The Swedish Premier, M. Tage Erlander, in his capacity of party leader, was one of the guests at a rally in Helsinki of the Finnish Social Democratic Party. M. Erlander greeted the Finnish sister party, and expressed his belief that the bonds between the two nations on either side of the Gulf of Bothnia would prevail over all vicissitudes. The Swedish Prime Minister's visit was greeted with satisfaction by all parties in Finland with the exception of the Folk Democrats. The latter, professed to view the visit with suspicion, and the Communist organ, Työkansan Sanomat, delivered an attack which through its absurdity and malevolence must distinguish it from all greetings ever accorded to a leading representative of a friendly Power.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

The Chamber of Representatives assembled on the 25th March to hear M. Spaak's statement of policy. M. Spaak began by describing his efforts to form a four-party coalition. These had failed because of Liberal and Communist disapproval of his suggested programme. The alternative was a coalition of the two major parties, and this had been achieved through a compromise on the country's "main problems." An exception, however, was the question royale, on which "fundamental agreement" had been reached; but the Cabinet as a whole was fully alive to the necessity of promoting "some kind of settlement."

Turning to the details of the Cabinet's programme, M. Spaak dealt first with the question of female suffrage in parliamentary elections. Women, he assured the Chamber, would have to vote "by the end of this year or the beginning of the next." At the moment he did not propose to devote many words to finance, as in the near future the Chamber would hear a full statement on the subject from the Minister (M. Eyskens); but he wanted members to know that it was the Cabinet's intention to "complete" financial reconstruction and to retain the currency policy which had been followed ever since the liberation. The Cabinet, added M. Spaak, was aware that the entire system of taxation needed overhauling; but, for the time being, the "heavy" taxes now operating had to be paid, and attempts at evasion would be "seriously punished." He promised a simplification of the system. The payment of compensation for war damage, he continued, made a "broadening" of the credit system "imperative." Accordingly, the Cabinet proposed to alter the constitution of the National Fund for Industrial Credit so as to make it independent of "private capital": it would be run jointly by representatives of industry, labour and the Cabinet. At the same time, they preferred to modify the statutes of the Banque nationale, so that it, too, would be independent of "private interests" and thus be able the "more fully" to carry out Government policy. The new Cabinet's "economic aims" were identical with those of its predecessor, although different "methods" would have to be employed to achieve them in order to meet the altered circumstances. A Bill for the establishment of an Economic Council, Joint Professional Councils and Production Committees would be drafted and introduced forthwith. M. Spaak then declared that the problem of prices and wages still commanded the situation, and that so long as that was the case controls would have to stay, although their removal could be expected in any industry which could show a pre-war production level. The Cabinet were opposed to a general rise of wages; but it might be necessary to investigate claims for increases in certain industries. State intervention in industry—essential during the immediate post-war period—would cease. His predecessor's decision to raise the average price of coal to 629 francs a ton (which had proved his undoing) would, declared M. Spaak, be adhered to; and Parliament would be asked to approve the Coal Bill which was now before it. The Cabinet's programme for social welfare was comprehensive, and its keynote was the improvement of workers' "material circumstances": the setting up of a permanent system of unemployment insurance; the examination of the conditions of apprenticeship; the granting of unemployment, health and disability benefits; assistance in finding employment; an increase of old-age pensions (to 16,500 francs), together with a "re-equipment allowance" for pensioners of 1,500 francs; an increase of family allowances as soon as the "quarterly budgets" permitted; and financial aid to newly-married couples setting up house. M. Spaak then announced that the housing programme would be the responsibility of the Minister of Economic Co-ordination (M. de Groote). Grants towards the purchase of houses would be increased, and a "bonus system" instituted: the question of extending these grants-in-aid to persons who at present did not qualify for unemployment insurance was under consideration. The Cabinet's agricultural policy had for its principal aims the repeal of "useless regulations," the "organisation of production," the securing to farmers of increased financial returns; and a Bill—the Farm Leases Bill—would be introduced in the Senate.

The "great effort" made by Belgium during the past two-and-a-half years, said M. Spaak in conclusion, had to be sustained "without pause and without weakening." "As far as I know," he added, "we have a stable majority which, I am sure, will keep us on the alert through criticism, and a two-fold Opposition which I hope will enable us to rebuild the country." Of the speakers who followed M. Spaak, the most striking contribution to the debate came from M. Devèze on behalf of the Liberals. In a rather bitter and sarcastic speech, he openly accused M. Spaak of having "manœuvred to keep the Liberals out of the Government." "The Premier," declared M. Devèze, "has now gratified a long-standing wish." He ventured to prophesy a short life for the new Cabinet. Pointing at the C.S.P. benches, he said that "all the Catholic Boy Scouts" had now entered the Cabinet; the contrast between the inexperience of its C.S.P. members and the experience of its Socialist members was "really striking." He thought the C.S.P. had been mistaken in joining the Cabinet "at this juncture." The agreement between the two parties could only encourage "widespread mistrust and opposition"; the main purpose of that agreement was the exclusion of the Liberals.

Winding up the debate (26th March), M. Spaak declared: "I have great hopes of co-operation between the Socialist Party and the C.S.P. I am a Socialist, but nothing in the words 'Social' and 'Christian' offends my ear; and I believe that the future of Europe lies in the combination of Socialism and Christian civilisation." A motion of confidence in the Government was carried by 148 to 13, with 22 abstentions, the Liberals voting against the motion and the Communists abstaining.

FRANCE

The National Assembly broke up last week for the Easter recess after voting another three months' provisional credits, amounting to 110 milliard fr. The Budget proper will be presented to the Assembly this month. The Minister of Finance has attributed the delay to his desire to produce a balanced ordinary Budget and he told the Assembly that this object was now virtually secured. Meanwhile an "Axe Committee" is engaged on the task of cutting civil service personnel and appointments: 20,000 posts have already been suppressed, but the goal is 50,000.

The National Economic Council met for the first time on the 26th March. Its existence is provided for in the new Constitution but it is a direct successor of the old Economic Council first set up in 1925. It is consultative but should have more authority than the old Council since the committees of the Assembly are obliged to listen to its advice before economic bills are discussed. The Economic Council has 184 members, representing the different trade unions, employers' and professional associations. At the opening meeting of the Council, presided over by M. Herriot, M. Ramadier referred to the good work done by the old Council and showed that the new one would be closely associated with the work of Parliament.

On the 30th March General de Gaulle made his first public appearance for six months when he unveiled a memorial at Bruneval on the Normandy coast in commemoration of the British raid of February 1942. There was a large audience assembled including H.M. Ambassador and British military personalities. General de Gaulle paid a warm tribute to Great Britain and referred to the co-operation between the Allies and the French resistance movement. His speech did not touch on politics, beyond his usual appeal for national union and some veiled attacks on the Communists, but it is expected that more may come of the speech that he is to make at Strasbourg on Easter Monday.

The last few weeks have seen a crop of scandals and unsavoury incidents, ranging from the discovery of a number of arms depôts in different parts of the country to a duel between the Socialist deputy, Gaston Defferre, and the Radical deputy, Paul Bastid, after a quarrel which arose out of the former's alleged connection with the famous wine scandal (see Summaries Nos. 363–4). M. Defferre's former chief, M. Gouin, has also been cited again by M. Yves Farge in connection with the wine scandal and he has asked to be allowed to make a statement before the committee of inquiry. The affair of the arms depôts was followed by the discovery of a subversive organisation inside the prison of Fresnes and the arrest of an Air Force General. A number of former "collaborators" who had taken refuge in religious houses were arrested, and this immediately led to a violent anti-clerical campaign in the Left-Wing press. The greatest sensation was perhaps caused by the discovery that a certain Joanovici, who had been a leading black marketeer, was both a collaborator and a resister and had useful connections within the Paris prefecture of police. The shortcomings thus revealed within the ranks of the police led to the suspension from his functions of M. Luizet, the Paris Prefect of Police, although his patriotic record remains untarnished. The efficiency of the magistrature has also been brought into question by the affair of René Hardy, another resister who was acquitted of a charge of collaboration with the Gestapo only to be re-arrested a few days later when new evidence was brought against him and he confessed. All these scandals have been used for political purposes by the Communists.

The High Court of Justice, meeting on the 25th March, sentenced to five years imprisonment M. Camille Chautemps, a well-known Radical Minister of the Third Republic, who was one of those Ministers who urged the conclusion of an Armistice in 1940. M. Chautemps is at present in the United States. On the 28th March Admiral de Laborde, commander of the French fleet which was scuttled at Toulon in November 1942, was sentenced to death.

The Franco-Italian Agreement, concluded last November, for the immigration into France of 200,000 Italian workers in 1947, was signed in Rome on the 21st March. The Italians are being received on favourable terms; they will be permitted to send home to their families 40 per cent. of their earnings or, if their families go to France with them, they may send 20 per cent. of their earnings to Italy.

SWITZERLAND

On the 24th March the Secretary of the Swiss Chamber of Commerce in Austria spoke to Austrian businessmen about Austrian-Swiss trade difficulties. He told how the trade agreement of August, 1946, was preceded in November, 1945, by barter agreements with Tyrol and Vorarlberg, which were disguised, rather than superseded, by the clearing agreement of October, 1946. Austrian exports to Switzerland in 1946 amounted to 41,700,000 Swiss francs, which was equal, in monetary value, to the highest pre-war figures. 80 per cent. of these exports were composed of goods manufactured from Swiss materials. Excluding goods delivered by Switzerland though not of Swiss origin, Switzerland exported to Austria goods valued at 19,500,000 Swiss francs. She also delivered relief consignments worth more than 20,000,000 Swiss francs.

Trade between the two countries was hindered by the unfavourable rate of exchange and by the Austrian fuel crisis. In time, Austrian reconstruction and renewed trade in Central Europe would remove conditions which had abnormally increased the mutual dependence of Austria and Switzerland. Switzerland would continue, however, to be dependent on Austrian timber, iron and steel, and would always be a good customer for leather and art goods while she herself could take Germany's place in providing dyes, chemicals and pharmaceutical products. Having introduced many improvements in her export industry during the last eight years, Switzerland is well able to re-equip Austrian industries with high-grade machine tools, textile and timber processing machines.

Three questions of foreign politics hold the main interest of Swiss public opinion. They are Switzerland's joining the United Nations, the future of Germany, and the attitude towards the Soviet Union. Much is said by the Swiss Press and official circles of Switzerland's intention of joining the United Nations, but only if she is allowed to maintain her traditional policy of neutrality.

SPAIN

Don Juan's consultations with his advisers (see Summary No. 384) have only confirmed the line already recorded here. There can be no question of negotiations with General Franco, except such as should lead to his handing over power to the Prince: and the idea of a Regency Council is ruled out. Discussions on the basis of a Right-Left entente are to continue, it being understood that the moment for action will depend on the Generals holding command in Spain, who alone can "deliver the goods." For that reason there can be no overt dealings with the Llopis Government-in-exile as such, inasmuch as it represents the opposite pole of "Republican legality" and includes a Communist Minister.

C267150

Stung to action maybe by the moves of his opponents General Franco chose the eighth anniversary of the Nationalists' victory in the civil war for a formal proclamation of the long talked-of project of restoring a monarchy in Spain. At the tail end of one of his characteristic homilies, on the evening of the 31st March, he announced the setting-up of a Regency Council whose function it should be to nominate a royal successor in the event of his death or disability. Meanwhile the headship of the State, by Article I of the Bill for the succession, is formally vested in the Caudillo. The terms of that Article, as announced, are: "Spain as a political unit is a Catholic and social State which in accordance with its traditions becomes a kingdom.". Article 3 makes it quite clear that the Spanish Horthy will see to it if he can that his successor is someone of his own choosing: . . . . "a person of royal blood, having been proposed by the regency council and the Government together and accepted by two-thirds of the Cortes . . . ." [On the face of it this rules out a Franco dynasty!] But "should it be the opinion of the meeting that no person fulfilling these conditions is available, or should its proposal be rejected by the Cortes, a regent may be proposed." The regency council is to consist of: the Cardinal Primate (or, failing him, the most distinguished archbishop), the Chief of the General Staff (or, failing him, the senior of the Chiefs of Staff of the three Services), the President of the Council of State, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice and the President of the Institute of Spain, together with one counsellor nominated by each of the chief vocational groups in the Cortes.

This specious gesture is exactly in line with the cherished notion of resuscitating "the traditional Council of the Realm" which General Franco trotted out in the spring of 1945, following the proclamation by Don Juan in Lausanne (on the 22nd March) indicating that the claimant to the Throne would have no truck with Franco and the régime and would sponsor a liberal, progressive programme of conciliation. Everything that has happened since then has only fortified Don Juan in those intentions. Nor can the Caudillo imagine, one would think, that such a patent fake will in any way mitigate the general condemnation of his régime abroad—and specifically in the Resolution of the United Nations Assembly of the 12th December last. What he may be playing for is to grapple to himself the wavering allegiance of some of his Army colleagues and other notabilities who may be expected now to take the line of least resistance and stick to their guns—and gains.

For the past three weeks the Spanish press and radio have been orchestrating their hymns of praise for the memory of General Primo de Rivera on the occasion of the anniversary of his death in Paris in March, 1930, six weeks after King Alfonso XIII "dropped the pilot." On the 25th March his body (which was brought to Madrid at the time of his death and accorded a State funeral) was exhumed and laid in state at the Ministry of War. Elaborate arrangements were announced for the translation later in the day of the Dictator's remains to his birth-place, Jerez de la Frontera—where his only surviving son, Miguel, formerly Minister of Agriculture, is now the mayor. All schools and universities were closed in tribute to his memory.

The reason for this unwonted pomp and ceremony is not apparent. Presumably the Government had come to the decision that in present circumstances Spaniards would be disposed to look back with nostalgia to that six and a half years' period of order and (material) progress under Army rule before Republican agitation got under way, and that now was the time to take over, for the greater glory of the Caudillo, the assets of the spiritual heritage of that period, which have hitherto been exploited exclusively by the Falange party through the "legend" of José Antonio, its founder.

There are signs that the personal intrigues of Falange leaders are once more causing the Generalissimo a certain amount of trouble. The name of Manuel Hedilla—the Falange leader who was ousted in 1937 at the time of General Franco's decree for the unification of all parties, by which he became all-powerful—has cropped up again. Since he was released from prison last September he has been lying very low, but now, it appears, some of the Old Guard Falangists are working to stage a come-back for him, as the apostle of the real Party doctrines against the time-servers and yes-men. This group, incidentally, is jealous of the alleged success among some sections of the workers of the Minister of Labour, José-Antonio Girón. Another group, composed of the old original members of the J.O.N.S. (Juntas de Ofensiva Nacional-Sindicalistas) has been nursing the ambition of providing a bridge from the present régime to the Monarchy. One of the moving spirits for this Restoration, with or without Franco, is José-Maria de Areilza, who has acquired much merit by his recent book—"Embajadores sobre España" (see Summary No. 378). Characteristically General Franco has pricked that bubble by appointing Señor Areilza to be Ambassador in Buenos Aires, and he is due to leave on the 1st April. At the same time Tomás Suñer y Ferrer, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—to whom the chief credit for the Argentine trade pact belongs—is also going to Buenos Aires, at his own request, as Consul-General.

It is unlikely in any case that these Falangist stalwarts would commend themselves either to the Monarchist minority groups who have hitherto cleaved to General Franco or, of course, to the "unconditional" Monarchists. Tension between Royalist supporters and the young bloods of the Party is evidently continuing in the capital: there was another affray the other day when Royalist students were set upon for the "offence" of wearing Monarchist badges, and one of them had his skull fractured.

An Anglo-Spanish Monetary Agreement was signed in London on Friday, the 28th March, to come into effect from the 8th April. It will have the effect of superseding the Anglo-Spanish Clearing of 1936 which was revived after the Civil War—a step rendered necessary, in any case, by the need to implement H.M. Government's undertakings under the terms of the Anglo-American Loan Agreement. The new Agreement will remain in force for two years. Each country will be entitled to hold currency of the other up to £2,000,000 to cover the needs of current trade; and, in addition, the Spanish Government agree to hold a further sterling amount of £8,000,000. Being in the nature of a technical readjustment this Agreement, of course, represents no change in H.M. Government's policy towards Spain, nor is it in any way a breach of our obligations under the United Nations Assembly Resolution of the 12th December last. A supplementary Agreement on the lines of those already made with Portugal, Belgium and the Netherlands will be concluded later specifically removing restrictions on the availability of sterling.

ITALY

After a long verbal battle the Constituent Assembly has approved by 350 votes to 149 the contentious Article 5 of the draft constitution which deals with relations between State and Church. The Article lays down that the State and the Catholic Church are each independent and sovereign in their own sphere and that their relations are regulated by the Lateran Pacts of 1929. It is provided that any modification of the Pacts agreed on bilaterally shall not necessitate a revision of the constitution. Other religious faiths are to have the right to organize themselves according to their own Statutes in so far as these are not contrary to Italian law.

The Lateran Pacts of 1929, consisting of a Treaty (with a financial convention annexed) and a Concordat, formally settled the long-standing dispute between Italy and the Holy See. Although the Treaty and the Concordat were negotiated, signed and ratified simultaneously, it is doubtful if they constitute a single legal unit. The Treaty fixed the general international status of the Holy See, whereas the concordat was only concerned with the Roman Catholic Church in Italy. The official papal view is that they are indissolubly connected and that if the Concordat is repudiated, the Treaty, and therewith the whole political settlement between Italy and the Holy See, falls. The Fascist Government, on the other hand, held that the two instruments existed separately and independently as from the date of their ratification, and hence that Italy remained free to denounce the Concordat without this affecting in any way the validity of the Treaty.

The Christian Democrats, Liberals and Communists voted in favour of Article 5 as it stood, the Socialists of both factions, Actionists and Qualunquists voted against it. Signor de Gasperi had made an impassioned appeal for the acceptance of the Article. Signor Togliatti, on behalf of the Communist Party, said it was necessary to know the Church's attitude and that this might be found in various articles in the Osservatore Romano which made it clear that, should Article 5 be rejected, religious peace would be deeply disturbed. It was on the basis of these documents that his Party had decided to vote for the Article, for it was only on religious peace that the unity of the proletariat could be maintained and the country rebuilt. He argued that this attitude was consistent with their past and present political actions. Signor Nenni, on behalf of the Socialist Party, made a bitter attack on the Article. The guarantee of religious peace depended, he said, on the secular State and it was precisely the Christian Democrats, by their intransigence, who drove free men to a revision of the Lateran Treaty. The Qualunquists, it is reported, went even beyond the draft and wished an amendment to be inserted providing that the Catholic religion was the official religion of the Republic. [The object of this amendment is not altogether clear as the Concordat had reaffirmed the position of Roman Catholicism as the State religion, a position which it already held (in theory at least) under the Piedmontese constitution of 1848.]

Both the Protestant and Jewish Communities in Italy have protested officially to Signor de Nicola, Provisional Head of the Italian State, on the subject of the Article. (Before the war 99·5 per cent. of the population of Italy described themselves in official statistical returns as Roman Catholics, although the proportion of those who were practising Catholics was, of course, much smaller.) The Protestants and Jews have complained that the State would contribute from taxation to the salaries of priests but not to those of pastors or of rabbis. Consequently non-Catholics would be paying towards the maintenance of the Catholic Church. Moreover, the Lateran Pacts contain a provision that the teaching in Italian schools shall conform to the doctrine of the Catholic Church—which non-Catholics consider an imposition on their children.

Finally they take objection to that part of the Lateran Pacts which forbids divorce. In Italy, they point out, adultery is practised on an immense scale, and only the very rich can obtain annulments of their marriages from the Sacra Ruota "on the most curious grounds." [The Concordat guaranteed free exercise of other "admitted faiths," but subsequent state legislation established a rigid governmental control over the administration and activities of the minority religions, and their freedom to make proselytes was hampered.]

Signor Monichella, head of the Italian Financial Delegation which recently visited London (see Summary No. 384) has now reported back to Rome, and on the 1st April it was announced that the Italian Council of Ministers had approved the financial and economic settlement reached by the Mission. The main questions under consideration were the conclusion of a payments agreement between the British and Italian Governments; the settlement of various mutual financial claims, including the U.K. Government's claims in respect of surplus stores transferred to the Italian Government, and the waiver by the U.K. Government of their rights under Article 79 of the Italian Peace Treaty to sequestration of Italian-owned assets in the U.K. It has now been agreed that a minimum sterling balance amounting to £10,000,000 will be maintained by the Italian Government which will also pay the U.K. Government £8,000,000 in cash in respect of the surplus stores; sterling balances of the Italian Government in excess to this £18,000,000 may be used by them in any currency area. In addition, where Italy has ratified the Peace Treaty, Italian assets in the U.K. will immediately be released. This last provision is in accordance with H.M. Government's policy of being willing to consider a revision of the terms of the Peace Treaty in any case which concerns the U.K. and Italy alone. Moreover, by waiving her rights under Article 79, H.M. Government has now waived all her remaining claims to reparations, the major claims having already been renounced at the Paris Conference.

The agreements will be concluded by an exchange of letters between Sir N. Charles and the Italian Government in the near future, probably just after Easter.

THE VATICAN

On the 25th March the Italian Constituent Assembly approved by a majority of 201 Article 5 of the new Constitution: "The State and the Catholic Church are, each in its own sphere, independent and sovereign. Their relations are regulated by the Lateran Treaty. Any modification or change in this treaty accepted by both parties does not require the procedure of constitutional revision." "Thus," comments the Osservatore Romano, "the religious settlement now has a new signature, that of the freely elected representatives of the Italian people."

Recently the Vatican has been conducting a vigorous campaign to win the support of the "workers." The Bishop of Mainz talk to German Youth broadcast from the Vatican contained this phrase: "Our greatest interest is centred on working youth." A Vatican wireless talk in Italian on the 18th March began with the words: "Every political movement bases its programme on the workers . . . . the Church which was founded by a worker can find the way to the heart of the proletarian masses, because she speaks the language of love,'' and recalled how a Hungarian Bishop had been welcomed by a Factory Committee when he said that he came of a working class family. On the 10th anniversary of Pius XI's Encyclical against Atheistic Communism, the Vatican wireless described how '' Pius XII took the torch from the hands of his predecessor, and appealed particularly to the workers for their intelligent and active work.'' Marxism, it continued, meant class war. It must be anti-Catholic, and Catholics must be anti-Marxist; for as Pius XII said, in his Encyclical Fulgens Radiatur, on the fourteen hundredth anniversary of the death of St. Benedict, all men are sons of one Father, and, therefore, brothers—and he did not fail to point the moral for today's divergencies, contained in St. Benedict's insistence that manual and intellectual work must be combined in one whole.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The U.S. Government, having decided that a new Note on Soviet intervention in Hungary will at present serve no useful purpose (see last week's Summary), are preparing to strengthen their cause by a series of economic measures. Silver bullion and certain other Hungarian assets now in the U.S. zone of Germany are to be returned and Hungary will be supplied with 6,000,000 dollars' worth of raw cotton. The International Emergency Food Council has approved the delivery of 40,000 tons of grain, 5,000 tons of which have already been despatched in the form of seeds. Hungary will also obtain some benefit under general relief appropriation, but the exact amount cannot yet be forecast.

Communist pressure has not succeeded in forcing the Smallholders to unite with the left-wing bloc in condemning U.K. and U.S. '' interference '' in Hungarian affairs. The Red Army newspaper, Uj Szó, rebukes M. Sulyok, the leader of the Freedom Party, for stating that the exchange of Notes was no concern of Hungary's. The Communist newspaper, Szabad Nép, follows General Sviridov's lead in refuting the U.S. accusations. The Social Democratic organ, Világosság, regrets that the U.S. Note was based on incorrect information and hopes that the U.S.A. will publicly refuse to support reactionary elements The Communist Press likewise voiced violent disapproval of President Truman's speech of the 12th March which the Smallholder and moderate Press published side by side with both favourable and unfavourable comments from foreign newspapers. Except in right-wing circles the confidence engendered by the U.S. attitude has been largely modified by a reluctance to allow Hungary to become the centre of a Russo-American contest.

During the Foreign Ministry's Budget Debate M. Gyöngyösi re-stated Hungary's foreign policy which was, he declared, based on her desire to establish good relations with her neighbours. He paid tribute to the humanity shown by the Red Army in the exercise of their rights and to their help in creating the conditions required by a democratic state. Hungary, he added, was linked historically with the great Western Powers whose goodwill she valued highly. He expressed gratification at the recently resumed diplomatic relations with Austria and Italy. Hungary was on friendly terms with Yugoslavia and Roumania. She wished to implement her Repatriation Agreement with Czechoslovakia, but this was not a question for her alone.

The non-party Magyar Nemzet and the Social Democratic Népszava are hopeful about the outcome of the Hungarian-Czechoslovak negotiations which have been reopened at Bratislava. M. Sebestyen, the head of the Hungarian delegation, has expressed his determination to allow no obstacles to stand in the way of success, but in view of past history it would seem unreasonable to anticipate more than a strictly limited measure of progress if Czechoslovakia continues to dispossess her Magyar subjects mobilized for national service. Even the most conciliatory Hungarians, who are willing to overlook the fact that the number of Magyars called up under the Labour Decree is disproportionately high, find it impossible to concede Czechoslovakia's right to confiscate their property without compensation. M. Szakasits, the Social Democratic leader, is simultaneously conducting talks in Prague.

Conditions in the U.S. zone of Germany are still such as to preclude the further deportation of Swabians from Hungary for the time being. General Sviridov, on behalf of the Hungarian Government with whose decision he associated himself, refused an invitation sent by General Weems to appoint representatives to a conference in Berlin for a detailed discussion of the subject.

The proposal to make religious teaching optional has led to strikes and demonstrations among the school children and university students of Szeged. The instigators have been arrested and the situation is once more normal, but left-wing circles have unofficially asked themselves whether the reform is worth the hostility it has aroused, since the indications are that its effect will be small in the clerical movement which it was designed to weaken. Officially the spokesmen of all the Coalition Parties have justified it, the Smallholders' Secretary-General, Fr. Balogh, affirming that none of the Parties wished to destroy the Church. M. Nagy, speaking as a Calvinist, assured a delegation from Csepel that neither he nor M. Tildy would have supported the proposal had it been to the detriment of the country's religious life. Should the legislature pass the motion, religious teaching would still remain a regular part of the curriculum, and only on the request of their parents might children be exempted from receiving religious instruction.

Erratum. In last week's Summary for '' Pinnyés,'' read '' Dinnyés.''

Roumania

Activity in Opposition circles in exploiting the conditions under which the recent election was held was strengthened by the freely expressed concern of Great Britain and the U.S.A. although their action deliberately did not go beyond the expression of concern. As a result there have been arrests on a large scale, as part of a campaign of reprisal against the Opposition. It is reliably reported that the next move is to be the deportation to Russia of a number of persons in the following categories: (1) '' War Criminals '' to be tried under Article 6 of the Peace Treaty. This article specifies persons guilty of crimes against peace or humanity, and those who aided the enemy during the war. It would be interesting to know what the present '' powers that be '' would consider a crime against humanity. D-na Pauker in a recent conversation declared that she was '' not interested in human beings!'' (2) Germans, which, of course, may mean Roumanians from Transylvania of Saxon descent or with German names. During the last deportations the possession of a German name was considered crime enough to warrant deportation. (3) '' Subversive elements,'' which of course can be made to mean anything. On top of this comes the Roumanian reaction to President Truman's proposals. Roumania waited for a lead from the Russian press, and when they got this, launched out in a series of articles to which a considerable amount of care seems to have been devoted. The general line is the visualising of Europe divided into two camps, and the inevitability of another war. Turkey is regarded as a likely base for an attack on the Caucasus which is Russia's weakest point. American opinion regards the arrests as the Communist reaction to President Truman's move.

The U.S.A. authorities in Roumania have sent a Note to the Roumanian Government on the subject of the treatment of the Oil Companies. The note draws attention to certain Russian demands made on behalf of Sovrompetrol, including (a) the demand for special treatment as regards new concessions, (b) compensation for inadequate prices paid for products delivered, payment at world prices for future deliveries, and (c) the right to export. To all of these the Government promptly agreed. The Note affirms that their agreement with these demands violates the law of 1942, and discriminates against other companies. The Note goes on to demand no less favourable treatment for American companies, and asks that American property in Roumania will receive most favoured nation treatment, and will not be at a disadvantage as compared with Sovrompetrol.

The Danube remains closed to traffic on account of heavy floods, and the height of the river above Turnu Severin has caused vehicular traffic between Giurgiu and Ruschuk to be suspended. As soon as navigation permits, however, a new passenger service to Vienna is to be operated by Sovromtransport.

The Russian Government has pounced upon a number of railway wagons many of which are Allied-owned. They were originally seized by the Germans and then in turn taken possession of by the Russians. The gauge of them is now being altered, and they are to be removed to Russia as '' war trophies.''

It is reported from two sources, but not yet confirmed, that Carol, the former King of Roumania, has obtained a French visa and intends to return to Roumania and make trouble with Russian support. Up to the present the efforts of H.M. Government and the U.S. Government have successfully prevented these periodical plots from maturing.

Yugoslavia

The Italian exodus from Pola before the ratification of the Peace Treaty has had its counterpart in the area of Zone B which is to be incorporated in the Free Territory of Trieste. But, whereas the removal of property and plant from Pola was entirely voluntary and unaided by A.M.G., the Yugoslav authorities in Zone B have been confiscating Italian property, ships and even hospital installations, and transferring them elsewhere without the consent of the owners. His Majesty's Government, in a Note to the Yugoslav Ambassador in London on the 24th March, pointed out that the occupation authorities would be responsible to the Security Council for the injury caused to the economy of the future Free Territory by this sequestration of Italian property, which was, in effect, contrary to international law as applied to territory under military occupation.

The inhabitants of British-controlled refugee camps in Italy are to be transferred to the British zone of Germany. Although the influx of some 11–12,000 Yugoslavs into an already over-populated zone will undoubtedly raise fresh problems, this transfer seems to be the only alternative to leaving these people to their fate in Italy. (It is considered undesirable to send them to Egypt or North Africa.) It will, at least, facilitate the process of screening and the search for war criminals. There will still remain several thousand Yugoslavs in Allied-controlled camps, who will become the responsibility of the Inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees after the ratification of the Treaty, and a large number outside the camps. While these refugees remain in Italy there will always be a danger that the Yugoslav Government may obtain their repatriation by applying pressure to the Italian Government. Nevertheless, H.M. Ambassador in Belgrade was recently informed that the Yugoslav Government do not intend to deal harshly with all Ustaši as such, but will punish only those convicted of war crimes. Of all the Ustaši captured since the end of the war, they say only a few hundred have been condemned as war criminals, the remainder have been released after a few months in prison—having been subject no doubt to suitable "re-education." Little reliance is placed on this assurance.

The old bogey of I.M.R.O. has reappeared in Macedonia. A trial of separatists, all allegedly connected with Vanče Mihailov who was last heard of in Zagreb in 1944, began on the 25th March. According to the indictment the accused, many of whom only recently joined the conspirators, were planning to establish an independent united Macedonia which would be under the protection of a Western Power. Only last November Metodi Andonov Cento, President of the Macedonian National Liberation Assembly until April 1946, was sentenced to 11 years' penal servitude on a similar charge.

The appearance of a "Radio Ravna Gora" purporting to broadcast from a "free mountain in Yugoslavia," indicates that the spirit of the četnik movement is not dead.

Greece

King George II of the Hellenes died of heart failure on the 1st April. His brother Paul has been sworn in as his successor and has asked the Maximos Government to remain in office.

Independence Day was celebrated throughout Greece on the 25th March. This year the celebrations were accompanied by a real feeling that, with the help of the American loan, there were solid grounds for hope that Greece would soon recover.

The United Nations Commission moved to Sofia on the 26th. Its most important session there seems to have been that at which the U.S. delegate raised the whole question of Macedonia (see under "Bulgaria"). The team which visited the Bulgarian border area examined the incidents which occurred last year near the village of Ljubimec. It has not yet been decided whether any representatives of the Commission will remain in Greece while the report is being prepared in Geneva.

Meanwhile there has been little news of raids by the bandits. Counter-operations by the Greek Army and Gendarmerie continued, though on a reduced scale, in the areas of Nigrita, Xanthi and Lamia. In the Grevena area gendarmerie and army units gave ground under bandit pressure and withdrew towards Krania.

On the 31st March the British Military Administration in the Dodecanese handed the islands over to a Greek Military Administration. Sovereignty over the Dodecanese cannot, however, pass to Greece until the Italian peace treaty has been ratified by all concerned. In the meantime the Greek Military Administration will govern the islands under the authority and orders of the Commander-in-Chief, Middle East Land Forces.

In the memorandum on "United States relations with Greece" published in the press, the U.S. Government were described as being "in favour of the cession of Cyprus to Greece," but this paragraph was later withdrawn from the documents and it was explained that the memorandum "was not intended to be a final statement." Meanwhile Lord Winster, the new Governor of Cyprus, reached Nicosia on the 27th March. The Greek Cypriotes received him coldly and there were shouts for "Enosis"—"Union" (with Greece). One right-wing journal was reported as saying that the Greek Cypriotes would celebrate the departure of the new Governor, not his arrival.

Albania

Hardly any mention seems to have been made in the Tirana press of the Security Council's debate on the Anglo-Albanian dispute, and—odder still—very little appears to have been said on the momentous subject of United States assistance to Greece. Turkey, on the other hand, came in for some hearty abuse when it was learnt that American help was likely to be given in full measure to her as well. Nor was the abuse confined by any means to the destined recipient. The richest nation in the world is pictured as being ready enough to buttress a "tyrannical régime" which "supplied Nazi Germany with enormous quantities of chrome"; but "they will not hear of helping war-torn countries like Albania or Yugoslavia" (cf. Bashkimi, 26 March). Not a word, of course, is said about UNRRA, which the simple people of Albania have at different times been taught to believe was either a benevolent organisation of Soviet origin or a poisonous instrument for the promotion of "fascist reaction." The emphasis the whole time is on the unfair discrimination of the Western Powers, as contrasted with the sympathy and support of the Slav bloc.

Bulgaria

The Bulgarian press naturally gave prominence to the arrival of the main party of the U.N. Investigation Commission at Sofia last week. The most restrained comment on the Government side was, as usual, published in the Zveno paper Izgrev. This welcomed the Commissioners, said it felt sure they must realise already that no genuine grounds existed for accusing Bulgaria of helping to create mischief near her southern frontier, and added: "We take this opportunity of saying that the Greek people are entirely unjustified when they blame their neighbours for every disturbance occurring in their country." The distinctively Communist papers were a good deal more unbalanced. It may here be remarked that some of the crudest and most irresponsible newspaper articles which have been appearing on the subject have been written by a prominent left-wing journalist called Vladimir Topencharov who has all the time been acting as a member of the Bulgarian liaison group officially attached to the Commission.

The United States delegate drew attention at a public session of the Commission on the 27th March to the Bulgarian Government's recent instructions that the population of Bulgarian ("Pirin") Macedonia were to be registered for the future not as Bulgars but as Macedonians. The Bulgarian liaison representative at once objected that the Macedonian question lay outside the Commission's competence: it was only being touched on, he felt sure, as "an attempt to divert investigation from the Greek internal situation."

Sofia Radio announced on the 26th March that a bill providing for a capital levy had received Cabinet approval and would shortly be submitted to the National Assembly by the Minister of Finance. Bulgarian citizens and companies would be liable to duty on all property, whether at home or abroad. Among organizations to be exempted were State and national institutions and enterprises, Fatherland Front Committees, and all party, trade union, educational, cultural and charitable bodies, including the Church. Farmers with less than three hectares of land would also be exempt. Foreign residents would have to pay on property in Bulgaria . . . . The decree of the 7th March (see Summary No. 384) now falls into its place, and it becomes somewhat easier to see how the ambitious two-year plan will be paid for. (It has been announced that 26,000 million leva—no more—will be provided towards it in this year's budget, although the cost of the plan for 1947 alone is estimated at 55,000 million. The whole budget amounts to precisely this sum—55,000 million leva.)

colleagues from Istanbul and elsewhere on 26th March was ascribed by the press to the need to answer American enquiries as to the precise kind of help they really want. Now that they regard effective assistance as a foregone conclusion, they may have more than their usual difficulty in making up their minds. When first commenting on the news of President Truman's message to Congress, M. Recep Peker, the Prime Minister, spoke of applying American financial help to industrial and economic schemes and to roads, transport, and social institutions, and he recalled that more than half the country's revenue was spent on defence. After struggling for years with the question "guns or butter?" the Turks may well be carried away by the quasi-certainty that they will get both and have only to specify details. Indeed some Turkish commentators have been a little inclined to look the American gift horse in the mouth and to take it as the due reward of Turkey's wartime role or of her evolution towards democracy, two subjects on which she deserves neither the smug credit taken by Turkish publicists nor the constant invective of the Soviet press and radio. All the same there is little doubt that, thanks to President Truman's initiative, the general apprehension of Russian intentions has been replaced by hope of better relations with Russia. In Government circles, nevertheless, there is constant fear that Great Britain and the United States may seek to appease the Soviet Government at Turkey's expense.

Until the question of American help overshadowed all else, party politics had been pursued with considerable acrimony in the press, in the Grand National Assembly and at local elections. The allegation of the Democratic (minority) Party that the Republican People's Party owed its victory in the municipal elections at the small town of Uşak to malpractice, created a good deal of fuss. The Democrats also made wholesale charges of intimidation by the gendarmerie during the municipal elections and the election of village headmen (muhtars) throughout the country. A reform on which the Democratic leader, M. Celal Bayar, is now concentrating is that votes should be fairly counted—which was not the case everywhere at the last general election.

At the invitation of the Speaker of the House of Commons six Turkish deputies —of whom two will be Democrats—will visit the United Kingdom in May. In return three British M.P.s have been invited to visit Turkey towards the end of April, after the Cairo meeting of the Interparliamentary Union.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The pause which has followed the important debates in the Senate and the Resolution of the Arab League on the Egyptian question comes as somewhat of an anti-climax after these events, and there is still no news of the next step which the Government propose to take, or as to how they expect to extricate themselves from the difficulties in which their policy of extremism may land them. They must, by now, be fully aware that they can expect no further concessions from His Majesty's Government which would help to save their faces and permit them to withdraw from the project of appealing to the United Nations, and, in spite of the form of the unanimous resolution passed by the delegates to the Arab League Council, they can hardly have been left in any doubt of the true sentiments of the delegates or of their expectations of the result of the appeal when it is made.

The Minister of Finance, Abdul Maguid Badr Pasha, in the course of his Budget speech in the Chamber of Deputies on the 24th March announced that, at the preliminary talks about Egypt's sterling balances, the proposal of His Majesty's Government that the credit should be scaled down as being a war-debt between two Allies, had been rejected by the Egyptian Government on the ground that Egypt's war effort had much exceeded that called for by her international obligations. He gave some details also of the Government's plans for social reform, upon which they propose to spend something over £E26 million in the course of the next five years. The profits which have accrued from cotton sales during the war are to be devoted to the supplying of drinking-water in the villages. The General Reserve has been increased by over £E10 million during the financial year just ended, and now amounts to nearly £E68 million.

The resignation of Sir Hubert Huddleston from the post of Governor-General of the Sudan and the appointment of Sir Robert Howe in his place seem to have baffled the Egyptian press, whose comments vary from that of Akhbar al Yom, which says that it is the result of the demand of the Egyptian Government, to that of a correspondent in the Ahram, who condemns the appointment and urges the appointment of an Egyptian.

The press campaign against British institutions in Egypt—which has been strongest in the organ of the Young Egypt Party, the Misr al Fattat—appears to have stimulated the series of bomb attacks which have recently occurred in Alexandria, and a more recent one on the premises of the Anglo-Egyptian Union in Cairo. The British Institute and the premises of the "Brethren of Freedom" have both been damaged, and an unexploded bomb has been found in Victoria College. There were no casualties.

Palestine

The appeal, reported last week, in which the Jewish Agency called upon the Yishuv for a united effort to develop and improve its economic position (which has been interpreted as an appeal to avoid strikes and lock-outs) was probably a result of the criticism to which the Agency has been subjected as a result of its passive attitude in face of the severe economic damage suffered from the imposition of Statutory Martial Law. In an attempt to re-establish its prestige the Agency has warned the public that the Government is trying to drive a wedge between the Yishuv and their national institutions, hoping that those who deviate from the line prescribed by the Agency or collaborate more than the Agency think desirable will be branded as quislings. The Agency statement has received some approval for the maintenance of the policy of the Basle Congress, but, on the whole, criticism in the Palestine press has been hostile, the right-wing Haaretz, which has been particularly vocal, saying that the Agency has undermined its own authority, and pointing to the need for strong leadership and effective representation. The London Jewish Chronicle, in a leading article on the 28th March, says: "the time has come—indeed it is long overdue—for Zionist and other Jewish bodies to meet together in an enlarged Jewish Agency expressing the widest possible measure of agreement that can be achieved in World Jewry on questions relating to the Jewish National Home and its future."

His Majesty King Abdullah, in a press interview at Amman on the 23rd March, is said to have advocated large-scale Arab immigration to Palestine as the best means of combating Jewish immigration and maintaining the Arab majority in the country.

The Arab Higher Executive met on the 26th March and approved new statutes for youth organisations which are to be published in a few days. They are also proposing to send permanent missions to London and New York and other delegations to organise the Arab communities in Europe, America and Asia. A cable is reported to have been sent to the four Foreign Ministers in Moscow drawing their attention to the Arab case in Palestine.

The second anniversary of the founding of the Arab League was widely but peaceably celebrated on the 22nd March.

(See also under "Arab League" and "Iraq".)

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported on the 24th March that a "cease fire" order had been issued to the Irgun Zvai Leumi pending "the result of negotiations now being conducted with responsible Jewish circles." In spite of this, acts of terrorism continue, and a British Army officer and a police officer were murdered near Ramleh on the 29th March. What is described by the correspondent of The Times as "the maniacal tendency" of the terrorists is further illustrated in the beating to death in the streets of Tel Aviv of a Jew who, it seems, had been some time ago unpopular with the Jewish community. On the 24th March the Palestine Discount Bank in Tel Aviv was held up by an armed gang who got away with £P27,500. A clerk who attempted to intervene was wounded. Explosions followed by fire caused serious damage to the oil storage tanks at Haifa on 31st March.

The Arab League

After the meeting of the Council on the 24th March at which the Palestine question was examined, a communiqué was issued announcing the unanimous decisions which had been reached. After a reference to the failure of the London Conference decisions are recorded to defend the Arab cause before the United Nations and to form a Committee to organise all the measures necessary for this purpose. The Council go on to recommend to the Governments of the Arab States that they should provide funds for the Arab Higher Committee so that it may intensify its propaganda campaign, and also that it may "send Palestinian scholastic missions to specialise in science and arts with a view to the creation of a University of Science and Arts in Palestine." Lively opposition is expressed to the continuance of Jewish immigration, and a protest is registered at the weakness of the measures taken against illegal immigration by His Majesty's Government.

The Council's previous decision regarding the unity and independence of Tripolitania was confirmed, and the Secretary-General was instructed to "make representations" so that the Arab League or "certain Arab countries" should participate in any enquiry or plebiscite destined to determine the political status of the country. The threat of famine is referred to, and the Secretary-General is to call upon the Arab countries for help if it becomes necessary.

Yusuf Yasin has told the Cairo correspondent of The Observer that the decisions were reached in absolute goodwill and understanding, and that he feels that the League has gained in strength and determination.

The appointment to the Secretaryship-General of the League was originally for a period of two years, which is now up. In spite of much discontent which has been expressed outside Egypt at Azzam Pasha's handling of the affairs of the League, there is, so far, no indication that any change is to be made.

Iraq

Nuri Pasha has told His Majesty's Ambassador that he regards the decision of the Arab League on Egypt as "illegal" (in the sense that it is not binding on Iraq unless it is approved by the Council of Ministers and confirmed by Parliament), although he excuses Fadhil al Jamali for failure to stand up alone against the views of the other delegates. His Majesty's Ambassador has, at his suggestion, written him a letter expressing surprise and concern at the terms of the resolution, and asking him how far the Iraq Government feel themselves to be bound by it. It remains to be seen how far Salih Jabr's new Cabinet (see below) are prepared to follow Nuri's lead in this matter. Article 7 of the Arab League Pact states clearly that "unanimous decisions by the Council are binding on all members of the League."

Meanwhile, in the hope of recalling the League to consideration of Iraq's views on Palestine instead of backing Assam's on Egypt, a joint meeting of both Houses of Parliament was summoned on the 24th March, at which a number of speakers criticised the Arab League for its inefficiency, lack of unity and neglect of the Palestine question. Finally, a resolution was adopted requiring the League unanimously to approve the following action :—

(1) The United Kingdom and the United States to be informed that they are responsible for the present critical state of affairs in Palestine;
(2) The Arabs to go to the United Nations and demand the setting-up of an independent Arab State of Palestine. If this demand is not met, reconsideration is to be given to economic and political relations with the United Kingdom and the United States;
(3) Full boycott to be imposed on Zionist goods, including those in transit.

If the resolution is not adopted by the League Iraq will consider herself free of all responsibility in the matter. This provision is intended to imply that Iraq might suspend her membership, or even withdraw from the League altogether. It appears from the communiqué issued by the League Council that they were unable to go so far as the Iraqi resolution demanded, and it remains to be seen how the Iraq Government will now act.

Meanwhile, Nuri Pasha has refused the Regent's request to form a new Government, and Salih Jabr has accepted the invitation to do so. Nuri has privately given as his reason for refusal that he can no longer work with the Regent, "who is always interfering."

The new Cabinet was formed on the 29th March, as follows :—

Prime Minister and Acting Minister of Interior : Salih Jabr.
Finance : Yusuf Ghanima.
Foreign Affairs : Muhammad Fadhil al Jamali.
Justice and Acting Economics : Jamal Baban.
Communications : Dhia Ja'far.
Defence : Shakir al Wadi.
Education : Taufiq Wahbi.
Supply : Abdulillah Hafidh.
Social Affairs : Jamil Abdul Wahhab.

Persia

On the eve of the Persian New Year (the 21st March) the Prime Minister made a long broadcast speech in which he announced details of his Government's Seven-Year Plan. This is, in effect, a blue print for the total regeneration of Persia. The expenditure involved is nearly rials 600,000 million (about £450 million), the equivalent of some fourteen years' annual ordinary revenue on the present basis. The Prime Minister stated that the larger part of this sum—the minimum needed to ensure to Persia her rightful place among the nations—would come from the national capital resources. There was no reference to the request for a loan from the International Bank (see Summary No. 383).

The full details of the plan are not yet known, but the main items covered are health services, education (see Summary No. 384), railway construction (see Summary No. 385), Army and security services, housing, industrial expansion (particularly in the spinning, sugar-refining and chemical industries), irrigation (including the construction and completion of ten dams) and agricultural development (especially in the fields of mechanisation and research).

On the 22nd February the Persian Government passed a decree preventing the dismissal of surplus workers from any factory without the prior sanction of the Ministry of Labour. This does not, however, apply to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The new law has been passed with the object of safeguarding the interests of those employees, particularly mill-workers, who were taken into employment as the result of Tudeh pressure on their employers, many of whom are now anxious to reduce their staffs.

In this connection a statement by the Labour Attaché to His Majesty's Embassy, Tehran, is of considerable interest :—

> "The Tudeh Trade Union Movement, which, twelve months ago claimed 300,000 members, held a monopoly position as representing workers, intimidated employers and forced the Government into granting concessions, is now a very dim shadow of its former self [see Summary No. 383]. The Government, which had been waiting for an opportunity to attack the political and anti-national activities of the Tudeh Party, used the successful conclusion of the Azerbaijan campaign as the occasion for organising Trade Unions under the ægis of the Prime Minister's Democrat Party. There was continuous friction, with incidents of physical violence, between the members of the two rival Trade Unions, and throughout the country there were allegations by the Tudeh Unions that their premises and clubs had been invaded and seized by the Democrat Union."

But, as is pointed out by the British Military Attaché, "no false deduction should be made to the effect that the Tudeh Party, either in its original or reformed state, is dead. It is working actively underground in Abadan, and in Tehran it is biding its time, hoping, not unreasonably, that the general dissatisfaction with the existing state of affairs will pave the way for its return . . . ."

Ethiopia

There have been signs for some time that discontent at the incompetence of Ministers and officials has been growing. The Emperor has, of late, ceased to give that daily attention to administrative detail which he used formerly to display. The reason for this is not clear, but the result is that administrative chaos and incompetence is rife, and a situation is developing which is giving rise to some anxiety.

Relations between Ethiopia and His Majesty's Government are governed by the Agreement signed at Addis Ababa on the 19th December, 1944, which superseded the "Agreement and Military Convention of January, 1942. Article 6 establishes a British Military Mission, which is a unit of the military forces of His Majesty the King but is responsible to the Ethiopian Minister of War for the organisation, training and administration of the Ethiopian army. Article 7 provides for British military administration of the Ogaden district and a "reserved area" to the west of the British Somaliland frontier. Although efforts have been made to persuade the Emperor to give serious attention to rectification of the frontiers—which would include a settlement of the Ogaden and the "reserved area"—no progress has been made, and the suspicion has arisen that delays are deliberately created pending a settlement of the future of Eritrea by the United Nations.

THE FAR EAST

China

In Nanking interest has been centred in the proceedings of the third plenary session of the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee, which opened on the 15th and was brought to a close on the 24th March. General Chiang Kai-shek's speech before this Committee was mainly concerned with a lengthy survey of Kuomintang activities, in which he bluntly invited attention to achievements and shortcomings with equal impartiality. He emphasized above all, the necessity to proceed with determination towards the establishment of a democratic form of Government and the removal of all obstacles to national reconstruction; he declared that the next nine months would decide whether it was to be life or death to the Party; and he pleaded with members to crown the national revolution with success through unity.

Observers are reported to read into his speech another mild swinging of the big stick to reassert discipline in the ranks of the Party following the recent outbursts of unbridled attacks on Dr. T. V. Soong and his followers, as well as on the Political Science Group led by the Szechuen Governor, General Chang Chun, and accusations against General Cheng Yi for having been the cause of the Formosa revolt (see Summary No. 385).

It was thought that the formation of a Coalition Government would be announced at the end of the Central Executive Committee session, bringing with it a redistribution of portfolios. General expectation is that when these moves are made, General Chang Chun, despite his unpopularity with left wing and certain third party delegates, will be appointed President of the Executive Yuan to fill the vacancy created by the recent resignation of Dr. T. V. Soong, and now temporarily held by the Generalissimo. So far, however, no official announcement has been made and recent press reports carry the somewhat disturbing news that both the Young China and the Social Democratic Parties have created an awkward situation by suddenly threatening to withdraw their support unless the Government afford an assurance of their willingness to settle the Communist question by peaceful means immediately the Communists indicate their willingness to resume negotiations. In a joint letter presented to General Chiang Kai-shek they have also demanded that the Government follow a foreign policy equally friendly to all countries.

There have been persistent rumours—believed to have their source in semi-official circles in Nanking—that as soon as the reorganisation of the Government has been effected General Chiang Kai-shek intends to go abroad, probably visiting Great Britain and the United States of America. Colour has been added to these rumours by the report that General Chiang personally sponsored the C.E.C. resolution for the creation of the new post of Vice-President—to be filled by the Shansi war lord, Yen Hsi-shan. In Shanghai, the immediate reaction to the rumour of the Generalissimo's impending departure was to cause something of a panic in commercial and financial circles, which sent the price of all shares, as well as of Government bonds, toppling on the local stock exchange. This appears to have been short-lived, however, and a more recent test of public confidence in the Government is claimed from Nanking to have produced a positive reaction in the favourable reception of the two new State loans that have been floated in an endeavour to tide over the national financial crisis. Nevertheless, considerable care has been exercised to make these two loans attractive and the steps taken are perhaps worthy of note. In the first loan, which is run for a period of ten years and bear interest at 6 per cent., the bonds are to be purchased with gold or foreign currency, thus providing an outlet for local holdings recently rendered stagnant by Government "freezing" regulations. The other loan, which is for three years and the bonds of which are to be paid for and redeemed in Chinese currency at the prevailing official rates of exchange for the U.S. dollar, bears interest at no less than 20 per cent.

On the 25th March a State Department spokesman of the United States Government said that his Government had recently sent Notes to China and the Soviet Union, urging declarations by the two Governments of their intentions to implement the provisions of the agreements regarding Dairen, Manchuria, and the Changchun Railway. The Notes also expressed the hope that the necessary arrangements for the implementation of such declarations would be made in the near future. It is known that a few weeks ago the Soviet Ambassador in Nanking called on the Minister for Foreign Affairs to enquire whether or not the Chinese Government were prepared to assume charge of Dairen and to participate in the joint operation of the Changchun Railway as provided in the Sino-Soviet Treaty signed on the 14th August, 1945. The Minister for Foreign Affairs promised to give a definite reply to this enquiry "as soon as possible," but pointed out to the Soviet Ambassador that the Communist occupation of almost the whole of northern Manchuria made the working of the railway impossible and that the whole situation might have presented a very different picture today, had not the Chinese Government's earlier attempts to take action in regard to Dairen been obstructed.

This latter contention was reiterated by the Nanking Government spokesman at a press conference on the 26th March, when the problem seemed no nearer solution.

The latest information from Sinkiang is reported to be causing the Government some concern. There had been hopes that it might prove possible at least to delay Soviet infiltration to Sinkiang by granting the rebels a fairly wide measure of autonomy. It is understood, however, that the Chinese Government are now being pressed to extend these concessions considerably further and that the Chinese Ambassador in Moscow feels that it cannot be long before the Soviet Government become more actively interested in this Province.

In the field the star of the Government is said to be in the ascendant. In Shantung the position of the besieged city of Tsinan is claimed to have been considerably improved; while the Communists are reported to have lost much prestige in the fall of Yenan. The Communist Party leaders are said to be wandering from place to place in the mountains of northern Shansi in search of a new capital, hotly chivied by Government forces. Reports from Communist sources, on the other hand, indicate that they have established a temporary headquarters at Harbin.

In South China the disturbances in Formosa are reported to have been stamped out—apparently with considerable brutality. Many of the rioters have fled to the hills and the local Government authorities have called on them to give themselves up forthwith, or take the consequences.

Japan

Japanese press representatives were advised by a spokesman at S.C.A.P. Headquarters that the general election to be held in April gave the people an opportunity to guard themselves against two extremes. One danger lay in the existence of Fascist organizations which had declared war to the death on some of the established political parties. The other danger, which was specially stressed, lay in the avowed aim of extreme left-wing groups to utilise mass discontent over economic miseries to overthrow the "legitimate government." At the moment the civil rights of the people were being guarded by the occupation authorities and the United States would continue to fight "anti-democratic, purely political, ruthlessly aggressive Communism just as it had fought Nazism, Fascism and Tojo's Japanism." But, it was to be assumed, the Japanese people must learn to carry on the good fight themselves.

One of the political parties at least seems to have seen the writing on the wall. The Progressive Party announced its own demise for the 31st March. The revolt of the members who were trying to justify the party's name thus seems to have succeeded. Ashida, the leader of the malcontents, described the attitude of the conservative bloc in the party as dog-in-the-manger. At the meeting of the standing committee which decided upon dissolution of the party, Takao Saito, Minister without Portfolio in the present Cabinet, was elected chairman of the preparatory committee appointed to form a new party.

The Government are anxious to revise the election law and have introduced a bill to replace the present plural-ballot system based on large electoral areas by a single-ballot system based on small areas. The opposition regard the measure as a sinister move to swing the election in favour of the Government and are trying to talk the bill out. Internal party dissensions have not prevented the Liberals and Progressives from presenting a united front in an attempt to railroad the bill through the Diet, and in committee the opposition were reduced to using their fists on two members of the Liberal Party.

The feared March financial crisis did not come to a head, but General MacArthur has felt it necessary to send the Japanese Prime Minister a letter urging him to take "early and vigorous steps" to curb inflation and warning him that outside assistance as regards food, &c., was contingent upon the Japanese Government's ability to assume efficient collection and distribution of food and to introduce the economic and financial controls which the situation demanded. The disease, in fact, is chronic but is growing more acute. The Finance Minister expects great relief from the special war-profits taxes now to be collected. On the other hand the Government refused to accept the Opposition's demand that payment of principal and interest on war bonds should be repudiated though they promised to give the matter further consideration. The food situation has been slightly relieved by the authorised release of 87,500 tons of imported wheat, wheat products and beans but the "Oriental Economist" calculates that supplies of rice will be exhausted by the end of May—which suggests a further critical period from June to October.

It has been known since last autumn that the new Constitution has provoked considerable discussion in the Far Eastern Commission, some of whose members were doubtful whether it could be considered to represent the considered views of the Japanese people. On the 27th March the Commission publicly announced that it had adopted a policy decision calling for a review of the Constitution by the Diet and the Commission "not sooner than one year and not later than two years after it goes into effect [the 3rd May, 1947]." The review is designed to give the Japanese people an opportunity to reconsider their new Constitution in the light of experience of its working and to allow the Commission to satisfy itself that the Constitution fulfils the terms of the Potsdam Declaration and other controlling documents.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The United States Government has now formally placed on record its views on the relationship between President Truman's Greek and Turkish policy and the broader aims and principles of the United Nations Charter. In a statement to the Security Council on the 28th March, Mr. Warren Austin said that every member of the United Nations was under an obligation under the Charter "to do its utmost to bring about a peaceful adjustment of any international situation before it becomes a threat to peace." The programme of assistance to Greece and Turkey contemplated by the United States was of an "emergency and temporary character," and the United States Government believed that the United Nations and its related agencies should assume the principal responsibility within their capabilities for the tasks of longer range. The United States was "giving momentum to the United Nations by its present policy." It also had "a special pressing interest" in obtaining "effective action" in the Greek case which the Security Council was still considering. In this connexion Mr. Austin suggested that representatives of the United Nations Balkan commission should remain in Greece until the deliberations of the Council have been concluded and that a system of border control should be instituted to safeguard the northern frontier of that country.

It remains to be seen how far Mr. Austin's statement will salve the consciences of those liberal-internationalists at home who have been upbraiding the President for trying to "by-pass" the United Nations. Prima facie it seems to meet those milder critics who, like Mr. Walter Lippmann, have continued to insist that the fact that the United Nations "is not capable of acting swiftly, effectively, or even of acting at all" does not relieve the United States of the obligation to consult the United Nations, and that, if Mr. Truman's policy "can be explained to Congress, and therefore to the world, it can also be explained to the United Nations." It was undoubtedly the persistence of such criticism that caused Mr. Dean Acheson to dwell at greater length upon the possible interrelation between the present United States policy and the functions of the United Nations in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the 24th March than he had done in the otherwise almost identical statement which he had made to the House Committee on the 20th. Yet among Conservatives there has been growing impatience with the liberal-left-wing charges that the United States has "disavowed" the United Nations—charges which Mr. Sumner Welles has roundly denounced as outright "Soviet propaganda"—and M. Gromyko himself has caused opinion to harden in these quarters by his use of the veto on the Corfu channel case on the 25th March. As the Philadelphia Inquirer observes, "if the Albanian veto has proved nothing else, it demonstrated why it was necessary for the United States to go to it alone in the Greco-Turkish proposal without inviting time-wasting and morale-killing vetoes in the United Nations."

Although the hope that the President's programme would be approved by Congress by the 31st March has not been fulfilled, an effort is now being made to bring the preliminary Committee hearings to a close, and the 7th April has been set as the date for the opening of the full debate on the floor of the Senate. The Russophiles and the motley element on the Left which Theodore Roosevelt once characterized as the "lunatic fringe" are at the moment doing all in their power to confuse the issue and to delay a decision. They have sent Mr. La Guardia, as well as Mr. Allen D. Fields of The Nation and representatives of the American Socialist and Labour parties, to the Senate Committee hearings to insist that the question of Greece be turned over to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United Nations and that nothing whatsoever be done to assist the Turks. In the Senate itself, Senators Claude Pepper (Democrat, Florida) and Glen Taylor (Democrat, Idaho) have introduced a resolution calling for a contribution of 250 million dollars to the United Nations for the rehabilitation of the domestic economy of Greece and making this the limit of United States assistance and intervention.

Feeling in favour of the Truman policy is said to have been strengthened among members of Congress by the testimony which Mr. Lincoln MacVeagh, the U.S. Ambassador to Greece, presented to the House Foreign Affairs Committee at a session behind closed doors on the 25th March and by the evidence which Mr. Edwin C. Wilson, the U.S. Ambassador to Turkey, gave on the following day. At other meetings of the House and Senate Committees Mr. William Clayton, the Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, has provided details of how the proposed 400 million dollars would be spent. Of the total of 300 million dollars requested for aid to Greece one-half would go towards rehabilitating civilian life and the other would be devoted to "making available to the Greek armed forces the arms, ammunition, clothing, rations and equipment necessary to deal effectively with the guerillas." The 100 million dollars requested for Turkey would be spent entirely on the Turkish armed forces and on projects which would contribute most directly to the Turkish defence programme. In Mr. Clayton's opinion, the military assistance granted to both countries, being essential to American security, and not creating in itself the wherewithal to repay, should be made as a "clear grant."

On the Moscow Conference comment has continued to follow the pattern set last week. In the extensive discussion on the future of Germany Mr. Hoover's report has received wide commendation among Conservatives, although the New York Herald-Tribune accuses the Republican ex-President of "going as far in one direction as Mr. Morgenthau went in another" and of completely overlooking the fear of an expanding German industry which pervades most of Continental Europe. There is considerable support for General Marshall in his firm refusal to "follow M. Molotov in a retreat from Potsdam to Yalta." Yet the publication of the complete texts of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements has evoked little of the interest which accompanied the revelation last year of the secret Yalta decision to hand over the Kuriles and Southern Sakhalin to the Soviet Union (see Summary No. 330).

Mr. Truman's Executive Order of the 22nd March for a purge of disloyal and subversive elements from the civil service (see last week's Summary) has produced the stormy reaction which might have been expected in advanced liberal quarters. Here it is felt that the President's measure will inevitably result in a large-scale exodus of progressive elements from public office and in the creation of an "inquisitorial atmosphere" which will have a deleterious effect upon the morale and efficiency of Government employees. The public in general, however, appears to be in complete sympathy with the Order, and it has accepted with equanimity the suggestion of Mr. Harry B. Mitchell, the President of the Civil Service Commission, that the new drive against disloyalty will cost the taxpayer another 12 to 13 million dollars and that the Commission alone will require an additional staff of between 2,500 and 3,000 to carry it out.

The absence of effective team-work among Republican leaders in Congress was once more demonstrated on the 27th March when Representative Harold Knutson (Republican, Minnesota), the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, succeeded in forcing through the House his bill to reduce income taxes this year by nearly 4,000 million dollars. The bill is retroactive to the 1st January and imposes a tax cut of up to 30 per cent. It is being strongly opposed by Senator Taft, the Chairman of the Republican Policy Committee in the Senate, who, although himself an inveterate advocate of lower taxation, believes that the reduction should not become effective until the 1st July and that it should not exceed 15 per cent. in the present circumstances. In the country at large the more thoughtful Republicans joined by the Scripps–Howard chain of newspapers and by the majority of Democratic and independent observers, continue to urge that the whole question of tax revision be deferred until it becomes clear what additional expenditure will be involved in the new foreign policy.

Argentina

The Argentine delegation to the International Wheat Conference has decided not to join in any agreement. This, of course, is only consistent with Argentina's selling policy, which is simply to exploit the present shortage for all it is worth. Meanwhile President Perón has replied to suggestions that Argentina is hanging back in order to make money, by alleging that the Argentina sales monopoly has been forced on his Government by a buyers' monopoly. He denied that the State was making exorbitant profits, apparently on the ground that the Government had to pay for subsidising prices in Argentina. What President Perón calls "winning Argentine freedom" is, in the opinion of many, nothing more than winning votes for his régime by internal subsidies, which are compensated by screwing up export prices. President Perón is also reported to have drawn attention to the sacrifices of Señor Miranda, who, though a millionaire with many interests, gives his time to Argentine public affairs, and to his own state of poverty. Such protestations of poverty are hardly to be credited; certainly Señora Perón is not destitute.

In view of her influence, already noted in this Summary (see Nos. 366 and 385), it may be pertinent to give a few details of her career. She was born 28 years ago near Junin, where her mother was a dominating political influence. She left school at the age of 16; later tried her hand at acting, not very successfully, and only managed to hold a position as broadcaster by bestowing her favours on various directors. After the 1943 revolution she became the mistress of Colonel Imbert, then Postmaster General, in whose department she hastened to place her nominees. Soon after she transferred her patronage to Colonel Perón, with whom she lived openly, acting as his hostess. She married him in November 1945. She is a ruthless woman of limited intelligence, and her sudden elevation to the dignity of President's wife has gone to her head. She has set herself to achieve popularity with the masses, indulges in blatantly demagogic addresses to the poorer classes of the community and has her own office, where she receives delegations, it being generally accepted that she runs the Secretariat of Labour. If not concerned in questions of paramount political importance, she has sufficient influence with the President to permit her to summon Cabinet Ministers to meetings and to keep persons of the type of Sr. Largomarsino in positions offering full scope for their corrupt methods. Señora Perón has recently widened the scope of her activities by registering a large number of trade products with the trademark "El Perônista." Criticism of the President's wife became so intense last year that she had to close her office and lie low for a while, but she emerged triumphant, and her power is now at its zenith. She has, of course, many enemies, and these, with the President's evident reluctance to restrain her, may one day imperil Perón's own position.

Colombia

Results in the Parliamentary elections held on the 16th March indicate that the Conservatives have gained seats in both Chambers, and still have a majority over the Liberal party factions considered separately, though not if they are taken together. Dr. Gaitan has improved his position compared with the other half of the Liberal party, led by Dr. Santos, to what extent is not yet certain. The Communist Party met with a heavy defeat, losing the four seats it held, and consequently having no representation in the new Congress. The elections were marred by some unfortunate "incidents," which resulted in 11 persons being killed and 139 injured.

Mexico

President Truman arrived in Mexico City on the 3rd March, the first American President to set foot in the Mexican capital. His visit coincided with the centenary of the battle of Chapultepec, the culminating point of the 1847 war, in which Mexico lost Texas, Arizona, a large part of California and other huge extensions of territory. The loss of these lands has rankled in Mexican breasts, and there was the possibility that a sense of grievance might impel some hotheaded Mexican to chance a shot at the American President. Great preparations were made to welcome and protect Mr. Truman, who won all hearts by departing from the official programme to lay a wreath on the monument near Chapultepec in memory of the Mexican cadets who died fighting against the American forces. Mr. Truman, who declared that he and President Aleman were in substantial agreement on all points discussed, left on the 6th March. In spite of the fact that his departure took place before dawn, the entire Mexican Cabinet, headed by President, were at the airport to wish him "God Speed." Both from a political and social point of view the American President's visit was a very great success, and he left without one critical note being sounded.

Peru

Recent serious food riots in Arequipa, and others of a similar nature in Lima and elsewhere have evoked a Presidential decree for the regulation of public meetings. This decree gives extensive powers to the authorities to break up meetings, close bars and places of amusement, obliges organisers of meetings to give two days' notice and permits only one meeting to be held in any town on a given day. As the Apristas are the only political party strong enough to provide a threat of uprising on a national scale, the decree indicates that the Government can rely on the army, and is not quite as intimidated by the Apra party as had been believed.

It is also reported that at least three groups have been projected or formed from the minor political parties, with a view to opposing the Apristas. These budding blocks roughly represent the Right, Centre and Left, and appear to have nothing in common but a desire to get rid of Aprismo.

UNITED NATIONS

Economic and Social Council

The Council concluded its fourth session on the 29th. March. On the 27th it had decided to hold only one more session in 1947, beginning on the 19th July. On the 25th March the following were elected to membership of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities: Mr. Borisov (U.S.S.R.), Mr. Chang (China), Mr. Daniels (U.S.A.), Mr. Ekstrand (Sweden), Mr. McNamara (Australia), Mr. Masani (India), Miss Elizabeth Monroe (U.K.), Mr. Nisot (Belgium), Mr. Pallares (Ecuador), Mr. Howard Roy (Haiti), Mr. Reze Zadeh Shafaq (Iran), Mr. Spanien (France). The following were elected to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information:—

Dr. Z. Chafee (U.S.A.).
Mr. R. J. Cruikshank (U.K.).
Mr. J. M. Pomakin (U.S.S.R.).
Dr. P. H. Chang (China).
Mr. Giraud (France).
Mr. Lopez (Philippine Republic).
Mr. Fontaina (Uruguay).
Mr. Fabrega (Panamá).
Mr. Ferguson (Canada).
Mr. Sychrava (Czechoslovakia).
Dr. Goldhart (Netherlands).
Mr. Christiansen (Norway).

Economic Commission for Europe

The establishment of an Economic Commission for Europe was finally approved by the Economic and Social Council on the 29th March and the first session of the Commission opens at Geneva on the 2nd May. The original proposal of the Devastated Areas Sub-Commission last September was well received by many European countries, including Poland and Czechoslovakia, but the Soviet Union was at first non-committal. However, after lengthy discussions in the Economic and Social Council at its third session and in the Assembly, the Council was unanimously instructed to give prompt and favourable consideration to the establishment of a commission at its fourth session. The exact terms of reference which have been the subject of debate during the past month, have not been easy to determine; several Russian amendments were voted down, and it remains to be seen whether the differences of opinion between East and West which these amendments expressed can be settled so easily.

The chief differences of opinion were over the desire of the Russians to minimise the control of the Economic and Social Council over the Economic Commission for Europe, and to eliminate as far as possible all references to liaison between the Commission and the Specialised Agencies. The reason for the Russian attitude was, primarily, the calculation that they would command a majority of votes on the Commission and would thus be able to wipe out at Geneva the defeats suffered by them in New York. With regard to Specialised Agencies, they were principally concerned to provide themselves with a shield against the working of the multilateral trade principles of the proposed International Trade Organisation.

The first tasks of the Commission will be to take over the temporary European economic bodies—the European Coal Organisation, the European Central Inland Transport Organisation and the Emergency Economic Committee for Europe, which have already dealt with the most urgent problems of rehabilitation and co-ordination of scarce resources—and to continue such of their functions as are applicable to the period of reconstruction. This will probably occupy the Commission throughout its first year, after which it will begin to examine problems of development. In addition to these mainly executive functions the Commission is empowered to collect, evaluate and disseminate such economic, technological and statistical information as the Commission deems appropriate. The work of the Commission will be re-examined by the Council at the end of five years.

One of the subjects in which the Commission will take a lively interest at an early stage is the future of the German economy. The French tried very hard to include in the terms of reference some mention of the importance of the economy of Germany to that of Europe as a whole; but in this they were unsuccessful. It is clearly appropriate that the Commission should be in a position to make representations about Germany on questions affecting member countries of the Occupying Powers, and this in itself does not imply any commitment on the part of the Occupying Powers. The Terms of Reference provide that the Commission can undertake negotiations in (inter alia) Germany but only with the consent of the Control Authorities. In general the Occupying Powers will be represented on the Commission through individual national delegations, but experts from Germany will be brought in in a consultative capacity. As far as possible day-to-day German trade problems will continue to be discussed between the Bi-Zonal Authorities at Minden and the Commercial Attachés of other Powers.

The Commission will consist at first of all European countries which are members of the United Nations—and this is interpreted to include Iceland and Turkey—together with the United States. It is probable that non-United Nations European states will be invited to send observers, as will the established Specialised Agencies and the International Bank and Fund. The first meeting of the Commission will be held at Geneva for about a fortnight from the 2nd May, after which a small negotiating body will initiate the take-over of the Emergency European Organisations. The second meeting will take place at the end of June at which a report on the Commission's activities will be prepared for the Fifth Session of the Economic and Social Council.

The lead given in respect of Europe has been followed elsewhere and a corresponding Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East has been decided on. An attempt to enlarge the purview of the European Commission to include the whole Mediterranean littoral and to set up a similar body for the Near East and North Africa was not successful.

Non-Governmental Organisations

Some time ago, the Secretariat brought up the question whether the Assembly's Resolution on the Franco Government should be deemed to apply to Non-Governmental Organisations with branches in Spain. The United Kingdom took the line of reason, that, since the Resolution was aimed at the Government of Franco, it could not apply to Organisations which were by definition non-Governmental. The United States, who had agreed with the United Kingdom line in preliminary discussions out of Committee, then changed their attitude and put up a resolution which was so phrased as to be hard to oppose without giving an appearance of being pro-Franco but which by admitting in principle that the Assembly Resolution could apply to non-Governmental organisations, opened the door which may later lead to its further application to relationship between N.G.Os and Specialised Agencies. According to this Resolution:

> "international N.G.Os should be excluded from relationship under article 71 if they had legally constituted branches in Spain whose policies are determined and controlled by the Franco Government. They shall be eligible for consultative relationship (a) if they have only individual members in Spain, who are not organised into a legally constituted branch, (b) if the branches in Spain, though properly constituted serve the interests of the Spanish people rather than those of the Franco Government, (c) if such branches are not active at the present time."

This was passed in Committee, the U.K. abstaining. When the question came before the Council the French delegation moved an amendment which would have had the effect of cutting out reservation (c), and exposing the International Chamber of Commerce to fresh attack; H.M.G.'s original defence of it had been that its Spanish branch was moribund. This amendment was defeated, and the Economic and Social Council adopted the U.S.A. resolution given above with slight modification of (b). It is difficult to see what is gained by this heresy hunt among N.G.Os, and the United Nations may well deprive themselves of valuable scientific and humanitarian co-operation, as has happened already in the parallel cases of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and the Narcotic Drugs Commission.

World Federation of Trade Unions

A resolution on Trade Union rights had been placed on the Agenda of the Economic and Social Council at the request of the W.F.T.U. Its subject-matter brought it obviously within the province of the I.L.O. which was to meet in June. When the Council met on the 24th March, France and U.S.S.R. proposed that the question be postponed until the Council's next session in July, because the Secretary-General of the W.F.T.U. was absent. Such a postponement would have been a severe rebuff to the rights of the I.L.O. After a long debate the Chairman put, and carried by 9 votes to 6 a resolution requesting the I.L.O. to consider the memoranda of the W.F.T.U. and of the American Federation of Labour at its next session and to send a report for the Council to consider at its session in July. The Council also resolved to send the memoranda to the Human Rights Commission. In this way the rights of the I.L.O. and the Economic and Social Council have been studied though some may doubt the appropriateness of the Council requesting a report from an independent body like the I.L.O. with a time-limit attached to the request. A procedure has also been established by which in future items submitted by category (a) non-governmental organisations shall be examined by the Secretary-General, and where necessary discussed with the organisation, before being placed on the provisional agenda for consideration by the Agenda Committee.

Trusteeship Council

The Council held its first meeting on the 26th March, an occasion marked by the presence of the Secretary-General and by the wilful absence of the Soviet delegation. In view of the line taken by the Soviet delegation at the General Assembly, that the trusteeship agreements submitted were not in accordance with the Charter and therefore invalid, their absence is not entirely unexpected. Professor Francis Sayre (U.S.) was elected President and Sir Carl Berendsen (New Zealand) Vice-President. This means that representatives of a non-administering and an administering country respectively fill the two posts, and it is our view that this principle should be maintained, and that the presidency should alternate between the two. A Committee of full Council was appointed to examine any controversial rules of procedure. The Council itself adopts its own rules of procedure. At the meeting on March 27th it decided that there shall be two regular sessions each year. At present there are eight Trust Territories, Ruanda-Urundi under Belgium, Togoland and the Cameroons under France, Tanganyika, Togoland and the Cameroons under the U.K., New Guinea under Australia and Western Samoa under New Zealand.

Palestine

According to present arrangements, Sir Alexander Cadogan will ask the Secretary-General to put the Palestine question on the Agenda of the General Assembly at its September Session. H.M.G. will submit to the Assembly an account of the Administration of Palestine under the Mandate, and will invite the Assembly to "make recommendations concerning the future Government of Palestine." If the facts of the situation can be established beforehand, the September Assembly need not delay matters until 1948 by setting up Committees to investigate and report. Two procedures have been suggested for avoiding such delays, to set up a Committee either (i) by a special Session of the Assembly, or (ii) by the Authority of the Secretary-General, in agreement with member States. H.M.G. are ready to accept whichever wins general approval.

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

Tuesday and Wednesday the 25th and 26th March were spent in discussing the Deputies' report on procedure for a German Peace Treaty. The traditional points of view were re-stated, and the entire draft, with the exception of the part dealing with the composition of the Peace Conference, was referred back to the Deputies,

Mr. Bevin remarking that they had his sympathy.

Mr. Bevin proposed that Persia should be added to the eighteen Allies, following the Anglo-Soviet undertaking given to Persia in 1942. M. Molotov agreed, and the Soviet Press has been busy attributing the proposal to him and not to Mr. Bevin. Mr. Marshall urged that China should join the other members of the Council of Foreign Ministers in convening the Peace Conference. M. Molotov went so far as to agree that China should be a joint presiding Power, as at Paris, but not a convener. Mr. Marshall's other suggestions were :—

1. That the C.F.M. should draft the final text on the basis of all recommendations having a ⅔rds majority, and bearing in mind all other recommendations and opinions expressed at the Conference.
2. That all countries in a state of war with Germany should come to the Conference as equals, and later sign the Treaty.
3. That Germans should comment on the draft treaty, but should not be asked to sign the Treaty.

Instead he proposed that a clause be put in the new German constitution declaring that all authority exercised under the constitution must be exercised in accordance with the terms of the Peace Treaty. M. Bidault agreed that Germany should not sign, while Mr. Bevin and M. Molotov considered Germany's signature vital. Mr. Bevin aims at evolving, under the guidance of the Allied Control Council, a Germany which can accept and so sign the Treaty, at the same time as evolving, in consultations with the Allies, a Peace Treaty acceptable to world opinion. M. Molotov's reason was briefer—to secure that Germany would assume responsibility for carrying out the terms of the Treaty. In the course of this two-day debate on procedure, Mr. Bevin re-stated the principle that States which, like the Dominions, "were good enough to join us in fighting in 1939," had the right to continue with us in making the Peace. This was in answer to M. Molotov's traditional exclusiveness. Russia's delaying tactics in the Co-ordinating Committee were overcome by firmness on the parts of Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall. M. Vyshinsky had held up the Committee's work, which was to tabulate the agreements and disagreements arising from the Ministers' consideration of the Control Council's Report on Germany. He had been indulging in long political speeches on Displaced Persons, and other matters of substance which were irrelevant. When Mr. Bevin urged speed, M. Molotov suggested that the Ministers should examine those parts of the Committee's Report which were ready. Mr. Bevin said all or none, and Mr. Marshall added that M. Molotov could decide whether the Conference should make progress or not. He did, and agreed that the report should be completed by the 28th March.

Thursday's and Friday's sessions were in the nature of an Austrian interlude. M. Molotov's proposal to invite Yugoslav representatives to Moscow to express their views on the Austrian Treaty and on the Report of the Committee on Trieste finances was translated into an agreement to invite Italians and Yugoslavs to speak on Austria and to send memoranda on Trieste. The rest of the time was devoted to German assets in Eastern Austria. "The issue," as Mr. Marshall said towards the end of the second day, "was clear." All agreed that Russia had a right to German assets in Eastern Austria. It only remained to decide which these German assets were, or, in Mr. Bevin's words, "to exclude property taken by the Germans by force or duress." Russia has long been out to get all she can, and has expended a wealth of legal ingenuity to call "German" as many assets as possible. Mr. Bevin, Mr. Marshall and to a slightly less degree, M. Bidault, contend for an objective determination of each "asset," and insist on the need for some kind of arbitration in disputed cases. M. Molotov has so far shown an invincible dislike of arbitration. A single instance will illustrate his legal ingenuity. M. Bidault proposed to exclude from German assets "all property wrongfully taken from United Nations nationals or from Austrian nationals, for racial, religious or political reasons." M. Molotov at once wished to substitute "property seized by the Germans . . . . as a result of forcible action, or in the process of 'Aryanisation' without any compensation." Mr. Bevin explained that the Germans had generally paid some small compensation for the property they took, and pointing to the loop-holes in the Russian wording, asked whether any honest nation could wish to benefit by frauds committed under Hitler's régime. He saw dangers also in the French definition. It was finally decided that the Deputies should produce a Supplementary Report on German Assets in Austria, which the Ministers would consider when they reached that part of the Austrian Treaty—a decision which is an advance on M. Molotov's first suggestion to postpone further action until the Minister's own discussions on the Treaty.

The remainder of Friday's meeting was devoted to arranging how best to approach the Report of the Co-ordinating Committee, and what States should attend the Peace Conference. M. Molotov, goaded perhaps by Mr. Marshall's proposal that all countries in a state of war with Germany should be on terms of equality, argued strongly for a distinction to be made in favour of those "who had taken part with substantial forces." M. Bidault thought the same and agreed with Mr. Marshall that it would be wiser to settle the composition of the Committees before that of the Conference. Mr. Bevin persuaded his colleagues to refer the composition of the Peace Conference to the deputies.

Saturday's short session resulted in an agreed procedure for dealing with the Co-ordinating Committee's Report. Mr. Marshall had suggested that the Ministers should deal with fundamental issues such as Economic Unity, Level of Industry and Reparations, and the Political Structure of Germany, leaving the other outstanding matters to a Special committee. M. Molotov wished to add Demilitarisation to the fundamentals. Mr. Bevin countered by proving that Demilitarisation involved Germany's industrial potential, which involved her level of industry, which involved the whole balance of her economy, and that therefore Demilitarisation was both military and economic. This was agreed, and "industrial demilitarisation" appeared on the agenda. The members of the Special Committee, which had to report by the 3rd April, were General Robertson, Mr. Mason, Mr. Alphand and Marshal Sokolovski.

Monday the 31st March marked a new stage in the Conference. Mr. Bevin circulated the United Kingdom proposals for Allied cooperation during the next phase in Germany, or, the principles of Potsdam revised in the light of experience, and introduced them in a speech which sums up British policy on the more important aspects of the German problem. The objective remains to rebuild Germany on democratic lines, and make her a member of the peaceful nations of the world. She must be shown a clear future, else she would despair. Economic unity to mean anything required four things: freedom of movement throughout all Germany for persons, trade and ideas: that German exports be used to pay for German imports: that the Four Powers share the past, present and future expenses of occupation: a central German administration with executive power. Potsdam required these four things, and to reject them, as some did, was to reject Potsdam. Mr. Bevin rejected the conditions which the Soviet had attached to their agreement to economic unity, (1) Immediate payment of reparations from current production, (2) Four Power control of the Ruhr, (3) an end to the fusion of the Anglo-American Zones. He rejected M. Bidault's condition that the German Treaty must guarantee coal to France, if France was to agree to economic unity, adding however that he hoped to make other arrangements to satisfy France's needs. The level of industry should be raised to include 10 million tons of steel a year. German economy must be so ordered that the British taxpayer had no more burdens thrust upon him.

Mr. Marshall was outspoken in his rejection of those things that Mr. Bevin had rejected. The most interesting part of his speech was his remark that if the Byrnes' Four Power Treaty were accepted, a reasonable increase in the level of German industry would not endanger Europe. "Germany," he added, must pay reparations; but German resources must first be devoted to "rebuilding the network of trade on which European prosperity depends." Here he sees eye to eye with Mr. Bevin "that the German problem is also a European problem," and Mr. Bevin's doctrine of the indivisibility of economic unity takes on a wider significance.

M. Bidault seemed more conciliatory on coal, and appreciative of the "Anglo-Saxon" viewpoint. M. Molotov, as often happens, responded most gently to this plain speaking, and hinted that reparations from current production should not start to flow eastward until German economy was balanced. For this reason he urged quick developments in German industry and agriculture. He still condemned the fusion of zones. He omitted all reference to the Ruhr. He proclaimed his attachment to economic unity, and finally he saw hopes of agreement, provided the "lawful rights" of Russia were not forgotten; but hopes do not destroy the fact that even a Germany who has balanced her economy, would become a Germany producing predominantly for Russia's benefit, if Russia secures her demand for ten billion dollars' worth of reparations from current production.

The outstanding event of the period under review was the speech of Mr. Bevin on the 31st March, and the British proposals which he circulated. The speech contained that blend of imagination and practical politics which had been noticeable in his utterances last week. The four Allies had endured two wars made by German greed. Remembering this, their common objective was now to avoid a third war by making Germany a peaceful member of a peaceful Europe. His guiding principle remains " see the whole picture " and this, combined with Mr. Marshall's refusal to " seek agreement merely for the sake of agreement," gives promise for the future.

Since the 30th March the Foreign Ministers in Moscow have done little more than explore every deadlock on the crucial economic question. Minor agreements reached on political questions were of little immediate value as none of these can be put into effect unless economic unity is achieved.

Discussions were characterised at the outset by opposition to the Russian claim that economic unity must be conditional on acceptance of the principle of reparations from current production, four-Power control of the Ruhr, and annulment of the bizonal agreement. On the 31st March, Mr. Bevin rejected all three conditions. Mr. Marshall concentrated on opposing the first condition. He also rejected the French request that economic unity should depend on a satisfactory settlement of European coal needs. The Soviet argument that France could have her coal and still leave enough in Germany to manufacture reparations for Russia he considered ill-founded, especially if the French meant to keep the limit on steel production. All this could only result in less imports to feed the population. Mr. Marshall emphatically denied any desire to divide Germany. The French and Soviet delegates stuck to their guns but both expressed the hope that agreement could be reached.

Mr. Bevin then took the lead by presenting a paper on "Supplementary Principles to govern the Treatment of Germany." This is really complementary to the Potsdam Agreement, although superseding it where any points conflict. It is the most comprehensive plan yet placed before the Conference, and the fact was notable that all the other delegations later used it as a basis for discussion. The preamble states that the aims of the Powers are : to establish political conditions which will prevent a revival of dictatorship and aggressive policies; to establish economic conditions which will enable a self-supporting Germany to pay occupation costs and to benefit the rest of the world by her industry; to establish a suitable constitutional machinery acceptable to the German people and to foster in the Germans a sense of democratic responsibility. The first part outlines the principles of Government which Mr. Bevin had already put forward and includes the need for strict Allied controls. It proposes that all German prisoners shall be repatriated by the 31st December, 1948. The Powers shall reaffirm that no German will be sent to work outside the country unless he voluntarily signs a contract before leaving. Land reform should be carried out by the 1st January, 1948. (This was later agreed.) Under "Economic Principles" are included four conditions for economic unity, although these are not considered exhaustive. The first is freedom of movement throughout Germany—a requirement which neither the French nor Soviet delegates have accepted. The second, that exports shall be used in the first place to pay for imports and that no reparations from current production shall be delivered until occupation costs have been repaid, is of course anathema to the Russians. The third condition, that both past and future financial burdens shall be equitably shared between the four Powers, is rejected categorically by the Russians and virtually by the French. Only the French make reservations about the fourth condition, that Central German Administrations with executive powers shall be established. The paper, among other familiar points, proposes to control the activities of foreign firms in Germany and suggests that the Germans should work out schemes for financial reform and decartelisation.

The chief feature of the secret meeting on 2nd April was a compromise American proposal on reparations. Mr. Marshall said that a substantial increase in the level of industry would reduce the number of plants available as reparations. He was prepared to study "without commitment" a plan to compensate for this loss by deliveries from current production. This was hedged about with provisions that deliveries should not begin immediately or increase occupation costs. The plan did not satisfy M. Molotov, who, in any case, said he could not modify the decisions already taken to remove plants for reparation. Mr. Bevin thought the plan was complicated and would only lead to delays. In fact it is felt that the proposal is no more conciliatory than H.M. Government's view, which does not preclude the possibility of such deliveries once Germany is self-supporting. M. Bidault diverted discussion by seeking to bargain for satisfaction as regards the Saar and coal in return for his agreement to an increased steel quota.

Between the 3rd and the 8th April the Ministers agreed to set up as soon as possible central German Administrations covering the main economic subjects including food and agriculture. The French said this should not apply to the Saar or prejudice the position of the Ruhr and Rhineland. The Allied Control Council is to issue directives to these departments and will specify which subjects should be administered by the Laender. A German advisory Council is to be established three months after these departments begin work and a Provisional Government nine months after that. Here Mr. Bevin and M. Molotov agreed that the Provisional Government ought to be directly elected, while M. Bidault and Mr. Marshall wished it to be formed from representatives of the Laender. The composition of the Advisory Council and the powers of the Laender were not agreed, although on the latter the exact points of difference are still not clear. M. Molotov was forced to withdraw a proposal that the Central Government should have powers of State Security. This the other delegates compared to the totalitarian Gestapo. The matter is, however, likely to crop up again. Mr. Bevin refused M. Molotov's demand for a plebiscite on the structure of Germany and said that he could not allow the Germans to choose a highly centralised form of Government as they had done under Hitler.

Frontier questions at length came up for discussion on the 10th April. The German-Polish frontier is the most delicate problem and one fraught with long-term dangers, since it is probably capable of rousing greater national hatred than any other German question: as Sir Horace Rumbold wrote of the Eastern frontier problem in 1930, unlike economic problems, "a restoration of territory . . . is something which any ordinary German can understand and strive for." It is doubtful whether the Germans would be content with a partial restoration and would not make it a stepping-stone to new concessions. Mr. Marshall, while agreeing that Poland should not be left with less resources than before the war and should certainly have part of East Prussia and all Upper Silesia, did not consider the frontier as finally decided. The remaining territory, was largely agricultural. If Germany lost all this territory, she would have to import two-fifths of her food and he thought that the area should be divided according to the needs of Germany, Poland and Europe as a whole. A special allied boundary Commission ought to study the problem. Mr. Bevin also wanted more agricultural land to remain in Germany. M. Bidault did not question the transfer of these territories to Poland, but was naturally quick to propose that all the boundaries of Germany should be examined together by the experts. Those areas now in question are parts of Pomerania, Brandenburg and Lower Silesia. It is too early to state which might be retained by Germany, but in any case it is most unlikely to be the whole area. The most densely settled by the Poles are Lower Silesia and the seaboard of Pomerania. On the other hand, Lower Silesia is a rich agricultural area representing some 5·4 per cent. of the agricultural area of the Old Reich, whereas the parts of Brandenburg and Pomerania together represented some 8·6 per cent. Approximately 4,976,000 Germans lived there in 1939 of whom some 350,000 remain, so that the whole area could hardly accommodate half of Germany's potential 10–12 million refugees. Germany might of course buy her food from Poland, but she is now less able to afford this than formerly because the Allies want a Germany which is less and not more industrialised than before 1939. Moreover, the German economic system has been violently dislocated, above all by the disturbance in the balance of her factors of production, and this dislocation would be reduced if a proportion of refugees returned to the East. On the other hand this return would of course affect the balance of Polish economy. Mr. Marshall was therefore careful to approach the whole problem on a broad European basis (see also under "Poland" and "The Moscow Conference").

Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall accepted French claims to the Saar, but have not decided whether this should include the area incorporated in 1946. Neither they nor M. Molotov accepted proposals for a special régime for the Ruhr and Rhineland. M. Molotov did not make any promises about the Saar although he seemed to consider using it as a bargaining weapon in order to gain concessions on immediate control of the Ruhr.

Disturbances and strikes continued in the British Zone during the first week in April, but did not increase in violence, largely owing to the intervention of the Trade Unions. Consultations have been held with Union leaders. Nearly 500,000 tons of coal were lost by stoppages during this time, and the situation has therefore been generally aggravated, despite improved food imports. Many rations are not being met in full. Despite some irresponsible diatribes against Military Government the German administration is still the chief target of criticism, and with reason. The farmers have not fulfilled their quotas and the Laender, particularly Bavaria, have not made proper deliveries. The bi-zonal Executive Committee has failed to produce adequate staff, and the food committee does not issue sufficiently firm orders, probably because it realises that any form of central control is unpopular with the Land Governments. This is but part of the acute friction over the relative powers of the Centre and the Laender which is undermining the bi-zonal arrangements.

The SED gained a sweeping victory in the Berlin Trade Union elections and has 36 seats on the executive committee compared with 7 of the Social Democrats and 2 of the Christian Democrats. The Social Democrats complained that the voting system was unfair and that they were hampered in the Soviet Sector. Nevertheless they have lost ground since last October, largely because they lack initiative and are rent by internal disputes.

AUSTRIA

The long drawn-out discussions on the German treaty are having their effect on the progress of the Austrian treaty, which has been hanging fire since the Deputies completed their review of the treaty articles on the 8th April. Further discussions by the Deputies on the question of the "German assets" have made it clear that the Russians are sticking to their London proposals and are particularly adamant on the question of bilateral negotiations (as opposed to arbitration machinery) and the narrow exception of property confiscated as a result of "direct forcible action" (as opposed to "force and duress"). The Deputies have agreed, however, that the (still elusive) definition of the assets should cover all pre-Anschluss German property which is still in German ownership, and property acquired by Germans since 1938 with the exception of the former Austrian State property and property beneficially owned by non-Germans. In the course of the discussions, the Soviet deputy denied that the London Declaration of the 5th January, 1943, applied to Austria. (In a letter to the press at the end of March Dr. Gruber, the Austrian Foreign Minister, had expressly drawn attention to this Declaration as being a "very valuable" aid in solving the assets problem for Austria). An analysis of the 211 concerns held by the Russians in Eastern Austria has been provided by the Austrian Delegation. This shows that 26 of these concerns belong to foreign (non-German) owners; 46 represent Aryanisation; in 34 cases dispossession of Austrian owners by force or duress can be proved; and 11 are contestable even according to the Soviet formula.

Another main problem tackled by the Deputies has been that of the transference from Austria of displaced persons, refugees, Reichsdeutsche and Volksdeutsche. It has been agreed that displaced persons in the strict sense of the word shall be treated entirely separately from those of German origin. In both instances, however, the Soviets insist on a time limit of six months for the completion of their removal. In the case of the Reichs- and Volksdeutsche the Soviets admit of no exceptions, while the other three delegations are agreed that the article should exempt "such persons as come within the categories approved for exemption by the Allied Commission for Austria," should apply to "Potsdam" categories only, and must not so much lay an obligation on Austria as provide for her to concert measures with the Control Council in Germany.

From the Austrian point of view the only bright spot so far in the disappointing tardiness and tangle of the Moscow talks has been the United Kingdom decision to abandon its claim to two-thirds compensation for United Nations nationals who have suffered loss or damage to property in Austria. The British proposal as it now stands provides for agreements for reciprocal treatment between Austria and the United Nations concerned, but even so it still seems to be unpalatable to the Austrians, who claim that the clause will place absolute obligation on Austria to compensate at a rate which may be anything up to 100 per cent., and that the return on Austrian property damaged in countries most likely to be affected may be negligible. The French maintain that two-thirds compensation should be paid, but both the Soviet Union and the United States are against any compensation. The possibility of further modifications cannot be excluded.

While the Soviet attitude on compensation for property is favourable to the Austrians, an entirely new proposal made by M. Gusev during discussion of the "Debts" article on the 8th April gives a further disconcerting indication of Soviet unwillingness to abide strictly by the "no reparations" principle for Austria. M. Gusev's proposal was that compensation should be paid by Austria for the unpaid work done by foreign workers in Austria, over 300,000 of whom had been Soviet citizens.

Yugoslav territorial claims against Austria were reiterated at a press conference on the 5th April by M. Kardelj, the leader of the Yugoslav Delegation which arrived in Moscow on the 2nd April. The Austrian Foreign Minister, in a subsequent press interview, has emphasised that Austria will never sign a treaty involving the territorial changes demanded by Yugoslavia.

In Vienna Soviet obstructive tactics in regard to British proposals for the creation of an Austrian army before the conclusion of the peace treaty have been continued. As at an earlier Executive Committee meeting, the Soviet member categorically refused at the Allied Council meeting on the 28th March to discuss any plans for the creation of the army, maintaining that this was outside the competence of the Allied Council and was the responsibility of the Four Powers charged with the supervision of the treaty. Soviet delaying tactics at the Allied Council's meeting on the 11th April were also responsible for a lack of agreement on the setting up of an Office for Civil Aviation in Vienna. It is suspected that the Soviets hope to make their approval conditional on the prior formation of an Austro-Russian civil aviation company. There is some evidence that the Soviets have made approaches to Austrian officials, who are reported, however, to have maintained a non-committal attitude.

(See "Czechoslovakia.")

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Contrary to expectation the Austro-Czechoslovak negotiations regarding certain relatively minor frontier adjustments desired by Czechoslovakia (see Summary 385) have not proved even moderately successful from the Czech viewpoint; the net result has been only an insignificant measure of agreement. The problem has now been referred back to the two Governments primarily concerned which have still to decide upon future procedure. Although a settlement is possible on a strictly quid pro quo basis where some of the less important demands are affected, as, for example, along the Dyje (Thaye) river and in respect of the narrow-gauge railway which connects Gmünd and Litschau, yet the Austrian Government have categorically rejected the Czechoslovak request for the cession of territory along the south bank of the Danube. It is not to Austria's advantage to accede to claims which are based solely upon their strategic importance. Consequently, the Austrian Government may be expected to resist energetically any demand, however trivial, for the expansion of the Bratislava bridge-head at Austria's expense and for the special facilities sought by Czechoslovakia on the grounds of expediency for the proper administration of the Oder–Elbe–Danube canal. The Austrian Government are, however, prepared to participate in a joint technical commission to study more closely the question of frontier rectification at the mouth of the canal.

The Austrian attitude has obviously disconcerted the Czechoslovak authorities who believed, perhaps too optimistically, that a mutually satisfactory solution could easily be reached. The Czechs are now busy advocating the benefits which would accrue from Danubian co-operation. In this respect, Dr. Clementis, the Communist Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has recently emphasised the importance which Czechoslovakia attaches to the projected expansion of Bratislava as a riverine port and as the gateway to the Balkans and the Soviet Union. He urged the Danubian countries to embark upon a new period of economic collaboration in which, naturally, Bratislava would play a leading rôle. The implication is, of course, that the Austrian attitude towards these frontier questions is short-sighted.

Commenting on the Minister's speech, the Austrian Government—in the meantime the Czechoslovak response to the Austrian counter-proposal is awaited—welcome the views of Dr. Clementis upon Danubian co-operation which would also act as a guarantee against renewed German aggression.

Dr. Kratochvil, the new Czechoslovak Ambassador to the Court of St. James, arrived in London on the 14th April, replacing M. Lobkowiez who was recalled in January after a lengthy period of ill-health. The appointment of Dr. Kratochvil is a political one. Still young (at 46) he has acquired a high reputation for intellectual and political integrity in his own country and is a prominent member of the Czechoslovak Social Democrat Party. (His party is maintaining, so far successfully, a line independent of the Communists.) His record of resistance—he suffered four years of German prison camps—is a worthy one. He is an authority on cultural and educational affairs, in which spheres he should do much to increase the already flourishing connections which his country has with the United Kingdom.

Dr. Teuner, the leader of the Czech Youth Organisation during the German occupation, has been arrested by American and Czech security organs in Germany. He will be brought back to Prague for trial.

POLAND

From the statements of Mr. Marshall and Mr. Bevin at Moscow on the Polish-German frontier, it is clear that the two statesmen consider this question not simply as a dispute between Poland and Germany, but as one affecting the whole of Europe. Mr. Bevin's suggestion of a possible change in the region east of Stettin indicates that he may wish to approach the question of general European prosperity from the point of view of the balance of German agriculture. Such an approach doubtless rests on the assumption that if Germany is to lose a large part of its agricultural as well as its industrial resources, she will hardly be in a position to contribute to her own prosperity, let alone that of Europe. The industrial side to the problem was illustrated by Mr. Marshall's proposal that, although German Upper Silesia should become Polish, its coal and other resources should help to sustain the economy of Europe. In fact, Poland was always willing to export its Silesian coal to Germany after the first World War, and even in the last year has begun to export it to various European countries, albeit in small quantities.

Demographic considerations in this matter were voiced by M. Bidault. It is certainly true that the expulsions and exodus from the former eastern territories of Germany might easily create difficulties in relation to the permanent distribution of a population of some sixty-six millions within a Germany reduced in size. The security of Germany's neighbours would also entail increased vigilance against any spirit of aggression which might result from such a restriction in territory. Between this aspect and his own proposals for the Ruhr and Rhineland, M. Bidault made a natural and logical connection, since such proposals, like his first observations, were inspired by a "desire once for all to deprive Germany of the means which has enabled her to undertake her former aggressions." M. Bidault was disinclined to alter the present Polish-German frontier, not only because of the Soviet and Polish losses in the war, but also because the direction given to the peace settlement by the creation of such a frontier would, in fact, be difficult to reverse. He did, however, think that the problem of Germany's frontiers should be examined as a whole, thus Mr. Bevin's suggestion to create a commission for that very purpose seems eminently pertinent.

Polish reaction to the whole matter has been such as was to be expected, though quite calm, and as yet free from polemics. Hitherto more attention has been paid to Mr. Marshall's attitude than to that of Mr. Bevin. The first statement following the new phase of discussions came from General Grosz, Polish official spokesman at Moscow, that any frontier commission was entirely unnecessary since, as M. Molotov had said, the Potsdam decision was final. General Grosz said that Poland would abide by any unanimous decision of the Foreign Ministers, which, in view of M. Molotov's refusal to alter the present frontier, seems safe enough. A similar, but more emphatic declaration was made by M. Modzelewski, Polish Foreign Minister, at a Warsaw Press Conference. The Polish Government, he said, considered the problem of Poland's western frontier as decided and settled according to the Yalta and Potsdam decisions, and the agreements concerning the transfer of the German population concluded with the Allied authorities based on the Potsdam decisions. The expulsion of the Germans had been in accordance with the Allied authorities' plans, and there was something fantastic in the notion of staging another migration of peoples in these territories. The Polish Government's attitude was approved by the whole nation, which had put forward tremendous efforts in resettling the Regained Territories, now according to Polish reports, holding some 5,000,000 Poles). As for the question of German agriculture, production could be increased by land reform, notably in Westphalia. Germany, moreover, had produced 85 per cent. of her food supplies in 1939, though she had previously lost Poznania and Alsace Lorraine. Finally, if the Regained Territories were to serve Europe, it must be remembered that they form an integral part of Poland, and that their reconstruction was impossible without that of Poland as a whole.

The whole Polish press supports M. Modzelewski, and in this respect accurately reflects Polish public opinion, which, ever since the Curzon Line was forced on the country, has been almost unanimous in its insistence on the Oder-Western Neisse frontier as the only possible recompense. On this issue M. Mikolajczyk is in complete agreement with the Polish Government; according to one report, he has written an article in which he said that Mr. Churchill called the Potsdam decision "final," and that the British are now going back on it.

SOVIET UNION

Negotiations are proceeding in Moscow between H.M. Ambassador at Moscow, Sir Maurice Peterson, and M. Vyshinsky, with a view to revising the original text of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty. For this purpose British and Soviet drafts for a new Treaty have been exchanged and are being studied in detail. The preliminary Soviet draft goes much further in its commitments than the 1942 Treaty and further than is compatible either with normal British peace-time obligations or the spirit of the Charter. In particular it would expand Article VI so as to forbid the conclusion of any alliances or participation in actions "directly or indirectly directed against the other high contracting party." Other points of difference between the negotiators are M. Vyshinsky's objection to specific references to the United Nations Charter and his reluctance to refer in the Soviet draft to the hypothetical Four-Power Treaty against renewed German aggression.

Germany continues to hold the centre of the stage and while full and, on the whole, fair reports have appeared in the press on the work of the Council of Foreign Ministers the barrage of criticism against the Anglo-American occupation authorities has been kept up in all papers. In spite of repeated British denials that this country had received any coal from Germany, Pravda alleged that German coal was being bought at 16 marks a ton and resold at enormous profits, while Izvestiya went on record with the assertion that Great Britain, while opposing the French claims to Ruhr coal, was herself going to take 100 million dollars' worth in 1947.

Zhukov, in a strongly-worded Pravda article, denounced the Anglo-Americans for appropriating an unspecified quantity of Nazi gold—and especially for having removed 100 tons of gold and other valuables from the Eisenach area before the arrival of Soviet troops. All these articles followed up a grossly unfair article in Pravda on the 31st March by the well-known Soviet writer Leonov entitled "A Conversation about Justice." The general burden of the article was that, while diplomats around the Moscow Conference table refused Russia's just claims, they forgot that in the ground beneath were buried 7 million giants who had defended the world from universal evil.

Criticism of British foreign policy, which had been in abeyance for several weeks, has reappeared in several items. Much was made of attacks upon Mr. Bevin's policy at the Co-operative Society Conference and other conferences, e.g., that of the Union of Clerical Workers, where charges were made that present British foreign policy was too conservative, encouraged the revival of Fascism and adopted too strong an anti-Soviet alignment. The impression given is of widespread criticism of Labour foreign policy, which is said not to be based on Socialist principles, and dissatisfaction at the British attitude towards Spain and actions in Greece. The reactionary nature of the Foreign Office and diplomatic corps is emphasised, as is the demand for closer Anglo-Soviet relations.

Soviet comment on General de Gaulle's Strasbourg speech has described him as no "servant of democracy," but rather its grave-digger. His statement was linked with the American offer of aid to Greece and Turkey as part of a general campaign of world reaction. De Gaulle, according to one Soviet commentator, was in reality advancing a claim on behalf of the notorious 200 families of France for a share in the international "trust" which was to administer Germany under the control of American capital; in return for this he was willing to condone dollar diplomacy everywhere.

French affairs in general have not excited much attention of late in Moscow, but French art is now coming under the general ideological ban. The leading Soviet painter, Gerasismov, has recently stated that the famous Moscow collection of XIXth century French impressionists would probably not be re-opened as it was undesirable that the public taste should be led astray by such decadence. Even Picasso, despite his recent admission into the ranks of the Communist Party, has been lumped with Cézanne and dismissed as a "pillar of formalism."

The Soviet Ambassador to Greece, Admiral Rodionov, was summoned back to Moscow from his post at the beginning of April, M. Chernichev, the Counsellor remaining in Athens as Chargé d'Affaires. There is no reason to suppose that the Ambassador's departure is other than temporary. Shortly before leaving the Ambassador presented a note of protest to the Greek Foreign Ministry about reports appearing in the Greek press that Generalissimo Stalin had given an interview to the Moscow correspondent of the American U.P. Agency. The note denied that such an interview had ever taken place, and its alleged contents were said to be on the stereotyped lines of other false reports hostile to the Soviet Union which appeared from time to time in organs close to the Greek Government. The note accordingly placed on the Greek Government responsibility for spreading the false interview in Greek press organs. The Greek Government have refuted these charges (see also under "Greece").

A Yugoslav Trade Delegation has arrived in Moscow. It is composed of M. Crnobrnja, Deputy Yugoslav Minister of Foreign Trade, and representatives of Yugoslav industry. The delegation was met at the airport by M. Lebedev, U.S.S.R. trade representative in Yugoslavia, and other Soviet officials. A Bulgarian trade delegation is also at present in Moscow, headed by the Minister of Trade and Food, Jordan Bozhilov.

By a decree dated the 4th April a Union-Republic Ministry of Forestry has been created to remove defects in the organisation of forestry and to improve the exploitation of forest resources. The new Ministry has been entrusted with the direction of forest control, the restoration of forests, the afforestation of steppe and dry areas, and the preservation and care of forests. All forests administered by Ministries and Departments, krai, oblast, raion and town executive committees with the exception of those transferred to collective farms under the laws on the utilisation of land in perpetuity and those belonging to village communities have been transferred to the Ministry of Forestry. Ministries of Forestry are to be formed in all Union Republics. M. German Petrovich Motovilov has been appointed Minister of Forestry of the U.S.S.R., and M. L. M. Kaganovich, former Minister of the Building Materials Industry of the U.S.S.R. has been replaced by M. S. Z. Ginsburg. (M. Kaganovich, has also been relieved of his duties as Deputy-Chairman of the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers following his transfer to the Ukraine where he is in charge of the reconstruction programme and has been elected member of the Polit- and *Org-*Buros of the Ukrainian C.P.) M. G. M. Orlov has been called from the Ministry of the Cellulose and Paper Industry of the U.S.S.R. to replace M. I. Saltykov as Minister of the Timber Industry of the U.S.S.R. An enforced resignation of a different order is that of G. A. Miterev, released from his duties as Minister of Health of the U.S.S.R. (a post he has held since 1939) for "inability to fulfil his duties." Moscow rumour has it that his dismissal is due to his neglect of the medical services under his care and to excessive interest in food and drink. It is also alleged that he did not sufficiently support Prof. Nina Kluyeva's cancer research work, for which the U.S.A. offered financial help. The results of Prof. Kluyeva's cancer investigations were described in her book "Biography of Malignant Tumours," published in 1946. (See also under "Far East.")

SCANDINAVIA

Finland

Like the proverbial watched kettle, a political crisis has been simmering in Finland for weeks and even months without coming to the boil. On the 11th of April, however, matters came to a head, and M. Pekkala tendered the resignation of his Government. The immediate cause was the decision of the Agrarian Party to withdraw its Ministers in protest against the unsatisfactory manner in which the Government were handling the economic situation. The Social Democrats also had expressed anxiety, at the signs and portents of deterioration and in March had approached the two other Government parties—Agrarians and Folk Democrats—with proposals for a reconstruction of the cabinet.

There are, indeed, good grounds for thinking that the renewed unrest on the subject of prices and wages is only a cloak for greater and more compelling political considerations. Agrarians and Social Democrats for a long time past have considered their position in the Government as intolerable, and the real object of the present move, undoubtedly, is to diminish the influence of the Communists and other elements among the Folk Democrats. Unfortunately the moment is singularly ill-chosen. The Peace Treaty remains unratified, the trial of those accused in the arms dumps case is in progress, and, to add to the embarrassment, a Finnish delegation is at present in Moscow negotiating with the Russians for transit rights through the Porkkala area and the Saimaa Canal. The imprudence of forcing a change at this juncture becomes yet further magnified when the Soviet attitude, as recently defined by Col.-General Zhdanov (see Summary No. 382), is recalled. It should be noted, however, that there is no evidence of any direct co-operation between Agrarians and Social Democrats in ousting the Pekkala Government. In these circumstances the overthrow of the Government may well be regarded as a protest against the Prime Minister personally, particularly as his Government long ago forfeited the confidence of all political parties except that of the Folk Democrats.

As regards the immediate future all responsible Finnish circles agree that exclusion of the Communists from the new Government is impracticable, however much it may be desired, and that, therefore, the division of power between the three largest parties is bound to remain more or less unchanged. The nuisance value of the Communists in opposition accounts for this view.

The most likely development is perhaps that the Folk Democrats will lose some ground, and that the new Prime Minister will not be a member of that Party. A battle royal is likely to be waged round the appointment of the Minister of the Interior, and it is inconceivable that the extreme Left should feel inclined to relinquish this political strongpoint as well as the Premiership. It is also believed that the Folk Democrats would prefer to see an Agrarian or a member of one of the other bourgeois parties at the head of the Government rather than a Social Democrat. Should the extreme Left, however, insist upon retaining all the portfolios which they have held, a deadlock will most probably result, leading to the dissolution of the Diet and General Elections. In any case the crisis is likely to be prolonged.

Sweden

On the 3rd April the Swedish Commander-in-Chief, General Jung, made a statement on the defence proposals and on Sweden's strategic position, in which he emphasized that the country was in a very exposed position, since in the event of a conflict between the Great Powers, the desire by one party to prevent Sweden from being used by the other might lead to an immediate attack on her by the former. That the General, nevertheless, has not abandoned his old preference for a policy of non-intervention is proved by his also pointing out that "in case of a collapse of the United Nations brought about by a conflict between the Great Powers there would be no formal obstacles to Sweden following her old policy of neutrality." In this connexion he also revived the idea of Scandinavian military collaboration so as to make a joint policy of neutrality more effective, admitting, however, that both Denmark and Norway were at present badly armed and that it would take a long time for them to recover from this weakness which in itself presented a danger also for Sweden.

FRANCE

General de Gaulle has returned to the political arena, and a Gaullist party proper now exists for the first time. On the 14th April the General issued a statement announcing that he had assumed leadership of the newly-born Rassemblement du Peuple Français (R.P.F.) a movement whose aim was "to achieve the unity of our people in the tasks of reconstruction and reform of the State." The present political system "whereby rigid parties sharply opposed to one another share out among themselves all the powers of Government, must be displaced by another system in which the executive power will be derived from the country as a whole and not from the parties, and in which any insoluble conflicts can be resolved by the people themselves." This statement is the second step in the much-advertised political campaign which began with General de Gaulle's speech at Strasbourg on Easter Monday and is to continue with speeches in other parts of the country. At Strasbourg the General put forward a programme which was sufficiently vague to make a wide appeal. He made a renewed attack on present party divisions and on the Constitution which had produced them, and appealed for a national movement aiming at the creation of a strong and efficient State through the reform of the constitution by legal means and on a plane above all differences of opinion. In foreign affairs he said that France's most urgent task must be to retain her independence in a world divided between two Great Powers and to work for a European revival so that there might be an element of balance between East and West.

General de Gaulle's attack on the existing political system will clearly find a wide echo in public opinion. He has waited until he could say that the new Constitution had failed to produce a stable and efficient Government, and he now believes that by the end of this year the economic situation will have deteriorated to such an extent and general disillusion will be so great that there will be a unanimous demand for his return to power. The General's ideas of how exactly this would happen are hazy, and it does not seem that he has a clear understanding of the consequences of his actions or of the realities which the political parties, with all their shortcomings, represent. The immediate consequence is undoubtedly a deepening of the rift between Left and Right in France. The Communists and Socialists are uncompromisingly hostile to the General, the M.R.P. is deeply embarrassed, and the groups of the Right and, to a lesser extent, the Radicals bring him enthusiastic support. De Gaulle is therefore becoming identified with the Right although he will find personal supporters in all parties except the Communist Party, and mainly in the Union Démocratique et Socialiste de la Résistance (associated with the Radicals) to which the Secretary-General of the R.P.F., M. Soustelle, belongs. It is not yet known whether the R.P.F. will act as a political party or as an extra-parliamentary "Ligue."

M. Ramadier's Government had warning of General de Gaulle's intentions, and the Prime Minister visited him to make it clear that the Government drew a distinction between commemorative ceremonies at which the General would be entitled to military and official honours, and purely political meetings at which he must speak as a private citizen. M. Ramadier himself in a speech on the 30th March gave a sharp warning against attempts to use "the ephemeral greatness of one man" as a focus for national union. M. Vincent Auriol, President of the Republic, on the eve of his departure on a State visit to West Africa, also gave a solemn warning against "permanent political agitations which would range men and parties against one another," and spoke as the defender of the new Constitution.

In Moscow (see also under "The Moscow Conference," "Germany" and "Poland") M. Molotov has dashed the hopes of the French delegation by refusing to agree to the immediate appointment of a special commission to work out means of incorporating the Saar territory in the French economic system. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall agreed in principle to the French proposals but said that the exact boundaries of the Saar and the question of adjusting France's reparations claim must be settled by experts. M. Bidault has had even less success in his request for consideration of the French plan for the Ruhr. On the question of coal, however, negotiations in Moscow between the U.K., U.S. and French delegations have brought agreement in sight for the establishment of a sliding scale relating exports of coal from western Germany to total coal output in that area for the second half of 1947. Final agreement is held up, however, on account of the French request for assurances that we shall support their approach to the European Coal Organisation when the decision on the incorporation of the Saar in the French economy has been taken. The French hope to benefit by the coal production of the Saar without giving up a corresponding proportion of their allocation of Ruhr coal.

The presence of the Foreign Ministers in Moscow has also enabled the Secretary of State to make a direct approach to M. Bidault on the subject of French failure to prevent the clandestine embarkation from French ports of Jews trying to reach Palestine. A sharp note was also sent to the French Government asking for their co-operation in this matter.

M. Auriol's visit to West Africa, which will be followed by other visits to all parts of the French Union, comes at a critical moment in France's relations with her Empire. Trouble in the French Union is not confined to Indo-China, and the existence of serious unrest in Madagascar has now been revealed. In this huge island French supremacy has been undermined by France's loss of prestige during the war, while the economic situation is bad owing to lack of imports and to the refusal of the Malagasies to work more than 2 or 3 days a week now that the system of forced labour has been abolished. A nationalist movement known as the Parti de Rénovation Malgache won all the seats reserved for the native population of the island in the National Assembly and the Council of the Republic. The party wishes Madagascar to become an associated State within the French Union but the population is too backward for this to be a practical possibility, and the French are only beginning to introduce measures which would educate them for self-government. The troubles began on the night of the 29th/30th March, and there have been sporadic outbreaks during the last fortnight with attacks by bands of natives, armed with spears and knives, on military posts and police stations. The acting Consul-General in Antananarivo estimates that 40 Europeans and hundreds of natives have been killed. Martial law has been proclaimed in some districts, and three nationalist deputies and two Councillors of the Republic have been arrested. The French attribute the trouble to extremist elements of the Parti de Rénovation Malgache representing, they claim, the old feudal aristocracy which dislikes the restraint put upon them by the French in the interests of the population as a whole.

In Morocco the state of tension is revealed by the fact that a petty quarrel between a Senegalese soldier and an Arab led to an affray in Casablanca in which Senegalese troops ran riot and 64 persons were killed. In Algeria electoral speeches by the extreme Nationalist leader, Messali Hadj, are causing concern, and the Minister of the Interior is visiting the country on a tour of inspection. Before leaving he told the press that the time had now come to introduce the new constitution for Algeria which was first proposed last summer. (See also under "Tangier.")

SPAIN

On the 2nd April in a statement to the Press in Lisbon Don Juan's secretariat denounced General Franco's Draft Law of Succession (see Summary No. 387) as being a unilateral decision by the Spanish Government made without prior consultation with the Prince. Don Juan followed this up on the 7th April with a personal message directed to the Spanish people. He claimed that the Bill of Succession was null and void since it lacked two essential requirements: neither the legitimate heir to the Spanish Throne nor the Spanish nation had been consulted —for the Cortes Españolas did not represent the Spanish people, it was no more than a collection of Government nominees. The Bill of Succession, said the Prince, was an attempt to turn General Franco's dictatorship into a life monopoly; to wrap in the mantle of hereditary monarchy a régime based on arbitrary government; to place a bogus constitution as the coping-stone of an edifice of so-called fundamental laws none of which had in fact been put into practice. Don Juan was ready, as he had always been, to agree to a normal and unconditional transfer of authority, but to acquiesce in General Franco's suggestions for Spain's future would be to fail in his sacred duty as guardian of the inherent rights of the Crown, rights which equally formed part of the spiritual patrimony of the Spanish nation.

This unequivocal statement is in line with views already expressed by Don Juan in an interview given last autumn to a Spanish correspondent of The Observer, details of which, (with amplifications arising from General Franco's latest move) were published with Don Juan's permission on the 13th April. At this interview Don Juan affirmed that he had nothing to add to his Manifesto of the 19th March, 1945. His views of the Franco régime remained unaltered, though he was quite prepared to negotiate an agreement with General Franco provided its sole purpose was to pave the way for a peaceful, complete and unconditional transfer of authority. Public reaction to the Draft Law of Succession had made it clear that already the Crown could count on a body of opinion so extensive and so coherent that the Sovereign would be enabled to carry into effect a national policy.

In replying to specific questions put to him Don Juan expressed the opinion that an historic institution such as the Spanish Monarchy could not depend on the will of a transitory majority expressed in a referendum. But, since the establishment of a régime and the carrying out of its high guiding mission depended largely on adherence to the national will unequivocally expressed, Don Juan intended to seek such confirmation of the will of Spain as soon as circumstances permitted. Another question concerned his possible difficulty in carrying out the political and economic reforms which he has promised against the wishes of the Army, Church, banking and industrial elements whose support was generally believed to be the mainstay of the present régime. Don Juan replied that, although the support or acquiescence of such groups was necessary for peaceful change, there was a wide gulf between co-operation with them and a Monarchy in subservience to them. Every individual and everybody that moved and acted within the framework of the law would under the Monarchy enjoy the same privileges: political and social rights would be upheld in a way which would challenge comparison with that of most progressive countries. Other answers made by Don Juan indicated that he would like to see a wider administrative division between the State and the Catholic Church, the latter being separated for its own safety from all political strife, and that he was prepared to treat with due respect historical and particularist claims within the Spanish State so long as they did not impair Spanish sovereignty or unity. A policy of decentralization transferring to all regions part of the departmental activities at present overburdening the State would, he thought, be of the greatest advantage. Finally, Don Juan dealt summarily with the charge often brought against him of having twice during the civil war offered his services to General Franco (a fact made much of recently in Spanish broadcasts, with a view presumably to discrediting Don Juan with the Left). Peace would not come to Spain, said Don Juan, until Spaniards are offered the opportunity to bury their mutual hatreds and feuds. Thus Don Juan—in his words at least—shows an encouraging realism and freedom from bias, gained in the bitterness of exile.

His message to the Spanish people has been well received in Spain by critics of Franco's latest Bill. It is rather significant that the Madrid newspapers, Ya, Arriba (the Falange Party organ) and ABC (under Monarchist ownership) have been permitted to publish the Royal documents together with Don Juan's original manifesto of March 1945, previously withheld. ABC in an outspoken accompanying article declared that General Franco's Bill of Succession violated permanent values of the traditional Monarchy, while the other two newspapers made no attempt to argue over the terms of the manifesto, but criticised Don Juan for his failure to recognize General Franco's services in saving Spain from Communism. Spanish broadcasts, however, have been couched in much stronger terms and reflect the Government's anxiety to stress the "absolute and obvious legality of the Spanish régime which sprang from the National uprising" and the anarchy and chaos likely to follow from any attempt to force General Franco to relinquish the reins. The Caudillo is manifestly perturbed by reports of Don Juan's success in convincing the Moderate Left that the liberal constitutional Monarchy is their only chance of getting rid of the present régime and at the same time offering the opportunity of freedom to reorganize their ranks and continue the campaign for the Third Spanish Republic.

TANGIER

On 9th April the Sultan of Morocco arrived in Tangier for a brief visit which had been contemplated for some months. So rare an event was calculated to attract a crowd of tribesmen and others such as would tax the town's resources in the matters of food, accommodation and police. Thanks, however, to the arrangements made by the international Committee of Control which, incidentally, is this year under the chairmanship of the British Consul-General, all passed off happily.

His Majesty Sidi Mohammed travelled by train from French Morocco with a suite of some fifty persons and his black guard of five hundred. On entering the Spanish zone the Sultan was received by his representative there (the Khalifa) and the Spanish High Commissioner, General Varela. In a brief interview given to a Cairo press correspondent the Sultan said that he attached great importance to the unity of Morocco and that Morocco shared the views and aspirations of the Arab League. In an extempore speech the Khalifa for ten minutes extolled the dynasty and qualities of the Sultan, hailing him as the "Commander of the Faithful" and contriving to make no reference to France or Spain. The Spanish authorities from the first had deprecated the proposed visit, being anxious, as ever, to avoid anything which might reinforce the constant French claim that the Spanish zone is only a part—sublet to Spain—of the French protectorate of Morocco. General Varela accordingly found it convenient to keep away from Tangier rather than play second fiddle there to M. Labonne, the French Resident-General at Rabat, who attended the ceremonies as the Sultan's Foreign Minister.

There is enough religious fervour and national feeling in the air of Morocco today to make it sure that, as both their temporal sovereign and their spiritual chief, the Sultan would receive an enthusiastic welcome from the assembled concourse. In speaking to the foreign representatives he recalled Morocco's friendly relations with the Western Powers, and he asked them to pass on to their Governments his view that it was only logical for the Moroccan people to realise the rights to which all peoples aspire. To the Moors he emphasised the need for the unity of Islam and of all Morocco and, if correctly reported, he said that local grievances were being listened to; that education was necessary for the progress which he ardently hoped to see Morocco make; and that there must be order, discipline and a proper fulfilment of duty. These utterances are in harmony with the guarded sympathy which the Sultan has been showing in recent years for Moorish nationalism—without taking a lead in it—but being considerably more than the parrot-cry of a mere puppet, they have caused some concern in Paris. The heir apparent, Mulay Hassan, who is still a youth, appears to have gone rather further when opening a Koranic school. After emphasising, as his father had done, that all Morocco was one, he is reported to have called, amid applause, for its independence. Thus the Tangier microcosm, invested though it often is with an air of comic opera, sometimes contains germs of far-reaching importance.

ITALY

It is now becoming increasingly apparent that drastic steps must be taken by the Italian Government to check inflation and to prevent financial collapse. Senator Einaudi, the Governor of the Bank of Italy and well-known Liberal-economist, whose statements on the economic situation of the country have always been outspoken and realistic even during the Fascist régime, has now presented the annual Bank Report for the financial year 1946. He has stated that the sums on deposit with Italian Banks showed an increase of 315,000 million lire compared with the previous year, but that the relative impoverishment of the middle-class depositors constituted a negative factor for revival and reconstruction. At the end of 1946 circulation of bank-note and Am. lire showed an increase of 123,002 million lire compared with 1945. "In Italy," he said, "we are still far from the point where every new monetary issue is useless and is no longer of any use to the Treasury, but we are at a parting of the ways: either we must give up useless expenses and those which can be deferred or else we must face inflation." There is no doubt that Senator Einaudi is justified in his anxiety. Signor Campilli, the Minister for Finance, revealed some weeks ago that the Budget showed a deficit of 610,000 million, instead of the estimated deficit of 193,000 million lire. The Government are making elaborate plans to reduce expenditure, but it is by no means clear how they propose to enforce the measures that they are adopting. An immediate reduction of retail prices of all produce by at least five per cent. of the price on 31st March has been ordered, but rationed goods are excluded. The bread subsidy which costs about 96,000 million lire a year is to be abolished. A 50 per cent. tax is to be imposed on all restaurant meals above a certain price. A Ministerial Commission has been set up to examine the possibility of reducing the estimates of the Ministries. Ministers' salaries are to be cut by 10 per cent. Prefects will be required to enforce measures against speculation and currency evasion. It remains to be seen how far the Government will be able to enforce these measures. Restaurants in Rome have already decided to close as from the 12th April in protest against the new regulations. The Government have also talked somewhat glibly of easing the situation by increasing production by obtaining larger quotas of essential raw materials, but it is difficult to see from what sources these materials can come. Signor de Gasperi has been somewhat over-optimistic and not always realistic in his statements on the economic situation. He has stated erroneously that before the war the Budget was balanced by income from the tourist trade and by remittances from emigrants. In fact pre-war Italy had a chronic budgetary deficit, and it would perhaps have been more accurate to say that these services had helped to lessen the deficit. In any case it is unlikely that the tourist trade will get on its feet again for several years, and Italy's third important invisible export, the revenue from her mercantile marine, is also likely to be lacking for some years to come. The prospect is therefore bleak in the extreme.

Grave internal unrest has been exemplified by rioting on the part of the unemployed in Turin and by the recent strike of the magistracy in Piedmont and Lombardy, both in the nature of protests against the rising cost of living.

H.M. Government have made representations to the Italian Government asking them to co-operate in preventing the traffic of illegal Jewish emigrants making their way to Palestine.

Signor de Gasperi has given an official interview on Government policy as regards Colonial Trusteeship, thus assuming that Italy will be entrusted with at least one trusteeship by U.N., and helping to maintain false hopes as to the disposal of the ex-colonies. Among other tendentious statements the Prime Minister asserted that the people of Eritrea, Libya and Somaliland are sincerely attached to Italy.

Corrigendum

It is now reported that the Qualunquist Party voted for Article 7 (5 of the draft) of the Constitution and not against it as stated in Summary 387.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The very limited measure of success so far achieved by the Hungarian-Czechoslovak negotiations is confined to the token exchange of some 450 families. The question of compensation is a serious one for the Hungarian Government who are faced with the necessity of finding land on which to settle the repatriates. As a partial solution to the problem they have decided to dispossess the Swabians awaiting transfer to Germany and to concentrate them in special zones, while some who returned illegally have been arrested. Hungarians contend that the Exchange Agreement is an unfair one since Czechoslovakia will retain the immoveable property of the Magyar repatriates who are in the main well-to-do farmers, whereas most of the Slovak transferees are penniless. According to reports received some Hungarians also have applied to be sent to Slovakia, apparently in the hope of obtaining land. For them and for Slovaks in need of re-Slovakisation a language course has been arranged with the necessary explanations in Hungarian. There seems no reason to doubt M. Gyöngyösi's statement that shortage of funds constitutes the real difficulty on either side, but the Czechoslovak Press accuses the Hungarian Government of attempting to exploit the situation financially.

Cardinal Mindszenty has protested against the proposal to make religious teaching optional in the schools and is alleged to have threatened to excommunicate those Deputies who vote in favour of the Bill. The Vatican in a broadcast based on reports made by the Episcopate to a Catholic magazine deplores the encroachment of Communism on democratic liberties, arguing justly that the Smallholders no longer exercise the influence in the country to which their majority vote entitled them. Unfortunately many of the other criticisms are less unexceptionable. Inter alia the broadcast gives an inaccurate impression of a general religious persecution, and there is a lamentable vagueness in the use of the term

"Christian," to which category the vast majority of Hungarians nominally belong. Whatever may be said of the inequity of certain of the verdicts pronounced by the People's Courts, the charges do not include the profession of Christianity, and it is consequently irrelevant to assert that "the accused are always Christians." Nor does the statement that "the Occupying Power has a fifty per cent. share in all industrial and financial undertakings" bear examination, the agreement for joint Russo-Hungarian control being at present restricted to aviation, navigation, bauxite and the still undiscovered sources of oil.

The brief existence of M. Sulyok's newspaper, Holnap, ended on the 27th March when the compositors refused to set up type for a journal which was so hostile to the trade unions. The Hungarian Journalists' Organization approved the decision, and the miners have attacked M. Sulyok for his speech on coal production. Enlightened left-wing circles, while admitting that his disparaging remarks about trade union leaders may have a solid foundation, regret that he has not adhered to his original intention of coming to terms with the Workers' Parties, and deny that this would necessarily have entailed a sacrifice of principle. It is in any case regrettable that Hungary's only serious Opposition Party should be without a newspaper of its own.

M. Dinnyés, the Minister of Defence, has stated that the strength of the Hungarian Army will be increased from 12,500 to 25,000 by the end of the year if equipment can be made available. Financial reasons at present prevent Hungary from reaching the total strength of 65,000 permitted her by the terms of the Peace Treaty.

The Public Prosecutor has demanded the death-penalty for eight of those accused of complicity in the plot against the Republic.

Roumania

As noted in the Summary of the 2nd April (No. 387), there is no doubt that Russian policy at the present moment is being directed to strengthening the hold of Communism over Roumania, with a view to the possible withdrawal of Russian forces in accordance with the terms of the Peace Treaty, but leaving a Government which can be depended upon to serve Russian ends. In the opinion of those who are in a position to judge, nothing could be more unwise than any action which might provide an excuse for retaliation—or for extension of the repressive activities which have already taken place. The followers of Dl Bratianu are behaving now with common sense and restraint. The danger comes from Maniu, who cannot be persuaded to let well alone. The Sunday Times of the 13th April sums up the situation in a short article from "a correspondent" who obviously knows what he is talking about.

> "While world interest has been focussed on the Moscow talks and on the American offer of help to Greece and Turkey, the Roumanian Government has been quietly rounding up hundreds of people in the most widespread and thorough attempt so far made to break the back of the opposition. No reasons were given for most of these arrests. . . . . For some specious reasons were put forward . . . . No mention was made on this occasion of 'subversive activities.' The Roumanian Communists seem to have learned their lesson . . . . They avoided giving these measures any official political meaning . . . . The arrests were of individuals . . . . And so far they seem to have succeeded in enabling a drive against opponents of the Communist régime, as formidable as that carried through in Hungary, to pass almost unobserved by the outside world."

The Industrial Bureaux Bill, which had aroused considerable criticism even within the Government, has been amended in draft so as to exclude the petroleum industry from its operation and, moreover, to make the inclusion of other concerns merely voluntary. This, of course, changes the whole character of the proposed law, and the question at once suggests itself whether the step is worth taking at all.

A new Treaty of Commerce and Navigation together with certain other conventions was signed at Moscow on the 20th February. Roumania during 1947 is "only" required to provide 15 million dollars' worth of products, which is just about the limit of the country's capacity, and will leave very little if anything for export to other countries. In return Russia is supposed to be supplying raw materials and equipment. But, in spite of the repeated boosting of these transactions in the Communist-controlled press she is giving no real aid.

The Russians are not alone in colouring their actions to suit themselves. A note from the Roumanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has claimed for the Government the right to be heard by the Council of Foreign Ministers during the discussions on the German Peace Treaty. The ground for this is the alleged value of military and economic aid during the war against Germany. This aid "was given willingly," whereas the assistance given earlier to Germany against Russia, it is claimed, was under compulsion. The very reverse is the truth. The whole Roumanian nation was solidly behind Mareşal Antonescu in the campaign to recover Bessarabia. It was in the last stages of the war against Germany that, as a beaten nation, Roumania acted under compulsion.

The same line of thought is behind an article in Scânteia on the relation between prices and wages. The Communist workers, it says, led by Gheorghiu-Dej are determined to overcome the black market and to organise production. Under the old system prices were approved without regard to the level of wages. Today wages are fixed on the basis of prices of essential commodities. So they may be—but the prices of commodities are fixed at such a rate that employers who are made responsible for the supply of them are obliged to buy on the black market at a loss, and, as if that were not enough, Scânteia urges the works committees to agitate for an advance of one-third of the wages and credits at the staff purchasing bureaux.

The King has conferred the Grand Cross of the Order of the Star of Roumania on the Patriarch of Moscow. The Patriarch Alexiei has replied, "I greatly appreciate this gesture by King Mihai, and should like to convey my thanks to His Majesty. I believe my forthcoming visit to your country will strengthen further the ties between our sister Churches." On the last visit of a delegation from the Russian Church demands were made by way of strengthening these ties which went a long way to destroying the independence of the Roumanian Church. On that occasion the Roumanian Patriarch took a strong line and it is to be hoped that he will do so again. The Bulgarian Clergy Union recently suggested that the Œcumenical Patriarchate might be transferred from Constantinople to Moscow. It will not be surprising if some step in this direction is to be attempted at Bucharest. The Russian Patriarch is not coming all that way for nothing.

Yugoslavia

There was a lively scene in the National Assembly on the 27th March when Dr. Dragoljub Jovanović and Radomir Todorović, former leaders of the People's Peasant Party, were bold enough to criticise the draft budget. They were, of course, severely rebuked, misquoted and given no opportunity to explain their attitude. The Minister of the Interior made a long speech, commenting on the inefficiency of some of the local People's Committees and reminding the public that it was their duty to demand the removal of all reactionary and incompetent officials. He gave the figure of "Križari" still at large in the woods as 1,778 on the 1st March, complained of Allied reluctance to hand over Yugoslav war criminals and announced that some 10,000 Italian, 11,000 German and 6,000 Austrian prisoners of war had been repatriated.

There was also a discussion of foreign policy after Marshal Tito had delivered a particularly bitter attack on the Western Powers on the 31st March. He complained specifically of the unfriendly activities of Mr. Patterson, former U.S. Ambassador, and of the U.S. Embassy, which, he said, constituted the main obstacle to a Yugoslav-American rapprochement. He had begun by explaining that Yugoslavia had signed the Italian Treaty for the sake of peace—and, to foil the "war-mongers" who had prophesied that she would not sign. He then referred to the Yugoslav claims against Austria and to the question of reparations. With regard to the American reaction to Yugoslavia's recent appeal for wheat he denied that she had exported any food or that she had done more than lend 20,000 tons of wheat to Roumania. Finally he declared that the Western Powers were turning Greece into an imperialist base from which to threaten the peace of the Balkans.

Meanwhile the Vice-Premier, M. Kardelj, had departed for Moscow, where he held a Press conference on the 5th April, reiterating the Yugoslav claim to Carinthia. In addition he said that the Styrian border should be modified, that a demilitarised zone 20 km. deep should be created along the frontier, that any remaining minorities should eventually be exchanged and that Austria should pay 150,000,000 dollars in reparations.

The Yugoslav Government have again complained to the Allied Council for Austria against continued bandit activities on the Yugoslav frontier and have reinforced their complaint with a note to H.M. Government.

The transfer of British-held Yugoslav refugees from Italy to Germany began on the 14th April. The Yugoslav Government have been informed of this and also of the intention of the British and American Governments to hand over as soon as possible all Yugoslav war criminals and traitors whose guilt is unquestionable.

On the 5th April the Yugoslav Government informed H.M. Ambassador that they agreed that the question of compensation for British properties affected by the nationalization law should be settled by bi-lateral agreement (they carefully avoided the term "Mixed Commission") and proposed that direct negotiations should be opened. British representatives are now ready to leave for Belgrade as soon as the Yugoslav Government can make arrangements for the talks.

Yugoslav requests for material relief from Britain and British support for the recent appeal for an emergency delivery of UNRRA wheat, have been refused. Yugoslavia is, however, due to receive in April 16,000 tons of potatoes under UNRRA arrangements, and may obtain a further delivery of seed potatoes.

Greece

The United Nations Enquiry Commission concluded their investigations in Belgrade on the 2nd April and have now reached Geneva where they will prepare their report to the Security Council. At their last meetings in Belgrade, the Greeks wanted the Commission to examine the Yugoslav General Dapchevic who, they alleged, was responsible for organising the despatch of guerrillas to Greece. The Russians opposed the calling of the general, and also advised the Yugoslav liaison officer not to reply to some questions put to him by the American delegate about the proposed incorporation of Macedonia in a Yugoslav federal state. The British and U.S. delegates finally withdrew their proposal that observers should remain in Greece while the Commission are drawing up their report. It was thought that, if Slav opposition should cause the rejection of a resolution on an interim commission, any subsequent discussion on a recommendation for a permanent commission might be prejudiced.

Since the Commission's departure from Macedonia several particularly brutal attacks by bandits have been reported, sometimes by bands as many as 600 strong. A novel feature of these recent raids is that in many instances the village priest has been either butchered or burnt alive.

On the 9th April the Greek Government's spring offensive began against the main forces of the bandits in Western Macedonia and Northern Thessaly. This was preceded by a final appeal, made by M. Venizelos, to the bandits to surrender, and by the dropping of leaflets warning the civilian population to keep clear of the operational areas. First reports indicated that a large encircling movement by two army corps, assisted by aircraft, was proceeding according to plan, but snow has since covered the mountains to a depth of two feet and activity on both sides has been considerably reduced.

In the Peloponnese comparative order has now been restored and the Government are proposing to lift martial law. General Zervas, who estimated the number of bandits operating in the Peloponnese at 900 to 1,000, has told the Press that almost the entire Parnon–Taygetos–Langada range is now held by Army and Gendarmerie forces.

The Greek Foreign Office have announced that, despite the departure of the Soviet Ambassador from Athens (see under "Soviet Union") the Greek Ambassador to Moscow will remain at his post. They have also issued a statement in connection with Admiral Rodianov's complaint of anti-Soviet articles in the Greek press. They point out (a) that the three newspapers described in the Ambassador's note as "standing close to the Greek Government" are all in fact organs of the Opposition; (b) that complete freedom of the press exists in Greece; and (c) that the official Soviet denial issued by the Tass agency was published in all the Greek newspapers.

The feeling is said to be spreading that all Greece's financial troubles will be over once the U.S. loan becomes effective. Civil Servants, bank employees and State Railway employees have all been on strike claiming an extra month's salary as Easter bonus, and it is reported that the Government are inclined to give way and thus encourage further trouble. The employees have now resumed work following a statement by the Premier in these terms: "When we get the U.S. loans, I am certain that U.S. experts will deal with employees' claims, which will be settled satisfactorily together with wage and salary questions."

Bulgaria

Although, in public, Opposition circles in Bulgaria have maintained a prudent reserve throughout the last month on the subject of President Truman's pronouncement of the 12th March, there is no doubt that—much as they, in common with other Bulgars, dislike the Greeks—they have on the whole been greatly encouraged and stimulated by the speech and its reception. It is probably true to say that the self-confidence of Government circles has been correspondingly shaken: they were certainly not prepared for such a revolution in American foreign policy, and it has increased their distrust of the Opposition. One Government paper (Narod, 20th March) said that Mr. Truman's intention of helping the present Greek Government could only be compared to Hitler's and Mussolini's interference in support of Franco ten years or so ago. Another one (Rabotnichesko Delo, 18th March) printed a letter alleged by it to have been written by the former Agrarian leader Dr. G. M. Dimitrov (now an exile in the United States) to his successor Nikola Petkov, giving him advice as to how to get control of the Government after the Soviet troops withdraw and how then to stamp out Communist influence. The Opposition have retorted that the letter is a crude forgery. Whether it is that or not, its publication marks a further stage in the rapid deterioration of relations between the Government and the Opposition which started with the announcement of the monetary changes on the 7th March. Whereas in February the Prime Minister was tentatively offering some degree of collaboration in comparatively mild terms, now once more the Opposition, with its press continually silenced and its deputies often subject to exclusion from the Assembly, is being branded by the Government as criminal and treacherous. The special importance of the monetary changes in this connexion is that they have given the Government such complete control over expenditure that it is open to question whether any Opposition press, or indeed political existence, will continue to be practicable.

Viewed as a whole, those changes amount, certainly, to the most drastic, and effective, step in communisation since the present Government came into power. Cash purchasing power is now so tightly limited that applications for sums of even 3,000 leva (under £3) are being refused. Bank deposit purchasing power has become completely subject to Government licence, and this means that all financial activity, from that of business corporations to the petty personal expenses of private individuals, has been brought under official control. While what was left of the old propertied class appears to be finished, a new privileged class has been created in the shape of the industrial workers and salaried employees who are paid in cash. Yet there is no likelihood that wage and salary earners will be well off either. The intention of the monetary changes appears to be, amongst other things, to force down the standard of living, in order to devote all resources to the Two Year Plan. Meanwhile it was reported unofficially three weeks ago that only about 44,000 million leva out of the old circulation of 72,000 million had been paid in, and it is known that many of the peasants are still hoarding food on a fairly extensive scale. In order to try and get much-needed cereals at a lean time, the National Bank was on the 19th March authorised to pay 100 per cent. in new bank-notes for grain. Even this expedient may not succeed in bringing in food, however; for the peasants' faith in the national currency has dwindled and few consumer goods are available.

Allusion was made in Summary No. 387 to the new draft law imposing a graded capital levy upon property and cash deposits. Another measure has now been introduced by the Government as a result of which financial transactions will become dependent upon the cheque system. No family will be allowed to hold more than 40,000 leva in cash, and businesses will be restricted to currency for one week's expenses. Payments over 10,000 leva for individuals and over 20,000 leva for firms will henceforth have to be made by cheque, and drawers will be obliged to present their cheques to a bank and not endorse them to a third party.

In a written answer the Minister of State informed Mr. Pritt, M.P., on the 2nd April (1) that the British authorities in Bulgaria had not during the past six months sold or transferred any sterling in exchange for Bulgarian currency, and (2) that, while no official rate of exchange exists in the sense of one agreed between H.M. Government and the Bulgarian Government, the rate of 3,000 leva to the £ [on which consular fees, etc., are actually based] corresponds in our view more closely to the true value of the lev than the rate at present quoted by the National Bank of Bulgaria [namely 1,156 leva to the £], and is not inflationary.

Turkey

While the question of American help has remained on the knees of the gods in Congress assembled (see under "United States"), the Turks have been defending themselves against Soviet calumnies with a robustness which suggests confidence in the force of Senator Vandenberg's argument that "if the Middle East falls within the orbit of aggressive Communist expansion, the repercussions will echo from the Dardanelles to the China Sea and westward to the rims of the Atlantic." Turkish commentators dismissed as a totally fictitious product of the Soviet propaganda machine P.M.'s story about President Inönü taking up the receiver, in the belief that Stalingrad had fallen, with intent to throw the Turkish army in against the Russians, but being forestalled by a call from Papen telling him that the German attack on the city had failed. However, the Prime Minister and other Turkish apologists are perhaps unwise to claim that Turkey took military measures to help Russia, for, as they should know, the Soviet Government have ample proof in captured German documents that it was the Turkish Government's fixed policy to do nothing to help Russia to defeat Germany. The Turks are on firmer ground when they point out that it was Russia who collaborated with Germany in 1939, whereas Turkey established links with the Allies. As Mr. Acheson stated in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Turkish neutrality was at least of negative value to the Allies.

In a speech made at Izmir on 1st April the Prime Minister repeated that Turkey claimed nothing from her neighbours provided they claimed nothing from her. The Anglo-Turkish alliance, he said, was as strong as ever and Turkey entirely understood Great Britain handing over some of her great responsibilities to the United States. It was inconceivable that the United States would seek to impose, or that Turkey would accept, conditions infringing Turkish independence, as hostile propaganda was suggesting. While declaring that he had no feelings of enmity against Russia, M. Recep Peker also stated openly that the reason for the maintenance of the "state of siege" in Istanbul and the Straits area was the continuance of external pressure. Unless such pressure ceased, Turkey would maintain the "state of siege" and submit the matter to the United Nations. An article in the semi-official Ulus with equal frankness described Soviet policy as being simply to demand that the United States should not support Greece and Turkey but allow Russia to dominate them and the Near and Middle East; the Russian Government were trying, not to promote, but to wreck peace-making; the sooner Congress passed the relevant bill, the sooner would the Slav bloc be weakened. Other papers wrote plainly of the Soviet desire to turn Turkey and Greece into satellites like Bulgaria and Yugoslavia.

