rights, will never happen again in federal elections.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA REFERENDUM AND PLEBISCITE ACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-287, an act respecting referendums and plebiscites in Canada and questions of public importance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, referendums and plebiscites are a rare, but very important instrument of direct democracy in Canada. Two, in fact, are under way in Saskatchewan and British Columbia at the present time. However, at the national level we do not have in place the enabling legislation. Although we have a Canada Elections Act for elections, we do not have a referendum and plebiscite act for direct voting.

The purpose of this bill is to provide the enabling legislation for direct votes at such times as Parliament would authorize.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-288, an Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (list of ingredients).

She said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes of the time of this House, if I may, to introduce for first reading this bill of great significance for many families with members who suffer from allergies.

[English]

This bill is similar to one I introduced in the last Parliament which was passed unanimously but which unfortunately died on the Order Paper. It deals with food labelling for people who suffer from life threatening allergies. It would require restaurants to have available a every specific listing of ingredients. This would save lives.

In particular I would like to recognize the work of Mrs. Betty Taylor on this bill. Her son Christian died as a result of eating nuts in food that was not properly labelled.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

REMEMBRANCE DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-289, an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will only take a moment to inform the House of the intent of this bill. It appears that the farther we get from times of conflict in which Canadian lives have been lost in pursuing peace or in collective action against an aggressor, the concept of Remembrance Day as a holiday for all Canadians to remember the contributions that people have made becomes in peril.

It has come to my attention, and to the attention of other people in the House, that Remembrance Day is not a compulsory holiday for purposes of employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. If passed, this bill would ensure that Remembrance Day in perpetuity would be a statutory holiday for all of those contracts negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–290, an act respecting access to information on Governor in Council appointments.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I very briefly would like to introduce this bill. I am glad to have leave to introduce it. It would provide more information on Governor in Council appointments. Specifically, I think it has been an anomaly and part of the problem of the malaise in the land that in Governor in Council appointments, cabinet appointments, the salaries paid to people who are paid by the public purse never seem to really get into the public domain in the way they should.

This bill and philosophy is: He who pays the piper, that is the taxpayer, should at least hear the tune of what he is paying and I hope it passes in due time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–291, and act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (discharge of ballast waters). He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prevent the further infestation of foreign organisms into the Great Lakes ecosystem by establishing mandatory regulations for the exchange of the ballast water of ocean going vessels proceeding through the St. Lawrence Seaway into the Great Lakes system.

PETITIONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF UKRAINIAN DAY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the folks of Atikokan will be quite pleased that you get their name first.

I have the honour to present two petitions today. The first one is very timely given the visitor in the gallery earlier.

The residents of Thunder Bay who attend the Holy Cross Ukrainian Church have petitioned this House pointing out that Canadians of Ukrainian descent have a long and proud heritage. They have made a tremendous contribution in building our country.

The Canada–Ukrainian route should be better recognized by the federal government. The petitioners point out that September 7, 1891 is the date marking the arrival of the first Ukrainians to Canada. They call upon Parliament to declare September 7 Ukrainian Day in recognition of the rich heritage and enormous contribution of Canadians of Ukrainian descent.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by residents throughout northern Ontario; Kenora through to Timmins, Porcupine, Keewatin and Longbow, Ontario.

The petition calls upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service which was cut on January 15, 1990 to maintain and where appropriate up–grade service on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those of the rest of the western world.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of Canadians.

The petition refers to Bill C–21 in which the adoptive parents have been discriminated against whereas their leave has been reduced from 15 to 10 weeks while at the same time it has increased when it comes to biological parents up to 25 weeks. That is 15 weeks maternity plus 10 weeks parental leave.

These constituents have referred to the fact that the cost to the Canadian taxpayers for providing equal benefit for adoptive parents would be only about 6 cents a year.

The petitioners are asking the House of Commons to ask the government to deal with this issue as quickly as possible and to put some equity into the system.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today from several members of the Oshawa Polish community who are concerned about a number of people who are labelled by the Minister of State for External Affairs as self-exiles.

The petitioners are simply asking the government to speed up the processing of the outstanding self-exiled applications, to remove the quotas which have applied to them and to apply the traditional sunset provisions so that these people may become productive Canadian citizens as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too rise in my place with my friend from Ottawa Centre to complain bitterly on behalf of Canadians who have signed my petition which urges the government to review Bill C-21 which in effect has reduced the leave provided to adoptive parents compared to increasing it for biological parents.

The petitioners are basically saying that the needs of an adopted child are the same if not more than for a biological child. We ought not to discriminate against parents who are adopting. The issue is the care provided for the adopted children.

The petitioners and our party have urged this government in the past—they continue to do so—to rethink and re-evaluate Bill C-21. The government should ask itself if it is true that an adopted child is less important than a biological child.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House a petition containing the signatures of several hundred people.

The petitioners are calling upon this government to come to its senses and to rescind the regressive goods and services tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We now come to Questions on the Order Paper. The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Abitibi on a point of order.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, can the member for Abitibi table petitions in the House of Commons? I have risen almost every time and you did not recognize people on this side of the House, only those in the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member can surely table a petition as any other member can. I would point out to you that I took 15 seconds to look around and I saw no one get up.

That said, I am pleased to return to Presentation of Petitions and to recognize the hon. member for Abitibi.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I have the honour to table a petition signed by people from Rivière-Héva, Amos, La Sarre, La Motte, Saint-Mathieu, Saint-Félix d'Alquier in Abitibi. They humbly ask Parliament to seriously consider the deficiencies of the Canada Labour Code when it reviews that legislation and to recognize the need to include clauses on preventive paid leave for pregnant women.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I move that all questions stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read a second time and referred to legislative committee F; and the motion of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When debate was suspended, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier had the floor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, before I start my speech, I first want to wish one of our colleagues, Mr. David Walker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, a speedy recovery.

[English]

I understand, David, that you are under the weather but let us hope that our main critic on this subject matter will be here before this debate ends.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is not an extremely complex piece of legislation. It consists of a single section whose purpose is to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. The bill proposes to extend the 5 per cent capping of increases for transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan from two years to five. As you know, Mr. Speaker, capping applies only to those provinces who do not receive equalization payments. I am referring to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Canada Assistance Plan is to help the provinces provide welfare payments and services to the needy as well as social welfare services aimed at relieving, eliminating and preventing the causes or effects of poverty, child neglect or welfare dependency.

Mr. Speaker, this is a worthwhile program that is part of our Canadian way of doing things, part of our national fabric, a program that is extremely important because it enables those who are better off to help those in need.

[English]

The Canada Assistance Plan is our safety net of last resort. It makes it possible for provinces to provide basic income to close to two million low-income Canadians. These people are in this situation, not by choice but sometimes because they just cannot get out of it. They were born into it and they are having an awful time trying to get away from it.

Many low-income Canadians have been forced out of work, cannot find a job and have used up their unemployment insurance. They must apply for social assistance under this program.

According to government estimates, the three affected provinces, Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia, will lose $2.135 billion in federal transfers over the next five years, that is from 1991 to 1996. Provincial estimates are much higher than that. Ontario, my province, estimates that the cap on this Canada Assistance Plan will cost Ontario $1 billion this year alone.

The premier of Ontario in an interview reported in The Toronto Star on August 16, 1991, is quoted as saying: "Ontario cannot afford literally to put up with the notion that in times of recession, which has hit Ontario harder than anywhere else, that our citizens are going to be even more vulnerable than others".

By moving with Bill C-32 the Conservative government is leaning toward the new social services proposed by some right-wing groups, the Reform Party among others, which call for a reduced government role in social services and leaves the burden to non-governmental agencies, business volunteers, families, assuming all the time that the government's share of carrying this load is not a public responsibility.

We in this party disagree strongly with the policy put forth by our right-wing partisans in this country.

[Translation]

In this context, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to transfer the tax burden to the neediest in this country. Our social security safety net is one of the key elements of our country's social security system.

I may remind hon. members that welfare and social service recipients include, first of all, children who have been removed from parental custody or who need protection because they have been abused or neglected. This group also includes the physically or mentally disabled. There are also single parent families. In Ottawa—Vanier, in my riding, 20 per cent of all families are single-parent families, and 85 per cent of these are headed by mothers with children. Then we have the unemployed. In the Ottawa area, the unemployment rate for August was 7.3 per cent, the highest rate ever for that month during the past five years. Finally, we have families and individuals who are in dire straits and low-income workers.

Mr. Speaker, my statistics are taken from government documents, from StatsCan. These are public figures, and I imagine they are reliable.

According to the Ottawa-Carleton Social Planning Council, a body which has considerable credibility at the regional level, 16,500 people were on welfare in July 1990 in the Ottawa-Carleton region, an increase of 21 per cent over the same period during the previous year.

From 1984 to 1988, the total tax burden for a two-income family with two children and a total income of $26,000 increased 39 per cent—which includes federal, provincial and municipal taxes—while the tax burden of high income families earning about $100,000 increased only 11 per cent.

In 1988, 40.5 per cent of single-parent families earned an annual income of between $10,000 and $20,000; 23.9 per cent of these families earned an annual income of less than $10,000. These figures are from StatsCan, Mr. Speaker. The poverty rate is 33 per cent among single mothers and 12 per cent for single fathers. I am talking about single-parent families.

In Ontario, a family of four with two incomes from full time jobs at minimum wage cannot possibly have enough to stay above the poverty line. That is serious, Mr. Speaker. I would even say it is sad. The poverty rate of families with children where the head of the family is under 25 is 55 per cent.

The reduction in the number of middle-income jobs combined with an increase in the number of low-paying jobs, as was revealed in a recent study by the Economic Council of Canada, does not augur well for these families. In its report entitled The Other Side of Fat City: Child Poverty in Ottawa—Carleton, the Social Planning Council of Ottawa—Carleton stated that an alarming number of children are affected by poverty in this region. Fourteen per cent of children under the age of 18, or 19,000, are living in poverty, Mr. Speaker and 17 per cent of children under the age of six, compared to 13 per cent for children between the ages of 6 and 17.

Families are increasingly dependent on food banks and soup kitchens. The rolls of welfare recipients are growing and too few decent jobs are created to help these people. This government has cast them into a mould that many will have a hard time getting out of. Unemployment and welfare are becoming the rule, and employment, far too often, the exception.

In 1988, there were 945,000 poor children in Canada. While Ontario is among the wealthier provinces in the country, it also has the largest number of children between 0 and 14 years of age, or 34.7 per cent, based on figures from Statistics Canada again. In Vanier, a city in my riding, there are reportedly 935 poor children. Even in ritzy Rockcliffe, there are 15.

On May 28, 1990, the Prime Minister signed the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children on behalf of Canada, thus committing this country to the reduction of poverty.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs who, I notice, is with us today recently quoted the Secretary General of the UN, Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, as saying—I do not have the exact reference, but I am told the quote is from the minister. She said, quoting Perez de Cuellar: "The way a nation treats its children shows not only the compassion and kind protection it is capable of, but also its sense of fairness, its concern for the future, its desire to provide future generations with a better life." It goes without saying that what goes for the international community should go for individual nations.

Mr. Speaker, the numbers reveal a sad state of affairs. When we look at the facts, there is no doubt we have a problem in this country. All the same, this government is introducing a bill which is going to create problems here, in Ottawa—Carleton, in Ontario as well as in British Columbia, but refuses to share the tax burden with the provinces.

[English]

According to an article in The Ottawa Citizen dated December 10, 1990, infant mortality rates among poor children are twice as high. Accidental deaths are twice as common, and deaths from infectious diseases are 2.5

times more common. In 1986, the high school dropout rate among poor children in Canada was 2.2 times the rate among children from non-poor families.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, according to the National Council on Welfare, health and higher education together account for about 11 per cent of the total value of goods produced in Canada. In Ontario, about one student in three drops out before completing 12th grade.

[English]

In his budget of February 26, 1991, which announced this measure that we are dealing with today, the Minister of Finance at the time said:

> There are worrying signs that our education system may not have kept pace with the needs of a competitive economy in the 1990s. As many as 30 per cent of our high school graduates are unable to meet everyday reading demands. We have an alarming secondary school dropout rate, almost 30 per cent, and for the most part these individuals are unable to go on to high quality vocational training. Our young people need to have the educational training to continue to learn for the rest of their lives. Whether our secondary school system is in tune with the 1990s is by no means certain.

This bill cuts right into training, right into educational programs, by cutting federal contributions.

In that same budget the government cut funding for education and health care. I could go on and give details on those cuts, but I will expect somebody to ask me questions because that is a very important part of the debate here today.

[Translation]

The Conservative government treats education as a government expense instead of considering it an investment in our future. With less money and the government cutting funds for education, we will have fewer skilled and qualified workers to meet this global challenge of being competitive, of being able to produce, of being people whom the international market wants to deal with.

The less competitive we are, the more unemployed and welfare recipients there will be, obviously. The more we can compete, the wider the labour market is, the more our young people will be able to find fulfilling work. More access to the labour market means fewer dropouts and fewer social problems. Ignorance is expensive, Mr. Speaker, quite a bit more expensive than education. As we said in the GST debate, taxing books encourages ignorance. It is bad, not good!

Of course, we must not expect results in the short term. An educated, well-trained labour force takes several years to develop.

The need for social assistance and services will continue to grow during this recession, caused largely by this government's disastrous policies. I need not mention all of them, because the litany is quite long. We come back to free trade, the goods and services tax, changes to unemployment insurance, the high interest rate policy, the overvalued dollar and so on, Mr. Speaker.

In my riding this summer, people knew what it was all about when we talked to them about the problems concerning Canadians. They said, "First and foremost the economy, Mr. Gauthier. Make sure I have a job. Make sure they don't tax all I've got in my pockets. Then, Mr. Gauthier—Do your job on the Constitution, you politicians. Solve that problem!" Well, we will solve the constitutional problem, Mr. Speaker, but as for the economy, we will really have to look into it and put forward policies that make investments in education, training and labour force development ones that give us control and make our youth competitive with other countries.

It is no exaggeration, Mr. Speaker, to say that money spent on education is an investment in the future. Not spending on it could cause us serious problems. It is sad to see the cuts made to education in past years.

[English]

I want to quote from the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

> Freezes on federal funds for universities will amount to a cut of $3.8 billion for the fiscal year ending 1995. This amount is much greater than annual operating budgets in the Universities of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

• (1540)

A poll in January 1991 by Angus Reid found that 93 per cent of Canadians agree that the federal government should continue to fund higher education. Two-thirds believe federal funding should be increased.

I want to give to the House some of the figures. In 1990–91, there were cuts of $321 million. In 1991–92 there were cuts of $581 million. In 1992–93, there will be $755 million cut and in 1993–94, $966 million. In 1994–95 the cut will be $1.205 billion. It is a sad state of affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, speaking of this bill, one cannot overlook the fact that there are people in need, that there are problems in our society. And again, going back to the National Council of Welfare, no federal government has ever intended to forget about its commitment towards the disadvantaged people. I repeat, up until now, no government has ever intended to give up its commitment towards the disadvantaged. The conservative government is doing it and is likely to continue to do so. What a shame! It is absolutely unacceptable!

Our society has all the powers, all the resources needed to ensure that all families have enough money to provide food, clothes and a home for themselves. All this government needs is a sound management. As far as I am concerned, I will speak again, when I have the opportunity, to the incapacity of this government to even look after the day-to-day business! They are unable to do it and I think it is quite sad.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier for a very thoughtful and thorough discussion.

What has become clear in his and in other speeches on this bill is that we have significant readjustment of society going on here in which those who are doing very well continue to do better, thank you, and those who are not doing so well will be worse off.

That is happening in a number of domains. We see the deficit and the debt used as the excuse for depriving those who most need the support of society. We see a continual move toward the privileged class and an under class in Canadian society.

I wonder if my colleague might care to comment on the kind of mismanagement of the finances of the country that he feels lie behind this trend which I think Canadians in general reject totally, having been always a society that was committed to sharing and to the development of the potential of every individual Canadian.

I wonder if the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier would have some more comments on that.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

I wish I were in my office. I have a paper there which I read recently which said that the rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer.

To sustain that statement, it showed that the rich have more disposable income today in 1991 than they had four or five years ago. That is possibly due to some Tory policy. Maybe that is the name of the game, but the poor's share of the national pie, if I may call it that, is going down.

I am saying to this government: Show some heart. Be caring about Canadians. Do not cut into the social programs of this country. It is the wrong thing to do.

Over there I know there are sensible people who have their hearts in the right place. I appeal to them to vote against this bill because this is the start, the erosion, of our national framework of understanding among Canadians and that basically is that we share the good times and the bad times. We should share with those who are having a hard time at this time. There are 1.5 million unemployed out there, and possibly .5 million who have left unemployment insurance because they cannot get it any more.

My colleague from Gander—Grand Falls knows all about that because he has a high unemployment rate in his riding. It is a sad state of affairs when you cannot get a job. That is what Canadians are asking for, not more, not less. Get them a job.

Here we are talking today about cutting into those programs which help those people who cannot get a job, who have no unemployment insurance but have to depend on social assistance programs. I hope this government comes to its senses and votes negatively on this measure.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter the debate this afternoon on Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, which in effect will extend to 1995 the 5 per cent cap that has already been imposed upon federal transfer payments in the social welfare and social services field.

The government brought forth the original bill and is now bringing forward Bill C-32 with the argument that this will help the country somehow turn around this horrendous public debt which it has accumulated over the years, will reduce the current account deficit and, through fiscal restraint, will put the government books back in order.

On the surface this is a compelling argument. Whenever you mention the evils of debt to individuals, to families, to family heads, you immediately get a very positive response and people will agree that debt is a bad thing, that debt has a very negative impact, as we say today, on one's emotional or psychological health, and that debt is something that drags the family or the individual down and drags a nation down.

Nations have been living with debt for a long time. While I am not saying that debt is a good thing, I think we have to look at the causes of debt and a whole variety of ways of dealing with its reduction. I will get to that in a few minutes.

As I approach the main subject of my address this afternoon, I wish to remind my hon. friends of certain characteristics we have developed in this country with successive governments down to but not including the present one through which we have established a way of life in this country, at least until a few years ago, that was considerably different in many respects from the way of life of our American friends and neighbours to the south.

We have chosen to put community first. We have chosen to use government fiscal policy to redistribute wealth. We have chosen to establish programs financed by the federal government to assist people to cope with day-to-day problems, problems related to public education, problems arising out of the concerns of those who manage public transportation, public health and health care, which we call medicare in this country, and the social services in the country to help those who are less fortunate or who fall upon adverse times in their personal lives, such things as workers' compensation at the provincial level, unemployment insurance at the federal level, even to the point of using federal funds to retrain people for the ever changing work place.

All of these things cost money. In Canada, at least until a few years ago, Canadians were prepared to pay the bill through their taxes, whether they were federal or provincial or municipal taxes. In the last two or three years this whole assault on the public debt by this government, revolving around fiscal restraint to bring down the public debt, has created a fear in the country that we cannot spend anything any more, or that these very worth-while programs have to be curtailed or reduced and some actually eliminated.

I do not think the people opposite, our colleagues on the government benches, really understand the social impact, to say nothing of the emotional or psychological impact, that this deficit fighting is having on our country. While we may be reducing current account deficits a little bit each year, the public debt in this country on the one hand is increasing. It is now estimated that it will be at least $400 billion by the end of this fiscal year and possibly $420 billion. On the other hand, a lot of these social programs that made Canadians different from the United States are now being subject to market force constrictions or marketplace limitations.

In other words, this government wants to treat social problems the same way as a corporate financier or a corporate manager would treat a corporate problem.

I am suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that that cannot be done because what is happening—and I have said this before in other speeches similar to this one dealing with social and economic issues—is that this is leading to an assault on the middle class. It is leading to an assault on middle class institutions. Public transit, for example, is being destroyed by government policies. VIA Rail is one specific example, as is the cabotage problem in terms of the airlines and the privatization of Air Canada. These are basically middle class institutions.

In our public school system, while we do not see decay at this point, we do see a tremendous negative impact in terms of financing. What the federal government does not provide directly or indirectly from Ottawa the local ratepayers are having to cough up at the municipal or local levels in order to keep their schools open and their high schools functioning.

We have the problem of public education. We have medicare, where it is being suggested that user fees be introduced in order to defray a portion of the cost. I can afford user fees, but medicare was originally used to help all of the people, particularly the disadvantaged and low income earners as well as the middle income earners. When you bring in user fees all in the name of fiscal restraint, you are mounting yet again another assault on a community based program. The community here of course being the entire country.

This government is doing everything it can to attack the middle class and middle class institutions. You may think this is somewhat outrageous, but all one has to do is look at what is happening in the United States with the same marketplace orientation to solving social problems. There you do see the decline of public transit, of public schools, of public or state universities and colleges in some areas of the United States.

Of course they have never been able to come to grips with public or state sponsored medicare. That is why you have such a divergence in private insurance programs in that country.

By way of introduction I simply want to say that we should be very careful in assessing the psychological, emotional and social impact of legislation such as Bill C-32, all in the interests of sharpening our pencils and balancing budgets. A country is not made up entirely of a budget. It is not made up entirely of dollars and cents. It is made up of people who have people problems, and we have to bring more to those problems than simply an accountant's approach, more than just a business approach. There are some things in this life that the marketplace cannot handle. The marketplace cannot handle many of the social programs that we and our predecessors on both sides of this House have fought for for years to improve the standard of living for our fellow citizens.

I cannot help but see in Bill C-32 yet another plank in this government's right wing corporate agenda. It is just one more piece of evidence that the corporations, the tax system, the rich in this country are not going to be hurt or hindered by this deficit—either the national account, the national public debt or indeed the annual current account deficit. It is really an attack on those least able to cope with the financial problems, both at the personal level and at the national level today.

The 5 per cent cap on government spending on social programs through the Canada Assistance Plan continues, but we have been running inflation rates in excess of 5 per cent for the last two or three years. Some have come in just about 5 and then 5.2 per cent. The deficit this year is expected to go as high as 6 per cent on the total annual basis.

How does this impact on the provinces? If the inflation rate is 6 per cent and the cap is at 5 per cent and we are in a recession where more people are unemployed, there are lower tax revenues coming in at the provincial level and lower corporate tax revenues coming at the provincial level. It means that the provincial governments, particularly Ontario which has been hardest hit by this recession, as well as Alberta and B.C., will probably have to borrow. In fact Ontario has had to borrow on the public money markets in order to find the funds to pay the increase in costs for these social measures.

And we saw a deficit budget that came in, in Ontario last May, projected to go as high as $9.7 billion. But of that just one item, $1.6 billion, was the direct result of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan—$1.6 billion. There was about $2 billion that the previous Liberal government had not even accounted for. There is about one-third of that budgetary deficit right there.

I suppose Canadians would not mind all that much if everybody were asked to pay his or her fair share of taxes in order to cope with these deficits. But that is not the case, as you and I know, Mr. Speaker. For example, during the years 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989—four boom years in this country when corporate profits increased by 34 per cent—the corporate taxes in this country declined by 20 per cent. Now we are not expecting corporations to pay higher taxes during periods of economic downturn, when sales are down, productivity is down, when they are going through layoffs, adjustment or rationalization programs or whatever the buzzword is now. But those were boom years, four or five years in this country when profits soared by 34 per cent and corporate taxes went down, down, by 20 per cent.

But during those same four years those in the second lowest income bracket, the second lowest quintile I think they call it, saw their personal taxes go up by 1.1 per cent. In the highest quintile, the highest 20 per cent of income earners in this country, their income taxes went up by only .9 per cent from 1986 through 1989 inclusive. The second highest group went up by only .3 per cent.

Now, is that tax reform? Is that the way it should be? Should those who are in the lower income bracket see their taxes go up the highest while those in the upper income bracket see their taxes go up at a much lower rate? That is not tax reform. That does not give credibility to this government. That is one of the major causes for discontent in this country today and one of the major reasons why this government is stuck at 12 or 15 or 16 per cent in the polls.

• (1600)

It is because of the unfairness of the government's programs. It masquerades as reformers, and when you cut through all the fancy words and language you find out that whatever the reform is it is not fair. What it is doing, either in the name of fiscal restraint on the one hand, or in promotion of the private corporate sector, the private corporate sector is not paying its fair share of the costs.

For example, Bill C-32 is going to slash transfer payments to the provinces in the field of social programs, but of this whopping deficit that we have only 6 per cent is caused by spending in the social envelope. According to Statistics Canada—and that first figure I gave was from Statistics Canada—tax breaks to the rich individuals in this country and to the corporations accounted for 44 per cent of the debt in this nation. Today, those rich people in this country and those corporations have the same loopholes of tax deferment that were existent in the laws of the land 10 or 15 years ago. They can still shelter their taxable incomes and they can defer spending their taxes forever and ever. Corporate lawyers know this.

There is no point talking about a minimum tax in this country. We have not got it for that matter, as long as you have tax loopholes where you can defer paying your taxes. Corporations still list tax deferments, not on the liability side of their annual reports but on the asset side. They are using tax deferments as an asset. Nothing can be more blatantly obvious as proof of my argument.

This government is misleading the people of this country again by saying that we have to tighten our belts in the social envelope to get the debt down, and yet only 6 per cent of that debt is caused by spending in the social envelope of social programs and 44 per cent of the debt is caused by tax breaks to the rich and by corporations being able to defer and write off all kinds of moneys that normally should go in the form of tax revenue to the federal government.

What we are seeing is not only an assault on middle class institutions and middle income earners and low income earners, but this is having a very negative effect on the people as a whole. They are turned off by government. They are turned off by lies by politicians. They are turned off by duplicity. They are turned off by programs that are supposed to be reform programs but turn out only to be masquerading as reform programs, bringing in more and more unfair and inequitable pieces of legislation that affect people differently. The rich are getting richer, as the saying has always been, and the poor are getting poorer.

This Conservative government seems to be powerless to do anything about it. It knows its time is running out, perhaps at the most a year or a year and a half to go in this Parliament, and it refuses to see and appreciate the problem. We also realize that this particular Conservative government under this particular Prime Minister is probably the most ideological Conservative government, in fact the most ideological government I would suggest that this country has had in the 20th century, certainly since R. B. Bennett. I do not think there is any question about that. If it does not fit the marketplace then it does not fit period; that is its motto.

Privatization, deregulation, the free trade agreement as it was written, the GST which is a tax that hits everybody equally at 7 per cent—it could be 9 per cent or perhaps on the eve of the next election it might even be 5 per cent—are all measures that will actually widen the disparity between those who possess and those who do not possess, between those who have a reasonably comfortable life and those who have a life of constant struggle.

Is it any wonder that the premier of Ontario, not in an ideological way but in the interests of promoting national unity, has suggested that transfer payments, medicare and social programs are just too damned important to be left in the hands of any one single government, that they should be enshrined in the new Constitution, and that we should have a social contract or a social clause in our Constitution?

It is not just rhetoric. It is not just words. It would at the very least give all Canadians, rich and poor but particularly the poor and the middle income earners, a guaranteed vested interest in that Constitution to make certain that the Constitution comes forward and that we maintain national unity in this country, whether it is francophone or anglophone, whether it is in New Brunswick or in Alberta.

That is what this party is pleading for. That is what the premier of Ontario is suggesting. I commend it to this government and to the Prime Minister and to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I see that my time has run out, Mr. Speaker. I thank you very kindly.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I think my question will become more or less a comment because the member in his speech has probably answered all the questions that anyone has in this House.

I know the members across the way have not been looking up, have feigned their disinterest and are working away at what they are doing. I know perhaps that they are somewhat embarrassed and ashamed because they certainly would concur with what my colleague has said about the clawback on old age pensions and the end of universality as we know it.

I pay particular attention to the medicare that we are so very proud of in this country. It is so ironic that just the other night I was watching a program that came from the United States narrated by Walter Cronkite who suggested that one in four bankruptcies in the United States is a direct result of medical care: one week in a hospital, $10,000. One in two Americans do not proceed to get the attention that they would require for their medical problems for fear that they cannot afford it. Twenty-five million Americans cannot afford any insurance. Lo and behold, if you do get ill and access the insurance program, you can surely bet that they will cut you off in short order.

It seems strange that we are cutting our medicare program or taking a very serious look at that through user fees, and the Americans on the other side are trying to emulate us. They have actually studied the program and said we are more efficient: "We would like to have what Canada offers". This is sold under the guise by the party in power that it is not an attack on social programs. It is just that we are going to spend more wisely.

The member pointed out the competitive agenda, the market driven agenda. This government says that it is the have provinces that we will not get the transfer payments for. We will reduce transfer payments to Alberta, B.C. and Ontario. I do not know if Ontario can be considered a have province. When you do not transfer to the province then the province must transfer to its municipalities. In the case of my municipality or the riding that I represent, Sault Ste. Marie, just last week the province of Ontario had to give $4 million to the city of Sault Ste. Marie just for back taxes that the Algoma Steel Corporation cannot pay.

The feds just say: "Oh, well, it is provincial jurisdiction because Ontario is well off". We resent that statement very much.

As far as the social contract is concerned, the European Economic Community suggests that a social contract is in order. Why would we not have one in North America?

Before I lose the good graces of the Chair, I do not know if the member would want to elaborate any more on what he has already done.

• (1610)

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I think the main reason why the European community has been able to insert the social contract into the constitution of the European community is because of one man, Mr. Jacques Delors, who I believe is the president. Mr. Delors also happens to be a French socialist. He was determined that the European community would not be dominated in its economics and its economic dynamics by countries like Germany or his own country of France or the United Kingdom or Italy, or the more advanced if you like. He was taking into consideration families and workers, men and women in countries like Portugal, Spain originally, and Greece.

He said: "We do not want to create an economic union here and a trading pact where great multinational and trans-national corporations can trade off countries, where they can say fine, we will locate in Portugal if we can get labour burden down to $5 an hour U.S. We will relocate from Germany down there for the cheap wages". "No", he said, "we are going to contract up so that the poorer countries in Europe will be able to pay higher wages and will stimulate their economies and their standards of living upward so that nobody can take advantage of and exploit the poorer countries in that organization".

We are in negotiations now with Mexico. I have nothing against Mexico. I love it. It is a beautiful country and I love Mexican people. It has a dynamic culture. What are we doing? We are not putting any safeguards in there for our working families or for American working families. Trans-national corporations are doing it now, racing down to Mexico to exploit Mexican workers at a much lower cost or labour burden to them, which is going to have a profound disruptive impact on the Canadian and American labour markets.

In Europe, Jacques Delors said: "We do not want that and they are not going to get that". Here we are in North America, falling prey once again to that corporate agenda of which our Prime Minister is a slaving supplicant. He sees nothing else but that in his thinking.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to participate in this debate today on Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

I have listened with great care and interest to the remarks of my colleagues on various sides of the House. I cannot help but think that there is a fair bit of misunderstanding as to what is going on, not only in this House but in the government, with the finances of the nation. I could not help but be impressed as I prepared these remarks in reviewing the progress that the government has made over the last seven years in coming to grips with an extraordinary financial mess that it inherited seven years ago from its predecessors.

I have to say this as a member from rural Atlantic Canada, an area that benefits tremendously from federal government expenditures, an area that is greatly concerned about the unity of our country because the breakup of our country would leave Atlantic Canada isolated from the rest of the country. We are highly dependent on the Government of Canada.

That is one of the reasons that we are not too thrilled at the kind of rhetoric that is coming out of the Reform Party these days, when it talks about reducing expenditures across the board by 10 per cent and when it talks about getting rid of things like ACOA, reducing equalization, reducing veterans pensions and old age allowances. My goodness, we are talking in this debate here about capping the Canada Assistance Plan, the growth and expenditures to three provinces so that they can only grow by 5 per cent. We wonder what would happen if the Reform Party and Mr. Manning came into power and everything was cut by 20 per cent. It is a pretty scary prospect for Atlantic Canadians, I must say.

What we have here is a piece in a very well ordered and well structured financial plan to bring back into order the finances of this nation, to ensure the confidence that is so essential in controlling things like interest rates, the rate of inflation and the value of the Canadian dollar that ensures the flow of investment to this country, investment that is the basis for jobs.

There are not walls around the country, but investment and sound finances. Those are the things that are important.

This bill is part of a financial package that really began in 1984, but most recently follows in line with the budgets of 1990 and 1991. I must say I commend it to all members of the House as we come to consider it here today, and indeed in the days ahead.

I think it is important to remember that the finances of this country were very much out of whack. In 1984, we had achieved an accumulated national debt of $200 billion.

Even more frightening was the fact that the national deficit was $38 billion. It had been allowed to run rampantly out of control. That $38 billion actually included a $16 billion operating deficit.

It is important to understand the structure of this debt. The government of that day was actually spending $16 billion more each year than it was taking in. In addition to that, it was paying $22 billion in interest on that $200 billion national debt.

I have people say to me: "What progress have you people made on the deficit? You have only brought it down from $38 billion to $30 billion." On the surface that is true, but let us look at the structure of the debt.

We are now running the government on a $12.5 billion surplus. That is a $28.5 billion turnaround. How has that turnaround been achieved? A certain amount of it has been achieved through increased revenues resulting from tax reform.

Some would say, by increasing taxes. I am not sure. It is more a question of taxes reflecting the growth in the economy. Even more important, it has been achieved through a 70 per cent reduction in expenditures by the Government of Canada.

That is management. That is tightening the belt. That is leading by example. I heard some of my hon. friends earlier saying, as some people say: "Ah yes, but the national debt has doubled since you people have been in power. What accomplishment is that?" Of course, they are hoping that nobody will dig a little more deeply to understand the structure of that debt, because it is a very simple thing.

If you take a debt in 1984 of $200 billion and you do nothing towards bringing that debt down and if you take, say, an average interest rate of 10 per cent per year even though the interest rates were much higher in the early 1980s, even in 1989 and 1990. Through the sound management of this government, I am pleased to note that interest rates have gone down 5.5 per cent in the last year, which is going to be of great benefit to the Canadian economy.

If you compound a $200 billion debt for seven years at 10 per cent and if you just add it up, what does it get you? It gets you $389 billion. If you want to be a little more accurate, it is probably about 11 per cent, then you compound it and you end up with a debt of $415 billion.

Members opposite say that this government has doubled the debt. This government has not doubled the debt. This government inherited a $16 billion operating deficit, turned it around to a $12.5 billion operating surplus. By getting the finances of the nation under control, we are gradually going to get at that $400 billion debt that is the legacy of the Trudeau Liberal government to Canadians.

Thank goodness we have had a government which had the courage and the integrity to tackle that debt. There is no question. Every politician in this House knows that it is much easier to get yourself popular by giving money out than by taking it away. That is the situation.

When we talk about capping the Canada Assistance Plan, what exactly are we dealing with? Speaking from the perspective of an Atlantic Canadian where we are so highly dependent on things like equalization and transfers to the provinces, it is very simple.

If the Government of Canada is going to tighten its own belt, if the Government of Canada is going to do something—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize. I have a point of order.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, there is really no need to apologize. It is quite a legitimate point of order.

My good friend from South Shore is in full flight and all that, but I am sure he would want to recognize that in the energy of the moment, he misled the House.

• (1620)

He talked about a $400 billion legacy of the Trudeau era. He will be aware that the public debt at the time his cronies took over was $180 billion. It is now $400 billion. I will not sit here, Mr. Speaker, and have that member deliberately mislead the House and I suggest you invite him to withdraw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It is a matter of opinion. Debate.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's will wish to perhaps make his point, invalid though I happen to feel it may well be, when we come to the questions and comments. There is no question that if you take a $200 billion debt—actually it was about $199 point something billion in 1984–85, so my hon. friend might check the budgetary figures and then come back in time for questions and comments and he can make his point.

I would invite him to compound the interest for the last seven years on that debt that the government of which he was a member, left as a burden to the taxpayers and the young people of this country, and come back with an accurate figure of what that debt is, if he wishes to try to dispute the reality of the fact. What we are left with as Canadians is roughly a $400 billion debt. That is a legacy of the government of which he was a member. However, he can come back with the accurate facts and figures if he believes that mine are not accurate.

I was saying before this euphemistic point of order was raised that in controlling expenditures, if roughly 25 per cent—maybe it is 24 per cent or 26 per cent; I would not want to run afoul of my hon. friend opposite— of the expenditures of the government are in fact transfers to the provinces, then what is more reasonable than if we are going to confine expenditure growth, that it should apply equally to transfers to the provinces as to the expenditures and the programs of the Government of Canada itself.

It is important to note that it is not as if this government has not significantly increased the transfers to the provinces. For example, this year total federal transfers to the provinces in cash and tax points will be some $37 billion, up from what was $25.6 billion in 1984–85, which is an average annual growth rate of 5.5 per cent.

At the same time, federal government program expenditures have gone up an average of only 3.7 per cent. This government has asked nothing of the provinces that it has not done in greater measure to itself.

Costs cannot be controlled unless expenditures are controlled. Indeed, if the provinces are not prepared to control their expenditures, but simply feel they can rely endlessly on the Government of Canada to meet their shortfalls, maybe it is appropriate in the interests of the taxpayer that the Government of Canada exercise some control and then leave the provinces free to go beyond that if they so wish.

I listened with interest to the premier of Prince Edward Island on the radio the other day. By the way, he is in contravention of a federal-provincial agreement, refusing to provide legal assistance to anyone charged before the courts. Indeed, there was some suggestion that it would be appropriate that the premier of Prince Edward Island, who is also the attorney-general, be cited for contempt of court. He made the statement in what seemed to me a semi-serious attitude, you know, an unhealthy semi-serious attitude, that what difference does it make if the federal government has a big debt? So what if the federal government has a big debt and the provinces do not have very big debts. So what. The federal government should just continue to let their debt grow. It is all the same taxpayer, he said, it is all the same taxpayer.

Well, if it is all the same taxpayer, let the province that wishes to spend the money, generate the money and answer to the taxpayer for it. This government wants the taxpayer and wants people beyond this country, the investors who are so important to the future of this country, to know that this government acts in a fiscally responsible manner and is going to endeavour to control the expenditures that it brings down.

Are the social programs of Canada put under siege by this government? Some, of course like the immediate speaker before me, the hon. member for Brant, suggested that social programs are under attack. I would suggest that we are not going to have social programs in the future if we bankrupt the nation. At what point does the nation cease to have the ability to govern itself when your national debt is a third of your expenditures as is the situation now? Is it when it is 50 per cent of the expenditures? At what point does the International Monetary Fund come in and say you are not responsible to govern yourselves?

Those are questions we might ask.

The accumulated debt of the provinces in this country is considerably less than the accumulated deficit which was estimated at $30.5 billion last year. At the same time that of the provinces is $9.4 billion.

Where is the Canadian taxpayer federally? You know 33 cents on the dollar is going to pay interest on the debt. What are the situations in the provinces? The average is about 11 cents on the dollar. It would seem to me that we need to tax the provinces which are not paying their fair share. When we look at the provinces that are impacted by this legislation they are not the provinces that are in the greatest financial need. It does not include provinces like the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan. What is the situation in those provinces? In Alberta it is 8.3 cents, 11 cents in Ontario, and 4 cents in British Columbia. That is the percentage of expenditures that goes toward the debt. Yet they say that the Government of Canada should continue to run up a debt.

Maybe that is why the Government of Canada has run up a debt because of uncontrolled spending by the provinces.

It is interesting to note that the figure 9.4, which is the combined deficit of the 10 provinces of Canada, is soon going to be blown out of the water by the actions of our friends in Ontario, Mr. Rae and his spending approach. It is going to be interesting to watch. As a Nova Scotian, I am greatly concerned about what happens in Ontario because Ontario has such a major impact on the economy of this country as a whole and indeed on the economic numbers. Things like inflation and interest rates are driven very largely by what goes on in Ontario.

The message is going out across the land that the Government of Ontario is going to spend, spend, spend with no regard for where the money is going to come from. The Government of Ontario is determined to put that province and the future generations of that province in a financial situation such as this country might have been in had there been no change in approach. If the $38 billion deficit that was inherited here in 1984–1985 had been allowed to continue, we would have a deficit of some $100 billion in this country today. I suspect that if Mr. Rae does not come back down to earth and recognize that he has to exercise some responsibility in the way he governs his province, what we are going to see is Ontario doing its best to rival the federal government in the size of its deficit.

I do not know what the future of that would augur. It will be interesting to look at the reaction of businesses to the proposals in Mr. Rae's budget. I cannot help but wonder what we can expect down the road. I heard earlier today one of my hon. friends from the New Democratic Party pulling out the old saw about the free trade agreement leading to lost jobs. I wonder if he is going to be prepared to stand up and honestly face this House as businesses leave Ontario running from Bob Rae and his approach to economics and the potential impact that they are going to have on the economy of that province.

As new industries, such as the one the Minister of Finance was speaking about today, and new opportunities develop in this country, and as our economy generally becomes stronger I am sure that my friends opposite in the New Democratic Party will continue to try to find opportunities to blame anything that goes wrong on the free trade agreement, even though there is no validity to it whatsoever.

Coming back to the bill more specifically, I think we should take cognizance of the fact that what we are talking about here is limiting the growth of expenditures. We are not talking about cuts. We are talking about limiting the growth of expenditures. There will be no limit on the growth of expenditures in the provinces where the need is greatest. But there will be a 5 per cent ceiling on growth in the three most affluent provinces, at a time when it is important to note that the Government of Canada as part of its budget is also limiting growth in expenditures in federal government programs to 3 per cent. What we have going down here is that the government is being far more generous to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario than it is being to itself.

What constitutes unreasonableness? Some provinces have resources at their disposal, limited deficits that they either have or inherited when they came into power and limited tax dollars that they have to allocate to paying interest on their debts. If they feel that their growth should exceed 60 per cent more than the federal government is allowing them and the federal government is allowing themselves, then let them find the resources for the revenues.

It amazes me how often I listen to people in this place and elsewhere suggest that the government should spend more money here and spend more money there. They say: "Let's expand this program. Why are we limiting expenditures here and limiting expenditures there? Are they proposing that we further increase the federal deficit, or are they going to propose new tax increases or new taxes?" Sometimes my friends from the NDP will say: "Tax the corporations". That is the solution to every problem. Bob Rae is going to find out he won't have any corporations left to tax if he keeps going the way he started out. There has to be an element of realism. That is what this government has provided, in the way of financial policy, an element of realism in its approach.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): The Tories in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCreath: It is very interesting. I should not allow myself to be distracted, but I do wish to comment. One of the really excellent things that has happened in the last year is that we have a government in Nova Scotia under the leadership of the hon. Donald Cameron. He is taking the finances of the province under control to make sure that he does not pass on to future generations of Nova Scotians the type of cycle of debt that exists in the federal government and has taken us so many years to bring under control. It is tough to stand up and take the tough measures, to do what seven governments have responsibly done, one of them being Nova Scotia, and indeed what the Government of Canada has done. We feel that we have a responsibility to the person who pays the piper and that is the taxpayer of Canada, whether they be from Newfoundland, British Columbia or anywhere else in between.

It would be nice to be able to say spend away all you want, there is no limit to the bottom of the well, but unfortunately there is. We have a government in Canada, a government I am proud to support, that is standing up for Canadians, future Canadians as well as present Canadians, in seeing that our finances are brought under control. One of those areas is the Canada Assistance Plan, and I encourage all members of this House to join me in supporting this excellent bill.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the hon. member's speech. However, I want to remind him of just a couple of things.

He accused Premier Rae of spending, spending, spending. The reason why the deficit in the province of Ontario increased so quickly in one year is twofold: (1) the previous government had hidden the facts of the decline in revenues to the tune of about $2 billion and (2) this government, by pulling back through the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, cost them another $1.6 billion.

But the point I want to make is this: I would like to ask the member how he accepts the fact that this plan will tighten belts and help to reduce government expenditures so that they can get the deficit under control, as he put it, when he knows that under present tax laws $6 billion a year go untaxed at the corporate level in this country—$6 billion.

Second, would he tell this House who would he ask in the province of Ontario to pay for the 14 per cent increase in welfare? Ontario has been severely hit by recession, has lost somewhere in the neighbourhood of 300,000 jobs, largely because of free trade and the high dollar that has been imposed on this country by this government. Would it be ordinary tax paying Canadians on their property taxes, or would it be ordinary taxpayers in their provincial taxes in Ontario? Who is he asking to pick up the tab for that increase of 14 per cent in social welfare payments alone in Ontario?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, of course I listened. My hon. friend asked many questions. It is difficult to know where to begin, but I am glad to see that he has not forgotten the rhetoric that has been sort of the gospel of the New Democratic Party for the past three years.

The member says 300,000 jobs were lost from the free trade agreement. I would like to see some accurate estimates of those figures. It is very interesting. I noticed those figures came from a study done by the Canadian Labour Congress. I am really intrigued with the fact that if you look at those figures and you break them all down, you see jobs lost in the Atlantic fishery included there. Is that not interesting? The number of fish in the ocean decreases and guess who is to blame? The free trade agreement.

Some of those job losses are in the tobacco industry. Significant thousands of Canadians have ceased to smoke, so the demand is less. Blame that one on the free trade agreement.

The big area, of course, that the NDP likes to talk about are the reductions in the automobile industry which, of course, are not a part of the free trade agreement. They have the auto pact to look after them.

We can talk about the brewing industry which is a part of those numbers. The brewing industry is explicitly left out of the free trade agreement.

