Mr. Justice Pinsent then addressed thera to the effect that, although this action was of a rare and unusual occurrence in this community, he end tirely disagreed with the remarks of the defendant's counsel in saying that there was impropriety, or reflection upon the plaintiff's conduct in bringing this case before the public in a court of juscice. This was a very proper medium for seeking redress, without which he did not know how a remedy could be applied to parties who felt themselves grieved in such cases. Here his Lordship referred to the evidence and told them that in his opinion there was sufficient evidence to sapport a fresh promise to marry and that the only question for their consideration was one of dam. ages. In that respect they should be guided by the respective position of the parties in life, particularly that of the defendant, who was a Bookkeeper in the employment of Mr. Duder at Fogo. They should also take into consideration the youthfulfulness of the defendant in comparison with the maturer age of the plaintiff, who no doubt must have exercised an influence over him which, perhaps, would have been better had she left

WAITING AT THE STILE

Me's yonder at the stile, · He's waiting there for me; I'll greet him with a smile, His heart shall dance for glee

For when I saw him last, I was cruel and unkind; I'll atone now for the past, And with smiles his spirit bind,

How fickle and untrue He must have thought me then ! If all my heart he knew, He would never doubt again.

He has loved me long, and shown That his love is all sincere; And, if the truth were known, To me be's qute as dear,

He's waiting at the stile; Where first his love he told; I'll dower him with a smile, More to him than pearls or gold.