In addressing the students of Istanbul University on the 29th March on the subject of nationalism M. Recep Peker made certain remarks which seem to have been meant also for the outside world. He insisted that the old Turkish nationalism, which regarded Christians as beyond the pale, was dead and buried; that the Turkish nation was a member of the family of civilised nations; that Jews and other non-Turks and non-Moslems were part of the nation; that anti-Semitism and all racialism were reprehensible; but that Turkish nationalism desired a happy existence for Turks outside Turkey (he had in mind presumably the deportation of the Crimean Turks and the alleged persecution of Turks in Syria and Bulgaria). Socialism, he said, could help progress, but was best avoided lest it should have its roots outside Turkey's frontiers and should degenerate into Communism, which was banned. In a subsequent talk the Prime Minister urged employers and parents to protect young people against the invisible enemy, Communism.

True to Atatürk's policy, the whole trend of which was to identify modern Turkey with the West instead of the East, the Turkish Government only sent an observer to the Asian Relations Conference at Delhi, while expressing good wishes for the success of the meeting.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The take-over by the Egyptian Government of the Qasr an Nil barracks in Cairo was made the occasion of a national celebration on the 31st March, in spite of the earlier agreement of the Egyptian military staff that it was undesirable to publicize the event. A national holiday was proclaimed, and an elaborate ceremony was staged in which King Farouk himself hoisted the Egyptian flag over the barracks. He also deputed a chamberlain to lay wreaths on the tombs of Mustafa Kamil and Sa'ad Zaghlul, and on the memorial in the University to the student killed in the riots of 1935—a typically irresponsible act at a time when the Government are having considerable difficulty restraining unruly students, the majority of whom are anti-Palace.

Representations are being made by His Majesty's Ambassador to the Egyptian

Government about the recent bomb outrages and the perfunctory way in which the police appear to be making their investigations into them.

On the 27th March a Muslim mob attacked the Coptic church at Zagazig, took out all doors, windows, benches and furniture, as well as clerical vestments and books, and made a bonfire of them outside. The following day a number of rioters climbed on to the roof and smashed it in, so that only the shell of the church remained. Mud was thrown at a British missionary and the Coptic Bishop when they went to visit the ruined church on the 28th March. The incident provides a reminder of the appalling readiness of the Egyptian mob to break out in anti-Christian excesses, an example of which was seen in the attacks on foreign Protestant and Catholic churches in the Cairo riots of February 21, 1946. There can be little doubt that the Muslim emphasis employed by the Palace in its campaign against the Wafd is primarily responsible for these demonstrations of fanaticism. The Government have suppressed publicity about the Zagazig riots, the origin of which, it may be remarked incidentally, is obscure.

Since the withdrawal of British troops from Cairo and Alexandria to the Canal Zone the Egyptian Government have been making difficulties about British military personnel, even in plain clothes, spending leave in those places or passing through the Delta on duty. This contravenes the Immunities Convention of the 1936 Treaty (which, in the view of His Majesty's Government, still remains in force) since, although the convention does not provide in so many words that British troops stationed in the Canal zone shall have the right to visit Cairo on leave, its terms clearly imply that this was intended.

The Thirty-Sixth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union was opened in Cairo on the 7th April, and was attended by twenty-four delegations. King Farouk was represented at the inaugural meeting by Prince Muhammad Ali, and, on the proposal of Count Carton de Wiart, who made the opening speech, Husain Heikal Pasha was elected president of the Conference. Speeches by Egyptian delegates shewed a tendency to point to the opportunities afforded to the other delegates by their presence in Egypt to learn the truth about the country's present civilization and past glories. On the 3rd April Heikal Pasha had given a press interview in which he pointed out that correspondents would inevitably have to discuss the Anglo-Egyptian question in conversation with the delegates to the Conference, and proceeded to give what was described as "a clear explanation of the course of the treaty negotiations up to the time when it was realised that they would be broken off." He then compared the straightforward attempt of the Egyptian Government to realise national ambitions within the framework of the United Nations Charter with Great Britain's endeavour to reconcile her imperialistic policy and aims with the Charter. It was this divergence of views and Egypt's refusal to become a British zone of influence, he said, which had led to the breakdown of the negotiations. He also alleged that it was an incontestable fact that neither the Egyptian Government nor the Egyptian Parliament had accepted the last treaty draft, that the Chamber of Deputies had gone no further than approving the continuance of the negotiations, and had only given the Government a vote of confidence so that it could realise national aspirations, to wit, the unity of the Valley of the Nile and complete withdrawal of British troops. The Senate, he said, had shewn, in several debates which had taken place on the subject, that it had not approved of the Sidky–Bevin proposals. Finally, he claimed that political unrest during the past twenty-five years—implying that it was due to the special position of Great Britain in Egypt—had made important reforms impossible and had prevented an improvement in the standard of living. He also announced the preparation of a booklet, describing the general situation in Egypt, which was intended for distribution to the delegates to the Parliamentary Conference and to the press. On the 6th April the Journal d'Egypte published a long article by Heikal Pasha which contained a bird's-eye view of some incidents in Egyptian history selected and presented so as to shew that everything had gone swimmingly in the way of social and economic progress until foreign interference took place. Although France and Russia receive a special mention, it is clearly to be inferred that Great Britain is the arch-criminal, even over the Capitulations question. This grossly improper exploitation of the Conference is unlikely to swing any votes in Egypt's favour at the hearing of her case before the United Nations, and may, in fact, serve to alienate the opinion of some who previously had an open mind on the merits of the Egyptian case.

The Egyptian press has announced that the United States Government have invited the Egyptian Chief of Staff and several senior officers to visit the United States this summer in order to acquaint themselves with military developments there. The invitation has been accepted.

Palestine

An extraordinary plenary session of the Vaad Leumi opened in Jerusalem on the 1st April under the chairmanship of Mr. David Remez, who, in his opening speech, appealed to the Yishuv to continue the fight against terrorism, although, he said, "not only justice, but political reason seems to have come to an end in this country." Ben Gurion later hinted that the Hagana might be used against the terrorists, even if, as he put it, "the police and some of their officers should interfere." He also made the characteristic charge that some of the police not only favour the terrorists, but are actually in contact with them. A resolution, introduced by the chairman, was passed instructing the Executive of the Vaad Leumi to increase protective measures against "terrorist hooliganism" and intimidation. Other resolutions dealt with the preparation of the Zionist case for presentation to the United Nations (a task which was entrusted to the Executive) and a call to the Yishuv to maintain unity in face of the hard political struggle facing Palestine Jewry.

The general impression is that the extensive use of force against the dissidents will not be attempted (if at all) until the ground has been prepared by a campaign of "re-education" upon which the Jewish Agency intends, it is said, shortly to embark. This will not necessarily include any co-operation with Government forces, or even action to prevent destruction of property other than that of the Yishuv, or punishment of the authors of such destruction. A well at Kiryat Haim had been destroyed, admittedly, by the Irgun Zvai Leumi, and a number of their members were beaten up in consequence on the 2nd April. This incident was recorded by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency as an indication that new measures against the terrorists have already begun. The Irgun Zvai Leumi wireless station on the 6th April attacked the Hagana for its action "against innocent people not connected with us," and made various charges against the Hagana, including the blowing-up of the Patria in 1940, when many Jewish lives were lost.

The damage to the Haifa oil installation, briefly reported in the last Summary, was extremely serious, and it will affect the quantity of oil products available locally. The Government announcement that the community would have to pay for the cost of the damage has caused a considerable outcry, and some anxiety about the steps which will be taken.

The demand of the Zionists for unrestricted, legalised immigration is maintained, but it is appreciated by the Jewish Agency that steps are being taken to counter the threat of a very large influx of illegal immigrants during the summer months. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency referred on the 14th April with some satisfaction to the probability that recent diplomatic representations by His Majesty's Government will not lead to any radical change in practice (see also under "France" and "Italy").

Transjordan

The Treaty of Amman between Transjordan and Turkey was ratified at Amman on the 31st March.

The Regent of 'Iraq, with Nuri Sa'id (President of the Senate) and Shakir al Wadi (Minister of Defence), has arrived in Amman with a draft Treaty of Alliance and Brotherhood, which it is hoped may be signed very shortly in Baghdad.

The Levant States

The Lebanese Chamber of Deputies was dissolved on the 9th April by Presidential decree. Elections to the new Chamber will be held between the 25th May and the 1st June.

A draft Bill providing for compulsory military service was submitted to the Syrian Parliament on the 3rd March. All Syrians from the age of 19 years become liable for service. Although exemption may be obtained by payment of a fee, all conscripts are still required to serve for three months' training. The period of service is twenty-one months in the infantry or twenty-four months in the cavalry or the armoured corps, followed by a period of reserve service.

Iraq

On the 4th April Salih Jabr outlined the programme of his Government. The most important points of his statement on foreign affairs were the revision of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty on a basis which would guarantee the mutual interests of the two countries on an equal footing in the light of the United Nations Charter; the strengthening of the ties between 'Iraq and the other member-States of the Arab League; the safeguarding of Arab rights in Palestine; the consolidation of friendship with Turkey and Persia, in accordance with the spirit of the Saadabad Pact; and, finally, adherence to the principles of the United Nations Charter.

The Prime Minister's domestic programme includes the re-equipment of the Army, the construction of a petroleum refinery at Baiji, and various educational and industrial reforms.

Persia

Military operations are now in progress against the Barzani Kurds (see Summary No. 835). It appears that the Barzanis, not relishing the idea of returning to their own country, 'Iraq, where they can expect little sympathy, decided instead to make for the Russian frontier. The Persian Army column sent out to intercept them received confirmation that they had been in touch with the Russians through the Russian Consulate-General in Tabriz and through the Herki and Shakkak Kurds. When the first clash occurred with the Persian Army at Mawana, fifteen miles west of Rezaieh, on the 16th March, the Barzanis had travelled some thirty miles north of the point where the Persian, Turkish and 'Iraqi frontiers meet. They were forced to retreat south after a sharp skirmish. Fighting has continued in the Mergawar plain, and around Ushnuiyeh, thirty miles west of the southern tip of Lake Urmia, but on the 6th April the Barzanis were reported to be moving toward 'Iraq.

Qazi Muhammad, the former head of the independent Kurdish Government of Mahabad, which was set up in January, 1946, and collapsed in December on the re-occupation of Azerbaijan, was reported by the press to have been executed at Mahabad on the 31st March. His brother, Sadr Qazi, and his cousin, Said Qazi, "Minister of War" in the Mahabad Government, were executed with him.

The question of Persian participation in the Peace Conference (see Summary No. 379) was discussed at Moscow on the 9th April. It was agreed, pending a final decision, that Persia should be admitted to the Information and Consultation Conference, but not to the permanent Working Committees or to the Peace Conference itself.

There are signs of increased Russian pressure in the Resht area. The Governor-General of Gilan, Ansari, has made a number of new appointments among his subordinates, introducing either Russian supporters or nonenties who can be relied upon to do what they are told. Ansari himself appears to be little more than a tool in Russian hands.

The delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions (see Summary No. 385), having united in Tehran, left on the 2nd April for Mazanderan, after which they are to visit Tabriz. Harries completed his independent tour of Khuzistan and Isfahan and returned alone to Tehran on the 21st March. The remainder of the delegation toured the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company area between the 22nd and 28th March, reaching Tehran viâ Isfahan on the 31st March. Harries hopes that it will still be possible for the delegation to reach an agreed report, if only on broad principles.

The Prime Minister's ambitious Seven-Year Plan (see Summary No. 387) seems likely to remain a mere paper project unless the necessary funds can be raised. Salman Assadi, Chairman of the Mining and Industrial Bank, in an interview with His Majesty's Ambassador, stated that the Persian Government were still hoping for the loan from the International Bank. They also hope to increase their revenue by tightening up the Administration. But, even if the money is forthcoming, the social reforms carried out to date make a poor shewing in comparison with what has been promised by Qawam in successive speeches, and augur badly for the success of the Plan. For example, the scheme for the distribution of State lands among the peasantry contained in a decree of the 6th July, 1946, which has been given much publicity by the Prime Minister, appears only to have been implemented in the Second Ustan (Department), which comprises the Tehran District. Here twenty-five villages in the neighbourhood of the capital have been distributed to the villagers, and the title assigned to the new owners.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The ingrained conservatism of the Japanese people was shown in the results of the first local elections held under the new constitution. According to a Times report, 33 out of 46 prefectural governors elected had held the same office under the bureaucratic system and in general conservatives, described as independents, gained a decisive victory over left-wing rivals. The electors displayed no enthusiasm over the election, 47 per cent. in the five principal cities abstaining from voting.

The new party, that has risen from the ashes of the defunct Progressive Party, has styled itself the Minshuto (anglice Democratic) Party. The word democracy has been so eagerly embraced by Japanese politicians of all shades of opinion as to have lost almost all meaning, but it is startling to find a party formerly of the extreme right adopting as its banner the Sovereignty of the People for that is the literal meaning of the Japanese word. The Party claims at the moment 145 Diet members composed of old Progressives with a sprinkling of adherents from other Parties. Its mission is declared to be to "shatter the bigoted shell of capitalism and correct the unrealistic character of socialism." In plain English this may mean that it proposes to steer a middle course between extremes of capitalism and socialism. The Party has suffered an initial set-back in the "purging" by the Government Central Screening Committee of Narahashi, one of the leading promoters.

The bill for the revision of electoral areas has successfully surmounted the committee stage and is now generally expected to pass. It is supposed to favour right-wing candidates, and the opposition are busily reducing sail to meet the challenge.

General MacArthur's warning that the Japanese Government must act vigorously to curb inflation received strong endorsement in the Allied Council. Mr. McMahon Ball said that the real difficulty was to find Japanese authorities who had the will and the capacity to establish a controlled economy. Minority groups were profiting by inflation and by the failure of the Japanese Government to carry out directions with regard to controls. During the course of the discussion the economic adviser to S.C.A.P. Headquarters is reported to have attributed the failure partly to administrative deterioration and partly to passive resistance.

Under the terms of reference of the Far Eastern Commission the U.S. Government is entitled to issue interim directives to the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers "whenever urgent matters arise not covered by policies broadly formulated by the Commission." On the 3rd April the Government announced its decision to authorise S.C.A.P. to release as advance reparations certain Japanese industrial equipment, already agreed upon by the F.E.C. as available for removal. The equipment is such as can be immediately used for relief purposes by war-devastated countries in Asia and is to be allotted to China (15 per cent.), the Philippines (5 per cent.), the Netherlands (5 per cent.) and the United Kingdom for Burma, Malaya and British Colonies (5 per cent.), These percentages are proportions of the reparations items described as available from Japan proper under the F.E.C's interim removals agreements, and it is expressly stated that they should not be prejudged as indications of the various countries' share in future allocations of either the remainder of the interim removals items or the final reparations settlement. In making this announcement the U.S. Government point out that the start of reparations removals has now been held up for over a year, though the countries concerned are in extreme need of the equipment.

The Australian Government have now established their own Liaison Mission in Tokyo and appointed Mr. McMahon Ball to head it, in addition to his duties as member of the Allied Council.

Korea

Mr. Marshall is attempting to break the deadlock between U.S. and Soviet representatives in Korea which has divided the country into two separate zones. In a letter dated the 8th April to M. Molotov he asserts that the action of the Soviet Commander in Northern Korea in refusing to permit freedom of movement and free economic exchange between the two zones has precluded political amalgamation and caused grave economic distress. After outlining the disinterested purpose of the United States in Korea and reinforcing his arguments by references to the Cairo Declaration of the 1st December, 1943, and the Moscow Conference of December 1945, he explains how Allied aims have been stultified by Soviet insistence on a formula which would eliminate the majority of representative Korean democratic parties and social organizations from the discussions which are necessary (if Korea is eventually to have a National Government representative of the freely expressed will of the Korean people). He therefore asks that the Soviet and U.S. Governments agree to instruct the respective Commanders in Korea to reconvene the Joint Commission as soon as possible. What may, perhaps, be regarded as the sting in the tail is the concluding statement that in the meantime the United States, mindful of its obligations under the Moscow Agreement, sees no alternative to taking without further delay such steps in its zone as will advance the purposes of that agreement. It is to be noted, in passing, that the stumbling-block is the definition of "representative" Koreans.

Siam

The public support which Luang Dhamrong Navasvasti so confidently expected for his Administration when he undertook the task of forming a new Government in August, 1946, did not materialise. Rather has the present Administration been subjected—largely at the hands of private vested interests—to continuous and increasing all-round criticism. Added to these difficulties have come losses and disagreements within the Cabinet itself. Early in February, for instance, Luang Dhamrong was deprived of his Minister of Communications, who met with a fatal accident when his inspection car fell through a bridge on the Burma Railway near the border. This loss was quickly followed by the resignation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs following an angry meeting with his colleagues, in which he is said to have baldly accused the Minister of Commerce of endeavouring to appropriate an unnecessarily large sum for the purchase of gunny bags for rice. In these unfortunate circumstances the Prime Minister was forced to consider the question of tendering the resignation of his Cabinet. Finally, however, he reached the conclusion that such a step would not be in the best interests of the State so long as the Senior Statesman, Luang Pradit, had not returned to the country from his visit to Europe. He decided, therefore, to add to his already heavy responsibilities the portfolio of Foreign Affairs and to endeavour to keep his Government in office.

The results of this move were to speed up certain Anglo-Siamese and U.S.-Siamese negotiations which were in progress (e.g., over oil distribution in Siam) and from the point of view of inter-Allied co-operation the attitude of Luang Dhamrong has been most helpful and energetic. During the whole of his term of office he has shown much courage in putting through decisions on external policy (e.g., the return of the "lost territories" to France and reference to a Conciliation Commission) in the face of bitter opposition. It is generally thought, however, that his Administration is likely to fall when the Legislature reassembles on the 10th May. While it is difficult to forecast the composition of the new Government, it seems probable that Luang Dhamrong will continue to play an important part in it.

In the meantime whisperings of the possible return to active political life of the ex-Dictator, Marshal Pibul, have attracted increasing publicity and concern. The many callers received by Marshal Pibul at his private residence, coupled with his creation of a new political party under the name of the "Right is Might Party," gave ground for the widely spread conviction that he was staging a come-back with the support of the Democratic Party and possibly also of that of the Army. In conversation with the Siamese Prime Minister, therefore, H.M. Ambassador was prompted to express grave concern over this campaign and to make it quite clear that the re-establishment of a fascist régime would be strongly condemned by world opinion, which no country could afford lightly to ignore; and also that Pibul's lip-service to democracy hoodwinked nobody.

Proceeding in step with H.M. Ambassador the United States Ambassador also spoke in similar terms to both the Prime Minister and the Senior Statesman—now returned from his visit abroad. It is understood that he informed the Senior Statesman that the United States Government were extremely concerned over the deterioration of political conditions in Siam and asked to be told what plans were under contemplation for the recasting of the Cabinet and the restoration of public confidence.

A few days later Siamese reporters asked the British Information Service for an observation on the reported intention of Pibul to return to political life, following which a staement figured prominently in the Bangkok evening papers that, although the British Information Service could not comment on Siamese internal political affairs, it was not forgotten that it was under the leadership of the ex-Dictator that Siam declared war on the British and American Democracies. Liberty, the English language paper, in commenting on this statement, described it as "pregnant with meaning"; while the American-edited paper, Bangkok Post, carried an editorial under the heading "A Timely Warning." The Siamese press also reported that the Minister of Defence had issued an order to all military units prohibiting them from meddling in politics.

It would appear that the views thus informally expressed by the British and United States Ambassadors—of which these press statements were a direct outcome—were rewarded with almost immediate practical results. Callers on Marshal Pibul found his house closed and were told that he had gone to the country. The Siamese Prime Minister remarked to H.M. Ambassador that, in his opinion, Pibul's recent "demonstration" was now ended, although possibly only temporarily. He also said that the leader of the Democratic Party had encouraged Pibul in the first instance because he had a personal axe to grind, but that he felt it was a good sign that Nai Kuang had now asserted in a public declaration that he did not endorse the movement. The Prime Minister went on to say that public opinion was "overwhelmingly opposed" to the re-emergence of Pibul and that if this movement were put to the test in the Legislature, it would be certain to meet defeat by a majority of at least 60 votes. Be this as it may, the Senior Statesman is convinced that the instability now threatening the whole Siamese political structure will culminate sooner or later in grave internal troubles. He himself feels so strongly the personal hostility of Nai Kuang and his Democrats, supported by certain elements of the Royal family, that he is considering the question of resigning his parliamentary seat and finally retiring from politics. It may be noted, of course, that Luang Pradit prefers to work behind the scenes and that this is not the first time that he has announced his retirement from active politics, only to stage a "come-back" later.

On the 19th March, H.M. Legation at Bangkok was raised to the status of an Embassy and H.M. Minister, Mr. G. H. Thompson, was appointed the first Ambassador to the post. On the same date H.M. Government informed the Siamese Government that they would be delighted if similar steps were taken in regard to the Siamese Legation in London. This invitation was accepted, and Nai Direck Jayanama, until recently Minister for Foreign Affairs in the present Administration, has been appointed the first Siamese Ambassador to the Court of St. James. On his arrival in London, therefore, the status of the Siamese Legation also will be elevated to that of an Embassy.

Sir Horace Seymour, G.C.M.G., C.V.O., until recently H.M. Ambassador to China and now retired, has been invited by both the French and the Siamese Governments to serve as one of the three neutral members of the Franco-Siamese Conciliation Commission (see Summary No. 365). Sir Horace has accepted this invitation in a personal and unofficial capacity, but with the knowledge and approval of H.M. Government. The other members of the Commission are Judge William Phillips (U.S.A.), Dr. Belaunde (Peruvian jurist and ex-Ambassador), Monsieur Naggiar (France) and Prince Wan Waithaykorn (Siam). The Commission is expected to meet in Washington in the first week in May.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Although progress has been slower than was originally hoped, President Truman's programme of aid for Greece and Turkey continues to grind its way without serious opposition through the legislative mill in Washington. The bill in which the programme is embodied was approved unanimously by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the 3rd April, and the full Senate debate upon it began on the 8th. In its present form the bill carries an amendment, originally submitted by Senator Vandenberg on the 31st March (and then slightly revised after consultation with the Foreign Relations Committee and with Acting-Secretary of State Acheson), directing the President to withdraw all or part of the aid authorized in any of three circumstances. These are: (1) if the President is requested to do so by a representative Greek or Turkish Government; (2) "if the United Nations Security Council finds (with respect to which finding the United States waives the exercise of any veto) or the General Assembly finds that action taken or assistance furnished by the United Nations makes the continuance of such assistance unnecessary or undesirable"; and (3) if the President finds that the purposes of the Act "have been substantially accomplished or are incapable of satisfactory accomplishment."

In common with Mr. Austin's statement to the Security Council on the 28th March, the Vandenberg amendment has eased the qualms of those who feared that the President's programme might weaken the authority of the United Nations. In opening the Senate debate on the 8th April Senator Vandenberg himself claimed that the amendment involved the "greatest act of voluntary allegiance" to the United Nations in the whole history of that organization. Only on the far Right and on the Left is the measure still found to be unsatisfactory—in the former case because to all appearances it sacrifices sovereign rights in permitting the United Nations to review and to call a halt to American policy; in the latter because the changes introduced by Senator Vandenberg are regarded, in the words of The Nation, as an attempt "to drape the nakedness of American intentions with a few rags of UNO authority." Between these two extremes doubting Thomases like Mr. Walter Lippmann now hasten to acknowledge that the Vandenberg amendment strengthens both the hand of the United Nations and the moral case of the United States Government. They point out that, until and unless the Security Council or the General Assembly requests it to withdraw, the United States Government will henceforward be acting, "not on its own isolated judgment, not unilaterally, but with the consent of the United Nations." Not unrelated perhaps to this swing of middle-road opinion in favour of the Greco-Turkish aid bill which the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has helped to produce is the announcement of the Russophil Senator Claude Pepper (Democrat, Florida) that, notwithstanding his earlier opposition, he will vote for direct financial and military assistance to Greece if the rest of his colleagues in the Upper House appear to be in favour of it. For different reasons, Senator Robert A. Taft, the Chairman of the Republican Committee on Policy, who stands at the other end of the political spectrum, has intimated that he, too, will lend his support to the measure. In the clearest endorsement which he has yet given to the Administration's foreign policy he stated on the 10th April that to repudiate the President now would be to "destroy his prestige in negotiations with the Russian Government, on the success of which ultimate peace depends."

Mr. Truman himself continues to enhance that prestige, the latest Gallup poll showing that 60 per cent. of Americans now approve his handling of his Presidential duties, as against only 32 per cent. when his political fortunes reached their nadir last autumn. The President has been warmly praised for his Jefferson Day speech of the 5th April, in the opening passages of which he elaborated the foreign policy originally outlined in his message of the 12th March. In commenting upon this pronouncement the conservative Scripps-Howard press—which is not generally friendly towards him—has been constrained to acclaim him as a leader who seems "consistently to act directly and candidly for what he sees as the country's best interest." On the 9th April Mr. Truman secured another important moral victory when, after long and at times unedifying Committee hearings, the Senate at last confirmed his appointment of Mr. David E. Lilienthal as Chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission by a vote of 50 to 31. To this victory Senator Vandenberg contributed in no small measure by helping during the previous week to defeat a move by his own Republican colleagues, Senators Bricker and Taft, to refer the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal back to the Atomic Energy Committee pending the further examination of some of Mr. Lilienthal's subordinates by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The scepticism with which American observers have hitherto followed the deliberations of the Moscow Conference is now slowly giving way to angry impatience with the obstructive tactics of M. Molotov and with his attempts to wear down and possibly to divide the Western Powers. In its extreme form the current mood has been reflected in the demand of Senator Harry F. Byrd (Democrat, Virginia) for a final "showdown" with the Soviet Union in the United Nations and in the candour with which Senator Tom Connally (Democrat, Texas) admitted to the Senate on the 10th April that it was largely "resistance to the aggressive expansionist doctrine of Soviet Russia" which impelled him to support the programme of aid to Greece and Turkey.

Mr. Marshall's proposal of the 9th April for an international commission to study the question of the German-Polish frontier has provided the highlight of interest at the Conference, and the insistence of the American Secretary of State that the final decision on this question must be in the interest of Europe as a whole is regarded as establishing a criterion which no amount of Soviet argument over what was done or said at Potsdam can gainsay.

In the United States itself the industrial situation has again been fraught with unrest as a result of the telephone strike and of the attempt of Mr. John L. Lewis to exploit the Centralia (Illinois) mining disaster of the 25th March in order to wreak vengeance upon the Federal Government for the recent setbacks which he has suffered at the latter's hands. On the 1st April—the date on which the soft coal strike was originally due to be resumed—Mr. Lewis ordered a six-day "mourning period" for the 111 Centralia victims, and on the 5th he called for the closing of all but the two pits which the Director of the Bureau of Mines had certified as complying with the Federal Safety Code. He had meanwhile made it clear that he would not expect any miner to resume work in an unsafe mine, although on the 12th April he climbed down to the extent of instructing the men to return to their jobs where there was "reasonable ground" to believe that they would not thereby be endangering their lives.

With the disorganisation produced by the telephone strike since the 7th April this latest display of truculence on the part of the miners' leader has given a fresh impetus to the demand for corrective labour legislation. It has also galvanized the Senate Labour and Public Welfare Committee and the House of Education and Labour Committee into a frenzied burst of activity on bills which would, inter alia, provide the Government with special powers to deal with strikes affecting the public interest. Nevertheless the deep concern in the country at large over the rising cost of living—to which the President himself gave utterance in his Jefferson Day speech of the 5th April—has caused many to sympathize with the telephone operators' demand for a rise in pay of 12 dollars a week. Mr. Truman reiterated his misgivings about the current level of prices at his press conference on the 12th, and he suggested that, if industry continued to make its present huge profits, there would be every justification for further wage increases.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

The Argentine-Bolivian bilateral agreement (see Summary No. 386) resembles closely in its outlines the treaty concluded with Chile. The Argentine Government, through its Trade Promotion Institute, lends Bolivia 50 million Argentine pesos at 3½ per cent. to cover Bolivian purchases in Argentina over the next five years; repayable in ten instalments beginning in 1952. Argentina will also invest 100 million pesos in Bolivia; an Argentina-Bolivian Finance Company, representing the Argentine Trade Promotion Institute, the Bolivian Government and Bolivian mining and industrial interests will be set up to develop Bolivian resources, especially minerals and rubber, with a view to the export to Argentina. Thirdly, Bolivia will float a loan in Buenos Aires, of which 100 million pesos will be taken up by the Argentine Trade Promotion Institute, and this loan will be used to finance public works, especially communications, and agriculture in Bolivia.

Apart from these credits, the two countries will draw up lists of non-competitive goods which will be admitted duty-free. Argentina undertakes to supply for five years fixed quantities of wheat, lard, sugar, edible oils, meat, live cattle and other commodities, while Bolivia will supply lead, asbestos, skins, timber, wolfram and rubber. Argentina will also take about 8,000 tons a year of Bolivian tin, at a basic price of 76 cents, rather more than that paid by the United States.

The Agents of the Trade Promotion Institute have also visited Perú, where, however, the Minister of Finance has declared that Perú would not sign an agreement of the type entered into by Chile and Bolivia, but confine itself to facilitating exchange through normal channels. The Peruvian Government are apparently not willing to take up State trading, and though they would be willing to press the International Petroleum Company and the Lobitos oilfields to sell to Argentina, they would not "resort to compulsion."

While the Argentine Government are thus exploiting their economic strength abroad, they seem to be seeking means to neutralize opposition at home. The most outspoken criticism of the Perón régime is to be found in the columns of La Prensa; and the Government, not content with attacking the paper by means of posters, appear to be considering more devious means of crippling it.

A recent controversy about maize prices throws some light on the Government's methods. The rising costs of production and of living (the latter is now 47 per cent. above the 1943 level) have caused dissatisfaction with the official maize price, which permits the Government to clear a handsome profit in sales for export. After a week-end in the maize-fields the all-powerful Señor Miranda announced his discovery that what was really the matter was not that the Government was paying too little, but that rents were too high, and he threatened expropriation of the "unscrupulous landlords." This fits in neatly with the official campaign against the land companies.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Corfu Incident

The Council debated the report of the Committee of Three (see Summary No. 385) on the 20th, 21st and 25th March. Albania's representative, Mr. Kapo, described the Australian and Columbian members of the Committee as partial, the Polish member being, by inference, impartial. Sir Alexander Cadogan's resolution, modified to meet U.S. and French views, ran as follows:—

> "The Security Council, having considered statements of representatives of the United Kingdom and of Albania concerning a dispute between the United Kingdom and Albania arising out of an incident on the 22nd October, 1946, in the Strait of Corfu, in which two British ships were damaged by mines, with resulting loss of life and injury to their crews: (1) considers that the laying of mines in peace time without notification is unjustified, and an offence against humanity; (2) finds that an unnotified minefield was laid in the Corfu Strait which resulted in serious loss of life and injury to their crews and which cannot have been laid without the knowledge of the Albanian Government; (3) recommends that the United Kingdom and Albanian Governments should settle the dispute on the basis of the Council's findings in (2) above, and that in the event of failure to settle, either party may apply to the Council for further consideration of the matter: resolves to retain this dispute on its agenda until both parties certify that it has been settled to their satisfaction."

Seven members voted for it. Syria's representative abstained, acting, it was learned later, without instructions from his Government, and Poland and Russia voted against it. Mr. Gromyko was able, by exercising the right of veto which the Charter gives to each of the five permanent members, to prevent the Security Council from reaching a decision. His action demonstrated to the world that one permanent member can at any time render the Security Council impotent as an engine of security, no matter how many members wish to reach a decision. Mr. Gromyko's attempt to follow up his use of the veto by having the dispute removed from the Council's agenda failed, and the matter came up again on the 3rd and 9th April, when the Council passed, by 8 votes to 0, with Russia, Poland and, of course, the U.K. abstaining, a U.K. resolution recommending the U.K. and Albanian Governments to refer the dispute to the International Court of Justice immediately, in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.

In the course of the debate on the 3rd April, the Brazilian representative raised the question of the proper functions of the Security Council. It was not, he said, a court of law or of arbitration. Its functions were political. It could not therefore punish or absolve. It could only recommend, or, when a breach of the international peace or security had occurred or was threatened, require members of the United Nations to take collective action. Apart from the general question raised, the majority of the Council held that the laying of an unnotified minefield was a breach of international security.

International Trade Organisation

The second session of the Preparatory Committee for the International Trade Organisation opened at Geneva on the 10th April. In the first session, which was held in London last autumn, a considerable measure of agreement was reached on the main lines of a Charter for International Trade, working on a draft submitted by the United States delegation. The object of the present session is two-fold: (1) to complete the work on the draft charter in preparation for the World Conference on Trade and Employment which it is hoped to hold next winter; (2) to undertake multilateral negotiations for the reduction of tariffs and for the reduction or elimination of preferences on a mutually advantageous basis, as a first step in the removal of barriers to world trade and as an essential move towards an effective world system of trade and employment.

The present meeting, accordingly, is divided into two main parts. During the past week the views of the chief trading nations on the form which a world trade policy should take have been expressed. In the first main phase, which is expected to last about five or six weeks, teams of customs experts from the several countries will try to arrive at agreed schedules of tariff reductions. It is expected that the first stage will be a series of bilateral negotiations between our country and its principal supplier of any given item. The results of these will later be made known to a gradually widening circle of other countries closely concerned, until finally all concessions granted and obtained are generalised to all participants. This phase will continue concurrently with the second, at which the terms of the Charter will be considered and, it is hoped, finally agreed, in the light of the results thus obtained. The Conference is expected to conclude about the end of July, when, it is hoped, an interim agreement, embodying the results of the tariff negotiations and such general provisions as are necessary to make it workable will be signed.

[For details of the first session of the Preparatory Committee, see Summary Nos. 364, 365, 366, 367, 368 and 369.]

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

Last year in Paris Mr. Byrnes proposed a Four-Power Treaty to ensure that Germany did not rearm. It was to be a simple treaty, similar to the bilateral pacts which the Soviet has made with various States against a revival of German aggression. On the 15th April, 1947, M. Molotov succeeded in forcing consideration of the treaty to be postponed indefinitely—probably the greatest blow for Allied disunity struck during the five weeks of the Moscow Conference. Yet the recognition of disunity is better than what Mr. Marshall denounced as "agreement for the sake of agreement." The one makes action possible. The other paralyses action. To this extent the Conference is succeeding.

In the last ten meetings the Ministers have re-trodden familiar ground. On the 1st April they discussed informally the level of industry, and reparations from current production. M. Molotov repeated that Potsdam covered such reparations. Mr. Marshall, with Mr. Bevin's concurrence, said that, since neither Potsdam nor the March 1946 level of industry plan provided for these reparations, M. Molotov was making vast new demands. Mr. Marshall did, however, suggest that U.S. experts might examine the possibility of compensating Russia out of current production for the plant which could not come to her as reparations if the level of German industry were raised; but only after Germany was self-supporting and British and American expenditure on Germany's behalf had been repaid. It was the old refrain, Russia chanting "reparations from current production," the Anglo-Americans responding, "no reparations from current production until . . . ."

On the 2nd April the subject was the political administration of Germany, and the issue remained the disposition of power between Laender and Central Government, M. Molotov favouring a strongly centralised Germany, the others, a Germany where power would reside in the Laender, who would delegate the essential minimum to the central government, M. Molotov posing as the champion of a united Germany, against the dismemberment which he said his Allies desired. Mr. Bevin and M. Molotov were at one in wishing the representatives of the Laender to be elected directly. On the 3rd April little progress was made in a debate on the Special Committee's Report regarding points in the Control Council's Report which the Ministers had agreed not to consider themselves. M. Bidault reaffirmed his objection to trade unions and political parties being organised on a pan-German basis. Mr. Bevin thought such organisation inevitable, and sought safety in guarantees of full and free competition between parties. M. Molotov, pressed by Mr. Bevin, agreed to let the Conference know when he would be ready to discuss a date for the return of prisoners-of-war. On Good Friday no meeting was held because the Co-ordinating Committee had not finished its report.

On Saturday the 5th April, there was an inconclusive discussion on the Co-ordinating Committee's Report, and Russia's refusal to have a proper international secretariat to do the translating made agreement still less easy. M. Molotov wanted Zonal Commanders to have the right to interfere with German central agencies. The other three objected.

On Monday the 7th and Tuesday the 8th April it became more obvious that M. Molotov's aim was a highly centralised, Communist-dominated Germany; and Mr. Bevin's repudiation of centralised security police, and Hitlerite methods advocated by M. Molotov, so delighted Mr. Marshall and M. Bidault that, after the meeting, M. Bidault thanked Mr. Bevin warmly in the name of France. Mr. Bevin's own appraisal of the position was that Russia had no desire to reach agreement except on terms dangerous to the security of the others.

Germany's frontiers were discussed on the 9th, 10th and 11th April, the main disputes being (1) whether the Polish frontier with Germany was fixed provisionally at Potsdam, as Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall had no difficulty in proving, or finally, as M. Molotov contended, M. Bidault agreeing with his Western colleagues, whilst pointing out that in practice the present frontier could not be altered. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall advocated an impartial enquiry by the Deputies into all the German frontier problems. M. Molotov would have the Deputies discuss the Western, but not the Eastern frontiers; (2) whether there should be a special régime for the Ruhr and the Rhineland, as M. Bidault contended, in order to eliminate the dangers latent in German control of an area whose industries would be revived to make the new Germany self-supporting; (3) whether the Saar should be detached and made a part of France's economy. To this Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall agreed, and M. Molotov, champion of German unity, objected (see under "Poland" and "Germany").

The remainder of the meeting on the 11th was concerned with the problem of the Central German Administrative Agencies, should they be under a State Secretary, as M. Molotov and the letter of Potsdam required, or under an Executive Committee, as Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall had proposed in order to reconcile M. Bidault to any form of Central administration.

On Saturday the 12th no agreement was reached on the establishment of the Provisional Government, on its relations to the Control Council, or on the division of powers between the Laender and the Central Government, M. Molotov alone maintaining that the Centre must be the ultimate source of power. All outstanding differences were referred to the Deputies to deal with for the next Session of the Council of Foreign Ministers. It was agreed that all "category 1" armament plants should be dismantled by the end of June 1948: Mr. Bevin said that categories 2, 3 and 4 must wait on the final Level of Industry. Further discussion on M. Molotov's contention that a Central German Government must be formed before a Peace Conference could be called was deferred.

The subjects on the 14th April were: (1) the Deputies' Report on Procedure for the Peace Conference, Mr. Bevin making another powerful plea for those Allies to participate who had shed their blood in the war, a plea whose cogency compelled even M. Molotov to make some advance; (2) the Byrnes' Four Power Treaty.

The Byrnes' Treaty occupied the greater part of Monday and Tuesday, in a debate which may be considered as the climax of the Conference. Mr. Marshall asked that his colleagues should not now go into details, but agree to the principle of the U.S. proposal, and to nominating plenipotentiaries who should work out a draft on the American basis. Mr. Bevin agreed without reservation. M. Bidault also agreed; but he asked that the following points should be stressed: (1) German disarmament must include economic and scientific disarmament: it must not be conditional, as at Versailles, on general disarmament. (2) Measures for sanctions must be agreed, with provision for action even without unanimity. (3) the special status of the Ruhr and the Rhineland. M. Molotov raised so many objections, and wanted so much added to the simple outline of the U.S. plan, that, as Mr. Bevin remarked, the Four Power Treaty would take the place of the Peace Treaty itself, and usurp what belonged to the Allies as a whole. It would, in M. Molotov's hands, become an engine for interfering in the whole life of Germany during the next forty years. Mr. Marshall told M. Molotov roundly that he was deliberately introducing elements of discord in order to wreck the Treaty, and added that since the Conference opened, his insistence that Russian agreement to Economic Unity depended on acceptance of Russia's demand for reparations from current production had been the chief source of the Ministers' difficulties. He wondered whether Russia sincerely desired the disarmament of Germany. As chairman, he left discussion of the Treaty, and passed on to other things. That same day he had his long delayed interview with M. Stalin which many have considered as in the nature of a "show-down."

The other item in Tuesday's meeting was the Report of the Coal Experts. Mr. Bevin refuted a statement which Mr. Vyshinsky had made to the Press, that Great Britain had taken German coal as reparations: "It is a matter of regret," he said, "that such statements are made, which must be known to be incorrect"—but "truth," as the Moscow wireless said in 1931, "is a bourgeois metaphysical concept."

Perhaps the most ironic misjudgment of the closing phase of the Moscow Conference came from the Russian-controlled Leipzig Radio, which declared on the 17th April: "Pessimism has now given way to confidence." The sixth week of meetings saw ill-omened discussions on Mr. Byrnes' proposal for a four-Power pact to keep Germany disarmed. Whereas the three Western delegations wanted a straightforward treaty to guard against German aggression, Russia was determined not to be bound by any pact unless she got her way over such matters as reparations, control of the Ruhr, and annulment of the bi-zonal agreement. She therefore sought to inflate the document to something resembling a peace treaty and covering all the controversial issues. Clearly, if Russia gets no satisfaction on these issues she wants a free hand, on paper as well as in fact, to carry out whatever policy she pleases in Eastern Germany. On 16th April inconclusive talks were held on coal exports. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall refused M. Molotov's proposal that German coal should be sent for reparations—a refusal that is being clearly driven home to the German public. Meanwhile agreement has been reached by the U.K. and U.S. Governments with the French Government for a sliding scale of coal exports (see under "France").

With the failure in Moscow to agree on German policy, the United Kingdom and United States Governments are now faced with the need to take decisions on policy in their zones, where it is clear that certain important changes can no longer be delayed. It is probable that in any case the permitted level of industry in the bi-zonal area will be raised, that the bi-zonal agencies will be concentrated in one spot to overcome the present lack of coordination and the deplorable communications; and that the bi-zonal organisation will be generally strengthened by smoothing away some of the differences of political structure in the two zones, although without actually setting up a bi-zonal Government.

It has become urgently necessary to deal with the serious teething troubles of the bi-zonal economic agencies. As already reported there is a dispute over the relative powers of the Laender and the Central Authorities. There is also ill-feeling between the Agricultural South and the Industrial North, the latter looks with hungry eyes towards southern food stocks, and the southern areas are accused of holding back supplies. Actually deliveries of produce have also been unsatisfactory in the north. The internal situation is not helped by the fact that food imports are unfortunately containing a big proportion of coarse maize hardly suitable for bread, and that there appears to be some lack of co-ordination between the different Allied agencies. The Christian Democratic Union and the Social Democratic Party take the attitude of prophets whose warnings on the food crisis have gone unheeded. Both seem to disregard the world food shortage. The Christian Democratic Union tends to defend the German Administration from blame while the Social Democratic Party demands overriding authority for the bi-zonal agencies. British authorities feel that some strengthening of the bi-zonal economic authority in the fields of industry and agriculture is essential. While many U.S. officials agree, they are reluctant to depart from the American policy of laisser faire and maximum responsibilities for the Laender. General Clay is at present insisting on a completely free economy and has even suggested that the Zone Commanders ought to run each zone on independent lines. This difficulty, however, is likely to be overcome since it is not thought to have the support of the majority of U.S. officials.

Final results of elections for State Assemblies in the British Zone will not be available until next week, but it seems that the Social Democrats have won a very short lead over the Christian Democrats, thus reversing the position at the District elections in October 1946. On the other hand, the non-Marxist parties taken together may still hold the lead over Social Democrats and Communists. The Communists have made some headway in Ruhr towns which have suffered particular hardship since the autumn. Feverish pre-election campaigns failed to overcome the apathy of the electorate. Eight months of growing cynicism and collapsing morale have led to less rather than more interest in the behaviour of democratic parties. This attitude makes it peculiarly difficult to assess the value of victory by any one party. All have cast their nets wide to catch votes and have voiced the complaints of the population. Moreover, since they lack responsibility on such matters as German unity, prisoners-of-war or currency reform speakers prefer to declaim in general, theoretical terms rather than getting down to hard facts. Therefore, among Non-Communist candidates there is a remarkable similarity of views on the larger issues. Dr. Schumacher's election speeches were marked by unrestrained attacks on the Socialist Unity Party and on Russian policy. On the 31st March at Oberhausen for example he decried the "fictitious prosperity" of the Eastern zone with its monopoly rule of State Capitalism. In Rendsburg on the 14th April he expressed scepticism at M. Molotov's proposals for German unity and said it meant political conquest of the Socialist Unity Party (SED) leading to "One Reich, one party, one puppet, one Secret Police." On the 17th April a "frontier demonstration" was held in Muenster when Dr. Schumacher, having already rejected the present Eastern frontier, said that the SPD would not agree to any cession of territory in the West or North. (The French authorities have now forbidden Dr. Schumacher to speak in the French zone.) Dr. Adenauer in his campaign for the CDU in the British zone emphasized that his party alone was not bound by any ties to one of the Allied Powers and could therefore be guaranteed to speak out frankly on Germany's behalf. He has declared that Germany must either get back the Eastern provinces or be free to develop her export industries to the full. Thus, perhaps inevitably, does he imitate the tactics of earlier politicians by bargaining for one concession, probably only to make it a stepping-stone to another.

Berlin Government suffers from perennial crises. The Lord Mayor, Dr. Ostrowski, reluctantly resigned on the 17th April after a vote of "no confidence" had been passed in the Assembly by his own party, the Social Democrats, against the votes of the Socialist Unity Party. The immediate cause of the trouble was that Dr. Ostrowski had held informal conversations with the SED on cooperation in the Government. His party, it is believed unjustly, accused him of committing the SPD to a line of policy without consulting it. The root of the trouble goes deeper. First the Social Democratic party is rent by rival factions many of whom are personally opposed to Dr. Ostrowski as well as to other members. The appointment of a successor will not therefore be easy. Secondly Dr. Ostrowski tried to cooperate with the Kommandatura and with the Russians because he believed this was the only way to achieve any practical results and to help the population. The party distrusts this policy and wishes to assert its freedom of action and stand out against the Russians at all costs although they are neither united nor powerful enough to do so. As pointed out in Summary No. 384, the Russians by the exercise of their veto in the Kommandatura are out to hamper the Council and discredit the Social Democrat Government, while the Social Democrats by their very ineptitude and unreliability are helping them in the task. The unfortunate results, both for the Party and for Berlin, have much more than local significance.

AUSTRIA

Quantitatively, work on the Austrian treaty has proceeded with vigour and dispatch since the Council of Foreign Ministers reached this item on their agenda on the 16th April; qualitatively, the measure of agreement that has so far been reached has been disappointing in that the three key-points are still unresolved, the territorial and financial claims of Yugoslavia, and the problem of the "German assets." Efforts by the Western Powers to compromise in justifiable instances have not produced a similar response from M. Molotov on any of these major issues.

At the meeting on the 17th April, M. Kardelj, the leader of the Yugoslav Delegation, reiterated Yugoslavia's claims to "the part of Slovene territory which has been under foreign domination," asked for a special autonomous régime for the Croats in the Burgenland, and enunciated eight provisions which, he considered, should be included in the treaty. M. Simic, the Yugoslav Foreign Minister then formulated Yugoslavia's claim to reparations to the value of 180 million dollars and insisted that German assets in Austria should be made available for Allies entitled to reparations. The Yugoslav claims were contested by the British, United States and French Ministers, though M. Bidault endeavoured to produce a compromise solution by suggesting (a) the revival of the pre-war Austro-Yugoslav agreement on power supplies from the Drave river, and (b) that provision might be made for Yugoslavia to retain Austrian property in Yugoslavia. No help was, however, forthcoming from M. Molotov, who firmly supported both Yugoslav claims, though he did not attempt to justify the territorial demands. In regard to the claim for reparations, M. Molotov contested that the Potsdam Agreement constituted a waiver of reparation claims against Austria by the three signatories only; he agreed, however, that M. Bidault's proposal was worthy of study by the Deputies, to whom both articles were referred after the Ministers had heard the Austrian Delegation state their views. According to The Times (22nd April) the Deputies later agreed to accept M. Bidault's reparations proposal, but M. Molotov's insistence, at the closed session of the Ministers on the 21st April, that the full Yugoslav title to reparations must not be prejudiced, has so far prevented further agreement.

The Foreign Ministers' discussion on the vexed question of the German assets was opened with a new, simplified proposal by Mr. Marshall under which (1) Austria would recognise the right of the Four Powers to dispose of the German assets according to the Berlin Protocol; (2) German assets were defined as "property, rights and interests beneficially owned on the 8th May, 1945, by the German Government or German nationals, which were (a) owned by them on the 12th March, 1938, or (b) acquired after the 12th March, 1938, by the German Government or by persons who on the 12th March, 1938, were German nationals if such assets were acquired without force or duress"; (3) the transferred assets should be subject to the provisions of Austrian law (except for a temporary ban on nationalisation); and (4) "Eastern Austria" was defined as the Soviet zone of occupation and the Soviet Sector of Vienna. Both the British and French Ministers were willing to accept this proposal as a basis for discussion, but all efforts to achieve agreement were rendered vain by M. Molotov's rigid adherence to the all too familiar Russian standpoint, to which he now added (in regard to (3) above) a claim for special privileges in regard to the disposal of the products and the foreign exchange obtained by their sale. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall drew attention to the disastrous effect which acceptance of the Soviet formula would have on Austria's economy and, after further exchanges, Mr. Marshall closed the discussion by saying that his Government could not co-operate in a treaty which would make Austria economically a puppet and place her in a worse position than the satellites. The problem was referred back to the Deputies.

Points agreed on by the Ministers include the re-establishment of Austria as a free and independent State; the prohibition of a new Anschluss with Germany and of Pan-German propaganda; a ban on the naturalisation or permanent residence in Austria of Germans who had been members of the Nazi party; the extradition of war criminals; and Austria's responsibility for Allied military currency of five Schillings and under. These would seem to represent some concessions on the part of the Russians who, however, won a "dictionary" battle over Austria's "responsibility." The Russians have also modified their original demand that displaced persons should be transferred from Austria within six months to a suggestion that the time limit should be fixed by the Allied Council in Vienna.

In Carinthia, tension has been increasing since the "Eisenkappel incident" and a number of minor disturbances have resulted in arrests of members of the Slovene Liberation Front (the OF) and of the "Kaerntnertreue" (those loyal to Carinthia). Yugoslav propaganda has capitalised the OF arrests, and the Yugoslav Delegation on the 14th April addressed a note to the Council of Foreign Ministers, alleging that the British and Austrian authorities had on the 11th April forbidden the Carinthian Slovenes to hold further meetings and to carry or display Yugoslav and Slovene banners. The Yugoslav complaint is a distortion of the facts: no new ban has been issued, but the British authorities in Carinthia have called for a strict observance of existing regulations on all public meetings; under these regulations only Austrian flags or those of the four Occupying Powers may be displayed.

Professor Savory's question in the House of Commons on the 2nd April regarding Russian demands for the allocation to Communists of eight important posts in the Austrian State police has been widely reported in the Austrian press. The Austrian police, which under the Provisional Government was under a Communist Minister of the Interior, was reorganised with effect from the 1st March, 1947. Early Russian protests against the retention of a number of officials alleged to have served in the police during the Nazi régime were believed to have been motivated by annoyance at the whittling down of the power of Duermeyer, the former Communist Head of the Police, and the general elimination of undue Communist influence from all levels. In mid-March Colonel Ilyichev requested a number of changes which, if effected, would have put Communists, who were nearly all non-professional police officers, in commanding positions. Up to the 31st March the Austrian Government still did not know whether the proposed changes were a request or an instruction. It is understood that they would refuse the former and refer the latter to the Allied Council. The reason for Russian interest in securing Communist control of the police is not far to seek in view of the weak position of the Austrian Communists in relation to the other political parties and the fact that Russian forces are eventually to be withdrawn. Addressing Communist leaders at the Landesparteitag of the Styrian Communist Party in March, Ernst Fischer stated that he would do all he could to persuade the Russian forces to remain in Austrian as long as possible, since their withdrawal would be a severe blow for the KPO. He admitted, however, a steady deterioration in the Austrian Communists' position on account of relations with the Russians, who had made themselves very unpopular in Austria.

Health statistics for February 1947 give an encouraging picture. The T.B. death rate for that month was much below that for February 1939 and, while new cases of T.B. showed a slight rise in February, they remained comparatively low: 1·869 per 1,000 population as compared with 1·860 in December 1946 and 1·683 in 1940–1944. The small extent of this rise is a clear indication that the food situation is not catastrophic.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The final curtain has now rung down on the Tiso trial. Death Sentences were pronounced upon the former Slovak President and Dr. Durčanský, his Foreign Minister—the latter was tried in absentia. The pronouncement of the verdict upon Šaňo Mach, formerly Minister of the Interior and perhaps the most hated man in Slovakia has been deferred in view of an illness which precludes his attendance at Court. Dr. Tiso's appeal to President Beneš for clemency was rejected. The Council of Ministers voted twice in the matter of a reprieve; a Czech Socialist proposal that the question should be referred back to the Slovak National Council was defeated by 13 votes to 10; the Council then upheld the verdict by 16 votes to 7, the minority consisting of the People's Party and Slovak Democrats. The President confirmed the Council's decision. Dr. Tiso was hanged early on Friday morning, the 18th April.

So far, calm and order have prevailed throughout Slovakia; no violent reaction to the verdict has been recorded, so that the majority of the population appear to have accepted the verdict as just—or were already stoically resigned to the inevitable outcome of the trial. The Czechoslovak Radio announces that most of even the American Slovaks have shown themselves to be satisfied with the findings of the Court. Amongst this latter element, however, anger and discontent have by no means been appeased. Dr. Durčanský, whose whereabouts since the end of the War has caused much speculation, has now emerged as Chairman of the Slovak Action Committee in America and is busily employed in disseminating anti-Czech propaganda. Broadcasting from America he is said to have announced that the Committee has protested to the United Nations against the Bratislava verdict.

A Polish Trade Delegation, led by M. Minc, the Minister for Industry, has arrived in Prague. The despatch of the delegation is the practical outcome of the wish of both the Czechoslovak and the Polish Governments, as expressed at the signing of the Treaty of Friendship last month, to co-operate on the broadest economic basis. Talks have already begun on trade exchanges and a transport agreement.

The results, published by the Central Planning Commission, of the Two-Year Plan for the month of March show that a steady rate of progress is being maintained. As in February, the target figures for those branches of production in which over-fulfilment is desirable—especially the coal-mining, iron and metals, and foundry industries—have been exceeded; the labour shortage is mainly responsible for the deficiencies in the remaining branches of industry. In order to assure the Plan's success in Slovakia steps have been taken to suspend the recruitment of labour in that province for the Czech Lands: proceedings will be instigated against those workers who have already departed or who intend to depart to seek livelihood in Bohemia-Moravia. In the Czech Lands also there is a dangerous drift of workers, especially of agricultural labourers, from the country into the towns. The District Trades Union Council in Prague at a recent meeting keenly appreciated this danger and recognised the need for voluntary workers to ease the labour shortage.

In recent weeks, there have been signs of sharper political conflict within the National Front. The Social Democrats particularly have been outspoken in their criticism of undemocratic and unconstitutional Communist moves, such as the drawing-up of regulations making it necessary for all public meetings to be attended by a security officer. In this respect, M. Majer, Minister of Food, suggested that the Social Democrats have been left in lonely opposition by the Socialists and Catholics. There are strong rumours that the Czech Socialists and the Slovak Democrats are on the point of extending their activities to the whole country; the former talk of absorbing much of the Social Democrat strength, and the latter have an eye to the Catholic and Right-wing vote.

SOVIET UNION

Soviet views on the present negotiations for revision of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty were given to the Russian public for the first time in an unsigned article in Pravda of the 19th April. In the first place the apprehension expressed by various British and American correspondents that certain Soviet proposals might be used to drive a wedge between this country and the United States was castigated as "slanderous" and "obvious nonsense." The establishment of the United Nations is held to have rendered redundant the provision whereby article 4 of the Treaty—which deals with mutual military and other aid in the event of renewed German aggression against one of the contracting Powers—is to remain in force until the establishment of "common measures for ensuring peace." But in line with the general reluctance shown by the Soviet Union to link its post-war Treaty commitments with the United Nations Charter, Pravda makes no proposals for bringing this article into harmony with the present position. The suggestion is that it should be simply deleted. It is twice asserted that the present negotiations were begun on British initiative. This is only true in the sense that the Secretary of State as early as December 1945 expressed his desire to extend the duration of the Treaty to 50 years. The present negotiations actually resulted from Generalissimo Stalin's conversation with the C.I.G.S. and from his subsequent message to Mr. Truman last January. Soviet insistence on a new Treaty obligation not to participate in any sort of agreements or actions which even indirectly would be directed against one of the parties concerned is reaffirmed. It is known, however, that there are serious difficulties on the British side to accepting any such specious commitments which leaves room for almost indefinite wrangling over intentions and interpretations. The general tenor of this article suggests that the Soviet authorities may be preparing the way for the announcement of a breakdown in the negotiations, without losing face themselves, at all events, at home.

Tass has also reviewed the attitude taken up in the foreign press to the Council of Foreign Ministers in an article which is little more than another sounding-board for official Soviet views. French, British and United States papers and commentators are attacked for their lack of objectivity and seriousness and for their attempts to "intimidate" the Soviet delegation by holding it responsible for the stalemate in the Conference and to "blackmail" the Soviet Union into making concessions which would prevent the Conference being a failure. The Times in particular is attacked for insisting that it is the Soviet Union which must renounce its legitimate demand for reparations, since Bevin and Marshall cannot yield. Reference is made to the ordering of the British train for the 13th April and to American preparations for departure as further examples of intimidation. The Soviet Union is not be intimidated, asserts Tass. Her firm attitude in "a number of issues is in harmony with the great constructive work intended for the successful completion of the Moscow session."

Mr. Harold Stassen, prospective Republican candidate for the Presidency of the United States, has enjoyed a good deal of publicity on his recent trip to the Soviet Union and was actually received by the Generalissimo on the 9th April. M. Stalin's remarks to his visitor on the Soviet censorship, in which he chid American correspondents for depicting the Soviet Union "as a sort of zoological garden" are common knowledge. Mr. Stassen appears to have maintained a very correct attitude and declined to discuss political topics until his return to the U.S.A. In the Ukraine he was received by M. Khrushchev, and after visiting Leningrad he went on to Helsinki.

On the 14th April it was announced in Moscow that the Governments of the U.S.S.R. and the United States had agreed to negotiate on the final settlement of outstanding Lend-Lease questions as provided by the terms of the basic agreement of the 11th June, 1942. The negotiations are to take place in Washington, M. Novikov, Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in the United States, being the Soviet representative. It is not known what has finally induced the Soviet authorities to agree to negotiate. They had already received five communications from the United States Government on the subject, the last being presented by the American Ambassador in Moscow on the 5th April. The cost of Lend-Lease goods sent to the U.S.S.R. amounts to 11,100,000,000 dollars on the 31st October, 1946, and in addition there was a total of 221,000,000 dollars of goods under a pipeline agreement, of which 17,000,000 had been held up by Congress. Soviet aid advanced to the United States under reverse Lend-Lease totalled 2,213,000 dollars on the 2nd September, 1945. The day following the announcement of this Agreement, Mr. Marshall was received by Generalissimo Stalin; no news has yet come through of the substance of their conversation. Meanwhile, the Soviet press campaign against American imperialism and militarism has continued with unabated vigour.

Patriarch Alexei has recently been decorated by King Michael of Roumania with the Order of the Roumanian Star (with Grand Cross). In expressing his thanks the Patriarch referred to his imminent visit to Roumania, which he hoped would further consolidate "the fraternal and spiritual bonds" between the two Churches. Two members of the Soviet Embassy in Bucharest, though not the Ambassador himself, attended the Easter ceremonies. In his Easter message from Moscow to Orthodox believers in the U.S.S.R. and abroad, Patriarch Alexei referred to the recent reception into the fold of members of the Russian Orthodox Church in America, who had been granted "freedom of church structure in accordance with the conditions of their life." This vague phrase does not make clear exactly what measure of autonomy has been granted to the Russian-American Church. Metropolitan Theophilus, its head, appears to have become rather wary after his first exhibition of élan, and some of his bishops, led by Archbishop Vitaly, have already decided to form a group maintaining relations with the Anastasy Synod.

It has been announced from Rome that the Italian and Soviet Governments have agreed to exchange a number of students. No confirmation has so far been received from the Soviet side, but if the agreement comes into operation it will be of interest as being the first evidence of such an exchange between the U.S.S.R. and a country outside the group of Soviet satellites.

The situation in Indo-China, of which little mention has appeared in the Soviet press in recent weeks, is the subject of a short comment in New Times No. 15 of the 11th April. The starting-point of the article is the recent vote on military credits in the National Assembly, from which the Communists are said to have abstained. The article proceeds on the usual lines to differentiate between French and democratic circles and those who wish to reimpose a colonial régime on the young Republic by force. Reference is also made to the "brutalities committed by the French soldiers," which are allegedly only rousing the peaceful population to greater opposition, and to a secret meeting in Hong Kong last month between "a French official" and certain émigré Annamite leaders who desire independence within the French Union. "It is to be hoped," concludes New Times, "that the peoples of Indo-China will thwart these new manœuvres of their enemies."

The success of collectivised agriculture depends very largely on the quality of the team of organisers and supervisors, i.e., brigade-leaders, collective farm managers, etc., attached to each farming unit, and responsible for the fulfilment of its plan. In view of the difficulties of re-establishing the collective farm system in large areas of European Russia and the Ukraine in the post-war period, the importance of the work of these king-pins of the Soviet agricultural system has greatly increased and is pivotal for the fulfilment of the Soviet Government's food production plans. This is clearly reflected in an order of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, awarding orders and medals, such as the Order of Lenin, Hero of Socialist Labour, Order of the Red Banner of Labour, to the brigade-leaders and other senior officials of the collective farms and tractor stations for obtaining specifically high yields of wheat, rye, maize, sugar beet and cotton. Thus, presidents of collective farms, senior agronomists, mechanics of State farms and other such officials may be awarded the title Hero of Socialist Labour for obtaining yields of wheat and rye on non-irrigated land of not less than 30 centners a hectare, while the same official group is awarded the Order of Lenin for obtaining yields of wheat and rye on non-irrigated land of not less than 25 centners a hectare. Officials of the local Soviets, the Communist Party and the agricultural departments are also encouraged to promote the food production drive by the award of the Order of Lenin, the Order of the Red Banner of Labour, etc., for fulfilment and over-fulfilment of the local planned yield. Individual agricultural workers as such are not mentioned in this order, and apparently are not to benefit by it.

It is reported that the Five-Year Plan of aerial photography of the Soviet Union comprises the surveying of remote districts which so far do not possess exact maps, such as parts of the Yakut Province, the Krasnoyarsk Region, the Northern Urals and the Nenets National Region. M. Sudakov, Deputy Chief of the Department of Land Surveying and Map-Making, recently stated that it was proposed to photograph about 7,000,000 square kilometres and to issue maps covering more than 6,000,000 sq. km. This year it is proposed to photograph 600,000 sq. km. from the air, two and a half times as great an area as in 1946. The main objectives will be the districts due for irrigation in Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, the Kura-Arakinsky lowlands in Azerbaidjhan. Large scale photographic operations are also to be carried out in districts liberated from the Germans in the Pskov, Smolensk, Vitebsk, Orel, Velikie Luki and Kursk Provinces, in Stavropol and in the Ukraine, where aerial photography will aid in correcting existing maps. To draw up plans for the reconstruction and restoration of cities, photographs of Stalingrad, Kursk, Smolensk, Voronezh, Sverdlovsk, Chelyabinsk, Astrakhan, Kemerovo, Stalinsk, Prikopievsk, Leninsk-Kuznetsk, Karaganda and other towns will be taken this year. It is also proposed to carry through vast survey works along the rivers Ob, Yenisei, Lena, Nizhni Tungus and others. Much surveying in connection with the needs of the coal industry is also planned to take place in the Donbas, Karaganda and Kuzbas. At present preparations are being completed. Aircraft and apparatus for high-altitude precision photography are being checked and equipment for the expeditions is being prepared.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

Denmark has been plunged into mourning by the death of her King, Christian X, which took place on the 20th April, after a brief illness. King Christian was in his seventy-seventh year and had all through his reign enjoyed the love of his people to whom he was the rallying-point for their patriotism and sentiment through the trying years of the German occupation. The King is succeeded by his elder son, who has ascended the throne as King Frederik IX. The new Danish King, who, in 1935, married the only daughter of the Swedish Crown Prince, has three daughters and so far no son, so that in the event of his decease without male issue the crown would pass to his brother, Prince Knud, who has two young sons.

The death of King Christian followed hard on the elections to the Upper House, which resulted in a gain of two seats for the Government Party, one seat for the Communists who previously had not been represented in the Landting, and a loss of one seat each for the Social-Democrats, the Conservatives and the Radicals. As was previously explained (see this Summary No. 387), the elections to the Landting are rather complicated, and the Communist paper Land og Folk has seized the occasion to revive the demand for the abolition of the Upper House, on the ground that the results of the present elections are in no way representative of the votes cast.

Some small changes in the Government have taken place. M. Søren Peter Larsen, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, has resigned for reasons of health and will be succeeded by the leader of the Venstre Party in the House, M. Jens Sønderup, who is a farmer. Thus the farming element in the Government will be strengthened, which is perhaps regrettable. Another change is that the Ministry of Trade has been divided into a Department of Trade and one of Supplies, M. Axel Kristensen being appointed as Minister of the new Ministry. He is by training an engineer and the director of the large porcelain manufacturing concern, "Norden."

According to a report in the British press M. Th. Døssing, Denmark's Minister to Moscow, has died of pneumonia. Rumours were current in March that M. Døssing contemplated resigning his appointment in the summer so that the question of his successor has probably already been considered. M. Døssing, whom the Germans arrested in 1942 and interned in 1943, escaped to Sweden in June 1944 and was subsequently appointed envoy of Fighting Denmark in Moscow. After the liberation he was recognised as Danish Minister to the U.S.S.R. His attempt, in October 1945, to enter parliament as a Communist, was unsuccessful. While he appears to have been popular in the Soviet Union feelings about him were rather divided at home, where he was in some circles regarded as more of a Russian Ambassador to Denmark than a Danish Minister to Russia.

Negotiations between the Printers' Union and the Copenhagen Master Printers' Association were resumed on the 29th March without, however, any settlement being reached (see this Summary No. 385). The chief conciliator discussed the position with the two parties on the 8th April and issued a statement that the moment was inopportune for the resumption of mediation. The strike, therefore, continues, and Copenhagen remains without adequate news supply. A butchers' strike which, however, is limited to factories engaged in sausage making and meat canning, has now spread to the Dockworkers', Horsedrivers', Lorrydrivers' and Messengers' Unions connected with the same industry.

Sweden

As a direct result of Prof. Myrdal's recent appointment to the Secretary-Generalship of the Economic Commission for Europe certain changes have taken place in the Swedish Government. M. Axel Gjöres, until now Minister of Supply, will succeed M. Myrdal at the Ministry of Trade; M. Gunnar Sträng, so far Minister without Portfolio, will follow M. Gjöres at the Ministry of Supply, and Prof. Karin Kock, Professor of Economics at Stockholm University and one of the leading members of the Swedish Economic Committee for Post-war planning, has been appointed as Minister without Portfolio. Prof. Kock, who is Sweden's first woman Minister, well deserves the honour her country has conferred upon her as she is an economist of distinction and at the same time a woman of great charm. Her appointment has had a favourable press all over Sweden. She had made it clear that she will not use her new position specially to promote women's interests but will concentrate entirely on the economic tasks which will be her special care.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

It was officially announced in The Hague on the 16th April that the Dutch Prime Minister, Dr. Beel, and the Minister of Overseas Territories, M. Jonkman, are to leave the Netherlands for Indonesia on the 29th April. Their visit is stated to have been made at the request of the Commission-General because of the many problems which have arisen in connexion with the implementation of the Linggadjati Agreement since it was signed. Dr. Beel and M. Jonkman will thus have the opportunity of examining these problems first hand. It is thought likely that they will attend meetings between the Commissioners and the Indonesian delegation.

M. H. R. de Vleeschouwer, Assistant Secretary-General of the Council of the (proposed) Netherlands–Belgium–Luxembourg Economic Union, told correspondents in The Hague on the 14th April that a Commission charged with collecting data and advising on the economic clauses of the Peace Treaty with Germany was shortly to be set up in the service of the Union. The Commission's work is also to include other German economic problems, particularly those relating to Germany as an economic hinterland to the Low Countries. M. de Vleeschouwer added there was a possibility of the Commission's acting as an advisory body to Belgium and the Netherlands in the event of their participating in the German Peace Conference. But the limits of the Commission's work could not be defined until the procedure to be adopted at the Conference was known. Turning to the Customs Agreement between the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg (which will probably come into force on the 1st August or 1st September of the present year), M. de Vleeschouwer said that he believed that the Agreement would effect the economic union of the three States within two years, by which time Dutch "economic evolution" would have reached a level at which rationing, wages and prices in the three States "would be about equal." During that period, co-operation between them would develop in two stages—a common customs tariff and standardization of indirect taxation, which together would ultimately lead to economic union with a common industrial, agricultural and transport policy. Economic union would not only provide a single market for the goods of the three States, but each member of the union would help in marketing the goods of the other two outside the union. In conclusion, M. de Vleeschouwer said that he "completely endorsed" the opinion that the despatch of transit traffic by way of German harbours was "quite wrong" from an economic point of view; he alleged that between 15 and 20 per cent. of the goods which passed through German harbours were stolen on the way.

Belgium

Despite M. Spaak's recent assurances regarding the question royale—there had been "fundamental agreement" on it among members of the new Cabinet—there is evidence to shew that it is still the issue on which the two Government parties are most divided. Some of the new Christian Social Ministers, prominent among whom was the Minister of Justice, M. Struye, had, at the outset, intended to write to King Leopold, informing him of their appointments and assuring him of their continued loyalty. From this, however, they were dissuaded. Shortly afterwards they received a message from the Prince Regent reminding them that, although he claimed no right to interfere with their political action, he, as Head of the State, expected to be kept informed of all such intended moves.

Meanwhile, reports from Switzerland about the Crown Prince's character and his attitude to affairs in Belgium have been received with some alarm. It is thought that Prince Baudouin has now forgotten Queen Astrid, his mother, and has become completely devoted to the Princesse de Réthy, his step-mother. He is reported to have told his entourage that, should he return to Belgium, he would have dealings only with those who had shown consistent loyalty to his father. Publicity given to such a statement—to say nothing of its being translated into action—could only serve to lay the Monarchy open to a charge of being anti-Belgian, and to divide the Belgian people still more on the issue of the question royale. For this reason, efforts are to be made to bring Prince Baudouin to Belgium as soon as possible before his present influences have done their work too thoroughly.

FRANCE

Affairs in the French Union have again provoked a Cabinet crisis. As in the case of Indo-China (see Summary No. 386) the Communists have taken the side of the Nationalists in Madagascar, thereby coming into open disagreement with the other parties represented in the Government. The immediate issue is the arrest by the judicial authority in Madagascar of five native deputies and Councillors of the Republic, all of whom belong to the Parti de Rénovation Malgache and are accused of direct responsibility for the rising which began on 29th March. One of the deputies, M. Ravoahangy, was in fact, according to documents in the possession of the French Government, starred for the rôle of head of an independent Malagasy Government. The difficulty arises over the question of parliamentary immunity since members of Parliament may only be arrested in flagrante delicto. It has been argued that the arrest of the Malagasy deputies and councillors is in fact covered by this provision; but in addition the Government decided on the 16th April to ask Parliament to lift the protection of parliamentary immunity in the case of the Malagasies. The Communist Ministers refused to accept these decisions and walked out of the Cabinet meeting. They also absented themselves from the dinner given that same evening to celebrate M. Blum's 75th birthday. No immediate consequences of this action are expected, however, since Parliament is in recess until the 29th April. Moreover, no change of Government could take place in the absence of the President of the Republic. The support given by the Communists to the Parti de Rénovation Malgache has caused even more annoyance to the Socialists and the M.R.P. than their support of the Viet-Minh since the latter was indeed largely Communist but the former is a feudal party formerly denounced by the Communists. A writer in the M.R.P. paper L'Aube asked: "Must we then conclude that any anti-French movement is assured in advance of the support of five Ministers of the Republic?"

Meanwhile M. Vincent Auriol is visiting a comparatively undisturbed part of the French Union, West Africa. He arrived at Dakar in the battleship Richelieu on the 20th April, after having received the salute of a British cruiser in the Straits of Gibraltar, and exchanged messages of courtesy. The Ministers of War and the Navy are on their way to visit Indo-China, and the Minister of the Interior, M. Depreux, is in Algeria. The press reports that he had a cold reception, the French Algerians holding aloof because they disapprove of his left-wing policy, and the Moslems wishing to wait on events. M. Depreux has emphasised that his visit is concerned with the preparation of the new Algerian constitution. A debate on this subject is to be held in the National Assembly on the 28th May and each party has its own plan prepared, that of the Communists being designed to attract the Moslem nationalists. M. Ferhat Abbas, leader of the moderate nationalist Parti du Manifeste, urges that Algeria should become an associated state within the Union. He lays stress on the possibility of coming to a working agreement with the French, and his moderation is in contrast with the extremism of Messali Hadj, leader of the Parti Populaire Algérien, with whom Ferhat Abbas is now on bad terms. The reports of unrest caused by Messali's recent tour in Kabylia were much exaggerated and he in fact appears to be losing ground. There is more cause for anxiety in the lack of rain which, if it continues, will ruin this year's harvest.

Further reactions to General de Gaulle's Rassemblement du Peuple Français are on the expected lines. The Communists are seizing the opportunity to try to create an anti-Gaulle front of Communists, Socialists and "democrats" but the Socialists are avoiding this trap without, however, abating their opposition to the R.P.F. M. Blum's condemnation of de Gaulle is significant and is taken to mean that he cannot face the prospect of seeing the Communists go into opposition. The M.R.P. also realises the danger of allowing the formation of two rival blocs in France, and one of its spokesmen went so far as to accuse de Gaulle of trying to form a single party. Meanwhile the recruiting offices of the R.P.F. are besieged with applicants and the movement has decided to exclude all persons who were members of collaborationist organizations. M. Soustelle, the Secretary-General, is assisted by MM. André Malraux, Gaston Palewski and Jacques Baumel.

The anticipated agreement between the U.K., U.S. and French Governments on German coal exports (see last week's Summary) was signed on the 19th April and published on the 21st. It takes the form of an exchange of letters between Mr. Bevin and M. Bidault in which the Secretary of State proposes a sliding scale for exports of coal from Western Germany rising from 21 per cent. of net merchantable coal produced when output is 280,000 tons a day, to 25 per cent. when output reaches 370,000 tons. M. Bidault, in reply, welcomes the acceptance of the French request for a formula of general application to German coal exports, and states that although the figures mentioned are still far from those he had hoped for he accepts them and appreciates the British and U.S. desire to meet French needs. In addition, Mr. Bevin agrees to the request of M. Bidault that when the economic incorporation of the Saar in the French economy has been decided, there should be a joint British and French notification of this fact to the European Coal Organisation which should be informed that France would thereafter present the needs and resources of France and the Saar as a whole and invited to take account of this new situation.

The Cabinet has begun to discuss the new statute of the press. The Assembly, at the end of its last session, dealt with the position of the Messageries Françaises de Presse, the agency founded after the liberation to distribute the new press. It took over the distribution side of the firm of Hachette including a fund of 150 million fr., but it was largely under Communist control and showed itself both inefficient and fraudulent. Some of the papers, including Le Populaire and Combat, therefore went over to an independent agency, L'Expéditive, which had been founded by Hachette. The combination of this competition and the press strike brought the Messageries to an ignominious end in bankruptcy. The Assembly therefore decided on the creation of an unlimited number of co-operative distribution agencies, each supported by a Government guarantee for half its capital and controlled by a Government representative appointed by the Conseil Supérieur des Messageries de Presse, a body representing the newspapers and the State. It remains to be seen whether these new agencies will be able to pay their way.

SWITZERLAND

A supplement to the Franco-Swiss Commercial Agreement (see Summary 355) was signed in March, the French Chamber of Commerce in Switzerland having successfully intervened in Paris to expedite the issue of import and export licences. Facilities are assured for Swiss exhibitors at the Lyons Fair and for French firms at the Geneva fair. Recommendations have also been made to the French railways regarding new time-tables for traffic to and from Switzerland.

An amended text of the Roumanian-Swiss Agreement of the 29th June, 1946, which proved impossible of execution, was also signed in Berne in March. This new Agreement replaces that of the 19th April, 1943, and is valid until the 30th June, 1947. The Swiss export list contains industrial and agricultural products; the imports from Roumania include pork, timber, petrol and eggs. Roumanian prices will be adjusted in Roumania and fixed in Swiss francs to avoid the need for a Swiss export premium.

Commercial negotiations with Poland are listed to take place in Warsaw towards the end of April, as import and export quotas are valid only until the 31st March under the present Agreement signed on the 4th March, 1946.

A Federal loan of 150 million francs for conversion purposes has been substantially over-subscribed.

War damage suffered by Swiss nationals, including property of Swiss residents abroad, has been estimated at 1,423 million francs.

Hungarian broadcasts on the 18th April contained allegations attributed to the Hungarian Minister of Justice concerning an "organised campaign of slander against Hungarian democracy in Switzerland," initiated by emigrés of the Horthy and Szálasi régimes. The Minister, who had just returned from Switzerland, was said also to have complained of "a spate of slanders about Hungarian conditions" circulated by Hungarian visitors to Switzerland. A broadcast for foreign transmission also complained of "much space" allocated by a Swiss journal "Die Weltwoche" to articles "slandering" Hungary. It was further alleged that these articles were financed by Horthy adherents now in exile.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

Monday, the 14th April, was the sixteenth anniversary of the establishment of the Second Republic in Spain. Among the exiles there were the usual statements by the President, Señor Martínez Barrio, and party leaders in Paris, re-affirming the Republic's aims, and Dolores Ibarruri, "La Pasionaria," delivered an eloquent speech to a big rally in New York. Rodolfo Llopis, Prime Minister of the "Government" averred that he had no fears about the result of an electoral consultation in Spain conducted with all the necessary guarantees of fairness, but "to try to impose a certain régime without previous consultation of the people is another matter"—a transparent reference to the possibility of a caretaker Government being installed under the ægis of Don Juan with the promise of a plebiscite on the form of régime being held after the restoration of the Monarchy.

Press and radio commentators in Spain dropped the usual invective about the Republican leaders and the chaos and anarchy of Red rule in favour of scurrilous attacks on Don Juan's advisers, represented as accomplices in the intrigues of freemasonry. The interview in The Observer—which ABC printed in extenso without comment—has evidently got under their skins! The claimant to the Throne is represented as having now taken the oath to Trygve Lie and the other "anti-Spaniards in the ranks of the United Nations." Headlines such as "The Red Flag has passed from the hands of Giral to those of Don Juan" and "Don Juan will hold elections with Monarchists and Communists thronging the streets" give the measure of their pique. (Don Juan promptly issued a denial that he was in any way an instrument of foreign Powers or would tolerate their intervention in Spanish affairs.) Monarchists in Spain have come out strongly for the Prince; the Duke of Alba has written him a letter, pledging the support of the Grandees of Spain; and Count Rodezno, leader of the Traditionalists, visited General Franco on the 16th at the head of a deputation from Navarre to deliver a protest against the Succession Bill and to declare that his "Communion" now gave its allegiance to Don Juan as the rightful heir to the Throne. Don Salvador de Madariaga, in a letter to The Observer this week, expresses his full agreement, at the same time calling upon the Western Powers to afford active backing to a constitutional monarchy for the overthrow of General Franco's totalitarian régime. (He doesn't say how this is to be done!) Finally, the Executive of the Socialist Party inside Spain has, it appears, advised party headquarters in France to support a Restoration without insisting on a plebiscite beforehand.

The Franco scribes of the press have been cudgelling their brains to find appropriate comment for the Bill of Succession. The most intelligible line is that the "Movement" could scarcely hope to flourish indefinitely on slogans of anti-Communism and therefore some such constructive link-up with the monarchical past was necessary. What intelligent and instructed Monarchists think of the Bill, however, has been clearly demonstrated in a critique by a Spanish professor of international law who in the early days was one of General Franco's legal advisers. He points out that Article 1 of the Bill is self-contradictory. It declares that Spain is constituted a Kingdom, but immediately afterwards Franco is proclaimed "Head" of this Kingdom, which means either that the Generalissimo has appointed himself King in the Napoleonic manner or we have to do with a kingless monarchy as was Hungary under Admiral Horthy. (It should be said that the reference to the Council of the Realm in our commentary in Summary No. 387 described it by a lapsus as "Regency Council"; a separate Council of Regency, composed of three persons only, the President of the Cortes, the Cardinal Primate and the top-ranking leader of the Armed Forces, is duly provided for in Article 6, "should the headship of the State be vacant.") In the event of Franco's death or incapacity, the Council of the Realm is required, by Articles 3 and 4, to designate a successor. This would be, then, according to this critic, an elective monarchy which is contrary to the centuries-old tradition of the Spanish Crown and therefore unconstitutional. Any change in the established law of succession, he says, can but threaten a return to the turbulent years of the nineteenth century—during which only two out of fifteen Heads of the State died peacefully in office. And the provision in Article 6 for a Regent is a misuse of the term, since a person so appointed under this Bill would be no more than the president of a republic without any limitation to his term of office. Finally, as was pointed out in last week's Summary, the five fundamental laws to which the chosen candidate for the Headship of the State "either as a King or Regent" is required to swear fidelity, have in fact not been observed or applied under the existing régime. Don Juan's name, incidentally, is not so much as mentioned in this egregious Bill of Succession; nor indeed is any reference made to Falange. It looks very much like a damp squib. It remains to be seen whether it will still be submitted to the Cortes—or to the country by referendum—for ratification.

Portugal

News of serious acts of sabotage by a group of port and dockyard workers in Lisbon who recently went on strike comes to light in the official announcement last week-end that a left-wing military rebellion was nipped in the bud on the 10th April. Considerable damage was done, including the putting out of action of all military aircraft at Cintra aerodrome and the destruction by fire of the military aircraft repair shops at Alverca. The aircraft were speedily repaired, however, and the Portuguese Minister of War, Lt.-Col. Santos Costa, demonstrated the fact with a typical Latin gesture by leading a formation of the repaired aircraft in a flight over Lisbon on the 19th April. The Portuguese police are inclined to put the trouble down to the presence in Portugal of trained agitators from abroad, since the strikes were too well organized to be the work of local dissidents. The incidents too, bear, the Communist stamp in the derailment of the Lisbon–Seville express at Crato and of another train at Velha de Rodao.

ITALY

The Anglo-Italian financial settlement negotiated in London last month (see Summary 387) was signed in Rome on the 17th April by Sir Noel Charles, the British Ambassador, and Count Sforza, the Italian Foreign Minister. The waiving by the United Kingdom of her right to Italian assets in this country in virtue of Article 79 of the Peace Treaty will come into force only on the ratification of the Treaty by Italy. By what may, or may not, have been a coincidence the ceremony of signature was held up by a demonstration of some three thousand unemployed who appeared outside the Italian Foreign Ministry just before Count Sforza arrived. The Foreign Minister was forced to leave his car and was pushed and jostled by the crowd before being rescued by the police.

The signature of the Settlement has received excellent publicity in the Italian Press which has expressed much satisfaction and indeed gratitude. The Globo, the leading economic daily, states that Italian requests have, on all points, been granted with the utmost comprehension. All concessions made to Italy are of the greatest value to Italian reconstruction. "The British Government," says the Globo, "has shown, during one of the hardest moments of Great Britain's life for possibly the past two centuries, that it had sufficient political wisdom to understand that, when faced with the choice between a harsh exaction of payments, reparations and credits . . . . and an act of generosity, it was good business to make an investment for years to come in the gratitude of the Italian people."

The Risorgimento Liberale describes the agreements as "the peace treaty between the Italian and the British peoples, or rather, to be more correct, the peace treaty which the British people offer to the Italian people to mark the end of a long period of rancour and incomprehension which has divided them." It is a long time since Great Britain has had such a good press, and is to be hoped that it will smooth the way for the ratification of the Peace Treaty by the Constituent Assembly.

For some considerable time the Italian Government have been expressing increasing anxiety regarding the number of displaced persons who may be left in Italy on the withdrawal of the Allied troops. In particular they are afraid that the continuing presence of Yugoslavs in the country may upset the attempt of the Government to establish more normal relations with Yugoslavia, and they also fear that Italy may be left to cope with the strong organisation which helps illegal Jewish emigration to Palestine.

H.M.G. recently decided that nine thousand Ukrainians—of surrendered enemy personnel status—should be brought to the United Kingdom as prisoners-of-war, and that the eleven to twelve thousand Yugoslavs who are a British responsibility should be moved to the British Zone of Germany (see Summary 387—under "Yugoslavia"). The movement of the Cetniks to Germany began on the 14th April. On arrival there officers and men will be separated. [As the result of screening the British and U.S. Governments have agreed to hand over certain individuals to the Yugoslav Government.]

As mentioned in last week's Summary, the illegal immigration of Jews into Palestine from Italy has been causing anxiety to His Majesty's Government. On the 20th March the Italian Government made representations to UNRRA on the subject of the assistance being given wittingly or unwittingly by UNRRA and voluntary societies in assisting Jewish emigrants to pass through Italy and continue to Palestine. The Italian Government have specifically mentioned by name the American Joint Distribution Committee. The A.J.D.C. has infiltrated itself into UNRRA and used its protection, while retaining its own liberty of action. The Committee has no international responsibility. Although the situation may not be realised by the Central Committee of UNRRA in Washington, there is, it seems, little doubt that no effort is made to interfere by certain high personalities in UNRRA who hold pro-Zionist sympathies. There is good reason to believe that of the huge revenue of the A.J.D.C., collected from Jews throughout the world, the greater part is expended on organising the illegal emigration of Jews from Italy.

If order is to be maintained in Italy after the withdrawal of the Allied troops it is imperative that the question of the Yugoslavs and the Jewish displaced persons be cleared up with the least possible delay, otherwise the Italian authorities who already have more than sufficient troubles in coping with dubious and unruly characters of Italian nationality, may be swamped by their responsibilities. Fortunately certain responsibilities will be taken over by the Inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees (and its successor the I.R.O.). The Italian Government has decided to grant asylum to genuine "International Political Dissidents," presumably in accordance with Article XI of the new draft Constitution.

H.M.G. propose to deliver a second note of protest to the Yugoslav Government on the seizure by the Yugoslav Prize Court of nine Italian ships sunk by the Allies and now lying in Italian territorial waters. The Yugoslav Government have also sold the wreck of the crack Italian liner the "Rex" to the Czechoslovak Skoda Works and it is reported by the Italian Foreign Ministry that dismantling of the vessel has already been begun. H.M.G. will remind the Yugoslav Government of the irregularity of their proceedings which are at variance both with the Italian Armistice terms and with the accepted principles of International Law, and warn them that any of the ships in question are liable to arrest in foreign ports on the initiative of any party claiming to be the lawful owner.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The first stage in the trial of those accused of participating in the conspiracy against the Republic ended on the 16th April when the Presiding Judge, M. Janko, passed sentence of death on General Veress de Dalnok, General András and M. Donáth. Of these three, only General András has availed himself of the right to plead for clemency. Such indications as are at present to hand suggest that, while acquiescing in the justice of the verdicts, moderate and informed Hungarian opinion would welcome a mitigation of the sentence at least in the case of General Veress de Dalnok. Although the nominal leader of the Committee of Seven, he is considered less culpable than many of his followers, if only by reason of his age and limited intellect. A harsher view is taken of M. Donáth who, together with M. Szentiványi, supplied the brains of the conspiracy and crystallised its purpose. M. Szentiványi and General Szentmiklossy have apologised to the nation for their part in the plot. Other sentences, which range from one year to life imprisonment, may be subsequently reduced if conditions in Hungary become stabilized.

M. Rákosi has made the conspiracy the occasion for further fulminations against M. Sulyok whose Party he sees as the new refuge of reaction. When, seconded by M. Szakasits, however, he proclaims it to be Fascist, even left-wing circles ask themselves why in that case he agreed to treat with M. Sulyok originally. Both MM. Rákosi and Szakasits naturally uphold the action of the printers in refusing to set up type for Holnap, pointing to a similar decision reached by British printers over the question of Sir Oswald Mosley's newspaper. It was not required of democracy to permit the forging of weapons designed for its own destruction, M. Rákosi argued. M. Supka, Editor-in-chief of the Bourgeois Democratic Vilag, on the other hand, maintained that such an issue ought to be determined by an impartial body established to arbitrate on controversial matters arising between printers and editors. M. Rubleczky, of the Smallholders' Administrative Committee, supported M. Supka on this point, but safeguarded himself by accepting the workers' right of action, while admitting its disadvantages.

The alleged threat to democracy is to be met by a further tightening of the bonds between the Workers' Parties. M. Rákosi also referred to their solidarity with the National Peasant Party. Though M. Szakasits endorsed these views he cannot in this respect be said to speak for the Social Democrats generally as the latter have never welcomed co-operation with the third partner in the left-wing bloc. The Social Democrats, indeed, tend to regard the National Peasants with strong, if undeclared, disfavour, seeing them either as crypto-Nazis or crypto-Communists, and their leader, M. Veres, as a crypto-Napoleon.

M. Szakasits has again threatened the Smallholders with the prospect of a General Election in the near future if they fail to fulfil their obligations under the last inter-party agreement. His fears, however, would appear to be superfluous since the Smallholders are less than ever in a position to offer effective resistance to left-wing demands.

One of the results of M. Szakasits' recent visit to Prague was the facilitation of arrangements for the forthcoming Social Democratic Conference of Danubian nations, which, it has been decided, is to be held during May. The Conference had previously to be postponed on account of Czechoslovak-Hungarian differences.

The repatriation of Hungarians from Slovakia is reported to be continuing in an orderly manner at the rate of 32 families a day. The land and houses allotted to them in Hungary are fixed in accordance with the amount of property which they have left behind.

Hungary has received permission from the Allied Control Commission to resume diplomatic relations with Finland.

Roumania

Dl Gheorghiu-Dej, the Minister of the Interior, is one of the very small number of Roumanians whose professed Communism is anything more than a means of filling their own pockets. Two steps have recently been taken by his Ministry which, representing as they do Russian practice, contain elements of grave danger for Roumania. The Gendarmerie is to be brought under the Ministry, an important step towards placing at the disposal of Dl Gheorghiu-Dej the forces responsible for internal order. At the same time the Ministry is taking in hand what it calls "Administrative Education." There are to be a number of secondary schools and one higher school which is to be known as the Academy of Administrative Science. (Roumanian police are a decent and well-disposed set of men, with little training and crude methods, whose main aim is to make things easy for everybody. Shortly before the war a small party of them were sent to England for a course under the Metropolitan Police. They went on point duty on their return and set to work to put in practice what they had learned. In twenty-four hours they were all in hospital with injuries received from the outraged public who resented being made to keep within the traffic regulations!) What is required now is to get rid of the "undesirable elements" in the force. At the same time a purge of the Communist party is taking place. Scânteia has announced in five issues within a few days the expulsion of twenty persons from the party for such offences as "disregard of party morale," "fractionism," whatever that may mean, and "treason towards the working classes." The persons concerned, of course, never were Communists, and have been found to be useless for party purposes. The next step would be to give the purged Gendarmerie a course at the new Science Academy. Dl Gheorghiu-Dej will then have at his disposal a set of toughs who will stick at nothing to promote "Communist ideals."

There was a time when British prestige stood high in Roumania. America has been gaining on us fast, and one of the first signs, which only affected the classes who are interested in and impressed by such matters, was the appreciation in value of the U.S. dollar as compared with the pound sterling. Englishmen employed in Roumania who have the closest contacts with peasants, funcţionari, and afacerişti (business men) have felt a growing apprehension at our fast diminishing prestige, owing to causes which affect the masses of the people. The American organisation for the relief of the famine-stricken areas of Moldavia—and in particular the refusal to allow the Roumanian Government to have the handling of food, which is being distributed through the Red Cross—has aroused great admiration amongst the people. The press has announced that the British contributions have been handed over to the Government, and, although this is not the case, the people have been prevented from hearing the truth. On top of this comes the news that the Româno-Americana Oil Company is sending parcels of food and clothing weighing 49 lbs. each to every one of its 5,000 employees. To compete with this requires enormous reserves. The Economat system to which reference has been made in previous Summaries makes a continual drain on the assets of industrial concerns. One British Oil Company last month had to spend nine milliards of lei on goods which they had to supply to workpeople at a fraction of that sum.

Besides famine and the high cost of living, even when modified by the Economati, the general conditions of life for the less well-to-do are not attractive. On the railways, except for a few long-distance tracks, it is best to go armed with some protection against "livestock" which carry typhus germs. There are likely to be no windows at all in the compartments —all the glass goes to Russia—or else the openings are filled with boards. The local trains are crowded, and passengers have to travel on the steps or roofs of the coaches or on the footplate of the engine. Road services are as bad. About 60 per cent. of the Bucarest trams have been removed, and there is only one bus service running. It used to be the fashion to put the blame for everything that went wrong on the "capitalists" and employers of labour, but recently there has been a movement against the trades unions. A week or two ago in Moreni the "workers' committee" which consists of trade union agents acting under the Confederation of Labour were attacked by the workpeople whom they are supposed to represent, and some of them are in hospital.

Yugoslavia

On the 17th April in Moscow M. Kardelj and M. Simić presented their country's claims against Austria, of which M. Kardelj had given the substance to the press on the 5th April. (See last week's Summary and also under "Austria.")

Since the Yugoslavs are demanding a special status for the Burgenland Croats in Austria and are expecting to have an Austrian minority of 60,000, information gleaned from censorship intercepts concerning the present position of the remaining Volksdeutsche in Yugoslavia is worth considering. Of those—by far the majority—who are in camps, only the hardiest manage to exist in conditions of over-crowding, over-work and malnutrition, where families are separated and disease is rife. Those with any money left pay to be taken over the frontier into Hungary or Austria, others are just dumped in No-Man's Land. Those outside the camps are considered good enough for military service, but find it almost impossible to get a job afterwards and are allowed no land of their own. They see their once carefully husbanded farms neglected and ruined by ignorant colonists from Montenegro. On the other hand, on acount of the shortage of technical personnel the Yugoslav Government have imported 100 Sudetan German technicians on highly favourable contracts and have rejected a protest from the Czech Minister.

Sentences of death and penal servitude have been passed on agents of I.M.R.O. in Skoplje (see Summary No. 387). Although Vanče Mihailov has disappeared since 1944 his organisation appears still to be alive. One report estimates that his supporters number 2,000 in the Bitolj area alone. They are said to have connections with the flourishing Macedonian colony in North America.

Spring in Yugoslavia usually brings a recrudescence of bandit activities and renewed hopes of the uprising that will lead to the millennium. The Križari who have lain low during the winter are reported to be planning new activities and expecting recruits. Their chief hunting-grounds are the Lika and Bosnia, where some četniks, too, still subsist. Mutual relations are bad and show how even common hatred of Tito is weaker than the old Serb-Croat animosity. In Slovenia, besides the underground movement fostered from abroad by the People's Party (Clericals), there is evidence of a highly secret organisation based on the "troika" system, consisting of groups of threes, mostly unknown to one another. Disturbances have been reported in the Bačka. In Zagreb two explosions occurred in textile factories during February. Not only did OZNA carry out close investigations on the spot, but the employees of all important Zagreb factories were warned of the serious penalties of such attempts to oppose "the will of the people."

Commercial agreements have been signed with Italy; with the Soviet military administration in Berlin for an exchange of goods with the Soviet Zone of Germany; and with Sweden, carrying also a guarantee of full compensation to Swedish firms affected by nationalisation.

A Soviet-Yugoslav Civil Aviation Company (JUSTA) has been formed to operate passenger and freight services in Yugoslavia and with other countries.

Marshal Tito has explained to a correspondent of the News Chronicle, that if some "lean swine" had been exported it was because shortage of fodder had compelled farmers to slaughter their livestock, and because the Ministry of Foreign Trade had acted irresponsibly. The offenders would be punished. He made the usual point that Yugoslavia had nothing against the peoples of Great Britain and America, but was dissatisfied only with "official quarters." Relations would improve, he said, with a general strengthening of the desire for peace.

Greece

In spite of heavy falls of snow, the Greek National Army have continued their advance into rebel territory in the Low Pindus, and have forced the rebels, who have suffered substantial casualties, to withdraw in certain areas, they are burning the villages as they retreat, forcing the inhabitants to take refuge in gorges and forests where they are suffering from hunger and exposure. The Greek military authorities have announced that casualties inflicted on the bandits throughout Greece in operations during the first fortnight of April amounted to 337 dead, 31 wounded and 132 prisoners. Furthermore, 71 men deserted from the bands and surrendered. Casualties of the Greek Army amount to two officers and 14 men killed and 42 wounded. The military authorities in Larissa, however, comment cautiously on the Athens report that operations in the Pindus–Agrafa area will be completed by the 15th May. They limit themselves to stating that the general offensive of the national forces has already been accelerated and that it may soon be possible to disclose satisfactory results.

Secret files of the Communist guerilla organisation in Central Macedonia which have fallen into the hands of the Greek authorities reveal that the effective strength of bands in that area is much lower than had been supposed. The bands operating in the Kroussia area, for example, are shown by these documents to number about 350/400 men, whereas Communist propaganda had claimed that they numbered three times as many.

Meanwhile there have been several reports of fresh incursions across the frontier. According to the Athens press, a band from Yugoslavia has penetrated into Greece near Alipoti. As the Greek Army cannot yet attack this band without running the risk of violating Yugoslav territory, they are waiting until it attempts to proceed southward.

The United Nations Frontier Commission, now in Geneva, have given provisional approval to the first or historical part of their report. A few points raised by the liaison representatives of Greece, Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia have been referred to the drafting committee.

Albania

There was a vituperative leading article about the Corfu Straits dispute in the semi-official paper Bashkimi on the 16th April which was broadcast from Tirana that evening in English. Not content with fatuously repeating that Great Britain has shown the world that she has no real case against Albania, that she thinks solely of her own "satanic" interests and that her one aim is to raise difficulties for Albania on every possible occasion, the writer goes on to attack the Security Council as a whole for its "unjust" decision to let the matter be referred to the International Court. What especially annoys him is the fact that the British complaint to the United Nations has been carefully considered, whereas "the just complaint of the Albanian Government" alleging British violation of her territorial waters has been ignored. The United States Government were assailed in the same paper's editorial columns on the previous day, when they were accused of deserting the ideals of Franklin Roosevelt, repudiating their promises, and "extending every support to fascist aggression" by means of "the dictatorship of the dollar."

Two members of the Albanian National Assembly are reported to have been murdered last month—one representing Elbasan and the other Berat. They seem to have been put to death at the bidding of the head of the Moslem sect to which they both belonged. The motive remains obscure, but was apparently connected with proposals for religious reforms which had the backing of the Government.

According to the Belgrade press a daily air service between Belgrade and Tirana was started on the 1st April.

Bulgaria

The diplomatic incident of the 7th March (see Summary No. 384) was at last settled to the satisfaction of all parties concerned by the publication in the Bulgarian press of two agreements reached last week. A communiqué issued on the 16th April recorded that a settlement had been separately reached between Bulgaria and France (whose Minister at Sofia was personally assaulted on that occasion); and by a joint statement published on the 18th satisfaction was accorded to the United States, Great Britain, Italy, Switzerland and Turkey, whose missions were all treated with gross discourtesy (to put it mildly). The six Governments say they wish "to put an end to exaggerated and tendentious rumours of serious misunderstandings on the subject of the currency exchange"; the plaintiffs add that they are "convinced that it was never the intention of the Bulgarian Government to attribute to them activities contrary to Bulgarian interests"; and all "mutually recognise the necessity for close prior contact between the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Heads of Missions when any exceptional relations between the local administrative authorities and diplomatic establishments are contemplated." The Bulgarian Government showed much reluctance in agreeing to give this last undertaking.

Some days earlier Nikola Petkov, the Opposition Agrarian leader, had sarcastically congratulated the Government upon a foreign policy which had deeply offended seven western Powers at the same time. This was, however, by no means the most exciting moment in the National Assembly during the past month. On the 29th March another Agrarian deputy complained that Bulgarian schoolchildren were being solemnly taught to call Georgi Dimitrov "a shining sun"—like Louis XIV! A female deputy, greatly daring, referred in a speech to some persons who had suffered at the hands of the Government as "victims of fascism"; and a male backbencher was thrown down from the rostrum for going one better and declaring that the Communist party, as a fascist organization, surely came under article 4 of the peace treaty. Within the four walls of the Sobranye there is certainly freedom of speech in Bulgaria. The Government line is still to depict the Opposition as conspiring to bring about a coup d'État with foreign assistance.

The U.S.S.R. will naturally not relax her grip on the Balkans more than she can possibly help; but in some respects future Russian intentions regarding Bulgaria are none too clear: an eye is certainly being kept on developments in Washington. General Marinov, the Bulgarian Minister in Paris (who is incidentally wanted by the Greek Government as a war criminal), confidentially told General Oxley, head of the British Military Mission, at Sofia on the 8th April that he thought the Russians did not intend to ratify the Bulgarian treaty at all and that in spite of Russian troop-movements in Bulgaria none had left the country: in fact there was no intention of withdrawing them, in his opinion. General Oxley could not quite make out whether General Marinov came to tell him this on his own initiative or not. He himself had reason to believe, two or three weeks ago, that (i) only a few Russian troops are left in the Sofia area, (ii) none are left in Northern Bulgaria, but (iii) there are large concentrations of them at Sliven, Yambol and Stara Zagora (no doubt in connexion with the war of nerves against Turkey). With the departure of the U.N. Frontier Commission Greece again looks like being menaced from Bulgaria, too: according to an unofficial source of information Nevrokop was "full of Russians" recently.

About a month ago Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia both concluded trade agreements with Bulgaria; the Bulgaro-French conversations in Paris interrupted in March have now been resumed; and on the 14th April a delegation headed by the Minister of Commerce left Sofia for Moscow to "negotiate" the really important trade agreement there. The details of the Bulgaro-Soviet trade agreements for 1945 and 1946 have never been divulged; but it may be remembered that one year ago M. Bozhilov's predecessor, a left-wing Social Democrat, appeared to be so prostrated by the terms to which he found himself required at Moscow to agree that he took to his bed and sent for a Communist ministerial colleague to sign in his stead. What is certain is that, whereas Bulgaria derived many benefits while she was under the economic domination of Germany, since then, so far from having received Soviet assistance on any appreciable scale, she has been bled white by the Russian military occupation, while owing to the Kremlin's habit of calculating Russian prices well above world levels it is extremely unlikely that any compensation has been received in other directions.

There are good grounds for thinking that along the Danube, from Rustchuk down, and also in the Dobruja, the spring crop is about 60 per cent. destroyed. Roumanian seed is not to be had, and the unfortunate drought has persisted.

Turkey

On Sunday the 6th April there were by-elections at Istanbul and three small provincial centres. The Democratic Party ran no candidates, and the authorities reported that the nominees of the Republican People's (Government) Party had been returned by polls representing at least 60 per cent. of the electorate. The attitude of the Democrats was that, as recent local elections had belied the Government's promise of electoral fair play, it was useless to put up candidates. They hinted, moreover, that if the Government failed to introduce into the electoral law certain modifications which they claim to be indispensable to ensure impartiality—particularly as regards the counting of votes—they would boycott the Grand National Assembly once more. The Republican People's Party retort that if the Democrats are going to abstain from Parliament every time they fail to get what they want, no beginning can be made with two-party government. President Inönü may perhaps feel impelled to mediate again between the two parties in order to remove the deadlock. For there is little doubt that the rulers of Turkey desire to see her strengthened by the adoption of genuine constitutional procedure—though there must be many hotheads in the Republican People's Party who are by no means reconciled to the idea of handing over power and its loaves and fishes.

Mr. Henry Wallace, speaking in London on the 11th April, referred incidentally to Turkey as a country where there were "no free trade unions, no true political representation, no real civil liberties," and deplored the fact that no conditions were being attached to a loan for maintaining "an oversized army against an unmentioned foe." This line of argument, which has led the Turkish press to talk of "Wallace the Muscovite, public enemy No. 1," has clearly been imbibed from the Soviet spoon. For, each of these charges is a well-worn point of Soviet propaganda, and the truth is that, in the matter of democratic institutions, Turkey's record is at any rate incomparably better than that of the Soviet Union, while it is only the Russians' deliberate war of nerves which compels the Turks to remain mobilised.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Three delayed-action bombs exploded near British-occupied buildings in Ismailia on the night of the 16th April. There were no casualties, and little damage was caused.

As part of the campaign against British institutions in Egypt, of which the attack on the Anglo-Egyptian Union was the first sign, the University graduates' club in Cairo, which was founded by British professors and receives a subsidy from the British Council, is now being undermined, and the Brethren of Freedom, an organisation started by Miss Freya Stark during the war, has been attacked in the Wafdist paper Saut al Umma.

Although no details are available of any serious incidents, further manifestations of anti-Christian feeling are reported to have taken place in Cairo and elsewhere. But Hasan al Banna, the leader of the Ikhwan al Muslimin (Muslim Brethren) has written to the Coptic Patriarch attributing the Zagazig incident (see last week's Summary) to persons fishing in troubled waters, and assuring him that the Ikhwan had nothing to do with it. He added that a circular letter has been sent to all branches of the Ikhwan reminding members of their sacred duty towards the Christian and Jewish faiths, which, with Islam, supplement each other. Although Hasan al Banna's organisation was set up primarily to consolidate and defend Islam and the Muslim way of life, efforts to reassure the Copts have been made during the last two or three years since its activities became more positively political. The existence of such a society, with its almost inevitable proneness to fanaticism, has naturally aroused alarm amongst the Copts, who will need some more substantial proofs of goodwill than a letter from Hasan al Banna. Official apologies for the Zagazig incident have not allayed their fears and resentment. The newspaper of the Ikhwan has roundly accused the British of organising the Zagazig riot, and the Rose el Yusuf makes the more general charge that we are provoking incidents so as to show that Egyptians cannot be trusted to run their own country. There is evidence that the Government, while not subscribing to this view of the origin of the trouble, are acutely conscious of the harm which may result to the cause of Egypt.

Several workmen charged with Communist activity have been acquitted. The Court accepted the view that there is a distinction between Communism as a socialist creed and Communism as a political activity directed against the existing system of the State, and that Communism is not illegal unless it is expressly directed to subvert the State. This important judgment shows less knowledge of the true nature of Communism than respect for the principles of absolute justice, and may prove to be a very unfortunate precedent.

Palestine

Dov Grüner (see Summary No. 378) and three other Jews were executed on the 16th April. Jewish commentators are of one mind in regarding the executions as calculated to aggravate the situation, and the Jewish Chronicle speaks of the Yishuv standing "bewildered between the Palestine Government and the terrorist groups.'' The Zionist Organisation of America provides a curious parallel with the Egyptian press in a statement which ascribes the carrying-out of the sentences to an intention to provoke outbreaks with the aim of prejudicing the case of Jewish Palestine in the eyes of the members of the United Nations. Two other Jews who were under sentences of death and were to be hanged on the 22nd April, committed suicide in their cells on the night of the 21st/22nd April.

Serious disturbances occurred at Caraolos camp in Cyprus on the 18th April after the refusal of a number of illegal immigrants to embark for Palestine unless the size of the draft was increased. Camp installations were set on fire and attempts were made to break out. The guard was forced to open fire, and one Jew was killed and six were wounded. The reduction in the draft from 750 to 375 was made to balance the number believed to have successfully entered Palestine from the Susannah (see Summary No. 385). His Excellency the High Commissioner is issuing a communiqué refuting the false reports which allege that the Government of Palestine has failed to honour its promises in the admission of illegal immigrants from Cyprus, and showing, by figures, that the departures from Cyprus are, in fact, a month ahead of schedule. Meanwhile a hunger strike was started in the Caraolos camp which has spread to the camp at Zylotymbou.

The Guardian, alias the Theodore Herzl, was intercepted off Tel Aviv in the early hours of the 14th April. When she was boarded a fight ensued which resulted in six casualties to Naval officers and ratings, and thirty-five to Jews, of which two were fatal. The ship was towed to Haifa and the majority of the 2,641 passengers were transferred to Cyprus.

A bomb attack was made on an Army Field Dressing Station on the 18th April. A sentry was shot dead before the bombs were thrown. There were no other casualties. Numerous other attacks on military vehicles and personnel have been made in Jerusalem and elsewhere, causing casualties. The most serious attack made was on the Cairo–Haifa train, which was wrecked near Rehovoth on the 22nd April; three civilians and five British soldiers were killed, and there were over forty injured.

The Arab League

A meeting of the Political Committee of the Arab League opened in Damascus on the 16th April. A communiqué issued says :—

"Political committee of the Arab League, composed of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Arab Governments and of the Secretary-General of the Arab League, met under the chairmanship of Jamil Mardam Bey at 6·30 p.m. on 16th April in Damascus. After discussing their attitude in the Palestine question when taken up before the United Nations, whether at the present extraordinary session or at next ordinary session, it was decided that the independence of Palestine, the abolition of the Mandate, and the immediate prohibition of immigration are the first objectives of the Arab States. The Committee also discussed ways and means, and various decisions were taken to guide the delegation representing the Arab League countries at the United Nations, and to co-ordinate their plans."

Transjordan

The Treaty between Iraq and Transjordan (see last week's Summary) contains provision for mutual consultation and united effort in the event of a dispute between one of the signatories and a third party; if the dispute results in an act of aggression (of which a definition is given) consultations are to be held to concert means of repelling the aggressor. Military missions are to be exchanged in order to secure unification of training methods. Nationals of one country are to be prevented from taking part in internal disturbances in the other or helping insurgents. The Treaty is for ten years, with automatic renewal for five-year periods unless notification to the contrary is given by either party.

Iraq

The new Iraqi Parliament, which assembled on the 17th March (see Summary No. 386), is composed of 68 Sunnis, 57 Shi'as, 6 Christians, 6 Jews and, for the first time, 1 Yezidi. Of these 138 members, 60 are new to the deputyship. The last Parliament was composed of only 115 deputies. There are now no representatives of any political parties in the new Parliament, apart from Saleh Jabr's unofficial Kotla bloc. The Hizb al Watani al Demokrati (National Democrat Party) originally gained four seats, but subsequently decided to withdraw its members as a protest against the non-election of Muhammad Hadid, who was considered certain of gaining a seat and hoped to be in the new Cabinet. Only the secretary of the party, Husain al Jamil, has withdrawn, however, the other three members preferring to break with the party rather than lose their seats.

On the 16th April the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Fadhil al Jamali, made a statement about Treaty revision, in which he pointed out that the present Anglo-Iraqi Treaty, which came into force in 1932, does not expire until 1957, and that there is no provision for adjustment until 1952. Accordingly, he intends to approach His Majesty's Government with a view to effecting an adjustment before that date, but will be guided by the United Nations Charter. "I am very sure," he said, "that we are able to approach Great Britain on a footing of equality." This appears to be the first occasion on which an Iraqi statesman has publicly admitted that Iraq is not entitled to demand Treaty revision until 1952. He also stated in his speech that the Arab League Council had accepted the Iraqi Parliament's resolutions concerning Palestine in their entirety (see Summary No. 387).

The withdrawal of British land forces from Iraq, which has been in progress for some time, is expected to be completed this autumn. The forces being withdrawn include the Indian brigade-group which was despatched to Basrah after the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company's strike last August, but R.A.F. detachments, covered by Article 5 of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty, will remain at Habbaniyah and Shaibah.

Persia

The delegation of the World Federation of Trade Unions returned to Tehran on the 7th April after visiting factories in Mazanderan, and the Soviet fisheries at Pahlevi. It appears that El Aris has been taking his orders from Borisov, and, in spite of protests by the British member, Harries, the delegation interviewed only Tudeh supporters. A visit to Tabriz was cancelled owing to the non-acceptance of Harries' proposal that equal hearing should be given to complaints from non-Tudeh members with those from the Tudeh. The visit to the Soviet fisheries was stage-managed in such a way that the delegates had no proper opportunity to examine conditions.

Reza Rusta, the Secretary of the Central Committee of the Persian Federation of Trade Unions, was arrested on the 13th April. The Government were averse to taking action against him on political grounds while the delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions was in the country, but they were obliged to act in view of the complaints of unpaid debts and financial irregularities levelled at him (see Summary No. 383). According to Nafisy, Under-Secretary at the Ministry of Labour, Rusta will be charged with espionage on the strength of the document found at his house immediately after his arrest.

An unconfirmed report states that the Barzanis (see last week's Summary), together with their leader, Mulla Mustafa, have surrendered to the Persian Government.

THE FAR EAST

China

On the 18th April, following the signing on the previous day of a Programme of National Construction by representatives of the Kuomintang, the Young China Party, the Social Democratic Party and two non-party members, General Chiang Kai-shek announced the birth of the "first Coalition Government in Chinese history" and the formation of the long-promised State Council with the following membership :

	Seats
Presidents of the five Yuan ...	5
Kuomintang Party	12
Young China Party	4
Social Democratic Party ...	4
Non-Party members	4
Total	40

Originally the Kuomintang had insisted on reserving to itself half the total number of seats in the Council, and this was one of the earlier main differences with the Communist Party. But, in the end, General Chiang succeeded in persuading his Party to agree—however unwillingly—to reduce their claim to 12 seats, these to be exclusive of any Yuan Presidents who might happen to be Kuomintang members. At the moment all five Yuan Presidents are members of the Kuomintang, so that the total number of seats held by that Party in the newly-created State Council is 17 out of the total of 29 filled.

The final choice of the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee for the first Vice-President of the Government fell, not as was at first thought on the Shansi war lord, Yen Hsi-shan (see Summary No. 387), but on Dr. Sun Fo; while the expected appointment of General Chang Chun, Governor of Szechuen, as President of the Executive Yuan—a post equivalent to that of Premier—was confirmed by General Chiang Kai-shek at the end of his inaugural speech. The Presidents of the other four Yuan remain unchanged. They are:

Legislative Yuan: Dr. Sun Fo.
Judicial Yuan: Mr. Chu Cheng.
Control Yuan: Mr. Yu Yu-jen.
Examination Yuan: Mr. Tai Chuan-hsien.

That unpopular war-time innovation, the Supreme National Defence Council, is to be abolished, and its functions are to be taken over by the State Council. The official announcement also states that the Supreme National Defence Council is to be replaced by the Central Political Council, which is to be an entirely Kuomintang organ; but it is not clear exactly what this means, or how even in China a defunct Council can be replaced by one organ and its functions assumed by another!

The new political programme—designed to prepare the way for the implementation on the 25th December of the Constitution recently adopted by the National Assembly—is a somewhat lengthy document of twelve resolutions, the main points of which are that the Executive Yuan shall abide by, and carry out, the decisions of the State Council; that during the examination of any new Bill by the Legislative Yuan competent representatives of the Executive Yuan shall attend in order to provide such explanations and elucidations as may be required; that the Government shall pursue a foreign policy of equality and good neighbourliness toward all friendly nations without discrimination; and that national unity be established through political negotiation, provided the Communists show a genuine desire for peace and that communications are completely restored to the control of the Government. This last resolution explains the reason for the immediate filling of only 29 out of the total of 40 seats in the State Council. And it will be noted that in the concluding sentence of his public announcement of the broadening of the Government General Chiang Kai-shek appeals to the Communist Party to reverse their attitude of "open rebellion" and to grasp the present opportunity of joining the Government and participating in the work of national construction. He warns them, however, that he has no intention of delaying indefinitely on their account the country's advance toward democracy.

Chinese press reaction to the new political programme is reported to be generally lacking in enthusiasm, while the Ta Kung Pao bluntly contends that the National Government is still a one-party organ because the President of the Government is entirely responsible to the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee; and the paper warns the minority parties to watch events carefully and to withdraw their support on the first signs of a straying from the path of the declared principles of the reorganisation. In this connexion it is interesting to note that recent reports from Nanking declare that at a joint meeting the Kuomintang Central Executive Committee and the Supreme National Defence Council freed the reorganised Government from all Kuomintang control by ruling that the President was not responsible to the Kuomintang's C.E.C.

Rumours which were current, but officially denied, a week or two ago of General Chiang Kai-shek's intention to go abroad on a visit to the United States and possibly also to this country, have been revived and are accompanied by whisperings of an anxiety on the part of the Generalissimo to place himself out of reach during the early stages of the new constitutional experiment.

In the field there has been little change. Government forces appear to have been able to make little headway in the area round Yenan; while in Shantung, where they claim to have cleared the central part of the important Tientsin–Pukow Railway following the capture of Taian in the first days of April, reports indicate that their advance has been checked. In this area, however, it is thought probable that the Government are about to launch a more determined effort to free the whole of the Tientsin–Pukow Railway line as well as that between Tsingtao and Tsinan. Once again "for military reasons" the port of Tsingtao has been declared closed temporarily to all foreign shipping. The activities of the Kuomintang Military Command in this area have caused the Government considerable embarrassment. At the end of March, a vessel operated by C.N.R.R.A. for the distribution of U.N.R.R.A. supplies to Communist territory was bombed when off the south coast of Shantung and in addition to a number of the Chinese crew, both the British Master and Canadian Chief Officer were wounded, the former seriously. As a result, all sailings of relief ships to Communist-held ports had to be cancelled, making the distribution of U.N.R.R.A. rehabilitation supplies to Communist territory impossible.

The Soviet claim, through an official Tass hand-out carried by all the Moscow papers on the 1st April, that between the end of 1945 and March 1947 the U.S.S.R. Government repeatedly invited the Chinese Government to take over the administration of Dairen and Port Arthur—and that the Kuomintang's failure to do so might be attributed to "some sort of paralysis of authority in China"—has prompted the Nanking Government to make it known through its spokesmen that on the 31st March, Mr. Wang Shih-chieh, Minister for Foreign Affairs, notified the Soviet Ambassador to Nanking of China's decision to take over the administration of Dairen and Port Arthur and of the measures which the Chinese Government proposed to take to that end. The spokesman further added that

> "as regards the delay in taking over the areas it may be recalled that it was the intention of the Government to assume control of the port of Dairen as the first step in the recovery of Manchuria. A Mayor of Dairen was appointed as early as October, 1945. I think I need not dwell on the reason for the delay in this matter."

On the 2nd April, Notes were exchanged between the Chinese and Portuguese Governments announcing the abandonment by Portugal of extra-territorial rights in China.

A Sino-Philippine Treaty of Friendship was signed in Manila on the 18th April by President Roxas and Dr. Chih Ping, Chinese Minister to the Philippine Republic. Provision is made for the settlement of all disputes by peaceful means and for the mutual exchange of diplomatic and consular representatives.

French Indo-China

Correspondents paint a gloomy picture of possible floods, pestilence and famine in Tonking when the rains come in June. The French forces have consolidated their hold on the principal towns except Vinh, which was surrendered, but in their withdrawal the Viet-Nam forces have carried out a ruthless scorched-earth policy and have evacuated further large sections of the populace. Even in peaceful times the task of controlling the numerous streams that form the Red River Delta is formidable. Now it may prove impossible.

M. Bollaert, the new High Commissioner, has returned from a visit to Cambodia and has made his first public statement of importance. At a press conference on the 17th April, he announced that it had been agreed with the King of Cambodia to draw up immediately a Franco-Cambodian treaty within the framework of the French Union. In this connexion it is of passing interest that no reference to a Federation of Indio-China was made.

It is thought that the publicity recently given to the rumours concerning the intention to reinstate ex-Emperor Bao Dai in Viet Nam has considerably detracted from his chances, and that tentative negotiations are now proceeding at Saigon with a representative of Ho Chi Minh. Much will probably depend on the ability to curb the extremists. At the moment, although Viet Nam forces appear to have lapsed into guerilla tactics, there is no immediate sign of a weakening of the strangle-hold they maintain throughout the countryside. In Cochin-China terrorists continue to harass the peaceful inhabitants with disastrous effects on the economy of the country.

The Ministers of War and Marine, who left France for Dakar on the 14th April, are proceeding to Indo-China. According to the press the object of this visit is to convey praise and encouragement to the French troops, on whom the recent quarrels in the National Assembly are thought to have had a depressing effect. The French Authorities have restored their Customs Administration in Haiphong, the spark that led to the present conflagration.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The attention of those in the United States who seek to follow the evolution of the new foreign policy has tended to alternate this week between the Foreign Ministers' Conference in Moscow and the deliberations of Congress on President Truman's programme of aid to Greece and Turkey in Washington. It is now expected that Mr. Marshall will return home empty-handed from the Moscow meeting, although it is thought that the recent negotiations have at least given him the chance to feel his feet as one of the "Big Four" and to take full stock of the present international situation. Much curiosity has been displayed regarding Mr. Marshall's private conversations with Generalissimo Stalin of the 15th April, although, in view of the disappointing results which have followed the anodyne gestures and pronouncements of the Soviet Premier in the past, there has not been much hope of this meeting breaking the deadlock at the conference table. M. Molotov's determination to smother the proposed Four-Power Pact in a blanket of patently unacceptable amendments is seen as another Soviet attempt to induce the United States to " pull out " of Europe, and as such it has been answered by assurances from a wide variety of commentators that the United States has no intention of taking any such short-sighted step. One or two newspapers, like the Washington Post, make a point of suggesting that, " if, as it seems evident, we cannot have a Four-Power Pact governing Germany, a Three-Power Pact would be the next best thing." This represents a notable departure from the belief that there must be no appearance of creating a Western bloc against the Soviet Union which commentators maintained so insistently at the time of the first Foreign Ministers' Conference in September 1945 (see Summary No. 311).

Congress continues to make progress with the legislation embodying the President's plan to provide assistance to Greece and Turkey. On the 22nd April the Senate approved the bill to make 300 million dollars available for the former country and 100 million dollars for the latter. 35 Republicans and 32 Democrats voted for this measure, and only 16 Republicans and 7 Democrats against it. On the 16th April the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee approved without dissent (although ten members were absent and another three abstained from voting) the bill which is being sponsored by its Chairman, Representative Charles A. Eaton. Originally identical with its Senate counterpart, the Eaton bill at present includes the Vandenberg amendment (see last week's Summary), but not the Vandenberg–Connally preamble which seeks to project the President's policy into a wider United Nations setting. It also contains a clause providing for the examination by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the persons appointed to administer the assistance programme. Another amendment, introduced into the Senate bill during the Committee hearings. forbids the Greeks or the Turks to use any of the money appropriated to repay loans which they have received from other foreign Governments. Under the influence of this amendment and of the strength of Congressional feeling behind it both Mr. Marshall in Moscow and Mr. Dean Acheson in Washington have been inclined to resist the suggestion of His Majesty's Government that the cost of maintaining the British military mission in Greece (which the State Department is anxious to have remain in that country) shall be paid by the Greek Government in dollars received from the United States. In the course of the recent Committee hearings Mr. Acheson is said to have assured members of Congress that the State Department had no intention of using any part of the funds now being voted to subsidize the British mission or any other British military force.

It is generally agreed that, instead of impeding the proposed action with regard to Greece and Turkey, the attempts of Mr. Henry Wallace to mobilize left-wing opinion in this and other European countries against it have had the effect of consolidating Congressional feeling in favour of the President's programme. Thus Senator Allen J. Ellender of Louisiana, a right-wing Democrat, has been moved by the activities of what the Louisville Courier-Journal calls " this muddled innocent abroad " to modify his earlier opposition to the Truman policy, while Senator Edwin C. Johnson, another Isolationist in the Democratic camp, has complained that, by his " shocking crusade," Mr. Wallace has " pulled the rug from under the Congressional opposition." Commentators like Mr. Harold Ickes, who share some of Mr. Wallace's views on domestic issues, accuse him of " running hog-wild " and of showing bad taste, even as a private citizen, in attacking his country's policy from foreign platforms. In its extreme form feeling has been reflected in the suggestion of Representative J. Parnell Thomas, the Chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, that the Department of Justice should prosecute Mr. Wallace under a sedition law which was rushed through Congress under the threat of war with France in 1798. In the eyes of less severe critics the danger of what Mr. Wallace has said and done has lain—to quote the New York Herald-Tribune—in the mistaken belief of some Europeans that he is " a great political leader, when in fact he is simply the editor of a magazine of limited circulation who cannot affect the votes of a single American State to any perceptible degree."

In view of the continuing American interest in the economic situation in this country the British Budget has attracted considerable attention. Reactions have on the whole been favourable. Even the Wall Street Journal is willing to concede that the budget represents a " notable achievement " and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer " points his policy in the right direction." The effort to reduce tobacco consumption is said to have caused some initial consternation among Congressmen from Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and the Carolinas. Nevertheless the large increase in the tobacco tax, which, in the opinion of the New York Times, throws into relief " the nature of Britain's real Budget problem, which is external rather than internal," is for the most part accepted as necessary to stem the drain upon Great Britain's dollar resources.

On the American economic front the prospects brightened on the 20th April when it was announced that a new wage agreement had been reached between the C.I.O. Steel Workers' Union and the U.S. Steel Corporation at Pittsburgh. This not only promises to avert the steel strike which had been threatened for the 1st May, but it also provides the pattern for a settlement in the other heavy industries. The willingness of the employers to negotiate is believed to have been influenced by the heavy costs of the steel strike last year, while the inclination of Mr. Philip Murray to come to terms as quickly as possible on behalf of the workers is stated to have been due in part to the action of the House of Representatives on the 17th April in passing its bill to control labour by the unusually large majority of 308 to 107. This bill, which is sponsored by Representative Fred A. Hartley (Republican, New Jersey), the Chairman of the Committee on Education and Labour, is expected to be shorn of its more stringent provisions—particularly its ban on industry-wide bargaining and on the creation of welfare funds—when it comes up for debate in the Senate. In the meantime the country at large has begun to show anxiety at the setbacks which the Secretary of Labour, Mr. Lewis B. Schwellenbach, has suffered in his efforts to arbitrate between the union leaders and the employers in the telephone strike. On the 16th April Mr. Schwellenbach took the seemingly desperate step of appealing over the radio to the public to bring pressure to bear upon both parties to accept a settlement.

LATIN AMERICA

Brazil

The proposed formation of a Communist Youth Movement has led to vigorous denunciations by the Ministers of Education and Justice and the three service Ministers. The statutes of the " Union of Communist Youth " were, in compliance with Brazilian law, published in the Official Gazette. Though their terms were mild enough, the whole Brazilian press, with the exception of the Communist organs, broke into expressions of intense indignation. It is to be presumed that the Brazilian Communists hoped to resume the offensive with their new movement and thus avoid the prohibition of the party, which is still in the balance. The result, on the contrary, has been to emphasize their isolation. According to a broadcast message, the Youth Movement was officially suspended by decree throughout Brazil, for a period of six months.

Chile

The uneasy partnership of Radicals, Liberals and Communists in the Cabinet has now broken down, and President Gonzalez Videla has formed a new administration, in which he relies entirely on the Radicals (his own party) for support. The President's inclusion of the Communists, in return for their backing in the presidential election, had grown increasingly objectionable to both Liberals and Radicals, many of whom considered that they were losing votes, as a result of their association with the Communists. The Cabinet crisis was accompanied, according to broadcast reports, by a curious statement from the Chilean Government, in which the Socialist leader, Sr. Oscar Schnake, was accused of " anti-Chilean activities," in having urged the Argentine Government to press President Gonzalez Videla to eliminate the Communists as a condition of the Argentine-Chilean trade agreement. Sr. Schnake published denials, and the Chilean Government replied with a statement that the information came from the Argentine Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The withdrawal of the Liberals from the Government was followed by that of the Communists, though the Communist Party had held demonstrations in favour of their Ministers remaining in the Government. On the 16th April the names of the new Cabinet were announced, and the President made a rather unimpressive appeal for sympathy and support. The Ministers of Interior, Finance, Foreign Relations and Education are un-

Paraguay

The civil war is now almost two months old. On several occasions General Morínigo and his Government have announced complete victory. He has not announced that the air force flew over to the rebels in the middle of March, and little prominence has been given to the fact that the navy has declared itself neutral : both Paraguay's gunboats are under repair in Buenos Aires, but naval forces have established a neutral zone in Asunción. On March 18th General Morínigo proclaimed a "state of war," but as this was followed by the closure of the Argentine frontier and suspension of Argentine steamer services, the order was withdrawn after four days.

In Uruguay there is strong propaganda against the Morínigo dictatorship, which has led the Asunción propagandists to urge the Uruguayan people to overthrow their Government, a gesture so ridiculous as to suggest despair. However, press reports now say that Argentina has agreed to supply wheat to Asunción, where bread had become extremely scarce, and also to clear the Argentine frontier of Paraguayan exiles, mainly opponents of the Morínigo régime.

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

U.S. aid to Greece and Turkey

On the 28th March the United States representative informed the Security Council of his Government's proposals for economic and financial assistance to Greece and Turkey. He also suggested that the Balkan Commission should leave a "rear-guard" in Greece to observe and report whilst the Commission was writing its report in Geneva. In the debate on this twofold subject which opened on the 7th April and continued on the 10th, 14th and 18th, Russia and her friends took the line that Greece was in a state of civil war and that in consequence help by one State to the Greek Government became intervention. Greece needed help, they admitted, but the help must be strictly economic, and administered by a United Nations' Commission. Military aid, in any form, must be banned. Help from one source only, they argued, ignored the principle of co-operation and undermined the authority of the United Nations. It was a curiously disingenuous argument, considering the nature of the assistance, that Russia had supplied to Yugoslavia and Poland, without giving any information on the subject to the United Nations. It was a somewhat unreal debate, with the "Slavs" professing not to know what external dangers threatened Greece, and the U.S. refraining from saying what those dangers were. Finally a Russian resolution to set up a Commission to supervise U.S. aid to Greece was defeated by 4 votes to 2 with 5 abstentions. The U.S. proposal for a rear-guard was carried by 9 votes, with Russia and Poland abstaining, and the rearguard, composed of a representative of each of the members of the Commission, will be in Greece "pending a new decision of the Security Council." An interesting feature of the whole discussion was the way in which the Slavs, and especially Yugoslavia's representative, came to recognise the right of one sovereign State to give help to another. The Yugoslav representative objected to the U.S. attempt to link this legitimate act of sovereignty with the United Nations.

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

The Foreign Ministers discussed the Report of the Coal Experts on Tuesday and Wednesday the 15th and 16th April Nothing was agreed. Mr. Molotov urged an increase in German coal production, and in the percentage devoted to exports, suggesting that half of these exports should be devoted to reparations. He proposed that the Four Powers should jointly control all Germany's coal output, with a special Four-Power body in charge of the Ruhr fields. Mr. Bevin replied that coal was only one item in Germany's economy, and that until Germany was treated as economically one, and the British and American Zone had become self-supporting, to devote Ruhr coal to reparations would mean that reparations were being paid by the British themselves. Mr. Marshall supported him.

Discussion on the Austrian Treaty began on the 16th April, in an atmosphere of friendliness and several of the less important clauses were agreed upon. There was, however, up to the 22nd April, no sign of compromise on German assets in Austria or on Yugoslav territorial and financial claims; and without agreement on these basic questions there can be no treaty. (See under "Austria" for a detailed account of the proceedings.)

On Monday and Tuesday the 21st and 22nd, the Ministers took the Report on the Finances of Trieste. Mr. Molotov, at first suspicious of Mr. Bevin's suggestion that the Free territory should apply to the United Nations for any financial help that it needed in the immediate future, eventually came round, and the four Ministers were thus able to register agreement as follows : The Security Council should be asked to put a sum not exceeding five million dollars at the disposal of the Free Territory, if it receives a request from the Governor and the Provisional Council for help to meet financial emergencies during the months of July, August and September. It was also agreed that goods of Italian and Yugoslav origin should enter the Free Territory duty-free until three months after the Governor has been appointed, by which time the Territory's own customs régime should have been set up. The agreement depends on Free Territory goods obtaining similar treatment by Italy and Yugoslavia.

THE EUROPEAN COAL POSITION

(This survey of the coal supply situation in present-day Europe has been prepared for this Weekly P.I. Summary by a member of the Economic Intelligence Department.)

The main factors responsible for the present solid fuel deficiency in Western Europe including Scandinavian countries are the low-level of output of Germany's western coalfields—particularly the Ruhr—and the lack of supplementary supplies normally available from outside sources.

Some idea of the overall deficiency may be gauged from the fact that the Ruhr coalfields which before the war contributed as much as 125 million tons of hard coal a year to Europe's fuel supplies are still operating at little more than half the pre-war level. Furthermore U.K. exports to Western Europe, which amounted to over 25 million tons before the war, did not exceed 3½ million tons in 1946, while, despite the acquisition by Poland of additional coal resources in the shape of the ex-German Silesian coalfields, the Polish coal contribution to the needs of Western Europe is still considerably below the pre-war level, namely, under 4½ million tons in 1946, as compared with more than double this figure in 1938. A redeeming feature of the situation, however, is the development of an export trade to Europe by the U.S.A. from which Europe benefited in 1946 to the extent of some 16 million tons. There is the prospect of a considerable increase over this figure during 1947 since U.S. exports are now running at the annual rate of over 25 million tons. American supplies, however, apart from uncertainties of the labour outlook in the American coal mining industry, cannot be regarded as other than a temporary expedient to meet a state of emergency, since they are not likely to be forthcoming on a scale sufficient entirely to fill the gap, while the adverse factors of transport and currency involved in their purchase (apart from inferior quality) will naturally influence European importing countries in favour of more convenient and cheaper and better quality sources of supply as and when these become available.

On a rough estimate it seems likely that out of a normal requirement of between 400 and 500 tons the current annual solid fuel deficiency of Western Europe is as high as 140 million tons. Even when scaled down in conformity with the reduced fuel consumption of those countries whose industries are operating at well below the pre-war level this still leaves a very large gap, the continued existence of which cannot but operate as a serious handicap to the general economic recovery of Europe.

So far as Eastern European countries are concerned, the dominant factor is the Polish production which can easily satisfy their more modest fuel requirements and is in most cases already contributing helpful supplies. Poland is also supplying Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland and France with varying and irregular deliveries of coal.

For an appreciation of the fuel problem of Europe as a whole, it would seem desirable to review briefly the position individually in respect of the more important suppliers and consumers involved. These are roughly sub-divided here for convenience into two groups—exporting countries—Germany and Poland and importing countries, where indigenous production is non-existent or insufficient to meet domestic fuel requirements.

Exporting Countries

Germany is of course the principal Continental exporting country involved. In 1946, hard coal production amounted to 65·5 million tons as compared with 186 million in 1938; of this latter figure, the area now lost to Poland accounted for some 31 million tons. 1946 production in Rump Germany was, therefore, only 42 per cent. of that of 1938. By the last week in February 1947 hard coal production in the Western Zones had reached a level of 54 per cent. of 1938, with a labour force of probably not more than 75 per cent. of the pre-war strength.

The main reasons for the decline in output are, according to the report of the Committee of Coal Experts, (1) shortage of suitable manpower particularly in the British and French zones, (2) lack of incentives to work—insufficient food, lack of consumer goods, poor housing and (3) the high rate of absenteeism. The amount of merchantable coal is further reduced by the abnormally high rate of colliery consumption due to the poor state of equipment at the pits. This factor is aggravated by the fact that coal allocations to the steel industry are insufficient to maintain the level of production necessary to provide replacements of equipment for the coal industry as well as the other vital branches of engineering.

Under these circumstances the amount of coal available for export is small. In 1938, exports of hard coal for all Germany amounted to 32·3 million tons, 17 per cent. of production*; in 1946 exports from the British zone amounted to 12 million tons, or 22 per cent. of production. In the autumn of 1946, it was found necessary to curtail even the limited export allocations owing to the pressing needs of German industry and the exhaustion of stocks. From October 1946 exports from the British zone were drastically cut, and it is only now that the process of restoring these cuts can begin. In April 1947 exports to European countries are being increased by 50,000 tons, and in May they will go up by 200,000 tons over the February–March (4 week) level of 625,000 tons. In June the increase will amount to a further 200,000 tons and, provided that during May daily production in the Ruhr reaches an average of 250,000 tons, the June increase will be raised to 300,000 tons over the previous month's level, viz., April 675,000, May 825,000, June 1,031,000 or 1,156,000 tons. In order to maximise production and to work out an equitable division of available supplies between home consumption and exports it is proposed to hold an enquiry into the coal production in the combined British and American zones. In the meantime the British, French and U.S. Governments have jointly announced an arrangement for fixing the proportion of exports from their zones of occupation to the coal importing countries of Europe for the six months period from July 1st next. Exports will be fixed in terms of percentages of net merchantable coal beginning at 21% when the daily output of clean hard coal in the Western zones reaches 280,000 tons a day and rising to 25% when it reaches 370,000 tons a day. It has also been agreed that when the economic incorporation of the Saar with France has been decided, a joint notification will be made by the Powers to the European Coal Organisation pointing out that in future France will be presenting to E.C.O. both the resources and the needs of France and the Saar as a whole, and asking that body to take account of this new situation.

Poland is the only other sizeable coal-exporting country in Europe. Polish coal production which at the beginning of 1947 was at the annual rate of some 55 million tons (or about 80% of the combined pre-war output of the old Polish and the newly-acquired Silesian coalfields)—continues to increase, but exports to Western Europe are well below normal. In 1946 Poland's exports (apart from deliveries to the U.S.S.R. on account of her reparations liability in respect of the newly occupied Western territories) totalled some 4 million tons or only about half the pre-war exports of which about 2 million alone went to Sweden. The original 1947 programme of the Polish coal industry envisaged a figure of 20 million tons as the total export to all countries including 9 million to the U.S.S.R. as "reparations" (see above). Under the recently announced Russo-Polish Agreement, 1947, "reparations" deliveries to the U.S.S.R. have been reduced from a nominal 13,000,000 to 7,000,000, for the whole year (6,500,000 in 1948). However, this will probably not result in any increased availability for Europe, as the Polish Government have officially estimated that their total export figure will be no more than 17,500,000 tons.

Poland is already making a helpful contribution to the needs of Eastern European countries which are by comparison small. The only other significant hard coal producer in Eastern Europe—apart from the U.S.S.R.—is Czechoslovakia, where hard coal output is now in sight of and brown coal output above the pre-war level and which is roughly normally self-supporting in solid fuel. The Soviet coal output itself is not a factor affecting the European coal supply position, but the reduction in the Russian demands on Poland already referred to should naturally be reflected to some extent on the quantity of Polish coal available for Western Europe.

* In 1937 before exports declined they accounted for 22% of total production.

Importing Countries

France heads the list of fuel importing countries in order of importance, though as will be seen, her relative dependence on imported supplies is much less than in the case of many of the others where domestic production is small or negligible.

The French domestic output continues at just above the pre-war level with a total labour force of some 40 per cent. higher of which a sixth (55,000) are prisoners-of-war. In 1946 production amounted to 49 million tons as compared with 47·5 in 1938 and during the past winter has been running at an annual rate of over 50 million tons. It is, of course, in respect of her outside sources of supply that France's position has weakened since before the war, when some 20 million tons of solid fuel were imported as compared with 11 million tons in 1946. The upshot is nevertheless, that during the last quarter of 1946 the monthly availability of solid fuel supplies averaged 5·2 million tons as compared with 5·6 million tons in 1938.

In view of the extreme energy with which France has urged her case for a larger share of the Ruhr coal production, it may be as well to consider the importance of these supplies in relation to her total fuel requirements.

In 1938, the main sources of French coal imports (totalling in all about 20 million tons) were over 6 million from U.K. and including coke nearly 7 million from Germany and over 4 million from Belgium.

At present, out of current imports of 600/700 thousand tons a month, as much as two-thirds comes from the U.S.A., while France's dependence on Ruhr coal amounts to no more than about one-eighth of her total imports or below 100,000 tons a month. Thus supplies from the British zone play a relatively unimportant part in the French coal supply position at present, and it is clear that the French agitation for a larger share of the Ruhr production derives as much from political and financial motives as from supply considerations. French demands relate in fact to the expanded level of industrial production envisaged under the Monnet Plan, rather than to any mere restoration of the pre-war level of coal consumption; furthermore France, like other European consumers, finds U.S. coal expensive and of poorer quality and would prefer not to have to draw so large a proportion of total imports from dollar sources.

The general cuts which were absolutely necessary last autumn in Ruhr exports to all destinations and of which France was made to bear no more and probably less than her fair share, doubtless affected the French position, particularly as during the shipping strike American supplies fell off, while Polish exports promised under the Franco-Polish trade agreement also failed temporarily to materialise to their full extent.

The present position is that, out of a total export allocation from Germany (Ruhr and Saar) to all countries during the quarter April–June 1947 of approximately 2½ million tons (see above under "Exporting Countries") France is to receive 720,000 or 28%, and if the May output in the Ruhr attains 250,000 tons a day, her share in June of the extra 125,000 tons to be made available for export will be 30%.

This provisional arrangement covering the second quarter of 1947 will be followed by the more recent arrangement mentioned above by which the British, French and U.S. Governments have agreed to fix exports from all three zones of occupation on a scale of percentages of output, thus to a large extent satisfying the requests which the French Government have been putting forward for a considerable time for the fixing of the volume of exports on a sliding scale as a percentage of German production, though the French make it clear that there is still a difference between what can be expected from these latest proposals and the "vital needs of France." Hence their request for help with E.C.O. over the question of the Saar and its effect on their coal position.

The French contention that she is entitled to the whole of the Saar production merits separate examination. The current rate of production of the area is Polish coal production which at the beginning of 1947 was at the annual rate of some 55 million tons (or about 80% of the combined pre-war output of the old Polish and the newly-acquired Silesian coalfields)—continues to increase, but exports to Western Europe are well below normal. In 1946 Poland's exports (apart from deliveries to the U.S.S.R. on account of her reparations liability in respect of the newly occupied Western territories) totalled some 4 million tons or only about half the pre-war exports of which about 2 million alone went to Sweden. The original 1947 programme of the Polish coal industry envisaged a figure of 20 million tons as the total export to all countries including 9 million to the U.S.S.R. as "reparations" (see above). Under the recently announced Russo-Polish Agreement, 1947, "reparations" deliveries to the U.S.S.R. have been reduced from a nominal 13,000,000 to 7,000,000, for the whole year (6,500,000 in 1948). However, this will probably not result in any increased availability for Europe, as the Polish Government have officially estimated that their total export figure will be no more than 17,500,000 tons.

Poland is already making a helpful contribution to the needs of Eastern European countries which are by comparison small. The only other significant hard coal producer in Eastern Europe—apart from the U.S.S.R.—is Czechoslovakia, where hard coal output is now in sight of and brown coal output above the pre-war level and which is roughly normally self-supporting in solid fuel. The Soviet coal output itself is not a factor affecting the European coal supply position, but the reduction in the Russian demands on Poland already referred to should naturally be reflected to some extent on the quantity of Polish coal available for Western Europe.

Importing Countries

France heads the list of fuel importing countries in order of importance, though as will be seen, her relative dependence on imported supplies is much less than in the case of many of the others where domestic production is small or negligible.

The French domestic output continues at just above the pre-war level with a total labour force of some 40 per cent. higher of which a sixth (55,000) are prisoners-of-war. In 1946 production amounted to 49 million tons as compared with 47·5 in 1938 and during the past winter has been running at an annual rate of over 50 million tons. It is, of course, in respect of her outside sources of supply that France's position has weakened since before the war, when some 20 million tons of solid fuel were imported as compared with 11 million tons in 1946. The upshot is nevertheless, that during the last quarter of 1946 the monthly availability of solid fuel supplies averaged 5·2 million tons as compared with 5·6 million tons in 1938.

In view of the extreme energy with which France has urged her case for a larger share of the Ruhr coal production, it may be as well to consider the importance of these supplies in relation to her total fuel requirements.

In 1938, the main sources of French coal imports (totalling in all about 20 million tons) were over 6 million from U.K. and including coke nearly 7 million from Germany and over 4 million from Belgium.

At present, out of current imports of 600/700 thousand tons a month, as much as two-thirds comes from the U.S.A., while France's dependence on Ruhr coal amounts to no more than about one-eighth of her total imports or below 100,000 tons a month. Thus supplies from the British zone play a relatively unimportant part in the French coal supply position at present, and it is clear that the French agitation for a larger share of the Ruhr production derives as much from political and financial motives as from supply considerations. French demands relate in fact to the expanded level of industrial production envisaged under the Monnet Plan, rather than to any mere restoration of the pre-war level of coal consumption; furthermore France, like other European consumers, finds U.S. coal expensive and of poorer quality and would prefer not to have to draw so large a proportion of total imports from dollar sources.

The general cuts which were absolutely necessary last autumn in Ruhr exports to all destinations and of which France was made to bear no more and probably less than her fair share, doubtless affected the French position, particularly as during the shipping strike American supplies fell off, while Polish exports promised under the Franco-Polish trade agreement also failed temporarily to materialise to their full extent.

The present position is that, out of a total export allocation from Germany (Ruhr and Saar) to all countries during the quarter April–June 1947 of approximately 2½ million tons (see above under "Exporting Countries") France is to receive 720,000 or 28%, and if the May output in the Ruhr attains 250,000 tons a day, her share in June of the extra 125,000 tons to be made available for export will be 30%.