My hon. friend, it is like anything else, you hear enough figures and you know enough of them are wrong that you wonder about the other ones.

My hon. friend is looking for a comment on the dollar and I would be pleased to comment on the dollar. There are two ways to deal with the dollar. I have to tell you, in all honesty, my particular constituency is highly dependent on exports to the United States. I honestly have to tell you that we, on the south shore of Nova Scotia, would very, very much like to see a substantially lower dollar than we have today, but what do we do? Do we have the Government of Canada decide the value of the dollar or do we do it the way it is supposed to be done? The dollar is high because people outside this country have so much confidence in this country. Is that not a remarkable turnaround from what I hear from my friends opposite.

When we talk about exports, the lower the dollar of course the more we can sell. However, we have to look at competitiveness. We live in a new world. We do not live in the 19th century. We are moving rapidly toward the 21st century and we have to be ready to compete. We have to look at our own productivity. We have to look at wage rates. We have to look at how many people are involved in the process.

They talk about pricing differentials between Canada and the United States and they like to blame it all on taxes or something like that. Well, taxes might be a little piece of it. You then look at the amount of profit taken by retailers, the amount of middlemen along the way, the cost of production, but it is great to be able to poll something in isolation and say: "Ah ha, that is the problem, there is the bogeyman."

The reality with the dollar is that the dollar is high because of international confidence in the Canadian economy. You do not have to take it from me. Look at the reports of the OECD and other internationally respected bodies that look at these things. The fact of the matter is that the high dollar hurts us right now in some areas where we export, particularly exports based on our resources, but it also challenges us as Canadians to become more competitive.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I do not suggest there is any hope that the member is going to answer any of the questions from this side of the House.

If we can get back on topic with regard to the free trade agreement and social policy, it was the Prime Minister who said that the free trade agreement would enhance social programs in this country. This is a redundant debate and a redundant bill. It is totally unnecessary.

Getting back to the question from the member for Brant, he said: "Who is going to pay in Ontario?" I cite my community again where the federal government said: "Here is a CAP." Sault Ste. Marie, in dire straits, the largest employer in the community cannot pay municipal taxes, $4 million. Who is to pay? The province transferred the funds to the community. The federal government does not participate.

Sault Ste. Marie is not alone. In northern Ontario the unemployment rate is 15 per cent. Who pays? I want the member to answer that question. If the federal government is not going to participate, what role is it going to play and who pays?

• (1640)

Mr. McCreath: I will very briefly answer, Mr. Speaker, because I know our time is just about up. There is a very simple answer to the member's question. The taxpayer pays.

The question is, at the same time the Government of Ontario must manage its affairs with the resources that are available to it. If the demand on the Ontario government in this particular area is greater, well then maybe it has to take a look at expenditures in other areas. That is exactly what this government has done. That is what the individuals you speak of in their homes have to do. That is what I have to do in my home. If I spent 15 per cent more than I took in every year, I would be in real serious trouble.

You have got to cut the cloth according to the pattern. The answer is very simple. The taxpayer is going to pay. It is just as well that it be the taxpayer or the guy making the expenditures as somebody else's taxpayer, but the bottom line is that the public is saying to the governments of the day and to this country: "Live within your means just as we have to as citizens".

I suggest that the Government of Ontario needs to learn that lesson. It could have no better model than this government and the Minister of Finance who is with us here right now.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words on this legislation which is called an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. In effect, what it does is reduce the amount of money that is transferred to the provincial governments, three provincial governments in this case, moneys that they use to spend to provide housing for the elderly in the case of a senior citizens' complex or a nursing home. At the end of every month the provincial government, which guarantees occupancy in those nursing homes and senior citizens' complexes, that are subsidized by the government, sends in a bill to the federal government and the federal government pays a percentage of the cost.

This bill will reduce the amount of money. It will put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. It will put a cap on the CAP. Well, the cap on the CAP not only covers the senior citizens' complexes, but it covers every amount of money that is given out to people under what we call social assistance, and what some people refer to as welfare.

It caps the CAP in three provinces. Why does it do that? The hon. member for St. John's West is here now and he is saying: "Yes, it does this in three provinces".

The reason why this bill is being brought in, I believe, is because they have already put a cap on the other provinces. They have already put a cap on everything that can be capped. In other words, in the riding of the hon. member who interjected a few moments ago, in his province, the federal government has said this year: "We are going to reduce the amount of money that we transfer to your province. We are going to cap it at 3 per cent".

In other words, in the operations of a hospital or in the money for universities, they have been capped as well. To get at the other three provinces which are not given equalization payments, the government decided to cap the CAP. Now everyone is capped. In other words, the cost of running hospitals is capped, the administration of post-secondary institutions—our universities, trade colleges and vocational schools—is capped and now the social assistance departments are capped as well.

When their moneys are capped at 3 per cent or 5 per cent, it means that they cannot pay salary increases of 10 per cent, 7 per cent, 6 per cent or 5 per cent. They cannot buy new machinery and increase the costs of running hospitals.

The hon. member for the NDP made reference a few moments ago to medicare and a program by Walter Cronkite. I saw that particular program. It certainly was a sad hour to watch. There were people who had received two or three treatments of chemotherapy for cancer. They were left not being able to go back to the doctor or the hospital to receive further treatments of chemotherapy because the insurance company said: "Too bad, we are not going to insure you again unless you pay us $20,000 or $30,000."

It was a sad program to watch, and it was a sad reflection on how the United States of America takes care of some people who are caught in the bind of not having a system like we have in Canada.

In that program it gave the numbers on the most modern types of machinery that we have in our hospitals to take care of our sick. It gave examples of a machine like a CAT scan, and it gave the numbers for the United States as compared to Canada.

It was very clear that in the United States they were farther ahead of Canada with the machinery and the new modern methods of dealing with and detecting a disease than we in our hospitals.

I was thinking as I watched that program that we have many instances of that. We have our provincial administrations today and the federal government really cost-sharing to send a great many people to the United States for treatment on various types of machinery in hospitals that we do not have here in Canada, or that we do not have enough of.

I was dealing the other day with a case of somebody who needed the use of what is called a lithotripter machine. That is a machine that is available in Halifax, Nova Scotia, at the Victoria General Hospital. Of course, that is overworked so the provinces send patients either there or to another hospital to where that piece of machinery is.

How can a hospital or a provincial government buy all of that machinery and expand on its facilities when they have been capped by the federal government, when their amount of money has been reduced by the federal government?

The same thing applies to post-secondary education. Here, in this bill, we come to another bad case of reducing money to people who cannot afford to be caught.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, how difficult it is for somebody to live on social assistance today in this country? You can compare the amounts they receive for social assistance right across Canada and you discover that the amounts vary from province to province.

As a general rule, a single person would get about $120 a month to live on. If you are living at home, that varies $70 to $90. The provincial governments certainly cannot afford to cut back any more on those people who are on social assistance.

The federal government, along with these bills, turned around and discontinued the extent of our direct job creation programs.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, you cannot now get on a direct job creation program unless it is connected with the unemployment insurance fund. You have to be drawing unemployment insurance in order to get on to a works program.

What the provincial governments have done is come up with their own program to try to put people on unemployment insurance in order to save money through their social assistance grants and programs that they have available provincially.

• (1650)

The federal government has done this, as the hon. member said a few moments ago, in the name of attacking the national debt. We just dealt with a bill before this Chamber that imposed a 7 per cent tax called the GST and then established a special fund to retire the national debt. That argument presented by the Government of Canada to reduce the payments for social assistance across Canada does not apply today because it claims that now the new GST will do the job for it.

The federal government has even gone beyond capping amounts of money to provinces. Because of this bill passing through the House, three provincial governments will now have to pay money back to the federal Treasury, either in an outright cheque for millions and millions of dollars or they will have to do what the federal government has done with the province of Newfoundland for this year, and that is have the provinces pay back so much at the end of every two weeks.

In other words, for all of this year the province of Newfoundland is sending a cheque off to the federal Treasury to pay back what the federal Treasury claimed was an overpayment made to the province of Newfoundland over the last three or four years.

Perhaps we will see the same thing happen here. Not only are they being capped, not only are they being limited in the amount of money being transferred to them, but they have now been asked to pay back money that was granted to the provinces three, four and five years ago.

I think the federal government should have learned a lesson by now and admit that it cannot cut back in these areas. Of all the areas that could be listed to cut back in, you should never, ever touch health care, education and social assistance. Of the three areas, our hospitals and post-secondary institutions unfortunately have become places for only the well-to-do in our society, the very well-to-do.

The way our student loan system has been structured and now taxed by the Government of Canada, it is very difficult for somebody to go to university unless they have lots of money in the bank or parents who have lots of money to give to them. Now it is attacking not only our hospitals, our students, but the poorest of the poor, our senior citizens and their accommodations and our poor people who are on social assistance today and who cannot make ends meet.

The Government of Canada should hang its head in shame and withdraw this bill and pay to the people on social assistance what they need to keep their heads afloat with all of these new taxes we have circulating in this country.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that my good friend from Gander—Grand Falls would say so succinctly what he said so well.

However, if you will just give me a moment here, I will get organized.

I thank my friend, the distinguished former Speaker of this Chamber for the coaching. I need all the help I can get at this particular point, as I am sure he is aware.

As my friend from Gander—Grand Falls was saying when he was in full flight a few moments ago, this is just the latest attempt, not an isolated attempt but the latest of several attempts by this government to hoodwink a lot of people.

I recognize the government does not have great difficulty hoodwinking the member for South Shore. He has a vested interest in being hoodwinked.

An hon. member: He is hoodwinkable.

Mr. Simmons: I am far more interested in the people who are being directly pounded into the ground by this particular piece of legislation. It sets about extending that cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

The devastation that this government is wreaking on ordinary people across this country needs to be quantified if that is possible. If we could only bring before the House some specific examples of how people are being pummelled by this particular government.

Let me give just an example that I ran into this week. It is not under the ambit of the Canada Assistance Plan, but it is a parallel example that I believe will drive home the point that I want to make here.

I was in the home of an individual, a college student, this weekend in a small community on the south coast of Newfoundland, a community of about 200 or 300 people. This young woman is the daughter of a fisherman who had a fair to middling year, not a good year. He has caught some fish and he is still working but he has no great amount of income. Notwithstanding, when that young individual went to apply for a Canada student loan she was told that given her circumstances and those of her father and so on, she would qualify, not for the $900 or $1,000 which she wanted but for $155.

Point number one: the reason she is qualifying for such a measly amount is because this government has not changed the basic ground rules since 1984. It has not kept up with inflation over those past seven years. Whatever an amount was worth in 1984, it is certainly not worth the same amount seven years later given the effect of inflation. To begin with, it has not changed the ground rules. That is quite another story, an important one but another story. On to my example.

This young woman was informed that she qualified for $155 to help her through her year at college, $155. She is going to appeal that, and we will help her. In the meantime, she trots off to the local bank a few miles down the road to get her $155. As she is about to sign all the forms and to receive the $155, which is several hundred dollars less than she was hoping she would get, the bank people said to her: "There are a few more details. Before we can give you the $155 you owe us $4.65". She wanted to know what that was for. That was the tax. That is the 3 per cent tax, another of the several taxes this government has put on education. The goods and services tax is also a tax on education. There is a theme on which we could go for some time.

My friend from South Shore has a nice term for everything. People these days call janitors or whatever sanitary engineers. Is that right? He is the kind of individual who goes around inventing fancy terms to put a nice face on some pretty despicable stuff. He can call it what he wants, but I call it a kick in the guts for students. That is what I would call it. Instead of engaging in sweet phrasing, when is he going to start fighting for those students in his own riding who must be pummelled by those taxes?

Let me continue with the example. I am sure he would be interested. He looks at least amused by the example, so let me continue.

This young woman is asked for $4.65 before she can get her student loan. She was told it was a federal government tax on student loans. So she said: "Take it off the $155". "No, we cannot do that. The rules do not allow us to do that. You have to give us the $4.65 first and then we will give you the $155".

She searched around in her purse and scraped up $4.65 and she passed it across the counter.

• (1700)

The bank is not finished with her yet. There is one more wrinkle. It said: "Now that you have paid us the $4.65, we have got to send it to the government. So you have got to buy a money order to send the $4.65 to the government". She searched around in her purse some more and $1.50 later she has got her transaction completed. To get her $155 loan which is only a fraction, only one-sixth of what she needs in the first place, she has to pay a tax that the finance minister and the boys have dreamed up for $4.65. Then to get that tax into the hot little hands of the Minister of Finance, she has got to turn around and buy a money order, another $1.50.

What are we trying to do in this country? Are we trying to drive those young people stark raving mad before they ever get in the door the first time to further their education? I say to my friend in the NDP that the one thing that they will not make of those people are Tories. They are working on alienating those people completely. They are working on running them out of rural Newfoundland or rural Canada and in the process they make every waking moment just as miserable as they can.

Think of the example that I have given. To get $155, she pays $4.65 in federal tax, a student tax, a tax on education, and then she has to turn around and buy a money order to send the tax off to the government.

There must be people over there who sit up nights saying: "How can we make it even more miserable tomorrow than it is today for the ordinary people out there? How can we do something to aggravate them, to drive them clean up the wall, to drive them stark raving mad?" This bill, this cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, while not as dramatic as the example I just mentioned, is in the same vein. It is of the same ilk. It is crafted by a bunch of warped minds that are so out of touch with reality, the reality of life for people out there in Newfoundland, in rural Canada and all over this great country, once great country which is only a shadow of its former self, thanks to what the gentleman from Baie Comeau and his clique have done with it.

People all over this country are hurting. They are hurting and it chooses this time to bring in this kind of a bill, this kind of a double whammy, this kind of a kick in the guts.

I was going to say I do not understand what makes this crowd over there tick, but then I do. It is that philosophy, that right wing agenda that somehow says: "If through no fault of your own you don't have a job or if for reasons of personal or whatever kind of misfortune you don't have adequate access to income, enough to keep body and soul together, if you happen to be in that category, tough luck". It is called, kick them while they are down.

If we were to characterize the approach of this government toward poor people, toward the disadvantaged generally across this country, it is kick them while they are down. The thing that really boggles my mind and tears at everything that is in me is how otherwise decent men and women can sit over there and be the unwitting parrots to this kind of nonsense, this kind of cruelty. How can they be party to perpetrating on poor people across this country what this bill seeks to do and what this government seeks to do on a daily basis?

The only surprise is that this crowd is at 12 per cent in the polls, that it is that far up. That is the only surprise.

Mr. McCreath: Seventeen on Monday.

Mr. Simmons: "Seventeen on Monday", the member for South Shore says. Enjoy it while it lasts. I say to him: enjoy it while it is up there at 17 per cent. It is a temporary situation if the people of this country continue to have the kind of basic horse sense that I know them to have. They will not stand by—

An hon. member: —another part of the horse.

Mr. Simmons: I think the member is much too kind. The member for South Shore should get his seat moved so he can be a seatmate of the member for Burlington. He would make the member for Burlington look good. Now if that is his attempt at wit he is half way there.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about what we can do under the aegis of the Canada Assistance Plan to help some of the ordinary people of Canada. The best that my friend from South Shore can do is sit here and dream up some more insults. He needs a few more lessons from the member for Burlington because the member for Burlington is light years behind him. But he is definitely going in the right direction and he should work on it—or, I should say, he should not work on it.

Mr. Speaker, who is going to benefit from this bill? I say the same people that the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs rushed out to call today, the Business Council on National Issues, his buddies in business. That is part of the right wing agenda; move away from the ordinary people every last nickel and dime you can, so that the well to do people in this country have ever–increasing amounts of disposable income. Do you know that if you were poor in 1984 when this government came to power and had an income of under $25,000, your taxes have gone up in the seven intervening years by $1,200. But if you are in another category, if you had an income of $100,000 or more, your taxes have gone down by $1,600 a year since 1984.

The member for South Shore is having trouble absorbing that, but that is not a surprise to me. He should check his facts. The advice he gave me—and I rushed out and I checked my facts and, as usual, he was absolutely right; the public debt in 1984 was not $170 billion, it was $167 billion. So I was off by a mere $3 billion. He now bids for $199 billion; do I hear $200 billion? Because whether we are talking $167 billion, $170 billion, or whether we are talking $199 or $200 billion, my point stands, that the debt now is over $400 billion and no amount of fiddling around with compound interest or double talk or insults will change that. The public debt since his administration took office has more than doubled. That is the point I was making to him. He skated beautifully.

Mr. McCreath: Compounding of the interest—

Mr. Simmons: He skated beautifully. He had his chance to make a speech, Mr. Speaker, and I leave it to his constituents to judge how good his speech was, because I know that he did not spend a lot of time talking about their particular needs. He talked about the needs of his Prime Minister, but then again he is probably more interested in pleasing his Prime Minister than he is in pleasing his constituents. But I say to him that in the long run his destiny will be more decided by his constituents than by his Prime Minister, the former of whom are much more permanent than the latter.

Mr. Speaker, while the people in the Business Council on National Issues and the well-to-do people of this country, the cronies of the Minister of Finance and the minister of constitutional affairs and the Prime Minister, will benefit by this further shift in moneys away from the poor that are not so poor, who will really be hurt by this?

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I recognize your signal that my time has so quickly passed. I think it goes without saying that Canada's poorest people, the people who can least afford another kick in the guts, are going to get one when this bill passes. It will pass because the government will ram it through like it did the goods and services tax and like it has done with 31 other taxes since this government took power. There is no doubt in my mind that the bill will become law.

My only reason in rising today is to make a plea to some of the people over there who must realize that to tie their destiny to this particular sinking ship is foolhardy at best, but even that aside, in the interest of basic ordinary decency and compassion, recognize that this bill is one foul step too many.

If they want to look at themselves in the mirror tomorrow morning, they will be better able to do it if they vote against this bill first or at least speak against it.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attentiveness and care to my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's. I listened to him talk about the people who are going to be disadvantaged by this legislation. It is interesting to observe that not a single Newfoundlander will be disadvantaged by this bill. Quite the contrary, Newfoundlanders will benefit from this bill because it is part of a package that is going to put right the disordered finances of this nation that were left as the legacy of the government of which he was a member.

We talked about the accumulated debt earlier. It was interesting to note in my hon. friend's remarks that he said: "If the Tories do not stop taking money away from people there will not be any Tories left." One of the reasons this country is in such a mess is that the philosophy of the Liberal government was: "Buy as many of them as you can for as long as you can." The Liberals left office in 1984 with a $16 billion operating deficit.

If my hon. friend had come into office in 1984 and he was the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance all wrapped up into one and he inherited a $16 billion operating deficit and a $400 billion accumulated debt, what would his solution have been to this situation?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the member in his last phrase or so unwittingly put a lie to everything he was saying. He should realize that the government which he supports inherited a debt of $167 billion. How many times do I have to say that to him? It was not $400 billion, it was $167 billion.

I heard the member say, Mr. Speaker, it was an inherited debt of $400 billion and it was actually $167 billion. Now he goes for $200 billion again. Do I hear $201 billion? In that example alone, it shows the member that if he is going to skate he should at least put the skates on. He should at least know how to do it.

The hon. member talks about inheriting an operating deficit of $16 billion. He is absolutely right, Mr. Speaker. These marvellous Tories with their wonderful machines have taken this atrocious $16 billion deficit—it weighed us down, it was horrendous, it was heavy, $16 billion—but thanks to him and his colleagues they whittled it down. It is no longer $16 billion, it is only $30 billion now. They got it all the way down from $16 billion to $30 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. On a point of order, the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I know it is not my hon. friend's intention to mislead the House, but we have a $12.5 billion operating surplus today from a $16 billion operating deficit when his party left office.

Mr. Simmons: I just want to continue with the answer to my colleague's question. He made the allegation that no Newfoundlander would be disenfranchised or hurt by this particular bill. Of course, he knows that is not the case at all. This is the old, foot-in-the-door approach. Today it happens to be Alberta, B.C. and Ontario. But once the government gets its foot in the door on this one, and does it with the unwitting support of people like the gentleman from South Shore, then tomorrow the world. Where will it stop? Where will it stop once it is allowed to make an onslaught on one of the programs that has served this country very well and helped look after the poor and the disadvantaged people of this country?

We cannot stand idly by and have these people doctor a very good program in the instance of shuffling a few more millions of dollars over to their rich buddies so they can make the tax break even greater for the people in the $100,000 bracket. That is our concern. It has to do with how you distribute income in this country.

If every decision was based on the bottom line we would not need a government at all. Those who have, have more and those who do not, shoot them. I do not subscribe to that philosophy, but this crowd does. I am not going to sit around and let them bulldoze their way through here with more policies that move this government's agenda further and further to the right. It is absolutely wrong and it belies the real reason we have government in the first place.

One of the reasons we have a government is to redistribute income to people who do not have income. That bill is a step in the wrong direction and I am going to oppose it for that reason.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleague spoke very eloquently and quite extensively about the deficit and about the accumulated debt. I would like him to make a few comments about what this bill is going to do to universality, particularly when we are talking about health care and education.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleague the fact that by the year 2004, there will be no transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces in the areas of education and health care. How can the government have any say in those two areas if it does not make any financial contributions to the provinces?

I want him to tell Canadians, in his view, whether that will weaken the ability of the federal government in setting standards when it comes to health care and also when it was talking about national education objectives.

I want to hear a few comments from the hon. member on the impact of this bill.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my good friend from Ottawa Centre. He makes the points very well.

First, on the question of universality and what it is going to do to people across this country who need dental care and disabled people who need living services, foster homes for abused children, places for abused women, child care for low income families, all services provided through the Canada Assistance Plan are under threat.

The member for Ottawa Centre talks about one of the much touted phrases of this government. He talks about national educational objectives.

Well, I say through him to this House: What a joke. Here is a government which, when it writes throne speeches or budget speeches can get much exercised by national educational objectives. I am a former educator and there are many sitting in this Chamber. Who of us will not say that we have become too compartmentalized. We have different objectives and different standards in little pockets all across this country and that has to change if we are going to be competitive.

• (1720)

Do I sound like the former Minister of Finance? These were his words, but he has never put his money where his mouth is.

Now, with this bill and with other initiatives in this House, I say to my friend from Ottawa Centre, that former minister, the present Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the rest of them over there are militating against our having national educational objectives. They are militating against our having a national standard of health care.

That is the real reason we on this side will fight this bill. It is a foot in the door that we do not want to go through.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to stand and to speak on this bill.

It is important that Canadians realize and know that the Canada Assistance Plan is the only way that the federal government transfers funds for the purposes of assisting in social assistance programs and social services. There is no other mechanism.

When we look at what this government is doing now, such as putting caps on this CAP, it is attacking our social programs. The Prime Minister said during his campaign debate that was a sacred trust. That is hypocrisy in the worst form. He campaigned strongly and clearly, saying: "This is a sacred trust. You have nothing to fear. The free trade agreement will not touch our social programs. You have my word on it."

So much for the Prime Minister's words, Mr. Speaker. The Canada Assistance Plan is being capped for the three richest provinces: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, the three richest provinces, which have 50 per cent of the poor within their boundaries. That does not make a lot of sense to me.

How do you explain to those people who are the poorest in those three provinces who send their children to school hungry and with clothes that are full of holes and shoes that are perhaps not fully soled? How do you explain to them that they have nothing to fear, that they live in one of the richest provinces in Canada.

It does not take away the pains of hunger. It does not take away the humiliation of the parents who have to go and ask for this welfare assistance. No, Mr. Speaker, quite to the contrary.

What this government should be doing is trying to help people to get back on their feet and to become contributors once again to this society. This government has an obligation to look at job creation programs.

We look at what is going on today in the country and we see thousands and thousands of people losing their jobs every day. They go to the unemployment office and try to receive benefits from the unemployment office, and they are told: "You did not work enough. You do not have enough weeks to apply. We cannot help you. Go to the welfare office."

Those same people who perhaps on occasion are able to collect unemployment insurance find out that the collection period is shortened. They are told: "Sorry, go to the welfare office."

The federal government is passing on its responsibilities to the provinces. At the same time, we hear the Prime Minister saying things to the premier of Ontario like: "The welfare roles are going up." It is no surprise, because he is washing his hands of the needs of the people of Canada.

The Government of Ontario is not ready to sit back and watch people starve. It is that simple. It is one thing for this government to say: "We have to show restraint. We need to have fiscal restraint. We have to get our deficit under control." On whose back are they doing it? On the less fortunate, that is whose back they are doing it on. By cutting back on those social programs in the form of CAP reductions, they are doing it on the backs of the Canadians who can least afford it.

We heard talk about the G–7 nations, the Group of Seven. There are a couple of notes I would like to read into the record just so that people understand a little more of what G–7 is all about. The G–7 is made up of the United States, Japan, Germany, Britain, France, Italy and Canada. Of the G–7 Canada has by far the highest percentage of total taxes paid from personal income, which leads me to the point of corporate tax. We hear people say that the NDPers are always talking about taxing corporations, always talking about passing the buck on to the corporations. It is not fair. Let us have a minimum tax for corporations.

We are then told that if you keep doing that the corporations are going to move to the United States. Let me remind you, my friends, that the United States has a minimum corporate tax of 20 per cent.

If we had a minimum corporate tax of 20 per cent here in this country, we could raise some $8 billion through that minimum tax.

Are we going to scare people away by saying we are going to have a minimum corporate tax? I do not think so because we see more and more that the manufacturers are leaving the country as it is. Why are they leaving the country now? We do not have a minimum tax. Why are they leaving? Why are we having so much unemployment in this country? It is because of the high dollar, the high interest rate policy that we have.

I would like to return for a moment to the social assistance program as we know it today. It is set up not to be a way for people to establish a lifestyle. Our social assistance program is a temporary measure to assist people when the need is greatest. It should not be institutionalized. We should not look to institutionalized food banks. We should try to find ways of getting people back to gainful employment.

That is the thrust of the message I am trying to get across here today. People in Canada are proud. They do not want a program of assistance to which they can adjust themselves to so that they can live free. No one in this country should get a free ride. Everybody has to contribute in one way or another.

I think that what this government should be looking at are more creative ways of creating jobs, of getting people back to work. I think that is going to be the solution to our problems in this country.

I have to restate that the burden of responsibility belongs on the shoulders of the federal government to assist the provinces in the continuation of these programs to aid those people who need it the most. Its corporate friends are not the ones who need it the most. The loopholes have to be closed in order to raise the funds that are needed to continue funding these programs. The federal government cannot pass its burden of responsibility to the provinces which in turn have no choice but to pass it on to the municipalities because that is where the welfare comes from, the ranks of the municipal taxpayers.

At the bottom line, I have heard people ask who pays. Sure it is the taxpayers who pay, but when you are taking 10 jelly beans out of a pot that has 15, or taking 10 jelly beans out of a pot that has 15 million, which one will you notice the most? If you are taking from the bigger pot, the effect is felt by fewer people. That is exactly what I am saying about this government. When we are drawing from the federal pot, everyone contributes and the effects are felt less strongly than they would be if they were taken from the municipal and the provincial pot.

• (1730)

Clearly, this federal government has missed the target altogether.

The federal government has said that it would like to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. Is this its response? Is this the way it is going to do it? You cannot keep taking away and taking away and expect people to continue to survive.

I believe we need some restructuring. We have to look at our tax structure to ensure that we all pay our fair share. No one in this country would object to paying their fair share. But the imbalance we have today is a bloody nightmare. There are people paying 7 per cent who are making millions. There are people who are paying 35 per cent who are making peanuts. There is a severe imbalance.

We have to look at our training programs so that people can adjust themselves to the technological change we see taking place in the country today. People on unemployment insurance are running out of benefits and are not receiving training. I get any number of calls in my office from people telling me that they have an opportunity for a job. They have gone to the Canada Employment Centre and asked for some training to do this job, only to be told that it does not fall within the parameters of the training program being offered by that office.

I had one incident where a person came to me and said: "I have a job driving heavy equipment. I need two months training. The employer gave me a letter telling me that I have the job". He showed me the letter. "I have the job and I need two months training, but he will not pay for the training. If I can get the training through UI, through the Canada Employment Centre, I have the job".

He went to the UI and he was told: "Sorry, that does not fall within the parameters of our retraining program". He did not get the job.

There are instances where the system is inflexible and it will not adapt itself to the needs of the people. We have a system where we have to adjust to the system.

When we look at single industry towns where there is limited opportunity for employment, what is this government doing to diversify that economy? What is it doing?

FEDNOR is an excellent program. I have no shame and no hesitation in commending the government when I agree with a program it has. FEDNOR is one of those programs. I have told the minister that it needs some flexibility, that it needs a broadening of the base and needs some changes. I wrote him a letter and as far as I know, he agrees and it is something that is being looked at.

A the same time, when we look at the retraining program through the UI, that is a whole different picture. "Sorry, that is not what we are looking at. That is not what we want to do. That does not fit within the parameters of the mandate". Well, what are the parameters of the mandate? What is it we want to do? We want to put people back to work. We want to get them off the social assistance programs. People in this country want to work. They do not want social benefits. But by God, if they need them they should be there. They should not be told: "I am sorry, but the pot is empty. So you go hungry. You do not meet the guidelines. You go without". That is not what this is all about. There is approximately $1.6 billion going to the Ontario government in Canada Assistance Plan money. That is an indication that there is a severe need for a restructuring of training, of where we are going. Is it the intent that we become a welfare state? It seems to me that that is where we are headed. More and more people are out of work and less and less is being done to help put them back to work.

Statistically, if my information is correct—and I have no reason to doubt that it is—if you take a person out of the work force for a period of two years, you have a very slim chance of getting that person back into the work force. That person will at that point have adjusted himself or herself to a system of social assistance where they have changed their lifestyle. They have learned to do without. They have learned to cut back. They have learned to tell their children: "I am sorry, you just cannot go to the show this month. Maybe in a couple of months we will save enough money that you can go to the show". They have adjusted themselves to that kind of a program.

That is not acceptable to me. That is not acceptable to any Canadian. Canadians want to work.

When we look at the whole question of CAP, at social assistance benefits, safe houses for battered women, the children's aid societies, when we look at any other government funded agencies that are funded through the Canada Assistance Plan, that is funded by the federal government in which that is the only way the federal government participates, I cannot accept, I will not accept that this government should be allowed to put a cap on it.

If the need is there, the funds should be there to assist on a temporary basis and, more important, we should be looking toward a better job creation program so that these people can become proud once again and contribute in the way they want to contribute to the economy in Canada.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend a couple of questions. He has tried in his speech to point to new sources of income for looking after those disadvantaged in our society. I appreciate the importance of the subject.

I want to question him on the two proposals he had which were pretty substantive. The first was the suggestion that we get rid of all loopholes in the Income Tax Act so that we can produce more revenue to look after the lower income people in Canada. We have, as the hon. member knows, since 1984 pruned from the Income Tax Act just about every loophole that the Liberals have put in there.

The scientific research tax credit was the worst. Almost $2 billion had been siphoned out of the taxpayers' hands through that scheme. The last one that we got rid of was the flow-through shares scheme which was important for the mining industry. What would he say? Does he support the removal of flow-through shares because that is a loophole which we did remove?

My second question has to do with taxing corporations, having a minimum tax on corporations. We have in Canada now over one million taxable corporations. A large number of them are sub-companies of larger holding groups. Therefore if you tax them, you would be taxing them once as the entity itself and once as the holding company. Is he in favour of taxing twice?

The second group of corporations that are not taxed are corporations that have loss carry-forwards. They have lost a whole bunch of money for two or three years, and they finally make a profit. They put the past years' losses against the profits and they are not taxable. Does the hon. member want to tax companies with loss carry-forwards?

In the third group we have over 800,000 companies in Canada with sales of less than $200,000. Is that who he wants to tax? There are not really very many companies left that do not pay tax, that really are worthy payers of tax in my view, so I would like his answers to those two questions.

• (1740)

Mr. Samson: I would like to thank the hon. minister for his question because I think they are very important.

First of all on flow-through shares, as the minister very well knows the original flow-through share program as we knew it was severely flawed and there was severe abuse.

The second Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program, CEDIP, was also somewhat flawed but a little less than the flow-through shares.

No, I would rather support quite clearly what industry is asking for now which is an adjustment to the cost price of a flow-through share. That would then give them money to continue exploration and create jobs.

Mr. Hockin: For all corporations.

Mr. Samson: I have never said I was opposed to assisting companies, corporations, call them whatever you like, that want to create or continue and expand employment.

If the loophole does nothing more than take the money and put it in their pocket and walk away, I am sorry I do not support that, and I do not think the minister does either.

What I am saying is that if we are going to create employment, if we are going to ensure the continuation of employment, then there definitely should be some assistance, but not if it is only to put money in their pockets.

On the question of double taxing of corporations, clearly a fair taxation system is what I have always wanted and what the New Democratic Party has always wanted, fairness and equality. Tax profitable corporations. If they do not make a profit clearly you are not going to tax them. That would not be fair. I do not think anyone in our party has ever said to tax companies that are going broke or to tax people who are closing shop or to tax people who are trying to create some employment but are having some difficulty. We never said that. I do not think anyone here has ever said that. I certainly have not.

When I made my comment about raising $8 billion in additional taxes, when I mentioned the 20 per cent minimum corporate tax, I was quoting from memory but I have the article here from The Financial Post in January 1990. They said: "$8.2 billion in additional revenue could have been raised in 1987, if a minimum corporate tax of 20 per cent had been in effect". This is for all profitable corporations.

I think I have addressed the questions of the minister and the evidence is there.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to ask a question of the member for Timmins. With regard to what is happening with the capping and so on, does the member agree with the proposal that has been put forward by Premier Bob Rae of Ontario to bring in a social charter that all governments in the future would have to recognize? Does he see that there is a need for social programs in Canada, particularly when we see food banks at the extent they are, when we see governments cutting back in social programs in the very areas they are needed most? Possibly at this time, when a constitution is being debated, it is time for a social charter to be adopted across Canada to identify those problems and ensure that they are looked after by all governments.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I certainly do agree with Premier Bob Rae of Ontario. We have to ensure that when the need is there—and let us be honest that it will probably always be there— the program that is required to assist these people is there as well. We have to ensure there is some kind of protection for these people when social assistance is required and that they do not have to get down on their knees and go begging hat in hand. We have to ensure that they are protected and that the children in particular are protected.

I applaud Premier Bob Rae for his initiative. I certainly hope that he will get the support of all the premiers and of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am busy on my feet today because there is a lot to be said about the government's economic fiscal and legislative program that it has put in place.

Earlier today I talked about the inequity in the government's approach to wage parity. I think this particular bill, Bill C-32, is another example of how this government has lost absolute control over its own agenda.

I remember just a very few years ago when I was running in my first election campaign federally in 1988. Goodness knows and God forbid, it sounded like if you elected a Conservative government again there was not going to be one chicken in every pot but there was going to be two chickens in every pot and a bigger car in every driveway.

I specifically remember the former Minister of Finance indicating clearly that the deficit was under control, the economy was under an expansion period, and saying "just elect us one more time and we are going to give you everything you ever dreamed of".

The people of Canada may have got sucked in back in 1988, but it is pieces of legislation like this, Bill C-32, that will ensure, as my hon. colleague from Newfoundland said, that Tories are going to be an endangered species after the next election.

What this government clearly has done is to dismantle the social system, the social network, that social net that we have built in this country over generations. We have always believed that this was a country, even with crazy geography and even with the inequities that we see in this country, rich enough that government had a role to play in ensuring that it did not matter where you lived, it did not matter how rich or poor you were, that you had a right to expect certain things and certain standards and programs.

This government has completely abandoned the promises of its 1988 campaign, promises of prosperity. Lots of prosperity has happened. I checked with Reverend Chang in my constituency, a minister who is very active in trying to help those who need that extra special hand in times of need, the poorest of the poor. He tells that he does not know what has happened, but for some strange reason that economic miracle has not hit some of the people in my riding or the people in ridings in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and all of the Atlantic, because we have never seen as many hungry people going to food banks. We have never seen so many people cut off from the economic greatness of this country. We have never seen church basements with so many people lined up looking for food for their children.

Where is the prosperity? What kind of an economic agenda has this government followed?

Let us look at it. Back in 1988 we were told that another term of Toryism, another term with these people opposite in power, was going to change the country. Brian Mulroney said it best: "Give me four more years and you will not even know this country".

There are a lot of people in this country who would like to go back about seven years because what this Prime Minister and this government have done has been nothing short of disastrous and an abuse of the public trust that was put into this government. Prosperity is not bursting out all over. Poverty, dismay and disunity have been the legacy of this government.

We have Bill C-32. This bill talks about fairness. It says, sorry, but the poorest of the poor, those people who want a job, who want to contribute, who want their children to feel that they belong and who do not want to be on welfare, are the people who are going to have to bear the burden more than anyone else in this country of this government's economic mismanagement, of its foolhardy policies.

There was a member opposite, the member for South Shore, who would have done well to sit down because I hope his constituents heard what he had to say on this particular issue. Maybe Nova Scotia is not affected, but this is the thin edge of the wedge. Give these guys across the aisle an inch and they will take a mile.

• (1750)

I remember the former minister for ACOA from Central Nova Scotia. He was out there beating the bushes telling us how great things were going to be in Nova Scotia because this government was committed, sacred trust, to regional development. We certainly found out what that sacred trust did. That sacred trust saw in the first two years of this government, $1.14 billion—that is a lot of money—cut from regional development programs in Atlantic Canada.

What effect do you think that has? I guess this government thinks it has no effect. It has a large effect because the unemployment rates went up. We became less competitive in the fisheries. We have seen our manufacturing base decline. This government calls that a continuing commitment to regional development.

We have also seen this government, as it tries to inflict prosperity from coast to coast in this country, come up and establish program financing.

Do you remember the principle this country was based on? It was caring and sharing. We said we have this program, it is called Established Programs Financing, and that is put there to ensure that it does not matter if you are in a province like Newfoundland, which is having some economic difficulties right now, or Nova Scotia, or if you are in Alberta where things are in fairly good shape or were before this government got in power. EPF ensured that there were transfers to those provinces for health care and post-secondary education. That is pretty important. If I cannot feel like a first-class Canadian in any province, and know that I have access to first-class health care and first-class post-secondary education, then there is something wrong with this country. It has pulled a thread out of this country which has damaged the fabric forever.

Let us look at Established Programs Financing. What has it done with it? I am going to quote right here from a brief that was given to a committee of Parliament studying bankruptcy legislation. It is from the Canadian Hospital Association.

The Canadian Hospital Association says that the changes in the EPF formula that this government has done in three successive budgets have the following effects. The transfer of responsibility to some of Canada's poorest provinces as a result of the changes to the EPF are as follows: between 1986 and 199, this government is cutting from transfers to the provinces for health care over $29 billion, $29.998 billion. That might be okay if you are in a province that has not been devastated by a recession or this government's policies. It is not okay in those provinces that do not have that type of economic base. It means that either they are going to have to cut somewhere else where they cannot afford it or we are going to have two classes of Canadians: those who live in have provinces and can expect to get national standards on programs, and those who live in have not provinces. Adios amigo, too bad, move to Toronto if you want to get a good bed and a good hospital.

Concerning post-secondary education, in a 10-year period between 1986 and 1996 it has cut $12.109 billion from those cost shared programs.

I heard the Prime Minister one day, I think it was during an election campaign, by God, saying that these things were sacred trusts. He even used his mother as a prop for goodness' sake to tell the Canadian public he would not touch any of these things. My goodness, it was those dastardly old Liberals and NDP members when they were going out and saying elect this bunch again and your social programs are going to be gone.

The government ensured that it once again was able to fool the Canadian public, and now we have seen two and a half years of Tory policies dismantle the social safety net in this country.

If that was not bad enough, a year ago, I think it was in April 1990, this government's spending was out of control. It was collecting more in taxes than any other government ever had. I think at that point it had raised taxes over 30 times. The money was coming in hand over fist. These guys opposite were spending it faster than it was coming in. They had taxed the Canadian public to the limit.

If that was not enough, they then decided that they were going to change the way the equalization formula works. There was some obscure clause that would kick in at a certain point, but they did not bother to tell the provinces about it.

The result in April 1990 was that Canada's smallest province and one of its poorest provinces, Prince Edward Island, suddenly found itself when the Minister of Finance was about to put a budget down $13 million short.

I think $13 million in a big province is a lot of money. Put it in a province with 135,000 people and it is absolutely devastating.

Then just three weeks later the province of Nova Scotia, again a have not province, found out that because the government and the bright boys and girls at the Department of Finance figured out another way to squeeze the poorest provinces it was going to lose $65 million in its provincial budget.

It is okay to say: "We have to share the burden here". If we are going to share the burden, why in the name of goodness do we not get to share the benefit when there are good times? We do not do that in places like Atlantic Canada.

This government comes in with its triple play, Bill C-32, the cap on CAP. If this government is allowed to go unchecked, it will not only ruin the economy but it will create a checkerboard Canada.

If you happen to live in a relatively prosperous region you can expect certain things. If you do not then you can expect not to have those certain things. Bill C-32, more than any other bill that has come before this place, is a glaring example of how this government has broken its social contract.

It is okay to say: "Ontario, you are kind of wealthy. Alberta, you are kind of wealthy. Maybe right now we are going to cap you". The problem is that the growing number of those who are unemployed and the growing number of those who find themselves in poverty are not capped. They increase every single day.

We are becoming more like Americans. We are trying to put a system in place here that rewards success. It absolutely throws those people who slip from the ladder of success into the trash heap. That is absolutely against every single thing that the Liberal Party tried to do in government and in forging a social contract with people of this country.

These Tories opposite sit back. With their smugness they say: "That is too bad. Let the poor people out there get jobs". That is the type of response you will get from some people opposite.

The fact is that the government has taken in more revenue than any other government. It has transferred the debt to the provinces. It has not given the provinces the capability for additional taxation because it has milked the public dry.

Mrs. Maheu: It has put away half a million jobs.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): It has put away half a million jobs.

We have had a free trade deal. Remember the wonderful free trade deal. The government opposite made it quite clear during free trade that it was going to be the panacea of everybody. There are going to be jobs flowing like milk and honey.

Just on the outside chance that there might be a job lost—you remember—it was going to have the most generous assistance program that the western world had ever seen. The minister walks behind me and says: "Yes". I hope he had a smile on his face and both fingers crossed, because he knows as well as every worker who has lost a job and an investment in their future and that of their family because of the free trade deal that it was simply not true.

This government's kamikaze economic policies have done more to separate us, to divide us, to categorize us and eventually, probably, to destroy this nation.

Bill C-32, as I said earlier, is the thin edge of the wedge. Today, maybe it applies to those provinces that this government in its warped sense of fairness feels can afford it.

Tomorrow, to my friend from Newfoundland who just spoke, it may apply to Newfoundland. The next day maybe it will apply to Saskatchewan or to British Columbia.

At some point, the federal government will absolutely shed like the skin of a lizard its responsibility to maintain those standards and that social contract with Canadians.

Even more important, what it is doing in places like Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan is making those governments pay dearly for the consequences of the actions of this government.

• (1800)

Jobs are going, half a million jobs. It will be a million jobs by the time these guys are finished. The poor are lining up at food banks. It does not get any better. It is the dismantling of Canada, as my friend from Ontario says. It is the dismantling of Canada.

Bill C-32, as I said earlier I think is going to go down as one of the most glaring examples. I cannot wait until we get on the campaign trail, because Bill C-32 is going to drive this government, not to its knees at 17 per cent; it will drive them into the Smithsonian Institute, the Museum of Civilization across from here. Because after the next election Bill C-32 is going to be indicative of the decline and fall of the Tory empire.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. It being six o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

THE CONSTITUTION

TABLING OF DOCUMENT
SHAPING CANADA'S FUTURE TOGETHER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, copies of a document entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together.

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to table the government's proposals to renew the Canadian federation. The proposals, entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together have one simple but nevertheless critical and crucial objective; to build a stronger and more prosperous Canada where all Canadians can feel at home. I believe that is an objective that is shared by all members of this House who believe in Canada.

Every generation of Canadians has had to redefine the terms of living together. Our generation now faces that same challenge. If we are wise and remain true to our traditions, we can transform challenge into opportunity. Our goal is not only a framework under which all Canadians can feel at home in this magnificent country, but one that better equips us to meet the challenges of the global economy in the 21st century and beyond. Because if we must provide Canadians with a valid constitution, we must also provide Canadians with a powerful and a growing economy. And one goes with the other, and these two challenges have to be met by all members of this House.

Canada's needs are well known: aboriginal self-government; two Houses of Parliament that are truly democratic and progressively more responsive; recognition, in principle and in practice, of the distinctive character of Quebec; protection for the rights of all Canadians, particularly for minorities; a stronger Canadian economic union; bringing government closer to the people in framing national programs and in delivering programs and services to individual Canadians, to people; reducing wasteful overlap and duplication of government programs. There is not a member in this House who has not heard directly from his or her voters in regard to not only the overlap and the waste in government, but the perception that it is perhaps in some cases even more widespread than actually meets the eye. Of course, governments at all levels, not just Ottawa, must listen and lead and one that truly empowers people in exercising its powers.

Mr. Speaker, none of these changes is in any way contrary to the original concept of Confederation, now 125 years old. Rather, these changes add up to a renewal, now long overdue if the truth be known, of our Confederation.

[Translation]

Renewal is what Canadians everywhere seek for our country—not confrontation, not division, not rupture. Renewal of our values, of our institutions, of our working arrangements—renewal of the spirit of Confederation so that we can face the future more confidently together. Finally, renewal of our commitment to Canada and to the well-being of our fellow Canadians.

The proposals I am tabling today on behalf of the government will be referred to the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. These proposals are for discussion. That committee has five months to consult with Canadians. Its mandate is very broad. The process is open, not closed; it is inclusive, not exclusive.

[English]

We seek improvements to our proposals and we expect changes. The joint committee will hold its first meeting tomorrow. The first witness before that joint committee will be the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, whose outstanding leadership in developing these proposals I know that all members from all parties will want to acknowledge with respect and gratitude.

• (1010)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Today, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go into a detailed explanation of all of these proposals. They will be available to members of the House, to the media and eventually to all Canadians. Rather, I wish simply to outline them so as to convey to the people of Canada what lies behind the proposals, the spirit that motivates them and the objectives we had in mind in developing them.

In the Canadian constitutional tradition, there exists side by side protection for individual human rights and the rights of people as members of communities. The people of Canada cherish these rights as attributes of our common citizenship. They are defining characteristics of our Canadian identity. They capture in many ways the essence of what unites us.

Our proposals therefore seek to enhance both individual and collective rights. For example, we are proposing that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms be amended to guarantee property rights among our basic rights in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We are also proposing more stringent limitations on the use of the so-called notwithstanding clause which enables legislatures to override many of our basic rights.

Of the various communities whose rights need and deserve protection, the aboriginal peoples of Canada have, in my judgment, a very important claim on our attention and the attention of all members. We have made a commitment to them that they will participate in the current constitutional discussions. We propose to entrench a continuing constitutional process for aboriginal matters. Consistent with these guarantees of process, the time has come to break with our recent history in aboriginal constitutional matters which sadly, has largely been by any objective criteria, a history of failure.

We are proposing to entrench in the Constitution of Canada a general right to aboriginal self-government within the Canadian federation and subject to the Charter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Our proposal would allow governments and aboriginal peoples 10 years to agree on the powers to be exercised, failing which they would be defined and enforced by the courts. In other words, the passage of time would work for and not against the aboriginal peoples of Canada. No aboriginal leader I know believes that self-government is by itself the remedy for the terrible deprivation and alienation that are so prevalent among so many aboriginal peoples. None underestimates the value of regaining the right to self-government and the responsibility that goes with it in providing an opportunity for First Nations' renewal.

That is what they ask, the right to get on with their own lives as members of aboriginal societies, the right to devise their own solutions to the terrible problems which over generations have come to afflict these societies, the right to work out their own place by themselves in Canada's future and the chance of a new lease on life.

I am proposing a deadline on the negotiation of the powers of aboriginal self-government because—I want everyone in Canada to understand this—I believe that we dare not wait another generation.

This is a matter of human dignity, of justice and fairness. We cannot repair the past, but we need not be condemned to relive it either. Let us altogether ensure that the future of the aboriginal peoples belongs to them and to their children in fairness, justice and equality of opportunity for all.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, about 285 million English-speaking people live on the North American continent. Surrounded by all these English-speakers is one piece of territory, Quebec, where some six million French-speaking people live and are a majority. They are determined to preserve and promote a vibrant French-speaking society in Quebec. They want to live their lives in French in a Canada that is both prosperous and fair. We must make certain that their capacity to do so is not inhibited, but is enhanced by reform of our Constitution and renewal of our Confederation.

Constitutional reform must embrace Quebec's distinct society and we propose to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Ninety-three years before Confederation, not after, but before Confederation, the Parliament of Great Britain recognized the distinctiveness of Quebec. The Quebec Act established Quebec's right to preserve its religion and civil laws. Exactly 200 years ago, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution Act of 1791 continued those rights. The British North America Act of 1867 rejected conclusively the attempt in 1840 to submerge those rights in a unitary system and contained other provisions supporting the distinctive character of Quebec.

The modern world with its economic, social and population pressures has in some respects overtaken the old Constitution and bent it out of shape. It is not surprising then that of all the provinces, Quebec has for 30 years been the principal advocate of constitutional reform.

In 1982, the isolation of Quebec from the patriation of our Constitution was a powerful reminder to Quebecers of their minority status and vulnerability as a society in English-speaking North America. In spite of the compelling economic and social advantages to Quebec of participating in Confederation—and no serious person in Quebec doubts those advantages—Quebec will assume the risks and responsibilities as well as the rights of a new federal partnership only if Confederation guarantees her cultural security as a distinct French-speaking society in Canada on American soil.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Seven years ago, Mr. Speaker, I committed my government to securing the return of Quebec to the Canadian constitutional family. We have never wavered in that commitment and today, Mr. Speaker, I reaffirm our determination to succeed.

I am sure that Quebecers will see in today's proposals the possibility of achieving the fundamental reforms that Quebec needs to evolve as a distinct society within Canada and to be a secure, confident and equal partner in Confederation. I have no doubt that this can be accomplished to the enduring benefit of all Canadians.

• (1020)

With regard to the recognition of Quebec's distinct society, we are proposing that clause 2 of the Constitution, a Canada clause, affirm the special responsibility of Quebec to preserve and promote its distinct identity as a French-speaking society. We are also proposing that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms be interpreted consistent with the preservation and promotion of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. It must never be forgotten that Quebec is a distinct society, but always within a united Canada.

The affirmation of Quebec's distinctive character in the Canada Clause and the recognition of the distinct society in the Charter of Rights would be important and substantial amendments to our Constitution. They are essential safeguards for Quebec against the uncertainties of the future.

In our proposals relating to national institutions, distribution of powers and the economic union, Quebec will find the space and the freedom to evolve and to flourish as a distinct society in a more harmonious Confederation. Our proposals relating to the Senate contain additional protection for the French language and culture. And, Mr. Speaker, if collectively we find it desirable next spring to include in our plan any items that require unanimity, we will move forward with important amendments to the amending formula and additional changes to the Supreme Court of Canada to which we remain committed as a government.

The proposal to place labour market training under exclusive provincial jurisdiction is fundamental reassurance of the authority of Quebec and of the other provinces over matters related to education. The proposed entrenchment of immigration agreements such as that recently signed by the federal government and Quebec has long been regarded by Quebec as a vital element of her cultural security. Now we are proposing the negotiation and entrenchment of similar agreements on cultural matters with any province that so requests. We will define the roles of governments to reflect the particular circumstances of each province in cultural matters. The proposals for delegation of federal legislative power, as well as for administrative delegation in some fields—and the proposed rules on the use of the federal government's spending power—would create a far more flexible federalism than we have known, something many have advocated.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we all know that the people of Canada are going to be looking carefully to see whether in proposing change and renewal for Canada we parliamentarians might seek to exempt ourselves. Well, we cannot and we must not. I am sure that we all realize that in the minds of the people of Canada no area of our national life is more in need of improvement than the Parliament of Canada itself.

I want to draw your attention to our proposals for reform of the House of Commons. Some may say these proposals breach long-standing parliamentary traditions. I would argue to the contrary, that these proposals are more faithful than some of our modern practices have been to the essence of parliamentary government and MP's prerogatives and individual freedoms. If we pursue proposals along these lines, we will have government much more responsive to the elected representatives of the people, and we will have members of Parliament much more responsive to the people who elected them in the first place.

We will then be closer to the British system of parliamentary government as it was originally meant to be. We will have a more vibrant and a more vital Canadian parliamentary democracy.

The people of Canada properly demand a renewed House of Commons and a reformed Senate. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that our Senate proposals are very much in line with the expectations of people across Canada, but I look forward to the views of the public and the recommendations of the parliamentary committee.

The Senate that we are proposing today would, for the first time, be directly elected by the people of Canada. An unelected body exercising legislative powers equal to the House of Commons is simply not compatible with democratic government.

The Senate should also be much more equitable in its representation than is the present chamber. Equity includes a range of possibilities, from weighted representation of member states, such as in Germany, to equal representation of provinces as advocated by the Canada West Foundation.

We propose an effective Senate. As a general rule, in order for a measure to become law, the approval by both the House of Commons and the reformed Senate should be necessary. And the Senate should have to approve key government appointments that affect the lives of Canadians. For example, under this plan in the future, nominees such as the Governor of the Bank of Canada would have to go before a reformed, elected Senate to explain his philosophy and obtain the approval of that body.

On legislation involving language and culture, special voting rules, a double linguistic majority will apply as proposed, Mr. Speaker, by the Alberta legislative committee in 1983, and by the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador in 1989.

On matters of particular national importance such as defence and international relations, the Senate would only have a suspensive veto.

Under our proposals, the House and the Senate would have somewhat different roles and responsibilities. We believe that good government demands that only the House of Commons be a confidence chamber, in order to prevent the kind of constitutional instability that parliamentary federal systems have known at other times and in other jurisdictions.

The Commons would likely become a chamber in which there was stricter adherence to the principle of representation by population, and the Senate in consequence, would provide more balanced and more equitable representation among the provinces. Both houses would have real power. Most important to Canadians, the Senate, like the House of Commons, would for the first time be accountable and responsible to the people of Canada.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there would not be much quarrel about it, that in the eyes of most people, for the first time the reformed Senate would have, as it is proposed today or perhaps as is modified by the parliamentary committee, democratic legitimacy.

Mr. Speaker, for some years Canadians have felt an increasing frustration with governments at all levels, and that is pretty obvious to all of us. Millions of Canadians sense they have lost power and influence over decisions that affect them, their families and the places they live. We must act to try and bring government closer to people. The reforms that we are proposing to the House of Commons and the Senate would greatly improve the responsiveness of parliamentarians to the people who elect them in the first place.

[Translation]

But bringing government closer to the people also means sharing power and responsibility with provincial and municipal governments and with non-governmental organizations.

Matters such as labour market training, immigration and culture have important national dimensions for the Canadian economy and indeed for the Canadian identity. Our proposals would preserve the capacity of the federal Parliament to maintain the national interest and institutions in these matters. However, training, immigration and cultural policy affect some of the most sensitive areas of people's lives. Mr. Speaker, that is why we are proposing that provinces have control over training as they have over education.

• (1030)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: That is why we propose to negotiate and entrench in the Constitution federal-provincial agreements on immigration, tailored to the particular needs, priorities and traditions of each province, from British Columbia to Newfoundland. That is also why we propose to negotiate and entrench in the Constitution similar agreements on cultural responsibilities with provincial governments that so request, while maintaining the federal Parliament's responsibility—and I say it clearly, Mr. Speaker, to avoid any misunderstanding—over key national institutions such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Canada Council.

That is also the spirit behind our proposal to recognize the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in such areas as housing, forestry, municipal affairs and tourism, while maintaining our international responsibilities in these areas. That is the spirit behind our proposal to require the federal government to work with the provinces in introducing new Canada-wide shared cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

However, Mr. Speaker, financing would still be provided to a province which preferred to tailor its own program to its own needs, so long as it met the objectives of the new national program.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we all know that the need to bring government closer to the people—and to share and to decentralize power—has to be balanced with the requirement for a strong Canadian political and economic union.

[English]

To reinforce the bonds that must unite us and to strengthen our capacity to compete and prosper in the world, our proposals include several fundamental reforms to our economic union.

There are more interprovincial barriers to trade and commerce within Canada today than there are among nations of the European common market. These barriers in our internal market weaken the Canadian economy and impair our ability to compete in the world. That is why we are proposing that the Constitution be amended to prohibit government barriers to the mobility of people, goods, capital and services anywhere within Canada.

In law and in fact our economic growth is profoundly affected by the policies and actions of both the federal and provincial governments. Fundamental conflict between federal and provincial economic policies can be absolutely disastrous. Even working at cross purposes can diminish our prosperity. It is absurd that the 12 nations of the European common market are moving toward a state of economic co-ordination and harmonization superior in many ways to the Canadian economic union which has been together for 125 years. Obviously we must do better. We must equip this country with the means to act decisively to ensure the best we can our own prosperity.

That is why we are proposing to amend the Constitution to provide the Parliament of Canada with a new power to make laws for the efficient functioning of the economic union of Canada.

That is why we are making a number of proposals to formalize the co-ordination of federal and provincial economic and fiscal policies. Together it is these reforms that produce the strongest framework of economic union since Confederation.

We propose as well a Canada clause which would be entrenched in the body of the Constitution, in section 2 of the Constitution Act. I hope and believe that all of our people will see reflected in that clause their own place in Canada, the common values and aspirations that unite us and our national characteristics, and our identity as we wish it to be.

We are a nation with an immense capacity for generosity and compromise, a capacity that has never mattered more than it matters today. Parochialism, small-mindedness, mistrust: these are always present in any society. These lesser attributes have had their day. It is now time for the fundamental qualities of generosity and compromise to dominate the process.

There are in all 28 proposals that the Government of Canada is putting forward today for consideration by the joint committee and discussion with the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Before presenting our plan for renewal in final form, we want to have the report of the Joint Committee, whose mandate extends until February. As I undertook to this House on May 15, "the government will be very open-minded to constructive amendments offered in the spirit of improving its proposals and broadening the consensus that Canadian unity needs and demands".

The government's proposals should be and will be examined on their merits. They must also be considered in light of their purpose, which is a more secure, united and prosperous Canada.

[English]

These proposals which are perfectible and which are going to a committee beginning hearing tomorrow will hopefully be examined in an objective and fair-minded manner, not by people searching for perfection because perfection can become the enemy of the good but for proposals that are good for Canada.

No one need lose. If the cause, the hopes and the aspirations of western Canada are advanced, that does not mean that that advancement means a loss for Quebec.

If French Canadians feel no more secure as a result of constitutional proposals and feel a greater attachment and greater love for Canada, that does not mean that the rights of Canadians in English speaking Canada, say in the Atlantic region, will in any way be diminished.

Constitutional proposals fairly considered, actively debated, and generously contemplated can be what they should be: a win-win situation for all Canadians.

How are they to be considered? Each one of us across the country, each premier, each taxpayer, each parliamentarian, each of us, will have to establish, I suppose, his or her own sense of parameters and his or her own objective criteria. I think that these proposals must also be considered in light of our greatest obligation.

We have many obligations. You can enumerate them, you can count them, you can divide them and you can add them up, but our greatest obligation as Canadians and as parliamentarians sitting here today is to turn Canada over to our children and grandchildren unsullied, undiminished and as a great, prosperous, united nation. That is our fundamental obligation.

To do that will require compromise and compromise is not an indication of weakness. Honourable compromise in Canada has always been seen as an indication of strength and maturity. The wisdom of knowing that all of us have to find our own places in the Canadian sunlight makes me hopeful that these series of proposals, once engaged, will give us all the opportunity to participate in the building of Canada.

Thomas D'Arcy McGee, who was a son of Ireland but who became a father of Canada, saw a brilliant future for our country. Seven years before Confederation he said: "I look to the future of my adopted country with hope, though not without anxiety. I see in the not remote distance one great nationality, bound like the shield of Achilles by the blue rim of ocean. I see it quartered into many communities, each disposing of its internal affairs, but all bound together by free institutions, free intercourse and free commerce. I see within the round of that shield the peaks of the western mountains and the crests of the eastern waves. I see a generation of industrious, contented men and women free in name and in fact, capable of maintaining in peace and in war a constitution worthy of such a great country."

Mr. Speaker, along with all other members of this House in all political parties, I too see such a country, a country of women and men, of your children and mine whose standard of living is the envy of millions and whose way of life is admired around the world. This country Canada, the second largest country on earth, is also according to the United Nations one of the two best countries in the world in which to live. The challenge for us now is to make Canada second to none.

The challenge is to build a stronger country for the security and the prosperity of all Canadians. I have said in this House on other occasions that the job of nation building did not end with Confederation, and had the Fathers of Confederation sought perfection and insisted on perfection there would have been no Canada in 1867. That was the beginning of nation building, but it continues with each generation and it continues to this day in our minds and in our hearts.

As McGee said, we want a Constitution cherished in the hearts of all of its people, not part of its people, not some of its people, not the people who live in the west and the east but English speaking Canadians, French speaking Canadians, from the north, the south and the east—all Canadians are deserving of a Constitution that represents them and reflects their hopes and dreams and aspirations for a new and a better Canada.

We have the challenge to keep Canada and today we have the opportunity to improve it. Nothing would serve the economic interests of all Canadians more directly than clear resolution of constitutional challenges. They have bedevilled this nation for too long. I think that it would be with a sense of national relief and gratitude that all Canadians dealt with a proposal that managed to bring this to a successful conclusion.

In that spirit I invite all Canadians, all political parties that believe in one undiminished Canada, to set aside other differences and to engage in nation building with the full exuberance that this magnificent country deserves.

I suggest that we get on with it, the building of Canada, of a vision of Macdonald and Cartier and McGee, and the country of our own dreams, a new Canada for a new century, honoured in the family of nations as a modern and flexible and caring country, a Canada respected by its peers, a Canada loved by its people, a Canada better able to serve its citizens with governments and institutions revised and reformed by this Parliament and by all Canadians that will be tied to the very best that Canada can provide.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today very conscious of the importance of the issue before us. At a time of significant national debate, each of us must fulfil our duties to the best of our abilities.

At a time when there is cynicism about the role of politicians, it is particularly important that the political process works the way it should.

I want it to be very clear that the role of the opposition is not to give a blank cheque to the government, nor is it our role to oppose simply for the sake of opposing something. The role of the opposition is to scrutinize, to ask the right questions, to propose improvements and to seek to correct errors. The role of the opposition is to speak for those who have no voice. This is a role that we will fulfil in the months ahead.

I want to say that our objective is the unity of the country, but this does not mean that we will necessarily agree with all of the proposals of the government. Indeed, our first impression is that the proposals of the government need a great deal of work.

Over the next few months some of the debates will be about issues of principle, and we will fight for our principles by proposing improvements, but much of the debate will also be about legal text.

What does one word mean? What does one phrase mean? Are there flaws that can be corrected or improvements that can be made?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a constitution is both a political statement and a legal document. It embodies and reflects the values Canadians share and defines the legal structure of our society.

Unlike other arrangements such as collective bargaining agreements and trade agreements which are temporary and easy to amend, a constitution is not easy to change, and that is as it should be.

When dealing with fundamental values, with political institutions, with the delicate balance of a society, our approach must be considered and prudent. Since the changes we make will be with us for a long time, it is preferable to get the wording right before the proposals are agreed to.

[English]

As a legal document which individuals, governments and the courts must rely upon, it must accurately reflect the intention of its authors.

Let us resolve not to transform a debate on legal meaning of proposals into an emotional debate about rejections and humiliations. Let us not transform a debate about values into a lot of empty rhetoric and political posturing.

• (1050)

Clearly it is too early for anyone to state definitively a hard and fast position on the government paper. Constitutional language is extremely important and some of the government papers lack legal precision. In many places we do not have a specific proposal, just a list of options.

Over the coming weeks and months, with the help of the people of Canada, we in this party will work to find specific answers. In this round we will not tolerate constitutional wording which is so deliberately ambiguous that it can be used to mean one thing in one part of Canada and something else in another part of the country.

Ensuring that these proposals are thoroughly debated, thoroughly reviewed and where necessary amended, abandoned or enlarged—that is our duty. It is a duty we in this party will honour. We will not compromise on principles.

[Translation]

As the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, I promise to do my best to ensure that all Canadians can take part in the debate on the proposals for constitutional reform. The Constitution does not belong to the politicians or the bureaucrats. The Constitution belongs to the people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I need not remind the Prime Minister of the failure of Parliament's last attempt at constitutional reform. This attempt failed because the Canadian people were excluded from the debate. It was the wrong approach.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, enshrined in the Constitution in 1982 to embody the common heritage of all Canadians, was the result of long and passionate public debate and of negotiations between governments. The most progressive provisions in the Charter, including protection of the rights of the disabled and measures to help disadvantaged groups, were made as a result of public hearings.

Quebecers know how important it is to have a Charter of Rights because they drafted their own charter several years ago. The Quebec Charter has influenced to a considerable extent the Charter that is now part of the Canadian Constitution.

Canadians have a stake in the Constitution, and they feel they are its guardians. The constitutional debate is not the exclusive preserve of politicians and bureaucrats. If it is to be credible and command respect, the debate must involve the people of this country.

On April 21, I urged the government to produce detailed and concrete proposals for constitutional reform that would immediately be considered by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. We recommended that the committee hold public hearings to receive the views, advice and comments of individuals, experts, groups and governments.

I said at the time that tabling concrete proposals would make it possible for all provincial governments, including the Government of Quebec, to express their views and to seek agreement with the federal government on the substance of the reform. We recommended that the committee be authorized to make recommendations aimed at amending and improving the proposals to reflect the opinions expressed, and that seems to have been accepted.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope the committee will make every attempt to involve the people in this debate. I also hope that committee members will work together to seek a genuine compromise.

[English]

The lessons of Meech Lake are written for all to see. The people shall never be ignored. I will hold the Prime Minister to his promise made today before the entire nation, his promise to involve the people of Canada in this new round.

This joint parliamentary committee is to report at the end of February. We must use the remaining time to study the proposals, to debate their meaning, to consult widely and to listen to the people of Canada.

I have spent time talking about the process because the process is very important. Now I will address principles which are equally important.

One of Canada's greatest constitutional thinkers, the late Professor F. R. Scott, once wrote:

> If Canadians can agree upon great and lasting principles upon which they wish their society to be built, then they can agree upon the broad outlines of a Constitution to achieve these ends.

Our principles as Liberals are clear:

(1) What is proposed must be compatible with the very nature of Canada, a nation which finds its raison d'être in sharing diversity and respect for the rights of individuals.

(2) The solutions proposed must result in real reform of our political institutions to ensure that the distinct concern of Canada's regions are respected.

(3) The solution proposed must recognize the need to renew and modernize our economic instruments, including the training and mobility of our work force to create policies that will permit us to be competitive in the world of tomorrow.

(4) Constitutional reform must not weaken the right of individuals as guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

(5) Constitutional reform must not weaken the Canadian duality, nor the rights of official language minorities everywhere in Canada.

(6) Constitutional reform must not weaken Canada's cultural diversity and its heritage of tolerance.

(7) Constitutional reform must not weaken the ability of a strong federal government to speak and act for all Canadians.

The Liberal Party of Canada entered this debate convinced that the things we call Canadian values are as relevant today as they have been at any time in our history. At a time when Canadian values are under attack and when our country is divided as never before, we believe that Canadians must remind themselves of the greatness of the Canadian experiment. We also believe that Canadians must devote their energies to finding new bonds and new endeavours which reflect our collective values. We must concentrate now on what unites us, and not what divides us.

More than ever we must commit ourselves to true Canadian values, values like generosity of spirit and collective action, values that will permit us to meet the next century with our head held high.

In discussing constitutional reform, we must reflect on the great and lasting principles of our society. Constitutional reforms must have one goal and only one goal, that is the well-being not of governments, not of politicians, not of bureaucrats, but of the citizens of Canada.

Which government holds which power only matters inasmuch as citizens are well served. Therefore, to serve the citizens of Canada, and that is what all of us have been elected to do, we must understand the values we share as Canadians. After all, Canadian citizenship means more than a shared passport. It is shared values. Quite frankly, Canadian citizens have a right to a government that can speak and act for all Canadians.

• (1100)

As Canadians we have a unique and profound commitment to a shared sense of social responsibility. We believe in equality and equality of opportunity. We respect the individual and we also have a very strong sense of obligation to the community as a whole. We believe that we are responsible for each other. We believe it is our responsibility, every one of us, to ensure that Canadians, wherever they live, enjoy a Canadian quality of life.

The partnership of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians built a nation where French is not spoken only in Quebec. I am very proud to be in this House today and to have been elected in a riding where the majority of the people are Acadian and I am very proud that they speak French—

[Translation]

[—] that they speak French, that they are truly French even if they do not live in Quebec and want to remain French-speaking within all of Canada.

[English]

I am proud to be in a country where English is not restricted to the other nine provinces. There are a lot of people in my province of Quebec who are as much Quebecers as anyone of us and who are English speaking and deserve to be protected like anybody else. That is a fundamental cornerstone of what we call Canada.

I want to state clearly that we will not accept any constitutional change that will effectively split Canada into two nations, nine English provinces on one side, and a French Quebec on the other side.

Canada's aboriginal peoples are a fundamental characteristic of our country too. But at the same time the treatment of aboriginal citizens is also a test. It is a test of our values. It is a test that we have failed in the past. We must not fail again in the years ahead. We have built a country that has welcomed people from every corner of the world. Diversity and multiculturalism, the fact that we can be different and be Canadian too, are fundamental characteristics of Canada.

[Translation]

These values form the foundation upon which to build our constitutional reform proposals. The Canadian Constitution recognizes the importance of the individual. Thus it protects the fundamental rights and freedoms of every citizen.

It recognizes our two official languages and acknowledges formally multiculturalism. It protects the rights of the aboriginal people of Canada. It recognizes the principle of equalization which ensures that all regions of Canada are afforded equal opportunities.

The Constitution grants provincial governments great autonomy and considerable power. In itself, the Canadian federal system has promoted the development of provinces all distinct from one another. Quebec as we know it today and are all so proud of developed within this Canadian federation.

We also recognized that Canada is far more than the sum of its parts, far more that just a community of communities. A strong national government has always been necessary to meet the great challenges we face today. More than ever a strong national government is needed if we are to meet the global challenges of tomorrow, especially in the 21st century.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is a strong foundation upon which we can build. We do not have to start from scratch. We must improve upon what we have.

[English]

Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker. We have in this party recognized that Canada is far more than the sum of its parts. It is far more than a community of communities. A strong national government has always been necessary to meet the great challenges we face today. A strong national government will remain necessary to meet the global challenges we will encounter in the months and years ahead.

The Liberal Party will not compromise on this principle. Our approach to constitutional change will be guided by this principle. Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker. In Canada we have a strong foundation upon which to build the future. We do not have to rebuild our nation from scratch. Instead, we must improve upon what we already have.

[Translation]

Over the last several months, we in the Liberal Party of Canada have made public the kind of country we hope to build in the months and years to come. We are, I am proud to say, the first federal political party to have made their intentions known to the Canadian people.

I have made it clear that Canada must not stand still in an ever changing world. To maintain the status quo is not good enough. Most countries are making changes in their institutions to adapt to the requirements of the next century. I suggest that Canada must not be the exception.

[English]

I set out the objectives of the Liberal Party on constitutional reform in Montreal on April 21. They will guide us in our work over the next few months. Let me repeat them here in the House of Commons.

First, we propose that the Constitution include an inspiring declaration of the nature of Canada. This declaration would set out the will of Canadians to live together in a federal state, the principles which govern that state, the values we share, our commitment to two official languages, a recognition of our diverse cultural heritage, a recognition of the distinctiveness of Quebec and a recognition of the role of the aboriginal peoples.

The government has tabled such a declaration. We will examine its wording and propose improvements where necessary.

Second, a commitment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All Canadians have a strong attachment to the fundamental rights and freedoms found in the Charter. They want to see those freedoms strengthened. In the Liberal Party, our position is very clear. We will not accept any constitutional change that diminishes the rights and freedoms of Canadians protected by the Charter. We will not accept that.

Third, strengthening the Canadian economic union. In the Canadian federal state we are entitled to expect the full benefits associated with the unrestricted mobility of people, goods, services and capital. This is essential if we are to develop internationally competitive products, services and technologies, things we need to meet the demands of globalization.

Then we need to break down interprovincial trade barriers. Those barriers are coming down all over the world and we must break them down in Canada as well. The government has made some proposals in this area. Our first reaction is that they need to be strengthened. There appears to be too many loopholes. We will be recommending a number of major improvements.

Fourth, institutional reform. The regions of Canada need to be more involved in decision making and policy making at the national level. To meet the hopes and dreams of those who live in the west and the Atlantic, a reformed Senate is essential. It must be a Senate that is elected, effective and equitable. Such a Senate should have the power to examine appointments to important federal institutions and agencies. It should also protect the rights of minority language groups, and it should require a double majority for legislation touching upon the French language and culture.

It appears that the government has adopted a lot of this proposal. We will listen carefully to the view expressed before the committee.

[Translation]

Fifth, concerning the division of powers, constitutional reform involves the redistribution of powers. That is inescapable.

The criterion should be the following: jurisdiction must be granted to the level of government in the best position to exercise it. A functional approach should be used.

We must seek the arrangement that will best serve the interests of the people rather than that of governments, bureaucrats or politicians. The new arrangements must be flexible enough to meet the challenges that lay ahead.

There are a number of areas in which the federal and provincial governments should be able to pass complementary legislation. For instance, we should be able to adopt national environmental standards and let the provinces adapt these standards to regional requirements.

The government's approach to the question of power sharing seems to be to give up federal powers to the provinces, without getting anything in exchange.

We intend to scrutinize each proposal in the light of our principles, in other words, it must be functional, and there must be a national government able to act and speak for all Canadians. We will draft amendments as appropriate and submit them to the committee.

I would also like to discuss the subject of spending powers. We believe it should be possible to limit the federal government's spending power in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. In the past, the problem was how to reconcile restrictions on spending power and the need for national standards. A functional redistribution of powers would help limit spending power without compromising national standards. However, it is essential that by the end of February, we do not end up with two Canadas, one rich, with first class social services, and one poor, with second class social services.

There is also an administrative agreement between Ottawa and Quebec that governs immigration. This agreement must be made part of the Constitution. The government appears to have accepted the proposals we made in Montreal last April.

[English]

Since the creation of the charter nine years ago, the Supreme Court of Canada is becoming more and more of a constitutional court. For that reason alone it is reasonable to expect that the provinces should have greater involvement in the appointment of judges.

To this end, a formula along the lines of the one proposed in the Meech Lake Accord could be adopted, provided that there is a real deadlock-breaking mechanism.

(7) The aboriginal peoples: across Canada there is a broad consensus of the need to deal with the problem faced by Canada's first citizens. There is understanding of the need to deal with the status, rights and claims of these peoples. In our view any constitutional package must enshrine their right to self-government.

(8) The amending formula: the process by which the Constitution is amended must be addressed. Liberals want a regionally based amending formula, combining flexibility with protection for each region and significantly improved public participation in the process. We believe it should be addressed now, not later.

(9) A national referendum: I have proposed the use of a national referendum to ensure that we get the full participation and approval of the Canadian people.

I believe that the final constitutional package that emerges from the parliamentary committee report will be put to the Canadian people for their approval. That will be the supreme test of its legitimacy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I now would like to speak more specifically to my fellow citizens in Quebec. I am a Quebecer and proud of it. I am proud of Quebec and its culture. I am proud of its achievements and its distinct character, and I hope that our Constitution will reflect that distinct character.

As a Canadian, I am also proud of Quebec, of its culture, its achievements and its distinct character. As a Quebecer and as a Canadian, I know none of this would have been possible without Canada. I realize that Francophones in Canada, and especially in Quebec, are anxious to protect their language and their culture and that the present trend towards globalisation has heightened their concern.

I know how difficult and passionate discussions on constitutional reform can be. In the past, there were insinuations of betrayal and bad faith. The words rejection and humiliation were used repeatedly.

The time has come to put a stop to insinuations. The time has come to examine our consciences. It is clear Canadian federalism can and should be improved. However, we must not forget that we live in a country that is the envy of the entire world, and we must now make it an even better place to live.

Quebec did not develop in isolation. Quebec belongs to the Western world. It had its quiet revolution. It reached economic maturity as part of Canada. The separation option would be a step backward. We must set our sights higher.

Our aim should be to build an even better country, a country whose resources and potential, geopolitical situation and diversity, ideals and values will make it possible for us to excel in all our collective and individual endeavours.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I know Quebecers are very anxious to constitutionalize the distinct character of their province. Our position is clear: as I have said many times, we want the Constitution to recognize the distinct character of Quebec. We want Quebec to promote the development of its culture and language, and we want the French fact to be present across Canada, and not just in Quebec.

However, we do not want this debate to be divisive. The government has just tabled a new text on recognition of the distinct character of Quebec in the Constitution. We will examine this text very carefully in the light of the principles I mentioned today.

I suggest we look at this text in a reasonable, not an emotional way, and keep a very open mind. I am convinced that by next February, we will have found the right words to enshrine in the Constitution the distinct character of Quebec, without in any way affecting the rights of all the citizens of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1120)

Mr. Chrétien: As a Quebecer, a Francophone and a Canadian, I would like to repeat what Laurier said: "We are French Canadians, but our country is not limited to the land we see from the Citadel Quebec. Our country is Canada. Our fellow citizens are not only those with French blood in their veins. Our fellow citizens are people of all races and tongues who came to this country driven by the misfortunes of war, by chance, or of their own free will."

[English]

In closing, I want to address a few comments to Canadians outside Quebec. I say to them that the Meech Lake Accord failed for many reasons. One reason was that it did not address the legitimate concerns of aboriginal peoples of the north and of western and Atlantic Canada. I was among those who said that changes and improvements were required.

For a constitution to succeed now the aspirations of aboriginal people, as well as the hope and dreams of the people of the north, west and the Atlantic provinces must be addressed. I have constantly said in Quebec—and I have paid a certain political price for it—that the needs and aspirations of the rest of Canada must be addressed in any constitutional reform package. I said we need a Canada round.

But I want to say to the rest of Canada that Quebec too has needs and aspirations which are legitimate and which must be met.

[Translation]

I have said repeatedly in Quebec—at considerable personal cost—that the needs and aspirations of all of Canada must be dealt with satisfactorily in any proposal for constitutional reform. However, I want to make it clear to Canada that Quebec also has needs and aspirations that are entirely legitimate and that must be satisfied.

[English]

I appeal to the values we share of tolerance and particularly of generosity. Let us use the next few months to understand that Quebec's distinctiveness makes Canada a greater country. Let us use the next few months to understand that the flourishing French fact across Canada helps us compete in a global society.

Let us use the next few months to understand that aboriginal self-government is a test of our values. Let us all demonstrate over the next few months thoughtfulness, reason, generosity, a willingness to accommodate and a skill to negotiate.

Let us get this constitutional issue behind us so that we can be equipped to deal with the real problems and challenges confronting us.

There is nobody who has been obliged to talk more about the Constitution than I since 1980 so I hope that I will turn the page soon and that we will devote our attention to jobs, to competitiveness, to the environment, to health care, to make sure that we can take our proper place in the world of tomorrow.

Do not forget what this government has forgotten so often, namely that we cannot get our constitutional house in order until we get our economic house in order. The two issues are not distinct. They are intimately linked.

We in the Liberal Party of Canada will be watching and will not permit the government to sweep our economic crisis under the rug once the constitutional dance starts once again.

Our nation has a history of accomplishments. Its history is not one of conflict. The Liberal Party has always worked to build a strong, united Canada. I cherish that legacy, and we shall continue that work of building a strong and united Canada.

There is a lot of work to do to improve this package; a lot of changes are necessary. We all have to work together. This time the people of Canada are watching. I want to tell the House of Commons and the government that we want to achieve the goal of keeping this country together and giving Canadians a new Constitution and a new departure for the 21st century.

But we have to do it in a way that is acceptable to all Canadians. We have to do it in a way that, rather than divide us it will make us closer to each other. We have too much in common to be complacent. This time we will be in a position to make some suggestions, and I hope that the government will listen. The last time my predecessor made some very good propositions in this House, some good amendments, which if accepted by this House, there would have been no crisis. But they were all rejected.

This time we will propose some amendments. We will help the committee to find solutions. We will make sure that every Canadian is comfortable with the new Constitution, because ladies and gentlemen, to be Canadian is the greatest asset we have, it is the asset that we want to give to all our children and grandchildren. Because, in spite of all the problems we are having, when we receive anybody who comes here from another country—like yesterday morning when I had the privilege to meet with the President of Ukraine—everybody when they look at us envies us.

It is our collective duty to make sure that this fantastic country remains one united, proud and independent Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today we begin a new journey as parliamentarians, as people of Canada and as a nation. We know it will be a difficult journey. It will sometimes be exhausting, sometimes painful, and that it will require from all of us on all sides of this House, as well as from coast to coast to coast, an openness and a tolerance for the diversity of this country and a commitment for the strength of a united Canada that acknowledges that diversity and which will truly make us strong as we go into the 21st century.

Mr. Speaker, although there will be problems along the way, there is also the promise of a better future. If we travel well and if we move in the right direction and achieve a destination we can agree upon as Canadians, we can build that better country; a united and an enlightened Canada that stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic Ocean. That Canada is the goal of the New Democratic Party.

I want to make it clear that this does, indeed, mark the starting point of the journey. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, he will be open to suggestions, he will be open to changes. The proposals put forward by the government are just that, proposals. The job of the joint parliamentary committee will not be that of simply selling those proposals or, indeed, selling the point of view of any one political party, but to take these proposals to Canadians and to listen to Canadians.

• (1130)

Today the Government of Canada has put forward its proposals and we have heard those proposals. Now we must go forward to hear the people of Canada.

In the coming months there will be much to say. I am sure there are things that Canadians can agree with in this document, but we must also raise questions and issues as well.

I and my party are committed to an open process. We have agreed to serve on the parliamentary committee because we believe that there we can help to open up that process, a process through which Canadians can truly be heard and listened to, and a process through which Canadians can accept, modify, reject, change or add on to what the government has put forward today. The final outcome must and will reflect the views of all Canadians.

The Constitution cannot be left simply in the hands of politicians, but must be the work of the hands, the minds and the hearts of the people of Canada.

Let me also say at the outset that we recognize that these are tough times for Canadians. Canadian families have many preoccupations; the high unemployment rate, the difficulty in a vastly changing world. It is not easy to think about constitutions and nation building when Canadians are worried about jobs and taxes, about trying to make ends meet. This debate has to be made relevant to Canadians and it has to be meaningful in the day-to-day lives of Canadians.

Having said this, let us be very clear that the stakes are high. We are talking about whether or not Canada will continue to exist as we know it or there will be change. We are talking about holding on to and strengthening a nation that is much admired around the globe.

There is no one who has voted for myself certainly, or anyone in this party, who has given us permission to work to tear this country apart. They have said to us: "We must work to keep this country together and to renew the federation". That is the responsibility I take as the Leader of the New Democratic Party and that is the responsibility that my party assumes and will participate in.

But there are some people in all parts of Canada who say that it is too late for Canada. To them let me cite the words of a first generation immigrant, Rambod Behboodi, who said: "I came here as a guest and Canada was generous as it has been to the generations of guests it has accepted and accommodated in its short and glorious history. For that I am forever grateful. Surely though, we can be generous to ourselves once in a while. Would it not be a tragedy if this haven of sanity in our insane world were to give up on itself?"

I can only agree with that person who chose this country for many of the values that all of us hold dear. It would be a tragedy because we are a nation like no other, populated by the First Nations, a vibrant French speaking society, rich regional cultures, people who have come from every corner of this globe to make up the reality of Canada in 1991 and to work together as we move to the 21st century.

We are a northern nation of great possibilities, where citizens and cultures come together. I am here because I believe in this northern nation. I believe in its possibility. I believe that though we are far from perfect, we offer the world an example of tolerance and harmony. Yes, we can give to the world some hope. We have a responsibility to others, to ourselves and to those who follow to fulfil the promise of Canada. I am here because I believe we can join together to correct the flaws, address the injustices and create the best Canada we can, a Canada that all Canadians will want to belong to.

Let me turn to the proposals put forward today.

[Translation]

It is too early to make specific comments on the proposals put forward today. I will have to examine them thoroughly before I can give an opinion.

I also intend to fulfil my commitment to consult extensively, a promise I made to the members of my caucus and of my party across Canada. However, I would like to say a few words about the vision of Canada presented in these proposals and how it compares with the vision of the New Democratic Party.

I think there are some aspects of this working paper that we can agree on. Mr. Speaker, there are also deep differences of opinion concerning the number of directions put forward.

Let me say, first of all, Mr. Speaker, that I am pleased to see that the government included in its document a number of suggestions made by the NDP among many others. The NDP has long been in favour of recognizing Quebec as a distinct society. We believe that this can really convey to the men and women of Quebec that their fellow Canadians truly accept, respect and understand the differences that exist within our country. We consider such recognition to be an expression of Canada's commitment to maintain and strengthen Quebec's uniqueness.

The NDP is also pleased to see that the government is looking at ways to reform our parliamentary institutions. We believe that such a reform could lead the people from Western Canada, from the Atlantic and the Far North to feel they have a say in decisions affecting them.

[English]

We are delighted, to say the least, to see that the government is looking at the abolition of the present non-elected Senate. It is a goal we have held for many, many years in this party.

One also sees in this document movement toward something else my party has long advocated, that is, the recognition of the right of aboriginal people to self-government. In this document, the government does not address the inherent right to self-government and I would suggest that that would be a major part of the discussion as the committee goes forward.

Let me say in this area, that the fundamental principle must be that aboriginal people be involved in every way at every stage, at every step, along the way. The First Nations of Canada must have a prominent place at the constitutional table.

Let me say with respect to the division of powers that it will take some time to fully study the government's proposals. We are talking about some fundamental changes. The New Democratic Party is not opposed to change, but we feel that in each area, there must be a rationale for how that change will meet the needs of Canadian people. In areas such as immigration and culture, for instance, Canadians must be able to see how these changes will in fact directly benefit them because all of these changes will have a profound impact on the future of our nation as a whole and how Canada will come to be defined in the 21st century.

I must re-state that the New Democratic Party believes that a strong Canada requires a strong national government. Any redistribution of powers that takes place must meet one fundamental test for this party. It must not be about meeting the demands of governments. It must be judged on the criterion of meeting the needs of citizens.

It is my view that the role of the federal government must be re-examined. The government has put out some proposals on this. Let us remember, if we try to accept the principle, as I certainly do and my party certainly does, that the diversity of Canada is part of our strength, that the rights of first nations, the distinctiveness of Quebec, the rich culture and contribution of our multicultural, multiethnic communities, the equality of men and women, are fundamental to who we are as a nation. If we are to recognize that diversity in a fundamental way, we must also recognize that the unity of this country will require a federal government that can represent every Canadian in all parts of the country in the national interest and in the international interest.

I repeat that there are a number of things that we can look favourably upon in initial reading of these proposals, but there are also elements that are potentially disturbing, elements that indicate that this government has a very different vision of the future of Canada, a very different vision. Of course it is the Conservative Party vision of Canada. It is a vision in some instances that is certainly not shared by the New Democratic Party, nor by many Canadians.

It is of course the government's right to put forward its vision in terms of its own political philosophy. If the consultation process, the parliamentary committee is to have any meaning, we must seriously look at all visions of Canada and try to come up with a consensus on what will best represent all Canadians and not one agenda.

I want to raise some questions particularly on the proposed economic union. I believe we can all agree in this House that the reduction of trade barriers, that greater co-operation among provinces and territories, is an important and laudable goal, but we must ask some hard questions.

Does the kind of domestic free trade in people, goods, finance and capital extend the same laissez-faire principles of the Canada-U.S. trade deal to a domestic playing field? Will there be winners and losers in this and, if so, how do we deal with that? Could this potentially lead to a whole new round of privatization, deregulation, diminishing social standards and diminishing corporate taxes as we look at this in terms of greater co-operation?

We must raise questions about the ability within Canada to reach the goals that we wish to reach in this economic co-operation if we in fact do not have a transportation infrastructure in place, which is absolutely necessary in a country of this size and which lamentably has been systematically destroyed.

What does the right of corporations to free movement of goods, services and capital mean for weaker provinces that seek to establish their own economic development programs? What does it mean for provincial Crown corporations? What does it mean for provinces or territories trying to support local jobs and fledgling industries? What does it mean for affirmative action? What are the implications of this form of economic union in terms of aboriginal self-government agreements?

Economic union that only addresses control and harmonization but does not mention initiatives to have greater regional equality and to strengthening section 36 of the Constitution on regional equality falls far short in this party's opinion.

Economic union proposals which suggest that the only role of the Bank of Canada will be to address inflation, not as well to look at unemployment, to look at fiscal and monetary policies as an instrument to address unemployment, fall far short of what we can be and can do if we are to have greater co-operation in the economy across this country.

While we support greater co-operation and while we support looking at a renewal of the relationships among the provinces, territories and the federal government in economic areas, we must also not simply take a defensive posture but a posture that says in this economy that we will reach out, that we will initiate to seek greater equality, and that that will be a strong commitment of a federal government, any federal government of any political party, and a fundamental part of our Constitution.

Part of the proposals on the economic union includes a council of federations. There are again many issues that must be discussed in terms of what that council will do, what kind of decision-making powers that council will have, how those will mesh with the decisions of the House of Commons, and indeed what implications a council of federations has, which according to the document is to make many decisions, when in fact aboriginal groups will not be included on that yet will have, according to the same document, aboriginal self-government agreements.

Therefore there are questions to be raised. We will be doing so in a constructive manner with alternatives.

I find what is important as we move into this process at this point is that we are constructive and we do present proposals. When we raise our vision of Canada and our alternatives, it is not simply to discredit someone else. It is because we truly believe that each of us in this House, each political party, has a contribution which will be fundamentally in the interests of Canada and that, if all of those contributions can be brought together, we will have the kind of consensus on a constitution that we must have. As we know, a constitution is not simply the government's constitution, the New Democratic Party's constitution or the Liberal Party's constitution; it is a constitution for the people of Canada now and in the future.