This provisional arrangement covering the second quarter of 1947 will be followed by the more recent arrangement mentioned above by which the British, French and U.S. Governments have agreed to fix exports from all three zones of occupation on a scale of percentages of output, thus to a large extent satisfying the requests which the French Government have been putting forward for a considerable time for the fixing of the volume of exports on a sliding scale as a percentage of German production, though the French make it clear that there is still a difference between what can be expected from these latest proposals and the "vital needs of France." Hence their request for help with E.C.O. over the question of the Saar and its effect on their coal position.

The French contention that she is entitled to the whole of the Saar production merits separate examination. The current rate of production of the area is now between 9 and 10 million tons a year or almost 70% of the pre-war level. This is disposed of as to some 50% for consumation in the Saar itself, the remaining 50% being disposed of approximately as follows: military consumption 1·5 million, rest of French zone 1·2 million and exports nearly 1½ million, practically all of which go to France itself. If the Saar is handed over to France with all its surplus coal production leaving the remainder of the French zone of occupation to be supplied from the British zone (Ruhr), France proper would stand to gain at least an additional 2–2½ million tons a year over and above her present intake. Even this advantage would be lost if as a result all Ruhr supplies were cut off, as she would lost an almost equivalent quantity of good quality coke for which Saar coal is an inadequate substitute.

As indicated above, however, the French have requested help with the European Coal Organisation when they present to that body both the resources and needs of France and the Saar as a whole.

Belgium and Holland are similar in that before the war domestic production went a long way to meet requirements, but both countries were dependent on imports of certain essential categories of coal—these coming mainly from Germany. Belgian domestic production is now at nearly 80 per cent. of the pre-war level (30 million tons a year) and Holland at between 60 and 70 per cent. (pre-war 15 million tons a year). Indigenous production is at present being supplemented by imports as to about 3 million tons a year in the case of Belgium and 4 million in the case of Holland which come almost entirely from the U.S.A. and Germany. Even so, the fuel availability in the case of Belgium is only about 85 per cent. and 75 per cent. of the pre-war quantity in the case of Holland. Domestic production is not responding very rapidly owing mainly to labour difficulties and an early recovery to the pre-war level cannot be expected. The Scandinavian countries of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Finland are in even worse shape since not only have they an insignificant or no domestic production but they were greatly dependent before the war on large-scale imports from the U.K., the absence of which has not only handicapped them in their recovery but has reacted adversely on British trade activities and prospects in this area (e.g., Swedish and Finnish timber exports to U.K.). Pre-war imports of all the above countries, including coke, totalled over 15 million tons a year, of which nearly 10 million tons or roughly two-thirds came from the U.K. The present low level of imports which are coming from a variety of sources—the U.S.A., Germany and Poland mainly—averages some 50–60 per cent. of pre-war, Sweden despite large imports from Poland being perhaps the worst off with a consumption of solid fuel below 50 per cent.

Italy and Switzerland as mainly dependent on imported supplies also have certain points of resemblance. Italy imported nearly 12 million tons before the war of which as much as 7 millions came from Germany, over 2 millions from the U.K. and about 1½ millions came from Poland. Her imports in 1946 of which as much as four-fifths came from the U.S.A. were about 5½ million tons. Her fuel supplies with her small domestic production, at about 80 per cent. of pre-war, are thus probably only about half her consumption before the war.

Swiss imports in 1946 were about 1½ million tons as compared with over double this figure before the war when supplies came mainly from Germany. Supplies are at present being drawn from a variety of sources namely France, Poland, U.S.A., mainly, and to a smaller extent Germany, Czechoslovakia and the Netherlands.

As already indicated, Eastern Europe's fuel requirements are or can be largely met from Polish sources. But, so far as any permanent solution of the solid fuel difficulties of Western Europe (including Scandinavia) is concerned, this is indissolubly linked with the necessity for a substantial increase in the Ruhr production and in U.K. exports to the European continent. At any rate until the proposed Anglo-American Joint Commission of Enquiry for raising production in the combined zones has reported and its findings have been acted upon, no rapid restoration of the pre-war fuel position can be expected.

SPECIAL ARTICLE

THE EASTERN ZONE OF GERMANY—I

Introduction

It has only recently become possible to piece together a reliable and coherent picture of the Soviet Zone of Germany. The result is in some ways alarming. Progress towards a Communist society has been more rapid than appeared on the surface. A façade of democratic forms has been maintained, and there is even the appearance of a democratic party system. In practice, however, the Communist-dominated Socialist Unity Party has either already secured complete control of every organ of the legislature, executive and judiciary, or has occupied a position which will give it complete control in the foreseeable future unless there is a drastic reversal of developments through amalgamation with the West. This first of two articles discusses the power of the Socialist Unity Party itself and of the various organisations dependent on it. The second will discuss the progress of sovietisation in the organisation of industry and agriculture, in the administration and police, education, youth, religion and denazification.

The Party System

The system of Government in the Soviet zone has not yet received its finishing touches. The skeleton and outline is, however, firm enough. It is based on the principle of control by one group, the Socialist Unity Party (SED), which in turn receives directives from Russia. The SED is virtually the Communist party under another name. It was formed on the 1st April, 1946, through compulsory fusion of the Communist Party and some of the Social Democrat Party; actually the Social Democrat component has had no real influence on policy. At the beginning of the occupation the Communists were not eager for fusion, but they reversed their policy when they saw that the Social Democrats were steadily growing stronger while they themselves were weakening. There were three main causes for their unpopularity:

the early excesses of Russian troops lowered the prestige of a party associated with the occupying Power; communist mayors appointed by the Russians were often extremely disreputable; many people were dismayed to find that the communist order bore a striking resemblance to that of Nazism, in its use of spying, its political oppression and the dragooning of public opinion by one-sided propaganda. The only way for the Communists to strengthen their hold was to absorb their chief rival, and fusion was therefore pushed ahead with vigorous help from the Russians.

Since the 1st April, 1946, no independent SPD has been permitted in the Zone. The three licensed Parties, the Socialist Unity Party, Christian Democratic Union and Liberal Democratic Party, are not fully representative of the electorate. The LDP in particular, although stronger than the CDU in some areas, is largely unreal. Its electors are mainly anti-Communists who also distrust the clericalism of the CDU, but own no real allegiance to the LDP programme. This state of things alone makes it impossible to regard the party system in the Zone as democratic. The system is, however, above all vitiated by the direct preference given by the Russians to the SED. Important decisions regarding the future of Germany, such as the latest decision to cease dismantling, have been announced by the Russians "after consultation with SED leaders," and were made public through SED channels. The Russians have thus treated the SED as if it were the de facto Government of the Zone. At the local and Diet elections in 1946 the Russians used unfair discrimination and even a degree of terrorism, though mild by Polish, Bulgarian and Roumanian standard, to secure an SED majority.

In the Diets some attempt is made to maintain a façade of democracy, though SED spokesmen have proudly declared that the system has little in common with "bourgeois democracy." Parliamentary debates take place; motions are voted on; and from time to time the SED is even outvoted by the other two parties. Nevertheless, on all major questions the CDU and LDP appear to be completely subservient. The whole political system is based on the "unity of the anti-fascist democratic parties," as expressed in the Unity Bloc. The Bloc had its origin in the four-party committees which were set up in 1945. As at that time there had been no elections, any ordinary system of party government was clearly impossible, and the committees seemed a reasonable expedient for the transition period. They have now, however, become a permanent institution. In the Diets all major measures are first agreed in the Bloc Committee before being debated in the Chamber. A revealing statement on this procedure was made by Otto Buchwitz, President of the Saxony Diet, on the 26th February, 1947. Buchwitz stated that, if the ordinary party system were used, the SED, with its small majority, would be able to force any measure on the other parties (in fact, the SED only has a majority with the aid of the 2 Peasants' Mutual Aid representatives and the one Cultural League representative; Buchwitz thus confirms that these two organisations are SED-controlled), and "on the top of this, the SED majority would have to bear sole responsibility for whatever happened in Saxony." Thus through the Unity Bloc system the CDU and LDP, though they seem to have little or no influence on policy, have to bear their share of the blame if anything goes wrong. Buchwitz further stated that all Bloc meetings were attended by representatives of the Free German League of Trade Unions (FDGB) "which, as a non-party organisation, is not represented in the Diet." As the FDGB is SED-controlled, this makes it impossible for the other parties to outvote the SED in the Bloc committee. Other means for securing SED predominance in the Diets include terrorisation and arrest of officials and candidates of other parties; preventing the other parties from putting up candidates; terrorisation or political bribery of the voters; and control of propaganda.

In spite of this the other two parties together succeeded in obtaining more votes than the SED in all States in the Diet elections. Yet the SED secured in each of the five Governments the key positions of the Ministries of the Interior and of Education. In four the Premier was also from the SED (in Saxony-Anhalt an LDP Premier was given an SED Vice-Premier). No matter what proportion of votes the non-Communist parties may possess in the Communes the mayor is almost always SED. Likewise the Central Administrations in the Soviet Zone are staffed almost entirely by SED members. Even applicants for lower posts in the administration apparently have to declare their political allegiance. In September 1946 advertisements in the Leipzig press for positions under municipal authorities said that "only persons . . . . who belong to one of the three anti-fascist parties need apply." Thus the non-party official is eliminated.

The S.E.D. Party State presents the same curious phenomenon as the Nazi State of the "doubling" of governmental departments by the party. The Nazi Party not only dominated the State; it was also a "State within the State." The ruling elements from 1933 onwards realised that the majority of the civil servants were not Nazis and could not therefore be altogether trusted to show the necessary zeal in implementing Nazi policy. Each Ministry therefore had its corresponding Party "Office" as watchdog. The SED Central Secretariat in Berlin, similarly, has departments for Youth, Training and Canvassing; Personnel and Finance; Administration, Local Government and Agriculture; Industry, Labour and Social Policy; Women. It should be added in all fairness that there is one important difference between the organisation of the SED and that of the NSDAP. In the Nazi Party all posts were filled by appointment from above. In the SED, on paper at any rate, the Party executives and secretaries are elected. The SED machinery requires a large number of reliable and trained officials. At the head of the training system is the Parteihochschule Karl Marx at Liebenwalde. 150 students were being trained there in January, 1947, of whom 60 came from the Western zones. No great account has been taken of political background and convictions in selecting students for District Party Schools. In a letter of January, 1946, a student, clearly a former Nazi—attending one of the courses—wrote: "I have had to change my views considerably; it was not easy, but now I am enthusiastic about it. Anyway I must have a profession, and why not an active Party member?" The latter remark throws light on the Soviet Zone system of government from another point of view. Like the Nazis, the SED seems to aim at creating a large class of people whose security is directly dependent on the fortunes of the Party. It is hoped in this way to ensure the stability of the régime by basing it on personal self-interest.

Officially the SED has nothing to do with the system of House and Street Wardens to be found in every town in the Zone; but these officials can be regarded to a great extent as a further means used by the Party to control the population. All reports indicate that the Wardens are to a large extent SED members, although officially appointed by the administrative authorities. Originally the House Wardens' tasks were to keep the house register, distribute ration cards and mobilise labour for tasks of reconstruction. Reports indicate that they also have certain police functions, and that there is close co-operation between the Wardens and the Food Office, the Social Welfare Office, the People's Solidarity Scheme and the Statistical Office. The House Wardens also have the task of allocating supplies of clothing, a task which must give them considerable hold over the persons in their charge.

The "Non-Party" Organisations

The mass organisations for charity, youth, women, culture and labour, are an essential part of the SED State and might in fact be regarded as its very foundation. Not everyone is compelled to take part directly in the activities of the Party, but it is difficult to see how anyone can slip through the finely-meshed net formed by the Organisations. Of course charitable organisations, women's committees, youth clubs and trades unions exist in other zones. What is peculiar to the Soviet Zone is that in each of these fields only one organisation is permitted; this organisation not only has the monopoly in its field, but is given an official or semi-official status and performs functions which elsewhere would be carried out by the ordinary administration. They are in fact inextricably part of the machinery of government but do not appear to be subordinate to the public authorities, so that they are an instrument of government which is not properly accessible to democratic control. They are centrally controlled and have organisations covering the whole Zone. In all this they bear a striking resemblance to the organisations of the Nazi régime such as the NSV and the DAF. Although nominally the organisations are non-party, they are in fact all controlled to a greater or less extent by the SED.

The People's Solidarity Scheme, founded in 1945, has absorbed all private charity organisations in the Zone. It has openly admitted, however, that its charitable aspect is of secondary importance, and its activities include those which should normally be the functions of public authorities such as price-regulation and, in Thuringia, supplying funds for mining bituminous coal. The Women's Committees, while engaging in practical welfare tasks, aim at "the anti-fascist indoctrination of women . . . . and the democratic education of children through their mothers." The major instrument for the control of intellectual and cultural activities is the Cultural League. As an example of its kind of control an artist writing in May 1946 affirmed that pictures were only accepted for exhibition if the painter was a member of the League. Directives are reported to be received directly or indirectly from Moscow. The Peasants' Mutual Aid Association helps in the building of farm houses, runs tractor loan stations and co-operates in fixing delivery quotas. Its newspaper Der freie Bauer leaves no doubt that the Association is dominated by the SED. It may serve later as the instrument for introducing a system of collective farms. In practice, the position of new farmers is more like that of members of Russian collective farms than of independent farmers. A Zonal agricultural directorate ensures planned output. In 1945 farmers received stern orders to complete harvesting and threshing by certain dates. Rigid scheduling, although standard in the Soviet Union, was new to the German farmers and many complaints were made against the Administration with the result that the Peasants' Mutual Aid now plays a more important part in the system.

The Organisation of Labour

Labour in the Soviet Zone is organised through the all-embracing Free German League of Trades Unions, which includes among its members all recipients of wages, salaries and fees. There is also in every factory or office a Works Council elected in accordance with Control Council Law No. 22 of April, 1946. In addition, there are Chambers of Industry and Commerce, Chambers of Handicrafts, and a Chamber of Technology. These organisations, however, do not represent the professional interests of their members over against the workers or the public authorities, but are an integral part of the administration, assisting the latter in the preparation and execution of laws. The majority of the members of the executives are not elected, but are appointed by the public authorities and the FDGB.

The main difference between the organisation of trades unions in the Soviet Zone and in the Western Zones is that in the West there has been a gradual development in each branch of industry from local unions, to a final loose association of zonal unions—except in the French Zone—whilst in the Soviet Zone the organisation has been centralised on a zonal basis from the beginning. The FDGB is a unitary organisation centred on Berlin with 19 constituent unions representing the various trades and professions organised vertically. Thus doctors are organised not as a Medical Association, but in the Health subsection of the Trade Union of Public Services and Administration. Elections for all commitees take place once a year on a non-party basis.

The whole organisation is similar to that in the USSR, and Walter Ulbricht, in a recent pamphlet urges German trades unions to take the Soviet unions as a model. As private enterprise is gradually eliminated in the Zone the trades unions tend to lose their function of representing the workers' interests over against the employers and to become agents of social security, educational organisations and cultural and welfare bodies. Above all, however, they are an additional instrument of control on behalf of the SED. The FDGB organ, Die Tribuene, pursues an SED line; and the key men in the organisations are all SED. Further, the SED has demanded that the coming Government of all Germany shall contain ministers from the FDGB. Membership of the FDGB is nominally voluntary, but according to all reports is in most places virtually compulsory. The total membership in the Soviet Zone is about 4 millions out of 6 million trade unionists in the whole of Germany.

In the Weimar Republic the Works Councils had no coercive powers and in the end performed little more than welfare functions. And, whereas in the British and US zones Works Councils do not seem to have any greater powers than under the Weimar Republic, in the Soviet Zone the tendency is to give the Works Councils coercive power over private employers, such powers being provided for in the Works Agreements which employers have to conclude with workers. Elections for the Works Council are, as for the FDGB, nominally non-party, but by a recent (secret) order of the SMA the SED has been given direct control of the Works Councils. This order provides for the inclusion in every Works Council of two members of the SED, not elected by the workmen but nominated by the military authority, often without reference to other qualifications. Their duty is to report all proceedings of the Works Council to a higher SED authority, with the object of ensuring that no "undemocratic decisions" are carried out.

GERMANY

Two welcome agreements were secured before the Moscow Conference ended. On the 23rd April, Mr. Bevin repeated his proposal that all German prisoners-of-war should be repatriated by the end of 1948, and M. Molotov agreed. The Control Council will submit to the four Powers by the 1st July, 1947, a plan for absorbing these prisoners. M. Molotov made it clear that all German nationals were covered whether they had served in the armed forces or in the auxiliary services. Earlier the Deputies had agreed in principle on free interchange of information and opinion between the zones. This is subject to considerations of military security and the need to prevent a revival of National-Socialism. The matter had already been discussed in the Control Council, but the French had been unwilling to admit newspapers freely to the Saar.

On the 23rd April and at the last meeting of the Conference the following day there were further fruitless exchanges between M. Bidault, Mr. Marshall and M. Molotov on the proposed Four-Power Treaty. The best that can be said is that this proposal has not been formally withdrawn from the agenda. The American suggestion for a limitation of the number of occupation troops was discussed. M. Molotov wanted 200,000 men for the Soviet Zone, 200,000 between Great Britain and the United States and 50,000 for France. Mr. Bevin pointed out that there was not a common Anglo-US army and said that the minimum figure for the most populous area of Germany must be 145,000. The French could not agree to less than 80,000 at present. British military strength is at present somewhat over 131,000, but allowance must also be made for contingents from Allied countries such as Belgium. In mid-March US forces numbered 165,000 including 30,000 constabulary but it is planned to reduce this figure to 117,000 by the 1st July. The matter is to be studied by the Control Council. The Deputies are to study the provisional political organisation of Germany. Mr. Bevin told Dominions' representatives on the 24th April that the United States' attitude to the political structure had only lately become clear. They wanted the Laender to control the electoral machinery but would agree to direct election to the Central Parliament. This scheme was much more practicable than the one clung to by the French who insisted that representatives to the Central Parliament should be elected indirectly by representatives of the Laender. The French, he said, wanted to put the clock back to Napoleonic times and it would not work. The next session of the Council is planned for November in London. No agenda has been prepared. Mr. Bevin left Moscow on the 28th April for talks in Berlin with British advisers and with Lord Pakenham, successor to Mr. Hynd.

Deep gloom over the end of the Conference permeates the press of nearly all regions or groups in Germany except the Communists. A typical comment by the Berlin Telegraf was that even those who did not expect success must be deeply concerned about the far-reaching extent of this failure. By contrast the Socialist Unity Party organ, Neues Deutschland, writes "only those have cause for pessimism who would like to preserve nazism." The paper adds, more reasonably, that no one can expect all-round agreement in seven weeks. Berlin Radio on the 25th April indulges in deliberate distortion. After dissociating itself from the "shouting about failure . . . . which helped to sabotage agreement" it claims that much of the preparatory work of a Peace treaty has been completed. M. Molotov is represented as the champion of German interests battling against the "powers of darkness." The broadcaster makes out that Mr. Marshall did not want to destroy cartels or to further democracy and that it was he who "caused the fiasco of the whole Four Power Pact."

Final results of the Laender elections in the British Zone, of which a preliminary report was given last week, show that the SPD has 39·7 per cent. of the seats, the CDU 33 per cent. and the KPD 8·3 per cent. (In the District elections last year the CDU had more seats although less votes than the SPD.) In Schleswig-Holstein the SPD has an absolute majority. The only other parties represented are the CDU and South Schleswig Association. In Lower Saxony the SPD has a majority but not a clear one while in Rhineland-Westphalia the CDU just leads. In both States the Centre holds the balance between Right and Left. The KPD in Rhineland-Westphalia has increased its representation to 28 seats. The CDU is really the only loser by the election. This is not surprising in view of the conglomeration of voters from different walks of life which it has collected in the past, many of whom may have since wavered in their views or may not have voted at all. On the whole there was remarkably little tendency to vote for extreme parties in spite of the hardships endured since last autumn. The poll averaged 65 per cent. of the electorate, a proportion which though high by British standards is low compared to last year's elections, and which German observers take as a sign of preoccupation with the food situation. Schumacher stated on the 21st April that the results showed that the cleavage between the CDU and SPD had increased. Adenauer, for the Christian Democrats had said that the CDU would only be ready to participate in a Government if all questions which divided the parties were relegated to the background and if a promise were obtained from Military Government for immediate supplies of food. He argues that politics are out of place when living conditions are so desperate. On this basis the Socialists would have to shelve some of the most important points in their programme such as Socialisation and land reform. Obviously they will not agree to do this.

During the first fortnight of April Communist Conferences were held in all States of the US Zone, and resolutions were passed in favour of "fusion" with the Socialist Unity party. Military Government has not given permission for a change of name, and General Clay stated on the 16th April that he thought admission of the SED would be influenced by the possible admission of the SPD to the Soviet Zone. The move may strengthen the administration and prestige of the SED but does not affect the SPD. In Hesse fourteen SPD officials have resigned, presumably preparatory to joining the KPD. Certain divisions of opinion within the US zone SPD, notably in Bavaria and industrial Hesse, have long been more obvious than in the British zone, but they are not so great that the KPD can expect to attract many disciples at present. Although the KPD organisation is the most efficient, SPD discipline is also strict, and the party keeps a much tighter hold over the members than do the more right-wing parties. In February General McNarney had expressed the opinion that party leaders in the zone were, on the whole, not doing much to reorientate the German people and were more interested in wielding political power. The Trade Unions and other bodies, he thought, did more. Over the last two months US officials have made surveys of German opinion in the US zone which reveal considerable criticism of parties and a feeling that the party system is still on trial. An important minority of 10 per cent. thought that only one party should be allowed after the end of the occupation. Very naturally this view was most prevalent among younger people, plunged for the first time from a feeling of security under Nazism into an atmosphere in which they have to think for themselves. Other groups expressed scepticism about the possibility of the party system working in Germany. It is of interest, however, that whereas in the early days it was party functionaries of the pre-1933 era who took the lead there are now an increasing number of people taking an interest in politics for the first time, who both inside and outside the parties are more ready to criticize and suggest reforms.

At a meeting of the prisoners-of-war and displaced persons directorate on the 22nd April the French member, supported by the Soviet member, protested against the British action in transferring 12,000 Yugoslavs from Italy to Germany (see last week's Summary under "Italy"). He declared that the move was contrary to Four-Power Agreements and was inconsistent with previous statements that H.M. Government were unable to accept any non-Germans, such as Volksdeutsche from Austria, into the British zone. The United States member could not see that the action was contrary to Four-Power Agreement. At the same time he regretted it as it would increase the burden on food supplies. Although the American authorities were equally concerned in this respect they had not been consulted. This is a somewhat curious statement, since conversations have been going on for some time with the State Department about the whole question of Yugoslavs in Italy. The British member expressed surprise that the protest should be raised by the Power which had contributed least to solving the displaced persons' problem. The movement, he pointed out, was not contrary to Four-Power Agreements and had been publicly announced in the press. The matter is now to be referred to the four Governments.

AUSTRIA

The Conference in Moscow has closed without producing a Treaty for Austria. A last effort on the part of the British Delegation on the 22nd April to produce a compromise solution on that bugbear of the Conference, the problem of the "German assets," apparently met with no response from the Russians, though the British proposal, made in private session, touched the fringe of Russian demands by providing (a) that, while owners who had been dispossessed without full and effective compensation should regain their property, such compensation as they had received should rank as a German asset, and (b) that disputes regarding the validity of owners' claims on property acquired by the Germans by force or duress or by the application of Nazi laws should be settled in the first instance by bilateral negotiations and only in the last resort by arbitration. Finally, Mr. Marshall proposed that the whole problem should be referred to the General Assembly of the United Nations. This also was rejected by M. Molotov (at the final meeting of the Council), who proposed instead that a Four-Power Commission should be set up to examine all the disagreed articles. This proposal, which had also been in the minds of the U.K. and American delegates, was finally accepted and it was agreed that the Commission, which is to include a Committee of experts to give special consideration to Article 35 (German assets) and to the appropriate parts of Article 42 (United Nations property in Austria), should start work in Vienna on the 12th May. There is still some disagreement, however, over the Commission's terms of reference; the Russian formula would confine the work of coordinating the points of view of the Four Powers to the assets question.

The two last meetings of the Council were marked by acrimonious exchanges between Mr. Marshall and M. Molotov, Mr. Marshall accusing the Soviet Delegation of blocking the Austrian Treaty by its uncompromising attitude over the problem of the German assets, while M. Molotov attempted to saddle Mr. Marshall with the blame. A radio commentator from Moscow on the 19th April accused the "reactionary international monopolists" of attempting to sabotage the agreed decisions on reparations—"the just and legitimate claims of the Soviet Union." There were no grounds, he insisted, for saying that the passage of the German assets into Soviet hands would undermine Austria's economic life; on the other hand this could truly be said of the compensation claimed for United Nations' nationals, which amounted to "disguised reparations."

The Moscow Conference has thus ended without restoring to Austria her freedom and sovereignty; some relatively minor points have been agreed on, but the Austrians are left with their country under continued Four-Power rule, with uncertainty about the frontiers, Austrian economic stability dangling precariously in the balance of Allied disagreement, and with the prospect that Russian and French troops of occupation, in addition to many unwanted Displaced Persons, will live for many months more on Austrian food. The plea for the reparation of Austrian prisoners-of-war also remains unanswered; when this was brought up by the British Delegation at the Council's last meeting M. Molotov flatly refused to discuss the matter.

Austrian official and press reactions to the failure of the Conference have been disillusioned and gloomy. Dr. Gruber has described the treatment accorded to the Austrian problem as being "a flagrant contradiction of the declaration concerning the creation of a free and independent Austria," likely to embitter the Austrian population and rob it of its faith in democracy. "If ever a free and happy Austria is to arise again," he said, "it will not be through but despite Allied policy." People's Party circles have expressed some gratitude for the U.K. decision to modify the claim for compensation for United Nations nationals, and President Renner has thanked General Mark Clark (the retiring U.S. High Commissioner in Austria) for his firm advocacy of Austria's vital interests. The Austrian press has tried to derive some crumb of comfort from the establishment of the Four-Power Commission, and the Socialist Party is convening an extraordinary conference for the 6th May to discuss the general situation produced by the Moscow failure. The Austrian Communists have seized on the negative result of the Conference to press for new elections "to place the struggle for the Austrian Treaty in the strong hands of the people." According to the Oesterreichische Volksstimme, it was only due to M. Molotov, who "tirelessly pressed for greater speed," that the Conference did not end "entirely without result" and it was thanks (only) to Russian endeavours that the door was kept open through the establishment of the Commission.

Discussion at the Allied Council meeting in Vienna on the 25th April on a Soviet resolution designed to forbid Commissions to recruit labour from amongst Displaced Persons in Austria, was inconclusive; a Soviet complaint of anti-Soviet and anti-repatriation activities in the Western zones was refuted by the Western members of the Council. The Russians are, of course, particularly sensitive in regard to any measures which might prevent the eventual repatriation of their own nationals or of those belonging to nations within the Soviet sphere of influence.

The latest Austrian police and denazification scandal has been the escape of Franz Richter, a former Deputy Mayor of Vienna and leading SS-man, while on a working party in a Vienna street. A revealing statement by the Minister of the Interior on the escape announced that a number of police officials had now been dismissed, that the practice of employing lesser Nazis to guard leading Nazis was now to cease, and that leading Nazis would no longer be employed on work in the streets. From all accounts it would appear that the extent of manual labour done by Richter and his associates was more nominal than actual, and the comment of the official Austrian press agency that the ban on their future employment on such work would mean "a serious blow to the programme of rebuilding in Vienna" has evoked a good deal of satire in the Austrian press.

The Socialist nominee, Herr Wedenig, was elected Provincial Governor of Carinthia on the 25th April, with the Communist and People's Party members abstaining from voting. Herr Wedenig, who is of Slovene origin, has reiterated the firm intention of the Carinthian Government to preserve Austria's 1937 frontiers.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Tiso trial has not, after all, been without its repercussions upon the Slovak political scene. Although the verdict pronounced against the former President of the former President of the Slovak Independent State is generally regarded as just, yet the abiding sympathy so frequently expressed on his behalf by many Slovak Democrats almost led to a crisis in the leadership of that Party. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the mere possibility of such a breach was due in the first place to the Tiso affair itself: political differences within the ranks of the Democrat Party have their origins in much deeper roots. There is, for example, the religious conflict between the Protestant and Catholic denominations and, as its logical off-shoot, the long-standing political rivalry between the Slovak separatists, who are mainly Catholics, and the "Czechoslovak-minded" Slovaks, who are chiefly Protestants.

The immediate reason for the threatened crisis was the attitude of the Catholic Right-wing group of the party towards various questions connected with the trial. This group is led by Canon Cvinček who, shortly before the general elections were held in May, 1946, attempted to establish a new party from among the dissatisfied Catholic elements. This dissident group has now criticised the failure of the Commissariat for Justice (which is supervised by the Slovak Democrat, Dr. Ivan Štefánik) to secure a reprieve for the ex-President and has disapproved of Dr. Lettrich's absence (he is the Chairman of the Slovak National Council) in America during the earlier part of the hearing.

The situation became so acute that a special meeting of the party Præsidium was convened on the day following Tiso's execution. After a stormy session party unity was eventually restored on the ground that its disruption would irremediably harm Slovak national interests and the democratic consolidation of the entire Republic, thereby enhancing Communist prospects at the next general election.

The Czechoslovak Parliamentary Delegation now in England is staying for two weeks by way of a return visit for that of the British M.P.s to Czechoslovakia last summer. The Delegation, which is led by M. Josef David, the Socialist President of the National Assembly, is representative of the four Czech and four Slovak parties; Mme. Hodinová-Špurna (Czech Communist) represents the 23 women deputies. Some of the deputies were members of the Delegation which visited the Soviet Union at the end of last year and some have recently attended the conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in Cairo. The party is visiting the Midlands and the North after a short tour of London and the Home Counties. They will be present at the Czechoslovak Film Festival to be held in London at the New Gallery Cinema between the 2nd and 7th May, when the leading Czech representative will be M. Fierlinger, the Social Democrat Vice-Premier. The Festival will help to develop still further the cultural relations which were fostered by the British Film Festival and the visit of the Arts Theatre Company in Prague last October.

Rudolf Beran, the former Germanophile leader of the Agrarian Party and Prime Minister after Munich, and General Syrový, his Minister of Defence, have been sentenced by the National Court in Prague to twenty years' penal servitude and loss of civic rights for the part they played in national events between 1938 and 1941.

POLAND

Polish official opinion has been much exercised, it appears, by the closing stages of the Moscow Conference, and particularly that part of it which first broached the question of Poland's western frontier. The 13th April saw the beginning of "Regained Territories Week," which, organized by the semi-official Polish Western Union, has had as its object "to place again before the whole nation the main problem of the present day." Almost certainly, the "main problem" was intended to be placed before the whole world as well as the Polish nation, and the synchronization, conscious or unconscious, with the Moscow Conference has indeed been useful. Speeches throughout the regained territories have been made by important people, the most notable coming from the Prime Minister M. Cyrankiewicz, at Walbrzych (Waldenburg), and M. Gomulka, Minister for Regained Territories, at Szczecin (Stettin) and Gorzow (Landsberg). Both speakers strongly insisted that the present frontier with Germany must not be revised at Poland's cost, since it constituted the defence of Slavdom against German imperialism. M. Cyrankiewicz, however, whose speech was appreciably less polemical than those of M. Gomulka, also added that Great Power Unity was the "philosopher's stone in the strengthening of peace," and that he believed Great Britain and the United States to be fully aware of this. These countries were bitterly attacked by M. Gomulka, who directed his words against Mr. Marshall and Mr. Bevin personally, on the ground that they raised the frontier question merely "to send up their diplomatic stock," and, allegedly, with special reference to the Ruhr.

The theme of danger from Germany was also lengthily expounded by the Polish Foreign Minister, M. Modzelewski, in a speech before the Polish Parliament on the 16th April. The speech was devoted to the importance of the recent Polish-Czech treaty, which, like those signed by Poland with the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, was described as "a link in the system for ensuring help in the event of German aggression." France was also associated with such a system. M. Modzelewski said that Poland was discussing a treaty of friendship with France, and the French Foreign Minister, M. Bidault, was said to approve Poland's western frontier on the grounds of security. The argument for the present frontier was somewhat ingeniously used by Robotnik, the Socialist newspaper, in its statement that Poland intends to export 28 million tons of coal in 1948, and 35 million tons in 1949. European collaboration was Poland's desire in this matter, but to maintain such an export, it would need to be assured of Szczecin (Stettin) and the whole course of the Oder.

The execution on the 16th April of Hoess, the former German Commandant of the concentration camp at Oświecim (Ausschwitz), provides a grimly pertinent psychological background to Polish opinion as regards Germany. After a three weeks' trial the accused was found guilty of being responsible for the murder of four million people by methods of unequalled brutality. The scrupulous fairness and complete calm with which the trial was conducted, was very laudable, the more so in view of the reputation of the Poles as an emotional people. In the words of M. Cyprian, the Public Prosecutor, one purpose of the trial was to show that Hoess was "a willing link in the system" aiming at the total destruction of the Slav people. This system, M. Cyprian argued, began a thousand years ago, when the Poles were driven from the Oder and Western Neisse.

The Budget session of the Polish Parliament opened on the 15th April. A surplus of 11 million zlote is revealed, though this is more than cancelled by the reconstruction expenditure of 85,400 million zlote proposed in the separate State Investment Budget. According to Polish figures, expenditure by the Ministries of National Defence and Public Security, together with that on Foreign Affairs, amounts to 25·2 per cent. as compared with 39·9 per cent. in 1937–38. The army, 600,000 strong at the end of hostilities, now numbers 165,000.

SOVIET UNION

Contrary to the consensus of British and American comment on the disappointing results of the Council of Foreign Ministers, Soviet commentators have been at pains to be optimistic about the future of Big Power cooperation while deploring the so-called misrepresentation of the Soviet attitude in the West. Mr. Thomas Barman, the excellent B.B.C. commentator in Moscow during the Conference, got a personal bad mark for his blunt admission of failure. The high lights of the Soviet attitude were reflected in a recent Moscow lecture by the well-known Soviet publicist, Yermashev. Yermashev clearly aimed at preventing his audience from drawing pessimistic conclusions from the Moscow Conference and made as much as possible of Big Power cooperation. The Soviet Union, he said, saw no reason to expect failure and did not entertain the idea of a breakdown. Having dealt with the German and Austrian problems on familiar Soviet lines, he asserted that the present international position showed an undoubted animation of reactionary forces. It is curious to note the omission of any reference to the Anglo-Soviet treaty talks in this general review of international affairs and of the Council of Foreign Ministers Conference.

The text of M. Molotov's reply (dated 19th April) to Mr. Marshall's letter on Korea of the 8th April has now been published with the latter, somewhat belatedly, on the 22nd April. M. Molotov began by recalling the terms of the agreement on Korea reached at Moscow by the Big Three in December 1945 and gave his views of the reasons for the failure meanwhile to implement this agreement. He laid the blame squarely on the American delegation to the joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. Commission in Korea, though Mr. Marshall for his part had alleged (see under "Far East" Summary No 388) that the political amalgamation of Korea had been directly obstructed by the Soviet commander in Northern Korea who had refused to permit communication between the two zones. In spite of their directly conflicting views of the causes of the present unsatisfactory state of affairs, both M. Molotov and Mr. Marshall claimed that the policy of their respective countries was aimed at the establishment of an independent state of Korea. M. Molotov's assertion that the U.S. delegation excluded the participation "of a number of democratic parties of Southern Korea" is countered by Mr. Marshall's previous allegation that the Soviet commander had insisted on a formula which would result in eliminating the majority of representative Korean leaders from consultation. Their opinions also clash regarding the attribution of responsibility for failure to convene the joint commission, which adjourned sine die on the 8th May, 1946, M. Molotov claiming that no reply had been received by the Soviet commander to his last letter to his American opposite number on this subject. M. Molotov proposed in his letter that the joint Commission should resume its work on the 20th May in Seoul, a disingenuous propaganda trick masking the difficulties originally created by the Soviet commander which made it impossible to re-convene the Commission hitherto. M. Molotov also recapitulated the progress allegedly made under Soviet auspices in Northern Korea in regard to democratization, the introduction of universal franchise, "guarantees of political freedom," the land reform, etc. —all of which must be taken with the proverbial grain of salt.

Soviet propaganda has dealt cautiously with Palestine in recent months, the press having given little attention to Palestine news or even to the terrorist incidents. On the eve of the U.N. debates about Palestine Soviet views were expressed more succinctly than hitherto in a long article in Krasny Flot (Red Fleet). Great Britain was attacked on more or less familiar lines, and guarded support was given to the Arab position. Great Britain was attacked for: (a) using Palestine from the first as a strategic base and insisting on the guarantee of her strategic and economic interests in the White Paper, (b) using the Jews and especially prominent British Zionists to counter-balance the demands of the Arabs for independence and thus retain her domination, (c) denying "elementary political rights" to the population, and (d) artificially creating antagonism between the Jews and Arabs. The current number of New Times makes the points that the United Nations is alone competent in present circumstances to find a solution and that the British mandate is definitely discredited.

New Times (18th April) welcomes the establishment of Soviet-Indian diplomatic relations as "an event of no mean international significance" and "a sign that India is moving towards an independent policy." It claims that the Indian people have been fighting for their independence for many years, but that the emancipation of India is by no means yet completed. "This vast country is still bound hand and foot by Colonial fetters, its economic development is retarded, its political and civil life is torn by conflicts. The establishment of peace and order in India and the development of an independent foreign and domestic policy are hampered by external forces which would perpetuate the country's Colonial régime and preserve a feudal order which should have long ago been discarded." Indian Democrats are said to have long been urging the establishment of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R., but British and Indian reactionaries are endeavouring to undermine the sympathy of the Indian people for the Soviet Union by anti-Soviet campaigns "which have of late become particularly intensive."

A Moscow broadcast in Turkish recently stated that last year 50,000 Armenians from all over the world had returned "to their homeland" and that another 63,000 are expected to return this year. Further, it was alleged that by the end of the year repatriated persons will represent one-tenth of the Republic's population of 1,200,000. These repatriated Armenians are apparently now working in various Armenian factories, especially the textile factories. Soviet propaganda has made the most of the opportunity of stressing the comforts provided for Armenian workers, including free land for those anxious to build houses, schools, restaurants, etc. Reports smuggled out of the country in letters to relations of these, repatriates provide a very different picture of discomfort and considerable hardship. Another broadcast stated that several hundred Armenians had been forced to escape from the persecution and extortion of local landowners in southern Persia and were leading a beggarly existence in Tabriz. Again the contrast was suggested between the plight of these people and the carefree existence of their fellow-countrymen in Soviet Armenia. (See also under "Turkey.")

The Soviet authorities have now spread their net for new citizens as far as Morocco. The local Soviet consul, together with an official from the Paris Embassy has been combing through the White Russian community, holding out promises of a pleasant life in the U.S.S.R.; so far he appears only to have secured fifteen applications.

Recent weeks have seen a striking number of moves in Moscow diplomatic circles. Australia and Canada are in process of changing their representation; Italy, Chile and the Netherlands have appointed new Ministers who have not yet taken up their posts. The Danish Embassy is vacant through the death of M. Doessing, who was in any case about to retire, and the new Swedish Minister, M. Rolf Ragnarsson Sohlman was received by M. Molotov on the 22nd April. A new Polish Ambassador, M. Naszkowski, has presented his credentials, and M. Mikhal Prifti, representing Albania, has just had his first audience. An interesting arrival is that of the Argentinian Ambassador, M. Federico Cantoni, who after a long delay has arrived in Moscow as the first representative of his country. The first Siamese envoy since the re-establishment of relations between the U.S.S.R. and Siam, M. Artakitti Banomion has also reached Moscow.

One of the first public Soviet criticisms of the American Russian-language broadcasts to the U.S.S.R. has appeared in the form of articles by Ilya Ehrenburg in the Party organ Kultura i Zhizn. To Ehrenburg's complaint that the broadcasts advertised American reaction and attacked the Soviet Union, David Lawrence, the well-known columnist and editor of United States News, replied, and Ehrenburg returned to the charge, bringing up the old familiar complaints of racial discrimination in the United States, and adding attacks on the proposed American aid to Greece and Turkey. In the one case this merely amounted to "tips to gaolers and gendarmes," in the other to subsidising von Papen's friends while refusing aid to the heroes of Montenegro. Ehrenburg concluded by asserting that he held friendship between the Soviet people and the U.S.A. essential to the development and happiness of humanity, but held that the "voice of America" broadcasts merely served further to estrange them.

Tass has announced the inauguaration of a new passsenger shipping line between the Soviet Union and the U.S.A.; the Rossia, one of the newer Soviet ocean liners, is to open the service by sailing from Odessa to New York on the 5th May.

FRANCE

French opinion had for some days been reconciled to the failure of the Moscow Conference to produce substantial Allied agreement, and the only noteworthy reaction in the press has been a tendency to accept the long-term division of Germany into an Eastern and a Western zone and to acknowledge the inevitability of French participation in the Anglo-American scheme of zonal fusion. The agreement on coal exports from Western Germany (see last week's Summary) was well received in the press, partly because it was generally, and wrongly, assumed to mean that when the Saar has been incorporated into the French economy the whole Saar coal output will be available to France without any deduction from her allocation of Ruhr coal. Those writers who understood that no such guarantee was contained in the agreement were more reserved. The Communist attempts to deny any value to the agreement were countered by the reply that Russia had made no effort to ease the coal situation. M. Teitgen, acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, assured H.M. Minister that the French Government were genuinely grateful for the agreement.

General de Gaulle held a long but uninformative press conference in Paris on the 24th April. He said that the Rassemblement du Peuple Français already had several hundred thousand members and 40 regional offices. He said it would intervene at elections to influence opinion but would not fight elections itself. He denied any idea of forming a single party or of wishing to set up a dictatorship, and claimed credit for his own record when he was in power. The comments of the newspapers favourable to General de Gaulle throw more light on his ideas. These papers belong to the group owned by M. Amaury, financier of the M.R.P. press and director of Havas-Publicité, the firm which produced the posters advertising de Gaulle's speeches. Amaury now owns Le Parisien Libéré and Ce Matin, two old Resistance papers, and has an interest in Le Figaro and Paris-Presse, the paper which is now publishing Colonel Passy's mémoirs. He undoubtedly represents the largest individual newspaper concern in the country and intends to use his power in support of General de Gaulle. Thus the formerly independent Figaro is showing more favour than hitherto towards the General and wrote of him: "It is certain that in case of emergency a man of his calibre, drawing more moral strength from his isolation than from the leadership of a party, might well be summoned by the whole nation to devote his prestige once again to the service of his country." The same article was, however, sceptical of the efficacy of the R.P.F., which was described by Le Parisien Libéré as "the instrument of a mystique" designed to transform the political atmosphere. The General's decision to lead the R.P.F. in person was apparently taken against the advice of many of his supporters and he has not yet made any outstanding converts among party leaders. He is at pains to avoid becoming associated with the extreme Right, but he is already classed in the minds of most Frenchmen as a man of the Right. The M.R.P. seem to have decided that they can afford to oppose the R.P.F. without losing too many adherents, and the return from Moscow of M. Bidault will no doubt serve to strengthen this decision.

Concern has been caused in moderate circles by a speech made by the Communist Minister of National Defence, M. Billoux, on the 25th April, to former members of the Francs-Tireurs et Partisans (the communist sponsored Resistance group). He described his conception of a modern democratic army, with 9 to 12 months' military service, provision for large-scale technical research, and the organisation in peace-time of local security forces based on the factory or the village and immediately available for defence against air invasion or for guerilla action in case of enemy occupation. The idea of entrusting the organisation of such forces to a Communist Minister will clearly not be tolerated by the other parties.

On the 24th April, elections were held throughout France in connection with the new unified social insurance scheme. Contributors were required to elect boards of directors who will have complete charge of their contributions and administer the prescribed benefits. These elections represent a revision, of M.R.P. inspiration, of the original arrangements whereby the boards were nominated by the Trade Unions. The main provisions of the new system are, on the one hand, allowances carefully calculated to encourage large families, and, on the other, old age pensions, including increased benefits for those who stay at work after the age of 60. It thus reflects and seeks to remedy one of France's greatest problems of the moment, that of manpower. Medical treatment and cash allowances for illness are also provided, but it is not proposed to nationalise, at least for the time being, the country's health services. The only organised opposition to the unification of the system has come from non-salaried workers such as tradesmen and self-employed craftsmen (supported in many areas by the Christian Trade Unions—C.F.T.C.), whom it was originally proposed to treat in exactly the same way as the employed workers. The accommodating attitude of the Communist Minister of Labour, M. Croizat, indicated, however, that this category of middle-class workers may be allowed an entirely independent pensions scheme. Moderate opinion has been alarmed by Socialist propaganda tending to discourage individual saving and by the prospects that the C.G.T. adherents will vote in larger numbers than the less-organised but equally numerous non-unionists and Catholic workers. The M.R.P. therefore urged the necessity of a high poll, and although the Confédération Générale du Travail was by far the largest active body in the "electoral campaign," it appears from the partial results available that its candidates have not done as well as was expected and that on an average 60 per cent. of the votes have gone to the C.G.T., 20 per cent. to the C.F.T.C. and the rest to the friendly societies, parents associations, etc.

The crisis which arises at this time each year over wheat supplies has roused the press to unusual anger since last year's wheat harvest was so good that no difficulty had been expected in lasting out until the new harvest. It appears, however, that the prospect of a very poor harvest this year, due to the disastrous winter frosts, is causing farmers to hoard their wheat so that deliveries are falling short, while imports from America are behind schedule and too much home-grown wheat has been fed to livestock. In Paris last week a quarter of the bakeries closed because of lack of flour. The Government has now been forced to reduce the bread ration from 300 to 250 grams a day and to prohibit the making of all cakes. It is anticipated, moreover, that the reduced ration will have to remain in force until August 1948, and that France will need imports of two-and-a-half million tons of wheat in 1947–8. The blow is particularly bitter in view of the fact that bread rationing, though legally in force this winter, had virtually lapsed.

SWITZERLAND

As a result of Swedish restrictions on imports there has been a certain amount of heart burning in Swiss commercial circles on the question of currency revaluation. Switzerland takes credit for having at an early date determined to maintain her policy of a stable currency. It is being emphasized that Sweden will adhere to the provisions of her commercial agreement with Switzerland, which is valid until the 30th June, 1947.

Negotiations with Czecho-Slovakia have resulted in a new commercial and payments agreement, valid until the 29th February, 1948. Swiss exports will be mainly machinery, instruments, textiles, watches, agricultural produce, and dyestuffs. Imports from Czecho-Slovakia will include sugar, agricultural produce, iron, paper, footwear, machines, chemicals, porcelain, glass and earthenware. In view of the favourable development of trade between the two countries quotas have been considerably extended. In addition, it is agreed that the interest on Swiss investments in Czechoslovakia may be transferred, as well as property of Swiss emigrants returning from that country.

The housing shortage, which affects all chief towns in Switzerland, is particularly serious in Zürich, where the number of persons for whom emergency accommodation has to be found is rapidly increasing. Figures up to the middle of March showed that 1,530 persons had been housed in that way. To meet the situation the authorities are considering a prohibition on removals into Zürich, the use of military barracks for emergency accommodation, and the extension of protection for tenants to cover even those in single rooms. It is hoped that the favourable conditions which at present apply in the building industry will bring about some alleviation of the situation this year.

The provisional returns of the Federal Railways for 1946 show total receipts of 581 million francs, as compared with the estimated revenue of 486 million francs. A readjustment of tariffs for both goods and passengers, which took effect from the 1st April, is expected to yield another 5 per cent.

The money market remains liquid. The Confederation has recently redeemed loans to the value of 175 million francs. New issues of public loans and industrial securities are quickly taken up. Indeed, in the expectation of substantial dividends, several Swiss industrial shares have recently shown a rise on the local stock exchange. The average yield of Federal Bonds is 3·05 per cent.

All restrictions on the use of electricity have been cancelled throughout Switzerland.

ITALY

On the 20th April elections were held in Sicily for the new Regional Parliament in accordance with the Statute granted to the Island last May under the terms of which Sicily was to be given autonomy within the political unity and constitutional laws of the Italian Republic. The whole question of Regional autonomies in Italy has still to be threshed out in the Constituent Assembly, and there is likely to be strong opposition to the proposed granting of special autonomy to Sicily, Sardinia, Val d'Aosta and Trentino-Alto Adige as well as to the general plan of provincial and regional decentralisation. The holding of elections for a Regional Parliament in Sicily is considered in many quarters as premature, but the Government have evidently felt that the holding of elections might placate the Sicilians and at least enable the Sicilian point of view to be put forward when the question of autonomy is discussed by the Constituent Assembly. As far as any amelioration of economic conditions is concerned, little or nothing has been done to appease the Sicilians, whose ideas of economic autonomy persist,

As compared with the General Elections in June 1946 the Popular Bloc has increased its percentage of votes from 21·5 to 31·5 while the Christian Democrat percentage has fallen from 33·6 to 21·1.

There are two particularly interesting features about these results, first the failure of the Monarchists, and in general of the right-wing parties, Monarchists, Qualunquists and Liberals together with the Separatists to obtain a majority over the Popular Bloc and the Republicans together, and secondly the success of the Popular Bloc in this stronghold of monarchy and of conservatism. The Christian Democrats have done rather better than they did in the Sicilian municipal elections, but they obtained 240,000 fewer votes than they did in June in a poll which was only 75,000 votes smaller. There can be no doubt that there was a decided swing to the left on the part of many former Christian Democrat supporters, for the Liberal–Qualunquist–Monarchist parties also lost 50,000 votes.

The victory of the Popular Bloc is ascribed in large measure to Communist energy and to skilful manœuvring, exemplified particularly in their voting for the inclusion of the Lateran Pacts in the new Constitution. This action may have soothed the fears of a number of gullible persons who had hitherto taken fright at the wicked anti-clericalism of Communists. But the left-wing success is probably also partly due to the miserable economic conditions of Sicily. The Christian Democrats are of course the successors of the Popular Party of the early 1920s, which was strong in the island, and they, as well as other Parties, have made many promises of help to Sicily. But nothing has been done to remedy the malarial conditions, the lack of water and neglect by absentee landlords. Many of the voters are doubtless tired of empty promises, and also realize that the Christian Democrat Party includes not only honest reformers but some of the big landowners whom the peasants regards as their worst enemies.

While it is true that the Saragat Socialists have had little time—and perhaps little money—to work up an election campaign, there is no sign yet that they have got that solid working-class backing which is the sine qua non of a successful Socialist party.

There has been heated debate both in the Constituent Assembly and all over the country on the question whether article 23 of the Constitution should read : "The Republic recognises the rights of the family as a natural association based on indissoluble matrimony" or, as amended by Saragat, "based on matrimony" omitting the word indissoluble. To the outsider it seemed that the vote to include in the Constitution the Lateran Pacts which forbid divorce had disposed of the possibility of divorce in Italy. But evidently many Italians felt strongly that the phrase "indissoluble matrimony" strengthened the hands of the opponents of divorce to an immeasurable degree. So strong was feeling on both sides that the Deputies demanded a secret ballot. The Communists supported the Saragat amendment, and by a majority of 3 the word "indissoluble" was omitted. The Osservatore Romano is not unnaturally furious, but it is surely indiscreet, to say the least, when it attacks what it calls "the criminal procedure of the secret ballot" in the voting.

The Yugoslav Government have presented two Notes demanding the immediate surrender of Yugoslav "quislings" in Italy. One Note was addressed jointly to the British and U.S.A. Governments and stated on the question of accused war criminals that "nothing has been done for two years" in spite of repeated Yugoslav demands. This Note flatly rejected the contention that Allied military authorities in Italy had no responsibility for Yugoslav "quislings" living outside camps.

SOUTH-EAST EUROPE

Roumania

There is some talk of a new Roumanian political party backed by the Russians which has been formed for the purpose of attracting the more moderate elements of the population. It is called "The National Union for Work and Reconstruction." Reports say that it is headed by Constantin Argetoianu, assisted by some little known members of the Communist Party who are trusted by their chiefs. One of these men has been provided with funds and facilities for the publication of a new daily newspaper. It seems incredible that this Constantin Argetoianu can be the same person who became Prime Minister of Roumania after the murder of Armand Călinescu in September 1939, and whose antecedents by no means suggest sympathies with Communism. He was, however, in 1943 reported to be founding a "centre party." Roumanian politicians do strange things.

It appears that pressure is being put upon the ex-satellite countries to prevent the establishment of theological institutes on the ground that Russia is well supplied with such establishments and is glad to receive students from Roumania and neighbouring countries. A certain number of Roumanian theological students have always done at least part of their training in Russia, and this is a good plan so long as no attempt is made to bring political pressure to bear. For some years before the war a scheme existed for the exchange of Roumanian and English theological students. But all this is very different from insistence by Russia on the privilege of supplying the Roumanian Church with Russian-trained clergy, which may very well be part of a plan for destroying the independence of the Roumanian Patriarchate, and possibly for substituting Old Slavonic for Roumanian as the liturgical language. The Liturgy has been said in the vernacular in Roumania since the XVIIth century.

The Minister of Communications, Professor Profiri, Dl Stoicu, Director-General of Railways and other officials left on May 28th for Budapest to discuss with the Hungarian Ministry of Communications matters concerning railway communications of interest to both countries.

Four ships have arrived at Constanţa with cargoes of grain from Turkey, the U.S.A. and France, amounting to over 1,600 wagon-loads, for the relief of the distressed areas of Roumania.

Yugoslavia

The joint communication to the Yugoslav Government on the subject of refugees in Italy which was made by H.M. Ambassador and the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires on April 8th, was not received with marked enthusiasm, nor did the news of the transfer of the četniks from Eboli to Germany seem very welcome. Official reactions have confirmed these impressions. In a long and bitter reply the Yugoslav Government have virtually rejected the proposals contained in the first note. They insist that His Majesty's Government and the U.S. Government are responsible for the surrender of all quislings in Italy, whether in camps or at large. They appear deliberately to have confused the British and American insistence on a prima facie case being made out against persons believed to be quislings with the question of their subsequent trial, and they appear determined to see in British and American policy only the desire to keep as many Yugoslav refugees and quislings as possible from returning to their mother-country. The news of the transfer of the četniks provoked an equally uncompromising response. It is regarded not only as quite unnecessary, but even as a hostile act directed against the Yugoslav Government. The Yugoslavs are apparently convinced that the četniks are being moved to existing camps in the British zone of Germany where they will be no less highly organised than they were at Eboli, and subject to similarly undesirable influences.

Yugoslav organs of publicity have, of course, reacted most unfavourably. The most notorious quislings and war criminals are said to be flocking to Eboli from their hiding-places in Italy in order to be taken to "safety" in Germany. It is also alleged that the British authorities are holding other quislings in gaol and ignoring all requests for their surrender. This is quite untrue. Nine of those who have been rounded up during the screening of British-controlled camps are now on their way to the Yugoslav frontier and should be in the hands of the Yugoslav authorities by April 28th.

There has been so much publicity about the Five-Year Plan for industrialisation and electrification since the beginning of the year that it might be assumed to be already in operation. Indeed the Budget for 1947 was drawn up on the basis of the Plan. But in fact the Plan was not introduced to the National Assembly until the 23rd April. The approval of the Assembly is, of course, a mere formality and a foregone conclusion, but the "debate" will no doubt provide an opportunity for explaining to the public the benefits to be gained from the industrialisation of Yugoslavia. M. Hebrang, who introduced the Bill, announced that 278,300,000,000 dinars were to be invested in the Plan, of which 120 milliard were to be allocated for the development of industry, particularly heavy industry, 30 milliard for electrification, 72 milliard for communications and 19½ milliard for agriculture. He said that it was planned to increase output by 66 per cent. in industry and by 90 per cent. in mining. A 50 per cent. increase-in the yield per hectare was also envisaged. M. Hebrang did not say by what means these increases in "labour productivity" were to be obtained.

Greece

At the meeting of the Chamber on the 22nd April the Premier reviewed the Government's work during the two months' recess. M. Maximos, after warmly thanking Great Britain for past help, referred to the Greek Government's appeal to the United States. The Government realised that the proposed assistance meant a greater obligation on the part of Greece to sustain democratic ideals. To be worthy of American help Greece must suppress the rebels who were trying to establish a totalitarian régime and must also curb all other anti-democratic manifestations. The Greeks could then turn all their efforts to reconstruction, success in which would be the justification for President Truman's policy. The Government regretted the need to impose law by force but would couple continued generosity to those who surrendered with stern measures against the rest. They had turned the corner, thanks to the work of the armed forces, but there were still trials ahead. The Government meanwhile had given all possible aid to the United Nations Commission and awaited their findings with a quiet conscience. During the debate which followed M. Sofoulis deprecated the Government's use of force to end the rebellion and urged a greater extension of the amnesty, while MM. Markenzinis and Turkovasilis thought the Government's measures not drastic enough and urged them to outlaw all leading Communists.

The Greek Army have continued to make satisfactory progress against the rebels. The commander of the Second Army Corps has announced that the whole mountainous region of Thessaly from the line Metsovo–Kalabaka south-wards to Karpenisi, an area of 4,000 square kilometres, is now under State control. He added that, since operations began, more than two-thirds, about 1,200, of the estimated number of bandits in this area had been either killed or captured, or had voluntarily surrendered. (British sources, quoting reports received up to the 23rd April, have not so far confirmed more than about half this number.) It is estimated, however, that, in this heavily wooded country, many bandits are escaping and it may take many months before the country is completely cleared.

Further north there have been several more reports of bandits escaping over the border into Bulgaria and Yugoslavia: it is confirmed, for instance, that in the course of mopping-up operations in the Mount Belesh area, north-east of Doiran, a band (closely pursued by Greek military forces) crossed into Yugoslav territory whence they opened fire on their pursuers. In the same area a Greek Spitfire shadowing bandits near the border was fired on both by Greek bandits stationed on the highest ridge of Belesh, who fired down on the aircraft flying below them on the Greek side of the mountain, and by other Greek bandits on Yugoslav territory immediately North of Lake Doiran.

In the Peloponnese the situation is again reported to be bad. The main reason given for the recent deterioration in the situation is that the large number of armed "Rightists" has become divided between (a) those owing allegiance to local Populist leaders like Mavromikhalis and Turkoyasilis and (b) followers of Zervas. These factions have on occasion fought among themselves. Meanwhile, on the 23rd April, Communist bands on Mount Parnon who were only temporarily dispersed almost without casualties in Zervas's recent operations, inflicted a severe reverse on a gendarmerie company which is reported to have lost 70 to 80 men.

Discussions have continued on the nature and the terms of reference of the rearguard section of the United Nations Frontier Commission which is to be left in Greece.

Albania

The press and wireless campaign against this country has been kept up unremittingly by the Albanian authorities. Thus the Tirana Radio's political commentator told his French-speaking listeners on the 21st April that if they were fair-minded they would have to admit that the U.K. Government had deliberately engineered the Corfu Channel incident and its sequel in order to create trouble for Albania, whose "only crime is that she occupies a strategic position in the Mediterranean. The British would like Albania to become their operational base, like Greece." The only trouble for us was that although "the Albanian people have always been anxious to establish friendly relations with the British people," they had "learnt a few lessons from this war" and were now "resolved to go their own way and pursue a foreign policy of complete independence." In view of the fact that Enver Hoxha is at least as much in Tito's power as Tito himself is in Stalin's, the last sentence of this broadcast appears to stand in some need of qualification.

A new Albanian Minister to the U.S.S.R. called Mihal Prifti left Tirana for Moscow on the 19th April. He does not appear to have held a post of any great importance or responsibility before, and his main task now will certainly be to transmit home faithfully and promptly the orders that he receives from the Kremlin.

Bulgaria

During April the chief subjects discussed by the Grand National Assembly have been foreign policy and the budget. The (Communist) Minister of the Interior dropped perhaps the most interesting remark made in the course of the budget debate when he was unexpectedly asked by an Agrarian deputy if it was true that there were 35,000 secret service agents employed in the State Security Department. "No," answered M. Yugov without turning a hair, "we have only 3,167." (Presumably it depends on whom you include and whom you leave out.) The most interesting speech during the foreign policy debate was that made by M. Petkov, who defined the attitude of the Agrarian Opposition in some detail. On many points in this one field they find themselves in agreement with the Government. The whole Bulgarian people, he tactfully said, stood for the maintenance of cordial relations both with the Soviet Union and with Yugoslavia. At the same time there could surely be no question of Bulgaria's being seriously asked to cede Pirin Macedonia to Yugoslavia: on the contrary, the Bosilegrad and Tsaribrod strips of territory [taken from Bulgaria in 1919 under the Treaty of Neuilly] ought in justice, he thought, to be given back, and he hoped that as a friendly gesture Yugoslavia would formally waive her reparations claims. Good relations with Greece, he felt, were dependent upon the establishment of really democratic governments in both countries [i.e., not only in Greece] and upon the acknowledgment of Bulgaria's claim to Western Thrace. Petkov deplored the Government's "malicious" press campaign against the United States and Great Britain, which, he said, ought to be stopped at once and could only do their own country harm in the long run. By their gratuitous mishandling of the recent currency changes they had alienated these two great Powers still further, and also in particular France, already upset by the needless restrictions being imposed on French schools. He also took this opportunity to criticise the Bulgarian diplomatic service as "corrupt and incompetent." [The great majority of the old career diplomats were dismissed during last year's purge and replaced by Communist nominees.] The Government had little enough to say to all this in reply.

Reliable reports disclose that the Sovietisation of former German businesses and industrial establishments in Bulgaria is in full swing. The Fokke-Wulf Aircraft Company, the Deutsche Lufthansa, the Société Allemande de Navigation Danubienne, Siemens Schuckert, Bayer-Farma and other undertakings have all been taken over by the Russians, and so has the Deutsche Bank. Moreover, all State-owned factories connected with the armaments industry have Russian specialists and inspectors working in them. It is believed that the Pirin coal-mines have a new and exclusively Soviet-run directorate, while several of the engineers and foremen are certainly Russian. On the other hand, since the last elections in November 1946, the number of immigrant Russian families in Bulgaria is thought to have remained almost stationary at the approximate figure of 65,000 persons. A few hundreds may have arrived at Plovdiv during March. For whatever purpose, the Soviet Legation at Sofia are believed to have changed 800 million leva on or about the 7th March, exclusive of the funds of the Soviet military authorities. It is said, incidentally, that ordinary Bulgarian citizens are becoming increasingly restive and indignant at the shameless way in which the officers in command of the various Occupation Army units allow their men to strip requisitioned premises bare, right and left, removing not merely beds, blankets and upholstery, but even window-frames and doors.

With the exception of the popular banks, all co-operative organizations have by now joined the Communist-dominated central union.

The Government press has denied any intention of nationalising the land.

Turkey

While waiting for President Truman's proposals to take final shape in Washington, the Turks have maintained a robust attitude towards the Soviet Union. The Turkish press has been busy answering the familiar Soviet charges of past collaboration with Germany. It has for the most part ignored charges of present subservience to Anglo-American imperialism and capitalism which are represented as turning Turkey into a satellite in order to secure the oil-fields of Mosul. Nor, being fully determined to accept no American conditions involving any loss of sovereignty, do the Turks appear to have been affected by Soviet fictions to the effect that, contrary to the tradition of Atatürk, the Turkish army will be put under American command and into American uniforms. The Turks have retaliated for past abuse on the subject of Armenia by publicising an account of the "Soviet paradise" given by certain Armenians who appear to have been induced by the Soviet authorities to return to Soviet Armenia and to have been thankful to escape from it. (See also under "Soviet Union.") Further, the Soviet Government are roundly blamed for the breakdown of the Moscow Conference. But perhaps the clearest indication of the way the wind is blowing in Angora is the acquittal of various Turks who had for many months been on trial for indulging during the war in Panturanian—and therefore anti-Russian—activities. Judgment was pronounced some weeks ago and appears to be final.

When Maximos V was elected Œcumenical Patriarch in February 1946, he was generally regarded as a strong character who might do something to raise the Patriarchate from its fallen state. It was not long, however, before he had a severe nervous breakdown, and this still continues. The likelihood that Maximos V may soon die or have to be replaced is a matter of some international importance. Soviet Russia, whose policy amounts to resuming the traditional Tsarist rôle of protector of the Orthodox Christians in the Near East, covets the Œcumenical Patriarchate as an admirable instrument for influencing local opinion. She has failed so far to get a foothold at the Phanar and, though now pursuing the alternative of intriguing for the transfer of its primacy to the Patriarchate of Moscow, she would doubtless be glad to obtain the election of a Russian nominee. The Western Powers have no interest in such an increase of Soviet influence at Istanbul. To Greece any such development would be doubly objectionable, since it would help to postpone to a remote future the realisation of the now dormant "Great Idea" of a Greek Constantinople. Turkey, the sovereign Power, has little to fear from Greece in present conditions of Turco-Greek interdependence and friendship, but it is vital for her to prevent the Patriarchate from passing under Soviet influence. Her interest is therefore that the Patriarchate should not be so feeble as to invite Soviet intervention, nor so strong as to be again the champion of Greek nationalism. The Orthodox in Turkey and abroad can but desire to see some measure of strength restored to an institution whose authority recently extended from the Adriatic to the Caucasus, but, since the expulsion of the Greeks in 1922, has been confined to the remnant in Istanbul. Shorn of properties, revenues and the offerings of most of the faithful, the Œcumenical Patriarchate to-day presides over a depressed little community of some 80,000 souls who can hardly provide a quorum of bishops for the Holy Synod nor candidates for bishoprics when they fall vacant. Moreover, in the administration of its churches, schools, hospitals and other institutions the Greek community of Istanbul is still exposed to arbitrary and vexatious interference by the Turkish authorities.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Nokrashy Pasha has deliberately delayed the presentation of the Egyptian case to the Security Council of the United Nations in the hope of strengthening his position in the country before doing so, and, possibly, with some hope also that last-minute concessions by His Majesty's Government might do away with the necessity to refer to the United Nations at all. But there are now signs that the matter can be put off no longer, and the Ahram talks of the middle of May as a probable date for the case to be brought up, giving as reasons for the delay the need to await the conclusion of the Moscow Conference and the undesirability of overlapping with the discussions on the Palestine problem. The press appear to think that the Egyptian delegation will argue that the 1936 Treaty is invalid because it includes clauses "contrary to the Charter of the United Nations," as al Misri puts it. The writer of this article argues that Great Britain alone has no right to assume responsibility for the protection of the Suez Canal, which should be assured by the Security Council. Nokrashy Pasha, in a conversation with the correspondent of The Times, has taken much the same line. He held that there is no justification for the retention of British forces on Egyptian territory, and said that evacuation to the Canal Zone did not satisfy his views on the matter. The Assembly of the United Nations, he said, had pronounced against the retention of the troops of one country on the territory of another without that other's agreement, and the Egyptians, seeing no present or early threat, and regarding the 1936 Treaty as having been designed to meet circumstances which no longer exist, did not now agree to the presence of British troops. He suggested that reference to the Security Council could be obviated if His Majesty's Government, "as an act of policy, based on an examination of what was right and just, independent of political and strategic objections," were to withdraw their troops from Egypt forthwith. He was insistent that such a decision must not have the appearance of a concession wrung by Egypt from His Majesty's Government. His Majesty's Ambassador interprets Nokrashy's insistence on this point as due in part, at any rate, to his feeling that such a decision would amount to His Majesty's Government dropping the claim that the 1936 Treaty is still in force, which would remove the necessity for Egypt to go to the United Nations to argue its invalidity. It is not clear what Nokrashy would hope to gain in the question of the Sudan. He says that, if he could announce that British troops would be out of Egypt by the spring of 1948, Egypt's aspirations would be satisfied and a new treaty could be concluded in three months. He refused to commit himself on the terms of a treaty, and said it was impossible to say in advance what the treatment of the Sudan question would be.

Although Nokrashy Pasha, in the interview quoted above, referred only to the removal of British troops from Egypt, the Cairo press assures its readers that immediate and complete evacuation of all foreign troops from Egypt and the Sudan will be demanded before the Security Council. The Egyptian Government will thus presumably claim the invalidity not only of the 1936 Treaty, but of the 1899 Agreement by which the condominium in the Sudan was established; or, alternatively, that Egypt has sovereign rights over the Sudan and that she is entitled to demand the removal of foreign troops from that country as well as from Egypt.

Palestine

The imminence of the discussions on Palestine before the Asssembly of the United Nations has not produced a more helpful attitude from the Jewish Agency. After the attack on the Cairo train on the 22nd April the High Commissioner sent for Mr. Ben Gurion, the Chairman of the Agency Executive, and warned him in the gravest possible terms of the inevitable results of a continuance of acts of violence, e.g., tightening of military control and the liquidation of much, if not all, of what the Jews had built up. But Ben Gurion, although he reaffirmed his desire to stamp out terrorism, gave no hope of co-operation with the security forces. His Excellency's reference to the illogicality of taking up this attitude while the matter is sub judice at the United Nations Assembly merely produced the argument that the matter was not sub judice, and that His Majesty's Government were still bound to interpret the Mandate as the Jews read it. However, in spite of unwillingness to co-operate actively with the authorities, the Jewish Agency have announced in the press a new drive against terrorism, which will be directed principally to "systematic education" in the youth movements, which are recognised as the factories of anti-British sentiment and terrorism.

On the 25th April a Post Office vehicle was stolen in Tel Aviv and two hours later was driven up to Sarona camp by two men pretending to be workmen of the Posts and Telegraph Department. Their passes were apparently in order, and nothing suspicious was found in the vehicle although it was searched. The men left the vehicle near the Depot Headquarters, where it afterwards exploded causing the death of a British Inspector and three British constables, and injuries to ten others, British, Arab and Jewish.

Assistant-Superintendent of Police Conquest was murdered in a Haifa street by two Jewish youths about noon on the 27th April.

A 300-ton steamer registered at Istanbul was intercepted on the 21st April and boarded when she entered territorial waters on the 23rd April. Some opposition was offered, but the 773 illegal immigrants were got off and the majority were immediately trans-shipped to Cyprus. No master or crew were found on board.

The hunger-strike at the Cyprus camps (see last week's Summary) was called off after lasting for ninety hours.

Apart from the communiqué issued after the recent meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Arab States at Damascus (see under "Arab League" in last week's Summary) there is little indication of the tactics which the Arab delegates will follow in New York. They are believed, however, to be strongly opposed to the appointment of any fact-finding commission after their previous experiences of such bodies, and may try to insist upon the whole question being discussed at the General Assembly. The Amir Faisal, who is representing Saudi Arabia, spoke with much earnestness and feeling to the Oriental Minister in Cairo of the disaster which an upheaval in the Middle East would be to both the Arabs and the British.

There is little political activity evident on the part of the Palestine Arabs, and the Mufti, in spite of rumours of his departure to Syria or the Lebanon being imminent, remains in Cairo.

Demands which have been put forward for the Jewish Agency to have official representation at the Assembly, on the ground that it is recognised as the representative of Jewry in regard to Palestine, have not gone unopposed. The American Council for Judaism, which is strongly assimilationist, and the American League for a free Palestine, are both against any such representation. The former says that it regards the American delegation as the only spokesmen for American Jewry; the latter that recognition of the Jewish Agency would imply either that Jewish citizens of countries other than Palestine are not full citizens, or that they have a dual allegiance.

Iraq

Mulla Mustafa Barzani (see last week's Summary under "Persia") was reported by the Chief of the Persian General Staff to have left Persia on the 18th April with 500 armed men and 6 Persian army deserters, and to be heading for Barzan. His Majesty's Ambassador, Baghdad, reports that Mulla Mustafa entered Iraq, having come via Turkish territory, accompanied by 200 armed followers. He has now withdrawn to the neighbourhood of Argosh, north north-east of Barzan, where he is penned in by the Iraqis, who are being helped by the Turks. There appears to be a possibility of his being able to break back into Persia, but the harrying that he has received from the Persian army will doubtless not tempt him to do so, except as a measure of desperation. All reports testify to the skill and endurance of the Barzanis; His Majesty's Consul-General, Tabriz, writes of their "superb fighting qualities."

The attitude of the Iraqi Government is to refuse to grant them an amnesty, and to demand unconditional surrender. They also insist on punishment for the leaders of the Dohuk insurrection of July, 1945, which led to action by the Iraqi army against the Barzanis and their eventual entry into Persia in October of that year. So far, there are no signs of a sympathetic rising among the Kurdish chiefs of Iraq.

Persia

On the 22nd April El Aris, the leader of the delegation from the World Federation of Trade Unions, submitted his report for the signature of his colleagues. Harries, the British representative, stated that he could not agree to this report which was, in effect, a sweeping indictment of the Persian Government and a vindication of Reza Rusta. El Aris then drastically amended the findings of his report, which now omit any reference to Rusta but confirm recognition by the World Federation of Trade Unions of the Central Committee of Trades Unions and recommend that the clubs and premises of the Persian Federation of Trade Unions be restored to the Federation. The revised report also urges the Government to release any innocent workers who have been imprisoned, and recommends that the new Trades Union elections be held under supervision of the World Federation of Trade Unions, following a congress of all Persian workers. Harries has initialled the recommendations, but has added a reservation to the effect that he cannot agree with many of the statements in the report itself.

The charges to be preferred against Reza Rusta (see last week's Summary) are much more serious than mere financial irregularities. According to the Minister of Labour he will be charged with undermining the security of the country, co-operating with the rebels and secessionists, inciting the citizens to insurrection, murder and encouraging the armed forces to mutiny.

The Pars News Agency has stated that Persia's reparations claim against Germany (see Summary No. 388) amounts to $955,000,000, a figure which has also been quoted by Muzaffar Firuz, Persian Ambassador to Moscow, in a statement to press correspondents.

The Persian left-wing press appears to be growing less hostile towards the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. This is largely due to the Company's policy of inviting Tehran editors to visit their establishments and see things for themselves. An article which appeared in Aras (which has replaced Iran-i-ma) in March is very fair towards the Company, as the following extracts shew. "The British are trying hard to approach the Persians . . . . The A.I.O.C. has already taken plenty of steps, and will take others in future, to satisfy the workers as far as possible." Such statements, coming from a paper like Aras, are decidedly healthy signs.

An Indian Trade Delegation, led by Mr. Isfahani, which has been visiting Tehran, has attracted much attention. Mr. Isfahani stated that the aims of the delegation, which had no political significance, were to improve trade and to strengthen the friendship between the two countries.

ASIAN RELATIONS CONFERENCE

The above Conference (see Summary No. 386) ended on 2nd April. The proceedings, if inconclusive, appear at least to have been reasonably harmonious, a fact which, considering the diversity of outlook represented, is somewhat remarkable. There does appear to have been a cleavage of outlook, however, as to whether the Conference should confine itself merely to exploratory issues—a view held by the Chinese delegation and an influential section of the Indian representatives—or should formulate a definite policy of Asiatic co-operation. The latter view was supported by delegates from South-East Asia and the Soviet republics, as well as by Nehru himself. There was unanimity of opinion on the need to resist foreign exploitation, but this was not accompanied by marked hostility towards the West. The correspondent of the News Chronicle has stated that the delegations from the smaller States shewed signs of nervousness against any tendency to dominate by India and China, regardless of the fact that, unless these two countries achieve internal unity, neither will be able to exercise much influence towards unifying Asia.

The one positive achievement of the Conference was the decision to set up an Asian Relations Organisation for which a Provisional General Council is to draw up a constitution. Nearly all the Asian countries, including the Soviet Republics, are represented on this body, over which Pandit Nehru will preside. The primary object is to co-ordinate the work of branch institutes for the study of Asian affairs in all the countries concerned. The next Conference is to be held in China in 1949.

That the Conference achieved so little is not surprising. Its very terms of reference precluded it from reaching any major decisions. Furthermore, it was hampered by the non-participation of the Muslim League, Mr. Jinnah staunchly refusing Pandit Nehru's efforts to secure his co-operation. But the Conference was not entirely valueless.

Summing up the position, Mr. Iqbal Singh, in The Spectator, states:—

> "It had a psychological value which cannot be exaggerated. It underlines the sense of Asiatic solidarity which had hitherto been only a sentimental assumption . . . . What is more, the Conference made it clear that there is no disposition in Asiatic political circles to-day any longer to tolerate foreign domination, or even patronage, and that from now on Asiatic nations are determined to take their full share in international affairs in their own right, rather than as agents of Western Powers."

THE FAR EAST

Japan

Unofficial returns for the general elections show only one striking change in the composition of the Lower House: the Social Democrat Party has increased its membership from 98 to 143 and thus becomes the major Party. Its gain has not, however, been obtained at the expense of the two conservative parties, which now together total 259 seats as against 253. Roughly speaking, the composition of the House is now:—

Liberals	133
Democrats	126
	—	259
Centre: Social Democrats	143

right and a left wing. Moreover what has been described for convenience as "Left," consists of several small parties, some of whom may be "attracted" to one or other of the larger parties. If the rather more go-ahead Democrats can agree on a policy (and also on an allocation of seats in the Cabinet), with the die-hard Liberals, the two Parties could form a fairly homogenous Government.

All the members of the present Cabinet stood for election, several for the first time, and were elected. The Communist Party made a poor showing, only 4 being returned (as against 6 in the last House). Of 79 women candidates 15 were elected as against 39.

In a special message General MacArthur declared that the basic issue before the electorate had been the selection of political philosophies; that of the totalitarian extreme Right had been discredited, that of the extreme Left was still at issue. Judged from a distance, the result seems to betoken a slight strengthening of liberal forces in the Lower House.

The results of the election to the Upper House (House of Councillors) are obscured by the return of 110 Independents out of a total of 250. These persons, however, are said to be mainly of conservative tendencies, and it is estimated that the House will consist of 188 Right Wing and 62 Left Wing members. It is to be noted that the Communists have secured 5 seats.

Korea

(See also under "Soviet Union.")

While the U.S. and Soviet Government are discussing possible terms on which to re-convene the Joint Commission, politicians in South Korea are busily stirring a witch's brew of intrigue, disorder, and murder. The supporters of Rhee Syngman, now due back from his visit to the United States, Japan and China, are preparing to welcome the return of the conquering hero. He is pictured as the man who stiffened the American back and extracted a promise of economic support. Demonstrations are to be held urging him to accept the position of head of the Government of South Korea, May Day is scheduled as an auspicious day for the inauguration of this new movement towards independence. It is an interesting pointer on Korean officialdom that the Chief of Metropolitan Police is openly reported to have transferred his allegiance from Rhee, the political leader, to Kim Koo, the militant head, of the Right Party. Kim, therefore, seems to have strengthened his position at the expense of Rhee.

Meanwhile the Communists have not been idle. They are training small mobile groups of 20 to 30 to foment disorders. Communists have been "infiltrated" into provincial Government departments and into the constabulary and police. On the 17th April, 12 of these policemen, together with 15 civilians and 3 agents from North Korea, were arrested while planning an attack on a police station. Both sides resort to terrorism. The latest exploit is the murder of the children of a worker who had refused to join the Communist ranks.

That life in Northern Korea is not all beer and skittles is suggested by the flow of refugees who are entering the Southern zone, sometimes at the rate of 1,000 per day.

French Indo-China

The arrival at Saigon of the French Ministers for War and Marine, together with the Chief of the Naval Staff, has been the signal for a fresh outburst of terrorist activity. A convoy on its way to Mytho, on the Mekong 40 miles south of Saigon, was ambushed and 44 persons were killed, including two Ministers of the Cochin-Chinese Government and a French Colonel. Nguyen Van Tam, the Minister of National Defence, who is said to be on the Viet-Minh Black List, was fortunate enough to come through unscathed. Previously, a bomb outrage in Saigon killed six Frenchmen and a number of Indo-Chinese.

Indonesia

On the 31st March, within a few days of the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement, Mr. Sjarir left Batavia in an aircraft especially sent by Pandit Nehru to take him to New Delhi in time to attend the final sitting of the Inter Asian Conference. With him went a number of other senior members of his Government, and this exodus brought to a temporary halt all further high-level discussions with the Commission General. The economic talks which had already started between Dr. van Hoogstraten and the Indonesian Minister for Economic Affairs, Dr. Gani, were suspended and Dr. Gani departed for Madioen, where at the Second Congress of the P.N.I. (Partai Nasional Indonesia) he was elected President of that party, despite its outspoken opposition to the Linggadjati Agreement to which Dr. Gani had but recently put his signature.

On the 10th April, Mr. Sjarir returned from India to find that, disturbed by the growing Indonesian agitation about independent foreign representation—fanned by a section of the Indonesian press—the Commission General had independently released the Notes officially exchanged between them and the Indonesian Delegates during the discussions which preceded the initialling of the draft Agreement. In the Commission's view this correspondence proves their contention that Article 15 of the Agreement shall be considered as providing for the admission of Indonesians to the Foreign Service, but not for independent Indonesian representation abroad until after the formation of the United States of Indonesia. The Indonesian leaders, on the other hand, are dissatisfied and claim that the correct interpretation of Article 15 is as set out in Mr. Sjarir's Note of the 20th November, 1946, that "in future qualified Indonesians will be appointed as representatives of the Indonesian Republic"—although Dr. van Mook had replied to this Note by pointing out that "diplomatic representation in the strictly international sense will not be possible before the formation of the United States of Indonesia." Endeavours to reach an understanding on this question with Mr. Sjarir have ended in a deadlock and, in these circumstances, the possibility cannot be overlooked of neighbouring States deciding to appoint diplomatic representatives direct to Jogjarkarta, thus aggravating an already delicate situation. His Majesty's Government and the United States, however, have made it clear that they will extend to the Indonesian Republic the de facto recognition accorded by the Netherlands under Article 1 of the Linggadjati Agreement, with continued recognition of the Netherlands Government as the sovereign in foreign and economic relations.

In the meantime attention has been centred on the endeavour to straighten out the more pressing economic problems. These discussions have not been made easier by Indonesian insistence that the Dutch must first lift their blockade of Indonesian ports, nor by the departure of Dr. E. J. van Hoogstraten for Australia to head the N.E.I. delegation for discussions concerning their respective war claims. It is understood that among the many points reviewed have been imports and exports, rice supplies, foreign exchange, and the return of the owners, or their representatives, to factories and estates situated within Republican-held territory. Some significance attaches perhaps to the fact that the representative of the Anglo-Dutch textile company, Nebritex (partly owned by Calico Printers Limited) has been granted permission by the Indonesian authorities to resume control experimentally of the Company's factory at Plered—near Pasaroen. At the same time Dr. Gani has given warning that foreign firms will be required to comply with Republican laws and regulations regarding production and distribution. Both sides appear at one in the conviction that all movements of imports and exports must be officially controlled and that certain State trading organisations should be set up with a joint economic planning board. Further discussions are expected to take place as soon as the Indonesian delegates return from Jogjakarta where they have been attending a full meeting of the Republican Cabinet to examine both the developments in connexion with the economic situation and the deadlock which has occurred over the question of foreign representation.

On the 22nd April, the first session of the East Indonesian Parliament was opened at Macassar. Both Dr. van Mook and the Commission General were present. In his inaugural speech M. Soekawati, the Interim President, surveyed events since the Malino Conference of the 16th July, 1946; voiced the expectation that they would soon be able to welcome Borneo into the family of the Indonesian States; and, after re-affirming his Government's intention to perform their share of co-operation in the formation of the United States of Indonesia, expressed appreciation of the manner in which the situation had been handled by Dr. van Mook, who, he hoped, did not contemplate resignation from his post.

An exchange of official visits between President Soekarno and the Commission General has been under contemplation, and it is understood that Dr. Idenburg will be going to Jogjakarta shortly to invite Dr. Soekarno to come to Batavia for this purpose. It has also been announced at the Hague that the Netherlands Prime Minister, Dr. L. J. M. Beel, and the Minister for Overseas Territories, Mr. J. A. Jonkman, will visit Java shortly for discussions with the Netherlands East Indies and Republican Governments. It is also announced that the Netherlands Minister of Finance, Professor P. Lieftinck, will leave for Batavia towards the end of April. After a brief stay in Java Professor Lieftinck is expected to accompany Dr. van Mook on a visit to the United States of America about the 18th

May, in the hope of arranging a substantial dollar credit for the Netherlands East Indies. It is thought that this request, which is supported by the Indonesian Republican Government, is likely to meet with a sympathetic reception in the United States and that, if granted, the loan is not likely to be unduly burdened with restrictive conditions. The Netherlands East Indies exchange control is threatened with a complete breakdown unless credits can be arranged, and in the meantime exchange is being refused for even the most essential imports for the rehabilitation of foreign enterprises.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

In his eagerly-awaited broadcast to the nation on the 28th April Mr. Marshall gave a restrained account of the difficulties which had prevented agreement from being reached by the four Foreign Ministers at Moscow. Agreement, he stated, had been made impossible because the Soviet Union had insisted upon proposals tantamount to establishing in Germany an administration which could be "too readily converted to domination by a régime similar to the Nazis." As regards the proposed Four-Power Pact to guarantee the demilitarization of Germany he had been "forced to the conclusion that the Soviet Government either did not desire such a pact or was following a course calculated to delay any immediate prospect of its adoption."

Among American press and radio commentators the negative outcome of the Moscow meeting has occasioned little surprise. Even before it wound up on the 24th April the Conference had been widely written off as a "total failure." Yet in the post-mortems which have followed the emphasis has been not so much upon the sense of frustration which such failure inevitably produces but upon the more positive significance of the Conference as marking the end of what has been called the "phoney peace." As the New York Herald-Tribune observes, "until the present, international policy has proceeded on the assumption that the war alliance retains its reality . . . . That assumption seems no longer tenable. The impasse at Moscow records a division too deep to give hope for a genuinely common policy which can be administered in the common interest." One or two thoughtful and cautious observers, like Mr. Sumner Welles, are willing to believe that there may still be hope, if the "highest authorities" in the Kremlin and in Washington resolve "to make a further attempt to negotiate the broad bilateral understanding upon which the fate of the world must now depend." Elsewhere, however, the conviction appears to grow that strengthening what the Philadelphia Inquirer calls the "Western association of nations" might be the wisest course to pursue in future.

That the United States can no longer think exclusively in terms of reaching agreement with the Soviet Union has frequently been emphasized in comment on the recent Senate approval of President Truman's plans for aiding Greece and Turkey (see last week's Summary). Drawing attention to the fact that the important details of the President's programme have still to be worked out, some commentators suggest that the "way in which it is administered will be vital to the success or failure of the policy." Those who will be responsible for the administration of the Greek programme are warned against using "direct political pressure" in that country and against allowing themselves to be influenced by British missions which may remain there. To this Mr. Walter Lippmann—still apparently a sceptic at heart—adds that what is to come of the Truman doctrine "depends on whether Marshall . . . . can translate our inchoate opposition to Soviet expansion into a realizable plan of action." The first objective, he states, should be "the conclusion of a treaty fixing definitely the boundaries of Greece, Turkey and Iran, the régime of the Straits and the distribution of the oil concessions.", The realization that such detailed considerations do in fact command urgent attention has lent interest to reports regarding the State Department's intention to set up a "Policy Planning Board." At his press conference on the 25th April Mr. Acheson confirmed that the Department was establishing such a Board and that this would be headed by Mr. George F. Kennan. Mr. Kennan has, significantly enough, been a member of the American diplomatic staff in Moscow.

A request which the President has made for a revision of the 1939 Neutrality Act has been well received, even by some who might have been suspected of harbouring a nostalgic attachment to the isolationist doctrine which inspired this Act seven years ago. In the message which he sent to Congress on the subject on the 15th April Mr. Truman urged that the executive power be given control over the export of armaments so that it could carry out its obligations under the United Nations Charter and deal effectively at the same time with "changes in the international situation." The burden of his argument was that, if war should ever again become imminent, it would be "intolerable" for the United States to find itself bound by its own laws to give aid and support to a Power which might later attack it.

Initial comment on the special session of the United Nations Assembly on Palestine has been mixed and inconclusive, although the Zionist organisations in New York have been much in evidence in pressing their claims. His Majesty's Goverment have again made representations to the United States Government regarding the continued Zionist appeals for funds to promote illegal immigration into Palestine, with the result that Mr. Acheson has undertaken inter alia to have an inquiry made into the possibility of discouraging the sale of American ships for illegal immigration purposes. Mr. Acheson believes, however, that it will be difficult to find any legal ground upon which to intervene in this matter. The State Department is clearly still subject to Zionist pressure on the immigration question. Partly perhaps for this reason it has been endeavouring to dissuade His Majesty's Government from having the United Nations Secretary-General appeal to other member-nations to deny transit facilities to Jews trying to get into Palestine illegally. Ostensibly the State Department fears that such action on the part of the Secretary-General might cause the special session of the Assembly to digress from its more immediate purpose to a general discussion on immigration policy.

The necessity of grappling with the pressing problem of high prices at home was once more emphasised by the President in the address which he delivered to the Associated Press in New York on the 21st April. The American system of private enterprise, Mr. Truman stated, was being "tested before the world," and the persistent rise in prices was the one cloud which cast a shadow over the country's economic future. Again asserting that it rested with industry and business to halt the trend towards inflation, the President pointed out that labour also bore a share of the responsibility, although he conceded that his "counsel of moderation" as regards wage demands had generally been followed since January by the wage-earners and their leaders. In this connexion it is interesting to note that the agreement reached between the steel workers and the U.S. Steel Corporation last week for a wage increase of approximately 15 cents an hour has been followed by similar settlements between the General Electric, Chrysler and Jones and Laughlin Steel Companies and their employees. The President of General Electric admits, however, that his company must, as a result of the wage increases involved, raise the price of its products by about another 7 per cent.—a step which might help to send the wage-price spiral whirling upwards again.

Meanwhile the labour issue begins to look more and more like the rock upon which Republican unity, in the Senate at any rate, may founder. This week Senator Irving M. Ives (Republican, New York) and Senator Robert A. Taft (Republican, Ohio) have clashed openly in the Upper House on labour legislation. Senator Ives, a former Dean of the School of Industrial Relations at Cornell University, who is something of a labour expert in his own right, believes a number of clauses which Senator Taft has been endeavouring to write into the Senate labour bill to be unnecessarily stringent and he seems to have been able to persuade a majority on Senator Taft's own Labour and Public Welfare Committee to accept his point of view. There are also influences in favour of moderation at work outside the walls of Congress, the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labour having just set up a 1·5 million dollar "war" fund to combat the sort of restrictive labour legislation which the Republican diehards have been proposing. The A.F. of L. has yet to make it clear what this will mean in terms of 1948, but neither Senator Taft—a Presidential aspirant—nor any other Republican leader could afford to persist with a policy which would array labour solidly against him then.

LATIN AMERICA

Brazil

Throughout Latin America organised labour is acutely political: nevertheless, Brazilian syndicates are prohibited by a decree of July 1946 from indulging in political activities, and the Brazilian Government still continue to fumble with this far-reaching question of the position to be given to organised labour. Under Dr. Vargas an advanced system of labour legislation, embodied in the Consolidated Labour Laws of 1943, was introduced. After his removal both contestants in the 1945 presidential election favoured a progressive labour policy, but, as organised labour has divided its political support between Dr. Vargas and the Communists, the present régime has never been on particularly intimate terms with the syndicates. When the Ministry of Labour held a national congress last November, the result was merely an open split between the Communist-controlled Confederation of Brazilian Workers (C.T.B.) and the Unions favourable to the Ministry. The latter erected themselves into a National Confederation; but, failing to make any progress against their rivals or to obtain official backing, this Confederation was wound up in the middle of February. The Communists at once claimed that the C.T.B. was the officially recognized organisation, since it had complied with the law in publishing its statutes in the official Gazette. The Minister of Labour replied that only confederations approved by his Ministry could legally represent organised labour. This implies that the Government does not recognise the right of any movement to represent Brazilian labour in international organisations, such as the Confederation of Latin American Workers (C.T.A.L.).

Colombia

Shortly after the congressional elections held in the middle of March the Colombian cabinet again resigned (see Summary No. 387). President Ospina Pérez has now announced a new ministry, composed of six members of his own Conservative party, four Liberals who support Dr. Gaitán and two orthodox Liberals. As the elections did not give the Conservatives a clear majority, the President has adhered to his policy of preserving the coalition, but the composition of his new cabinet reflects the decline of the official liberals and the rise of the Gaitánistas. The eclipse of the official liberals is emphasised by the departure of Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo to become Director-General of the Pan American Union and that of Dr. Alfonso López, who is to represent Colombia on the Security Council. Dr. Gabriel Turbay left politics after his defeat in the presidential election, and the present leader Dr. Eduardo Santos, has planned a long visit to Europe. Whether the orthodox liberal party can survive without its giants remains to be seen.

Venezuela

Rumours of impending disturbances (see Summary No. 380) have again been rife. In the middle of April the Government sought powers from the Constituent Assembly for the detention of those suspected of sedition. Most of the potential insurgents were accordingly arrested, and confidence in the Government's power to control the situation was restored. In the course of the debate, the danger of civil war was discussed, and when one of the two Communist deputies declared that ex-President López Contreras was supported by United States imperialism, the United States Ambassador, who was in the diplomatic box, shouted: "That is a lie," and left the building. The incident attracted considerable attention in the press, even papers of the right appealing to Venezuelan "national dignity."

UNITED NATIONS

The General Assembly

The first Special Session of the Assembly met on the 28th April to study the question of Palestine. Dr. Aranha (Brazil) was elected President. Seven Vice-Presidents were elected from the following countries: France and U.S., 49 votes each, U.K., 47, China, 45, U.S.S.R., 44, Ecuador, 43, India, 37. The Chairmen of the six committees were chosen from Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Sweden, Poland and Honduras. The President, the seven Vice-Presidents and the six Chairmen form the Steering Committee which will discuss the agenda, and whether it shall be limited to the U.K. request for a Preparatory Committee on Palestine or shall include the Arab proposal for the end of the mandate and the recognition of an independent Palestine. Jewish requests for non-voting seats at the Assembly will also be discussed. (See also under "Middle East.")

International Wheat Conference

The final plenary session of this Conference (see Summary No. 385) was held on the 23rd April, five weeks after the draft agreement had been put before the delegates. In the meantime considerable changes had been made in the draft, largely because one of the chief wheat exporters (Argentina) declared they were unable to participate in an agreement. The result of these changes was to transform the original draft from a commodity agreement on the old pattern to what was in effect a multilateral long-term contract. Agreement was reached on the main principles of the new Draft. The U.K. was ready to approve the general plan of the draft, in the preparation of which it had played a major part and regarded it as a model for future international commodity schemes. A workable plan for the chief importing and exporting countries (excepting Argentina) was indeed in sight, but no agreement could be reached on the fundamental question of the prices that were to prevail under the agreement.

Under the plan as it now stands each signatory should adhere to this agreement as either an importing or an exporting country and should guarantee to import or export a specific quantity of wheat in each year of the agreement within a determined price range. The importers would guarantee to import their guaranteed quantities when the price was at the bottom of the range and the exporters to supply their guaranteed quantities when the price was at the ceiling. Member countries would undertake to maintain stocks as instructed by the International Wheat Council.

The draft agreement allows for freedom of trade within the price range, but the variation of prices is to be kept within bounds by agreed maximum and minimum prices intended to protect the consumer against overcharge and the producer against under-payment, while at the same time guaranteeing the consumer supplies in time of scarcity and the producer a sure market in times of surplus. The British delegation was able to agree to this system of "wheat points" (so called on the analogy of "gold points") but could not admit that the present spot and futures wheat prices on particular markets (i.e., Chicago) could be taken as the measure of a "reasonable" world price. The prices ruling on the world market before the war were, indeed, too low; but those being asked now are, in many instances, far too high. The world must face international wheat prices far lower than at present, and the U.K. desires that these may be reached soon. The price proposals in the draft agreement as it now stands, which were originally made by the U.S. delegation, did not, in the opinion of the British delegation, allow for a quick enough or big enough fall in prices. The U.K. could not afford to pay excessive sums for any of its imports, particularly for essential imports such as bread grains; but this draft would require excessive prices to be paid in future years. The U.K. was, therefore, unable to sign the draft as it stood. Canada was unwilling to sign if the U.K. did not, since an agreement without the U.K., the world's largest wheat importer, could hardly be expected to work. It was therefore proposed, as the Conference could get no further, that the draft be referred to the International Wheat Council for further consideration at a later date. It is possible that discussions may shortly be resumed in Washington.

The difference between the price offers of the prospective sellers and buyers does not seem great at first sight. The U.K. agreed very reluctantly to a ceiling price of 1·80 dollars a bushel for the term of the agreement and to a duration of 5 years. Its original proposals were a ceiling of 1·55 dollars and 4 years. The U.S. proposals, however, would not allow wheat prices to fall to 1 dollar until the fifth year of the agreement. To this the U.K. could not agree. It must be possible for prices by 1949–50 to come down to 1 dollar a bushel if there are plentiful supplies of wheat in the world by then. If prices like those in the Anglo-Canadian agreement could have been obtained (e.g., from 1·55 dollars a bushel in 1946–47 to not less than 1 dollar a bushel in 1949–50) it is probable that the draft might have been accepted; but, in view of the importance of a long-term wheat agreement for the British balance of payments, and of the probability that prices will soon be falling, the terms proposed were unacceptable.

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

The Foreign Ministers concluded their "Fourth Plenary Session," as the Moscow Conference is known officially, on Thursday the 24th April. It was the forty-third meeting. They will meet again in November in London, and may hold a brief unofficial meeting in September, if all four Ministers attend the Assembly of the United Nations in New York. The Deputies will continue their work probably in London, possibly in Berlin.

No important agreements were made, and yet the Conference was not a complete failure. By removing obscurities in the policy of Russia and of Great Britain, France and the United States, it made it easier for the Ministers to see the road to peace. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall each summed up the position. "I would rather," said Mr. Bevin, "take a long time and produce a good peace in the end, than have a loose one slopping over with false formulas," and Mr. Marshall: "the differences between the Western Democracies and Russia have been neither increased nor decreased during the Conference. We understand now what those differences are." Both Ministers declared that the differences could be solved, but their apparent optimism must be judged against the background of Mr. Marshall's question "How long can Europe endure while we are struggling with the problem?"

On the 23rd April the hard-worked Deputies produced a list of agreements, disagreements and conditional agreements on the German problem. As has so often been said before, agreement on the political organisation of Germany depends on agreement on the economic unity of Germany, which in turn depends upon agreement with the Russians upon reparations, &c.

A considerable amount of work has been done on the subject of procedure for preparing the peace treaty; but here again, partial agreements, though better than nothing, are to have no validity until agreement has been reached on the whole question. Part I of the Deputies' Summing-up deals with denazification, demilitarisation, &c. Agreements on this part go to the Control Council as directives, disagreements for information and study.

In attributing the rejection of the Four Power Treaty to M. Molotov, Mr. Marshall declared that his Government did not withdraw the offer. The Treaty therefore remains alive, though it is in a state of indefinitely suspended animation. Some apparent agreement was reached on the return of prisoners-of-war to Germany. Mr. Bevin's proposal of the end of 1948 as a final date was accepted. It should be recalled that Russia's figure of prisoners held by her is generally considered to be an under-estimate.

The Austrian Treaty, which the Foreign Ministers in New York had told their Deputies to prepare, failed to materialize because, as Mr. Marshall pointed out on the 23rd April, the Soviet had not advanced from the position which they had taken up in February, and because they had widened the gap between themselves and the West. They gave the clear impression that they did not desire peace with a "free and independent Austria." German assets remained one of the two centres of disagreement, since to accept the Russian interpretation would be to guarantee the dependence of Austria. Mr. Marshall proposed that the General Assembly should be asked to make recommendations for a settlement of the question if it was still outstanding in September. This proposal was immediately followed by the most startling and hopeful response that M. Molotov has made to Western ways of thought, a response which may prove to be the most important achievement of the Conference. It showed, provokingly late in the day, that the four Ministers could all practise the art of agreement through discussion, and that M. Molotov could, like his colleagues, tolerate a fact-finding commission. M. Molotov rejected an appeal to the Assembly; but proposed a commission of the four Powers to examine all the articles of the Austrian Treaty which were still in dispute, especially articles 35 (German Assets) and 42 (United Nations property in Austria). Mr. Marshall was anxious for a Committee of experts in Vienna to study the conditions for a final settlement of the German assets question, and Mr. Bevin insisted on the need to get at the facts of the "assets" and "property" questions. Chiefly as a result of his initiative the Council adopted the following decision: "The Council of Foreign Ministers agree to establish a Commission, consisting of representatives of the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and of France charged with the examination of all disagreed questions of the Austrian Treaty. The Commission shall include a Committee of Experts to give special consideration to Article 35 and the appropriate parts of Article 42 and to the establishment of concrete facts.

The aim of the Commission shall be to co-ordinate the points of view of the Allied Governments represented on it.

The Commission shall submit its report without delay to the Council of Foreign Ministers.

The Commission will sit in Vienna," and begin its meetings on the 12th May. Article 42 is the other centre of disagreement, because it includes oil, and Russia has an eye on these oil properties, which belong in part to Nationals of the Allies. The Russians have subsequently claimed that the co-ordination of the Allied points of view refers only to the question of German assets.

Two other matters were raised on the last day of the Conference, the size of occupation forces, and the return of German prisoners-of-war. Mr. Byrnes had originally proposed that Russia should maintain 200,000 men, the U.S. and the U.K. 140,000 each, with 70,000 for France. M. Molotov now suggested 200,000 Russians, 200,000 between the U.S. and the U.K. and 50,000 for France. Mr. Bevin replied with 145,000 each for the U.S. and the U.K. It was agreed that "considering the need to reduce the size of occupation forces in Germany, the Control Council should consider the question and determine the strength of the occupying troops of the four Powers as at the 1st September, 1947." The report should be submitted before the 1st June.

Mr. Bevin asked that the Powers still holding Austrian prisoners—Russia—and to a lesser extent France—should send them back now, in accordance with the spirit of Article 31 of the Austrian Treaty. M. Molotov refused to discuss this question.

SPECIAL ARTICLE

THE EASTERN ZONE OF GERMANY—II

The Organisation of Industry

The ultimate aim of the Occupying Power is the establishment of socialism on the Russian model, but in setting about it the Russians and the Socialist Unity Party (SED) display considerable tactical elasticity. In the early days of the occupation a wave of unplanned socialisation took place—apparently without Russian intervention. Its disorderliness hampered production at a time when the Russians were deeply concerned to get the maximum amount of goods out of their zone. Communist speakers were therefore encouraged to proclaim the virtues of private enterprise. The next phase aimed to produce orderly socialisation. It was initiated in June 1946 in Saxony State when a referendum was held on the question of expropriating enterprises owned by war criminals, Nazis and war profiteers. It was emphasised that the proposed measure did not aim at socialisation, but at the punishment of war criminals, and official propaganda implied that those who voted against the measure were hidden Nazis. A large majority voted "Yes." Subsequently similar laws were passed without referenda in the other States of the zone.

Liberal and Christian Democrat speakers later declared that many owners who were not Nazis had their plants listed for expropriation. Other reports indicated that several well-known Nazis succeeded in evading the law. Most of the confiscated plants were transferred to the State Governments or to local authorities, but some were sold and a number of the smaller firms were returned to their original owners. Thus in Saxony State the Government took over 1,119 out of the 1,866 firms which were finally expropriated and sold the rest to "victims of Fascism," resettlers, cooperatives, etc. Firms taken over by the State Governments are organised under one special administration or group

THE EASTERN ZONE OF GERMANY—II

The Organisation of Industry

The ultimate aim of the Occupying Power is the establishment of socialism on the Russian model, but in setting about it the Russians and the Socialist Unity Party (SED) display considerable tactical elasticity. In the early days of the occupation a wave of unplanned socialisation took place—apparently without Russian intervention. Its disorderliness hampered production at a time when the Russians were deeply concerned to get the maximum amount of goods out of their zone. Communist speakers were therefore encouraged to proclaim the virtues of private enterprise. The next phase aimed to produce orderly socialisation. It was initiated in June 1946 in Saxony State when a referendum was held on the question of expropriating enterprises owned by war criminals, Nazis and war profiteers. It was emphasised that the proposed measure did not aim at socialisation, but at the punishment of war criminals, and official propaganda implied that those who voted against the measure were hidden Nazis. A large majority voted "Yes." Subsequently similar laws were passed without referenda in the other States of the zone.

Liberal and Christian Democrat speakers later declared that many owners who were not Nazis had their plants listed for expropriation. Other reports indicated that several well-known Nazis succeeded in evading the law. Most of the confiscated plants were transferred to the State Governments or to local authorities, but some were sold and a number of the smaller firms were returned to their original owners. of administrations. Thus the "Industriewerke der Provinz Sachsen-Anhalt" contains 14 groups covering the principal industries. A board of directors is appointed by the President of the Province, and its decisions have to be approved by a board of management on which the unions and political parties are also represented. The group controls the greater part of the industry of the province. This is a process not merely of socialisation but of creating giant horizontal trusts leading to an economic system similar to that of the Soviet Union. There are in addition coal marketing boards run by the States as organs of the central administration. The districts and communes have also taken over businesses which are in some cases financed partly by private capital.

Socialisation is now being speeded up, and the final elimination of an independent middle class is in sight. Berlin radio of the 28th February announced that some 3,000 industries were now owned by State Governments, but this excludes railways and posts and works owned by districts, communes and cooperatives so that private enterprise plays a less important part than would appear from this statement. The pretext of denazification is still used to dispossess owners of small businesses. Nor are the authorities at a loss for other means. At the end of January 1947 a well-known pharmaceutical firm was expropriated on the grounds that it had "contributed a too small proportion of its profits to social purposes." The cooperative societies, largely under SED control, have been given special privileges in order to enable them to drive the small retailer out of business. The blocking of all bank accounts was a measure which tended also to squeeze out the middle class, though there is no evidence to show that it was introduced for this purpose. It was, in fact, justified on economic grounds alone since the assets on which the banks could pay out sums of money no longer existed. In the British Zone, moreover, the crisis has been aggravated by the disproportion between the amount of money circulating and the amount of goods available.

A special feature has been the establishment of "Soviet State concerns" which began in the summer of 1946. Its motive was simply the more effective control and exploitation of German economy for the benefit of the Soviet Union. These factories are estimated to account for approximately 27 per cent. of the total value of production in the zone. It appears that the central authority is a Soviet holding company under the Soviet Military Administration in Karlshorst. Under this company is a number of "combines" each covering one branch of industry. A firm is apparently taken over in the following manner. The Russian director of the combine makes an inventory of assets which are said to be usually valued at only 25 per cent. of their peace-time value. The inventory then goes to the Soviet holding company which cuts the figure by 50 per cent. The final sum is credited to Germany on reparation account. No credit is given for natural resources such as ores or forests owned by the firm, and no outstanding debts are taken over by the Russians. Besides German workers it is reported that hundreds of Russians have been brought from Moscow. The workers seem to be well treated but are paid on a complicated system of piece-rates, and the rights of trade unions are curtailed. Nearly all output goes to Russia and is not credited to Germany on reparation account. Some private firms, however, which had been transferred to Soviet administration are now being handed back to German administration. It is not definitely proved that the Russians are completely relinquishing their hold, but it is not improbable that the products from these factories will go to the German market.

Land Reform

The Land reform initiated in the autumn of 1945 in order to destroy the power of the Junkers was stated at the time to entail the expropriation of all owners of land over 100 hectares. The reform has, in fact, affected only about 60 per cent. of the land covered by large estates, and, of the land actually distributed, about 24 per cent. has not been given to individuals but has been reserved for communal use in some form. This suggests that the desire for spreading private ownership was not the only or even the main motive for the move. On the other hand, the proportion of land given to private owners was not inconsiderable, the impoverishment of the new peasants, no doubt, it was thought, would make it easy to take a further step towards collectivisation—they are already dependent to a large extent on central aid.

The Administration

The following organs of government exist in the Russian zone: (a) the Central departments; (b) the Laender or Province administrations; (c) the Landkreis (country district) administration; (d) the Stadtkreis (borough) and Gemeinde (commune) administrations.

C267262 A

There are 13 central administrations, the first of them having been set up in June 1945 in Berlin by order of the Russians. It aroused some comment that the other Allies were not informed, but the Russians could, with some justification, claim that this represented no departure from Allied policy. At that time the central administrations could no more be regarded as a zonal government than the subsequently formed Zonal Advisory Council in the British zone, much less the States Council in the U.S. zone. The administrations were then merely executive organs of the Soviet Military Administration (S.M.A.), and there was no connecting link, apart from the S.M.A., between the individual administrations. In the first few months the "advice" given by these departments to the Provincial and State Authorities appears to have been frequently ignored, but gradually it became clear that this "advice" was acquiring the force of law and that the departments were issuing circulars not originated by the Russians. In November 1946 a formal change of power was made when the administration for Labour was given the right to issue orders and even supervise the local administrations. In February 1947 the Russians ordered the State Governments to place themselves "voluntarily" under the orders of a central administration for industry. Despite this progress towards centralisation there is still no direct link between the administrations which would give them the character of a real zonal government.

Constitutions have been passed for all the other levels of government. At their face value they are an expression of democratic principles, and where they differ from those of the Western zones they frequently appear to ensure more democratic control and greater decentralisation. Only when viewed in the context of the political system as a whole is it seen that the democratic provisions are vitiated.

All the Soviet zone State Constitutions affirm that the States are part of a German democratic republic, and all are based on a Draft Constitution for the whole of Germany which the Socialist Unity Party published in November 1946. This in turn is based on the Weimar Constitution—with a number of significant differences. The SED believes that National Socialism came to power largely by exploiting the institution of State President, and particularly the Article which made it possible to govern by emergency decree. The SED do not, therefore, provide for any President except as a figure-head. They wish the only source of authority to be a one-chamber parliament unhampered by a supreme constitutional court, a really independent judiciary or even a non-political civil service. In short, there must be no obstacle to dictatorship by the strongest party and the door is therefore left open to the one-party State. It is in this conception that the Soviet zone constitutions differ most profoundly from those so far drafted in Western Germany. The system of proportional representation is maintained. "Permitted" political parties and organisations" can put up candidates, but no clue is given as to which are permitted. As in the U.S. zone, use of the referendum is included. Lay judges are to be appointed for all types of court in the States. The judges of the highest courts are to be elected by the parliaments. These lay or "peoples'" judges are said by the SED to prevent the judiciary from being the preserve of the academically-trained middle class. Land reform, expropriation measures, and school reform are incorporated. There is complete separation of church and State. The sections on "personal rights" seem to follow closely on those of the Weimar Constitution and similarly qualify them by stating "Exceptions are only permissible on the basis of laws."

The various district constitutions and the uniform communal code bear out the principle of concentrating all power in the Assemblies. As in the British zone, these are elected by the inhabitants and are supreme in their own district, but, unlike the British zone, the assemblies also elect their chief executive officers so that there is no separation of functions and no non-party civil service. The mayors of the communes follow the German tradition, departed from in the British zone, of combining the chairmanship of the assembly with the office of chief executive. At first glance these codes embody to a unique degree the principles of democracy and decentralisation, going further than those in force before 1933 and even than the constitutions of Western Germany. Thus the chief district official is elected by the district instead of appointed by the State, as formerly. Both district and communes are free to take over economic undertakings, whereas in the British zone, they are restricted in this field. Again, however, there is in practice scarcely any obstacle in the path of one-party domination. Moreover the actual functions of the authorities are still vague and are to be defined by "special laws." Suspicion that these may render negative the democratic provisions are strengthened by a Draft Law for one State which has become available. This proposed to exclude the following from the power of the communal authorities: the grading of employees; matters of general organisation and 14 types of police. The latter were to include "press police" and "Public meetings police" and even "political police," although anything of the last-named type is forbidden by the Control Council and would tend to deprive the communes of their autonomy.

Education and Youth

The contrast between Eastern and Western Germany is perhaps more marked in this field than in any other. In the Soviet zone uniformity and regimentation are the order of the day, and schools are being used to instil Communist ideology. The school system has been entirely reformed. Formerly there was a Grundschule for all children from 6–10 followed by the Oberschule from 10–18. There is now a uniform primary compulsory school up to the age of 14, after which about 10 per cent. of the pupils go to Oberschule and others to technical schools or part-time classes. All private schools are banned. The institution of this uniform school has been a demand of Left-wing circles since before 1919. In the West the Weimar compromise of a single school up to the age of 10 has been maintained. From the purely educational point of view the Soviet zone standard is not likely to be so seriously affected as might appear, for a wider choice of subjects is taught than formerly, but the system does destroy the last privilege of the middle class. Moreover, a particularly drastic denazification policy was carried out in order to destroy the middle-class character of the teaching profession. The gaps have filled by thousands of new teachers, mostly of working-class origin and with only elementary school education. In the universities, as in the schools, there is highly centralised direction. Special consideration is given to working-class students and in the winter of 1946 it was claimed that they made up nearly 50 per cent. of university undergraduates. Although membership of the SED counts in a candidate's favour, and there are strong SED student groups in each university, it cannot be said that admission to the universities is actually limited to members of the SED.

All youth activities are in the hands of the Free German Youth which is controlled by the SED although members of other parties and even some clergy participate. Membership is nominally voluntary but various means of pressure are applied. Thus it is reported that all children of civil servants must join the movement. Its activities range from ordinary sports and entertainment to participation in works councils and local parliaments.

Religion

On the 26th April, 1946, Vatican Radio proclaimed "In Eastern Germany the decisive battle between Christianity and Bolshevism is being waged." This is somewhat misleading. Soviet leaders have clearly recognised the conflict between Christian and Marxist doctrines—and certain SED leaders have admitted that they intend eventually to destroy the churches: but neither wishes to add to the roll of Christian martyrs, and they have taken pains to avoid provoking a Church struggle such as was waged under the Nazi régime. The Church has also been reluctant to give any trouble to the authorities. The administration have even given tangible expressions of goodwill. Church property was excluded from the land reform measures, and church buildings have received priority in derequisitioning. On the other hand, Church youth organisations are banned, and all religious teaching is forbidden in the school curriculum, though school buildings can be used for instruction after school hours. Thus a struggle undoubtedly exists but is not publicly admitted.

Denazification

The attitude of the Russian authorities to denazification has differed from that of the Western Powers in that they are much more interested in bringing about a social revolution than in baiting former Party members. Denazification has therefore been left largely to the Germans, and, as a result, the most chaotic conditions developed with regulations differing even between village and village. At first arbitrary methods were used. Foreign workers and Communists were asked to denounce Nazis, who were rounded up and allegedly shot or in some cases deported to Russia. Later more discrimination was exercised, and denazification was also used as a means of bringing about social change as in the case of the teachers. Opinions vary on the completeness of the purge of administrative and economic life, but in general non-active Nazis have been able to rehabilitate themselves by "helping in democratic reconstruction," usually by joining a political party, the SED for preference. It is significant of the chaotic state that, despite the drastic purge of teachers, a Thuringian Minister this spring spoke of over 50 per cent. of teachers in Thuringian secondary schools being former Nazi Party members. At the beginning of this year measures were drastically tightened up, evidently in preparation for the Moscow Conference, but it appears that these may have been somewhat modified later as the result of SED complaints. There is no doubt that the Russians have protected compromised individuals who could be of use to them.

Conclusion

All in all the U.S.S.R. should have reason to be satisfied with the practical success of communisation in the Soviet zone. It is the more interesting that by advocating unification the Soviet Union should risk upsetting this work, for it seems likely that under any system of genuinely "free" elections throughout Germany the work of the SED would be swept away. The Soviet authorities could attempt, of course, to maintain the present situation by force, and they would doubtless claim that the changes already made had been "freely" approved by Germans in the Zone.

GERMANY

Berlin has succeeded this week in achieving perhaps a record score of public Allied disagreements. The most important dispute is over the refusal of the Russian member of the Kommandatura to approve the resignation of the Lord Mayor, Dr. Ostrowski. As reported in Summary No. 389, Dr. Ostrowski resigned after receiving a vote of no confidence by the City Assembly. The Russians' position is weak, but they undoubtedly feel bound to obstruct the appointment of a successor who would be necessarily uncongenial. They have continued the illegitimate practice, initiated by them, of publicly airing disagreements before they have been discussed by the Allied Control Council. The Soviet commander in Berlin published in "Taegliche Rundschau" of the 23rd April a long attack on the Social Democrats and on U.S. Military Government, accusing the former of inefficiency and the latter of interference. United States and British representatives later made suitable replies. The Russians have also attacked the U.S. authorities for an alleged breach of secrecy over a recent round-up of deserters and the British authorities for alleged maltreatment of two Russian sergeants. The U.S. authorities have protested against the presentation in the Soviet Sector of a Russian play with an anti-American bias.

All these wranglings have further tarnished the prestige of four-Power administration. Indeed, in the case of the Lord Mayor's resignation, it has been made to look somewhat ridiculous in German eyes, since Dr. Ostrowski has stated that he would not resume office even if asked to do so by all four Powers. German party leaders are therefore surprised that the Kommandatura decided on the 28th April to submit the question to the Allied Control Council. Meanwhile the SPD has rejected Socialist Unity Party proposals for co-operation in the City Assembly. During the present inter-Allied quarrel an SPD conference was held in the city. The executive decided that the Berlin group should become a district organisation of the SPD for the whole of Germany in preparation for "the early realisation of the political and spiritual unity of Germany." The immediate effect of this decision will presumably be to strengthen the influences of the executive in Hanover, headed by Schumacher, who has for some time shown disquiet over the behaviour of party members in Berlin.

The pessimism of the West German politicians over the end of the Moscow Conference continues unabated and is not likely to be influenced by Mr. Bevin's appeal to world opinion not to be despondent and not to dismiss the Conference as a complete failure. Dr. Schumacher, interviewed by Sueddeutsche Zeitung on the 26th April, expressed frankly cynical views. He is reported as saying that Germans must realise that proposals made on Germany's future structure should not be attributed to any special interest in Germany. They were merely tactical moves made by the various Powers with a view to strengthening their political position. This type of utterance will be swallowed hook and line by the German public who will also appreciate the remarks made during the same interview by the veteran Social Democrat, Paul Loebe. "70,000,000 Germans," he said, "herded together between the Oder and the Rhine, robbed, underfed, and burdened with undefined reparations will become a hotbed of disease which will prevent Germany from attaining peace." More restraint was shown by Jakob Kaiser, the Chairman of the Eastern zone Christian Democrats, who remarked that all politicians who were aware of the difficulties of reconciling opinions within Germany must know that time and patience were needed to overcome differences between Eastern and Western policies. The Premier of Wuerttemberg-Baden delivered a singularly gloomy broadcast on the same day. A rare exception among Western German politicians was the Wuerttemberg-Baden Secretary of State, Fritz Eberhard (SPD) who, at a youth meeting in Berlin on the 30th April strongly deprecated the spread of pessimism about the Conference. While there is certainly no cause for optimism, a check to the German tendency to rush to extremes of gloom and fatalism might be salutary, and it is therefore unfortunate that such utterances are made only by persons of minor importance and are immediately exploited by the Communist-controlled Berlin Radio as part of its own campaign for optimism.

The earlier drive for the Socialist Unity Party (SED) in the U.S. Zone, which was discussed in last week's Summary, is being copied in the British Zone. So far it is restricted by the British refusal to admit SED speakers to the area. The Central Secretariat of the party has asked British Military Government to revise its attitude of opposition. Commenting on this the SPD immediately said that it had no wish to bargain for a sham freedom in the Eastern Zone in exchange for the formation of the SED in the British Zone. In Muenster a committee has been set up to prepare for the SED, and issued on the 15th April an appeal signed by some members of the SPD as well as by Communists. The SED is clearly taking advantage of the food crisis and the post-Conference depression to work up its campaign, but its chances of voluntarily converting large numbers—particularly when viewed in the light of the latest election results—seem meagre.

The Zonal Advisory Council of the British Zone is being reorganised closely in line with German proposals. This was announced by General Robertson at its meeting on the 30th April, just over a year after its formation. The Council, as established on the 6th March, 1946, was a German body appointed by the British authorities to advise them and consisted of representatives from the main political parties, administrative officials, representatives of the trade unions and technical experts. It is now to consist entirely of party members who will be chosen by the State Diets subject to Military Government approval. They will be representative of all political shades and not only of the majority parties in the States. General Robertson emphasised that this latter condition is in line with decisions taken at the Moscow Conference about the future German Advisory Council. This reorganisation had been deliberately postponed until after the Moscow talks and until full consideration had been given to the measure of agreement reached there on Germany's political structure. (No agreement was reached in Moscow as to whether an advisory Council should be restricted to the parties.) In reply to Communist complaints that the Trade Unions were not represented, General Robertson said the Council must consult them where necessary. He also urged that a proportion of women should be represented. The Council remains advisory; unlike the States Council in the U.S. Zone, it has no executive power and is not a coordinator of matters pertaining to the States. Members are allowed a wide freedom of discussion even extending to matters which are being considered by the four Powers in Berlin, but they have been warned that they must not abuse this right. Further, they may compel members of the zonal and bi-zonal agencies to attend meetings and answer questions. Speakers in the debate that followed regretted, however, that the Council's relation to the bi-zonal agencies remained undefined. Once again the conflict of authorities within the two zones is brought to the fore and makes more urgent the discussions being held on this subject.

24 senior officials of the German chemical trust IG Farben were formally indicted by a United States War Crimes tribunal in Nuremberg on the 3rd May. They are accused of aiding in the preparation of the war and of being involved in mass murders at Ausschwitz Concentration Camp. According to a report in The Times, among the charges was one that IG Farben through its international cartel arrangements had prevented United States firms from sending war material to Great Britain and other European countries until the United States entered the war and that this was part of a plan to limit the production of war materials in countries which might prove hostile. The first trial of industrialists opened in the U.S. zone in March of this year when members of the Flick enterprises were indicted.

AUSTRIA

The French High Commissioner for Austria and General Mark Clark, the former U.S. High Commissioner, have both proclaimed their Government's support for the maintenance of Austria's 1937 frontiers. General Clark has now been succeeded by General Keyes. Before his departure from Austria General Clark was awarded an honorary degree at Vienna University. Speeches at the ceremony indicated sincere Austrian appreciation of his work in and for Austria.

The Austrian political parties celebrated May Day with the traditional demonstrations. The fact that these passed without incident provided the three-party paper Neues Österreich with an opportunity for disclaiming the necessity for the continued presence of (Allied) troops to maintain peace and order. The Communists had previously appealed in vain to the Socialists to hold joint demonstrations with them as evidence of working class unity. On May Day they sought to retrieve their failure to achieve this aim by placing the blame on the "small clique of SPO leaders" whose action, according to the Communist spokesman, Ernst Fischer, was whole-heartedly deplored by "tens of thousands" of Socialists. The Socialists explained their rejection of the proposal as being due to their desire to keep the day, as in the past, for a public proclamation of their political faith. The failure of the Moscow Conference naturally overshadowed May Day speeches and commentaries, and all parties were at least united in demanding liberty for Austria. The Communists did not miss the chance to demand new elections and to attribute the failure of the Conference to the fact that both leaders of the Austrian Delegation had been members of the People's Party.

One of the chief sources of disappointment over the delay in the conclusion of the Treaty has been the postponement of the return of the Austrian prisoners-of-war. Both on May Day and on several other occasions all political parties have emphasised the general anxiety on this score, and the Communists have utilised it to urge closer collaboration with the U.S.S.R. They have attributed the repatriation delay to an alleged anti-Soviet propaganda campaign in Austria. While these allegations are of course grossly exaggerated, and have even in one case bordered on the ridiculous, it is a fact that the Soviet authorities have recently drawn the attention of the Allied Council in Vienna to two short items with an anti-Russian tendency which have been published in the U.S. zone press. One of these, "And so it was in Nazistan" concerned the recent elections in the U.S.S.R.

Evidence of active Austrian Communist interest in furthering alleged Russian preparations for a "defensive war" against the Western Powers has emerged from a report of instructions which were given by Ernst Fischer to a select circle during the Styrian KPO's Landesparteitag in March. Fischer is said to have stressed that it was of the greatest importance "for the victory of Communism" that Russia should be accurately informed about the plans and new weapons of the Western Powers. He therefore urged his hearers to collect all possible scraps of information and opinion on such matters from the officers of the Western Powers.

According to press reports, the failure to meet the food rations in Vienna this week has produced a series of unofficial strikes in some factories. The Trade Union League is discussing the situation and has warned workers that such strikes are seriously prejudicial to the interests of reconstruction. At the meeting of the Food Directorate on the 30th April the Minister of Food had announced various measures to improve the food distribution and supply situation, including the supply of potatoes from Lower Austria for Vienna.

His Majesty's Government have authorised a gift to Austria of surplus machine tools to the value of £125,000 to assist in Austria's industrial rehabilitation.

The newly-formed Educational Exchange Committee in London is to arrange an exchange of Austrian and British students. Another students' exchange scheme has been initiated by the Austro-American Institute of Education in Vienna, and it has also been reported that Austrian Universities are in contact with the Danish International Students' Committee.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Judging by the tone of the daily press, one cannot but feel that relations between the Czechs and the Slovaks are steadily deteriorating, and Communist and Right-wing ideologists are trying to extract what advantage they can from the older conflict of regionalism. Following immediately upon the crisis which developed lately in the leadership of the Slovak Democrat Party (see last week's Summary) a state of open warfare has now been declared between Rudé Právo, the Czech Communist organ, and Čas, the organ of the Slovak Democrats. Recrimination and counter-recrimination are now the order of the day.

A recent issue of Čas which stated that the Communists and the Prague Government (in which President Beneš is naturally included) were responsible for Tiso's execution was confiscated by the authorities on the ground that the article was tendentious and inexact. The Communists contend—it is no new theme—that the Democrat Party is dominated by Hlinka sympathisers who on every conceivable pretext viciously attack the Government, Prague centralism, the person of the President, Land Reform, the secularisation of schools—a reform already adopted in Slovakia and bitterly contested—and the July 1946 Agreement between the Government and the Slovak National Council defining and limiting the functions and competence of the latter body. The Communists are also making harsh criticism of "Slovakia Today"—a bulletin issued for Czech home consumption by the Slovak Commissariat for Information—which gives the impression, the Communists allege, that Slovakia is undergoing a reign of terror: in short, everything is done to foment suspicion between the two partners in the Republic. The generally unsatisfactory state of these relationships may soon impel the Marxists to seek a speedy amalgamation of both branches of the Communist Party.

From their historical opposition to imperial authorities, both Church and State, the Slovak Protestants, have always, like their Czech brethren, tended to champion the cause of national unity. The Protestant wing of the Democrat Party disapproves therefore of the "separatist" attitude of the more extreme members of the Catholic wing, although supporting the aims of a healthy regional consciousness. A clue to the Protestant line of action is presented by Air General Ambruš (he escaped from Slovakia at the beginning of the War and served with the R.A.F.) who has been condemning the anti-Czechoslovak standpoint of some sections of the Slovak Catholic press in America. At the same time, and in order to appease Czech apprehensions, a Štefánik Week of Czech-Slovak Brotherhood—from the 26th April to the 4th May—has been inaugurated by the Czech-Slovak Society of which Dr. Lettrich is Chairman. The choice of Štefánik to illustrate the bonds uniting the two "peoples" is particularly happy and significant. (Milán Štefánik, the Slovak airman who rose to be a general and who was so tragically killed in 1919 in an aeroplane disaster, was the Slovak member (along with President Masaryk and Dr. Beneš) of that famous "triumvirate" which did so much to secure the foundations of the first Czechoslovak Republic.

POLAND

As announced by Sir Stafford Cripps, agreement in principle has been reached on the conclusion of an Anglo-Polish trade agreement, which is to operate for a period of three years. Poland would export to the United Kingdom goods to the value of £23,000,000, of which foodstuffs would form an important part. Imports from the United Kingdom would amount to £35,000,000, and would consist chiefly of machinery and raw materials such as wool, rubber, tin and graphite. The disposal of the £12,000,000 is connected with the ratification of the Financial Agreement of 1946 (see Summary No. 342), on which the Poles had strongly insisted. With reference to this question and to other aspects of Anglo-Polish affairs, the Foreign Secretary made a statement in an oral answer in the House of Commons on the 5th May. After mentioning his conversations with the Polish Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, held at Warsaw on the return journey from Moscow, he continued: "We had a useful and friendly conversation in which we discussed many matters of current interest to our two Governments, I expressed in the House on the 30th April my conviction that it is the duty of all Poles who feel able to do so, to return to Poland to aid in the reconstruction of their country. We shall, of course, continue to do our best for those who cannot return and who decide to stay here, but I am more than ever convinced, from my conversation with the Polish Prime Minister, that Poland has great need of Poles who are able to go back and that the Polish Government genuinely wishes to encourage them to return. As a result of this conversation I decided to recommend to H.M. Government the ratification of the Anglo-Polish Financial Agreement and I am glad to inform the House that His Majesty's Government have now decided that this agreement shall be ratified. This will, incidentally, facilitate a resumption of trade between Great Britain and Poland."

The prospect of an Anglo-Polish trade pact has been well received by the Polish Communist paper Glos Ludu, which said that it would be welcomed by the Polish people, always anxious to have the widest possible trade relations with the Western countries. "In trade policy," continued the writer, "we are not pursuing an Eastern or a Western policy. We should like to have normal trade relations both with the East and the West, based on mutual services and offering mutual advantage."

SOVIET UNION

The May Day slogans put out by the Central Committee of the Communist Party follow closely the familiar lines, though with somewhat increased emphasis on the appeal to the toilers of all lands and the call for the unmasking of the aggressive plans of the imperialists. An interesting new slogan was the fourth, which insisted that there could be no democracy without a fight against fascism. This text was elaborated in a long comment by Dr. Lemin, who attacked Anglo-Saxon foreign policy in the usual way, claiming, however, that the working people of Great Britain were opposed to it, and that there was a large, though insufficiently organised, Opposition movement in the U.S.A. The occasion was fully exploited for paying the now conventionally bombastic tributes to Soviet arms, attacking imperialism and disparaging foreign assistance in the war. "The U.S.S.R. does not want foreign help" was the theme of a highly tendentious broadcast talk by the well-known writer, Vsevolod Vishnevsky. Vishnevsky surveyed the machinations of foreign capital and intervention in pre-Soviet Russia and the Russian people's success throughout history in throwing foreigners out of their country and building up "their towns and fortresses" without foreign aid. On the latter point Vishnevsky is as glibly forgetful of the Italian and other foreign architects who were largely responsible for the Kremlin, and famous buildings in other Russian cities, as he is of the Lend–Lease supplies which reinforced Soviet manpower in the second World War. In view of the volume of these supplies and the dearth of consumer goods among the Soviet population during the war, M. Vishnevsky's claim that the Soviet Union "succeeded in ensuring all supplies necessary for the army and civil population" is easily exploded.

The Soviet Government have issued a vigorous protest against the transfer of displaced persons, mainly Ukrainians and Lithuanians, from the British and American zones of Germany to work in Belgian coal mines. Pravda's Paris correspondent claimed that a special agreement with the Belgian Government provided for the despatch of 20,000 persons from the Amerizan zone and 15,000 from the British, that such an agreement was unlawful and that such persons were subject to unconditional return to their motherland. The British reply stated categorically that His Majesty's Government had no obligation to interfere with the voluntary movement of the nationals of another country outside the borders of that country, even when the national status of the persons concerned was beyond dispute. The argument applied even more forcibly in the case of citizens of the former Baltic States, whose incorporation in the U.S.S.R. de jure had not been recognised by His Majesty's Government. The proposed transfer of some 8,000 Ukrainians from Italy has also come under fire from the U.S.S.R., and a number of general articles have appeared in the Soviet press claiming that the proposed despatch of displaced persons overseas is merely an Anglo-American scheme to get cheap labour and to have "dark elements" ready for any adventure.

The Russian press has reported the arrival in Moscow on the 29th April of an Hungarian Trade Delegation led by the Minister of Commerce, Sandor Ronai. This Delegation follows close on the heels of the other Balkan trade missions to Moscow from Yugoslavia and Bulgaria (see Summaries 341 and 38).

The views on national sovereignty now current in the Soviet Union suggest that Soviet political thought has moved far from the theories of international government popular in the days of Lenin. These Soviet conceptions of national sovereignty were recently propounded by Professor Korovin in a lecture in the Academy of Social Sciences attached to the Central Party Committee and are worth attention in view of their direct bearing on the Soviet attitude to various schemes of international control under the United Nations. In the first place, atomic energy, all involving some relinquishment of sovereignty. Korovin defended the principle of sovereignty and maintained that the whole course of Soviet diplomacy was directed towards safeguarding the sovereign rights of nations (with a bland disregard of recent Soviet interventions in Eastern Europe). "Sovereignty in its Soviet conception," said Korovin, "is a weapon in the struggle of the progressive democratic forces against the forces of reaction and imperialism."

It is interesting to note that in the years 1940–1946 (according to Pravda), membership of the various Societies for Cultural Relations with the Soviet Union and "Friends of the U.S.S.R." increased tenfold. These societies used to be mainly representative of the pro-Soviet intelligentsia and were located as a rule only in capital cities. In many countries they have now spread to the provinces with branches in smaller towns. Thus the Franco-Soviet Association, which was a comparatively small body before the war, now numbers 160,000 members. The Bulgaro-Soviet Society numbers over half a million members, the Czechoslovak Union of Friends of the U.S.S.R. about 300,000 members, the Finland-U.S.S.R. society 170,000 members and 700 local organisations. These societies with their fellow-traveller membership, and hard core of Communist direction form a most valuable network of propaganda agencies for the Soviet Union abroad. The information distributed by them is most carefully sifted and distorted so as to present a glowing picture of Soviet life and Soviet achievement. The political importance of these soi-disant cultural societies, is shown in the recent visit of a Delegation of the Albanian Society for Cultural Relations with the U.S.S.R. to Moscow, where it was received by M. Polyansky, Chairman of the Council for Religious Affairs of the U.S.S.R.—this being the first occasion on which a Cultural Delegation has been received by this official. M. Polyansky availed himself of the opportunity to describe the position of the various religions other than Orthodox inside the Soviet Union, laying special stress on the favourable conditions enjoyed by the Moslems, whose status would naturally be of primary interest to his audience.

Most of the societies publish regular bulletins, attractively illustrated, which, no doubt carry considerable weight among uninstructed readers. No equivalent "cultural"—but in fact quasi political—organisation working on similar lines in the interests of a foreign Power, it should be pointed out, would be tolerated by the Soviet authorities.

The post-war campaign for the ideological instruction of the Soviet peoples is now to be reinforced by the establishment of a new All-Union Society for the Dissemination of Political and Scientific Knowledge. The Society has been launched by an imposing group of sponsors consisting of Academicians, including the Presidents of the All-Union and various Republican Academies of Sciences, the Rectors of many higher schools of learning, representative professors, the writer Simonov and such important Government officials as S. V. Kaftanov, Minister for Higher Education in the U.S.S.R., and M. B. Khrapchenko, Chairman of the Arts Committee attached to the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers. The object of the Society is to organise the "widespread propagation of scientific and political knowledge by lectures which will reveal the advantages of the Soviet public and State system over capitalism," the successes of the economic development of the U.S.S.R., and the achievements of Soviet science, literature and the arts as well as the problems confronting Soviet people. A determined drive is thus to be made, apparently, to eradicate the defects of the "political education" of the Soviet peoples, the inadequacy of which has been very frequently attacked in Party journals and meetings since the end of the War.

The Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. has decided to revive the activities of the Committee for Invention and Discoveries attached to the Council of Ministers. The object of this Committee, it is officially claimed is to improve the direction of inventions and discoveries in the U.S.S.R., to render assistance to inventors, to utilise new discoveries as rapidly as possible and to protect the interests of the State in this field. Engineer A. I. Mikhailov has been appointed the new Chairman of the Committee which, inter alia, will no doubt with close attention follow developments in nuclear physical research.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

M. Christmas Moeller, has startled both his friends and his enemies by resigning from the leadership of the Party's parliamentary group. He took this step, according to Social-Demokraten, at the suggestion of the Chairman of the Conservative Party organisation in his constituency. On the 20th April he called a meeting and requested that his own position as Chairman of the party should be placed under debate. At the meeting he explained that he had received letters accusing him of being the main cause of the recent Conservative losses in the elections to the Upper House. He had also been rebuked for fraternising with the Communists, and his attitude to the South Schleswig problem, his statement that the agricultural boom could not last, and his conclusion of the Trade Agreement with Great Britain had likewise been criticised. M. Moeller stated that he could see no political faults in his conduct but felt personally that one of the main causes of his party's election defeat had been his own attitude to the South Schleswig question. He had, however, been completely loyal to his party in this matter. As for the accusation of having "fraternised" with the Communists, M. Moeller did not deny this, but emphasised that he had not forgotten the Communist participation in the starting of the resistance movement and did not think it an error to show confidence in them and let their acts speak for themselves. He believed that he had the right idea of the measures to be taken to contribute to the international peace and reconstruction of Europe. But he had expected less party politics and more collaboration after the liberation. At the same time he also emphasised that his political experiences had convinced him that Danish politics required a Centre Party, as the Venstre was a farmers' party and the Social-Democrats represented the workers. He would continue to serve as a "private" member of the Lower House. At the conclusion of M. Christmas Moeller's statement, M. Poul Møller, Chairman of the Conservative Youth Organisation, (M. Moeller's bitterest opponents within the party) requested him to retain the Chairmanship, but M. Christmas Moeller declared his decision to be final and also opposed the suggestion that a vote of confidence in him should be passed. M. Ole Bjørn Kraft, the Party leader in the South Schleswig question, will succeed M. Christmas Moeller.

Press reactions to M. Christmas Moeller's resignation are very interesting, although comments are still handicapped by the printers' strike in Copenhagen. Some conservative organs in the country regret his decision, as for instance Jydske Tidende, which states that many people will feel that the cause of Conservatism and Danish politics as a whole can ill afford to do without him. An article on the subject in Information, the Resistance Movement paper, is a curious mixture of praise and censure which probably comes nearest to the truth. M. Moeller had "awakened the displeasure of the middle classes by too many references to the sins of the occupation years and by excusing too much the public scapegoats." Undoubtedly the lack of success of the Conservative party since the liberation was due to him. Moreover, it was regrettable that M. Moeller had failed both his party and the country on the South Schleswig problem. He alone could have formulated a dignified reply to the British Government's ultimatum. When he complained that he had not expected, and was disappointed in, the post-war atmosphere of Danish politics, he overlooked his own share in this development. He had had authority and force in both camps—in the Rigsdag and in the Freedom Movement—and it might have been better if instead of rejoining the Conservative Party he had held himself in reserve and become a spokesman for Resistance ideas. Information concluded, however, with a most generous tribute to the great services that M. Moeller had performed for his country and expressed the hope that he might resume the activities which he had pursued in Great Britain of "creating friends for Denmark whose loyal spokesman he was in the most fateful period of her history."

The agreement covering the despatch of a Danish military contingent to the British zone of Germany was signed on the 23rd April. The despatch of the troops had to be postponed, however, until early in May owing to the death of King Christian X. (See Summary No. 385.)

Sweden

It is reported that the Swedish Trade Union Congress has appointed its treasurer, M. Axel Strand, to be the successor to M. August Lindberg, who retires on pension. M. Strand was the only candidate for the post and was elected by acclamation.

According to Dagens Nyheter of the 18th of April the Communists have succeeded in retaining the leadership in the Stockholm Metalworkers' Union, although by a very slender margin only, 8,487 to 8,025 against. About 52 per cent. of the members registered their vote which is a record. At the last election in 1946, the Communist beat their opponents by more than 3,000 votes as against 462 this year.

Finland

After nearly three weeks of fruitless negotiations the Finnish Government crisis remains unsolved. The first of the President's nominees, M. Sakari Tuomioja, Governor of the Bank of Finland, had to admit failure after the Folk Democrats had declared their refusal to participate in a Government headed by a member of the Progressive Party. Their own candidate, M. Leino, Communist Minister of the Interior, thereupon tried his hand at Cabinet making, but was unable to secure the support of Agrarians and Social Democrats. The third would-be Prime Minister, M. Eino Pekkala, who served as Minister of Justice in the outgoing Government presided over by his brother, was likewise refused the support of the Social Democrats.

The situation would, therefore, now appear to have reached a complete deadlock, with the Folk Democrats determined not to see their influence in the Government diminished by as much as a single portfolio, and the Agrarians and Social Democrats equally resolved on a redistribution of administrative power more in keeping with parliamentary representation.

In the meantime the Folk Democrats, with the Communists in the van, have organised huge demonstrations in various towns throughout the country, the intention of which can only be to bring pressure to bear upon the President and the Diet. At the same time the Finnish Communist press has been playing the ace of trumps—the trust of the Soviet Union—for all its worth, ably seconded by such commentators as Ilyinski writing in Izvestiya. These activities, fortunately, have not met with much success and have been condemned by the rest of the country as undemocratic and reminiscent of the days of the Lappua Movement.

The President of the Republic has authorised the ratification of the Peace Treaty, and the instruments of ratification have apparently already reached Moscow, though they have as yet not been deposited.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

The Dutch Prime Minister, Dr. Beel, and the Minister of Overseas Territories. M. Jonkman, began their journey to the N.E.I. on the 3rd May [see Summary No. 389, 23rd April]. Their visit is expected to last about three weeks. They were accompanied by Dr. H. M. Hirschfeld, Economic Adviser to the Dutch Foreign Office, and M. H. Albarda, Managing Director of the Netherlands Trading Company. Two other members of the party—Lieut.-Col. P. T. Six, of the Prime Minister's "Cabinet," and Dr. H. J. Fredericy, Head of the Constitutional Reform Department in M. Jonkman's Ministry—left the previous day. At a press conference on the eve of his departure, M. Jonkman explained the reasons for the visit. "In the first place," he said, "we want to acquaint ourselves with conditions in the N.E.I. Secondly, we intend to advise the Lieut.-Governor-General [Dr. van Mook] and the Commission-General about the political situation in the Netherlands. Thirdly, we want to discuss the methods of implementing the wishes and measures expressed and decided upon at the Malino Conference, and also the implementing of the Linggadjati Agreement. Fourthly, there will also be discussions to decide what persons are, in the present circumstances, the most suitable to occupy the highest posts." No changes among the senior administrative officials in the N.E.I. Government could be expected until the Prime Minister and he returned home. One of the first points which would come up for discussion was the problem of Dutch nationals still interned by the Republicans in the interior of Java. M. Jonkman added that Dr. Hirschfeld and M. Albarda had been asked to accompany the party in order to deal with economic and financial problems which required immediate attention.

Belgium

Severe economies in labour were announced by M. van Acker, Minister of Communications in the new Belgian Cabinet, when he presented his Department's estimates to the Chamber on the 30th April. He began by stating that the deficit on Belgian railways, telegraphs, telephones, radio and tramways were due to low tariffs. Since these could not be increased without adversely affecting the country's economy, the solution was "a cut in expenses." Accordingly, he proposed to abolish railway subsidies as soon as possible, to reduce the number of railwaymen, by 7,000, and drastically to curtail work on the system, with the exception of electrification schemes. He went on to attribute the increase of Post Office workers to "abuse of sick-leave facilities"; and he therefore proposed a reduction of their number by 5 per cent. by the end of this year. In the field of air transport, it was essential that the country keep abreast of developments: this implied "considerable, but necessary expenditure." Money would likewise have to be found for the reconstruction of the Belgian Mercantile Marine, which he promised would be accelerated; and it would also be necessary to ask for credits for a Belgian Navy. The standard of Belgian broadcasting, said M. van Acker, had suffered through "cuts in expenditure"; and he proposed to restore that standard by reducing "administrative expenses." Staff would be cut by 20 per cent. He would ask for a grant of 125 million francs for the radio system: he estimated that receipts would be about 117 million francs—a figure which took into account his proposal to raise the cost of a radio licence to 144 francs.

M. van Acker added that heavier penalties would be imposed on those who failed to take out licences.

FRANCE

Before the new session of Parliament opened on the 29th April it was generally expected that a Government crisis would occur as a result of the disagreement between the Communists and their colleagues in the Cabinet over policy in Madagascar. The debate on this question was postponed, however, and the expected crisis developed over a new problem caused by the strike of workers at the Renault factory in Paris. The strike, which began on the 25th April, was unauthorised, and in spite of C.G.T. appeals that the men should return to work it continued and spread. They were encouraged by various elements, Socialists, Catholics and Trotskyists, who all wished to make difficulties for the Communist trade union leaders. As a result the Communists decided that they could not afford to oppose the strike and on the eve of the May Day demonstrations the C.G.T., reversing its attitude, tried to regain control of the Renault men by supporting the substance of their demands for higher wages. At the Cabinet meeting on the 1st May the Communist Ministers withdrew their support of the Government policy of wage-stabilisation, and M. Ramadier, in consultation with M. Vincent Auriol, who arrived home from Africa the same day, decided to put the matter to the Assembly as a question of confidence.

The issue between the Prime Minister and the Communists was more clear-cut than it had been over Indo-China in March, since the policy of price- and wage-stabilisation, inherited from the Blum Government, had been made a major plank in the programme of the Ramadier Government when it was formed in January. All parties had agreed that wages should remain fixed until July in order to give the policy of price reductions a chance to prove itself successful. Prices did in fact show an encouraging fall in March and retail prices in Paris were 836 against 858 in February and 856 in January, while wholesale prices dropped even more. The general wholesale food index stood at 945 in March, as against 1,007 in February, 978 in January and 946 in December. Unfortunately this encouraging picture has been marred recently by the bread shortage (see last week's Summary) and the Government's inability to control the meat market, while the official wages policy is naturally unpopular. The Communists have hitherto supported this policy, but it is now clear that they will not allow themselves to be outbid on their left and risk losing control of the workers. Meanwhile, the Renault strike continues and is spreading to other works.

The vote of confidence was put on the 4th May after M. Ramadier had reaffirmed the necessity of his economic policy and pointed out that the country could not afford a repetition of last year's experience when the general 25 per cent. increase in wages was followed by an even greater rise in prices. M. Duclos, speaking for the Communists, said that while his party could not vote for M. Ramadier's policy, it did not wish to leave the Government and would continue to regard itself as a party ready for governmental responsibility. When the vote was taken 360 deputies voted for M. Ramadier, the 186 Communist deputies and Ministers voted against him, and about 62 deputies, including all those of the Parti Républicain de la Liberté, abstained.

The Communist Ministers did not then resign, and M. Ramadier was faced with the choice of resigning himself or of decreeing their resignation, since it was clearly impossible for him to accept a compromise. The M.R.P., whose national council, meeting on the 27th–28th April, had shown marked appreciation of M. Ramadier's personal qualities, now urged that the Constitution did not allow him to resign while he still enjoyed the confidence of the majority of the Assembly. In fact, the new system whereby the Prime Minister is personally invested by a vote of the Assembly before he chooses his Ministers, gives him a strength not enjoyed by the Prime Ministers of the Third Republic. M. Ramadier's position is also strengthened by the support given him by the President of the Republic, and it was possibly this support which enabled him to persuade the Socialist party executive that he should not resign. He therefore revoked the decrees appointing the Communist Ministers who are Deputies, and the remaining Communist, M. Marrane (who is a member of the Council of the Upper House) himself resigned. The decision that the Socialist-led Government should remain in power without the Communists had still, however, to be confirmed by the National Council of the Socialist Party which decided last December that the Party could only be represented in a Government if the Communists were also members of it. After long discussion and by only a small majority the National Council approved the continuance in the office of M. Ramadier's Government. This decision represents a momentous change in Socialist policy and a personal triumph for M. Blum. For the first time there will be in existence a moderate Left coalition. The exclusion of the Communists will not, however, remove all causes of friction within the Government since the Socialists and M.R.P. are divided on questions of foreign policy while the Rassemblement des Gauches is highly critical of the Socialist policy of economic controls. Moreover, it remains to be seen how the Communists will use their power over the C.G.T., now that they are outside the Government.

General de Gaulle's movement now claims 811,000 members. On the 29th April the General presided over the first meeting of regional delegates of the R.P.F. He said that members of all parties would be welcomed in the movement. The M.R.P. have, however, decided that their members may belong neither to the R.P.F. nor to the Communist-sponsored "Republican Vigilance Committees" which oppose it. The Rassemblement des Gauches in a statement issued on the 26th April condemned all attempts to divide the country into two blocs; one of its departmental federations has, however, authorised its members to join the R.P.F. in an individual capacity.

Following a report that industries in the British Zone of Germany, including the Ruhr coal mines, were to be transferred to German management on the 1st May, a protest was made to H.M. Government by M. Massigli. He was informed that no such decision had been taken and that the French Government have been kept fully informed of the progress of discussions on giving increased executive power to Germans in the British zone.

SWITZERLAND

If one is to judge by recent official pronouncements and articles in the press, the Swiss authorities are beginning to grow restive over the deadlock reached between Switzerland and the United States on the rate of exchange for the franc and the Reichsmark; for until agreement is reached on that point, the liquidation of German assets, as set out in the Washington Agreement of the 21st May, 1946, cannot be carried out. On the 20th March, M. Petitpierre, head of the Political Department, told the National Council that the delay could not be charged against Switzerland. It has further been emphasised in official circles that, contrary to the general impression abroad, the delay has been by no means advantageous to Switzerland—for the German assets in question, which have been blocked for two years, include, besides jewellery, specie and money, a considerable amount of property which is subject to depreciation of value. The Federal Council has therefore decided to realize the value of all such articles at once by public sale, the proceeds being paid into fixed accounts in the owners' names.

Yet another statement has been issued by the Federal Council concerning the dangers of inflation, coupled with an appeal to the Swiss people to assist in maintaining the purchasing power of the franc by means of the stabilization of prices. The danger of expecting the present commercial and industrial "boom" to last was again emphasised, and manufacturers and heads of business organisations were urged not to expand their productive capacity unduly on the strength of present conditions, which the Authorities have always regarded as temporary and abnormal. A special point was made with regard to the building industry in which the rise in the cost of labour and materials is especially marked, already requiring the assistance of subsidies. All unnecessary building was therefore strongly deprecated. The dangers of the rise in prices continuing, with a possible devaluation of the franc, were such that no section of the community could afford to ignore them.

The Swiss-Norwegian Payments Agreement of the 1st March, 1946, originally for one year, has been extended until the 30th June, 1947.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Because of the heavy costs of occupation, the Hungarian Government regard the speedy ratification of the Peace Treaty as an urgent matter. Although the U.K. and Soviet Russia agree that the ex-enemy states should be required to deposit their ratifications first, His Majesty's Government would have been willing to ratify by the 1st May, and the Soviet Government by the 15th May. The U.S. Constitution, however, demands a two-thirds majority vote of approval from the Senate, and until this has been obtained the Four Powers will be unable to announce a date for joint ratification. Unlike the U.K. and the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A. do not hold the view that prior ratification by the satellite countries is necessary.

The announcement of an Hungarian-Roumanian Air Agreement has been followed by reports that Hungary is negotiating along similar lines with Czechoslovakia and Switzerland, and that France and Sweden come next on the list. As a result of General Sviridov's statement that the matter did not concern the Allied Control Commission the U.S. Government have decided to begin active negotiations with Hungary. They argue that if such agreements are to be concluded before the Peace Treaty comes into force they must be placed on a non-discriminatory basis.

The sentences passed on the first group of conspirators are awaiting confirmation by the N.O.T. (the Supreme Council of Appeal of the People's Courts), which includes a representative of the Bourgeois Democrats in addition to one from each of the four Coalition Parties. The trial of those accused of sheltering the conspirators is now in progress.

M. Szakasits has once more proclaimed that the Smallholders are failing to honour the inter-Party agreement and threatened them with the prospect of an early election, but there are no substantial reasons to suggest that the Left wish to force the issue at present. What will happen if M. Nagy takes a firm stand is another question. The Premier is determined to retain his position until after the departure of the Red Army, and to resist all further demands when the purge which he himself believes necessary has been effected. Such a purge would not mean a numerical weakening of his Party since the places of the ejected deputies would be filled by other Smallholders. M. Gyöngyösi appears to have changed his attitude to M. Nagy, to whom, on the latter's own showing, he is now giving unreserved support.

According to the newspaper Kossuth Népe, a split has occurred in the Freedom Party, the new group, which is alleged to have no ideological differences with the Government, being led by M. Parragi. Other sources assert that though not all the members of the Party regard the present constitution as legal, the matter plays a relatively unimportant part in their programme. The same reports state that in the event of an election the Freedom Party would have sufficient candidates to cover every constituency and that they would be able to count on a fair measure of Smallholder support. The Party, however, is financially weak and still imperfectly organized in the country districts.

The left-wing press has devoted much attention to the unified Three Years' Plan agreed on by the Workers' Parties. The Plan provides alternative programmes according to whether the work of reconstruction is undertaken with or without foreign aid. It is estimated that production will reach 78 per cent., 95 per cent. and 113 per cent. of the 1938 level by the end of the first, second and third year respectively, and that the workers' pre-war standard of living will be raised by 15 per cent. The national income for the three years is reckoned at 60 milliard forints, 4,300 million of which would be earmarked for reparations. The Smallholders criticise the Plan as devoting insufficient attention to agricultural investments, and maintain that private enterprise should have wider scope.

The Orthodox Church in Hungary, which has acknowledged the supremacy of the Moscow Patriarchate, is shortly to send a delegation to Moscow, when Fr. Varju will be ordained as Bishop. Fr. Varju, who is reported to be able if unprincipled, was formerly a Catholic priest. He appears to have changed his religion in the hope of becoming the head of the Hungarian branch on the establishment of the Orthodox Church in Hungary.

Only 20,000 of the 250,000 Hungarian prisoners-of-war in the Soviet Union, it is alleged, have been allowed to return home.

Yugoslavia

The Yugoslav Government's dislike of the British and American treatment of the refugee problem was expressed in public by the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Bebler, at a Press Conference on the 26th April. He declared that, if there were no change of policy soon, "decisive diplomatic steps" would be necessary, and hinted at an approach to the United Nations. He spoke of the high hopes raised by the news of the formation of the Maclean Mission, and of the subsequent disillusionment in Yugoslavia, and he made it clear that the much-discussed visit of Brigadier Maclean to Belgrade was now overdue. He announced that the Yugoslav Government held the names of the četniks responsible for the death of Viktor Glumčić (the ill-fated consul at Naples—see Summaries Nos. 378, 379 380), and that they were about to approach the British authorities with regard to reopening investigations.

M. Bebler claimed that the četniks had known in advance of the plan for transfer to Germany and that they regarded it as a guarantee of the future safety of their persons and of their organisations. There is some truth in this last allegation. But, in effect, the četniks are not being sent to existing Yugoslav camps in Germany. The officers are being segregated from the men, and if necessary placed under guard. Brigadier Maclean is of the opinion that many četniks, if they find themselves in less comfortable conditions than at Eboli and with plenty of work, may volunteer for repatriation. A number of them have certainly remained abroad in the hopes of being able to emigrate to some pleasant clime, rather from any particular aversion for conditions in their home country. It seems fairly clear that the rank-and-file of repatriates returning at present meet with no untoward fate, provided that they are content to belong to the "people's masses" and do as they are told.

For their leaders the position is different. Many of them are liable to be, or have already been, cited as traitors by the Yugoslav Government. There is now a divergence in the views of His Majesty's Government and the U.S. Government on the question of these "war criminals." The State Department have claimed that five Yugoslavs were recently handed over without its consent, although it was understood by the Foreign Office that the men in question belonged to the category of those automatically to be handed over. The U.S. Government, however, are subject to considerable pressure from the influential Catholic and Yugoslav emigrant groups in America and feel no longer in a position to agree to the wholesale surrender of even proved members of the Ustaši.

Marshal Tito's speech to the National Assembly on the Five-Year Plan contained a vigorous denunciation of the "foreign capitalists" who before the war had exploited the natural wealth of Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav Government, however, have agreed to open negotiations for the settlement of the question of British property on the 1st June.

In an interview with an American broadcaster, Mr. Steele, the Marshal expressed his doubts about any "favourable" solution of the Carinthian question, if it were referred to the United Nations. He said that he hoped to establish a customs' union and close economic co-operation with Bulgaria on the pattern of existing relations with Albania (which is politically little more independent than one of the Yugoslav Republics).

A Cultural Convention has been signed with Czechoslovakia and the possibility of repatriating the Czech and Slovak minorities in Yugoslavia is being discussed in Belgrade.

The Yugoslav Government have complained of the passage through Yugoslav territorial waters on recent occasions of British and American ships. They seem to regard territorial waters as extending six miles or more from the coast, and refer to innocent passage as "an incursion."

Greece

This year, for the first time, May Day in Greece was not observed as a public holiday. During the last week of April there were numerous discussions about plans for the occasion, and the Communists proposed that there should be joint labour celebrations as in previous years. M. Pazantzis, the General Secretary of the Greek Workers' Confederation, however, refused to collaborate and declared that he would call for doubled production instead of the customary stoppage of work. On the 29th, in a broadcast speech, he called on the men to "work on May Day to show their determination to reconstruct the country and annihilate Communists bands." In view of this conflict of opinion the Government announced that the workers were free to decide whether they would work (in which case they would receive overtime pay) or whether they would celebrate May Day by abstaining from work. Meanwhile the police forbade all public meetings in the Athens area on the 30th April and the 1st May on the grounds that labour circles were not in agreement on the manner in which May Day should be celebrated and that, since the slogans issued by the one side were purely political, disputes might arise and disturbances take place. In fact no disturbances occurred on May Day, and between 90 per cent. and 95 per cent. of the workers worked throughout the day, in defiance of the Communists' call to strike.

The Greek Army's drive against the bandits has continued. The operation in the South Pindus is now completed except for the mopping-up of isolated groups. Casualties among the bandits are reported as 385 killed, 35 wounded, 224 captured and 81 surrendered. Greek Army casualties in the same area are said to number about fifty. The gendarmerie are reoccupying the posts they were previously forced to abandon.

It is suspected that a number of bandits who have escaped from the Pindus are joining those near Lamia where a concentration of some 1,600 bandits now constitute a potential threat to communications between Athens and the army fighting in the North. To deal with this menace, the Greek Army have launched an offensive in the Othrys Mountains but bandit casualties are said to have been slight.

There has been a serious recrudescence of lawlessness, especially in the Florina area where a band "700 strong" attacked Nymphaion, and in Central Macedonia. Chalcidice, Serres and other districts are affected but the most serious trouble is reported from Evros (Alexandroupolis). A deputy from there telegraphs that the "countryside is being abandoned, villages burnt, inhabitants murdered and survivors flocking into the towns."

The United Nations Enquiry Commission continue to draft their report and to make plans for the despatch to Greece of the rearguard section. The Yugoslav and Albanian liaison officers have contested the competence of the Commission to institute any subsidiary enquiry and have announced that they will take no part in it and that their respective countries will give it no facilities. The Commission have decided to refer the whole matter to the Security Council.

Albania

Fresh from the discussions before the Security Council, M. Hysni Kapo made a bitter attack on Great Britain as soon as he arrived back at Tirana last week. Speaking to some Communist newspapermen he went so far as to say that the British charges were "based on false documents," that the oppression of small nations was "the traditional policy of British imperialism," and that our object was not to strike at Albania only, but at all her friends and supporters too. When asked by an eager press correspondent if he would amplify the first point about the "false documents," M. Kapo became somewhat incoherent.

An Albanian Institute of Studies—quite a new development—was opened at Tirana on the 28th April by the Minister of Justice, Dr. Manol Konomi, who made a speech about the education policy to be pursued by the Hoxha Government. The schools, he said, were to be entirely secularised, elementary education would henceforth be compulsory for all, and a campaign was to be launched against the prevalent illiteracy. A training-centre for school-teachers was to be started at Tirana, and night schools would gradually be opened for peasants and workmen.

Bulgaria

On the 2nd May the British Political Representative called to see the Bulgarian Foreign Minister on the subject of treaty ratification procedure. He found that—influenced, no doubt, from the usual quarter—the Bulgarian Government are strongly disinclined to ratify in advance of the Great Powers. M. Georgiev said that once the latter had ratified he undertook that there would be no delay on Bulgaria's part; but further than that he would not at present care to go. (This is interesting because only on the 21st April M. Molotov was contending that the treaties will not properly come into force until the ex-enemy satellites have ratified, as well as the Great Powers, and that "this naturally may result in a delay in the withdrawal of the Allied troops.") Mr. Sterndale Bennett took advantage of this opportunity to remind M. Georgiev of the terms of His Majesty's Government's note of the 11th February, with its specific reference to Article 2 of the peace treaty (guaranteeing to all Bulgarian citizens the "fundamental freedoms"), and to tell him that he was very much disturbed at the suppression, for a month, of both the surviving Opposition newspapers for the second time since his arrival in Bulgaria on the 16th March. M. Georgiev tried feebly to make out that, at any rate in the case of one of the papers, the reason for its suppression was its (allegedly) unhelpful attitude over food distribution at a critical time. It is believed, however, that the real reason is much more likely to be the ruling Communists' determination to prevent the ungarbled text of Mr. Marshall's candid speech on the results of the Moscow Conference from being published.

A few days earlier our Mission, along with others, was informed by M. Stefanov, the Finance Minister, that the Bulgarian Cabinet had "decided"—unilaterally—to fix for its use the following (very low and unfair) diplomatic exchange rates: for dollars 450 leva, for pounds sterling 1,810 leva, for Swiss francs 105 and for Swedish crowns 128. Feeling that, all considerations of correct procedure apart, such arbitrary proposals would make Sofia almost more expensive for them to live in than Washington, other heads of Missions besides our own hastened to record their surprise and dissatisfaction, whereupon M. Georgiev remarked to Mr. Sterndale Bennett that, even if only to avoid prejudicing the parallel question of commercial exchange rates, he personally thought it was not likely that any "decision" of the kind would at present be published. It was put to him that this was obviously a matter which required full discussion first.

C267277

The Bulgarian Prime Minister on the 28th April thought it worth while in a broadcast statement to deny completely an Associated Press report from Athens which had declared that there was in existence a soi-disant "Supreme Balkan Administrative Council" presided over by himself. According to the Sofia wireless, M. Dimitrov said that this was "a base slander" emanating from "the present rulers of Greece." No meetings, so he averred, had taken place between himself and "other persons [sic], either at Prague or elsewhere." (A rumour, never confirmed, was in circulation a little under a year ago to the effect that Dimitrov, Tito and Zachariades had met for an important all-night discussion somewhere on the Yugoslav-Bulgarian frontier at about that time, shortly after a mysterious visit paid by Zachariades to Prague. (See also under "Yugoslavia.")

Answering a Parliamentary Question on the 5th May about the continued imprisonment of General Stanchev, former Commander of the 2nd Bulgarian Army, Mr. McNeil stated that according to the Bulgarian authorities the General is in preventive custody in connexion with the discovery last year of an army conspiracy, and he has not hitherto appeared before any court because investigation of the case has not been completed. But, believing that this distinguished officer has now been in prison for many months and being not at all satisfied that he is being well treated, His Majesty's Government will continue to watch the situation carefully, and should there appear at the appropriate time to be any breach of the terms of the peace treaty they will take consequent action. (See Summaries Nos. 357 and 381.)

Turkey

As part of a Mediterranean cruise which the United States Navy announced last month, the cruiser Dayton, the aircraft-carrier Leyte and two destroyers anchored at Istanbul for a few days' visit on the 2nd May. To mark their appreciation of benefits expected from Congress shortly, the Turkish authorities provided the most generous hospitality. They have also been concerned to dispose of the accusation made by American journalists that Turkey is one of twenty-four countries where the press is muzzled. The Deputy Prime Minister insisted, in a published statement, that foreign correspondents were completely free, and he explained that the recent suspension of two Opposition papers was due to their having questioned the legality of the Grand National Assembly. In theory, at any rate, all this is true, but M. Mumtaz Okmen was surely being disingenuous when he proceeded to imply that the counting at parliamentary polls—of which the Opposition complain bitterly—was fair.

The Turkish Government are giving 300 tons of wheat to the Lord Mayor's Relief Fund.

It seems possible that the revival by Tass of the idea of a Great Kurdistan, though presented under the guise of an American scheme (see under "Persia"), may be the prelude to further Soviet agitation for the Eastern vilayets.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

An article in the Ahram of the 30th April speaks of the despatch to Washington of the documents necessary for the presentation of the Egyptian case before the Security Council, and of agreement about the delegation which will present it, although the same article quotes Nokrashy Pasha as saying that no public announcement of their names can be made until the examination of the Palestine problem is completed. Rumours of American intervention to settle the "dispute" continue to circulate. These are without foundation.

In spite of the anti-British campaign which has taken the form of hostile articles in the press and of the acts of violence which have been reported, there is evidence that large numbers of people remain well-disposed and that many, who have lost their employment, sincerely regret the departure of British troops. Unfortunately this cannot be expected to influence the official attitude towards the matter, nor can it be taken as a sign that the mob would refuse to follow the lead of the politicians in anti-British demonstrations or other excesses if they were incited to take part in them. Murmurs against the King and the Government are unlikely to be more than murmurs unless they are backed by a strong political organisation such as the Wafd or the Ikhwan al Muslimin, and there is no indication that either party is moving in this direction from the less dangerous "national" platform.

The Egyptian Red Crescent Society is sending missions to Tunis and to Libya to supervise the distribution of sums collected in Egypt for the relief of hardship caused by the recent partial failure of crops in this area. It is probable that the motive is at least as much a political as a humanitarian one, but permission has been given by the French and the British authorities, although the military authorities are satisfied that there is no immediate danger of severe privation.

Palestine

A determined and well-organised attack by a large party of armed Jews was made on Acre prison on the afternoon of the 4th May. The prison wall was breached with explosives, and over two hundred prisoners escaped, the majority of whom were Arabs. There were eight British wounded in the fight which followed the attack, and fifteen Jews and one Arab, a prisoner, were killed.

The Jewish Agency has condemned the attack both because it has resulted in setting criminals at liberty amongst the community, and because some of the Arabs who escaped had been convicted ten years ago of shedding Jewish blood.

There are signs that the Haganah is to become more active in measures against the terrorists. They have visited several young members of the Irgun in their homes during the last few days and given them a severe beating.

Unobtrusive moves for the restoration of Dr. Weizmann to office have recently been made, and it was reported in the press that Mr. Ben Gurion was to discuss the question in New York with other members of the Jewish Agency Executive. He was to have left Jerusalem on the 5th May, but his journey was postponed pending a decision on the participation of the Agency in the discussions of the General Assembly. Now that the question has been settled in their favour (see under "United Nations") it is possible that Dr. Weizmann will also go to New York at an early date.

Persia

The Tehran left-wing newspaper Shahbaz, emerging from suppression for a single day, the 15th April, published an article, presumably at Soviet instigation, accusing the United States of fostering a scheme for a Great Kurdistan under cover of which the oilfields of the Caucasus, 'Iraq and Persia would be secured by America. It also alleged that the execution of Qazi Muhammad and his satellites (see Summary No. 388) was due to their refusal to co-operate with the Americans. Some significance may lie in the fact that the article was quoted next day by Tass, which had presumably arranged for its original publication.

More details are now available of the Prime Minister's compulsory education scheme (see Summary No. 384). The provision of free elementary education was envisaged in Article 19 of the Persian Constitution of 1906, but the Primary Education Act was not passed until 1943, and even then no effective measures were taken to implement it, mainly owing to political instability. This February, however, the Government decided to take further action, appointing a committee to study the problem of providing sufficient school accommodation to enable education to be made compulsory. But, as Government funds were not forthcoming, an experiment has been made in the Province of Tehran which has been divided into one hundred districts, in each of which a committee of six trustworthy residents has been appointed to supervise the raising of funds for building the necessary schools. The problem of training the additional teachers required does not appear to have been decided. At present free education is provided for about one-twelfth of all Persian children of elementary-school age, though in Tehran the figure may be as high as three-fifths. Educational reforms figured prominently in the Prime Minister's Seven-Year Plan (see Summaries Nos. 387 and 388).

Ethiopia

Various rumours of a crisis have been circulating in Addis Ababa during the last few weeks, one of them being that the Emperor was going to abdicate and enter a monastery. There has been a good deal of smouldering discontent with Ministerial incompetence, and it seems probable that the Emperor is planning some compromise with the Opposition parties which will involve important Ministerial changes.

The question of minor frontier rectification with Kenya and the Sudan has been discussed at intervals during the past four months with the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs. Representatives of the two Governments have arrived in Addis Ababa, and preliminary examination of the question should now have started.

THE FAR EAST

China

On the 23rd April General Chang Chun assumed office as President of the Executive Yuan and at the same ceremony the new Government appointments were confirmed by the recently created State Council. Of the 18 portfolios in what may be termed General Chang Chun's Cabinet no fewer than 13 are filled by members of the Kuomintang of tried political experience. The remaining five portfolios have been distributed as follows:—

Chairman, Mongolian and Tibetan Affairs Commission: Hsü Shih-ying (Independent).
Minister of Communications: Yu Ta-wei (Independent).
Minister of Health: Y. T. Tsur (Independent).
Minister of Economic Affairs: Li Huang (Young China Party).
Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: Tso Shun-sheng (Young China Party).

Of these the first three are all veteran statesmen who have held office under the Kuomintang. Only the two members of the Young China Party, Li Huang and Tso Shun-sheng, who have been appointed to the two important Ministries of Economic Affairs and Agriculture and Forestry, respectively, are newcomers to Cabinet rank. Li Huang is a native of Szechuan. He was one of the founders of the Young China Party, of which he is now the recognised leader. As one of the Chinese delegates, he attended the San Francisco Conference in 1945, but does not appear to have held any former office with the Central Government. Nor is it at all certain that he will accept his present appointment. In fact, press reports assert that he is now on his way from Chungking to Nanking for the express purpose of declining the post in person.

Tso Shun-sheng is a native of Hunan. He resigned his position of Secretary-General of the Democratic League in order to become one of the original sponsors of the Young China Party. He is a professor of history and the author of a number of historical works.

Thus, the distribution of the important posts in the Executive Yuan of the reorganised Government indicates that the Kuomintang is determined to remain at the helm. It remains to be seen how far public opinion will allow itself to be convinced that the new appointments properly fulfil the promise of representative Government and individual freedoms.

Whatever their make-up, the reorganised Government scarcely seem to be getting away to a fair start. The financial and economic situation is giving cause for renewed anxiety. On the 29th April, the Government found it necessary to convene a meeting to consider the whole question of price control, but failed to arrive at any immediate decisions, and in the meantime essential commodities are either disappearing altogether from the market, or are displaying an alarming fresh rise in cost of from 20 to 50 per cent.; while black market quotations for sterling and U.S. dollars are already in the neighbourhood of double the official rate.

Nor is the situation vis-à-vis the Communists encouraging. Although in his inaugural speech on the 23rd April, General Chang Chun expressed his determination to bring about a settlement of the internal state of strife through political means, General Chiang Kai-shek continues to voice confidence in the ability of his forces to crush the Communists before the autumn. Certainly the civil war appears to have flared up again with renewed intensity and, although in Shensi the Communist stronghold of Suiteh is reported to have fallen, Government forces on the whole are making little headway —in fact, if anything, the fighting appears to be going in favour of the Communists. In Shantung Communist forces have recaptured the important railway town of Taian and have succeeded in establishing a corridor westwards to the Yellow River. In north Honan the Government's economic position is further threatened by the possibility that the Communists may gain possession of the mining areas, on which they are concentrating in constant and heavy attacks. Observers report that the morale of the Government troops is beginning to show signs of deterioration, while Communist detachments, on the other hand, still retain their spirits and discipline, even in defeat.

On the 26th April, in response to a request from the Chinese Government, the President of the United States issued an executive order directing the transfer of a number of surplus naval vessels and floating drydocks to China. Details of these vessels are not yet available, but it is understood that the transfer, without charge, of up to 271 surplus naval craft of less than destroyer class in size, together with material necessary for their operation and maintenance, was authorised by Congress last July. It would appear that General Chiang Kai-shek has never wavered in his faith that, once China had supplied evidence of having broadened her Government, United States financial and material assistance to an even greater extent could be counted on. And it is to the United States that his eyes are turned —to avert the threatened economic crash —in anticipation of the granting of long-term cotton and wheat credits, of a loan in hard cash, and, possibly also, the much-needed replenishment of equipment and ammunition for his American-trained military divisions.

Negotiations between the Chinese Government and the U.S. State Department are expected to take place in Washington shortly with a view to arriving at a settlement concerning lend-lease and unadjusted surplus war property, as well as other war-time financial obligations of the two Governments. The terms of the lend-lease settlement are expected to be liberal and to follow the general principles governing the settlement concluded between the United States and His Majesty's Government in December, 1945.

A year ago China concluded two agreements with the United States Government. One dealt with post-war "pipeline" deliveries of non-military character (see Summary No. 360); while the other provided for some payment of military lend-lease aid for a limited period after the 30th June, 1946. But neither of these agreements covered a general settlement of war accounts.

Japan

The new constitution came to life in an atmosphere of sober realism on the 3rd May, 1947. There was a brief ceremony in front of the Imperial Palace, but rain was sufficient to keep away any great concourse of enthusiasts. Those that were present gave a great ovation to the Emperor when he appeared for three minutes and the Times correspondent comments that the most striking feature of the celebrations was the evidence of the reverence in which the Emperor is still held. Comment was restrained. The Premier stated that if the constitution permeated the life of the nation, Japan would soon be a happy nation. The press emphasizes the difficulty of creating the new society that the constitution envisages. Grave doubt is expressed whether the Japanese people is strong enough to stand up to its enemies whether of the right or the left. The problem of the new Government to be formed as a result of the elections has yet to be solved.

Central News reports that North-West Airlines and Pan-American Airways have been given permission by S.C.A.P. to make preliminary arrangements to operate Trans-Pacific services and also that Japanese ground crews and flight radio operators, mostly former Japanese air-force personnel, are being trained at American-controlled bases in Japan which are to serve as terminals and emergency landing-grounds for inter-island services. It is stated that Haneda airfield near Tokyo is designated as the sole port of entry for Trans-Pacific flights and that the two companies are prohibited from employing Japanese in flight operations or in aircraft maintenance.

In the statement to newspaper correspondents on the 17th March, in which he stressed the urgency of a peace treaty with Japan, General MacArthur mentioned the need that trade should be taken out of the hands of Government and placed in those of private traders. There are persistent rumours that machinery for the resumption of private trading is now being studied. S.C.A.P. has presumably realised that the prospects of an early peace treaty are remote and is anxious to hasten the opening of private trading as the best means of averting an economic crisis. His Majesty's Government welcome the move provided that arrangements can be made to ensure a greater volume of trade with sterling countries and that banking, shipping and insurance companies are allowed to resume business. At the same time it has to be understood that many obstacles have to be overcome before the present semi-barter system is replaced by free trading.

Siam

During the past three weeks the political situation in Siam has inclined toward greater stability. There has been a marked stiffening of the opposition to the "comeback" which Luang Pibul and his followers had been so energetically engaged in staging, and it would seem that the ex-Dictator has now realised that his return to power would meet with comparatively little internal support and much stiff external opposition. But there are those who feel that the experiment has been merely deferred and that, given the opportunity, it is not impossible that the present Government might be succeeded by a Cabinet headed by Adul, the present Commander-in-Chief of the Siamese Army, or Nai Kuang, the leader of the Democrats, and that in either case Pibul—never likely to remain long in a subordinate position—might start by accepting one of the Ministries. In present circumstances, however, it is not at all certain that earlier expectations of the fall of the present Government will be realised when the Legislature reassembles this week. It is understood that the Prime Minister has wearied of the constant flow of criticisms levelled at him from all quarters and is, himself, anxious to withdraw from politics. Nevertheless, the Constitutionalists and Independents are urging that he should remain at the helm—a plea that has been greatly strengthened by the advice of the Senior Statesman and the encouragement derived from President Truman's recent expression of hope to the newly-appointed Siamese Ambassador to Washington that there might be a continuation of stable and democratic Government in Siam. In these circumstances Luang Dhamrong elected to withhold his final decision until after a meeting that had been arranged by his friends with Luang Pradit in the Chair. What was the result of this consultation has not yet been made known. Expressions of Siamese opinion, however, are becoming increasingly confident that Luang Dhamrong will continue in office at the head of a re-shuffled Cabinet. The Senior Statesman, it may be noted, has left for Washington in connexion with the Franco-Siamese Conciliation Commission.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Mr. Marshall's broadcast of the 28th April (see last week's Summary) has provided the framework for continued press and radio discussion in the United States on the lessons of the Moscow Conference. The unruffled manner in which the Secretary of State presented his report on the negotiations has been widely praised, and even critics of the current foreign policy like Mr. Max Lerner, of the Left-wing newspaper P.M., have been constrained to admit that there is no political figure to-day more completely deserving of national respect. It is widely conceded that relations between the United States and the Soviet Union are "now down to bedrock." There is also general agreement that it is the Russians who have the most to gain by procrastinating with the peace settlement while Europe drifts into chaos.

In this connexion Mr. John Foster Dulles, who served as Mr. Marshall's special adviser at the Conference, has attracted much attention with his assertion, in a broadcast of the 29th April, that Soviet foreign policy depends "little on getting results by diplomatic negotiation" and much on penetration and infiltration into the political organizations and the labour movements of other countries. This being the case, Mr. Dulles contends that one aim of the new foreign policy should be to "pump vitality into Western Europe" and to make it clear that, whatever happens, the United States will never again disinterest itself in that part of the world. That other thoughtful Republican leaders are beginning to share this conviction is evident from the statement which Senator Vandenberg issued on the 29th endorsing Mr. Marshall's broadcast. It would be worth a supreme effort, Senator Vandenberg suggested, to seek agreement with the Soviet Union during the coming months. Nevertheless, if this were "beyond reasonable reach," the United States could not "wait too long for a peace programme which at least unites those who can agree." Even among Republicans there is still a hope—as Mr. Harold Stassen indicated at his press conference on the 5th May—that some degree of accommodation will yet be possible with the Soviet Union. On the other hand, the American public as a whole has clearly been less bemused this time by the promises which Generalissimo Stalin held out in the conversations with Mr. Stassen published on the 3rd May.

It may be to some extent unfortunate that Mr. Stassen, as the spokesman of the liberal wing of the Republican party, should have chosen the occasion of his press conference on the 5th to criticize the President's policy. (He did, however, make it clear that he supported the Greco-Turkish Aid Bill in its present amended form.) Such criticism will probably not affect the final vote of the House of Representatives on Mr. Truman's programme, but it does serve to emphasize the dissensions with which Mr. Stassen's own party is torn at the moment. As it is, some "Old Guard" Republicans who have no love for the ex-Governor of Minnesota, have joined forces with the Russophil Democrats to oppose the Greco-Turkish Aid Bill in the House Committee on Rules. The same elements, apparently disliking the prestige which is accruing to Mr. Truman from the present bi-partisan approach to foreign policy more than they like the idea of national unity, are also reported to be urging Senator Vandenberg to withdraw his support from the President to the extent of resigning from the U.S. delegation to the United Nations General Assembly. Their pretext is that the U.N. Participation Act of 1945 compels delegates to vote "under the instruction of the President" and that it is unseemly for a Republican leader to take orders from a Chief Executive chosen by the Democrats. In another short-sighted act of partisanship they have caused an appropriations sub-committee of the House to delete the entire 1948 estimates for the State Department information services, fearing, it is said, that the latter might be used to the advantage of the rival Democratic party.

Other Republicans, and a few Democrats, have been giving vent to their Russophobia in attempts to prune the President's general foreign relief programme of benefits which this might otherwise extend to nations within the Soviet orbit. On the 30th April, the House of Representatives, in the teeth of strong opposition from the Chairman of its Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. Charles A. Eaton (Republican, New Jersey), reduced the amount to be made available for relief purposes from 350 to 200 million dollars and excluded countries dominated by the Soviet Union from the programme unless their Governments agreed to the latter being controlled exclusively by American missions set up by the State Department and "screened" by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The House also sought to deny relief to countries paying reparations.

The reparations issue is one upon which anti-Soviet feeling easily crystallizes at the moment, and it is being fully exploited by the Italian-American organizations at the hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Italian peace treaty. Among those who have so far appeared before the Committee to oppose ratification of the treaty have been Mr. Adolph A. Berle, the former Assistant Secretary of State; Mr. Charles Poletti, Lieutenant-Governor of New York State from 1939 to 1942; and Dr. Paul Shipman Andrews, Dean of the Law School at Syracuse University. On the 1st May Dr. Andrews denounced the treaty as "pushing Italy towards Communism" and as inconsistent with the President's attempts to rescue other countries like Greece and Turkey from Communist domination.

Partly perhaps because it is meeting in that part of the United States where the Zionists can ensure that the press pays most attention, the special session of the United Nations General Assembly on Palestine is now arousing considerable interest. To judge, however, from the references in the advertisements of the American League for a Free Palestine to the "game of tragic futility" which is allegedly being played at Flushing Meadows, the Zionists themselves are not happy about the proceedings. In fact, the extremist Political Action Committee for Palestine is endeavouring to create a diversion with a new "Exodus by Air" programme which involves the raising of funds to drop thousands of young Jews by parachute into Holy Land. Some non-Zionist internationalists have sharply criticized the "incoherent, uncertain and largely irresponsible" attitude which the U.S. delegation is believed to be adopting in the Assembly. The greatest discomfiture, however, has been suffered by the American Communists who have been faced with the necessity of explaining away M. Gromyko's attempts to ingratiate himself with the Arabs to their many Jewish supporters in New York City.

Inside the United States the labour situation is now tending to become more confused than ever. While a number of the larger concerns have continued to negotiate new wage contracts with their employees along the lines of the steel agreement of the 20th April (see Summary No. 389), some 25,000 members of the C.I.O. Steel Workers Union are at present on strike against smaller companies which claim that they cannot afford the proposed wage increase of 15 cents an hour. Local units of the A.F. of L. builders' unions are also striking for higher wages. Meanwhile, the nation-wide telephone strike has been in process of settlement, but only on a piecemeal basis. In Washington the Republicans are still a long way from an agreed and workable labour policy, although 16 of the 48 State legislatures have been able to enact new labour laws since January. The Republican leaders in the Senate have now rejected the idea of finding out from the President how much of their proposed legislation he would be likely to veto, and they have also voted down a scheme to divide this legislation into four separate bills so that Mr. Truman could accept some and reject others. Their "all or nothing" attitude is said to be dictated by a belief that they may be able in the end to run with the hare of labour and hunt with the hounds of public opinion—the idea being to placate union leaders by passing no bill at all and at the same time to inflame the rest of the electorate against the President by pointing out that it was his veto which kept the promises of anti-strike legislation from being honoured.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

According to press reports the Argentine Senate has ordered the removal from office of all the members of the Supreme Court of Justice (see Summary No. 369). The accusations against the judges include abuse of authority, violation of duty, interference in politics by recognition of the revolutions of 1930 and 1943, and refusal to acknowledge the labour courts. The Supreme Court is thus condemned for recognizing the revolution from which the present régime emerged; in fact the jumble of accusations seems to have been designed to confuse public opinion, since the Opposition could hardly defend the Court for recognizing the revolution of 1943, while the masses of Peronistas might be supposed to back the Government on the question of the acknowledgement of the labour courts. Whatever the charges, it is clear that the Government are determined to eliminate the present Supreme Court, which represents the last outpost of opposition to Peronism and could in fact inconvenience the Government by impeding legislation. The loss of independence and impartiality by the Supreme Court reflects a further decline in Argentine public morality, and suggests the possibility of constitutional amendments to permit the present Government to remain in power.

Honduras

General Tiburcio Carías is one of the two or three dictators in Latin America who have survived the war and its repercussions to date. He came to power at the beginning of 1933, and his term of office, twice prolonged by National Assemblies, expires on the first day of 1949. Although President Carías has promised that elections will be held on October 1948 and that he will then hand over his authority to his successor, members of the opposition naturally fear that he may either change his mind or elect his own successor. The Opposition Party, the Reds, or Liberals, have had a thin time since the President and his Blues (the Nationalists) have been in power. Although a political amnesty, granted at the beginning of 1946, was followed by a lively anti-Carías campaign, opponents have continued to be subjected to acts of petty persecution, and nothing resembling an organised movement with an Opposition leader emerged until this year, when the Reds approached General Solis. As a result General Solis was watched, then arrested and bidden to accept either the post of Consul-General at New Orleans, or "the consequences." It was duly announced that he had chosen the Consulate.

President Carías' action suggests that the Opposition may not be allowed to find a candidate of their own. In this case the choice appears to lie between Dr. Gálvez and General Abraham Williams, both Blues. General Williams, who is Vice-President, resigned from the post of Minister of the Interior and Justice and Health in December after apparently quarreling with the President, and also, it is believed, in order to be free to prepare for his nomination as a presidential candidate. Anyone who quarrels with General Carías may be expected to make an appeal to the Opposition, but it seems likely that the President will give his support to Dr. Gálvez, a true Blue who has the additional recommendation of being lawyer to the United Fruit Company. Such a candidature would not be popular; it would suggest confirmation of General Carías' dictatorship, which, however necessary in the chaotic conditions existing in 1932, has given order without political advancement and financial stability without material progress. Honduras has no labour laws, only a few miles of paved roads, one of the highest illiteracy rates in America, and a rich variety of endemic diseases: the principal solace is drunkenness, which affords the Government a comfortable revenue from its liquor monopoly.

Mexico

Returning President Truman's trip to Mexico, President Alemán has recently visited Washington and New York. Among many other activities, he addressed the United Nations General Assembly as well as the U.S. Congress, was decorated with the Legion of Merit and had a civic reception in New York. While Mexican opinion seems likely to favour this inter-American fraternisation, the extreme right and left of the Mexican press has made the visit of President Truman the pretext for a certain amount of sniping. From the right the elderly Señor Luis Cabrera warned Mexicans that the United States wanted unified hemispheric defence and the lowering of tariffs, and urged President Alemán not to be tempted. This was followed by some recommendations from Señor Bussols, the former Mexican Ambassador in Moscow—and a Communist—who enlarged on the danger to Mexican independence of fully accepting the hemisphere defence scheme: if war were to break out between the U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. was Mexico not to be able to decide for herself which was the aggressor? Mr. Truman would be mistaken if he thought he could deal with the Mexicans like the "tame oxen" of Central America. There was no need to follow the example of Argentina in blatantly opposing the United States' designs: the idea of continental defence was unobjectionable, but it must not be a cloak for United States military and economic hegemony. Señor Bussols' line of talk, though a little more cunning than that of some of his fellow-travellers, drew a broadside from Excelsior, which ridiculed the attempts of spiritual Georgians and Byelo-Russians to set up as champions of Mexican nationality, and declared that Mexicans intended to live within the healthy freedom of the good-neighbour policy.

THE UNITED NATIONS

General Assembly

Palestine

On the 1st May the Special Assembly called to consider the Palestine problem adopted its agenda. It included the United Kingdom item without the need for a vote, and rejected the Arab item on the termination of the mandate by 24 votes to 15 with 10 abstentions. The Slav States supported the Arab case. On the 2nd May, in the General Committee of the Assembly, the Slav States proposed that the Jewish Agency should be heard at a plenary session of the Assembly. Their proposal was defeated by 8 votes to 3, with Latin American States abstaining. A U.S. motion to refer Jewish requests to the First Committee for a decision was amended by the U.K. representative in order to enable the Committee to consider further applications that might be made: In this way the Palestine Arabs would be given equal treatment with the Jews. Thus amended, the resolution was passed by 11 votes, with three abstentions. The problem of Arab and Jewish participation came before the Assembly on the 3rd and 5th May, and what had been said in the Committee was repeated and elaborated in the Assembly. The final result was an instruction to the Political Committee to hear the Jewish Agency, and to decide for itself what other Palestinian organisations it heard. Three Latin American and two Slav States sponsored the resolution, which was carried by 44 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions. A resolution to give the Jewish Agency a non-voting seat in the Assembly was defeated by 39 votes to 8, with 7 abstentions. S. Africa's representative voted for the resolution. The Political Committee of the Assembly is now in a position to plan the "Committee of Enquiry," for which purpose the Special Assembly was called together.

Military Staff Committee

What may loosely be called the "disarmament" work of the United Nations finds itself held up in part by the absence of any armed forces which, according to Article 43, of the Charter should be at the disposal of the Security Council. The preparation of plans for these forces is the task of the Military Staff Committee, composed of the Chiefs of Staff (or their representatives) of the Permanent Members of the Security Council, whose work was for so long frustrated by the attitude of the Russian Government. On the 3rd May the Committee published an 80-page report on "the general principles governing the organisation of the armed forces made available to the Security Council by member nations of the United Nations." The report contains 41 articles. Twenty-five of these were agreed unanimously. Sixteen show disagreement, with Russia tending to stand against the united views of the other four Powers. The disagreements include the vital issues. Russia insists that each of the five Powers must contribute equal forces, equal in all respects; so that, for example, Great Britain's naval contingent must be in no way superior to Russia's, nor America's air contingent in any way superior to China's. In between periods of action Russia would have the contingents kept in the Home territory of the contributing Power, who would thus be debarred from stationing the force in any colony, overseas territory, allied country, etc., the United States presumably being unable to keep her U.N. contingent in Alaska. The other four Powers maintain that the forces could be kept in any place to which a contributing Power had legal access. Russia does not consider that bases are among the "facilities" which the Charter expects members to put at the disposal of U.N. forces. Russia wishes the U.N. forces to return home within 30 to 90 days of completing any allotted task. The other Powers are content with "as soon as possible." The contingents cannot be used against any of the Permanent members, nor would it be easy to employ them against the friends of Permanent members. Such are the underlying assumptions of the Charter. For all that, the report records a notable achievement, since this preliminary work of the Military Staff Committee has brought a step nearer the formation of the first international police force in modern history.

GERMANY

No decisions of importance have been reached in the latest Four-Power Council meetings in Berlin, and indeed the present phase of differing policies makes it inevitable that less and less can be threshed out at this level. Fruitless discussions have again taken place over the French aversion to anything resembling the union of parties all over Germany. On the 10th May the Control Council studied once again without success the question of printing a uniform currency for Germany. In this atmosphere interest is diverted more and more to the serious economic conditions of Western Germany.

Food rations for the normal consumer in the British zone are now being honoured to the extent of only some 800 calories daily out of the official ration of 1,550 calories. In some Ruhr towns they are reported to have sunk even lower, but agricultural areas are naturally less hardly hit. Even in the predominantly agricultural U.S. zone latest investigations show that the official ration (which is the same as in the British zone) is falling short by about 300 calories. A general strike of all workers except those in essential services took place in Hamburg on the 9th May, and mass protests led by trade union leaders were made against the food situation. A trade union leader said: "The moment has come to tell the British and German authorities and the world that we cannot go on without help and that when we perish you also perish." The whole demonstration was remarkably orderly. Spokesmen of the Communist Party denied to British officials that they had provoked the strike but they are evidently cashing in on events. Demonstrations were also held in Hanover, and a strike was called for Flensburg on the 13th May, thus spreading unrest to agricultural areas. In the key Ruhr town of Düsseldorf delegates from all works' councils met on the 12th May in criticism of both German and Allied authorities. Attempts were made by some delegates to provoke a general strike—and they obviously received considerable emotional support, but trade union leaders prevailed on the meeting to adopt a common-sense attitude. The strike was shelved—but not indefinitely as the meeting resolved to follow a policy of political non-cooperation if rations did not quickly improve. In Wuppertal council employees have already said that they cannot guarantee essential services because 30 per cent. of their number are away sick from lack of food. If there were any general move towards passive resistance the Occupation Powers would be seriously embarrassed, now that so much responsibility has been delegated to the Germans. Last autumn the two leading parties in the West, the Social Democrats and Christian Democrats threatened that they would not cooperate if conditions did not improve. Food rations are now lower than last autumn but so far the Parties have held their hand, and it seems unlikely that they will take such a grave step unless forced by public opinion.

Urgent consultations are being held by British and American officials to combat food difficulties. The Germans will appreciate the statement made by Lord Pakenham on his latest visit to Germany that he considered the Ruhr food problem one of the worst in the world and that he would work "flat out" to solve it. Part of the trouble is of course outside the direct control of the authorities in Germany: the world food shortages (insufficiently appreciated by Germans); the inevitable uphill struggle after the capitulation; and the lack of grain deliveries from Eastern Germany. These difficulties were, however, known when the modest rations for this year were fixed. The exceptionally hard winter has undoubtedly delayed the unloading of ships, thus accounting for some temporary hold-ups, and has also contributed towards the failure of some of the food collections in Germany. But a considerable share of the blame must rest with the German farmers and the German administration. There have been heavy deficiencies in the collection from the farmers, particularly of meat and grain, both in the North and South. Much is kept back and more sent on to the black market—with serious practical and psychological effects. Even the food that is collected is not distributed by the Germans as fairly or carefuly as it should be. The shortage of meat and fats means that more of the ration has to be met in bread. General Clay frankly told the Germans on the 6th May that all efforts to buy fat abroad had failed. Agreement has been reached to ship an extra 40,000 long tons of flour, but the U.S. authorities are now convinced that increased imports are essential. They wish to raise the figure to 130,000 tons during May and June though this suggestion is hardly thought to be practical. His Majesty's Government feel that while the German ration must be kept up as much as possible they cannot commit themselves to agreeing that food shortages caused by German inefficiency should automatically be replaced by imports, particularly in view of the financial strain and the acute world shortage—which would mean diverting supplies from other countries.

This raises the general question of the working of the Anglo-American fusion agreement which began in January and which is now suffering from the conflict of authority between the new bi-zonal economic agencies and the States (see particularly Summaries Nos. 388 and 389). In the first quarter of 1947 only about one-third of the export target for the period was met and it is most unlikely that the deficit can be made up by the end of the year. Daily coal output in the British zone was only 219,500 tons on the 3rd May and was tending to fall, although the target set by the Germans for May was nearly 255,000 tons (1938: 448,000 tons). The miners have decided not to make up the time lost by strikes before Easter. Economic shortages and their offsprings, barter and the black market, mean that the currency is losing its value. Actually there have been one or two recent instances of workers asking for a share in the products of their factories, presumably because the goods can be exchanged for food or clothing and are more use than cash. At present although coal is allocated to industries by the bi-zonal authorities there does not appear to be sufficient supervision over its distribution to individual firms to ensure that it is used to the best advantage. An alternative policy of control by the bi-zonal agencies would avoid waste but would mean overriding the rights of the States and would cause temporary unemployment. The Bi-zonal Economic Executive Committee's decisions cannot at present be carried out if the States wish to obstruct and the U.S. zone States in particular are obstructive to the point of sabotage. The Chairman, Dr. Agartz, wants the Committee to have overriding power to regulate economic activity throughout the area. The difficulty is to decide how this can be made law without infringing the rights of the States, and the U.S. Military Government view is that each Parliament in its zone would have to pass a separate bill surrendering this power. A second difficulty is that even then it is not clear whether all the 8 State Ministers on the Committee have to be consulted over every order—a system which Dr. Agartz believes renders prompt action impossible. A further complication is that the U.S. authorities seem solely concerned with extracting from Germany the maximum amount of exports to pay for imports and are not convinced, as are His Majesty's Government, that the export target can only be achieved on the basis of an expanding internal economy. The issue is really how far long-term Allied Policy—particularly that of the Americans—aimed at political decentralisation can be reconciled with the need for planning in the present emergency and whether, if central powers are granted, they can ever become unnecessary or be revoked. Despite differences of opinion between British and American authorities, Mr. Marshall has expressed his conviction that agreement can be reached. Meanwhile General Clay, although opposed to H.M. Government plans for a controlled economy, has repeatedly censured the farmers in the U.S. zone. He stated in Berlin on the 8th May that, if necessary, troops would be employed to force the peasants to deliver food and that he might be prepared to give the bi-zonal authorities greater power to deal with the present food crisis.

Constitutions for the three States of the French zone (but not for the Saar) have passed their readings in the German advisory assemblies and will be submitted to referendum on the 18th May when new Assemblies will also be elected. The Drafts are largely the work of the Christian Democrats who have an absolute majority in each case. The Constitutions have not been supported by more than two of the four parties in any of the States, so that their chances of being respected and supported in the future are considerably reduced. In the U.S. zone the two largest parties, the Social Democrats and Christian Democrats, generally collaborated in working for the constitutions, but in the French zone the Social Democrats voted for the Draft only in South Wuerttemberg. Previously all the Opposition parties had withdrawn from the Constitutional Committee, and the first Draft for this State, which entirely failed to make the Government responsible to Parliament, was rejected by French Military Government as "undemocratic." Substantial amendments also had to be made by the Germans themselves to the Rhineland–Palatinate Draft which was highly authoritarian in character and whose extreme particularist tendencies were more than even the Christian Democrats could tolerate. The Constitutions in their final form appear fairly moderate in tone. There are no independent State Presidents and no second chambers. The questions of socialisation and land reform (which the French themselves are now studying) are largely shelved. Some of the most heated debates were held over the question of confessional schools. Except in South Baden, which has not had confessional schools since 1876, these will be permitted alongside undenominational schools.

The action of the French authorities in rejecting the South Wuerttemberg Draft Constitution showed justifiable distrust of German constitutional theories, but the fact that they were compelled to take such action is probably a result of the negative attitude adopted all along towards German administrations. Although the French have made long-term plans to change the training of civil servants and have been active in the field of education they have not, unlike the British authorities, made real attempts to train the present generation of officials and ministers along democratic lines. Authoritarian tendencies therefore crop up rather more frequently than elsewhere in Western Germany, particularly in the District and Communal codes which are now being drafted. At the same time the zone's population is apathetic about political conditions and is cut off from political contact with the rest of Germany. Exports from the zone are still far higher per head of the population than those from the bi-zonal area, and the food situation is extremely grave; up to date, however, few strikes or protests are recorded.

AUSTRIA

The Special Commission on the Austrian Treaty and the Expert Committee for the study of German assets were due to meet in Vienna on the 12th May. Both the U.K. and U.S. Governments have appointed new personalities to the Commission and Committee in the hope that fresh minds may improve the chances of progress. The Russian delegate is the Head of the Western section of the Soviet Foreign Office and was the Secretary-General of the Moscow Conference. The Commission has been described by the three-party paper Neues Oesterreich as the "thin thread of hope which links our grey and fettered present with a brighter future."

The Austrian Federal Chancellor and and the Foreign Minister have made statements on the Moscow Conference in the Austrian Parliament. Dr. Figl appealed to the conscience of the world for justice for Austria and called upon the Allies to honour their signature to the Moscow Declaration. Dr. Gruber complained that Allied treatment of Austria was "much worse than that applied to Germany." He singled out the United States Government as having been the most co-operative in the Treaty discussions. While stressing Austria's natural link with the West in constitutional matters, Dr. Gruber emphasised his country's desire for friendship with all on the basis of complete political independence. Another appeal to the world was made by the Socialist Party, together with demands for the withdrawal of the bulk of the occupying forces and the cessation of the requisitioning of foodstuffs and other burdensome restrictions. The Communists have demanded inter alia an "Austria policy" and direct negotiations with the Soviet Union about the German assets.

About 5,000 factory workers took part in the "hunger demonstration" in Vienna on the 5th May. At one moment it seemed that the situation might get out of hand, and the Austrian authorities requested the help of the Allied military police. This, however, proved unnecessary. In his report to the Cabinet Dr. Figl attributed the serious turn taken by the demonstration to the participation of "numerous foreigners" and to "irresponsible elements." These elements (i.e., Communists) have been condemned by the Austrian T.U. League and by the People's Party and the Socialists. The Communist press has described the demonstration as a spontaneous expression of the workers' discontent. According to the American zone radio, nearly all the unofficial strikes occurred in enterprises under Russian management.

The Austrian Minister of Food has attributed the Vienna potato shortage—the main cause of the demonstration—chiefly to transport difficulties and to the delay in obtaining Russian permission for the import of potatoes from Lower Austria. Cabinet Ministers have discussed the situation with trade union officials and have promised that rations will be met in the future. Chancellor Figl is to head a trade union deputation to the Allied authorities.

As a result of the demonstration, the Austrian Cabinet has decided to approach the Allied Council once more to consent to the adequate arming of the Austrian police. In November 1946 an urgent appeal on these lines was addressed to the Council by the Chancellor, but no quadripartite agreement was reached, owing to demands made by the Soviet element for severe restrictions on the use of such arms as might be permitted. In February 1947 Under-Secretary of State Graf, described the Austrian police as being "equipped for playing at Red Indians" and stated that police losses in 1946 were as heavy as during the whole lifetime of the First Republic.

The decision taken by the Catholic Church in March to make a free grant of some Church lands for the re-settlement of Austrians whose means of livelihood disappeared as a result of the war, was the subject of a special Communist committee meeting in April. The meeting decided to ignore the Church's gift in the Communist press and otherwise to minimise its importance by suggesting that the measure was being taken as a result of Communist pressure and possibly as a gesture to hinder land reform. The meeting further decided that the K.P.O. should continue to maintain an apparently tolerant view of the Church, while in fact regarding it as the most important support of reaction. The People's Party press has stressed the generous extent of the Church's gift by giving figures to disprove "fantastic accounts" of the extent of Church property in Austria.

Eleven ships belonging to the Hungarian River and Ocean Shipping Company escaped from Linz on the 4th May and are reported to have reached the Russian zone, if not Bratislava. The ships have been impounded by the Linz Court of Appeal as a security for a claim by a British banking syndicate. The Austrian police appear to have made no attempt to prevent their passage, and the United States authorities disclaim responsibility.

The students of both Vienna and Innsbruck Universities have appealed respectively to the Allied Council and to the Austrian Government for leniency in the application of the Denazification Law to students, with particular regard to the "less incriminated" persons who are thus being excluded from studies. The Vienna appeal points to the more favourable situation of young persons in Germany, and the Innsbruck resolution makes a direct appeal for an amnesty for certain age-groups. On the whole the penalties in Austria are considerably heavier than those imposed on equally incriminated persons in Germany—on paper, at any rate.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The closing-down on the 4th May of the National and People's Courts, which had been set up to try collaborators and war criminals, serves to mark the end of a period of transition in Czechoslovak life towards more normal conditions. One of the last judgments was that delivered upon Jan Bata, head of the international shoe organisation. His Czechoslovak property has been confiscated and nationalised, and he himself sentenced in absentia—he is sheltering in Brazil—to 15 years' imprisonment. During the war, Bata failed to give assurances to His Majesty's Government concerning trading with the enemy.

On the whole, the courts appear to have resisted the attempts of the opportunists, whether political or otherwise, to turn the past two years into a large-scale witch hunt. The judicature has preserved much of its pre-war dignity and independence, although this has not been easy when its judgments have been too lenient for the Communists or too severe for the Democrats. With the approaching decision of the Constitution—which, of course, will vitally affect the foundations of Czechoslovak justice—and the completion of the nationalisation programme, the formative period in matters political and economic is giving way to a period of consolidation, and it is a healthy sign that the trials are now finished and done with.

This gradual change to more stable conditions is marked, too, by the holding of a census of population in Bohemia and Moravia arranged for the 22nd May. The census will provide an interesting picture of the great population changes which have taken place during the last two years as a result of expulsion and re-settlement, now virtually completed. The latest news of repatriation, by which means a small percentage of the Sudetenland depletion has been made good, is a report that 140,000 Czechs are to be brought back from Bosnia where they settled after the withdrawal of the Turks.

Whatever plans the extreme Left may cherish for an extension of political power—and they already have the lion's share—the Czechoslovak Government show themselves at the moment to be concerned with the more tangible problems of production and supply. Urgent all-party appeals are being broadcast for volunteer farm workers. M. Duriš, the Minister of Agriculture (Slovak Communist), has promised to bring the farming community within the benefits of pensions and health insurance, and to grant medium and small farmers some tax relief. M. Majer, the Minister of Food (Social Democrat), has forecast the indefinite continuance of rationing, and has recently reminded the public that shortages in neighbouring countries inevitably affected their own standard of living.

Dr. Ripka (National Socialist), the Minister of Foreign Trade, pointed in a recent press conference to the same need for consolidation in the general trade position of Czechoslovakia. Exports have declined gradually since January, and were less than imports for the first time in March. A trade agreement with Bulgaria, and amicable discussions with Mr. Krishna Menon, the representative of India, offer posibilities of further development. Dr. Ripka, however, forecast the re-entry of Germany into world markets in 1948, and increasing competition from the United States. With the disappearance of a "sellers' market," quality and economy of production must be the aim of Czechoslovak industry. This emphasis upon conservation rather than expansion is a fitting background for the International Timber Conference which has been meeting amid the delightfully wooded surroundings of Marianské Lázně, a district which bears witness to the fine pre-war afforestation policy of the Czechoslovak Government.

SOVIET UNION

The second anniversary of Victory Day—a public holiday for the Soviet peoples—was marked by an Order of the Day issued by the U.S.S.R. Minister of the Armed Forces, General Bulganin, decreeing a salute of 30 artillery salvoes to be fired in the Union capital, Moscow, the capitals of the Union Republics and in the cities of Leningrad, Stalingrad, Sebastopol and Odessa as well as in the recently incorporated Kaliningrad and Lvov. In this Order of the Day tribute was paid to the Armed Forces of the Soviet Union, the Communist Party, "the heroic Soviet people"—"the victor people"—and Generalissimo Stalin. The day was also marked by the publication of a number of articles, highly polemical in content and temper, by leading Soviet publicists, including Academician Tarle and Ilya Ehrenburg. As last year the claim was maintained that "the Soviet people made the greatest contribution to the common cause of victory of the freedom-loving peoples'' (New Times). The incorrigible Ehrenburg admitted that the British showed great stamina during the German bombing attacks, but added "the British saved themselves, but sitting on their island they were unable to save Europe. Europe's salvation began on 22nd June, 1941 . . .'' Academician Tarle deplored the rising tide of world reaction in the year ushered in by Mr. Churchill's Fulton speech of March 1946 and completed by Mr. Truman's programme for assistance to Greece and Turkey. But the "new pretenders to world dominion will encounter a calm and resolute rebuff from the Soviet Union,'' he warned. The main object of concern and vilification was the U.S.A. with its "Wall Street Lords,'' profiteering armaments manufacturers and imperialism actuated by "the desire to secure the oil of Iran, 'Iraq and Syria—seizable only on condition that all local Tsaldarises are firmly planted in the saddle.'' Against this picture of American greed and expansionism was conjured up the shining example of the Soviet Union to whom "Iran, 'Iraq, Korea and other countries do not mean petroleum, do not mean fisheries but nations with their historic record, their future development and capacity for progress.''

Abrogating a previous decree of the 2nd September, 1945, which ordained that 3rd September, fêted as anniversary of the victory over Japan, should be celebrated as a public holiday, the Præsidium of the Supreme Soviet has determined that in future it shall be regarded as an ordinary working day.

The Soviet press has recently shown revived interest in Turkey. After brief reports of the support for Armenian territorial claims from Armenian societies in the United States of America and in Latin America and of the supply of British aircraft to the Turkish Government, Izvestiya (6th May) attacks Turkish reaction on familiar lines but also adds the following complaints against the British and Americans in Turkey: (a) "British and American instructors and agents are operating on a large scale either in military uniform or in the guise of civilians, commercial travellers, etc.; (b) construction of more than 100 airports, strategic highways, ports and the naval base at Ismid under British leadership during the war; (c) servicing of the 'civilian' airlines established by Great Britain and the United States of America by Anglo-American military personnel—who also control special closed airports and radio stations (this is a typical piece of Soviet misrepresentation. The B.O.A.C. operate an air service to Turkey and some of the pilots and other officers may be former military officers but are not now serving soldiers. There are no "closed'' Anglo-American airports); (d) British control over radio-location installations which 'cover the shores of the Straits.' (In this instance technical advice is tendentiously confounded with "control''); (e) New powerful broadcasting stations at Angora, Istanbul and Ismid.'' The article, which suggests no little Soviet resentment at Anglo-American support of Turkey, concludes by warning the Turkish public against the dangers to Turkish peace and independence contained in President Truman's offer of assistance.

There has been a revival of Soviet propaganda (Trud 4th May) on the oppression of workers by the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The Company is said (on the authority of the Persian paper Mardom) to have bribed Major Fatehi for 200,000 rials to break the Abadan strike and to be "making use of the old and tried method of colonisers, that of inciting one nationality against the other,'' to have hired Arab agents to attack workers. Mardom is also quoted as saying "the policy of the British Government in Iran and the activities of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company played an important rôle in the provocation of 14th July. Trud concludes that there is documentary evidence of direct bribery of Iranian civil servants by the Oil Company, of the Company's arming of Arabs and incitement of the latter against workers. The indictment officially accuses the Company of provoking the "sanguinary events in Abadan.''

During recent months there have been numerous rumours of negotiations being carried on between the U.S.S.R. and emissaries of General Franco through Swiss intermediaries. Tass has now seen fit to issue a formal denial, refuting, in particular, a statement from Svenska Morgenbladet that such negotiations were being carried on in Buenos Aires and Tangier.

It was announced in a joint Polish-Ukrainian communiqué of the 8th May that the reciprocal repatriation of Poles and Ukrainians from the two Republics had been completed in accordance with the Treaty of the 9th September, 1944. No firm figure of the numbers involved is available. M. Mikolajczyk estimated in January 1946 that 543,876 Ukrainians were due to leave Poland for the Ukrainian S.S.R.

According to Polish estimates of April 1947, a total of 1,373,000 Poles had come to Poland from east of the Curzon line by July 1946 and a further 574,000 were expected, which makes a total of 1,947,000. Those from the Ukraine would be rather over half of that number.

Among the work in progress announced by the Academy of Sciences is a lavishly annotated edition, with Russian verse translation, of the "Ramayana.'' This may perhaps be connected with the drive to intensify cultural relations with India. It is interesting to note that this mythological poem is presented by Academician Barannikov, in his pre-view of the work, as an allegory of political conditions in northern India in the XVIth Century, and in particular of the oppression of the Hindu population by the Moslem conquerors. Barannikov, who was born in the Ukraine in 1890, was elected to the Academy in 1939, and specialises primarily in the philology of modern Indian languages.

Little or nothing has so far been revealed by the Soviet authorities about the effects of the new wage–price–rations measures, enforced in September–October 1946, on the Soviet standard of living and on Soviet morale. The changes were merely outlined in a communiqué published in the Soviet press on 17th September, 1946 (see Summary No. 308). The communiqué announced "a certain increase in ration prices,'' which certainly did not give the impression that ration prices were to rise drastically. In fact, and to the surprise of the population, ration prices were raised from 100 to 250% for the principal items in the Soviet diet. Thus the price of the black bread ration rose from one rouble a kilo to 3·7 roubles a kilo—potatoes from 1·9 roubles a kilo to 4 roubles a kilo—butter from 28 roubles a litre to 66 roubles a litre—beef from 14 roubles a kilo to 30 roubles a kilo, and so on through the list. Therefore it now costs about 2·8 times as much to purchase a given quantity of rationed food as before the 16th September when the decree came into operation. Apart from these increases in the cost of rationed foods, the rations themselves were considerably reduced (especially in the case of dependents and children). Many persons were re-classified downwards from one category to another, deprived of supplementary rations and in some extreme cases deprived of any ration at all. This drastic measure affects all the rationed population, which is virtually the entire urban and much of the non-agricultural rural population, but entirely excludes the agricultural population. Under present conditions in the Soviet Union, it must result in a sharp reduction in the amount of foodstuffs consumed by the average individual, which means in turn a sharp decline in the standard of living and in real wages. In the Soviet Union food costs are such a high percentage of the total expenses of the average individual, that food is nearly synonymous with standard of living. As a result of having his expenditure on food for himself and family raised a minimum of almost 200%, the average worker will be able to spend much less than previously on consumer goods, services, entertainments, &c., for the increases in money wages and salaries decreed on the 15th September were only very partial compensation for the effect of these price rises on individual and family budgets. The main objectives behind these measures would appear to be: (a) to secure a reduction in food consumption so as to meet a general shortage of grain owing to the bad harvest and perhaps to provide reserves either for political purposes or for ensuring the smooth passage of de-rationing, should this in fact still be contemplated in 1947; (b) to obtain an increase in the total labour force by compelling "dependents'' to take up employment and employed people to work harder. The Soviet people have been hard hit by this decree. Whereas all expected that at the end of the war living conditions and the food situation would get better, the position is that, after five years of difficult life, sacrifices are still far from ended.

There are certain indications that the Ministry of Health of the U.S.S.R., on which devolves many of the more important tasks of post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction, is in bad shape, at least at the Ministerial level. Reuter reports from Moscow on 10th May that the Deputy Minister of Public Health, Major-General A. Y. Kuznetsov, has been dismissed for "incompetence.'' Kuznetsov has held this post since March 1943 and was at the same time Chief State Sanitary Inspector of U.S.S.R. According to the journal Medical Worker he has now been removed from both these posts "because he could not cope with the tasks allotted to him.'' The same reason was given when M. G. A. Miterev was removed from his duties as Minister of Public Health some months ago (see Summary No. 388).

the freedom-loving peoples'' (New Times). The incorrigible Ehrenburg admitted that the British showed great stamina during the German bombing attacks, but added "the British saved themselves, but sitting on their island they were unable to save Europe. Europe's salvation began on 22nd June, 1941 . . . .'' Academician Tarle deplored the rising tide of world reaction in the year ushered in by Mr. Churchill's Fulton speech of March 1946 and completed by Mr. Truman's programme for assistance to Greece and Turkey. But the "new pretenders to world dominion will encounter a calm and resolute rebuff from the Soviet Union,'' he warned. The main object of concern and vilification was the U.S.A. with its "Wall Street Lords,'' profiteering armaments manufacturers and imperialism actuated by "the desire to secure the oil of Iran, 'Iraq and Syria—seizable only on condition that all local Tsaldarises are firmly planted in the saddle.'' Against this picture of American greed and expansionism was conjured up the shining example of the Soviet Union to whom "Iran, 'Iraq, Korea and other countries do not mean petroleum, do not mean fisheries but nations with their historic record, their future development and capacity for progress.''

Abrogating a previous decree of the 2nd September, 1945, which ordained that 3rd September, fêted as anniversary of the victory over Japan, should be celebrated as a public holiday, the Præsidium of the Supreme Soviet has determined that in future it shall be regarded as an ordinary working day.

The Soviet press has recently shown revived interest in Turkey. After brief reports of the support for Armenian territorial claims from Armenian societies in the United States of America and in Latin America and of the supply of British aircraft to the Turkish Government, Izvestiya (6th May) attacks Turkish reaction on familiar lines but also adds the following complaints against the British and Americans in Turkey: (a) "British and American instructors and agents are operating on a large scale either in military uniform or in the guise of civilians, commercial travellers, etc.; (b) construction of more than 100 airports, strategic highways, ports and the naval base at Ismid under British leadership during the war; (c) servicing of the 'civilian' airlines established by Great Britain and the United States of America by Anglo-American military personnel—who also control special closed airports and radio stations (this is a typical piece of Soviet misrepresentation. The B.O.A.C. operate an air service to Turkey and some of the pilots and other officers may be former military officers but are not now serving soldiers. There are no "closed'' Anglo-American airports); (d) British control over radio-location installations which 'cover the shores of the Straits.' (In this instance technical advice is tendentiously confounded with "control''); (e) New powerful broadcasting stations at Angora, Istanbul and Ismid.'' The article, which suggests no little Soviet resentment at Anglo-American support of Turkey, concludes by warning the Turkish public against the dangers to Turkish peace and independence contained in President Truman's offer of assistance.

There has been a revival of Soviet propaganda (Trud 4th May) on the oppression of workers by the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The Company is said (on the authority of the Persian paper Mardom) to have bribed Major Fatehi for 200,000 rials to break the Abadan strike and to be "making use of the old and tried method of colonisers, that of inciting one nationality against the other,'' to have hired Arab agents to attack workers. Mardom is also quoted as saying "the policy of the British Government in Iran and the activities of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company played an important rôle in the provocation of 14th July. Trud concludes that there is documentary evidence of direct bribery of Iranian civil servants by the Oil Company, of the Company's arming of Arabs and incitement of the latter against workers. The indictment officially accuses the Company of provoking the "sanguinary events in Abadan.''

During recent months there have been numerous rumours of negotiations being carried on between the U.S.S.R. and emissaries of General Franco through Swiss intermediaries. Tass has now seen fit to issue a formal denial, refuting, in particular, a statement from Svenska Morgenbladet that such negotiations were being carried on in Buenos Aires and Tangier.

It was announced in a joint Polish-Ukrainian communiqué of the 8th May that the reciprocal repatriation of Poles and Ukrainians from the two Republics had been completed in accordance with the Treaty of the 9th September, 1944. No firm figure of the numbers involved is available. M. Mikolajczyk estimated in January 1946 that 543,876 Ukrainians were due to leave Poland for the Ukrainian S.S.R.

According to Polish estimates of April 1947, a total of 1,373,000 Poles had come to Poland from east of the Curzon line by July 1946 and a further 574,000 were expected, which makes a total of 1,947,000. Those from the Ukraine would be rather over half of that number.

Among the work in progress announced by the Academy of Sciences is a lavishly annotated edition, with Russian verse translation, of the "Ramayana.'' This may perhaps be connected with the drive to intensify cultural relations with India. It is interesting to note that this mythological poem is presented by Academician Barannikov, in his pre-view of the work, as an allegory of political conditions in northern India in the XVIth Century, and in particular of the oppression of the Hindu population by the Moslem conquerors. SCANDINAVIA

Norway

During his recent tour Mr. Henry Wallace visited Oslo. He was given an exceedingly friendly welcome and all the meetings were filled to capacity. Despite this, the impression remains that the Norwegian public, drawn by clever advance propaganda, came to see the ex-Vice-President of the United States whose subsequent activities had caused such a stir in the world press rather than to hear Mr. Wallace expound his views. In one of his speeches Mr. Wallace referred to an alleged statement by Mr. Churchill in which he labelled Mr. Wallace as a crypto-Communist, and stated that the British ex-Premier professed to regard another war as inevitable. Mr. Churchill's reply to these allegations (published in Manchester Guardian, 21st April, 1947), was promptly printed and appeared in some papers side by side with the report of Mr. Wallace's speech.

Conservative members voiced their fears and apprehensions in the Storting on the 26th of April, when the Government's bill exempting the 1945 class of conscripts from military training and, instead, directing them to work in the forests, was debated. The belated call-up of these conscripts was due to the occupation. M. Sven Nielsen said that he was unable to give his consent to a measure which violated the principle that every male should be given military training fitting him to defend his country. Not even during the inter-war years had such training been replaced by labour service, and the speaker regarded it as fantastic that a Government which made pretences to rebuilding the defence forces should at the same time be prepared to exempt a complete year-class from basic military instruction. Replying for the Government, M. Hauge, Minister of Defence, said that he could well understand the doubts voiced by the Opposition but wished to point out that the drafting of the 1945 year's class to forest work did not preclude them from receiving military training later, should this prove necessary.

The fact that the bill was carried need not be taken as evidence that the Norwegians are again going to allow themselves the luxury of neglecting their armed forces, and among the Ministers M. Hauge at least may be relied upon to do everything in his power to bring the services of this peace-loving and un-militaristic nation to a reasonable level of efficiency and preparedness. The present extraordinary measure was in fact, as far as can be seen, dictated by economic necessity only.

Denmark

The bill providing for the despatch of the Danish Brigade to Germany was given it first reading on the 6th of May. As was to be expected, several speakers immediately coupled the question with that of the German refugees interned in Denmark. The newly appointed leader of the Conservative parliamentary group, M. Ole Bjørn Kraft, pointed out that the continued presence of the refugees constituted a heavy burden and hoped that the despatch of the troops would make the Great Powers more willing to assist in the solution of the refugee problem. Communists advanced criticism on the ground that Great Britain had been anxious to provide the arms with which the Brigade was to be equipped without consulting Denmark as regards either the quality or the price. M. Starcke for the Justice Union even disputed the necessity for the despatch of the contingent and suggested that Britain's promise concerning the removal of the refugees was so worded as to give Denmark no legal assurance. He also criticised the arrangement under which the troops were going to be under British command, as Denmark thus became co-responsible for actions over which she had no control. His party could not see their way to support the bill. M. Rasmussen, the Foreign Minister, gave particulars concerning the notes exchanged between the British and Danish Governments on the refugee question. When the present evacuation to the Russian and American zones was concluded another approximately 100,000 refugees remained in Denmark. While he could not supply information about any new agreement on the matter he had reason to believe that in the near future the evacuation of these last 100,000 refugees would begin. The bill was sent to Committee.

Almost the first action of M. Ole Bjørn Kraft, was to launch an attack upon the Foreign Minister for his handling of the South Slesvig question, accusing him of not having used sufficient energy in obtaining a hearing for the wishes of the South Slesvigers at the Foreign Ministers' meeting in London. On the following day M. Kristensen resumed his pro-Slesvig campaign with renewed vigour, insisting that it was impossible to safeguard "Danishness" in South Slesvig as long as that country was under German sovereignty. He reiterated the demand for a plebiscite, while at the same time stressing his desire for good relations with Germany, but concluded that "we do not intend to pay for Germany's prospective good will by sacrificing our compatriots in South Slesvig." Thereupon M. Christmas Moeller, now free from his obligations as Chairman of the Conservatives, expressed his regret that M. Kristensen had insinuated that some of his fellow-countrymen had treacherously forsaken the South Slesvig people. While the Premier was now maintaining a secession demand of this kind which would liberate the Danes in South Slesvig, he contended, he had himself abandoned them by his note to the Great Powers which stipulated that South Slesvig should remain under German sovereignty. M. Moeller also pointed out that the Germans were equally entitled to refuse to buy Danish good will by sacrificing their nationals in South Slesvig and also reiterated his well-known argument that if German sovereignty in South Slesvig were ended this would represent a big political gamble for Denmark. At the same time he referred to the general complaint that the Note had not been properly considered at the Moscow Conference. What did this matter if the Danish Premier so completely disavowed the note itself?

It thus seems that the South Slesvig question is once again going to be one of the main subjects of argument inside and outside the Danish Parliament, and it remains to be seen how far the Conservative and Venstre parties, now having more or less the same aim, will succeed in making their wishes felt with the Great Powers. Much may depend on how far they will be able to persuade the Social-Democrats and the Communists of the soundness of their views. So far the leading Social-Democratic paper, Social-Demokraten, remains sceptical, remarking that the two leaders need not be taken too seriously as the idea is "merely to win in the party competition without risking an election which would seal the fate of the anti-Socialist Government."

FRANCE

M. Ramadier's Government is, for the time being, firmly reinstated and in place of the five Communist Ministers three Socialist Ministers and one M.R.P. Minister have been appointed. There has been some re-allotment of ministerial tasks and M. Teitgen, Deputy Prime Minister, has taken over the functions of M. Thorez as regards the Civil Service, while M. Letourneau, Minister of Commerce, has assumed responsibility for Reconstruction. M. Daniel Mayer (Socialist) is the new Minister of Labour, M. Prigent (M.R.P.) is Minister of Health, M. Thomas (Socialist) is Minister of Posts and Telegraphs and M. Béchard (Socialist) is Under-Secretary for National Defence under the Prime Minister. The Rassemblement des Gauches was offered the Ministry of Reconstruction but refused, being unable to agree on the choice of a representative and unwilling to tie itself too closely to an economic policy of which it disapproves. Its uneasiness has, however, been partly allayed by M. Ramadier's description of himself as "un socialiste non-dirigiste" and by the compromise wording of the resolution adopted by the Socialist National Council. The M.R.P. have clung to their interpretation of the constitutional situation and welcome the strengthening of the Prime Minister's position.

The Socialists are fully conscious of the danger of their position and of the narrow majority won by M. Ramadier and the parliamentary leaders over the Socialist rank-and-file and the trade unionists who do not relish the prospect of taking sole responsibility for an unpopular wages policy. The resolution of the Socialist National Council stated that the party would not remain in power if it was supported by a reactionary majority (i.e. with the Communists in opposition) and invited the Socialist Ministers to remain in close contact with the trade unions. The Communists are not for the time being exploiting their position and content themselves with insisting on Socialist responsibility for the Government's shift towards the Right. They reiterate their claim to be "un grand parti de gouvernement" and say that they will give the Government their support in its efforts to help the workers. In the matter of wage-claims the Communists are giving their support only to claims for increased bonuses for higher production; even the Government appears to regard these as justified since it has now conceded a 3 fr. increase in the production bonus for the Renault workers. As a result of this and of the restored authority of the C.G.T., the Renault workers have agreed to return to work; but they will forfeit their pay for the days when they were on strike, and one or two workshops are consequently still holding out. Labour unrest is spreading in various parts of the country, and production bonuses may have to be raised in in many works. Negotiations began on the 12th May between M. Ramadier and the C.G.T. for a general settlement of the wages question.

The much-heralded debate in the Assembly on Madagascar which took place on the 7th–9th May was overshadowed by the Government crisis. The debate was on general policy and not on the particular question of lifting the parliamentary immunity of the Malagasy deputies, which will be dealt with later. The only Malagasy nationalist deputy still at liberty, M. Raseta, was one of the speakers, but he did not touch on the revolt in which he is accused of being concerned, and asked only for the autonomy of Madagascar within the French Union. Most speakers were critical of the Governor-General of Madagascar, M. de Coppet, and although the Minister of Colonies defended him vigorously the Government, it appears, are willing to sacrifice him. The Minister gave proof of the complicity of all the Malagasy nationalist deputies in the revolt but threw no light on the Government's general policy. It is significant that during the debate the African native deputies of all parties showed their sympathy with the demands of the Malagasies and their dislike of the policy of assimilation. At the end of the debate a Communist demand for a parliamentary commission of inquiry was defeated, and a vote of confidence in the Government's policy was passed by 375 votes to 47, the P.R.L. voting against and the Communists abstaining. Meanwhile H.M. Consul-General in Madagascar sees little hope of a return to peaceful conditions in the island and says that the French are faced with the difficulty of reducing the influence of the Hovas, the ruling caste which sponsored the revolt, and who at present hold many posts in the administration.

Victory celebrations were held in Paris on the 11th May, and on the previous day Mr. Churchill was decorated by M. Ramadier with the Médaille Militaire.

The International Bank of Reconstruction has granted France a loan of 250 million dollars. This is only half the amount requested, but it is believed that a further loan may be made later on. The loan is to help France to import the goods needed for her programme of reconstruction, and full information on the way in which it is employed will be furnished to the Bank. France will pay interest at 3¼ per cent. plus a further 1 per cent. commission on all sums outstanding. In addition she will pay a "commitment" fee on the undispersed portion of the Loan. Amortisation will be over 30 years and will start in 5 years' time.

Meanwhile France has been permitted to draw 25 million dollars from the International Monetary Fund as an advance on her quota as fixed by the Bretton Woods conference.

SWITZERLAND

Renewed demands for higher wages threaten to produce an outbreak of strikes, especially among workers in the building trade. Last month about 600 painters and plasterers ceased work in Berne over a demand for an increase of 50 centimes an hour, and forced the Authorities to cancel local regulations about half-yearly removal dates. The existing wage agreement for the building trade ends on the 14th May, on which date 90,000 workers threaten to strike unless working hours are reduced, paid holidays are approved, and wages are increased by about 70 centimes an hour. It is stated that these concessions would raise building costs by approximately 20 per cent., with a consequent increase in rents and the cost of living generally. Already the high cost of construction is seriously hampering the industry, and Federal Departments are asking cantonal authorities to co-operate with them in postponing all contracts which are not absolutely essential. The Federal Council has also refused to confirm a collective wage agreement proposed by the furniture-making trade, on the ground that the suggested schedule of wages is unreasonably high. Two other points of interest on the industrial question are: first, that 90 per cent. of applications received by the Price Controller for increased prices are based on higher wages; second, that the number of days lost through strikes in 1946 was the highest since 1930.

With a view to arresting the flight from the land, and to maintaining the maximum acreage under cultivation, the Federal Council has submitted a draft Bill providing for public grants to agricultural workers.

Dissatisfaction is being expressed because of the failure of the Argentine to ship the grain quota specified in the Swiss-Argentine Commercial Agreement, and also at the Argentine demand for substantially higher prices. If these are maintained, the Swiss Authorities will have to provide further subsidies to keep down the price of bread. The import of butter from the Argentine, however, allowed stocks of locally-produced butter to be increased to 2,600 tons by the end of April. This is ten times the figure of a year ago.

Greater allocations of meat to restaurants have reduced the meatless days to Friday only. Stocks of cheese are lower, but supplies of nut fats and oils are plentiful, and the product has been decontrolled since the beginning of April. A special ration of 6 kilog. of sugar for jam-making has been issued for this year.

Fuel allocations for 1947–48 are much better than those of last winter. For domestic purposes the quota of certain classes of coal is to be raised from 15 per cent. to 35 per cent. of basic requirements; for industry, up to 75 per cent.; for railways, 100 per cent. There is, however, a shortage of good quality coal which is affecting the gasworks and certain specialised industries. Wood fuel is no longer controlled.

Subject to the conclusion of the Anglo-Swiss air agreement now being negotiated, British European Airways propose to inaugurate on the 19th May a new two-way daily service from London to Geneva.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

The stir provoked by General Franco's Bill of Succession and Don Juan's answering manifesto (see Summary No. 389) is dying away, and the fact that the Caudillo is still very much in command of the situation is evidenced by his ability to prevail upon Dr. Salazar to order the removal from the Prince's immediate proximity of two of his chief advisers, Señores Gil Robles and Saénz Rodriguez and another adjutant, Señor Vejarano. The three men have been ordered to depart from the Lisbon area, ostensibly for having indulged in activities likely to prejudice Portugal's good relations with her neighbour, Spain. They have now moved to Oporto. General Franco's own assessment of the position is provided aptly enough in the Arriba headlines of the 29th April, reproducing an interview granted to the Madrid correspondent of the Sunday Times: "En la Ley Sucesoria—afirma Franco—no se trata de una restauración sino de una instauración."

Moving ceremonies in connection with the removal to a new throne of the Virgin of Montserrat, the patroness of Catalonia, took place on the 27th and 28th April. Elaborate preparations had been made by the Abat Oliva Commission, backed by wealthy members of the former Lliga Regionalista (Conservative) and the Union Democrática de Cataluña, the nearest equivalent to the Christian Democrats of France and Italy. No expense was spared to advertise the event. Special trains and motor coaches were being run from nearby towns, and loudspeakers had been set up in the town and public square adjoining the monastery. It was hoped, indeed, through a vast concourse of Catalans on the spot, to turn the religious festival into a reverberating demonstration of Catalan nationalism. (Under pretence of promoting local folk-lore and culture the Commission has been working assiduously to revive Catalan aspirations and the ideals of christian democracy throughout the Province. The authorities in the main had tolerated these activities, only clamping down on them from time to time, as they did recently by closing the office of the organization at Badalona.) On this occasion, however, the Spanish Government were alive to the danger and effectively spiked the guns of the Catalanists by taking over and making the celebrations their own. General Franco was represented by Señor Artajo, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who was accompanied by other high-ranking Government officials. The crowds attending the ceremonies were estimated at 70,000.

The Spanish Government were not so successful in handling the labour unrest in the Basque Provinces, another hotbed of autonomist aspiration. Whether or not the strikes in Bilbao were entirely engineered by the Basque "Resistance Government" in Paris, as claimed by President Aguirre, there is no doubt that the émigré Government have been pleased with the results achieved by what is actually the first political strike in Spain since the end of the Civil War. According to Radio Euzkadi (the Voice of Basque Resistance) orders to cease work on May Day in accordance with the request of the Basque Committee of Resistance were issued to the workers by the U.G.T., the C.N.T. and the "Solidarity of Basque Workers." Some 14,000 persons including workers from factories, dockyards and miners from the Vizcayan area complied with the order and took the day off. All might have gone well —the workers had made their gesture. But the Falangist Civil Governor, Señor Riestra, issued orders that the strikers were to be dismissed for breach of contract, and on returning to work the next day some of the workers found themselves discharged. They were apparently entitled to apply for reinstatement, but such reinstatement would not carry with it seniority or pension rights prior to the 1st May. In the face of these punitive measures the strikers refused to return to work, and the organizers of the strike called upon workers in other industries to strike in sympathy against the "victimization of the Basque workers, food shortages, Falangist taxes and low wages." Messages of encouragement and calls for aid have been sent out by many of the Republican groups outside Spain, and M. Louis Saillant, Secretary-General of the W.F.T.U., has urged all trade unions affiliated to the World Federation to support the strikers. Resistance groups outside the country obviously hope to incite a general strike against the Franco régime, but it is doubtful whether they will succeed. The number of men on strike at one point was estimated to have been 25,000. A spokesman of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, admitted on the 9th May that 40 per cent. of Bilbao's 50,000 workers were on strike on the 5th, but claimed that all had returned to work by the end of the week. There is no doubt that the events at Bilbao have made a deep impression in Spain.

The recent appointment of Father Angel Herrera, on General Franco's nomination, to be Bishop of Málaga recalls that worthy's journeyings at the end of 1945 to Rome, Lausanne and Lisbon on the Caudillo's behalf (see Summary No. 326). It will be remembered that the new Bishop was the brains behind the Catholic opposition in the days of the Republic, as more recently he was concerned in the efforts of the opportunist Catholic group at the time of the Cabinet re-shuffle in July 1945 to take over the power and influence of the Falangist party. Father Herrera is an astute Churchman of the type which crops up so often in the pages of Spanish history. Another new appointment is that of Señor de Lequerica as Inspector-General of Diplomatic Missions and Consulates. Señor Lequerica was Spanish Ambassador to Vichy until 1944 when he became Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was replaced in 1945 by the present Minister, Señor Martin Artajo, a representative of Father Herrera's Catholic group.

Diplomatic relations between Spain and Bolivia were renewed by means of an interchange of Notes on the 27th and 28th April between the Spanish Ambassador to the Argentine and the Bolivian Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Bolivian Government originally broke off relations with Spain in September 1945 and, more recently, the Bolivian Delegation to the United Nations voted in favour of the Resolution of the General Assembly last December which called for the withdrawal of Ambassadors and Ministers Plenipotentiary from Madrid.

Sir Owen O'Malley, H.M. Ambassador to Portugal since August 1945, left Lisbon on the 29th April. He is retiring from the Diplomatic Service. His successor is Sir Nigel Bruce Ronald, K.C.M.G., C.V.O., an Assistant Under-Secretary of State.

Portugal's "Colonial Week" organized by the Geographical Society was brought to an end on the 3rd May by a ceremonial meeting of the Society, presided over by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies. During the week, dedicated to India, which is an object of special concern to the Portuguese Government these days, public bodies and schools throughout the country had organized demonstrations with the object of arousing patriotism and pride in Portugal's long record as a colonial Power. In this connection it may be worth recording that the Governor General of Mozambique, Commander Gabriel Teixeira (who replaced General de Bettencourt in September 1946), has expressed his pleasure at the gracious manner in which their Majesties received him, Madame Teixeira and his Staff during the Royal visit to South Africa, a gesture which has given great satisfaction and pleasure in official circles and amongst the local Portuguese population. The Governor General also had a friendly talk with Field Marshal Smuts.

ITALY

On the 7th May the Italian Government sent an official request to M. Trygve Lie that Italy should be admitted to the United Nations. Italy's application is, of course, premature, and she will not be eligible for membership until the Peace Treaty has been ratified by the four Great Powers and by Italy herself.

On the 12th May the Constituent Assembly approved the Italo-Egyptian Agreement concluded in Paris in September 1946. Under this agreement Italy will pay £E. 4,500,000 as reparations to Egypt, and Italian citizens there will have their sequestrated property returned to them. Count Sforza took advantage of the occasion to declare "A new fact has arisen in the Mediterranean—the re-awakening to the Arab world. Italy must take this reality into account in formulating her new migratory and commercial policy in Africa." This reality, Count Sforza added, necessitated an active collaboration with the Arab world and, above all, with Egypt, the seat of the centre of Arab nationalism.

The problem of illegal Jewish immigration to Palestine from Italian ports is still causing anxiety to H.M. Government. The Italian Government while declaring their willingness to put a stop to these activities are unwilling to lay themselves open to the charge of illegal detention of foreign ships. They are also, not unnaturally, anxious to get rid of as many refugees as possible. The most helpful step in the prevention of Jewish immigration would probably be to tighten up frontier control, especially on the Italo-Austrian frontier, but the Italian Government state that they do not possess sufficient frontier guards or police to ensure the carrying out of governmental instructions.

On the 13th May Sig. de Gasperi handed in the resignation of the Government to President de Nicola. There have been indications for some time past that the Prime Minister had been considering the broadening of the Government. Signor Morandi, the Socialist Minister for Industry and Commerce, accused Sig. de Gasperi of attempting to shift the political axis of the Government which, the Socialist Party feels, would only increase Governmental inefficiency. Consequently the Prime Minister no longer felt that he would enjoy the support of the Socialist Party in the statement on the country's political, economic and financial situation which he had intended to deliver on the 13th.

SOUTH EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The Foreign Relations Committee of the U.S. Senate have now unanimously approved the Peace Treaties with the satellite countries, and the Senate has been asked by Senator Vandenberg to ratify them in order to avoid "danger and confusion" (see under "United States"). In Hungary's case the question is closely bound up with the fate of the prisoners-of-war who are still in Russia. Writing in the Red Army newspaper, Uj Szó Professor Szekfü, the Hungarian Minister in Moscow, states categorically, on the strength of assurances obtained from official Soviet circles, that when the Treaty becomes valid "the Russians will not keep our prisoners-of-war, labour servicemen or civil internees, but will send them home as soon as possible."

The natural anxiety to which the matter has given rise is regarded by M. Rákosi as the result of a sinister attempt on the part of the forces of reaction to drive a wedge between the Soviet Union and the democratic elements in his own country. In a survey of the international situation he contrasts the "clear and simple foreign political line" followed by the U.S.S.R. with the support which, the U.S.A., according to him, reserve for the enemies of democracy. And despite the growing opposition of the left-wing of the British Labour Party, its leaders, he asserts, have allowed their aims to be subordinated to U.S. interests, as was manifested by the regrettable incident of the Notes delivered after the arrest of M. Kovács. The campaign of vituperation is carried further by a certain M. Kassai in his radio talk on Topical Questions: on the one hand, there is Soviet Russia who won the war virtually single-handed and who has now turned her attention to the establishment of a just and lasting peace; on the other hand, the Western Powers who opened the second front only after it had become obvious that the Red Armies were on the point of achieving victory. Foreign imperialists, M. Kassai continues, are again scheming to plunge the world into war, and it is they who, having failed with all the neighbouring countries except Austria, fostered the plot against the Hungarian Republic.

The sentences passed on those convicted of concealing the conspirators range from one year's imprisonment to three months. The Presiding Judge declared that though he himself would have preferred to impose heavier penalties the Law did not allow him to do so—rightly enough, it might be thought, since the offences of the accused consisted merely of sheltering their friends and had no political foundation.

In spite of the newsprint shortage the Left have contrived to publish yet another newspaper entitled Tovabb. Its responsible editor is M. Paloczi-Horvath, the author of Darkest Hungary, who has been working for the B.B.C.

The Communists favour the introduction of a capital levy on all fortunes of more than 50,000 forints. A capital tax, considerably higher for private persons than for commercial undertakings, is already applied to property in excess of 20,000 forints.

M. Nagy has sought to defend himself against the criticism of the right-wing members of his own Party by arguing that the concessions which he has made are to the advantage of the Hungarian nation. It would be a long time, he said, before the Smallholders could afford to sever their connection with their partners in the Coalition Government. Peace was needed for creative work and to raise the standard of living.

The maximum grant of land to be allotted to Hungarian repatriates from Slovakia has been fixed at 15 hold; though the rule may be subsequently relaxed, it is explained, in carefully selected cases. By a still somewhat obscure method of classification former landed and landless peasants will be definitely assured of property, but "professional farmers" will receive holdings only if any remain available after the other claims have been met. The reason for this discrimination is not clear unless the "professional farmers" are the equivalent of the "gentlemen" landowners of feudal Hungary whom the Land Reform restricted to a maximum 100 hold, while permitting a maximum 200 hold to all who could prove peasant origin. Among non-agricultural workers preferential treatment will be given to those, such as doctors and craftsmen, whose occupations are estimated as being of most value to the community.

The Hungarian Government have asked the Italian authorities for the extradition of the war criminals, Oliver Rupprecht, formerly editor of Magyarság, and M. Vajtha, formerly Hungarian Consul in Vienna. Since making the request they have heard that Vajtha has left Italy.

The Secretary of the International Department of the Labour Party, Denis Healey, is to attend the forthcoming Danubian Conference of Social Democrats in Budapest as an observer.

The Hungarian Government have agreed to the establishment of Soviet consulates in Szeged, Debreczen, Pécs, Györ and Miskolc. (See also under "United Nations.")

Roumania

The question of ratification of the Peace Treaty is the subject of much discussion and exchange of views. The usual practice is that such a treaty should be approved by the Legislatures of the victors and thereafter submitted to the vanquished country for due ratification. But in the present case it has been decided that the order shall be reversed. The reaction of the Roumanian Minister of Foreign Affairs is that this plan might "embarrass" the Roumanian Government if, after Roumania has ratified the Treaty, the Great Powers should withhold ratification. It has been proposed that the necessary action should be taken by the Powers on or about the 15th May. The Russian Government points out that a decision by the Great Powers to withhold ratification might result in delay in the withdrawal of Allied troops. Other considerations are involved, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion not only that the withdrawal of troops is in the minds of some of those concerned, but also that trouble may arise over the observance of Article 3 of the treaty, which provides for "human rights" and fundamental freedom. This article is already being infringed by the Roumanian Government, and, as things are at present, the only action which can be taken is under what are known as the January assurances. These have never been observed, and no pressure has been brought to bear for their observance. The fact is that the Roumanian Government feel so secure in their Russian backing that they just behave as they please. During the last month over 2,000 arrests of known supporters of the Opposition have taken place and many have been kept in prison, although no charge has been made against them. It is now fairly evident that the Russian policy is to present the United Nations with the fait accompli of a virtual Communist dictatorship.

A point which appears to have escaped general notice in this connexion is that, however much the Russians safeguard their position and, however complete is the control of the Communists over the country, it will never really be safe for the Russians to withdraw. The only question is whether they will be so impressed with the preparations that they have made, and with the outward appearance of things in Roumania, that they will deceive themselves and be persuaded that their position is more secure than it actually is.

Assuming that they decide to go, what is there that they leave behind to make their withdrawal safe?

(1) The Communist Party, consisting of a number of genuine Communists which can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and an indefinite number who cannot be relied upon at all. Many of these have recently begun to show their hand, and active "purging" of the the party is taking place.

(2) A Secret Police force on N.K.V.D. lines, consisting of a developed and enlarged Siguranta. The new elements are

(a), recruits of more or less Russian nationality from Bessarabia, (b), soldiers of the Russian occupying army, (c), men of the type who formerly constituted the Iron Guard. These were a number of young professional men and schoolmasters and a number of disappointed and rebellious bright boys from the country elementary schools, who came from the villages to the towns before the war intent upon improving their positions, only to find that all the jobs worth having were held by Jews. There was some reason for this, for until the late twenties there was no one except the Jews qualified to take these posts.

(3) Russian troops who have been "withdrawn," that is, who have changed into plain clothes. (It should be said, perhaps, that during the last 3 months, according to reliable evidence, seven Russian divisions, i.e., at least 100,000 have left the country.)

Of these three elements none is reliable, once the Russian military Government and the fully armed and organised Russian armies have left the country.

On the other hand there are certain elements which a Russian withdrawal would set free. These consist of the King, the Government, nominally Communist, but containing perhaps three real Communists, the underground forces, and the vast majority of the Roumanian people whose hatred of Russia and everything connected with it, is beyond the power of language to express. The obvious—and in fact the only—leader is King Michael, who would have the whole nation solidly behind him in any attempt to smash the carefully constructed régime left behind by the Russians. The opportunity might come for effective action when Russia feeling secure in consequence of the measures she has taken to protect her interests, allowed herself to become occupied in other directions with a view to new conquests.

Meanwhile, the Roumanian Parliament is aiming at dealing in the shortest possible time with a large number of legislative matters. The King's speech deals with Bills concerning fees for certification of weights and measures, for the control of objects made of precious metals, for the reorganisation of the Judicial Body, for punishment for crimes committed against members of the Allied Forces, for the settlement of certain questions of citizenship, for the increase to 500,000,000 lei of the credit to the Ministry of Communications, and for the provision of a cost-of-living bonus in addition to pensions for members of the Composers', Painters' and Sculptors' Union. Bills have been discussed and passed authorising a loan to the Ministry of War of 29,100,000,000 lei, a modification of the law relating to the completion of buildings attached to the Royal Palace, a loan of 7,000,000,000 lei for road building in the judet of Dâmboviţa, &c.

Yugoslavia

The 9th May was celebrated as Victory Day in Yugoslavia with pan-Slav fervour. Almost all the merit for winning the war was given to the "glorious Red Army," but the efforts of the Yugoslav people were not unhonoured or unsung. The most brotherly sentiments were expressed for other Slav nations, including the honorary Slav, Albania. Marshal Tito, who exhorted the Army to be vigilant towards internal and external enemies, did, however, mention Great Britain and the U.S.A.—as the capitalist homes of the war-profiteers who sought war for the sake of the profit. Borba admitted that the "reactionaries" had fought, but in a "demoniac war" in order to substitute their domination for the German and Italian yoke. Narodna Armija promised that the Army would perfect the art of war, and that the Five-Year Plan would provide the modern technical resources required.

Details of the Plan, especially with regard to the development of industry, have been published in the Press. But it is also promised that the Plan will eventually remove the need for rationing food-stuffs and textiles. There are no immediate prospects of this. Owing to the failure of last year's grain collecting scheme a new and more drastic measure has been introduced. Instead of retaining a certain quantity of cereals for their own use and for sale in the free market, before delivering to the State, the farmers must, this year, first surrender a fixed quantity based on the productive capacity of the area, and then keep or sell the rest. Whereas last year many farmers produced only enough for themselves, this year they must all work hard or starve. If they produce any surplus for free sale they can only dispose of this through a State purchasing enterprise presumably at a fixed price. A new order fixing grain prices on the same level as last year, does, however, offer a 40 per cent. advance for such sales.

The Deputy Foreign Minister has discussed with Mr. Peake some of the points raised in his Press Conference (see last week's Summary). Much of the conversation covered old ground, such as the Yugoslav Government's dissatisfaction with the British attitude to the Glumčić affair. But M. Bebler indicated that a visit from Brigadier Maclean would still be welcome and might still be of value. His unfavourable comments on the transfer of četniks to Germany confirmed the impression gained from other conversations that the Yugoslav Government had been confident of reaching agreement with Italy on the subject of refugees.

Some members of what is described as an "adventist sect" have been sentenced in Zagreb to long terms of forced labour. From Sarajevo it is reported that some "opposition" Croats have made it their business to penetrate the ranks of the Croat Republican Peasant Party (the Communist-controlled version of Dr. Maček's Party), while the Peasant Party leaders in Zagreb prefer to "wait and see." In Austria a Social and Welfare Club has been formed among D.P.s as a cloak for political activities by Maček's supporters.

Greece

Greek enthusiasm for the U.S.A. which might have been expected to increase with the final approval of the Aid to Greece Bill by the House of Representatives, was suddenly checked this week by the publication in Athens of a report from Geneva. According to this, Mr. Ethridge, the U.S. delegate on the Frontier Commission, has proposed that the Commission should recommend that a "broader amnesty" should be granted by the Greek Government (under supervision of an international body) to bandits and political internees. The Government are dismayed at the suggestion that, while the rebellion is still in progress, they should be urged to release common criminals and individuals who would at once take steps to reinforce the rebel bands. They remain convinced that the fighting force of the bandits must first be destroyed and that then a general amnesty can usefully be discussed. They argue, moreover, that any such recommendation by the Commission would violate the provisions of the United Nations charter, which preclude any intervention in the domestic affairs of a member state, and that the Commission was empowered only to investigate whether or not Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia are helping bandits in Greece and to recommend means of preventing such assistance, if proved. It is reported that, in their anger and dismay at Mr. Ethridge's proposal, the Greeks are deriving comfort from the news that it was opposed by the U.K. Delegate. This, they feel, shows that "British experience in Greece during the last few years has given them a greater understanding of the situation."

The Greek Government have been officially informed that, as an American economic mission is expected in Athens in the near future, the British Economic Mission, the life of which, under the Financial Agreement of January 1946 which set it up, was in any event only to be eighteen months unless extended by mutual agreement for a further six months, is to be withdrawn before the 30th June.

Despite the Communists' attempts, by making raids at widely scattered points, to divert the Greek Government's forces from their counter-measures, the Greek Army continue to report progress. Brigadier Manitakis, at a press conference in Athens, reviewed operations in the Thessalian mountains during the five weeks from the 1st April to the 5th May and gave the figures of losses on both sides as: bandits—killed 1,023, captured 1,166 (including 297 voluntary surrenders); Army —killed 39, wounded 93. Gendarmie casualties were not given. Manitakis declared that no Greek soldiers had been captured by the rebels, who were in full retreat and refused battle.

According to the latest information available from British sources, Greek estimates of bandit casualties appear to be grossly exaggerated. It is not thought that more than 800 bandits have so far been killed or captured and, although the Greek Army have forced the bandits to withdraw from the Lower Pindus, there is no evidence to support the suggestion that they are "in full retreat." During the last week there have been reports of several incidents spread over a wide area in which the bandits have shown that they retain some initiative and are by no means a beaten force.

Manitakis also produced a written statement by Kapetan Nikitas, a member of NOF (Macedonian autonomists) who was recently captured. In it he stated that on the 21st August, 1946, an agreement was signed between the KKE and the Yugoslav Communist party for the supply of arms to the Communist bands operating in Greece. A subsequent agreement, signed on the 6th January, 1947, provided for the complete fusion of the two parties. Nikitas stated that he had met Niko Zachariades, the leader of KKE, on the 4th April, 1947, in the Hassia Mountains at a conference with the local guerilla leaders. Zachariades, since his disappearance from Athens, is reported, from a French source, to have visited both Yugoslavia and Bulgaria where he is said to have had conferences with both Marshal Tito and Dimitrov. (See last week's Summary under "Bulgaria.")

Albania

As indicated already in earlier Summaries, direct information of a reliable character about conditions in Albania is not at all easy to obtain—in the absence of any British or American representatives in the country. It is learnt, however, from a reliable unofficial source that food conditions, in particular, are bad—and worsening. Albania has been through a very hard winter, and the rainstorms have gravely dislocated her communications. By next year it may be expected that she will be completely integrated in the Yugoslav economy, and the intention is that while she herself is to concentrate on growing industrial crops like flax, she is to rely for her grain crops upon her dominant neighbour. Albania will thus depend on Yugoslav harvests, and, even if these are adequate, their distribution will call for improved communications. Regarding roads, the main work being carried on by the authorities is probably the construction of one connecting Peshkopi with Kukës, in the north-east. But it is the railway scheme which is of overriding importance. Albania has hitherto remained wholly without railways. It is proposed to carry through the Italian plan for a line running inland from Durazzo, as soon as possible, as a beginning, and to start by putting into good condition the embankments already laid, by rebuilding the bridges destroyed during the war,—and by laying tracks on the whole stretch from Durazzo through Elbasan to Labinot (a village a few miles farther on to the north-east). No public statement has been made on the question whether the railway will then go east into Yugoslavia or south-east to Korça. It is far from clear, in any case, where Albania will find the materials, machines and technical skill to carry out what would be a somewhat ambitious project.

From the same source it is gathered that there was very little public reaction at all to the Corfu Channel mining. Great Britain everywhere comes in for much criticism as a defender of Greece and as a supposed champion of the Greek claim to "Northern Epirus" (i.e., Southern Albania), so that it is not unusual now to find Albanians who are strongly opposed to the Hoxha régime but equally hostile to the British.

Turkey

The adoption by Congress of President Truman's proposal to give financial help to Turkey is dealt with under "United States." Renewed attacks by the Soviet press on Turkey are described under "Soviet Union."

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

On the evening of the 4th May Nokrashy Pasha broadcast an appeal to the Egyptian people to put an end to acts giving cause for complaint by foreign residents in Egypt, in the interests of Egypt itself. He referred to protests that he had received and to articles in American and other papers giving exaggerated accounts of incidents and acts of discourtesy on the part of Egyptians who had failed, in their dealings with "foreign guests," to observe Egyptian traditions of dignity and hospitality. He blamed those selfish elements who were trying to disturb the harmonious relations between Egypt and foreigners for forgetting that it was their duty to behave in a way which would raise the prestige of their country. He said that he realized that complete calm was difficult at this critical moment in Egypt's history and that emotions too long pent up might, at times, be violently expressed, but he thought that the restraint which, on the whole, had been exercised should be noted in Egypt's favour.

The Ahram, commenting on this broadcast the following day, referred to it as designed to persuade the Egyptians to be courteous to foreigners "during the discussion of Egypt's case by the United Nations." What may happen afterwards in the event of a decision unfavourable to Egypt is indicated by the Akhbar el Yom, a weekly paper which came out the day before Nokrashy Pasha's broadcast with the claim that failure to give satisfaction to Egypt would cause an outburst that would destroy the Security Council and the Powers behind it. "Egypt," the writer proclaims, "will fight intruders in the cities, in the villages, in the squares and in the street. The intruders cannot go on living amongst a people who abhor, despise and curse them." The Rissala, a high-class weekly review, has also been conducting a campaign of "cultural xenophobia" which cannot fail to find an echo in the hearts of many believing Muslims who fear the undermining of their religion and way of life which is founded upon it by the infiltration of Western ideas. In the issue of the 28th April the inculcation of a hatred of foreigners was urged "until this hatred becomes a religion and second nature" and the mass expulsion of foreigners was demanded. On the 7th April British, American and French schools had been attacked. The anti-British campaign has thus inevitably widened into one against all foreigners and is accompanied by a vociferous renaissance of militant Islam. Foremost amongst the agencies responsible for anti-Christian agitation are the Ikhwan al Muslimin (Muslim Brethren), although their leader has tried to reassure the Copts (see Summary No. 389). The Copts, however, are far from happy; a series of articles has recently appeared in the Coptic newspaper Misr, drawing attention to the oppression to which they are subjected and blaming the Ikhwan, amongst others, for their plight. An open letter also has been addressed to the Egyptian Government by the "General Union for Christian Affairs" of Alexandria in which allegations are made of discrimination against Christians and ending with an appeal to the Government not to allow the division of the country into two camps and the creation of hatred between them. In a Coptic weekly paper the Government are blamed for the burning of the church at Zagazig and a writer refers to "the present persecution of the Copts."

The rumours that no decision had been reached regarding the organ of the United Nations to which Egypt should appeal were dispelled on the 12th May when Nokrashy Pasha told the Chamber of Deputies that he would submit the case to the Security Council as soon as the present extraordinary session of the United Nations was over. He announced also (according to the press) that their case would be based on three main points: evacuation of the Nile Valley, evacuation of the Sudan and the unity of the Nile Valley. He is also reported to have emphasised that not a single legal expert that he had consulted had advised him that it was possible unilaterally to denounce the 1936 Treaty or the 1899 Condominium Agreement. This follows the line which Nokrashy indicated a short time ago to the correspondent of The Times (see Summary No. 390).

The eleventh anniversary of King Farouk's accession was celebrated on the 6th May.

On the night of 6th/7th May there were three bomb incidents in Cairo. Attacks on the offices of the British Ministry of Food and the British Information Services caused no casualties and little damage but an explosion in the Metro Cinema resulted in five deaths and injuries to some forty people. This is the most serious of the numerous outrages which have occurred in foreign-owned cinemas in Cairo during the last two years. The Egyptian Government has offered a reward of £10,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of persons concerned in the incidents of the 6th and 7th May. Some suspects who had been released for lack of evidence in previous bomb attacks have been detained for questioning.

Palestine

Mr. Ben Gurion has gone to New York to be a member of the Jewish Agency delegation which is led by Dr. Abba Hillel Silver. Dr. Weizmann was invited to join the delegation but, according to a Jewish Agency spokesman, said that he was unable to appear at such short notice. The expectation that he intends to return to politics is confirmed by the fact that he is making a tour of Palestine and has addressed a public meeting at Nahalel on the 7th May. Although it was assumed that he would make some important announcement there he did no more than deny that the hour had yet come for him to shake off the yoke of Zionism and express his continued belief in the magnificent prospects for the Zionist enterprise provided that there was no turning away from the path of constructive work.

The attack on Acre prison, reported last week, was followed by a period of quiet, broken only by three cases on the 8th May in which armed Jews entered shops in Tel Aviv, forced out the occupants and set fire to the premises with incendiary bombs. The Jerusalem correspondent of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency ascribed the lull as due either to the losses sustained by the terrorists in the Acre attack or to their compliance with a request telegraphed by "their American friends" to desist from terrorism during the United Nations' discussions. The hope that they might do so was premature. On the evening of the 12th May two British policemen were shot dead in a Jerusalem street.

Jamal al Husaini, the Vice-Chairman of the Arab Higher Committee, who is reported to have made an inflammatory speech in Haifa on the 30th April in which he urged all Arabs to store arms and ammunition, has now left for the United States.

Transjordan

The Government have signed an agreement with the Iraq Petroleum Company for the exploitation of mineral oil in Transjordan.

Persia

The lack of progress of the New Abadan Oil Workers' Union (see Summaries Nos. 379 and 382) is confirmed by a British official of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, who reports general apathy among most of the workers. Nevertheless, a hard core of Tudeh supporters remains, beyond which is a larger group, mildly pro-Tudeh, considered likely to support them wholeheartedly if they felt it safe to do so, but preferring to wait in the wings. Lastly, there is the vast mass of apathetic workers who cannot be described as either pro- or anti-Tudeh, but are easily swayed by mob-oratory. This group realises that the strike last July brought them some benefits, and for that reason they are vaguely aware that the Tudeh has done something for them, but when some of the Tudeh leaders absconded with the Party's funds they became bitter. "They do not understand what the new union is," states the above-mentioned official. "A large number even think that it is the Tudeh in disguise and are afraid to co-operate with it. Others are swayed by the hard core who advise them to boycott it." (See also under "Soviet Union.")

Afghanistan

The disorders in India have given rise to anxiety among members of the Afghan cabinet and those in contact with persons coming from that country. In particular, the temporary interruption in the flow of goods to and from India, upon which the economic life of the country depends, has caused the Government considerable anxiety.

The Government are also apprehensive of the possibility of tribal unrest on both sides of the frontier when British rule in India comes to an end. In their view it will be difficult for them to resist the demands of their own younger Afghans for the incorporation of the Pushtu-speaking tribes on the Indian side of the frontier. They have also expressed to His Majesty's Government the view that the obligations which they have accepted in their treaties with His Majesty's Government will no longer be binding upon them when the British withdraw from India. The Government do not, however, overlook the fact that if they support claims on behalf of the frontier tribesmen for a return to the Afghan fold, this might lead to similar claims from the Governments of the Soviet Republics on their northern frontier, for the incorporation of the areas of northern Afghanistan inhabited by Tajiks, Uzbeks and Turkomans.

THE FAR EAST

China

The growing threat of a second economic and financial crisis continues to absorb attention in China. Little confidence is placed by the general public in the Government's somewhat half-hearted endeavours to deal with the rapidly deteriorating situation; and, angered by rising prices of all staple commodities and the hoarding tactics of rice merchants, crowds are reported to have begun rioting in Shanghai and a number of other large towns. Nevertheless, the Minister of Finance is of opinion that the position, although requiring immediate attention and action, is by no means as bad as it is popularly painted. He realises that some further devaluation of the national dollar is unavoidable and that it may thus become necessary to re-introduce the system for the payment of wages based on the cost-of-living index. He asserts, however, that the Government are determined to put an end to hoarding and to see to it that the towns are kept adequately supplied with rice, sales of which, together with all other food-stuffs, are to be governed by new price-control regulations.

Despite considerable opposition within their ranks to the contracting of any foreign loan, it is becoming increasingly evident that the Government are relying on obtaining a loan from the United States in time to save the situation. In a statement in the Executive Yuan on the country's financial situation General Chang Chun declared that China must find a way to settle her budget deficit by internal measures. At the same time, however, he warned the Yuan of the dire necessity to obtain a substantial and immediate loan from the United States, without which, he declared, the National Treasury would be totally unable to cope with the pressing need for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of a vast area. Incidentally, in answer to questions at a press conference in Washington on the 8th May, the United States Secretary of State admitted that in his judgment the steps recently taken toward the broadening of the Chinese Government constituted a move toward fulfilling the United States requirements for a possible loan, but he qualified this statement by pointing out that it still remained to be seen how effective the broadening of the Chinese Government would be. Mr. Marshall is also reported as having gone on to say that China has made several proposals for railway and harbour rehabilitation and other reconstruction projects, and he was hopeful that rehabilitation of the Canton–Hankow Railway, as well as harbour developments essential to north China, could be accomplished.

The Government are reported to be growing increasingly concerned at the attitude of the Soviet authorities toward the question of handing over the administration of the port of Dairen as required by the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945. The Chinese Government hold that, in order to cope with the Communists who are reported to number at least 30,000, it is essential to disembark sea-borne troops at Dairen. The Soviet Ambassador's contention, however—since confirmed in a Note from the Soviet Government—is that, while his Government are quite ready to hand over the civil administration of the port to the Chinese authorities, in no circumstances could Chinese troops be permitted to enter Dairen until after the state of war with Japan had been finally terminated in a Peace Treaty. Negotiations have been brought to a stand-still by the Chinese Government's rejection of this contention in a strongly-worded note.

In the meantime the civil war drags on, fortune swaying first to one side and then to the other with almost rhythmical regularity. In Shantung the tide has turned in favour of the Government at the moment, and the much-prized town of Taian is once again in their hands. But almost everywhere else the rounds are going to the Communists. In Shansi Communist numerical superiority is telling its tale, and Taiyuan, the capital of the Province, is reported to be invested by a large force under the personal command of General Mao Tse-tung. In Manchuria, too, the Communists have resumed their guerrilla tactics in the neighbourhood of Changchun, while a large force is expected to begin fresh operations from points south-east of Harbin as soon after the thaw sets in as ground conditions admit.

Japan

A sensational report, current in Tokyo, credited General MacArthur with assuring the Emperor, in the course of an interview on the 6th May, that "he would defend Japan in the same way as he would defend the United States." S.C.A.P. promptly issued a denial, and the Japanese interpreter, who accepted responsibility for the "leakage," has tendered his resignation. S.C.A.P. appears to have pointed out that Japan's security would be a matter for the United Nations or some other collective agency to handle. Despite the denial, Central News professes to have learnt that the Emperor expressed his concern over Japan's security now that she has renounced war and that in his reply General MacArthur told the Emperor that he would personally work for the security of Japan in the same way as he would work for the security of the United States. There is of course a world of difference between "working for" and "defending."

The Central Screening Committee has turned its attention from political to financial magnates and has "purged" 178 financial leaders including Kawai, former Minister for Public Welfare, Hiratsuka, former Minister for Transport, and the Presidents of two leading companies. The new Democratic Party has suffered most from these purges and accuses the Government of manipulating the work of the Committee to the advantage of the Liberals.

Indonesia

On the 7th May the Netherlands Prime Minister, Dr. Beel, and the Minister for Overseas Territories, Dr. Jonkman, accompanied by a staff of technical experts, arrived at Batavia. The reported objects of their visit are to obtain a first-hand picture of local developments and conditions since the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement as well as to examine important economic and financial problems. (See Summary No. 391 under "Low Countries"). They have been met by gloom and stalemate.

Their Cabinet deliberations over, a slightly re-shuffled Indonesian Delegation returned to Batavia on the 1st May. Discussions with the Commission-General were resumed almost at once, but the promise that accompanied the meetings which followed immediately on the signing of the Linggadjati Agreement was not sustained, and optimism has given place to extreme depression. The main difficulty is the question of sovereignty during the interim period which has proved an insurmountable stumbling-block. The Indonesians demand the right of independent representation abroad and an entirely separate financial system, with their own issue of bank notes and management of foreign exchange control, requirements which are entirely unacceptable to the Commission-General, who are also strongly opposed to the arrangements that the Indonesians are in the process of concluding to supply India with rice in exchange for nine million yards of textiles.

The Commission-General are not prepared to give way on any of these major points and claim that the Republicans are employing delaying tactics in order to cover up their deliberate failure to implement the Linggadjati Agreement. The Indonesians, on the other hand, accuse the Netherlands authorities of violating Article 16 of the Agreement by increasing—instead of decreasing—the number of their troops in the N.E.I.

In these circumstances, therefore, negotiations have reached a deadlock and important questions concerning arrangements for the resumption of coastwise and direct trade, as well as the return of foreign merchants to their factories and plantations are being held in abeyance. Dutch patience is reported to be nearing exhaustion, while Indonesian suspicion and mistrust have become accentuated by loose talk, which no doubt has lost nothing in the telling, about the Commission-General's complete loss of faith in the possibility of solving the problems before them by negotiation and their consequent intention to employ force.

Nor has the general situation been improved by a proclamation by the leader of the Partai Rakjat Pasoendan (Soendanese People's Party), Mr. Kartalegawa, declaring Pasoendan (West Java) an independent state within the framework of the United States of Indonesia (under the Dutch crown), with Bandoeng as its capital. The movement has the moral support of the Dutch—more particularly of the older residents of the mercantile community—who contend that it is justified under Article 4 of the Agreement. The Indonesians, however, have declared in no uncertain terms their intention to suppress it, pointing as their right to do so, to Article 1 of the Agreement, under which "the Netherlands Government recognises the Government of the Republic of Indonesia as exercising the de facto authority over Java, Madura and Sumatra." Generally speaking the movement does not appear to be hailed with any very great enthusiasm by the rank and file of the Soendanese, and it is doubtful whether in the end it will do more than temporarily widen the unfortunate breach that already exists between the Commission-General and the Indonesian authorities.

Both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments attach the utmost importance to securing conditions under which factory owners and planters will be able at an early date to reoccupy their properties. And both countries have instructed their representatives in Batavia to stress this concern to the Commission-General and the Indonesian Delegation. In addition, the United States Ambassador at The Hague has been instructed to inform the Netherlands Government that the United States is keenly interested in the early re-opening of the Netherlands East Indies to world trade.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

After a debate lasting four days the House of Representatives on the 9th May finally passed the Greco-Turkish Aid Bill by 287 votes to 107. 127 Republicans and 160 Democrats voted for the Bill, and 93 Republicans, 13 Democrats and one independent member voted against it. In the course of the debate the Opposition introduced more than a dozen amendments, designed to emasculate the President's programme and to limit the military staffs to be sent to Greece and Turkey. All of these were defeated. As a result of other amendments added during the Committee hearings there are differences between the Bill and its Senate counterpart which will have to be ironed out by a conference of the two Houses. The supporters of the Bill laid characteristic emphasis upon the need to check Soviet aggression, Representative James P. Richards (Democrat, South Carolina), suggesting on the 7th May that the Soviet Union had joined the United Nations for the sole purpose of undermining the authority of that organization, and Representative Chester E. Merrow (Republican, New Hampshire) going so far as to remark two days later that, if Russia thought that the action of the House was a "declaration of war," then she could "make the most of it." Nevertheless, some of the Congressmen who voted for the Bill are said to be still only lukewarm towards the President's Greek and Turkish programme as such. Their reservations have been summed up by the New York Herald-Tribune, which asserts that the policy adumbrated by the present Bill will very probably "never achieve more than a partial success" and that, as it stands to-day, it "badly needs clarification, improvement and a more positive and constructive content."

A noteworthy attempt to provide such clarification was made on the 8th May by the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, who is due to leave the State Department and return to his private law practice at the end of next month. In an address to the Delta Council at Cleveland, Mississippi, which President Truman himself, originally, had been due to deliver, Mr. Acheson enunciated more explicitly than any State Department spokesman has ventured to do so far the principle that American financial and economic assistance should be concentrated where it would "be most effective in building world political and economic stability" and "in promoting human freedom and democratic institutions." He stated that "top priority" should be given to free peoples who were seeking to preserve their independence and ways of life against totalitarian pressures. The "facts of international life" indicated that the United States would have to extend credits to foreign countries "beyond existing authorizations" if those countries were to continue to buy in 1948 and 1949 the things which they need for sustaining life and for rebuilding their economies. The United States had at the same time to "push ahead with the reconstruction of those two great workshops of Europe and Asia—Germany and Japan—upon which the ultimate recovery of the two continents so largely depends." In this connexion it is interesting to note that, at his press conference on the previous day, Mr. Marshall had expressed the view that the State Department should take over from the War Department the administration of the occupied areas in Germany, Austria and Japan. A decision along these lines seems in fact to have been taken, although the details of the transfer of authority and of the new administrative machinery to be set up at the State Department have still to be worked out.

The hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the peace treaties with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania have also provided the State Department with an opportunity to enlighten both Congress and the public on the subject of foreign policy. On the 6th May Mr. Marshall read to the Committee a letter from the President in which the latter attempted to refute the frequent allegation that the treaties conflicted in spirit with his Greco-Turkish programme, and in which he pointed out that it would be a heavy blow to American leadership in world affairs if the United States now repudiated the treaties unilaterally. Both Mr. Marshall and his predecessor, Mr. Byrnes, who appeared with him, urged prompt ratification on the ground that delay would merely permit the situation to go from bad to worse in the countries concerned and would—to quote Mr. Byrnes—"help only those who can exploit confusion and unrest." Senator Vandenberg, the Committee Chairman, gave his wholehearted support to this view, and on the 9th May the Committee decided to recommend ratification "without reservation." Its unanimous vote on this occasion provided a remarkable contrast to the attitude which, under the Chairmanship of the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, it adopted to the Versailles Treaty in 1919 and 1920.

That, despite its clear endorsement of the President's Greco-Turkish programme, the House of Representatives is still liable to display what one newspaper calls "obscurantism and irresponsibility" on matters bearing upon international relations has once more been demonstrated by the vote of the Appropriations Committee on the current State Department budget. On the 5th May the Appropriations Committee not only approved the proposal to deprive the Department's Information Services of their funds (see last week's Summary) but also decided to recommend a cut of 60 million dollars, or 22 per cent., in the State Department estimates as a whole. This it did in the teeth of vigorous opposition from Mr. Marshall. (It appears that, in the eyes of the Committee's unimaginative Chairman, Mr. John Taber, the State Department has committed the unforgivable sin of broadcasting to the Russians about The Wallaces of Iowa, Russell Lord's popular study of the ex-Secretary of Commerce and his forebears). The liberal press has hastened to emphasize the difference between the Committee's attitude on this matter and its simultaneous action in approving to the last cent the funds requested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation for the new drive against Communism. It is suggested that some members of Congress apparently prefer to put their trust in "police instead of principles" in combating the influence of Moscow.

In the Senate the Republicans, assisted by the conservative Democrats, have at last succeeded in passing their Bill to curb the powers of organised labour. The measure was carried on the 13th May by 68 votes to 24—more than two thirds majority necessary to override a Presidential veto—but only after a week of bitter wrangling among Republican leaders. Towards the end of the debate Senator Irving M. Ives of New York and 15 other "insurgent" Republicans joined forces with the liberal Democrats to defeat a proposal by Senator Taft to prohibit industry-wide bargaining. Such a prohibition already exists in the Bill which, by an equally large majority, the House of Representatives passed on the 17th April (see Summary No. 389), and it is expected to cause some disagreement when members of the two Chambers meet in conference to resolve the differences between the two measures. A ban on industry-wide bargaining is anathema to a large section of the labour movement. It would threaten the very existence of the Congress of Industrial Organizations which, since its inception at the end of 1935, has been built up on the basis of individual industries, rather than along the traditional craft lines.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

Since last September little has been heard of the efforts of the Argentine Chief of Police, General Velasco, and a number of army leaders and others, to put pressure on President Perón to curb the activities of his wife and dismiss certain of his Ministers. Recently, however, there have been reports that the group is again attempting to remove from power the President's wife, Señor Lagomarsino and Señor Miranda, those most involved in the existing orgy of corruption. Señora Perón's virtual control of labour affairs places a powerful weapon in her irresponsible hands, and if anything is to be done it would seem that her forthcoming visit to Spain on General Franco's invitation would offer the opportunity. However, it remains to be seen whether Señora Perón will abandon her strategic position in the Secretariat of Labour for the less tangible advantages of receptions in Madrid and the Vatican, even though she should return from Rome a Papal Marchesa, as report has it.

Meanwhile, one of the leaders of the army group, General Oscar Silva, an extreme nationalist of totalitarian sympathies, has driven a wedge into Miranda's organisation by bringing evidence of fraud against the members of the new Telephone Company Board, nominated by Señor Miranda. The Chairman of the Board, Sr. Fretes, a close associate of Sr. Miranda, has been imprisoned and a judicial inquiry is to be held. There are rumours that the inquiry may be extended to the I.A.P.I. (Instituto Argentino de Promoción del Intercambio), a possibility which might indeed be used to speed Señora Perón on her way to Europe.

The President is rendered rather more vulnerable to army "persuasion" by a further split among his supporters in the Chamber. When elections were held for the various party offices, the party leaders demanded the unopposed re-election of the outgoing officers. As a result 24 delegates withdrew and formed a new party, the "Juan Perón Revolutionary Party," which declared its full support of the President in person, but maintained its right to freedom of expression. The President has had interviews with the leaders of the group, and has disclaimed any attempt at directing the choice of party officers. The implication is not that such direction was not made, but that it was the work of the busy President's lady. It is reported that Colonel Mugica, the leader of the rebellious group, is a Nationalist in touch with the Chief of Police.

The regimentation of Argentine Unions appears to have sustained no great setback since the A.F. of L. tour (see Summary No. 385). Indeed the A.F. of L. report has not been followed by any noticeable campaign in the United States press against Argentine trade-union methods; and, although a Peronista labour rally was held at the end of March in which the old slogans against Mr. Braden were revived, the impression exists that the State Department is now more interested in the activities of American big business men who are attracted by the Argentine five-year plan than in the lack of democracy of Argentine political life. Such an impression is reinforced by a recent statement of Mr. Marshall to the effect that he had good reason to hope that the whole situation with Argentina would be cleared up in about three weeks.

In fact the A.F. of L. report appears to have been suppressed as far as possible in Argentina, and the independent unions are in an unenviable state of isolation. Sr. Luis Gay, the former head of the Argentine Confederation of Labour (C.G.T.), whose removal coincided with the visit of the A.F. of L. delegation, completely disappeared for about a month, and he is now said to be detained on a remote farm in Santa Fé. Three members of the executive Board who were removed with Gay are reported to be back at their jobs, though under police supervision. Significantly enough, the disappearance of the leader of a federation of unions estimated to include a million members has been followed by no protests or strikes, and the C.G.T. is now "led" by Sr. Aureliano Hernández. Sr. Hernández will probably be appointed to "represent" Argentina at the I.L.O. Conference at Geneva in June: it remains to be seen whether the Argentine credentials are challenged. A number of articles extolling the effectiveness of Argentine organised labour which have appeared in the Government Press suggest defensive preparations.

Brazil

The Supreme Electoral Tribunal has replied to the Government's petition that the Communist Party be declared illegal. The Tribunal voted the Party illegal by three votes to two. The Party may appeal to the Supreme Court for the decision to be reversed. Meanwhile the President has suspended for six months the Brazilian Workers' Confederation, which is Communist-controlled, together with all the unions affiliated to it.

In a speech at the Brazilian Chamber of Commerce in London, Mr. Dalton, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, urged the scaling-down of the war debts of the United Kingdom. He said that British purchases of Brazilian goods would provide Brazil with more than sufficient quantities of sterling to pay for everything that Britain would supply at least over four years, and added that the recent action of the Bank of Brazil in resuming the purchase of sterling was welcome; he was particularly glad to note, he said, that a temporary misunderstanding had been surmounted.

Whether this will be enough to smooth ruffled Brazilian plumes remains to be seen, for Brazilian pride seems to require an explicit statement that Brazil has not contravened the payments agreement. Such points of pride are unfortunately much more likely to affect Brazilians than reminders of the part played by Great Britain in the war.

The Rice Agreement now comes up for renewal, and the Brazilian Minister of Finance has declared that his Government have decided not to renew the agreement, adding that half the exportable surplus could be offered at "competitive prices." When reminded that it was agreed in January that the agreement should be extended, he stated that conditions had changed since January, and it was now the Brazilian Government's policy not to conclude commodity agreements.

Panamá

According to a statement issued by the State Department, the United States Government has proposed that a new agreement be concluded about defence sites necessary to protect the Panamá Canal. Under the war-time agreement of May 1942, Panamá gave the United States permission to use 134 defence sites outside the Canal Zone for the duration of hostilities. All but 36 of these sites have been handed back to Panamanian authorities; those still occupied are described as "technical installations essential to safe aerial navigation."

There has for some time been disagreement between the United States and Panamá on the interpretation of the existing agreement, and although numbers of prominent United States officials and citizens have visited Panamá on missions of persuasion, the Panamánian Government have shown considerable reluctance to accede to the United States proposals. Two recent visitors declared that if Panamá did not prove more co-operative the Canal might have to be "moved"(!)

Paraguay

There was no definite change in the military situation in Paraguay during April. President Morínigo appears to have kept his best troops in the region of Asunción in case of a coup d'état, while sending lorry-loads of hastily conscripted supporters of the Colorado party to the front. These faced the rebel forces across the Paso-Né marshes, and it seemed probable that a single battle would be decisive. Meanwhile, President Morínigo was reported to have bought a number of automatic pistols and submachine guns in Argentina, while the dismantled aircraft left behind by the pilots who flew over to the rebels (see Summary No. 389) were reassembled and did a certain amount of exhibition flying over the capital. (The Government are reported, incidentally, to have engaged a Mexican acrobatic aviator to perform over the enemy lines.) The Paraguayan navy remained neutral, holding a section of Asunción from which the army and police were excluded. The fleet, consisting of two gunboats, which were under repair in Argentina when the war began, left Argentina and sailed up river without apparently making it very clear whether they intended to join the Government or maintain the navy's neutrality. At this stage General Morínigo seems to have decided to try to arrest naval officers, thus precipitating a naval rising on the 26th April. The Government armed numbers of civilians and after three days' fighting declared that order had been restored. Some public buildings in Asunción are reported to have been destroyed. General Morínigo's half-English Commander-in-Chief, Colonel Federico Smith, was said to have left the country, and the President himself took command.

There have been various reports of Brazilian and other moves in favour of some form of mediation.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Palestine

The Special Assembly continues the attempt, which it began on the 28th April, to establish a Committee to investigate the problem of Palestine. On the 6th May the First (Political and Security) Committee voted in favour of hearing the Jewish Agency, the Arab Higher Committee, and "any other organisation representative of a considerable element of the population of Palestine." It was intended that the views thus presented to the Committee should be confined to the "constituting and instructing of the Special Committee."

Strictly speaking the Assembly had not been impartial. It had named the Jewish Agency in its instructions to the Committee, but had left it to the Committee to decide what other organisations it chose to hear. The Arabs, who are the great majority of the inhabitants of Palestine, resented what seemed to them to be discrimination, and declared that they would not appear before the Committee, unless the Assembly dealt with them as it had dealt with the Jewish Agency. To meet this objection the Assembly, which has precisely the same membership as the Committee, met and affirmed that the "decision of the First Committee in granting a hearing to the Arab Higher Committee gives a correct interpretation of the Assembly's intention." The Arabs were satisfied.

Dr. Silver presented the views of the Jewish Agency on the 8th May. He quoted Mr. Lloyd George's evidence before the Peel Committee to prove his contention that the framers of the Balfour Declaration intended a Palestine predominantly Jewish. And he wished the Committee to regard the concept of Palestine as a Jewish National Home as the basis of the Investigating Committee's work. The other main point in his speech was his argument that the Palestine problem was inseparable from the problem of the "Displaced" Jews in Europe. These two points were emphasised again on the 12th May, when Mr. Moshe Sertok said that a Jewish State was the consummation of the policy of a Jewish National Home, the means being the right of unlimited immigration, and Mr. Ben Gurion said that the Jews must not be a dependent minority in the Land of Israel. Mr. Sertok renewed the link which Dr. Silver had forged between the Hebrew claim to Palestine and the Displaced Jews of Europe.

The Arab Higher Committee, represented by Mr. Henry Cattan, was heard on the 9th May. He suggested that the Investigating Committee should examine the British pledges to the Arabs during and before the 1914 war; but he did not rest the Arab case on pledges nor on the validity of a mandate. He based it upon the natural and inalienable right of the People of Palestine to independence and upon the right to self-determination. The claim to a Jewish National Home, he said, contradicted these fundamental rights and was contrary to the obligations which H.M. Government had assumed on joining the United Nations. The problem, he continued, was not essentially an Arab-Jewish problem. The inhabitants of Palestine would object to any enforced immigration from any source. He wished the Investigating Committee to note this point, and to realise that the problem of the Displaced Persons was irrelevant.

Many of the Arab arguments were reaffirmed on the 12th May, when the Political Committee was debating whether the Investigating Committee's terms of reference should include the independence of Palestine, a thorny question, because independence in the near future would mean the end of official Jewish hopes, and the omission of all reference to independence would seem to differentiate the Palestinian mandate from all other class "A" Mandates, and to ignore the rights of its inhabitants. To omit all reference to independence would be, as the Syrian delegate declared, "to acquiesce in the immoral Jewish plan" of waiting for independence until immigration had produced a Jewish majority in Palestine; and, as the Iraq delegate added, what genuine claim to Palestine had a people who had made a transitory residence there two thousand years ago? Turkey's delegate favoured independence as soon as possible. Poland continued the Slav game of sitting on a convenient hedge encouraging and repelling each side in equal measure, and trying to concentrate their mutual antagonism against the British. The Jews and the Arabs, he said, had no quarrel with one another. Their only quarrel was with the Mandatory Power. If Arabs would drop their pro-Nazi leaders and get rid of the Foreign oil interests, they should be really free. The British were maintaining a police state in Palestine. They should release all political prisoners and remove all barriers to immigration. The hedge beneath the Slavs grows daily more narrow. Finally the Political Committee decided that the programme of the Investigating Committee should make no reference to "independence." The voting was 29 (U.K. and U.S.) against 14, with 10 abstentions (the Slavs).

There were three other matters of interest in the week under review. The Political Committee rejected the claims of 13 organisations to be heard on Palestine and Sir Alexander Cadogan explained the attitude of H.M. Government to any recommendation which the Assembly may make. H.M. Government have been charged with having no intention of carrying out a recommendation which they dislike, and therefore of slighting the dignity of the Assembly. Accusations multiplied after the recent statement by Lord Hall in the House of Lords. Sir Alexander explained how anxious H.M. Government was for a solution agreeable to Arabs and Jews alike. All H.M. Government asked was that it should not be expected to carry out alone a recommendation which neither pleased both sides nor appealed to the conscience of the United Kingdom as being just. It would be fairer, he added, to address these hypothetical questions to all interested parties, and indeed to all members of the United Nations, instead of flinging them at the United Kingdom alone. A Polish proposal to instruct the Investigating Committee to visit displaced persons' camps in Europe, and in Cyprus was defeated.

On the 13th May the Political Committee decided the composition and the terms of reference of the Committee of Investigation. Eleven medium-sized or small Powers will form the Committee—Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Persia, Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. Thirteen delegates voted for the motion, eleven against. Among the 29 abstentions were many S. American delegates who were waiting to vote for a U.S. resolution which they did not know had been withdrawn. Russia was anxious to include the five Permanent Members on the Committee, but to exclude other members of the British Commonwealth.

The terms of reference are wide and leave the Committee a remarkably free hand. The Report "on the question of Palestine" must reach the Assembly by the 1st September. "All questions and issues relevant to the problem of Palestine" are to be investigated, and investigations are to take place in Palestine and wherever the Committee may think useful. This enlarged area of enquiry is held by many delegates to enable the Committee to go into the question of the Jews of Europe. For this reason the Arab States opposed it. No overt reference is made in the terms to the Jews of Europe. The Committee is to give careful consideration to the religious interests in Palestine of Islam, Judaism and Christianity. A Soviet, Indian and Polish move to instruct the Committee to include in its recommendations one to establish without delay an independent and democratic State for Palestine was defeated by 26 votes to 15 with 12 abstentions.

Membership

Hungary's application for membership of the United Nations was considered by the Security Council on the 30th April and referred to its Membership Committee for consideration "at the appropriate time." After the question of Admissions had come to a head with Russia's rejection of Eire, Portugal and Transjordan on the ground that she was not in diplomatic relations with them, the Assembly passed a resolution in November last recommending the Security Council to consult with a Committee of the Assembly with a view to drawing up rules governing the admission of new members. The Assembly also recommended the Security Council to reconsider the applications of the rejected States on the basis of article 4 of the Charter. The Security Council accepted both recommendations, but has so far given effect to neither. To consider Hungary's application at present would prejudge the issue of drawing up rules governing admissions. It would be out of place to consider Hungary's application before carrying out the recommendation to reconsider the cases of the rejected States. Moreover, until Hungary has concluded the treaty of peace she retains enemy status and is therefore ineligible for membership of the United Nations. For these reasons the U.K. and the Australian representative were opposed to consideration by the Security Council of Hungary's application.

The U.S. representative, on the other hand, saw no reason why the existing Council rules should give way before rules that had not yet been made and urged that there was a case for postponement of consideration of Hungary's application, but that it ought not to be rejected outright. The issue was resolved in this sense by the Council.

Refugees and Displaced Persons

The meeting of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organisation which had its first plenary session on the 1st May at Lausanne has been concerned with two major questions—

(a) whether any international body for dealing with refugees and displaced persons will be in existence with adequate staff and funds when UNRRA and the I.G.C.R. cease on the 30th June;

(b) what relations are to obtain between the new refugee organisation and the control authorities in occupied Germany and Austria.

The latter question may be of great importance in the future: but for the moment it is quite overshadowed by the former which is, indeed, a question of life and death for the international handling of the refugee question. As Sir Humphrey Gale explained for UNRRA, and Sir Herbert Emerson for the Inter-governmental Committee on Refugees, both these organisations will come to a definite end on the 30th June, and neither of them will have any funds left for refugee work after that date; moreover, their experienced staff will be dispersed unless decisions can be made now which will enable them to be kept on till they can be taken over by the new organisation.

If enough countries had seen their way to announce and ratify their adherence to the constitution of I.R.O., this difficulty would not have arisen, for I.R.O. could then have been brought into existence at this meeting. For this to happen fifteen countries, whose combined subscriptions would cover three-quarters of the budget, must have signed unconditionally. When the meeting began, thirteen countries had signed (three of them, U.K., New Zealand and China, unconditionally), and the contributions attaching to these signatures amounted to 73·5 per cent. of the budget. It is hoped that the remaining signatures may be obtained before the meeting of the Preparatory Commission ends, but this will not, in itself, solve the problem, if much time must elapse before most of the signatures are ratified. Legislation enabling the U.S.A. to join is well advanced, though not completed; but the appropriation of the funds necessary to pay the American subscription still has to be made. The United States delegate, Mr. Warren, is confident that all legislative steps will be finished by the 1st July; but that may well be too late, as vital decisions must be taken well before then. As at present drafted, the measure would authorise the appropriation of funds on the strict condition that I.R.O. comes into being in accordance with its constitution; but Mr. Warren was able to say that, if the Preparatory Commission had to assume financial responsibility before then, the Bill might be amended to allow a proportion of the money to be voted.

After the prolonged stormy passage which the Constitution of I.R.O. has had, with the obstinate refusal of the Russian and some other delegations to agree to any workable scheme, many countries, especially those who have not the actual charge of numerous displaced persons, may well hesitate: but the time for hesitation has already gone by. As I.R.O. itself cannot well come into being by the 1st July, some interim arrangement must be made to look after the thousands in various parts of Europe, and the Middle and Far East who will then no longer have UNRRA and I.G.C.R. to look to. In secret committee on the 4th May the Preparatory Commission examined the practical alternatives:

(a) That Governments already signatory to I.R.O. should form themselves into a shadow I.R.O., to act till all the necessary acceptances had been obtained.

(b) That funds should be provided (whence not specified) to enable I.G.C.R. to continue for a further three or six months, UNRRA to continue its operations in Italy, Middle East and Far East, and Control Authorities to take over UNRRA's D.P. work in Germany and Austria.

The constitutional, financial and administrative objections to these courses were seen to be overwhelming. This left the Committee with only one workable suggestion, namely that the Preparatory Commission itself should become an executive organ and take over (as necessary and desirable) the activities, staff, and assets together with the responsibilities of I.G.C.R. and the Displaced Persons Section of UNRRA, as provided for in paragraph 3 of the Interim Measures Agreement. It was not thought judicious to pass a formal resolution to this effect, but a unanimous "recommendation" was sent to Governments, expressing confidence that I.R.O. would come into full existence in the near future and urging both immediate agreement to the course proposed and the provision of the essential funds advances amounting to a quarter of their respective subscriptions to the first year's administrative and operational budget of I.R.O. On the 13th May the Preparatory Commission unanimously decided to act on this proposal and it is now hoped that, the interim period having been bridged in this manner, the I.R.O. will come into full operation by the Autumn of this year.

GERMANY

Discussions between British and U.S. officials in Berlin led to preliminary agreement on the 12th May about a number of important bi-zonal matters. What are known as "category B" imports—those which are not essential to prevent disease—are to include materials which will help to stabilise German economy generally and are not to be restricted merely to those which can be used to manufacture exports. It is agreed that the bi-zonal agencies, which are to be concentrated in Frankfurt, will have sufficient authority to compel the states to carry out their directives and that Dr. Agartz, the chief German bi-zonal official, will have some executive powers enabling him to act without always consulting all the representatives of his committee. It has been decided, moreover, to set up a bi-zonal economic council consisting of delegates nominated by the German states in proportion to their population. It will have certain legislative powers but its exact composition and authority has yet to be decided. Full details of the reorganisation have not yet been made public, and it is too early to assess German reactions, but the plan, as it stands, goes a long way to meet H.M. Government's views on the need for central economic planning in the present emergency. Typical adverse comment from Russian-controlled sources has been given by Leipzig Radio which said that yet another reorganisation entailing the removal of staff to Frankfurt would surely dislocate the work of planning still further, and that these hastily-made plans were merely a screen for the political aim to create a political centre at Frankfurt and divide West and East by political boundaries.

situation is now such that they must secure 450,000 tons of food imports in each of the next three months if they are to avoid serious trouble. In the circumstances they accept the U.S. proposal to ship immediately an additional 130,000 tons of flour equivalent, if this can be obtained (see last week's Summary), and they would like to increase this figure to 150,000 tons. General Clay stated on the 18th May that Bavarian food collections were better and that imports had improved. Nevertheless, conditions in general are certainly no better. Until there is a marked change Germans will be sceptical of reorganisations or assurances, and the temper of the people will require delicate handling. Tuberculosis has been rising sharply, although general sickness has not greatly increased. There have been more strikes and disturbances. Trade Unionists from six Ruhr towns met in Muelheim on the 18th May. They at first threatened to withdraw from co-operation with Military 'Government, but later restricted themselves to presenting a series of demands, some of them constructive. These included: the end of the dual system of control and Military Government "interference," the establishment of Commissions represented mainly by Trade Unionists to supervise the work of economic agencies; special courts empowered to withhold supplies from producers who did not co-operate; an end to dismantling except of war plants; increased means for foreign trade and for manufacturing fertilisers and synthetic fat. Other protests against dismantling of works have been made in Duesseldorf. The town councils of Solingen and Wuppertal have suspended themselves. The leader of the Christian Democrats, Adenauer, is trying to make his Party's participation in the new Government of N. Rhine/Westphalia and Lower Saxony dependent on assurances in regard to food. This is part of his attempt to throw full responsibility on Military Government.