I also find it somewhat disturbing that the proposals put forward today include such things as the entrenchment of property rights but make no mention of a need to entrench social rights.

I have to ask what this says about the kind of Canada the government envisions. What kind of constitution will it be if corporations have rights such as to pollute the property they own when children have no recognized rights to health care in this country? Surely our goal for Canada must not simply be to further the rights of private interests but to further the rights of Canadian families and to further the public good.

[Translation]

What is missing in these proposals, Mr. Speaker, is a Canadian Charter of social rights to recognize and define the rights of the Canadian families and foster the public good. This Charter would define our social rights, such as the right to health care, to equality, to a decent standard of living and to collective bargaining. It would also define the responsibilities of the citizens, men and women, and those of the government to ensure that these rights are respected. In fact, a Charter of social rights is a commitment from the people of Canada to the people of Canada, a commitment to define the principles and values we share, to protect the institutions and programs that reflect these principles and values, to determine what it is we want to accomplish and to find a way to reach our common goal.

[English]

The Constitution is, in a word, about freedom. The rights to equality, to recognize diversity, the rights of individuals are enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But there is no freedom without public health care. There is no freedom for the worker without a job. There is no freedom for the woman without equality. There is no freedom for the child without education. There is no freedom for the minority without human rights.

• (1150)

A charter of social rights would direct governments to provide quality health care, work toward full employment, move society toward equality, provide education for our young, and ensure that the human rights of all are respected.

A charter of social rights is about creating greater freedom. Surely that is a goal that all members of this House embrace.

As we enter this remarkable period in our history, the question confronting Canadians is: Can we agree upon a vision, a vision of this country, a destination that we can all share? I believe we can do that.

Canadians are a caring and a tolerant people. We are a people who celebrate the richness of our society and value the bonds we share. We have a history of drawing on each other's strengths and compensating for each other's weaknesses. We have a future, if we choose it, of a stronger partnership, a shared prosperity, equality and freedom.

I recently read an article about the opening of a new school in Toronto. During that opening the school choir of 75 children from every racial and cultural background, 75 very different children growing up together, learning to live together, singing together, performed some compositions. Among the songs they sang were Dare to Dream and Look Beyond Tomorrow. Let us think of these children as we enter this new phase in the development of Canada and of our Constitution. Let us dare to dram and let us look beyond tomorrow.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–292, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (severance pay).

She said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill to amend the Canada Labour Code for severance pay is to provide that in cases of substantial lay-off employees who have at least 20 years of employment with the establishment shall receive severance pay amounting to six months' wages. The bill also provides for 16 weeks' notice of lay-off.

At a time when we are witnessing substantial lay-offs, it is important that workers who will be forced to relocate and find new employment be compensated for their years of service to their previous employer. This is especially important for older workers who will have a more difficult time in finding alternate employment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-293, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Employment Act (whistleblowing).

She said: Mr. Speaker the purpose of this bill is to provide for sanctions against public sector employers who discharge or otherwise discipline employees for what we call blowing the whistle, a serious misconduct by the employer.

The measures in this bill would be to protect the employee who, when acting in good faith, makes known to the public actions by the employer or actions being considered by the employer that are illegal and contrary to public policy or which would endanger public health and safety.

The bill would amend the Canada Labour Code, the Public Service Employment Act, as well as the Canadian Human Rights Act. It would then apply to all employees and employers who fall under federal jurisdiction.

Whistleblowing protection is needed if employees are to be free from threats or intimidation if they report on the misconduct of their employer.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL CONSUMPTION STANDARDS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-294, an act to amend the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it just seemed to me, on a day when the attention of all members of the House quite properly was directed toward the saving of the country, we might spare a small thought for a small measure to aid in the saving of the planet.

In 1982 this House passed the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act. That act has never been proclaimed. The goal of the bill before us today is simply to amend the last section of that act to provide that it will come into force on January 1, 1992. At that time, the original act would take effect which allows the cabinet to set fuel standards for new cars, vans and trucks to reduce emissions to fight the greenhouse effect on this planet. It is a small measure, but great things come from an aggregation of small measures.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-295, an act to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against countries that engage in driftnet fishing and to amend the Fisheries Act.

She said: Mr. Speaker, as today is United Nations Day, I think it is appropriate and I feel very fortunate to have the opportunity to introduce this bill, which most nations of the world have seen fit to support via the Wellington Convention.

Driftnet fishing has been widely condemned for the destruction caused to non-target species by the hundreds and thousands of miles set daily in the oceans ament lines which have been cut loose and continue to trap and drown vast numbers of marine mammals.

This bill amends the Fisheries Act, providing the option to set duties or bans on countries which may be intruding upon the global commons, threatening the viability of fisheries, or insisting on driftnet fishing which could lead to the extinction of species.

I am pleased to offer this bill to the House for the consideration of the hon. members and to all Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-296, an act to amend the International Development (Financial Institutions) Assistance Act.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to introduce this bill which will complement the Canadian initiative to ensure that economic development meets the needs of the people and the environment.

This bill will act to ensure that any activities Canadian institutions offer the international community will first be required to consider the impact on the human and natural environment.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment introduced such a process this year to Canadians, saying that the environmental implications of all proposed federal policy and program initiatives will be considered before decisions are made.

The intent of this bill extends our commitment to the international efforts in which Canada will be involved, offering a similar review process and commitment when providing assistance or endeavouring to undertake co-operative development.

I dare say that through amending this bill to the International Development Assistance Act, Canada will truly be attempting to practise what we preach.

The world, its people and the environment will truly be considered in all efforts by Canadians. I am pleased to offer this bill to the House for the consideration of all.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-297, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act (oats and barley).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a result of a removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board in 1989 by an Order in Council.

Since that time many producers in Saskatchewan and throughout western Canada have expressed some great concern that the Wheat Board can be affected simply by an Order in Council and not by Parliament itself with an open and proper debate.

Therefore, the purpose of this bill would be to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act to include oats and barley under the Wheat Board and that there could be no changes to oats or barley without this House, the Parliament of Canada, passing such legislation and such changes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-298, an act to amend the Criminal Code (cattle and other animals).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the intent of this bill is to give livestock owners the opportunity to defend their livestock from attacks by packs of stray dogs.

As a farmer, I have witnessed livestock breaking out of their feedlots and corrals to escape vicious attacks by packs of stray dogs. It took days to round them up and to get them back to their quarters and calm them down. I have witnessed sheep that have been attacked and killed, others disembowled, and some others terrorized to the point where they never recovered.

Ranchers and farmers need this legislation. They need the right to protect their livestock, which is their livelihood. They have asked for this legislation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-299, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (travelling expenses).

He said: Mr. Speaker, many people living in rural Canada work a long way from their homes; Canada is a rural country. The problem is that these people cannot make reasonable travel deductions on their income tax for this purpose. When we have people travelling great distances to go to work, it seems only fair and right that in order to assist these people that there be proper tax deductions.

The purpose of this bill would be to allow taxpayers living more than 50 kilometres from their place of work to deduct travelling expenses. Lawyers do it, business people do it; working people should be able to do it as well.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

* * *

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-300, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (tuition credit and education credit).

He said: Mr. Speaker, education should be one of the basic rights in this country and we should do what we can not to deny anybody such a fundamental right.

The purpose of this bill would be to expand the possibility of deductions for income tax purposes with respect to education, specifically for students in a public school situation where usually the parents or the students themselves have to pay for particular subjects. They would be able to deduct those expenses for income tax purposes. As well, the bill would allow the minister to expand to special institutions, such as institutions for the deaf or such institutions of that nature, to allow for deductions as well for tuition fees paid for that particular purpose.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act (financial information). He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to present a bill to amend the Financial Administration Act (financial information). This bill will provide Parliament and all taxpayers with better long-term information on financial planning. I am responding to many in my riding who are tired of government spending that gives no thought whatsoever to the average taxpayer. We want accountability from our government.

This bill ensures that all government programs must be costed out fully and completely. If a department or program goes over budget, then the Auditor General and the public accounts committee will examine it, demanding the reasons for the extra cost and the alternatives that were considered before concluding the excess was unavoidable.

As a former municipal politician, I know that governments at all levels must be forced to stay within a budget. This bill will do that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST TO WITHDRAW MOTION NO. M-14

On the Order: Private Members' Business:

M-14—Mr. Rodriguez

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should protect Canadian workers by amending the Bankruptcy Act, including in amendment measures to increase the dollar amounts allowed to employees as secured creditors.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, if there is unanimous consent, I move that Notice of Motion No. M–14, standing in my name on the Order Paper under Private Members' Business be discharged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give unanimous consent that the motion tabled by the hon. member be withdrawn?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PETITIONS

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions signed by concerned citizens in the southern end of Nova Scotia who want to remind the government that CFB Cornwallis has first rate facilities that could easily accommodate any new duty, in addition to recruit training, that the Department of National Defence might require.

The petitioners ask this House and Parliament to urge that the Department of National Defence not only maintain but add to its operations and to find ways to use CFB Cornwallis.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Canada, members of Transport 2000 in Saskatchewan in particular, but also people from Thunder Bay. It is consistent with the remarks that my leader made during her speech on the Constitution today that you cannot have a country unless you have a good transportation infrastructure.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services cut on January 15, 1990, maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail, and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

OXYGEN CONTENT OF FUEL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by several hundred citizens from the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who are asking the federal government to impose a minimum oxygen content in automobile fuel of 3.2 per cent, thereby eliminating the need for the compound named MMT.

I would also like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex who drafted this petition.

CABLE TELEVISION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, which was also signed by some of my constituents from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the nicest riding in Canada, naturally. The petitioners are asking the Canadian government to stop treating them in a discriminatory fashion in the area of cable television.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to legislative committee F; and the motion of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to inform the House that due to Ministers' Statements, Government Orders will be extended for 1 hour and 47 minutes pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a) as follows: 60 minutes between 1 and 2 p.m. and 47 minutes starting at 5 p.m.

[English]

The hon. member for Dartmouth has three minutes left.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I usually cannot say my name in three minutes, but I will do my best to try to conclude by contribution to this debate on this very regressive piece of legislation, Bill C-32.

Yesterday I focused my opposition to this particular piece of legislation by using some examples of what this government's economic policies have done to some of the poorest parts of this country, particularly Atlantic Canada. At that time one of the members opposite indicated, at least I heard them mutter from across the aisle: "This is not going to affect Nova Scotia. You are not one of the have provinces, where there is going to be a cap put on CAP".

Just because you come from a have not province does not mean that you do not have enough good and caring left in your heart and concern for this country that you cannot get up in this Chamber and speak for those you, perhaps, do not represent legitimately as a member of Parliament from a particular riding, but you do represent as a member of the Liberal party in this Chamber. There are a lot of Nova Scotians and Newfoundlanders in Ontario and Alberta and other parts of this country who are going to be affected very badly by this piece of legislation.

In Bill C-32, the government is attempting to put a cap on CAP, the assistance that is given to the poorest of the poor, the dispossessed, those who are down on their luck. It would do us all very well to just reflect for a minute on what this is going to mean.

There is nowhere in this country, rich or poor province, where the level of municipal social assistance that is paid does anything but keep the recipient of that social assistance and their family absolutely entrenched in a cycle of poverty. In this country an individual who finds himself in need of support and has to rely on a provincial or a municipal government for assistance has nowhere else to go to get enough to feed his family, have adequate housing, to be able to clothe his children and to be able to feel that he is contributing.

What this bill effectively does is rob those provinces that are affected by this piece of legislation of the ability to enhance social assistance payments. Every member here, probably every weekend when they get home and hold office hours, has somebody in—and I know I only have a minute—but I want to use an example that was used yesterday by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. It is a startling statistic.

• (1220)

According to Statistics Canada, if you have a family of four with two parents working at minimum wage—working at minimum wage—those individuals live below the poverty line in this country. We are talking about the working poor. Another startling statistic is that in 1988 there are nearly one million children who are living in poverty.

In conclusion I want to say that this bill will do absolutely nothing but ensure that those who find themselves in that despair will find that their despair and misery will increase.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Dartmouth who showed not only the goodness in his heart in speaking on behalf of his colleagues from the three provinces involved, but also to draw to the attention of the House, and indeed to the viewing audience, that we in the Atlantic region are not so concerned with our own province that we can't look at the country at large. But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that as I stand on my feet today, I would think that the hon. member for Dartmouth, despite the largesse of his heart is probably more concerned about Atlantic Canada right now. And it is that sort of thing that has caused us to rise to this occasion.

I would like to ask the hon. member for his comment on the following aspect of this, which quite frankly has bothered me for some time and continues to bother me. Presumably, this bill is the government's response to try and reduce the debt, by transferring the debt of the national government to the provinces. I can understand that as a cost saving measure, but quite frankly I am getting a little sick and tired of hearing the government from across the floor blame this debt on Liberal policies. I think after seven years of trying to run the country it should now have another system of trying to find the reasons for why we are in this condition that we are in right now.

I know the member campaigned—we met a couple of times during the campaign for the 1988 election. Mr. Speaker, I recall quite well promises being made, and in particular the promise of child care, for I think it was around $4 billion. This government, as one of its election promises, was very adamant that it had a program and it was prepared to look at it, and it even put a cost figure on it of $4 billion. I mention that, not as a specific program, although I was very concerned about that.

But I was also concerned that there was another $8 billion of promises. I was somewhat concerned about this, because while the public debt was not a major issue at the time, certainly not when the government was campaigning, I think most Canadians were concerned with that. I recall the Minister of Finance of the day saying that: "These are not campaign promises; they are in the program. We are going to spend that money. They are commitments".

Mr. Speaker, days after—in fact, I think it was in the next budget after the election and this government's first budget—there was no sign of child care. There was no sign of child care in the next budget or many other of these promises, not the least of which was a prison in my riding that was clearly an election promise, though I expect it will start to surface again as one of their promises.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Dartmouth for his comment and his feeling on these kinds of promises that are made, on the one hand, and on the other hand trying to cut back and blaming it on the Liberals because "we now have to transfer all these debts that we can't manage to the provinces".

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised some very salient points. As members from provinces that are have not provinces at this time, to try to keep us from yelling too loudly against this bill, the government has said; "Don't worry about it, because it is not going to affect you, and you, of course, can trust us when we tell you that".

This is what it goes back to, a matter of trust. I remember clearly during the 1988 campaign that this government opposite also made a number of other promises dealing with the well-being of families and the fiscal ability of families to make a living. One of them was child care. We remember that anybody who campaigned in that election said that child care was not a promise; it was a commitment. We also heard that regional development was not a promise; it was a commitment. We also heard that real tax reform that would save people money was not a promise; it was a commitment.

Just as with the prison in the hon. member's riding, we all found out very soon after the election that those commitments were written with disappearing ink. It is little wonder that people on our side of the House who stand with the majority of Canadians in opposing this piece of legislation say: "No, no, don't tell us now this is a measure that is only going to take place until these guys opposite can get their fiscal house in order. We do not believe them for a minute. Do not tell us that Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, the Northwest Territories, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Quebec is not going to be nailed by the broadening and deepening of this particular regressive piece of legislation, because we simply do not believe them".

The record of this Conservative government in fooling or misleading the people intentionally or unintentionally during campaigns is there for all to see. The Progressive Conservative government gets up in this House and indicates that this is necessary for fiscal responsibility.

"The economy is in really good shape", do you remember, Mr. Speaker, during the campaign? I certainly do in Atlantic Canada. My hon. colleague from Newfoundland remembers. The Prime Minister went around and promised that he was going to cause prosperity to break out all over, to inflict prosperity on this country.

He certainly has not inflicted it on the Atlantic fisheries. My hon. colleague from Newfoundland probably spends most of his working day. It is a long day when he goes back to his constituency, having to deal with the economic chaos caused by this government's policy in dealing with the Atlantic fisheries.

When I go home to my riding I have to deal with individuals who are living below the poverty line. Every time they make a purchase they are paying the GST on it.

In conclusion, I want to reaffirm and agree with my hon. colleague that this is the thin edge of the wedge. This government is absolutely not credible when it comes to making promises on fiscal responsibility and prosperity.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell my colleague that I am a little confused by the explanations given to us by the government. Perhaps he could clarify this for us.

We heard during the last election campaign that campaign promises were different than commitments, but the net effect has been that both the commitments and the promises were broken.

I ask my colleague whether he recognizes the difference between a Tory promise and a Tory commitment, because I cannot.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, quite simply there is no difference. They are both worthless.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I feel honoured to rise to speak after the hon. member for Dartmouth who has made such a fine and cogent presentation. In fact, I would rather not follow him because it is always very difficult to follow his dynamic and outstanding presentations in this House. I am sure his constituents are very proud of him this morning.

I want to address this again because while the hon. member did speak well it was the last part of the presentation that was started yesterday. To assist in the flow and continuity, and quite frankly to refresh myself on this, I would like to make it clear what the purpose of this bill is.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mifflin: The hon. member from across the floor laughs.

There have been so many bills dealing with a number of items that I would like to find out if Bill C–32 is in fact a bill to cap what is called the Canada Assistance Plan and applies to the three richest provinces in the country: Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario.

Some people may ask, and those in my riding who are watching me may ask: "Why is the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception speaking on problems in Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario?"

• (1230)

There are two answers to that. One is that as a member of Parliament I am very conscious that I am a member in this House and represent primarily my riding. Certainly the last couple of months has been very focused on the disastrous fishing we have had and the effort on the part of me and my colleagues, and indeed the whole Liberal Party and caucus, in trying to get the government to address that problem now, not two or three months later or weeks later. People are without money and they are hurting now.

While that is a major concern, as a federal member I feel it incumbent, in representing my riding and my constituents, to speak on behalf of Canada and to be involved in things like the constitutional debate that we heard this morning and to concern myself about measures that are taken by this government, whether they apply to Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, Newfoundland or to the rest of Canada.

The second reason is the primary reason. The primary reason is that cutting off or reducing the assistance programs to these people and these provinces in which, by the way, quite a large percentage of Newfoundlanders live, indeed from my riding, will indeed affect them as I will later point out. It is very important to understand that these provinces that get what is called the Canadian Assistance Program for which this bill is meant do not receive federal equalization payments like we do in Newfoundland.

I want to express my concern for the equalization payments that were cut off to the Atlantic provinces because they are equal to this cap that is now being put on the Canadian Assistance Program. By way of illustration, I want to relate to you, to this House and to my colleagues, just what the transfer of payments and the restriction have done in my province and in my riding.

I do not want to go through the revelation again of pointing out the promises that were made. Indeed, one promise shortly after this government was elected was to reduce the deficit despite 22 income tax increases in that time and the imposition of the despicable and hated goods and services tax at a time it could not have been worse, not only for the economy of Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada but for the rest of the country. This was at a time when there was a made–in–Canada recession that this government admitted to finally after being cajoled and reasoned by other members on this side of the House.

On top of all that, then, was a measure—and to me it was a despicable measure and a measure that I was not comfortable with—to to reduce the debt on a national basis. Basically this government is giving up the responsibility that traditionally the federal Government of Canada as a strong central government has had for those difficulties in the economy and those regions in Canada that were hurt the most.

That was one of the reasons this country was formed in 1867. It was, from a central viewpoint, to be able to cope with the problems that regions had. As each province joined then there was a better ability on the part of the central government to handle these regional problems. I very much regret that the government is divesting itself of that responsibility. It bothers me tremendously.

Since I have been a member of Parliament I recall the 1989 budget. Although it did not particularly contain great CAP measures or reductions in transfer payments, at that particular point in time it did close various parts of Atlantic Canada. I think VIA Rail was concerned and other measures mitigated tremendously against the economy. Then in 1990 there was a signal from the budget that we would have difficulties in transfer payments and in particular the 1991 February budget extended the freeze on the transfer payments to the budget year 1994–95. There had been a two-year freeze from the previous budget, and then in February we saw a freeze for another three years.

This came on the heels of lower payments in other areas. It came at a time when we were trying to standardize levels of service. It came at a time when the economy of the country was heading downhill and the economy of Atlantic Canada, because of the reduction in the economy due to poor fishing in Newfoundland and other factors in the rest of the province, became a major concern. On the heels of this dismal economic outlook, we had inflicted on us the reduction in transfer payments.

Mr. Speaker, I think you would appreciate, as all members of the House would, that it is very difficult to get a precise dollar figure on this because it is based on certain projections that would determine what the transfer payments would have been if this restriction had not been placed.

A figure that certainly I see recurring—I can agree more or less with this figure—is that the activation of the reduction of transfer payments as it applies to the provinces other than the three being considered by this bill is in Newfoundland, $148.6 million in the last three fiscal years; Prince Edward Island, $33.8 million; Nova Scotia, $230.8 million; and New Brunswick, $167.3 million.

It may be higher now because of economic factors, but as far as I and my colleagues are concerned the net effect of these developments has been to erode Ottawa's contribution to provincial treasuries in the Atlantic region rather severely.

To give some indication of the totality of what this means, we in Newfoundland, and indeed those in the rest of Atlantic Canada, rely largely on the central government and on these Ottawa transfer payments for a percentage of our annual budget.

The net result of what was done, the subject that is being discussed right now, is that the proportion of Newfoundland's total current account, the revenues in the budget of last year coming from federal resources, was down from 50 per cent in the previous year to about 45 per cent.

That is a 5 per cent reduction. That is incredible. Corresponding figures applied for Prince Edward Island, for Nova Scotia and for New Brunswick.

I do not have to point out to anybody who is listening to this from the Atlantic region the downstream effect that this has had. Irrespective of the stripe, colour and kind of government, they have had tremendous difficulties in coping with the financial difficulty that this has transferred to their government, to their caucuses and cabinets and eventually to their people.

The net effect of this cap has been the same, because these transfer payments are essentially meant to assist those who need it the most.

The CAP program per se, as I see it, helps those who are helped in a similar manner by the transfer payments. I am looking at health, social assistance and, to a certain extent, education.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, among those who benefit from the Canada Assistance Plan and the other social services are, firstly, the children who need protection because they suffer from abuse or neglect, but also the handicapped, whether physically or mentally, single parent families, older persons, the unemployed, families and individuals in distress, low-income workers and battered women.

[English]

CAP is the main component of Canada's social safety net. We have heard that so many times that I think it means so much to so many people. It is the last resource for those who have exhausted or have been denied all other forms of financial assistance.

In 1988 and 1989 for which there are solid figures this program benefited 1.853 million Canadians from the social assistance provisions. Now 46 per cent of these recipients live in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario which are the provinces that would be affected by CAP. This was related and spoken to in great lengths when Bill C-69 was being discussed. The inadequacy of social assistance benefits is a leading cause of child poverty in Canada.

I do want to return to something that I spoke about earlier here this morning. I did indulge the House to a certain extent and was supported by my hon. colleague from Dartmouth in his presentation of his concern. I have to reflect on the difficulty I have with a government that is trying to convey the impression that it is caring, that it is concerned, and that the needs and the cares of the ordinary person matter to them.

I would attribute and I would ascribe that concern to them because I know a lot of the members across the floor of the House. I deal with them on a regular and hopefully often a non-partisan basis, people like yourself, Mr. Speaker. I know that as individuals there are caring people on the other side of the House. But I have some difficulty understanding how that is translated from the individual concerns to the government as a group of people trying to run the country. I do not know how much influence the caring members have but there are many examples of that.

Mr. Speaker, I will give you one example. While it may not be directly related to caps, transfer payments and equalization payments, it certainly is a concern that we see every day. I have seen it every day. In particular, I have seen it since about May of this year.

I am not unlike any other member. I am not going to stand up here and take credit for travelling through my riding extensively. Every member pretty well does that, any members that are worth their salt. It is one thing to hear about it on the radio. It is something else to go and talk to an individual and say: "What kind of a year are you having?" We do this not only to listen to their words but to see the look on their faces, to see the despair, the emotion, and to talk to their families—their wives, fathers, mothers, brothers and sisters—to see the difficulty they have in coming to grips with just the thought that no one really cares to the point where they are prepared to do something for them.

I wish it were otherwise that I had to stand up here and ask for assistance from the government for the people whom I am responsible for in Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. In the first instance we had a situation in Newfoundland where the ice conditions were extraordinary. I have a background in marine subjects. I have spent essentially a lifetime at sea. I am from a family that has spent a long time at sea. I am from a province that has a seagoing heritage which needs no amplification here.

I have never seen a year like this. In the memory of those people to whom I speak, they have never seen a year like it either. Fishing normally starts in May, cod fishing. This year, May came, no fishing; June came, no fishing. In fact every week fishermen were trying to get their nets out and catch some fish, essentially cod, and they could not even get their nets out. When they got their nets out they were destroyed.

I will have to say that the government eventually did come up with a rescue package the day before this House closed on June 18, I believe it was. It was for $18 million. I am grateful for that and my people are grateful for that.

However, every single day and every single week there were questions in the House of Commons. The people who finally got some assistance had to go through a living hell to get that. They did not know they were going to get it. Every day I would get 40 to 50 telephone calls toward the end saying: "When is something going to be done for us?" Eventually there was recognition that something had to be done and eventually there was consideration shown.

The point I want to make is that the human anxiety people went through before this aid package was given was something that I am physically and mentally incapable of portraying to this House of Commons. Equally, beyond that we are in the same position, except it is worse because more people are involved and the financial constraints and financial implications are even worse. I am going down to my riding this weekend and I know I am going to be speaking to yet more fishermen, more plant workers and plant owners. Everybody in the riding is affected by that. They are asking me: "When is something going to happen?"

Most of them have seen me and my other colleagues in the House ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Employment and Immigration when something was going to be done for these people. Their answer is: "We are working on something and we will let you know when it is ready".

I cannot go back to my riding and tell people: "Well, I cannot do any more because the government is not ready yet". My responsibility, as I see it, is to explain the problems of my riding to this government and not to go back and explain to Bonavista—Trinity—Conception why this government has a particular policy.

In other words, I am here to express the policies and concerns of my constituents to this government and not to go explain government policy back to my constituents. I have to do it sometimes, particularly when it affects them. Surely, it has to be a two-way street and surely my responsibility is primarily to represent them in explaining to this government what their problems are instead of going back and saying to them: "This government has a problem because it has not been able to reduce the national debt despite 22 tax increases, the goods and services tax, the cutbacks on VIA Rail and the cutbacks on this and that".

The cutback in Atlantic Canada, in my province, is such that one has to live in the United States to call a toll-free number to cross on the ferry. If one lives in Newfoundland one cannot call a toll-free number to make a reservation to go across the gulf either from Argentia or from Port aux Basques. That is totally unacceptable. It is totally uncaring. It is a small thing, but it irks people. They believe that somebody up here, the governing party, really does not care about them.

I see that my time is coming to a close. I want in closing to make three final points.

The first point is that for all the reasons I and and my other colleagues have mentioned, we in the Liberal caucus are consistently opposed to this limit on the Canada Assistance Program.

Second, we do not support the measure that transfers the burden of national debt and the federal deficit reduction on to the backs of poor Canadians. Why should rich Canadians pay for poor Canadians? That is not the concept of this country. That is not what we believe in. That is certainly not what I believe in, as an individual who represents people who are not rich.

Finally, while the government may have the legal right because of a Supreme Court judgment to cut welfare payments to the provinces, I do not believe there is a moral right to abandon its responsibilities to poor and disadvantaged Canadians.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament from Kootenay East, British Columbia, I feel compelled to speak out against this regressive legislation. It is no wonder that we do not see in the House Conservative members from British Columbia getting up and supporting this piece of legislation. That is because it is a cutback in social programs for the province of British Columbia. As a member of Parliament who represents an interior area where many people are subjected to having to use and apply for social assistance, I find this very offensive.

Just for a moment I want to refer back to the last election. As we went through the campaign the free trade debate was the big debate that was going on across Canada. We heard our Prime Minister tell the people of Canada, who were concerned about our social programs, our safety nets on our health and welfare programs and our medicare, that it was a sacred trust and we did not have to worry about it.

I want to say that they do have something to worry about. We have seen the changes to our Unemployment Insurance Act. We have seen the changes to our hospitals and so on. We have seen the waiting lists of people trying to get into hospitals and so on. We have seen the cuts in post-secondary education. Now we see Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in British Columbia, in Alberta and in Ontario. The rationale of this government is that these are richer provinces, that they can afford it and that it is going to bring about some fiscal changes to the government and try to assist it in its debt.

I want to say to the House and to Canadians that the people who require social assistance do not look at British Columbia as being any richer than any other province. The need is there, the requirement is there, as some of the people in the government would know if they were to sit in some of these offices and hear the problems as I do in my riding with social assistance and the food banks. I visit the food banks. What does this message tell the food banks out there trying to bring a bit of added assistance to people so that they can live a little better? Many of them are single women, many of them are children of single parent families, and so on. What does this message tell the food banks out there volunteering their efforts to try to make their lives a little better?

I want to say that the government is not admiring the work they are doing. It is saying to them: "We are going to make it even harder for you and you are going to have to go out there and beg further and further to try to assist these people".

While this has been going on, the government has brought in changes to our taxation system. It brought in a consumers' tax, a 7 per cent added tax so that even the people who are prepared to share a little more through the food bank systems are finding it harder and harder for themselves. The Unemployment Insurance Act has been changed and people are finding it harder and harder to qualify and to live on unemployment insurance payments. The post-secondary education clauses are being changed and our students who want to go to school and want to carry on are finding that they cannot.

This summer while I was sitting in my office and we were running into the fall session where students were beginning to want to qualify for student loans—and I am talking about a loan; I am not talking about a grant—they would come in to my office and say that they had difficulty getting through.

As a member of Parliament I thought that should not be any problem. I picked up the phone and I phoned the office in Vancouver time after time and that line was busy the whole time. When a member of Parliament cannot get through on the phone to talk to the department, it shows that this government is cutting back even in the areas of answering the telephone to try to assist people. I am finding the same thing throughout the various programs.

I look back at some of the problems I see with social assistance in my riding, where young children of 17 or 18 years of age have difficulty at home and find themselves in situations where they feel they are being abused. They are coming in to my office and I am going down to social assistance trying to find places for these people, and it is not being done.

I want to say to the government, and especially to members of Parliament of this government from British Columbia, that they have a responsibility to this province. They should not allow the government to cut back universality in our social programs, in our medicare programs, in our unemployment insurance programs and in our pension programs. That is what they are doing. The universality of our programs is being attacked in a very mean and cold-hearted way.

I have seen it not only in the social programs. They all affect one another. If we do not have proper health care, if we do not have jobs, if we do not have unemployment insurance, it all reflects back and finally we reach the stage where we come under the social assistance programs.

As the former mayor of a municipality, I want to say to the municipalities in British Columbia that they are also under attack. As this affects the province, it comes down into the municipalities and into the regional districts because in cutting back in these areas where the need is the most urgent they are going to find that it will reflect on the way of life of those whole communities.

It is much harder to receive these services because we are at the very extreme end of the province. Many times you have to fly to Vancouver or Calgary in emergencies.

These are some of the problems that we have and it all relates, because it all comes back to our social assistance programs, our medicare program. I had a case in my riding where someone had a very serious attack and needed to fly by helicopter to Calgary. They got halfway to Calgary and were told to return to Cranbrook because they did not qualify under the air ambulance system of that province. They had to fly under the air ambulance service, and they returned that person back to Cranbrook.

Is that the kind of rationale that we are getting into with regard to our services throughout the country? No. We in the New Democratic Party believe in universality. We believe that the poor and the people who require that assistance should be treated equally in every province throughout Canada.

That is not happening. That is not what this legislation says. Bill C-32 allows for the extension of the 5 per cent limit of the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario. That is not universality. I say to this government; get back to the people. Is it any wonder that your government is running so low in the polls?

I see members from British Columbia sitting there, not getting up and standing up for the rights of our British Columbia people. I want to say to them; stand up and try to defend this piece of legislation because we have an election going on in British Columbia at the present time and the people of British Columbia will want to know where this government stands with regard to the social assistance programs in our province.

This government has a responsibility as a federal government. If the government is not capable of supplying jobs for the people and is not capable of allowing them to go to school to further their education, then surely to goodness we must have programs in place so that they can at least send their children to school with some dignity.

I do not want to leave the thought that there is any dignity in the meagre amounts of money that is available through social assistance programs because it is a very difficult time for children, single parents and the people who require this assistance to try to survive.

Go to the food banks in your riding and stay there on a Wednesday afternoon as I have done. See the people coming in and what their needs are, especially around Christmastime. You see exactly what is going on in your ridings.

I want to say to those British Columbia members that I have no doubt that it is going on in your ridings also.

I experienced a problem in my riding where the mines shut down. There were 800 people unemployed. Right away you might say: "They have unemployment insurance and they have other things," but the effects of that taking place and the impact it has on a community is devastating. It is absolutely devastating.

Without knowing that these kinds of programs are in place, makes it that much worse. For this government to bring about a program that is going to cut this back is just wrong. It is wrong, and the government should be looking in the other direction, to try to ensure that there is work for people, that they are able to live in dignity and earn their wages.

At least have the decency to maintain a social program so that they can continue sending their children to school, clothing their children and feeding them. Do not allow the food banks to have to pick up the extra stress because this government has decided it is going to make the poor and the lower income people suffer.

Also, in the same vein, we have the new changes that the government brought in concerning the UIC. Some of these people came into my office and decided to go on unemployment and upgrade their education so that they would not have to be faced with this problem again. They were told, however, that they did not qualify to go on UIC and upgrade their education.

What are we doing? We are changing legislation that the government wants to get out of so it brings in its unemployment insurance bill which places all of the burden on the workers and on the companies and the government stands idly by and watches things take place. It is all part of the free trade agreement. The people out there know that. The people know that the government is systematically getting out of these programs because of the free trade agreement. This is the first step. It is like the travelling salesman who knocks on the door and the first thing he does is shove his foot in the door. He knows if he can get the first foot in the door that is the first part of his sale. That is what the government is doing here. It is getting its foot in the door, bringing about changes in these provinces. If it gets away with it, it will then bring about more drastic changes than that.

It does not surprise me that this is the route the government is taking. Everyone knew when the free trade debate was taking place that this was going to be the agenda of the government, to get out of many of these programs and to systematically move out. We have seen it.

Bill C-21 makes UIC harder to get, which makes it run out more quickly and, of course, brings people right back on to the social rolls. Family allowances have been cut back. It again comes back on to the people.

The clawbacks in pensions, less money distributed throughout the communities, cutbacks in the agreements between the provinces; everywhere we look this government has attacked. Where is the child care program that was promised during the election so that single parents, who wanted to get out and obtain another job and increase their method of maintaining their families? It is not available to them.

As I go through the riding, I see that social programs are not meeting the needs of the people at the present time. For this government to bring about a 5 per cent cut in British Columbia is just not acceptable. Yet we see our Conservative members of Parliament from British Columbia sit idly by and allow this to take place.

Mr. Speaker, I know you have a feeling, as I do, for the people in my province and I know that we all must try to bring about fiscal restraint and so on, but there are other ways of bringing about fiscal restraint. The entertainment tax that large businesses and large corporations are allowed to write off is one method of trying to bring about some restraint, but no, this government does not see fit to look at those kinds of proposals. Those people would be their rich friends that they are attacking.

When I read the Ottawa paper on Sunday and I saw an article concerning large buildings that are sitting empty here in Ottawa. But this government has the gall to put forward a program that would say to our people on social assistance: "We are going to have to cut you back because of fiscal restraint." Here is a building that is not being utilized by this government and the taxpayers of this country are having to pay for it. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough. As a member of Parliament from British Columbia, I say that I am deeply saddened that this government would use this kind of approach on the people who can least afford it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying something which I think we should all remind ourselves of in this House from time to time, and it is that very few of us are poor. Because we tend not to be poor, we have very little communication and often very little understanding of what it means to be poor.

That gives us an extra obligation every time we debate a bill like this or an issue that affects those with whom we do not have personal connections, to make sure that we endeavour to understand fully and completely the problems that our actions in this House create for others and the effects they create.

I want to say that this bill goes to the very heart of Liberal principles about what Canada is all about and what any civilized society is all about. We believe very much in the value, dignity and worth of every human being and their right to have a society in which each person can develop to the best of their potential and contribute to their society.

We also believe that Canada is a nation based on a philosophy of sharing the tremendous riches we enjoy, riches that are not enjoyed by many nations of the world. We believe in a sharing of those to the benefit of all Canadians so that we can fully prosper in this country and can fully contribute to the prosperity of others.

Those are principles that are very much being violated by this bill that is before the House today. What it says is that if you are strong, well educated, wealthy and able to stand on your own two feet, this society is going to support you. But if you happen to be sick, elderly, poor, unemployed, psychiatrically disabled, or unable for one reason or another to fully care for yourself and to fully compete in a society that cares only about the strongest surviving, then this society has no place for you. That is what this bill is all about.

This country is an economic union, but it is more than that. It is a union of people who share a vision about social justice, about equality, about opportunities, about progressing and about making things better for people, not worse. Here we are taking a step backwards again.

What is being done in this bill is removing money from programs that allow people to participate in society despite short-term, temporary difficulties that make it hard for them to compete in the way others can. But it joins a parcel of actions by the government which show that only the strong and prosperous matter in this government's Canada. It joins actions against health funding in health programs, it joins cuts to education, all of which are essential investments in this generation and in the next generation and in our country. The fewer people we have who are capable of fully participating and fully developing their talents, the poorer our society is, not just those individuals, but all of Canada and all Canadians.

The Canada Assistance Plan represents the government's contribution to the prevention or alleviation of poverty. It also is much more than that. It is very much a contribution to the development of human beings in our society and therefore to the development of Canadian society. What this bill does is penalize those provinces that have been responsible in how they administer their budgets and how they manage. It penalizes those who contribute most to the prosperity of the rest of Canada through the equalization payments. But it penalizes the poorest within those communities. I can tell you, because my riding is perhaps a good example of this.

Being poor and being surrounded by people who live comfortably and well is very difficult and perhaps more difficult because the support services are not there. The support of the entire community is not there for you. People do not like being poor. They do not like being dependent.

I have worked with people in my community and I have found that it takes so little to break the cycle of poverty for families. It takes so little in the way of programs that are geared toward mothers and children living in poverty, training programs that help young people who started out with a disadvantage in life to have a better opportunity.

We do not want to see programs that simply perpetuate poverty, but programs that give people a basic living while they move toward independence and also to provide a basis of support to those who for one reason or another cannot be independent. There are thousands and thousands of them in Canadian society. We have a healthier, saner society when we look after those who cannot look after themselves.

CAP contributes to basic necessities a very minimal living for people who temporarily need the help of society. We have seen how inadequate it is. We have seen how it is not enough to afford decent housing and so we need special housing programs. It is not enough to afford basic food and so we have food banks and volunteers and churches overwhelmed by the demand for extra support services. There are children going to school sometimes too undernourished to be able to profit from education and so we have in-school lunch and breakfast programs.

We have the implications of cutting back the contribution to the basic necessities of life. The implications fall most heavily on children. Poor children are four times more likely to drop out of school. Is that what we need in Canada? Is that what we need, that large proportion of our young people never finishing school, never developing the abilities they have, never being able to establish a stable and progressive employment record because they do not have the basic tools to work in Canadian society, to be steadily and well employed and remunerated enough to raise their own families? I do not think that is what we are looking for.

Mr. Speaker, you have already heard read into the record the health problems of poor children. I can tell you what happens in the schools when poor children enter kindergarten. They are stigmatized from the first day they enter school because their hair is not as glossy, their skin is not as bright, their clothes are not as nice, their shoes are not as shiny. By the time they have been in kindergarten for three months, before they are even six years old, those children already feel like failures. That is what we do to children when we let them grow up in poverty. That is what this bill will do.

We deprive children of any hope. We deprive their mothers of any hope. We deprive their brothers and sisters of any hope, and we deprive our society of any claim to being civilized and humane.

I know that the government seems very anxious to get itself out of any responsibility for making this a stronger and better society. It seems to think that the private sector is somehow going to take care of all of that for us. I do not believe that. If that were true we would not need governments. We would not need volunteer organizations. We would not need people who are looking constantly for ways to make this a country of opportunity for all Canadians and especially for all the children of Canada.

There is only one taxpayer's pocket, and the government can pretend that it is saving money with a bill like this. I am shocked that I have not seen, as the Prime Minister promised during the 1984 election, a similar massive review of subsidies to government. I cannot tell you how many tens of millions of dollars I have seen just coming across my desk in the last week in press announcements of $1 million here, $10 million there or $15 million there to companies in this country. Nobody has ever suggested that we should start cutting back on some of that money from the government side of this House. No, it is always the poor, is it not? It is always the children, the elderly and the sick that this government thinks should carry the burden of its mismanagement of the debt and the deficit.

I hope, in the better off communities within the three provinces that this government has targeted, social programs are going to survive because there are many communities in Ontario, B.C. and Alberta that have the resources to put in and make up where the government is not fulfilling its responsibility. But other programs in those communities will suffer. Programs that make up the basic necessities of food, clothing and shelter for families, other programs that help them get off welfare, that help them get training, that provide the extra support services needed to make life decent and liveable while they are on public assistance, those are the programs that will suffer. The extra little bit for dental care, for furniture, when a stove breaks, for back-to-school clothes for the children, those are what will suffer because there is only one taxpayer.

Many of those families now in Canada that are unemployed and poor will have to pay through their property taxes for what this government refuses to pay through a much more equitable tax base that it has access to. The property tax does not differentiate about whether you happen to be temporarily unemployed, on pension, poor or not. It is not based on income so you do not necessarily pay according to your means. So more of the burden will fall on fewer Canadians who can afford it.

The government by other actions has made the need for such services even more significant through the cutting back of benefits and unemployment insurance, which hits again most toughly in these three provinces. What it is doing is forcing more people on to welfare. As it is forcing more people on to welfare it is pulling back its own support from those very social programs that help people through a tough time and help them get back on their feet.

The bottom line is that this bill hurts not only those in the provinces that it is directly targeted at—and it is no easier to be poor in Ontario, B.C., Alberta or anywhere else, in many ways it is harder—but it hits our whole commitment to sharing in this country. People from the Atlantic provinces have spoken on this bill because they know that when we abandon that generosity of spirit that says all Canadians are entitled to a decent start and a decent chance, a helping hand over a rough period in their lives, then we start abandoning those segments of our country where we have to provide a little extra help.

It is important to all of us that Atlantic Canada be part of our country, not just to the people who live there. We have to be prepared to make it possible for the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland to benefit fully from being part of Canada if we want to enjoy the benefits.

• (1320)

Sometimes that involves paying a price, and we in the Liberal Party recognize there is a price to being Canadian and we are willing to pay it. We resent very much that this government is abandoning our commitment as Canadians to one another.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Ottawa West on her usual fine job of presenting arguments in an organized fashion on behalf of Canadians and on behalf, particularly I think this morning, of Canadian children.

I just wanted to get a reaction to something we find so prevalent in the country today. We have seen it mentioned here this morning, I think, by everyone who has spoken in the House so far, and that is the cynicism that is out there in Canada today. One does not have to go looking for it, it is so obvious wherever one goes. It affects politicians at whatever political level they happen to be: municipal, provincial or federal.

I just wanted to get the hon. member's reaction to something which I think has happened within the last week. I think it has some bearing on what she is referring to here in her speech. This cynicism is out there. It is going to take the efforts of all of us. It is something like a disease that is creeping across the land. I think it is going to take the efforts of all of us to try and put any kind of a damper on it.

One aspect of this will affect the hon. member in particular. Almost on the eve of provincial elections being called in two provinces, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, we find this government announcing almost simultaneously, let us put it that way, that an organization which has been headquartered here in this province will be suddenly removed from Ontario and put in Saskatchewan where there is a provincial election coming up within the next five or six weeks.

At the same time something in the nature of a science centre, I guess one could call it—both of these projects are very worth while—was announced. Another project would be put in, dropped in, placed in B.C., and an election was called there.

This is a double-barrelled example of the purest form of cynicism that exists in this country. Surely the Canadian viewing audience can see through the political moves that are afoot there and see it with straight cynicism. If Canadians are becoming more and more cynical, surely this feeds right into the hands of the cynics, and I think is gnawing at the very heart of the nation.

I wonder if my hon. friend from Ottawa West would just comment on that. I know one of those particular things is very near and dear to her.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): I thank my colleague. Certainly we are well aware of and understand the cynicism that is growing because we have seen a lack of trust in the government and a well deserved lack of trust. We have proclamations about the sacred trust of our social programs and yet we have—and it is not the first—a bill that is a very denial and destruction of the social programs that were being referred to.

Before every election this government referred to introducing a child care program. Three times it has reneged on that promise. We have seen money cuts to job creation, cutting opportunities for young people. We have seen the slashing of the registered home ownership savings plan so young people cannot afford their first home now. We have seen a surtax that was supposed to disappear when the GST came in. It has gone from 3 per cent up to 5 per cent instead of coming off. We saw Katimavik that gave new opportunities to our young people cancelled. We saw promises about not touching old age security. It was a sacred trust: "On the name and on the word and on the head of my mother I would not touch old age security". Whammo, six months later old age security and family allowances start being reduced and cut. Personal income tax has gone up. Those who are doing well in our society have more disposable income. Those who are poor have less disposable income, and now the feet are being cut out from under them again.

Yes, Canadians see themselves being bribed by their own government to vote the way their government wants not only in federal elections. Oh, no, now they are down there interfering in provincial elections, trying to save Grant Devine's skin. Canadians see themselves being bribed by their own government to vote the way it wants, not only in federal elections, but now they are interfering in provincial elections, trying to save Grant Devine's skin from the negative effects he has created by moving Regina jobs out into rural Saskatchewan. They are moving federal jobs in to fill in the gap he has left, therefore disrupting two sets of families to achieve no positive results.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague, the member who just spoke, in questioning the member who made the speech, in saying how much I enjoyed the remarks made by the member for Ottawa Centre.

There was some reference to the way poverty affects school children and I was wondering if the hon. member would perhaps take a more positive role and share with this House some of her ideas on the possibilities not only of cutting back on the moneys that are going in but perhaps inaugurating and instituting a program for younger children, school-aged kids, to be supplied with the basic fundamentals of life. I am talking very basically about at least a nutritious breakfast or something like that for those people who cannot afford it.

This problem is particularly acute in the larger cities, but not only there, and I am aware from my own background of having taught in schools that the problem does exist.

If the hon. member for Ottawa West would perhaps give us her views on that I would be most appreciative.

Mrs. Catterall: I thank my colleague for the question. That is exactly the kind of program that local communities can introduce for their children if they have the resources to do it and if they are not being required to meet the federal government's obligations to meet basic necessities of life through welfare systems.

I think it is even more important to back off a step before that. The successful programs I have seen involved very young mothers before their children were of school age, working with them around their own self-worth and the importance of their role as mothers in raising the next generation so that their children do develop a sense of pride and self-respect, that the mothers learn some skills that perhaps they did not learn growing up in their own families, so that the community as a whole is working to help mothers and their young children develop a new sense of pride, get the training they need, and get out of the welfare system.

In my view, the first thing is the community supporting the role of the mother with her child so that the sense of self-worth comes from within.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I and my colleague voted against Bill C-69 when it was introduced in this House and we will be voting against Bill C-32 at third reading for a lot of reasons. One of the main reasons for opposing these two bills is that we believe they in fact mark the beginning of the end of universal social programs as we know them in Canada.

According to many of the people who do research in the area and from all of the indications we received, by the year 2004, transfer payments to the provinces from the federal government in the areas of education and health care will be zero. There will be no transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces by the year 2004 in the areas of health care and education.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians know that when the federal government is not investing in the areas of education and health care it will not have the kind of say it wants to have in these two areas.

It surprises me somewhat that in the last budget the Prime Minister spoke very eloquently on the issue of education. He spoke about the question of objectives in the area of education. It was a very welcome statement at the time, but when one looks at the actions of the government in terms of Bill C-32 and before it, Bill C-69, one would question the commitment of the federal government to the educational question as well as to the health care question.

• (1330)

The whole issue is centred around reducing the deficit. There are three options which the government can take. One is to shut down operations and keep the taxes rolling for a few years. That will generate enough money and to pay the deficit.

Another option before the government is to do as it is doing now, reduce the services it is providing Canadians to a bare minimum and to attack many of the social health care programs, the social programs, that are very much needed in different parts of the country. It can sell national institutions such as Petro-Canada, Air Canada, VIA Rail and possibly CBC, et cetera, collect all this money and put it towards deficit reduction.

It can shut down a lot of the operations that are in place. We will still have a somewhat limping government, a somewhat half operational government, but we will still have a government and we will reduce the deficit.

There is a third alternative and that is the Liberal alternative, the Liberal way of reducing the deficit and revitalizing the economy in the country as a whole and that is through investment. We do not look at the question of putting money in the area of health care and education as being an expenditure, we look at it as being an investment in the future of Canadians.

The Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance in May 1990 said, when they spoke about the CAP spending restraint, that $147 million would be saved in the year 1990–91 and $154 million in 1991–92. The government at the time estimated that for the next five years it would be saving approximately $2.35 billion in transfer payments to Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. Then the Minister of Finance of the province of Ontario, Mr. Nixon, estimated that would cost the province about $150 million in 1990–91 and approximately $280 million in 1991–92. The latest estimate which came a year later clearly stated that the loss to the province of Ontario would be approximately $1 billion in one year.

As a result of this move, the total share of social services which are provided by our regional municipality of Ottawa–Carleton will be reduced tremendously. In fact, the Social Planning Council of Ottawa–Carleton predicts that the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan will cut revenues by $596 million over two years in the Ottawa–Carleton region alone. That is a tremendous amount of money, considering the increase in the social welfare payroll on an annual basis in this region is at least 10 per cent every year.

When the federal government cut the transfer payments to the provinces, the provinces in turn cut their transfer payments to the municipalities, and the municipalities find themselves trying to pick and choose, as my colleague from Ottawa West indicated, whether to increase the property taxes or let the people go hungry.

This downloading is creating a generation of people on the welfare market. In many cases they are not receiving the kind of care they deserve because of lack of funding. On the other hand, the government both at the federal level and at the provincial level are just shifting the problem without trying to address it with some sort of strategic plan.

Mr. Speaker, we must look at the impact of Bill C–32 on medicare and post–secondary education. Back in 1976, we had an agreement between the federal government and the provinces which stated that funding for post–secondary education was on a fifty–fifty basis. However, in 1986 the federal government started cutting the transfer payments to post–secondary education by 2 per cent every year, until the famous Bill C–69 arrived, which froze completely the transfer payments for 1990–91 and 1992 to the rate of inflation. From there it started going downhill.

These cuts in transfer payments have affected the delivery of services and programs at universities and colleges. For instance, the 1987–88 budget in the province of Quebec published a table which showed that the federal government would no longer put any money into medicare in Quebec by the year 2004, as I indicated earlier. That was with only the 2 per cent reduction in the federal funding formula which is presently being used. However, by 1990–91 the reduction would climb to 3 per cent and all the contributions would be frozen again for two years. All cash payments to all provinces, even the poorest, and that includes Atlantic Canada, will end some time around the turn of the century. Payment to Quebec will end by the year 1995 and in Ontario in 1998.

So as we are saying, less and less federal money for medicare and colleges and universities will put more of a financial burden squarely on the shoulders of the provinces. As a result, the federal government's ability to influence national standards and guidelines will be, as I indicated earlier, diminished.

When a survey was done across the country, 85 per cent of Canadians believed that medicare is our best and most valuable service.

When we look at the question of education, nobody could have put it any better than Jane Arnold, who is the chairman of the Canadian Federation of Students, when she said that education is a right and not a privilege. Bill C–69 and Bill C–32 take away the right and make education a privilege. Truly, Mr. Speaker, it will make education a privilege because, according to some statistics which were published in 1986, the higher education our children and our youth receive, the better chances they will have in receiving an education. The lower education our youth receive, the less chances they will have in receiving an education.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when we have to put our emphasis on investment in our children and our youth, it is somewhat disappointing that the federal government is moving toward cutting many of the social and education programs that in fact would help in getting the country out of the difficulties we are in. There is no better investment the government can make than investing in our youth. There is no better way in dealing with reducing the level of deficit in Canada than investing in our youth.

• (1340)

Bill C-69 and Bill C-32 will be causing a lot of damage to the way we provide and offer our social programs across the country. Unfortunately CAP was the only remaining open-ended program that was cost shared between the provinces and the federal government. There was no limit on how much a province could choose to spend on some of the social services they are offering. The only limit they had is the fifty-fifty sharing agreement.

Mr. Speaker, when you look at the fact that approximately 40 per cent of the people who get welfare payments are children, research shows that poor children tend to have more health problems, greater difficulties in school and more involvement in crime than other children, and the cap on CAP makes sure that Canada does even less than in the past to combat these problems.

According to Dr. Robin Walker, president of the Canadian Council on Children and Youth: "About 40 per cent of social assistance recipients are children. The recent cap on CAP means that there will be less money to meet the basic needs of these children, to help their parents escape the welfare roles or to combat the negative effects of child poverty". He is absolutely right.

In fact, the situation is even more difficult when we look at the approximately 60 per cent of Indians living off-reserve in Canada who receive social assistance. A disproportionately large number of native children living off-reserve are cared for within British Columbia's child welfare system. We can conclude that aboriginal people in Canada represent one of the largest groups affected by restrictions on the amount of CAP transfer payments to the provinces.

Christopher McCormick, national spokesman on native issues for the Native Council of Canada, indicated: "Cuts to the Canada Assistance Plan will be a national disaster for aboriginal people who already live in Third World conditions".

On this subject matter one could speak on and on forever. The bottom line is that it is really up to this government to decide what it really wants to do. Does it want to invest in the future of Canadians now, or does it want to shut down operations and go home?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment on Bill C-32. First, I would like to congratulate my colleague, the member for Ottawa Centre, who has just put so well and so correctly all the damage this bill will cause.

I too of course am against this Bill C-32 because it will result in cuts to the provinces. We already know how badly the province of Ontario is mismanaged by the present New Democratic government that is there. Take that and add to it the cuts in transfer payments and we are in for some major difficulty. My fear is that these cuts to the provinces will result in our inability to train our population because a great Canadian once said the following about our ability to compete as a nation, Mr. Speaker, and I ask you to pay close attention to this. He said:

> First, we require co-operation to re-establish the concept of working together as Canadians first. The concept around which this nation was built.
> Second, we must make an effort to ensure that we have the capital required to finance national development in the 1980s, including a commitment from all sides to avoid the kind of vexatious and punitive policies that serve only to drive away Canadian foreign capital.
> Third, we need a major national program to train and retrain the richest resource of all, our people, so that all Canadians may share in our development by working and by paying our own way.

An hon. member: Who was that enlightened person?

Mr. Boudria: I am glad my colleagues just asked me who that great Canadian was, because I just quoted from the book Where I Stand written by one Brian Mulroney.

An hon. member: That must have been a long time ago.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his comments. I think the statement made in the book is a true statement. There is a lot of merit to it. I think the challenge of the government is in fact to do the delivery that would match what is in the statement.

I would like to state that it is really appalling when we look at the state of our educational system. It is appalling when we see that in Canada we have in excess of 38 per cent of our population who have difficulty reading or writing, who are considered to be functionally illiterate.

Just on this point, the question of literacy and illiteracy and the lack of investment on the part of the government in our human resources, I would like to say that a business task force that was set up some time in 1986 or 1987 stated that the cost of this to our economy was approximately $4 billion and about $10 billion to society as a whole.

If we look at the deficit of $30 billion annually and we look at the cost of illiteracy alone of $10 billion, it would not take a genius to conclude that investing in human resources is a key to addressing the question of shortages and the question of deficit.

In my view, what we should be focusing on is dealing with the question of education in a very aggressive and outward looking way through consultation with the provinces of course and through consultation with institutions such as universities, colleges and school boards. Unless we do that it does not matter. We could keep throwing money at the problems day and night. That will not solve it. Unless we start looking at the human resources and trying to help them out to move forward, there is no way we could deal with the question of deficit.

Let me assure you that we could, perhaps by the year 1995–96, have a balanced budget, but that will not stay for very long because another difficult year like the years we had in 1981–82 and everything will be out of whack. We will have the same cycle we have gone through in 1981–82, and we are just coming out of 1990–91, all over again by the year 1997–98.

The whole answer to this question is through investment in our human resources.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on his continued battle to try and bring the issue of illiteracy to this House of Commons and certainly trying to push the government on investing in human capital.

• (1350)

Mr. Speaker, through you to my colleague, I want to pursue a line of thinking. I have always contended that we are going to have to attract foreign capital to this country, which eventually will be one of the ways in which we create downward pressure on interest rates that ultimately will help our economy in every sector.

Foreign capital naturally looks at the levels of productivity. When we look at the levels of productivity in a company, or in a country, we do not only look at how hard people work. We look at how skilled the labour force is. One of the things that I hear over and over again from manufacturers, not only in my riding but other ridings across southern Ontario, is the difficulty they have in finding a skilled labour force. In order to have a skilled labour force we need a high level of literacy. We need people who understand the basics of reading and writing.

I would like to ask my colleague: Does he not think this investment in making sure that we become a more literate nation not only affects us in the short term in terms of our productivity, but ultimately will have an effect in terms of the whole economy and downward pressure on interest rates and the dollar?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, no one could have put it more nicely than my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. I want to thank him very much because he too is pushing for the same cause. No wonder he is a Liberal.

There is no doubt in my mind that more emphasis has to be put on the question of productivity. The reason why I say this is because it is really amazing that Canada is one of the largest exporters of wood, for instance, but we still import saws from Italy, among other countries, to cut the wood.

We have a very strong mining industry and we ship raw materials to Japan, Hong Kong and elsewhere, but we still import the machinery to gather the raw materials.

I totally agree with my colleague that to become more competitive we must spend more money in the area of research and development and in the area of education. We must, there is no doubt in my mind, make manufacturing a priority. All of these wonderful raw resources and raw materials, all of the resources that we have in Canada right now, over the next 15, 20, 30 or perhaps 50 years will be depleted. The only thing we will be left with is our human resources.

In closing, I totally agree with my colleague, unless investment now starts shifting and focuses on our human resources, that we have quite a challenge.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the next hon. member, I wish to inform the House that the five hours of consideration have now been completed and members will now speak for 10 minutes maximum, with no question and comment period.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, this morning in the House of Commons we heard the Prime Minister putting forth the proposals of our cabinet in a document entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together. The thrust over the last couple of weeks that we have heard from the Prime Minister is a thrust toward co-operation of all parties and of all peoples within Canada, a thrust toward equality, a thrust toward giving people a voice in Canada.

I would like to quote from page 7 of the foreward of the document.

The document states as follows: "Canada must ensure that it is equipped to deal with the economic challenges of the next century. If we are to maintain our prosperity, ensure a high standard of living for our children and continue our effort to reduce the disparities that exist between the regions of Canada, one of the most important and enduring principles of Confederation, we must be prepared to work together more harmoniously and effectively. We must have an economic union that is both modern and truly functional".

Last year under Bill C-69 the government selected three provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario, out of the 10 provinces and two territories and proceeded to treat them differently, to discriminate if you will against these three provinces because they are the larger provinces and are considered to be have provinces within Confederation.

Under Bill C-32 it is proposing to extend that same unfairness toward the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario by extending the cap at 5 per cent on the Canada Assistance Plan payments, the payments that approximately 25 years ago it had agreed would be funded on an equal basis with the provinces.

The argument might be that these are the have provinces and therefore they can afford to give up some of what they have, but reality finds its way into this argument and shows that the argument is not a valid one.

The reality is that provinces such as Alberta and British Columbia and Ontario, when times are tough, get people moving from other provinces into those areas looking for employment. These people are often the same people who are without unemployment insurance benefits and go with the idea that they will be able to find employment.

In my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt we have a very high unemployment rate and we have a high rate of people on social assistance for that very reason. It is a wonderful climate and during the summer there are jobs available in the Okanagan region particularly and in the Similkameen Valley in the fruit picking industry.

What often happens is that people come from other provinces without money in their pockets and they must turn to social assistance until they get a job. Then it falls on the people of British Columbia to pick up the tab for those from other areas of the province. That shows part of the unfairness.

If we couple what this government is doing now under Bill C-32 with Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Act, where it cut down the qualification time, you are again hurting the people in my area because often, with the seasonal nature of fruit picking, they do not get the required number of weeks in order to apply for unemployment insurance.

What do they do when they are without work? They turn to the social assistance area for that assistance.

That is the problem that we have with this bill. It is not reflected in the 5 per cent of growth. Well over that 5 per cent I think is reflected on a year-to-year basis because places like Alberta and British Columbia particularly are areas in which people enjoy coming to look for employment and perhaps to live, particularly if they are not employed, because it is a wonderful climate.

By attacking these areas I think we are effectively attacking what they have set out here, the harmony, increasing the standard of living for all of us, by saying we are not going to assist you, we are not going to keep up with our end of the deal, a fifty-fifty split on the Canada Assistance Plan. We are not going to fund it. We are going to leave it to the taxpayers of your province.

Certainly in the larger cities, what happens is that it is the taxpayers of the municipalities who must pick up the added rate for the added people who are on social assistance.

Unfortunately, I am not going to have time to go into some of the things that have bothered me about Bill C-32 because of Question Period rapidly approaching, but I just want to point out—I will go into it in my next few minutes—that it is the children who are being hurt by this. We know that they are the single largest group of people getting social assistance.

For a government that has committed itself to assisting child poverty and doing away with it by the year 2000, I think it puts a bad light on this government in looking at child poverty when it thumbs its nose at those in Alberta, those in British Columbia and those in Ontario which have 50 per cent of the population of children who are presently living in poverty.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 31

ARMENIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, over 99 per cent of the voters in Armenia were in favour of independence, and there was a 95 per cent turnout. Yesterday, all the members of the Armenian Parliament sang their national anthem "Armenia free and independent". Mr. Speaker, today, all the members of this House must join me in congratulating the men and women of Armenia on their independence.

An historical agreement was reached yesterday, Mr. Speaker, when Armenian and Azerbaijani authorities agreed on an immediate cease-fire and the disarming of armed units in Nagorny Karabakh. So, Mr. Speaker, all the refugees can finally go back home. We would like to offer our congratulations to the presidents of Russia and Kazakhstan, Boris Yeltsin and Noursoultan Nazarbaïev. This is the dawn of a beautiful day in Armenia for the people of Nagorny Karabakh. Hurrah for independence, Mr. Speaker!

NOVA SCOTIA CLAM COMPANY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the people of my constituency, like other Canadians, want to participate in renewing the Constitution, but their immediate concern is economic, a secure job so they can feed their families.

Since May, 250 unemployed workers of the Nova Scotia Clam Company have been waiting for clear leadership from this government to enable them to go back to work. All summer long, despite rally after rally, they have been kept in the dark.

Before the last election, this government created special rules to encourage this company to establish in the Strait of Canso. Since then, as in so many other cases in Atlantic Canada, the federal government has acted to undermine this company and abandon its workers.

In August, the Minister of Fisheries and ACOA threatened the viability of Nova Scotia Clam by permitting the new competitor, National Sea, to enter its market for off-shore clams.

Now, the company's clam vessel The Scotia Surf is being sold. Will the Minister of Fisheries and ACOA, with nearly $1 million invested in this project, object to this sale? Will he act in the dying hours to save these jobs? I await his answer, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, from the cradle to the grave is synonymous with a lifetime.

From the cradle to the grave is also synonymous with unemployment insurance for many.

For too many Canadians, unemployment insurance is an inheritance passed on from father to son.

In 1940, an act was passed to provide for a national unemployment service which would provide a means of temporary assistance to people who were put out of work so that they could find other employment, retrain or take further education.

No country can continue to prosper if a large segment of its working force is content to work for only a few months each and every year.

More must be done to ensure the original intent of the Unemployment Act is honoured. Retraining must be a must.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has unleashed a monster on the Canadian people. At 17 secret sites across the country, Agriculture Canada is conducting biogenetic engineering experiments that have the potential to wipe out crops and endanger human health.

The federal government is keeping these experiments secret, putting the interests of big chemical companies ahead of the health and welfare of Canadians.

Canadians have the right to know this is going on. Communities near experimental sites have the right to know. Farmers who have fields nearby have the right to know.

The short-term effects on other plants from accidental cross-pollination is potentially disastrous. The long-term effects of eating genetically altered crops developed to work with only specific pesticides is still unknown.

These experiments should have undergone a full environmental assessment complete with public hearings. An independent review board should be set up to oversee all test applications from Agriculture Canada. In addition, the government should set up a royal commission to determine the long-term impacts and repercussions of genetic bio-engineering.

RAILWAY CROSSING SAFETY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in July of this year, 12 year old Phillip French was tragically struck and killed by a train at the CN crossing at Stewiacke, Nova Scotia. This crossing has a long history of accidents resulting from a complex intersection of five roads with a rail line running right down through the middle.

For years the residents of Stewiacke have requested that barrier gates be installed. With this latest fatality, it is clear that these demands are justified and long past due.

The Minister of Transport and his officials have been very receptive to my presentations regarding this dangerous situation and have agreed to consider the information as quickly as possible and arrive at the appropriate decision.

I am now and will continue to urge the minister and his officials to move quickly and approve the request of Stewiacke for barrier gates before yet another tragedy occurs.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward Island potato farmers have been facing a difficult situation since Agriculture Canada informed the United States of the presence of PVY-N in some potato crops.

They are looking for some innovative and positive steps from this federal government to assist them in making the best of this dismal situation.

According to Agra Europe Potato Markets Supplement, this year Moscow will be facing a potato shortage of at least 20 per cent below its need.

I urge the federal government, in an effort to make up for their lack of efficiency in dealing with the PVY-N crisis, to examine the possibility of purchasing, at a competitive rate, the Prince Edward Island potato stock and including it as part of Canada's aid package to the Soviet Union.

This way, Island potato farmers will benefit, Canada's international reputation will be enhanced, and we will be assisting Soviet citizens in this very difficult time for the Soviet Union.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker if a new east-west runway is built at Pearson International Airport, the owners of the new Novatel Hotel might have a few things to say about it.

Four floors of their hotel will have to be removed to accommodate the flight path. There will be literally no room in the inn.

Is the airport encroaching on other land development? Are airport planners lacking in foresight or is Pearson International just running out of room?

My bet is that it is time officials started looking in the direction of Hamilton or Buttonville. It is high time airport officials paid heed to the wise words of their predecessors: "Build a second airport now".

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I stand here today shocked at what I saw in this House last night at 6 p.m. when Conservative members of Parliament performed a complete flip-flop on assisting Canadian farmers.

Late last month at the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture, all members of all parties present voted and passed a motion calling on the government to assist and consider a third line of defence for Canadian farmers for the 1990-91 crop year. Last night the same motion came before the House. Where were the Conservatives? All but one Tory member reversed themselves and voted against the motion.

I am afraid when Tory MPs are forced to face Canadian farmers, they say one thing. But when it comes time to providing action, the only thing farmers can count on from this government is hypocrisy.

ENVIRONMENTAL PARTNERS FUND

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, September marks the end of the second year of operation for the Environmental Partners Fund program of Environment Canada. To date, over 480 environmental projects across the country have been approved. This represents a federal commitment of over $19.3 million to initiatives which are protecting, preserving and enhancing our environment. The program encourages small community groups, the private sector and other levels of government to form partnerships to help solve our environmental problems. Such groups have been able to raise an impressive $60.3 million. Last December, the green plan challenged all Canadians to participate in securing a healthy environment for our future.

• (1410)

In this regard, the Environmental Partners Fund was extended for a further two years and expanded to include community based awareness activities for products which encourage and lead people to further action.

I am proud of the response by responsible Canadians to help resolve our environmental problems.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this government has recently named Toronto department store co-owner Frederick Eaton as High Commissioner to Britain. Of course, Mr. Eaton has been making the annual $1,000 contribution to the Conservative Party to qualify him as a member of the Club 500. His company contributed $81,463 in the 1988 election campaign. His company has also contributed $40,000 to the Conservative Party in the two subsequent years for which returns are public.

Obviously Mr. Eaton is far from being a career diplomat. Besides, if you are born in the right families, six figure jobs are available to you by birthright.

Mr. Eaton is being shuffled off to London. He is certainly more comfortable there than having Eaton's shuffled off to Buffalo to catch up with cross-border shopping.

It remains, however, to be seen if the owner of Harrods will be appointed the next High Commissioner of Britain to Canada.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, next week from October 7 to the 13, we will be celebrating National Family Week. Today's society is not without constraints for the Canadian family. There are economic problems, new values, a growing number of single parent families and more and more young parents ill equiped to succeed in their family life, to name a few.

When you think about it, our Canadian families are in dire need of protection and celebration. This year, the emphasis will be on family environment. This theme, first of a series of four, is designed to strengthen families and improve family life. Furthermore, 1994 has been designated as International Year of the Family, providing us an opportunity to reflect upon the problems and concerns experienced by some families.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, Canadian grain and oilseed and horticulture producers are facing the worst financial crisis in a generation due to the lowest commodity prices in history. These low prices are caused by the international grain trade war between the European Community and the United States.

Although Canada is not responsible for this trade war, Canadian farmers are being destroyed by it. The Canadian government exacerbated the hardship placed on farmers by reducing its farm support programs by $1.3 billion last year. It has exacerbated this situation this year by not providing adequate transitional assistance to a new safety net system for the 1991-92 crop year.

The Standing Committee on Agriculture unanimously called on the government to provide this emergency transitional assistance in a resolution passed August 29, after hearing of the tremendous hardship farm producers have faced this year. The same resolution was voted down by the House of Commons last night because every Conservative MP, with the exception of the chairman of the agriculture committee, shamefully voted against this emergency help for Canadian farmers.

I call on this government to provide this emergency help now, before it is too late.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's separation would certainly necessitate a renegotiation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Because Quebec did not sign the free trade agreement, it derives all of the advantages, but is not directly bound by it. A new free trade agreement would require the agreement of three parties: Quebec, the United States and the new Canada.

In return for signing a new trade agreement with Quebec, the United States would undoubtedly want the elimination of all of the restrictions on American ownership of Quebec businesses, the unlimited right for Americans to bid on Quebec government contracts and perhaps common environmental standards. In return for signing a trade agreement with Quebec, the new Canada would undoubtedly want the right to buy Quebec power at domestic Quebec prices and a say in Quebec's fiscal and monetary policies that impact on the repayment of the present Canada's national debt.

Would it not be ironic if in order to get a trade agreement, Quebec had to hand back more sovereignty than it had gained by separation?

HEALTH

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the people of Prince Edward Island are very concerned about medicare in Canada. The Canada Health Act was put in place to ensure that Canadians across the land receive proper medical attention. In 1986, the government decided to change the funding for medicare in Canada. The National Council of Welfare indicates that by the year 2000, there will be close to $100 million cut from the medicare and post-secondary education budget by this government.

The government has changed the path of medicare. I am afraid we are going to see hospital beds closing and doctors leaving for richer parts of the nation, leaving for better pay and where the bigger dollars are. This is supposed to be a country from sea to sea to sea. If we allow this to happen then there will only be proper medical care for the wealthy in the richer parts of the nation.

GREECE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): This year, Mr. Speaker, Greece will celebrate its 2500th anniversary of democracy, which had its origin in ancient Athens, with a three day celebration beginning tomorrow, September 25.

Announcing details of the celebration, the Speaker of the Greek Parliament, Mr. Athanassios Tsaldaris said: "Democracy is the only regime in European countries today which brought about peace and surpassed blocks and divided walls." He went on to say that "everyone is now turning to parliamentary democracy as the sole institution that ensures the freedom of the individual and enables him to cope better with his problems."

The highlight of the three day celebration will be a special ceremony on Pnyx Hill opposite the Acropolis in Athens where a replica of a marble stela inscribed with the ancient law for the protection of democracy will be installed.

As well, an international philosophy symposium will take place entitled "Greek Democracy and Its Message to Modern Societies".

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am speaking for all members of the House in offering our congratulations to the government and the people of Greece on this historic occasion and as well as my hope that this anniversary will act as a positive omen concerning the future of our country.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, for centuries the right of a man or woman to own property has been at the very heart of democracy. This right protected people from being exploited and from having their wealth taken away without due process of law.

In 1982, Canadians lost the right to own their own homes and be protected against governments when they wanted to expropriate land. The old Canadian Bill of Rights had given us that protection, but the Charter of Rights, which replaced it, was silent on the issue. That was wrong.

For the last nine years, Canadians have been among the only people in the western world without property rights.

This morning it was fulfilling to hear the Prime Minister propose to restore property rights and enshrine them in our country's Charter of Rights.

My congratulations to the government for having the political courage to do what is right. Average, middle class homeowners have sustained a victory out of the new Canadian federation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This morning we heard the Prime Minister say he wants Canada to be a real economic union, and we are happy with that, but he has not backed up these words with real power to make it happen. Either you have an economic union or you do not have one. As the fishermen of Beauséjour say: "Either fish or cut bait."

How can we have a real economic union when up to three provinces and up to half of the Canadian population can opt out of the economic union?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend seems to suggest that because there is a provision for provinces to opt out, that would destroy the concept of an economic union.

Well that, of course, would run counter to the argument that he has been making for 10 years where he provided for an override, the equivalent to opting out, of fundamental rights, where a province could opt out of the fundamental rights without destroying the Constitution in consequence.

The argument that my hon. friend is making is extremely illogical, inconsistent with everything he said. In fact, the provisions clearly strengthen the economic union of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister wants Canada to become an economic union, but when we look at the document he tabled today, the federal government will have less power than the European Community in Brussels. I want to ask the Prime Minister once again: How can he say we will have an economic union in this country when three provinces and a majority of Canadians can opt out of this union?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I beg to differ with what the Leader of the Official Opposition said about Brussels. The two situations are not identical. We must compare them objectively, and we are prepared to do so before the parliamentary committee.

What the document tabled this morning proposes to do is to eliminate the barriers that exist across Canada and make this country an economic union to be reckoned with, by removing as much as possible any obstacles to domestic trade.

This is one of the proposals the Government of Canada will submit to the members of the committee. If this proposal is less than perfect and the hon. member has any suggestions on how it could be improved, he may wish to appear before the parliamentary committee. If his suggestions are an improvement, the members of the committee will consider them, and Canada will benefit.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope and pray that we can make amendments. I would like to go back to the Charter of Rights that the hon. Prime Minister referred to earlier.

He said in this House, and I heard it very clearly, that the Charter of Rights was not worth the paper it was written on because we had the notwithstanding clause. I am happy to note today that he is making the notwithstanding clause stronger than before because under the proposition you will need 60 per cent of the population. The requirement is stronger if you want to use it and it will be reduced to a period of three years. We are happy with that because it will make it more difficult to be used, but we would keep it while the Prime Minister said he wants to scrap it.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if in his own personal view it is the intention of this government to make sure that the existing rights under the charter will be the same with this constitutional proposition.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be no change in individual rights with regard to any matters raised by my friend as a result of these constitutional proposals.

Should my hon. friend find any in a real way, I am sure he would want to draw it to the attention of the commission and it will deal with it.

I never suggested this morning that the document we were tabling was perfect. It is certainly a perfectible document, but there are no circumstances under which we seek to diminish individual rights.

With regard to the notwithstanding clause, my hon. friend I think is in error. What we did this morning was suggest a means whereby the utilization of the notwithstanding clause is made more difficult. I repeat what I have said from the beginning, that I believe that if a constitution were designed to protect individual rights, then obviously any instrument given to a province to override those individual rights was inconsistent with the original objectives in the first place. That has always been my intention, my view of it.

An hon. member: Take it out.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says to take it out.

Mr. Chrétien: Over my dead body.

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the Opposition says over his dead body. I view this as an unacceptble clause, but we want to make it more difficult for people to use.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. The government has just tabled a new proposal for the recognition of Quebec's distinct character in the Constitution. This morning, speaking on behalf of our party, our leader made it clear he was in favour of enshrining Quebec's distinct character in the Constitution. However, we want this to be done in very clear terms so that everyone understands what is meant, both Quebecers and the rest of Canada.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: By doing this, by proposing to enshrine the distinct character in the Charter, does he intend to make the distinct society subject to the Charter or does he intend to give additional powers to Quebec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is all in the text included in the document you received this morning.

In June 1990, all the legal experts concluded that enshrining a provision of this kind in the Canadian Constitution would not have the effect of granting additional powers to a province.

Perhaps I may point out to the hon. member that the distinct society will be mentioned twice in the Constitution: in the Canada clause and in the Charter. Its use will be compatible with the provisions of the Charter.

So, there it is. And I think this reflects the real situation, something my honourable friend has always wanted. It gives Quebec a normal instrument to promote this distinct identity.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, obviously, we will have to ask the minister for clarifications at the earliest opportunity in the parliamentary committee, because the Prime Minister's answer seems to cloud the issue more than explain it and seems to leave it up to the Supreme Court whether additional powers are involved or not.

I do not think that is the way to proceed. If we want to do something positive, let us do so directly, not give something today that could be taken away tomorrow by the Supreme Court, or if no additional power is involved, let us have the honesty to say so clearly. We will return to that tomorrow with the minister responsible.

But I would like to remind the Prime Minister that one of Quebec's most basic demands has been the veto right. Our party's nine proposals recognized the importance of giving Quebec a veto right and the way to do it was by giving a regional veto to all regions.

This morning, the Prime Minister said nothing about this. Did he forget about Quebec's veto?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me answer my hon. friend. I referred to a document released in June and I will read it, because it is an important question.

[English]

"In our opinion, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be interpreted in a manner consistent with the duality, the distinct society clause or the proposed constitutional amendment, but the rights and freedoms guaranteed thereunder are not infringed or denied by the application of the clause. They continue to be guaranteed subject only to the reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

It is signed by six of Canada's most outstanding constitutional lawyers and accepted last year by all parties.

[Translation]

Now I think that is quite a clear answer to my friend's first question.

As for the veto right, my friend spoke about Quebec's veto right—at least, I think so. Is that right?

Mr. Ouellet: That is what I am asking you!

Mr. Mulroney: I did not forget, but is my friend talking about a veto right for Quebec? Yes, all right. Because Quebec's veto right was lost by the Parti Québécois in 1982 when they gave up Quebec's traditional veto. It was recovered in the Meech Lake Accord under the amending formula.

If you look at the document tabled this morning, you will see that after the 7/50 provisions, the amending formula will apply. The reason the concept of a regional veto, which is a defensible proposal, was not accepted is that the Premier of Alberta, for example, said outright that his province would also demand a veto, not just Ontario.

[English]

But Alberta was entitled to have its own veto, not just a regional veto. If anyone was going to get a veto, Alberta was going to get a veto as were the other provinces. We agree with that because we agree with that concept of equality.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This morning in the constitutional document, the Prime Minister outlined clearly the Conservative Party's perspective of an economy for Canada, moving into the future.

The document talked about financial institutions and fiscal control. It talked about the rights of capital, but it was silent on the initiatives and a proactive approach on employment and on regional inequality. A nation is about more than just the economy, it is about facilitating Canadian families and their future.

• (1430)

The Prime Minister has articulated an economic agenda. Surely, it is equally important to articulate a people agenda.

Will the Prime Minister seriously consider a social charter which would give substance and form to the inherent rights of Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to a proactive approach. Indeed, she is quite right. In terms of the economy, as I indicated this morning, one cannot segregate developments in the economy from considerations in the Constitution.

That is why I know that she will be well pleased to learn that interest rates have dropped since the budget by almost two percentage points in March. Growth has accelerated to something in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent for the last quarter and inflation next year, if we keep on track, may be down to 3 per cent. That is extremely good news for the kinds of objectives being sought by my hon. friend, namely, job creation and social justice.

With regard to the concept of a social charter which was put forward by the premier of Ontario, I suppose this is something that the committee itself would want to examine to see if it might be advantageous to Canadians in the long term. I do not know. I have not examined his proposals in great detail, but I know that Premier Rae proposes to play a constructive and helpful role in our national debate, and I look forward to his participation and that of my hon. friend.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this round of constitutional discussion is about the economy, it is about the future of Canada's social programs. This party and myself would like to see us, as a nation, also say that we have a goal of full employment and that our institutions are going to be directed to that end, as well as the other important issues discussed in this proposal.

Among the proposals put forward today was that much of our economic decision-making could be turned over to a council of the federation. Obviously, it is an idea that has to be further explored, because, as is stated in the proposal, it could be taking fundamental economic decisions away from this House and institutionalizing them in an institutionalized back room if we are not careful.

Will the Prime Minister commit to an open process for any economic change that includes full participation of the provinces, the territories as voting members and the aboriginal people who are, of course, acknowledged in his proposals as having self-government in the future?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the proposal with regard to a council of the federation would not have to do with an agency dealing with, as I think the Leader of the New Democratic Party said, most of our economic decisions. What it would focus upon, however, is that wide range of very important areas where there is either no agreement between federal and provincial governments, or where there have been agreements in principle that have not been brought into practice, as is the case with too much of what has happened with regard to the elimination of trade barriers and other things.

I think is a very interesting, important new proposal. I hope it will be looked at seriously by the committee. Certainly, we intend to make it as open as possible, because we think that one of the things we have to do here is open up the budget processes of federal and provincial governments. Open up the processes of federal-provincial consultation, involving both what we are doing and what the provinces are doing and try by the reforms we are proposing to this House and to the Senate, to make these institutions far more accessible to and far more representative of the people of Canada. That kind of openness is exactly what we are seeking.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. As I said earlier, our institutions must have a broad enough mandate. About the proposal concerning the mandate of the Bank of Canada, stated simply as to achieve and preserve price stability, it seems to me that it is to take a very narrow view, Mr. Speaker. The Bank's mandate should be much broader to curb these outrageously high unemployment rates in Montreal, Cap-Breton and elsewhere in Canada. It should also be designed to make sure that full employment is possible and that the needs of farmers and small businesses are met.

Is the government willing to broaden this mandate?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we did propose major changes regarding the Bank. But if the leader of the New Democratic Party has proposals to make, she will have the opportunity of doing so before the Committee. I think it is very important to remind the specific purpose of a central bank in a system such as ours. There is a problem at present: it is not as open as it should be to the provinces and others groups involved who are affected by the decisions the Governor makes.

That is why we proposed some major changes. For the first time, the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada will be subject to the ratification of an elected Senate. That will give great power to the regions. As far as other groups are concerned, there will also be changes which could require much more extensive consultations at the regional level regarding the Governor of the Bank's policies.

BANK OF CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. In the document tabled today, the government says it intends to amend the existing law to limit the mandate of the Bank of Canada to enhancing and preserving price stability.

I ask the minister, why does the government want to change the existing law to remove the present requirement that the Bank of Canada concern itself with trade, production and employment and not just price stability and inflation? Why is the government saying to the people of Canada that its constitutional view of the impact of the Bank of Canada is that it just doesn't care when it comes to jobs?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we want to take this matter to committee where things can be discussed in some detail is so that misunderstandings, I am sure innocent misunderstandings such as that expressed by my colleague, will not prevail.

We are making proposals with regard to the bank which have to do with making clear what its central purpose is, which have to do with ensuring a greater harmonization between fiscal and monetary policy. We are making other proposals that will try to create by consensus a situation in the country where the fiscal policy of provinces and the fiscal policy of the national government follow the same course.

If the hon. member has other improvements to suggest, we will welcome his participation in the committee.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to take a look at his own document. It says that the "Government of Canada proposes to amend the Bank of Canada Act to make it clear that the mandate of the bank is to achieve and preserve price stability".

Then, I ask him to look at the preamble of the Bank of Canada Act which says that the bank is supposed to concern itself with "the general level of production, trade, prices and employment".

The minister has failed to give any explanation as to why it wants to limit the mandate of the bank so that it will not be able to concern itself with jobs.

I ask the minister to give a clear answer. If he wants to take time to familiarize himself with his own document, we will be happy to let him do that.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Thanks, Herb. I appreciate these gentlemanly exchanges across the floor of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Let me be very clear. We are not seeking to limit the role of the bank. What we are trying to do is clarify that role. That will be made clearer when my colleague, the Minister of Finance, lays before a meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers a background document on the matter.

We are also trying to undertake other changes with respect to the functioning of the bank that will cause it to be more acceptable to and more reflective of concerns in the country. Those are changes that are long overdue. We hope that we will have the support of the hon. member and his party in achieving them, and if they have other suggestions for improvement, we will certainly welcome them.

SKILLED LABOUR

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important elements of global competitiveness is the availability of a skilled labour force. At a time when a company like Siemens Electric is questioning Canada's ability to supply skilled workers to meet its future labour demand of 9,000 new jobs, I would like to ask the Prime Minister what measures this government has taken to guarantee that Siemens Electric Limited will have the skilled labour it requires.

• (1440)

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, you can see the amount of skilled labour we have on this side of the House. We have any number of people prepared to answer that question.

One of the things we are doing, of course, in the whole competitiveness agenda is to look at ways in which the educational system might be more amenable to having the kind of programs that will provide the people needed for that company.

As well, in terms of some of the engineering groups and the science groups and the technician groups, we have already taken steps to benefit those groups. We have more on the board and we will take them.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Clearly, the minister does not understand the gravity of the issue. If this government's training strategy is so effective, I ask the minister why a company such as Siemens Electric, which is a world leader in the field of electronics, would express major concerns and doubts about Canada's ability to supply skilled workers.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, that doubt is being expressed in every one of the industrialized nations because we all face the same problem. We do not have enough people going into the technical streams either in our technical colleges or in our universities. That is why many of the government programs are designed to encourage students to move into those sectors.

MEME BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last night 200 angry women met in Montreal to share their experiences with breast implants. We heard new anecdotal evidence of the debilitating secondary effects many women face from implants.

Now that Surgitek, the manufacturer of the Meme implant has taken all of its breast products off the market, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare finally undertake a judicial inquiry into why his department has not even now put a stop to this medical experimentation on Canadian women?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I met this summer with the member for Mission–Coquitlam and other women and I think it was clear at that time, and is still clear that as far as the health of women is concerned, we have done what was possible to do in light of the information which was provided to the department and myself.

In terms of the regulation itself, she knows very well that I asked the department to report to me in terms of the way the Meme breast implant was grandfathered in 1982.

The situation now is that I am waiting for the report in terms of regulation, but it is very delicate, Mr. Speaker, to refer in terms of health if there is no more information than my colleague had this summer.

I repeat, if there is any information that we do not have in the department which we can consider for review at another time, we will do that, but in light of the information we have, I repeat what I said: everything is being dealt with in the way it should be by the department, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. These women cannot afford to wait. This is a serious problem. The minister's response is contrary to past precedents of this government. It is contrary to logic and it is cruel.

The question which I wish to pose to this minister is the following. How can he reconcile his response that we have just heard, knowing full well that this government spent millions of dollars to help thousands of homeowners take urea formaldehyde out of their homes, but will not spend one red cent to have women take these implants out of their bodies? How does he reconcile that?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member for Chambly knows very well that if there is anything against the company and if there is any fault at the moment where there was a breast implant and the product was not what it should be—it has been done by a woman from Vancouver. She went to court and asked for a decision.

The member asks me why we do not put up the money. We are talking about the health of women with breast implants. The information we have so far is that the health question has been considered by the department in buying, and withdrawing the product from the market. It has been done in the way that it should be.

If those two members have any information in terms of health, they can provide it to the department or any scientist,, which could change the decision already made, then for God's sake they should give the information to the department.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence, perhaps his Minister of State or the Prime Minister himself can answer.

Given that the survival of agriculture, especially for joint plans in Quebec such as the one for the dairy industry, is based on the principle that production costs will be taken into account and farmers will have a reasonable income, can the Minister or the Prime Minister assure farmers that this essential criterion will always be maintained for our farmers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend wants to know whether there is anything in the proposals tabled this morning to—If the question is whether we will maintain our previous programs in spite of the document tabled this morning, the answer is yes.

My hon. friend from Papineau, who is also an expert on agriculture, tells me that this issue is mainly up to GATT. That being so, I would be pleased to answer a supplementary.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec farmers' union, the UPA, is very concerned about their future because the Minister of Agriculture is always talking about productivity without considering production costs. That concerns them and they would like to have an answer about it.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, productivity applies to everyone.

But mentioning productivity in no way undermines the ability of the UPA or its members to meet the competition that they face now. Nothing was said or done to keep farmers in Quebec or elsewhere from maintaining their production. The Canadian government will try to find new markets for them.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The worst ice conditions in history have completely wiped out the fishery in Labrador.

The minister's own industrial adjustment committee, which wrote the minister this month says two things: first of all, that Labrador has been worse hit than any other area; second, that there is a very small window of opportunity to help those people as they never needed help before.

Will the minister agree to the recommendation of his industrial adjustment committee and set up an aid program so that work programs can begin by October 1? Will he give that undertaking today?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the situation and the question describing it today are not new, because year after year, some coasts remain icebound a little longer than would be desirable.

Several programs and million of dollars have been made available to fishermen to deal with these situations.

Last year we announced special funding. Through a partnership established with the provinces and the private sector, we intend to set up a strategy to help fishermen who need assistance. In any case, the department's own programs are available to fishermen, and that is what we are working on.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, let me make it clear to the government that this is not an ordinary year.

These are the worst ice conditions in living memory. This is not an ordinary year. Is the government going to help those people or not? Aid delayed is aid denied. If it is not done this week, do not bother because we cannot take the aid after this. Do it this week.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): I can only repeat to the hon. member that every attempt is being made in co-operation with the provinces and the various parties concerned so as to provide an appropriate response as quickly as possible, and we are working on a number of permanent solutions.

PORCUPINE CARIBOU

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I am sure that the minister is aware that the 180,000 caribou in the Porcupine herd migrate across the Northwest Territories and Yukon to calve on the Alaskan coastal plain known as the 1002 lands.

Since the survival of this herd will be severely compromised by the proposed development of gas and oil in this unique and irreplaceable caribou maternity zone, will the minister tell us what steps she has taken to encourage the Prime Minister to raise the urgency of protecting this area from industrial development with President Bush, since it is at that level that this proposal will have to be stopped?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we do have concerns about the matter that the hon. member raised.