Rumours that food is being exported from Germany are again rife in the British zone. A recent investigation has also shown that 85 per cent. of the population there are grossly ignorant about coal exports. They believe that these comprise 50 per cent. or more of total production, instead of the actual proportion of 10–20 per cent., and they have even wilder ideas about the amount sent as reparations, which is of course nil. An intensive publicity campaign in Hamburg and the country area of Hildesheim did something to correct these false impressions: similar efforts will be hampered, however, by a fresh cut of 25 per cent. in newsprint. General Clay is to launch a campaign in the U.S. zone to tell Germans how much food they are receiving from the United States.

Ever since councils and parties began to function after the capitulation spasmodic attempts have been made by Germans to gather together representatives of the whole country in order to define their attitude to subjects of national interest. Occasionally one group such as the Liberal Democratic Party or the Trade Unions has succeeded in holding inter-zonal conferences, but efforts on a larger scale have met with failure. In some cases an Occupying Power has intervened. The French authorities, fearful of any all-Germany action, have usually forbidden delegates from their zone to attend interzonal meetings. In other cases representatives from the Russian zone have stood aloof—presumably because of tacit Russian disapproval. That disapproval is less obvious to-day. Liberal Democrat leaders from the Soviet zone were recently permitted to attend an international Liberal Conference in London; the parties attend interzonal conferences and there have been fairly frequent contacts between the Premier of Thuringia and States of other zones. The Russians evidently feel that if they have Germans in prominent positions who are reasonably acquiescent in the policy of the zone it is no bad thing to allow them to spread their views in the rest of Germany—even if (or perhaps because) they are not necessarily members of the Socialist Unity Party. The differences between the Germans themselves are perhaps more formidable obstacles. The Christian Democrats' recent call for all-party discussion have so far come to nought. The invitation has been heavily criticised by the French, but failure is primarily due to the Social Democrats' understandable refusal to sit down with the Socialist Unity Party while they are not allowed to function freely in the Soviet zone. Nevertheless, negotiations are continuing. A different invitation and one which partly evades the party question has come from the Christian Democrat Premier of Bavaria. He wishes all heads of States to meet in the first week of June. Both the Social Democrat Party and Socialist Unity Party are sceptical, the latter being particularly embarrassed that the initiative should have come from a quarter which it considers a hotbed of reaction and separatism. No one has yet seen fit to decline, but acceptances are trickling in rather hesitatingly. The Bavarian Government has called the conference because it considers that no German Government can merely stand by through the summer, waiting upon the next Four-Power Conference.

Dr. Schacht has been sentenced by a German tribunal in Stuttgart to eight years' imprisonment, of which he has already served two years. He loses most of his property and civic rights. He was not convicted as a "war criminal"—on which charge he was acquitted at Nuremberg—but as belonging to the lesser category of a "major offender" because of his support of the Nazi régime.

AUSTRIA

The Austrian Peace Treaty Commission has begun work in Vienna. The five meetings held so far have been largely devoted to attempts to secure agreement on the terms of reference of the Committee of Experts who are to study Articles 35 and 42 of the Austrian Treaty (German assets and United Nations' property in Austria). Drafts have been submitted by the delegates of the Four Powers and, while no agreement has yet been reached, the issue seems to have been whittled down to one of resolving the differences between the proposals submitted by the United States and Soviet delegates. At the fifth meeting of the Commission, on the 17th May, the British delegate expressed his willingness to accept the United States draft in order to expedite progress.

The main point at issue has been the amount of latitude to be allowed to the Committee of Experts in their consideration of the German assets: the Western delegates have felt increasingly that the Committee should fix its own programme of work and procedure, while the Soviet delegate has claimed that the Commission should discuss and lay down the Committee's programme, particularly in regard to the "concrete facts" which it should be instructed to try and establish. In conversation with the British delegate, on the 17th May, M. Novikov stated that his real fear was that, if the Committee of Experts were given too free a hand, they would wander off into all kinds of questions which would require years to solve. After the British delegate had sought to reassure him on this point, and also on the possibility of reconciling the Soviet and United States' drafts with a view to enabling the Committee of Experts to begin work on the oil industry and other important concerns, M. Novikov promised to study Mr. Dodge's proposal. Mr. Dodge had previously proposed an amplified definition of the "concrete facts" regarding the most important aspects of the German assets: the Soviet draft provides that the Committee shall begin its work with an examination of "the most important aspects" of German assets in Austria, while the United States draft provides that the Committee shall begin with an examination of "concrete facts." It has been agreed in principle that oil shall be taken first and shall be followed by other important questions, such as the Danube Shipping Company, the insurance companies and certain branches of industry.

According to Reuter, the failure of the Commission to reach agreement on the preliminary discussions on procedure caused great pessimism among Austrian observers in Vienna. The Socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung commented: "From this, every Austrian will be able to calculate when the State Treaty may be achieved." The Austrian Cabinet decided at its meeting on the 13th May to appoint a committee of experts to discuss with Austrian Government Departments various questions of the Treaty. The Vienna press has expressed its disappointment that the conference is about, rather than with, Austria, but it is hopeful that the Commission will work in constant contact with the Austrian Government and Austrian experts. The Communist press organ has described the conference as "the gate which Molotov opened for Austria" and has reiterated its appeal for "understanding" with the Soviet Union.

It has been reported from Vienna that the continued low level of hard coal and coke loadings for Austria from the Ruhr, following upon the much reduced deliveries of the first few months of 1947, is rapidly precipitating a crisis in Austrian industry. Only 70 per cent. of Austria's total allocations for the first quarter of 1947 were delivered. It is feared that, unless deliveries are speeded up and maintained at a level consistent with allocations, Austria's only battery of coke ovens at Linz, and the only blast furnace at present working in Austria, at Donawitz, will have to close; consequent decline in already low morale may provoke unrest.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

During the debate on foreign affairs in the National Assembly on the 14th May, members of all parties spoke in eulogistic terms of the Czechoslovak-Polish Treaty signed in March. The Polish Ambassador, M. Wierblowski, was given an ovation when he declared that Poland had abandoned the foreign policy of Colonel Beck. The question of rival territorial claims has been left in abeyance, and both Polish and Czech and Slovak minorities are being granted full citizenship rights and cultural amenities. In his speech M. Masaryk stressed the importance of the agreements on common planning in agriculture and industry; such co-operation, he claimed, would strengthen the Czechoslovak and Polish position in the international market by overcoming unnecessary mutual competition and would stimulate internal recovery. The Minister stated further that a transport agreement was also under discussion. There is news that the more important railway links between the Baltic and Adriatic ports are being resumed. Considerable publicity was given in Poland recently to the arrival of the first Czechoslovak cargo of exports at the rail-head at Szczecin (Stettin).

Apart from the article by Dr. Clementis, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the Communist newspaper, Rudé Právo, which dwelt at length with the economic fruits, the Czech press concentrated more upon the strategic advantages ensuing from the Treaty by way of completing "the system of Slav defences." The economic discussions now proceeding in Prague are a natural outcome of the earlier discussions in Warsaw two months ago.

On the 15th May, Alexander Mach, former Slovak Minister of the Interior under Tiso, was sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment by the Slovak National Court. It was reported earlier that the Communists had been endeavouring to save Mach—at one time perhaps the most detested figure in Slovakia—as a politician of some future value to their Party, and that his "illness" in prison was a means of staying judgment. The Slovak National Court has still some cases to hear, but the People's Court ended its work in Slovakia on the 15th, ten days after the Czech National and People's Courts had concluded their business.

POLAND

Two passages in the Secretary of State's speech in the House of Commons on the 15th May concerned Polish affairs. The first was on the question of territorial claims against Germany:—

> "It was hoped," Mr. Bevin said, "that the Deputies or a special commission would have been instructed to deal with this, and to report at the next meeting. Unfortunately the Soviet delegation claimed that the new German-Polish frontier had been settled at Potsdam, and should therefore be excluded from examination. We were asked to accept the provisional frontier as final, in spite of the fact that it was agreed at Yalta, and confirmed at Potsdam, that the final delimitation of the Western frontier of Poland should await the peace settlement. I am perfectly certain that if this had operated the other way, and we had made such a claim to the Peace Conference for a settlement, it would not have been tolerated by our friends for a moment.
> "All I ask is proper treatment. When one has entered into agreement it should be carried out as it was intended. The territory between the Eastern and Western Neisse, it seems, has been filled up, but I am not so sure about the territory between Frankfurt and the Baltic, which is a great agricultural area. Before territory of this kind is finally handed over—and I pronounce no opinion as to what the final view of His Majesty's Government would be—one is entitled to have the facts before giving a final decision. That is all I have asked. We have an open mind on the matter, but we accept the view that Poland must be compensated for what was taken away from her by Soviet Russia in the East."

As regards the general question of Great Britain's relations with Poland, the Secretary of State said;

> "I notice that in certain quarters it has been suggested that I have altered the policy of His Majesty's Government towards Poland. I have done nothing of the sort. In the Potsdam discussions I was given certain pledges which were not fulfilled, and great difficulties ensued. Now, as soon as I see that there is apparently a change of approach, I am willing to respond immediately under such circumstances. On 20th March, 1946, I stated in the House that, while we would not use force to compel the Poles to return to Poland, I nevertheless wanted them to go back. I have never disguised our firm conviction that all of them ought to go back; in that we have been perfectly consistent all the way through.
> "At present, co-operation between us and the Polish Government in connection with the return of the Poles is much better than it has ever been. I think there is an understanding in Poland even > with regard to our intentions about the Polish Resettlement Corps, and the denunciations that went on about it have ceased! . . . . We have sent back from the United Kingdom to Poland over 66,000 Polish Servicemen. This does not include a considerable number of Poles who were repatriated direct from Italy and Germany . . . . About 28,000 men in the United Kingdom are still awaiting repatriation, which we are speeding up . . . . In addition, since the end of March, just over 10,000 volunteers for repatriation have come forward. I think there is a better understanding of the genuineness of our motives and of our desire, not to desert the men who fought with us, but to get them to go back to their own country.

> "I am convinced now that I can say to the Poles with greater confidence, that they can return to Poland with a better feeling than they have hitherto thought possible."

SOVIET UNION

The ripples set up by the publication of the Tass version of the Stalin–Stassen interview have not yet subsided in the stream of Soviet publicity. Leontiev in Pravda's "International Review" went once again over the ground of the Soviet attitude towards co-operation with the outside world since the Revolution, picking out various statements of Lenin and Stalin in support of the thesis that ideological and economic differences need be no obstacle to friendly exchange, particularly in the realm of trade. Leontiev—and also Osipov in a broadcast commentary—blamed American journalists for giving a distorted picture of Soviet policy to their readers which suggested that the U.S.S.R. was against co-operation. Leontiev insisted, however, that Generalissimo Stalin's references to co-operation with the Western powers did not mean that the Soviet Union was departing from its position over the solving of important international questions. He concluded by stating that the interview would play a big part in unmasking those who were now trying to impose reactionary régimes on the peoples while unjustly accusing the U.S.S.R. of wishing to implant its own system by force in other countries.

This reference to the imposing of "reactionary régimes on the peoples" was taken up in Soviet comment on the political crises in France and Italy, which were described as having many common features. The fact that in neither country were there serious internal conditions such as should lead to a crisis suggested, according to Pravda, that the threatening crisis was fomented from outside. Events in France and Italy were clearly linked in the same plan of attack by world reaction against the democratic victory which had been won in the countries of western Europe. The Giornale d'Italia was quoted for the suggestion that the "Truman doctrine" might be extended to include Italy.

Although in his talk with Mr. Stassen Generalissimo Stalin appeared to condemn Soviet press attacks on American aggression, these have continued at, if anything, an increased tempo. Moscow radio broadcast a long talk on the attempts of American monopoly capital to grab Middle Eastern oilfields; Krasnaya Zvezda accused the Americans of developing new weapons of mass destruction in order that the United States might engulf in its power the whole globe, while Pravda waxed eloquent on the subject of the "63 American families" who were alleged to be in control of the whole of the U.S.A., including the President.

Pravda's Berlin correspondent descended to the trivial in trying to make out that the American authorities in Germany were by way of blackmailing German actors so as to prevent them from appearing in the Soviet play, "The Russian Question," which is an attack on the Hearst press.

The question of displaced persons has been taken up once again on the usual lines by Pravda and Krasnaya Zvezda (see Summary No. 391). The familiar charges were made that anti-Soviet propaganda was conducted in the camps and that Soviet repatriation officers were not allowed free access. Previous articles had argued that the reluctance to repatriate displaced persons was due to a desire on the part of the Western Powers to secure cheap labour, and this point was hammered home more forcibly in these latest utterances. Completely ignoring the strict conditions imposed in Great Britain for the recruitment of foreign labour which preclude any possibility of undercutting wages, Pravda accused the British of establishing a new "reserve fund of serfs" designed to create a permanent means of pressure on the wages and conditions of the British working class.

An official denial has been issued by Tass of the report circulated by the Cairo paper Al-Ahram to the effect that in Stalin's conversation with Mr. Bevin, the Soviet Government promised not to support Egypt in the United Nations. The conversation, it was alleged by Tass, did not touch upon the question of the United Nations or of support or non-support by the U.S.S.R. of any Egyptian demand in United Nations. On the question of relations between Great Britain and Egypt, it was stated that this was the concern of Great Britain and Egypt and that the U.S.S.R., in accordance with its invariable policy of non-interference, does not intend to interfere.

British "manœuvres" to retain military power and capital investments in India after the "formal" handing over to the Indian authorities were the subject of a provocative and basically mendacious article in Pravda by the Far Eastern expert E. Zhukov, one of the Soviet delegates to the recent Inter-Asian Conference. After some preliminary sneers at the difficulties now encountered in India and other "colonies" by "British colonial officers of the old school," Zhukov-described the large-scale movements of British troops "out of Indian territory proper" to the principalities and especially Hyderabad, and went on: "The British make no secret that they are converting this great space into a military base" [a statement completely devoid of foundation]. Zhukov also talks wildly about "private separatist agreements by the feudal princes with the British authorities and the transfer of British mobile capital to the principalities." Finally Zhukov described the scene at the departure from Bombay of the Soviet delegation to the Inter-Asian Conference; the pouring rain, greetings to Stalin and Moscow, and "the envious feelings of those who remained behind, envy of our unity and brotherhood."

A typically misleading account has appeared in Trud from the Soviet representative to the W.F.T.U. delegation to Persia, Borisov, on the "persecution of independent trade-unions in Persia" and of the Government's attitude to the Delegation. Borisov's account also conflicts on many points of fact and interpretation with the reports of the British representative, Mr. Harries. He speaks of the spontaneous welcome given to the W.F.T.U. delegation but ignores the fact that, in spite of protests by Mr. Harries in Mazanderan, the delegation interviewed Tudeh supporters only. The difficulties which the Delegation encountered appear to have been deliberately exaggerated by Borisov. For example, though it is true that they were quartered 18 km. outside Tehran, the reason for this was not neglect of their comfort but because the best hotel is situated there. Finally, Borisov's account of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company's intervention in trade union affairs is most unfair: whereas the avowed policy of the company has been non-intervention, Borisov insinuates that it has been actively intriguing in trade-union matters, including elections.

The first open sign of Soviet interest in the possible successor of the Oecumenical Patriarch Maximos, who is seriously ill, has appeared in a Tass report from New York quoting the New York Times to the effect that the U.S.A. was interested in the candidature of the Greek Archbishop in the United States, Atlenagoras, whose election would enable the State Department to counteract "the propagandist apparatus of the Soviet Union." There has so far been no suggestion of any candidate likely to be favoured by the U.S.S.R.

In spite of the urgent need for a bumper harvest this year, the farmers of Byelorussia seem to have carried out their spring tasks in a very slipshod and half-hearted fashion. The Central Committee of the Byelorussian Communist Party recently issued a decree on "The need for promptly setting about spring work in the fields." This order was widely flouted, it appears, and in some kolkhozes work was started as much as a week after the "ripening of the soil." Tractor drivers have been taken to task for shallow ploughing; "certain kolkhozes in the Mozirsk rayon" (Polesskaya Province), it was said, had ploughed only to a depth of 7 or 8 cm. Instances are reported of sowing by hand while seed drills were left idle. The harrowing of winter crops was largely neglected. In places the working day started at 10·0 or 11·0 a.m., there were long breaks, and the workers are reported to have left early. The area under flax is being restored to its pre-war size very slowly indeed, and the flax-growers' agricultural technique remains on a very low level.

In many rayons of the Ukraine also the promptness and diligence of the farmers has apparently left something to be desired. The latest overall figures available for the Republic show that the sowing of early crops was proceeding somewhat more slowly than in spring 1946. When the sowing period had already expired in the southern Ukraine the Nikolaevsk and Kherson oblasts had failed to complete their programme, while the Odessa oblast fell seriously short of its 1946 achievements. The farmers of the Ukraine have "given their word to Comrade Stalin," we are told, to raise the level of agricultural production this year. "The fulfilment of this promise depends largely on the tempo and quality of spring sowing," says

Pravda Ukrainy of the 16th April. Party workers are busy explaining to the kolkhoz workers the obligations undertaken in their name, but it is by no means certain yet that the programme can be carried through.

SCANDINAVIA

Finland

Reports from Helsinki state that the President is now trying to obtain agreement on the return of the Pekkala administration. So far only the reactions of the Agrarians and the Social Democratic Parties are known. Both are prepared to agree to the arrangement, a fact particularly significant in the case of the Agrarians who were the immediate cause for the original resignation of M. Pekkala and his colleagues. The Agrarians have, apparently, made their agreement conditional while the Social-Democrats also make certain stipulations. It should be made clear, they say, that the Cabinet is being appointed by the President himself and that the Social-Democrats are, therefore, not committed to supporting it. In view of the fact that the Social-Democrats, no less than the Agrarians, had been extremely critical of the Pekkala administration (see this Summary No. 388) this face-saving move is hardly surprising. As for the Folk Democrats, it may be expected that they will not only welcome the President's decision as a proof that the Pekkala Government is, after all, the best available Government, but will indulge in a certain amount of jubilation at this defeat of their opponents. In his May Day speech M. Leino, the Communist Minister of the Interior, has already, in a way, anticipated the acceptance of the status quo ante by his party, in that he made may complimentary references to the successful administration of the Pekkala coalition. M. Leskinen (the Social Democratic spokesman, a right-wing member of the Party and its Secretary), on the other hand, disputed M. Leino's assertion that the late Government had been so successful. What was needed, he said, was a strengthening of the administration to secure greater confidence in it on the part of the working classes.

Denmark

There is some evidence that M. Christmas Møller's resignation (see last two Summaries) may produce some unlooked-for results, in that it appears to be gaining him supporters in hitherto hostile quarters. Thus the Conservative Youth National Council, one of his bitterest opponents for the last year or so, has issued a resolution regretting his resignation. M. Bertil Dahlgaard, a prominent member of the Radical Liberal Party, expressed the opinion at a party meeting at Shelskör that "the Conservative Party had rendered ineffectual the man who stood for economic and social progress and was willing to stake his political career on the national frontier policy." The leading Social Democratic paper, Social Demokraten, which although not opposing him had always refrained from openly supporting him, referred to his Aarsus speech in a leading article and pointed out that his attack was not only directed against M. Kristensen, the Prime Minister, but also against his own successor, M. Ole Björn Kraft. Both M. Kristensen and M. Kraft's speeches, said the paper, were exceedingly harmful in that they were calculated to create confusion about the Danish attitude as set forth in the note to the Great Powers. If they were to be taken seriously, it would mean that the basis on which the country's South Slesvig policy was based, was smashed.

General.—Between the 10th and 12th of May meetings between the Ministers for Foreign Affairs, Finance and Supply of Sweden, Norway and Denmark were held in Stockholm. The principal subject on the agenda was the discussion of the proposed statutes for the International Trade Organisation. In an official communiqué subsequently issued it was stated that the general aims of the organisation appeared to correspond with those of the Scandinavian countries, but that the right of members to independent action should be preserved, lest the Organisation fail to attain universality. At the same time a number of minor suggestions were put forward for the greater effectiveness of the Organisation, among the more interesting ones being a proposal that export subsidies should not be granted in cases where their use might hamper natural processes of productive development. The statement concluded by agreeing that, subject to reservations on certain points, the Scandinavian countries would support the efforts being made towards the formation of the organisation.

Minister at the time of the invasion in May 1940—opened in Amsterdam on the 9th May. An imposing array of witnesses gave evidence. These included Professor Gerbrandy (who succeeded Jhr. de Geer as Prime Minister); Dr. Sillem, former Netherlands Ambassador in Lisbon; M. Steenberghe, former Minister of Economic Affairs; M. Welter, former Colonial Minister; Dr. Bolkestein, former Minister of Education; the Chairmen of the Labour and Communist Parties; MM. Koos Vorrink and Wagenaar; Baron Harinxma thoe Slooten, Netherlands Ambassador in Brussels; Otto Behne, former Plenipotentiary of the German Government at The Hague; and van Geelkerken, former Deputy Leader of the N.S.B. (Dutch National Socialist Party). Other high N.S.B. officials, together with several well-known journalists, were also heard.

Professor Gerbrandy in evidence said that while he regarded Jhr. de Geer's return to occupied Holland as a "sinister affair," he was convinced that the accused would "never have formed a Government in the Netherlands at the instigation of the Germans." Asked by the President of the Court, Professor Dr. J. H. van Hamel, if that meant that he did not "doubt the accused's patriotism," Professor Gerbrandy replied: "Not in the subjective sense."

The accused, who conducted his own defence, gave evidence next day (10th May). He began by stating that he wanted to give the Court "an honest and straightforward account" of what had happened, however distasteful that might be to him. He claimed that he had been accused, not of a positive crime, but rather of "harbouring evil thoughts." He had been charged with having been disloyal to the "free and democratic institutions" of the Netherlands, and with having had intelligence with people whom "he himself considered as traitors to their country." He went on to quote from his own speeches in an attempt to prove his consistent opposition to National Socialism and his innocence of anti-Semitism. A few "careless remarks" had, he complained, been "used against him"—remarks by which he meant no harm: nevertheless, "violent exception had been taken to them." With regard to his mission to the N.E.I., the evidence of the witnesses was "entirely contrary to the facts." He had been told by M. Welter that he had permission to visit such of his family as were in the N.E.I., but M. Welter had added that he "did not particularly insist" upon Jhr. de Geer's actually going or not. [M. Welter, in evidence, had described the mission as an economic mission, which the accused, "a capable financier," was well fitted to undertake. Without warning, however, he received a letter from Jhr. de Geer (then in Lisbon), explaining his desire to return to the Netherlands. He was at once told that he would not be allowed to do so; whereupon he broke his promise and left.] The fact was, continued Jhr. de Geer, that he wanted to see his wife and the rest of his family who were in the Netherlands, and had accordingly made up his mind to go back. He had interpreted the mission to the N.E.I. as being "not really of a very serious character." It was "not quite right" for him to return home, he admitted, but it "did not occur to him at the time that he was being disloyal." In his opinion if his return to the Netherlands had been "prejudicial" to the Resistance Movement, this was not due to the action itself, but rather to the "fuss" made by London on the radio, which had served only to "play into the hands of German propaganda." Speaking of the publication of his much discussed pamphlet [Synthèse in de Oorlog, published in 1942, in which he had urged consultations with Germany with a view to ending the struggle against her], the accused said that he regarded himself as a "co-religionist of Lloyd George and Chamberlain." He insisted that there was no "defeatism" in the pamphlet, any more than there was in Lloyd George's "craving for peace," or in the views of those who "seriously believed" that war was "tantamount to suicide."

The Procurator-Fiscal, Mr. W. P. Bakhoven, asked for a "conditional" sentence of a year's imprisonment, a fine of 4,000 guilders with the alternative of four months' imprisonment, and deprivation of the right to hold office and to vote for five years. Speaking of Jhr. de Geer's broadcast from London [20th May, 1940], Mr. Bakhoven said that the accused had wanted to "avoid exasperating the Germans too much," and to "leave open the possibility of a rapprochement with Germany." He had repeatedly discussed in London the possibility of a "compromise peace"; but a prima facie case could not be made out against him on his peace efforts alone, as he was "inspired entirely by his pacifist views." He should not have used his visa to return to the Netherlands. "I do not, however, believe," concluded Mr. Bakhoven, "that by failing to carry out his mission to the N.E.I. he harmed the cause of the Netherlands or that his attitude was advantageous to the Germans. He ought to have informed the Government in London that he intended to return to the Netherlands from Lisbon."

Sentence is to be pronounced on the 23rd May.

Belgium

The Walloon Congress—the third since the liberation—assembled at Namur on the 3rd May. The proceedings were opened by the Chairman, M. Schreurs, who was in no mood for compromise, and threatened the abandonment of a "conciliatory attitude" and the use of "more forceful methods" if the Belgian Government rejected the proposal for the establishment of a Walloon Federal State. He accused the Government, and M. Spaak in particular, of making "empty promises," and attacked their "anti-French policy." Of the 17 million people in the Dutch-Belgian-Luxembourg economic bloc, declared M. Schreurs, over 14 million were "Teutonic," and under 3 million Walloon. Although the "Walloon ideal" had suffered a "certain decline" last year, they now saw a revival of the Walloon Movement. The Congress had to submit its view on M. Marcel-Hubert Grégoire's proposal for constitutional revision. The rejection of federalism would leave Walloons with no other choice but "complete autonomy or inclusion in France." Many Walloon "fighters" could "again apply underground fighting methods," while others would "continue to voice their demands with all the democratic means at their disposal—in the first place, by appealing to the United Nations and the foreign ministries of other countries." Wallonia had to become an "organic State," with "a capital, a flag and a national anthem."

FRANCE

M. Ramadier's "placid courage," in the words of one newspaper article, is carrying the French Government through the storms of the difficult food situation and the wave of strikes which it has occasioned. He has himself assumed direct responsibility for the administration of food supplies until August when the new harvest will be coming in and the situation will be easier. This is an act of marked courage in view of his complete failure as Minister of Food in the winter of 1944–45, but public opinion is willing to believe that his failure then was due to circumstances beyond his control and to hope for better things now. A national committee for collecting wheat has been set up, with M. Vincent Auriol as Chairman, to enlist the support of local personalities in all districts in the campaign to induce farmers to disgorge their stocks of wheat. It is estimated that, if the farmers will co-operate, there is enough wheat in the country to enable the ration to be met, with the aid of the supplies promised from America, and the price of wheat has been raised as an extra inducement. At the end of the Assembly debate on wheat supplies, on the 16th May, a motion was passed unanimously expressing confidence in the Government but asking for the formulation of a coherent agricultural policy with a balanced structure of prices. M. Ramadier succeeded in obtaining the withdrawal of a motion put forward by the Rassemblement des Gauches which was couched in critical terms and was aimed against economic controls. The dislike of the R.G.R. for the policy of MM. André Philip and Tanguy-Prigent, Ministers of National Economy and Agriculture, has long been evident, but M. Ramadier refuses to sacrifice them and called the R.G.R. to order by reminding them of the collective responsibility of the Cabinet in which they are represented.

The wave of strikes which has occurred during the last fortnight is generally attributed to the shortage of bread, which has reached serious proportions in some places, and to the absence of meat from the market except at very high prices. A strike in the Paris flour mills was settled by the grant of increased bonuses for output and regular attendance, and the two Renault workshops which had refused to accept the Government's terms (see last week's Summary) have now resumed work. The Paris metalworkers' union, however, demonstrated on the 16th May in favour of higher production bonuses, and the meetings between the C.G.T. and M. Ramadier have not yet produced agreement. The Communists are preaching moderation, saying that the weapon of the general strike must be kept in reserve for a moment of critical emergency, but they are backing all demands for production bonuses. The C.G.T. Communist leaders have been alarmed by the comparative success of the Catholic unions in the social security elections (see Summary No. 390) and by the defeat of many leading unionists by lesser-known men. The revolt of the trade unionist rank and file against the discipline imposed by their leaders is but one facet of the general revolt against restrictions on individual freedom, and the Communists are usually quick to adapt themselves to any general trend of working-class opinion.

General de Gaulle spoke at Bordeaux on the 15th May on the occasion of a ceremony in memory of Félix Eboué, the negro Governor of the Tchad province of Equatorial Africa. He devoted himself to questions of imperial policy but his insistance on the need for federal institutions which should hold together the different parts of the French Union did not seem to differ from the ideas of the present Government. He did, however, maintain that the Union could not survive without a strong French state such as did not at present exist.

M. Eirik Labonne, Resident-General in French Morocco, was replaced on the 14th May by General Juín, Chief of Staff for National Defence. M. Labonne is appointed to a special post under the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister in connection with the organisation of the French Union. The need for such an appointment has long been felt, but it is not clear in this case whether M. Labonne's transfer amounts to promotion or not. His efforts to carry out a liberal policy in Morocco have earned him the dislike of the French community there; moreover, M. Labonne has been censured for allowing the Sultan of Morocco when he visited Tangier last month to make no polite reference to France but to speak in friendly terms of the Arab League and to voice Morocco's natural aspirations (see Summary No. 388 under "Tangier"). The Sultan's remarks caused considerable concern in Paris and it may be felt that a strong arm is needed at Rabat. General Juin's appointment has provoked a protest from the Socialist Executive Committee, which fears that it may mean a retreat from M. Labonne's liberal policy. General Juín has long experience of Morocco and served on Lyautey's staff at one time. He is one of France's most distinguished soldiers and won fame through his leadership of the French Expeditionary Force in Italy. He was appointed Chief of Staff for National Defence in 1944, and it is to be hoped that the co-ordination of the three services which was thus achieved will not now be sacrificed.

M. Coste-Floret, Minister of War, gave a press conference on the 13th May at which he outlined French military policy, no doubt in answer to the speech made by M. Billoux, the Communist ex-Minister of Defence (see Summary No. 390). He spoke of new methods of organising defence in depth, and of training the nation with one year's conscription and frequent short periods in the reserve. The army in France and North Africa, he said, now numbered 284,000. Troops in Indo-China numbered 116,000 with 60,000 police, and the occupation troops in Germany and Austria were being reduced from 75,000 to 50,000.

M. Bidault gave a press conference on the 16th May, dealing with the results of the Moscow Conference. He emphasised that its failure was due to disagreement on the fundamental questions of economic unity, reparations and the level of industry. He regretted that more statistical examination of the level of industry, including questions of coal and steel production, had not been made. He said, however, that the British and Americans had shown at Moscow greater understanding of France's needs.

Conversations opened in Paris on the 12th May between British and French representatives on the question of the departure from French ports of ships carrying illegal Jewish immigrants to Palestine. The atmosphere of the meeting was friendly, and the French showed a more co-operative attitude than hitherto with regard to control of visas, the enforcement of the regulations for safety of life at sea on ships suspected of carrying Jews, and the stoppage of irregular trains of Jews entering the French zones of Germany and Austria. French co-operation in this matter is, however, linked by them with our own response to their desire to recruit German labour in our zones of Germany and Austria. Conversations on this question have been going on at Lausanne, and the French have shown that they wish to recruit Volksdeutsche rather than other displaced persons in Austria, and that in Germany they wish to recruit civilian German labour to replace the German prisoners-of-war whom they are releasing. This is therefore a separate question from their long-term proposals for German emigration as voiced by M. Bidault at Moscow.

SWITZERLAND

Liquidation of the German assets in Switzerland continues to be held up by the failure to agree upon a rate of exchange for the Swiss franc and the Reichsmark. Some American negotiators contend that the Swiss are playing for time, and they still maintain that the Accord did not stipulate, or even imply, that a rate of exchange must be fixed before liquidation could be started, but merely that the owners would be indemnified. The Swiss, however, reiterate that they are not to blame for the obstructions. A few months ago, British, United States and French representatives in Berlin agreed on a provisional exchange rate of 129 Swiss francs for 100 marks, but the Soviet representative would not agree to any new rate, proposing, instead, the pre-war rate of 170 Swiss francs for 100 marks. This rate was rejected by the representative of the United States, and was also considered completely inadequate by the Swiss.

On the 17th May, M. Stucki, head of the Foreign Affairs division of the Political Department, discussed with the Commercial Counsellor, a question which he said had been on the tapis recently in Washington—that of an advance of 50 million Swiss francs under Article 5 of the Washington Agreement, which gave the Allies the right to draw in advance on the proceeds of the liquidation of the German assets. M. Stucki stated that the Swiss Government sympathised deeply with the object of Article 5, and with the difficult consequences of the tragic position in which the United Kingdom found itself at the present time. He maintained, however, that, as liquidation had not yet begun, there were therefore no proceeds; but he felt sure that, as soon as the rate of exchange was fixed, the Swiss Government would at once make 50 million Swiss francs available to the Allied Governments even though liquidation had not started. He emphasised, however, that he was speaking personally and without the authorisation of his Government. M. Stucki also complained of the slow progress made by the Joint Commission, and said that on this account the Swiss member, Dr. Speiser, was thinking of resigning. If this should happen, the Swiss Government would not again nominate a member of such high calibre. The Swiss Government, M. Stucki added, had already made three proposals during the past year—(1) that the rate of exchange should be 43·40 Swiss francs for 100 marks; (2) that they would be willing to work or a provisional rate; (3) that they would consider a provisional rate applying only to the British, French and American Zones. No reply had been received to any of these proposals, though the first had been made when the Accord was signed at Washington.

The Allied point of view is that the establishment of general conversion factors between the Reichsmark and other currencies is a very delicate matter, which is only part of the process of financial reform in Germany, and that in any case no provisional rate is likely to be agreed upon which represents a reasonable anticipation of a rate in line with a future general indemnification rate. Moreover, it is expected that uniformity in the rates of exchange will ultimately be achieved for all German owners of assets and not only for those with holdings in Switzerland.

SPAIN

By the end of the second week of May conditions were normal in all the industrial establishments in the Basque Provinces affected by the strikes. While the press, taking its cue from the official statement (see last week's Summary), has, of course, dismissed the whole episode as a thing of small account, the Basque Nationalists in exile are jubilant and regard it as an impressive demonstration of their continued hold on the population. The President of the "Government of Euzkadi," Jose-Antonio Aguirre, told a press conference called in Paris on the 12th May that the order to return to work had duly been transmitted through the Basque Resistance Council and the three trade union organizations concerned. He went on to commend the workers for the orderliness and discipline of their peaceful protest and the employers on the sympathy and understanding they had shown. Evidence of the strength of democratic conceptions in that part of Spain this demonstration has certainly been, but it is important to recognize that we are in the presence of a localized affair which will have caused scarcely a ripple on the surface of the life of Spain as a whole.

It is probably wishful thinking, for example, to suppose that General Franco's present journeyings to the Mediterranean seaboard are in any way designed to counterbalance the effect of the recent strikes. Barcelona was beflagged for the arrival of the head of the State on the 18th May—his third visit since the Civil War. In Valencia on the 13th May the Generalissimo delivered a "pep" speech to the officers of the local garrison on the theme that the Spanish military must never again, as in the past, shut themselves up in their ivory towers (sic), they must maintain close associations with industry and a strong national economy (as indeed very many officers individually are doing these days!) and strive to bring justice to every home—to make a more just and more human Spain. The Caudillo, who is accompanied by his wife and daughter, made a number of other speeches during his seven days' stay in the province of Valencia—to groups of the press, the magistracy and members of the legal profession and to a delegation of the Youth Front. According to the official version he was the object of unceasing loyal demonstrations: Republican propaganda, on the other hand, tells of the distribution of thousands of leaflets by the Resistance movement and speaks of the indifference shown by the people to the organized demonstrations of welcome. The truth lies probably somewhere in between.

The death of Francisco de Assisi Cambó in Buenos Aires on the 30th April removes from the scene the most distinguished, or at any rate conspicuous, Catalan figure of our generation. He was prominent at the same time as a wealthy business magnate, patron of the arts and politician. As a founder-leader of the Lliga Regionalista from 1902–23 he championed the cause of "Home Rule" for Catalonia and was frequently at loggerheads with the various Governments of King Alfonso XIII's time in Madrid. Protection for Catalonia's textile interests was one of the principal planks in the Lliga platform. But Señor Cambó acquired merit among Catalanists of all parties by his munificent gifts and foundations for the cultivation of Catalan art and literature, finely-printed editions of the classics in Catalan, &c. He derived his great wealth from the electrical consortium CHADE (Compañía Hispano-americana de Electricidad) formed in 1918–19—of which the partly British-owned Riego y Fuerzas (Barcelona Light and Traction Co.) was a dependency and which was associated with British interests—e.g., the Primitiva Gas Company—in Buenos Aires. Señor Cambó was a bitter enemy of the Dictatorship of General Primo de Rivera because of the deadset made against all autonomist activities. In the interval between the dismissal of the Dictator and the fall of the Monarchy he was one of the group of old politicos who made a vain attempt to stage a come-back. During the Republic he was active behind the scenes, but by that time the glory of the Conservative Lliga had departed—Catalan politics were well and truly oriented to the Left. The dispute about the Law of Agrarian Contracts (Ley de Cultivos) in 1934 found him on the other side of the barrier, allied with the agrarian and business interests of Castile. But he maintained his position as a Maecenas of Catalan culture. A strong Catholic, he was necessarily alienated by the mob-rule in Catalonia at the beginning of the civil war; but he regarded himself as a European and liberal-democrat and found collaboration with General Franco and the Falange distasteful. Hence his departure for Argentina, where he made his home for the last ten years of his life. It was rumoured last year that he was contemplating a return to the Spanish political scene as a champion of the cause of Don Juan. But the journey to Lisbon never materialised. More recently there was talk in the Spanish press of his returning to Barcelona.

Spanish obituary comment, flattering enough to Cambó personally but denigrating the cause of Catalanism which was his life's passion, will have disgusted all Catalan patriots. People in Catalonia may well also be up in arms about the summary dismissal of the Civil Governor, Colonel Bartolomé Barba, who, though no particular friend of Catalan aspirations, had acquired considerable respect for his firm treatment of the local Falange party. It was baldly announced that the new Civil Governor, Don Eduardo Baeza Alegría, transferred from Zaragoza, would take up his duties on the 10th May. This change will be widely regarded as a score for the Falange. So, in Catalonia, General Franco will be finding a heavily-charged atmosphere. The police have apparently taken elaborate precautions for his safety.

Although the Spanish press has maintained a discreet silence, the reason for Col. Barba's sudden departure is believed to be that he had spoken disparagingly of the Caudillo's Bill of Succession and had manifested sympathy with Don Juan. Another version is that he was in disgrace for allowing a recent meeting of the Carlists at which the Traditionalist leader, Señor Fal Conde, also spoke slightingly of the Succession Bill, at the same time dissociating himself from the camp of Don Juan and once more putting forward the pure Carlist doctrine on behalf of a Regency to be vested in Francis-Xavier de Bourbon Parma.

The recent renewal of diplomatic relations between Bolivia and Spain gave rise to a curious misunderstanding on the part of the Spanish Government. Under the misapprehension that His Majesty's Government had been consulted by the Bolivian Government, and had advised in favour of resuming diplomatic relations, the Spanish Government instructed their Chargé d'Affaires in London to thank His Majesty's Government for the part that they had played. The Chargé d'Affaires was informed that His Majesty's Government had not been consulted by the Bolivian Government, and in any event would not have advised a renewal of diplomatic relations with Franco Spain. The Chargé d'Affaires was further requested to make it plain to the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs that belief in His Majesty's Government's intervention in this matter was but another example of the pathetic inclination of the Madrid authorities to hold that His Majesty's Government were not really opposed to General Franco.

The First Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organisation met in Montreal on the 6th May. In accordance with the directive of the United Nations General Assembly—which made its approval of the draft relationship agreement (for specialised Agency status) conditional on action being taken to debar Franco Spain from membership of I.C.A.O.—the Assembly at its third plenary session duly voted for Spain's exclusion, and the Spanish delegation walked out. Thus, so long as General Franco rules—not only is Spain ostracised from all inter-Governmental bodies but she finds herself increasingly excluded from international technical conferences. The action of the I.C.A.O. Assembly requires ratification by two-thirds of the member States. (See also under "United Nations.")

ITALY

The resignation of Signor De Gasperi on the 13th May (see Summary No. 392) was precipitated by the grave economic situation. Signor De Gasperi has been under increasing criticism from both Left and Right for the last three months, the Left accusing him of being too pro-American and the Right and the Vatican accusing him of having been too conciliatory to the Communists. Since Signor De Gasperi's return from the United States in January there has been increasing evidence that he had made up his own mind. In his view the economic situation could only be saved by the grant of a loan from the United States, and the United States would be unlikely to make such a loan unless the Communists were jettisoned from the Government. There are good grounds for believing that his interpretation of the intentions of the U.S. Government is the correct one. The right wing of the Christian Democrats (encouraged by recent events in France) has complained of Signor De Gasperi's conciliatory attitude to the Communists and Nenni Socialists. He has undoubtedly been conciliatory, but it is difficult to see how he could hope to bring the economic situation under control without their active assistance.

De Gasperi has failed to convince the political world that the economic position of the country must be the first consideration of the Government and that the Tripartite government should devote its primary attention to this question. His tentative suggestions for widening the Government on a national basis and of calling in technical experts (who were likely to be of right-wing sympathies) has alarmed the left-wing parties, and thus Signor Morandi's statement on the attitude of the Socialist Party (see Summary 392) was the immediate cause of De Gasperi's resignation.

On the 13th May Signor De Gasperi broadcast the speech on the economic situation which he had intended to make in the Constituent Assembly. After referring to the immense deficit on the 1946–7 Budget and to various plans for increasing the revenue and decreasing expenditure in 1947–8, Signor De Gasperi came to the two serious problems confronting any Government in Italy, that of price stability and of increased production. He admitted that his Government had not succeeded in stabilising prices and the lira, reducing consumption and imposing the necessary discipline. The difficulties were political and psychological and were due to lack of organisation.

The last part of his speech explained the dependence of the country's very existence on the power to obtain a foreign loan. Signor Morandi, the Socialist Minister for Industry and Commerce, had explained to the Cabinet that most of the country's exports went to pay for essential foodstuffs, and that industrial and agricultural reconstruction was severely hampered by the shortage of raw materials, for which they would be unable to pay now that UNRRA relief was ending. Signor De Gasperi indicated that it was no use being afraid of economic planning, this had already existed in connection with UNRRA relief. Planning was essential if foreign investments were to be secured; and in addition non-essential consumption must be reduced and prices kept stable. He appealed for collaboration at a time of economic and financial hardship, when the Government was bent on economic revival and the defence of the lira.

All this is sound enough, but it must be owned that it contains a somewhat damning confession of failure made not to the Cabinet but in public. It seems to support the claim of Signor De Gasperi's opponents that he promises much but does nothing.

President de Nicola has asked the 78-year old Signor F. S. Nitti to form a new government. (Signor Nitti was Premier in 1919–1920 but during his term of office proved to be weak and to be incapable of dealing with a complex political situation.) Latest reports indicate that he is having difficulty in securing the co-operation of the smaller left-wing parties.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Roumania

The May Day celebrations took place as usual, and by way of encouraging the "workers" to demonstrate and listen to Communist speeches the bread ration, the withholding of which had caused a serious strike in Arad in the previous week, was issued in Bucarest on the 30th April. There was an unusual display of large pictures of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin and lesser Russian and Roumanian Communist luminaries, but for the first time portraits of King Mihai and of the Prime Minister were absent.

Traffic has been resumed on the Danube, but so far it is mainly limited to local passenger traffic. What movement of goods there has been is limited to small cargoes of pyrites from Russia to Czechoslovakia, and to coal and wood for burning from Orsova. Dredging and maintenance work is being carried out at the mouth of the river, and it is reported that the depth at the Sulinar bar is 25 feet. The Sovromtransport Company which was formed in July 1945 has acquired rights over Roumanian ships and over riverside property of various kinds, so as to place it in a position to control the whole of the navigation over the Roumanian stretch of the river. It is thus able to prevent the operation of all privately-owned river craft, and can extend its control by the exercise of prior rights to leases of all port facilities not actually acquired. As a result the grip of the Company extends to the Black Sea ports, and the whole of the Roumanian merchant fleet, which is dependent upon the Galați and Constanța shipyards now leased to the Company.

A warning had been issued over the Roumanian Radio against listening to clandestine broadcasts. Offenders are liable to heavy fines and to the confiscation of their receiving sets. A large number of these have already been confiscated. Libertatea draws attention to the conditions of the roads throughout the country, which by affecting transport tends to prolong the economic crisis. Timpul emphasises the bad condition of the streets of Bucarest —a state of affairs which contrasts strangely with the stories of luxury and excessive spending which reach us from time to time. Neglected gardens, filthy boulevards, rubbish dumps, streets covered with litter and tram tickets, all this, says the article, confers on the city its aspect of 70 or 80 years ago. "This is due to the indifference and bad faith of those whose duty it is to look after Bucarest's appearance."

A committee has been formed in London under the presidency of the Earl of Selborne to sponsor a "Help the Roumanian Children Fund." The Secretary is Lt.-Col. de Chastelain, D.S.O., O.B.E., of 46 Palace Gardens Terrace, W. 8.

Yugoslavia

Dr. Dragoljub Jovanović, who lately criticised the Budget and the Five-Year Plan during the debates in the National Assembly, has exhausted the Government's patience. Abuse of him by Government speakers has now been followed by a proposal for his expulsion from the Praesidium of the Assembly, put forward by the Executive Committee of the puppet Agrarian Party, with which his former Party—the People's Peasant Party—has been amalgamated. He is reported, moreover, to be under arrest.

From Croatia there is an unconfirmed report of the arrest of Franjo Gaži, the Second Vice-Premier of the Croat Government. He had long been a member of the Croat Peasant Party before he joined the Partisans in 1942. But his public criticism of Dr. Maček and the part he played in forming the Croat Republican Peasant Party, with Communist support, lost him the favour of the peasants, and it was said of him in 1945 that he was so unpopular that he dared not show his face in his own village. He has never been more than a figurehead, but his alleged arrest suggests now that he may have been in contact with the Opposition.

An exhibition of British books was opened in Zagreb by H.M. Ambassador on May 14th. It has aroused considerable popular interest and a demand for English dictionaries.

The Yugoslav press has expressed great indignation at the American refusal to permit the opening of a branch of the Yugoslav travel agency, Putnik, in New York, on the ground that the U.S. representatives in Yugoslavia would not be able to ensure sufficient protection to American citizens visiting the country. In fact, they are not able to protect themselves, it seems, since the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires and his staff were recently detained at Peć until they had surrendered their cameras. Nevertheless, a formal apology has been forthcoming.

The Greek Minister in Belgrade has been subjected to insulting treatment and the Military Attaché has been declared persona non grata.

Yugoslav-American talks on the question of American property in Yugoslavia began in Belgrade on May 19th. A French-Yugoslav Trade Agreement was initialled in Paris on the 14th May.

Greece

Discussions have continued about Mr. Ethridge's proposals on a "broader amnesty" to be granted by the Greek Government. No official statement has yet been made, but M. Tsaldaris, the Foreign Minister, has told the Press that he and the U.S. Ambassador in Athens have agreed that decisions about a broader amnesty shall be postponed until the Security Council has taken action on the report of the Frontier Commission. Meanwhile the Government has extended the time-limit of the amnesty, which expired on the 31st March.

The Greek press and radio have on several occasions commented impatiently on the fact that the Commission, "lacking the courage to face the truth," have not yet finished drafting their report in Geneva. Most members of the rearguard section, however, have now returned to Salonica, and it is understood that they will begin by examining the recent case of a band from Yugoslavia which attacked the frontier post at Mikrolimni in Western Macedonia. The Athens press reports that large numbers of bandits are concentrated in the Monastir region of Yugoslavia and are ready to cross the frontier into Greece.

Twenty-one Populist and National Liberal Members of Parliament tabled a motion on the 14th May to outlaw the Communist party on the ground that it had never ceased instigating criminal acts throughout the country. On the following day, however, it was announced that the signatories had tabled the motion against the instructions of their party leaders, and the Government persuaded them that a debate on the subject would be inopportune. The motion was, therefore, postponed indefinitely.

It has now been reported that on the 6th May the EAM branch in Macedonia/Thrace published an appeal to all organisations, secular and religious, in that region to summon a conference "for the exchange of views and finding of drastic remedies which will save the nation from destruction and stop the bloodshed and civil war."

To mark the passing of the Aid to Greece Bill, Mr. Marshall, Assistant Secretary Benton and Senator Vandenberg have broadcast to Greece, and King Paul has broadcast a message of gratitude to the American people.

During the week M. Stratos, Minister of War, tendered his resignation to the Premier because he was not consulted by the Inner Cabinet when they appointed Brigadier Tzigantes as Greek representative at Nuremberg. It was immediately decided that all the actions of the Inner Cabinet must receive the approval of the full Cabinet, and the question of the Nuremberg appointment was referred back to M. Stratos for discussion with the General Staff. It is believed that he will now withdraw his resignation.

Albania

A brief but momentous announcement was made by the official Albanian telegraph service on the 14th May in these words:—"On the proposal of the Head of the Government, the Præsidium of the People's Assembly has dismissed from office the Minister of National Education, Professor Sejfullah Malleshova, for incapacity and negligence in the performance of his duties. Dr. Manol Konomi, Minister of Justice, has temporarily assumed the duties of the Minister of National Education."

Whether it is mere personal jealousy or something more fundamental which has led to this unexpected development it is as yet impossible to say, but in making the change Enver Hoxha is definitely "dropping the pilot." Malleshova has been a leading light of the extreme Left in Albania ever since 1923, when Hoxha was a boy of 15 and his new lieutenant Xoxe was only 12. In that year and the next he was chief secretary to the then Prime Minister, Bishop Fan Noli who led the old Albanian Democratic Party in opposition to King Zog. (The Bishop in those days a stormy petrel but now not so young as he was—has for many years been living quietly at Boston, Mass., whence, as one of the very few Albanian exiles favourable to the present régime, he periodically sends telegrams of congratulation and encouragement to Hoxha). With the fall of the Fan Noli Government in 1924 Malleshova escaped to Russia; he took a degree at Moscow University and became a member of the Soviet Academy of Science. As an experienced journalist and organiser he was afterwards a leading figure in the underground Albanian revolutionary movement in France, and it was there that he seems first to have met young Enver Hoxha, who was then dividing his time between attending lectures at a minor French lycée, leading a Communist study-circle and helping to run a cigarette kiosk. On his return to Albania in 1943 Malleshova at once became Hoxha's chief adviser and "elder statesman," with a special responsibility for L.N.Ç. propaganda. Brigadier Hodgson reported at the end of 1945 that he was "probably the strongest and most single-minded man in the Government and the real leader of the Albanian Communist party." He added that his Ministry was "certainly the most efficient element in the Democratic Front Government," and that he was—even at that time—definitely anti-British. This last quality is one, however, which he has shared with his latest set of ministerial colleagues without exception: all Hoxha's former collaborators who felt differently were carefully eliminated when he reconstructed his Cabinet in March 1946, preparatory to tying himself hand and foot to Marshal Tito.

Bulgaria

The supreme contempt in which both the British and the American Governments are held by the Dimitrov Government could hardly be better displayed than it is by the fact that, with treaty ratification already in the air and Article 2 of the Bulgarian treaty obliging the Government in black and white to guarantee to all Bulgarian citizens the "fundamental freedoms," week after week has elapsed with no Opposition newspaper at all allowed to appear—and this in spite of repeated protests made by our own chief representatives at Sofia and their United States colleagues to the Bulgarian Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister—not to speak of the Deputy Chairman of the (still existing, but hardly now functioning) Allied (Soviet) Control Commission and the Soviet Minister to Bulgaria.

M. Petkov, as leader of the Opposition, tried to bring the matter up in the Grand National Assembly last week, but only succeeded in getting himself suspended once again. The Prime Minister, in an evasive written reply to his question, tried to maintain that in neither of the two instances quoted by M. Petkov had there been any direct Government action: for in the one case it was the printers who had refused to print, while in the other it was the distribution agency which had refused to distribute. (Being a Government monopoly, there was nothing very surprising in this!) These tactics of the Communists may do well enough for the present, but if ever the Russians do really quit Bulgaria, that is the time when they will learn their lesson.

Turkey

President Truman's bill for helping Greece and Turkey was approved by majorities heavy enough (in the Senate 67 to 23, and in the House of Representatives 287 to 107) to give supreme satisfaction in Turkish circles which had been acutely conscious of machinations in circles of the Left to defeat a policy obviously directed against Soviet expansion. In recognition of his advocacy of the Turkish cause in Washington, the U.S. Ambassador had the most unusual honour of being greeted on his return to Angora by an imposing reception committee headed by the Foreign Minister. Similarly President Inönü made a special visit to Istanbul during the stay of the American squadron.

With the approval by both Houses on the 15th May of various amendments, the Truman proposals were finally adopted, and the Turks were justified in feeling that in the Near East American intervention had brought in a new era. Nevertheless, they seem to be confident of Great Britain's economic recovery and to recognise that the new era means stronger Anglo-American cooperation, not Anglo-American rivalry. The precise way in which the 100 million dollars earmarked for Turkey are to be applied will be worked out by an American mission of twelve army officers, six naval officers and two official economists now proceeding to Turkey. There is wisdom in the general conditions laid down by Congress to ensure that Turkey (and Greece) shall not squander or misapply the windfall. The presence of American official observers and of American press and radio representatives should prevent the Turks from using the money for such follies as the £2 million Atatürk mausoleum, and indeed enable both Governments to meet the inevitable criticisms that American funds are being wasted. Other conditions are only reasonable, viz., that Turkey (and Greece) shall not pass on equipment or information but shall safeguard it and shall not use the money of the United States for the service of any foreign loan.

The Turks have thrown off the Capitulations too recently (1914), and have too much of the chauvinism of a new nation, to relish anything that smacks of renewed foreign control. While pocketing the cash with profuse and genuine gratitude, they are likely to contrive in practice to evade more than a modicum of American inspection and advice, as they have done in the case of foreign inspectors and advisers in the past—British, French and German. (See also under "United States.")

In any event, the assurance that it is no longer Great Britain alone but also the United States which is now behind Turkey is doubtless responsible for the outspoken remarks of Turkish commentators on Soviet policy. They recall Russian designs to get outlets to the Persian Gulf and Mediterranean, as revealed by published archives; to obtain bases on the Straits; and to upset the present Turkish régime. They rightly insist that it is because the Soviet Government have never repudiated their claims against Turkey, that Turkey maintains the mobilisation of which Soviet propaganda complains. If Turkey were to succumb to Soviet pressure, nothing could keep Russia out of the Middle East and North Africa, and that, they frankly say, is why the United States is helping Greece and Turkey.

The Turkish parliamentary delegation which is visiting this country consists of six deputies belonging to the Republican People's Party and two belonging to the Democratic (Opposition) Party. Among them are the veteran journalist Yalçin, two former Cabinet Ministers and Professor Fuat Köprülü, a shining light of the Democratic Party.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

In the debate in the Chamber of Deputies on 12th May, reported last week, Nokrashy Pasha appears to have referred only to the 1936 Treaty as impossible to denounce, and not to the 1899 Agreement, although the specific reference to the Agreement in Article 11 of the Treaty appears to make such a differentiation between the two instruments difficult. Opposition deputies criticized the vagueness of the Prime Minister's statement and the delay in presenting the Egyptian case. There is a general feeling that Egypt will not have an easy passage in the Security Council; the recent course of events in the General Assembly dealing with Palestine and the permission given to the Jewish Agency to state its case have given rise to some apprehension.

Mr. Bevin's references to Egypt in the House of Commons on the 16th May have provoked Nokrashy Pasha into issuing an official statement which was published after a meeting of the Council of Ministers on the 18th. It opens by roundly stating that the presence of British troops is an infringement of the sovereignty of a free and independent nation as well as being against the will of the people (a fact which is well-known to the British Government) and continues by repeating the demand for their withdrawal unconditioned by any treaty. In the Sudan Great Britain is accused of pursuing a policy designed to encourage separatist ideas among the Sudanese, a policy contrary to the will of the people of the Nile valley, which is that it shall be united. The fact that there are British troops in the Sudan is ascribed (with factual accuracy rather than respect for contingent circumstances) as the result of the earlier British occupation of Egypt, and their right to be there is denied. Finally, Nokrashy announces again the firm intention of the Egyptian Government to appeal to the United Nations in the expectation that "the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members, upon which the United Nations is founded, will guarantee Egypt her rights." It was officially announced later that Nokrashy Pasha himself will lead the Egyptian delegation to the Security Council.

Mr. Bevin's speech has, not unexpectedly, had a bad press in Egypt. His reference to the interest of His Majesty's Government in improving the standard of living in the Middle East is regarded by the Wafdist papers as "impertinent" because the only real British interest in the standard of living, they say, is exploiting it to British advantage. Both Wafdist and Makramite organs attack the Egyptian Government. The Kotla says that Egypt's lack of unity has made Mr. Bevin able to speak as he did, and the Wafd blame Nokrashy for failing to denounce the 1936 Treaty. We are thus once more presented with the familiar spectacle of Egyptian politicians accusing anyone but themselves for the difficulties in which they have become involved.

Abdus Salam Fahmi Goma'a has been appointed Secretary-General of the Wafd. Although the younger elements in the party are disappointed that Sarag ad Din was not chosen, the unity of the Wafd has not been affected.

There is every evidence that the Egyptian Government and the Palace are now seriously alarmed at the intensity of recent anti-foreign propaganda and violence which, they fear, may adversely affect the presentation of their case to the United Nations. The apprehension felt by Christians continues to be voiced by the Coptic press.

His Majesty's Ambassador called on the Prime Minister on the 14th May and gave him a written communication saying that His Majesty's Government will be glad to receive "an authoritative mission" to discuss the problem of the sterling balances belonging to Egypt at the end of May or the beginning of June. In reply a note verbale was received accepting the invitation and announcing that Amir Pasha, the Egyptian Ambassador in London, would lead the Delegation.

Palestine

The atmosphere of gloom which the attitude of the United States delegation at Lake Success had cast over the Yishuv was dispelled by M. Gromyko's speech on the 14th May. The Hebrew press welcomed it, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, as "a turning-point in the Soviet Union's attitude towards Zionist aspirations." Arab politicians in Palestine are now described by the correspondent of The Observer as "woeful and confused."

Minor acts of terrorism have occurred during the week but the Irgun Zvai Leumi announced on the 15th May that they are suspending their military activities and devoting themselves to "political work."

The Trade Winds, an illegal immigrant ship of about 800 tons, carrying over 1,400 Jewish passengers, was brought into Haifa by a naval escort on the 18th May.

In a leading article in the Jewish Weekly an appeal is made for unity in Jewry. The Zionist leaders are attacked for obstinately refusing to understand that the needs of the moment are to save the remnants of the shattered Jewish people and for insisting on following the "long dead" Biltmore policy. "Our religious principles are at least as inviolable as the Biltmore resolution for the Zionists." The article closes with a reference to the United Nations' discussions and says "unless unity is achieved there, unless Jewish organizations can co-operate together, the future of the Jewish people is indeed a tragic one. World orthodoxy must be prepared. It is nearly too late."

Iraq

The Prime Minister, Salih Jabr, made a statement in the Senate on treaty revision on the 27th April, in which he said that his Government would consult the nationalist elements, whose views on this subject were considered to be in disagreement, but that such consultations would not be binding nor be allowed to hamper the progress of the negotiations, for which the Government would take full responsibility. It appears that the Prime Minister has no intention of rushing matters, but he has indicated that he will not allow a repetition of the delay which characterised the Egyptian treaty negotiations.

In spite of the fact that Salih Jabr recently obtained a vote of confidence in the Senate by 95 votes to 14, his policy in general and the treaty revision proposals in particular, have come in for much criticism in the Chamber. Such criticism was only to be expected from the less moderate elements, following the commendable tone of the Foreign Minister's original announcement on the 16th April (see Summary No. 389).

Outside Parliament the opposition group is led by the Liberal Party (Hizb al Ahrar). The Iraqi-Transjordan Treaty (see Summary No. 389 under "Transjordan") has been the subject of much criticism from this group, who affect to regard it as a cunning move by British diplomacy to bind Iraq more closely to Great Britain's Middle East policy. The treaty is also criticised as offering openings to Syrian industrial and commercial enterprise at the expense of Iraq. The Senate passed the treaty on the 15th May by seventeen votes to one.

Persia

Delay on the part of the Government in sending the necessary credits for the economic reconstruction of Azerbaijan has been causing considerable anxiety to Ali Mansur, the Governor-General of that province. The large number of unemployed in Tabriz believed to be about 15,000, are already growing restive, and may give trouble unless they can be absorbed into the urgent public works schemes, the most important of which is the completion of the railway from Tehran to Tabriz via Marageh (see Summary No. 385).

THE FAR EAST

Japan

Replying to the foreign affairs debate in the House on the 16th May, Mr. Bevin denied that the Government took insufficient interest in the Far East. Speaking of Japan, he endorsed the tributes paid to the work of General MacArthur. Everything might not be as we wanted it, but it was wrong to say we did not make our views known. Many questions would fall to be dealt with in the final peace settlement, when we should have full opportunity to make our opinions known and to submit our proposals. He hoped that it might be possible to conclude an early peace treaty with Japan; the first step was to reach Allied agreement on the basis for the treaty. He had arranged to send a labour attaché to Tokyo who would report on conditions in the textile industry in Japan. An important law enforcing fair wage standards, which was applicable to the textile industry, had been enacted in Japan. This would certainly have an effect, but the Lancashire and Yorkshire textile trades could not be saved by imposing restrictions on other countries. Interposing, Mr. Eden said that what the Opposition had in mind was the very different conditions of hours and labour. Mr. Bevin replied that running through the debate there was an element of fear that Lancashire could not stand up to it, whatever the conditions were. The Government had placed facilities at the disposal of that trade, and it was up to the flexibility, energy and vigour of the workpeople and managements to respond.

Reports have been circulating in the United States that General MacArthur meant to retire. Replying to a correspondent, the Supreme Commander stated that (a) he did not contemplate early retirement; (b) he believed he should remain until peace negotiations were completed; (c) he did not think transfer of responsibility to a civilian agency was feasible before the Peace Conference.

The U.S. Under-Secretary of State's speech at Cleveland (see Summary No. 392 under "United States"), in which he stressed the urgent necessity of reconstructing the two great workshops, Germany and Japan, on which the ultimate recovery of the two continents of Europe and Asia depended, seems to indicate that American opinion is gradually coming to the view that direct aid to the war-ravaged countries of Asia alone will be inadequate and that in the long run it will pay to allow Japan to build up her export capacity to a level higher than the minimum level of industry necessary for a viable economy. Under the Potsdam Declaration Japan was to be allowed to maintain such industries as would sustain her economy and permit the exaction of just reparations in kind but not those which would enable her to rearm for war. This has generally been assumed to mean that Japan would be allowed to pay her way and no more.

Japan's future level of industry has proved a baffling question in the Far Eastern Commission for some time. Minimum levels have been fixed for various war-supporting industries, but the nearest approach to a general decision is contained in the policy statement of 21st January, 1947, in which it is laid down that the peaceful needs of the Japanese people should be defined as being substantially the standard of living prevailing during the period of 1930–34. The United States for a long time displayed hesitancy in dealing with the actual level of industry but have now come forward with a plan which, in the main, is very much in line with the proposals advocated by H.M.G. over a year ago. China has argued that, even at the sacrifice of Japan's own needs, rehabilitation of her victims should come first. Russia wishes, for security reasons, to scrape Japan down to the bone. (Moscow Radio also states that Russia will demand reparations from current production.)

The task of forming the new Japanese Government is proving difficult. As an opening gambit, the strongest Party—the Social-Democrats—took its stand on General MacArthur's request for integrated economic and financial controls which, it claimed, could best be met by the gradual nationalisation of essential industries, strengthening of the Economic Stabilisation Board, thoroughgoing measures to cope with inflation, heavy taxation of nouveaux riches, co-ordinated control of wages and prices, improvement of the rationing system, suppression of the blackmarket and drastic measures to obtain delivery of rice from the farmers. Neither the Liberals nor the Democrats could agree to this programme as it stands without sacrifice of their avowed principles, and it is obvious, therefore, that considerable compromise is necessary. On the other hand a repudiation by the left-wing of the Social-Democrat Party of any possible co-operation with the Communist Party may be taken as a tentative move rightward.

Secretaries of the Social Democrat, Liberal, Democrat and People's Co-operative Parties met on the 12th May and agreed provisionally on a 5–5–5–1 allocation of seats. They postponed, however, a discussion of either the programme or the premiership of the proposed coalition Government.

Korea

At long last the Joint U.S.-Soviet Commission is to be re-convened. It has been adjourned since the 8th May, 1946, during which time political and economic conditions in Korea have been going from bad to worse. M. Molotov's letter of the 19th April (see Summary No. 390 under "Soviet Union"), while consisting mainly of an attack on the United States, offered one ray of hope in that it proposed that the Commission should resume its work on the 20th May.

The basis on which the question of consultation with Korean parties and organisations has been agreed is General Hodge's letter of 24th December, 1946, to General Christyakov which in turn refers back to Communiqué No. 5 issued by the Joint Commission during its discussions in 1946. The agreement published in this Communiqué did not require support of trusteeship, but merely that parties and organisations to be consulted should "co-operate with the Commission in the working out of proposals concerning measures regarding trusteeship." In other words, parties and organisations would be free to express themselves against a possible trusteeship when the Commission undertook the working out of recommendations on the matter. This was made a matter of record by the American Delegation when the agreement was reached, and the American Commander publicly stated that, no matter what form trusteeship might or might not take, Southern Koreans were free to speak their minds on the subject. The only reservation was that they should not actively foment anti-trusteeship opinion. It remains to be seen whether the Soviet interpretation of Communiqué No. 5 will agree with the United States interpretation quoted above —which was published in a press release from General Hodge's Headquarters in Korea.

The Farmer's Weekly, an official paper published by the Department of Public Information in the U.S. Military Government reports that Dr. Philip Jaisohn (Saw Chai Pil), an exile in the United States since 1919 and now a U.S. citizen, has been invited by the Korean Interim Legislative Assembly, to return in order to accept a high position in the government. Jaisohn is 80 years of age and in his youth became known as an ardent advocate of democracy. Forced to leave the country, he returned to Korea in 1896 to act as advisor to Emperor Kwang Mu. Since then he has spent most of his life in the United States, where he has done much to publicize Korea's sufferings under the Japanese. He is known as one of Korea's elder statesmen and it appears to be the view of the U.S. Military Government that as an unofficial advisor he may be able to restrain the hotheads whose slogan of immediate, complete independence has been a source of embarrassment to the American authorities. It remains, however, to be seen whether the Koreans themselves will be prepared to listen to one who has been so long out of the country and has in addition adopted U.S. citizenship.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

On the 15th May the Senate and the House of Representatives in Washington gave their final approval to a compromise Greco-Turkish Aid Bill which had been agreed upon by a joint Conference Committee two days previously. This incorporates the preamble and the amendment introduced by Senator Vandenberg to bring the Truman programme into line with the broader aims and policies to which the United States stands committed under the U.N. Charter. It includes the two House amendments authorizing the President to terminate all financial assistance to Greece and Turkey if he finds that those countries are not observing the conditions imposed or if for any other reason Congress decides by concurrent resolution that such assistance ought to be terminated. In its present form the Bill also stipulates that the heads of the Greek and Turkish missions shall be appointed "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" and that "no civilian personnel shall be assigned to Greece or Turkey . . . until such personnel has been investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." Beyond the suggestions thrown out by Mr. Will Clayton during the Committee hearings (see Summary, No. 387), the State Department has apparently still to devise a detailed plan for carrying out the provisions of the Bill. A mixed military, naval and economic mission to consider the most advantageous way of using the 100 million dollars to be set aside for Turkey is at present on its way to that country. (See also under "Turkey.")

Another joint Conference Committee of Congress succeeded on the 16th May in ironing out the differences between the Senate and House of Representatives texts of the general Foreign Relief Bills. It agreed, inter alia, to recommend the restoration of the 150 million dollar cut which the House had at the end of last month endeavoured to impose in the post-UNRRA relief funds for the war-stricken countries. When a similar reduction was proposed in the Senate on the 14th May it was rejected by 64 votes to 19. On the same day the Senate approved the full programme of 350 million dollars by 79 votes to 4. This compares very favourably with the Senate vote of 47 to 14 on the original UNRRA Participation Bill in February 1944. Nevertheless, there are supporters of the present programme who, like Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., feel that American foreign relief should not be used to reconstruct "the same old European crazy quilt," but should be applied to promoting economic unity in Western Europe. The latest German food crisis has helped to foster this feeling..

Considerable satisfaction has been expressed by newspaper and radio commentators at the acceptance by M. Molotov of the proposals recently put forward by Mr. Marshall for the U.S.–Soviet Commission to resume its activities in Korea (see also under "The Far East.") The apparent willingness of the Soviet Government to abandon their hitherto intransigent stand on this matter is seen to offer proof that the United States can always make the Moscow authorities more amenable to reason by threatening to "go to it alone" in areas of common interest. The hope is expressed that the Soviet Union will now join the United States in good faith to help a united Korea to gain "political freedom and economic health."

The agreement to appoint a special commission of 11 "neutral" nations to report on Palestine in time for the next General Assembly of the United Nations has been welcomed as another heartening change from Big Power deadlock in international dealings. Although it is widely recognized elsewhere that his motives throughout the discussions have been far from altruistic, M. Gromyko's reluctance to espouse the Arab cause has brought relief in left-wing Zionist circles. On the other hand, nothing in the New York proceedings seems to have tempered the rancour of the Zionist extremists towards this country. The latest advertisement appeal of the American League for a Free Palestine declares that, every time that bombs or guns go off against the British in Palestine, "the Jews in America make a little holiday in their hearts." The appeal appears over the signature of the playwright, Ben Hecht, and openly asks for funds for the terrorists. The tone and content of this appeal have caused His Majesty's Government once more to protest to the State Department. H.M. Government point out that it is intolerable for the press of a friendly country to print such matters and maintain that the time has now come for the United States Government to stop these exhortations to violence in Palestine once and for all. In the United States itself the press and public are at last beginning to react openly against the advertisements. The New York Herald-Tribune, in which it originally appeared, has been constrained to print a batch of readers' letters condemning the Hecht manifesto, while the Christian Science Monitor has recently published a special article and an editorial, drawing attention to the pernicious effects which the advertisements are likely to have upon the conduct of foreign relations and to the divided loyalties of the American Jews associated with them.

President Truman's somewhat surprising decision to accept the "portal-to-portal" pay Bill has left the pundits in Washington guessing about what he is likely to do with the general labour bill (see last week's Summary) when this is sent to the White House for his signature. In signing the "portal-to-portal" pay Bill, which invalidates trade union claims for back pay amounting to an estimated 6,000 million dollars, the President ignored the protests of organized labour as well as the advice of his Secretary of Labour, Mr. Schwellenbach. He endeavoured, however, to soften the blow for the unions by simultaneously calling upon Congress to raise the statutory minimum wage from 40 cents to "at least 65 cents an hour" and by promising to ask Congress for "prompt remedial action," if the new law should prove detrimental to the maintenance of fair labour standards.

LATIN AMERICA

Bolivia

As anticipated, the Bolivian Government resigned during the second week in May, and Dr. Hertzog has now formed a coalition cabinet. The Portfolios of the Interior, Finance, Economy, Education and the newly-created one of Public Health remain unchanged in the hands of the President's party (Union of Republican Socialists). Those of Public Works and Labour go to the P.I.R., (Partido Izquierdo Revolucionario) and those of Defence and Agriculture to the Liberals. The new Minister for Foreign Affairs is Dr. Guachalla, the unsuccessful candidate at the Presidential election. The fact that Dr. Guachalla has accepted this appointment bears out his promise of co-operation, when the final result of the election was still in doubt.

Chile

Yet another political organisation has arisen in Chile, under the name of Acha (Acción Chilena Anti-Comunista), with no other apparent programme than that of opposing communism. This group, which was formed shortly after President González Videla came to power, has a strong flavour of secret society. Its President is Arturo Olavarria, a lawyer and former Minister of the Interior under President Aguirre Cerda. He was on the statutory list for representing Japanese firms during the war and was active in helping listed firms to avoid sanctions. Acha, which includes a number of persons well-known in political and intellectual circles, is said to have a membership of some thousands. Various rumours are current about it, one of them linking it with Haya de la Torre, another with North American money; but, notwithstanding the Nazi sympathies of many of its members, it should probably be regarded as simply another symptom of anti-Communist feeling in Chile.

Peru

While adequate legal proofs of the murder of Señor Graña by Apristas (see Summary No. 376) are lacking, this crime and other outrages are generally attributed to them by thinking non-Apristas and have engendered a state of mind, which, if not actually the cause, has undoubtedly facilitated the formation of a National Alliance by the nine principal non-Aprista parties. In a manifesto issued on the 26th March, this group called upon all patriotic Peruvians to join it. Though this move is but another example of the tension occasioned by the murder of Sr. Graña, there has been no really striking development in the internal situation other than Dr. Bustamente's broadcast speech on the 12th April. The President, who spoke for nearly an hour and a half with a frankness and decision not usually associated with his character, went so far as to say that the present state of mind in Peru is such that the country is heading for civil war. He had, he said, given the country an opportunity of ruling itself in a democratic manner, but the parties which had elected him had departed from his election programme, his Government now intended to rule more firmly and would no longer permit excesses which were undermining the fabric of the State. He added significantly that the Armed Forces would continue loyal to the Government, a declaration which was confirmed four days later by high-ranking officers of all services. With regard to labour Dr. Bustamente announced that the Government had sent to the Legislature a series of measures for the regulation of strikes. These, if they became law, would hit at the Aprista power over the workers by making strike action depend on a secret vote at a general assembly of the whole body of workers, in place of the procedure by public vote which exposed the voters to intimidation.

Apra reaction to the President's speech has been so far limited to a wordy statement by Señor Haya de la Torre, of no particular interest. On the other hand, the President's expressed determination to defend the rule of law against the totalitarian aspirations of the Apristas has been well received, and it remains to be seen whether they decide to oppose him when the Legislature meets in July. By that time Aprista popularity with the less intelligent sections of the electorate may have waned, and its leaders be more inclined to listen to the voice of reason. Were such a change to take place, Dr. Bustamente's message might well turn out to be the beginning of a new era in Peruvian affairs, rather than just one more public utterance.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Palestine

The Special Meeting of the General Assembly on Palestine concluded its work on the 15th May. It adopted the recommendations of the Political Committee governing the establishment of an Investigation Committee by 45 votes to 7 with Siam abstaining, the opposition consisting of the Arab, Turkish and Afghan delegates. An ancillary Norwegian resolution was carried nemine contradicente, the Arabs abstaining. According to it the Assembly will "call upon all Governments and peoples and especially the inhabitants of Palestine to refrain . . . . from the threat or use of force or any other action which might create an atmosphere prejudicial to an early settlement of the question of Palestine." Dr. Victor Hoo is to be head of the Secretariat of the Investigating Committee. The Committee is to begin its meetings on the 26th at Lake Success.

During the sessions of the Assembly on the 14th and the 15th May the Iraq delegate described the Palestine problem as a simple question of "aggressive invasion" by one people of the territory of another. Aggression contravened the Charter and should be stopped. M. Gromyko dealt with various aspects of the matter. It was obvious, he said, that the mandate must go. The aspirations of an important part of the Jewish people were bound up with the question of Palestine. The Jews had a right to a State of their own. So far he had not said that such a state should be in Palestine. He left the problem with the Committee. Turning to the future of Palestine, he declared that, since both the Arabs and Jews had historical roots and present interests in the country, the ideal solution would be a single, bi-national State with equal rights for Jews and Arabs, and he suggested that Russia's method of dealing with peoples of different culture and language might be copied. Failing such a bi-National State, partition should be considered.

Syria's representative, Mr. El Khouri, replied to M. Gromyko in an impressive speech. He described the history of the Children of Israel's transitory connection with Palestine, and denied their historical right to the country. The descendants of the Hebrews were, he said, now in Arabia. The "Jewish" immigrants entering Palestine from Eastern Europe were not Hebrews, but people of Mongol stock coming originally from S.E. Russia. Sultan Abdul Hamid had refused to give the founder of Zionism any land in Palestine, on the ground that the land was not his but belonged to the people of Palestine. Were the United Nations, he asked, to be less just?

The facts, described in last week's Summary, which led up to the Assembly's decision to set up an Investigating Committee of eleven members, need fuller treatment. Originally it had been agreed that the U.K. representative should support a U.S. proposal for a Committee of Seven, representing the smaller States. It was a well-balanced company, capable of reaching objective conclusions. Australia's delegate then proposed that the Committee should number 11, and the Australian motion was taken before the U.S. Sir Alexander voted against it, having promised his vote for the American proposal. To his astonishment, the U.S. representative, Mr. Warren Austin, voted for the Australian text. It was carried by 13 votes to 11, with 29 abstentions. Four extra members of the Committee were therefore needed. At Chile's instance Yugoslavia and Guatemala were chosen, and it was decided to pick one member of an Asiatic and one of a Pacific country. India was elected for Asia by 34 votes to 7, and Australia for the Pacific by 21 votes to the Philippine Republic's 20.

Specialised Agencies

On the 14th May the Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organisation resolved to carry out the recommendation of the United Nations General Assembly that the Franco Government of Spain be debarred from membership in Specialised Agencies established by or brought into relationship with the United Nations. It therefore approved a new rule, Article 93 B, to the effect that a State coming within the recommendation of the Assembly "should automatically cease to be a member of the Civil Aviation Organisation." Twenty-seven States supported the new rule, Eire, Portugal and Switzerland voted against it, and Argentine and S. Africa abstained. Previously the member States had given unanimous approval to the draft relationship agreement with the United Nations. Similar difficulties over the political qualifications that members must possess if they are to remain members of a Specialised Agency have arisen with regard to the Universal Postal Union, to which Spain at present belongs. Another member is Japan, who, in the view of His Majesty's Government, should not, as one of the two major ex-enemies, exercise its rights of membership, though His Majesty's Government would not object to a Japanese "observer." It was decided, on political grounds, not to invite Spain to take part in the Conference on Radio Aids to Navigation.

The text of the new Anglo-U.S. Economic Agreement for their two zones, briefly reported in the last issue of this Summary, was published on the 3rd June. An Economic Council of about 54 members, selected by the provincial parliaments in proportion to the strength of the political parties, will direct the economic reconstruction of the two zones and will issue ordinances for this purpose. There will also be a full-time Executive Committee consisting of one representative from each Land appointed by the respective Governments, and its job will be both to advise the Council and to supervise and co-ordinate the execution of its orders. When this Council and Committee are established, probably by July, the present Economic Executive Committee consisting of the Ministers of Economics of the Laender will cease to exist. The bi-zonal Food, Finance and Agricultural Departments, &c., will be headed by Executive Directors working under the supervision of the Executive Committee but generally responsible to the Economic Council. The Executive Committee will nominate the directors, but they will be appointed and dismissed by the Economic Council which will also define their functions. The Agreement lays down that the maximum use will be made of provincial governments to carry out orders in accordance with the general policy of decentralisation, but the Council, the Committee and the Directors may issue administrative regulations if necessary. Ordinances are binding on the Laender "and must be promptly executed."

This agreement goes far towards establishing a strong "central" economic control and, if worked as intended, gives the bi-zonal authorities power to see that their decisions are no longer obstructed by the Laender. The Council and Committee are both appointed by the Laender, so that federal rights are maintained, but whereas each Land has equal representation in the Executive Committee, members of the Council are appointed on the basis of one member to about 750,000 inhabitants so that large States like Bavaria and North Rhine/Westphalia have greater power. The text of the new Anglo-U.S. Economic Agreement for their two zones, briefly reported in the last issue of this Summary, was published on the 3rd June. An Economic Council of about 54 members, selected by the provincial parliaments in proportion to the strength of the political parties, will direct the economic reconstruction of the two zones and will issue ordinances for this purpose. There will also be a full-time Executive Committee consisting of one representative from each Land appointed by the respective Governments, and its job will be both to advise the Council and to supervise and co-ordinate the execution of its orders. When this Council and Committee are established, probably by July, the present Economic Executive Committee consisting of the Ministers of Economics of the Laender will cease to exist. The bi-zonal Food, Finance and Agricultural Departments, &c., will be headed by Executive Directors working under the supervision of the Executive Committee but generally responsible to the Economic Council. The Executive Committee will nominate the directors, but they will be appointed and dismissed by the Economic Council which will also define their functions. The Agreement lays down that the maximum use will be made of provincial governments to carry out orders in accordance with the general policy of decentralisation, but the Council, the Committee and the Directors may issue administrative regulations if necessary. Ordinances are binding on the Laender "and must be promptly executed."

This agreement goes far towards establishing a strong "central" economic control and, if worked as intended, gives the bi-zonal authorities power to see that their decisions are no longer obstructed by the Laender. The Council and Committee are both appointed by the Laender, so that federal rights are maintained, but whereas each Land has equal representation in the Executive Committee, members of the Council are appointed on the basis of one member to about 750,000 inhabitants so that large States like Bavaria and North Rhine/Westphalia have greater power. from the Laender, who happened all to be Social Democrats; but the new Economic Council will provide representation for the views of all major political parties. Its members will not be allowed to retain positions in provincial parliaments and so will give full attention to bi-zonal duties. The Executive directors of each Department will be directing the operation of their Departments and will be able to take quick decisions in an emergency. In the past these agencies were operated by the more clumsy device of Committees of the Provincial Ministers for the different subjects. Decisions of the Economic Council are still to be subject to Anglo–U.S. approval but within this limit the Council has wide economic powers. It may issue ordinances concerning such matters as the production, allocation and distribution of food, goods, raw material and electric power, and concerning trade, price control and public finance.

The news has been received with disquiet in French circles and with open abuse from Soviet-controlled sources. German reactions are cautious, although the Agreement is generally considered to be a step forward particularly by the Social Democrats. On the other hand, the Democrat Premier of Wuerttemberg Baden undoubtedly expressed the views of many Germans when he stressed that economic unity was inseparable from political unity and that, in his view, bi-zonal control would only become effective in the event of the failure of the London Conference in November. This is an unfortunate testimony to a growing feeling among some Germans that a failure at the Conference might be preferable to indecisive discussions since they believe that this will force the Western Allies to take definite steps to set up a West-German political State and give the Germans added economic opportunities. But for the many whose heart is still set on final unity such prospects are not welcomed. A spokesman of the Christian Democrats remarked of the Agreement that it might have unfavourable consequences for the future unity of Germany—although the Western Powers were justified in their action.

Bavaria looks on the new plan with grave misgivings and will evidently make determined efforts to cling to her rights—and her goods. The Minister for Food declared on the 30th May that "the collapse of Bavaria's food supply system" would result from a U.S. Military Government Order that Bavaria was to stop all brewing of beer and must deliver 65,000 head of cattle and large quantities of potatoes to Berlin and the British zone during June. The Wuerttemberg/Baden Minister of Agriculture has also "threatened to resign" if the bi-zonal authorities do not reverse their decision that the Land should hand over 6,000 tons of canned vegetables to Hesse and Bavaria. A U.S. Military Government official recently estimated that 20 per cent. of German food production in the West was going to the black market. Allied and German officials as well as tightening up controls and administrative organisation at various levels have still to deal with the problem of whether some more positive incentives can be offered to the farmers to make them deliver supplies. One district in Bavaria has already tried with success a system of distributing goods such as shoes to the best deliverers of farm produce. In the Soviet zone various bonuses of this type are offered to those who exceed their delivery quota, although this gesture is accompanied by heavy penalties for those who fail in their deliveries.

The drafts of Constitutions for each State in the French Zone (but not the Saar) were submitted duly to a referendum on the 18th May. 67·9 per cent. of votes in South Baden were cast in favour of the proposed draft, and 69·8 per cent. in South Wuerttemberg, the only Land where the Social Democrats supported the Constitution. In Rhineland–Palatinate only 53 per cent. of the electorate voted for the Constitution, while it was rejected entirely in the areas of Rhine–Hesse and Palatinate, where the Social Democrats are in a majority. This half-hearted endorsement is hardly a favourable omen for the future. Although the Constitutions are moderately democratic in concept they depend for their success on whether parliament and people are sufficiently determined to make them work. The Christian Democrats again emerge as the strongest party in this zone, with 50 per cent. of all valid votes, but they have lost absolute control of the largest Land—Rhineland–Palatinate. In all three Laender, as in the British zone, they have lost votes both to the Social Democrats and to the Liberals, who split the right-wing vote. This is a consequence partly of grave economic conditions and partly of the vulnerability of a party without a firm programme. The Communists have made no real headway. The election campaign apparently concentrated on constitutional and internal problems rather than on those major questions of German unity, the frontiers or the food situation which characterised the campaign in the British zone. Added details about the Rhineland–Palatinate and South Wuerttemberg Constitutions show that, as in South Baden, the way is left open to socialisation, and in South Wuerttemberg monopolies are specifically forbidden while the workers have the right to share in the running of the respective undertakings. Despite French efforts to shut out Socialist Unity Party propagandists, the drive for this party got under way during the election campaign. A licence has already been applied for by the KPD of Rhineland–Palatinate and the Saar, but there is no sign of any genuine "fusion" supported by Social Democrats.

The combined Anglo-U.S. area of Germany and France have held a three-day conference in Paris on trade between the two countries and the three zones. It was announced on the 24th May that both delegations expressed their determination to establish the maximum trade between France and Germany by all possible means including the admission of French business men into the combined area. Lists of commodities in which trade between France and the combined zones is possible have been exchanged, but the conclusions of discussions on trade between the three zones are not yet available. In this connection there is considerable disagreement over the question of payment in dollars for goods from the combined zones. A Payments Agreement relating to mutual trade between the Anglo-U.S. area and France has been concluded.

AUSTRIA

Though the Austrian Peace Treaty Commission in Vienna has now been sitting for three weeks, it has not yet got down to its work of examining the unagreed clauses of the Austrian Treaty. Except for one fleeting moment the thirteen meetings held so far could be summarised in one sentence: "Mr. Novikov said 'No'." The Soviet Delegation, against firm opposition from the other delegations, has insisted (a) that the work of the Committee of Experts should be strictly limited and supervised by the Commission; (b) that the Commission should discuss Articles 35 and 42 (German assets and United Nations' property) before the Committee has established "concrete facts"; and (c) that the Committee of Experts should first discuss the oil problem and only afterwards pass on to other important subjects, such as the Danube Steam Shipping Company and financial institutions. Various attempts by the U.K. and U.S. delegations to reach a compromise on the terms of reference of the Committee have met with no success. A glimmer of hope that the Soviet delegation might be willing to relent a little emerged on the 29th May, when M. Novikov for the first time withdrew his insistence on the discussion of oil alone. This hope was, however, dissipated at the next meeting when the Soviet representative not only failed to produce the new proposals which he had promised, but once more strongly criticised the U.K. and U.S. proposals. Sir George Rendel's report of this meeting—at which he appeared for the first time as the U.K. representative—indicated that the Commission was back where it was three weeks ago. He had gained the impression that M. Novikov had received fresh instructions to stand firm against the establishment of a fact-finding body which might produce evidence likely to prove embarrassing to the Soviet authorities in connection with the assets that they had seized in their zone. In order to get the Commission to work the U.K. representative now proposes to sound the U.S. and French representatives with regard to the possibility of setting up a tripartite Anglo-U.S.-French committee of experts to study the "facts" relating to the German assets. (It would be still open to the Russians to come into the committee if they wanted to.) In Sir George Rendel's view, discussion on Articles 35 and 42 might be resumed after the "facts" had thus been established; meanwhile, the Commission should continue to examine the disputed points in the Treaty.

The Austrian authorities have set up a committee of eleven economic experts to be available for consultation by the Commission. Five of these experts have been nominated by the People's Party, five by the Socialists, and one by the Communists. The past week's deliberations of the Commission have evoked little press comment, but it is hardly to be doubted that Austrians, already pessimistic after the Commission's first two days of inactivity, are more than depressed at the interminable succession of wrangles over procedure alone. Comment relating to the future work of the Commission has naturally centred on the problem of the German assets, the suggestion being that, while compensation should be paid to claimant states, Austria should remain in full possession of her property and have the full right of disposal over all her means of production. The Socialist Party staged a large demonstration in Vienna on the 21st May to impress on the Peace Commission Austria's right to an independent existence.

An Austrian Trade Union delegation called on the Allied Council on the 22nd May to discuss the measures indispensable for the restoration of a healthy economic life in Austria. Points included in their memorandum covered the abolition of zonal boundaries and of censorship, the return of the broadcasting stations to Austria, food and raw material supplies, the placing of all Austrian industrial and agricultural products at the disposal of the Austrian economy, currency reform, the stabilisation of wages and prices, the return of Austrian prisoners-of-war, and the removal of the displaced persons.

Public discontent at the delay in the repatriation of the Austrian prisoners has been increasing steadily in recent weeks, and during May large demonstrations were held by Viennese women. According to a statement made by the Minister of the Interior on the 21st May, 823,000 Austrians have so far been repatriated, including 112,600 from the U.S.S.R. The Austrians estimate that some 114,000 Austrians are still held by the Soviet Union, though the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs maintains that, apart from members of the S.S. and police troops, only a few thousand remain in the U.S.S.R. The Minister of the Interior denied that the Soviet Government was making the repatriation of the prisoners dependent on changes in the Austrian Government. Steps were being taken to speed up the release of prisoners from Yugoslavia; no reliable information was available on the number held in that country, and the Yugoslav Government were not prepared to release prisoners generally until after the conclusion of the Treaty. So far only disabled or politically indoctrinated prisoners had been repatriated, though a start had now been made on the return of Carinthians.

Chancellor Figl has promised a general regulation of wages and prices in the near future. This problem is closely related to that of currency reform, the possible effects of any such reform have been causing great anxiety in Austria for some time. At a big public meeting on the 20th May the Chancellor stated that the methods used by the Government to save Austria from inflation were now no longer adequate, and it was for the Government now to decide whether it was going to reduce the amount of currency in circulation or to allow prices to rise.

The Minister of Food announced on the 20th May that consignments of cattle for Vienna were now arriving from the provinces in satisfactory quantities, though there was a deficit on deliveries from Styria. The Viennese Socialist press has accused the provinces—particularly Lower Austria and Styria—of conducting a "veritable hunger campaign" against the capital. The cattle-slaughtering policy of the Allies has once more been attacked, this time by the Minister of Agriculture, who has described the meat delivery quotas as indefensible and impossible.

The escape of another prominent Nazi, Otto Hartmann, from police custody has revived the stir made in the Austrian press in April over the escape of Richter. Hartmann, who has since been recaptured, was awaiting trial on charges of betraying members of the resistance movement to the Gestapo. The Vienna Police President vouchsafed a feeble excuse that the supervision of internees doing outside work was not among the tasks of the Vienna police. He did not, however, state where the responsibility lay. Hartmann was working in the Natural History Museum at the time of his escape, in spite of the fact that, after the Richter episode, it was decreed that leading Nazis would no longer be employed on outside work. The escape from Dachau of Dr. Uberreither, the former Gauleiter of Styria, has also produced a flurry in the Styrian press and has provided the Communist Wahrheit with the occasion for an attack on the British authorities.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

With the already insecure political situation in Slovakia rendered even more uncertain by the difficulties encountered in the drawing-up of the new Constitution, by the dissatisfaction openly expressed in many quarters at the inconsistency of the verdict pronounced against Dr. Tiso as compared with that against Sano Mach, and by the spate of hostile propaganda now being poured out by the Slovak Action Committee from the United States, a tenser atmosphere has recently permeated Czech-Slovak relationships. With about a year to pass before the next general election is due to take place, the gloves are now off with a vengeance in the struggle for political supremacy between the Communists and the Slovak Democrats.

Unrest in Slovakia is reported to be on the increase; the numerous Catholic religious processions, though seemingly innocuous, are alleged to be nothing more than a very flimsy disguise for the spreading of subversive political propaganda. The Marxists, by way of counter-attack, overlook no opportunity for vilifying their most powerful antagonists in this province: in Parliament, Communist deputies are intensifying their assault upon the right-wing element of the Slovak Democrats, whilst Rude Pravo, the official Communist organ, has lately inaugurated a new campaign accusing the Democrats and their party press of attempting to organise new anti-State movements.

Yet another factor which has made the general situation even more acute of late has been the decision of the Praesidium of the Slovak National Council to remove from office Dr. Daxner, the Communist President of the tribunal which passed judgment upon MM. Tiso, Durcansky, and Mach. While M. Gottwald, the Prime Minister, has recognised that such action is within their rights, the Government in Prague are still debating whether this decision is compatible with the constitutional independence of a judge, and have in the meantime requested the Slovak authorities not to implement their decision. Dr. Daxner's dismissal without any objection being raised would of course be tantamount to a tacit admission of the superior status of the Slovak Democrat Party—and this a Communist central Government could not easily digest. The approaching conference of the National Front of Czechs and Slovaks is likely to be stormy.

Reviewing the problems which still confront the Republic, President Benes in a speech at Karlovy Vary would appear to have glossed over the obstacles lying in the way of closer Czech and Slovak co-operation; the main emphasis of his speech was laid upon the problem of establishing peaceful relations with Germany. He did, however, express his conviction that government by National Front would continue even after the next elections: this prognostication cannot be palatable to the Slovak Democrats who would prefer to see a Government from which Marxist influence would be entirely excluded.

Whatever squabbles may be clouding the internal political scene, the statesmanlike words of welcome uttered by M. Erben, the Secretary-General of U.R.O. (the Central Council of the Communist-dominated Czechoslovak Trade Unions), to the Executive Committee of the World Federation of Trade Unions, now meeting at Prague, will be echoed by the bulk of Czechs and Slovaks. M. Erben attributed the liberation of Czechoslovakia, not to one Great Power alone, but to the joint efforts of all the Allies. This emphasis on international solidarity is becoming increasingly noticeable in Czechoslovak Government pronouncements. The Czech Communist Party is not slow to exploit opportunities of appearing before the public as the party of national unity, as also of leadership in international affairs—pointing with some justification to the agreements with Poland and Hungary as examples of the value of co-operation with other, formerly unfriendly, countries where the Left is now in power. (See also under "Hungary.") The "opposition" parties will need all their resources and determination when the time comes to convince the electorate that their part in Czechoslovak life is of like, or even greater, value to the community.

POLAND

Ever since the inclusion of the political agreement between the Socialists and Communists in November 1946, it has always been an important question whether the Socialists would succeed in preserving their independence, or would simply be absorbed by the Communists on the pretext of "working class unity." A speech made at Krakow on the 11th May by M. Osubka-Morawski, Socialist Minister of Public Administration, and Prime Minister prior to the elections, may prove of significance in this connection. He described the question of a "united front" as the most important in Polish internal affairs at the present time. Immediate amalgamation of the Socialist and Communist Parties, he said, would mean a new break-up of the Polish Socialist Party. But, nevertheless, this must be a long-term aim. As a first step, inter-party suspicions must be dissipated. Anyone who joined the Socialist Party with the object of opposing the Communists would have no success. Throughout his speech, M. Osubka-Morawski emphasized that the Socialist Party is stronger in Poland than in certain other countries because it is united. The party's compass, he concluded, must be a united, democratic, and disciplined Socialist Party, a united front, and an alliance of workers and peasants.

Such aspirations are sometimes contradicted by facts. According to reports from Lodz, the Socialist-Communist alliance there is breaking up, the Socialists, as usual, demanding a greater share in public administration, particularly in the militia and security police, than they have at present. Economic problems are also of relevance. The expected shortage of bread grain developed suddenly about two weeks ago, when the price of bread rose in some towns by as much as 300 per cent. The Communist Minister of Industry, M. Minc, has blamed the racketeering of the " bourgeois " and the kulaks (although he did not use those actual terms), and the Socialist press has replied sharply with charges of administrative mismanagement, Communist experiment, and neglect of the co-operative system of collection and distribution.

In the sphere of foreign affairs propaganda against the United States continues unabated. American " economic imperialism " is singled out for special attack, and was mentioned by M. Osubka-Morawski in his speech at Krakow. From Lodz there are reports that the public has noted with approval what it considers as an adoption by the United States of the Russian technique of political warfare.

At the Margate Conference of the Labour Party, Mr. Bevin gave certain figures about the repatriation of Poles. In just over a year 73,000 Poles had returned to Poland from the United Kingdom, leaving 114,000 behind. Of the latter, 15,000 were awaiting repatriation. There were also 35,000 Polish civilians in the United Kingdom. Of the Poles abroad under United Kingdom command, mostly in Germany, there remained 17,000 servicemen, of whom 5,000 were awaiting repatriation. In one year the total figure of about 240,000 Poles, for whom solutions had to be found, had been reduced to just over 100,000. The Poles, moreover, were showing a desire to return to Poland, and would be encouraged to do so.

SOVIET UNION

The continued press campaign against United States capitalism and aggressive expansion has overshadowed criticism of Britain and every other theme of international importance. Two important articles in Pravda and Izvestiya accused the British and United States Governments of delaying a reduction in armaments and distorting the Soviet proposal on disarmament in order to cover up the unrestrained armaments race in which they were indulging. Attacks on British foreign policy took an indirect form, but from the opening day the Labour Party Conference at Margate came under fire, special attention being given to the ban on joining the Anglo-Soviet Friendship Society, to the protests against conscription, to the Labour Party Headquarters pamphlet on foreign policy and other such " anti-Soviet " aspects of the Executive Committee's activities. Britain's economic difficulties were also stressed. Pravda's review of the Conference maintained that it reflected the " growing alarm " of the British working class at Britain's economic situation and the Labour Government's foreign policy. The rejection by a majority of the Conference of the more important resolutions condemning Labour foreign policy and the " formal approval " for Mr. Bevin's policy said Pravda did not conceal the " profound differences of opinion " between the mass of the workers and the Party Leadership. A Krasnaya Zvezda travelogue on India served to remind the reader of the tenaciousness of British imperialism there. The first review of the situation in Egypt for some weeks—by Dazin in Moscow Evening News—accused Britain of attempting to retain her exclusive position in that country and to block the Egyptian appeal to the United Nations. A second report of Jewish gratitude for Gromyko's proposals on Palestine underlined the traditional Soviet friendship for all oppressed peoples and emphasised that the Jews could claim Soviet support for their rights to their historic motherland.

In the Far East, an outstanding feature in Soviet publicity was the Trud interview with Tarasov, Soviet member of the recent W.F.T.U. Delegation to Japan and Korea; apart from his complaints against American obstructionism, Tarasov condemned the bad labour conditions in Japanese industry and called for a united trade union programme against American diversionary tactics through the Japanese and Korean Federations of Labour. American monopolisation of industries in Southern Korea was unfavourably contrasted with the glorious achievements of the trade unions in Soviet-occupied Northern Korea.

The twenty-ninth anniversary of the independence of Afghanistan was marked by an article from the pen of Professor Reisner of Moscow University, author of a recent history of the country, emphasising the friendly feeling for " the freedom-loving Afghan people always entertained by the Soviet people." The support given to Afghanistan in 1919 in its struggle for independence against British imperialism by the young Soviet Republic was recalled in terms uncomplimentary to this country. In fact, at this time the Bolsheviks were too preoccupied with their own Civil War and their difficulties to grant more than verbal support to Amanullah. Professor Reisner concluded with a peroration expressing the hope that " despite the machinations of certain foreign circles Soviet-Afghan friendship will develop and gain strength for the benefit of both parties."

On the invitation of the British Iron and Steel Workers' Union, a Soviet Metal Workers' Trade Union delegation has arrived in London, headed by Evstratov, Chairman of the Central Trade Union Committee of Ferrous Metallurgy of Central U.S.S.R. A group of British metal workers went to the U.S.S.R. in 1945, and this is by way of a return visit.

The Soviet press campaign on the subject of displaced persons continues to develop; it is being intensified at the moment, in connection with the measures now being taken to provide the D.P.s with work and facilities for emigration. The accusations of forcibly preventing Soviet citizens from returning home have been directed primarily against the British, but the French have also now incurred Moscow's displeasure on the same ground. The British were said to be bringing " organised influence to bear on people placed in a hopeless situation," in fact the mission in question is a Brazilian Mission. " The tender-hearted ladies of the male sex both in and out of uniform " who have protested against the passing of the death sentence on Kesselring, in particular Randolph Churchill and General Leese, are the latest butts for Soviet sarcasm. A commentary in Trud linked the protests over Kesselring with Mr. Churchill's speech at the " United Europe " meeting at the Albert Hall " calling on the Germans to make possible the formation of his Western bloc."

Rather more publicity has been given of late to Orthodox Church activities. The recent session of the Holy Synod under the Patriarch was reported, as well as the memorial service held on the third anniversary of the death of Patriarch Sergei. Tass also announced that a new book entitled " Patriarch Sergei and his spiritual legacy " had just been published. Further, the Council for the Affairs of the Russian Orthodox Church has, it is alleged, allowed 62 new churches to be handed over to the religious authorities, and the Annunciation Cathedral in Leningrad where Suvorov is buried is being restored. According to Karpov, President of the Council, there are now 22,000 parish churches in use throughout the U.S.S.R.; it is of interest that the greatest concentration of these appears to be in the Ukraine.

The Orthodox Church calendar for the year 1947 gives a total for the Russian Church of six Metropolitans and 62 bishops, though Karpov, in the statement quoted above, had put their number at 75. Judging by their photographs, one or two of these hierarchs must be newcomers to the sacerdotal life as they seem to have had no time to grow the necessary beards. The Calendar is of interest for the details of sacramental and liturgical instructions that it gives, but, of course, there is no means of knowing how many of the faithful are able to profit by these.

The experienced negotiator, Patriarch Alexei, accompanied by Grigori of Leningrad, has just left for Roumania. Officially, this is merely a return visit for Patriarch Nicodim's to Moscow, but it may be connected with the rumours of a crisis in the Roumanian Church.

The Soviet press of the 27th May published a decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. abolishing the death sentence in Soviet law in peace time and replacing it by 25 years' imprisonment in corrective labour camps. The decree explains this change by reference to the increasing might of the Soviet State, to the exceptional loyalty of the whole population of the Soviet Union to the Soviet land and the Soviet Government and to the fact that the international situation since the defeat of Germany and Japan has shown that " it is possible to regard the cause of peace as being ensured for a prolonged period in spite of efforts by aggressive elements to provoke war." The decree also says that in making the change the Presidium has taken note of the wishes of trade unions and other authoritative organisations representative of public opinion. In a leading article in Pravda (the 27th May) M. Vyshinsky referred to this decree as " an historic act " and pointed out that capital punishment was only introduced as an exceptional penalty in the Soviet Union " outside the general penal system," whereas the overwhelming majority of other countries, including the U.S.A. and Great Britain, always regarded it as a normal penal measure."

A State Inspection Body for assessing harvest yields has been created and attached to the U.S.S.R. State Planning Commission. In an interview with a Tass correspondent the Chief State Inspector, B. V. Savelyev, (formerly Deputy Minister of Agriculture of the U.S.S.R.), stated that " the necessity for creating such an organisation, already noted in the decisions of the February session of the Central Party Committee, is to be explained by the great political and economic significance of data on harvest yields and sowing areas of agricultural crops. We must have correct data, free of distortions and mistakes, he emphasised. " The task of assessing

The solution of the Finnish Government crisis whereby M. Pekkala's administration re-assumed office (see Summary No. 393) after prolonged negotiations illustrates more clearly than anything else the position which Finland occupies in the constellation of satellites in post-war Europe. Those who may have nursed the conception of a comparatively free and democratic republic on the north-western border of the Soviet Union must have received a rude shock. The undeniable facts are that the Government was overthrown by the majority of the Diet, only to be reinstated some weeks later as the result of external pressure. In such circumstances declarations by political parties that they consider M. Pekkala's Government to have a parliamentary basis do not amount to very much and can be ignored. What may have induced the Agrarian and Social Democratic parties, the groups primarily responsible for the resignation of the Cabinet, to concur in its continuance in office is naturally difficult to determine, but it seems likely that an alleged attentat against the Soviet Legation in Helsinki may have been used as a means of applying pressure. The incident itself appears to have been insignificant and only amounted to an outbreak of fire in one room of the Legation building which was quickly extinguished by the staff without the assistance of the fire brigade. What is of interest, however, is that the Russians did not inform the Finnish police until several hours later, and then the latter were refused permission to carry out an examination of the premises.

Three days after the Government crisis had been solved, if not in accordance with democratic parliamentary practice, at any rate to the satisfaction of the Russians and the Finnish Communists, it was announced in Moscow that Finland had been granted rights of transit for passenger and goods traffic through the Porkkala area. The conditions under which the Finns will be allowed to use the railway running through the area are as yet not known, and further details are awaited. The object-lesson contained in this latest Soviet concession can hardly, however, have been wasted on the Finns, as M. Enckell, the Foreign Minister, only a few days earlier had stated in confidence that since the beginning of the Government crisis, on the 11th of April, the Russians had been quite unwilling even to discuss the matter, his own opinion at that time was that the Finnish delegation which had gone to Moscow would probably have to return without concluding an agreement.

Preliminary results in the elections of delegates to the S.A.K. (T.U.C.) congress, due to commence on the 15th June, show considerable gains for the Social Democrats with corresponding losses for the Communists. The latter are in consequence already complaining of irregularities alleged to have taken place during the ballot and the counting of the votes.

On the 24th May the death of M. Väinö Voionmaa, Chairman of the Diet Foreign Affairs Committee, was announced in Helsinki. For many years a leading member of the Social Democratic Party M. Voionmaa was regarded as one of Finland's foremost experts in the field of foreign affairs, and had participated in all peace negotiations conducted by Finland during her period of independence.

Denmark

Towards the end of May Copenhagen witnessed an outbreak of spasmodic strikes and demonstrations in protest against the wretched food supply situation in the capital. Shortages of fish and potatoes are said to have been particularly acute, and Socialists and Communists severely criticised the Government for the position which had arisen. The Federation of Trade Unions also addressed a communication to the Minister of Supply in which it was claimed that the crisis could easily have been avoided, had the Government only stopped exports of potatoes at Easter when the position began to show signs of danger.

In reply to a Communist motion in the Folketing the Prime Minister, M. K. Kristensen, said that the Danish Government had already taken the first steps towards terminating the Danish-American Greenland Treaty of the 9th of April, 1941. The Treaty which provided for the defence of Greenland by United States forces was concluded in Washington by the Danish Minister on his own initiative but later unanimously ratified in 1945 by the Danish Government. The Danes are now, not unnaturally, anxious to rid all the territory under their sovereignty of foreign troops, and this desire is by no means confined to the Communists. It is in fact argued that if military facilities are to be accorded on Danish territory to one Great Power it will be difficult to resist demands, should they be advanced, by another. The strategically commanding position of the Danish Islands at the entrance to the Baltic is probably the main reasons for Danish sensitiveness on this point.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

Dr. Beel, the Dutch Prime Minister, and M. Jonkman, the Minister of Overseas Territories, returned to the Netherlands from Indonesia, "chastened and tired," on the 27th May. The surviving Commissioners-General, Professor Schermerhorn and M. van Poll, arrived next day. On reflection the two Ministers can have derived small comfort from the results of their visit; for behind them was a complete deadlock, and before them the possibility of a political crisis at home, unless Indonesian intransigence collapsed. Their difficulties had doubtless been increased by the unfortunate rumour which had been put about in Java that the Dutch intended —at any rate in the last resort—to use force in an attempt to break the deadlock. This the Dutch have naturally been at great pains to deny. But they are clearly exasperated: the Republican Government are said to have been completely uncooperative—a fact which convinced Dr. Beel and M. Jonkman of the futility of further discussion. It is significant that the spirit of impatience has permeated moderate and even left-wing opinion in the Netherlands, which is now showing a tendency to support the right-wing in accusing the Indonesians of procrastination and of lacking any serious intention of reaching a settlement. Thus, a weekly paper closely identified with Professor Schermerhorn (Party of Labour), which has hitherto pleaded for a more sympathetic treatment of the Republic, now sees agreement endangered by an "unbearable" Indonesian policy of obstruction.

Meanwhile, new Dutch proposals for a solution have been issued, of which the primary object is the setting up of an Interim Government of the United States of Indonesia. These proposals are to be regarded as the last offer which the Dutch are prepared to make. The Political Director of the Dutch Foreign Office (M. van Vredenburch) told H.M. Ambassador on the 27th May that their rejection would mean the end of direct Dutch-Indonesian negotiations. Information in his possession pointed to at least a two-to-one chance against acceptance, however reasonable the proposals might be, since, in his opinion, the Indonesians did not want full agreement. The next step to be taken—as he saw it—would be for the U.K. and the U.S.A. to join in bringing the greatest possible unofficial pressure to bear upon the Indonesians to induce them to see reason. M. van Vredenburch went on to suggest that, if this policy were to be carried out, the British and American Governments would have to see to it that the necessity for using force in the last resort by the Dutch did not arise. The U.S. Ambassador to The Hague is believed to have informed the Dutch Foreign Office of his Government's willingness to help in any way possible to smooth the course of Dutch-Indonesian discussions.

On the day of his arrival Dr. Beel made the following statement:—

> "We regret that an unsatisfactory state of affairs was found to exist with regard to the attitude of the Republic on the implementation of Linggadjati. On the occasion of our visit to Maccassar and in answer to criticisms expressed by President Soekawati on the words and actions of the Republic, I felt obliged to express serious doubt about the Republic's willingness to co-operate with other parts of Indonesia and the Netherlands. This doubt must be brought to an end as soon as possible. For this purpose a Note was recently handed to the Republican Delegation by the Commission-General—a Note not only of an economic and financial, but also of a political, character [i.e., the new proposals referred to above, published on the 29th May]. In this Note further form is given to the Federative structure outlined in the Linggadjati Agreement. The Note proposes and demands compliance all along the line with the conditions stipulated in the Linggadjati Agreement. The contents of this Note will be made known as soon as possible. One subject of discussion was who, in the present circumstances, are the most suitable persons to co-operate in the highest positions in a solution of these problems. At the present stage we can make no statements on this."

The deferred judgment in the case of Jhr. D. J. de Geer, the former Dutch Prime Minister [see Summary No. 393], was given on the 23rd May. He was sentenced to one year's "conditional" imprisonment, with a probationary period of three years. [The effect of this is to set him free, provided that he be not convicted of any offence during probation; in which case he would be liable to a year's actual imprisonment]. He was also ordered to pay, before the 1st July, a sum of 4,000 guilders to each of five war charities, including the Underground Workers' Fund and the Sailors' Fund. He was further forbidden to leave the area of the commune in which he lives (Soestdijk) without the permission of a local body to be appointed by the Dutch Attorney-General, and debarred from accepting public office. Finally he was deprived of the honorary office of Minister of State, to which he had been appointed for life in 1933. The comparative lightness of Jhr. de Geer's sentence is no doubt partly due to his age—he is in his 77th year. He has, however, given notice of appeal.

The Dutch press has announced the appointment of M. van Kleffens, Minister without Portfolio, as Netherlands Ambassador to Washington (30th May).

FRANCE

During the last fortnight the French scene has been dominated by a wave of strikes on the one hand, and of middle-class demonstrations against economic controls, on the other. M. Ramadier has tried, with some success, to steer a middle course, but he is hampered both by opposition within his own party and by the attitude of the Communists who press for what amounts to a general increase in wages. The Communist position has now been made clear in a statement isued by the C.G.T. research bureau, which claims that the share of wages in the national income has fallen by 5 per cent. during the last year and should be restored to its former level by the grant of "production bonuses." The Government have declared their opposition to any bonuses which do not represent payment for real increases in productive efficiency, but they are being forced to make concessions. Following the conversations between M. Ramadier and the C.G.T., the Minister of Labour conceded the trade unions' demands for a net minimum wage of 7,000 fr. a month (the income-tax exemption limit being raised to that level) for 200 hours' work, instead of 208 hours as previously; he also announced that a collective production bonus would be fixed for each industry, but that the general revision of wage-rates due to be considered in July must be postponed until December. The C.G.T. received this decision with reserve, stating that its attitude would depend on the extent to which the workers' purchasing power could be raised in the near future by falling prices and the grant of bonuses on production.

Meanwhile the C.G.T. is supporting strike movements in various industries. It provoked a show-down with the Government when the gas and electricity workers threatened to strike for 24 hours on the 28th May if their demands for higher bonuses were not accepted. The Government promptly decreed the requisition of the gas and electricity undertakings under the mobilisation law of July 1938, which makes employees who refuse to work liable to up to 5 years' imprisonment. Fortunately, the requisition order did not have to be enforced since a last-minute compromise was reached and an arbitrator appointed to find a solution "within the framework of the Government's policy." M. Ramadier, in an appeal to the workers concerned, reminded them of their reponsibilities as public servants belonging to a nationalised industry and having an obligation to maintain public services. The incident has inevitably led to discussion as to how far strikes can be tolerated in nationalised industries. Another awkward incident has been a 2-day strike of bakers' men in Paris, which has involved a temporary reduction in the bread ration.

The demonstrations by middle-class organisations and shopkeepers have somewhat outrun the intentions of their originators. It was the newspaper Le Figaro which first started the campaign for a middle-class organisation which could enter the lists against the C.G.T., while the Radicals have taken the lead in protesting against excessive economic controls. The section of opinion which is most hostile to controls is represented by the Confédération Nationale des Petites et Moyennes Entreprises, which held a monster meeting in Paris on the 20th May. At this meeting the machinery of State intervention was strongly criticised, and it was decided to hold a token strike of all shops which are members of the C.N.P.M.E. on the 4th June; but M. Ramadier was able to persuade the C.N.P.M.E. to call off this strike. Its leaders do not approve of the many riots which have occurred in different parts of the country where food and other public offices have been attacked. The movement is in fact being exploited by undesirable elements and the Communists are also making capital out of the public distaste for "dirigisme." The Radicals are therefore moderating their attitude, since they have no wish to bring about M. Ramadier's downfall, realising that such an event might mean the return to power of the Communists. The political atmosphere is highly charged, and M. Ramadier referred in the Assembly to the war of nerves caused by strikes, on the one hand, and by riots organised in the name of economic liberty on the other. He declared that the effect of the former might well be the fall of the Republic and of the latter the collapse of the franc.

The final results of the election of members of the boards which are to administer the social security scheme show that the C.G.T. won 59 per cent. of the votes and the C.F.T.C. (Catholic unions) 26 per cent. The C.F.T.C. vote is far larger than its actual membership would warrant and the sudden rise to importance of this organisation is a measure of the opposition to Communist control of the C.G.T. The C.F.T.C. has therefore decided to erase from its constitution all references to Catholicism and to refer only to general Christian principles. It already has many members who are not Catholics, and this step will allow it to cast its net still wider.

The National Assembly gave its approval on the 23rd May to the loan granted to France by the International Bank (see last Summary). M. Duclos, for the Communists, criticised it sharply but agreed to vote for it "so as not to embarrass the Government." The Minister of Finance assured the Chamber that no humiliating conditions were attached to the loan.

On the 29th May the Assembly began at last to discuss the ordinary Budget for 1947. Expenditure for the ordinary Budget is estimated at 612 milliard fr. and receipts at 590 milliards. The Government proposes to cover the deficit by an all-round cut of 7 per cent. in civil service estimates and by savings obtained by the reduction already effected in the numbers of civil servants. Economic subsidies are estimated at 59 milliards, of which 13 milliards go to the coal-mining industry.

The escape of the Moroccan leader, Abd-el-Krim, from the French ship which was taking him to France on parole from the island of Réunion where he has lived in exile since the end of the Riff revolt in 1926 (see under "Middle East") is causing some alarm to the French. Abd-el-Krim's presence in Egypt will cause Moroccan eyes to turn towards that country, and he himself said in a press interview given at Suez that Morocco formed part of the Arab world and must regain its independence and join the Arab League. This is just what the French do not want. The new Resident-General in Morocco, General Juin, stated on his arrival at Casablanca on the 27th May that Morocco was a western country and must develop on Western lines. Promising to pursue a policy of reforms, he said that the protectorate treaty would come to an end in time, but only when Morocco had evolved sufficiently to enjoy the status of a self-governing country.

SWITZERLAND

In the course of a conversation held on the 9th May between Mr. Bevin and the Swiss Minister (M. Ruegger), the question of Swiss representation in Berlin was raised. At present, the Swiss Government are represented there by a military mission. They are desirous of converting this mission from a provisional to a recognised agency which would be able to deal with Swiss interests on a regularised footing. The Secretary of State drew M. Ruegger's attention to Switzerland's failure so far to recognise the Control Council as the Government of Germany pending the establishment of a German Government. If the Swiss Government would first clear up this position, Mr. Bevin said, he would then consider the other matter.

The Swiss Minister also raised the question of Switzerland's position with regard to membership of the United Nations, and stated that, while his Government would continue to associate themselves with all the technical and social organisations of the United Nations, they could not go further than this for the time being, because of the Swiss policy of neutrality.

On the subject of the American suggestion for moving the headquarters of the International Telecommunications Union from Berne to the headquarters of the United Nations Organisation in the United States, M. Ruegger left an aide-mémoire with Mr. Bevin, in which it was stated that the Swiss Government cannot see any advantage in such a transfer. They submitted, moreover, that satisfactory co-operation between the United Nations Organisation and the Union could also be more readily secured if the latter's headquarters remained in Europe. The Swiss Government, accordingly would continue to hope that the headquarters of the Union might continue to be in Switzerland, either in Berne or Geneva.

Discussion also turned on the question of Swiss-owned works in the British Zone in Germany which had been earmarked for delivery as reparations.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

Apart from the one "dud" bomb found in a suitcase in a Barcelona station, no untoward incident, apparently, has marred General Franco's visit to Catalonia. During a fortnight's sojourn he made a number of perfunctory speeches and sought to do honour to the Region by holding a meeting of the Council of Ministers in Barcelona.

The Special Committee working on the Draft Bill of Succession made its report in time for the Cabinet meeting in Barcelona. Quite a number of emendments were submitted by the procuradores (members of the Cortes), but as the Commission of the Cortes which will have the final word is composed exclusively of dyed-in-the-wool Falangists, it is a foregone conclusion that the substance of the Bill will remain unaltered. Señor Goyoaga, representing the Diputación Provincial of Vizcaya, has been summarily dismissed from his post (thereby losing his seat in the Cortes) for proffering an "inopportune" amendment which sought to make specific mention of Don Juan de Borbon y Battenberg as the rightful Head of the State to whom the Caudillo should, within a prescribed period, hand over his powers; his version also held that "fundamental laws of the nation should be those which, in a Cortes elected for the purpose, with full sovereignty, express the will of the Spanish people." What else was to be expected when General Franco, apparently before going off on his tour of the Mediterranean provinces, left behind a directive that the name of the Count of Barcelona was no longer even to be mentioned, nor that of any member of his family!

The situation as between General Franco and the claimant to the Throne is manifestly one of complete deadlock. A spokesman of Don Juan was quick to repudiate a suggestion by the Labour M.P., Mr. M. Follick, when breaking a lance on Don Juan's behalf in the recent House of Commons debate on foreign policy (22nd May), that Don Juan was prepared to swallow his principles and accept the succession from General Franco if there were no other obstacle. The Duchess of Valencia, well known as a very rich owner of racehorses and an ardent Monarchist, has been placed under house arrest. The Duke of Alba has had his diplomatic passport withdrawn from him, and the same treatment has been meted out to the owner of ABC, the Marques de Luca de Tena (formerly Ambassador to Chile), who has gone on a visit to the United States.

The Official Gazette of the 3rd May published the text of a new law for the repression of banditry, terrorism, &c., which has important implications. The object is to differentiate sharply in future between such offences, frequently involving the use of arms and explosives, and ordinary political opposition. Hereby the Law for the Security of the State of 1943—which was in fact an extension of the military law of the Civil War period—is presumably abrogated, and civil courts will henceforth take the place of the military jurisdiction which has so far obtained in regard to illegal association for political purposes, the forming of political parties or groups and the making and distribution of clandestine propaganda. This change is a milestone marking the end of "Burgos Justice"—as it was called (by opponents in the Republican camp) during the Civil War, and a return to normality. It remains to be seen whether it will be implemented with fairness. (Under the Monarchy and the Republic there was ample provision for various stages of martial law to be proclaimed in case of emergency, while crimes of a terrorist character were covered by an old law, the Law of Abduction of 1877).

The Spanish press of the 11th May announced, with a flourish of trumpets, that Spain had established diplomatic relations with Transjordania. Juan Manuel de Aristegui, at present Consul-General in Jerusalem has been appointed Spanish Minister Plenipotentiary at Amman. Another new appointment is that of the Falangist leader, José-Maria Alfaro, as Minister to Columbia.

Portugal

On the 28th May the twenty-first anniversary of the Revolution from which the present régime stems was celebrated throughout Portugal with markedly little pomp and ceremony. The only signal event was the conferring on President Carmona, at the instance of the Supreme Army Council, the rank and dignity of Marshal. The veteran Chief of State, with Dr. Salazar at his side, took the salute at a march-past in the Terreiro do Paço. Speakers at the principal demonstration meeting in Lisbon were Professor Marcelo Caetano, the new President of the Executive Committee of the "National Union," the Minister of Economy, Eng. Vieira Barbosa, and Col. Ricardo Durão, as spokesman of the Army. In Oporto a mass-gathering was addressed by the Minister of the Interior, Senhor Cancela de Abreu, and the Under-Secretary of State for Corporations. It may or may not be significant that Dr. Salazar took no active part in the proceedings: one is inclined to think that this self-effacement was deliberate, for Dr. Salazar dates his own substantial part in the formation of the New State from 1928 when he was called back a second time to deal with the country's sick finances. It is worth noting, too, that the chosen speakers for this occasion were all newly appointed to their posts in the Cabinet re-shuffle at the beginning of February. The official papers, the Diário da Manhã, as usual, produced a monster-number for the day, with special attention to local proceedings.

On the 22nd May the Under-Secretary of State for Commerce and Industry, Dr. Correia de Barros, presiding at a meeting of the Technical Corporative Council, declared that the Corporative Organization would shortly be revised and adjusted to fulfil the functions of co-ordination in the economic sphere which War conditions had caused to be suspended.

The long-awaited Judgment of the Supreme Court on the matter of habeas corpus has now appeared in the Official Journal of the Ministry of Justice. It will be examined in a later Summary.

Portugal's brilliant Association football record this season was badly tarnished when her team was soundly beaten by ten goals to nil by an English professional eleven in Lisbon on Sunday, the 25th May. This trouncing was too much for Portuguese pride, and the members of the team refused to attend the banquet after the match. The whole team have been suspended "pending an inquiry on their unsporting behaviour." This episode has caused a furore in Portuguese football circles, but so far there have been no political repercussions. The public is deriving some consolation from Portugal's triumph in the ice hockey tournament which was recently played off in Lisbon.

ITALY

The Italian Ministerial crisis lasted well over a fortnight, and after each of the two aged politicians, Signori Nitti and Orlando, had proved unable to form a Government, largely owing to the refusal of the smaller parties to join a coalition Government based on Christian Democrats, Socialists and Communists, Signor De Gasperi succeeded on the 31st May in forming his fourth Government which was sworn in on the 1st June. This is virtually a Christian Democrat Government, for eleven of the Ministries are held by Christian Democrats, a number of "technicians" including Professor Einaudi. Count Sforza retains the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. Apparently he is prepared to accept the unpopular position of being Foreign Minister when the Italian Peace Treaty is ratified, if he can retain office until the elections. He may perhaps hope that after the elections a grateful country will make him President of the Republic.

The Christian Democrat party is, of course, much the largest in the Constituent Assembly, where it holds 207 seats in a total of 556, and it may be able to secure sufficient support from the right-wing parties to keep it in office until the autumn elections. Much will depend on the way in which it tackles the very serious economic situation in the country; failure to do so would unite Communists, Socialists of both groups and many of the smaller parties against the Government. Signor De Gasperi is well aware of this danger. On the 13th May, the day of his resignation, he openly admitted the economic difficulties of Italy and quoted his Socialist colleague Signor Morandi on the country's inability to pay for essential imports of raw materials as well as foodstuffs (see Summary No. 393). He has appointed Professor Einaudi, the Governor of the Bank of Italy, to be Vice-Premier and temporarily in charge of both the Ministry of Finance and of the Treasury, and it will be his task to set in order Italy's finances and to secure the means of satisfying her most urgent economic requirements.

Professor Einaudi is probably Italy's best known economist. He is Professor of Finance in the University of Turin, the author of numerous learned books and articles on economics, and is a member of learned societies in Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States. Although he retained his professorship under Fascism, he never joined the Fascist party, and his criticism of Fascist economic policy was often outspoken. During the war and before the fall of Mussolini he contributed to a book published in Italy a paper which was a bitter attack on the whole system of Fascist economics. But although Professor Einaudi's reputation as a scholar and his personal integrity are both beyond question, it is open to doubt whether an old-fashioned Liberal economist aged 73 will be able to enforce the stringent measures which will be essential if Italy is to keep her head above water. Professor Einaudi's economic liberalism will probably inspire confidence in the good intentions of the Italian Government in the United States, where the Secretary of State announced yesterday: "The American Government naturally wishes every success for Prime Minister De Gasperi and the new Italian Government in the difficult tasks which they must face." Americans were happy to have been of assistance in rebuilding the Italian economy, "and we shall continue to give aid to the Italian people, who have demonstrated their sincere and abiding faith in democratic processes for the preservation of their individual liberties and basic human rights." This statement will certainly encourage the new Government in its hope of securing an American loan, and a large loan may set Italy on its feet and save it from revolution either from the right or from the left. But the loan alone will not suffice; much will depend on how it is used and on the Government's ability to enforce the stringent economic and financial measures on the need for which, Signor De Gasperi has insisted.

The new Government is a minority Government, and its every proposal will certainly be critically scrutinized by Socialists, Communists and many of the small progressive parties. For it is not only a minority Government, its members belong to the more conservative part of the Christian Democrat party. Signor Gronchi, the leader of the left-wing Christian Democrats, is not included. Socialists and Communists in fact opened the attack even before the names of the new Ministers were announced. Signor Nenni's paper, Avanti, of the 30th May described Signor De Gasperi as the tool of internal and foreign reactionary forces "which we refuse to identify with the American people or their Government." Signor Togliatti declared at the end of May that this was no time for a one-party Government, and went so far as to call Signor De Gasperi a traitor.

While the Christian Democrat party obviously included among its supporters in June 1946 large numbers of workers, particularly agricultural workers, the great mass of Italian labour is controlled by the Socialist and Communist parties, and unemployment and unrest are likely to strengthen this control. In this connexion it is worth noticing that there are considerable numbers of unemployed agricultural workers both in the North and in the South. Meantime the Confederation of Labour is meeting in Florence, and elections were being held for the executive committee on the 2nd June. The results of these elections will show the strength of the Communists and Nenni-Socialists in organised labour, and will require careful consideration by the newly-elected Government.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The conspiracy against the Republic has again become the centre of interest in Hungary with the implication of M. Nagy through admissions said to have been obtained from M. Kovács during his cross-examination by the Russians. Instead of complying with the order to return from Switzerland where he was spending a holiday, M. Nagy telephoned his resignation, a fact which the Left interpret as tantamount to a confession of guilt. It was alleged in certain quarters that unless M. Nagy abstains from enlightening the Western Powers about the true state of Hungarian affairs he will be tried for treason in his absence by the Communists. His daughter, Mlle. Julie Nagy, has, according to reports received, for some time past been conducting anti-Soviet activities in Switzerland under the unofficial direction of M. Honti. It now appears that she was recently married to M. Kálmán Sáláta, one of the conspirators who succeeded in escaping from Hungary. His brother, M. Gyula Sáláta, is in Russian hands, and the intention is attributed to him of declaring on M. Kálmán Sáláta's authority, that all instructions in the plot came from M. Nagy.

Also implicated—though only to a minor degree—by the attestations of M. Kovács is the President of the National Assembly, Fr. Varga, who has since fled to Austria. The evidence contains nothing against M. Gyöngyösi, but he has nevertheless been superseded at the Foreign Ministry by the former Minister of Information, M. Minalyfi. The Minister of Defence, M. Dinnyés, while retaining his Portfolio, has been appointed to replace M. Nagy as Premier. The changes do not increase left-wing representation in the Cabinet, but the Smallholder numbers are reduced by two, and M. Dinnyés is regarded as a weak man of limited intellect who is likely to be dominated by the Communists.

C267351

The Russians are not yet prepared to surrender M. Kovács to the Hungarian authorities for questioning, though they have agreed to make his depositions available. There have been further arrests in Budapest, and another Party purge is likely to be required from the Smallholders, after which, M. Szakasits states, they will still be acceptable partners in a Coalition. The Left are pressing their demand for a revision of the electoral registers so as to disfranchise "reactionary" elements before the General Election, which will, it is generally believed, take place in September. In no case could the now largely discredited Smallholder Party hope to come out of the ordeal victoriously, but the Freedom Party, which has the advantage of a leader (M. Sulyok) whose record is unblemished, might reasonably have counted on attracting a fair proportion of Smallholder votes. Results, however, are not difficult to forecast if the compilation of the registers lies exclusively in the hands of the Left-wing bloc.

The U.S. Government have decided to withdraw Hungary's right to draw on dollar credits for the purchase of surplus American war material until developments become clearer. They are reported to be preparing a Note of protest, in which event they would seek the support of H.M. Government.

The National Peasant Party have approved the Communist demand for the nationalisation of the National Bank and the "big three" as essential to the successful realisation of the Plan for Hungary's economic rehabilitation. The Social Democrats, on the other hand, regarded the scheme as untimely and considered that a preferable alternative would be to place the thirteen leading banks under State control, while the Smallholders showed a general reluctance to accept the Communist plan for nationalisation. A compromise solution, based on the Social Democratic proposal, was reached, by which only the National Bank was to be nationalised and the other leading banks were to be publicly controlled. Statements published since the crisis, however, indicate that the principle of nationalisation has now been agreed to by all the Parties—but these should be treated with reserve until fuller information is forthcoming.

M. Kémény, the Under-Secretary of State for Finance, maintains that the Russian claim under the Potsdam Agreement, for the transfer of German assets to the Soviet Union cannot be met, and that the Moscow negotiations are doomed to failure unless the Soviet attitude changes.

Measures to reduce soaring industrial prices include the lowering of production costs, increased output to which the proposed purchase of 100,000 cotton spindles and other machinery from the United Kingdom will contribute, and continued action against speculators by the Economic Police.

Complete agreement has been arrived at on all questions regarding the implementation of the head-for-head exchange of populations between Hungary and Czechoslovakia. The two countries will resume diplomatic relations in the near future.

Roumania

The political situation in Roumania has not developed to any extent since it was dealt with here in some detail in Summary No. 392. His Majesty's Government and the State Department have been considering what action they can usefully take to impress on the Roumanian Government and people that they do not intend to disinterest themselves in the fulfilment of the Human Rights clause of the Peace Treaty. Silence would encourage the Roumanian Communists, and no doubt the Soviet Government, to go further along the path they have chosen, but there are few weapons available to His Majesty's Government, apart from the mobilization of public opinion in the West, which still has some importance in the eyes of the Roumanian Government. His Majesty's Government are therefore inclined to make it widely known that "they are not in a mood to remain silent" about the latest outrages against the Opposition parties. For once the Treaty is ratified, they will probably "have cause to make frequent reference to Article 3" (dealing with fundamental human rights). The State Department are anxious to do nothing which would make diplomatic relations between the U.S.A. and Roumania more difficult and proposed to "study the matter further." They have been asked to reconsider their attitude.

A week ago the political Representative of Roumania in London, Dl Franasovici, was hurriedly summoned to Bucharest. He is expected to return shortly, but there is a rumour that Tătărescu, the Foreign Minister, is coming to the end of his tether, and that his nominees abroad may be removed from their posts. The Industrial Bureaux Bill, which Tătărescu has said would never be passed by any administration of which he was a member, has, in fact, been passed by Parliament with only minor changes. The provisions of the bill are highly technical, but it is fairly evident that it could be used to effect nationalisation without compensation, and that it will render increasingly difficult the operations of British and American industrial concerns in Roumania.

The difficulty over obtaining clearances for British subjects for Roumania remains. Dl Tătărescu has excelled himself by combining an assertion that while the Russians remain in the country the Roumanians are quite powerless in this matter with a promise that if only we will ratify the Peace Treaty the whole difficulty will disappear in three days.

Yugoslavia

Dr. Dragoljub Jovanović, whose arrest was reported in Summary No. 393, is to be tried for espionage. The Yugoslav Government claim to have documentary evidence of his allegedly treasonable association with "a representative of a foreign power." The foreign representative may, in this case be H.M. Press Attaché, with whom Dr. Jovanović was in contact until a few months ago and with whom he discussed political affairs on his own initiative. He has also been in touch with the U.S. Embassy. Whether or not there is any serious foundation for the charge, it is clear that the Government have failed to silence this uncomfortable critic by other means. Some months ago he was assaulted by some young toughs while the Militia looked on, and, more recently, his criticism of the Budget and the Five-Year Plan, and his doubts about the efficiency of the Army, were answered with insults and threats.

The rumours of a Government approach to the Opposition which were prevalent a few months ago have been denounced by Dr. Bakarić, the Croat Premier, as the fabrications of the Opposition who had nothing better to do. But Dr. Subašić had already assured H.M. Consul-General in Zagreb that they were quite without foundation, whereas the Central Committee of the Communist Party is known to have been the source of one such report. The spreading of false information, if sufficiently serious, is an offence under the Law for the Defence of the People's Power, and a useful charge to lay at the door of the Opposition.

Some prominent members of Pavelić's Government who had been extradited by the British and American authorities during the past eighteen months are on trial in Zagreb. The prosecution appears as anxious to discredit Dr. Maček as to prove that the accused are traitors.

The United States Government have withdrawn their consent to the surrender, without further reference to them, of all those wanted by the Yugoslav Government as traitors who can be proved to have been members of the Ustaši. They are now unwilling to allow any man to be handed over to "victimisation through the perversion of justice." The recent surrender of seven Yugoslavs by the British authorities has aroused great interest in the United States, and considerable disapproval of the British action has been expressed.

A protest has been received from the Yugoslav Ambassador in London against the alleged confiscation by a British Field Security Sergeant in Austria of a consignment of newspapers destined for a refugee camp. Of late it has been frequently asserted in Yugoslavia that the British Military Authorities prevent the circulation of literature designed to encourage repatriation.

The Yugoslav Government have sought permission to operate civil air services across the British zone of Austria to France and Switzerland. Their request has provided an opportunity for His Majesty's Government once more to press for the conclusion of a civil aviation agreement—now with some hope of success. Hitherto, the Yugoslav Government have been very reluctant even to discuss negotiations. Talks with the French for the establishment of a Belgrade–Paris air service have been in progress since the beginning of May.

Trade agreements have been signed with Poland and Finland.

Greece

The Greek Army continue to report progress against the rebels in many areas. It is clear, however, that the bandits' tactics of dispersal, sporadic raids and avoidance of large-scale battles are bringing them considerable success. The prospect of an almost indefinite prolongation of the campaign is said to be lowering morale, among both civilians and the Army. The fact that the bandits are reported to be using anti-aircraft guns, even though of a light type, has introduced an element with which the Greek Army had not reckoned.

Raids by bandits have been reported from almost all parts of the country from Kalamata on the South coast of the Peloponnese to Thrace, and numerous incidents have occurred including one near Alexandroupolis when the bandits mistook British Military Mission vehicles for Greek ones, and killed two British other ranks.

It has long been suspected that the bandits would attempt to capture some town in Macedonia, where Zachariadis might establish the seat of a "free" Greek Government. The Greek Army were, therefore, to some extent prepared for the recent attacks on towns of some size. On the night of 26th–27th May large bands attacked Katerini, on the 28th–29th and on the 30th Florina and on the night of the 29th–30th May Kilkis—all towns with at least 10,000 inhabitants. All the attacks were repelled and, according to reports, the bandits suffered much higher casualties than the Government forces. The bandits seem, however, with the assistance of local Communists, to have penetrated well into the towns and at Kilkis fighting took place around the offices of the prefecture in the centre of the town. Public opinion is seriously disturbed by these incidents, and they were discussed throughout the session of the Chamber on the 30th May. A heartening feature of the debate was the agreement of all parties to present a united front against the Slav menace. M. Rentis, who spoke for the Liberal opposition, was warmly applauded after a speech in which he stated: "Support of the bandits from abroad finds us all united in the defence of Greece."

The United Nations Enquiry Commission have now completed their work in Geneva. On the 20th May two statements on the causes of the incidents on the Greek frontier were presented: a Russian one implying that Greece was solely responsible for all that had happened, and an American one which made some attempt to apportion the blame fairly between Greece, Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, but left no doubt about the flagrant intervention in Greece in which the three latter Powers had been indulging. The American conclusions received an 8–2 majority vote on the 22nd, the delegates of Belgium, Colombia, making one reservation, and the delegate of France abstaining. The Russian conclusions were included in the combined report to be submitted to the Security Council. A majority of 9–2 of the Commission also approved three recommendations to be submitted to the Security Council: (1) that a permanent international commission, presided over by a neutral, should watch over the frontier; (2) that the four countries should do their utmost to settle their differences amicably and should not forcibly repatriate the minorities within their borders; (3) that refugees should be rounded up and put into camps, under the control of the permanent commission, and that they should not be allowed to take part in politics.

The Russian and Polish delegates made two joint reservations. The Commission, they said, had not determined that the Albanian, Bulgar and Yugoslav Governments had supported civil war in Greece; that the Commission had not determined the existence in Greek Macedonia of a separatist movement inspired by Yugoslavia; and also that the civil war in Greece originated not from frontier incidents, but directly from the abnormal internal political situation of the country. Finally they accused Greece of tolerating and conducting racial propaganda against the Slavs.

The sub-committee of the Frontier Commission held its first public session in Salonica on the 27th May and decided to leave for the Bulgarian frontier on the 2nd June in order to investigate the Angistron and Kapnotopos incidents. There is no official indication yet whether or not the three northern neighbours of Greece are going to send liaison representatives to Salonica to work with the sub-committee. Rizospastis stated that it might be considered certain that Bulgaria would dispute the sub-committee's jurisdiction and would not allow its members to enter Bulgarian territory, but it now seems likely that the Bulgarian authorities, though they may seek to delay the sub-commission's work, will not openly defy its authority.

The Œcumenical Patriarch who is visiting Greece (see under "Turkey") has been received there with the full honours accorded to a head of a state. After a two-day stay in Athens as a guest of Archbishop Damaskinos, the Patriarch has moved to a house at Kifissia which has been put at his disposal by the Greek Government.

Albania

Albania's non-stop propaganda campaign against Greece and the Great Powers supporting her has been, if anything, intensified during the past fortnight. Nine Albanian deputies who were suddenly deprived of their seats in the Assembly on the 21st May were at once charged with participation in espionage and conspiracy against the Government "in the service of Anglo-American reaction," and with having in the past "received considerable sums of money from the British and United States missions." They were also accused of having been in contact with "war criminals both at home and abroad," who "are even now being protected by the Anglo-Americans." It was further insinuated that they would welcome the opportunity which "a Greek attack upon Albania" would provide.

On the next day the Tirana press angrily asserted that three Greek aircraft, after circling for 40 minutes over Albanian territory in broad daylight, had machine-gunned two village streets in the prefecture of Koritsa, killing two harmless people and wounding a number of others. This allegation was repeated in an official protest sent on the 23rd by General Hoxha to M. Trygve Lie, but it was categorically denied by the Greek Government. What had actually happened, according to them, was that a band of guerillas said to be about 500 strong and heavily armed was seen to come from Albanian territory; it was attacked on Greek territory by Greek land forces and aircraft, and later withdrew again into Albania.

When counter-accusations are made from the Greek side they are received with fury and derision. A report reached Athens on the 22nd May that an Albanian warship had approached the northern extremity of Corfu island and fired at the Greek coastal batteries there. When stripped of its onion-like layers of invective the Albanians' defence amounted to the mere contention that they did not possess a single ship which could rightly be called a warship.

Bulgaria

There was an echo of the "Neutral Officer" trial of January last when on the 21st May the alleged ringleader, General Ivan Popov, was sentenced after two days' court proceedings to 15 years' solitary confinement and told from the Bench that if he had not "repented" and turned King's evidence, that sentence would have been still more severe. The effect of the poor General's first four weeks in the custody of the militia was to reduce him to such a condition that he was officially admitted to be unfit to plead, at the time when his associates were tried. The effect of his next four months in their care was to make him quite ready to "confess" that the entire indictment was true; he no longer sought to excuse himself in any way, but "felt bound to place the entire guilt" on Nikola Petkov and other Opposition leaders, adding—as by now one could safely have guessed—that he had been in touch with "two colonels who were heads of foreign intelligence services" in Bulgaria. In announcing the reopening of the trial on the 19th May Sofia Radio had told its listeners that they might soon expect to hear that Dimiter Ghichev and Peter Koev [two leading Opposition Agrarians] were to face their trial for complicity in the same "Neutral Officer" plot, and General Kiril Stanchev for having organised another one, the "Military League" Conspiracy. (See Summaries Nos. 377, 378, 380 and 391.)

Although a discreet silence is being observed about it in Government circles—the process is becoming all too familiar for unnecessary advertisement—a split seems definitely to have occurred in the already thin ranks of the Government Agrarians, a minority left-wing group which under Alexander Obbov remained within the façade of the Fatherland Front when the great bulk of the old Agrarian party—far the strongest and most representative in Bulgaria—went into opposition as a protest against the behaviour of the Communists about two years ago. This further fragmentation will suit the latter very well: from being one of the smaller groups in the original coalition of September 1944, the Communist party has managed by precisely such manœuvres to climb to the top of the very different Fatherland Front of to-day.

There are still no Opposition papers appearing, and H.M. Government are considering the advisability of addressing a note to the Bulgarian Government on the subject, in view of Article 2 of the peace treaty.

Turkey

On the 22nd May President Truman signed the bill for helping Greece and Turkey and President Inönü broadcast a message thanking the American people for a token of friendship which would provide for Turkey's most urgent needs and help her to overcome her economic difficulties. On the same day there arrived in Angora the first contingent of the American military mission. Under the supervision of the United States Ambassador the mission's business is to work out in detail the manner in which the suggested 100 million dollars are to be applied. It is understood that the whole sum is to be a gift for the purchase of military equipment. Clearly it would not be enough for a thorough reform of the Turkish forces, and its importance is largely psychological. Later on Turkey may be able to obtain a loan for economic purposes from the International Bank.

Speaking at the Labour Party conference on the 29th May the Foreign Secretary referred to the question of the Straits. He repeated that H.M. Government were ready to join in a conference for revising the Montreux Convention, but that what Russia demanded was a base. This, Mr. Bevin said, would mean a loss of independence for Turkey, and H.M. Government were unable to accept it.

On the previous day the Turkish Prime Minister invoked the Russian threat to the Straits in order to justify the prolongation for another six months of the "state of siege" in that area. It was under the exceptional powers conferred on the army by the "state of siege" that two Democrat (Opposition) papers in Istanbul were recently suspended for questioning the legality of the present Grand National Assembly. This is a sore point, for the Democrats claim that the Government's majority at the last general election was only due to faked counting, and they demand that appropriate guarantees be inserted in the electoral law. M. Recep Peker's motion for prolonging the "state of siege" therefore was challenged by the Democrats as being directed against legitimate opposition, and it was not passed without provoking a debate of considerable warmth.

Until the middle of May the agricultural outlook was extremely serious. Then a long drought broke and anxiety was substantially, but not wholly, relieved. Autumn sowings (70 per cent. of the whole) promise badly except on the Anatolian plateau; spring sowings are half ruined. The maximum now expected is 70 per cent. of last year's bumper crop, but this still depends on future rains.

The Oecumenical Patriarch, who is still ailing (see Summary No. 390), took on the 19th May the unprecedented step of leaving Istanbul. With the encouragement, it may be presumed, of the Hellenic Government he went to Athens for what was described at the Phanar as a couple of months' change. (See also under "Greece.")

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The composition of the Egyptian Delegation which will be proceeding to New York to present Egypt's case before the Security Council was announced on the 25th May, although the decision of the Council of Ministers that Nokrashy Pasha should lead it had been published a week before. In addition to the President it contains two Sa'adists, two Liberals, Mahmud Hassan Pasha, the Egyptian Ambassador at Washington, and Mahmud Fawzi Bey, the permanent Egyptian delegate to the United Nations. The attitude of the Liberals to participation had been arousing some interest, and it is remarked that their two representatives are lightweights and that Hussein Heikal Pasha is not included. His absence is believed to be due to his desire to reserve himself for the succession to the Presidency of the Council of Ministers in the event of Nokrashy's failure to obtain satisfaction for Egyptian demands. The King, who is said to have little expectation that Egypt's case will be favourably considered, may thus be extricated from an awkward predicament.