They have been raised with the United States. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, and I have had discussions about this and the implications for Canada and the U.S., as well as with the Minister of the Environment.

We have raised this with the United States, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister.

Since President Bush has included the development of the 1002 lands in his energy proposal for the United States, will the Prime Minister today publicly call upon President Bush not to proceed with developments of gas and oil on the 1002 lands, because it would contravene both the spirit and the letter of the 1987 agreement signed between the Prime Minister and his good friend in the White House.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have called on the United States to designate the coastal plain as a wilderness area.

We are concerned about protecting the sensitive habitat of wildlife there, and we are also concerned about the economic livelihood and the traditional culture of people who live in the region.

I do not know just when the oil leasing and the refuge will reach the floor of either the House or the Senate, but our embassy is following developments very closely. We are in touch with them and we are making strong representations.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State regarding the use of our flag, our national symbol, to promote our country.

Thousands of Canadians and businesses use the maple leaf to foster tourism, trade, identity and unity—yes, unity—but guess what. There is an official in the protocol directorate of the secretary's department that appears to be harassing and indeed sometimes threatening legal action against companies which use their flag.

It is ridiculous. It is unbelievable.

Mr. Speaker, through you to the minister: What is wrong? Why is it illegal for Canadian business to use the Canadian flag to urge Canadians to shop in Canada, to support the Canadian economy and to promote the tourism industry in Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to state that we administer section 9 of the Trade Marks Act.

The purpose of that section in the Trade Marks Act is to prevent people from misrepresentation or misleading advertising, using the symbols of Canada.

After these particular cases that my colleague has raised were brought to my attention, I asked officials to review all outstanding cases and in the two cases that were mentioned in the media recently, that of Banff Lifts Limited and Superstore, I had my office personally contact the companies to say that it was totally proper for them to use the flag, encouraged them to do so, and assured them they would have a letter signed by myself before the end of the week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. With the announcement last week by the Minister of National Defence concerning the need to cut out excess infrastructure within the Canadian Armed Forces, does this mean that the $36 million naval reserve facility announced in July will now not be built?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the task force that is to develop criteria for restructuring the Canadian forces will not extend its activities to existing programs.

[English]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Does this mean the minister will put the new naval reserve facility on hold until his committee has reviewed all the excess infrastructure to see if there is not some place like CFB Cornwallis for this?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I may refer the hon. member to my previous answer.

ILLICIT DRUGS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

In metro Toronto illicit drugs are of great concern to parents. Today there are reports of the takeover by drug dealers of yet another neighbourhood near Bloor and Lansdowne. Repeatedly the federal government has been asked by Toronto metro council and metro police to return a share of funds seized by the RCMP in drug arrests. This money could be returned to metro authorities for education, crime prevention, rehabilitation programs, and anti-drug enforcement activities.

I ask the Solicitor General whether he will act on such proposals in support of the fight against illicit drugs on the streets and in the schools in urban Canada.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): I welcome the interest of my hon. friend in this issue. I think every member of the House is interested in the issue.

This morning I met with Governor Martinez of the United States, the drug enforcement officer there, and we discussed several issues. My friend makes a valid point. In fact, we are trying to improve our efforts on seizure of assets and the transfer from seizure to forfeiture. The point has been made by various police officials and mayors around the country that they would like to have some of the funds returned for expenses. I think that is a valid point, and I intend to look into it.

As to whether or not we would go so far as to look into drug programs, I am not sure we are at that point, but we are looking at the possibility of returning funds spent on investigations to the various jurisdictions.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): I would like to thank the Solicitor General for his reply and ask him what additional measures he envisages in the fight against illicit drugs so as to bring to an end this very disturbing and growing pattern across the nation.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the Prime Minister has been taking a lead on this issue.

Yesterday in Montreal he made reference to the improved co-operation among the various authorities we have, the RCMP, National Defence, the Coast Guard, and customs, in the effort to crack down on this very serious problem. I would also point out to my friend that the national drug strategy which the Prime Minister initiated is a five-year preoccupation. It expires in 1992 and is currently being reviewed to see what improvements we can make to it.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, part of the proposed constitutional changes tabled this morning by our Prime Minister dealt with restoring Canadians' right to own private property.

My question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. If enshrined in the Constitution, exactly what impact would this right have on the lives of individual Canadians on main street in my riding?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is early to answer that question. The matter will have to be looked at in the committee. There will be legal drafts brought forward at the committee stage. I think that various implications, including for some provinces and including for women who have concerns about the property right and other matters, would have to be taken into account.

We in proposing this are confident that we can find legal language which will take account of those concerns and allow us to place in the charter the right to property in a way that will be effective on main street.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is about the social charter idea.

In the proposal tabled in the House this morning there is nothing on a social charter. I wonder if the minister can explain to the House precisely why he failed to propose in the paper this morning the willingness to put in the Constitution of Canada a guarantee for medical care, education, clean environment, housing and a job for ordinary Canadians when these have become in a modern society pretty fundamental rights of citizenship.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would want to look at the specific references in the Canada clause. He would also want to consult members of his own party, the party leader in British Columbia Mr. Harcourt, being one of them who has expressed concerns about handing over to the courts the very substantial power that would be involved in a social charter.

I have no doubt that that matter, as others that are divisive in various parties, will be discussed within the NDP and that when the hon. member takes his usual active and constructive role in the committee he will have some proposals to put forward.

If we think something workable is put forward, we are certainly prepared to look at it, although I would not want that answer to be interpreted as suggesting that we are looking to the inclusion of a charter of the kind that was proposed by the premier of Ontario. If there is something in that line that can be made acceptable, I am sure the committee will be prepared to consider it.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister did not deliberately mislead the House. The premier of Ontario was not suggesting a social charter where the Supreme Court was the final arbitrator. There are other mechanisms to enforce the social charter.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. In light of the fact that we have had some cutbacks recently in federal government funding—and I am talking about the rate of increase in funding for post-secondary education, medical care, welfare, and indeed some cutbacks at the provincial level in some provinces during a recession when people need it most—I would like to ask the minister: without a social charter in the Constitution, what guarantees will the people of this country have that these important social programs will remain universal, affordable and accessible to all Canadians regardless of where we may live?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the most effective guarantees, probably the most effective guarantee in the real world, is to have a growing Canadian economy able to compete in the world. That is one of the reasons we have proposed an economic union proposal in our document.

I was rather surprised this morning to hear his leader raise some questions about the idea of the economic union, because I do not think one can be taken seriously about social issues unless one is prepared to take the economic decisions and put in place the economic mechanisms which let us have the wealth that fund the social programs this country has been so proud of.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and the amendment of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has two minutes left. I ask for the collaboration of all hon. members—— so that we can hear the end of the hon. member's speech.

[Translation]

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, when my speech was interrupted prior to Question Period, I was just talking about the difficulty that the CAP under Bill C-32 was going to cause for children.

I point out once again that while Canada is one of the wealthiest nations in the world there are close to one million children living in poverty. We are second only to the United States in the level of child poverty in the industrialized world. It appears that these children are being asked to pay for the loopholes that are offered big corporations.

I say that because it appears that over the last few years profitable corporations in Canada have increasingly being paying less and less of their share, and yet this government would have us believe that in fact it is our social programs that are causing us to have this massive deficit and debt that we have.

I point out that the Statistics Canada figures in April show that taxes had increased the most from 1988 to 1989 for those on the second lowest rung of the income ladder, an increase of 1.1 per cent, while at the same time those in the highest income quintile saw taxes rise only .9 per cent and those in the second highest quintile, .3 per cent.

I do not know whether that is what the government speaks of when it says in the document Shaping Canada's Future Together that I referred to earlier, in the Canada clause, that it will make a commitment to the well-being of all Canadians. It seems to me that the commitment that this government has made over the last seven years has been a commitment to fill the pockets of those who are most able to afford to pay their share and take from the pockets of those who are unable to speak for themselves.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to enter the debate on Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

This act proposes to extend the 5 per cent ceiling on the rate of growth in transfers to the Canada Assistance Plan from two years to five years. This cap is a cap on a cap considering the fact that not too long ago, in the earlier nineties, Bill C-69 was presented to the House on June 12, 1990. It was the first cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, and we are now looking at a bill, Bill C-32, which is a further cap on this cap.

The cap applies only to the provinces which do not receive the equalization payments. At present these provinces are British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. As a member from Ontario and specifically northern Ontario, a region that has high unemployment, a region that has a cycle and troughs of high unemployment, low unemployment, economic boom and bust, this particular piece of legislation will be very detrimental to the well-being of the citizens of Kenora—Rainy River.

I think it is important to take a look at this in its proper context. The government wishes in its propaganda and information put out to the public to suggest that what it is doing is perfectly civilized because in essence the three provinces that it is dealing with are the three richest provinces.

Let us take a look at it a lot closer and look at the amount of dollars that the government is funnelling from the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. That amount is $2.135 billion of federal transfers over the five-year period. That amount as far as Ontarians are concerned is a very conservative estimate.

The present Government of Ontario has suggested that this year alone it suspects that it will cost it about $1 billion to replace the dollars that have been held back by the federal government because of this cap under Bill C-69 and now the cap on the cap under Bill C-32. I am sure it will be passed because of what the government is proposing to do with the usual boot. It will stop debate, force us to go as quickly as we can and allow this bill to be passed by the House of Commons and the Senate in a very short period.

What is most interesting about this whole debate is that 54 per cent of the poorest Canadians are the ones who live below the poverty line, who are on welfare already and who are unemployed. There are those who cannot seem to help themselves because they are disabled or are seniors who through no fault of their own are not able to work and are relying on the governments to look after them as we have done in the past. It think it is important to remember that 54 per cent of all Canadians in those categories are affected by this piece of legislation.

I think it is important for our constituents to know exactly what does the Canadian Assistance Plan do and what does it provide for our poorest Canadians. It provides, very succinctly, basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies. That part of the Canadian Assistance Plan is better known as the welfare side of it.

It also supplies to those Canadians who may not fall within the welfare roles but are in such a situation where they may not be able to provide dental care, and this social assistance will do that. It will provide essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, and subsidized child care for low income families.

As we can see, this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-32, will have a tremendous impact on the abilities of our poorest people in Ontario, our poorest people in Alberta and our poorest people in British Columbia to be able to help themselves with the very basic necessities, to pick themselves up by the bootstraps and try to get out of that continual cycle of poverty which we as a caring and loving society are trying to help them with.

There is also another strong implication of this particular legislation. As was mentioned by myself and others in this House when we debated Bill C-69, we believe very strongly—and I know most Canadians involved in the social assistance areas believe it—that this is a threat to the universality programs which previous governments in previous years have tried to put in place, that social safety net that we believe so strongly is necessary in order for Canadians to feel that the particular society we live in has not given up on them, is not that mean and cruel society of other countries in the world, but in essence is a society prepared to look after its own and is prepared to pay for it out of its taxes and out of its own pockets.

I want to put in context where this particular program came from. There is a particular belief by a lot of people in this country that the New Democratic Party is the only party that believes in social programs, the only party that is quite prepared to stand up for the little guy when he has difficulty in looking after himself. I want to speak to that for a moment and put to rest the myth that it is the party that has done what is necessary for the poor of this country.

I want to talk specifically about the war on poverty which began in earnest in the mid-1960s. Under the then Prime Minister, Lester B. Pearson, the government passed a few major pieces of legislation. That particular government, as we all know, was a Liberal government. That government was the government that put in place the medical care insurance plan, the Canada Pension Plan that we as Canadians are all so proud of, a guaranteed income supplement for pensioners who were having difficulty making ends meet on the meagre Canada Pension Plan, and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Those four initiatives in the mid-1960s were part of a process that the then Liberal government went into to try and put in the social contract that we hear so much about. That social contract was put in place to allow Canadians to feel comfortable, that if times get difficult, like the world recession we went through in the early 1980s in which there was massive unemployment, there would be a tremendous rise in the social assistance program.

The Canada Assistance Plan rose by almost 12 per cent in those years of high unemployment and massive world recession. Did the government of the day say it had to cut this particular program down because of the people who are using it, that it simply could not allow that to go past a certain percentage point? This government across the way seems to believe that anything over 5 per cent is not acceptable.

No, we did not do that. We worked as hard as we could to try and help those Canadians to help themselves. We got through that particular recession because of that. We have now broken the contract. It has been 25 years since the enactment of this Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, which was heralded as a model of federal—provincial co-operation.

I want to emphasize to members across the way that in order for this federation of ours to work, co-operation must be a two-way street. The provinces will co-operate with the federal government if it does not do things by decree arbitrarily. I hope it will understand that this particular move has done nothing to help all of us, as Canadians, to co-operate to make this country of ours work more effectively. All the constitutional changes in the world will not work unless we have that co-operation that is necessary. A measure like Bill C-32 is not going to help that whole process one little bit.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to stand here in this House today to speak on the bill before us, Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

When I say I am pleased to stand here, I am displeased at the same time because such a regressive bill is something this country does not need, particularly the three provinces that are going to be most seriously affected.

Through this legislation the government will cap the Canada Assistance Plan transfers to three provinces: Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. According to the government's own estimates, the three affected provinces will lose $2.135 billion in federal transfers over the five-year period through 1995 to 1996.

The affected provinces estimate the loss to be much higher. Ontario, for example, believes that the legislation will cost it $1 billion alone in this 1991 year.

As we know, the Canada Assistance Plan was enacted in 1966 to assist and encourage the development and expansion of social assistance and welfare services throughout Canada.

• (1520)

Under the plan the federal government agreed to share fifty-fifty the costs incurred by provinces and municipalities in providing social assistance and welfare services to needy Canadians.

This is a mandatory program. It is the responsibility of the federal government. It is the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities to see that everyone in this country has a roof over their head, food on their table and is able to participate as a normal citizen.

Unlike other income maintenance programs, which establish conditions for eligibility, social assistance is the program of last resort. Once eligibility and entitlement have been determined, according to provincial legislation, the provincial or municipal agency delivering this program cannot refuse. It cannot refuse to provide that assistance and this government is cutting back on that money.

In other words, the government is refusing to provide the adequate basic services to people in this country who are in dire need. The primary objective of the plan is twofold: to support the provinces in the extension of adequate assistance for persons in need—and this is what the government is pulling back on—and to support the provinces in the delivery of welfare services fashioned to lessen or eradicate the effects of such social afflictions as poverty, child neglect or dependence on social assistance.

CAP has in essence created the foundation upon which Canada's social security system has been built, a system that has contributed to the unity of this country by fostering equality of regions and equality of people.

Recipients included under the Canada Assistance Plan are people in homes for special care, homes for the aged, nursing homes, hostels for transients, child care institutions, homes for unmarried mothers and many others. In areas of health care, in areas of child welfare, in areas of welfare service, it is a known fact, not only in this country but in all countries around the world, that children from homes who are provided welfare have a much higher rate of not going to university, not carrying on their education, of health care problems and many other problems.

These are the people who are going to be suffering. These are the most vulnerable people of our society. The assistance they receive comes in the form of dental care, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, social assistance when they are unable to find a job.

The provinces affected by this legislation, which are Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, are the only provinces that today do not receive federal equalization payments from the Government of Canada. In other words, the Government of Canada calls these three provinces the have provinces.

As of March 1990 half of the poor families of Canada, 54 per cent of all welfare recipients under CAP, were living in Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. When we should be looking for ways to get these people off of social assistance, we are having to stand here today and debate whether those who are in need will be able to get social assistance. I find it absolutely ludicrous.

The government again is failing to realize that at this time of recession people are already suffering. Interest rates remain high, the Canadian dollar remains high, unemployment remains unacceptably high with the end not in sight for some time. Unprecedented levels of bankruptcy, especially in this province of Ontario, exist in this country, and there have been permanent losses of thousands of jobs in the manufacturing sector in Ontario. All of the above crises are happening right here. They are right here at home.

The government says: "Don't worry about the CAP. It only affects the three richest or have provinces". This province, in which I live, could very well become one of the have not provinces.

I would like to know who is going to support it, and who is going to support 50 per cent of the welfare recipients in this province. When will this government wake up and realize that there are no more have provinces because of its own policies?

In the 1990 budget the government announced that growth in CAP transfers was to be limited to 5 per cent for Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario in the fiscal years of 1990–91 and 1991–92.

In the 1991 budget the government extended the ceiling on these three provinces. It capped transfers for three more years through the fiscal years of 1994 and 1995. After that, the government assumes that CAP expenditures will grow roughly in line with increases in the Gross National Product.

The federal government is abrogating its moral responsibility to disadvantaged Canadians. The federal government says it will save $2.4 billion. It will save $2.4 billion on the backs of the needy. It is unconscionable. I do not understand it.

Will this money go to debt reduction? Why is debt reduction the responsibility of those people who are on low income, or those people who are not able to provide for themselves? I have to give the government, certainly, a failing grade on that point.

By its action the government is continuing its agenda of ftransferring the burden of the national debt and the federal deficit reduction on to the backs of the provinces and municipalities. This is abrogating the responsibility. It is a must; the provinces have to provide that. They cannot back out of it, and yet the federal government is certainly backing out of it.

We on this side of the House do not support this government's measures that transfer the burden of the national debt and the federal deficit reduction on to the backs of poor Canadians. We do not support it in that.

A Supreme Court judgment may have given the government the legal right to cut welfare transfers to the provinces, but it did not provide the government with the moral right to abandon its responsibility to poor and disadvantaged Canadians.

It also appears that the current amendment violates the spirit of federal–provincial co–operation which has marked the 24–year history of CAP. This is the first time in the history of CAP that the federal government has acted unilaterally to change its provisions.

In abrogating its commitment to contribute equally with the provinces to the alleviation and prevention of poverty, the federal government is throwing out that sacred trust of Canada's social programs.

CAP is the fundamental and minimum element of Canada's social safety net. Again, as I said, I am pleased to stand here. I am very displeased with this government. I would dearly hope that it could reconsider its actions and recognize the importance of maintaining that contribution, that payment to the provinces and to the municipalities.

It is the government's responsibility. It is my responsibility as a legislator, and it really grieves me that it has taken this action.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments to participate in this debate because I think there is a need to put on the record some of the concerns many members would share with me that they picked up over the last few months working in their ridings.

Part of the problem is that government, in a real broad sense of the word, has changed. There may well have been a time when a government could express a political philosophy and kind of live its parliamentary life in splendid isolation. The people it governed did not really know what kind of a lifestyle the members would lead, what Parliament was up to and all the little things that governments do.

In a modern age, people see the day–by–day occurrences of life in Parliament, of life in government, of how governments spend their money. The newspapers are full of accounts of massive expenditures that do not work and of large amounts of money that have been spent on projects that never will function.

They see, for example, the way a cabinet minister carries out his or her duties. Someone stands in this Chamber and preaches restraint and then goes outside and gets into a limousine that has a driver, and the people of Canada see that. Perhaps they should not be making their judgments in this way, but they do. They do not have an understanding of what is meant inside the Chamber when someone preaches restraint but outside takes a limousine and a driver to the airport, and flies first class to some great meeting somewhere else in the world. They see that in a much different light than members of Parliament would and they see it in very hard and critical terms.

Perhaps they knew that governments across the board at all levels had frankly said: "We cannot afford to do things in the same way as we always have and so we will not have any more great conferences. We will not fly deputy ministers around the world to learn how to govern. We will not do a great many things that this government has, on the record, reportedly done."

Perhaps they did not know that the people who are governing this country are, by and large, people who represent the wealthier class. Perhaps they did not see on their income tax returns and then in talking to people in their own community that most people who have an income now, and not necessarily an upper income but a substantial income, have options instead of paying their income tax and, of course, they exercise those options. They read about how to avoid paying taxes and they pay people to give them financial advice on how to defer their taxation.

It is clearly understood among people all across Canada now that one becomes rather stupid if one gets caught in the taxation net. So what you find out is that people who have a take home pay cheque with taxes deducted at source are people who are carrying the tax load in this country. They look around them in their own community and they have knowledge of those who pay no taxes. They understand that is unfair. So when this government brings forward this type of legislation, they question whether or not it is sincere in what it is doing. Of course, the test with any kind of legislation is not whether it fits into an ideology, whether it fits into a political philosophy, but whether or not it responds to the reality of the day.

I would put to you, Mr. Speaker, that in my own province of Ontario it does not, because Ontario is going through what some would call a recession, but I think is, in truth, a restructuring of its economic base. A recession, in my mind, would be a decline in buying power. People do not buy the cars people in Oshawa build, perhaps not as quickly or as often. But a restructuring means that some of the plants that used to supply parts for that auto plant in Oshawa do not exist any more. You cannot get recalled to a job that has been moved to Alabama. That factory is not there in Ashburn any more, it is gone.

There are a number of people all across Ontario who face the same thing. This is not just a downturn in our economy, it is a restructuring of the whole fibre of our industrial base in Ontario. Oddly enough, it will not be this government which feels the pinch as directly as municipal governments. Although it would be a theory, it is true that the Canada Assistance Plan, for example, serves several functions, but when you get down to the municipal level what you find out is that the funding may come down a tunnel and the program may be designed to fit specific needs, but in practice the money is necessary. What we are finding in Ontario politics now at the municipal level is that people at a council are saying: "We have had a 50 per cent or 60 per cent jump in the welfare case load in our community."

Now we have to find some money because there is a law on the books that says we must provide these kind of assistance programs. The money is not forthcoming from the federal government or the provincial government because those have been budgetary matters decided some time ago. It is now in the court of the municipality. What they are doing is making the hard choices they have to make. Although it is a theory, it has nothing to do with the Canada Assistance Plan, but their legal obligations must be carried out and so they must delay expenditures for other things like streets, roads, arenas, libraries, schools and all of those other expenditures to find their percentage of this funding program.

I think part of what is wrong with this bill and is reflected across Canada now is that people would understand if this government all of a sudden said: "Well, we really are under a restraint program and there will be no more use of consultants anywhere in the Government of Canada for a whole year." The people would then say: "Boy, it must be serious because consultants, by and large, turn out to be their friends and they turn out to get rather large and handsome contracts for doing work for the government. So it must be serious if they are turning down their friends.", or if the Government of Canada said: "Well, there will be no more big sponsored conferences by the federal government for a year and a half. You can have your conferences but somebody else has to sponsor them." Or, mercy me, they could stop their massive advertising campaigns and say, for example: "We would be happy to supply you. We have lots of print material that you can get in all the constituency offices of the members, but we are not going to do any television spots promoting this".

I am reminded that the advertising programs of the government are sometimes not quite as effective as it would like them to be.

A woman called me at home this summer and asked me: "What is this tax on student loans"? I asked: "What tax?" I read the budget and it was not in there. I get all kinds of mail about new government programs, new taxes and all that kind of stuff. I have not seen any of that. I have called both offices and they have no information on that. I called our critic. No information there. We called the Library and there was no information there. Why did the Government of Canada see fit to put a tax on student loans and did not bother to tell anybody until it began to apply the tax? If the purpose of the exercise is to inform the public, this seems to be one example, at least, of where it chose not to inform the public.

What is wrong here is that the concept of what the government is trying to do does not fit into the reality of the day. There is nobody here who could not give you chapter and verse on government waste, I am sure. There is probably nobody left in the country who could not do that.

There is nobody in the country who is afraid of competition. The problem really is that competition and lectures on the values of competition usually come from those who no longer compete. When you are in the trenches, when you are struggling for a job and when you are trying to compete in the workplace, it is not exactly a pleasant experience. It only becomes one after you leave that particular venue and you occupy some higher place.

I do not think the people of Canada need lectures on restraint any more. I do not think they need this kind of simplistic legislation any more. What they need is a government that has some sense of what it is like to be employed anywhere in Canada in this day and age. What is necessary is a government to have some sensitivity that the province of Ontario is going through a massive restructuring of its economic base and that is hurting. That pain is beginning to be translated into municipal budgets. The provincial budget of last spring was certainly an expression of that.

Ontario is, perhaps, one good example of a province that is trying to be a little bit creative about social assistance programs, to provide a little more flexibility and to provide something a little more positive than a welfare cheque. But it is caught now because it is trying to put those changes into effect in the middle of a massive restructuring of its economy with a downturn to boot. It is caught in a very dangerous position.

I believe the Government of Canada ought to rethink this program. This program does not apply to this time and this place in this nation. It is quite wrong-headed.

The federal government cannot lecture the current government in Ontario for running up substantial debts when it has on the books the laws that make the government run up those debts. The government in Ontario is simply trying to buffer a little bit, as much as it can, those municipalities and those school boards and it is struggling to do that.

I would prefer to see this government drop this notion. This kind of a bill does not work. Look at the reality of the day and do what governments ought to do; respond to the real needs of the people they are supposed to represent.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to participate in this debate on Bill C-32.

You will recall that this morning that I read excerpts from that infamous book known as Where I Stand by a well-known Canadian author and not so good politician. That well-known Canadian author and not so good politician wrote this book a number of years ago, telling us abut the importance of contributing in the area of education and training in this country.

Education, of course, falls within the authority of the province. But the Government of Canada needs to contribute to it, in order to make sure that it happens so that we have a well trained and well equipped workforce in this country.

What is the government doing? It is cutting back on transfers to the provinces.

[Translation]

In the case of my own province, the province of Ontario, $1 billion will be cut this year from transfers to the provincial government, one billion!

• (1540)

I see the minister opposite, and I am sure he will realize that cuts totalling one billion and the fact that in Ontario we have a government that is not too good at government administration, that these two factors combined will have a disastrous impact on Ontario. So we have those budget cuts I just described and the people of Ontario are suffering.

Mr. Speaker, many people have criticized Bill C-32 and its predecessor, Bill C-69. I will read a few passages from what the experts had to say.

[English]

Lise Corbeil Vincent of the National Anti-Poverty Organization said, according to this article in The Ottawa Citizen, and I quote: "This is a disaster for people in Canada".

This program, the one about which we are talking that will be affected, is designed to help those 1.9 million Canadians who are on welfare, and those 1.9 million Canadians on welfare have very little defence. They have very few ways of getting their voices heard. Many times they are the same people who are regrettably functionally illiterate or do not avail themselves, or cannot avail themselves, of the tools to air their grievances.

I want to read a few more quotes. Here is another one: "The poor will become more and more defenceless than ever as the already meagre levels of government support are cut further". Again that was Lise Corbeil Vincent.

Finally Viola Robertson of the Native Council of Canada said: "Many native Canadians already living in Third World conditions will only suffer more as cost-cutting continues to be more important than human lives".

That is the sad reality.

In the riding I represent, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, we have very high unemployment. Over the last years, as a result of the recession, caused largely by economic policies of this government, and as a result of some of the legislation that has been passed in the House before, namely the changes in the unemployment insurance provisions, the welfare rolls have increased substantially.

[Translation]

And while the unemployment rate is rising in my riding, Mr. Speaker, the federal government announces it will cut transfer payments to the provinces. The province will then cut or at least not increase, transfers to municipalities. Now the municipalities, which happen to be the level of government closest to the taxpayer have to pay the people on their welfare rolls but cannot get the money from the other levels of government.

That is what is happening in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Stormont—Dundas, and other rural ridings in Ontario.

[English]

There is a misconception out there that in Ontario, it being a wealthier province than others, everyone is well off. There are still some people I guess in other regions of the country who would probably define a poor Ontarian as someone who washes his own Cadillac, or something like that. Well, the reality of course is very different.

The area I represent, and I am thinking here of Prescott County particularly, has unemployment of about 15 per cent, very high welfare, and people who are living in conditions that are certainly not what we would wish for them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is still time for the government to do something. I ask them to withdraw this bill, this budgetary measure that is so unfair to the neediest in this country. If they stopped to think, they would realize that these cuts which are now being imposed on the so-called wealthier provinces are not really affecting the provinces, the provincial governments or the ministers personally, but the people on welfare in these provinces.

Those are the people we are concerned about, Mr. Speaker. We as parliamentarians are here to defend those who are least able to defend themselves.

[English]

That is why I ask our colleagues across the way to think very seriously about this bill. They have had an opportunity to pause and reflect after the issue went to the Supreme Court of Canada on Bill C-69. The Supreme Court did indicate, at least to a degree, that the government had the legal authority to enact such legislation, and I say to a degree, because on one aspect the decision was not all that clear. But, needless to say, even if it has the legal right, it certainly does not have what I consider to be the moral right to cut back on benefits to the poorest of Canadians.

When we are talking about transfers to the provinces in the Canada Assistance Plan, that is exactly what we are referring to; we are talking about money for education and money for welfare. In the area of welfare I have explained the effects, and in the area of education it is the same, Mr. Speaker. Because if we do not invest to train our population, we will find more and more of them in poverty. The poor will get poorer and the rich will get richer, and that is not good for us as a society. It is bad for those people in that position but it is bad for all of us collectively.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when people live in poverty, the crime rate tends to go up. When people are in need, this often has undesirable effects, unfortunately.

In concluding, I would ask the government to withdraw this bill while there is still time, and to stop being partisan and consider for a minute the well-being of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you that this is an historic day in our country. There began today a new round of constitutional negotiations and I think all of us in this House would agree and all of us would hope that this newest round of constitutional negotiations will end in a successful and equitable settlement, a settlement that all Canadians from sea to sea to sea can be comfortable and happy with so that we can move forward to greater and better days.

By any objective measurement, by any standard, by any measurement, Canada is a great country. I think one of the reasons why it is a great country is because we have a strong tradition of sharing. Just look at some of the things that we have done, say, since the Second World War, be it family allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, old age assistance, Canada Pension Plan, medicare; I could mention a number of programs. But they all speak to a fine quality in Canadians, a quality of sharing; sharing our resources, sharing our wealth. I think that is one of the main reasons why this country is so great. I think if we continue that tradition of caring and sharing, the future of this country will be guaranteed and it will remain one of the best countries in the world.

But I am worried, Mr. Speaker. I am worried because I see a Tory agenda, a Tory disease that I think is slowly but surely destroying that great tradition of sharing in this country. I think this particular bill, Bill C-32, which would place a 5 per cent cap on CAP or, to put it another way, a 5 per cent cap on social programs under the Canada Assistance Plan, is symptomatic of what I call the Tory disease, symptomatic of the Tory agenda.

Let there be absolutely no doubt about it, this government which, by the way, is probably the most right wing government this country has ever known, is following a very deliberate agenda. It is an agenda, if I can put it in a few words, to downsize government, to handcuff government, to get government away from some of the traditional responsibilities that government has had in this country and turn those responsibilities over to the private sector.

The government has done it in many ways. In some cases it has just taken its responsibilities and given them to the marketplace. One of the best examples of that, of course, is the free trade agreement, a bilateral agreement with the United States, an international treaty that really democratizes this country. It makes us unable to deal with some very very serious national economic issues because those responsibilities have been taken away from government, taken away from the people and turned over to the private sector, over to the marketplace. The marketplace, as you know well, Mr. Speaker, is really not that democratic and I do not even expect it to be that democratic. Certainly you do not have the kind of justice that most Canadians would want out of the marketplace. If you are looking for justice, you look to your democratic institutions.

The free trade agreement is just one example of that. We have seen this government slowly destroying our tradition of sharing in other ways. Look at what it is doing by way of reducing transfer payments to the provinces. Transfer payments are an example of sharing; the federal government, facing its responsibilities, taking on those responsibilities seriously, and providing assistance to all provinces, sharing the wealth, sharing our resources.

We have seen in the last few years that the government is cutting back on those transfers, cutting back on moneys to the provinces. You can be absolutely sure that many of the provinces, if not all of them, will not be able to afford some of those cutbacks. What the provinces will do in turn is pass on some of their responsibilities to the municipalities. The municipalities have no place to turn whatsoever and those very valuable services that are provided as a result of the transfer of payments will come to an end.

Through that kind of process, you can see the unravelling of social programs, the unravelling of the country itself. When you have a reduction in transfer payments, you have a reduction of assistance to medicare. There is a reduction of assistance to secondary education. The provinces cannot bear those burdens alone. The resources of the provinces are limited. The federal government must take its responsibilities seriously. I do not think the government is doing that.

I understand why. I understand it is because of its ideology. This government really does not believe in government. If it does believe in government at all, it believes in weak, impotent government. It believes in weak, impotent, democratic institutions. Leave it to the marketplace, leave it to the private sector.

I am a champion of the private sector. The private sector does some of its jobs extremely well. When it comes to business, I say, leave business to business. It is up to us politicians to set the polices, to set the parameters, to make absolutely sure that in our daily activities, be those activities by individual Canadians, groups of Canadians or corporations, that we are always working for the common good, for the good of all of us, for the good of the country. I do not see that in the way the government is operating.

There is no great mystery about the Canada Assistance Plan. It is there to help the poorest of the poor. It is there to provide benefits to the poor and especially to children. I think it is a very sad commentary on the government, and in a way it is a sad commentary on our country, when we see the government putting a cap on this kind of assistance. It in effect says to the people of the world: "We are not going to share our resources any more. We are going to leave it to the provinces". Of course, then the provinces will turn around and say: "We'll leave it to the municipalities". That is a recipe for disaster. That is how services begin to unravel to a point where they will not exist any more.

In my closing moments, I would say to the government, look at this bill again. It is wrong in principle and it should be reconsidered, in fact, it should be just dropped completely.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–69 will cap the Canada Assistance Plan at 5 per cent until the year 1992. Bill C–32 extends that cap for another three years. This further capping is part of this government's agenda. The government says: "We must do something about the deficit", but then proceeds by making the people who can least afford to do something about the deficit contribute to the reduction of the deficit, forcing them to take a good portion of the burden.

The agenda of this government is an agenda which suggests a trickle down theory. If you feed the corporations enough, maybe they will pass some of it on to the workers. It does not work that way and it has never worked that way.

I understand the province of Ontario has added close to 300,000 people to its welfare rolls in the last year. That to a great extent has been caused by the policies which this government has put in place and the free trade deal that was passed by this government. How does it do it? It seems like a long and involved process because it happens at so many levels. A while ago it changed the UI for workers and with the free trade and other reasons, the high dollar, we have had the closing of many plants across the province. I speak of Ontario now because Ontario is one of the benefactors of this particular bill. However, the plants close so people are put out of work. The bill passed by this government has reduced the UI they will get, and it has also shortened the time that they will get it. It is harder to get UI and it runs out quicker than it did in the past. Also there are fewer jobs because there is a continuous closure of plants.

What does this worker do? He goes to the municipality for social assistance. So these people go on social assistance. This increases the cost of social assistance to the municipality. It increases the cost of social assistance to the province. In the past, a good many years ago, if you spent 50 cents on social assistance the federal government contributed 50 cents. However, the Liberal government in its wisdom changed that a few years ago and made it a block payment to provincial governments so that it no longer had to match the funds that the provincial government pays. Consequently it has got away with less.

But what the government is doing now in this particular bill is cutting the federal assistance which would help to pay the social assistance necessary for these people who have been put out of work by its policies. In other words, there has been a very deliberate and somewhat indirect but effective change in the quality of assistance or the amount of assistance that has been available to people who require welfare. This whole process is based on an agenda that makes it possible in this country for the rich and the corporate elite to become richer, to get more out of the system than they have had in the past. That whole process is part of this government's agenda.

The government will say that it has introduced these measures in the name of fiscal restraint and that only the rich provinces are being affected and they can afford the cap. As I pointed out before, the number of people who have been added to the welfare rolls in Ontario has increased faster than most of the other provinces. Consequently it has more need for this extra money to come in, in the future.

Even before that happened, 50 per cent of the poor in Canada lived in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. If you are poor, it does not matter which province you live in. You have the same needs and you have to go to the municipalities and the provinces to have those needs alleviated. If the federal government does not contribute to that alleviation then the province must do so, and that is going to add to the burden in the particular province.

Also, one has to recognize that Alberta for many years, British Columbia fairly continuously, and Ontario, when there is a recession in the rest of the country, are the provinces that are going to get the movement of unemployed people. I come from the province of Saskatchewan where we have had a Conservative government for the last eight years which will soon be over, thank goodness. But in those last eight years, in fact in this last year, 24,000 people left Saskatchewan. They went to Alberta. They went to Ontario. They went to British Columbia. As the recession hits those provinces many of those people are likely to be on welfare before very long, probably very quickly. They have not been able to work in those provinces long enough to build up UI benefits.

What this government has done by its policies in other areas has put more pressure on these so-called richer provinces and made it impossible for them to deal with the requirements of the Canada Assistance Plan structure. As I said before, many of these people are forced to go on UI. Since there has been a cutback in UI they are back on the welfare roles much more quickly than one would expect.

CAP provides for a fifty-fifty cost sharing between the feds and the provinces, but only up to a certain level. When that level is reached, then the province has to find the money or the municipality has to find the money. Talk to the mayor of Toronto right now. He will tell you a long story about how difficult it is to deal with the extra requirements put on the city because of the closing of plants, because of the needs of the people who have been taken off work as a result of closing of plants caused in many cases by the free trade agreement and the GST increasing the cost of operation in Ontario.

Bill C-32 is just another example of how the government has decided to place the burden of paying off the debt, paying off the deficit or the accumulated debt, on the shoulders of those who can least afford it. The government has not targeted the people who caused the debt or asked them to pay the debt because the corporate taxes have declined 20 per cent since 1986 and the profits for those same corporations have increased by 34 per cent.

We have a situation where this government is making a deliberate decision to reduce the amount of money that is going to be available to people who are forced to go on social assistance and not going to the source of the problem for funds to take care of that situation.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Brampton moved that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to committee, many of us were outraged.

I was particularly shocked by his closing statements in the remarks he made yesterday. I will quote them: "There are no quick, painless fixes to the deficit and debt problems we have inherited. I urge all members of the House to support this motion and to join us in accepting our fiscal responsibility to all Canadians".

We cannot fool the Canadians sitting at home in their living rooms at this moment or on the replay tonight. If the government was truly interested in fiscal responsibility, it would have begun years ago.

When we as the Liberal Party lost the election in 1984, there were 28 ministers in the government. Since 1984 that number has climbed to over 40. Of course, when you raise the number of ministers you raise all the expenses of government.

• (1610)

An hon. member: Like the limousines.

Mr. Keyes: Like the limousines.

An hon. member: Two ministers for every department.

Mr. Keyes: Yes, two ministers for every department.

We went through some healthy economic times in 1985, 1986 and 1987. When the times were good did this government take a second and say: "Well, listen, the times are good. Like many Canadians living at home, when times are good we had better sock away a little bit into an emergency fund, or maybe we should have another look at this national debt of $180 billion and better start paying it down, because it is only going to grow and especially if inflation gets away from us in the future we will be able to pay it down". But that did not happen.

Today Canada has inherited from this government that has been sitting on that side of the House since 1984 a debt that has gone from $180 billion to over $400 billion. "Interest rates," it cries, "interest rates".

The Conservatives set the economic agenda. They set the fiscal and economic policy for this country. They are the ones who created the problem and the financial mess we are in today.

The government has not eliminated the deficit as it said it would do but has instead doubled the national debt, as I have said, to $400 billion. Tory cabinet ministers maintain they are merely servicing the debt incurred by the former government, but is it not about time that they accepted responsibility for the fiscal mess which they have put this country in, the responsibilities and decisions they have made since 1984?

In this whole notion of capitalism as the way of the future—and it is such a smashing success—some like to point to the United States as the leader of that capitalistic order. I have to ask myself, and my constituents ask themselves at home: "Why are millions of Americans living in abject poverty, in ghettos teaming with people who have fallen through the cracks so fast?" It is because the safety net is so thin.

My colleague from the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell likes to quote from a book. I have got one for him. In a new book entitled The Quick and the Dead—Brian Mulroney, Big Business and the Seduction of Canada, Linda McQuaig writes that top Tory officials privately admit that the Prime Minister and his government are intent on dismantling Canada's prized social safety net in favour of the open-ended, laissez-faire, rough and tumble, cutthroat world that we see just south of our border.

It has been mentioned in this House before, that the cornerstone of that plan was the free trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. What the Prime Minister and the Conservative government failed to realize was that such a free trade agreement would mean one of two things. First, Canada would immediately rush into the U.S. market and swallow up entire sections of businesses becoming global giants. Second, Canadian companies would drop like flies because labour costs and material costs and taxation were so low in the United States that they would either not be able to compete and would be forced out of business or else they would take it upon themselves to move to the U.S. where the cost of doing business is cheaper.

We are seeing that happening every day. Near our riding of Hamilton West Triton is gone. In a community where I used to work, Barrie, Ontario, General Tire, what did they spend? They spent $45 million upgrading that plant. They are going to make the tires at the parent company in the United States. After nearly 300,000 Canadians have lost their jobs since the free trade deal was struck, the Prime Minister has announced a new campaign for competitiveness.

The former Minister of Finance, let us call him the former minister of financial disaster, has been asked to take on this task. Work shops, position papers, programs, all will be created for us so that we may be competitive.

The result of this nearsightedness is that the statistical sheets are all covered in red ink. In the world-wide recession of 1982 there were 32,000 bankruptcies in Canada. In the latest made-in-Canada recession, a recession made by this government, there were 42,782 bankruptcies in Canada in 1990, a 50 per cent increase over 1989.

In Ontario 16,287 residents had to declare bankruptcy and another 2,907 businesses followed suit.

Here is another interesting statistic. Some more red ink. There are currently 1.5 million people unemployed in this country as the unemployment hovers over 10 per cent.

According to the Canadian Association of Food Banks, the number of people receiving emergency food aid each month in this country is 186,000, including the stark, tragic statistic of one in six children.

I have reams of numbers I can quote for the folks at home and here in the House. This bill would put a cap on the amount of money transferred from the federal government to the three provinces which do not receive equalization payments, but nonetheless rely on federal funding. The provinces are B.C., Alberta and this province of Ontario.

People are lined up at the food banks and this government proceeds with limitations on what it will give provinces like Ontario to provide social assistance programs.

In my riding of Hamilton West the unemployment rate has matched the rate of factory closures. Here are some statistics. In April the unemployment rate was 8.1 per cent; in May, 8.5 per cent; in June, 9.7 per cent; and in July, 10.8 per cent. Last month that rate climbed to 11.4 per cent; 38,000 people unemployed in Hamilton. Where are these and the 1.3 million other unemployed Canadians to turn if they cannot rely on their governments? If the economy does not pick up soon, the three provinces will bear the burden being imposed on them through this bill, by receiving $2.135 billion less.

What are the low income families with three children to do if their mother or father is laid off? Sometimes one parent works at night, others work shifts and others are trying to make ends meet.

In conclusion, these were all called the sacred trusts. They are sacred. They are sacred to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have lost their manufacturing jobs. They are sacred to the other millions of Canadians who desire a decent standard of living but are finding it increasingly difficult because of this government's fiscal mismanagement. I wish I could go on.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam—PS 2000; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Montreal's economy; the hon. member for Edmonton East—Petro-Canada; the hon. member for Northumberland—External Affairs; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries.

The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, if you are agreeable, I would like to provide some brief background information on the bill before the House today. The purpose of the Canada Assistance Plan, which goes back a number of years, to 1966, to be exact, was to help the neediest in our society. This was part and parcel of a tradition we have always had here in Canada which is to look after our neighbours, to be our brother's keeper. The attitude has always been that special measures are needed to help those in greatest need.

• (1620)

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the way the Canada Assistance Plan works, for many years it has helped to redistribute wealth in this great country of ours. Unlike most countries in the world—one example is the United States—we have a number of social mechanisms to ensure that all Canadians have the minimum they need.

Of course, many people envy the fact that Canada has always ensured that Canadians had their old age pension, subsidized housing and federal assistance for provincial welfare payments, so that people always had something to fall back on when times were hard.

Today, these principles in which we take so much pride may be threatened. I would like to show you how important the Canada Assistance Plan is and read the objectives of the plan as they were drafted 25 years ago: to support the provinces in providing welfare payments and institutional care appropriate to the needs of the needy; and to support the provinces' social welfare services aimed at alleviating, eliminating or preventing the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or welfare dependency.

Mr. Speaker, all Canadians know that these are the principles that guide our social policy. For some time there have been various cuts in our social programs because of the deficit. The GST was supposed to deal with our deficit, but nevertheless, the government has managed to put a cap on spending that will affect the neediest in this country. Our point is, that although we have had a long tradition of providing social services in this country, gradually and very subtly, the government is cutting costs.

Mr. Speaker, the three provinces that are affected are British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. These provinces have welfare plans, and now they have to raise taxes provincially and even at the municipal level to cover the shortfall, because they want to maintain national standards. This does not augur well for the rest of the country, Mr. Speaker.

Gradually, we notice that these major social benefits are undermined. I use that word because the various provinces are making efforts to help those in greatest need and see these funds being cut. Certainly the provinces in question will in turn have to cut if they do not find the financial wherewithal. What we should keep in mind is the national government's responsibility to ensure that all Canadians have the minimum required to keep them from extreme hardship.

Almost every day, or at least every week, we see on television countries that are incredibly worse off than we are. It is true that if we compare, we realize that we have a great country that cares about people's welfare, and rightly so, because it is part of what makes us Canadian. And we are proud of it. Of course, it was paid for by our taxes, but we were proud to take part because we knew that the least advantaged in our society would have our help, not directly from each one of us, but with some contribution of ours. However, such measures have called this into question and are not in keeping with our ideal as Canadians. We want to preserve this tradition of helping those in need. And I think that as a society that calls itself Christian, we want to maintain such things. Here we see a subtle way to undermine our basic rights.

Mr. Speaker, I would like Canadians to realize that some people are not affected by these cuts. Who is to say that tomorrow, other cuts will not affect you? That is the issue. We want an egalitarian system. If we see that part of our society is deprived, believe me, we could be the ones to be hit by cuts tomorrow in a most basic area in a society like ours. We realize that we have moral obligations to those in greatest need.

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to elaborate on that too much; I think the message is very clear for the government. Nevertheless, there have been many demonstrations. Many briefs were presented by volunteer groups of people who give freely of their time. They realize that we must always be alert and vigilant to ensure that the most disadvantaged have a chance to obtain the basic necessities like health care and housing. Many studies show that if suitable housing is available, there is less illness, people are less discouraged and hospital admissions are down. It is as simple as that.

So in closing, Mr. Speaker, I would say to our fellow Canadians that we should not let this go by in silence; we should say that there comes a time when cuts in such a fundamental area as our social welfare cannot be tolerated. It is up to you and not only members of this House. We are representatives and servants, but we would like all Canadians who are aware of what such cuts imply to communicate with government members, tell them that you are aware of what they are doing and that you will not let some of the most basic programs that are in keeping with this country's greatest traditions be continually undermined in silence.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very carefully to some of the addresses in the House this afternoon with regard to Bill C–32.

I would just like to take a few minutes to participate in the debate today and address some of the major financial hurdles that all Canadians face, the fact that we are really living beyond our means. That means that we spend more than we take in.

This fiscal year it will be around the $30 billion area. We have to curtail our spending. It is difficult in certain areas and we certainly have not zeroed in on the health care of the lower income people and the social services.

The government has looked at absolutely every department and every issue, and everyone is going to have to contribute to get our deficit and our debt down.

The measures that we have taken within this Bill C-32 are in keeping with our agenda and will help us contain the deficit.

• (1630)

If we do not act now, we will not have the money to provide social services in the future. As I said, I know it is extremely difficult.

I know that some of my colleagues have discussed the numbers on the deficit and the debt. Currently the debt is sitting at $400 billion. This is certainly a big number, $400 billion which requires $43 billion in this year's expenditures just to service the debt.

When we came into office, and this is very interesting, the debt was sitting just at the $200 billion level and it has grown. Yes, it has doubled. But the growth is due to servicing the debt, Mr. Speaker, and certainly it is not due from other areas.

What I really want to talk about is that we have a problem. Why can we not all work on this together? The thing I have heard from my colleagues on the other side is discussing interest rates, the high interest rates, the high value of the Canadian dollar. Yes, they are high. In order to get those down, we flat have to cut our expenditures and get our deficit and debt down. This will also help put us in a more competitive position so that we can trade. Indeed, Canada is the most trade dependent nation in the western industrialized world. We have to trade to exist.

We hear people talk out of one side of their mouth saying get the dollar down, get interest rates down, and yet continue spending—and maybe you can help me, Mr. Speaker—but I have not heard anyone suggest a cut. They are asking today for us to withdraw the bill, which we have no intention of doing, for more money for health and welfare. It is a major department, but already the department spends 55, 56, 57 per cent of our budget. As some of my colleagues have stated, about $36 billion, $37 billion goes into the CAP transfer programs in this fiscal year.

We have to spend our money more wisely, spend it better, and we have to stop the treadmill from gaining so much speed. I have heard you ask for money for National Health and Welfare. I have heard money for science and technology, which I support. We need more science and technology, research and development. I have heard you ask for more money for agriculture. We would not eat. Our farmers, our agriculture people all across Canada have problems with regard to the GATT, the regulations and the subsidies that the European and the United States are applying to the export market on agriculture.

I have heard people ask for money in the transportation area with regard to runways as well as new terminals. Yes, we need new runways in certain areas across this country. I have heard people talk about housing. Housing is extremely important., Through CMHC, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we assist about 40 per cent of the homeowners within Canada and we would like to assist more.

These are all worth-while valuable areas, but we are not going to be able to help anyone unless we are able to get our deficit down and our debt removed. As part of this effort, this bill addresses capping at 5 per cent the Canada Assistance Plan payments to the three better off provinces, Ontario, B.C. and Alberta. I am indeed from the province of Alberta, and it is hard. But we all have to get this under control.

Now, 35 cents of every dollar the federal government gets goes to service the debt. We cannot apply it against any programs. We cannot utilize it for the increase of our standard of living, increase of hospital care or educational institutions. No, it must go to service the debt.

With regard to Ontario, it carries carry about a $48 billion debt that is to be reached in the year 1991-92. It requires 12 cents out of every dollar to service the debt. In the province of B.C. the debt this particular year is going to be about $615 million and four cents of every dollar goes to service it. In the province I come from, eight cents of every dollar we collect goes to service the debt.

The constraints, or restraints, in the province facing the federal government are major in comparison. We all have to help. We all have to participate. It is everybody's problem. We will certainly maintain our fiscal restraint and work toward the lowering of the deficit, which will be about $25 billion in two years and then down to $6.5 billion in the year 1995 at which time the government will no longer have to borrow outside to service the debt.

While we recognize that this is a very serious move, we also have to say that the amount of the federal transfer payments has been growing and indeed has grown at a much faster rate than the other programs. A major review is needed and certainly the Minister of National Health and Welfare is well aware of this. He met with his colleagues in June, I believe, and again just last week the counterparts in the provinces to discuss the whole area of health care and welfare. Indeed, we recognized that perhaps the time has come to take a look at how better we can do this.

Really what I want to say, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate the opportunity, is that I know it is tough, but everybody has to help, all departments have to help, to reduce the deficit and debt. Then we will be able to support social programs within this country, maintain a standard of living, health care education that will be great for our youngsters instead of leaving them with a tax burden that would forbid them fro, perhaps having those beneficial elements we are able to give.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member who just spoke for really setting up the question for what I have to say in this House today.

The hon. member said that we live beyond our means and we have to curtail our spending. She said everyone has to contribute to get the deficit down. Then she accused the opposition of speaking out of both sides of our mouths.

Well, talk about the two-faced business lobby, talk about speaking out of two sides of mouths, talk about the cheek of this government suggesting that we have to all take and pay our fair share to get the deficit down so that social programs, health care programs and education in this country can be covered by this government. Let us take a look at some of the facts.

It is really interesting that this government and the corporations in Canada are all muling about how high the deficit is and how we all have to tighten our belts and how we all have to take and pay our fair share, but in fact if corporate Canada were paying its fair share of taxes in this country, we would not have the deficit we have and we would be able, with no difficulty at all, to maintain the social programs in this country, to maintain health care in this country, and to maintain post-secondary education levels in this country in all of the provinces and territories, not in a select number of provinces and territories.

Let us look a little bit at the facts. In 1987 Canada had 362,828 corporations that reported profits of $87.7 billion. That is excluding intercorporate dividends. Guess how much they paid in taxes.

Well, they were supposed to pay 36 per cent of that in taxes. Thanks to the leaky system that this government and the Liberal government before it put into place, they in fact paid 17.7 per cent, about half of what they should have been paying in corporate taxation. Despite combined profits of $25 billion, 118,162 corporations, or about one in three, paid no corporate tax whatsoever. Not a cent, not a penny. Who has to tighten their belts, Mr. Speaker? Who, on the one hand, is not paying a cent of corporate tax, and on the other hand, is out there telling Canadians through this government that we all have to share the pain, that we all have to suffer? Who is suffering? Low income Canadians, students, the sick, the elderly.

I would not for a moment suggest that the Tories don't have an agenda. In fact, the hon. member just said "we are sticking to our agenda, and our agenda in the Tory government is let the little people, the people who are struggling, the people who are trying to keep this country running, pay, pay and pay again, and let corporate Canada yet again off the hook and lay the blame at the feet of the working people in this country, of the sick, of the elderly and of the poor".

The business groups in this country, and this government, are wrong about the deficit. It is not government spending that is too high. It is the way that we, in fact, are financing government spending that has been wrong. The cost of carrying past debt is expensive because too much of it is short term and the interest rates are too high. The Minister of Finance should restructure the debt and direct the Bank of Canada to lower its interest rates. The government should quit listening to the business groups which are not paying taxes which tell us on behalf of Canadians that we all have to cut back, that we all have to suffer and that we all have to pay.

I would like to talk just for a moment about my riding of Mission—Coquitlam. My riding is the shake and shingle capital of Canada. We produce in my riding cedar shakes and shingles. As you know, this government has botched that industry. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the shake and shingle workers who are unemployed as a result of these botches are not very impressed by this government's telling us that everybody has to pay their fair share, and that we have to suffer in British Columbia because this government has botched it.

In my riding there is a blueberry industry. We produce more blueberries and more cranberries, more soft fruits, berry fruits like that, than anywhere else in North America. And, yet, because of the vagaries of weather we have had failures in crops this year. Those farmers are not convinced that this government is right when it says that they have to shoulder yet a further share of the pain through the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan. Young people in my riding, not young people 15 and 16 but young people 25, 26, who still cannot get full time jobs at decent wages, who still are unable to leave home.

Single moms in my riding, Mr. Speaker, who are living below the poverty line are being told because of this government's cutbacks in programs that they, in fact, are going to have to shoulder an even greater share of the burden.

All of these people are finding it very tough to believe, while half of corporate Canada is paying not one single cent, zero, in taxes. These people are finding it very, very tough to believe that they are not paying their fair share.

As if Bill C–32 is not enough, as if that is not putting the squeeze on the average Canadian enough, we have a record from this government of Bill C–21. You will remember that, that was the UI bill that made it harder to get unemployment insurance, makes the ability to collect unemployment insurance for a shorter time, and in fact makes it very very difficult for some workers in some industries to collect UI at all.

This government has partially deindexed family benefits. That means that families who need money get less each year. This government has clawed back family allowances and pensions and partially deindexed them, which means that the threshold for cutoff of benefits gets lower each year.

Further cuts to social assistance and cuts to health and post-secondary education in Bill C–69 and Bill C–20 are threatening the future of medicare and accessible education. There is still no sign of the long promised, twice promised in election campaigns, national child care strategy which is desperately needed.

There is not enough integrity in this government to pay fairly government workers the pay equity that even the Human Rights Commission has said they justly deserve. This government is ignoring that. Nor is there enough integrity from this government to bargain fairly at the bargaining table.

Hon. members from the other side of the House get up and say to us with the highest level of sanctimony that we all have to tighten our belts and we all have to pay.

In closing, I would like to say that I would have an awful lot more respect for this government and for its agenda if it included all Canadians and did not exclude its corporate friends.

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the Parliamentary Secretary is back. I hope she will be able to stay and listen to my comments on her speech.

[English]

I am very happy that I had the opportunity to hear what she had to say because the Conservative Party stands in public opinion in my city of Toronto and in North York as well at around 8 per cent.

Anyone who is wondering—perhaps members of the government party are wondering—why the popularity of their government is so low just had to listen to that parliamentary secretary stand up and give her explanation of why this unacceptable measure, Bill C–32, is being brought forward now. We understand that Canadian people are not stupid and that they have been following the activities of this government since 1981. Clearly in metro Toronto, the Canadian people have had it with this government.

She stood up and said that the deficit was a big problem and that we all had to do our share to reduce it. The ceiling is being continued on the Canada Assistance Plan so that our province of Ontario does not receive the share which the federal government agreed to give it at the beginning of the program when so many worth-while support programs were entered into by governments in Canada which form the major part of the social safety net underlying poverty in our country.

The social safety net, since its creation, has never been more needed than it is now after eight years of Tory government. The social safety net has never been more threatened than it is now after these eight years of Conservative government.

To say that this measure is justified by the deficit will make my voters recall the campaign promises that this government made in 1984. In 1984, when it was first elected, it was largely on the basis of promising to eliminate a deficit created by successive Liberal governments which stood then, if I remember correctly, at $174 billion.

The Conservatives were elected because it was said that the Liberals did not care as much about the deficit as they did, and they would do something about it.

How many years have elapsed under their government: six, seven or nearly eight years? Far from reducing the deficit, they have seen it more than double. Now, as if it were not the first time, they are saying that it is time to take on the problem of the deficit.

Their credibility has worn rather thin. Anything that they feel should be done now to bring down the deficit could have been done much more easily, much less painfully with much more public support in 1984 when Canadians were ready to believe that they were going to decrease the deficit.

In 1984 the Liberal deficit which the government could have decreased at that time, if it feels it is capable of doing it now, would have been more than twice as easy to eliminate than the deficit now. Not only was the amount less than half, but we were in a boom period when the social safety net was not being looked to by nearly as many of my fellow Torontonians or by our fellow Canadians who are looking to it now.

• (1650)

Now there are far more people who need the social safety net. Now there is far more of a deficit to deal with. This is a deficit which has been created by seven, nearly eight years of Conservative government.

People do not believe at this point that this government is capable of reducing the deficit and they do not believe that this government intends to reduce the deficit.

The parliamentary secretary looked across and said: "All of us have to make our contribution to doing it". In the very same budget that introduced this very harsh measure, as I understand it—and I hope the parliamentary secretary or a member from the government party will stand up and correct me if I am wrong—the government did not give a break to the corporate welfare bums identified by the New Democratic Party. I think it is shooting at the wrong target when it talks about corporations. The government actually deferred the existing tax law for the taxation of capital gains passing through successions of wealthy families.

How much did that measure take away from its plan or commitment to reduce the deficit? How much could it have spared for the social safety measure if it had not introduced on a gratuitous basis another plan to make it easier for the rich to get along without paying taxes, not corporations as the last speaker for the NDP put it? Corporations have a role to play. The taxes that they pay have to be competitive with the taxes that are paid by corporations in other countries.

Why the payment of capital gains tax by individuals should have been deferred in the very budget that weakened and threatened and undermined the social safety net is something that I would like to see a member from the government party stand up and defend.

I understand that most members of the Conservative Party did not even know that this very budget that was undermining the social safety net in a manner that I intend to elaborate on for a few minutes was extending and increasing tax benefits to the wealthiest sector, the wealthiest group in Canadian society.

I have nothing against the rich in Canadian society. That is for sure. I certainly feel that a budget, which is administering harsh medicine to provinces and harsh medicine to poor families in Canada, should not at the same time have opened a new loophole for deferring capital gains tax to the wealthy.

One of the ways this government gets away with measures like this is that they are complicated and they are hard to report. I think it is worth taking a few moments to elaborate on some of the background of the benefits of the Canada Assistance Plan.

This is a program whose beneficiaries probably in most cases could not even identify it, but they are people who have received in the 1991–92 fiscal year $6.4 billion. This is a measure in which federal and provincial governments share equally the cost of basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies. This is a measure under which the federal government in the last election campaign promised to deliver day care.

An hon. member: We cannot afford it.

Mr. Kaplan: Why did you not say so in the election campaign? The hon. member is saying the government cannot afford it. It says that now, now that it has another two years left in its mandate. During the election campaign what it said, as we and as the NDP did too, was that day care was the missing program under the Canada Assistance Plan and that it would introduce it if it were elected.

We were not elected. We can be excused.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kaplan: I see I have only two minutes left. What I would like to know from the parliamentary secretary is this: How can that party now complain about being at 8 per cent popularity in the city of Toronto or at 16 per cent nationally when it had the nerve in the last election campaign to promise day care and it says now it does not have the money?

Was it not smart enough with the Minister of Finance that it had during the last Parliament—after it had doubled the deficit—to know that maybe this promise should not have been made?

This government is on a very sticky wicket to try and defend this measure on the basis of financial need when it has created the financial need by the way in which it has run the country since 1984.

[Translation]

If they had solutions to reduce the deficit and were committed to reduce the deficit in 1984, why did they not act on their promise when they took power in 1984?

Mr. Speaker, in the city of Toronto—

[English]

In the city of Toronto the government still has eight points left to go. Nationally, it still has 16 points left to go. If it continues to make this kind of defence of its programs, it will not be very long in going through that 16 per cent.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is really a shame that there has to be a debate at all on Bill C–32. It is yet another vicious cut brought upon the poorest of the poor of this country by this government. I have here a list of programs provided under the Canada Assistance Plan and I want all the members of this House to know what these programs are because it is important that they know what this government is proposing to cut in this bill. There are programs dealing with children in foster homes who need protection, with physically or mentally disabled people, with single–parent families, with seniors, with the unemployed, with families and individuals in need, with low–income earners and with battered women.

That is the list I found in the Canada Assistance Plan annual report.

The government is proposing cuts in the payments to assist these people. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this bill is flawed. This House should reject it.

We also have a quote from Mrs. Anne McGrath, the Vice–President of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, who stated the following before the Finance Committee during the study of Bill C–69. The source is the May 15, 1990 proceedings of the Committee, on page 121:5. She said: "Why is CAP important to women? I think we want to say that programs supported by the Canada Assistance Plan essentially present our most basic public commitment—this government's and this country's most basic public commitment—to women's equality. We view any threat to those programs as a reduction in this commitment.

As well, any reduction in this commitment and the reduction we are talking about in Bill C–69, we believe, puts at risk the real lives of poor and working women who are the primary beneficiaries of the programming that is eligible for funding under the Canada Assistance Plan.

• (1700)

I think our point is relatively simple. The services that are covered under the program embrace the range commonly known as welfare service. The primary target group is poor women with children. Although we still believe the best welfare is a good job, we also are quite concerned to make sure there is adequate support for the poor women with children who want to get those good jobs. We need good child care. We believe the best investments are with our youngest citizens."

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the government that introduced a bill such as Bill C-32 is doing exactly as it did with Bill C-69. Furthermore, it is obviously in disagreement with all groups supporting women, the poor, the unemployed and any person who needs the help provided by the Canada Assistance Plan.

[English]

In fact it is safe to say that this government has done worse than nothing for the poor of this country since it took office in 1984. The bulk of its program cuts have been in this area. We see this cap here. We see the clawback in old age security payments. We see increased premiums for unemployment insurance. We see reduction in payments under the Unemployment Insurance Act, both in duration and in amount. I suggest that what the government is doing is trying to solve its deficit problems on the backs of the poor.

I made a speech last Friday and effectively discredited the Minister of Finance's opening gambits on his budget presentation. This bill represents another part of his budget, and I indicated in that speech very clearly how the government had failed Canadians in leadership and its efforts to reduce the deficit.

In response to a question that was put to me after the speech when I was asked what it was we would have done, I neglected to mention one very important thing, and that is the things I suggested be done we would have done in the very first year of office, in this case in 1984. I suggest had the government made the cuts in 1984 instead of giving tax breaks to the wealthy and increasing its expenditures, spending money like a drunken sailor, trying to hand out patronage plums to all its friends, if instead of doing all that it had really bitten the bullet, swallowed it, and said it was going to solve the deficit problem in Canada and been serious about it—as it kept saying it was throughout the election campaign—then today it would be expanding these programs instead of cutting because it would have money in the bank, especially after having introduced something like the GST that is bringing it in so much money.

Yet the government did not think of that in 1984. Oh, no, no, they did not. They said: "Oh, well, we are a new government. The cupboard is bare but we can afford this and that. We can get jobs for our friends. We can help out this group and that group and spend money on this public work project and that public work project. We can build a new penitentiary in the Prime Minister's constituency and all kinds of things".

Remember all that? Now we are paying for it in spades. Now it is saying the reason why the deficit is so big is because of the interest payments on the debt it inherited. That is palpable rubbish. The reason it is having all these big interest payments today is because it did not reduce the government expenditures when it took office the way it said it was going to. Instead it gave tax breaks. It allowed the gap between revenue and expenditure to increase in 1984 and 1985 and 1986 instead of dealing with the issue properly. By 1987 it knew it had an election to face so it did not increase taxes at that time. Remember, it gave us a tax break? Remember it introduced part one of tax reform and lowered taxes before the election and then brought in the GST right after the election.

Any responsible government would have done the two at the same time, but not this group. It had its eye on the election campaign and it was determined to win, keep themselves in office at any cost, and boy, has it cost the Canadian people, particularly the lowest income groups in the population.

Let me quote some statistics that will back up my point. I know the hon. members do not like to hear statistics because it upsets them. I am quoting now from "Household Facilities by Income and Other Characteristics", a publication of Statistics Canada this year. "The 20 per cent of households with the lowest incomes, that is the bottom quintile, the bottom of one-fifth of all households in Canada, had the same share of total income in 1989, that is 5.2 per cent of the total income in Canada, as in 1981". In other words, over the nine year period they got no increase whatever, while the 20 per cent with the highest income showed an increase in the same period from 39 to 41 per cent, almost 40 to 42 per cent. The increase was at the expense of households in the middle three quintiles. Which is exactly what we have been saying. The middle classes have suffered under this government and the lowest groups in the whole system have got absolutely zero.

The second statistic: "Home ownership rate of households in the lowest quintile declined to 39 per cent in 1990 from 45 per cent in 1980". A significant drop, because house prices have gone out of reach for people in the lowest income groups.

Finally, "the proportion of renters spending 30 per cent or more of income on rent has decreased from 23 per cent in 1989 to 27.2 per cent in 1990", which sounds just fine, except that when you look at the lowest quintile you will find that, in fact, it increased significantly there.

On average, renter households spent somewhat more of their income on rent in 1990 than in 1982, an increase of about 1.5 per cent.

These figures belie a failure on the part of the government to address the needs of the poor in Canada and it has failed in this bill to do anything about it. In fact, it has made the situation worse.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply wish to remind the House that, because of the Prime Minister's statement and the opposition's response, the debate on the orders of the day will be extended until 5.47 p.m. Therefore, Private Member's Hour will begin at 5.47 p.m. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to go over the fact that this Canada Assistance Plan covers the payments for those who are most disadvantaged in our community.

A lot of people tune into these House of Commons debates and sometimes we use expressions like CAP and we do not tell people often enough what we are actually debating. I know in a city like Toronto when we talk about the fact that we are getting payments cut back by the government that are due to those people who are disabled, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, subsidized child care, we are talking about capping. We are talking about cutting back.

An hon. member: One of the three the richest provinces in Canada, in the whole country.

Mr. Mills: The member from Newfoundland talks about the three richest provinces in Canada. I presume that he would include the province of Ontario as one of those provinces. I want to let the hon. member know that right now in the province of Ontario and specifically metropolitan Toronto, we are on our knees.

I must tell you that I am totally sympathetic to your riding as well. I am not trying to say that people in Toronto are the only ones suffering pain. I want to let you know that this is probably the first time ever that we in Toronto have experienced the kind of pain that the hon. member from Newfoundland has faced over many years. This may sound blasphemous to some of my friends in Toronto, but perhaps it is not a bad thing that for the first time ever some of us in Toronto have experienced pain the way many other regions of the country have faced it for many years.

There may be a chance that this experience we are all going through right now might even bring us closer together. In fact, I am quite happy this afternoon that we are talking about the economy. Because, with all my respect for the Constitution, the people in my community, in my riding, certainly want the unity question settled, but they want us in this House to focus on the economy.

When my friend from Newfoundland talked about coming to his riding and that things were rough there, I understand that. But I will tell you what is happening in Toronto right now and why these cutbacks are of such concern for us.

It doesn't matter whether it is rental housing or the cost of goods, the prices in Toronto are almost double those in most other regions of Canada. So if you receive a welfare payment or an unemployment insurance cheque in Newfoundland, it goes a lot further than it does in Toronto. You are lucky if you can rent a one bedroom apartment in Toronto for $750 a month. I know in my riding that single mothers with kids are renting basement apartments for $1,100, $1,200, $1,300 a month. I know in some regions of the country that just sounds right off the wall, but those are the facts. And so when all of a sudden we are faced with this economic crunch, which we have never faced the likes of before, compounded with these cutbacks, it really exacerbates the pain.

So we on this side of the House are concerned about the deficit and the debt. We know it is a tough complex problem, but there is no way we are going to stand up here in this House and just say that this realignment of CAP is something that we take lightly. We are trying to communicate to you that the once secure, rich province of Ontario—and I am only speaking for Ontario right now—is, for the first time ever, on its economic knees. Combined with that, it is natural that we have a morale problem, and we have got to get the morale of this country rolling again. We especially have to get it going in those provinces that traditionally have had an ability during an economic crisis to generate wealth and keep the whole nation moving along.

We talked a little bit about this last Friday and I am going to repeat myself. I do not believe that the way we lift the morale of this country off its knees is by further cuts. I also do not share the view of members of the New Democratic Party which is out to somehow punish the rich. They say they don't pay any taxes—and there are some who don't pay any, and I think we have got to address that—but we are not anti-rich here and we are not anti-business. We need a healthy business climate in order to create jobs, in order to get this economy going again.

I would be very careful about putting a stigma on people who can create wealth in this country. I want to repeat what I said on Friday; we need to attract investment to this country, we don't need investment to flee this country. We need investment, foreign investment especially, to look at this country and see that it is productive, that the morale is good despite the fact that we are facing a tough global economy, and we have got to sort of do what we have to do to pick that morale up. We should not be picking, with respect to the NDP, on corporate Canada and upper income people who we need here to continue to invest and to continue to create jobs, the ones that are left. There are a lot of businesses in this country right now that are on the edge, that are having second thoughts as to whether or not they want to continue their presence in this country and I do not think we should be doing anything that would cause them to second-guess their commitment to investment in this country. We need foreign investment here.

I want to repeat what I said last Friday. The way to attract foreign investment, the way to get the capital we need that will create jobs, that will ultimately look after the deficit and debt that we are all concerned about, is by creating a productive environment where people will have the feeling that they want to go back to work, that they want to learn more and that they want to go back to retrain themselves.

Any cutback in any area that drives people further away from getting up off their knees or getting out of their current slump is counterproductive to the entire economic fabric of this country, so I would humbly request that the Conservative Party reconsider this cutback to the most disadvantaged people in our community.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I too, want to participate in the debate on this piece of legislation.

It has received a great deal of attention both in terms of the provincial governments which have been affected by it and, more importantly, the people who will be affected by this legislation.

The purpose of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, tends to extend the 5 per cent ceiling on the rate of growth and transfers to the Canada Assistance Plan from two years to five years. This cap applies only to the provinces which do not receive equalization payments. They include British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

I think it worth while for members of the House to be reminded of the purpose of the Canada Assistance Plan. I know members on this side of the House have been very concerned about what the Government of Canada was doing with regard to transfer payments.

It goes back to Bill C-69, introduced by this administration, which in effect curtailed the amount of money going to provincial governments to provide what I would deem—perhaps members opposite would interpret it differently—provided necessities for individuals in our society.

Basically, the Canada Assistance Plan was enacted in 1966 to encourage the development and the extension of assistance in welfare services programs throughout the country. Under this plan, the federal government has entered into agreements with the provinces and territories to share the costs incurred by the provinces and municipalities in providing social assistance and welfare services to needy Canadians.

The primary objectives of the Canada Assistance Plan are twofold. One is to support the provision by provinces of adequate assistance and institutional care for persons in need. The second is to support the provisions by provinces of welfare services designated to lessen, remove or prevent the causes and— I underline these words, Mr. Speaker, which I am sure that you as the arbitrator of our proceedings here would want to give careful consideration to—the effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance.

When we are talking about the ceiling on payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, we are not only talking about governments, whether they be in Ontario, British Columbia or Alberta. We are also talking about municipalities that in many instances are the first group in our society to be confronted with those hard core social needs which my colleagues who have spoken before me have brought to the attention of this House.

More important than governments and more important than municipalities are the individuals who were involved. As my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has alluded to, if you are poor in downtown Toronto or in St. John's East, you are still poor.

The hon. member opposite gives us a sigh as if there was a distinction that we as a national government should make for a poor individual in one end of the country from a poor individual in the other. I suggest to the hon. member that if you are hungry, you do not have a job, you cannot find child care for your children, you cannot provide the necessary clothing, the necessities of shelter, lodging and food, if you cannot do that anywhere in the country, we, as a national government, must come to the forefront and participate in trying to resolve those hard core realities of Canadian society.

• (1720)

The response, unfortunately, of the government opposite has been to say: "Look British Columbia, look Alberta, look Ontario, your respective municipalities, the people who reside in those provinces, that is tough. You go out on your own and you do the best you can." What an irresponsible way to proceed. Is that the Canadian mosaic? Is that the generosity and the tolerance that the Prime Minister not more than a few hours ago talked about? Hardly not, Mr. Speaker.

This decision to cut back in British Columbia, Ontario and Alberta was taken to the British Columbia Court of Appeal. It was stated by judicial minds that the Government of Canada in its unilateral move to put a ceiling on transfer payments to those provinces was illegal.

The Government of Canada appealed that to the Supreme Court of Canada which said very clearly, and note the wording, Mr. Speaker, that: "Yes, the Government of Canada had the legal propriety to make the decision to unilaterally cut back on transfer payments." Yes, the government has that authority, but I ask the question to you, sir, and to members opposite, having the legal authority, does that give you the moral authority? I think the answer is unequivocal for my party that it was wrong for the government to proceed the way it did in this particular instance.

What do we mean when we talk about such things as Canada Assistance? We are talking about dental care for children. We are not talking about dental care for the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia. We are talking about dental care for kids in Toronto, Mississauga, Hamilton, Calgary, Edmonton and Victoria.

Members opposite say: "Ah well, they are rich those provinces." Those kids are not rich. They have the same needs that your children and my children have. Essential living services for disabled persons, I guess you are saying to disabled persons in Ontario: "Get on a boat and go to Newfoundland because they get equalization payments. You cannot get it in Ontario so move to another province." I mean if that is not Tory logic and Tory sense, it is beyond me, Mr. Speaker. Foster homes for abused children is where we cut into. Safe housing for abused women. Well, we are also talking about subsidized child care for low income families.

Yes, there are lots of Canadians out there who would like to take their shots at Toronto. There is no question that they would like to do that, but the hard core reality is that if a kid lives in Toronto, Hamilton or anywhere in the province of Ontario and is poor and does not have those basic necessities that I have referred to, or a kid lives in my constituency or anywhere else in this country, a poor kid is a poor kid is a poor kid. I find it very unflattering that government members opposite would try to paint a picture for those citizens by throwing away their lifeline to dignity, to hope for a better future for them and for their children in the years to come.

I would only hope, Mr. Speaker, that members opposite would see their way in understanding that Bill C–69, which was introduced at an earlier time, is wrong both in terms of its substance and the effects it will have on Canadians. Equally so, Bill C–32, which in its very substance, the procedural way in which it has been introduced, the fact that it had to go to the Supreme Court in order to get some legitimacy, is wrong for the country, is wrong for national unity, is wrong because it hurts those Canadians who need the help most, and that is poor income Canadians wherever they may be, British Columbia, Alberta or Ontario.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to take a moment to perhaps clarify a few things so that those reading or viewing will not be misled by some inaccurate statements that have been made earlier this afternoon.

It has been continually said, and I should point out not by the hon. member from Broadview—Greenwood, but several members of his own party and certainly the NDP before him, that corporations in this country do not pay tax.

I think it should be clear to Canadians now that clearly, Canadian corporations do pay tax. There are very few reasons why they would not. A number of corporate loopholes have been closed with tax reform since 1987. There really remain, perhaps, one or two reasons why a corporation in a given year might not pay tax. It is simply because they have carried forward losses from the year before or in the year of paying tax, rather than make a profit, that corporation had a loss.

Even with the large corporation tax that was brought in by this government, many large corporations in this country which in a given year had a loss would have to pay tax under the large corporation tax which is essentially a minimum tax for corporations.

So it is really unfair in 1991 to categorize any Canadian corporation as not paying any tax.

The other thing I just wanted to make a brief comment on was this continual reference to cutbacks. Clearly there is no cutback. I do not understand how members can stand in their place and talk of cutbacks when what we are doing with this program is merely restraining the increase in spending and increase in transfers to three provinces to 5 per cent. How can we talk about cutbacks when we increase the funding of these programs. Only in three of the provinces, the three richest provinces in the country, are we in fact restraining the growth of those programs to 5 per cent.

So in those provinces, that is, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, the federal transfers under CAP will increase this year up to the 5 per cent.

Limiting the growth of CAP does not put Canada's welfare system at risk. With the federal government's support for provincial social assistance, spending will continue to grow in all provinces, including Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. Fortunately, the economy is growing but we need to continue with responsible fiscal policy to ensure that the recovery is stable and long term. Economic growth and more jobs is the best way to help people regain their financial independence.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugene Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in this debate on Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, introduced by the Conservative government. The purpose of this bill is to extend for two to five years the 5 per cent CAP on transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan. This CAP only applies to provinces who do not receive equalization payments at present, that is to say British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

In 1984, Prime Minister Mulroney during the election campaign stated with great fanfare that it was a sacred trust. He claimed that he would never touch or cut social assistance, medical programs and the whole social fabric of Canada.

• (1730)

Since then, for over seven years, the Prime Minister and his Tory government have made one cut after another. I heard government members say: "Oh well, you know Ontario, Alberta and BC are very rich. They can afford such cuts." Let me tell you that the poor happen to gravitate towards these provinces. Social programs are very strong in these provinces, at least they used to be until this government assumed power.

I had the privilege and the pleasure of serving in the regional government of Ottawa—Carleton. During my tenure, I sat on the Social Services Committee for five years and had the opportunity to realize how many people were in fact gravitating towards our so-called prosperous regional municipality of Ottawa—Carleton in order to be able to benefit from social services.

[English]

The Social Planning Council for the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton predicts in the two first years of these cutbacks that the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton will suffer in the amount of $600 million.

[Translation]

I am sure that government members will say: "Oh well, the regional municipality of Ottawa—Carleton is very rich." Well, the regional municipality of Ottawa—Carleton has its share of poor people and provides programs like other municipalities. Some of the social programs we provide are:

[English]

Single parent families, mentally and physically disabled persons, the aged, children in care or who need protection because of abuse and neglect, the unemployed, families and individuals in crisis, low income workers, battered women.

[Translation]

The list goes on. I have even seen people who could not pay for their own relatives' funerals. The taxpayers of the region pay for those people.

This means that property and provincial taxes in Ottawa-Carleton, in my riding of Carleton-Gloucester, will go up more and more because when you set a ceiling on assistance, it does not stop there. There are no fewer poor people, welfare recipients, battered women or abused children. It does not reduce their number. The unemployment rate is over 11 per cent. One often forgets that people on welfare are not counted. The number of people on welfare is phenomenal.

Is the number of welfare recipients reduced by cutting transfer payments to the provinces? The provinces are caught in a vice. The money spent on social programs comes largely from municipal governments. This means that from now on the municipalities will have to pay more for these programs. It means that people will pay through their property tax, which I think should not be used for this kind of program, because some people have lived in a house for a long time and after a while they are on a fixed income; they can barely survive themselves without going on welfare. They can barely make ends meet and pay their property tax.

So social programs will be further abused instead of making it proportional throughout Canada. It must be paid for. If people are in distress, they must be helped. They can be helped by taking money out of the left, right or back pocket, but money must be found to help them or they are left behind.

Since there do not seem to be such heartless people in Canada, efforts will certainly be made to contribute through the property tax, but it is not the right tax for this kind of service.

We talk about global competition, work, our students having to learn more trades; we talked about free trade with the United States, but now we talk about free trade with the Mexicans. Soon we will talk about competition with the Orient and with Europe. Do we have the students and the skilled tradespeople we really need in our industries? Will cutting education help our industries?

It is a negative approach. We must spend on research and education. It pays dividends. The more educated people are, the more skills they have, the more productive they can be and the more tax they can pay to help the whole machinery of government, the whole government, the whole country.

As for medical services, by cutting federal-provincial transfer payments, are we helping our hospital system or is this Conservative government trying to imitate the medical system in the United States, which is divided into two classes, one for those who can pay for medical services and another for those who cannot and are left out in the street? That is not how we do things here in Canada. We have always spoken of sharing. Our philosophy of life is sharing.

Here is a government that refuses to share its wealth for education, for the provinces' medical system and for welfare recipients. Instead, it prefers to share their money by giving contracts to the very rich all over the country. My experience on the Public Accounts Committee shows me that there is a lot of waste in federal government contracts.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am not happy to be speaking in this House on this bill. I do not think this is the kind of legislation that this House should be seized with. Clearly it is an attack on three of our provinces in terms of their ability to assist people in need, clearly an attack on their ability to provide the necessary social programs to deal with the upheaval caused by this government in fact through its economic policies.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–32 allows for the extension of the 5 per cent limit on the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario. I think people will also remember that Bill C–69 capped CAP at 5 per cent of the federal increases until 1992. This bill extends it to 1995. This is the only mechanism by which the federal government funds social assistance and social services. The government introduced these measures in the name of fiscal restraint and said that the rich provinces that are affected can afford the cap. Well 50 per cent of Canada's poor live in B.C., Alberta, and Ontario. It does not matter where you live. If you are poor, you are poor and do not have enough money to provide the basics of life: food, clothing, shelter.

• (1740)

The irony is that, particularly from Ontario's point of view, the same government that is saying that fat cat Ontario can afford it is the one which attacked the budget of the Ontario government. It found itself in a situation of having to have a deficit. It recognized that expenditures were increasing, particularly in the area of social services. At the same time because of the loss of over 385,000 jobs that revenues were declining, this government has the audacity to attack that decision in order to try and protect the people of Ontario from the impacts of the recession.

In fact, a very major portion of that $9.7 billion deficit is directly attributable to this cap on CAP. It has reduced cash flows back to the taxpayers of Ontario who paid them in the first place. This is the end result of this particular legislation.

I think it is fair to suggest because B.C., Alberta and Ontario have had an image of being prosperous that when people in Atlantic Canada, from the prairies in terms of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, or people from the north find they cannot get employment in their own province or territory, they look to these three for opportunities. A lot of time they go there "on spec" only to find that the recession is worse in Ontario in particular than it is in their own province, and that there are no jobs. They end up on social services and the provinces end up having to pick up more and more of the costs.

I want to remind you that it is not just provincial income taxpayers who are bearing the burden. It is municipal property taxpayers who pick up 20 per cent of the cost. I know that in my own municipality of Thunder Bay the cost to the property taxpayer has risen enormously. We have had to add more social workers, more clerks to process social assistance, more people to help those who have found themselves not only without a job but without the necessary income to support their families.

In a lot of ways they are also victims of another policy of this government, and that is the reduction in unemployment insurance benefits.

In my community in the last three months alone we have had one pulp and paper mill close, putting 450 people directly out of work. We have had another mill lay–off in the neighbourhood of 400 to 500 employees permanently. We have the Port Arthur shipyards which is down to about 60 workers this week with 100 or so laid off. We have the grain industry that is in difficult times. We have a minor rebound right now, but we do not have 1,000 or 1,200 people handling grain in Thunder Bay any more. Most of those people have lost their jobs and we are down to a permanent work force of about 400. CanCar Rail which is between contracts has hundreds laid off, and at the other end of the riding we have one lumber mill which shut down in November. We were able to get it started again this spring through the assistance of the Ontario government. We have a second one in Atikokan that is currently shut down and we are trying to find a new owner in order to get it started again.

The community of Atikokan had 60 per cent unemployment this winter. The unemployment rate in Thunder Bay is in the double digits.

The point I am making is that all these people had expected to get decent treatment by the federal government when it came to unemployment insurance, only to find that their deferred earnings in the form of vacation pay, deferred earnings in the form of severance pay, counted against them. More and more people are finding themselves on welfare much earlier than they should have been.

It is the property taxpayer and it is the provincial income taxpayer who are being forced to pick up the extra costs, or it is the provincial governments that are being forced to pare even further in terms of the assistance that the provinces can provide municipalities, hospitals, school boards, et cetera.

This legislation we are dealing with today is part of a systematic destruction of our social service network in this country. It is a very blatant attempt to pass the problems from the federal level to the provincial level. As we have seen in the past, the Tories have just learned from the Liberals. They just pass it right on to the municipalities where the only choices they have are cutting services, raising property taxes or raising user fees.

It is a systematic attack. They say they are doing this in the name of restraint, in the name of the deficit. A Statistics Canada study showed how erroneous that kind of statement is. Only 6 per cent of the deficit is due to program expenditures. Forty-four per cent is due to the kind of tax breaks that are given to the powerful and wealthy in this country, changes to the tax system to allow more and more loopholes to exist, more and more people to avoid not just part of their taxes but all of their taxes.

We as a country suffer because they are not paying their fair share of our programs. Whether it is social services, whether it is defence, whether it is transportation, any of the services provided directly or indirectly by the federal government, they suffer because of the kind of taxation policies that this government operates under and this government believes in.

The bill itself will make it very difficult for new programs to be developed, to be established. Very clearly it shows how the government said one thing at election time knowing full well that it was going to another thing.

It looks like my time has run out for the moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.47 o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved that Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code (terminally ill persons), be read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a life issue. So many times life issues are happy to talk about, like the life issue this week in my family is the birth of my grandson, Joshua Robert Christopher Payne, the first born of my only daughter. I have got all my pictures here. I want to show them and I want to tell the world about this joyous event so that the Chair can share with us, our family and the world the great joy and celebration about the new young Canadian who came into the world this week.

An hon. member: Are you a grandfather?

Mr. Wenman: I am a grandfather, that is right. That is true very much of some of the joyous issues about life, the process of beginning and an end that leads to a beginning that leads to an end, those great cycles.

There are some issues in life that are not quite so easy to talk about. The recent death of my parents, and the death of one's parents is a natural occasion for all to experience who are around this age, I find very hard to talk about here because it still hurts a fair amount.

• (1750)

If we are talking about that death or we are talking about the death of friends or family or those who are close to us, it is something we kind of put aside. If we are talking about your death and all of those listening today, that is something we do not talk about. We do not usually talk about it until it is a bit too late, and then a person is very ill and we do not think we should bring the matter up.

I think it is our responsibility, as legislators who do regulate through law life and death issues from cradle to grave, to confront this issue on behalf of the people we serve here.

I think most people have a romantic thought about death hoping that they will be one of the lucky ones, that somehow they will fall asleep painlessly one night, quietly with one's family and friends around, at peace with ourselves, our family, our friends and the world, a Utopian kind of ending. This is an ending that has come to us through history.

John Keats described it this way in the early 1800s: "Darling I listen; and for many a time I have been in love with easeful death, calling him soft names in many a mused rhyme, to take into the air my quiet breath; now more than ever seems rich to die, to cease upon the midnight with no pain".

This is a very romantic and comfortable thought about death, but Shakespeare was probably a little more right when he said: "Last scene of all that ends this strange eventful history is second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything".

Those were views of the older days when death was an easier, more simple, natural process. A people's faith in technology and their search for eternal life know no bounds in the modern world.

In this new age of advancing medical technology in which death finds no easy piece or end and life is extended again and again and again, one can sustain their dying connected to machines and strapped to their hospital bed, rotting and suffering until all or most of their body parts are gone and then what is left can be frozen and refrigerated into eternity until some kind of technology is going to find a new life for that remaining piece.

For those who wish to extend their lives in that way I give them their right and their privilege, but for me and I think for many others, if I am lying in a comatose state or losing my senses and losing my mobility and my capacity to think, or as Shakespeare says "sans everything", there is a time when enough is enough. When will science and the state allow my will and God's will to prevail and allow a natural death? When does natural life end? When does death begin in this modern age or, for the Christian ethic, when will technology end and allow the individual to call for an end to treatment and suffering and put himself or herself in the hands of God so that the beginning of death leads to the ending of life and the beginning of a new life after death?

Who will make that tough, tough decision in this modern technological world? Will it be the state that decides for you and me? Will it be the medical profession, the family, the pastor or some other individual or the individual himself?

I would hope that it would be a combination of these people expressing themselves in the format of a written health care directive or a living will.

That kind of clear process eases the pain of death not just for the person who must pass through it, but for those who are left behind who have understood it and thought about it before the event.

It ends the bickering, arguing and the hurt of families to some degree, and I think that is what we want to try to do. We want our most difficult life experience of all to be eased from the pain and suffering and to sustain the maximum quality of life to the longest point that we can. At that point there should be a choice of allowing natural death to occur.

This bill deals with amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada. Specifically it deals with the serious subject of the right of individuals who are in the latter stages of terminal illness to refuse and withdraw from medical treatment in order that the timing of a more natural death may preclude unnecessary pain and suffering.

In essence, this bill allows all of us in the House of Commons to address this question. This bill is not a be all and an end all. It is not the final answer. It is an opportunity to raise the subject. It is being raised by our constituents and it is being raised by the Canadian Medical Association and the bar associations. They say that we need a clarification and that our courts want to know. Our medical profession wants to know.

They want some clear direction from the Government of Canada and a clarification of the Criminal Code of Canada. This bill attempts to do that. It attempts to allow individuals to die with a sense of dignity and purpose, sustaining a quality of life that is acceptable and understandable to that dignity.

Advances in medical technology have allowed terminally ill patients to live well beyond and longer than is naturally possible. I want to continue that. I am for the extension of the maximum quality of life to the very end, and I will want that for my life and for the life of everyone I know.

The ability to live longer can also result in a diminished quality of life for those who suffer from degenerative and incurable diseases in particular. As a society and a government, we can no longer avoid this issue.

Canada is becoming an aging society. We are seeing a growth in incurable diseases like cancer, Alzheimers, AIDS, and there is a rising demand in our society for self–determination over the length of one's medical treatment. Yet there exists virtually no governmental regulations or judicial guidance concerning the right of the terminally ill patient to refuse or withdraw treatment.