Nokrashy Pasha has so far put off questioners who want to know the date on which the application for a hearing will be made, and the composition of the staff of experts who will accompany the delegation. There is, however, some talk that he may be leaving for the United States during the present week in the hope of being able (before the meeting of the Security Council) to negotiate an American gold loan to support Egyptian currency and to facilitate its detachment from the pound sterling. If this report is well-founded it shows an important step in the direction of reliance on American rather than British support and advice, of which the despatch of a military mission to the United States had already given some indication. The activities of this mission are being extensively publicised in the Egyptian press, and the possible significance of the abolition of the British Military Mission to the Egyptian Army—which becomes effective at the end of this year—will not be lost upon the public.

The pro-Government press has been suggesting that the Opposition intend to undermine the efforts of the Egyptian delegation in New York, and that the British are trying to organise such a movement. The Wafdist press has characterised these suggestions as efforts to bolster up a minority régime, but it is possible that the Government are genuinely apprehensive of a stab in the back from the Wafd and are doing what they can to forestall it. The Moqattam has published an interview with Prince Muhammad Ali in which His Highness suggests that Egypt should be prepared for a disappointment at the United Nations. Nokrashy Pasha himself expects to be defeated on the Sudan issue, but is convinced that he will be successful in getting the period for the withdrawal of British troops reduced substantially below that contemplated in the Bevin–Sidky discussions, unless we and the United Nations produce some compelling strategic reason for their maintenance in Egypt.

In the course of a Senate debate on the budget on the 20th May a senator drew attention to the social differences in Egypt and to the contrast between great riches and great poverty, which were responsible, he said, for the bad state of public security. He confessed to pessimism about the immediate future. A week later Muhammad al Ashmawi Pasha, a former Minister of Education, returned to the subject and appealed for special attention to be given to social conditions which he described as "shameful." He called for a campaign against "the poverty, disease and misery from which millions of Egyptians are suffering."

Little progress has been made in the enquiries into the bomb incidents of the 6th and 7th May (see Summary No. 392), and some of those arrested have been released on bail. The press continues to report daily discoveries of bombs left about in different parts of Cairo.

Abdul Karim, the leader of the Riff revolt, who was on his way to France from Réunion, where he has been detained for the past twenty-one years, disembarked at Port Said on the 31st May with his family and a large retinue. He had received permission from the Egyptian Prime Minister to land on condition that he did not meddle in politics—an assurance which he gave, no doubt, as readily as the Mufti when he landed from France a year ago, and which will be as blatantly ignored by the Egyptian authorities. Indeed, it is likely that he will be regarded as a valuable asset in the campaign for extending the influence of the Arab League, under Egypt's leadership, to the North African countries. Arrangements were made by the Egyptian authorities for his party to be taken to Cairo, where he immediately went to the Abdin Palace and signed the King's book. (See also under "France.")

Palestine

The Jewish attitude of extravagant optimism which resulted from Mr. Gromyko's speech of the 14th May (see last Summary) has given way to a mood of sober confidence based mainly on his later clarification of Soviet policy.

The Jewish Elected Assembly (Assefath Hanivharim) concluded a three-day session on the 22nd May. The main business was to approve the budget of the Vaad Leumi (National Council), but the Chairman, Mr. David Remez, in his opening speech, dwelt at length with the significance of the Soviet attitude to the problem of Palestine, and devoted a good deal of time to praise of the achievements of the Yishuv, in spite of their lacking "state authority" (which was now being claimed from the United Nations), and in spite of receiving no services from the Government in return for some £10,000,000 paid in income tax. He ended with a demand for national discipline to make an end of terrorist activities. Mr. Ben Gurion arrived from New York in time to address the Assembly. Saying that he was speaking in a personal capacity, he recognised that a Jewish State in an undivided Palestine was not a practical proposition, and proposed that the central part should be retained under mandate to facilitate Jewish settlement, while the remainder should be formed into a Jewish State. He categorically rejected the continuation of the Mandate over the whole of Palestine, the creation of a bi-national State, and a trusteeship of three Great Powers. He analysed the proceedings at the meeting of the United Nations, but, referring to the conclusion reached by the Soviet Government that a Jewish State is a necessity, warned his hearers against undue optimism on that account, since Great Britain had given no definite undertaking that she would act on the recommendations of the Assembly. After debate, resolutions were passed expressing support for illegal immigration, endorsing the demand for a Jewish State, denouncing terrorism and approving the "defensive" measures taken against it. The Budget for the National Council, providing for an expenditure of £1,250,000, was passed "mainly for educational, social welfare and health services," according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency. The Assembly elected a new National Council of 42 members: Palestine Labour Party (Mapai) 15, Mizrachi (Workers) 6, Ahdut Avoda (Movement for Labour Unity), 5, Hashomer Hatsair (Young Guard) 4, Ali'ya Hadasha (New Immigration) 4, the General Zionists and the Yemenites 2 each. The Maccabi, Women's organisations and business interests make up the total with one seat each. The new Council will elect its own Executive, which is not expected to differ in its composition from the present one.

Dr. Silver, Chairman of the Washington Executive branch of the Jewish Agency, affected to disbelieve the reports of Ben Gurion's speech, and commented that the case of the Jewish Agency was officially presented by its representatives, including Ben Gurion, and that there has been no change of policy since then.

The members of the Arab Higher Committee have been assembled in Cairo discussing whether they should or should not co-operate with the Special Committee of the United Nations. The Arab press as a whole seems to favour co-operation, and the Palestine delegation to the United Nations has come under fire for its handling of the Arab case and for recommending the boycott of the Committee without waiting for the Arab States to define their attitude. The views of the Mufti, who repented at the last moment of his decision to boycott the Royal Commission in 1936, are not known. Azzam Pasha is reported from New York as saying: "I do not believe in boycotts, and I think the Arabs will co-operate. We believe in the United Nations. We will stick by it and try to make the most of it." He emphasised that a decision will be taken only at the coming meeting of the League Council in Cairo.

On the 20th May armed parties of the Haganah attacked Arabs near Petah Tikvah. Five Arabs were killed and seven wounded. The leader of one party of Jews was also killed, and was given what amounted to a State funeral. The attacks were alleged to be reprisals for and prevention of Arab banditry, but they are in marked contrast with the policy of the Stern Group which assiduously woos the Arabs in an endeavour to seduce them into an alliance against "British Imperialism." It is impossible to avoid a suspicion of deliberate provocation on the part of the Haganah, but, apart from a howl of indignation, Arab reaction, so far, has been less violent than might have been expected. The Mufti is said to have called for a full report on the incidents.

Efforts to combine the Najjada and the Futuwa into a single Youth Movement continue, and the Arab Higher Committee have now issued a manifesto from Cairo calling upon "noble Arab youths" to support it, and announcing that an agreement has already been signed between the two organisations. Mahmud Labib, an Egyptian, is to lead the new movement.

There has been a decrease in the number of terrorist incidents during the past fortnight. Attacks have been made on the railway, and an abortive attempt on the Iraq Petroleum Company's dock and offices in Haifa Port was made on the 28th May. The Stern Group announced later that they were responsible for this last attack.

The illegal immigration traffic continues in spite of efforts to check it at its source.

The Lebanon

The Lebanese Chamber of Deputies was dissolved by Presidential decree on the 9th April (see Summary No. 388), and the electoral campaign began at once. Activity was especially marked in Mount Lebanon, where Camille Chamoun, who returned from his appointment in London in March, joined forces with Kamal Jumblatt in a campaign for the return of "clean" elements to the new Parliament, and, with an eye on the Presidential election in 1949, both became involved in a complicated intrigue designed to eliminate as many as possible of President Khouri's supporters. Except in the Beqa'a, where there seems to have been less activity than in other districts, the elections were keenly contested. The results were announced on the 26th May, and, though there will be a few new faces, the new Chamber will differ little from its predecessor. Interference by the Government in the Beirut and Mount Lebanon constituencies is alleged by the Opposition, and both Kamal Jumblatt, Minister of National Economy, and Camille Chamoun, Minister of Finance, resigned in protest. The latter afterwards withdrew his resignation on a promise that a committee of enquiry will be formed from members of the judiciary, under the supervision of himself and the Minister of Justice. According to the constitution only the Chamber of Deputies is competent to decide election irregularities, and the committee will, therefore, prepare a report for submission to it. Although the absence of disorder was a satisfactory feature of the elections, there is no doubt that the Government, and the President in particular, have overplayed their hand in a very clumsy manner, and the possibility of strikes and demonstrations fomented by unsuccessful candidates in Beirut cannot now be excluded. The President, who is alleged to have instigated official propaganda on behalf of candidates on the list sponsored by his brother, Shaikh Salim Khoury, in Mount Lebanon, has been the subject of a violent open letter from the Archbishop of Beirut calling on him to resign. He has made no secret of his determination to use the new parliament to alter the constitution so as to enable him to secure re-election for a second term in 1949.

Iraq

The Opposition Group (see last Summary) under the leadership of Sa'ad Salih, continues to canvass for support, particularly among out-of-work politicians. Both Hikmat es Sulaiman, Prime Minister from 1936–37, and Jamil Madfai, who has had four spells as Premier between 1933 and 1941, have been approached in this connection, but their reactions are not known. The Group have threatened various forms of political action, such as strikes and demonstrations by students, civil disobedience and even raising a revolt among the Middle Euphrates tribes. However, their achievements to date are negligible and they lack cohesion, due to divergencies of political opinion.

Persia

There is still no sign of the newly-elected Fifteenth Majlis assembling, although the Tehran newspaper Dad (moderate left) has given 23rd June as the date of opening. Qawam es-Sultaneh is in no hurry to exchange his unchallenged control of public affairs for the endless bickering of the Majlis debates and continues to procrastinate, despite the mounting volume of criticism from the press at the corruption of his cabinet and the incessant clamour of the deputies who want to start drawing their pay. The educated section of the populace, mindful of the garrulous futility of the last Majlis, are apathetic towards the assembly of the new one, while the Russians, now somewhat uneasy about the reception of their oil concession bill, are not pressing for it to convene.

Reports from press correspondents in Tehran of an influx of Russian insurgents into Azerbaijan have been vigorously denied by the Persian Government, as has also a statement made by the B.B.C. on the 20th May that the Russo-Persian frontier had been closed. The latter statement appears to have been occasioned by an administrative decision to entrust the Ministry of War with the responsibility of guarding the country's frontiers, a task hitherto undertaken by the Gendarmerie. H.M. Consul-General, Tabriz, confirms that there has been no Soviet infiltration into Persia, but reported on the 22nd May information from the G.O.C. Azerbaijan that the Russians were concentrating appreciable forces in Nakhichevan and Erivan (Armenia), while increased Russian activity on the frontier near Astara has been reported by H.M. Vice-Consul, Resht. The general Soviet policy towards Azerbaijan appears to be to keep the whole province in a state of unrest and anxiety over possible Russian re-entry and to incite the Kurds and Assyrians in Western Azerbaijan against the Persian Army. The activities of the Soviet consular officials have shown a marked increase lately, and an organised system of espionage, reaching the Turkish Consulate at Rezaieh, is believed to have been built up.

On the 25th May the Shah visited Tabriz, where he was accorded a very enthusiastic reception, the spontaneity of which cannot be doubted. In his speech to the people he stressed his interest in Azerbaijan and his desire to raise its economic and social standards.

The body of the late Shah, Riza Pahlevi, is to be re-interred in a special mausoleum which is being built at the Shrine of Shah Abdul Azim, a place of pilgrimage a few miles south of Tehran. The original proposal was that it should be buried at Meshed, but this was opposed by the mullahs. A special delegation will travel to Cairo to collect the body, which arrived there from S. Africa in 1944.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The new constitution has got off to a flying start. The Diet, on assembling, designated Mr. Tetsu Katayama, Chairman of the largest Party—the Social Democrats—as Premier, and on the 31st May Mr. Katayama announced the formation of his Cabinet consisting of six Social Democrats (1 without portfolio), 7 Democrats (2 without portfolio), 2 People's Cooperatives (1 without portfolio) and 1 Independent. He has stated his intention to follow a middle course leaning neither to the extreme right nor to the extreme left and "demarcating a clear line vis-à-vis Communism." This path, should it prove practicable, ought to satisfy public opinion whose main objection to the Liberal Government was that it leaned altogether too far to the right. The new Premier is a Christian.

The Foreign Minister is Mr. Hitoshi Ashida, lately of the Liberal Party and now Chairman of the Democratic Party. A Counsellor of Embassy in Turkey and Belgium successively, he later became editor of the Japan Times, the Government organ during the war-period. There are rumours that his case is under consideration by the "purging" committee. Baron Shidehara, who had earlier been ousted from his position as Chairman of the Democratic Party, opposed the form of the Coalition Government and has resigned from the Party. Suehiro Nishio, a leading light of the Social Democratic Party, becomes Chief Cabinet Secretary.

Two other prominent members of the new Cabinet are Chozaburo Mizutani (Commerce), a leading Social Democrat, whose political theories are said to be based on those of the British Labour Party, and Hiroo Wada (Economic Stabilisation Board), attached to no Party but liberal in outlook, who spent a considerable time in prison during the war for "dangerous thought."

Speaking on foreign policy at the Labour Party Conference on the 29th May, Mr. Bevin said that the methods adopted at Potsdam of trying to settle problems of peace among the Foreign Ministers of the Great Powers would not be satisfactory in dealing with the peace treaty with Japan. Eleven countries were actively involved in the war with Japan and should form the peace conference.

In Canberra Dr. Evatt stated that it was proposed to hold preliminary discussions among representatives of the British Commonwealth of Nations prior to the signing of a Peace Treaty. Australia had suggested that India should be included in these talks and it was hoped that they would take place in the Pacific region, possibly in Australia.

It is understood that His Majesty's Government favours a meeting in Canberra during August, but details remain to be settled.

Korea

The joint commission has appointed three sub-committees to consider respectively (1) consultation with democratic parties and social organizations, (2) the type and structure and the political platform of provisional government, (3) the method of selecting its members. Dr. Rhee at first threatened to boycott the Commission but has now backed down, declaring that, while not anxious to participate because he does not know what form trusteeship will take and foresees conflict between the American and Russian definitions of democracy, he will not oppose the participation of others.

General Hodge, Commander of the United States Army in Korea, giving evidence before the U.S. House of Representatives Appropriations Committee, is reported to have stated his belief that the Russians wished to make Korea a "Communist satellite." Russian tactics, he contended, were to convince the Koreans that, so far from carrying out their promises the Americans were trying to colonise Korea, the Russian aim, as he saw it, being to make the Koreans thoroughly discontented and the Americans so weary of the struggle that they would pack up and leave.

French Indo-China

It has been an open secret for some time that informal talks were proceeding between M. Mus, Director of the Overseas College in Paris, and M. Giam, Viet-Nam Minister for Foreign Affairs. There are also unconfirmed reports of a meeting with Ho Chi Minh himself. According to Le Monde of the 28th May, M. Mus communicated to the Viet-Nam Foreign Minister the French terms for the cessation of hostilities: the Viet-Nam forces, apparently, would be required to surrender their arms and French forces would have freedom to move troops wherever required. Refusing to accept these terms Ho Chi Minh issued two proclamations, one to his own people urging them to continue the struggle, the other to the French people appealing to them to put a stop to the fighting.

Adherents of ex-Emperor Baodai have issued a statement condemning the present Viet-Nam Government as being totalitarian and favouring a union of Tonking, Annam and Cochin-China under a democratic Government forming part of the French Union.

Indonesia

After paying brief visits to Pontianak (where they witnessed the signing of the Statute of West Borneo) and Maccassar (capital of East Indonesia), as well as Sourabaya, the Netherlands Prime Minister, Dr. Beel and the Minister for Overseas Territories, M. Jonkman, left Batavia to return to the Netherlands on the 23rd May, breaking their journey at Singapore, where they stayed for one night as guests of the Governor-General. They were followed a day later by Professor Schermerhorn and M. van Poll, Comissioners-General. Strenuous efforts had been made to reach agreement with the Indonesian Delegation, but all discussions on the major questions of foreign representation, currency and economic matters in general ended in deadlock.

Neither Dr. Beel nor M. Jonkman took part in the formal discussions between the Commission-General and the Indonesian Delegation, nor did they meet President Soekarno or Dr. Hatta—indeed, on this latter point, and on their failure to visit Republican territory, the Indonesian press has been sharply critical. Nevertheless, during the earlier days after their arrival in Batavia both Dr. Beel and M. Jonkman had many friendly and informal discussions with M. Sjarir—which, however, led nowhere.

The Netherlands Ministers became firmly convinced that the Republicans were playing for time, well knowing that the Dutch could not afford to wait in the face of the severe strain that the situation was already placing on their exchange resources and which, the Dutch maintained, could only be relieved by the immediate establishment of Dutch-operated exchange control for the whole of Indonesia. No doubt they are right in this view, for the Indonesians have made no secret of their unwillingness to compromise on economic matters so long as the Netherlands Authorities fail to reduce the number of their armed forces in the N.E.I.

The Indonesians claim, in fact, that far from implementing Article 16 of the Linggadjati Agreement, the Dutch are actually increasing the number of their troops. The extreme bitterness of this contention has shown itself in the Republican press, while M. Sjarir, himself, has quite openly expressed the opinion that all other questions would become susceptible of easy adjustment once the major issue of military force were disposed of. He felt strongly, however, that until some concrete steps have been taken toward the fulfilment of this important obligation and the possibility of attempting a solution by force was thus removed it would be unreasonable to expect the Republicans to give way, or even meet the Dutch half-way on economic issues.

The Commission-General, on the other hand, take the view that their responsibilities to the Hague preclude any possibility of Dutch forces being withdrawn or reduced before a settlement has been reached for a satisfactory working arrangement on the more general major questions: the premature withdrawal of their troops, they maintain, would expose the lives of a large number of helpless people to grave danger.

Thus there is complete deadlock with each side accusing the other of being entirely devoid of any spirit of co-operation. The Commission-General's view that the situation has become quite hopeless and that nothing can be expected from further discussions is shared by both Dr. Beel and M. Jonkman, who have let it be known that on their return to The Hague they intend to lay before the Cabinet a proposal which will provide for the restricted use of force in the last resort. As a result of this intimation there has been a good deal of careless jingo talk in all circles of the local Dutch community, and corresponding resentment in Indonesian circles.

Finally, Dr. Beel decided that an eleventh-hour endeavour to break the deadlock should be made. Accordingly, before his departure from Batavia, the comprehensive scheme which he had in mind was preliminarily outlined to M. Sjarir by M. Jonkman, and on the 28th May the proposals were formally presented by Dr. van Mook. They contained five principal points, which may be summarised as follows:—

1. Instead of waiting for the constitution of the United States of Indonesia in 1949, an interim Government be set up forthwith on federal lines, including all existing political units of Indonesia and working through joint departments in co-operation with the N.E.I. Government. At the head would be a transitional federal council in which a casting vote would rest with the representative of the Dutch Crown. A parallel council to be set up at The Hague;
2. Foreign Relations to be placed temporarily under an all-Indonesian Board presided over by the Head of the Dutch Far Eastern Directorate. Its Secretariat to train Indonesians for appointments in the Dutch/Indonesian Foreign Service. In the meantime specific Diplomatic, Consular and Trade Commissioners' posts to be reserved for Indonesians;
3. A joint Directorate to be set up to ensure military co-operation and handle matters of internal safety and defence. Order to be maintained by a joint gendarmerie and military forces of both sides to be withdrawn to garrisons;
4. Foreign trade and exchange to be put under a Central Control Board. This Board to comprise 4 representatives of the Republican Government, 3 representatives of the Netherlands and N.E.I. Governments, and East Indonesia and Borneo each to have 1 representative; the President of the Javaische Bank also to be a member of the Board, ex officio. The sale of estate produce to be undertaken by the Board. The return of estates to

For "the Board" read "an ad hoc Board."

These proposals were accompanied by a lengthy commentary, the final paragraph of which makes it clear that the Commission-General have reached the final stage of their negotiations for the implementation of the Agreement; also that they consider it will be impossible to entertain any modifications of the new proposals, which have been drawn up as the result of previous consultations with the Republican Delegation. The memorandum ends by stating that, in view of the pressing urgency, the Commission-General feel that they must demand an answer from the Republican Delegation within 14 days. Should this answer reject the proposals or prove unsatisfactory, the Commission-General consider that it will then be necessary to decline to enter into further discussions in the matter and will refer the question of what other steps are to be taken to the Netherlands Government.

The Commission-General have expressed the hope that His Majesty's Government and the U.S.A. will exert their influence to persuade the Indonesians to respond favourably to the proposals. They have also conveyed the impression that, in the event of the proposals being rejected, the answer to a delicate situation might possibly be found in joint Anglo-American arbitration. It is understood, however, that Mr. Sjarir's first reaction is on the whole favourable. He and his colleagues are now considering the proposals at a Cabinet Meeting at Jogjakarta. But they are intensely suspicious of the sincerity of the Dutch and cannot forget that when outlining the scheme orally, Mr. Jonkman told Mr. Sjarir quite bluntly that unless an agreement was reached the Dutch would resort to force.

In the meantime the local situation is aggravated by an increasing tendency towards separatist movements within the framework of the United States of Indonesia, which the Indonesians suspect the Dutch of encouraging.

that on the 29th May, plans were discovered to sabotage the Goodyear Rubber Factory. Explosives, sufficient to put the factory out of operation for several months, were found and a number of men were arrested. Reports state that some of these men belong to the Republican National Army.

While the Dutch daily newspaper in Batavia, Nieuwsgier is carrying a number of articles by the Editor, written after his visit to the interior, which are considered well balanced and not unfriendly to the Republic, Dutch and Republican commentators, generally speaking, are indulging in mutual recriminations. The Indonesians are bitter on the subject of the arrival of additional Netherlands forces and, since the latest Dutch proposals have been made public, tension in general has increased. The Republican newspaper Nasional, published in Jogjakarta, denies the Dutch accusation that the Indonesian leaders have shown a lack of will to co-operate, and describes the proposals as the N.E.I. Government's last card.

When the Legislature reassembled on the 10th May, it was the Prime Minister's intention that he and his Government should resign as soon as certain matters of a more or less routine nature had been dealt with, which, he estimated, would occupy about a week. He believed that the effect of this action would be for both Houses to express the wish that he should return to office and undertake the task of forming a new Cabinet. In discussing this matter with H.M. Ambassador, he appeared confident of his ability to count on wholehearted support from the Constitutionalists and Independents and, by clearing up certain misunderstandings, he hoped also to win the support of the Co-operatives, thus ensuring a safe majority over the followers of both Nai Kuang and the ex-Dictator, Luang Pibul. He expressed the view that, while it was

5. The de facto Republican Government to accord immediate recognition to the independent States of West Borneo and East Indonesia as partners on a federal basis.

These proposals were accompanied by a lengthy commentary, the final paragraph of which makes it clear that the Commission-General have reached the final stage of their negotiations for the implementation of the Agreement; also that they consider it will be impossible to entertain any modifications of the new proposals, which have been drawn up as the result of previous consultations with the Republican Delegation. In the meantime the local situation is aggravated by an increasing tendency towards separatist movements within the framework of the United States of Indonesia, which the Indonesians suspect the Dutch of encouraging.

The Soendanese movement to create an independent State of Pasoendan (see Summary No. 392) was suddenly brought into prominence at Buitenzorg on the 23rd May, when, according to press reports, unarmed supporters of this movement surprised and overran all the Republican Administrative offices in the town. The Soendanese People's Party then appealed to the Dutch military authorities to protect the buildings, which request was complied with by the posting of Dutch armed guards. Another report, carried by The Times is that on the 29th May, plans were discovered to sabotage the Goodyear Rubber Factory. improbable that Pibul would himself make an open bid for the Premiership, it was highly likely that his followers might throw their weight on the side of Nai Kuang's Democratic Party in the hope of reaping suitable rewards if that party came to power.

As so often happens, however, events did not work out according to plan. On the very day on which the Government had intended to announce their resignation the Democratic Party unexpectedly assumed the initiative by pressing the Prime Minister to face up to a debate on a motion of censure, the attack taking the line that the present Government's mismanagement of state affairs and their inability to put an end to corruption and to suppress smuggling have brought the prestige of the country to a low ebb.

Luang Dhamrong decided to accept the challenge, but let it be known that, whatever the outcome, the Government would resign immediately after the debate. The attack was launched with considerable bitterness and made the more difficult for the Prime Minister by the introduction of references to the continued mystery of the late King's death. Luang Dhamrong is reported to have countered with considerable skill. Nevertheless the debate occupied the whole of nine days, finally coming to an end on the afternoon of the 26th May, in a victory for the Government by 31 votes. The following day the Cabinet resigned and on the 29th May, at a joint meeting of both Houses of Assembly Luang Dhamrong was re-elected by 139 votes to 55 and invited to form a new Cabinet—a personal triumph indeed!

The formation of the new Government has already been completed and, as had been expected, is very largely a reshuffle of the outgoing Cabinet. The only newcomer of importance is Nai Arthakitti Banomyong, who becomes Minister for Foreign Affairs. A half-brother of the Senior Statesman, Nai Pridi Banomyong, the new Foreign Minister was the accredited Minister to Sweden and the U.S.S.R. and has just returned to Siam from Stockholm.

It is also understood that the Prime Minister intends to take personal charge of all negotiations concerning the rice problem and that, as soon as his new Ministers have taken office, he will issue an official statement of the Government's decision to control prices at least until the end of the year. To H.M. Ambassador he intimated that "at least" would most probably mean until the end of 1948.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

President Truman has now signed both the Greco-Turkish Aid and the post-UNRRA Relief Bills and has, by Executive Order, authorized the Secretary of State to exercise, through such agencies as he may designate, all the powers conferred upon him by these measures. At the same time Congress has been assured by Senator Vandenburg and by Representative Charles A. Eaton that no further relief appropriations for foreign countries will be sought this session. At his press conference on the 20th May, at which he stated that he likewise did not anticipate any further proposals for extending financial assistance abroad in the immediate future, apart from the War Department appropriations for the occupied areas and a possible 78 million dollars for rehabilitation purposes in Korea, Mr. Marshall drew attention to the fact that the whole question of foreign relief was now being studied by the newly-created Policy Planning Committee of the State Department. This Committee, it has been suggested, may have a "global" plan ready by the end of October, and the President may then call a special session of Congress to deal with it. After adjourning on the 31st of next month Congress would normally not assemble again until January 1948. Before its adjournment it has to appropriate the actual funds for the Greco-Turkish and post-UNRRA relief programmes. These, as the Chairman of the House of Representatives Appropriations Committee has intimated, may be lumped together with the War Department estimates for the occupied areas and a possible 73·5 million dollar contribution to the International Refugee Organization in one omnibus Bill which would be given consideration this month.

There is little prospect at the moment of an agreed policy among Republican leaders to cope with the "major problem" (as one of their own newspapers describes it) of the long-term use to which the United States should put its economic strength in the present "shattered world." The Republican party's outstanding internationalist, Mr. Harold Stassen, now believes the solution of this problem to lie in the formulation of a bold "lend-lease programme for peace." Addressing an American Legion celebration at Jefferson, Iowa, on the 21st May, at his first major public-speaking engagement since returning from Europe, Mr. Stassen urged the United States to devote ten per cent of its total farm and factory production over the next decade to building up "world-wide peace, plenty and freedom." For this it could receive adequate repayment in long-term agreements for "fair access" to raw materials in other parts of the globe. On the other hand, the Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Mr. John Taber, who is the symbol rather than the leader of the forces working to curtail American expenditure abroad, professes to believe that large-scale retrenchment will be possible once a formal peace has been concluded with the ex-enemy countries. He consequently subscribes wholeheartedly to the new thesis that the United States should begin to think about saving its own pockets by writing separate treaties with Germany and Japan.

This thesis has been put forward in a memorandum by ex-President Hoover, whom Mr. Taber invited on the 27th May to testify before a sub-committee of his Appropriations Committee on the War Department estimates for the occupied areas. While supporting the proposed estimates of 725 million dollars, Mr. Hoover called for a drastic revision of the present occupation and reparations policies and for the abolition of the "whole concept of 'levels of industry.'" He went on to state that, if the next Foreign Ministers' Conference is not able to agree upon "more constructive policies," the United States might "contemplate a separate peace" with a "temporary centralized German Government" in the British and American zones. As for Japan, the United States should "at once summon the peace conference" and permit "as many nations as wish" to come to terms with that country. Hailed by the New York Herald-Tribune as "hardly less significant than the Truman Doctrine," this memorandum represents an interesting advance in Republican thought on the subject of Germany since Mr. John Foster Dulles delivered his much-discussed speech in New York on the 17th January (see Summary No. 377). It also sets a new goal for the present State Department policy of threatening to "go to it alone" (as for example in Korea) if the Soviet Union continues to prove refractory.

The readiness of the House Appropriations Committee to prune the 1947–48 Budget even where the national interest is most vitally affected was once more demonstrated on the 29th May when the Committee recommended a cut of 8·3 per cent. in the Army's purely military expenditures. This recommendation, which follows the approval by the House itself of a reduction of 11 per cent. in the Navy's estimates, was made in the teeth of strong opposition from the Secretary of War, Mr. Patterson, and the Chief of Staff, General Eisenhower. It was also made at a time when the Administration was endeavouring to awaken the legislature more fully to the requirements of national defence. Only three days previously the President had sent to Congress a message calling attention to the pressing need for passing the Inter-American Military Co-operation Bill. This measure, as Mr. Truman pointed out, was originally proposed last summer. It had then been pigeon-holed after being reported out favourably by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. The bill authorizes the standardization of training and equipment among Western Hemisphere countries and permits the President to transfer war material to other American republics.

The major struggle of the State Department during the past two weeks has been to prevent Congress from writing into the Administration's price-support Bill, a provision to impose "import fees"—i.e., a prohibitive tariff in only very thin disguise—on foreign wool in a manner which would seriously tie the hands of the U.S. delegation at the Geneva I.T.O. Conference. The House approved this provision on the 23rd May by a standing vote of 151 to 65, despite representations to the contrary by Mr. Will Clayton, the head of the Geneva delegation, and the recent warning by Mr. Acheson, in his World Trade Week broadcast, that it was the "responsibility of the giant of the economic world to take the lead in reducing the tariff and other barriers that obstruct the healing and enriching flow of world trade." The fact that Mr. Marshall saw fit to condemn the action of the House at his press conference on the 29th has been taken to indicate that the President will veto the Bill if it is sent to him for signature in its present form.

Mr. Truman is also expected to veto the 4,000 million-dollar income tax reduction Bill, which the Senate approved on the 28th May. The vote on this measure was 52 to 34, which leaves its sponsors doubtful whether they will be able to muster a final two-thirds majority to override the President. As regards labour legislation, the Republicans are confident that they will be able to place their new Bill—officially entitled "The Labour-Management Relations Act of 1947 ''—on the statute book with or without the assent of Mr. Truman. At the moment the President is faced with the unenviable choice of risking the loss of the labour vote in the 1948 election if he accepts this Bill or of alienating other large sections of the community if he rejects it. In the slightly less punitive form in which it has emerged from a Senate-House Committee Conference the Bill is said to enjoy a wide measure of support among the general public. Mr. Walter Lippman, for example, claims that it '' does not divide the country but in fact unites a very large majority of the people '' and that it is '' a statesmanlike effort to carry out the popular will.''

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

There are now signs that the much-deferred Rio de Janeiro Conference on Hemisphere Defence may soon be held. The main obstacle is still the indeterminate state of relations between the United States and Argentina. In a recent interview Mr. Marshall dropped a private hint that he had put a scheme for a general settlement before President Truman. According to the New York Times of the 23rd May, the Secretary of State has decided, despite the opposition of Mr. Braden, to supply United States military and naval equipment to Latin America. No specific reference was made to Argentina, though the New York Times alleged that Great Britain, '' now released from her war-time agreement with the United States, has been peddling modern war equipment in her drive to get hard foreign money. She recently sold several jet fighter aircraft to Argentina.''

Also on the 23rd May, the Argentine Foreign Minister told journalists that eight more Nazi agents had been deported, that all dangerous Nazis were now regarded as listed for deportation (i.e., when they were captured), and that Argentina had thus fulfilled all her international obligations. This statement, which is obviously intended to emphasize that there is no longer any ground for discrimination against Argentina, is linked by the United States press with the recent meeting of the Presidents of Argentina and Brazil at the Brazilian-Argentine frontier, though official accounts of the meeting make no reference to discussions on inter-American affairs.

Argentina

Señora Perón proposes to visit this country at the end of June or beginning of July after her entertainment by General Franco and the Pope. Her insistence on making the most of her visit to Europe suggests that she is, after all, confident of the strength of her position in Buenos Aires (see Summary No. 392). Though she is not the first wife of a President of Argentina to graduate from the stage, her background is more questionable than that of her predecessors; and Argentine society, which is far from Peronista, has not opened its doors to her. Señora Perón has found abundant outlet for her restless energies in the realms of politics, labour and commerce, but these activities have not broken down the resistance of '' society.'' She has been photographed rather ostentatiously in clerical company, and her solicitude for compulsory Catholic education appears to have led to her invitation to the Vatican. Her ambition is to be received by the Pope, a European dictator, a President and, if possible, a Crowned Head.

Bolivia

A situation of considerable strain has arisen at Catavi, the scene of the massacre of 1942. In the middle of May, most of the foreign mining staff left Catavi for Oruro on the ground that their lives were in danger. Control of the mines had apparently passed into the hands of the miners' unions. Though the Government tried to get the men and the companies to resume work, the companies maintained that a start could not be made without the foreign staff, who refused to return under existing conditions. The British and United States nationals remaining at Catavi are reported to have been placed under house arrest, but were released and reached Oruro.

Guatemala

H.M. Minister at Guatemala City has had a talk with President Arévalo with the object of finding out what the Guatemalan view of an out-of-court settlement may be. It is only to be expected that British views regarding this matter would be limited to carrying out the Treaty of 1859, while the Guatemalans are obviously intent on gaining territory. Nevertheless, in view of Guatemala's reluctance to accept the British offer to submit the case to the International Court, it might have been hoped that the Guatemalans were aware of the feebleness of their legal arguments, and would therefore reduce their '' demands.'' In fact President Arévalo proposes that we should forthwith cede all territory south of the 17th parallel and leave the question of sovereignty of all territory north of this line to be discussed at the end of another fifty years '' when the positions of Great Britain and Guatemala might have undergone radical changes.''

Absurd as President Arévalo's suggestion is, it clearly shows the dangerous way in which the Guatemalans have hypnotized themselves with their '' claims.'' The last sentence of President Arévalo's proposal is not perhaps deliberately intended to be insulting, but the insinuation reflects the extent to which Great Britain's financial difficulties have affected her standing in parts of Latin America.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Freedom of Information

At its first session held in February 1947 the Commission on Human Rights, it may be recalled, decided to establish a Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, the terms of reference of which were (a) to examine what rights, obligations and practices should be included in the concept of freedom of information, and (b) to carry out any other instructions of the Economic and Social Council or of the Human Rights Commission. In due course the Economic and Social Council requested the sub-commission to '' submit recommendations regarding the programme of the Conference on Freedom of Information, and to assist in its preparation.'' This World Conference has to be convened before the end of 1947, according to a resolution of the General Assembly of the 14th December, 1946. Thus, the sub-commission, which began its first session on the 19th May, has a two-fold task.

The members of the sub-commission were chosen as individuals, for their abilities and experience in the subject, and not as Government Representatives. Mr. Robin Cruikshank, of the News Chronicle group of newspapers, was one of the twelve persons so chosen. Mr. Cruikshank has not been able to attend the present meeting, but he has been represented by Mr. A. R. K. Mackenzie. The members from France and Panamá are also represented by substitutes. It was decided in the first meeting by 6 votes to 3 that substitutes should not only take part in discussions, but should have the right to vote.

M. Goedhart (Netherlands) was elected Chairman of the Sub-Commission, M. Sychrava (Czechoslovakia) Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Ferguson (Canada) rapporteur.

On the 20th May, the Sub-Commission began work on plans for the World Press Conference and decided by 6 votes to 2 to recommend Europe as its meeting place. A Russian proposal to fix on either Geneva or Prague, where the Czechoslovaks offered all facilities, was defeated, and the final choice was left to the Economic and Social Council. Non-member States are to be invited, and a Soviet proposal giving them full voting rights was carried by 9 votes to 2. Previously the Soviet member, M. Lomakin, had opposed the grant of voting rights to substitutes. M. Lomakin began by working closely with his colleagues; but he soon receded into Russian idiosyncracy. Among other preliminary decisions reached in the early sessions are the following: (1) that the Secretariat should circulate a questionnaire on the regulations regarding Freedom of Information in various countries. M. Lomakin opposed this. It has not yet been decided whether this questionnaire should be sent only to Governments or whether it should also go to appropriate international non-governmental organisations. On being informed that U.N.E.S.C.O. had issued a batch of 1,500 questions on the subject to eleven European countries plus China and the Philippines, the Sub-Commission issued a warning against duplication of effort; (2) that the Press Conference should observe in general the rules of procedure of the World Health Conference; (3) that invitations to the Conference should go, on request, to specialized agencies, Category '' A '' non-governmental organisations and the International Organisation of Journalists.

M. Lomakin's wish to define the objectives of the press in terms of anti-fascism, anti-warmongering, &c., remained unfulfilled. Instead, a Philippine proposal, amended by Mr. Mackenzie, was carried, that the different media of communication, in performing their basic function of gathering and disseminating information, '' should have regard to telling the truth, maintaining peace and security, promoting human rights and aiding the solution of economic, social and humanitarian problems.'' None of this was pleasing to

M. Lomakin, though it was carried by 7 votes to 1.

The Sub-Commission also defined information in relation to the world Conference, as " the following means of bringing current situations, events and opinions thereon to the knowledge of the public: newspapers, news periodicals, radio broadcasts, and new reels." Mr. Mackenzie opposed this definition as being too narrow, but was defeated by 5 votes to 4.

The Palestine Committee

On the 2nd June the Special Committee chose as its chairman Chief Justice Sandstrom of Sweden, with Mr. Ulloa, Peru, as vice-chairman, and decided to invite the Mandatory Power, the Arab Higher Committee and the Jewish Agency to send liaison representatives to the Committee.

International Emergency Food Council

At the fourth meeting of the International Emergency Food Council, which began on the 26th May, the Secretary-General, Mr. D. A. Fitzgerald, gave a serious warning about the progressive fall in the world's food stocks and the probability that Europe and Asia would have to face another year of food shortage in 1948. He read a letter from Mr. Clinton Anderson, the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, urging that a conference be held in Europe not later than mid-July, to be attended by Ministers of Food and Agriculture, and by their administrative and technical advisers to impress on all concerned the urgent necessity of collecting, husbanding and distributing in orderly fashion for human food the greatest possible amount from their indigenous supplies. Mr. Anderson developed this text by saying that, if the home-produced food supplies of the deficiency countries were not effectively utilised, the food problem a year hence would be even worse than it was now. The prospective decline of food grain production in N.W. Europe in the current harvest year would call for an import programme of some 20 million tons—assuming this amount could be collected and transported. The export programme from the U.S.A., the greatest in history, was between 14 and 15 million tons; and, even if other exporters, such as Canada, Australia and Argentina, could increase their exports in like proportion, a critical grain shortage next spring and summer could not be avoided. Importers must contrive to collect and distribute for human use a much greater proportion of their own crops than they were doing now. This action might be hard to get started, but the urgency of starting it must be realised.

The Council adopted the proposal to call a Conference, and appointed a sub-committee to decide where and when. Mr. Maurice Hutton for U.K., while not directly opposing the suggestion, said he was very doubtful whether a full-dress Conference would carry things any further forward than they were. He suggested that the meeting should be a special session of the I.E.F.C. Cereals Committee, which Ministers of Food and Agriculture should be asked to attend.

In the end, the I.E.F.C. voted (on the 28th May) to call a Special Emergency Conference on Cereals and to ask F.A.O. to issue invitations to responsible Ministers to meet in Europe about the third week in July. The United Kingdom vote was the only one cast against this motion, but not less than eighteen other nations abstained.

GERMANY

The Government Heads of Berlin and all the German Laender, except the Saar, journeyed to Munich for their first joint conference on the 5th June. The Eastern Premiers had refused until the last minute to say definitely whether they were coming and had tried to get the conference transferred to Berlin and to secure representation for the parties and trade unions. Their arrival, therefore, had the air of conferring a favour, but their subsequent actions showed that the journey was hardly more than a tactical move designed to display Eastern solidarity and to fasten on the other Laender the stigma of "federalism," in their language tantamount to "unpatriotism." The course of the conference showed once again how German differences reflect those of the Occupying Powers. When the agenda for the conference was discussed on the 5th June, the Eastern Premiers submitted a motion that "the formation of a German central administration by an understanding among the democratic parties and trade unions on the establishment of a German unitary state should be placed on the agenda." This was outvoted and, as a result, the Eastern Premiers walked out and left Munich. In a communiqué afterwards they declared that although they had been assured that they might make suggestions for the agenda they found on their arrival that an unchangeable programme had been made. A further comment was issued stating that only a plebiscite could decide the structure of Germany and that the principal reason for the increasing misery of the Germans was the far-reaching tolerance of Nazi elements and the continuance of large concerns and large landholders in many parts of Germany. The Premiers also demanded increased coal production and nationalisation of the mines. The other side of the question was given in a communiqué by the Bavarian Government. This stated that during discussions in the preliminary commissions, which the Eastern Premiers declined to attend, it had been announced that an express avowal of German unity would be made and also that the necessity for German unity must be stressed in all items of the agenda. The other Premiers thought, however, that this question should not form a separate item on the agenda. Their attitude is understandable. They were, of course, unwilling to commit themselves to unity on the Socialist Unity Party's terms; moreover the conference was called to discuss such questions as food, denazification and refugees and representatives from the French zone had been forbidden to discuss political matters. It can hardly be doubted that the Eastern Premiers had no intention of remaining at a conference where they could be outvoted on every occasion. Suspicions on this score are not dispelled by Dr. Paul of Thuringia, who flaunted in the faces of press reporters the five shirts in his ample baggage as proof positive that he "had seriously expected to attend the whole conference."

The rump conference passed a number of resolutions for submission to the Occupying Powers. These included: immediate revision of the industrial plan; transfer to Germany of all responsibility for interzonal trade; simpler procedure for foreign trade and the granting of exit rights to German business men; credits for the import of food and raw materials and admission under normal conditions to the world markets and world fishing grounds; lower occupation costs, less timber felling and less coal exports. The Premier of Bavaria, Dr. Ehard, pointed out that it was not surprising if Germany, after being cut off from the world for eight years, was not fully conscious that her distress was a common one. In spite of this admission, the resolutions call for more Allied help than for German effort. An exception is the proposal that certain central States committees, including one for prisoners-of-war, should be set up to advise the Allies. It is not stated how this is to be achieved and it seems unlikely that the conference will have practicable results. In Berlin, the Communist press has enjoyed the conference as an occasion for fresh attacks on the Western Powers.

The boundaries of the Saar, which were extended in July 1946, have again been changed by the French authorities. In the North-west, the area has been reduced by detaching most of Kreis Saarburg which forms the hinterland of Trier on the right of the river Moselle. A strip about six miles wide in the South still links the Saar with Luxembourg. Otherwise, the extended area of 1946 is retained with the addition of a strip of territory in the North-east of about 45 sq. miles which contains a branch railway from Ottweiler to Turkismuehle. The addition to the 1919 territory is now one of some 35 per cent. instead of 50 per cent. in area. On the 15th June a Saar mark will be introduced for the Saar area at the rate of 12 francs to 1 Saar mark. This, with the existing customs control means virtual separation of the Saar from Germany. H.M. Government have informed the French Government that, subject always to decisions to be taken at the final peace settlement and to a satisfactory agreement being reached on the adjustment of the French reparations claim so as to take into account the value of the Saar, they have no objection to the boundaries of the Saar as now proposed nor to the French intention to proceed with their plan to issue a new currency within the boundaries of the Saar as now defined, in place of German marks.

The food situation in the British zone shows no real improvement. There have been few demonstrations in the last fortnight, but morale is still extremely low and trade union leaders while continuing to cooperate with Mil. Gov. express grave anxiety for the future and feel that they have already lost hold over some of their members. The Military Governor, in a cautious statement on the 9th June, could only say that the present ration level (about two-thirds of the official 1,550 calories) could be maintained until the harvest and that subsequently slight increases might be possible. Lord Pakenham has again been in Germany for consultations. He was presented by Herr Luebke, Minister of Food for N. Rhine/Westphalia, with a detailed plan for improving the food situation. This is now being studied. The chief features of the proposal according to press reports, are that the Germans in the British and United States zones should be able to buy imports on their own account. Herr Luebke estimated that they could produce half the fat they needed and should import the rest. By also importing a large quantity of maize annually as fodder, they would be able to feed enough pigs to export bacon in payment for other goods. This would mean a reversal of the present policy of restricting livestock in favour of crops. Hitherto, Allied dietary experts have considered fat supplies less essential to good health than have most Germans. Herr Luebke also wants to build up long-term reserves of bread grain by imports. This, together with the maize, would represent a higher level than that of present imports and is clearly dependent on world supplies. Herr Luebke also believes that foreign countries will be ready to grant Germany credits, while, as an internal measure, he wishes to increase production of synthetic fatty acid and to re-start Germany's industry for the processing of oil-cake for re-export. Meanwhile, as forecast last week, it has been announced that rewards for "good" farmers as well as penalties for "bad" farmers in the bi-zonal area are being planned on the basis of German proposals.

According to Die Neue Zeitung (U.S. Zone) there have been food demonstrations in three areas of the Soviet zone. To counter the effects of such reports, an official statement from the zone has given details of food rations which show that miners and normal consumers receive roughly the same amount as those in the Anglo-U.S. zone, but that heavy and very heavy workers in the East get much less. It was claimed that rations, on the whole, were honoured. Despite optimistic reports about agricultural production, there have been official admissions of serious deficiencies and there is unlikely to be any real surplus which could be sent to the western zones. Signs of the beginning of collective farms on the Soviet model have been reported from Mecklenburg. The Minister of Agriculture told a press correspondent on the 19th May that the land reform scheme had been modified so that some of the bigger farms were now run by a dozen or more families as State enterprises.

The past fortnight has witnessed a number of positive achievements such as the bi-zonal reorganisation, work at a high level on land reform plans for the British zone, and discussions on a revised level of industry for the bi-zonal area. Yet the backcloth to these efforts has once again depicted partisan strivings, not confined to the Munich Conference, in which activity far exceeded results. At the four-Power level the Control Council has failed to agree on the number of occupation troops which should be permitted. In Berlin, agreement has not yet been reached about the appointment of a successor to the Lord Mayor, Dr. Ostrowski, and the arena of four-Power dissension has been increased by Russia's decision to supply her sector with food on an independent basis. In the British zone, seven weeks after the elections, only Schleswig-Holstein has succeeded in forming a Cabinet. The main reason for delay in the other two States seems to have been the usual split within the Christian Democratic Union on the question of socialisation. In all three western zones, attempts to establish the Socialist Unity Party have continued. The use of misleading titles and of signatures obtained under false pretences has characterised the Communist attempt to circumvent Military Government opposition and to show that they have Social Democratic support. A fairly friendly interview was held with British officials on the 21st May; leaders of the Socialist Unity Party put their case for licence, but were firmly told that the party would not be permitted to form in any way. Pieck and Grotewohl visited Bremen on the 30th May when their speeches included such pacific remarks as the Germans must bear full responsibility for their present position and must desire cooperation between the Allies. This sounds strange in conjunction with Communist press onslaughts and inflammatory speeches against the occupying Powers. Herr Hoffmann, the trade union leader, has been rebuked by the Regional Commissioner for a speech of this type made in Remscheid on the 24th May.

AUSTRIA

Only three meetings of the Peace Treaty Commission have been held during the past week. While the Commission is still entangled in wearisome discussion on procedure, there seems a little hope that the stalemate of the past three weeks may yet be broken. Sir George Rendel, the U.K. representative, instead of suggesting the setting up of a tripartite (Western) committee of experts, has announced that U.K. experts have begun independent fact-finding work; while the Soviet representative has expressed his willingness to consider a French proposal as a basis for agreement. The U.K. representative has made clear his hope that other Delegations may see their way to authorising their experts to collaborate in the work of establishing facts and Mr. Lawson, the chief U.K. expert, has already approached U.S. and French experts to this end. M. Novikov, to whom the U.K. announcement can only have been unwelcome and embarrassing, in view of the marked Soviet opposition to any examination of concrete facts relating to German assets in Austria, contented himself at the last meeting on the 4th June with saying that there would be no objection to experts taking time off for research, but that the suggestion that other Delegations should co-operate amounted to an attempt to reach privately in committee an agreement which the Commission itself had failed to secure. The Soviet Delegation, however, recognised the right of each Delegation to present to the Committee of Experts all facts which it might consider relevant.

The compromise proposal advanced by the French Delegate on the 3rd June inclines far more to the views held by the Soviet Delegation than to those held by the other Western Delegates. It provides (1) that the Commission shall undertake a summary examination of the principal aspects of German assets in Austria in conjunction with Article 35 and the relevant sections of Article 42; (2) that the Commission's work shall extend to the mineral oil industry, navigation on the Danube, financial institutions and industry and any other aspects which the Commission shall decide on; and (3) that, after completion of the summary examination, the Commission shall determine the directions to be given to the Committee of Experts. The omission in the French proposal to any reference to fact-finding work by the Committee of Experts before the Commission has got through a certain programme of work would seem to be the clue to the Soviet willingness to consider the proposal. M. Novikov has stated that his Delegation have no desire to limit the discussion to the oil problem.

The Commission adjourned on the 4th June in order to allow M. Novikov to draft his amendments, and the other Western Delegates have agreed to discuss the French proposal when these amendments have been received. U.S. amendments include an important footnote to the effect that the U.S. Delegation regard as concrete facts any material that is so regarded by any Delegation. M. Novikov is reported to have returned to Moscow, presumably for consultations with his Government.

On the 1st June all Russian newspapers published for the first time a lengthy Tass report on the work of the Commission. The U.S. representative is accused of trying, with the support of the U.K. and French Delegates, to give the Commission a direction different from that laid down at the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow and of seeking to turn the Commission and Committee into a means of revising joint Allied decisions in the interests of Anglo-U.S. oil firms and Austrian capitalists who served the Germans during the period of the Anschluss. Similar views have been expressed by the Red Army newspaper in Austria, and the Communist Österreichische Volksstimme has blamed the Austrian Government as well as the United States for the Commission's deadlock. Comment in other Austrian papers has been scant, but headlines have indicated impatience and gloom.

There have been confused reports of possible changes in the Austrian Government. The Times, 10th June, stated that one of the Communist leaders, Ernst Fischer, had been approached by a member of the People's Party with regard to greater Communist participation in the Government. The Wiener Kurier of the 9th June, however, declared that Fischer had made this approach and had demanded sweeping changes on the grounds that the Soviet Government would make the signing of a treaty dependent on these. Fischer has since denied this threat. The Communists have of course been pressing for new elections and closer co-operation with the Soviet Union since the failure of the Moscow Conference.

General Lebedenko, Soviet Commander in Vienna, has issued independent instructions to the Police President of Vienna regarding the maintenance of public order in the Soviet sector. These reduce the period of notice of public meetings from three days (Inter-Allied Command instructions) to two; they permit the holding of spontaneous demonstrations (at present forbidden in Vienna) and define the duty of the police as merely to "keep an eye" on such demonstrations and to keep the Head of the Command and the Heads of the Districts "informed" of the proceedings. Help may be requested from the head of the (Soviet) Command if the police find themselves unable to maintain public order and when all their reserves are exhausted, but it is made clear that the Austrian police will have to justify their demand in face of Soviet scepticism. These instructions are no doubt intended to weaken police control in the Soviet sector, and would facilitate the formation of Communist mobs to invade other sectors. Another important factor in the situation is the inadequate armament of the Austrian police. This matter is still being examined by the Control Council who have, however, authorised the Austrian Government to equip the Vienna police with hardwood truncheons.

In the Allied Control Council Soviet efforts to block every attempt to restore

Austrian civil aviation continue. At the meeting on the 29th May the Soviet representative insisted that the completion of air disarmament in all zones must be confirmed by a quadripartite commission before any civil aviation project could be established.

Trade talks and agreements have been concluded recently between Austria and Czechoslovakia, Hungary, France and Poland. The Socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung, 20th May, painted a gloomy picture of Austria's economic situation and pointed out that these agreements were really only barter agreements since Austria did not possess the dollars to pay for imports. The coal and electricity crises were partly responsible for Austria's inability to carry out more than a minor share of her commitments in such barter agreements but the problem would never be solved satisfactorily until the Government introduced a planning law for the Austrian economy: such a law had been consistently opposed by the People's Party.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The problem of reaching a satisfactory solution to the strained relationships existing between the Slovak Democrats and the central Government continues to occupy the forefront of internal political interest. In this connexion the entire press has featured the interview which President Beneš recently granted to a delegation of Slovak journalists. Replying to specific questions posed by the delegates on this urgent problem Dr. Beneš besought Czechs and Slovaks alike to be frank—this has not always been the case—in the presentation of their demands for a permanent and explicit definition of the competence of the central Government, the Slovak National Council and the Board of Trustees. He reiterated his conviction, however, that, no matter what solution was eventually incorporated into the new Constitution, the central authority must wield effective control throughout the State. The President, a sincerely "western-minded" democrat who favours decentralisation, is thus placed between a Communist (or Soviet) Scylla and a dissentient Slovak Charybdis: he dare not advance too far his views on decentralisation particularly when they affect a province which is ardently pro-Catholic and anti-Marxist. Hence his path, severely limited by the close proximity of Soviet Russia and the predominance of the Communists at home, must perforce follow a line of cautious compromise if Czechoslovakia is to emerge as a synthesis of "East" and "West."

A more forthright viewpoint was expressed by M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister, in an interview to the same delegation. Stressing the need for raising Slovakia's material standards to those of the Czech Lands, he warned that neither "nation" could deviate from a unified political delevopment and that there was therefore no necessity for establishing new parties (this latter was probably a direct admonition against the formation of a National Democrat Party which would apparently be a fusion of Czech and Slovak Catholics. He uttered too a serious warning concerning the alleged activities of a "Hlinka Movement" within the ranks of the Democrats; in a later address to Prague Communists M. Gottwald stated that the "Democrats have made a pact with the Hlinka Party."

The ministerial utterance in turn provoked Dr. Lettrich, Democrat Chairman of the Slovak Council, to expound his opinion on the uneasy relationship. He admitted that the present relationship was unsatisfactory, but he could not accede to Government interference in the authority of the Council—in other words the Council must remain an independent organ.

In the meantime Communist-inspired attacks against the Democrat attitude continue unabated. The Government have over-ruled the decision to dismiss Dr. Daxner (see last week's Summary) whilst a mass meeting of Slovak Trade Union leaders and officials resolved that any threat to the "existence of the Republic and its characters as a people's democracy" must be resisted.

Slovak affairs are undergoing a strain which will tauten as the next election approaches. Recent events in Hungary and the general pattern of Soviet behaviour in other Balkan countries should serve as a salutary though probably vain warning to the reckless Slovak extremists, who since the Liberation have been one of the main embarrassments to President Beneš' attempt to preserve State unity.

be no objection to experts taking time off for research, but that the suggestion that other Delegations should co-operate amounted to an attempt to reach privately in committee an agreement which the Commission itself had failed to secure. The Soviet Delegation, however, recognised the right of each Delegation to present to the Committee of Experts all facts which it might consider relevant.

The compromise proposal advanced by the French Delegate on the 3rd June inclines far more to the views held by the Soviet Delegation than to those held by the other Western Delegates. It provides (1) that the Commission shall undertake a summary examination of the principal aspects of German assets in Austria in conjunction with Article 35 and the relevant sections of Article 42; (2) that the Commission's work shall extend to the mineral oil industry, navigation on the Danube, financial institutions and industry and any other aspects which the Commission shall decide on; and (3) that, after completion of the summary examination, the Commission shall determine the directions to be given to the Committee of Experts. The omission in the French proposal to any reference to fact-finding work by the Committee of Experts before the Commission has got through a certain programme of work would seem to be the clue to the Soviet willingness to consider the proposal. M. Novikov has stated that his Delegation have no desire to limit the discussion to the oil problem.

The Commission adjourned on the 4th June in order to allow M. Novikov to draft his amendments, and the other Western Delegates have agreed to discuss the French proposal when these amendments have been received. U.S. amendments include an important footnote to the effect that the U.S. Delegation regard as concrete facts any material that is so regarded by any Delegation. M. Novikov is reported to have returned to Moscow, presumably for consultations with his Government.

On the 1st June all Russian newspapers published for the first time a lengthy Tass report on the work of the Commission. The U.S. representative is accused of trying, with the support of the U.K. and French Delegates, to give the Commission a direction different from that laid down at the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow and of seeking to turn the Commission and Committee into a means of revising joint Allied decisions in the interests of Anglo-U.S. oil firms and Austrian capitalists who served the Germans during the period of the Anschluss. Similar views have been expressed by the Red Army newspaper in Austria, and the Communist Österreichische Volksstimme has blamed the Austrian Government as well as the United States for the Commission's deadlock. Comment in other Austrian papers has been scant, but headlines have indicated impatience and gloom.

There have been confused reports of possible changes in the Austrian Government. The Times, 10th June, stated that one of the Communist leaders, Ernst Fischer, had been approached by a member of the People's Party with regard to greater Communist participation in the Government. The Wiener Kurier of the 9th June, however, declared that Fischer had made this approach and had demanded sweeping changes on the grounds that the Soviet Government would make the signing of a treaty dependent on these. Fischer has since denied this threat. The Communists have of course been pressing for new elections and closer co-operation with the Soviet Union since the failure of the Moscow Conference.

General Lebedenko, Soviet Commander in Vienna, has issued independent instructions to the Police President of Vienna regarding the maintenance of public order in the Soviet sector. These reduce the period of notice of public meetings from three days (Inter-Allied Command instructions) to two; they permit the holding of spontaneous demonstrations (at present forbidden in Vienna) and define the duty of the police as merely to "keep an eye" on such demonstrations and to keep the Head of the Command and the Heads of the Districts "informed" of the proceedings. Help may be requested from the head of the (Soviet) Command if the police find themselves unable to maintain public order and when all their reserves are exhausted, but it is made clear that the Austrian police will have to justify their demand in face of Soviet scepticism. These instructions are no doubt intended to weaken police control in the Soviet sector, and would facilitate the formation of Communist mobs to invade other sectors. Another important factor in the situation is the inadequate armament of the Austrian police. This matter is still being examined by the Control Council who have, however, authorised the Austrian Government to equip the Vienna police with hardwood truncheons.

Austrian civil aviation continue. At the meeting on the 29th May the Soviet representative insisted that the completion of air disarmament in all zones must be confirmed by a quadripartite commission before any civil aviation project could be established.

Trade talks and agreements have been concluded recently between Austria and Czechoslovakia, Hungary, France and Poland. The Socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung, 20th May, painted a gloomy picture of Austria's economic situation and pointed out that these agreements were really only barter agreements since Austria did not possess the dollars to pay for imports. The coal and electricity crises were partly responsible for Austria's inability to carry out more than a minor share of her commitments in such barter agreements but the problem would never be solved satisfactorily until the Government introduced a planning law for the Austrian economy: such a law had been consistently opposed by the People's Party.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The problem of reaching a satisfactory solution to the strained relationships existing between the Slovak Democrats and the central Government continues to occupy the forefront of internal political interest. In this connexion the entire press has featured the interview which President Beneš recently granted to a delegation of Slovak journalists. Replying to specific questions posed by the delegates on this urgent problem Dr. Beneš besought Czechs and Slovaks alike to be frank—this has not always been the case—in the presentation of their demands for a permanent and explicit definition of the competence of the central Government, the Slovak National Council and the Board of Trustees. He reiterated his conviction, however, that, no matter what solution was eventually incorporated into the new Constitution, the central authority must wield effective control throughout the State. The President, a sincerely "western-minded" democrat who favours decentralisation, is thus placed between a Communist (or Soviet) Scylla and a dissentient Slovak Charybdis: he dare not advance too far his views on decentralisation particularly when they affect a province which is ardently pro-Catholic and anti-Marxist. Hence his path, severely limited by the close proximity of Soviet Russia and the predominance of the Communists at home, must perforce follow a line of cautious compromise if Czechoslovakia is to emerge as a synthesis of "East" and "West."

A more forthright viewpoint was expressed by M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister, in an interview to the same delegation. Stressing the need for raising Slovakia's material standards to those of the Czech Lands, he warned that neither "nation" could deviate from a unified political delevopment and that there was therefore no necessity for establishing new parties (this latter was probably a direct admonition against the formation of a National Democrat Party which would apparently be a fusion of Czech and Slovak Catholics. He uttered too a serious warning concerning the alleged activities of a "Hlinka Movement" within the ranks of the Democrats; in a later address to Prague Communists M. Gottwald stated that the "Democrats have made a pact with the Hlinka Party."

The ministerial utterance in turn provoked Dr. Lettrich, Democrat Chairman of the Slovak Council, to expound his opinion on the uneasy relationship. He admitted that the present relationship was unsatisfactory, but he could not accede to Government interference in the authority of the Council—in other words the Council must remain an independent organ.

In the meantime Communist-inspired attacks against the Democrat attitude continue unabated. The Government have over-ruled the decision to dismiss Dr. Daxner (see last week's Summary) whilst a mass meeting of Slovak Trade Union leaders and officials resolved that any threat to the "existence of the Republic and its characters as a people's democracy" must be resisted.

A special session of the Sejm was summoned on 30th May to which the Communist Minister of Industry, Mr. Minc, presented the text of six Bills for enactment and three Decrees, already operative, for confirmation. Though the stated purpose of this body of legislation is to combat inflation and remedy supply difficulties, it constitutes in fact a return to the more radical and extreme economic policy which the Communists were forced to drop some nine months ago.

Mr. Minc classified the bills in three groups, each of two bills. The first group concerns taxation and consists of one bill to increase the yield of the land tax paid by the peasants and a second creating "Social Commissions," i.e., groups of party members empowered to search out and denounce tax evaders. The second group introduces an "amnesty" for capital and profits hitherto undisclosed and provides facilities for its investment, thus forcing those with accumulated wealth to expose themselves to suspicion now or to penalties if discovered later. The third group concerns retail trade and sets up further Social Commissions to investigate the qualifications of shopkeepers and to enforce controlled prices by fine or suspension.

Of the three decrees, the first empowers the State Food Supply Fund to purchase food-stuffs direct from individual co-operatives, thus bye-passing Spolem, the Co-operative Wholesale Society. The second provides for the establishment of State department stores on the Soviet model and the third freezes prices of State-manufactured goods and State-provided services. In the recent controversy, Socialist spokesmen vigorously opposed the first two of these decrees which strike at the basis of their strength in the Co-operative Movement.

As to the difference of opinion between the two leading parties of the bloc which the discussion has revealed, two of the leading Communists, Messrs. Berman and Gomulka, have insisted that far from signifying a breach between them, it points the way to a fuller unity, based on an understanding of each other's idiosyncracies.

General Romejko, former Chief of Staff of the Polish air force, has been promoted to Commander-in-chief. He spent most of his career in the Soviet Union, but is believed to be of Polish origin. It is not known whether the Soviet General Polynin, former Commander-in-chief, has left Poland. The Polish press has recently emphasised that "very few Soviet instructors now remain in Poland." The promotion of General Romejko is presumably part of the general attempt to convince the Polish people that the air force is becoming increasingly independent.

M. Wladyslaw Raczkiewicz, who died in this country last week, was appointed as President of the Polish Republic in September 1939 by President Moscicki, who was unable to accompany the Polish political leaders who escaped to France. He had held many administrative posts, including four provincial governorships, and had been Minister of the Interior in three different cabinets. As President his efforts were mainly directed to maintaining a united front between the various groups of Poles in exile.

SOVIET UNION

During the past fortnight there has been a major Soviet propaganda campaign against the British and American press, with special reference to allegedly inaccurate and slanderous articles written about the Soviet Union by special correspondents since their return from the Moscow Conference. British correspondents, especially Ewer, Ashley and Clifford, have come off even worse than the Americans. The latest example is the correspondence between the Sovinform Bureau and the editor of the Daily Herald published in Moscow on the 3rd June about the non-publication by the Daily Herald of a Soviet reply to Mr. Ewer. This ends with the comment that the "central organ of the Labour Party" is the joint property of the capitalist Odham's Press (51 per cent.) and the T.U.C. and Labour Party (49 per cent.). (Soviet propaganda ignored the fact that, according to the Daily Herald's articles of association, control of policy is entirely in the hands of the T.U.C. directors.) The timing of this propaganda campaign against the Anglo-American press may have been connected with the discussions of the United Nations Sub-Commission for Freedom of the Press and Information. But it seems to go deeper than this, as Anglo-American correspondents in Moscow are now suffering even greater frustration than in the past and are once again being refused permission to make visits outside Moscow. The intensity of the anti-American propaganda campaign is perhaps best reflected in a recent authoritative statement by the deputy Chief of the Communist Party Propaganda Organisation to the effect that democratic circles no longer believed that another world threat would come from Germany. The threat was now from reactionary American circles who planned the world domination earlier sought by Hitler.

Soviet commentators have recently returned to the subject of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty extension negotiations with the special object, it would appear, of impressing upon the Soviet public that this country and not the Soviet Union was responsible for the lack of progress of these negotiations. M. Oleshchuk, the deputy Chief of the Communist Party Propaganda Organisation, made a number of one-sided and misleading references to the Anglo-Soviet Treaty negotiations in an important lecture on the 30th May, reviewing international developments since the Moscow Conference. The Secretary of State had failed, he said, to take back from Moscow a Soviet signature to an extended treaty as the Soviet Government had found it necessary to include a guarantee that neither party would join a coalition hostile to the other. Britain was, however, now a member of the Anglo-Saxon bloc hostile to the Soviet Union. The latest proof of the existence of such a bloc was the "Cards on the Table" pamphlet stating that the Soviet Union was trying to liquidate the British Empire and that the United States was helping Britain to withstand a possible struggle with the Soviet Union. Oleshchuk referred in this context to the proposed quadripartite treaty on Germany which had also not been signed because, for the Soviet Union, it would only have been a paper guarantee. The key to the question was the possible United States attitude in the event of a future war between Germany and the U.S.S.R.; despite the quadripartite treaty, the United States might well join the German side, and hence the Soviet Union demanded real guarantees before signing. An editorial in the latest available number of New Times also discussed the treaty negotiations, alleging that British leaders were concealing from the public why they are resisting the Soviet proposals for improving the agreement and abolishing its weak clauses, the essential point being, it is stated, that the British Government refuses to take upon itself the obligation not to participate in any blocs directed against the Soviet Union. This is disguised behind baseless allegations that the Soviet Union wishes to prevent Britain from maintaining friendly and business co-operation with the United States or France or any other country.

Soviet comment on the British proposals for the "change-over" in India is on strictly orthodox Marxist lines. Though a reasonably full and fair London Tass summary of the Prime Minister's statement on India on the 3rd June was published prominently in most Soviet papers on the 5th June, it was immediately followed by another London Tass item summarising the Daily Worker criticism on the Government plan for India, as a typical example of the traditional British divide and rule policy, which had never settled any problems. The Indian masses it was maintained, would continue the struggle for freedom. Further evidence of Soviet views on India was provided by a lecture on the 4th June by E. Zhukov, a member of the Academy of Sciences and one of the Soviet visitors to the recent Inter-Asian Conference in New Delhi. He referred to the Prime Minister's offer of Dominion status which, though overdue, was even now "aimed at postponing the grant of independence." In view of the successful post-war struggle for independence of the "colonial" peoples in North Asia and of the development of a working class movement in India, Britain has been compelled to find a new form of relationship to cover the continued domination by British capitalists. Zhukov also dealt very critically with the existing Indian parties and leaders, all of whom came from the bourgeoisie, feared their own exploited working class and preferred the maintenance of close ties with Britain to co-operation with the Americans, who being stronger than the British would leave no scope for rising Indian capitalism. The Indian bourgeoisie also wished to maintain the alliance with Britain because of their fear of the Soviet Union. The leaders of both the Moslem League and Congress were described as mainly reactionary landowners and industrialists, the most reactionary and anti-Communist Right Wing Congress element being led by Ghandi and Patel. "The essence of the Ghandi programme is to keep the people disarmed and to retard progress." Nehru was treated more kindly, but with reserve. Jinnah was described as "more British than the British" and his Pakistan scheme was said to have been inspired by the British as a means of dividing and ruling, Pakistan remaining the main hope of the British. Nevertheless, "the Moslem League was somewhat more progressive than Congress." It is interesting to note that Zhukov also stated that the Indian Communist Party wish to see the country divided into independent States, with the right of self-determination and social and cultural development, economic unity and the right to join or remain outside an all-Indian union. This was the only correct way to grant true independence to the different communities, he concluded.

The Social Democrats, particularly in western Europe, have been the subject of a general attack in Pravda; the article is probably timed to coincide with the meeting of the Second International now being held in Zürich. The right wing Social Democrats who were not working in with the communists were accused by Pravda of reviving the social democratic policy of the inter-war years, viz., that of forming a bloc with the bourgeoisie and splitting the working class movement, the British Labour Party being regarded as the arch sinner in this direction. Pravda reminded its public that Mussolini had started as a Socialist and suggested that similar " blood hounds of the bourgeoisie " were even now once again paving the way to power for Fascism. There is nothing new in this policy of stressing the community of interest between the Social Democrats and the bourgeoisie. It has been used by the Communist Party of the U.S.S.R. ever since the Revolution.

Scandinavian affairs have been in the foreground during the past week. The report on defence measures by the Swedish commander-in-chief General Jung was criticised in Pravda by Major-General Galaktionov for putting before the Swedish public the picture of a war between east and west as a real possibility and for hinting that Sweden might be used as an advantageous base for the western powers in the event of such a conflict. This had been taken up by some organs of the Swedish press which were ready to sell their country to the dollar under the banner of independence and democracy. Summing up, General Galaktionov said that a new foreign policy was being thrust on Sweden, a policy of militarism and hostility to the U.S.S.R.

In this connection it is of interest that the well-known Soviet journalist Yuri Zhukov should have recently been paying a visit to the Aaland Islands, which have for a long time been quite out of the limelight. In his travel notes published in Pravda, Zhukov criticised the Aaland politicians who were advocating the cession of the islands to Sweden. The same politicians, he argued, were quite happy for their islands to be Finnish when Finland was Fascist and hostile to the U.S.S.R. This new love for Sweden was merely a dislike of Finnish democracy.

M. N. D. Kuznetsov, Soviet Ambassador to Norway since the liberation, has been replaced by M. S. A. Afanasiev. The new ambassador has been for some time in the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs and in 1945 he was personal secretary to M. Molotov.

M. André Gide's recantation of his earlier pro-Soviet views evidently still rankles in Moscow, for much unjust sarcasm has been expended on the award of Oxford doctorates to him and François Mauriac. Moscow radio inquired why such " moral defeatists " were singled out for honour instead of Frenchmen who had urged their people on to fight the invader. Moscow radio said it was aware that Fascist ideas had been popular with undergraduates, but was pained to learn that even the professors admired " Fascist hangers on." It should, however, be pointed out that in fact M. Mauriac was strongly behind the resistance while M. Gide's sins—if any—were those of omission.

SCANDINAVIA

Norway

The replies of the Labour Party and the Communist Party to a letter from the Trade Union Federation proposing the unification of the whole Labour Movement have now been published. The two parties were asked whether they were prepared to amalgamate on the basis of the so-called Vestfold proposals, and secondly whether they were willing to participate in a joint congress for discussing the matter before the 1st July. The reply of the Labour Party was unconditional and in the affirmative on both points. The letter from the Communist Party Executive can, however, be regarded as nothing but a thinly veiled refusal as after accepting the Vestfold proposals in principle it goes on to say that participation by the Party in a joint congress can only become practicable after the two workers' parties through comradely co-operation have shown their desire to abide by the joint programme of 1945. This is generally interpreted in Norway as meaning that the Communists are willing to participate in a united front only as long as they are allowed to preserve their own independent party machine.

Denmark

The opposition to the Government's bill authorising the despatch of the Danish Brigade to Germany appears to have been greater than at first expected, and the bill was not passed through the Rigsdag before the 21st May. Advanced parties of the contingent were, however, reported to be leaving for Germany at the beginning of this month and the Brigade is expected to have reached its stations by the 20th June.

The Communists scored a victory when on the 30th May the Copenhagen compositors rejected the proposals of the official mediator by about 75 per cent. of all votes cast. In view of the fact that most of the men's demands were conceded and that the Copenhagen Compositors' Union, as well as the Trade Union Federation, recommended acceptance, the action must be considered as irresponsible. The strike began on the 1st March, and the Capital is still without newspapers with the exception of Social-Demokraten and the Communist Land og Folk which are not affected. Some papers appear in a form similar to the news sheets of the occupation period.

FRANCE

France has this week been paralysed by the most serious strike that has taken place since the liberation. The railwaymen at some Paris dépots began to come out last week and by Saturday, the 7th June, the strike was practically complete all over the country, only food and mail trains being moved. All travellers were inconvenienced and many British tourists were stranded. Emergency bus and air services were organised but these could only alleviate the situation. The railwaymen demand wage increases which would place a heavy additional burden on the Budget and M. Ramadier at first refused to negotiate until the men went back to work. However, he agreed to receive a delegation from the railwaymen's union on the 10th June and it is expected that some compromise will be reached.

It is now apparent that the policy of price reduction and wage stabilisation introduced by M. Blum has not achieved its original aim. The price level has indeed fallen but the increase in the level of production is hampered by lack of coal and raw materials, on the one hand, and of dollars, on the other, and has therefore not been sufficient to restore economic equilibrium. The standard of living of the workers is low, particularly in comparison with the agricultural community, and their impatience at the policy of fixed wages has been increased by the current shortage of bread and meat. The Communists no doubt left the Government in anticipation of labour troubles and they are now free to support all spontaneous strikes, even if they do not initiate new ones. It is felt that their aim is to show that M. Ramadier cannot rule without the authority of Communist Ministers, and to make his task as difficult as possible this month so that they may return to power next month when the harvest comes in. It is significant that the strikes are occurring in those sectors which are most vital to the functioning of the economic system, such as the railways, bakeries, petrol dépots, and public services. The Socialists are becoming restive in the face of Communist misrepresentation of the Government's aims and M. Ramadier faces a growing revolt within his own party; the support which is given him by M.R.P. and Right-Wing circles makes him an object of Left-Wing suspicion, but his reputation in the country is still high. In an Assembly debate on the 3rd June, M. Ramadier went so far as to accuse the Communists of " orchestrating " a wave of strikes, which they would never have tolerated if they had been in power, in an attempt to provoke a Government crisis and perhaps a change of régime.

Another sign of internal division in the Socialist Party is the dissolution by the Party Executive of the bureau of the Socialist Youth movement. This movement has long had Trotskyite tendencies and at its congress in April it strongly criticised the policy of the Government.

The newspaper Combat, whose independence and impartiality have given it a high standing among French papers, has undergone a change of ownership as a result of losses incurred during the prolonged printers' strike. Although it is stated that the paper's political line will remain unchanged, its main leader-writers have left and there is no indication of what financial banking it will now have.

Jacques Benoist-Méchin, former Secretary of State under Darlan in the Vichy Government, was convicted of treason by the High Court and sentenced to death on the 6th June.

In reply to a Soviet note of the 13th May which complained of the retention of Soviet citizens in camps in the French Zone of Austria and of French recruitment of Soviet displaced persons for work in France, the Quai d'Orsay published on the 4th June the text of two notes addressed to the Soviet Government. These notes stated that the " Soviet citizens " in question were in fact Ukrainians and Balts who were not Soviet citizens before 1st September 1939, and should not be forced to return to the U.S.S.R. Other allegations were also answered and the French proposed a joint conference in Paris to discuss the matter.

The reception of Abdul Karim in Egypt (see last week's Summary) and the incident concerning the Egyptian cruiser Amira Fauziah (see also under "Middle East") has caused much resentment in French official circles. M. Bidault saw the Egyptian Ambassador on the 2nd June and made a strong protest against Egyptian connivance at the escape of Abdul Karim. The French press is highly critical of the lack of precautions taken in arranging the transfer of the Moroccan leader from Réunion to France, and the Governor of the island has been recalled for consultations together with the French Ambassador in Cairo. It is reported that Abdul Karim had made so many protestations of loyalty to France in recent years that it was not thought necessary to put a close watch on him. Protests from Spain may now be expected since France is under treaty obligation to Spain to maintain Abdul Karim in safe custody. The incident of the Amira Fauziah has also annoyed the French since; they welcome the gift of wheat which she is carrying to the Tunisians, but they feel that the Egyptian plan of sending it into Tunis harbour on a warship is merely a hostile propaganda move.

SPAIN

General Franco's Bill of Succession was duly passed by acclamation by the puppet Cortes on the 7th June, though the Caudillo had found it necessary previously to dismiss some fourteen dissident Deputies who had had the temerity to criticise the terms of his Succession Bill and to suggest amendments. General Franco has had his way, and the Bill reflects his desire to legalise his own position as Head of the Spanish State and to ensure that supreme power should in due course pass to a Royal successor pledged to preserve the principles of Falangism as laid down in the series of laws promulgated by the Caudillo and his Government since 1939. This attempt to force the Royal heir to subscribe to the ideology of the present régime is manifestly a counter to Don Juan's determination to return to the Throne untrammelled by previous commitments to a régime internationally condemned as Fascist. Whether or not General Franco will submit the Bill to a referendum in early July as reported, his own sentiments were probably echoed by the remarks of the President of the Cortes, Don Esteban Bilbao, during the proceedings—namely, that if the Monarchy is to come at all, it will come through General Franco. Don Juan has made no further pronouncement since his original manifesto to the Spanish people on the 7th April, and his statement on the 16th April in which he discounted the false impression created by the Franco propagandists that he favoured the idea of foreign intervention in Spain's internal affairs. His advisers, banished from Estoril by Dr. Salazar's ruling, are busy preparing for the next move.

The Spanish press and radio have been making much of recent articles in the French press to the effect that sanctions against Franco were costing France over 300,000,000 pesetas in exports, cancelled orders for industrial equipment amounting to 3,000,000,000 pesetas and the loss of the Spanish market for French phosphates, cars, chemicals and luxury goods. Spain, asserted Pueblo smugly, had closed her frontier solely owing to France's behaviour. Spanish commentators adopted the same self-righteous note in reporting General Franco's meeting with the Bishop of Seo de Urgel at Lérida during his recent tour of Catalonia. The Bishop (co-Prince of Andorra with the Head of the French State) welcomed Franco on behalf of the Principality of Andorra which, he said, "wished to join in loyal Catalonia's demonstration of affection and gratitude." When reporting this incident in his International Review, broadcast on the 3rd June, José Ramon Alonso claimed: "There has never been any dispute with Andorra . . . . the rights of the Spanish Prince are irrefutable, whereas those of France are disputable as they spring from usurpation and not from inheritance since a republic can hardly be considered the preserver of a king's rights." In spite of a similar pin-pricking policy on the French side the two Governments would undoubtedly like to find a face-saving formula for re-opening the Franco-Spanish frontier which, to the economic detriment of both countries, has been closed since February 1946.

A significant pointer to the continued connubial happiness of the Caudillo and the Church is the re-establishment by Papal decree on the 5th May of the Eccesiastical Court of Appeal known as the Spanish Rota. After publication of the Motu Proprio in its Latin text in the Official Gazette, General Franco issued a decree declaring that this new appeal court would be duly incorporated in the Spanish judicature and would have precedence immediately after the Supreme Court of Military Justice. Its seven judges, who must be priests and doctors of Canon Law, are accorded the rank and prerogatives enjoyed by judges of the High Court of Civil Justice.

Doña Eva Duarte de Peron, the wife of the President of Argentina, is paying a visit to Spain. She arrived in Madrid on the 8th June, where General Franco, his wife and the entire Spanish Cabinet waited to greet her. For weeks past the Spanish press has devoted its most fulsome epithets to the impending visit, and no expense is to be spared to ensure that Señora Peron shall take home to her husband an excellent impression of Spanish hospitality. On the 9th June she was invested with the Grand Cross of Isabella the Catholic, and Madrid enjoyed a public holiday.

ITALY

One of the first duties of the new Italian Government is to secure the speedy ratification of the Peace Treaty by the Constituent Assembly. On the 5th June the Senate of the United States ratified the Treaty by 79 votes to 10 (see also under "The United States"), and it is hoped that the French Government will get ratification through by the end of this week or shortly afterwards. Count Sforza has ready a bill for presentation to the Assembly, and now that the American Senate has ratified, there seems no reason to expect undue delay on the part of the Italians. The Assembly is due to be dissolved or adjourned on the 24th June, but it seems likely to have it life prolonged in view of the protracted discussions on the new Constitution. In this case, there should be no difficulty about presenting the ratification bill, and Professor Einaudi, the new Vice-Premier is confident that it will be approved without much delay. Certainly the new Government will be anxious to get ratification through and to have the continued support of the United States. The Government's position is by no means comfortable. Already the Communists have issued a party resolution asserting that the last two Government crises were provoked by Signor De Gasperi without any good reason, under the "pressure of Italian and foreign groups that were determined to exclude the working-class parties." The party proposes "to correct this situation by democratic methods."

The meeting of the Confederation of Labour ended on the 6th June, and there seems to have been a general feeling of satisfaction among all the political parties that it ended without any serious internal split in spite of violent differences of opinion. A directing committee of 15 was nominated, on which the Communists have a majority of one over all the other parties combined. The Saragat Socialists obtained only two nominations, which is yet another indication that this party has not got the working-class support which is claimed for it by some of its leaders. This committee will elect from among its members the executive committee and a Secretary-General, who is to replace the three presidents, each representing one of the three big parties.

In regard to the relations of the Confederation to the Government, Signor Lizzadri (Socialist) said that they were willing to collaborate with the Government, but that the Confederation must defend its independence of any Government or party. Signor Di Vittorio (Communist) spoke on the economic demands of the Confederation; he dwelt on the need to take a stand on the ground of real wages, fighting the high cost of living and speculation and on the necessity to increase production and reduce costs. He added that the workers' problems could only be solved on the basis of the essential interests of the country. These are admirable sentiments. The Government will certainly need the whole-hearted support of the Confederation if the country is to surmount its economic and political difficulties. The figures of membership quoted by the party leaders indicate that the Confederation is representative of Italian Labour and that the Government will be bound to take its view into account. There are now six million members, i.e., nearly one-third of the total working population over 10 years of age. This is a large proportion in view of the fact that nearly 9 million of the working population are agricultural workers, always hard to organise, and that 5·6 million of the working population live in the poverty-stricken, unorganised South and in the islands. This poverty was referred to by Signor Lizzadri who said that the Republic would not be secure until the workers in the South had the same standard of living as those in the North. This is a laudable ambition, but one unlikely to be achieved for many years.

THE VATICAN

Broadcasting on the 2nd June, his Saint's Day, Pope Pius XII surveyed the world and found it full of wickedness and woe, of tyranny and fear, and he urged Christians to take courage from the Divine promise and bestir themselves before it was too late. His speech could be summed up in the opening line of the 12th century hymn "Hora novissima, tempora pessima, nunc vigilemus." 1947 had so far given many problems but few solutions. The wounds of war were not healed, hatred was increased. Security was spoken of but not achieved, and victors used or tolerated the evil methods they had fought. Universal prosperity had not come, and the "economic inertia" of poor countries might well ruin the economy of the prosperous. Freedom had been a watchword; but true freedom could only exist in countries where "law and right were Sovereign and the dignity of individuals and of other nations was held in respect." "A succession of fruitless conferences" made the people despair: the ingenuity of the false prophets of atheism who live on discord and hatred bewildered them; yet, as Christians, they know that the Christian virtues of faith, hope and charity, and the strength of Christian principles ensure that "even in the most serious conflict of human and national interests there is always room for a peaceful solution." The greatest danger to recovery the Pope saw in the disgust of youth with the capacity and the ideals of their elders—a disgust which looked like ending in pure nihilism.

His Majesty's new Minister to the Holy See, Mr. Victor Perowne, assumed charge on the 6th January. Sir D'Arcy Osborne, the retiring Minister had served for eleven years, five of which he spent inside the Vatican City itself.

Hungary

The dominant note sounded by officially-inspired comment on the speedy resolution of the Hungarian crisis is that of self-congratulation. M. Nagy's decision to remain in Switzerland was taken on the advice of his Smallholder counsellors, and with the apparently disinterested concurrence of M. Rákosi, who felt that no useful purpose could be served by his return. His complicity seems to be generally admitted even among those who are well-disposed towards him, while, according to an alleged statement of M. Kovács, "Nagy knew everything and did not take any steps." He is now said to be considering the idea of forming a Government in exile to represent Hungary before the United Nations.

Whether from fear, disillusionment or the conviction that the moment for action has not arrived, protests against the coup have been noticeably lacking. M. Bán, the Social Democratic Minister of Industry, is reported to be aware of the Communist danger but to hold the view that, so long as the Soviet Army is in Hungary, no effective stand can be made, though M. Rákosi's renewed insistence on the theme of ultimate fusion suggests that postponement may deprive the Social Democrats of their last vestige of independence. Moderate Social Democratic opinion, while favouring the disfranchisement of persons who were "B" listed for political reasons, lays stress on the importance of a free election, but the Minister of Justice, M. Ries, is collaborating closely with the Communists over the question of preparing a revised electoral register. He has declared himself in favour of excluding not only the offenders themselves but also the relations of all those condemned for war crimes, crimes against the nation and the violation of the Law for the Protection of Democracy. In addition he recommends the disfranchisement for a period of from three to five years of former Arrow Cross members, a reform which, if faithfully executed, would affect numerous Communists who sought immunity in the Party after the liberation.

M. Nagy and Fr. Varga have been expelled from the Smallholders' Party and threatened with loss of nationality if they refuse to comply with the forthcoming order to return within sixty days. The substitution of the unknown and inexperienced M. Implom in the place of Fr. Balogh as Secretary-General of the Party means a further serious weakening of the Smallholders who relied for intellectual leadership on the able if unscrupulous priest, now ironically consigned to a monastery. Other resignations include those of M. Kövargo, Mayor of Budapest, and, according to an unconfirmed report, of M. Nyárády, Minister of Finance. M. Arpád Szabo is to succeed Fr. Varga as President of the National Assembly, and M. Szekfü, Ambassador to Moscow, has been mentioned as a possible candidate for the Foreign Ministry, the appointment of M. Mihalyfi being merely provisional.

Outside Hungary MM. Szgedy-Maszák, Auer, Gordon and Andaházy-Kasnya, the Ministers accredited to the U.S.A., France, Switzerland and Turkey respectively, have resigned in protest against the Governmental changes, and refused to return home. Among those expressing disapproval of their action is M. Bede, the Social Democratic Representative in the U.K.

General Sviridov met the U.K. request for the documents containing the depositions of M. Kovács with the reply that the only available copy was in the hands of the Hungarian authorities. A second approach to him has been made.

The U.S. State Department have drafted a strong Note to the Soviet Government protesting against their intervention in Hungarian affairs with the result that minority groups now dominate the majority Party. The Note emphasizes the responsibility for preserving Hungarian independence which attaches to the U.S.A. as a signatory to the Yalta Agreement and requests a tripartite investigation, failing which the U.S. Government may feel obliged to refer the matter to the United Nations.

His Majesty's Government are likely to suggest certain modifications of the Note. In their view weight should be given primarily to the question of unilateral Russian intervention, despite the fact that prior consultation with his colleagues is an obligation binding upon each member of the Allied Control Commission. The contention that minority elements have usurped authority is more easily answerable, since the present Government still represents the voice of at least half the 1945 electorate. H.M. Ambassador in Moscow has been instructed to lodge a verbal protest with M. Molotov and to demand clarification of the Soviet policy towards Hungary.

The U.S. Senate has approved the ratification of the Peace Treaty, and the Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs intends to introduce the Ratification Bill in the National Assembly on the 11th June. The Hungarian ratification would consequently be deposited in Moscow early the following week. The Russians have informed M. Mihalyfi that the Soviet Union will ratify within two days of the U.S.A.

In defiance of the compromise solution reached along lines suggested by the Social Democrats seven banks are to be placed temporarily under state control and nationalized by the autumn. The seven are stated not to include an unspecified bank which numbers many British subjects among its shareholders. It appears that in any case only such shares as are the property of Hungarians will be nationalized, since compensation cannot be paid to foreigners.

Roumania

The visit to Bucarest of the Russian Patriarch (see Summaries 388 and 390) has taken place. The Bucarest Radio broadcast a somewhat vague account of a service at the Cathedral at which the Patriarch is said to have officiated, and in which both the Old Slavonic and Roumanian languages were used. It will be interesting to receive further details as to what actually took place. The Prague Radio reports a speech in which the Prime Minister is said to have stated that the Roumanian Church has been "included in the Russian Orthodox Church." It has been obvious for some time past that something of this sort was in the air. The Patriarch Alexiei is reported as saying that he is convinced that "the Orthodox Church in Roumania will succeed in overcoming all obstacles," and will be able to send representatives to the Congress of the Orthodox Church which is to be held in Moscow in the near future. There is no mention of what the obstacles are which the Roumanian Church is to overcome. Roumania is an independent Patriarchate, owing no allegiance to anyone, except the according of a primacy of honour to Constantinople, which in theory is also owed by Russia. Roumania has the distinction, which is shared only by Russia amongst the Orthodox nations, of herself consecrating the oils for anointing. All other Orthodox Churches receive their oils from Constantinople. It will be interesting to see if the suggestion is forthcoming that Roumania shall emphasise her union with Russia by receiving her oils from Moscow, and interesting also to see how Roumania receives the suggestion if it is made. It is a small point, and the sending for oils to Constantinople began as a matter of convenience, but a good deal of store is set by it in Orthodox countries. It may be remembered that already the suggestion has been made, and rejected, that Roumania should alter her calendar to coincide with that of Russia.

until Marshal Tito gave an interview to some Bulgarian journalists a few days ago there has been no authoritative pronouncement on the subject in Yugoslavia. "Tomorrow, perhaps, but not to-day" has been the attitude. But on June 1st Tito said that the "masses" in Yugoslavia and Bulgaria desired a rapprochement between the two countries. They knew from experience what it meant to be a small state, therefore they must unite, and nobody had the right to impede their union. Albania, the Marshal said, though not a Slav state, enjoyed a social system which made similarly close relations possible. A union of the three states would not be a threat to anyone, but a means of safeguarding their own interests and possessions.

Albania, it will be recalled, already has a customs' union with Yugoslavia and is virtually integrated with that country economically and politically, so that once Marshal Tito's words are put into effect a form of Balkan federation will in fact exist. The visit of the Roumanian Prime Minister to Belgrade on the 7th June, allegedly on his own initiative, also fits into this picture of Balkan union. The visit was kept secret beforehand. In spite of an emphatic denial from the Yugoslav Foreign Minister that anything would be signed or was ready for signature, it was believed that the subjects of discussion were a customs' union and, in more general terms, a Balkan federation.

During the same interview Tito announced that, as a member of the United Nations, Yugoslavia would accept the decision of the Powers with regard to Carinthia, but that she would regard no solution as permanent which did not satisfy her full demands. He made the customary reference to the supposed thraldom of the Greek people. Tanjug, however, has denied the rumours circulating in Greece of a concentration of Yugoslav troops near the frontier.

Some Ministers and a large part of the Foreign Ministry are being transferred to Bled in Slovenia, where Tito occupies the former summer residence of the Royal Family.

The British Book Exhibition, which is being transferred from Zagreb, where it met with great success, will be opened in Belgrade on 13th June by H.M. Secretary of State for Air. This event will coincide with the arrival of a Military Delegation from Czechoslovakia, headed by the Minister for War, which is reciprocating the recent visit of the Yugoslav Chief of Staff to Prague and is said to have no political significance.

It is learned that the Franco Gaži who was recently arrested in Croatia (see Summary No. 393) is not the Vice-Premier but his namesake, a member of the Peasant Party, who at one time held a post in the Legation in Moscow, but who has occupied no position under the present régime in Yugoslavia. His brother, Stjepan, was, and may still be, in Switzerland, whence he kept up a correspondence with Dr. Krnjević in London.

A commission for the purging of the legal profession has reduced the number of practising lawyers in Croatia from 160 to 55 within a few weeks. Before the war there were 700.

Greece

The recent lull in the Greek Army's operations against the bandits has afforded an opportunity of reviewing the events of the last two months. It is generally agreed that military operations against the bandits have been neither so successful as to raise hopes of an early collapse of the rebellion, nor so unsuccessful as to justify pessimism. It is believed in some quarters that, unless the prospective U.S. mission authorises an increase in the Greek Army, military suppression of the bandits is going to take a long time. Moreover the bandit menace will probably never be eliminated by the use of force alone. On the other hand the recent considerable increase in the scale and scope of bandit attacks (see last week's Summary) has convinced even the Liberals that a purely political solution of the problem, by broadening the amnesty terms and suspending operations, is now impossible. The bandits in those areas still to be liberated by the Greek National Army are reported to be better organised and better armed than ever and have shown themselves to be arrogantly self-confident and in no mood to surrender. The Government, therefore, see no alternative to their policy of a continuance of military operations combined with their present amnesty offer.

Meanwhile the presence of the United Nations Frontier Sub-Commission in Northern Greece seems not to have checked the movement by bandits across the frontiers of the three neighbouring countries. Hopes that Bulgaria would not impede the Sub-Commission's work were frustrated on the 2nd June when its members travelled to Kula in order to cross into Bulgarian territory to investigate the Angistron-Lipa and Kapnotopos incidents. They were confronted by an unusually large number of frontier guards and denied entry. They therefore returned to Salonica after investigating as much of the incidents as they could on the Greek side of the frontier.

Bandit raids have continued over a wide area. In and around Grevena, in particular, the situation remains serious. The town is overcrowded with refugees from the surrounding villages where a very large number of houses have been destroyed by the bandits. The Holy Synod of the Orthodox Church of Greece has issued an Encyclical denouncing the rebels and instructing the clergy to celebrate Requiem Masses for the patriots who have died in defence of the State. It is reported that 197 priests have so far been murdered by Communist bands, and 65 churches have been burnt, as well as a number of ancient monasteries.

Bulgaria

Three new incidents afford further proof of the Soviet-run government's determination to get rid of all opposition before the time comes for the Russian forces to evacuate the country.

Upon the expiration of the month for which the opposition paper Svoboden Narod was suspended, a crowd organised by a Communist union invaded the printing works and prevented a resumption of publication. After making verbal representations in vain, the British political representative on the 5th June handed in a Note of protest. This also cited the recent elimination of the other Opposition paper, Narodno Zemedelsko Zname, by the analogous trick of an inspired printers' strike. The Note expressed the hope that the Bulgarian Government, by enabling both papers to reappear, would clear themselves of any charge of infringing the freedom of expression and of press and publication solemnly guaranteed by the Bulgarian Government in the treaty recently signed and due soon to come formally into force. The United States representative made verbal protests somewhat earlier to the Prime Minister and to the Russian representative. Twenty-nine of the Svoboden Narod printers had the courage to sign a protest to the Acting Prime Minister against the Communists' intimidation.

The second incident was the arrest on the 6th June of Nikola Petkov, the leader of the Opposition, whose outspoken criticisms in the Assembly have shown him to be a man of remarkable pluck. His arrest had long been expected, but it came with surprising suddenness. A motion for the suspension of his parliamentary immunity was introduced without warning, it was passed by the usual government majority and he was arrested by the Militia at the end of the sitting after he had made a dignified speech denying the charges brought against him. Later, Asen Stambuliski, acting as leader of the Opposition, read a statement to the effect that a new wave of terror had been started, that the charges against Petkov were completely false and that his arrest was illegal. The Opposition then walked out.

The allegation of the Public Prosecutor is that Petkov created in the army an illegal organisation of "reactionary and pro-fascist" officers in order to overthrow the régime by force. Much of the so-called evidence on which this allegation is based appears to be "confessions" wrung by familiar means from General Popov, Peter Koev and others who have been arrested on similar charges.

A third incident is the wholesale mobilisation in labour battalions of persons alleged by the Fatherland Front (i.e., Communist) local committees to be doing no, or insignificant, work. This simple but effective means of removing adversaries is clearly directed against the rank and file of the Opposition, and at least three reporters of the Opposition press have thus been got rid of.

Regarding all of the above three matters, Mr. Sterndale-Bennett saw the Bulgarian Prime Minister on the 7th June. Georgi Dimitrov promised that not a hair of Petkov's head should be harmed during his arrest, that he should be properly accommodated and that he should not be subjected to torture or any physical coercion. In defence of his policy Dimitrov produced disingenuous explanations and insinuations of British and American plots to wreck the food supply and even to overthrow the Government. He said that the Government would respect the fundamental freedoms, as provided in the new treaty, but they would also carry out the provision which barred fascist organisations designed to withhold democratic rights. He chose to say that if Britain and the United States would refrain from interfering, relations with those countries would be satisfactory, but Mr. Sterndale-Bennett made it plain that, on the contrary, an improvement in relations depended on Bulgaria. The United States Chargé d'Affaires had an interview with Dimitrov the same day.

If words could produce an impression on unscrupulous fanatics, Mr. Sterndale-Bennett's plain speaking might be expected to curb the Government's actions. But the issue between the Government and the Opposition is one of life and death, and, even if they were disinclined to do so, the Government must continue on their course or run the risk of being torn to pieces later.

Turkey

Members of the American military mission are now travelling about Turkey in order to form an estimate of the country's military needs. The most urgent of these appear to be air defence and improved communications, particularly at the southern port of Iskenderun (Alexandretta) which at present is a bottleneck. After that the Turks' main requirement seems to be simple equipment and instruction in its use. Among the difficulties are firstly a certain Turkish complacency which arises from ignorance of modern warfare, and secondly the Government's fear of criticism, by Soviet propagandists and by the Turkish Opposition, on the score that Turkish independence is being sacrificed. However, if the efficiency of the Turkish forces can be raised enough to permit substantial demobilisation, that in itself will remove a cause of political discontent and of economic weakness.

It may be taken as certain that the Turkish Government are watching with anxiety the armed struggle in the Greek mountains. The semi-official Ulus emphasised that Soviet policy was to encircle Turkey by breaking through Greece to the Mediterranean.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Egyptian press has adopted an attitude of injured innocence towards the criticisms of the Egyptian Government's grant of asylum to Abdul Karim (see last week's Summary) which have appeared in the French and American press. The Journal d'Egypte, which is inspired by the Palace, devoted a special article to the subject on the 4th June in which it was suggested that the sudden hostility of the American press indicated that the incident was being used as a pretext to attack Egypt, and remarked: "il serait fort intéressant d'en connaître le motif." The writer ingenuously asks what the United States authorities would have done if Abdul Karim had landed at an American port.

Simultaneously with this affair a dispute with the French Government has arisen over the distribution of supplies given by the Egyptian Red Crescent Society in aid of distress in Tunisia (see Summary No. 391). Although the gift had been accepted by the French authorities, they had not given permission for the Egyptian cruiser, the Amira Fauziah, to visit Tunis, where she arrived unannounced to land the supplies. Permission to do so was refused by the French, and the ship left for Malta where she anchored on the 2nd June (see also under "France"). The question of her now calling at Tripoli is causing some difficulty, although, owing to the status of Libya, the cases are not analogous.

The two incidents have excited the xenophobic tendencies of the editor of the Ikhwan al Muslimin, who wrote on the 5th May urging the recall of the Egyptian Ambassador from Paris, the closing-down of all French institutions and schools in Egypt, and the banning of the teaching of French in all Egyptian schools and universities. "This," he writes, "is how we should treat every country attacking our rights. Arrogant countries must be taught a lesson which they will never forget." Under the title "Egypt in the right and the Government should proclaim it" the Ahram criticises the Government's silence on the two affairs about which, the writer says, public opinion is much exercised and should not have to depend on news from foreign sources.

Interest in these two affairs has somewhat overshadowed the prospects of Egypt before the Security Council, and the Prime Minister has not yet left for the United States. An announcement of the names of experts who are being consulted leads the press to assume that Egypt's case will be based upon its legal aspects.

Palestine

The only reference during the week to Mr. Ben Gurion's speech is a protest by Mr. Ben Gurion himself that The Times misreported him. According to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency the Jerusalem correspondent of The Times stated that Mr. Ben Gurion said that the Jewish Agency cannot have confidence in Russia because Russia had often broken her pledges, whereas he had, in fact, said the exact opposite, namely, that the word of the Russians can be trusted. The full delicacy of the situation confronting the Agency, consequent on the indication of Soviet policy contained in Mr. Gromyko's statement, is evidently realised by Jewish leaders, and not least by Mr. Ben Gurion himself. The risk of estranging American opinion by shewing over-eagerness to close with Russia is fully appreciated. Russian support for partition would be conditional on complete autonomy for the Jewish zone, so that the Jews would be unable to purchase Anglo-American support by the offer of an alliance and military bases. Hence Mr. Ben Gurion's advocacy of the creation of a Jewish State in part of Palestine, and the retention of the British Mandate over the remainder, into which Jewish penetration would be facilitated (on the assumption, made, no doubt, by Mr. Ben Gurion, that the terms of the Mandate remained unchanged). Thus His Majesty's Government would retain a technical foothold and the Jews would be enabled to discharge their obligations to the Soviet Union by refusing facilities to Great Britain and the United States.

The Arab Higher Committee, who concluded their deliberations in Cairo last week, are said to have contained a majority in favour of boycotting the Fact-finding Committee, but to have decided to wait for the result of the meeting of Foreign Ministers of the Arab States—which opened on the 5th June—before coming to a final decision. The Foreign Ministers, who form the Political Committee of the Arab League, completed their review of the work of the Arab delegations to the United Nations on the 7th June. They criticised the United Nations for its failure to include any mention of independence, democracy and self-determination in the terms of reference for the Palestine enquiry, or to separate the refugee problem from the Palestine question. On the ground that Zionist influence in the United States is strong enough to prevent an entirely impartial consideration of the Palestine question, they confirmed the decision of the Arab delegations that each Government should reserve its liberty of action to adopt whatever attitude it thought necessary towards the Palestine question. Finally, expressing the belief that peace and harmony could not prevail in Palestine and the Arab World if the principles of democracy were disregarded, the Committee formally resolved that the Arab Governments should present the next session of the United Nations with a demand for the termination of the Mandate and recognition of the independence of Palestine. How these decisions will affect the attitude of the Arab Higher Committee is not yet known. The opponents of co-operation are swayed by emotion rather than by consideration of where the true interests of the Arabs lie, but, from the fact that Dr. Tannons has asked the United States Consul-General in Jerusalem for his opinion, there seems little doubt that they are anxious to test foreign reactions to a boycott.

A Jewish Agency spokesman claimed on the 5th June to know the contents of a report recently made by His Excellency the High Commissioner, in which he criticised the attitude of the Jewish Agency as an encouragement to terrorism. This charge, the speaker said, is utterly rejected by the Agency, which, as usual, puts the whole blame upon the British policy of "deportations," the enforcement of the Emergency Regulations and "such speeches as that made recently by Mr. Bevin." An attempt to excuse the attitude of the Agency in regard to general co-operation of the Yishuv with the police was made on the ground of a distinction between political and ordinary crime. On the 4th June, however, it was announced that "Jewish security forces" were taking action to apprehend the perpetrators of the attacks which were made that day on the railways, and to "deter" them from further activities.

The Stern Group announced in Jerusalem on the 5th June that they were responsible for the "letter-bombs" which have been received in this country. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency expresses doubt of the truth of this claim.

An illegal immigrant ship, the Anal, was intercepted last week with 399 passengers, a substantial proportion of whom seem to be Jews from North Africa.

A British police sergeant and a police constable were kidnapped on the afternoon of the 9th June at a public swimming-pool at Ramat Gan, near Tel Aviv. The Haganah issued an appeal to the terrorists to free the men, and one to "every Jew who has information of the whereabouts of the kidnapped men immediately to inform the nearest Haganah commander." Both were found on the afternoon of the 10th June at Kiriat Shaul, north of Tel Aviv, which had been cordoned by troops. They were unharmed and had been well-treated.

Transjordan

His Majesty King Abdullah has written to Mr. Bevin saying that he is very anxious about the general situation in the Middle East and the political tendencies there, and that, as a well-wisher who considers that peace is to be found in a true understanding with Great Britain, he would welcome the opportunity of a meeting either in London or Amman.

Syria and the Lebanon

The situation in Beirut arising out of dissatisfaction with the conduct of the elections (see last week's Summary) was reported by His Majesty's Minister to have improved by the 4th June as a result of the firmness of the Government, who forbade demonstrations, and of disunity in the ranks of the opposition. On the 8th June, however, the editors of all the leading daily newspapers, except the semi-official Le Jour, addressed a letter to the President of the Republic announcing that they would boycott the proceedings of the Assembly owing to the notorious fact that "the success of a large number of candidates was due, as is well known, to falsification and fraud, which no-one dares deny," and demanding the dissolution of the Assembly.

Meanwhile, in accordance with the Constitution, the Government have resigned and a new Government, headed by Riadh Bey as Solh, has been formed. The members are :—

Prime Minister : Riadh as Solh.
Vice-Premier and Public Works : Gabriel Murr.
Finance : Muhammed Abdur Razek.
Interior and Public Health : Camille Chamoun.
Foreign Affairs and Education : Hamid Frangieh.
National Economy and Agriculture : General Naufal.
Justice : Ahmad Hussaini.
Defence and Posts and Telegraphs : Emir Majid Arslan.

Henri Pharaon refused to participate, and this caused some difficulty at first which was overcome by the inclusion of General Naufal, a non-deputy, who was head of the gendarmerie from 1941 to 1943, when his pro-French sympathies resulted in his removal from his post. Henri Pharaon apparently hopes to regain some of the popularity he lost during the election, by leading the Opposition in the Assembly.

According to the Arab News Agency, Monseigneur Mubarak, the Maronite Archbishop of Beirut, has been ordered by the Lebanese authorities to leave the country and has embarked for Rome. His anti-Government activities appear to have gone beyond the mere publication of an open letter to the President (see last week's Summary).

Although the press has reported that an agreement between the Syrian and Lebanese Governments concerning the Trans-Arabian pipe-line (see Summary No. 380—Special article on Oil Production and Supplies in the Middle East) has already been signed, this is not the case as difficulties still exist over the share of the dollar proceeds which each country shall take. These will fall under three headings : the construction of the pipe-line in the Lebanon, the construction of the pipe-line in Syria and the construction of the refinery at the Lebanese end of the pipe-line. The Syrians are claiming 50 per cent., but the Lebanese consider that this is excessive, since the Lebanon will suffer certain disadvantages such as wear and tear on roads, a drain on water-resources and (absit omen !) the danger of bombardment in war.

Saudi Arabia

His Majesty King ibn Sa'ud has addressed a letter to Mr. Bevin in which he alleges that the Hashimites are intriguing against him. He refers to the "Greater Syria" project and the recent 'Iraqi-Transjordan Treaty, which he describes as a "political and military" union between the two countries, and as the beginning of an aggression against Sa'udi Arabia and Syria. He says the new Treaty aims at changing the status quo, a thing which he could never tolerate in any circumstances. He asks for an assurance from His Majesty's Government that they will never agree to any change in the Middle East, and will guarantee that no harm shall come to Sa'udi Arabia or her interests. (The request for an assurance that no change shall be made in the Middle East, apart from ibn Sa'ud's personal interest in the matter, implies satisfaction with the post-1918 division of the Arab World which has so often been criticised as artificial and unsound. The divergencies of view between the members of the Arab League thus appear in their true light as the result of differences in national character, due to local conditions and varying levels of culture rather than of rivalry caused by the creation of unnatural divisions.) Mr. Bevin's reply, which was handed to the Sa'udi Arabian Minister on the 6th June, is couched in reassuring terms, but expresses the hope that any differences which may occur between the Arab States will be settled by wise diplomacy in a spirit of mutual goodwill. It goes on to state that His Majesty's Government believe that the policy of 'Iraq and Transjordan is in no way directed against Sa'udi Arabia, and that, according to their information about the Treaty, it does not, in fact, amount to a union between the two countries, but is very similar to the Treaty of 1936 between Sa'udi Arabia and 'Iraq, and its terms do not seem open to any legitimate objection by any third party. With regard to "Greater Syria," His Majesty's Government continue to hold that they are not an interested party, and that this is a question for the Arabs to settle amongst themselves. In conclusion Mr. Bevin says that he does not consider that there is any special cause for apprehension on account of the recent developments to which His Majesty has drawn his attention.

Persia

On the 29th May the Prime Minister, Qawam as Sultaneh, gave a reception at the Persian Democratic Party's headquarters in honour of the newly-elected deputies. He made no reference to the date on which the Majlis would assemble (see last week's Summary), stating merely that it would not be until after the end of the elections. He then gave a characteristic outline of his achievements during his period of office, but dwelt particularly on the responsibilities of Persian youth. He added that he wanted the Democrat Party to become a political school where the youths of the country could get their training.

Mulla Mustafa (see Summary No. 390, under "'Iraq") returned to Persia on the 1st June. He is now in the mountainous area west of Khoi, i.e., near the Turkish frontier, with about 400 followers, and it is believed that some skirmishing with Persian troops has taken place. It is anticipated by the Persian Chief of Staff that the Mulla may try to make for Russia (see Summary No. 388) or join up with the Jellali Kurds.

THE FAR EAST

China

The 13th and last plenary session of the P.P.C. (People's Political Council) opened on the 20th May to the accompaniment of mass strikes and demonstrations by students in most of the larger towns. Airing in the first instance, as they did, petty grievances these strikes attracted little public sympathy. Subsequently, however, the strikers adopted a more skilful line of propaganda. Slogans were directed against the continuance of the civil war, the high cost of living and the unsatisfactory economic state of the country; and the students declared their intention to stage a general strike on the 2nd June (the anniversary of the "anti-civil war" movement started last year by the Communists from Yenan), in which they invited labour to co-operate.

In a public statement on the 18th May General Chiang Kai-shek branded the demonstrations as Communist inspired. On the same date the State Council prohibited, with special reference to the student movement, all strikes and demonstrations and warned all concerned of the consequences of disregarding this order. In Nanking, however, the students decided to defy the ban and, in an attempt to stage a parade outside the National Assembly Hall at the time of the opening of the P.P.C. meeting, found themselves involved in a rough and tumble with the police, in which several persons on both sides were hurt and, the students claim but Government sources do not confirm, two students lost their lives.

In his speech at the opening ceremony of the P.P.C. General Chiang Kai-shek made a point of declaring his willingness to resume peace negotiations the moment the Communists "halt their rebellion." And General Chang Chun, who followed, promised that the students' difficulties would receive sympathetic consideration and appealed to them to co-operate in the nation's reconstruction by confining themselves to their studies.

Nevertheless, the students continued their agitation and the movement gathered momentum throughout the country, causing the Government considerable anxiety. Shanghai was reported to be seething with unrest and a tenseness which threatened at any moment to break into labour disorders and riots. The city authorities issued a warning to "left-wing agents" who, they declared, were busily inciting the students to fresh demonstrations. The Mayor, Dr. K. G. Wu, after asserting that much of the unrest was due to a rice shortage brought about by Communist activities in northern Kiangsu, declared that the Government had come into possession of documentary proof of a Communist plot to promote student and labour strikes followed by a general uprising—accompanied by extensive fires in the Shanghai and Nanking areas—on the 2nd June. He said that the authorities had watched the plot develop step by step until it had reached a point which made the immediate application of drastic action essential. There is little doubt but that gestapo methods were then brought into play. Many students and ordinary civilians, including a number of newspaper reporters, were arrested as Communist agents in almost all the larger towns throughout the country.

This somewhat high-handed action on the part of the Government met with severe criticism from a section of the members of both the Legislative Yuan and the P.P.C., who claimed that the students were largely instrumental in overthrowing the Peking régime twenty years ago and who characterised the Government's present action as "short-sighted" and more likely to aggravate than alleviate the situation. The Government, however, made it quite clear that they were prepared to take effective steps against any further attempts at disturbances by the student fraternity; while disorders from sympathetic labour movements were virtually bought off by the restoration of a cost of living index—on an exceptionally generous scale—as the basis for wage calculations. Special precautions—including in some instances martial law—were taken in all the principal towns and the 2nd June passed quietly and almost without event, the students quite suddenly and unexpectedly declaring that they had "decided against holding the public demonstrations."

The P.P.C. session itself is said to have run true to form with much loud criticism of the Government but with little of constructive value being accomplished. Among the resolutions passed in the Council's advisory capacity was an invitation to the seven Communist members to attend the P.P.C. session "to discuss national affairs" and an effort was made to convey this invitation by means of the Government-operated broadcasting stations, but if it reached the Communists at all, it brought no response. However, before the P.P.C. finally closed its twelve days session, a short manifesto was issued appealing to the Government to reaffirm their wish for a peaceful settlement of the Communist problem. Other resolutions included the placing of the main burden of taxation on the rich and the requisitioning of their property; a more generous scale for the repayment of pre-war deposits; a halt to the issue of new bank notes; the requisitioning by the Government of private capital and deposits abroad; while confused resolutions relating to possible foreign loans seemed to indicate that the delegates believed that a solution of China's economic problems was to be found primarily in contracting loans with the United States of America and other countries. In the debate on foreign affairs a resolution demanding the restoration of Hong Kong was withdrawn, but a similar resolution urging the Government to initiate negotiations for the recovery of Macao was adopted. The situation in regard to Dairen and Port Arthur came in for discussion resulting in a recommendation to the Government to take over the administration of both ports—"as soon as possible."

In the north and more particularly in Manchuria the progress of the civil war is causing the Nanking Government considerable anxiety. An indication of the seriousness with which the situation is regarded is to be found in General Chiang Kai-shek's sudden decision to make a personal visit of inspection of the front in the Mukden area on the 30th May.

Obviously with Mukden as their objective, a strong detachment of Communist troops had already made a rapid advance along the railway line to a point within a short distance north of the strategically important road centre of Kaiyuan—leaving on their way the two important railway junctions of Changchun and Szepingkai to the attention of other Communist units. Kaiyuan has since been captured and the detachment is now reported to be threatening Mukden from a short distance from the important key pass of Tiehling.

In the south, the recent trouble in Formosa has been stamped out, and General Chen Yi has been replaced as Governor by Wei Tao-ming, who assumed his new post on the 15th May and declared his determination to administer the island on strictly democratic lines. The Nanking Government is also watching with some anxiety the possibility of a separatist movement developing in Kuangtung and/or Kuangsi under the direction of the former war-lord, Li Chai-sum, whose activities in Hong Kong recently formed the subject of representations by General Chiang Kai-shek to H.M. Ambassador at Nanking. At present, however, the possibility of such a development is confined to suspicion.

Japan

The State and War Departments announced on the 9th June that private trade with Japan will be authorised as from the 15th August, that accommodation for 400 private trade representatives will be made from that date and that the Allied Trade Board in Washington will determine the allocation to the Allied nations. Fears that trade representatives already resident in Japan might enjoy an unfair advantage at the outset are to some extent allayed by the proviso that no transactions may be finalised before the 1st September.

Trade will necessarily open under severe restrictions. All transactions must be licensed by the Japanese Government and approved by S.C.A.P. Headquarters. Certain goods such as cotton textiles, tea and raw silk, and various equipment and machinery, are temporarily reserved for Government-to-Government trading. The announcement states that initially there will be no foreign exchange rates established. Since the objective is to develop the maximum amount of trade possible, it has been agreed in Tokyo and Washington that no exchange rate is practicable until a flow of export trade in a wide range of commodities has been set in motion.

The Japanese Government has proved itself hitherto unable to establish the necessary controls over the economic system, which is in serious plight. The present resumption of trade cannot, therefore, be regarded as more than a move in the right direction.

Siam

On the 5th June, Luang Dhamrong's new Cabinet obtained a vote of confidence in the National Assembly by a substantial majority.

The full list of the new Cabinet is as follows:—

President of the Council of Ministers and Minister of Justice, Luang Dhamrong.
Vice-President of the Council of Ministers, Dr. Duan Bunnag.
Minister of Commerce and Minister of Education, Dr. Duan Bunnag.
Minister of Defence, Lt.-General Jira Vichit Songkhram.
Minister of Foreign Affairs: Nai Arthakitti Banomyong.
Minister of Finance: Nai Vichitr Lulitananda.
Minister of Agriculture, Col. Chuang Chawengsak Songkhram.
Minister of Communications, Phya Prakit Kelasat.
Minister of Interior, Phya Sunthon Phiphit.
Minister of Public Health, Nai Saeng Suthiphong
Minister of Industry: Nai Thongin Phuriphat.

The Cabinet also includes the following nine Ministers without Portfolio:—

Colonel Thuan Wichai Khatkha, H.S.H. Prince Nondiyavat Svasti, Nai Yuan Phanitwit, Nai Chamlong Daoruang, Nai Thong Kanthatham, Nai Wirot Kamalaphan, Khun Radap Khadi, Nai Jit Wechaprasit, Luang Narat Raksa.

Of the members of the outgoing Cabinet who have not been included in the new Cabinet, Vilas Osathanond, formerly Minister of Commerce, and Charoon Subsaeng, formerly Minister of Agriculture, are the most noteworthy. That his half-brother, Nai Arthakitti Banomyong, should have been appointed to the important post of Foreign Minister, is taken as an indication of the Senior Statesman's influence from behind the scenes.

The only entirely new name in the present Cabinet is Luang Narat Raksa, Minister without Portolio, who, it is understood, will assist both the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Public Health. Of the other members of the Cabinet, Saeng Suthiphong is a former Acting Secretary of State and Director-General of Public Health; both Yuan Phanitwit and Khun Radap Khadi have at one time been Secretary to the Minister of the Interior; and Jit Wechaprasit was a Minister without Portfolio in Seni Pramot's Cabinet.

On the 6th June, Vice-Admiral Sir Denis Boyd, the Commander-in-Chief of H.M. Pacific Fleet, arrived in Bangkok on a short courtesy visit.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The Government and press of the United States have reacted strongly to recent events in Hungary. On the 5th June President Truman condemned the Soviet coup against the Nagy Government as an "outrage" and said that the State Department was making a complete investigation. Previously a State Department spokesman had announced the suspension of the surplus property credit to Hungary until the situation in that country became clearer. On the 4th June it was revealed that a request had been made for Brigadier-General George S. Weems, the U.S. representative on the Allied Control Commission in Budapest, to be furnished with copies of the information against M. Nagy which the Soviet Chairman of the Commission had handed to the Hungarian Government. Since then the United States Government has been in consultation with His Majesty's Government regarding possible joint representations to the Soviet authorities. (See also under "Hungary.")

The American press has waxed indignant about the Soviet Union's "flouting of the democratic process" and its "mockery of the armistice terms" in the Hungarian coup. In some quarters it has been suggested that the overthrow of M. Nagy has been the Soviet answer to the "Truman Doctrine," although informed observers point out that the coup is in reality the outcome of a well-laid plan upon which the Soviet authorities have been engaged for more than eighteen months. Others feel that Czechoslovakia may be the next victim of Soviet aggression. They fear that Italy, too, may be exposed to Soviet machinations if American troops are withdrawn when the peace treaty is ratified. Thus in the Upper House this week two prominent Democrats, Senators Fulbright and McMahon, moved that ratification of the Italian treaty be postponed until January 1948, by which time it would be seen whether the major German and Austrian settlement was possible or not. Their motion was firmly opposed by the Republican Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Vandenberg, who himself admitted that events in Hungary added "nothing but a further sense of outrage" to the sensibilities of those Allied nations which believed in "peace with justice." In the end the Italian treaty was ratified on the 5th June by 79 votes to 10. The Roumanian, Bulgarian and Hungarian treaties were at the same time ratified by acclamation.

On the day on which the President condemned developments in Hungary in the terms already quoted, Mr. Marshall inaugurated what promises to be a new phase of American economic foreign policy. Addressing the Harvard Alumni Club, the Secretary of State called for a concerted programme of recovery among the European democracies to permit American assistance to be used to the maximum advantage. He stated that the object of American policy in future should be to "provide a cure rather than a mere palliative" for the situation in those countries. The European Governments concerned should first agree among themselves "as to the requirements of the situation" and as to the part which they would take "in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be undertaken" by the United States. Mr. Marshall thereby gave expression to an idea—that of the European countries themselves taking the initiative in formulating a recovery programme—which State Department officials have apparently been turning over in their minds for some time. He also suggested the lines along which the newly-created Policy Planning Committee of the State Department (see last week's Summary) may be working. In any event his speech represents the most advanced position with regard to foreign relief problems which the United States Government has ventured to take so far—which is a full turn of the wheel since President Truman summarily stopped all lend-lease operations in August 1945.

As far as Congress is concerned the fact that Republican spokesmen have already been pleading for something similar should help to make the Harvard policy and all that it implies digestible. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., for example, has recently been at pains to emphasize that American assistance should be used to foster a "voluntary economic union" in Western Europe (see Summary No. 393). In a minor way President Truman has also won bi-partisan goodwill for other relief ventures by his much-commended choice of Mr. Dwight Griswold, a former Republican Governor of Nebraska, as head of the present assistance mission to Greece. On the other hand, Senator Taft, with whom (to the professed regret of some observers) the President this week permitted himself to bandy views in public, is endeavouring to convince the country that large-scale spending and lending abroad will increase the pressure of inflation and make a mockery of attempts to keep prices down at home. Senator Taft alleges that the dollar funds already made available to foreign countries go "far beyond the proof of specific needs."

The potential area of bi-partisan co-operation is likely to be extended by the State Department decision of the 3rd June to "renew consultations with other American Republics looking towards a mutual assistance treaty as provided for in the wartime Act of Chapultepec." Hitherto Senator Vandenberg has let it be clearly understood that bi-partisan support would not be forthcoming for the Government's inter-American policy as long as Mr. Braden, whose resignation has now been announced, prevented the restoration of what he called "the warmth of New World unity." (See also under "Latin America.")

In a week in which events have moved quickly in the field of foreign relations President Truman has at last seen fit to issue a statement urging every citizen and resident of the United States to refrain from all activities which tend to inflame passions in Palestine while the problem of that country is being considered by the United Nations. Meanwhile, various Jewish bodies in the United States have been repudiating the anti-British advertisements of Mr. Ben Hecht. Consultations regarding these advertisements have apparently been held between the State, Justice and Treasury Departments, and the Deputy Director of the State Department Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs now holds out the hope that it will be possible to take early action to deal with them.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

The likelihood of a rapprochement between the United States and Argentina has been brought closer by an announcement from President Truman that Mr. Messersmith will soon be returning from Buenos Aires "on the successful conclusion of his mission." On the 4th June President Truman also "reluctantly" accepted the resignation of Mr. Spruille Braden as Assistant Secretary of State for American Republic Affairs. Mr. Braden's resignation becomes effective on the 30th June, and his withdrawal will presumably mark the end of the "tough policy" of which he has been the constant exponent. In Buenos Aires President Perón has chosen the same time to accept the resignation of his ultra-Nationalist Chief of Police, General Velasco, who is replaced by General Bartollo, a former military attaché in Washington with a record of co-operation with the United States. Each side has thus removed its tough men. According to Press reports, Vittorio Mussolini was greeted with the Fascist salute on entering Rosario in a Government car on the 3rd June: this sounds like a last minute attempt of the Argentine Nationalists to stop the reconciliation with the United States.

Argentina

The removal of the Chief of Police and his assistant, Colonel Molina, also represents a victory for the President and his wife in internal affairs. General Velasco, whose control of the police was of effective assistance to Perón at the time of the presidential campaign, had for some time been one of the leaders of a group of Nationalists who were opposed to the corruption of the present régime and to the multifarious activities of the President's wife. In recent months he had challenged Sr. Miranda, the President of the Central Bank, by releasing to the press information about scandals in the telephone company run by one of Sr. Miranda's satellites (see Summary 392). General Velasco also appears to have stirred up army dissatisfaction with Sr. Miranda on the grounds that he had not supplied the army sufficiently generously with funds. President Perón is obviously deeply committed to Sr. Miranda, and he has now contrived to reconcile the generals with him, while eliminating any challenge to his own authority. As General Velasco derived his strength from his influence with the police rather than from personal popularity, it may be assumed that President Perón has the measure of the Nationalists: at the same time it seems unlikely that even Argentina will tolerate the present rate of racketeering for ever.

An illustration of Argentina's opportunism is provided by the change of the Government's attitude towards the railways since purchasing them from the British companies. Higher freight and passenger charges, formerly resolutely opposed by the Government, are now vigorously advocated by Sr. Miranda, who maintains that increased wages and social services will double expenses and that revenue must accordingly be doubled. Speaking as a good industrialist, he hinted that cattle-breeders would be singled out to bear the brunt of the increases.

Sra. Perón arrived in Madrid on the 8th June and was welcomed by General and Sra. Franco and the whole Spanish Cabinet. According to press accounts, she also had an enthusiastic popular reception and a full programme has been arranged for her fortnight's stay in the Spanish Capital. (See also under "Spain".)

Nicaragua

The political atmosphere in Nicaragua was suddenly disturbed on the night of the 25th May, when the former dictator, General Somoza, executed a coup d'État, as a result of which President Argüello sought refuge in the Mexican Embassy. Dr. Argüello was elected as a result of General Somoza's support, and assumed the presidency on the 1st May. It had obviously been the ex-president's intention to perpetuate his authority by treating Dr. Argüello as a rubber stamp. When Dr. Argüello began to remove supporters of the ex-dictator from the Government, General Somoza availed himself of his position as commander of the National Guard to remove his inconvenient successor by force.

On the 26th May members of the diplomatic corps were allowed to visit Dr. Argüello, who described how two hours before the coup General Somoza had agreed to leave the country. He also handed to his visitors copies of a previously suppressed telegram to heads of foreign states in which he protested against General Somoza's "shameful scandal." The same evening a docile Congress produced a resolution which began with half a dozen unconvincing "whereases," proceeded to divest Dr. Argüello of his office, and appointed Dr. Benjamin L. Sacasa as Provisional President. Dr. Sacasa at once appointed General Somoza as Minister for War, Marine and Aviation and Commander-in-Chief.

While four out of five Nicaraguans are probably opposed to General Somoza, he can count on the army and the censorship and on his own long experience as a dictator.

The United States Government have informed Dr. Guillermo Sacasa, Ambassador of the overthrown government, of their concern regarding the seizure of power in Nicaragua. They are now discussing the situation with other American republics, and pending further developments, are not disposed to enter into official relations with the régime now in power in Nicaragua. H.M. Government are adopting a like attitude.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

On the 4th and 6th June the Council discussed the report of the Military Staff Committee on the general principles which are to regulate the United Nations Armed Forces (see Summary No. 391).

According to the U.S. representative the report constituted a measure of progress, but the U.N. forces must be made effective, and for that reason bases must be available, and Russian insistence on the absolute equality of the Great Powers' contributions must not prevent those Powers which had particularly effective weapons from supplying more of them and less of other kinds of weapons. Artificial restrictions on the location of U.N. forces must not be accepted.

The representative of Belgium, as one of the smaller Powers, doubted the assumption that the threat to peace would not come either directly or indirectly from a Great Power. He noted that the report did not show how the U.N. forces could come quickly into operation. Russia's representative asserted that the delays in the Military Staff Committee (which according to the records are clearly due to Russia's dilatoriness) were caused by the "delegations which had advanced proposals contrary to the Charter." He defended the principle of equal contributions, on the ground that the principle of comparable contributions might place one Power in a position of military advantage. He would allow exceptions, e.g., in air force contingents. Large forces were unnecessary since the defeat of the Axis meant that no large Power remained who could threaten the peace. He opposed the grant of bases for the U.N. forces, because the Charter did not mention the word bases (the word used in the Charter is "facilities"). Nor should the U.N. forces have a general right of passage, since this would infringe national sovereignty. The contingents must be kept on home territory, for the proposal that they might be stationed wherever their Government had a "legal right of access" was "too elastic," a time limit must be laid down for the return of U.N. contingents after their work was done, since it was unsafe for the decision to be left to the Security Council, where the operation of the veto could delay matters indefinitely. Mr. Gromyko's anxiety lest the veto be abused was equalled by his care for the independence of weak nations. It was dangerous, he said, to allow one country to lend equipment to another; and he alluded, in passing, to foreign troops which had remained during several decades in countries where they were looked on as "uninvited guests." He would leave questions of strategic direction to be taken later.

Australia's representative was disappointed at the Committee's slow rate of progress and at the scanty amount of information reaching non-permanent members of the Council. He challenged the unanimity rule and pointed out that neither the tasks required of the U.N. forces, nor their size was defined. The argument that the "moral weight" of a United Nations decision was so great that only small forces were necessary to carry it out, he regarded as unjustified. He opposed the "equal contributions" proposal, and urged the necessity of keeping the United Nations forces ready for immediate action.

Economic and Social Council

Freedom of Information.

The sub-commission concluded its first session on the 4th June, and approved the report by 10 votes to 1. Mr. Lomakin (U.S.S.R.) explained that he had tried to achieve unanimity, and had failed. Since the sub-Commission had refused to accept his view that the Press was concerned primarily with the struggle against the remnants of fascism, and since it retained reference to "the progressive elimination of peace-time censorship," he was obliged to vote against the report.

A Dutch resolution on the shortage of newsprint which hampers the free flow of information was passed by the sub-Commission, and the Economic and Social Council is asked to study the matter urgently and "consider measures to alleviate it."

Human Rights.

The United Kingdom draft for an International Bill of Human Rights has just been published by the Stationery Office as a non-Parliamentary paper, price 4*d*. It has been laid before the Drafting Committee of the Human Rights Commission, the meetings of which began on the 9th June. The text is accompanied by notes and a valuable introduction.

The political atmosphere in Nicaragua was suddenly disturbed on the night of the 25th May, when the former dictator, General Somoza, executed a coup d'État, as a result of which President Argüello sought refuge in the Mexican Embassy. Dr. Argüello was elected as a result of General Somoza's support, and assumed the presidency on the 1st May. It had obviously been the ex-president's intention to perpetuate his authority by treating Dr. Argüello as a rubber stamp. When Dr. Argüello began to remove supporters of the ex-dictator from the Government, General Somoza availed himself of his position as commander of the National Guard to remove his inconvenient successor by force.

On the 26th May members of the diplomatic corps were allowed to visit Dr. Argüello, who described how two hours before the coup General Somoza had agreed to leave the country. He also handed to his visitors copies of a previously suppressed telegram to heads of foreign states in which he protested against General Somoza's "shameful scandal." The same evening a docile Congress produced a resolution which began with half a dozen unconvincing "whereases," proceeded to divest Dr. Argüello of his office, and appointed Dr. Benjamin L. Sacasa as Provisional President. Dr. Sacasa at once appointed General Somoza as Minister for War, Marine and Aviation and Commander-in-Chief.

While four out of five Nicaraguans are probably opposed to General Somoza, he can count on the army and the censorship and on his own long experience as a dictator.

The United States Government have informed Dr. Guillermo Sacasa, Ambassador of the overthrown government, of their concern regarding the seizure of power in Nicaragua. They are now discussing the situation with other American republics, and pending further developments, are not disposed to enter into official relations with the régime now in power in Nicaragua. H.M. Government are adopting a like attitude.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

On the 4th and 6th June the Council discussed the report of the Military Staff Committee on the general principles which are to regulate the United Nations Armed Forces (see Summary No. 391).

According to the U.S. representative the report constituted a measure of progress, but the U.N. forces must be made effective, and for that reason bases must be available, and Russian insistence on the absolute equality of the Great Powers' contributions must not prevent those Powers which had particularly effective weapons from supplying more of them and less of other kinds of weapons. Artificial restrictions on the location of U.N. forces must not be accepted.

The representative of Belgium, as one of the smaller Powers, doubted the assumption that the threat to peace would not come either directly or indirectly from a Great Power. He noted that the report did not show how the U.N. forces could come quickly into operation. Russia's representative asserted that the delays in the Military Staff Committee (which according to the records are clearly due to Russia's dilatoriness) were caused by the "delegations which had advanced proposals contrary to the Charter." He defended the principle of equal contributions, on the ground that the principle of comparable contributions might place one Power in a position of military advantage. He would allow exceptions, e.g., in air force contingents. Large forces were unnecessary since the defeat of the Axis meant that no large Power remained who could threaten the peace. He opposed the grant of bases for the U.N. forces, because the Charter did not mention the word bases (the word used in the Charter is "facilities"). Nor should the U.N. forces have a general right of passage, since this would infringe national sovereignty. The contingents must be kept on home territory, for the proposal that they might be stationed wherever their Government had a "legal right of access" was "too elastic," a time limit must be laid down for the return of U.N. contingents after their work was done, since it was unsafe for the decision to be left to the Security Council, where the operation of the veto could delay matters indefinitely. Mr. Gromyko's anxiety lest the veto be abused was equalled by his care for the independence of weak nations. It was dangerous, he said, to allow one country to lend equipment to another; and he alluded, in passing, to foreign troops which had remained during several decades in countries where they were looked on as "uninvited guests." He would leave questions of strategic direction to be taken later.

Australia's representative was disappointed at the Committee's slow rate of progress and at the scanty amount of information reaching non-permanent members of the Council. He challenged the unanimity rule and pointed out that neither the tasks required of the U.N. forces, nor their size was defined. The argument that the "moral weight" of a United Nations decision was so great that only small forces were necessary to carry it out, he regarded as unjustified. He opposed the "equal contributions" proposal, and urged the necessity of keeping the United Nations forces ready for immediate action.

Economic and Social Council

Freedom of Information.

The sub-commission concluded its first session on the 4th June, and approved the report by 10 votes to 1. Mr. Lomakin (U.S.S.R.) explained that he had tried to achieve unanimity, and had failed. Since the sub-Commission had refused to accept his view that the Press was concerned primarily with the struggle against the remnants of fascism, and since it retained reference to "the progressive elimination of peace-time censorship," he was obliged to vote against the report.

A Dutch resolution on the shortage of newsprint which hampers the free flow of information was passed by the sub-Commission, and the Economic and Social Council is asked to study the matter urgently and "consider measures to alleviate it."

Human Rights.

The United Kingdom draft for an International Bill of Human Rights has just been published by the Stationery Office as a non-Parliamentary paper, price 4*d*. It has been laid before the Drafting Committee of the Human Rights Commission, the meetings of which began on the 9th June. The text is accompanied by notes and a valuable introduction.

A permanent German Central Economic Commission has been set up by the Soviet Military Administration in their zone. This was announced by Marshal Sokolowsky on the 14th June. The Commission is to direct the economic reconstruction of the zone. Information on its powers is not yet complete but it seems that its orders must be approved by the Soviet Military Administration, and will then be effective over the planning, direction and control of all economy in the zone. According to press reports the Commission is composed of the five Presidents of the Central Administration for agriculture, industry, fuel and power, transport and commerce, together with the Presidents of the Freie Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund and of the Bauernhilfe. The five representatives of the Central Administration were originally appointed to their posts by the Soviet Military Administration. The new Commission, unlike the Bi-Zonal Economic Council, is not subject to any parliamentary control and does not provide for representation of federal interests. It is, in fact, a completely centralised economic cabinet consisting entirely of members of or sympathisers with the Socialist Unity Party, but responsible to Military Government. It is to be supported by an economic department, whose composition is not yet known, which will coordinate the work of existing organisations and provide liaison between the Laender and the Central Administration. The Commission provides one first direct link between the different members of the Central Administration, although some, e.g., the administrations of Finance and the Interior are not represented. It is not yet certain whether the provision that orders must be approved by the Soviet Military Administration will mean that every detail will be subject to control or whether only larger decisions of policy will be affected, but Military Government intervention is likely to be more direct than in the bi-zonal area. Although this move may be viewed in part as an answer to the bi-zonal economic council, it had clearly been contemplated for a long time before the latter's establishment and is a natural step in the zone's policy of centralisation.

During the last week of May Saxony-Anhalt and Thuringia passed laws nationalising mineral resources. In Thuringia this was opposed by both Christian Democrats and Liberal Democrats and in Saxony by the Christian Democrats only. In the former case, there was no provision for suitable compensation. In Saxony, compensation is provided for those who are not politically incriminated, although few are likely to benefit, and CDU opposition to the Bill seems to have been due to their belief that it should have granted the workers some association in the management of State enterprises. A Brandenburg draft socialisation law was recently rejected by the Soviet Military Administration because it did not expressly exclude foreign property, but mines in this State and in Saxony have already been removed from private ownership. A Trade Pact was signed on the 27th May between the Soviet zone and the Netherlands. Goods which the Soviet zone is to export include potash, timber, chemicals and even newsprint as well as iron and steel products for which the Netherlands will supply raw materials. Such scarce commodities as machines for the agricultural and food industries are mentioned. The Soviet zone will get in exchange such goods as rubber and fish. A Trade Agreement was also signed at the end of May between the Soviet zone and Sweden while in April pacts were concluded with Czechoslovakia, Denmark and Yugoslavia.

A law directed against cartels has been promulgated in the French zone. According to press reports of the 13th June, it states that no organisations may, without special permission, employ more than 10,000 workers or have a capital exceeding 50,000,000 R.M. The limit on the number of workers is the same as that in the U.S. zone law introduced this spring and appears likewise to be somewhat more mandatory than that of the British zone. The latter laid down that firms employing 10,000 or more workers must be "examined" as "prima facie evidence of an undue concentration of powers." The limit on capital is peculiar to the French zone. The firms most likely to be affected such as branches of the Degussa, Daimler-Benz and Mannesmann works have been held under French control since the early days of the occupation.

A draft land reform law, drawn up by the British authorities, was submitted for consideration to the Zonal Advisory Council on the 11th June. It is considered as an economic and social measure which is not connected with proceedings against militarists or Nazis. Land belonging to such persons has already been expropriated without compensation. The present Draft provides that nobody may own land of more than 150 hectares or worth more than 200,000 R.M. if this is the greater. All land affected will come under the control of a technical commission in each Land composed of persons with practical knowledge of land and farming. All acreage in excess of the permitted amount will be expropriated, but the owners will be compensated. The Commission has to see that food production is not interfered with and may require the former owner to run the land until it is distributed. The land will eventually be leased to persons approved by the Commission who will have an option to buy at the end of three years if they have farmed satisfactorily. Special consideration will be given to refugees. Forests will normally be transferred to the Land. Detailed application of the law will rest with the Governments. The Zonal Advisory Council had been consulted last autumn and its many differing recommendations were later borne in mind. The present Advisory Council, however, is differently constituted, being more representative of party views, and it has shown considerable resentment because it believes it has not been sufficiently consulted. It has now been given one month to study the proposals. At the meeting on the 11th June, Communist and Social Democrat speakers displayed particular opposition and they are likely to recruit support from the Centre Party and even the left wing of the CDU in demanding that the permitted acreage should be cut to 100 hectares and that the Commissions should include party representatives. In the Soviet zone all estates of over 100 hectares have been expropriated without compensation. The U.S. zone law provides for distribution of land on a sliding scale but it is so vaguely worded and contains so many loopholes that it is still doubtful whether much land will be divided. The French zone law is not yet complete.

The decay of Four-Power Government in Berlin has not yet been arrested. The latest compromise reached in the Control Council on the 10th June is more of an acknowledgment of the deadlock than a means of removing it. It was agreed that the Assembly and not the Magistrat (Government), as the Russians had wanted, should be asked to elect a new Lord Mayor. It was also agreed that his appointment would require the prior approval of all four Allies although the British and U.S. representatives insisted that this did not mean that they accepted the general principle of prior approval. This represents a considerable triumph for the Russians, who can continue to exercise their veto, and it must weaken the tactical position of the Western Powers in future debate on the subject. General Clay first proposed the arrangement, and in doing so is understood to have acted against the advice of his staff. The Social Democrats feel very strongly that they have been let down. Their most probable candidate for the mayoralty, Reuter, is unacceptable to the Russians presumably because he left the Communist party in 1921 and is opposed to Russian ideas. The most likely outcome is that Frau Louise Schroeder will eventually be elected. She is not an outstanding personality, she will be kept under close party control and is unlikely to be able to do much to strengthen the reputation of the Berlin Government.

Eight weeks after the British zone election cabinets have at last been formed in N. Rhine/Westphalia and Lower Saxony. In N. Rhine/Westphalia, Arnold, representing the left wing of the Christian Democrats, is reported to have succeeded in forming a coalition which only the Free Democrats have refused to join. All other members are believed to be prepared for some measure of Socialisation. Despite considerable friction a split between the left and right wings of the Christian Democratic Union was avoided. On the 3rd June, the Zonal Committee sent a letter drafted by Arnold's friends, but signed by Adenauer the right-wing leader, which empowered him to continue his negotiations to form an all-party cabinet. It was announced on the 12th June that the provisional cabinet of Lower Saxony would consist of 4 Social Democrats, headed again by the previous Prime Minister Kopf, 2 Christian Democrats, 2 Lower Saxon Party, 1 Communist, 1 Free Democrat and 1 member of the Centre Party. This gives a left wing majority of only one, but it is not yet known what attitude the two Christian Democrats will take towards socialisation.

AUSTRIA

A political storm of the first order broke on Austria on the 9th June with the disclosure, in the U.S.-controlled Wiener Kurier, that secret talks relating to possible Government changes had been held between the Communist Deputy, Ernst Fischer, and leading members of the People's Party (OVP), including the Chancellor. This revelation, which was made by the Foreign Minister, Dr. Gruber, immediately gave rise to a spate of statements, accusations and rumours. The Wiener Kurier's version stated that Fischer had threatened Soviet refusal to sign a treaty unless the Austrian Government was drastically reconstructed. This has been flatly denied by Ernst Fischer, who has also sought to give the impression that the talks were held on the initiative of the OVP and also that the Chancellor said he was willing to resign. Dr. Figl has stated categorically that the interview was persistently sought by Herr Fischer; he himself had never said he would resign, or that there was any question of new elections before the constitutional term. He admitted that economic questions, including the German assets, had been discussed, but emphasised that he had only intended the meeting to be private and "social."

Privately, Dr. Figl has expressed great annoyance that his Foreign Minister should have given publicity to such highly secret talks. The disclosure has, of course, aroused keen Socialist resentment against the OVP for excluding the SPO, and particular exception has been taken to the fact that the Head of the Government should have implicated himself even in a private capacity. The OVP has defended the Chancellor's action on the grounds that the talks were expected to be "purely social" and that it was Herr Fischer who overstepped the mark in raising matters of far-reaching importance. Rumours of Dr. Gruber's resignation have been officially denied. Herr Fischer and the Communists have been most vociferous in their condemnation and have demanded both his resignation and an official enquiry into the "leakage." They have also condemned as "outrageous" the Socialist failure to demand the resignation of both the Foreign Minister and the Chancellor. The OVP, solidly behind the Government, has stressed that the country will not be intimidated by a small minority.

A parallel between the Austrian crisis and the situation in Hungary has been drawn by spokesmen of both the OVP and SPO. Dr. Gruber, in a private conversation, expressed the opinion that the Austrian political storm was a development of the Soviet political offensive which had begun in Hungary. An SPO Deputy, in the Parliamentary debate on the 11th June, voiced his regret that the Chancellor had given to the outside world the impression of being about to involve the OVP in a disaster similar to that which had recently befallen the Smallholders Party in Hungary. The reality of the four-Power occupation in Austria does not, however, appear to justify such extreme fears.

No Russian reaction to the situation has so far been noted. Lord Pakenham, speaking in the House of Lords on the 11th June, emphasised that His Majesty's Government regarded the present Austrian Government as fully representative of the state of public opinion as revealed by the 1946 elections; His Majesty's Government would regard any step to make the Austrian Government unrepresentative, and not corresponding to the declared will of the people as expressed at the elections, as dictated by pressure from outside and not as representing the wishes of the Austrian people.

After a week's adjournment the Austrian Peace Treaty Commission reassembled on the 11th June. Two days previously the Soviet Delegation had tabled a new proposal which, in the opinion of the two leading British experts, represents an appreciable advance on the previous Soviet position and an improvement on the latest French proposal (see last week's Summary). The new Soviet proposal suggests that the Commission shall begin by discussing in the framework of Article 35 the various categories of potential German assets. Having established these categories, the Commission will proceed to study the question of what sort of concrete facts it is necessary or useful to ascertain in regard to them. The actual field to be investigated would be oil, the Danube Steam Shipping Company, financial institutions and State property. The Commission would refer to the Committee of Experts questions which require special investigation in the light of facts. The procedure envisaged still runs largely counter to the original U.K. proposals for the respective rôles of the Commission and the Committee, but the U.K. experts consider that the new Soviet conception is not wholly unreasonable. One week's work on independent fact-finding has tended to bear out Soviet apprehensions that, unless the scope of enquiry is limited to specific tasks, the Committee might get lost in a mass of unco-ordinated detail. The U.K. experts consider that quadripartite fact-finding is beginning to appear not only impracticable but perhaps even undesirable. Important U.K. and U.S. amendments to the Soviet proposal were, however, rejected by M. Novikov on the 12th June. In particular, M. Novikov denied the right of any one delegation to secure discussion of facts which it regarded as important, claiming that the Commission must decide whether or not such facts warranted consideration. He also put up strong resistance to all attempts by the U.S. member to provide for a reasonable rotation of discussion, and blamed the other Delegations for having blocked discussion of concrete facts. He has also again accused the U.S. delegate of wanting to revise the Potsdam decision.