We need to clarify this in the code and then make way for the living will process that has been passed now in Ontario and is being considered in other jurisdictions.

I take this fundamental position. As a Parliament we must take the opportunity to pass legislation which provides terminally ill patients with the power to determine when they no longer wish to be subject to medical treatment. It sounds so much like common sense that I cannot imagine that there would be inhibitions to that in the law.

Moreover, such legislation should provide the medical profession with the right to do so by the patient or that patient's designated care giver. Terminally ill patients must have the right to determine their own length of treatment. Physicians must not be held liable for following their own patients' wishes.

The Canadian Medical Association Ethics Committee addressed this in its convention this summer and basically it has come up saying the same kind of thing, establishing that this as an ethical practice but one that is probably slightly ahead of the law.

At this point I would like to outline the state of legislation in Canada on this issue and what I feel can be done to make improvements.

A strict reading of the Criminal Code would indicate that withholding treatment from the terminally ill might constitute a criminal offence. The Criminal Code has a number of sections which either indicate or seem to indicate that doctors must provide their patients with full treatment regardless of circumstances.

Section 14 of the code reads: "No person is entitled to consent to have death inflicted on him", while sections 45 and 215 further impede the right of patients to refuse treatment or doctors to follow their patients' wishes.

• (1800)

According to Law Reform Commission of Canada working paper 28, cessation of treatment may be an illegal act under a number of provisions of the Criminal Code, ranging from homicide to failure to provide the necessities of life, or even aiding suicide.

It may come as a surprise to many Canadians that there are no laws in Canada which permit physicians to stop administering medical treatment under any circumstances, even at the patient's request. There are no laws allowing doctors to halt treatment if it is no longer serving any useful purpose or is clearly no longer in the best interests of the patient.

The effects of lack of clear laws on the medical profession and its patients is of great concern to many of those who have moved into the powerless state of terminal illness. My outreach to various medical and patient groups has led me to the conclusion that the requested withdrawal of medical treatment for terminally ill patients merely reflects what is common practice in many hospitals and palliative care units across Canada.

My legislation that I am presenting today in many cases would have the effect of legitimizing common practice. In Canada to date there is no record of conviction of a doctor for shortening a patient's life by refusing to provide treatment, which is not to say there would or could not still be convictions or charges. However, the result of potential sources of criminal liability has provided great instability in the medical profession on this issue and has inevitably caused some doctors not to carry out their patient's wishes to halt medical treatment because of their fear of the law.

Currently some doctors will make it their practice to sign a "do not resuscitate" order to end medical treatment at a patient's request, and still others have to be coerced into doing so. Others will simply refuse to stop treatment for fear of legal consequences.

This legal void may already have encouraged discrepancies in the quality of medical practices and services throughout the country. It may have led to life and death issues and decisions based on ethical position of a particular doctor rather than as guided through legislation.

Under the current law, many people who decide to withdraw from medical treatment are forced to die alone because loved ones fear being charged under the Criminal Code for aiding and abetting suicide, or even manslaughter if they simply remain with the patient. It may be more than the patient, it might be a mother, father, brother or sister. If they stay with them, they are afraid of prosecution.

It is truly unjust, unfair and harshly cruel to deny a terminally ill patient the comfort of their loved ones in their final moments.

What this legislation does is provide for the right of terminally ill patients to refuse further medical treatment and the right of physicians to follow their patients' wishes in these circumstances.

As concern for the right to die with dignity has become widespread, and as a greater portion of our population reaches old age, more Canadians are looking to formulate documents such as living wills or advanced health care directives to make it clear at what point of terminal illness they would no longer wish to receive medical treatment.

I think it is time that we act, that we act now. This is not my specific concern now, but it is the concern of all of us. It is the responsibility of all of us to remove as far as the law can the pain, the suffering of a person who must pass through this time, to remove some of the fear, some of the uncertainty, and to assure that quiet, peaceful death that is, of course, the object and hope for all of us.

I recommend this bill to you, Mr. Speaker, and I look for support from all parties in the House of Commons to assure that it is carried forward.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Fraser Valley West for asking me to speak on Private Members' Bill C–203, an act to amend the Criminal Code (terminally ill persons). Although I rise as the Liberal critic for National Health and Welfare, there is another plain on which I also studied this particular bill. It is a bill that could affect personally and profoundly physicians and members of the health care teams.

As a physician by professional background, I have stood at the bedside of patients and upon request written a "no resuscitation" order on the chart. Writing those two words runs against my first prerogative as a doctor, knowing that first and foremost it is my duty to sustain life. But life of what quality, I ask?

Is life in a coma, fed intravenously and given breath through a respirator, with brain activity almost non–existent, the kind of life I, myself, would choose before death? What of a life where the body constantly contorts in pain, racked by spasms and unrelenting agony? I would refuse to live like that unless I was sure at the end I could be healthy once again.

To be healthy again is not a possibility for terminally ill people at the final stage of their diseases. It could be Parkinson's, AIDS, cancer, cystic fibrosis, or any number of horrific illnesses that brings patients to the end of their lives. It is at this time that the manner of our deaths comes to the forefront, and I think it is being addressed by this bill.

I believe in the patient's right to die with dignity. But there are a myriad of aspects to the right to die question. These aspects need more redress than this bill may allow. Issues like suicide, death for economic reasons, pressure by family members, the feeling of burdensomeness and that the dying are a strain on the health care system, all must be resisted. I believe the possibility exists that people could be pressured into selecting a quick death and use the medical system to terminate their lives, and that must be resisted too. No one should feel pressured to die for convenience.

The present bill hopes to add section 217.1 to the Criminal Code. This new paragraph states:

> Nothing in sections 14, 45, 216 and 217 of the Criminal Code shall be interpreted as (a) requiring qualified medical practitioners to commence or continue to administer surgical or medical treatment to a person who clearly requests that such treatment not be commenced or continued.

This paragraph alone could lead to complacency, I must point out, in patient care. An elderly woman may be languishing in her hospital bed, with a "no resuscitation" order on her chart, when she is struck by cardiac arrest. The nursing staff stand by, obeying the order, but making the woman as comfortable as possible, knowing this moment was imminent.

They call a doctor but not the crash emergency cart. The heart monitor begins to flatline and she is gone. Quickly dispatched, as were her wishes. Then an autopsy report reveals the woman's cardiac arrest was caused by a clogged respiration pipe, or a piece of food lodged in her throat. Is this the way she wanted to die? Does it make a difference? To medical ethicists, to caring staff, patients and family, the difference in manner of death would be viewed as wrong.

How would the Criminal Code deal with incidents like these? Could the hospital be charged with negligence and malpractice? Should it be? It is a situation like this I greatly fear. Every "no resuscitation" order I write on a chart is followed by lengthy details, qualifying this order after consultation with patient, nursing staff, other doctors and the patient's family. Life is precious when there is little left to live.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor but I must request the collaboration of all hon. members because the Chair and the people watching us can hardly hear. Thank you for your collaboration.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I repeat: life is precious when there is little left to live. To be taken prematurely, to be taken at all, is tragic.

I would like to think that this type of bill would never need to be introduced, but this is not an ideal world. Technology has advanced at a dizzying pace. We have machines that breathe, feed, clean the blood, start the heart and pump blood. But, ironically, over a dozen people in the past five years have died in hospitals because they were secured with restraining straps and left unattended. No, this is not an ideal world. All the technology in the world are only as good as the caring staff that administers it.

Faith in the medical system is key. Patients and doctors must consult, communicate and understand the wishes of each other. There should be no case where a person is made to suffer because of heroic treatments which may, in the end, serve no purpose. There would not be a case where a patient gives up when there is hope, and sometimes there is still hope when people choose to die. This is a fear of doctors and nurses who have been trained to save, comfort and ease pain. They also cannot complacently accept death. But they know they have to allow death to happen, but must insist not to will death to happen.

Maybe it would be easier not to care as much, to hasten death, to dispense pain killers and watch the light gradually fade from a patient's eyes instead of desperately trying to save.

To the best of my knowledge, doctors do not, as noted in paragraph 217.1(b) "commence or continue to administer surgical or medical treatment to a person where such treatment is medically useless and not in the best interests of the person".

To do so, against an advance directive of the patient, would be an assault. It is a statement like that which throws suspicion on the medical community, and to suggest a medical team would treat someone in that manner is misleading and unfair.

Already there are guidelines instructing doctors how to proceed in such cases. The Canadian Medical Association believes "the right to accept or reject any treatment or procedure ultimately resides with the patient or a duly empowered proxy. The Association also believes that this includes the right to accept or refuse resuscitative as well as life saving and/or life sustaining measures in general, would they become medically indicated."

Mr. Speaker, doctors are there to help the ill. Palliative care is meant to make the dying as comfortable as possible. The health care system, under-funded as it may be, is still filled with people who place the patient first. So, the patient must also give consideration to the doctor. My fear is that the relationship between patient and doctor may dissolve into one based on legalities. The patients may no longer trust a physician to act in his or her interests, and legally instruct the physicians with living wills. I think in all cases this type of legal document is unnecessary, that instead the doctors, nurses and patients can use the advance directive to determine the course of care for a patient.

Matters involving life and death cannot be made in the office of the lawyer entirely. They must be made in consultation with a doctor, and they must be updated as technology and the prognosis for diseases changes.

Another concern I now have is for the education of doctors in matters of death and dying. There are many faces of these two. It takes many years of experience to recognize them. Medical students must begin with a solid background in the care for the terminally ill and incapacitating diseases. A doctor fresh out of medical school may not have the knowledge to question the request of a patient or recognize the shades of dying, whether it be heart attack or trauma related to choking. Consultation with more experienced doctors should be necessary in this case.

In fact, consultation is always a necessity. The wishes of the patient in regard to death with dignity must be clarified with all staff who attend to that patient. There is a fine line between allowing terminally ill patients to die with dignity at their request and aiding in that death.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in support of the bill which has been proposed before the House this afternoon by the member for Fraser Valley West. In rising to support the principle of this legislation, because that is, after all, what we are doing at this stage of debate at second reading in the House, I want to pay tribute to the member for bringing before this House an issue which is both sensitive and important, important to millions and millions of Canadians who had to confront the issues which are addressed in this legislation.

I want to note as well that my colleague and spokesperson for health for the federal New Democrats, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, had very much hoped to be here to participate in this debate, but unfortunately he is not able to be here. As the member for Fraser Valley West knows, he has himself tabled a private member's bill. It differs somewhat from the bill which has been proposed by the member for Fraser Valley West, but certainly in principle it is very much in the same spirit.

I would hope that this House will in fact allow both the bill of the member for Fraser Valley West and the bill of the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing to be referred to a committee of this House so that for the first time we as elected representatives will have an opportunity to hear from Canadians about this very important issue. Indeed it is long overdue.

I do not think we need much evidence of the interest and the depth of concern of Canadians about this issue when we look, for example, at the book by Derek Humphrey Final Exit has been on the top of the best seller list for some time. Obviously Canadians are deeply concerned about the issues that arise.

I rise to urge this House to act on this legislation in a non-partisan way, to send it to committee, to give Canadians an opportunity to be heard on this important question.

I want to note that at the present time in Canada, as the member for Fraser Valley West has pointed out, the Criminal Code of Canada was adopted in 1892 and has not changed in any significant respect on this important issue. It specifically prohibits any person from aiding the suicide of another, even giving advice about methods of suicide, which can result in up to 14 years of imprisonment. In fact, by the current definition in the Criminal Code, euthanasia is indistinguishable from murder since anyone who clearly intends to take the life of another and does so is guilty of culpable homicide.

These laws have been studied over the years by a number of different bodies. I know the Canadian Medical Association has studied them, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Bar Association, and I think it would be very helpful for this House to give an opportunity to representatives of these organizations to appear before the House and give their thoughts on this bill and its principle.

The fundamental principle here is that we must give people the right to make this decision for themselves, this most basic literally life or death decision. This does not in any way diminish our respect for life. Indeed, it is a symbol of our respect for the quality of life and a recognition that people should also be allowed to die with dignity.

I want to pay tribute to those groups in this country who have for many years struggled with this question and who have put this question on the agenda in our country, groups such as Dying with Dignity, the Right to Die Society of Canada, a newly founded group in Victoria which, reading from its leaflet, "affirms the right of any mature individual who is chronically or terminally ill to choose the time, place and means of his or her death. We categorically reject the notion that human beings are to be subjected to the risk of a protracted period of misery and humiliation due to modern medical technology and/or government cutbacks and health and welfare funding".

I would know that this does not in any way preclude our support for those individuals, dedicated hard working individuals in our country, who are working to allow people through palliative care to die with dignity. Indeed we support those groups. I think of groups such as Casey House in Toronto and others that are working incredibly hard and with incredible dedication to ensure that those final days in fact are days of dignity. For those who choose that, we must respect that choice.

• (1820)

There are others who do not have that choice. I think, for example, of my former friend, my late friend Mitch Jacobson who died after a slow, agonizing and painful death. He died of AIDS. He died in Elisabeth-Bruyere Health Centre in Ottawa. I will never forget my friend—blind, he had no senses left, no taste, no feel, he was almost deaf—crying out saying: "For God's sake, stop this pain, stop this suffering", Surely to God, we must allow a man or a woman to avoid that kind of death, to allow themselves to make the decision for themselves, to end that terrible agonizing pain. As Mitch said: "Let me go". I could not let him go. His doctor could not let him go because under the present law that would be considered a criminal offence.

What is the crime in our society? Surely the far greater crime is not allowing men and women in situations such as that to make the decision for themselves.

There were some who were critical of another friend of mine, David Lewis, who also tragically died of AIDS. I am a member, as a gay man, of a community which has been devastated by this epidemic. If I speak with some emotion, it is because I have seen the lives of too many of my friends destroyed by this epidemic for which governments have not done nearly enough.

If at the end David Lewis chose to go with dignity, as he did, surrounded by his friends at a time of his choosing, who are we to say that he was wrong, that he was a criminal, that those who supported him were in some way criminals?

I want to appeal to this House to recognize that this is an issue that Canadians are deeply concerned about. Indeed in August of last year a Gallup poll found that some 78 per cent of Canadians believe that a doctor should be allowed by law to end the life of a patient who has an incurable disease that causes great suffering, if the patient has made a formal request in writing.

I believe that fundamentally. I would go further and support the system in Holland which allows for active euthanasia. I think that we will want to hear evidence before the committee on this issue as well, on the extent to which we should be prepared to move as a society to recognize the rights of people to die with dignity.

A recent study from Holland showed that 11.2 per cent of the patients in the final stages of AIDS died by euthanasia. Recently it has been estimated the figure is as high as 25 per cent.

I want to conclude by once again congratulating the hon. member for Fraser Valley West and my own colleague for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing for the vision and the leadership that they have shown in putting this important question on the parliamentary agenda. I want to appeal to all of my colleagues to recognize the cries of those in our country who say that enough is enough, that we must heed those cries, we must allow people to die with dignity, and surely we must allow this Parliament to give those people a voice to be heard.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege, as the other members have mentioned, to be able to speak on this very important topic today. I am speaking in support of the bill. I believe that it does assist the medical profession in clearing many of the grey areas that have been enumerated today.

Just what is the legal position of a physician in an area where he perhaps removes treatment which could keep the patient alive, or perhaps provides treatment which in order to alleviate pain or suffering may have the side effect of hastening that person's death?

As the hon. member from Fraser Valley West mentioned in his speech, North Americans want to deny that. They do not want to face it, yet we have seen many, many patients in the past who have welcomed the idea of being permitted to leave their pain, suffering and sickness.

In the past, we have seen many physicians who have been criticized. I do not know of anyone who has been actually sued, but they have been taking a lot of criticism because they did not make heroic efforts in order to keep somebody alive who in the physician's opinion had a quality of life not worth the torment that the patient would have to go through.

Very often in the medical profession you are told to do something, it does not matter if it is good or not, you just have to do something. I think that this law permits a physician to do what he thinks is the best thing. Perhaps that is to do nothing but to make sure that that patient is relieved of the suffering.

We are talking in this law today about passive euthanasia. The previous speaker talked about a more active type where death is brought on by a physician. In this particular bill today, we are discussing passive euthanasia. When we use that word, it brings of course a great emotional outburst from many of us.

We have heard today that technology prolongs life, but we do reach that period when as we have mentioned life is intolerable. Perhaps it is nausea, pain or various types of distress and the patient no longer has any will to live. The physician is then faced with the ability to withhold drugs which would prolong the life.

I think here of something like antibiotics in the case of an Alzheimers victim with pneumonia. We can prolong that life. The patient may not know what we have done, but we feel that is unwise, at the same time, perhaps by giving a drug to relieve the pain of a sufferer.

This is mentioned in the second part of this bill, that is, by providing sometimes large amounts of a sedative or morphine that we have the effect of hastening that death.

I thought it would be worth while just to comment for the rest of my time on the stand the Canadian Medical Association has taken. In 1984 as a result of a joint meeting between the Canadian Nursing Association, the Canadian Hospital Association and the Canadian Medical Association, they came forward with a list of directives.

It is called The Resuscitation of the Terminally Ill and was published in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, Volume 136 on February 15, 1987. This has been updated as recently as this last summer at its convention in Toronto.

Because of the shortness of time, I do not have time to read all of it, but I would like to introduce some of the highlights of the report that was produced. It says: "The Canadian Medical Association believes that the right to accept or reject any treatment or procedure ultimately resides with the patient or a duly empowered proxy. The Association also believes that this includes the right to accept or refuse resuscitative as well as life saving and/or sustaining measures in general should they become medically indicated.

Furthermore, the Association believes that under certain circumstances it may be appropriate that a patient indicate the position to other relevant persons by means of an advanced directive whether the patient wants resuscitative measures taken should the occasion for the use arise."

What we are referring to is better known as the living will.

The Medical Association goes on. "The Association is firmly convinced that the decision to accept or reject any medical treatment or procedure should be only made after an appropriate consultative process with a duly qualified health care professional."

• (1830)

In other words, it is essential that the facts be fully discussed with the patient, with the family, and the pros and cons discussed so that the patient understands fully just what he or she is signing.

The medical association also recommends that during the course of the person's illness that these orders be reviewed periodically. In other words, circumstances change, the patient's condition changes, so this should not be taken as a permanent form but should be reviewed periodically.

In another section it says: "If an advance directive is so general as to apply to all possible circumstances that could arise, it is usually so vague as to give no usable direction to the physician." In either case, physicians will have to rely on their professional judgment to reach a decision. This permits a physician in certain circumstances, perhaps something happens such as the member from Winnipeg mentioned, somebody choking on a piece of meat, where they also have a cancer which everybody felt was going to take their life. In this circumstance, the physician would be permitted to overrule the patient's request. It says: " The association therefore suggests that physicians who are involved in the consultative process surrounding such a decision make sure that patients understand the limits that are inherent in such advance decision making."

It goes on further: "Finally, the association suggests that physicians who are involved in the consultative process surrounding advance directives encourage their patients to identify a specific person who will have the legal power to act as a proxy decision maker for the patient should the need for clarification of an advance directive arise."

The association also encourages physicians to inform their patients that in an emergency situation it is not always possible to get in touch with this duly appointed proxy to seek clarification about the advance directive should that prove necessary. Patients should therefore be encouraged to make these directives as clear as possible.

We can see that this is just a small part of the work that the Canadian Medical Association has outlined. I think it would be worth while to review at this time their guidelines for the decision making that the patient has to make.

The first one is, Mr. Speaker, that a patient has the right to accept or reject any treatment or procedure proposed by a physician. This includes CPR, or any other life saving and/or sustaining measure. In other words, the patient is in control. The proposer of the bill mentioned that the patient at the end of life frequently has no control over what happens to them. What this is doing is making sure that the patient is in control at a time when it is most important.

When a competent patient informs an attending physician that such measures should not be undertaken, the physician shall make sure that the patient understands the nature and consequences of this decision. This is not something to be made on an emotional basis, but a result of calm deliberation, and it is up to the physician to make sure that happens.

If, as a result of this communicative process the patient reaffirms this decision, the physician shall record this decision on the patient's health record.

When a patient is incompetent, an appropriate proxy decision maker informs the attending physician of the decision not to engage in resuscitative or life saving and/or sustaining measure. A physician shall engage in the same consultative and communicative process with the proxy as though it were with the patient himself or herself. If as a result of this, a proxy still insists on a request not to apply resuscitative and/or sustaining measures, the physician shall record this decision on the patient's health record.

Mr. Speaker, when this comes to the committee, as I hope it will, there are other guidelines that have been produced by these bodies to assist in the regulations that would naturally follow.

In summary, we feel that the welfare of the patient is the primary object. It is his or her care and comfort that we are looking for, and I believe the quality of life which this bill is protecting is all important.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at this point in time I want to say that I listened very carefully to the member for Fraser Valley West. He certainly raised a lot of important issues. There are some negatives to proposed Bill C–203, which is intended to provide protection for physicians in a number of treatment situations where the patient is terminally ill and where it is said that the legal position is not clear enough to permit the physician to treat or even refrain from treating without the fear of becoming involved in a possible criminal offence.

Similar principles were recommended by the Law Reform Commission of Canada. In the same report the commission recommended against decriminalizing voluntary active euthanasia and was in favour of continuing to treat it as a culpable homicide. The commission also recommended that the offence of counselling, aiding, abetting suicide should not be removed from the Criminal Code or even, indeed, be revised.

Therefore, it has become apparent that it was unnecessary to legislate the principles recommended in the commission's report, because there are already recognized and generally accepted in the case of terminally ill people.

We do have problems within the Criminal Code. It is a criminal offence with regard to euthanasia. Over a number of years now, and I will not go into how long ago, I was involved in a nursing career and did spend quite a bit of time in certain situations that I found extremely difficult where people certainly did suffer a great deal.

It is hard for the family, it is hard for medical people and nurses to see their patients, their loved ones suffering and yet, there are complications with regard to providing legislation that allows physicians the right to practice euthanasia.

I also listened to my colleague from Delta who spoke on the Canadian Medical Association's position with regard to answering some of the issues raised in Bill C–203. I spent a great deal of time listening and he has raised major issues that I think a legislative committee could look into more thoroughly and come up with suggestions.

What I am also saying is, let us get ahead of the issue. I cannot tell you if it will be three, five or ten years before this particular issue is debated. In certain provincial jurisdictions there have been some recommendations. Legally, within our legislation, within the Criminal Code, we have nothing to protect physicians from making a decision with regard to euthanasia. Therefore, it is difficult.

Today physicians are in danger of being charged. We recognize this. There are competency questions of whether the people in making living wills are competent or are not competent for signing agreements and substitute consents. I realize that a lot of these issues have to be looked at more carefully.

There is civil liability in the area of medical practices and a lot of issues within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that we have to be aware of that could prove to be contrary to the bill my colleague has put forward.

I know that today, in the Criminal Code, we cannot accept this. I think we have to take a good look at it. As I said, in my years as a medical professional and also having relatives in senior citizens homes, it is very, very difficult to face death. I do not think any of us here want to see anybody suffer. There can be criteria worked out that I feel can be accepted, not only by the medical fraternity, but the community in general, all assisting health care institutions and the religious areas.

• (1840)

Getting in touch with the church I think is most important.

I just want to say that the negatives are so great that I would like to compliment the member for Fraser Valley and would look forward to seeing this bill discussed in committee.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can just get unanimous consent to conclude with a one–minute remark on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the suggestion. Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has one minute.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that I support the principle of the bill because it is providing an opportunity for Canadians to examine the issue, which is very vital, and by bringing it to the consciousness of Canadians we can address a very vital issue.

I would just like to end by saying that when we examine this bill let us remember the work of the Manitoba Law Reform Commission issued this year, as well as the paramount principle of medical ethics.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I came into the House only moments ago after a committee meeting, not even knowing that this debate was taking place today. But I do not want to let the opportunity go by without expressing at least some concerns that I have.

I wish that the bill would go to committee because I am not against us examining the issue, but I as a person who believes very strongly in the sanctity of life am very concerned with anything that could be done whereby we would start—and I will dare use the words—to play God in any way.

I am concerned with what we see in some European jurisdictions. I am thinking in particular of Holland, a great country but one in which too many decisions, I believe, are taken by members of the medical profession to end human life. That whole subject disturbs me immensely.

We have had debate in the past on other related issues. I am thinking of the debate we had on capital punishment. I said where I stood on that one and that was against capital punishment for the protection of human life. We have had a debate on abortion and again I stood in the same position.

Today I express my concerns with this bill, but I am not one who will block it from going to committee because I do think we have to talk of the issue because it is a very profound one. I nevertheless want to indicate to the House how deeply I feel about the issue. I am sure that other members feel just as strongly as I do, but that should not prevent us from discussing an issue so important as this one.

[Translation]

Some might say, Mr. Speaker, that the issue is much more complex because, with the advance of medicine, who can tell at what stage of life a person dies from natural causes versus being artificially prolonged? Besides, what do we mean by "natural"? In the absence of this information, it becomes very difficult to determine what is not. That is why, notwithstanding my deepest convictions, I would like this matter to be referred to a parliamentary committee. I hope that the government will see to it that it will be considered, that the full process is applied so that witnesses can be heard.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish that the witnesses who will testify before the committee not to be biased one way or the other, no more my way than the other way. I want a real debate to take place, where all views on the issue can be expressed, because I believe that everyone must be heard, not only those who support a legislation such as this one. We should also hear from those who are against.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I saw what happened in a previous debate, the abortion debate, and I am not convinced that the whole process was carried out impartially. I detected some degree of bias in that debate and I want none in this one. I would want us to be impartial and all witnesses to be heard.

[English]

I do not want to speak any longer because I do not want to prolong this debate. I wish the issue to go to committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

PS 2000

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in June I rose in the House and asked the President of Treasury Board if the minister would tell us just what the government's commitment was to pay equity for federal government employees.

The minister responded:

> I would like to reassure the hon. member that pay equity stays there, I mean will be implemented.

In 1984 the Public Service Alliance of Canada filed a complaint with Canada's Human Rights Commission on behalf of 50,000 members of the clerical and regulatory CR group.

It was only after that action that the Treasury Board invited all federal public service unions to participate in a joint equal pay study. The equal pay adjustment which the Treasury Board announced for the CR and ST groups in January 1990 were only one-quarter to one-third of what they were entitled to and owed.

The adjustments announced for the EU group in April, 1990, were about a half of what it was owed. No adjustments at all were provided to the other underpaid groups.

What that really means is that a lot of women who work for this government were cheated out of money they were owed by this government.

As a result, over 15,000 Public Service Alliance members filed grievances requesting implementation of the study results. In the meantime the employer is trying to block the tribunal's investigation of the complaint.

Recently several conciliation board tables that reported back to the President of Treasury Board in recent negotiations prior to last week's strike reported that the current pay equalization payments should be factored into bargaining and that it is important and it is justified for this government to be implementing pay equity during this round of bargaining.

Since 1990 the federal government has twice attempted to block in the federal courts the Canadian Human Rights Commission from investigating the pay equity situation. Chief Commissioner Max Yalden said last week during the dispute with the Public Service Alliance that the federal government is not playing fair with the then striking public service employees.

He found it very strange that the government is still trying to kill a human rights tribunal set up to resolve the pay equity issue while at the same time telling striking employees that the issue should be dealt with by the tribunal, not at the bargaining table. The tribunal hearings began this month.

• (1850)

If the President of Treasury Board were being straight with us in the House that day, if he were serious when he said that pay equity would be implemented, why after these last three months is the Treasury Board still trying to block pay equity?

The question also needs to be addressed of why we as parliamentarians accept that women who are working for the public sector should receive a quarter, a half or a third of what they are owed.

I think it is very important for us to recognize that the Prime Minister in the 1988 election campaign was committed to pay equity. I think it is also important for the Treasury Board to be aware that women in the Public Service Alliance were very clear going back to work this week that they will not accept less than the pay equity they are entitled to.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have very limited time to respond to this question, so I will cover it as fast as I can.

In 1984, during the election, we committed ourselves to pay equity in the Public Service. In March 1985 the President of the Treasury Board put in place a joint union–management committee to investigate and recommend how we could implement equal pay for work of equal value. It concluded that there were approximately 73,400 government employees involved.

On June 27, 1986 the Employment Equity Act received Royal Assent after debate in this House and in committee.

The remedial action that the government decided to take fell into two phases. In phase one the government allocated $317 million for retroactive payment, an average of $4,800 for each employee involved. Phase two allocates $76 million in salary adjustments from April 1, 1990.

Pay equity affects women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and disabled people. The Canadian Human Rights Tribunal has been mandated to examine complaints filed in relation to the equalization adjustments. The government remains committed to pay equity which is not affected by the present negotiation, the zero, three and three that is going on with the Treasury Board and PSAC at the present time.

Let me say this again. The government is committed to pay equity and will continue to be committed in the future. Finally, pay equity is not on the negotiating table in the current discussions between PSAC and the Treasury Board.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise again a question I asked on September 16, at the very beginning of this new session, about the deplorable economic situation in the Montreal area. I raised that issue earlier, in February and also in June, when we held in this House an important debate on Montreal's economy, which my colleague from Saint–Denis organized and participated in.

On this side of the House, Liberal members from the Province of Quebec, from the Montreal area, are very concerned about what is happening in Montreal, Mr. Speaker.

It is easy for the government to rise every day and say the recession is over. Yet, each and every day, thousands of workers are losing their jobs.

That is a very telling example, especially since the Minister of Finance is saying the recession is over. I am not the one making this allegation, it appeared in the September 11 issue of La Presse, where it read: Housing Starts Dropped by 40 per cent in the Montreal Area. We all know the construction business, especially residential construction, is the motor of our economy, because it immediately provides jobs to workers. How can you say the recession is over when 40 per cent of all housing starts, and I am not talking here about sales, because this government tells us housing sales are up. Of course, we are selling old houses, there is speculation, and so on. But a 40 per cent drop in housing starts in August only is terrible and is not helping Montreal at all.

Here is another article published on September 18: "The East of Montreal is agonizing—10,000 more unemployed than in 1986". However, the government is still boasting that it's all the fault of the Liberals, that it is all the making of the bad Liberals. Look at the numbers: 10,000 more unemployed than in 1986. And we have a Conservative government since 1984. Texaco, 380 jobs lost; BP, 226; Esso, 500; Gulf, 450; Biscuits David, 437.

Here, I am hearing voices, Mr. Speaker, this is the voice of the hon. member for Mercier who was supposed to protect the only refinery left in the East of Montreal, if I remember correctly, in 1985–86. Maybe she should read what she said at the time, instead of shouting in the wilderness. Steinberg, 591; Daoust–Lalonde, 211; Vickers, 380; Kemtek, 250; and the last one, Mr. Speaker, Angus, 900 jobs. This was last week.

You seem to be telling me that my time is nearly up, so I will just read a few more articles: "Job stagnation in Montreal until to 1995". Yes 1995, Mr. Speaker, and we are in 1991. So, where is the economic recovery for Montreal?

Here is another one, dated September 10 in the Journal de Montréal "Nobody cares about Montreal", Mr. Speaker. And finally, last week, and I will conclude on that, some people in Quebec met to find a solution. Quebec leaders, under the chairmanship of the Conseil du patronat du Québec, found 48 projects and the only thing they asked the government for, Mr. Speaker, and I will end on that, was to have the dollar at 80 cents, but the government keeps saying that we should let the dollar rise every day.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to answer my friend and colleague on the economic revival of Montreal and I would like to draw the attention of the member for Saint–Léonard on an event that I attended yesterday in Montreal. He forgot to mention the newspaper clippings that said:"Merck Frosst opens a new research centre in Kirkland".

The president of this multinational thanked this government, this minister, who is even from Alberta, for having worked on bill C–22, but not you who, again, jammed this bill with your Liberal senators with the exception, I must admit, of the member from Saint–Denis who was with us.

I was present at this inaugural, Mr. Speaker, and I have never seen anything like that: 4 500 people from research and technology under a tent.

I must admit that it was a large tent. It was a big event.

Mr. Speaker, the prime minister is the minister responsible for Montreal and the research centre and I can tell you also that there were not many Liberals, not even one of them, because it was Bill C–22 and the Speaker remembers it.

So, the President congratulated us, Mr. Speaker, and I can tell you that the largest research center in Canada will now be in Quebec, in the Montreal area. It will not be difficult to find. It will create 300 new quality jobs in Montreal, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress the fact that yesterday's ceremony was the concrete result of Bill C–22. We, on this side, strived to make of this bill an extraordinary piece of legislation, whereas the Liberals did everything they could to prevent it from passing, to make Montreal suffer. They were the ones who made the most ridiculous arguments. Mr. Speaker, they went as far as predicting the worst catastrophes for the Canadian pharmaceutical industry and for consumers.

Well, the president of Merck Frosst himself emphasized that the new centre was a direct result of the adoption of this bill which encourages businesses to invest in Canada. All that was confirmed by the Quebec minister, Gérald Tremblay, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate, because I would have also liked—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is this old latin saying Dura lex, sed lex meaning "the law is strict, but it's the law." So, according to the rules, I must now recognize the hon. member for Edmonton—East.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, and through you to all Canadians, the Mulroney Conservatives have now sold 20 per cent of our national energy company as the Petro-Canada interim report for the six months ending June 30, 1991, put it and I quote: "The sale of shares ends Petro-Canada's status as a Crown corporation". Petro-Canada, serving as a 100 per cent Canadian totally publicly-owned energy company is gone, not for a little while. It is gone forever.

What have we lost? We have lost a vital public policy tool. No future national government will be able to use Petro-Canada to help keep foreign oil companies honest by being the one company, our company, we can reasonably expect would not gouge us at the gas pumps. Petro-Canada can never be used to help keep energy profits in Canada for reinvestment here. Petro-Canada can never be used to help lead us toward a greener energy future by actively promoting conservation and alternative energy sources, and by taking even such modest steps as collecting, recycling and selling used engine oil or marketing ethanol produced from grain, an environmental choice product, nation-wide.

Canadians are also losing a potful of money, billions of dollars. My very rough estimate is that Canadians will lose at least $4 billion on this sale.

I tried to make changes to the Tory privatization bill to guarantee that the sale would at least recover for Canadian taxpayers the $6.8 billion they have invested in Petro-Canada over the years. That is right, $6.8 billion in 1990 dollars.

Unfortunately, the Conservatives and Liberal members of the committee studying the bill defeated my fiscally responsible amendment, but that is not all. The minister himself admitted that a lot of money that it raised from the sale, including the approximately $520 million from the sale of the first 20 per cent of the shares, will never be returned to the taxpayers. It will be ploughed right back into the company.

I am not joking. The buyers of Petro-Canada will have your cake and will be eating it too. If you sold your house and then gave the money back to the people who bought it, your kids would have you put away. Any psychiatrist in the land would back them up because it is lunacy.

There are two more layers of bitter frosting on this particular nut cake, Mr. Speaker. First, Canadian taxpayers will be shelling out millions of dollars to investment dealers to facilitate this legalized theft of public money. Second, the money that the company will get from the first sale, that $520 million, will make it financially possible for Petro-Canada to assist in the government scheme to ship Canadian oil from the Hibernia field straight past Canadian refineries, located in regions of double digit unemployment, to United States refineries. The lunacy never ends.

I will tell you this, Mr. Speaker. If after it is all finally gone and the last government share is sold, the people of Canada have recouped more than $2.5 billion in 1990 dollars, I will eat the Hansard of the entire Bill C-84 debate including the committee transcripts.

Let me conclude then by repeating the question I asked the minister on June 19, 1991. It is this: " What is the government's best estimate of how much money will be returned to the Canadian treasury once from the sale of Petro-Canada shares once those Petro-Canada shares are completely sold off, the government's best estimate, even a ballpark figure."

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the remarks of my hon. friend from Edmonton East.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Petro-Canada Public Participation Act which received Royal Assent on February 1, 1991, permits the government to sell of its shareholding in Petro-Canada and allows the company to issue and sell treasury shares. This gives Petro-Canada the financial flexibility it needs to fully participate in the development of Canada's significant reserves alongside its private sector counterparts.

Not only does this government hold the view that state ownership and state control are not necessary in the Canadian oil and gas industry, but we also believe that it is in the public interest for Petro-Canada to raise the new equity it needs directly from investors rather than continuing to rely on the Canadian taxpayer. In short, the privatization of Petro-Canada is a matter of simple common sense and sound economic management.

I am happy to report that Petro-Canada has completed the first crucial step in moving into private sector hands. On July 3, Petro-Canada's initial public offering of treasury shares closed, netting the company over $520 million. As promised, Petro-Canada has used these proceeds to pay off some of its debt, thereby improving the company's financial position. As evidence of the success of this offering, over 100,000 Canadians purchased shares, including many small investors. Petro-Canada's employees were also eager to participate directly in the company's future, as over 80 per cent bought shares through the employee share purchase plan.

While the government continues to hold a substantial majority of the outstanding common shares, it has promised not to interfere in the operations of the company.

The government is also committed to selling all of its shares in Petro-Canada, subject to market conditions and other relevant factors. As the minister explained to the hon. member for Edmonton East last June, it is premature to speculate on the amount the government can expect to receive from the sale of thee shares.

Given the size of Petro-Canada, it is conceivable that it will take a number of years for the government to significantly reduce its holdings in the company. The value that we receive for our shares when we go to market will depend on a number of factors, including the outlook for the oil and gas industry, Petro-Canada's financial and operational performance and the prospects for growth, competitive forces and the over all market condition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Your time is over.

I apologize. There are no questions of privilege on adjournment motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, last week, and previously in May and June of this year, I raised questions in this House on an issue of great concern to the Canadian public.

The issue I raised had to do with the quick entry of Mr. Al-Mashat and his family into this country as landed immigrants. Mr. Al-Mashat was the previous Iraqi ambassador to the United States.

There were really two issues at stake at the time this issue was before the House in the spring of this year. There was the issue of how it was possible for this gentleman and his family to gain such quick entry into this country ahead of a long list of very eligible people. That was one issue.

The second issue which arose was the way that our government ministers handled this particular issue. Instead of taking responsibility for the mistaken quick entry of this gentleman and his family into this country, our ministers in this House blamed their bureaucracy for the quick entry of Mr. Al-Mashat. They not only blamed their bureaucracy, but they named particular members of the bureaucracy who were to blame.

In absolving themselves of responsibility for the quick admission of the Al-Mashats into this country, the government very selectively quoted from the McGrath report, quoting verbiage from that report which would support their statement that they were not responsible, leaving out other items whereby it was clear that the ministers in this case were ultimately responsible for the quick entry of this family into Canada.

To quote from that report, specifically it said: "Where ministers do involve themselves directly in administration, it follows that they will be accountable for their specific decisions. Moreover, they will continue to be held accountable in Parliament by traditional means."

What happened was that our former Secretary of State for External Affairs himself put into place the procedures that were to be followed by his own bureaucracy. From the information our investigating parliamentary committee received, those procedures were followed to the point.

Despite the fact that officials of the department followed all the procedures that were outlined, the minister absolved himself of responsibility and blamed those same bureaucrats for the quick entry of the Al-Mashats into this country.

It is interesting, I am sure, to the Canadian public, what happens as a consequence of being blamed for misprocedure in this House. The Under-Secretary of State has received a position as Ambassador to Italy and his associate is Ambassador to Brussels.

There was an investigation looking into a lost secret memo which was a key as to whether or not in fact, the minister was informed of the desire of the Al-Mashats to come into this country. That secret memo was lost.

• (1910)

The present Secretary of State for External Affairs has promised to do an investigation to search for this secret memo. In answer to my question last week, she indicated that this memo has still not been found. I asked those officials who were carrying out the investigation of the department to find the secret memo and make their report to the minister public. Since the hearing into this whole affair was a public issue and there is a strong sense in the public that there was a cover up, I think it is important that the government make this report public as well.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is important to keep the record straight on this matter. The question put before the House tonight had to do with a question the member asked last week with regard to the missing memo.

I should point out that nine-tenths of the remarks she made tonight had nothing to do with the matter of the memo that was missing and was part of her question. It was a polemic about the case before.

The hon. member also neglected to point out that while she was upset with the quick entry of Al-Mashat, so was every other member of this House, including every government member and cabinet member. They were equally upset about that. She also neglected to mention that prior to Al-Mashat's entry, the two ministers in question had turned down the quick entry of another Iraqi diplomat which should have given clear signal that the ministers would not have, had they known, admitted Mr. Al-Mashat.

The member continues to talk about the secret memo. It may be that it was classified secret, but it was no secret. It was widely distributed to the members of the committee. The member has one. She has a copy of this and yet she continues to talk about the secret memo leading the Canadian public to believe that nobody in this House or anywhere else knows what the contents of that memo are. She knows very well what is in that memo and yet she continues to call it that.

There was an investigation conducted, as the minister promised, in the days of June 11 to 26 of 1991, just a few months ago. The security division of external affairs did conduct that investigation. It interrogated all the members of external affairs who could have had contact with that memo and did not find the memo. It discussed the matter with the RCMP, but since there was no criminality suggested in the action, the RCMP said that there should not be an investigation by that force and the matter up to this point, therefore, has been dropped.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the fishing disaster and the disastrous year it has been in Newfoundland in the total fishing industry.

Since May 9 I have been pursuing this with my colleagues on this side of the House. Letter after letter to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and response after response, here we are almost the end of September and we still have not addressed the problem.

Since this House opened there has been a question or a discussion every single day in this House, on two occasions by the Leader of the Opposition. I asked a question of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on September 17. I again raised the issue as a statement today. Yesterday, on September 23, and today, the member from Labrador raised the tremendous concern he had about the situation in Labrador, which is a total disaster. There have been no fish up there at all.

Mr. Speaker, you know what my question is going to be and I can tell you what the response is going to be from the hon. parliamentary secretary. The response from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is: "Yes, I am aware of what is going on, but we are not ready yet." The people in Newfoundland are ready and the people in my riding are ready.

Let me tell you how ready they are. I represent three Bays: Bonavista Bay, Trinity Bay and Conception Bay. Let me say something about Bonavista Bay. One area trapped, last year, 300,000 pounds, this year 14,000 pounds. That is a tremendous reduction in the same bay. Another area needs a response to assist 150 fishermen and 500 plant workers in Bonavista Bay. Let me talk about Trinity Bay.

In one area in Trinity Bay, as I stand and speak, there are 31 people who have not qualified for unemployment insurance. This is a report from the union.

I have another report here. This concerns Conception Bay, and this is from the CEC office which works directly with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The number of employees in one area serviced by a CEC office, in a fish plant area, is 3,200.

The number of those who had any weeks at all as of the end of August is 1,600 and only 100 had a total of 10 weeks, that will qualify for unemployment insurance.

What is happening is that we are raising the concerns of our riding, and I am sure people are sympathetic to it but what I am getting is the response from the government. I am not paid to come up here and take back to my riding the response that the government has. I am paid to come up here and to give the position of the people from my riding, who are in dire situations.

I have three cases in which people cannot afford to send their kids to school because they have not got any money, and they have not got any clothes for the children and they do not have money to put food on the table.

I cannot impress upon this House the urgency of this situation. I know the hon. member for Labrador. He is a very moderate man, and he was angry today. He said: "If you do not give it to me now, don't bother." I am sure he did not really mean that but that is the sense of urgency that we are trying to get into this House and into this government.

The hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, whom I believe and hope understands the situation, has to pressure his cabinet colleagues to come up with an aid package now. He said the fishing industry is not finished yet. It is not over.

It is finished for a lot of people and it is going to be finished for a lot of others, even as we stand and speak.

If you cannot come up with a total package, because he claims the fishing industry is not over, come up with a partial package. Aid those who need it now.

These are extraordinary times, and they cannot have a standard solution. They need to have an extraordinary solution. I am asking the minister and his parliamentary secretary to give me a good answer to that and to tell me there is an aid package coming out tomorrow morning.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member opposite, I can assure him and the House that officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and Employment and Immigration Canada are closely monitoring the situation. They are working on the very problem that he has identified so eloquently here this afternoon.

I can tell the hon. member also that during a recent visit last week the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans met with the premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Wells, and also with Mr. Cashin, President of the Fishermen's Union.

We do realize that many fishermen and plant workers are facing troubling times because they have been able to catch very few fish this season. The severe ice conditions which persisted along the Labrador coast have caused a failure of fish in that area. The conditions along the northeast coast of Newfoundland were somewhat better, but the cold water temperatures resulted in poor capelin and cod fisheries.

For the many industry participants, this is the worst fishing season in recent memory. Inshore ground fishermen and plant workers who rely on the success of this fishery for employment have had their incomes seriously reduced. A comprehensive program of assistance is being developed in co-operation with the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Officials are assessing the options available to provide assistance to those affected by the unusually poor fishing season.

I want to allay the fears of the hon. member and assure him that this government is acting in the interests of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador who depend on the fishery. In May the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a special ice compensation program which was able to provide assistance to those who were prevented from beginning the normal fishing season due to severe ice conditions.

The government's $18 million assistance package helped fishermen get through the period when ice problems delayed the opening of the fishery and the government will act again to ensure that hardship is averted throughout the winter by providing a package to assist the fishermen and the plant workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House now is deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.18 p.m.