After a month's work the Commission is thus still wrangling over procedure and local Austrian opinion is said to be showing signs of restiveness at a deadlock which is not wholly ascribed to Soviet obstruction. Pessimism as to the outcome of the Commission's work was reported from the British zone in the latter half of May. Opinion of the political parties in Styria was that the issues at stake were too great to be discussed at Deputy level. In Carinthia, few people were expecting tangible results, but there was said to be much talk of a possible permanent partition of Austria into an Eastern and a Western zone, should the November Conference of Foreign Ministers prove a failure. Headlines in the Vienna press have indicated pessimism and impatience.

A British resolution setting out objections to the activities of USIVA (Administration of Soviet property in Austria) was supported by the U.S. member at the Allied Control Council's meeting on the 13th June. The Soviet member refused to take part in the discussion though he remained present. The object of USIVA is to operate within Austria, but outside Austrian jurisdiction, an individual organisation of the firms classed as German assets, the products of which are used mainly to supply Soviet home requirements. This is a flagrant violation of previous Allied Council decisions which recognise Austria's right to control her indigenous resources and allocation of industrial goods. An article in the Communist Oesterreichische Volksstimme, 18th May, sought to prove that Austrian concerns taken over by the Russians were being allowed and encouraged to distribute the major part of their products for the benefit of the Austrian economy.

The question of arms for the police was also discussed without success by the Council. General Zheltov refused to consider a British proposal for the arming of the police with a certain number of revolvers and attempted to confuse the issue by alleging that there were some 3,000 Nazis in the police and gendarmerie, and that the budgetary provisions for these forces had been exceeded. An interim Control Council decision to arm the police with wooden truncheons has been described by a Communist press article as an indignity for the population.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Relationships between the Czechoslovak Communists and the Slovak Democrats are again in the forefront of interest. On 11th June all parties within the National Front met to discuss the position of the Slovak Democrats. The Slovak Communists, spurred on, no doubt, by their Czech counterpart (M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister, re-asserted the presence of a "pact" between the Democrats and the Hlinka elements) pressed for a purge of the Democrat ranks. Dr. Lettrich rejected all criticisms of his Party, saying that the only "pact" had been that made between the Catholics and Protestants within his Party in support of that very same national solidarity which they were now accused of disrupting. The negotiations terminated when all Parties resolved to co-operate in amicable accord, to solve as soon as possible the question of the new Constitution, and to eradicate reaction. It remains to be seen, however, how "amicable" this co-operation—hitherto uneasy—will remain.

The Czech National Socialist Party recently celebrated in Prague its fiftieth anniversary. The Party was founded in 1896 to compete with the Social Democrats for the votes of the newly enfranchised workers of Austria, and it endeavoured in a moderate programme to "group together a section of the working class and a section of the lower categories of public and private employees, as well as of the artisans and intellectuals." Hence it developed, along with the major current of social democracy in Czechoslovakia, as a subsidiary, non-Marxist socialist party with a reformist and evolutionary programme—a programme which still forms its political platform. After the 1918 revolution it changed its name to the Czechoslovak Socialist party, but returned to the old name in 1925 long before the Hitlerite brand of national socialism attained any significance. Much of the party's strength is due to the influence of President Beneš, a former member, and to the fact that he was—and is—such an earnest disciple of President Masaryk's political outlook. At the first general election after the Liberation (May 1946), the party was second in strength to the Czech Communists.

Reviewing its development, Dr. Zenkl, a deputy Prime Minister and Chairman of the Party, said that the Party, whose strength lay in its policy of humanitarian democracy and Czechoslovak socialism fully endorsed the ideas of President Masaryk and President Beneš. Reaffirming the Party's loyalty to socialist doctrine, Dr. Zenkl stated that it rejected any concept of socialism which "aims at realising the class demands of merely one part of the community."

On 16th June, a Cultural Agreement was signed between the United Kingdom and Czechoslovakia. The signatories on behalf of the former were Mr. Bevin, H.M. Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Tomlinson, Minister of Education; on behalf of Czechoslovakia, Dr. Stránský, Minister of Education, and M. Kratochvil, Czechoslovak Ambassador to the Court of St. James. The Agreement is important because it is the only one of its kind which His Majesty's Government at present contemplate with any country in Eastern Europe. The Agreement, which will operate for five years, provides for the exchange of teachers and students, mutual visits for holiday courses, the showing of films and the establishment of additional professorial chairs in both countries.

The first conference of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions has just ended in Prague. The Congress was attended by delegates from 53 countries. Deputy Zapotocký, Communist Chairman of the Czechoslovak Trade Union Movement, in his opening address exhorted the unions in every country to be on their guard against possible reactionary counter-attacks. Broadcasting from Prague, Mr. Walter Deakin, President of the W.F.T.U., described his impressions of Czechoslovakia with the following words: "We have been able very briefly to look at the two-year planning and it certainly inspires one with very great confidence in the Republic's future."

The annual Congress of the International Journalists' Organisation ended recently in Prague. By a majority of 13 votes to 8, the Bohemian capital was selected as the permanent seat of this organization; Mr. Archibald Kenyon (U.K.) was re-elected Chairman. The Congress was significant as furnishing a battleground for the clash of "eastern" and "western" ideologies.

SOVIET UNION

M. Molotov's answers to Sir Maurice Peterson's request for information on the Hungarian situation in their interview of the 9th June were unsatisfactory. Ignoring Sir Maurice's specific points concerning Soviet intervention in the sphere of Hungarian economics, particularly the attempt to gain control over the Credit Bank, M. Molotov concentrated on the need for refraining from intervention in Hungarian internal affairs, trying to turn the tables by accusing His Majesty's Government of this interference. With a demeanour even more imperturbable and uncompromising than usual, M. Molotov painted a picture of complete Soviet righteousness and never even made any attempt to justify his Government's actions on security grounds. He insisted that Great Britain would not increase her prestige in Hungary by attempting to defend M. Nagy. Interference could only have a negative result; the Hungarians must be left to decide their own internal questions for themselves. Recent events in Hungary did not, according to M. Molotov, threaten the interests of any Allied Power and particularly not those of Great Britain. Although he did not give the information for which Sir M. Peterson had asked, he strenuously denied the charges of Soviet secretiveness towards their Allies. The Soviet authorities assisted the Allied Control Commission over matters which concerned them; the present events emphatically did not.

The communiqué put out by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R. on the 14th June reporting the conversation gave a fairly accurate précis of M. Molotov's remarks, but did no justice to the points put forward by Sir Maurice, who is to see M. Molotov again on the 17th June. Meanwhile General Sviridov in Budapest has rejected the letter of the American representative of the Control Commission, General Weems, asking for a Three-Power Commission to investigate the Hungarian situation.

Soviet press comment on the crisis has not been extensive; Pravda dragged in the familiar argument that the plot was evidence of the struggle being waged by the united forces of reaction against the young Hungarian democracy, and accused the United States of taking drastic action such as the suspension of credits "even before receiving any information on the state of affairs." The proposal of the group of Senators headed by Mr. Vandenberg to bring the Hungarian question before the United Nations showed that the main task of U.N.O. was supposed to be "the combating of democracy." Pravda concluded by quoting Senator Eastland to the effect that if the U.S.S.R. should leave U.N.O. the United Nations might become "a military organisation." Did not this show the real meaning of the clamour raised round events in Hungary?

M. Vyshinsky, from his retreat at Karlsbad, has sent greetings to the Hungarian democracy "the more so because now you have such a likeable Premier." It is of interest that so far no Soviet comments have been received on the Bulgarian crisis, nor on the tension in Roumania and Austria, though there have been brief Tass accounts of events in the different countries.

A week after the report circulated by the Chinese Central News Agency of an attack by Outer Mongolian troops supported by aircraft bearing Soviet identification marks on a Chinese military unit in eastern Sinkiang, Tass (Ulan Bator, the 15th June) transmitted an official and circumstantial denial from the Mongolian Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese version of the incident. There was also a direct Tass démenti from Moscow two days earlier. According to the Mongolian account the district in the Baitak Bogdo range of mountains where the clash is alleged to have taken place is fifteen miles across the frontier of the Mongolian People's Republic and not within the boundaries of Sinkiang. The aggressors are therefore said to be the Chinese and not the Outer Mongolian troops who only "took measures to drive the raiders out of their country" when the Chinese had ignored their request "to clear out of Mongolian territory. . . . . In this action, the Mongolian frontier guards did not cross the border on to Chinese territory." The account contains some gruesome details of the mutilation by the Chinese of several Mongolian frontier guards and the Mongolian negotiator "killed in a barbaric manner in violation of the commonly accepted principles of international relations." Finally the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Mongolian People's Republic makes a sharp protest to the Chinese Government and reserves the right to demand the punishment of the offenders and compensation for the damages suffered by the Mongolian Republic. It may be recalled in this connection that according to the Soviet-Mongolian Treaty of February, 1946, in the case of a military attack on one of the contracting parties, the two Governments undertake to render each other every assistance including military assistance. (See also under "Far East.")

The Mufti Ishan Babahan, Chairman of the Moslem Council of Central Asia, has returned to the Soviet Union after a 45 days' pilgrimage to Mecca. This is the third pilgrimage made by the Mufti to the holy places of Islam. In a broadcast in Arabic over Moscow wireless (the 13th June), he paid tribute to the attention paid him by the authorities and the people of Mecca and said he had had some valuable talks with religious dignitaries there.

The Jewish settlement of the remote autonomous province of Birobidzhan, which has long been quiescent, is now apparently being revived and exploited in Soviet propaganda designed to deprecate the British-sponsored Palestinian experiment. According to a broadcast in Yiddish (the 8th June) for the U.S.A., the second transport of resettlers from Vinnitsa has departed for Birobidzhan. It was stated that the builders of the Jewish Autonomous Province were carrying out a great and honourable task as well as a great historic mission, the creation of the only Jewish Socialist State in the world.

The unification and revision of the Soviet penal Codes inaugurated by the decree abolishing capital punishment of the 27th May (see Summary No. 394) is proceeding and new decrees have now been published on—

(a) Thefts of public property;
(b) Thefts of private property;
(c) The Defence of State Secrets.

The decree dealing with thefts of public property, i.e., State, collective farm or other Communist property, is mainly concerned with the penalties for these offences which range from five to twenty-five years' detention in a correctional labour camp, with or without confiscation of property. The text of the decree does not define the amount of the theft, appropriation or embezzlement incurring either the maximum or minimum penalties. A large margin of discretion is thus left to the judicial authorities. It is also decreed that failure to inform the authorities of a known theft of State or communal property either under preparation or already committed, is to be punished by imprisonment for two or three years or by deportation for five to seven years. A similar decree was also passed at the same time "with the aim of strengthening the protection of citizens' private property," and was directed against individual theft (punishable by detention in a correctional labour camp with confiscation of property. gang of thieves (punishable by detention in a correctional labour camp for 6–10 years); and banditry, that is, assaults or the threat of violence with the object of appropriating other people's property, punishable by detention for 10–15 years in a correctional labour camp with confiscation of property. If the assault endangers the life or health of the victim or causes grievous bodily harm, the penalty is raised to 15–20 years' detention with confiscation of property. Penalties of up to 2 years' imprisonment or banishment for 4–5 years are also announced for failure to report a robbery "known to be under preparation or known to have been committed." Apart from the fact that the death penalty has been abolished for the most serious form of assault and robbery, the penalties for ordinary thefts established by the above decrees are heavier than those previously enforced according to the penal code. The new legislation confirms the Soviet authorities' determination to stamp out post-war lawlessness and thieving, the large-scale proportions of which have hitherto caused them much concern.

The text of the decree "On the Defence of State Secrets" showed that its purpose was "to unify legislation and to increase penalties" in respect of the various classes of offence falling under this heading as defined in a following decree (see below). The punishments prescribed consisted of confinement in "correctional labour camps" for varying periods, the maximum possible sentence of 20 years being reserved for any disclosure of "information of a military nature." It was made clear that the Decree stopped short of dealing with offences of such gravity as to amount to "high treason or espionage." One clause stated that the penalty for disclosing secret discoveries or technical improvements would apply not only to offences committed from within Soviet territories, but also to those committed abroad by "U.S.S.R. citizens sent there by the State." Finally it was notified that all cases arising under the decree would "come within the jurisdiction of Military Tribunals." This decree was followed by another containing a list of items of information constituting a state secret and classified under the following headings:—(a) Information of a Military Nature; (b) Information of an Economic Nature; (c) Geological resources and the extraction of non-ferrous and rare metals; (d) Miscellaneous Information; (e) State ciphers and contents of coded messages; (f) Any other information which the U.S.S.R., Council of Ministers may describe as not subject to disclosure. The above decree enumerates the items classified under the heading of State Secrets in far greater detail than the previous enactments of the Council of People's Commissars of 1926, 1925 and 1924, which it supersedes. It throws the net so wide that Russian nervousness about contacts with foreigners—already extreme—has noticeably increased.

The Soviet attitude of dislike and distrust of the proposed International Trade organisation as expressed in recent comment on the Geneva trade talks is a natural corollary of the fact that fundamentally the Soviet Union prefers the principle of bilateralism to any multi-lateral trade framework, and that her interest in foreign trade is strictly limited. She is indeed only interested in international trade so as to obtain essential products, if possible on credit for the realisation of the current five year plan, but relies mainly upon her own resources for the reconstruction and development of the Soviet Union. It should be noted that she does not regard international trade as a means for promoting world co-operation or of prosperity and in general has no interest in increasing commercial exchanges between the nations with the exception of trade between her satellites. The Soviet Union is a country whose currency has no value or meaning abroad and her financial transactions are largely made through a clearing house account, except with some of the satellites, notably Finland, which is expressed in dollars and conducted on that basis.

The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. has released M. Sergei Lukin from his duties as Minister of Light Industry of the U.S.S.R. "owing to ill-health." M. Nicolai Chesnokov who was appointed in his place was Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the R.S.F.S.R. and was in charge of the Textile and Light Industries.

SCANDINAVIA

Norway

The Ministry for Foreign Affairs announced on the 3rd June that, following negotiations, the Government had declared itself prepared to receive a Spanish chargé d'affaires, thus regularising the diplomatic relations between the two countries. Hitherto the relationship has been entirely one-sided, with a Norwegian representative in Madrid, while Norway's unconcealed reluctance to receive a Spanish diplomat has more than once been the cause of complaint by General Franco. The Government's decision is in keeping with the revised attitude towards Spain cautiously outlined by M. Lange, the Foreign Minister, before the Storting earlier in the year (see Summary No. 383), but the fact that the Spanish chargé d'affaires will reside in Copenhagen and, at least for the time being, be attached to his country's Legation there may be taken as a measure of the very strong feeling which many sections of the Norwegian public entertain against the present Spanish régime. Even so, the announcement was debated in the Storting on the following day, when the Communist member M. Vougt accused the Foreign Minister of having broken his promise to keep the assembly informed of future developments. M. Lange refuted the statement by saying that the Foreign Affairs Committee had been fully informed of the Government's intentions.

Finland

At a press conference after his return from Moscow M. Kaijalainen, the Minister of Communications, disclosed the terms under which Finland will be allowed to utilise the railway through the Porkkala area. The Finns may run five trains—passenger or goods—daily in each direction, but these will be pulled by Russian locomotives along the stretch of approximately 40 kilometres through the territory of the Soviet naval base. The train personnel during this part of the run will also be Russian, and the blinds of all passenger coaches must be drawn. The Soviet Union is to receive by way of payment five-sixths of the total annual profit of the Finnish State Railways derived from the operation of the service between the two border stations of Köklax and Täkter. This, according to preliminary estimates, will amount to about 19½ million finnmarks. The agreement is for one year only, but it is understood that it will automatically be renewed, though doubtless renewal will be conditional upon internal political developments. The Finns, nevertheless, profess to be pleased with the arrangement and are hoping to inauguarate traffic along this line between Helsinki and Turku in the near future. On the subject of transit rights through the Saimaa Canal M. Kaijalainen said that negotiations had not broken down but merely been suspended in order to give the Government time to consider whether under the terms proffered navigation of the Canal would be a paying proposition.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

The Commissioners-General, Professor Schermerhorn and M. van Poll, left the Netherlands for the N.E.I. on the 8th June. Among those who witnessed their departure were Professor Romme, leader of the Catholic Social Party in the Second Chamber, and M. J. M. Kiveron, Secretary-General of the Ministry of Overseas Territories. Professor Schermerhorn told journalists before he left that he still had "great hope" of a "satisfactory" solution of the Indonesian problem through "joint endeavour." "I cannot make a statement concerning reports which are not yet official," he added. "I do not want to obstruct Mr. Sjarir in any way, and will therefore await the definite reply of the Republican delegation with interest. There has been mention of Republican counter-proposals. It will depend upon their contents whether we can continue the negotiations." Nevertheless, the threat of Dutch military intervention—albeit on a limited scale—remains; and the situation in Java is said to have deteriorated appreciably.

According to an official announcement in The Hague on the 11th June, Dr. van Mook has been refused permission to resign the Lieutenant-Governor-Generalship of the N.E.I. owing to the "present developments in the Indonesian situation," but has been asked to remain in office "in the national interest" until such time as the situation allows his request to be acceded.

Belgium

Two independent visits to London were paid last week by distinguished Belgians. On the 9th June, M. van Acker, Socialist ex-Premier and now Minister of Communications, opened the Maison Belge in Regent Street as a travel information bureau. In the course of a short inaugural speech, M. van Acker said that they were gathered together to celebrate "an event of some importance in the history of Anglo-Belgian relations." In the Maison Belge, information about the national railways, the State shipping lines and the tourist services would be "assembled under one roof, to promote touring relations between the two countries." On the 10th, a Belgian Parliamentary Delegation of twelve, headed by M. van Cauwelaert, President of the Chamber of Representatives, and M. Gillon, President of the Senate, was officially received at the House of Commons by Mr. Eden, who welcomed the Delegation in the name of the British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. A meeting of the British group, with Major Milner, the Deputy Speaker in the chair, was later addressed by one of the delegates, M. H. Fayat, a Socialist Deputy for Brussels, who gave his audience a detailed account of Belgium since 1940. Perhaps the most interesting parts of his address were those which related to the question royale and the problem of Wallonia. After observing that, in 1940, the Belgian Army was "twice the size" of the B.E.F., and that "never again" should the British or the U.S.A. "allow the same unpreparedness to become a threat" for their "freedom-loving friends," M. Fayat said that the Allied military collapse on the Continent had had "tragic results" for the Belgian Army and its Commander-in-Chief, King Leopold. "Surrender after brave fighting," continued M. Fayat, "was never a dishonour; but the cruel consequence was that, in the midst of these disastrous events, our King, ill-advised by his personal assistants, acted contrary to the unanimous advice of his Ministers." "Much nonsense" had been talked about the question royale both at home and abroad; and the "least sensible" people were, "as usual," the royalists themselves. The point was that the nation wanted to be "reasonably sure" that the Head of the State would "behave as a constitutional, parliamentary monarch"—that is, one who would act upon the advice of his responsible Ministers, rather than upon that of "irresponsible personal assistants." They had been fortunate, however, in finding a willing helper through that "painful period" in the person of Prince Charles. Belgium owed a great deal to the dynasty founded 116 years ago by Leopold I. Speaking of the Walloon problem—particularly in relation to the total population of Belgium—M. Fayat said that, although the total population had remained almost stationary between 1938 and 1946—8,386,000 in the former year, 8,388,000 in the latter—the striking factor was the "growing change in the relative strength" of the three parts of which Belgium consisted. Thus, while the Flemish population—already substantially larger than the Walloon population—actually increased from 4,410,000 to 4,510,000, the Walloon population fell from 3,030,000 to 2,928,000. By contrast, the bi-lingual Brussels area shewed little change—a slight increase from 946,000 to 950,000. "The significant fact," said M. Fayat, "is that there are only two Walloons to every three Flemings, and there is a tendency towards still more Flemings." A group of Walloon members of the Chamber had sponsored a private Bill to reorganize Belgium on federal lines—a Walloon and a Flemish region and a Brussels area, each with a separate Government and "well-defined powers"—so as to prevent a Flemish majority from "dictating policy" to a Walloon minority; but there was "no reasonable prospect"—constitutional difficulties apart—of this Bill's ever becoming law. "Special attention" would be devoted to this problem; and one of the delegates present, M. Harmel, a Christian Social Deputy for Liége, had sponsored a Bill for the establishment of a research institute on Flemish-Walloon relations. The solution was not to be sought in separation, nor in advising Walloons to "compete" with Flemings in producing "more and more" children.

FRANCE

The French Government are deeply interested in the speech made by the U.S. Secretary of State at Harvard (see last week's Summary under "United States") which offered U.S. help to those European countries which could draw up a concerted programme of their needs for reconstruction. The Government therefore welcomed Mr. Bevin's proposal that he should go to Paris to discuss the matter with them and he left for Paris on the 17th June. Mr. Bevin had said in a speech to the Foreign Press Association on the 13th June that "France, Great Britain and the United States—almost in direct line geographically—have a great common interest . . . . We have decided to consult her (France) and other European nations to see how best we can take advantage of this great proposal of the United States." The French Government were equally quick to react and sent an outline of their views on Mr. Marshall's proposal to His Majesty's Government and to Mr. Marshall himself. They realise the need for speed in drawing up a European programme of requirements and therefore suggest that ad hoc committees of experts should examine each country's needs in essential materials and equipment, considering how far they can be satisfied by exchanges within Europe and drawing up a final deficit for presentation to the U.S. The main difficulty which will face the French Government in this matter is the attitude of the Communists. The French Government asked the Soviet Government for its views on Mr. Marshall's proposal but no reply has yet been received and the hostility which is already apparent in the Soviet press will certainly determine the attitude of the French Communists.

The acceptance by His Majesty's Government of the new boundaries given to the Saar territory by the French authorities, subject to the decision of the final peace settlement (see last week's Summary under "Germany"), has given great satisfaction to the French. The question of the adjustment of France's reparations claim still remains to be considered.

Agreement in principle has now been reached on French recruitment of German labour from the British Zone of Germany, and the agreement will be embodied in an exchange of letters. The details will be settled in Berlin where a Franco-American agreement on recruitment of German labour will also be concluded on parallel lines.

The French railway strike was finally settled in the early hours of the 12th June and the Government's honour was "preserved" by the railway unions agreeing to issue an appeal to the men to return to work before the actual conclusion of the new wage agreement. The extra cost to the Government will be 10 milliard fr. for the rest of this year, instead of the 13 milliard demanded by the railwaymen, and it will no doubt be covered by an increase in rail fares. On the other hand the Government has announced that while it will leave the question of production bonuses for private negotiation between employers and workers, these bonuses must not exceed a fixed amount and they must not have the effect of raising prices. This decision is not likely to please the C.G.T. and the Government may be forced to retreat from it. The railway settlement and that also concluded with the gas and electricity workers represent a considerable retreat from the Government's original position. M. Ramadier, however, is facing the situation bravely and he had another parliamentary success when he addressed the Assembly on the 10th June. He spoke of the damage to the country which was being caused by the railway strike and urged the trade unions to adopt a more responsible attitude. He laid particular emphasis on the fact that the present disputes were not between labour and capitalist employers but between labour and the State and said that they gave the impression of being attempts to overthrow the authority of the Republic and the policy of nationalisation.

SWITZERLAND

On the 7th June a Compensation Trade Agreement with Finland was signed at Helsinki. The value of trade involved is 20 million Swiss francs in each direction, and the period covered is 1st June, 1947, to 31st May, 1948. Swiss imports from Finland under the agreement include sawn timber, pulp paper and paper products, wall-paper and glassware. Swiss exports will be mainly electrical machinery and equipment to a value of 10 million Swiss francs, chemicals, pharmaceutical products, textiles, clocks, watches, precision instruments, ball bearings, rolling stock and automobile spare parts.

An agreement concluded with Switzerland for the reciprocal abolition of visas for Swiss and British subjects will come into force on the 24th June. Permits are still required, however, before a subject of either country can take up employment in the respective foreign country. The agreement also applies to Liechtenstein nationals and to British visitors to Liechtenstein.

Federal arbitration proposed to settle the dispute with the building industry, which included reduced working hours, higher pay and improved holiday facilities, has been rejected by both employers and employees. As a result, local strikes have occurred.

Labour troubles have also resulted in a strike in a rayon factory at Stekborn, affecting nearly 500 workers.

Zurich doctors refused to accept panel patients as from the 1st May. Health insurance offices have now agreed to increased rates, and the medical service has been resumed.

Official figures show that the wage index rose by 2·5 per cent. in the first quarter of 1947 to 170·3 (January–August 1939=100), as compared with a cost of living index of 155·3.

ITALY

On the 13th June the French National Assembly by a unanimous vote, though with about 80 abstentions, authorized the Government to ratify the Peace Treaty with Italy. During the debate which preceded the vote M. Bidault dwelt on the desire of France to restore good relations with Italy and maintained that the French were making peace in a spirit devoid of any motive of reprisal. While it is true that, in comparison with the loss of Trieste and of the Navy, Italy's loss of territory to France is a small matter, it has, nevertheless, created a sense of grievance, even of injustice, in Italy; and wiser Italians have been distressed by the fact that the French appeared to value the acquisition of this small piece of territory more highly than the establishment of friendly relations. The Italians have, in fact, found it hard to see in this annexation any other motive than that of reprisal, repudiated by M. Bidault last Friday. The area involved is a small one, but it does contain important hydro-electric power-stations which are of great value to any country, particularly at this time of universal coal shortage. In this connexion it is possible that France is adopting a more conciliatory attitude, if the report in Il Tempo of the 5th June is correct in saying that the Italo-French economic negotiations include a proviso by which France will not take over the Roja valley power-stations for 15 years.

The reference by M. Bidault in the same speech to the provision in the French Constitution that there should be no addition to French territory without the consent of the population involved, coupled with his promise that a referendum would be held in the Briga-Tenda area, is most interesting. The proposal to hold a referendum suggests a most satisfactory solution, and should do more than anything to further a rapprochement between France and Italy. But Italy should not be too optimistic about the results of the referendum, for French influence in the area has been and still is very strong. There is no clear evidence as to the desires of the population, though the French maintain that the inhabitants are anxious to become French citizens.

The life of the Constituent Assembly, due to be dissolved on the 24th June, has been prolonged until the 31st December by a motion adopted by 279 votes to 155 on the 14th June. It has been obvious for some time that it would be impossible for the Assembly to finish in the short time available its main task of producing a new constitution for the Republic. But the decision of the Government to ask for such a long extension aroused bitter hostility on the part of the Socialists and Communists, who have insisted that the change in Government must on no account involve a postponement of the elections beyond the autumn. It will now be impossible to hold elections before the spring, unless steps are taken to reverse this decision in the meantime. The decision was taken by secret ballot, but there can be little doubt that it was the vote of the small, left-wing parties, particularly the Saragat Socialists and the Republicans, who need time to consolidate their position, which turned the scale in favour of the long extension. The view of Socialists and Communists alike is that the new Government does not represent the view of the electors as shown in the elections of June 1946, and that the rights of the workers are being ignored. Signor De Gasperi's speech to the Constituent Assembly on the 9th June was in the main a reiteration of what he said immediately after his resignation. He dwelt on the economic problems of the country and on the new Government's determination to solve them with the help of their economic experts like Professor Einaudi. He emphasized again the need for foreign loans, particularly from the U.S.A., and it is probable that the hope of obtaining such loans will affect the actions of even the more extreme Socialists and Communists, who realize the urgent needs of the country even when they reject the idea of "foreign interference."

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

His Majesty's Ambassador in Moscow has been instructed to seek a second interview with M. Molotov who refused the legitimate British request for information, as provided in the statute of the Control Commission, and replied to our enquiries concerning Russian activities in Hungary with counter-charges of British intervention. The Soviet Government likewise bluntly set aside the views contained in the United States Note and refused the request for the appointment of a tripartite committee of investigation. (See also under the "United States" and "Soviet Union.")

The differences between the U.K. and U.S. approach are noted by the London correspondent of the Social Democratic newspaper, Népszava, in an article published on the 8th June. This writer points out firstly that in the U.K. official judgment on the parts played by the various political groups will be withheld until full information becomes available. In the second place the U.K. does not intend to exercise economic pressure on Hungary. On the contrary, she is desirous of fostering economic relations with South-Eastern European countries even if she disapproves of the Governments concerned.

Lord Vansittart has received a letter from M. Nagy recording the development of recent events in Hungary. The Hungarian ex-Premier has now arrived in the U.S.A. where, it appears, he will be shortly joined by Fr. Varga and M. Auer. MM. Auer, Szegedy Maszak and Gordon are said to have offered to place the assets of their respective legations at his disposal.

According to an unconfirmed report, M. Nagy, assisted by Fr. Varga, will form a free Hungarian committee under U.S. auspices, a proposal on these lines having been made to him by the U.S. Minister in Budapest in anticipation of the coming trouble.

The allegations of his loquacious and not always accurate Secretary, M. Kapocs, have further implicated M. Nagy in the conspiracy. M. Kapocs charged his former Chief with attempting to establish a right-wing bloc which was to include the followers of the Social Democrat, M. Peyer, but to exclude the genuinely progressive sections of the Workers' Parties. In addition M. Kapocs affirmed that M. Nagy had planned the liquidation of the Political Police, obstructed the course of investigations, been a party to the escape of M. Kovacs and issued instructions for the detention of Government funds in Switzerland. All the Hungarian Missions abroad, M. Kapocs stated, contained at least one member of the conspiratorial clique, and M. Nagy's son had gone to the U.S.A. with the purpose of contacting M. Eckhardt.

M. Sulyok's spirited denunciation of the Communists has broken the cautious silence which greeted the news of the coup in Hungary. M. Sulyok referred to his country as a police-ridden state without any kind of freedom, and, while attacking M. Nagy for deserting his post, he acclaimed him as representing the peasants. M. Ries, the Social Democratic Minister of Justice, has already accused M. Sulyok of high treason in consequence of the latter's demand that foreign observers should supervise the election, but there is a chance that M. Sulyok's criticisms may be tolerated for a time, if only to prove the reality of Hungarian democratic institutions. M. Zsedenyi, the first President of the Republic after the liberation, also protested strongly against the electoral law now under discussion and called for the establishment of a Parliamentary Commission to investigate the facts of the plot.

M. Dinnyes has denied Soviet influence in connection with his nomination to the Premiership and refuted the report that he intended to govern by decree. In his speech at the opening session of the Assembly on the 10th June he emphasized the legality of the Governmental changes which had taken place and urged that the Coalition should continue. The peasantry, he said, would participate increasingly in the administration and the Police Force and a new corps of Army Officers was to be trained. Plans for nationalization included the banks, bauxite and electricity. Foreign loans were essential for reconstruction and would be acceptable under certain economic conditions. A comprehensive programme of assistance for agriculture had been prepared. There would be further air agreements with neighbouring states and a review of newspaper licences. Friendship with the Soviet Union was the foundation stone of Hungary's foreign policy, but she desired close co-operation with the U.K. and the U.S.A. too.

M. Boldizsár, the editor of the National Peasant Party newspaper, Vjmagyarország, is mentioned as a possible candidate for the post of Foreign Minister which M. Mihalyfi still holds provisionally. M. Bartok, the Hungarian Minister to Vienna, has resigned his office and his Hungarian citizenship.

Roumania

The British Representative at Bucharest has issued an interesting summary of the new attitude of the Tătărescu Liberals. It has been clear since early April that Dl Tătărescu was not feeling happy about the Communist direction of the Government. He had promised six months ago that as long as he remained in the Government the Industrial Boards Bill would not become law. But it has become law with very little amendment, and although Dl Tătărescu and his party abstained from voting, the leader remains a member of the Government. He has, however, issued a memorandum calling attention to the failures of the Government and the deplorable state of the country. The exact motivation of this apparently courageous gesture, from so astute and cynical a politician, is not clear. It is of course true that the country as a whole would welcome any change from the present Communist domination. The Groza Government has earned a reputation for incompetence, subservience to Russia and disregard for Roumania's interests, which has made it as unpopular with the Socialists as with the farmers who have lost their lands, and the middle classes, ruined by inflation and scarcity.

Meanwhile, indiscriminate arrests continue. In a private conversation Dl Pătrăşcanu, the Minister of Justice, admitted that that was part of a deliberate attempt to intimidate the country in view of the fear of a wide-spread peasant rising.

A great deal of agricultural land having been broken up into very small holdings, the discovery is now being made that larger holdings are necessary. Those who have interested themselves in this subject will not be surprised to learn that the proposed cure is the "setting up of cooperatives of production." This of course, is exactly what was done in Russia, and later in Roumania by the Germans, and it is a system which the Roumanian peasant detests above everything else.

During the past few months there has been increasing censorship of British newspapers, periodicals and films. Steps are being taken to make public the character and extent of this nuisance. It seems likely that, here again, the trouble is as much Russian as Roumanian, as here and there it is marked by an almost incredible childishness which is more Russian than Roumanian. For example, the Censor has prohibited the showing of the film "Blythe Spirit," "on account of its mystical and religious significance."

A draft bill is being considered by the Minister of Justice to authorise certain courts to deal with war criminals. The excuse for such a measure is that it will enable the Government to deal with offenders under Article 6 of the Peace Treaty, that is, those who are guilty of crimes against peace and humanity and collaborators with the enemy. In effect, it would give the Government power to victimise its political opponents at will. The draft has been submitted to the King, who is opposed to it as being unnecessary. A party of six Roumanian men and two women have made a clever escape from Roumania by plane and have landed at Istanbul. They have been interned. According to the Ankara Radio they stated that there was no longer any freedom in Roumania and that the economic conditions were deplorable. The people could not even get bread. The methodical pillaging of the country and the removal of machinery to Russia had "transformed Roumania into a Red Hell."

Yugoslavia

The British Book Exhibition in Belgrade was opened on 12th June by the Secretary of State for Air, who was welcomed in Yugoslavia with unusual cordiality. Marshal Tito held a luncheon in his honour and surprised even his colleagues by making a speech in English—an unprecedented event. Mr. Noel Baker discussed with the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Communications questions of trade, compensation for nationalised British property and civil aviation. The Yugoslavs not only professed their desire for an improvement of relations in general, and for the development of trade relations in particular, but even made concrete suggestions for the speedy settlement of the property question and for the opening of negotiations for an air agreement. It would seem therefore as if the urgent need of the Yugoslav Government for trade with this country in order to enable the operation of their five-year plan has at last outweighed their natural hostility. Whatever the reasons may be, the visit of a figure of such high standing as Mr. Noel Baker seems to have provided the Government with an opportunity for a change of attitude which they have been quick to seize; but it would be rash to suppose that any fundamental change in policy has taken place. Pending further evidence, this gift-bearing mood of the Yugoslavs must be treated with due caution.

Rumours of a reunion of MM. Molotov, Vyshinsky and Georgi Dimitrov in Belgrade, to discuss a Balkan Federation, have been officially and emphatically denied in Belgrade and Sofia. The Roumanian Foreign Minister has, moreover, informed H.M. Representative in Bucharest that no such subject, nor even that of a Romano-Yugoslav customs union, was discussed by Dl Groza in Belgrade. The official communiqué published after his visit (see Summary No. 395, 11.6.47) announced that a possible treaty of friendship, a cultural agreement, which would shortly be ready for signature, economic collaboration and the formulation of a common policy on Danubian navigation, had been under consideration. According to Hungarian and Czech reports Marshal Tito has been invited to pay a reciprocal visit to Bucharest—to sign the proposed treaties, no doubt.

Bulgarian and Czech Military delegations have also visited Yugoslavia.

The Greek Military Attaché, who was recently declared persona non grata in Belgrade has been involved in some rather clumsy espionage. Five of his Yugoslav agents have been sentenced to penal servitude. Nor have other members of the Greek Legation helped to improve the difficult and disagreeable position of the Greek Minister, to whom the Yugoslav Government are now openly discourteous. One of his staff has committed bigamy and all of them have been engaged on the black market in no small way.

Marshal Kvaternik, Dr. Košak and four other members of Pavelić's administration have been sentenced to death.

Two recent decrees, of importance to the expansion of foreign trade, authorise foreign firms to set up foreign technical, commercial and commission agencies in Yugoslavia, subject to the control and consent of the Ministry of Foreign Trade.

A trade agreement has been concluded with Egypt.

Greece

It has been announced that the U.S. Government are in favour of an increase in the Greek Army by 20,000 men in order to allow the release of older age groups. This announcement followed closely upon several press reports which made it clear that the existing military forces are wholly inadequate to deal with the rebels. Since the raids on Florina (see Summary No. 394) troops have been withdrawn from some frontier posts and outlying districts in the general area of Prespa in order to prevent them being overrun. As a result it is impossible to prevent the rebels crossing and recrossing the frontier in this area. Meanwhile another attack on Grevena has been reported: on the 11th June forty mortar shells are said to have exploded inside the town. The attack was successfully repulsed.

Owing to the Army's heavy commitments elsewhere, it has been impossible to strengthen units in the Peloponnese where the situation is causing anxiety. A band 250 strong recently attacked Exokhori in Central Peloponnese. The 57 gendarmes defending the village fought until their ammunition was exhausted. They were then overpowered by the bandits; 30 gendarmes were massacred and 13 others are missing. The question of the Government's failure to restore order in the Peloponnese was raised by several deputies in the Chamber on the 6th June who tried to ascribe it to the rivalry between the Minister of War and the Minister of Public Order. This was denied by M. Tsaldaris who claimed that there was united leadership in the anti-bandit drive.

The Greek press has carried persistent reports that large-scale troop-movements are taking place in Yugoslavia along the Greek frontier from Istip to Gevgheli. These, it is alleged, are being staged to facilitate the entry into Greece of the reported International Brigade being formed to assist the rebels. There is, however, no reliable evidence to support the report that large-scale troop-movements are in fact going on. According to information reaching the Greek Government, a force of 2,500 men has arrived at Split on their way to the Greek-Yugoslav border where they intend to cross into Greece.

For the second time the United Nations Sub-Commission have been refused entry into Bulgaria in order to investigate the Angistron-Lipa and Kapnotopos incidents. They have sent a report of Bulgaria's obstructive attitude to the Security Council, and have now asked the Yugoslav Government to grant them facilities to investigate two incidents near Lake Doiran when bandits being pursued by the Greek Army are said to have crossed into Yugoslavia protected by the Yugoslavs.

Mr. Dwight Griswold has been appointed Head of the U.S. Mission to Greece.

When searching the house of the Opposition leader, Nikola Petkov, after they had arrested him, the Communist-run Militia came across the written resignations of other Agrarian Party Deputies. The discovery gave the Government a chance too good to lose. The Militia handed the resignations of twenty three prominent Deputies to the Assembly and the Government press started a violent campaign against Petkov as a party Fuehrer and "a perfumed Western agent." The Opposition Agrarian Party submitted a letter to the President of the Assembly pointing out that these resignations had been handed in to the Permanent Presidium of the Agrarian Union and not to Petkov personally, under the regulations of the Agrarian Parliamentary Group which had laid down such procedure since 1919. The letter contended that the Militia had no right to send the documents on to the Assembly. The twenty-three Deputies also individually cancelled their letters of resignation but on the 11th June, were deprived of their mandates by the Assembly. By these means of doubtful legality, therefore, the government have got rid of the most active and effective of the Agrarians, including Asen Stamboliski (who acted as leader after Petkov's arrest) and the organising secretary. If it is true that the authorities have also got hold of the resignations of the principal remaining Opposition Deputies, the Government will no doubt take advantage of this to reduce them to impotence.

Communist control of the country thus seems one degree more complete. On the 11th June the Foreign Secretary expressed in the House of Commons the British Government's serious anxiety lest the last vestiges of liberty should be extinguished in Bulgaria. On that same day the Bulgarian Prime Minister adopted a truculent tone when receiving a delegation of the Union of Textile Workers. He warned them against fantastic rumours to the effect that American or British forces would arrive and that the Fatherland Front would disappear. Georgi Dimitrov continued that, although it had been said that the Americans and British would not permit the elections of November 1945, nor allow the Fatherland Front Government to sign the treaty, nor recognise that government, the elections had in fact been held and the Fatherland Front Government had both signed the treaty, and been recognised. That Government ruled to-day and only they could rule in the future.

The trial of Petr Koev, another leading member of the Opposition who was arrested on trumped-up charges (see Summary No. 380), has ended in his condemnation to twelve and a half year's imprisonment. This means the elimination of yet another influential opponent of Communist totalitarianism.

Turkey

The deep concern caused in Turkey by the Soviets' coercion of Hungary was clearly reflected in the Turkish press. The United States and Britain, which failed to foil Soviet intrigues in Roumania, Bulgaria and Poland, would, it was felt, have to adopt a much more drastic policy if they were to check Soviet designs on Greece, Austria and Czechoslovakia—and even on Italy and France. The moral drawn for Turkey was the need of unity.

Fortunately that unity exists for, so far as foreign policy goes, the Democratic (Opposition) Party supports the Government to the full. It is true that the President, when he addressed the rising generation at the annual Youth Festival on the 19th May, denounced extremism whether of the Right or of the Left. This was perhaps a warning to students who have lately been inclined to start witch-hunts against professors of Leftist sympathies. It may be taken as certain that, though Panturanianism seems lately to have been given a little extra rein, the Government have the Panturanians, no less than potential Communists, well under control. Neither of these small minorities is likely to weaken the Government's hand in foreign affairs.

President Inönü also spoke, as he had done in a press interview a few days earlier, of the Government's firm intention to continue the introduction of democratic institutions. This was no doubt intended to catch the ear of the West, particularly of the United States. But it was perhaps primarily addressed to the Democratic Party in Turkey who insistently demand more freedom for the press to criticise the Government, less power for the police to make arrests and domiciliary searches, and fairer electoral methods. To mark their dissatisfaction with the dishonest counting of polls the Democrats declined to contest the recent elections of village headmen and town wardens.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Fawziah affair has lost its interest for the public, and the last reference seen in the press (Le Journal d'Egypte) on the 12th June, merely refers to the vessel's expected arrival at Alexandria with two mine-sweepers from Malta. It is possible that the Government, realising the inopportuneness of antagonizing France when they will need all possible support for their case before the Security Council, have directed the press to drop the subject.

There is still no news that Egypt's case is ready for presentation. Injudicious interference by Palace officials—on the King's instructions, it is believed—is now thought to be holding up the preparation of the necessary material, but there are reports also that the delay is deliberate and that Nokrashy Pasha wishes to avoid appearing before the Security Council until July, when the President is no longer a Frenchman. Speaking in the Chamber of Deputies on the 9th June, Nokrashy said that he could not leave for the Security Council until he felt more easy about the supply position in Egypt. Questioned by journalists about a despatch sent by the Cairo correspondent of the News Chronicle to the effect that submission of the Egyptian case had been postponed indefinitely, Nokrashy said that the appeal would be sent "about the middle of June," by which time Parliament's examination of the budget should have been completed. The general indications are that Nokrashy would gladly accept any safe way out of his difficulties, but that he will now be forced to appear before the United Nations and will hope for their ruling that direct negotiations should be reopened with His Majesty's Government. (See also under "Arab League.")

On the 11th June the press published a manifesto by the Wafd signed by Nahas Pasha, which begins by criticising the Government's delay in dealing with the Egyptian question, and alleging that it constitutes an open conspiracy against the nation to enable to present Government to remain in power. After arguing that Nokrashy's view of the meaning of the "unity of the Nile Valley" coincides with that of Mr. Bevin, Nokrashy is asked why, in these circumstances, it is necessary to go to the United Nations at all. The manifesto then criticises the statement may by Mamduh Riaz Pasha, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, in which he told the delegates to the Inter-Parliamentary Conference (see Summary No. 388) that the presentation of Egypt's case should not be regarded as a hostile act against Great Britain, and then argues that the fact that the nullity of the 1936 Treaty and the 1899 Agreement have not already been declared proves that the Government agrees with that statement. Allegations follow that the Government is waging a strong campaign to mislead the Egyptian people, and, as evidence, the celebrations staged on the evacuation of the Cairo and Alexandria barracks are cited and the welcome given to the appointment of Sir Robert Howe to the Sudan, which was represented as evidence of a change of policy there, whereas, in fact, no such change had taken place—rather had the former policy been affirmed.

Allegations are then made that the present administration is stifling the liberties of the people and seeking to destroy the opposition. Nahas declares "in the name of the Egyptian people" that the sons of the Nile Valley will not be bound by any treaty forced upon them. In conclusion, he announces that the Wafd will get into touch with the democratic nations and see that they fully understand the Egyptian question and the demands of the Egyptian people. There is little doubt that this manifesto is a prelude to a communication from the Wafd to the Security Council saying that the Egyptian delegation is not representative of the nation, and that the people will not accept responsibility for anything which the delegation may do at the Security Council's meetings.

The American-owned Metro cinema in Cairo, which is still closed for repairs after the bomb outrage of the 6th May, has received a threatening letter warning the management that another bomb will be placed in it unless more Arabic films are shown and Arabic music is played in it. Similar threats have been made to other cinemas in Cairo and Alexandria, although in these cases the flying of the Egyptian flag and the playing of the Egyptian National Anthem before and after each show are demanded.

The accused in the Alexandria bomb incident have now been sentenced. The two ringleaders of the gang were sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, and others to lesser terms. Two were acquitted. (See Summary No. 392.)

The Minister of Defence, Lewa Ahmed Attiya Pasha, has given an interview to the new Government paper Assas in which he states that a new plan to modernise and expand the armed forces is ready. The plan will call for a capital outlay of between seventy and eighty million pounds, in addition to an annual outlay of twenty-two million pounds for the three services. Egypt's present budget is ninety-five millions on a ten-months' basis, and her budget for 1938–39 was forty million pounds.

Palestine

After a meeting on the 8th June the Arab Higher Committee issued an appeal to all Arabs to boycott the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine, and to the Arabs of Palestine to observe a general strike on the 16th June, when the opening session of the Committee was expected to be held. Amongst the reasons given to show why the Arabs should boycott the Committee were that Great Britain was seeking international sanction for her policy of Judaizing Palestine, and that a new and dangerous factor had been introduced in the inclusion in the terms of reference of mention of the rights of the three world religions, an innovation which foreshadows trusteeship.

It is clear that this policy of boycott does not command universal support in Palestine; the success of the efforts of the Higher Committee to enforce it upon the local Arab community will be a measure of its hold on public opinion and of its ability to enforce "national discipline." (See also under "Arab League.")

The Jews have spent the past week in diligent preparation for their appearance before the Committee. Ben Gurion and Shertok will lead on the political side, and other experts will present the economic and other aspects of the Zionist case. The Vaad Leumi has decided to invite Dr. Weizmann to appear. According to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency report of the 11th June he had already completed the draft of the evidence he will give, although he may not accept the invitation unless he is satisfied that a considerable part of the Yishuv favours his appearance.

It is believed that Dr. Weizmann regards Ben Gurion's statement at the session of the Elected Assembly as an ineptitude, and opponents of partition all criticize it. Nevertheless, there is a substantial body of public opinion which endorses it.

There have been sporadic acts of terrorism during the week, and on the 13th June Reuter's office in Tel Aviv was entered by an armed gang who stole a typewriter, an accounting machine and the office telephone. Extensive damage was caused on the same day by a bomb which was exploded in a Jewish dairy in Haifa. Another bomb, placed on the window-sill of a Haifa Jewish firm, caused only slight damage to the premises.

The language of the Stern Group and the Irgun Zvai Leumi increasingly echoes the phrases of communist propaganda. Their reaction to the death sentences passed on three of the five Jews caught after the attack on the Acre prison remains to be seen.

Jamal el Hussaini has defined the immediate programme of the Arab Higher Committee as:—

(a) the merger of Youth Organisations;
(b) the union of all National organisations in support of Beit et Mal (the Treasury of the Arab Higher Committee);

(c) the establishment of National Committees;
(d) the holding of general elections to select a new Arab Higher Committee.

A message from the Mufti was read in Jerusalem in the Haram ash Sharif and in other principal mosques in the country on the 16th June. In it Haji Amin appealed to Palestinian Arabs to sink their differences, to unite in opposition to "tyranny," and to make sacrifices to redeem the lost areas of Palestine.

The Special Committee under the Chairmanship of Dr. Sandström held two meetings in Jerusalem on the 16th June. The factual evidence of the Palestine Government was presented by the Chief Secretary, Sir Henry Gurney. The Chairman broadcast later to the people of Palestine and held a press conference, when some dissatisfaction was expressed at the fact that the day's sessions had been held in camera.

Syria

General elections are to be held on the 1st July under the new Electoral Law, which provides for one-degree elections, and differs from the former law in certain other respects.

The Arab League

The feeling seems to be general amongst the States members of the Arab League that Egypt is making a grave mistake in going to the United Nations. The Lebanese Prime Minister would like to see direct negotiations re-opened between Egypt and Great Britain, and feels that if the other Arab countries cannot persuade the Egyptians not to go to the United Nations they should work for an appropriate recommendation by the Security Council in favour of re-opening negotiations. Ibn Saud and his advisers are convinced that Egypt cannot now withdraw, but are equally certain that, if the United Nations recommend new Anglo-Egyptian discussions, the Egyptian Government would be only too happy to bow to this ruling. There is no likelihood of the Sa'udi Arabians taking any initiative at this stage. The 'Iraqi Foreign Minister (who is acting under direct instructions from the Regent and the Prime Minister) promises to see Nokrashy Pasha and to urge him to ask Sir Ronald Campbell whether discussions could not be renewed. It is difficult to believe that they can imagine that such a move would be successful.

On the Palestine question the Arab States appear to be unable to agree on a common policy, but the majority seem to favour co-operation with the Special Committee.

Iraq

The Iraqi-Turkish Treaty, signed in Angora in March 1946 (see Summary No. 334 of 6th March, 1946, under "Turkey"), was passed by the Chamber on the 7th June by 88 votes to 13, but has not yet been ratified. The full text of the treaty was published without sanction in the press in the middle of May, and legal action is being taken against the offending newspapers. The treaty is one of friendship and good neighbourliness, and contains no particular innovations. The first clause states that the two countries undertake to respect each other's territorial integrity and common frontiers as defined in the 1926 Treaty. In the second clause it is agreed that the two contracting parties will follow a policy of non-intervention in each other's affairs. The fourth clause states that both parties will refer threats of aggression to the United Nations. Attached to these political articles are six Protocols dealing in great length with the control of the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates and their tributaries; mutual assistance on matters of public security; co-operation in educational and cultural matters; postal, telegraphic and telephonic communications; economic matters and, finally, frontier questions. There is also an Extradition Convention and Judicial Assistance Convention. No active steps are yet known to have been taken to implement these Protocols and Conventions.

The treaty has been the subject of much adverse criticism in the press and some opposition in the Chamber. The chief grounds for objection are that it ties Iraq's hands over the Hatay question and conflicts with the Arab League Covenant.

Persia

The visit of three American warships to the Persian Gulf between the 14th and 17th May has been the subject of considerable criticism and misgiving in the Persian press. The destroyer Hyman visited Abadan, the destroyer Dixon Basrah, and the cruiser Toledo Ras Tanurah. This is the first occasion on which American warships have visited the Persian Gulf, and is part of the United States "shewing the flag" policy in the Middle East. The cruiser Toledo was flying the flag of the Commander-in-Chief, United States East Atlantic and Mediterranean Fleet, Admiral Conolly, who flew to Tehran and called on the Shah and the Prime Minister.

According to press reports, fierce fighting is in progress between Mulla Mustafa Barzani's followers (see last week's Summary) and Persian Government troops near the Perso-Soviet frontier. 1,000 Barzanis are reported to have fled into Russia, but 500, with Mustafa in command, are holding out although surrounded by much larger forces.

A change in the administrative set-up of the Mekran district in East Persia has been sanctioned by the Cabinet. A new province called Baluchistan is to be formed, with headquarters at Zahidan, consisting of four sub-districts (bakhsh) and three Governorates.

The abolition of the death penalty in the U.S.S.R. has been given much prominence in the press. An article in Mard-e-Emruz (Centre) of the 31st May states that this news is "as striking and important as that of the atom bomb." It then suggests that if social injustice in Persia continues, the people in the north (i.e., the Azerbaijanis) might be driven to seek shelter in the Soviet Union, in the same way that the southerners had migrated into India, Iraq and Kuwait. (See also under "Soviet Union.")

THE FAR EAST

China

The general situation continues to provide the Nanking Government with cause for considerable anxiety and uneasy suspense. The stern measures applied by the authorities in Shanghai and the larger towns (see Summary No. 395) have so far successfully restrained the student fraternity from indulging in further demonstrations. Nevertheless, the Government have an uncomfortable feeling that, added to the support they already enjoy from the professors, the students are steadily gaining public sympathy which may quite possibly encourage them to seize any opportunity that may present itself to air their views and grievances once again in public.

Although monitoring reports have attributed to Dr. Hollington Tong the report that the Communists have "rudely" rejected the peace offer extended to them by the People's Political Council on 2nd June, which later received favourable consideration from the State Council, there is no official confirmation of any reply having been received.

The Times correspondent at Peiping reports that the civil war in Manchuria and north China is growing in intensity. He paints a gloomy picture for the Nanking Government of Communist disruption of communications by the destruction of numerous bridges on all the more important railway lines, thereby greatly assisting the staging of strong Communist attacks against several important towns in the Peiping and Tientsin areas. Official reports indicate, however, that the situation remains virtually unchanged from last week. In Manchuria Government reinforcements are reaching Mukden, but the Communists are reported to be intensifying the weight of their attack on Szepingkai. Further to the south the Communists are also reported to be attacking in force and to be meeting with general success, although it is uncertain at the moment whether the important town of Antung has actually fallen to their arms.

The Chinese press has given widespread and almost certainly officially inspired publicity to a report that on or about 5th June a force of Outer Mongolian cavalry, supported by motorised units and four aircraft bearing Soviet emblems, had entered the province of Sinkiang and attacked the Chinese garrison at a place called Peitashan. The Government troops were forced to evacuate the town, but later reports state that they have succeeded in recapturing it.

In Nanking the spokesman of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs declared that this was "no ordinary incident" and that the Chinese Ambassador at Moscow has been instructed to lodge a protest with both the Soviet Government and the Government of Outer Mongolia through the latter's representative in Moscow. Although the spokesman neither confirmed nor denied the press report that the Mongolian troops were supported by planes bearing Soviet markings, he is said to have expressed the opinion that the U.S.S.R. "had a responsibility for the attack." According to a later report issued by the Chinese Ministry of Information, the Government have instructed the Minister of National Defence, General Pai Chung-hsi, to proceed to Sinkiang to deal with the matter.

There is some doubt as to the exact position of Peitashan, where the attack is understood to have taken place. Chinese reports place it to the north of Chitai and claim that it is some considerable distance on the Chinese side of the border. Mongolian reports, on the other hand, declare, probably rightly, that Peitashan is the Chinese name for the mountain range of Baitak Bogdo which, the Mongolians claim, is situated within the territory of the Mongolian People's Republic. In this connexion it may be remarked that the boundary has never been officially delimited.

Observers are watching the situation with considerable interest and the possibility that the incident is being capitalised to support Nanking Government suspicions of Soviet designs upon frontier regions and assistance to the Communists has not been lost sight of. It is also thought that the Chinese Government may be exploiting the incident to disguise what is in fact another local revolt; or that possibly it is an attempt to play to the gallery in the United States in the hope of hastening, through public sympathy, the granting of the much needed dollar loan.

Indonesia

Disturbed by the gravity of the situation in Indonesia and fearing that the Republican Government might reject the terms set out in the Commission-General's Note of the 27th May, the Netherlands Cabinet decided to ask the good offices of the United Kingdom and United States Governments in representing to the Indonesians the desirability of accepting, in the main, the Dutch proposals.

It was thought that parallel representations undertaken separately might achieve the desired result with less publicity than would be the case if joint representations were made. As a matter of fact, it so happened that the instructions concerning the representations the United States Government intended their Consul-General in Batavia to make at Jogjakarta arrived too late and were subsequently cancelled by agreement with the Netherlands Government.

H.M. Consul-General in Batavia, however, was instructed to fly to Jogjakarta and, unobtrusively and in as friendly a manner as possible, to dwell on the world economic aspect and to urge upon Dr. Soekarno and the Indonesian leaders the desirability of reaching a solution without further delay. H.M. Consul-General, whose visit to Jogjakarta was not welcomed by the local Dutch officials in Batavia, despite the receipt of specific instructions from The Hague, was warmly received by the Republican leaders.

Dr. Soekarno said that in view of the message conveyed to him from H.M. Secretary of State, which he much appreciated, he was inclined to accept the proposals as a whole. He promised that his reply would be conciliatory and positive, but he pointed out that there were some points on which discussion and/or clarification seemed desirable—e.g., military co-operation and foreign representation. He said that there could be no practicable understanding without mutual trust which, in turn, was impossible so long as Dutch military officers indulged in threatening and reactionary talk, the more especially since he felt that Dr. van Mook was able to exercise little, if any, control over General Spoor.

The Indonesian reply to the Dutch Note was delivered to Dr. van Mook on the 9th June. For the most part, it follows the lines generally anticipated. But, although it accepts, in principle, most of the chief points raised by the Commission-General, it is a somewhat argumentative document of extreme length, containing a number of counter-demands.

Briefly, the reply accepts the proposal to form an Interim Government, agrees in general to demilitarisation and joint policing of the demarcation areas, as well as to the Dutch economic proposals. But in each case acceptance is qualified by reservations and any underlying suggestion that the delay in the implementation of the Linggardjati Agreement is the fault of the Indonesian Republic is denied.

This being so, the Indonesian Government expect the Netherlands Government to undo the military measures taken at Modjokerto, Buitenzorg, Medan and other places. Furthermore, far from the complaint of lack of order in the Republican area being admitted, the Dutch are accused of breaches of democratic principles in their own controlled areas.

The Republic is prepared to recognise East Indonesia but criticises the manner of its formation. It also demands an equal voice in determining the status of Borneo and contends that New Guinea should be brought within the state of East Indonesia.

Similarly, the reply contains a demand that immediately on the establishment of the Interim Government the Netherlands Government will take steps to propose Indonesia as a member of the United Nations and separate overseas representation of Indonesia shall begin.

As regards the maintenance of defence, while the participation of a foreign army is not excluded, the responsibility should be resigned to a national army and a national federal army, therefore, should be constituted.

Within the Republic, maintenance of law and order is claimed as the province of the Republican police and not of the Netherlands army. Formation of army in non-Republican states of Indonesia should be arranged between Federation States and the Netherlands.

The treatment of all Indonesia as one economic unit is accepted in principle, but the method of transition during the interim period is debated. Establishment of uniform Customs legislation for all Indonesia is accepted with reservation. It is also agreed to regard Indonesia as one Customs region, but each state to retain duties levied by it; and Dutch proposals for Customs control by management of foreign exchange fund are rejected.

As regards foreign property, that should be returned (except such of it as is to be nationalised against indemnity), but operators are enjoined to return free from "Colonial mentality." Proceeds of sale of estate products in the meantime to be subject to production expenses incurred by the Republic.

A change in the title of the Lieutenant Governor-General is suggested (possibly to that of High Commissioner); but in the interim period it is desired that: no change be made in the de facto recognition of the Republic; half the members of the Interim Government to be Republicans; and, on the formation of the Interim Government, areas occupied by Dutch military units, or where Republican authority has been weakened (presumably action by the Dutch army subsequent to the Linggadjati Agreement is indicated) to be restored immediately to the Republic.

In Batavia the immediate reaction to the Indonesian reply was one of disappointment and irritation. Dr. van Mook's view that it is dictatorial in tone and quite unacceptable is shared by the local Dutch community as a whole, who believe that only a choice of evils now remains—the least of which being in the application of force. They are convinced that, were this course adopted, the Dutch could depend on quite a large measure of support from certain elements within the Republican camp—a possibility, indeed, over which the Indonesian leaders themselves are more than a little worried. It is said that the other States and the more moderate section of the Republic would welcome a settlement by some form of limited Dutch military action; that they are sitting on the fence in an intensely nervous mood; and that if the indications are that the Republican leaders have scored a victory over the Dutch, they are likely to throw their weight irretrievably on the side of the Republic. Be this as it may, the situation in Java is intensely critical and Dutch military preparations and recruitment are reported to provide strong indications that military action is contemplated. Clashes have been numerous in the last few days, but it is not thought that General Spoor will attempt to embark on large-scale operations without official, or at least semi-official, sanction.

In the meantime Professor Schermerhorn and M. van Poll have returned from The Hague. They arrived in Batavia on the 12th June, after spending a night in Singapore. In Singapore Professor Schermerhorn expressed his determination to find a solution without resorting to force and said that, while he was not able to express any definite opinion until he had examined the Indonesian reply, at first sight the position "did not seem too bad"; the Indonesians had accepted the important economic proposals, and the Dutch were prepared to meet Indonesian wishes on proportionate Republican representation. It is most unfortunate, therefore, that on the day following his arrival in Batavia Professor Schermerhorn should have come to the conclusion that no peaceful settlement is possible and that he can see no way out except by force. He said that the more he re-read the Republican reply, the more clearly he realised its intransigeance and intention to play for time. He has been greatly shocked by the exposure of the exchange of Republican telegrams with Batavia and Sumatra, indicating that Dr. Soekarno is now dominated by the extremists in his Government, who are resolved to prevent any form of co-operative settlement with the Dutch and are aiming at Dutch surrender. Professor Schermerhorn now feels that to give way to the Indonesian demands, or even to continue discussions, would be to play into the hands of extremists and weaken still further the position of M. Sjarir and the more moderate Republican faction.

At The Hague, too, the atmosphere is one of extreme depression. The Indonesian reply in its full text is held to have gone far beyond the Linggadjati Agreement and to hold no hope of a peaceful settlement. It seems evident, therefore, that the Dutch are near the conviction that drastic action is the only course now open to them. However, a decision is not expected until the whole question has been ventilated at a Cabinet Meeting.

None the less, His Majesty's Government are of the opinion that the situation, if taken in hand immediately, is not entirely without hope and that an indication that the Indonesians are prepared to make some further concessions is provided in the admission to H.M. Consul-General at Batavia by an emissary of Dr. Sjarir that the Republican reply was in part "too firm and provocative." In discussing the position with the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs, therefore, H.M. Ambassador to The Hague urged that the Dutch and Indonesians should get round a table once again to thrash out their differences and to discuss the implementation of the points on which they agree. But the Minister seemed to think that this method afforded little hope of progress. He gave an assurance, however, that the Dutch troops would take no concerted action, although they would be bound to defend themselves if attacked.

The signature of a Treaty of Friendship between Egypt and Indonesia on the 10th June, and talk of direct diplomatic relations is regarded by the Netherlands Authorities as a breach of the Linggadjati Agreement and, as such, a further proof of Indonesian bad faith.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Mr. Marshall's Harvard speech (see last week's Summary) has been welcomed by all shades of opinion in the United States, and the Secretary of State has been praised for his "sound" and "realistic" approach to European economic problems. Only the Daily Worker has (not unexpectedly) condemned the policy which it outlines on the ground that it represents "unabashed dollar diplomacy." The speech is seen by the majority as a more mature phase of the "Truman doctrine," although it is generally agreed that the extent to which it will produce "concrete results" will depend upon the ability of the European countries themselves to respond in the requisite manner. In this connexion, the decision of Mr. Bevin to discuss the new American approach to Europe with the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of France has been warmly applauded.

Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, on the 13th June, was the first of the Republican leaders to comment on Mr. Marshall's plan. While endorsing "the importance of facing this problem on an overall basis," he called for the establishment of a bi-partisan advisory council drawn from America's "ablest and most experienced citizenship" to calculate the total needs of Asia as well as Europe and make an "inventory" of American resources such as would "determine the latitudes" within which these needs might be considered. (Mr. Benjamin V. Cohen, the State Department Counsellor, had intimated on the 12th that "Europe's rudimentary rehabilitation needs" might require as much as 5,000 to 6,000 million dollars a year for another three or four years.) An even more guarded opinion was given by ex-President Hoover in a letter to the Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee published on the 15th. While conceding that assistance must continue to be given to peoples abroad who are in need, Mr. Hoover insisted that the United States "must prevent excessive exports and by so doing reduce excessive prices." It must also estimate periodically the goods and services which it can safely export and limit purchases of its commodities "by limiting gifts and loans." The present "rate of giving and lending" was causing the country to over-export goods to an extent which, at the existing level of production and consumption, might have "evil consequences" for American economic stability. Mr. Hoover, who is a leading oracle of the Republican party on foreign relief questions, thus subscribes to the thesis that the "huge dollar funds" already made available abroad inevitably increase the pressure of inflation at home. This thesis has recently been advanced with some vigour by Senator Robert A. Taft (see last week's Summary), who is apparently as inimical to what he calls "heavy spending abroad" to-day as he was when he led the fight against the Bretton Woods Agreements in July 1945.

As long ago as last March Mr. Vandenberg had apparently decided to sound Mr. Marshall out on the idea of a United States of Europe within the framework of the United Nations as endorsed in a Senate concurrent resolution sponsored by Senators Fulbright (Dem., Arkansas), and Thomas (Dem., Utah). In a reply, published on the 10th June, the Secretary of State expressed himself as being "deeply sympathetic towards the general objective" of this resolution, the object of which, as he understood it, was inter alia to encourage the nations concerned "to co-operate together to promote the economic recovery of Europe as a whole." At his press conference on the 12th, Mr. Marshall made it clear that his proposal for American aid to Europe embraced both the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. It would, however, be difficult on present showing for the Soviet authorities to convince Congress that they were not "manœuvring to block the recovery of other countries" and therefore ipso facto ineligible for consideration under the conditions laid down at Harvard on the 5th.

Mr. Truman's address to a joint session of the Canadian Houses of Parliament on the 11th June, during his three-day State visit to the Dominion, has been widely interpreted as putting the Presidential stamp of approval on Mr. Marshall's recently expounded views. Mr. Truman pointed out that "Canada and the United States emerged from the war as the only major sources of the industrial products and the food upon which much of the world depends for survival." Emphasizing that "we of the United States are deeply conscious of our responsibilities to the world," he stated that it was the purpose of the United States "to restore the world to health and to re-establish conditions in which the common people of the earth can work out their own salvation by their own effort." He added that the United States intended to invest its substance "in promoting world recovery by assisting those who are able and willing to make their maximum contribution to the same cause" and "to support those who are determined to govern themselves in their own way, and who honour the right of others to do likewise."

One or two competent political observers continue to feel uncertain regarding the possible reaction of Congress to the Administration's latest proposals. The public was reminded of potential divergences of opinion between Congress and the Administration on questions of economic foreign policy this week when Mr. Marshall openly expressed his disappointment at the action taken on the Wool Bill. In reply to a question at his press conference on the 12th June, Mr. Marshall suggested that the final acceptance of the Wool Bill would greatly complicate the Geneva trade negotiations. Senator George D. Aiken (Rep., Vermont), a prominent member of the joint Senate-House Conference Committee which was obliged to yield to the overwhelming pressure of the House of Representatives for the imposition of "import fees" on foreign wool (see Summary No. 394), at the same time ruefully admitted that "there is a drive within this country to isolate the United States economically." The temptation to "play politics" with financial measures having a bearing upon foreign relations will probably not have diminished as a result of Mr. Truman's decision on the 16th June to veto the 4,000 million-dollar income tax reduction Bill (see Summary No. 394)—a decision which the Republican Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee has already described as "coldblooded politics" on the part of the President. In his message rejecting the Bill Mr. Truman reminded Congress that the country continued to be confronted with "great responsibilities for international relief and rehabilitation" and that common prudence therefore demanded "the realistic and conservative management of fiscal affairs." The House of Representatives failed by two votes on the 17th to override the Presidential veto.

Political developments in South-Eastern Europe continue to cause grave concern to the United States Government. On the 11th June, the State Department made public the text of a strongly-worded note which Brigadier-General George H. Weems, the United States representative on the Allied Control Commission for Hungary, had been instructed to deliver to the Commission's Soviet chairman, General Sviridov. The note protested against the "unilateral action in violation of the Yalta agreements and [the] Soviet interference in Hungarian political affairs" and hinted at action through the United Nations if the American request for "the expeditious establishment of a three-power commission to examine the situation as a matter of urgency" were not complied with. Senator Vandenberg has publicly supported the idea of referring the Hungarian affair to the United Nations, but the majority of thoughtful observers take it for granted that, apart from rallying world opinion against Russia, action along these lines would have no practical effect. Despite widespread criticism of his previous hastiness in "first shaking a fist and then a finger" at the new Hungarian Government, President Truman, when signing the four satellite peace treaties on behalf of the United States on the 14th June, ventured publicly to express his regret that the Governments of Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria "not only have disregarded the will of the majority of [their] people, but have resorted to measures of oppression against them.'' Mr. Dean Acheson, in an address to students of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, referred to '' the cynical and barefaced coup d'État in Hungary '' and accused the Soviet Union of obstructing World recovery by pursuing '' policies diametrically opposed to the very premises of international accord and recovery.''

On the 11th June the State Department also issued a statement criticizing sharply the action of the Bulgarian Government in arresting the opposition leader, M. Petkov, and concluding '' as he [Petkov] goes on trial in his own country, so will the present Bulgarian régime be on trial in the minds of many Bulgarians and certainly in the opinion of all freedom supporting peoples outside Bulgaria.''

In happy contrast to these protests, the United States Government has been able to acclaim the agreement between the British Government and the Indian leaders for the transfer of power in India. In a statement issued on the 10th June the State Department welcomed the agreement as '' a source of much encouragement to India's friends,'' and suggested that it might '' provide an example of co-operation and fair play to all nations of the world.'' The press has at the same time hastened to acknowledge that '' the British have fulfilled their pledges handsomely.'' With unusual enthusiasm Mr. Walter Lippmann declares: '' The Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, and Viceroy Lord Mountbatten have done a service to all mankind by showing what a statesman can do, not with force or money, but with lucidity, reason, imagination, resolution, sincerity and goodwill. The world needed desperately a demonstration of this kind to renew men's faith in the power of the human spirit.''

LATIN AMERICA

Brazil

According to broadcast reports, a number of soldiers and civilians have been arrested on a charge of attempted revolt. The conspirators appear to include nine soldiers, six of them sergeants, and two members of ex-President Vargas' personal guard.

The Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr. Raul Fernandes, paid an official visit to Uruguay from the 14th to the 26th May. In a number of speeches and interviews, Dr. Fernandes expressed his thesis that the limitations of the United Nations Charter lay in the traditional idea of the unlimited sovereignty of states, and urged that peoples should realise that a state is sovereign only in respect of its own affairs.

Chile

According to broadcast reports, the National Convention of the Radical party has approved a motion authorizing the Party to co-operate with parties of the right, so long as the co-operation was not '' of an exclusive nature.''

The transport strike in Santiago was reported to have been settled after military intervention, when President Gonzalez Videla received the Communist leader of the Chilean Labour Federation to negotiate for a settlement. However, on the 12th June there were street disturbances during which the armed forces opened fire, killing three persons and wounding twenty. The province of Santiago was at once declared an emergency zone under military control for a period of 30 days.

Dominican Republic

At the Presidential elections held on the 16th May, President Trujillo was re-elected by a handsome majority. According to the official returns of the 779,263 votes cast, the President and his Dominican Party received 721,164, while the candidate of the National Democratic Party accounted for 29,302 and the candidate of the National Labour Party 28,797. The only district in which there was sizeable opposition to the President was San Francisco de Macoris, where the Dominican Party took 19,761 votes and the Labour Party 10,403. In fact, both opposition candidates were little more than tools of President Trujillo.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Freedom of Information

The Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information recommended an agenda for the World Conference on Freedom of Information. A number of concessions were made to the ideas of the Russian member, in the hope of reaching agreement. For instance, when the Conference discusses Censorship, it shall '' pay due regard to the requirements of national security and public order.'' Again, the right of people to receive information is to be considered '' with due regard to the existing laws of the various countries '': in spite of this, the Russian member opposed the report, and it is not now certain whether the Soviet Union will take part in the Conference, where the issue fundamental to all human rights will be raised—who is master of the mind of man?

The provisional agenda for the Conference follows the outline of the U.S. proposals, with the addition of the points from Mr. Cruickshank's paper which the U.S. draft had not covered, e.g., the general discussion of the principles of freedom of information, Government information services, encouragement of professional journalistic bodies to develop their own standard and disciplines. Of the six main headings of the Agenda, 1 and 2 provide for general discussion; 3 and 4, the problems of foreign correspondents, rights of entry, access to information, censorship, freedom from arbitrary arrest, etc.; 5, a detailed study of what restrictions Governments impose on the flow of information to their citizens, the best ways of improving the quantity and quality of the information, and how best to counteract the spreading of false information; 6, breaches of press conventions, &c., and how they can be treated within the framework of the United Nations.

Economic Commission for Europe

The first session of the Economic Commission for Europe ended on the 15th May at Geneva. The meetings were almost wholly taken up with questions of procedure, and it is difficult to predict at this stage what its future scope will be apart from continuing the allocation of coal and taking over some of the functions of E.C.I.T.O. and E.E.C.E. The emergency organisations will all be wound up before the end of the year. All European members of the United Nations were represented (except Iceland, which will, however, be at the second session, beginning 5th July). The U.S.S.R. and her satellites all attended, and the former made it clear that the liquidation of the emergency organisations on which they had not been represented was their main preoccupation. On the whole, however, there was less of a clash between East and West than might have been expected, the only important point of principle put to the vote being whether Portugal should be invited to send an expert to the Conference of Transport Experts (which was held in Paris at the end of May to decide the functions of the Commission's subsidiary body on Inland Transport). The decision was in Portugal's favour by 8 votes to 7. Discussions were however invariably strenuous and protracted.

Many of the more difficult procedural problems remain to be discussed at the second session of the Commission, beginning on the 5th July. Among these are: the association of non-United Nations European countries with the work of the Commission, the relationship with the control authorities in occupied territory, with the specialised agencies and with non-governmental organisations. The recommendations of the conference of transport experts will have to be studied. A decision will have to be taken as to what functions of the E.E.C.E. are to be taken over. Among present activities which E.C.E. will most probably continue are those of the present sub-committees on fertilisers, timber, alkalis, public utilities and (possibly) housing. It is too early to say at this stage in what way the E.C.E. will be associated with the Marshall plan. In the early stages at any rate, the Secretariat of the Commission is unlikely to be able to handle the work involved in such a large scale but urgent project.

The Russians wanted E.E.C.E. to be ended at once, but the Commission agreed to end it 45 days after the close of the second session, thus ensuring continuity. E.C.I.T.O. will end not later than the 27th September, by which time the new transport organisation of E.C.E. should be ready to take over. E.C.O. will probably continue to make coal allocations up to and including the first quarter of 1948.

GERMANY

Mr. Marshall's speech on the economic revival of Europe has evidently aroused keen interest in Germany, but comments in the press have so far been somewhat uncertain. It is not yet clear to the Germans how far Germany will be affected, and comment seems subdued by the fact that they do not feel in a position to take any active steps themselves. Many of the papers in the Western zones were content to report the speech and to quote from foreign press comments without additions. Stuttgarter Nachrichten, a non-party daily—less enthusiastic than Mr. Bevin—called it "perhaps one of the most important announcements of the last two years." It saw this as a blow against isolationism, but was also inclined to regard it as a veiled weapon against Russia, and even to fear that the offer might prove to have conditions attached which would be detrimental to a final solution of the European problem. Fraenkische Landeszeitung related the speech more closely to Germany which, it claimed, "is suffering the most heavily under the economic collapse" of Europe. It concluded that Marshall's speech "may be the final appeal which warns the suffering peoples away from the mouth of chaos and perhaps preserves them." An unenthusiastic acceptance of the idea was given by the Social Democrat Telegraf nearly a fortnight after the speech. This it describes as "no ideal solution but . . . . the only opportunity of mitigating the present suffering speedily. Germany is so poor that she cannot choose." Communist organs writing prior to the Russian agreement to meet Mr. Bevin and M. Bidault were cynical but did not reach their usual standard of abuse. Leipzig Radio of the 12th June, for example, doubted the purpose behind the plan and said that Germany could accept the foreign help which she needed only if treated as a single nation with a single economy and if the only condition attaching to loans was payment of a normal rate of interest. The doubts in the commentator's mind were revealed more clearly by Berliner Zeitung which related the whole plan to an American desire to use European poverty for the benefit of "big business."

H.M. Government are already taking steps to assess the practical needs of the British zone which might be met if there were to be direct American assistance. The possibility of such assistance comes at the moment when the Allied Bi-Zonal Authorities had presented to their Governments for the first time demands for essential food imports which are clearly in excess of the financial resources at present available. The food situation in the Bi-Zonal area showed no substantial improvement during the past week. In Cologne a five-day strike which began on the 18th June temporarily paralysed all factories and workshops except the railways.

An agreement in principle was reached on the 9th June for the financing, import, processing and sale of cotton and textiles in the joint U.K./U.S. zone of Germany. This is important as the first real initiation of private financing in the import-export trade of the bi-zonal area. An American Cotton Supply Corporation of New York City is to be established in which American exporters can belong and which will provide short-term drafts for the purchase of cotton—normally repayable in dollars and within nine months. The joint import-export Agency continues to authorize exports and gives a general undertaking to provide the cotton corporation with funds to pay the drafts when they mature.

Additional details are now available about the Economic Commission of the Soviet zone. The members are to include the head and his deputy of the supporting economic department. A new Central department of inter-zonal trade, not to be represented on the commission, will be headed by Josef Orlopp, who is already on the staff of the Central Administration. He is a former Social Democrat, now an active Socialist Unity Party man and had wide economic experience as a member of the Weimar Economic Council. When establishing the Commission Marshal Sokolowsky released the news of an agreement concluded on the 10th February between the individual Central Administrations and the Laender. (Reference to this was made in the special article on the Soviet zone in Summary No. 391.) The reason for the delay in publication is not clear. It gives the Central Economic Administrations responsibility for the planning and control of economy throughout the zone, but makes the reservations that the agreement is valid in the first instance only until December 1947, and that orders, before being submitted to the Russians, "must be agreed on with the Laender." It is doubtful whether in practice either of these restrictions will much affect the work of the Centre. It is not yet known whether they apply also to the new Commission. A statement issued by the SED on the 16th June is at pains to point the differences as they see them between the Commission and the Bi-Zonal Economic Council. The latter is described as violating decisions taken at Potsdam, the former as according fully therewith. The Commission is pictured as a working committee for promoting economic development while the inter-zonal trade department strengthens bonds with the West. The limits placed on the agreement of the 10th February show, says the SED, that there is no attempt by the Commission, as there is by the Bi-Zonal Council, to set up a Government leading to the dismemberment of Germany. Finally, a contrast is offered which would hardly have occurred to the Western observer—"the Commission is a German creation formed by the free decision of responsible German authorities, while the direction of the Bi-Zonal Economic Council was decided and ordered by the Occupying Powers."

Dr. Buschmann, who resigned from the Presidency of the Central Administration for Trade in the Soviet zone because of his opposition to political trends, is touring the British and U.S. zones by official invitation to study the food situation. He is peculiarly well-placed to comment on developments in the Soviet zone. At a press conference in Stuttgart, Dr. Buschmann said that farm delivery quotas in the Soviet zone were smaller than in the U.S. zone, but they were being collected. If milk quotas were not fully surrendered, livestock was confiscated, but if there was surplus food, the farmers used it to buy domestic articles. There was no black market like that in the Western zones. The U.S. zone News Agency reported Buschmann as stating that reparation deliveries of food were "quite considerable," but he was not more specific and in the past the only reliable evidence has been of the delivery of some shipments of sugar to the East.

The system of bonuses in the Soviet zone is not restricted to farmers. Recent reports show that high-placed German officials who are considered to have served particularly well are being rewarded by order of the Russians with suitable gifts in cash or kind—including bicycles and wrist watches. Great efforts are still being made to encourage German specialists to work in the Soviet zone, and there is little doubt that they make full use of Communist members in the other zones to help them and even to use their influence to see that a desired specialist is treated leniently by the local denazification panel. By contrast to the lot of these privileged classes conditions among prisoners in Sachsenhausen internment camp, who are reliably reported to include a number of children, continue to be extremely bad. A statement on political arrests was made by Major Sokolko on the 17th June, when he spoke at the Soviet House of Culture, in Berlin. His conception of Soviet zone trends was interesting, since he referred to those arrested as "counter-revolutionaries" and stated that "to-day no nazis display the swastika but disguise themselves for preference as Social Democrats." "As long as Germany does not show that she will take steps against her reactionaries we must act for her." Three days earlier the Berlin City Council had resolved to request the Allied Control Council to publish the names of all persons arrested by the Occupying Powers and to permit them to correspond with relatives.

The United States Government have sent a non-committal reply to the French Government on the subject of the recent changes in the Saar. They do not intend to protest against—although they do not specifically approve—the alterations in the boundaries and the introduction of the new currency; they confirm that these steps do not prejudice a final decision on the limits of the Saar to be taken at the Peace Settlement. Neues Deutschland, organ of the Socialist Unity Party, has violently attacked the new currency as a gift to the Saar capitalists whose investments in Nazi business will yield splendid profits.

The Social Democrats in Schleswig-Holstein, who formed the first non-coalition government in post-War Germany, are making determined efforts to prove their efficiency. Although they are not allowed to legislate on land reform they have prepared a Draft Law, which is far more drastic than that of Military Government. A firm line is also being taken with the Danish Minority. The Government's statement on the 8th May said that the South Schleswig Association would be granted full rights as a minority if similar rights were accorded to the German minority in North Schleswig. There is now good reason to believe that a campaign is to be launched against members of the SSA who are considered to be opportunist "new Danes" and not genuine members of the minority. It is perhaps unfortunate that this, very natural, step should be taken at a time when Denmark's fervour about the problem shows signs of abating. A special effort is being made to see that German children are not enticed to Danish schools by offers of better school meals. 2,000 children in Flensburg came out on strike on the 3rd June as a result of a Government decree that German children might not be transferred to Danish schools. The parents have held a number of protest meetings and are preparing to appeal to Military Government. A Committee composed of Military Government, the German Government and Danish minority representatives has not yet reconciled opposing school claims. At the moment it has been decided that new Danish private schools may be set up if ten children desire it, but that public Danish schools must become private schools after April, 1948 unless a different agreement is reached before then.

AUSTRIA

At its twenty-first meeting on the 18th June, the Austrian Peace Treaty Commission finally reached agreement on the procedure of work to be followed by the Commission and its Committee of Experts. The final formula provides that (1) the Commission shall begin discussion of the question of the basic types of German assets and in this connexion shall examine the proposals of the different delegations regarding important concrete facts; (2) the Commission shall examine the oil industry, Danube shipping, financial institutions (including insurance companies), industry, and State property; no one subject will, however, be examined at such undue length as to delay examination of another problem; and (3) the Commission will refer to the Committee such questions relating to the establishment of concrete facts as it may consider necessary.

This compromise agreement satisfies the Soviet desire to keep the main discussion in the hands of the Commission and to limit the scope of the Committee of Experts; it also goes some way towards meeting the wishes of the U.K. and U.S. delegations in regard to the weight which should be attached by the Commission in its decisions to the fact-finding work of the Committee. The hard bargaining which has been necessary to secure agreement has naturally resulted in the recording in the minutes of a number of agreed "interpretations" and reservations by the various delegates, and the U.K. representative has made it clear that he has only accepted the present formula on the understanding that M. Novikov will abide by certain important assurances he has given. These include declarations that the Soviet Delegation will not attempt to prolong unduly discussion of any one item at the expense of another, or to delay reference by the Commission to the Committee. M. Novikov has also stated that the Russians are prepared to give up any genuinely non-German assets (whether or not claimed by the Allies) which they have taken over in their zone. Sir George Rendel has privately proposed to M. Novikov that the chief U.K. expert should draw up from his own information a list of assets taken over by the Soviet authorities in their zone which are considered by the U.K. delegation to be (a) indisputably German, and (b) doubtful; a third list—of assets definitely regarded as not German—may also be added. These lists would be communicated unofficially to M. Novikov with a view to learning Russian reactions. The Russian argument against providing such a list themselves is that it would imply that the Soviet Government were answerable for their actions to other Powers. It is the view of the U.K. representative that the production of an agreed list of indisputably German assets would greatly contribute to the solution of the treaty problem.

With the breaking of the deadlock, the Commission has now been able to get down to its real work, and its meeting on the 19th June was devoted to initial discussions on the oil problem. The Commission then adjourned until the 23rd June in order to allow the experts time to prepare the relevant material. In the interval the U.K. representative intends to explore, in conjunction with the Americans, the best means of securing the reversion of the maximum amount of oil to the Austrian State. The main concern of the U.K. is, of course, to ensure Austria's independence, and economic viability; Soviet suspicions that the U.K. Delegation is mainly concerned with the protection of British commercial interests, particularly in regard to oil, do not yet appear to have been dissipated.

On the 21st June the U.S. authorities in Austria renounced their claim to occupation costs after the 1st July. After that date they will compensate the Austrian Government by payments in dollars for their requirements in Austrian Schillings; special dollar credits will be granted to the Austrian Government for this purpose. The U.S. authorities estimate that Austria will thus receive about twenty million dollars annually, but Austrian financial experts set the figure at about ten million. The U.S. decision has received a warm welcome in Austrian official circles both for its financial implications and as a proof that the U.S. intends to treat Austria in actual fact as a liberated country. It has been pointed out that Austria will now be able to import urgently needed goods and also that a considerable amount of property requisitioned by the U.S. forces will, as the result of economies, be released for the population. The official Wiener Zeitung has denied that this friendly gesture has anything to do with "so-called monopoly capitalism"; the Communist Volksstimme, no doubt with precisely this suspicion in mind, has inferred that the measure will be of little benefit to Austria, the Socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung has greeted the step as being mainly the result of Socialist agitation. It will be recalled that demands for the reduction or cessation of occupation costs and for the de-requisitioning of property for Austrian use figured prominently in the Austrian Socialists' "appeal to the world" early in May 1947 and in the Memorandum submitted to the Allies by the Austrian Trades Union delegation a few weeks later.

The U.S. decision is reported by the British press to have taken the three other occupying Powers completely by surprise. Allied occupation costs have hitherto been decided by the Allied Council. At the beginning of 1947 they were reduced from 25 per cent. to a maximum of 15 per cent. of the Austrian Federal budget. In varying degrees the Soviet authorities have received a larger share of this allocation than the three Western Powers, whose own share has been apportioned equally between them.

Dr. Guido Schmidt, the Austrian Foreign Minister at the time of the Anschluss, was acquitted of the charge of high treason on the 12th June. The following day the Minister of the Interior announced that, at the request of the Socialist Party Executive, immediate proceedings would be instituted against Dr. Schmidt under the denazification law as a collaborator. Dr. Schmidt's acquittal has been sharply criticised in the Austrian Communist press, and the Socialists, while admitting the legal correctness of the verdict, have reiterated their demand for the arraignment of the Schuschnigg Government; the People's Party newspaper Kleines Volksblatt, on the other hand, has insisted that the trial produced no evidence to show that the then Austrian Government failed in the struggle against Nazism —Dr. Schmidt's guilt lay in his desertion of the Austrian cause after the Anschluss. Evidence in favour of Dr. Schmidt was given (by deposition) by former Chancellor Schuschnigg. Dr. Schmidt's main line of defence was that he had followed the only course possible for Austria at a time when Germany was rearming and the West was unwilling to give any assistance against her.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Following upon the recent meeting of the National Front which was convened in order to investigate the Slovak problem (see last week's Summary) the Executive Committee of the Democrat Party have decided that certain "appropriate measures" should now be introduced. What these "measures" entail is not yet known, but it appears probable that a purge of the Democrat ranks—long advocated by the Communists and their supporters—will shortly be carried out under the supervision of either the National Front or the Government. For the present at least the position has become much easier; the results of the inter-party meeting are reported to have been received calmly in Slovakia and the press campaign has been toned down. It may now be hoped that the widespread criticism of the Democrat attitude, allied to the pungent warnings which the President has uttered on the score of Slovak intransigence, will bear full fruit, and that a period of renewed tranquillity will ensue.

Another hopeful augury during this period of unrest has been the conference which the Executive Committees of the Czech and Slovak Social Democrats held earlier in the month. The conference, over which M. Laušman, Czech Minister for Industry and Vice-Chairman of the Party, presided, unanimously resolved to defend national unity: with emphasis on the need for a united yet decentralised administration which would function throughout the State both branches of the Party criticised the present irresponsible trends in Slovakia and rejected all reactionary attempts to sabotage the Republic's solidarity. The most important result of the meeting, however, was agreement on the desirability of amalgamating the two branches into one single party. Such a step will strengthen the bonds of Czech-Slovak co-operation, thereby helping to create the pre-requisites for agreement on the thorny question of the new Constitution. No final decision is to be made, however, until the whole question of fusion has been tackled at the forthcoming party convention.

Encouraging, too, is the fact that negotiations between the Foreign Ministry and the American Embassy in Prague have finally resulted in agreement on the transit fees payable by Czechoslovakia for the transportation of goods across the American Zone of Germany. The agreement covers transit fees between the end of the War and the 1st March, 1947, after which date the fees shall be paid in Czechoslovak goods instead of dollars: the arrangement, circumventing Czechoslovakia's dollar-shortage should give a much-needed fillip to her exports to the West as well as having favourable internal political repercussions. Czechoslovakia has also successfully negotiated the purchase of considerable quantities of flour from America and Canada. Commenting upon UNRRA aid, M. Fraštacký, Democrat Vice-Chairman of the Slovak Board of Trustees, stated that Slovakia alone has received assistance amounting to 3,000,000,000 Crowns "without UNRRA's noble aid," he said, "reconstruction in eastern Slovakia would have been impossible."

The first batch of 900 Roumanian workers has arrived in Czechoslovakia: 8,000 workers from Moldavia and 7,000 from Transylvania are also expected to take up employment in the Republic, mainly in Bohemia and Moravia. The Czechoslovak Government have renewed their Trade Agreement with Roumania.

Czech business firms are maintaining lively contacts with the Latin American States. This month Czechoslovak Chambers of Commerce will be opened in Mexico, Uraguay, and Argentina; others will be opened later in the year.

" on the whole " because it is reported that the Socialist paper, Robotnik, refrained from commenting on the Foreign Secretary's Parliamentary statements on the subject. This is a reminder that there is not complete unanimity of view with the Communists on all points of foreign policy, and of the difficulties existing between the two leading parties of the Government. The difference is largely one of emphasis, however; the Socialists tend to speak encouragingly of signs of British interest in the Slav countries, such as the visit of Mr. Noel Baker to Belgrade and Prague, and the willingness of Great Britain to buy goods outside the dollar bloc. They see " American imperialism " as attempting to drive a wedge between Great Britain and the U.S.S.R. The Communists react more violently, and profess to regard Britain as the willing servant of American reactionary policy. Tygodnik Polski, the official London Polish Weekly, regretted that no comparable organisation under United Nations control had been set up to replace UNRRA, and criticised American policy, as exemplified by the Truman doctrine, for attempting to attach unwelcome political conditions to loans for devastated countries.

Influenced by the deeply-rooted fear of Germany, suspicious and uncertain of the intentions and possible effects of the Marshall plan, and conscious always of the Russian attachment, the Polish Government are bound to be cautious, to say the least. On the other hand, there is no downright condemnation, and the reasons for this are perhaps mainly economic. Before the war Polish foreign trade was an important factor in the European situation; Polish food imports were a considerable item in the feeding of Britain, while its coal became a competitor from the time of the General Strike, particularly in the Scandinavian market. Polish foreign trade was mainly with the West and North of Europe, and with America; Danubia apart from industrialised Austria and Czechoslovakia, was too similar in character to play a big role. The complex problems arising out of the war combined to change temporarily the character and orientation of Polish trade. The 1946 figure showed that Polish trade had declined—a Polish expert calculated by 50 per cent., excluding UNRRA—and was mainly with Russia, which had regained the position lost by the political hostilities of the 1914–1939 period.

The economic reconstruction planned by the Government calls, however, for a large increase in foreign trade, and in particular with Britain, as the great market for its normal agricultural surplus. Coal is now urgently required by Western Europe, while Poland needs the machinery, raw materials and consumer goods produced by the West. Further, Poland and Czechoslovakia are aiming conjointly at filling the vacuum left in the Danube Lands by Germany's downfall; Poland, now in full possession of Silesia, is in a more favourable position to fulfil this task.

Polish trade is in fact already showing signs of re-entering the Western sphere, as physical conditions improve. Towards the end of 1946, the amount taken by the Soviet Union declined. By agreement the Soviet quota of Polish coal was reduced, allowing more to enter the channels of Central and Western Europe. On the 9th June, letters were exchanged between the President of the Board of Trade and the Polish Ambassador in London accepting the trade proposals worked out for the next three years. By this Agreement, the excess in British exports to the value of about £12 million will be made up by a contribution from Poland to the value of £4·2 million, and one from the United Kingdom of £7·5 million; Poland will draw on Polish credits in the United Kingdom and upon the Polish gold deposited in London, and will deliver £800,000 worth of coal to Britain in 1947–48; Great Britain will provide credits through the Export Guarantee Department. The Polish gold mentioned above becomes available to the Polish Government under the Anglo-Polish Financial Agreement, which was ratified in London on 19th June—under this Agreement the Polish Government are entitled to choose surplus stores in the United Kingdom up to a value of £6,000,000. The Poles are taking over £1,000,000 worth of raw wood under this heading.

It is significant that the President of the Board of Trade should refer in his letter to the proposals as being designed " in particular to restore the traditional pattern of trade between the two countries."

Robotnik, on the 10th June, described the Agreement as " not only an economic but also a political achievement." The whole complex of problems involved will be very profoundly affected by the outcome of the meeting of the British, French and Soviet Foreign Ministers in Paris on the 27th June.

As a background to these events Warsaw has seen the latest meeting of the All-Slav Committee. M. Barcikowski, Deputy-Speaker of the Sejm, described the meeting as a protest against " German barbarism, and the resurrection of Germanism by its new Allies." General Gundorov, the Soviet delegate, remarked, nevertheless, that, " we do not cut ourselves off from other democratic and peaceful nations of the world."

Stop press news indicates that, following the Russian move, the Polish Government has been quick to announce its willingness to join in discussions on the Marshall plan.

SOVIET UNION

The acceptance by the Russian Government of the Anglo-French invitation to a Three-Power Conference in Paris, announced on the 23rd June, has not come as a complete surprise. Comment on " the Marshall plan," even though in the main hostile and suspicious, had been reserved and not at all in the grand tradition of Soviet invective. Mr. Marshall's purpose in announcing the extension of the original scheme was said to be mainly to disarm the criticism levelled at the Truman doctrine by progressive people in the U.S.A., and no new trend in American policy was held to be indicated. The Anglo-French exchanges concerning the proposals were described as an attempt to reach agreement behind the backs of the U.S.S.R. and other European countries. The main burden of the complaint, taken up by M. Molotov in his interview with Sir Maurice Peterson, was that the U.S.S.R. had been kept in the dark; and this was presumably put out by way of a retort to Anglo-American complaints of lack of information on the Hungarian situation.

Sir Maurice Peterson's second interview with M. Molotov on the 17th June on the subject of Hungary was even less fruitful than his first, M. Molotov this time giving signs of active wrath instead of merely stolid passive resistance. He categorically rejected the proposal for a Three-Power Commission, stated that the arrest of Kovacs had already been satisfactorily explained and did not take at all kindly to Sir Maurice's suggestion that Marshal Voroshilov, as Chairman of the Allied Control Commission, should be sent to Budapest to clear up the situation. At the time, M. Molotov refused to give an immediate answer to the aide-mémoire handed to him by Sir Maurice, but he gave an official reply to it five days later. The Soviet aide-mémoire contained nothing new. It simply dismissed the British note as a repetition of the " slanderous fabrications " concerning Soviet pressure on the Hungarian Government and reaffirmed the Soviet refusal to consider a Three-Power Commission on the ground that it would lead to " inadmissible foreign interference in Hungary's internal affairs."

Although the political situation thus remains tense, considerable activity is proceeding on the economic front. Professor Gunnar Myrdal, Secretary-General of the Economic Commission for Europe, was received by M. Molotov on the 18th June, and the British trade delegation, headed by Mr. Wilson, Secretary for Overseas Trade, reached Moscow two days later. A delegation of Danish tobacco experts is to leave shortly for Moscow where they will advise on the building of a tobacco factory. The Roumanian Minister of Industry and Trade and the Minister of Agriculture are also at present in Moscow with a delegation. The first Soviet commercial transaction with Chile has been concluded in the shape of a purchase of £225,000 of Chilean wool and hemp. Tass has put out a more than usually vigorous refutation of the report appearing in Le Populaire and repeated in the Prague organ Lidova Democracie to the effect that negotiations for a Soviet-Spanish trade treaty were proceeding in Madrid. The report was dismissed as " a vicious provocative fabrication meant for credulous simpletons."

Soviet-Dutch negotiations for a joint air service are proceeding, but the Dutch have apparently broken them off on discovering that they are to be no exception to the usual Soviet rule of refusing to allow foreign air services to Moscow while claiming the right to land in the capital of the other contracting party.

A large-scale evacuation plan is apparently on foot for repatriating Greeks from the Caucasus to Greece, involving a total of over a thousand families. The Greek Embassy in Moscow is asking for transit visas for them through Haifa at the rate of about fifteen families a week. These Greeks are presumably Soviet citizens, and it is curious that the Greek Government should be willing to accept them. In the inter-war period there had been one or two small waves of emigration to Greece of Soviet citizens of Greek origin who became on their return pillars of the Greek Communist Party.

Meanwhile the Greek Ambassador in Moscow, M. Politis, has been unable to secure an exit visa for his Russian wife and had to leave alone on the 11th June. The case has been taken up strongly by the Chinese Ambassador, as doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, but he was told that to grant the request of Madame Politis might create a precedent and lead to requests for exit visas for the other Soviet wives of husbands of other than Soviet nationality.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

Feelers put out by the Social Democrats in order to ascertain the attitude of the Radical Party towards a possible change of Government have led to a variety of interesting speeches and press polemics. M. J. Jørgensen, leader of the Radical parliamentary group, replied cautiously to these advances by asking for a clear statement of the policy which the Social Democrats intended to follow. He added that no co-operation was feasible on the basis of the "Future Denmark" programme drawn up by the Socialists in 1945. What the Radicals desired was not doctrinaire Socialism or doctrinaire Liberalism, but a "social-liberal" policy adapted to the demands of the present age and constantly striving to translate into practice the principles inherent in democracy for the improvement of the standards of the humbler classes of the community.

M. H. Hedtoft, Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, delivered his reply in a speech at Aalborg on the 14th June. M. Jørgensen had evidently not appreciated, he said, the fact that the "Future Denmark" programme was not definitive but was merely intended to serve as a working basis. How many or how few of the principles embodied would eventually be applied, naturally depended upon the political possibilities at any given moment. The time had now come, however, for all progressive groups in Denmark to unite in overthrowing the present Government. The formation of a coalition Government, as far as the Social Democrats were concerned, was, nevertheless, out of the question until fresh election to the Lower Chamber had been held, as only an election could clear the air and make possible the work of reconstruction which the Kristensen Government had neglected.

M. Hedtoft's references to his Party's programme are interpreted as meaning that he is prepared to let the nationalisation programme sink into abeyance as the price of support by the Radicals. In a later speech M. Jørgensen also revealed a willingness to compromise when he said that, though the ultimate goals of the two parties were not identical, there were times in the lives of nations when principles had to give way to practical solutions which could count upon the support of the majority of the population.

The realistic attitude adopted by the two politicians augurs ill for the present Government, and the trend of events certainly points towards the holding of new elections after the Rigsdag reassembles in October. Should such an election take place one of the main issues will undoubtedly be the South Schleswig question.

Following an operation, M. E. Kjaer, Minister of the Interior, died suddenly on the 18th June. His successor has not yet been appointed.

On the 17th June Mr. Marshall discussed the American bases on Greenland with the Danish Ambassador, M. Kauffmann (see Summary No. 394). Though the Americans maintain that actual negotiations have not yet started, the Danes are reported to be pressing for the immediate termination of the Treaty. The United States, however, insists upon safeguarding the American continent, and it is thought that some Danish support could perhaps be secured if proposals are advanced placing the bases under the auspices of the United Nations Organisation. In an interview M. Kauffmann admitted that there were strong reasons why Greenland should be included in an all-embracing inter-American defence system, but pointed out that Denmark, on behalf of Greenland, was not a party to the Chapultepec agreement.

The laboriously erected dykes against the rising tide of inflation appeared to have been breached when at the end of May the Government announced new wage increases for almost all workers in other than nationalised industries—but excluding agriculture. The decision was taken after strong pressure from the S.A.K. (the equivalent of our T.U.C.), and after the Employers' Federation had declared that a refusal would almost certainly lead to widespread industrial chaos. Other factors contributing to the unfavourable development are recent increases in rents and the release of timber from price control with effect from the 1st June. This will inevitably cause a sharp rise in the price of fuel next winter, and house-owners are already complaining that the higher costs have gone a long way towards cancelling out the increases in rents. The same observation might well be made by the wage-earners with reference to their alleged gain.

The S.A.K. congress opened on the 15th June with 171 Social Democratic delegates and 129 representatives for the Folk Democrats. In his opening speech the Chairman, M. E. Huunonen mentioned the renewed danger of inflation and said that, although the S.A.K. had pursued a moderate wage policy, the hoped for stabilisation had not materialised despite higher production. The trades union movement could not be held responsible for this.

To a large extent the new inflationary wave is directly due to the shortsightedness of the Government who under pressure from the Agrarians, and, be it noted, with the tacit support of the Folk Democrats, released meat and certain other agricultural produce at a time when an unbridgeable gap existed between supply and demand.

An embarrassing incident took place on the third day of the congress when in a matter of the greatest delicacy one of the Communist delegates turned for support to the Soviet trade unionists who were among the foreign guests. The question concerned the execution of Russian P.O.W.s during the hostilities. It was only through the timely intervention of the Chairman that a major "incident" was avoided.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

On the 19th June, Professor Jacques Pirenne, King Leopold's secretary, handed to the Prince Regent, in the presence of M. Spaak, the Prime Minister, the report drawn up by a committee of nine distinguished jurists, who had been requested by King Leopold nearly a year ago to inquire into his attitude and policy since October 1936, when Belgian independence in the sphere of foreign affairs was first proclaimed. Professor Pirenne also gave copies of the report to M. Spaak himself, the Belgian Attorney-General, and the Presidents of the Senate and Chamber. (It was at the suggestion of the two last that the inquiry was undertaken.) The general tenor of the report is an apologia for the King. In view of its international importance, an English text is to be issued.

There are 170 pages of text, followed by 270 of documents. Seven main points are covered, viz.: (i) The pre-war policy of neutrality, announced in October 1936; (ii) King Leopold's defence preparations; (iii) the conduct of operations during the 18-day campaign in Belgium in May 1940; (iv) King Leopold's attitude at the time of the Belgian Army's capitulation; (v) his attitude during the occupation (including his interview with Hitler at Berchtesgaden in November 1940); (vi) his marriage to Mlle. Baels in December 1941; (vii) his removal by the Germans to Germany before the liberation of Belgium.

On the first point the report emphasises that the pre-war policy of neutrality enjoyed the full approval of M. Spaak, and points out that this policy was ratified by Parliament in April 1940—only three weeks before the German invasion. Right up to the day of invasion the King did not cease from preparing the country for the possibility of war, and was in touch with the British and French General Staffs, to whom he gave documents revealing a plan for a German attack in the region between the Sambre and Meuse. He also told the French General Staff of his conviction that the Germans would attempt a breakthrough in the Givet–Longwy sector—a prediction which proved to be correct. At no time did he ever conceal his intention to defend Belgium against German aggression: indeed, he had informed the German Military Attaché in Brussels (Colonel Pappenheim) that the whole nation would "rise in arms" in the event of a German invasion.

In dealing with the King's conduct of the campaign in Belgium, the report draws freely upon the text of the messages sent by the late Lord Keyes (at that time King Leopold's special liaison officer), and shows the King as dutifully obeying the Supreme Command's orders, adding that the Belgian Army fought to the point of exhaustion, with the sole object of allowing the embarkation of the British Army at Dunkirk. Had the King abandoned his forces on the 25th May (as suggested by his Ministers), says the report, "the Belgian Army would have been broken, and not a single British soldier would have crossed the Channel." On the 27th May, 1940—the day before he signed the capitulation order—King Leopold was urged by Admiral of the Fleet Sir Roger Keyes (as he was then) to accompany him to England, but he refused, saying that he preferred to remain with his people. Organised French resistance, he thought, would be at an end within a fortnight; and what then, he asked Lord Keyes, did England propose to do? On Lord Keyes assuring him of Great Britain's determination to continue the struggle, King Leopold replied that he was "certain of that," and added: "You will win, but not without going through a hell of a time." According to the report, capitulation was forced upon the King, because of the British Command's inability to spare enough troops to give him the assistance he needed: allegations that he surrendered to the Germans were, therefore, "entirely false." That King

Leopold had never contemplated a separate peace with Germany is shown, it is claimed, by a letter which he sent to King George VI on the 25th May, 1940, in which he declared his intention of staying with his people in order to prevent their being associated with any action against Belgium's late allies. His refusal to support his Ministers, who were then in France, in their desire to sue for an armistice with the Germans, was due solely to his regarding himself a prisoner-of-war; and later, during the occupation, he had also opposed the "solicitations of certain politicians and high officials" who wanted to replace the exiled Pierlot Government by a new Government in Brussels.

With regard to his visit to Berchtesgaden in November 1940 the report says that the King had twice asked for an interview before Hitler agreed to grant his request. [For details of the interview and of the Senate debate which followed their publication, see Summaries Nos. 318 and 319 of the 7th and 14th November, 1945.] In approaching Hitler he had been actuated by the wish "to avoid reprisals which the Germans would have taken against the Belgian people had he persisted in refusal." The King's principal requests at the interview had been for the release of Belgian prisoners-of-war, and for more bread for his people. He had refused to discuss politics with Hitler, who afterwards expressed himself dissatisfied with the interview, and vowed to "get rid of King Leopold." When later the King refused to collaborate with Germany, he was warned that he might be deported to Germany. A second warning followed his protest against the deportation of Belgian workers. He himself was eventually deported on the 7th June, 1944. The report stigmatizes as defamatory suggestions that his removal to Germany was "a comedy pre-arranged with the Germans." On the question of his marriage of Mlle. Baels, the report asserts that, "according to constitutional principles," this marriage "could not have any political consequences. His wife could not become Queen, and descendants born of the marriage could not claim the rights constitutionally reserved for Princes of the Blood Royal."

The Belgian Press has naturally devoted considerable space to the report. Its findings are welcomed by the Catholic La Libre Belgique with the comment: "Nothing now remains of the malicious accusations thrown out against the King"; and by the Catholic La Nation Belge, which declares that it is "impossible not to be struck by the scruples and constitutional loyalty of the King," and that "one must regret that so many criticisms have been uttered wrongfully against the King." The Socialist Le Peuple, however, inevitably takes the opposite view: the King's "faults and mistakes," it says, "make it impossible for him to return to the Throne."

FRANCE

Mr. Bevin's visit to Paris (see last week's Summary) resulted in a joint communiqué issued by the U.K. and French Governments on the 18th June. This stated that Mr. Bevin and M. Bidault had examined the statement made by Mr. Marshall at Harvard and "welcomed with the greatest satisfaction the thoughts he expressed about the organisation of economic co-operation between the countries of Europe and the help which the U.S. Government could envisage to make such co-operation effective." The communiqué emphasised the need for measures to restore Europe's productive capacity to its pre-war level, and proposed that comprehensive programmes of requirements should be drawn up by all those countries which were willing to participate in the scheme "in liaison with the appropriate organs of the United Nations." A joint invitation was sent to M. Molotov proposing that a meeting of the three Foreign Ministers should be held this week to discuss the whole question.

M. Molotov's affirmative reply to this invitation has lessened the anxieties of the French Government and may cause the Communist paper Humanité to moderate its tone. This paper attacked the Marshall plan as an extension of the "Truman doctrine," acceptance of which would make France economically and politically dependent on the U.S. For most of the press, however, the plan represented a hopeful chance of increasing French production and saving the franc. M. Blum, writing in Le Populaire (18th June) said that the Marshall plan was of more immediate importance than any other matter and urged that France should accept it without delay. He emphasised the effect on American opinion that would be obtained by presenting a united European front. M. Francois-Poncet, former French Ambassador in Berlin, writing in Le Figaro of the same date, remarked on the inevitable necessity of Anglo-French collaboration in this, as in all matters touching Europe. Both he and M. Blum put the case for entrusting the work of drawing up a list of European needs to the Economic Commission for Europe. The problems of securing Soviet collaboration and of deciding on the rôle to be allotted to Germany were, however, fully appreciated by both commentators.

M. Vincent Auriol, continuing his campaign for investing the office of President of the Republic with more authority and dignity than it used to possess, gave a warm welcome to Mr. Marshall's statement, in a speech which he made to the Foreign Press Association. M. Bidault made a short report to the Assembly on the 18th June, emphasising his desire and that of Mr. Bevin to make the scheme for European co-operation as wide as possible, and his hope for speedy agreement between France, the U.K. and the U.S.S.R. The Communists were, however, the only party not to applaud his speech and they requested an immediate debate. This request was refused by the Government.

The French Government are particularly anxious to make a success of Mr. Marshall's plan in view of their own parlous financial position. During the last week it has been revealed that the Treasury will soon be unable to meet all the demands for funds made upon it, unless drastic action is taken. This situation arises from the fact that large quantities of Treasury bonds are now falling due for repayment while private lenders are unwilling to take up new bonds owing to their own difficulties (increase in the wages bill and rising costs) and to a crisis of confidence. The Government are being obliged to raise by 100 milliard fr. the limit of advances made to them by the Bank of France. They also intend to release gold amounting to 250 million dollars from the reserves of the Bank to meet the heavy deficit in the balance of payments.

In addition to these stop-gap measures the Government have asked the Assembly to agree to a series of budgetary cuts and tax increases. The proposals of the Minister of Finance, M. Schuman, are mainly orthodox and were most unpalatable to many members of the Government. M. Ramadier was in fact near to resigning on this issue, but the visit of the Secretary of State, with its demonstration of the necessity for united action in face of the Marshall plan, enabled him to bring his colleagues to heel. The Radicals accepted the financial proposals through fear of precipitating a Government crisis which would mean the return to power of the Communists; the M.R.P., with some misgivings, made the best of M. Schuman's proposals; and the Socialists finally upheld M. Ramadier in spite of their embarrassment at the violent campaign carried on by the Communists and the C.G.T. against the financial proposals. The finance committee of the Assembly, which at first turned down the plan, was induced to accept it after a debate on the 23rd June, in spite of well-organised workers' demonstrations outside the Chamber, and the Assembly itself adopted it the same night. The Government's majority was, however, only 61 votes, and the opposition included a number of Radicals as well as the Communists and the Parti Républicain de la Liberté.

The financial measures mark the end of the policy of price reduction, as M. Blum has himself acknowledged. They include a series of measures which will relieve the budget by allowing prices to rise; these consist of the abolition of the subsidies on bread and milk and the removal of the deficit of the State railways and postal services by an increase in fares and rates. The price of tobacco and matches (which are state monopolies) will also be increased. These measures will bear hardly on the working class and in partial compensation family allowances and old age pensions are to be raised. The richer classes will be made to contribute by means of a 25 per cent. increase in the tax on capital, a tax on new businesses and on private cars, and by limitation of distributed profits. State expenditure will be reduced by a further decrease in the staffs of Government offices and by cuts in military expenditure. Finally, controls will be taken off in the case of various commodities including textile goods and wine. These measures thus represent a move back to more normal conditions, but they cannot in themselves provide a solution to France's economic and financial difficulties.

SWITZERLAND

The delay in implementing the Washington Agreement of May, 1946, concerning the liquidation of German assets in Switzerland continues to be the subject of prolonged discussion between the British, American and French signatories. The main issue is still the advisability or otherwise of placating the Swiss to the extent of fixing the rate of exchange at some pre-liquidation figure. The French appear to favour the adoption of the pre-war German-Swiss clearing rate, which is also acceptable to the Russians, but which the Swiss are almost certain to reject. In spite of suggestions in some quarters that M. Stücki, personally, is the main obstacle to Swiss acceptance of the Allied proposals, there appear to be good grounds for believing that he has his Government solidly behind him.

Recent Swiss-Polish economic discussions terminated in the signature at Warsaw on the 10th June of a series of Agreements supplementary to the Agreement of March, 1946. Ratification by both Governments is still required. The new Agreement, which will be valid for two years from the 1st July, provides for the delivery to Switzerland of 600,000 tons of Polish coal per annum, at a price to be determined at discussions between the two countries next October or November. It is calculated, however, that, since Switzerland is required to supply against the Polish coal goods to the value of 60,000,000 Swiss francs, the price will probably be about 50 Swiss francs a ton at the Swiss frontier. In addition to the transaction in coal an agreement has been reached providing for other trade to a maximum of 40 million Swiss francs on each side, spread over a period of two years.

No progress has yet been made on the subject of compensation for Swiss property nationalised in Poland. The Swiss Government have already rejected a Polish suggestion that Switzerland should provide an inter-governmental credit out of which Swiss nationals could be compensated. The Polish Government have promised, however, to accord friendly consideration to claims for the recognition of Swiss ownership of small agricultural holdings.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

The Spanish Government have set the stage for endorsement by "the popular will" of the Bill of Succession passed by the Cortes Españolas on the 7th June. Spaniards of both sexes over the age of 21 will have "the right and duty" to record a straight vote for or against the Bill. The ballot will be secret, and the enfranchised for this occasion will be all who qualify for the Electoral Census as ratified in May 1946. Those who have been deprived of political rights or have at any time been detained for trial by the Military or special political tribunals (e.g. the tribunal for the suppression of freemasonry) are excluded. (The number of these "outlaws"—apart, of course, from Spaniards living in exile—is estimated at some two million persons.)

The text of the Bill as amended and approved shows no fundamental alteration from the original drafts: where the wording has been changed, it is in every case with a view to strengthening the powers of the present Head of the State, Generalissimo Franco, and his régime. Thus, for example, any future King or Regent is required specifically to swear loyalty to the principles embodied in the National Movement, as well as undertaking to observe and preserve the "fundamental laws." A new article lays down the order of succession to be followed once the Crown has been re-established; and another empowers the Head of the State, in consultation with the Council of the Realm, to propose to the Cortes "the exclusion from the succession of those persons of royal blood lacking the necessary capacity for leadership, or those who on account of their well-known aversion from the fundamental principles of the State or by their acts, deserve to lose the right of succession established by this law." This is dotting the i's and crossing the t's with a vengeance; it is tantamount to locking the stable door on a horse which was never inside! Nevertheless, General Franco will presumably get his plebiscitary backing,—for what it is worth.

Señora de Peron has had a very full programme. When she attended a bullfight in Madrid the crowd gave here a tremendous reception—and the Caudillo also. Apart from official dinners and gala theatre performances, a visit to the University City was arranged for her so that she might address the students, and she also made a characteristic and entirely successful speech to a workers' gathering organised by the sindicatos. After visiting the Escorial, Toledo, Segovia and Avila she made a trip to Galicia and ended her tour in Barcelona, with General Franco in attendance to see her off. Youthful, glamorous and simpática, she does not seem to have put a foot wrong, and she has evidently won the hearts of many Spaniards who were disgusted by the propaganda exploitation of the visit.

It has now been officially announced that Manuel Aguirre de Carcer has been appointed Delegate of the Spanish Government in Paris in the place of Don Miguel Mateu, who resigned some weeks ago. Señor Aguirre de Carcer is a senior member of the Spanish diplomatic service, with special knowledge and experience of Morocco. Towards the end of 1944, it may be remembered, Señor Mateu, President of the Hispano-Suiza Company and mayor of Barcelona, accepted the post of Special Envoy to France (following her liberation). General de Gaulle's Government treated him shabbily by refusing to give him the opportunity of presenting his Letters of Credence, and, since the rupture of relations at the end of February 1946, he had been still more left out on a limb. No wonder he has given up the unequal struggle. He was no more successful when employed as a mediator in the early period of General Franco's efforts to attach Don Juan to the régime.

Portugal

An official Note issued by the Portuguese Cabinet on the 15th June announced the dismissal of Vice-Admiral Jose Mendes Cabeçadas Junior and of ten Army officers on the charge of subversive activities against the State. More than a dozen university professors and lecturers have also been compulsorily retired on similar charges. The Note stated that investigations following the military revolt at Mealhada in October 1946 and more recent incidents—in particular the wrecking of 20 military aircraft at Cintra had disclosed evidence implicating the dismissed officers. The Government had not at first wished to take extreme measures, hoping "that commonsense would prevail and experience show these people the futility of their efforts." But, parallel to these revolutionary attempts, disorders had occurred in Lisbon and other parts of the country. A strike had started in the shipyards and had spread to various factories. Then university students had joined in and held demonstrations as a protest against police measures which were quite unconnected with academic life. A number of professors and their assistants had backed the agitators and taken part in the demonstrations, thus showing themselves to be more interested in idealogical controversies than in carrying out their proper duties. The Government had therefore taken steps to remove from public office those individuals who had given unequivocal proof of their active opposition to the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

ITALY

On the 21st June Signor De Gasperi's new Government obtained a vote of confidence by 274 votes to 231. The Communists, Socialists and small left-centre parties voted against the Government. It is clearly going to be difficult for Signor De Gasperi to govern with such a narrow majority, and the Qualunquists who command thirty votes have already stated that they will give only a limited credit to the Premier. The left-wing of the Christian Democrats under Signor Gronchi is also showing signs of being troublesome. Meanwhile the mass of the population will judge the new Government by any concrete steps that it may take to cope with the increasingly disastrous economic situation.

A new constitutional crisis is already looming ahead, precipitated by the decision to prolong the life of the Constituent Assembly. On the 25th June President De Nicola officially resigned on grounds of health from his post as provisional head of the State, and his message of resignation was read to the Constituent Assembly. As he is very highly respected by all parties it will be unfortunate if he cannot be persuaded to reconsider his decision and remain in office until the Constituent Assembly has completed its work and a new Parliament has been elected. Dr. De Nicola is, however, 70 years of age, in indifferent health, and the cares of office lie heavily on him. It would not be an easy task to find a suitable successor. Already the names of such elder statesmen as Orlando (87), Nitti (78) and Bonomi are being mentioned as possible successors. Dr. De Nicola is evidently willing to hand over the reins to any one of these, but the decision will of course be in the hands of the Constituent Assembly.

The Italian police have made a swoop on a neo-Fascist organisation in Rome and other cities. Numerous arrests have been made including that of Pizzirani, who took part in the Fascist march on Rome in 1922, and was a luminary of Mussolini's Fascist Republic of 1943–45. Carlo Scorza, one of the most ruthless and primitive of the Fascist Ras, is reported to have been one of the leaders of the movement. The aim of the organisation is described as being to encourage the "cult of the Duce," to plan revenge on "traitors of Fascism," to sabotage the present political and civil life of the country, and, ultimately, to engineer the return to power of a Fascist régime. Although the strength of the movement will probably be found to be relatively slight, its very existence demonstrates the dangers of economic and social chaos in the country and the disastrous effect of the too-wide amnesty, granted on the proclamation of the Republic a year ago, which undid much of the work of the purging Committee.

It is reported that Count Carandini has resigned his post as Italian Representative in London and will be returinng to Italy after the visit to this country of Count Sforza.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

References to Hungary during the Foreign Affairs Debate on the 19th June revealed the uneasiness felt on both sides of the House at recent developments in Hungary.

The situation has not been improved by a White Paper published on the 22nd June in which the Hungarian Government accused the U.K. and the U.S.A. of collaborating with the conspirators to obtain information directed against the U.S.S.R., and stated that M. Nagy had received promises of financial assistance through the U.S. Commercial Counsellor in Budapest. M. Jarmay, a police official and former bodyguard of M. Kovács, is said to have been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for supplying two British officers, Captain Clark and Major Hanley, with details of the organization of the Political Police and the political affiliations of various of its members.

According to a Reuter correspondent in Washington, M. Nagy, who is charged in the White Paper with attempting to turn Hungary into a political and economic base for the U.S.A., has now admitted willingness to accept U.S. aid in order to establish an Hungarian democracy on the Western pattern.

If Hungary's case comes before the United Nations, M. Ries asserts that his Government will produce such evidence as will alienate U.S. public opinion from M. Nagy. Meanwhile another Smallholder, M. Jekely, principal adviser to M. Tildy and recently appointed Minister to Belgium and the Netherlands, has decided to follow M. Nagy into exile. The reasons for M. Jekely's step are not yet clear, for in view of his political untrustworthiness and sinister personal reputation it is impossible to believe that he has acted disinterestedly, or merely, as he himself affirms, "to continue with M. Nagy the struggle for the freedom of a democratic Hungary." By virtue of his former office, however, the significance of M. Jekely's resignation, tendered in Berne on his way to Brussels, must not be overlooked, and the Smallholders from whose Party he is now expelled have lost a leading, if altogether disreputable, left-wing member. Their thinning ranks are further reduced by the flight to Austria of yet another prominent Deputy, Count Dessewffy, whom enlightened left-wing opinion esteemed as a man of good will, though not as a statesman of the highest order. M. Rosti-Forgacs, Hungarian Minister to Prague, has also refused to continue in office under the present Government, and has left Czechoslovakia for Switzerland.

M. Tildy has denied the intention of resigning attributed to him by M. Jekely. He likewise maintains that he is not under house-arrest at Balatonlelle. He nevertheless admits that he is unable to keep closely in touch with developments either through M. Dinnyés or the rest of the Cabinet, while his statement that he could have seen papers bearing on Government policy, but "just did not seem to be interested in the crisis" hardly suggests that he anticipates remaining long in his present position. Both M. Nagy and M. Tildy were, it is alleged, helped to power by the Hungarian Community, which during the war functioned as a resistance organisation, but was also anti-Semitic in tendency—a fact which the President and ex-Premier professed to ignore.

In an interview with a representative of the Social Democratic newspaper, Népszava, Mr. Tiffany, a Labour M.P., visiting Budapest, testified to the exaggerated version of the case which "the foreign reactionary Press" presented. There had, he said, been no disorders, and he promised to portray the situation more impartially on his return to London. The Communist organ, Szabad Nép, launched a bitter attack on The Daily Herald for the emphasis which the latter placed on M. Sulyok's criticisms. M. Sulyok's Party so far remains the only one which has ventured to challenge the new régime. Disillusionment with M. Nagy appears to be widespread among the Smallholders in Hungary.

As reported in an article published in Népszava on the 17th June, the Social Democratic Party maintains that Hungary ought not to intervene in differences of opinion arising between the Great Powers. The attitude is interesting for its relative independence in contrast to the whole-hearted Communist backing of Soviet Russia. Népszava likewise repudiates on a somewhat irritated note the advice offered by Szabad Nép to the effect that Hungarian Social Democrats should dissociate themselves from their sister parties in the U.K., France and Austria.

The trials of MM. Mistéth, Jaczkó and Hám, among others, are in progress. M. Hám is the first of the conspirators to allege torture by the Political Police.

Roumania

M. Tătărescu in conversation with H.M. Minister in Bucharest has stoutly denied the current rumour that in his present stand against the Government he was acting by arrangement with the Soviet Ambassador. His memorandum is still under discussion, but there is little chance that he will achieve more than a meaningless compromise. Four votes out of sixteen were cast against the draft bill dealing with war criminals which was approved on the 19th June; M. Tătărescu's Liberals thus seem still to be making a stand wherever possible.

Negotiations concerning gold claims against Roumania are continuing. The latest report from Swiss sources indicates that the Roumanian Government are preparing to move two or three tons of gold from Switzerland back to Roumania. It is of interest that the Governor of the National Bank of Roumania, Professor Mosoiu, should have been attending the recent meeting of the Bank of International Settlements in Basle. Apparently he is anxious to come to this country on a courtesy visit to the Bank of England after visiting Paris and Brussels.

M. Gheorghiu-Dej, Minister of Industry and Commerce, and M. Savulescu, Minister of Agriculture, are at present in Moscow with a view, according to the official communiqué, to obtaining cereal imports.

A Roumanian delegation left for Belgrade on the 17th June to reach an agreement on air transport with the Yugoslav Government. The Roumanian Government apparently desire an air line through Yugoslavia to Italy, while the Yugoslavs wish to secure two lines through Roumania to the U.S.S.R.

An agreement on direct railway communications between the U.S.S.R. and Roumania was signed in Moscow on the 12th June. The detailed provisions are not yet known.

(See also under "Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia.")

Yugoslavia

It has now been decided that Major-General Maclean will visit Belgrade on or about the 25th June to discuss with the Yugoslav Government the problem of displaced persons, and to see Marshal Tito at Bled. Meanwhile, the Yugoslav Government, through the mouth of an official of the Embassy in Paris, have again threatened to take "energetic diplomatic action," if there is no immediate change in the British and American attitude to this problem. Since all Yugoslavs who are detained by the Allied authorities in Italy pending a decision on their eligibility for forcible repatriation will after the 30th June, become the responsibility of the Italian Government, it has been suggested that they should be transferred to Germany before that date, provided the United States Government agree.

The Anglo-Yugoslav compensation negotiations in Belgrade have now been adjourned to enable H.M.G. to consider a global offer made by the Yugoslav Government for the payment of £3,000,000 sterling over a period of five years, and for the conclusion of an economic agreement covering an exchange of goods, in which Yugoslav exports would exceed imports by five per cent. annually, the balance being used to meet the compensation settlement. Such an agreement could benefit both countries, since Yugoslavia, where harvest prospects this year are good, can offer foodstuffs and timber in return for materials necessary for the implementation of the Five-Year Plan.

New air lines connecting Belgrade with Tirana, Bratislava and Prague were opened on the 16th June by the Yugoslav Air Transport Service. Belgrade is beginning to assume the appearance of a centre of South-East European air routes. Negotiations are also reported to be in progress between Yugoslavia and Roumania, which desires facilities for operating air routes with Russia and Italy respectively. Meanwhile the Yugoslav Government now appear anxious to conclude an air agreement with His Majesty's Government, although only a few weeks ago they claimed to be afraid that such an agreement would constitute a precedent for a similar arrangement with the United States, which in their eyes, might be the thin end of the wedge of "capitalist" domination over Yugoslav economy.

Greece

On the 20th June the text of the United States–Greek agreement on aid to Greece was issued. On the previous day publicity had been given to the correspondence between M. Tsaldaris and the U.S. Ambassador in Athens about the administration of the U.S. aid. It is proposed (a) that all exports and imports, both Governmental and private, shall be controlled by a Greek organisation with a U.S. head and Greek and American technical staff; (b) that a U.S. Economic Mission shall approve all expenditure involving the use of American aid and shall approve the allocation of foreign exchange; and (c) that the present Currency Committee with its Greek and foreign advisers shall be retained but that its functions shall be modified to accord with those of the U.S. Mission. Meanwhile the newly-appointed head of the U.S. Mission has not yet arrived in Greece and the members of the British Economic Mission can obtain no information as to which (if any) of them he may wish to retain.

On 12th June a bandit attack in Greece close to the Yugoslav frontier, near Lake Doiran, was repelled by Greek forces with the help of artillery and aircraft. On the 14th June an official statement was published in Belgrade complaining of the bombardment by Greek artillery of the Yugoslav village of Nikolić near the frontier, and of an aerial attack, early on 13th June, on a frontier post, in which the commanding officer was killed and two guards wounded. The Yugoslav Government asked the Security Council for an immediate investigation on the spot. Their own investigating commission, which was at once despatched to the area, announced the discovery of spent British cartridges at Nikolić. The Greek Government have denied any violation of the frontier, which is clearly enough marked in this area for a mistake to be unlikely. Nevertheless, there is doubtless a close connection between the bandit attack, which almost certainly originated in Yugoslav territory, and the incidents of which the Yugoslavs complain.

The United Nations Sub-Commission's request to the Yugoslav Government for facilities to investigate the two incidents near Lake Doiran has not yet been granted. The Yugoslav Government seem to be adopting the same delaying tactics as did the Bulgarian Government over the Angistron and Kapnotopos investigation, and it may be that, in this case also, the Sub-Commission will have to carry out its investigations on the Greek side of the frontier only. The main Commission have now assembled in New York in order to present their report to the Security Council.

There has been little news during the week of operations against the rebels, except for a report that a large band which was trying to penetrate into Attica has been defeated on Mount Helikon. For some weeks this band had been active in the mountains North of the Gulf of Corinth; they recently attacked Delphi. It is now claimed that the remnants of the band are being chased towards Parnassus.

Leontios, the Bishop of Paphos, who recently led a delegation to London to press upon H.M. Government the claims of Cyprus to union with Greece, has been elected Archbishop of Cyprus.

Bulgaria

The Foreign Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons on 19th June, condemned the suppression of liberty in Bulgaria at Soviet instigation. There was a determination, Mr. Bevin said, to wipe out every Opposition party.

The Opposition remains blunted if not broken. Both its papers are still suppressed. The attitude of the head of the Printers' Union appears to be that the printers are not going to let Svoboden Narod appear again, whatever the Bulgarian Foreign Minister may say. The number of people called up at the beginning of June for compulsory labour, on the pretext that they were not usefully employed, was about 30,000.

The Bulgarian treaty, having now been ratified by the United States, only needs ratification by the Soviet Union and the deposit in Moscow of the British, American and Soviet instruments of ratification, to be brought into force. Although ratification by Bulgaria is not necessary it is desirable, but the Bulgarian Government shew signs of being in no hurry to ratify, even after the Soviet Union has done so. On the 20th June they introduced a bill for the approval of the treaty, and on the same day the Grand National Assembly adjourned till the 16th September. It can, however, be recalled.

Tsankov, the arch-collaborationist who tried to start an émigré government when the Germans were thrown out, was sentenced on the 9th June in absentia, with nine of his chief military followers, to be hanged. Accomplices who are under arrest were given relatively short terms of imprisonment.

On 16th June the bread ration was reduced for a fortnight—to 300 grammes for ordinary people. In view of the damage done by drought the people are being urged by the Government to harvest their crops as required by decree.

Turkey

It is reported that, making hay while the American sun shines, the Turks have voted an extraordinary defence credit of approximately £10 million sterling and have given contracts to two American firms to build new airfields at Angora and Adana and modernise the Yeşilköy airfield outside Istanbul, at a total cost of £1 million.

Turkish broadcasts on the European situation have been pointing a contrast between Soviet action and Anglo-American talk, while comparing the firmness of the United States with a hesitancy—attributed to weakness—on the part of Great Britain. The Soviet Government are seen to be aiming at the creation of a Balkan federation, including Roumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Albania and perhaps Transylvania and Macedonia. An immediate tactical aim of the Kremlin, it is plainly stated, is to undermine the Truman policy of aid for Greece and Turkey—described as the only obstacle to Soviet domination of Europe—by spreading the idea that the President's policy is responsible for increased international tension.

On 18th June, after a deputy had reported in most appreciative terms on the Turkish parliamentary visit to the United Kingdom, the Grand National Assembly approved with unanimous applause a proposal of the President that the House of Commons should be invited to send a delegation to Turkey.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The French Government has been kept fully informed of the intentions of His Majesty's Government with regard to the Fawziah, which is to land supplies in Tripoli (see last week's Summary). As notice of the visit was given in the customary form and with due previous warning (which was not the case when the vessel went to Tunis) no objection is being made to it. Although press references to the Fawziah's trip have been much moderated or have ceased altogether, the Cairo police received a warning on the 18th June from a so-called "Committee of Egyptian Nationalists" saying they had "declared war on all French interests" as a reprisal for the Fawziah incident.

Reports that the Egyptian note to the Security Council had been submitted were published in the Ahram and the Journal d'Egypte on the 18th June, but were promptly denied by the Prime Minister in the Sa'adist paper the Assas. Nokrashy is reported to have given no reply when questioned later by journalists about a statement of Mamduh Riaz that the Egyptian delegation would leave between the 25th and 27th June; the latest news is contained in press reports that the Cabinet approved the terms of the Egyptian appeal on the 22nd June.

Palestine

The Arab boycott of the Special Committee is being maintained, and is supported by the Arabic press who take the line that national discipline must be preserved and, accordingly, have sent no representatives to the Committee's meetings. The strike ordered by the Arab Higher Commitee for the 16th June took place without incident.

Mr. Shertok opened the Zionist case in open session on the 17th June by stressing that he proposed to give a factual introduction to the studies of the Committee from the point of view of the Jewish Agency, and that that could not be regarded as the opening of the Jewish Agency case. He did, however, refer to the restriction on Jewish purchase of land, and claimed that Jewish settlement had not resulted in Arabs becoming landless. He protested against the reversal of policy contained in the provisions of the 1939 White Paper, gave a short account of Jewish enterprise and spoke of the urge of immigrants towards the soil, complaining that "the Jews were almost completely disregarded in the Palestine Government's distribution of State lands for cultivation."

The Vaad Leumi have decided to identify their political claims with those of the Jewish Agency, but will send their own representatives to appear before the Committee.

Three Jews were sentenced to death on the 16th June for participation in the attack on Acre prison on the 4th May. Two others, found to be under 18 years of age, were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. The sentences have not yet been confirmed by the General Officer Commanding.

An appeal from the relatives of the three condemned to death was addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee, and resulted in a cable to the Secretary-General of the United Nations in which a majority of the Committee expressed concern at the "possible unfavourable repercussions" the execution might have on the Committee's task, and made a reference to the fact that the sentence was pronounced on the day of their arrival in Palestine.

The Palestine Government has not waited for any official transmission of this appeal, but, in a note addressed to the Committee, refers to the press reports of the Committee's action, and points out that, the sentences not having been confirmed, the matter is still sub judice, and, in these circumstances, it is necessary to avoid public comment. The reference to the date of the sentence, the note continues, presumably is not intended to suggest that the court pronounced sentence otherwise than in the ordinary course of business. "There would, of course, be no truth in any such suggestion."

The Arab League

Following a draft decided upon at the meeting of the Arab League Council on the 24th March (see Summary No. 387) a letter has been addressed on the subject of Palestine to His Majesty's Representatives in Baghdad and Amman. Shaikh Yusuf Yasin mentioned the document to Mr. Grafftey Smith in Jedda a month ago, but said that he preferred to communicate its contents unofficially since he did not know what the other Arab States were doing, and things had changed anyhow since the text was agreed.

The letter claims that the terms of the Mandate for Palestine were the same as those for other Arab countries separated from Turkey, but that His Majesty's Government violated them by the unwarranted pledge to the Jews and, further, seriously prejudiced the Arab inhabitants, both economically and administratively, by permitting "unlimited" immigration. His Majesty's Government are, accordingly, requested to put a stop to immigration, and to go to the United Nations on the basis of the termination of the Mandate and the declaration of Palestine's independence as an Arab State. Failure to accede to these requests, the letter says, will throw on His Majesty's Government the responsibility "for the present critical situation in Palestine and for whatever effects may ensue from it, either inside or outside Palestine."

Iraq

It is reported that the five opposition parties—Hizb al Istiqlal (Independence), Hizb al Watani al Demokrati (National Democrat Party), Hizb al Ittihad al Watani (National Union Party), Hizb ash Sha'ab (People's Party) and Hizb al Ahrar (Liberal Party)—held a secret meeting on the 8th June at which an oath was taken pledging concerted action against the Cabinet. However, the links which bind these parties together are extremely tenuous (see Summary No. 394) and, as is general with the minor political coalitions in Iraq, their weakness and lack of organisation are hidden beneath a façade of bombast and truculence. But while the achievements of the opposition parties have been negligible to date, and the prospect of their taking concerted action against the Government appears remote, they are already beginning to build up a dangerous spirit of unrest among the masses and to foster an unbalanced outlook among nationalist and, in the main, anxious to see the initation of the social reforms so badly needed in his country, the young Iraqi is easily convinced that no true progress will be possible whilst the present Government and the British deny him a hearing.

While criticism of the Turco-Iraqi Treaty (see last week's Summary) continues, the more moderate leftists are now prepared to accept it, provided that the status quo in the Sanjak of Alexandretta is not recognised; that Iraq will not support Turkey in any dispute she may have with another Arab country; that the Turks are not granted the same customs reduction and other preferences given to the Arab States, and that Turkey is not allowed to interfere in the cultural and educational affairs of Iraq. This attitude reflects the fact that enlightened opinion still considers Iraq's first loyalty to be toward the Arab League (perhaps, more accurately, the States which the League represents), and that non-Arab alliances are of secondary importance.

A petition requesting an amnesty for Rashid Ali and other Iraqis in exile with him has been addressed to the Regent. The signatories include many prominent Axis supporters, such as the ex-Mufti, Hassan al Banna (President of the Ikhwan al Muslimin) and Salih Harb Pasha (President of the Young Men's Muslim Association). This petition, the purpose of which was probably to embarrass Anglo-Iraqi relations, has aroused violent opposition in Iraq, where the memory of Rashid Ali's past misdeeds is still fresh.

Persia

The Cabinet resigned on the 19th June and Qawam as Sultaneh presented his new Cabinet to the Shah on the 21st June. It is composed as follows:—

Prime Minister and Minister of Defence: Qawam as Sultaneh.*
Foreign Minister: Anushirwan Sepahbodi.
Health: Dr. Iqbal.*
Communications: Farouhar.*
Finance: Hajir.*
Education: Dr. Issa Sadiq.
Labour and Propaganda: Salman Asadi.
Justice: Mustafa Adl.
Interior: General Aqevli.
Posts and Telegraphs: Seyyid Ali Nasr.
Agriculture: Ahmed Adl.
National Economy: Sadiqi.

Ministers without Portfolio—
Musavizadeh,*
Homayunjah,* and Ali Asghar Hikmat.

* Indicates a member of the last Cabinet.

The fall of the Cabinet is not surprising: it could hardly be expected to have withstood the full blast of public censure for much longer. It has, in fact, survived for exactly eight months, which exceeds the normal span of Persian Cabinets. Of the new Ministers, Sepahbodi has hitherto been the Ambassador in Paris, General Aqevli was head of the Gendarmerie in 1942 and Chief of the General Staff in Qawam's Cabinet of February, 1946, and Mustafa Adl and Dr. Sadiq have also held previous Cabinet appointments.

The Ministry of National Economy is an innovation. It has absorbed the former Ministry of Industry and Commerce and the Industrial Bank. Qawam's original proposal was that it should absorb the Ministry of Labour and Propaganda as well, but he has been persuaded against this step. The new Minister, Sadiqi, is an ex-Minister of Communications, and was deputy for Azerbaijan in the last Majlis. He has been returned in the recent elections as deputy for Tehran.

In an interview given to a representative of Le Monde, published in the Democrat-e-Iran of the 16th June, the Prime Minister stated that the only reason why the Majlis had not assembled was that elections were still in progress in Fars and Azerbaijan. By now, however, the voting is reported to be over in Fars, and only the final count awaited. When questioned about the Perso-Soviet Oil Concession Agreement, Qawam stated that he was under an obligation to present the bill to the Majlis, but that circumstances had changed since the original agreement was signed, and that it was not possible for him to impose a particular point of view on the deputies. He then envisaged modification of the Agreement by the two signatories, so that, when put forward, it would be acceptable to both the Majlis and the public. Finally he repudiated the rumour that other countries would be asked to participate in the agreement. This statement shews that he anticipates an unfavourable reception of the bill in the Majlis, but the Russians are unlikely to consent to serious modification of its clauses. Not even Qawam's skilful proscastination will be able to prevent the matter from coming to a head soon.

The latest reports from Kurdistan state that Mulla Mustafa has, as forecast in last week's Summary, escaped into Soviet territory. On about the 17th June, after brushes with the Persian troops sent against him, he swam across the Aras (Araxes) River to the north of Maku accompanied by about 650 followers and 6 'Iraqi officers. The Barzanis are reliably reported to have surrendered to a Russian frontier post and to have been removed in lorries. The Jelali Kurds did not apparently help them.

The Shah returned to Tehran on the 11th June, having completed an extensive tour of Azerbaijan and Gilan. At every town and village where he stopped he appears to have been received with great enthusiasm by all sections of the population. Cattle were slaughtered in his honour, and triumphal arches erected (Resht is reported to have put up no less than twenty-six). The approach to Tabriz from Maragheh was, according to the press, decorated with carpets to a distance of five miles. There has been some criticism of these extravagant demonstrations of loyalty in the Tehran newspapers, particularly the left-wing ones, which maintain that the money might have been better spent on improving social conditions. But the tour must have been well worth while. If the Shah implements the promises of improvements made on his visits to schools, hospitals and institutions, the carpets and triumphal arches will have paid a valuable divident. Even if no immediate improvements result—the most likely eventuality—the royal tour will have served to link the peoples of Azerbaijan and Gilan more closely to the Crown and to the rest of Persia, a consideration which, in view of the ever-present possibility of Soviet encroachment, is of the greatest importance for the security of the country.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

It is possible now to form a clearer picture of the new Cabinet. Besides the Premiership, the Social-Democrats hold the portfolios of Justice, Education, Agriculture & Forestry, Commerce and Industry. In addition Yonekubo, at present a Minister without Portfolio, is "tipped" as the Minister of Labour in the new Department which is to be formed, and the other Social Democrat, Nishio, is Secretary-General to the Cabinet. On their side the Democrats hold the portfolios of Foreign Affairs, Home, and Finance as well as Welfare and Transport while Saito, known as the principal adviser of his party, is one of the two Ministers without Portfolio. Under the old dispensation the Ministries held by the Democrats would have outranked those held by the Social-Democrats, but the Home Office has been shorn of much of its power, and the Foreign Office is at the moment little more than a liaison office. As against this the Social-Democrats hold the posts directly concerned both in the rehabilitation of the country and in the guidance of the coming generation. The People's Co-operatives hold Communications and have one Minister without Portfolio, while the one Independent, Wada, is in charge of the Economic Stabilisation Board.

Party strength in the new House of Representatives is given as follows:—

Social Democrats	... ...	144
Democrats	... ...	132
Liberals	... ...	129
People's Co-operatives	...	31
Independents	... ...	19
Japan Farmers	... ...	7
Communists	... ...	4
		466

It is to be noted that the Democrats are slightly stronger than the "Diehards"—the Liberals.

The Katayama Cabinet has now announced its policy. Since it is a coalition government, nothing startling was to be expected. Its plan to overcome the existing crisis is, briefly, to enforce existing controls "sincerely and boldly," to raise the official prices of certain commodities in order to combat the black market, to control the supply of raw materials to key industries and to introduce legislation for a somewhat nebulous form of "State control" of coal-mining.

It is recognized that not only public finance but also both industrial enterprises and private householders are insolvent, and an appeal is made to the people to strain every nerve to put the country on its feet again. Public opinion welcomes the Government's programme but seems slightly sceptical of their ability to carry it out.

The new Foreign Minister, Ashida, has stirred up a storm in a tea-cup by informing a foreign press conference that "for sentimental reasons" Japan desired the return of Okinawa (Loochoo Islands) and part of the Kuriles and other islands around Japan. The Cabinet's Secretary General Nishio was driven to state that Ashida was expressing his own personal views. The incident has the appearance of a ballon-d'essai.

The State Department informed His Majesty's Government on 9th June that they had decided to send a further Japanese whaling expedition to the Antarctic in the 1947/8 season.

In spite of having objections to Japanese whaling outside home waters, His Majesty's Government agreed to the dispatch of an expedition in the 1946/7 season, since the total catch of all whaling fleets is limited to a maximum quota by international agreement, and there were not to be sufficient fleets in the Antarctic in the 1946/7 season to deal with the full quota. Japanese activities would therefore be of assistance in attaining this quota.

The U.S. Government, however, undertook not to despatch any further expeditions without prior consultation with interested Governments, but their announcement of 9th June was made without previous warning to any of the Governments concerned.

His Majesty's Ambassador in Washington has been instructed to protest strongly against this action. No reply has yet been received to this protest, but it appears that the U.S. Government do not intend to alter their decision.

Japanese whaling activity in the coming season will do nothing to increase the world supply of whale oil, and will, in fact, decrease it, since there will be sufficient Allied fleets in the Antarctic to deal with the full permitted quota of whales, and any catch made by Japanese vessels would of necessity have to be deducted from the catch of Allied fleets. Furthermore, Japanese processing methods are much less efficient than Allied methods, and hence the amount of whale oil obtained from the total quota would be correspondingly less.

Korea

The Joint-Commission on the 12th June issued a communiqué on the method of consultation with Korean democratic parties and social organisations. It is provided that they shall submit their views regarding the provisional Government through their central organs only. Sub-commission No. 1 is being required to draw up a list of approved parties and organizations, and the Joint-Commission will convene joint meetings to which representatives of these parties and organisations will be invited—on the 25th June in Seoul for South Korea and on the 30th June in Pyongyang for North Korea. The same representatives will later be invited to individual oral consultation from the 5th July onward. Co-ordinated proposals will then be elaborated by sub-commissions for submission to the Joint-Commission which shall appoint a drafting committee to compile the final text of recommendations concerning the structure and principles of provisional Government and local authorities as well as the Government's political programme.

Foreign businessmen are to be admitted to South Korea as from the 15th July. Trade will continue for the time being under the existing export-import licensing system and certain exports will be disposed of through Government agencies.

Indonesia

Any hopes that the Indonesian reply to the Commission-General's Note might be accepted as a basis for renewed discussion were quickly dissipated. At meetings on the 14th and 15th June between the Commission-General and the representatives of the States of East Indonesia and West Borneo the latter expressed their disapproval of the Republican reply and begged the Commission-General to stand by their original proposals as the only means of preventing the Republicans from gaining complete control over the whole of Indonesia. As a result the Commission-General's attitude towards the situation in general was reported to have stiffened appreciably.

On learning from Dr. van Mook's Chief Secretary of the way the wind was blowing, H.M. Consul-General at Batavia stated his readiness to do his utmost to help in bringing about a compromise through direct negotiation, and his suggestion that he should take immediate steps to meet M. Sjarir informally again and apprise him of the seriousness of the situation was not opposed.

M. Sjarir responded promptly to the invitation and arrived at Batavia on the 18th June. The Commission-General made it clear, however, that, for their part, they were not prepared to talk matters over unless M. Sjarir made a definite statement of acceptance of their terms. This being so, M. Sjarir decided to make an effort to save the situation by taking the initiative into his own hands. Acting with great speed and courage—and without first seeking the approval of any of the other members of his Government—he broadcast a plea for an end to recrimination and mistrust. And he followed this act by forwarding to Professor Schermerhorn a copy of the full text of his broadcast under cover of a letter in the name of the Indonesian Delegation, laying stress on the following points:—

1. Agreement to the establishment of an Interim Government.
2. Agreement to the inclusion in the Interim Government of a representative of the Crown exercising de jure authority.
3. Early discussions concerning the form of the Interim Government, in which discussions representatives of East India and West Borneo to participate.
4. The Interim Government to establish the Federal Organisations referred to in the enclosures to the Commission-General's Note of 27th May; and the early establishment of a Federal Economic Organisation is regarded as particularly urgent.

The letter ended with an expression of hope that it might now be possible to attain that degree of mutual co-operation demanded by the Linggadjati Agreement and that the Dutch Delegation might take the necessary steps for the immediate initiation of discussions on the framework of the Interim Government, referred to in point 3.

While this was going on the Commission-General had drawn up and despatched to the Indonesian Delegation an answer to their counter-proposals. It took the form of a lengthy document—couched in a tone of remonstrance and consisting, for the main part, of a summary of their respective points of difference—which concluded by asserting that the Indonesian counter-proposals amounted to a refusal of the Commission's original Note; that their claims to the authority to be vested in the Republic went beyond the provisions of the Linggadjati Agreement; that their proposals rejected the basis of co-operation, which should be founded upon reciprocity; and, finally, that no guarantees were given either for the return of those who had been compelled to quit Republican territory, or for the safety of the large number of persons who had co-operated with the N.E.I. Government. The Commission-General thus consider that the Republican Note does not allow of further discussion; and, as provided in the final sentence of their Note of 27th May, they have referred the whole question of future procedure to the Netherlands Government.

This communication crossed M. Sjarir's letter amplifying his conciliatory broadcast; and in acknowledging the latter Professor Schermerhorn pointed this out and informed M. Sjarir that the Commission-General have noted the effort made to bridge the gulf created by the exchange of Notes; but he remarked that the importance of the issue renders it necessary that there should be no uncertainty as to how far the exact wording of his letter of 20th June represents an acceptance of the Commission-General's proposals of 27th May. Professor Schermerhorn then expressed satisfaction that the Commission's requirement concerning the position of the representative of the Crown in the Interim Government has been accepted. Acceptance of this point, however, he stated, does not alter the fact that in other respects M. Sjarir's proposals show no nearer approach to the Dutch requirements. And he went on to intimate that a different conclusion would only be possible if M. Sjarir's letter could be interpreted to mean that the Republican Government agree to the formation of all the Federal Organisations mentioned in the enclosures to the Commission's Note of 27th May, and if the Republican Government also fully accept the definitions and descriptions of those organisations. The letter ended by requiring an immediate reply on those points in order that a conclusion might be arrived at by the Netherlands Government, to which M. Sjarir's letter had been submitted.

Dr. van Mook called on M. Sjarir on 23rd June, and presented an aide-mémoire, adding that a reply must be delivered by 27th June at the latest. Dr. van Mook told M. Sjarir formally that the Republican Government's confirmation of his recent concessions must be obtained immediately. M. Sjarir said that he would proceed to Jogjakarta on 24th June and that he hoped to bring back a satisfactory reply by 26th June.

His Majesty's Government, although fully aware of the difficulties that would accompany the acceptance of a request to renew their efforts at mediation, have nevertheless made it clear that they are prepared to place their good offices at the disposal of both parties at any time, should it be thought that they would be likely to help either toward a solution of the problem, or in the prevention of the development of an irretrievable situation. Independently, the U.S. Government have made formal representations to both the Netherlands and the Indonesian Governments. And, in their Note to The Hague, they have pointed out that the use of force, even on a limited scale, would be viewed with disfavour.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Considerable interest has been shown in the United States in the Anglo-French conversations on the "Marshall plan" (as the essence of the Secretary of State's Harvard speech of the 5th June has come to be called). An official spokesman described the State Department on the 19th June as being "very pleased" with the way in which His Majesty's Government and the French Government had responded to Mr. Marshall's offer. Some newspapers, led by the New York Times, believe the Bevin-Bidault talks to indicate that Europe is at last beginning to shake off the "paralyzing fatalism" into which it had appeared to be drifting since the end of hostilities. At the same time they point out that the next step will depend largely upon how the Soviet Union avails itself of the Anglo-French invitation to join in the task of drawing up a reconstruction programme. It is too early at the time of writing to gauge the full reaction to M. Molotov's formal acceptance of this invitation. (The very fact, however, that the Soviet Minister has decided to reply in the affirmative for once will probably add to the confusion sown by Mr. Henry Wallace, whose recent public-speaking tour in criticism of current State Department policies is said to be causing some concern in orthodox Democratic quarters.)

The note of caution on the subject of economic foreign policy recently sounded by Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Hoover (see last week's Summary) has not passed unheeded, and a number of commentators are now at pains to emphasize that a careful evaluation of American resources and capacity to help must precede any more concrete offer of assistance to the needy countries. At his press conference on the 18th June Mr. William L. Clayton, the Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, conceded that Senator Vandenberg's idea of a bi-partisan advisory council to draw up a "total balance-sheet" was a very wise one and that Mr. Hoover had raised a pertinent question in suggesting that the United States was "over-exporting" its resources in attempting to meet foreign relief requirements by present methods.

Meanwhile the Administration has been taking steps to educate the country at large on the nature and purpose of its economic foreign policy. It is thus no coincidence that international problems have provided the main theme of the addresses delivered by State Department and other Government officials at the customary "commencement" or university graduation ceremonies this year. No less a person than the President himself chose the Princeton bicentennial celebrations on the 17th June to remind the American people that their economic resources alone were insufficient to safeguard their friends abroad against the "encroachment of totalitarian pressures" and that military strength would also be needed to maintain "world leadership." Mr. Truman therefore appealed to educational institutions everywhere to support his scheme for "universal military training" (which Congress, with characteristic lack of any sense of urgency, has so far merely expressed a willingness to consider in Committee).

Some influential Republicans have likewise taken advantage of current academic gatherings to draw the attention of thinking Americans to what Mr. Acheson lately referred to as "the facts of international life." Speaking at Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, on the 16th June, Mr. Harold Stassen said that "delays and evasions" might render American economic assistance to Europe too little and too late, and he urged that consideration be given at once to pressing problems like the British dollar shortage and the necessity of reviving the Ruhr industries. In a similar address to graduates of Northwestern University at Evanston, Illinois, on the 18th Mr. John Foster Dulles, the leading Republican expert on foreign affairs, called for "enlightened judgment" in carrying out the assistance programme abroad so that it would be left to others "freely to decide" whether or not they adopted the "particular economic system" favoured by the United States. He also advocated "moral resistance" to the attempts of the Soviet leaders to impose their will upon other nations which, it seemed to him, would never stop of their own accord.

The Republicans, it has been suggested, are likely to show less relish for the bi-partisan approach to foreign policy as a result of the President's veto of their two favourite domestic measures—the income tax reduction Bill (see last week's Summary) and the Taft–Hartley Labour Bill. The pace of party politics is in any case being quickened by the incipient jockeying on both sides for position in the 1948 election. The President's veto of the Taft–Hartley Labour Bill—the most-publicized event in home affairs this week—was overridden by the Senate on the 23rd June by 68 votes to 25. The Senate—like the House of Representatives, which three days previously had overridden the President by 331 votes to 83—was thus unmoved by the strongly-worded message which Mr. Truman had addressed to Congress in returning the Bill unsigned on the 20th. The efforts of a small group of liberal Senators led by Glen Taylor (Democrat, Idaho) and Wayne Morse (Republican, Oregon) to "filibuster" in order to give the President's arguments against the Bill time to be driven home to the public also proved unavailing. In his message Mr. Truman objected in true Jeffersonian fashion to the "clumsy, cumbersome Government intervention" in private economic affairs which the Bill would entail. He said that the measure contained the seeds of discord which would plague the American people for years to come and hinder the unity and productive strength which were essential to the country internationally.

As it now goes on to the statute book the Taft–Hartley Bill bans the "closed shop" and permits the Government to use court orders to stop strikes against the national interest and to postpone any strike by injunction for 80 days. It bans "sympathy" strikes and enables legal action to be taken against unions whose members break their contracts. The Bill also withholds bargaining rights from unions which employ Communists or Communist "sympathizers" as their officials and forbids trade union newspapers to support political candidates.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

On the 23rd June Mr. Marshall defended the plan for the standardisation of arms in the western Hemisphere before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. His principal line of argument was that co-operation with the Latin American countries had been made difficult because many of them had received equipment and training from Germany and other European countries, and that if the United States plan were not approved by Congress, Latin America would seek help elsewhere.

According to the United States Ambassador in Brazil, the Brazilian Government have agreed to the 1st August as the earliest possible date for the Rio de Janeiro Conference on hemisphere defence, but the State Department now desires a postponement until October.

Argentina

Preliminary results of the Argentine census taken in May give a population of over 16 millions; of these 3,371,000 live in the federal capital. No census had been taken since 1914, when the total population was less than 8 million, and the present count shows that the calculated population based on the 1914 figures was 2 million too low. This is in contrast to the 1940 census in Brazil, which showed that the real population fell considerably short of that estimated.

On the 17th June President Truman announced that Mr. James Bruce, a business man from Maryland, would succeed Mr. Messersmith as Ambassador in Buenos Aires.

Nicaragua

There have been no signs of any active intervention in favour of the deposed President Argüello. The recently declared Provisional President, Lacayo Sacasa, has now decreed the dissolution of Congress and convoked elections for the 10th August. The deputies then chosen will meet on the 29th August as a Constituent Assembly. Presumably General Somoza will not experience great difficulty in arranging the results. The device of a new Constitution would of course effectively settle any future question of the legality of President Argüello's removal.

Peru

The investigations following the murder of Sr. Graña (see Summary Nos. 376 and 393), while they have done little or nothing towards revealing the identity of the murderer, have produced a sub-plot, in which Sr. Manuel Seoane, the Vice-President of the Senate and, after Sr. Haya de la Torre, the most prominent of the Apristas, was involved. When the Aprista organ La Tribuna raised by public subscription the sum of nearly £2,500 as a reward for information leading to the arrest of the criminal, a certain Arrumátegui, an Aprista chauffeur, came forward with a story which implicated a chief of police under the Prado régime. This story failed to survive investigation, and Arrumátegui confessed that he had been primed by the editor of La Tribuna, Carnero Hoke, and by Seoane himself. Carnero was arrested, but subsequently released. While it is widely believed that Carnero's release was due to the Government's reluctance to raise new difficulties by proceeding logically to the arrest of Seoane, La Tribuna maintains that both Carnero and Seoane acted in good faith on Arrumátegui's information, and blames the Police Investigation department. This led the Ministry of the Interior to issue a statement to the effect that Carnero had been released because Arrumátegui had made a partial retraction which, it hinted, resulted from Aprista intimidation. It is suggested that the Government's hesitation in arresting Seoane is not due to fear of the Apristas, but to the belief that anything that could be construed as a martyrdom would revive Aprismo from its present decline.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Atomic Energy Commission

Since the Atomic Energy Commission resumed work last March, two aspects of the problem have been under consideration by the two main Committees. Committee 1 has been discusing the Russian amendments to the Commission's Report of last December. The first five of these amendments have now been considered; but the fundamental differences with the Russians remain.

Committee 2 has been reviewing the problem as a whole. It has the task of preparing a Second Report, called for by the Security Council's resolution of the 10th March, 1947. This Committee split up into a number of groups, each of them working under a Chairman on the understanding that the members would speak as individuals without committing their Governments. It follows, that is to say, the procedure adopted by the Scientific and Technical Committee.

Each group prepares a chapter for the Report. Four have already been completed—on Research and Development, Mining, Processing and Purification of Ores, Nuclear fuel, etc. The preamble and two papers remain outstanding in respect of the first half of the Committee's field of study. The second half can, at most, be treated in sketchy fashion before September when the Report may be the subject of debate by the Security Council.

There have been two important developments recently in the Atomic Energy Commission. The first is the clear statement of American views on the powers to be granted to the International Agency. These powers would include ownership of all source material once it has been removed from the ground, of all chemical plants and of some refineries, as well as ownership of the plant engaged in any of the more dangerous processes in the development of atomic energy. The Americans also propose a monopoly of research for the Agency whenever a dangerous quantity of the nuclear fuel is involved. The American contribution is thus in essence a re-statement of the proposals originally put forward by Mr. Baruch in June 1946. It represents an extension of what was contained in the Report of last December—which was agreed to at the time by the Americans. These American proposals go further than the views expressed hitherto by H.M. Government on this matter.

The second important development is the tabling of the Russian proposals for an International Commission established within the framework of the Security Council, its composition, rights, obligations, etc., being determined by a Special International Commission on Atomic Energy which would operate in accordance with the "Convention on the prohibition of Atomic Weapons." The basic principle is that the use of atomic energy may be controlled by granting the relevant Agency certain defined powers of inspection. The Commission, proposed by the Russians, is specifically linked with the other fundamental point in the Russian general scheme, namely, the need of agreeing upon a Convention for the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction—those weapons which M. Gromyko declared in a speech on the 20th May at the American-Russian Institute dinner, "are destined for the extermination, first of all, of peaceful populations."

The Russian proposals state for the first time in detail what powers of inspection they are prepared to agree to and what rights of access they will concede. There is still insistence, however, on the right of veto in respect of any sanctions which the Security Council may wish to apply to a breach of the Convention. Moreover, the Russians are still refusing to accept any form of international management by the proposed Agency in their own country. It is believed, for instance, that they are not willing to agree to air survey flights. Then any inspection such as they envisage would be periodical only, so that its purpose might well be frustrated by suitable window-dressing. Finally "international inspection," as they conceive it, would not mean, it seems, inspection in Russia by international inspectors. In his speech to the American-Russian Institute M. Gromyko, repeating previous declarations, made it clear that control was necessary in their view, only to guarantee the execution of the proposed Convention and that the inviolable rights of national sovereignty forbade all interference in countries producing atomic power for peaceful uses.

When the Working Committee met on the 12th June, some doubt was cast on Russia's motives by her delegate's insistence that Committee 2 should consider her "new" plan. To pass the Russian plan to Committee 2 would mean that work on the Second Report required for the Security Council by September might well be held up indefinitely by interminable debates on the differences between the views of the Soviet and Polish delegations, on the one hand, and those of the other ten members on the other. The U.S. delegate opposed reference of the matter to Committee 2, and the representative of the United Kingdom suggested that Committee 1 would find the Soviet document useful in its discussions on the Russian amendments to the First Report. No decision was taken. The debate continued on the 17th and, as a result of a ruling by the Australian Chairman, Committee 1 resolved to resume its study of the Russian amendments, adding items from the new Russian proposals as they became relevant. In this way M. Gromyko was enabled, on the 19th June, to repeat his views on the inviolability of the unanimity rule. He argued once again also that the Agency should confine its research work to the peaceful side of atomic energy since the reason for its existence was to ban the production of atomic weapons of war; and he pleaded once more for unfettered research by all countries that signed his "Convention."

Further episodes of the Berlin crisis must be put on record, but no progress can be reported. In previous Summaries was recorded the Allied decision that the Kommandatura must approve unanimously the appointment of a new lord mayor before he took office. He was to replace Dr. Ostrowski, who had been forced to resign by his own Social Democratic Party. It was known officially that Ernst Reuter, the SPD's most likely candidate, would not be tolerated by the Russians, presumably because of his anti-Communist and anti-Russian feelings, and that therefore he could not take office. Yet on the 24th June Reuter was elected Lord Mayor by the votes of all groups in the Berlin Assembly except the Socialist Unity Party. This is a remarkably united challenge to the Kommandatura which involves far wider issues than those of the personality of Reuter. His supporters contend that the Allied decision on the veto is contrary both to the terms of the Berlin constitution and to the previous practice of the Kommandatura, and they feel that they are defending the rule of law against arbitrary government. The President of the Assembly, Dr. Suhr, in announcing the Allied decision on the 11th June, criticised it in no uncertain terms. He proposed that the order should be debated at the next meeting. This was done—despite objections by the French and Russians, who attempted to gain support from the other members of the Kommandatura for an immediate reprimand of Dr. Suhr. After the actual election the Kommandatura met on the 27th June and, for lack of agreement, referred the matter to the Co-ordinating Committee at the insistence of the British representative. This seems to be the only means of protest available to the British member, and there is every likelihood that he will eventually have to agree—as the French and U.S. members are already prepared to do—that Reuter cannot take office. Meanwhile Frau Luise Schröder continues as acting Lord Mayor, an unenviable post which she may hold for a long time and which she seems to be handling with tact.

A new, if not unexpected, complication over Four-Power Government in the city has arisen. The Russians have protested to the Kommandatura that Great Britain and the United States are trying to include their Sectors of Berlin in the bi-zonal area. This matter has also been referred to the Co-ordinating Committee. The Russians object to small liaison groups which are maintained simply and solely in order that Berlin economic needs shall be known to the Western Zones. Berlin has no vote in the Bi-zonal Council or Committee. Before this protest disquiet had frequently been expressed in the Berlin press about Russian attempts to draw their Sector away from Four-Power Government. In particular papers have commented on the large-scale expropriation of private firms now administered by the "Deutsche Treuhandstelle." This is stated by SED supporters to be only a provisional body, but the fact remains that it has no connection with the Kommandatura or the City Government.

The Bi-zonal Economic Council held its first meeting in Frankfurt on the 25th June. Earlier in the week the members of the council had been elected by the Laender. They number 31 from the British Zone and 23 from the U.S. Zone. Although North Rhine/Westphalia has complained that the British Zone is insufficiently represented, the general focus of interest appears to have been along party rather than regional lines. This may have the disadvantage of bringing too many party conflicts into economic affairs, but it would have been naïve to expect anything else in Germany, and it should have the advantage of counteracting the pull of regional economic interests without destroying federal rights. The CDU has 21 members, SPD 20, Liberals of varying titles 5, Communists 3, Centrists 2, Lower-Saxon Party 2, Economic Reconstruction Party 1. The less "progressive" elements—Christian Democrats, Liberals and Lower-Saxons—have a slight majority. In marked contrast the Executive Committee, consisting of one representative from each zone, has six Social Democrats and only two Christian Democrats. The Committee can suggest legislation but has less power than the law-giving Economic Council. The relation of the Committee's members to the Laender who appointed them was defined by a U.S. Military Government Officer recently. He said that they should observe the rights of their Laender but should not take orders from them. The Economic Council has already sub-divided itself into a number of specialist committees and "A committee of elders." Speakers at the opening meeting all tended to follow similar lines—welcoming the chance for the Germans to better themselves, but demanding also the return of prisoners-of-war, the cessation of dismantling, and a higher level of production and exports, coupled with lower taxes. The Communist Party played its Janus rôle to perfection. After its previous hostile comments on the bi-zonal organisation its spokesman announced that it was prepared to co-operate actively in the bi-zonal council. He warned the other members, however, of the futility of being ruled by two occupying Powers who, he alleged, often failed to see eye to eye on policy.

U.N.R.R.A. ended its work in Germany on the 30th June. The care of refugees and displaced persons in the British Zone will now be undertaken by the Control Commission. An agreement signed on the 28th June with the Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organisation provides that the Control Commission will act as agents of I.R.O. who will send a director and staff to supervise the work. A similar arrangement will probably be reached in the U.S. Zone, but the United States bill approving participation in I.R.O. was signed only on the 1st July. General McNarny stated at the end of May, according to the press, that U.S. Military Government would take over if I.R.O. was not established promptly. According to a U.S. intelligence survey for the beginning of June ill-feeling between Germans and displaced persons in the U.S. Zone has increased as the result of uncertainty about the latter's future and German fears that they might become a permanent drag on the country's economy. The Jews are the chief target of animosity and anti-Semitic feeling is stated to be considerable throughout the Zone. Conversely, His Majesty's Government have had to complain about anti-British demonstrations by Jews in the camps of the Zone. By the end of May 13,000 displaced persons had been recruited from the British Zone for work in the United Kingdom. More Polish nationals have been repatriated after the end of the cold weather, but Germans have continued to arrive from Poland. Since the beginning of the year over 35,000 illegal immigrants have been received in the British Zone and, with the 100,000 refugees which His Majesty's Government have agreed to accept from the United States Zone, the Zone had, by the end of May, its full quota of 1½ million Germans from the East.

A discreditable episode in Bavarian history has culminated in the dismissal on the 24th June of Alfred Loritz, Minister in charge of denazification. This follows an attempt by some members of the Economic Reconstruction Party to oust him from leadership. The attempt does not mean any change for the better in the party, which has been described as a "body of middle-class sharks," but it gave an opportunity for the Assembly to vote for Herr Loritz's removal. As Minister he seemed to have no policy except that dictated by personal ambition. He constantly acted against Military Government principles and on the one hand, ordered a greatly extended amnesty for small nazis while on the other hand he instituted in internment camps a form of Security Police (closely reminiscent of the Gestapo), which was immediately dissolved by Military Government. When he received his dismissal Loritz told the Premier of Bavaria "You have thrown down the gauntlet. I accept the challenge and declare bitter war on the Government." He then delivered personal attacks on a number of ministers and walked out of the Chamber after being described by a deputy as "a second Adolf Hitler."

Those Communes of Saarburg which had been returned to Rhineland–Palatinate on the 6th June have organized a referendum, on their own initiative. It has apparently resulted in an overwhelming majority in favour of remaining in the Saar. This is unlikely to affect French policy since the Government knows that His Majesty's Government would not approve of a re-enlargement of the area. Nevertheless, it is rather surprising that French Military Government should have permitted a referendum when they have always refrained from suggesting one in the Saar itself, presumably for fear of stirring up disagreement. The Saarburgers were doubtless prompted mainly by material reasons, and must be feeling acutely the reduction in rations resulting from their return to Germany. The French Government have sought to cleanse the Saar area by expelling some 300 families who have been convicted as active Nazis. A number of Communist leaders have also been expelled, but the party persists in its opposition to French policy. Communists are represented on the new Constitution Committee for the Saar which has been appointed to draft a constitution by the autumn and their first step in the Committee has been to demand a referendum on the future of the Saar. In the rest of the French zone two new Military Government ordinances were issued during June which define the power of Military Government. They ensure inter alia that in denazification, demilitarisation, education and anti-combine measures the German Government shall submit draft bills to Military Government before they are even presented to the assemblies for discussion. Military Government retains legislative control over a wide range of economic subjects which they consider require co-ordination between the Laender. The ordinances possibly give the Germans more power than in the British zone over demilitarisation, but certainly much less in the economic field, and they prevent any zonal legislation by the Germans themselves. In general the German attitude towards the Occupying Power is reported to be very bitter. In particular the population looks with suspicion on political leaders who co-operate with the French authorities and frequent complaints are still made of inequalities in the purge system and of the exacting economic demands of Military Government. These overshadow the seemingly more favourable aspects of French policy in such matters as education and decartelisation.

AUSTRIA

Hard on the news that the United States forces of occupation in Austria were to pay for their own costs of occupation from the 1st July, 1947 (see last week's Summary), came the announcement, on the 25th June, of the signing in Vienna of a United States relief agreement for Austria within the framework of the 350 million dollar post-U.N.R.R.A. General Relief Bill for Europe. The Austrian press has estimated that the sum to be allocated to Austria will be in the region of 85 million dollars, i.e., nearly one-quarter of the total aid for Europe. Goods to be supplied under this agreement will be limited to such necessities as food, medicaments, clothing material, fertilisers, pest destroyers and seeds; distribution, sale and use will be supervised by a United States mission in Austria in order to ensure that all sections of the population receive a fair share. A condition of the agreement is that these goods shall not be used unduly for the maintenance of the (future) Austrian armed forces or in any way for the forces of occupation. No doubt, anticipating suspicion of United States motives from the extreme Left, General Keyes has emphasised that the goods supplied under the agreement will be a gift made in part-fulfilment of the United States Government's commitment under the Moscow Declaration to restore Austria's independence and economic viability. Communist sensitiveness in regard to any step savouring in their eyes of "dollar diplomacy" is, of course, well known. The British-controlled Weltpresse has pointed out that both Great Britain and the United States have long been resolved to help Austria in the post-U.N.R.R.A. period and that the British grant of £10 million in 1946 serves the same purpose as the present United States grant. The bulk of the British grant is to be expended on coal, food, agriculture and the wool industry. In view of the new United States relief appropriation, His Majesty's Government have decided not to approve further dollar expenditure from United Kingdom grants and credits for Austria.

It is now learned that the United States gesture in renouncing occupation costs is also to be retrospective: the official Wiener Zeitung announced on the 28th June that a second agreement had been signed on the 21st June whereby the United States Government undertook to pay the Austrian Government 308,382,590 Schillings (some £7,709,500) in full and final settlement of all obligations incurred by the United States forces and officials in Austria since the start of the occupation. According to Reuter the French occupation authorities in Austria have conceded that, in order to lessen the burden on Austria, visiting French civilians not attached to the army of occupation are now to draw Austrian rations and find private accommodation.

The Austrian Treaty Commission has been discussing the oil problem in closed sessions. Nothing conclusive has yet emerged. An interesting development of the decision of the United Kingdom and United States representatives to leave the technical and factual aspects of the Commission's discussions mainly to their experts, is that the Commission is in this respect gradually assuming the work and character of the Committee of Experts. This may well mean that the United Kingdom Government is on the way to thwarting persistent Soviet opposition to the idea that investigation of "facts" should precede a large-scale discussion of principles in the Commission.

No doubt as a counter-blast to the Russian claims to German assets now being investigated, and to Communist propaganda assertions that the Russian-controlled firms are working almost exclusively for the benefit of the Austrian economy, bold criticism of Soviet mismanagement of Austria's oil resources—and the illegal appropriation by the Russians of Austrian products manufactured in the confiscated enterprises—has recently appeared in the non-Communist Austrian press. Soviet efforts to establish legal title to certain confiscated landed properties were rejected by the British member at the Allied Council's meeting on the 27th June, on the ground that the whole problem was now under discussion. The Russians have not acquired a title under Austrian law to any of the property they have seized in Eastern Austria and no legal transfer of title may be made without the written consent of the Allied Council.

Publicity has recently been given in the Austrian radio and press to cases of kidnapping both in Vienna and on the Soviet/United States zone border. Reports indicate that the victims were mainly Displaced Persons belonging to countries in the Soviet orbit and that their assailants used Russian uniforms and cars. These incidents, together with reports of terroristic "White Guard" activity on the Yugoslav-Carinthian border, have led to renewed Austrian appeals for the more adequate arming of the police and gendarmerie and also for permission for Austrian courts to take action against "any street robber, whoever he may be." The "White Guards" are an organisation of Slovene Displaced Persons who have escaped from internment camps; they are reported to be both anti-Tito and anti-Austrian and to support ex-King Peter of Yugoslavia.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Official reaction towards the American offer of economic aid to Europe has been surprisingly scanty, even a little distrustful; it was not, in fact, until the Soviet Government agreed to attend the Paris discussions that any spontaneous, if cautious, comment resulted.

First to proffer an opinion was Dr. Zenkl, Czech Socialist Vice-Premier, who confined himself, however, to remarking that the negotiations denoted another milestone on the road to international co-operation. At the same time he emphasised that his Party, whilst seeking friendship with the West, would permit no one to disturb Czechoslovakia's "splendid relations" Soviet Russia. Shortly afterwards it was reported that the Government, after hearing a statement on the Marshall Plan by Dr. Clementis, Communist Deputy Foreign Minister, had decided to appoint a Commission to examine further procedure on that score. Finally, M. Masaryk, Czech Foreign Minister, welcoming the scheme in a United Nations' anniversary speech, said that it must include "the whole of Europe" since Czechoslovakia could not tolerate any plan which might divide Europe into "Left and Right." His faith lay rather in the efficacy of the United Nations' Organisation. No other Party spokesman appears to have made any declaration on the offer.

The Czechoslovak attitude, predetermined by the conflict of political and historico-cultural considerations, reflects the wariness with which the Government approaches relations between the Big Powers. The safest course is thus the attempt to appease two conflicting ideologies by proving that a synthesis is possible and by persuading the West, particularly America, that Czechoslovakia is still accessible to Western influences. It is this "two-way" outlook which prompted Dr. Zenkl, despite his protestation of loyalty to Russia, to condemn rumours of "mysterious pressure" and political conditions, which, the Communists allege, attach to the loan still being sought from America. These rumours Dr. Zenkl stigmatised as "insults to our American friends." The Czechs would naturally prefer to maintain their independence—a wish that presupposes, however, a sympathetic attitude on the part of the Western Powers. Not even the Czech Communists are anxious wholly to submerge their country's national sovereignty in the interests of regional Communism; at a recent press interview the Communist Premier, M. Gottwald, stated that Czechoslovakia did not feel the need of either a "European" or a "Slavonic federation" which would limit their independence.

With the exception of certain minor details and the crucial question of Czech-Slovak relations, the Constituent Sub-Committee have approved the draft of the new Constitution. The promulgation of the Constitution, it may be recalled, is the principal task of the present administration. M. Gottwald, when asked his opinion on whether they could complete their programme at an early date, replied that he saw no reason why the several Parties, each with its own programme but adhering to the principle of National Front co-operation, should not contest new elections next May. He stressed the necessity for continuing the work of the present Government—meaning that the newly elected Government must draft a second economic Plan. Commenting on current conditions the Premier pointed out that Slovakia must be cleansed of all Fascist elements: subversive remnants, however, he said, were not confined to Slovakia; they existed also in the Czech Lands where the "grande bourgeoisie" and landed magnates, whose power had been broken by nationalisation and Land Reform, still tried to sabotage the Government. This last criticism as intended as a defence of the Communist Minister of Agriculture, D. Duriš, who, since the beginning of the year, has been subjected to continuous Opposition attacks on the count of unconstitutional procedure—his position is regarded as critical now that his claim for special powers has been rejected by the Parliamentary Legal Committee. The Communist-controlled Ministry of Interior is also under bombardment by Popular and Czech-Socialist Deputies for the illegal provision of arms to the civil population, principally the Works Militias.

Cultural Agreements have been signed with Norway and Bulgaria. Czechoslovakia has entered into a Trade Agreement with South Africa.

POLAND

M. Cyrankiewicz, the Prime Minister, opened the session of the Polish Sejm with a detailed statement of Government policy, and claimed success in improving international relations, in steadying the internal situation, and in the great work of developing the Regained Territories.

After the usual tribute to the Soviet Ally M. Cyrankiewicz first stressed the importance of the Polish-Czech Pact and the impending economic agreement derived from it, and of similar agreements with Yugoslavia, as also in matters of trade, with Bulgaria and Sweden. Like Czechoslovakia Poland expects soon to resume normal diplomatic relations with Hungary.

With regard to the Western Powers, the Prime Minister expressed his Government's satisfaction at the new understanding reached with Great Britain. This, he hoped, would lead to a solution of the fundamental problems of Germany and the Polish Western Frontier, as well as of questions relating to the demobilisation of the Polish Forces, the restoration of Polish property, the repatriation of Germans to the British Zone of Germany and of Polish emigrants in Westphalia back to the homeland. No efforts would be spared, he added, in improving relations with the United States, and further discussions would take place on the Franco-Polish alliance. His Government were, however, disquieted by certain developments in Germany, such as the unification of zones, the rebirth of German chauvinism, and the unsatisfactory progress in denazification and demobilisation.

In his reference to internal affairs M. Cyrankiewicz paid tribute to the invaluable assistance given to Poland during the period of recovery by the Soviet Union and by U.N.R.R.A. The cereal shortage, he said, had been eased by the extension of U.N.R.R.A. activities to the end of June, 1947, by the granting of additional U.N.R.R.A. credits to the value of 11 million dollars, and by the recognition on the part of the International Food Council of Poland's need for 550,000 tons of grain.

The subsequent debate was comprised mainly of words of approval by the various bloc parties, although the pro-Government Catholic group registered a token protest —a reduction in the education grant of 1 zl.—against the secularisation of schools. M. Mikolajczyk praised the solid achievements of the Government, but soon ran into stormy weather by opposing—no doubt with real conviction—the budget of the Ministry of Security, and appears to have incurred the wrath of the Minister by some of his criticisms. The Polish radio reports on the proceedings in the Sejm, at no time, of course, favourable to M. Mikolajczyk, present a somewhat garbled account of the exchange between him and General Paszkiewicz. The General, one of the London Poles who returned to Warsaw, and is a member of the pro-Government Peasant Party, stated that General Sikorski's death in an air crash during the war had not been accidental, and implied that M. Mikolajczyk, who became Prime Minister, had not been energetic enough in protesting about the purge of elements opposed to Anders among the higher ranks of the Army. M. Mikolajczyk asked the General to withdraw his statements, but Paszkiewicz, in defence of his statement, asked for the Polish Peasant Party's leader to be brought before the tribunal of the Sejm. This is a constitutional procedure which could cost M. Mikolajczyk his seat. Recently the military press has stepped up its campaign against Anders, and any opposition to the present régime is being conveniently daubed with the same colours.

The visit of Cardinal Griffin to Poland was surrounded by an atmosphere of warm friendliness and sincere devotion. His fortnight's tour of Catholic centres all over the country, made in company with the Polish Primate, Cardinal Hlond, was an unparalleled success. The Cardinal was met by Catholics everywhere with extraordinary enthusiasm, and the visit was taken as a sign of solidarity between the people of England and the Polish population which is striving to preserve national as well as religious liberty. The deeply-rooted Catholic character of Poland has indeed obliged the Communists to proceed less openly in their campaign to extend their hold upon the broad masses.

SOVIET UNION

While the Soviet press had shown reserve in commenting on the Marshall plan before the Russian acceptance of the invitation to the Conference, the increasingly adverse tone adopted in the days intervening between that acceptance and M. Molotov's actual arrival in Paris on the 26th June prepared the ground for the involved but clearly unfriendly Tass statement of the 29th June setting forth Moscow's view of what should be done. Pravda of the 25th June set the tone by bringing up the charge that the Marshall plan, if plan indeed there was, had been necessitated by America's deteriorating economic situation and consequent search for markets; the main sting of the article was, however, in the tail—where the view was put forward that the plan was linked with Mr. Churchill's proposed United States of Europe and the Western European Customs Union advocated by The Economist. Such a tendency, according to Pravda, clearly aimed at substituting for the important business of European reconstruction "all kinds of adventures directed towards setting the West against the East."

The Tass statement clouded the Soviet point of view in a considerable amount of verbiage. What emerged was the assertion that the proposal for an all-embracing economic programme for Europe was not acceptable to the U.S.S.R., which regarded it as tantamount to interference in each country's internal affairs. In the Soviet view each country should prepare its own estimates of its need for American aid, and then submit them to a joint examination. This examination should not, however, be conducted by Great Britain, France and the U.S.S.R. alone, but by other European countries, in particular those which had suffered under German occupation. The former enemy countries would be consulted, but Germany must be left out as the Council of Foreign Ministers had not yet agreed on the German problem.

While fulminating against the Western bloc, the U.S.S.R. seems eager to consolidate its position in its own bloc with all possible speed. Communist sources in the Balkans are talking of a Balkan security union under Soviet auspices, which may be achieved in stages by cultural, economic, ecclesiastical and finally political agreements. The recent Rumano-Yugoslav cultural agreement (see under "Roumania") fits into this scheme, as does the similar Bulgaro-Czechoslovak agreement. The All-Slav movement is showing increasing activity and endeavouring to extend its sphere beyond the field of Slavdom proper. The plenary session of the All-Slav Committee in Warsaw was concluded on the 21st June, Medvedev, one of the Soviet delegates, described as a "social worker," being elected secretary general of the Committee. The next All-Slav Congress is to be held in Prague in 1948; meanwhile a Congress of Slav scientists is announced for this year. This co-operation between Slav scientists is a new feature, which is being developed by the Scientific section of the U.S.S.R. Slav Committee recently formed in Moscow, with Professor Sidorov as chairman. Professor Belic of the Serb University, who has just been made the first honorary professor of Moscow University, pleaded in a speech at Warsaw, for "common agreed programmes" in all the universities of Slav countries, while the Soviet Professor Vosnesensky urged that "Slav studies" should be interpreted in a wider sense than heretofore and that professors of history and economics from non-Slav as well as Slav countries should be invited to the 1948 Congress. In the President's speech at Warsaw it was stated that there were some 360 Slav organisations in non-Slav countries including the U.S.A., Latin America and Australia. The American branch is bringing out a new magazine Slavyansky Amerikanets, and the Palestine branch has been particularly active of late. The appeal to the intellectuals of the world put out at the close of the Warsaw meeting ran on the stereotyped lines of attacking imperialist warmongers and ended :—"long live the friendship of all freedom-loving peoples which stands guard over democratic peoples and their national independence." The Slav movement has lost the services of Academician Vladimir Picheta, Soviet expert on the history of the Slavs, who died on the 24th June.

Moscow has met with some setbacks in its plan for using the Orthodox Church as a weapon in Balkan consolidation schemes. The Synod of the Greek Patriarchate in Jerusalem has passed a resolution declining Patriarch Alexei's invitation to the Pan Orthodox Congress to be held in Moscow this year, and it is believed that Patriarch Nikodem of Roumania would refuse if he could; he has not yet accepted the invitation to Moscow and has suggested that the Congress should be held on Mount Athos instead.

The Greek Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow has emphatically denied the existence of a large-scale evacuation plan for Greeks in the U.S.S.R. (see Summary No. 397). Only about fifty individuals a month are expected to be travelling back to Greece.

Greece has come in for especial condemnation for its suppression of EPON, the local left-wing Youth organisation, at the fourth session of the Executive Committee of the World Federation of Democratic Youth which has been meeting in Moscow and has just concluded its labours. The Council of the Federation is to meet in Prague in August. The speeches in Moscow were along familiar lines; while imperialism was condemned in the usual terms, lip-service was paid to U.N.O. Indonesia is to be admitted as a member of the Federation, and it was announced that an Asiatic Youth Conference would be held there in November. Other new members of the Federation, which is said to count 45,000,000 adherents, are the Youth Organisations of North Korea, the Dominican Republic, Colombia, Catalonia, Austria, Chile and Trieste.

Reports continue to come in of the activities of armed bands of Ukrainian guerillas in the Western Ukraine and South-eastern Poland, mainly organised in the now well-known U.P.A. (Ukrainian Insurgent Army). Seventeen members were recently sentenced to death by a Polish court at Rzeszow for aiming at tearing away from Poland part of the Southern Polish territories. Tass has given publicity to these reports, stating that 406 bandits, including chieftains, had been killed in the last six weeks. There are reports that the different Ukrainian nationalist organisations are seeking to co-ordinate their activities and that Paris is the centre of their contacts. According to a Tass message from Rome Mr. McNeil's statement that the 8,000 Ukrainians of the former Galician S.S.

division who had arrived in the United Kingdom had been screened with the assistance of a Soviet Committee was "intended to misinform public opinion" as no Soviet representatives had taken part. The statement added that the men of this division had been noted for their savagery. In point of fact a Soviet military mission headed by Major-General Busilev flew to A.F.H.Q. in August 1945 for the express purpose of repatriating these Ukrainians to the U.S.S.R. But most of the men came from the territories annexed by the U.S.S.R. since the 1st September, 1939, and refused General Busilev's request that they should return to their homes.

The new Australian Minister to the U.S.S.R., Mr. Watt, arrived in Moscow on the 19th June. The Ethiopian Minister, M. Lorenzo Taseas, died in Stockholm on his way. M. Samuilovsky, at present head of the Near Eastern Department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, has been appointed Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. to Afghanistan in place of M. Bakulin, who had held this post since 1943.

When in March this year M. L. M. Kaganovich was transferred to important Party work in the Ukraine, he relinquished his post of deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. and that of Minister of Building Materials. The latter post had been filled by the appointment of M. S. Z. Ginsburg, the former Minister for Construction of Military and Naval Enterprises. The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. announced on the 28th June that M. N. A. Digay had been appointed Minister for Construction of Military and Naval Enterprises. He is an old associate of M. Ginsburg and had worked under him as chief of the Building Administration for the Tank Industry.

M. Dekanozov was relieved of his post of Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs by a resolution dated the 19th March but not published until May. No reason was given for his removal. M. Bogomolov, Soviet Ambassador in Paris, was appointed a Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs in January, but he is to remain at Paris.

The Supreme Soviet of the R.S.F.S.R. heard last week a report from M. Safronov, on the execution of the 1946 Budget and the provisions of the 1947 Budget. The Finance Minister was followed by delegates from the various Republics and Autonomous Regions of the R.S.F.S.R., who expressed their approval of the Government's financial proposals and outlined the economic and cultural progress and plans of their own areas. M. Safronov closed the three-day debate, which was said to have been conducted in an atmosphere of "exceptional unanimity," by announcing that the Council of Ministers had examined the proposals of delegates and decided to make very small additional allocations to these regions. The R.S.F.S.R. is budgeting for an income of 46,137,710,000 roubles and expenditure of 46,105,002,000 roubles. According to M. Safronov the Federation Budget's resources have increased by 10,900,000,000 roubles as compared with last year. 90 per cent. of the Federation's expenditure in 1947 is earmarked for the rehabilitation and development of the national economy and the satisfaction of the social and cultural requirements of the population. One-quarter of the total expenditure is allotted to State Health services and the training of medical personnel. Dorothy Weston, broadcasting in English from Moscow, emphasised that in the R.S.F.S.R. appropriations for Government administration "hardly exceed 10 per cent." of the Federation's expenditure but obviously a considerable proportion of the allocations to industry and agriculture and cultural work goes to pay for the maintenance of administrative staffs.

SCANDINAVIA

Finland

At the end of May the Diet received a request for the arrest of one of its members, M. Kivelä of the Conservative Party, the allegation being that he was involved in the so-called Arms Dumps affair. The Speakers' Council recommended that M. Kivelä be deprived of his parliamentary immunity, but M. E. von Born, of the Swedish People's Party moved that the matter be referred to the Constitutional Law Committee for consideration. On the 13th June the Diet concurred by 78 votes to 51 in the Committee's decision for the rejection of the demand on the ground that the request had been made by the Public Prosecutor and not by the Court trying those implicated in the affair. Though the decision of the Diet is strictly in accordance with the law, the fact that M. Kivelä during the war served as an officer with the branch of the General Staff responsible for planning the secret stores of arms naturally tends to reinforce the suspicions against him. On the other hand it may be questioned if it is not M. Kivelä's membership of the Conservative party—rather than his war service—which has attracted the attention of the "conscientious" Prosecutor, M. Nikupaavola.

Another indication that the Communists may have opened what might be termed a general offensive against the Conservative Party was given a few weeks ago when the State Police announced the arrest of a number of youths accused of illegal activities directed against the Soviet Union and Finnish left-wing circles. The accused, who are alleged to be members of the Conservative Party Youth Organisation, are said to have stolen materials from a Helsinki printing office for their own illegal pamphlets and to have procured firearms. Little, however, is as yet known about this case, as the charges are being heard in camera, on account of the fact that some of the accused are minors.

Disquiet has manifested itself in the Aaland Islands over the tardy fulfilment of the President's promise of greater autonomy. During a recent visit the Speaker of the Diet, M. Fagerholm, attempted to allay these fears by stating that the delay was only due to the large volume of work confronting the Diet in Helsinki. There are, however, excellent grounds for thinking that the Soviet Union would look with displeasure upon any measure calculated to weaken the authority of the Finnish Government over the Islands, and this, no doubt, will weigh heavily when the matter is considered.

Sweden

A report by the International Committee for the Study of European Problems, issued a fortnight ago, has attracted considerable attention and has been freely commented upon in the press. It alleges the existence in Sweden of underground organisations formed by German-born Swedish industrialists for the purpose of assisting Nazi refugees to escape to Portugal and South America. The authorities, however, have labelled the report as vastly exaggerated and have denied the existence of any such organisations. It is admitted that Germans have been helped to escape by individual Swedes, and a number of persons have recently been arrested in connexion with passport forgeries. These activities, nevertheless, it is emphasised are on a very small scale. The matter has also been discussed in the Riksdag, and the Minister of Justice was asked if the Government contemplated taking steps in order to curb the propaganda activities of a certain notorious anti-semite by the name of Aaberg which, if allowed to continue, would gravely harm Sweden's reputation abroad.

On the 18th June M. Undén, the Foreign Minister, replied to a question concerning the killing by a Russian sentry of a Swedish Red Cross worker near the frontier between Austria and Czechoslovakia. The Government, M. Undén said, was awaiting a full report of the facts by the Legation in Vienna and would after considering this decide whether further action should be taken. The shooting, it seems, took place at the extremely short range of only 50 metres, and as the car in which the victim was killed was reversing at the time of the incident, and, therefore, could not have been travelling very fast, the action of the Soviet soldier appears indefensible. Certain sections of the Swedish press are already urging that Swedish relief work in future be confined to areas where incidents of this kind need not be expected.

FRANCE

The meeting of the three Foreign Ministers in Paris is being followed with close attention by French public opinion. It is hoped that the present discussion will bring delivery from the economic straits to which France has been reduced. The tone of Communist comment became more restrained once it was known that M. Molotov was coming to Paris, and M. Thorez was forced to issue a correction to the press version of the speech that he had made at the Communist Congress. He denied that he had called the Marshall plan "a western trap"; it had grave disadvantages and was regarded by some reactionaries as a weapon to be used against the Soviet Union, but the presence of M. Molotov would serve to clear the atmosphere. Now, however, that the divergence between the views of M. Molotov and those of Mr. Bevin and M. Bidault has been made plain, Communist criticism may be expected to regain its original violence.

M. Ramadier has profited by the Foreign Ministers' meeting to impress upon his colleagues the desirability of avoiding a Government crisis. The Cabinet sat in almost permanent session over the weekend in an attempt to agree on a comprehensive economic policy which could be submitted to the Assembly. The passing of the Government's financial proposals (see last week's Summary) was followed by a debate on the 25th June when a Socialist trade unionist, M. Gazier, questioned the Government on their general economic policy and asked them to tighten up controls, particularly on foodstuffs. His resolution, which was put forward by the Socialist parliamentary group as a sop to the left wing of their party, aroused the resentment of the Radicals who openly accused the Socialists of trying to engineer the fall of the Government. However, the rest of the debate was postponed and the Government decided to ask the Assembly for a vote of confidence in its economic policy on the 2nd July. If M. Ramadier obtains this vote, as he is expected to do, he will be in a strong position to face the National Council of his party which meets on the 5th July.

These political manœuvres, nevertheless, do nothing to solve the very real problems of the economic situation. The downward movement of prices between January and April was reversed in May and it is nowhere denied that the lowest paid workers are suffering considerable hardship. Industrial production showed a slight fall in May as a result of the recurrent strikes, and the June figures are expected to show a further fall. The latest disturbance, a six-day strike in the coalfields, hit the most vulnerable spot in the French economic system. The workers' demands now amount to a general 10 per cent. increase in wages and the employers seem disposed to recognise the validity of these demands. But they have thrown back on to the Government the onus of establishing a new equilibrium between wages and prices and have exposed the absurdity of the principle of granting "production bonuses" when production has not increased.

Meanwhile the Communist Party Congress, meeting at Strasbourg from the 25th to 28th June, revealed more clearly than ever the determination of the party leaders to resume their place in the Government. Siren calls were addressed to the Socialist Party, which was accused of having yielded to reactionary pressure, to bring about the formation of a new Government led by Communists and Socialists. At the same time M. Blum was attacked as the evil spirit of the Socialist Party. M. Thorez made his report in a five-hour speech whose dimensions were matched by those of the portraits and inscriptions on the walls of the hall. One of the most interesting points made by him and other speakers was the desire of the party leaders to recruit members on a mass basis and to avoid doctrinal niceties which would offend prospective entrants.

General de Gaulle made his answer to the Communists in a speech given at Lille on the 29th June. In this speech he spoke openly, for the first time, of the risk of war between the Soviet Union and the United States and declared that France must place herself on the side of the Western Powers. Referring to the internal situation he said that the present economic difficulties could not be solved by the existing political régime.

Some light relief to the gloomy picture in France has been afforded this week by the discovery of a new "plot" against the Republic. The leaders of the plot are nonentities, with the exception of a former Cagoulard, Colonel Loustaunau-Lacan, and the publicity given to the affair by the Sûreté and the Ministry of the Interior seems to represent an ill-judged attempt to win sympathy for the régime.

ITALY

As reported in last week's Summary Signor De Nicola resigned on grounds of health from his post of President of the Republic as from the 25th June, the date when the life of the Constituent Assembly and that of his presidency should have ended. But on the 23rd his doctor had told the press that all the President needed to restore his health was a month's holiday, and on the 26th the Constituent Assembly re-elected him by 405 votes out of a total of 431, Signor De Nicola having agreed to carry on his duties after a short rest. He has now approved the draft decree which authorises the ratification of the Peace Treaty and which, it is hoped, will be agreed by the Constituent Assembly in the near future.

Count Sforza, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, is expecting to visit London this month, and has declared that his principal aim in coming is to strengthen good relations between this country and Italy, although he also hopes that he may be able to secure a better understanding of Italy's feelings about her former colonies and her navy. Count Sforza maintains that his whole foreign policy is based on friendship with Great Britain, and that, although Italy must depend on American help to a great extent, her political future should be closely linked with that of this country. His aspirations are in the direction of some form of western federation led by Great Britain, although no doubt he wishes to avoid antagonising Russia.

Once again Sicily has been the scene of an outburst of violent crime. On the 22nd and 23rd of June Socialist and Communist offices in small towns near Palermo were attacked with bombs, two people were killed and a number wounded. The organiser of these attacks is thought to be one Giuliano, a Sicilian bandit, who started his career of crime in 1943 when he stole an army horse laden with flour, shot a carabiniere, became an outlaw and a leader in the Mafia. Now he seems to have taken to political crime, and the Left parties have suggested that he is in fact being used as an agent by some of the big landowners, who object to the organisation by the Left parties of peasant co-operatives on land taken from the big owners. An attack on a group of workers celebrating May Day, in which 16 were killed, was also attributed to Giuliano. The lastest crime has become an event of national importance. The General Confederation of Labour called a general strike of half-an-hour on the 25th June in protest against anti-democratic terrorism in Sicily and agrarian reaction generally in South Italy. The central Government have not only offered a reward of 3 million lire for information leading to the capture of Giuliano, but have sent Dr. Ferrari, Chief of Police, to Sicily to investigate, and General Branca to take charge of military operations against Giuliano's bands. The Communists and Socialists are undoubtedly making use of the situation to attack the Government, though there is no ground for their accusation that the disorders are a result of the creation of the new minority Government.

VATICAN

A series of articles have appeared in the Osservatore Romano pleading for a "modus vivendi" between Russia and the West. Count della Torre, the editor of the paper, and author of the articles, starts from a passage in the Pope's speech to his cardinals on the 2nd June: "for those who see things in the light of the Divine Order . . . . there is always room for a peaceful accommodation even in the gravest clashes of human and national interests." The articles maintain that there is much to be said for Russia's search after secure frontiers; that to believe in the pure aggressiveness of Russia's policy is as absurd as to believe in Anglo-Saxon imperialistic expansionism. The peoples of East and West must shelve their ideological differences, as the Count considers they did during the war, and discover how they can live together. At all costs a clash between East and West must be avoided. Significantly enough, Moscow has also been broadcasting an appeal—in her foreign language programmes, not in Russian—to follow Stalin's dictum that two worlds can exist side by side in peace.

At first sight the Osservatore Romano's articles look like a change in Vatican policy, from its bitter reaction to the activities of the Communists; but the paper, and the Vatican wireless, continue to pour outspoken blame on the evil deeds that the Communists do vis-à-vis the Church. Two explanations have been offered of these articles. The Vatican, however, desires to regularise relations with Poland and States within the Russian orbit, and has no doubt concluded that some sort of an agreement is better than a continuance of the present state. Pius XI, it may be remembered, said, of the Reich Concordat, that he was prepared to make an agreement with the Devil provided some good would thereby accrue to Catholics. The doctrine of minus mali points in this direction. At the same time Pius XII did his utmost to prevent the late war, and when it had begun, to keep America and all other countries out of it, considering war to be the worst of evils. Judging from the Osservatore Romano, the Vatican is convinced that the clash between East and West is dangerously near, and that even without war the division of the world into two halves would have consequences fatal both in the material and in the spiritual realm. If Rome is to keep contact with Eastern Europe, it must agree with the Powers of Eastern Europe, and Rome, in the past, has been prepared to make apparently poor bargains because it "knows how to wait," until men become more reasonable.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Such misgivings as Hungarians may privately feel about Russia's willingness to ratify the Peace Treaty of necessity found no place in the debate on the Hungarian Ratification Bill which the National Assembly passed unanimously. M. Sulyok probably spoke for the majority of his countrymen when he said that Hungary's position now was worse than it had been after Trianon, but that a bad treaty was better than no treaty at all. M. Sulyok, whom the Smallholders originally expelled on account of his revisionist views, again underlined the harshness of the territorial clauses in particular. There was general agreement among Deputies that post-war democratic Hungary ought not to be held responsible for a crime committed by her pre-war reactionary Government.

M. Sulyok likewise made use of the occasion to complain of the curtailment of the promised freedoms where his own Party was concerned. He had already expressed dissatisfaction with the result of his interview with M. Rajk when he demanded police protection at his meetings to ensure him the same liberty of speech as the Communists enjoyed. The Communists in turn allege disturbance of their meetings by M. Sulyok's followers. While it is possible that members of the extreme Right have been responsible for irregularities committed in M. Sulyok's name, his past record in no way suggests that he himself countenanced them. On the other hand, there is certain evidence of Communist rowdyism, and, though M. Sulyok has been speaking freely enough in the National Assembly, he has every reason to complain of the limitations imposed on him since the suppression of his newspaper by an inspired printers' strike.

The Smallholders and Social Democrats are agreed that separate Party lists shall be offered at the next election. In a speech delivered at Debreczen on the 29th June M. Dinnyés denied the report that the new election laws would affect large numbers of persons. The Germans, indeed, would lose their right to vote, but they were to be transferred to Germany as soon as repatriation became practicable. The number of Members of Parliament, moreover, would be diminished. M. Dinnyés stated that anybody who wished might come to Hungary, and that consequently there was no need to invite foreign observers—a condition to which M. Sulyok attaches great importance. The Government, M. Dinnyés said, would continue to stand by the principle of private property; nor is this endangered, the Left claim, by the Three-Year Plan, which has now been approved by the necessary two-thirds majority in the National Assembly. (Communist spokesmen, incidentally, are making rather a point of the Party's agreement to this.) Here again Freedom Party supporters protested, alleging that they had not even seen a copy of the Plan, while some of the Smallholder deputies abstained from voting.

M. Mihalyfi has refuted the statement attributed to him that after the Peace Treaty ratification foreign journalists would be liable to punishment, including the death-penalty, for propagating tendentious reports about Hungary. On the contrary, the Government would adhere to their previous policy of assuring full freedom to the foreign Press by allowing the facts to speak for themselves despite the malicious falsehoods which had been disseminated.

How far credence can be given to M. Dinnyés' contradiction of the rumour that Russian instructors were training the Hungarian Army is uncertain. According to him, Russia had neither asked for a military alliance nor for military and air bases on Hungarian soil. His statement does not correspond with the information provided by his predecessor, General Bartha, who told of repeated Russian attempts to obtain his consent to the appointment of Soviet instructors and to the distribution of military equipment similar to that in use by the Russians. General Bartha had remained firm, but he did not anticipate that M. Dinnyés would follow his example.

The Hungarian Press has ignored M. Hám's allegation of ill-treatment (see last week's Summary), which was apparently substantially correct. Meanwhile the trials of the present group of conspirators were temporarily adjourned, pending the investigation of further evidence brought to light in the White Paper.

Hungarian reactions to the Marshall Plan are mainly favourable. The Communists, it is true, regard it with scepticism, but the Social Democratic newspaper, Népszava, considers it supremely important and a test of whether East and West are capable of effective co-operation. Western Europe, states Népszava, will accept it gladly, but the attitude of Eastern Europe is more problematical, as is also the Plan's endorsement by Congress. The Smallholder organ, Kis Ujság, believes that the Conference will ease international tension, and points to it as a proof of the peaceful designs of the U.S.S.R.

M. Rákosi's recent visit to Prague aroused much interest in Czechoslovak circles. (See also under "Poland.") M. Rákosi stated that he had come as a Party representative to discuss matters affecting both nations with Czechoslovak Communists. He thought it probable that repatriation would be suspended for about four weeks while the harvest was brought in, since most of those concerned were farmers. According to Népszava Hungarian schools in Czechoslovakia will be opened after the 1st August.

In the economic sphere the Russians are attempting to gain a dominant position in the Hungarian Credit Bank which numbers British, French and Russian nationals among its shareholders. Hungarian trade talks in Moscow were officially described as "satisfactory so far," but Soviet demands concerning German assets in Hungary do not appear to have been abated. By various manœuvres they are attempting to secure, in some cases, double payment for Hungarian debts owing to German concerns and in others the payment of assets without liabilities. The position of the Soviet-Hungarian companies has recently been improved; to five of them decrees have granted special tax exemptions.

Roumania

The Memorandum in the name of His Majesty's Government protesting at the indiscriminate arrests in Roumania and the brutal treatment of political prisoners was handed in to the Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 25th June, the American note on the subject being presented on the same day. M. Tătărescu, who was experiencing an upsurge of his mercurial temperament, expressed confidence that the majority of those arrested would be released within a fortnight. He put the total number of political prisoners at 1,200; Mr. Morgan Phillips had been given the figure of 1,303.

The Roumanian economic delegation has returned from Moscow without much yet being divulged of its achievements, though M. Gheorghiu-Dej announced on alighting from his aeroplane that sufficient food had been assured for the population until the next harvest. The Soviet Union has apparently agreed to deliver shortly to Roumania 80,000 tons of cereals—60,000 of wheat and 20,000 of barley. The Communist press fulsomely commented that the generosity of the Soviet Union "completely eclipsed all the manifestations of friendship received by Roumania during her history." It was claimed that reception "by those who registered in good time" of the ration of 200 gr. of maize meal was a concrete sign of the result achieved, though the agreement only covers wheat and barley. România Liberă praised Yugoslav generosity in sending 20,000 tons of maize to Roumania, adding that it was for this reason that food supplies from overseas had been diverted from her to western Germany. Prospects for the maize harvest appear to be fairly good, but the wheat harvest is only expected to yield 1·2 million tons, 800,000 tons less than was expected. A report from Buenos Aires states that the Roumanian Under-Secretary of Foreign Trade, who is there on an economic mission, has cancelled the previous agreement for 300,000 tons of maize but still intends to purchase leather and wool from the Argentine and is asking for a credit of 100,000,000 pesos. Another Roumanian Trade Delegation has just arrived in Beirut.

It is reliably reported that an attempt at stabilisation of the currency on the Hungarian or Bulgarian model will be made when the harvest is in. Meanwhile the inflation is progressing rapidly, the pound sterling being worth 4,200,000 lei, against 3,400,000 a fortnight ago.

Roumania's consolidation of relations with her neighbours continues. A cultural agreement with Yugoslavia was signed in Bucharest on the 26th June by M. Livizeanu for Roumania and M. Ribnicar for Yugoslavia. The Agreement, which is for five years followed by another five unless abrogated by one of the contracting parties—provides for the setting up of a Mixed Commission with a section in Bucharest and another in Belgrade. The Commissions would provide for exchange of professors, students, apprentice-technicians, etc., as well as of films, books and pictures.

The Roumanian-Bulgarian Friendship Society has held a celebration meeting in Bucharest in honour of M. Georgi Dimitrov.

Yugoslavia

General Maclean's first talks in Belgrade on the question of displaced persons have been fairly satisfactory. The Yugoslav Government are primarily interested in the problems of encouraging repatriation and of dissolving emigré politico-military organisations. If they can be satisfied on these points, general agreement on the whole problem of refugees may be possible. General MacLean has left Belgrade with a draft embodying heads of agreement for the solution of this problem.

Meanwhile there has been no relaxation of Yugoslav criticism of British and American policy towards displaced persons. Some justification for their strictures is provided by the savage exploits of Yugoslav D.P.s on the Austro-Yugoslav frontier. In Berlin the head of the Yugoslav Military Mission has written to the Control Council complaining of Allied "protection" of war criminals in the Western Zones of Germany. In Belgrade the Yugoslav Government have protested to the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires against a request for the withdrawal of the Yugoslav Repatriation and War Crimes Investigation Missions from the U.S. Zone of Austria.

With the prospect of being able to make food purchases in Yugoslavia, His Majesty's Government have decided to seek an early settlement of the property question by accepting the Yugoslav global offer (see last week's Summary), provided that the proposed lump sum is increased and covers nationalised property only. His Majesty's Government are proposing a meeting in London to discuss an agreement for the promotion of mutual trade, and would like to open negotiations for this trade pact, for a compensation settlement and for a revised property agreement (covering property not affected by the Nationalisation Law) early in August. The signature of the Shipping Agreement in the near future will depend on a favourable reaction from the Yugoslav Government to these proposals.

The Governments of Great Britain, France and the U.S.S.R. have been officially informed of Yugoslavia's interest in the U.S. offer of aid for Europe. A Yugoslav Note of the 26th June, and a leading article in Borba, make it plain that the Yugoslavs feel that they should be the first to receive aid, by virtue of their sacrifices in the war, but will brook no interference in their internal affairs.

While industrial rehabilitation on the one hand, is greatly hampered by the lack of essential materials, the food situation is encouraging. Harvest reports from all parts of the country are good. Reserve stocks of grain have been released for general consumption, and pure wheat bread is now on sale again in Belgrade. The Government have relaxed their harsh policy towards grain hoarders and peasants who failed to deliver their surplus crops to the local authorities. Those who have been imprisoned have been released by an amnesty, prompted either by the general improvement in the situation or by the desirability of making use of all available labour for the harvest.

A new trade agreement has been concluded with Albania. Air negotiations have begun with Roumania, and have been brought to a successful conclusion with Hungary.

Greece

The Security Council have begun their consideration of the Frontier Commission's report (see under "United Nations"). Meanwhile the subsidiary group which is attempting to conduct supplementary investigations from Salonica have met with yet another rebuff. The Yugoslav Government have refused permission for its members to enter Yugoslavia to investigate frontier incidents at Kouka and Belesh. They say that they have carried out their own investigation and are satisfied that no incidents whatever took place on the 31st March, 1st and 21st April, as the Greek Government alleged. They, therefore, see no need for a United Nations investigation. The subsidiary group, who only last week received fresh instructions from the main Commission to continue with its investigations, is proceeding to examine the incidents from the Greek side of the border only.

Despite continued efforts by the Greek Army, raids by the "bandits" have been reported from many areas. Near Dhomokos a band blew up a passenger train, destroying two coaches and killing three passengers; another band cut the railway line near Agra in Western Macedonia by removing 15 yards of the permanent way. North of Florina a band 1,000 strong coming from Yugoslavia attacked Panagitsa. An army platoon, assisted by a detachment of gendarmerie and a group of armed peasants, resisted for several hours but were eventually forced to withdraw. The "bandits" then entered Panagitsa and burned many houses. Reinforcements which arrived the following day ejected them. Remnants of the band withdrew northwards, harassed by machine-gun fire from Government aircraft.

The bands have recently turned their attention to the villages of Western Thrace which are inhabited by Turks (see also under "Turkey"). Twenty villages have been threatened with destruction unless they give active support to the bands. Some 90,000 Turks are said to be affected, and they are asking the Turkish consul at Komotini to arrange their repatriation to Turkey. The Turkish Government are said to be considering referring the matter to the United Nations.

M. Zachariades, the Secretary-General of the KKE who disappeared from Athens some months ago, is reported to be attending the congress of the French Communist Party at Strasbourg. M. Porphyrogenis, another Greek delegate, has announced to the congress the early establishment of a "free Greek Government" in the areas controlled by the rebels, if a speedy compromise is not reached between the Greek Government and the Communists.

King Paul, accompanied by the Queen and by M. Kanellopoulos, Minister of Air, has been making a tour of Thessaly.

Albania

True to the best form of Communist minority governments which are concerned to stamp out all possible opponents, the Albanian Government addressed formal demands on 20th June to the British and United States Governments for the surrender of some 170 Rightist Albanians who managed to escape from Albania before the Communists got control. The Albanian notes, which have not yet been received in London or New York, dubbed these people "war criminals" and alleged that the majority of them were living under American or British jurisdiction in Italy, Greece or Germany. The modest press and wireless resources of Albania were turned on to support this reiterated appeal with sundry variations on the theme that the British and Americans were organising war criminals and reactionaries against progressive democratic régimes.

Tirana radio and the one Albanian newspaper have made the most of any incident that could be magnified into Greek violation of the common frontier, and they have continued faithfully to give their limited public the Moscow version on general questions such as Hungary, Greece and the Marshall offer.

Bulgaria

The Bulgarian Government have continued their policy of liquidating the Opposition. The militia have been searching deputies' houses and are alleged to have discovered in one such house arms which they have managed to plant there. A violent public campaign for a heavy sentence on Petkov, it is reported, is shortly to be started. The twenty-three deputies whose resignation was precipitated, have been living in hourly fear of arrest. There is ground to fear that General Ivan Popov, who was recently sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for the lead he was alleged to have taken in the so-called "neutral officer" case, is being tortured in order that he may give more damaging evidence against Petkov. The Government seem to have discussed with half a dozen Agrarian (Opposition) deputies the terms on which Narodno Zemedelsko Zname, one of the two suppressed Opposition papers might be allowed to reappear. Together with the permission for publication the Government would have given the Agrarians certain diplomatic posts abroad and perhaps two cabinet portfolios, provided that Narodno Zemedelsko Zname toned down its criticism, and that the Agrarians disavowed Petkov. According to reliable reports, this last condition made the Agrarians reject the whole offer outright.

The British Political Representative on 26th June addressed a further formal protest to the Bulgarian Government on the subject of the suppression of the press. The United States Representative is making a similar protest verbally.

Turkey

Although there was some disappointment at the delay, the Turkish Government's definite desire for friendly relations with the Arab States was clearly reflected by press comment on the ratification (see Summary 396) by Iraq on 7th June of the Turco-Iraqi treaty of friendship. The overwhelming majority of Iraqi deputies in favour of ratification was regarded with satisfaction. The small minority who opposed it were considered to be tools of Moscow whose very words they had echoed, and their action to point the moral that in the face of the common danger from the north, Turkey and the Arab states must co-operate. Although the Arab territories had belonged to the Ottoman Empire, they had gained their independence by the same historical process as modern Turkey herself, and she wished their freedom, as well as her own, to be preserved.

The United States special mission of military officers and economists have been continuing their enquiries into Turkish needs, to the great satisfaction of the Turks and to the evident displeasure of Moscow which would have liked to see—or at least persuade the world of—a popular revulsion caused by the alleged sacrifice of Turkish independence to United States imperialism. The American experts have reassembled in Angora and are drafting their recommendations for spending the 100 million dollar grant in such a way as to increase the efficiency of the Turkish forces. Relying on American aid and on the British alliance, the government hope to pursue their general programme of internal development. This includes building up a two-party parliamentary system, raising the army and judicature completely out of politics, improving the civil service and carrying out a variety of industrial projects. At the moment the government are considerably concerned by the threats which Turkish villages in Western Thrace are receiving from Greek Communist bands (see under "Greece").

Conversations which President Inönü has had in the last few weeks with M. Celal Bayar, the leader of the Opposition, are generally taken as connected with a mutual desire to keep party recriminations within the reasonable limits expected of a democracy officially based on the Anglo-Saxon model, and to which Turkish politicians are as yet unused, and to prevent them from developing into extremism either of the Right or of the Left. Some evidence of the Government's desire to proceed with moderation was afforded by the reappearance after six month's suspension of the Leftist Yarin. On the other hand the authorities promptly suppressed a magazine which, for an unexplained reason, had the temerity to bring to the light of day a poem written twenty years ago in criticism of Mustafa Kemal by Riza Tevfik "the philosopher," a political opponent who was then in exile but has since returned under pardon.

Economic discontent continues, and indeed criticism of the government's economic policy is increasing. Adverse comment has now fastened on the new income tax bill, amendments to the rents law, the lack of trade facilities and, above all, the Government's failure to bring down the extremely high cost of living.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

Nokrashy Pasha is now generally blamed by the politically-minded public for procrastination and secretiveness about the appeal to the Security Council, and what appears to be a reply to his critics was broadcast from Cairo on the 22nd June alleging that a war of nerves is being waged against Egypt by Great Britain, who "fears Egypt's faith in international arbitration" and is trying to deceive Egyptians and convince them that no appeal will be made. Another subject in this attack, the speaker added, is the allegation that Egypt has not contributed to democracy, that her moral and spiritual participation in the war was insignificant, and that Egypt's case, therefore, cannot be based on democratic principles.

Negotiations on the subject of Egypt's sterling balances were ended in London on the 26th June, and the Egyptian delegates left for Cairo the following day with the matter unsettled. A final offer made by His Majesty's Government, however, has since been accepted by the Egyptian Government.

A project for the electrification of the Aswan dam has been approved by the Chamber of Deputies.

Palestine

The United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (U.N.S.C.O.P.) continued their investigations into both Jewish and Arab affairs by a series of visits during the past week to various parts of the country. In contrast to the effusive welcome accorded to members at Jewish centres, their reception by the Arabs seems to have been reserved owing to the conflict between the orders for a boycott and the traditional claims of hospitality to strangers. There were some signs that the Arab decision not to co-operate might be reversed, and King Abdullah has been making strenuous efforts in that direction, but tentative approaches made by members of the Committee to Jamal al Husaini are believed to have been rebuffed.

The release to the press by the Special Committee of the text of their resolution expressing concern at the "possible unfavourable repercussions" which the execution of the death sentences passed on three Jewish terrorists (see last week's Summary) might have on their task, has convinced many moderate Arabs that the policy of the Arab Higher Committee was right, and has done much to wreck the efforts which were being made to bring about a relaxation of the boycott.

The Chairman and other members visited Dr. Weizmann on the 23rd June, and it is expected that he will be giving formal evidence before the Committee at an early date.

On the 26th June the Jewish Telegraphic Agency devoted considerable space to the Memorandum handed to the Committee by the representative of the Palestine Government on the previous day. Extracts are given to illustrate the argument that, in seeking to explain the principles upon which policy has been based, the Government unwittingly admit that what they consider as the Mandatory policy does not conform with the Mandate itself. On other issues also the Agency loses no opportunity of attacking the Government and impugning the good faith and impartiality of British officials.

Major Farran, who was arrested in connection with the disappearance and death of a member of the Irgun Zvai

Leumi, escaped from arrest on the 19th June, but surrendered to the authorities before the end of the month.

Two cases of attempted abduction of British officials have recently taken place in Jerusalem. On the 28th June an attack with automatic weapons on a café in Haifa resulted in the death of one British officer and the wounding of two others. In Tel Aviv, on the same evening, three soldiers were killed and one wounded while walking down Allenby Road, one of the main thoroughfares. An attack was made by twelve Jews on officers and men on the beach at Herzliya, north of Tel Aviv, on the 29th June in which two soldiers were injured, one of them seriously.

Transjordan

His Majesty King Abdullah has received proposals from Ibn Sa'ud for opening negotiations for the settlement of frontier questions between Transjordan and Sa'udi Arabia, and is sending an acceptance. At the same time, His Majesty is somewhat apprehensive and at a loss to understand the motives underlying Ibn Sa'ud's actions in this matter, which was raised by the Amir Faisal with the Prime Minister of Transjordan in London last November, and should have been discussed by the Amir when he visited Amman at the end of December. At that time, however, he excused himself from all political discussion on the ground of ill-health.

The 28th June was celebrated in Amman as the thirtieth anniversary of the beginning of the Arab Revolt under King Husain. In a speech by King Abdullah, read for him by an official, occur the words, "The natural unity of Syria has become the right of this nation and the purpose of its struggle." Although the reference is, presumably, to Arabs in Transjordan and Syria, the assumption that His Majesty's dream of a Greater Syria is shared by many of his neighbours appears from all the evidence to be quite unwarranted.

Syria

Elections are due to take place on the 7th July, but the prospects are extremely obscure. The publicity given to the malpractices in the Lebanese elections has given rise to the hope that the Syrian Government may be discouraged from following suit.

The death is announced of Sa'adullah Jabri, who was Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs until his resignation in January last. He was an ardent nationalist, but since his main object of securing complete independence was attained, did not seem to have any clearly-defined policy. He was 57.

Iraq

At the end of May the Chamber of Deputies voted 3 million Iraqi dinars (equivalent to pounds sterling) for railway construction and improvements. An extension is to be built from Kerbela to Najaf and Kufa, and the Baiji-Tel Kotchek section of the main line, completed during the recent war, is to be improved. There has been some heated criticism of the railway administration in Parliament, and particularly of the British experts employed by the Government. The Prime Minister has stated that his Government would continue to employ foreigners until Iraq was in a position to dispense with their services.

Persia

The new Cabinet—Qawam's fifth—(see last week's Summary) although not differing greatly from the last, is a considerable improvement upon it. Two, at least, of the five ministers dropped, Aramesh and Nikpay, are known to have collected money (ostensibly for the Party chest) by highly irregular means, while Shayegan and Sayyah are nonentities. Of the new ministers, Dr. Issa Sadiq, Hikmat and Salman Assadi are able and respected, Mustafa Adl (Minister for Justice) is an outstanding personality, and Ahmed Husain Adl (Agriculture), a former Director-General of Agriculture, is well-suited to his present appointment, which he has held twice in recent years. Little is known of Nasr (Posts and Telegraphs), but the appointment is, in any case, a minor one. The retention of Homayunjah and Musavizadeh (Minister for Justice in the last Cabinet and the Prime Minister's right-hand man in the Democrat Party) without portfolio is probably due to the difficulty of dropping them at this stage.

On the 27th June the Prime Minister announced in an official proclamation that the Shah would open the Majlis on the 17th July. The proclamation also contained a warning that martial law, which was lifted in Tehran on the 16th June, would be re-imposed unless the press ceased to abuse their newly-won freedom.

The Persian Government have made two substantial claims against the Soviet Union. The first is for 11,196,070·30 grammes of gold, plus a supplementary claim for approximately $8 million. The gold claim, based on an agreement of the 2nd March, 1946, between the Soviet and Persian State banks, is intended to cover the sums in rials advanced during the war by the Persian State Bank to the Soviet military forces in Persia, the dollar claim representing the value of the stores supplied by Persia to the Soviet troops. The second claim, for 310 million rials, is in respect of customs duties. The Persians claim that ever since the Russian occupation Soviet goods have been brought into the country without payment of customs dues; further, that the Soviet Government continued to disregard the Persian customs long after their troops had withdrawn from the country. The discussions which have been held about these claims have been somewhat acrimonious. The Soviet Government is only prepared to accept a figure of 120 million rials as the customs claim, and does not appear willing to recognise the first claim at all. Their attitude has occasioned much adverse criticism from the Tehran press and radio.

A Sa'udi Arabian delegation is reported to have visited Persia in May to discuss the re-opening of diplomatic relations between the two countries and the renewal of the Persian pilgrim traffic to the Holy Cities. Since the summary execution in December, 1943, on the orders of Ibn Sa'ud, of a Persian pilgrim who was alleged to have defiled one of the Holy Shrines, the Persian Government have refused to grant passport facilities to intending pilgrims (see Summary No. 226 of 2nd February, 1944). This has resulted in a considerable loss of revenue for Sa'udi Arabia. Up to date no agreement appears to have been reached between the two Governments.

His Majesty the King has given his agrément to the appointment of Mohsen Rais to succeed Hassan Taqizadeh as Persian Ambassador in London. Taqizadeh is to return to Persia shortly, having accepted a seat in the new Majlis as deputy for Tabriz.

THE FAR EAST

China

The Sinkiang-Outer Mongolia border dispute has continued in the foreground of Chinese political affairs (see Summary No. 396). On the advice of General Chang Chih-chung, Sinkiang's recent Provincial Governor, the decision to send the Minister of National Defence, General Pai Chung-hsi, to investigate the dispute on the spot was cancelled at the last moment. But both sides continue loud in their claims to sovereignty over the territory involved; and, following a lull of five or six days, fighting was officially reported to have been resumed on 20th June. In their reply to the Chinese Government's protest, the Government of the Republic of Outer Mongolia have stated that they consider Peitashan Mongolian territory. And, in reporting this reply, the Chinese Government Information Office in London has explained that the Mongolian claim that Peitashan and Baitak Bogdo are one and the same mountain range is not contested, but that locally the name Peitashan is used to indicate the fort on the Chinese side of the range. In this connexion it is of interest to note that the Peitashan or Baitak Bogdo (Bogdo being the Mongolian for hill) is a separate arm of the Altai Mountains running due west and that it is this range which formed the old boundary between Mongolia and Sinkiang (the change of boundary is first recorded in 1927). To be of any practical use today, however, a fort in these mountains would have to be situated in the neighbourhood of Lat. 45°N, Long. 94°E, where the present boundary cuts the Peitashan (Baitak Bogdo) ridge. If this were not so, the incident might involve claims to a very large and important area of territory and thus be serious indeed. If, on the other hand, this is so—as would seem to be the case, since the Chinese Information Office assert that China's claim is only in respect of the "Sinkiang Peitashan slopes and that they in no way challenge Mongol sovereignty over Baitak Bogdo," it would strengthen the suggestion that an everyday border brush is being magnified for political reasons—no doubt in the hope of inducing public sympathy in the United States by playing up the Soviet threat.

Certain it is that the Nanking Government have been making strenuous efforts to persuade the United States Government to come to their rescue. And although a substantial quantity of much-needed ammunition, which had already been paid for in American dollars, has now been released to them, they are said to be keenly disappointed both in Mr. Marshall's statement that the Outer Mongolian "invasion" might be only one of a long series of border incidents, and in the reserved attitude of the Americans towards Chinese accusations of Soviet violations of the 1945 Treaty of Friendship. In a public statement on current events Dr. Sun Fo, Vice-President of the National Government—who is generally believed to walk on the left side of the middle of the road and, in fact, is often spoken of as the leader of the "pro-Soviet group," testified that the Soviet Government's violation of their Agreement of 1945 had banished all hope of a peaceful settlement between Nanking and the Communists; that the Communists, backed by the Russians, are in control of 85 per cent. of the north-eastern Provinces; and that, unless foreign help can be obtained, there is a grave possibility that the seeds may be sown for a third World War. He openly accused the Soviet Union of direct responsibility for the existence of civil war in China; for admitting Communist forces into Manchuria; for helping Koreans to fight in the Communist cause; for barring the way of Chinese forces to Dairen and Port Arthur; and for the invasion of Sinkiang by Outer Mongolian troops. Subsequent press reports recorded Dr. Sun Fo as explaning that the object of his remarks was to "arouse attention in the U.S.A. and in Britain to Soviet intrigues in China."

The Government are particularly irked at the failure of their attempts to persuade the U.S.S.R. to hand over to China the administration of the ports of Dairen and Port Arthur. On 25th June the Ministry for Foreign Affairs released to the press a lengthy statement, claiming that the Agreement of 1945 accords the Chinese Government the right to send troops to both these areas; making a number of outspoken complaints against the Soviet Government couched in similar language to that contained in Dr. Sun Fo's outburst; and calling upon them to live up to their treaty responsibilities.

Although the Nanking Government are turning a brave face to the world in their claims to many and telling Communist defeats, experienced observers believe that the Government's position in Manchuria is rapidly becoming hopeless. The Mukden correspondent of the New York Times attributes this situation not so much to the strength of the Communist fighting forces as to lack of co-operation between General Tu Yu-ming, the military Commander-in-Chief, and General Hsiung Shih-hui, in charge of Manchurian political and civil affairs, as well as to the incompetence of most of the senior civil officials and military commanders. The full extent of the seriousness of the military position in Manchuria is said to have been quite suddenly realised by the Generalissimo and the Central Government. In the Executive Yuan opinions are reported to be divided and tempers frayed over the question whether to evacuate all Government forces and abandon Manchuria to the Communists, or to continue the struggle in the face of what appears to be an impossible position. Either alternative is thought to present an equally difficult task, and it is expected that the final decision will be to fight on.

The policy pursued by General Chiang Kai-shek's Chief of Staff, General Chen Cheng, has made him the subject of severe criticism from his field commanders. In consequence, General Chen Cheng has submitted his resignation, which, it is understood, has not yet been accepted. It is thought probable, however, that the post will be offered once again to General Ho Ying-chin, who resigned that office last year in the hope of removing the barrier to peace talks with the Communist delegation.

Renewed rumours that General Chiang Kai-shek is considering retirement from official life—or, at least, going abroad for a long holiday—in order to clear the way for a fresh attempt at peace negotiations with the Communists would appear to be dispelled by a telegram carried by The Times and dated Nanking, 29th June. It states that an order for the arrest of General Mao Tze-Tung, Chairman of the Communist Party, has been published in the official Gazette. The order is reported to charge General Mao with organising an illegal political party and instigating a rebellion to overthrow the Constitutional Government of China.

At a press conference in Washington on 25th June, Mr. Marshall, the United States Secretary of State, said that the five hundred million U.S. dollars which had been earmarked in the Export-Import Bank Fund for a loan to China would cease to be available for this purpose after 30th June, and that, although the matter had been the subject of careful and daily discussion, he doubted if any action would be taken to extend the time-limit. It is understood, however, that it will still be open to the Chinese Government to make an application to the Export-Import Bank for a loan in aid of any approved project and that, far from wishing to discriminate against China, the United States Government are anxious to make it possible for her to obtain financial assistance.

Meanwhile signs are lacking of both the will and the ability of the Chinese Government to help themselves out of the political and economic crisis into which the country has drifted. In expressing the Government's gratitude for the offer to furnish British ships specially equipped to handle the export trade on the Yangtsze River in such commodities as oil and eggs, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs has informed H.M. Ambassador that it is regretted that, in view of the unanimous decision of the various organisations concerned (Chinese shipping companies which have neither the ships nor means to deal adequately with the trade), permission cannot be granted to foreign vessels to call at ports on the Yangtsze. To this rejection was added a statement concerning the possibility of the British ships in question being chartered to sail under the Chinese flag, application for such permission being made to the Executive Yuan whenever necessary.

Indonesia

Following his meeting with Dr. van Mook in Batavia on 23rd June (see Summary No. 397), M. Sjarir returned to Jogjakarta to obtain his Government's confirmation of the concessions which he had felt compelled to make in order to prevent an immediate armed conflict. At an all-night sitting of the Republican Cabinet the principal political parties declined to endorse M. Sjarir's actions. He thereupon tendered his resignation and, for the second time within a year, President Soekarno assumed full powers over the Republican Government. Ordering all members of the Sjarir Cabinet to continue in office until a new Government has been installed, President Soekarno called upon the four principal political parties to take immediate steps to form a coalition Government; and he announced the appointment of M. Sjarir as "Elder Statesman." A later radio report from Batavia, however, announced that the leaders of the political parties concerned have returned the mandate to Dr. Soekarno and informed him of their inability to form a coalition Cabinet.

In Batavia the Republican reply, impatiently awaited by Dr. van Mook, was delivered on 28th June. Couched in conciliatory tones it, somewhat surprisingly, confirmed all the points recently conceded by M. Sjarir, except that defining the position of the Lieutenant Governor-General in the Interim Government. The wording, however, was such as to leave the matter open to adjustment by further discussion. The reply also rejected the Dutch demand for the formation of a joint gendarmerie to maintain law and order throughout Java and Sumatra. Dr. van Mook took the view that the failure to concede these all-important points rendered the Republican reply entirely unsatisfactory and that, therefore, drastic steps should be taken immediately. Ultimately, however, though only with great difficulty, Professor Schermerhorn prevailed on him to refrain from any action until reference had been made to The Hague and an urgent reply requested.

H.M. Consul-General was quick to take advantage of this lull in the proceedings. He pointed out to Dr. Soekarno that M. Sjarir had previously given Dr. van Mook a definite assurance of acceptance of the Commission-General's requirements on the matter of the Governor-General's position and that it would be well, therefore, if he, too, were to concede the point. Dr. Soekarno readily accepted this advice, acted immediately and, it is said, with good results.

It is also reported that the United States Consul-General at Batavia was instructed to request the Republican Government to "co-operate without delay in the immediate formation" of an Interim Federal Government, and to support this request with a promise of financial help as soon as an Interim Government is established and functioning smoothly under the Dutch Crown. In this connexion a monitored broadcast report from the United States asserts that about a year and a half ago "the former Indonesian Government had applied for a 100,000,000 dollar loan, and an Interim Federal Government, as outlined in the Indonesian-Netherlands Cheribon accord, would have to make a new application. The amount to be named in the new application, if made, is uncertain."

According to radio reports the informal approach to the Republican Government was made by the United States Consul-General only an hour or two before the Indonesian Commander-in-chief announced that intercepted documents afforded proof of the Netherlands forces having been instructed to assume the offensive on 30th June without waiting for further orders, unless counter instructions were issued before then. In spite of the increased tension in both camps that naturally followed this announcement, a meeting is reported to have taken place between Dr. van Mook and Republican representatives at which the United States offer was discussed.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The efforts of the European "Big Three" to match Mr. Marshall's offer of assistance with an agreed recovery programme of their own have been followed closely in the United States. While it is too early as yet to gauge the general reaction to the breakdown of the Paris talks, there seems to be little reason to assume that the unwillingness of the Russians to share the benefits of the Marshall plan will be regretted by the present majority in Congress or indeed by the public at large. At a press conference in Geneva on the 2nd July Mr. William L. Clayton, the Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, suggested that the fact that some countries might want to remain outside should not prevent others from agreeing upon a programme. Although not mentioning the Soviet Union by name, Mr. Marshall himself, in a speech to the Women's National Press Club in Washington on the 1st, publicly deplored the way in which the purposes of American economic assistance were being "distorted" abroad by "a continuous propaganda of misrepresentation." Pointing out that, since the end of the war, more than 9,000 million dollars' worth of American goods had been sent to Europe, the Secretary of State remarked that no political parties subservient to the United States had been left behind in European countries "to attempt conquest of Governments from within"; no American agents had "sought to dominate the policy establishment of European countries"; and no "joint American-European companies" had been forced upon reluctant Governments.

Some confusion has been caused by press reports of dissensions among "top Administration officials" in Washington over the wisdom of the Marshall plan in the light of the present political situation at home and by allegations that the National Advisory Council, of which Secretary of the Treasury Snyder is the Chairman, is not wholewheartedly behind it. (The Council has just published a report showing that no less than 14,800 million dollars' worth of aid in various forms was extended to foreign countries between the summer of 1945 and the end of 1946 and that this has not proved adequate to achieve the purposes for which it was intended). Mr. Snyder himself did not help matters when he conveyed the impression at a news conference on the 25th June that there was nothing in the Secretary of State's speech of the 5th which could be interpreted as an invitation to other nations to seek more assistance from the United States. However, he subsequently issued a statement emphasising that his remarks should not be taken as disagreeing with what Mr. Marshall had said at Harvard. President Truman has also been at pains to point out that the Government Departments concerned are in "complete accord" on the Marshall Plan.

Conservative opinion has for the most part welcomed the President's decision of the 22nd June to appoint three groups of experts to study the questions relating to American relief policy which were recently raised by Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Hoover (see Summary No. 396). The principal group, a "non-partisan committee," which is to be drawn from industry, finance, agriculture, labour and academic life, will be under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Harriman, and will make recommendations on the limits within which the United States can "safely and wisely" lend aid to foreign countries and on the relation between this aid and domestic economic problems. Ex-Senator Robert M. La Follette has been invited to serve on the committee, but, to the regret of some Republicans, ex-President Hoover has not. While it bears some superficial resemblance to the "bi-partisan advisory council" which Senator Vandenberg recently recommended the committee is to advise the President alone and not "both the Executive and the Congress," as Senator Vandenberg suggested. Nor does the calibre of its members seem to be of that "highest attainable level" which the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee stated that he had in mind. A second committee, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, will make a survey of the "state of American national resources," while the President's Council of Economic Advisers, set up under the 1946 Employment Act and headed by Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, will study "the impact on the American national economy of aid to other countries."

On the 26th June Mr. Truman returned the much-discussed Wool Bill (see Summaries No. 394 and 396) unsigned to Congress, thereby exercising his veto for the third time within a fortnight. The Senate then passed a substitute measure eliminating the "import fee" provision to which the President had objected. In a short message accompanying his veto Mr. Truman suggested that it would be a "tragic mistake" and a blow to American leadership in world affairs to raise tariff barriers at a time when the United States Government was playing the principal part in trying to secure greater freedom of trade at the Geneva conference. In recent conversations in London, however, Mr. Clayton has been inclined to minimize the importance of the Wool Bill and to reproach other nations for supposedly exaggerating its possible consequences.

As was to be expected, the action of Congress in enacting the Taft–Hartley Bill over the President's veto (see last week's Summary) has produced a storm of indignation and resentment in American labour circles. Within twenty-four hours of the final vote on the Bill more than a third of the nation's soft-coal miners had downed tools in protest against it. (The miners are well-placed to make trouble at the moment, as their contract expired on the 30th June with the termination of the Government's seizure of the mines. They are in any event legally entitled to an annual holiday between the 27th June and the 7th July.) Both Mr. William Green of the A.F. of L. and Mr. Philip Murray of the C.I.O. have, however, rejected the idea of a general strike against the new law. The union leaders, it appears, prefer to test the latter's constitutionality in the courts. After a conference of labour lawyers in Washington on the 28th June it was made known that the unions would deliberately violate those provisions of the Taft–Hartley law which prohibit the use of union funds for political purposes and require union officers to present affidavits to the National Labour Relations Board that they are not Communists. It has been suggested that up to two years may elapse before the validity of all the provisions of the Act has been tested and that the Supreme Court will in the end have to decide what many of the clauses mean, as it did in the case of the Wagner Act twelve years ago.

The major labour organisations have made it clear that they will also try to wreak vengeance at the polls in 1948 on all members of Congress who supported the present measure. Yet the political common sense of the union leaders, together with their proved devotion to the precept of the late Samuel Gompers that labour should always "be partisan for a principle and not for a party," should militate against talk of drawing them into a third party in next year's elections. Such talk emanates at present from left-wing elements who claim that the failure of the President to get his veto of the Taft–Hartley Bill sustained should shake the confidence of labour in his ability to safeguard its interests. The President is also being attacked from the Right for his alleged readiness to jeopardize the bi-partisan approach to international affairs by flouting the overwhelming sentiment of Congress on a domestic issue. For his part, however, Mr. Truman has called upon both employers and workers to comply with the new Act "in a spirit of tolerance and fair play." He has at the same time made it clear that he will do all in his power to see that the Taft–Hartley law is "well and faithfully administered."

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina

Señor Miranda, the President of the Central Bank, and his management of Argentine economic policy have been the subject of a number of attacks in the Tribuna Peronista, and it now seems that the removal of General Velasco (see Summary No. 395) has by no means settled the Miranda question. It has been reported that Señor Miranda offered his resignation on the 26th June. Hitherto President Perón has followed Sr. Miranda blindly in matters of economic policy. In a graft-ridden régime it may be doubted whether the telephone company scandal (see Summary No. 392) alone would suffice to bring down Señor Miranda. There are signs, however, that the President has come to regard the new Insurance Law as a ramp. Señor Miranda has frankly stated in conversation that he regards the law as a weapon to extract essential supplies from foreign countries. This sort of thing is possible as long as the sellers' market continues, but at least some Argentines regard Sr. Miranda's policy as short-sighted and ill-conceived in that it aims solely to extract immediate high profits, without regard to Argentina's trading reputation.

An interesting item in the recently published figures of the Argentine census (see Summary No. 397) is the inclusion of the Falkland Islands, the population of which is given as 2,944. How this part of the census was taken is not revealed.

Brazil

The Brazilian Government have recently reached an agreement with a group of United States buyers for the sale of rice at a price considerably above the I.E.F.C. rate. Brazil has also resigned her membership of a number of committees of the I.E.F.C. In extenuation of this move the Brazilians complain that I.E.F.C. has not treated them fairly, their economic position is so precarious, they say, that they must accept the highest prices in dollars.

Chile

President González Videla has arrived in Brazil on a State visit. After spending a week in Brazil he will visit Uruguay and Argentina. He is accompanied by the Chilean Foreign Minister, Señor Raúl Juliet, and the Commanders-in-Chief of the three armed services. It seems probable that this tour is intended to provide the opportunity for exchanges of views about problems to be discussed at the forthcoming Rio de Janeiro Conference.

The President seems to have finally decided to make a break with the Communists. He vigorously attacked them in a recent conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador and announced his determination to "strike first" if necessary. His main difficulty appeared to be that, although the Communist minority numbers only 40,000, it is well entrenched in the copper, nitrate and coal industries, and can "hold the country to ransom."

Guatemala

A recent issue of the Sunday Times contained a statement that the Guatemalan Minister of Foreign Affairs had demanded the cession of all British Honduras south of the 17th parallel or payment of £5 million compensation, the fate of the northern half of the colony to be settled in 25 years' time. This is obviously a version of President Arévalo's proposal (see Summary 394). The reason for its publication does not seem very clear: the Guatemalan Foreign Minister, Lic. Silva Peña, has attributed it to the indiscretion of President Arévalo and has instructed the Guatemalan Minister in London to publish a denial. Meanwhile, the New York Times of the 23rd June has printed a letter from Señor Silva Peña which ventilates Guatemala's demand for ex aequo et bono treatment of her "case," declares that British Honduras has been hindered from "incorporating itself into the national economy of Guatemala"(!), and forms the conclusion that the economic progress of Guatemala requires that "the illegal English colony of Belize disappear . . . ."

This overture to the United States public follows a Guatemalan approach to the State Department, to whom Señor Silva Peña some time ago suggested the holding of conversations on the possibility of settling the "Belize question." Señor Silva Peña seems to have proposed that the State Department should facilitate informal conversations in Washington between British and Guatemalan representatives "and others" with a view to an out-of-court settlement. It is not clear exactly what part Señor Silva Peña might expect the State Department to play, but the additional phrase "and others" suggests that, having declined this country's offer to submit the case to the International Court, he hopes to mobilise Pan-American sentiment on Guatemala's behalf.

Paraguay

In the Paraguayan War both sides continue to put out statements of alleged victories in the region of Pedro Juan Caballero (opposite the Brazilian town of Ponta-Porã). It is reported from Rio de Janeiro that the Brazilian and Argentine Governments have agreed on a basis for mediation which would be submitted to the Paraguayan Government by a Brazilian representative.

THE UNITED NATIONS

On the 26th June the United Nations celebrated the second anniversary of the signing of the Charter with broadcasts from the Secretary-General, M. Spaak, President of the First General Assembly and spokesman of the Five Great Powers. All tempered disappointment with hope. "Why conceal the disillusions brought about by these two years?" said M. Spaak. Mr. Attlee urged his listeners not to let disputes in the Security Council make them forget the constructive work in social and economic fields. M. Ramadier thought man had gone far in the short space of two years on his road to Utopia, which he had been seeking since the birth of civilisation. President Truman pledged his people to continue working actively and consistently for the United Nations, "the hope of the world for lasting peace" and not to be discouraged by temporary setbacks. President Chiang Kai-shek said that all obstacles could be surmounted if all nations wished to subordinate their national interests to the common good. M. Gromyko expressed the hope that the United Nations would be able to "overcome the defects in its operation, so as to become a real and effective weapon in the struggle for peace and security of all peoples," and M.Trygve Lie exhorted people to raise their spirits and believe in the ability of the United Nations operating on a basis of respect for national sovereignty to work out a lasting and peaceful solution to the problems that beset the world. All agreed that success tarried only for goodwill.

The Balkans Commission

The Security Council began its study of the Balkan Commission's Report on the 27th June (see Summary No. 397 under "Greece"). Senator Warren Austin seized upon the essentials of the Report: (1) Yugoslavia, and to a less extent Albania and Bulgaria, had aided the guerilla movement in Greece, (2) the United Nations should maintain a semi-permanent commission in Greece in order to prevent a continuance of this aid and to restore good neighbourliness along Greece's northern frontier, (3) if, in spite of this, Greece's northern neighbours kept up their intervention, their conduct should be regarded as "a threat to the peace," (4) for the present the Council should act under Chapter VI of the Charter. Giving these four points their obvious meaning he proposed for the Council a course which promised action and startled by its simplicity. His speech was incidentally a noteworthy declaration of U.S. policy towards the United Nations.

All members of the United Nations were, he said, bound to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State. There were many devious ways of employing force, such as "infiltration, intimidation and subterfuge." A member of the United Nations, Yugoslavia, and two other States "which no doubt expected one day to become members," by using "force," had violated the principles upon which the United Nations were founded. The Security Council therefore had two duties—to prevent a recurrence of intervention by means of the Commission, which should see that frontiers were safe, and to take action if intervention continued. Since continued intervention would be a "threat to the peace," action would come under Chapter 7 of the Charter, i.e., Sanctions, economic and in the last resort military. This was the striking feature of the U.S. representative's speech: he was bold enough to say "the continued use of force in violation of the Charter must be regarded by the United Nations as requiring enforcement measures."

Senator Austin tabled a long resolution on the further action to be taken by the Security Council, in line with the Commission's Report.

According to the resolution the proposed frontier Commission would be a subsidiary organ of the Council. It would consist of representatives of each of the members of the Council. Its duties would be to settle by means mentioned in Article 33 of the Charter controversies arising from frontier violations disputes over the carrying out of frontier conventions or complaints about border conditions. It would have wide powers of investigation. It would study the situation and put its good offices at the disposal of Governments, in order to secure the acceptance of its recommendations. It would keep a register of all persons who cross or have crossed the frontier; assist in the return of those who wish to be repatriated, if called upon by any of the Governments concerned, to supervise the transfer of minorities. It would draw up a register of those who wished to emigrate. Its headquarters would be Salonica. It should be able to act on either side of the frontier, and to call upon nationals and officials of the four Balkan States to give evidence before it. It would establish its own rules of procedure, and send quarterly reports to the Council. It would, in short, be a body capable of ensuring peace in these disturbed regions, if the will to peace existed.

SPECIAL ARTICLE

THE FREE TERRITORY OF TRIESTE—I

On the 1st July, 1946, the Foreign Ministers gave up the attempt to settle the rival claims of Italy and Yugoslavia to the city of Trieste and agreed to set up an International Territory, finally constituted as the Free Territory of Trieste by Article 21 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy.(1) It was stipulated that the integrity and independence of the Territory should be secured by the Security Council of the United Nations. The boundaries of the new State are to be finally determined on the spot by Boundary Commissions composed of representatives of the two Governments concerned (Art. 5), but the general line of the frontiers is described in Articles 4 and 22. The frontier between Italy and the territory is a short one, starting from a point on the new frontier (the French line) between Italy and Yugoslavia approximately two kilometres north-east of the village of San Giovanni and running out into the Gulf of Panzano about 2 kilometres west of Duino (Art. 4). The frontier with Yugoslavia starts from the same point and follows the French line—i.e. it runs in a south-easterly direction approximately seven kms. from the sea to a point about four kms. north of the railway from Trieste to Cosina, then runs in a south-westerly direction till it reaches the river Quieto north of Visinada, and from their follows the river to the sea (Art. 22). [See accompanying Map.]

The Territory has an area of about 310 square miles, and, according to the census of 1936, a population of about 343,000, of whom over 248,000 live in the city of Trieste and its immediate suburbs, and the rest in 16 small communes and in the surrounding country. Over 70 per cent. of the inhabitants are Italians. (According to the 1910 Census, the only one accepted by the U.S.S.R., 73 per cent. were then Italians and 27 per cent. Yugoslavs.)

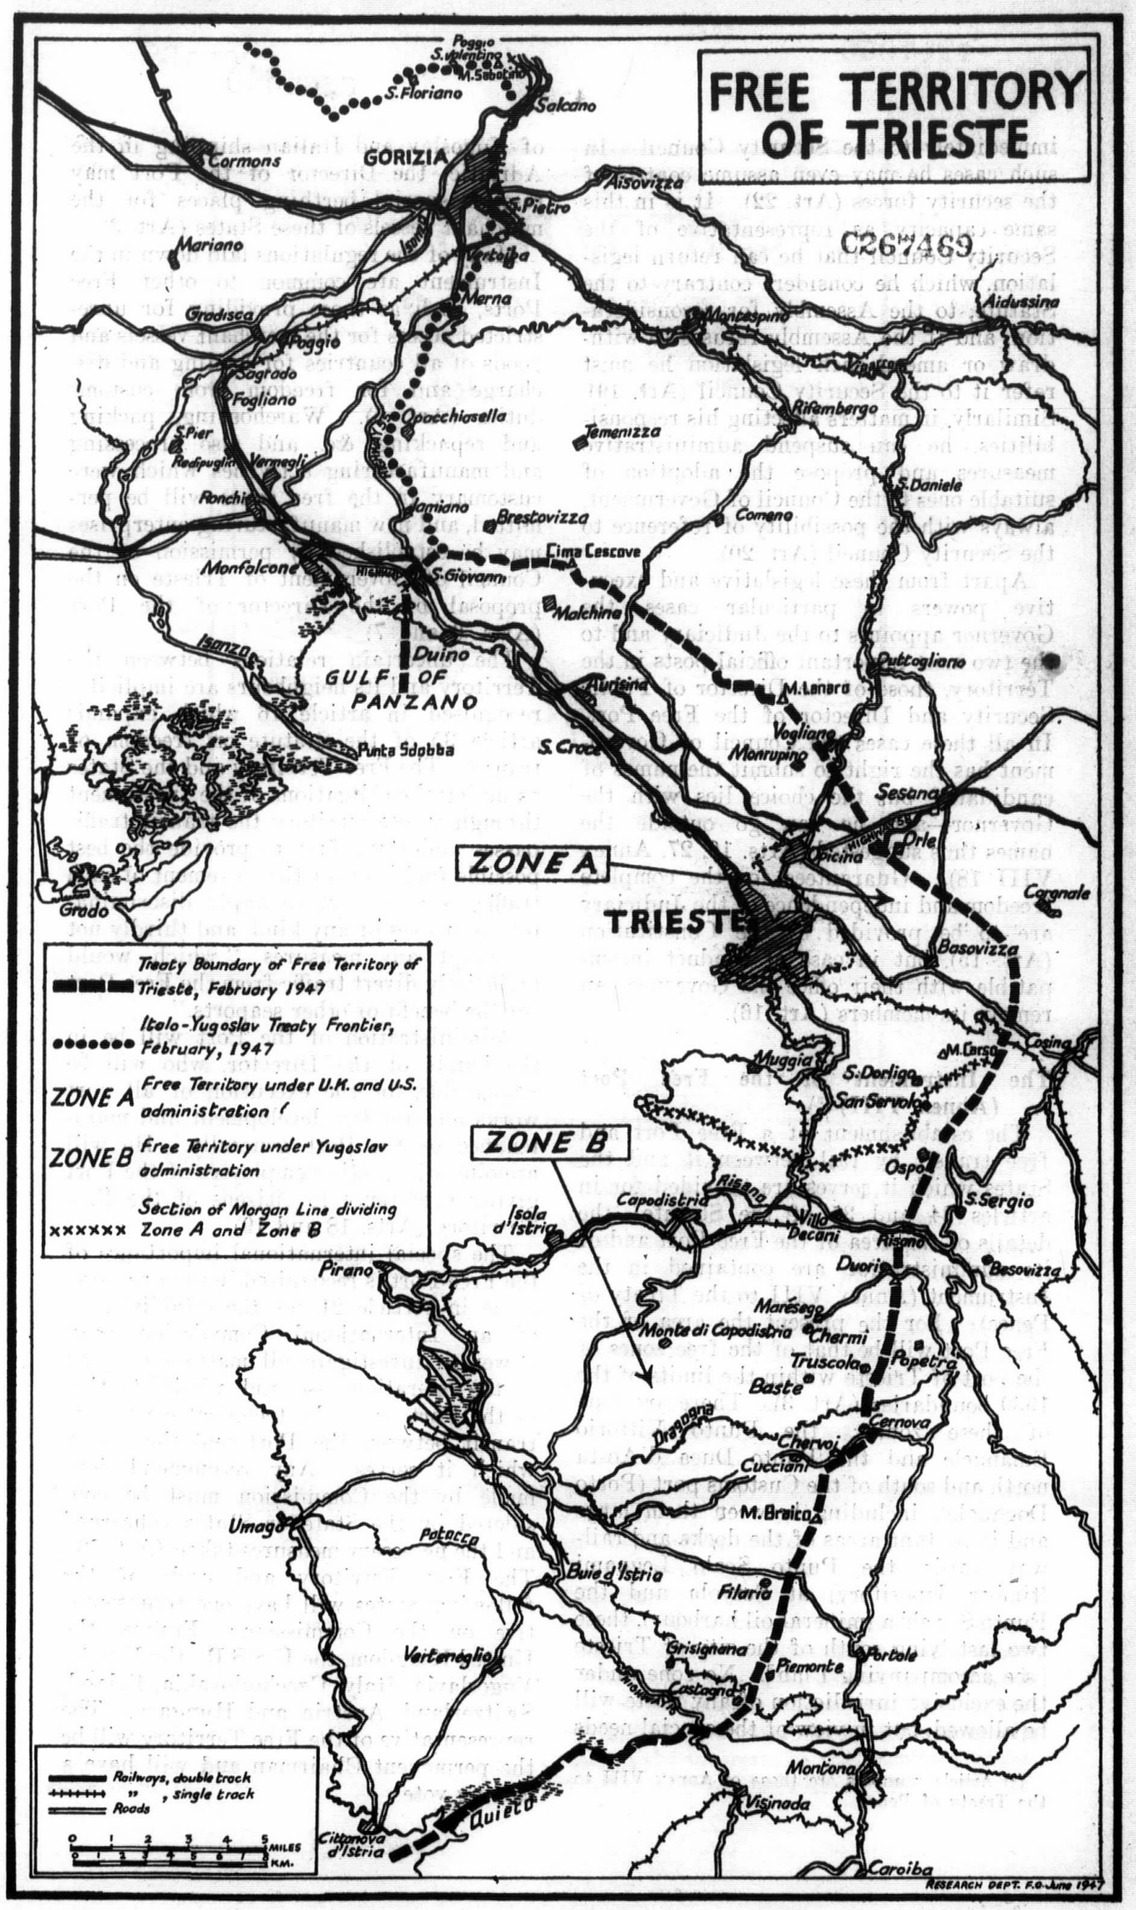
Yugoslavia is aggrieved because she has failed to obtain the great city and port of Trieste, but Italy laments the loss of a great Italian town, which was a centre of Italian irredentist feeling from 1860 to 1918, and in which Italy had done much to build up a flourishing industry during the inter-war period.

As soon as the Treaty comes into force, i.e. on its ratification by the U.K., the U.S.A., the U.S.S.R. and France, Italian sovereignty over the area will end, and the Territory will be governed in accordance with the Provisional Régime (Annex VII) until the Security Council fixes the date for the coming into force of the Permanent Statute (Annex VI). But, although the Provisional Régime may be expected to come into force shortly, it was drawn up by the Foreign Ministers after the Permanent Statute had been agreed, and its provisions are largely concerned with clearing the ground for the Permanent Régime; it therefore seems best to examine first the main provisions of the Permanent Statute together with Annex VIII, the Instrument for the Free Port which is established by Article 34 of the Statute.

The Permanent Statute (Annex VI) [2]

The first three articles define the relations between the Territory and the Security Council of the United Nations which is made responsible for ensuring the observance of the Statute—in particular the protection of the basic human rights of the inhabitants, and the maintenance of public order and security. The Territory is to be demilitarized and neutral, and no armed forces will be allowed in it except by the Security Council. Provision is next made for the rights of inhabitants. The Constitution (Art. 4) is required to ensure the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms by all persons under the Territory's jurisdiction. Original citizenship will belong to Italian citizens who were domiciled in the Territory on the 10th June, 1940, and to their children born after that date, but the Government must provide that such citizens over the age of 18, whose customary language is Italian, may opt for Italian citizenship within six months of the coming into force of the Constitution (Art. 6). Both Italian and Slovene will be official languages (Art. 7).

The greater part of the Statute is concerned with government and administration in the Territory and with the respective powers of the four organs of Government described in Article 9—the Governor, the Council of Government, the popular Assembly and the Judiciary. The Constitution, established in accordance with democratic principles, is to be adopted by a Constituent Assembly with a two-thirds majority of the votes cast (Art. 10), but the Statute in fact lays down specific details on the nature of the Constitution. The legislative body will be the Popular Assembly consisting of a single chamber elected on the basis of proportional representation by the citizens of both sexes and by universal, equal, direct and secret suffrage (Art. 12). Executive authority, subject to certain responsibilities specifically vested in the Governor, will be exercised by the Council of Government, appointed by and responsible to the Assembly (Art. 13). This Council can also initiate legislation (Art. 19) and will be responsible for the preparation of the Budget and for its submission to the Assembly (Art. 21). Normally, the Council will control the Director of Public Security (Art. 27).



Provision is thus made for a popularly elected legislative body with an executive chosen by and responsible to it. But the central figure in the Territory is the Governor. He is to be appointed by the Security Council after consultation with the Governments of Yugoslavia and Italy, and is to be—> "responsible, as the representative of the Security Council, for supervising the observance of the present Statute, including the protection of the basic human rights of its inhabitants, and for ensuring that public order and security are maintained by the Government of the Free Territory in accordance with the present Statute, the Constitution and laws of the Free Territory."

He is to be appointed for five years and may be reappointed, and his salary is to be borne by the United Nations. He may not be a citizen of Yugoslavia or of Italy or of the Territory (Arts. 11 and 17).

The wide discretionary powers of the Governor arise in fact from his position as representative of the Security Council. Normally, as has been seen, legislative and executive powers belong respectively to the Assembly and to the Council of Government, but "in matters which in his view affect the responsibilities of the Security Council as defined in Article 2" he can initiate legislation (Art. 19) and even "directly order the execution of appropriate measures," provided that he reports immediately to the Security Council. In such cases he may even assume control of the security forces (Art. 22). It is in this same capacity as representative of the Security Council that he can return legislation, which he considers contrary to the Statute, to the Assembly for reconsideration, and if the Assembly refuses to withdraw or amend such legislation he must refer it to the Security Council (Art. 19). Similarly, in matters affecting his responsibilities, he can suspend administrative measures and propose the adoption of suitable ones to the Council of Government, always with the possibility of reference to the Security Council (Art. 20).

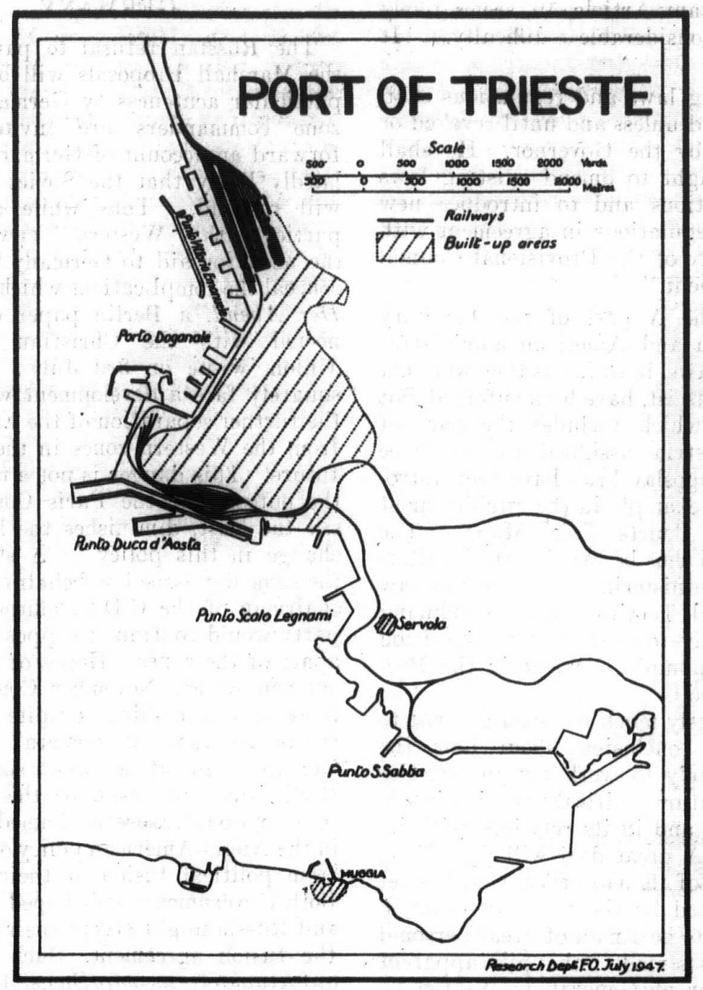
Apart from these legislative and executive powers in particular cases, the Governor appoints to the Judiciary and to the two most important official posts in the Territory, those of the Director of Public Security and Director of the Free Port. In all these cases the Council of Government has the right to submit the names of candidates, but the choice lies with the Governor—and he can go outside the names thus suggested (Arts. 16, 27, Annex VIII 18). Guarantees for the complete freedom and independence of the Judiciary are to be provided by the Constitution (Art. 15), but in case of conduct incompatible with their office the Governor can remove its members (Art. 16).

The Instrument of the Free Port (Annex VIII) (3)

The establishment of a Free Port and free transit by rail between it and the States which it serves are provided for in articles 34 and 35 of the Statute; the details of the area of the Free Port and of its administration are contained in the Instrument (Annex VIII to the Treaty of Peace). For the present the area of the Free Port will be that of the free zones of the port of Trieste within the limits of the 1939 boundaries (Art. 3). There are four of these zones: the Punto Vittorio Emanuele and the Punto Duca d'Aosta north and south of the Customs port (Porto Doganale), including between them large and important areas of the docks and railway yards, the Punto Scalo Legnami (timber depository) at Servola and the Punto S. Sabba (mineral-oil harbour), these two last lying south of the city of Trieste [see accompanying Plan]. No zone under the exclusive jurisdiction of any State will be allowed, but in view of the special needs of Yugoslav and Italian shipping in the Adriatic, the Director of the Port may reserve special berthing places for the merchant vessels of these States (Art. 3).



Many of the regulations laid down in the Instrument are common to other Free Ports, such as those providing for unrestricted access for the merchant vessels and goods of all countries for loading and discharge and for freedom from customs duties (Art. 5). Warehousing, packing and repacking, &c., and also processing and manufacturing activities which were customary in the free zones will be permitted, and new manufacturing enterprises may be established by permission of the Council of Government of Trieste on the proposal of the Director of the Port (Arts. 6 and 7).

The uncertain relations between the Territory and its neighbours are implicitly recognised in article 16 which expands article 35 of the Statute on freedom of transit. The Free Territory and the States assuming the obligations of the Instrument through whose territory the transit traffic passes undertake first to provide the best possible facilities for the movement of such traffic, secondly not to apply discriminatory measures of any kind, and thirdly not to adopt any measures "which would artificially divert traffic from the Free Port for the benefit of other seaports."

Administration of the Port will be in the hands of the Director, who will be responsible for the execution of all port works and for the development and maintenance of the Port generally. He will appoint all the other employees of the Port giving preference to citizens of the Free Territory (Arts. 18 and 19).

The special international importance of the Free Port is recognised in the provision made in Article 21 for the establishment of an International Commission with power to investigate all matters relating to the operation, use and administration of the Port or to the technical aspects of transit between the Port and the States which it serves. Any recommendations made by the Commission must be considered by the State or States concerned and the necessary measures taken (Art. 23). The Free Territory and each of the following States will have one representative on the Commission: France, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A., Yugoslavia, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Switzerland, Austria and Hungary. The representative of the Free Territory will be the permanent Chairman and will have a casting vote.

The Provisional Statute (Annex VII) (4)

Formal ratification of the Treaty with the consequent establishment of the Free Territory is expected within the next fortnight, but the Governor of the Territory is unlikely to be appointed until some time after this. In the intervening period the Free Territory will be governed in accordance with Art. 1 of the Provisional Statute, which states that pending assumption of office by the Governor the Territory will continue to be administered by A.M.G. Without a Governor the Provisional Statute cannot come into force, for, although as far as possible administration is to be from the first on the lines of the Permanent Statute (Art. 2), the establishment of the Government is in the Governor's hands. He is to select a Provisional Council of Government from among persons domiciled in the Territory after consultation with the Governments of Yugoslavia and Italy (Art. 2), and in consultation with this Council is to organize the elections of members of the Constituent Assembly, these elections to be held within four months of the Governor's assumption of office (Art. 8).

The difficult task before the Governor is indicated in Article 4, which lays down that "the first concern of the Governor shall be to ensure the maintenance of public order and security. He shall appoint on a provisional basis a Director of Public Security who will reorganize and administer the police force and security services." For 90 days the Governor will have at his disposal a limited number of Allied troops, 5,000 from the United Kingdom, 5,000 from the U.S.A., and 5,000 from Yugoslavia. After that period the troops will cease to be at his disposal and will be withdrawn within 45 days, unless the Governor advises the Security Council that, in the interests of the Territory, some or all should not be withdrawn.

One important Article, 10, seems likely to cause considerable difficulty. It states :—

" Existing laws and regulations shall remain valid unless and until revoked or suspended by the Governor. He shall have the right to amend existing laws and regulations and to introduce new laws and regulations in agreement with the majority of the Provisional Council of Government."

In the Zone A part of the Territory under British and American administration Italian laws, in so far as they were not specifically Fascist, have been enforced, but in Zone B, which includes the part of north-west Istria assigned to the Free Territory, Yugoslav laws have been introduced, as for example in the establishment of People's Courts [see Map]. The Governor will thus be faced with the alternative of administering two forms of law inside his small Territory or of introducing measures likely to cause bitter opposition from the Communist element in the Provisional Council.

It is obviously much too soon to come to any definite conclusion about how the Statute is likely to work out in practice or as to the future political situation inside the Territory and in its relations with its neighbours. A great deal will depend on the character of the Governor, who has yet to be appointed by the Security Council. He will need to be a man of great personal courage, as was made unhappily apparent by the murder of General de Winton by Maria Pasquinelli. He has been given considerable powers by the Statute, but, in addition, if the right man is appointed, a man who is both conciliatory and firm, his position will be greatly strengthened because he will have been in authority from the first beginnings of the new State. It is impossible to say what the results of the elections will be; Trieste is full of cross-currents, political as well as national. There is not only the question of Italian versus Slav; there is a small middle-class group of people who are striving above all for an independent Trieste, there are the usual Italian political parties and there is the strong Communist movement among the workers, Italians as well as Slovenes. In their sympathy with the Italian desire to retain an Italian city inside the frontiers of Italy, many British people have perhaps failed to recognise that Communism may prove stronger than nationalism among a majority of the Territory's workers.

[To be concluded]

GERMANY

The Russian refusal to participate in the Marshall Proposals will be felt with particular acuteness by Germany. If the zone commanders are invited to put forward an account of German needs it is hardly likely that the Soviet commander will respond. Thus while all German parties with " Western " views insist on the need for aid to Germany they do not conceal the complications which may result. Der Abend, a Berlin paper closely connected with the Christian Democratic Union, wrote on 3rd July: " We must squarely face a development which means the further separation of the Eastern zones from the Western zones in the immediate future. This danger is not a new one, but the outcome of the Paris Conference, to say the least, diminishes the hope of any change in this policy." A statement on the same day issued on behalf of the Berlin chairman of the C.D.U. affirmed that the party would continue to oppose the falling apart of the zones. Hopes of a successful outcome of the November Conference are likewise diminishing, despite such statements as that of General Clay. The General said at a press conference in Berlin that the result of the Paris Conference would cause no immediate change in the Anglo-American policy of refraining from political fusion of their two zones. Both Governments still hoped that France and Russia might accept their offer to join the fusion agreement. Such patience is unfortunately incomprehensible to many a German man-in-the-street. An official report on morale in the British zone during June showed that rumours of an impending war between East and West, which have cropped up ever since the capitulation, are now widely current.

Comments by the Socialist Unity Party (SED) on the latest developments in Paris are broadly on the lines laid down by Moscow. Berliner Zeitung, a paper with SED leanings, writes that the German people had cause to feel particularly pained by a split between West and East brought about by West-European economic union. The SED itself has declared that the so-called economic aid was only intended to conceal an attack on the independence of small States. Leipzig Radio alleged that Anglo-French proposals to exploit Germany's industrial capacity touched on this issue only from the point of view of the interests of other nations. Germany in fact figured only as an industrial colony. It is too early to say exactly how the Russians will defend their policy to the inhabitants of the Soviet zone if the Western zones alone should receive economic assistance from the United States. It is only obvious that Russia will continue to proclaim one of her main tasks to be the positive one of rebuilding a peaceful German economy. She will also pursue her policy of tightening trade relations between Germany and Eastern Europe. At present purely material conditions in the Soviet zone are probably slightly better than in the Western zones. Although the occupation troops have to be fed the ration shortages are not quite so acute as in the British zone, since the area was approximately self-supporting before the war. A very high proportion of all current production is taken as reparation but even so there may be more consumer goods available to the inhabitants than there are in the West; finally the policy of full production and full employment may well have made the population feel up till now that, once reparation claims are satisfied, the economic—as distinct from the political—future may not be so grim for them.

A tentative proposal for a loan to Germany was recently made to General Clay by representatives of the Chase National Bank. They apparently mentioned the figure of 500,000,000 dollars and they suggested that transactions should be carried through by a Corporation in the United States. General Clay replied that the right procedure would be to set up a Corporation in Germany. There have as yet been no formal negotiations. It is of some interest that Adenauer is reported to have stated privately that to his knowledge a major American loan to German industry was being negotiated. This may have been little more than guess work but Adenauer's remarks in this connection are important. He stated that help for German reconstruction could come only from the United States. Not only did Britain lack the financial ability to help but she did not even want to help and British industrialists were trying to prevent German competition in the world market. Moreover, Britain had no firm policy towards Russia. This meant that Germany, particularly the Christian Democratic Union, must adapt itself to the economic, political and constitutional ideas of the United States.

A wholehearted welcome for the Marshall proposals was given by Dr. Schumacher when he spoke at the second post-war inter-zonal conference of the SPD held in Nuremberg on the 29–30th June. He voiced the feeling of a growing number of Germans, however, when he regretted that Germany was not represented at discussions—since this might have " fatal consequences, first of all for Germany and also for Europe." In the course of a long speech on a variety of topics he accused the Allied Powers of stifling German initiative and said: " We cannot be reproached for our lack of unity if we are not given the power to create that unity." On the subject of reparations he demanded that the loss of the Eastern territories should be added to the account of what Germany had paid the victors. He made a special appeal for friendship with France—this despite the continued distrust of the French authorities towards Dr. Schumacher and most of his works. No less than 12 foreign Socialist parties were represented at the conference. Both British and French speakers declared, according to the press, that their parties wished to see an end of the occupation.

The disagreement over four-Power control of Berlin government has been carried one stage higher. At a meeting of the co-ordinating committee on the 3rd July the Russian representative proposed that the City Assembly should be informed that Reuter was unacceptable as Lord Mayor. The Russians accused him of being incapable, disloyal to the occupying Powers and possessed of an " obscure " political past. The British representative replied that these allegations were only of a general nature and unsupported by evidence. Unless the Russians could produce something better than that they could not expect the British to reject Reuter. The American representative then reversed the unhelpful attitude taken by his colleague in the Kommandatura and attacked the Russians for undemocratic behaviour. The French representative was faced with a somewhat embarrassing choice since he had evidently been relieved when the Americans showed signs in the Kommandatura of wishing to avoid a fight. Eventually General Bapst supported the Anglo-American proposal for a full report on Reuter. This the Russians refused, and the matter will be discussed again. There is evidence that the opposition to Reuter is prompted more by the desire to overthrow SPD leadership in the government than by personal animosity. Hermann Matern, chairman of the Berlin SED, has openly admitted having proposed to the SPD that they should join with the SED in carrying out a programme for the future government of Berlin. In return the SED would support Reuter's candidature. The fact that the SED accuses Reuter of supporting the Nazis did not embarrass Herr Matern in the slightest.

The general reticence about food shortages in the French zone has at last been abandoned in South Baden. At the meeting of the Assembly on the 12th June all four parties presented a resolution calling for an investigation into the cause of the present food crisis and into measures taken to combat it. The resolution, while expressing thanks to Military Government for the minor palliatives they were able to offer, said that the population no longer had faith in promises. They could not work the full hours, and public safety was threatened. Unless decisive steps were taken the whole food system would break down. Spokesmen said that the figures fixed for the potato quotas had not been reached, and the crop would be even worse this year because of lack of seed. The milk and fat quotas set were largely impracticable because the majority of peasants only owned 1 or 2 cows, most of them draught animals. Grain deliveries had almost come up to the mark, but even if all deliveries were perfect and even with the new scheme of bonuses for excess delivery there would not be enough food. The resolution sharply criticised deliveries of cattle for the occupying Powers and called for more grain imports. Dr. Schmid of South Wuerttemberg, when he spoke at the Munich Conference, confirmed that the French zone, as a former surplus agricultural area, has to make substantial food deliveries to the occupation forces owing to the acute shortages in France. The occupying forces have recently suffered a cut in their rations, but there are still several thousand French school children to be fed by the zone. Rations are if anything on a smaller scale than those actually distributed in the British zone and have been so throughout the occupation, but as this is a mainly non-industrial area the hardship to the inhabitants has probably been less acute. Very few indications of public discontent on this subject are allowed to leak into the local press.

The Communist Party of the Saar has withdrawn its only representative from the Saar Administrative Committee on the ground that it could not tolerate the Committee's acquiescence in French policy. In turn this representative, Robert Neufang, announced in mid-June that he had resigned from the Communist Party. He believed that many Communists agreed with him in favouring economic union of the Saar with France and objected to the party's practice of labelling all its opponents "undemocratic." It is possible that the party will now lose some more members.

As forecast last week, the U.S. army is to be made responsible for the actual feeding of displaced persons in their zone. It was announced on the 4th July that the Military Commission of the International Refugee Organisation had taken over the duties of UNRRA and will look after the general interests of displaced persons.

AUSTRIA

The Austrian Cabinet on 9th July decided to accept the Anglo-French invitation to the Paris Conference on the Marshall proposals. The anticipated opposition from the solitary Communist member of the Cabinet failed to materialise, and the Cabinet's acceptance was unanimous. Previous to the announcement of this decision, the Communist organ Volksstimme had taken some trouble to warn its readers of the insidious implications of the project, under which Austria's position would be "practically that of a semi-colony." The Socialist Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Shaerf, is reported to have expressed the hope that Austria may be able to take a part in a European plan and make her contribution to the reconstruction of the Continent without becoming involved "in a whirlpool of conflicting views between East and West." Austria is to be represented at the Paris talks by a non-political committee of experts led by Dr. Vollgruber, the Austrian Minister in Paris.

Austria's desire to take an active part in European and international affairs has been emphasised recently in speeches and press articles. These have stressed Austria's need for independence both in relation to speedy conclusion of the Treaty and also as regards remaining aloof from any bloc of Great Powers. With these two ends in view Austria's "natural obligation" to join the United Nations has been urged by the Chancellor and the Foreign Minister, who have both pleaded the necessity for a free Austria if the peace of Europe is to last. The need for Austria to steer a middle course and "to meet the storms from East and West alike as Austrians pure and simple" has also been stressed by the three-party paper, Neues Oesterreich.

Discussions in the Austrian Treaty Commission have been cencentrated on the oil problem, with particular reference to the (post-Anschluss) Bitumen Law of 1938, under which prospecting and production rights of foreign owners were reallocated as concessions or contracts to Reich German firms. The Soviet Delegation insist on the validity of this Law and have sought also to prove that it did not discriminate against "foreign" firms and was not Nazi in character. Soviet insistence on the "normal" character of the Bitumen Law and also on the part played by the Germans in the development of the Zistersdorf oilfields is, of course, directed towards establishing the maximum "German" character of the Austrian oil assets. All the Western Delegations contend that the Law, at least in its application, was both discriminatory and Nazi in character. The actual validity of the Law is being seriously contested by the U.S. Delegation; the U.K. Delegation are more concerned to prove that many if not all of the contracts granted under the Law are either already invalid or liable to termination. Under the Law (which is still in force) the exploration and exploitation rights for Austrian oil belong exclusively to the Austrian State, and the United Kingdom Delegation therefore propose to advance the argument that the Soviet Government could only take over the contracts granted to the Germans under the Law, including their obligations and limitations as well as their rights.

Both the Yugoslav and Polish Governments have protested to the U.S. authorities in Austria against the U.S. decision not to prolong the permits of their respective repatriation missions in the U.S. zone. The Yugoslav Government allege that the "expulsion" of the Yugoslav Delegation will result in Yugoslav Displaced Persons being left at the mercy of Yugoslav "criminals and collaborators" in the zone, while the Polish Government seem to fear increased recruitment of Polish labour for foreign countries. The number of repatriable Yugoslav and Polish nationals left in the U.S. zone is comparatively small, and the International Refugee Organisation will shortly be taking over the care of the Displaced Persons. By the 31st March, 1947, 92 per cent. of the Poles and 78 per cent. of the Yugoslavs in the U.S. zone had been repatriated; there remained only some 4,000 Poles and rather more than 5,000 Yugoslavs, of whom 2,000 and 4,000 respectively had been classed as non-repatriable; the remainder were scheduled to be repatriated over the next three months at the monthly rate of 300 and 200 respectively.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Czechoslovak Government have decided to accept the Anglo-French invitation to attend the Paris Conference, stating that their delegation will be led by M. Nosek, the Czechoslovak Ambassador in Paris. Their acceptance constitutes the most encouraging news to come, as yet, from the Slav countries.

The Czechoslovak reply to the invitation to participate in the reconstruction of European economy had been awaited with evident curiosity by the Western Powers, more particularly perhaps by America which sees in the ultimate Czechoslovak reaction a clue to the strength of Soviet influence in the Republic. At variance, however, with their earlier caution, the Czechs have now shown themselves in a bolder light; the Commission, recently appointed by the Government to examine further procedure with relation to the Marshall offer (see last week's Summary), unanimously agreed under the chairmanship of the Foreign Minister, M. Masaryk, to co-operate; it therefore recommended the Government to empower M. Masaryk to acquaint the British, French and Soviet Governments with Czechoslovakia's positive intentions. This shift in opinion, encouraged by the increasing interest displayed by Poland and influenced, no doubt, by political as well as economic considerations arising from the Soviet refusal to participate, has led the Czechs to assume the initiative—a step which conforms to their self-imposed mission of acting as a link between East and West.

The latest development is that a delegation, headed by M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister, and M. Masaryk, has left for Moscow in order to discuss the situation and to "find out the real facts behind last week's Paris talks." The results of the Moscow talks—a new economic treaty with Russia may result—and of what will transpire at Paris will have far-reaching effects upon Czechoslovak plans for commercial recovery and internal reconstruction. It is upon the success of her economic planning that the new social system in the Republic largely depends; hence it is logical for the Czechs to emphasise the benefits accruing from economic co-operation rather than to be swayed temporarily by political considerations respecting Soviet Russia. It is interesting to note that Czechoslovakia accepted the Paris invitation before deciding to send a delegation to Moscow, the inference being that not even the Communists dared to neglect this opportunity of putting the European house into some semblance of order.

Equally important, though from a regional angle only, the negotiations which have been in progress between the Czechoslovak and Polish Governments since the signing of the Treaty of Alliance (March 1947) have resulted in the conclusion of a broad economic agreement. Briefly the agreement (all political and territorial questions have been excluded) provides for the closest collaboration so that the two economies will dovetail. A Joint Council of Economic Co-operation will be set up along with various sub-commissions dealing with transport, finance, agriculture, and scientific collaboration, while a number of mixed committees will deal with problems affecting, inter alia, the steel, mining, chemical and textile industries. There will be joint exploitation of the Polish maritime and riverine ports and of the Danubian ports; a committee will be appointed to plan the Oder–Danube canal. Polish estimates claim that trade between the two countries for the year 1947–48 was likely to be almost five times as great as in the pre-War period. A cultural agreement was also signed and the Treaty of Alliance ratified.

Czechoslovakia has entered into trade agreements with Italy and the Argentine.

(See also under "Hungary" and "Poland.")

POLAND

A Tass Agency report was the first indication that Poland would not be represented at the Paris talks. The Polish Government were placed in an awkward position by the refusal of M. Molotov to continue with further discussions of the Marshall Proposals. As indicated in Summary No. 397, the general background of Polish economy tends to bring it into relations not only with the Soviet Union, Central Europe and the Balkans, but also with Scandinavia and the Atlantic countries. The Government were hoping to obtain loans from the United States, and Poland was, of course, one of the chief recipients of U.N.R.R.A. aid. At the time of the Marshall offer officials in the economic departments in Warsaw were manifestly eager to enter into discussions.

That the joint Polish-Czechoslovak plans for economic development in Central Europe (see also under "Czechoslovakia") would undoubtedly be affected by any developments arising out of the American scheme is evidenced by the sudden diplomatic exchanges between Warsaw and Prague, and Prague and Moscow. The Polish press has been cautious in its comments on the Soviet refusal, and, while the possibilities of joining in the next Paris meeting without Russian co-operation are being sounded out, the United States has been treated with somewhat unusual friendliness. During his visit to Prague M. Cyrankiewicz made a press statement on the 4th July, summing up the Polish attitude as "positive." "The American offer," he said, "must be similar to the aid given during the war. . . . It would have been catastrophic during the war if the Allies had parted ways, but it would be just as catastrophic in peace time if disagreement arose between the three Great Powers in the economic field. To-day, just as during the war, there is a German danger, and it will be met in complete unity."

As a background to Polish comments on America, it is to be noted that the F.A.O. Mission arrived in Warsaw on the 4th July, on the same day also as Colonel Harrison, special representative of the United States Department of Agriculture. He will investigate Polish needs, and confer with the F.A.O. Mission, with the delegation from the International Bank already in Poland, and with the United States Relief Mission. The last is concerned with the grant to Poland of American assistance valued at $68 million.

The nationwide celebrations which ended on the 29th June were proof of the increased interest and importance of the Baltic coast-line to the new Poland. There is a parallel with the phenomenal rise of Gdynia after the 1914–18 war in the energetic manner in which the Government have pushed forward the revival of the three major ports now under Polish sovereignty—Gdynia, Gdansk (Danzig) and Szczecin (Stettin). Control over the Oder (at least its right bank) and Vistula river systems, which compose what is regarded as the Polish "homeland," is of great historical, as well as economic, significance to the Poles. The rebuilding and development of the Baltic ports forms an integral part of the Three Year Plan. President Bierut, speaking at one of the demonstrations held at Szczecin on the 29th June, said that the target set for the ports in 1947 was a turnover of 13,700,000 tons; in 1949, 26 million tons. The sea fleet, which at the outbreak of war consisted of 71 ships totalling 102,000 gross registered tons, was now 42 ships totalling 150,000 tons, and would by 1949 rise to 60 ships totalling 254,000 tons.

The development of Szczecin, in particular, and the proposed Oder–Danube Canal, are subjects of special interest to the Czechs, and are under discussion at the moment. Official statements on the subject put the present loading capacity of Szczecin for coal and ore at 1,375,000 tons per annum; by 1949 this figure should rise to 5 million tons for coal alone.

Warsaw Radio reported on the 4th July a statement made in the House of Commons by Mr. Mayhew, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, in reply to a question, that the British Government did not recognise the claims of M. Zaleski to the title of President of the Polish Republic, or the existence of a Polish Government in Britain.

THE SOVIET UNION

The Soviet post-mortem on the Paris Conference has revealed no unforeseen complications. Pravda has returned a tu quoque to the charges made in the American press that the Soviet Government had from the start had no real intention of co-operating, by asserting that the conveners of the conference had consciously aimed at disrupting it "in order to free their hands for further actions." Great Britain and France, according to Pravda, "had entered on a path which had nothing in common with the interests of international co-operation, with the true interests of the peoples of Europe." In a more sober assessment, New Times exposed what is probably the real core of the Soviet objection to the Marshall offer, namely that it might involve a recasting of the economic plans now being launched in the countries within the Soviet orbit. M. Molotov had hammered home the same point in his speech at the Conference, instancing the possibility of pressure being put on Poland to produce more coal or on Czechoslovakia to increase her agricultural output at the expense of machine-building and so on—to suit American interests. The Soviet Union, now trying to hoist itself up by its own boot straps, is clearly determined that its satellites shall do likewise, unless American help is to be had for nothing. According to New Times this would be the barest justice; the United States, owing to the increase of her national wealth during and since the war, was "morally obliged" to help the countries ravaged by Hitler on their own terms. No "co-operation between horse and horseman" could be tolerated.

So far there has been no reply from Moscow to Mr. Marshall's speech of the 1st July vindicating American policy. Only a few Russians, headed by M. Malik, deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, attended the Independence Day celebrations at the American Embassy in Moscow. MM. Molotov and Vyshinsky were conspicuous by their absence.

In spite of its haughty repudiation of foreign help the Soviet Government does appear to realise that its public, in so far as it is aware of what goes on, is seriously disturbed and disappointed at the failure of the talks, since success might have meant some slight relaxation of austerity. Evidence of this is the aggressively complacent tone of an editorial in Izvestiya (5th July) asserting that the Soviet people must have felt peculiar pride in reading of M. Molotov's stand in Paris. "Always we have relied on our own forces and always these forces have been sufficient for victory." From the height of Soviet Socialist ethics, said the writer, the injustice and cupidity of the bourgeois world could be clearly discerned. Any people who wished to take up some "up-to-date foreign-ism" were in fact behind the times and had lost the consciousness of their civic dignity. The article harped on Leninist ideology as the greatest achievement not only of Russian but of world culture and insisted on the irreconcilable and merciless attitude of this fighting ideology towards its foes. "A man who stands on the foundation of Marxism–Leninism stands head and shoulders above any bourgeois scientist with his idealistic ravings." Izvestiya went on to insist on the superiority of Soviet culture in the field of art and literature over bourgeois culture which was "drowning in a morass of mysticism and amorality."

The same inordinate self-satisfaction was reflected in the proceedings of the eleventh plenary session of the Board of the Soviet Writers Union which has just been held in Moscow. Fadeyev, the Secretary, reviewing the development of Soviet literature since the decree of the Communist Party ten months ago, expressed immense pride in the latest books which were realistically depicting the new morals of Soviet men and women. Alexander Korneichuk, President of the Ukrainian Authors Union, appealed to progressive American and British authors to counter the slanders being put out against the U.S.S.R. Considerable publicity is being given in the Soviet press to Ukrainian cultural contacts abroad, perhaps with a view to preparing the ground for the establishment of diplomatic relations by the Republic. The Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries is said to be very active, and the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences has received material from the Gold Coast Scientific and Historical Committee with a request for the establishment of scientific contacts. Tass has given full publicity to the cordial exchange of messages between the UNRRA team and M. Khrushchev, head of the Ukrainian Government, on the winding up of UNRRA's fifteen months of work in the Ukraine. There seems no doubt that the work of the mission was genuinely appreciated and that the members of the team had rare opportunities of gaining insight into the byways of Soviet life. Mr. Paul White's parting statement to Tass in the course of which he remarked that a new type of woman never before known to mankind had been evolved in the Soviet Union, must have been particularly gratifying.

With the opening of diplomatic relations between the U.S.S.R. and India the Soviet press is devoting attention to the Indian theme. There has so far been no comment on the appointment of Pandit Nehru's sister, Mrs. Viayalakshmi Pandit, to be the first Indian ambassador to the U.S.S.R., but Tass from Delhi transmitted a message from her in which she expressed her conviction of the need for good will and friendship between India and the U.S.S.R. in view of their position as neighbours. She hoped, besides telling the Soviet Union about the new India, to borrow from the U.S.S.R. certain things which would help to strengthen and consolidate her country. Dyakov, commenting in Izvestiya on the British plan for India, asserted that Britain, while formally granting independence, would in fact be able to maintain her control by playing on the religious and other differences existing among the weak individual states. This being so, it was not surprising that opponents of Indian independence such as "the Churchill group" favoured the plan which would in fact buttress all the forces of reaction in India and was bitterly opposed by all the progressive elements. Tass published the resolution of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of India on the British plan, which expressed the fear that in Pakistan especially the local feudal lords would attempt to divert the masses from the anti-imperialist struggle and direct them along religious paths.

Trud attacked British policy in Burma on similar lines, arguing that the agreement of 27th January perpetuated British colonial rule and complaining of the persecution of the Burmese Communist Party.

The first Soviet Minister to Siam since the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries in January 1947 has been appointed in the person of M. S. S. Nemchina. Nothing is known of him beyond the fact that he has been in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The Soviet Repatriation Mission in the British Zone of Germany has almost completed its work, all those Displaced Persons recognised by the British authorities as Soviet citizens having long since been repatriated. The Balts, who are in any case not regarded as Soviet citizens, are not likely to return home in any substantial numbers. General Vershinin, Chief Soviet Repatriation Officer in Berlin, and General Konovalov, head of the Soviet Commander-in-Chief's Mission in the British Zone, appeared to realise this as long ago as April, when they stated, on a visit to General Bishop, that the Soviet authorities did not wish to repatriate any Baltic nationals against their will, and that they proposed to wind up their mission after one final visit to the camps in an attempt to persuade waverers. Since then, however, General Konovalov has been dismissed and his successor, General Shikin, accompanied by General Bassilov from Moscow, informed General Bishop in June that no offer to withdraw the Soviet Mission had ever been made and that a long period of work in the British Zone was envisaged. The conclusion that the Mission is serving other purposes besides its official one appears inescapable.

The Soviet Government are strongly pressing at Paris for the Baltic Republics to remain separate members of the International Postal Union and have threatened to walk out if their demand is not satisfied.

The discovery of mass graves is not ended. An Extraordinary State Commission for Investigating Crimes of the German Fascist Aggressors has just arrived from Moscow in Poland, headed by M. Kudayavtsev and Professors Avdeyev and Nikitin. They have announced the finding of a grave of 70,000 Russian prisoners-of-war at Guty Bujne, east of Warsaw.

Denmark

Recent declarations by two prominent members of the Danish minority in South Schleswig, approving the October note of last year as having granted "Danism" sufficient security at least for the time being, provoked the Prime Minister into yet another ill-considered statement. Speaking at Ladelund, on the 21st June, M. Kristensen said that the statements referred to had greatly surprised him, as he had been under the impression that at any rate one of the two men shared his views on the subject. Now, however, he found that their statements were tantamount to a dissociation from the request made to the Allied Control Council for a referendum to be held in due course. It was, further, a dissociation from all circles in Denmark who held that the future status of South Schleswig should be decided by plebiscite. For these reasons M. Kristensen deplored the utterances as he felt convinced that, if the promise of a plebiscite were not fulfilled whilst the Allies were in occupation of Germany, it would not be fulfilled later. He felt certain, too, that the raising of this demand would pave the way for consideration of the other requests made in the note and on which everyone was agreed.

M. Kristensen's speech caused a storm of protests from nearly every quarter in Denmark. The Social Democrats reminded the Prime Minister of his declaration before the Rigsdag a few weeks ago, when he himself had said that the October note and the memorandum of last January formed the basis of Denmark's policy on the frontier question. The speech at Landelund was, therefore, a clear breach of a solemn undertaking given to the Lower Chamber. The Communists went a step further, and in a letter addressed to the Speakers of the two Chambers, their leader, M. A. Larsen, urged that an extraordinary session of the Folketing be called without delay. M. Kristensen's rather feeble reply to these accusations was that, although as Prime Minister he was bound by the declaration to the Lower Chamber, as a private citizen he was free to express his opinions and to fight for what he believed to be right.

On the 2nd July representatives of the different parties met the Speakers of the Rigsdag, and the question of convening an extraordinary session was considered. The Social Democrats favoured the proposal with a stipulation that a vote of censure should be passed on the Government leading to the issue of writs for a new election. Conservatives and Radicals, though both critical of M. Kristensen, were, however, not prepared to go to such lengths, and by siding with the Venstre Party prevented the Folketing from being summoned—thus postponing for some time a Government crisis which, it is felt, is bound to come sooner or later.

M. Arnth Jensen was appointed Minister of the Interior on the 30th June, in succession to M. Kjaer whose death was reported in Summary No. 397. Earlier reports stated that many members of the Government itself were opposed to the appointment, but that the Prime Minister insisted upon the inclusion of M. Jensen in the cabinet. The Government, however, still lacks a full complement, as on the same day M. J. Villemoes, Minister of Commerce, resigned for reasons of health. There is no evidence connecting the appointment of M. Jensen with this resignation.

Norway

On the 24th June the Government's proposition for an interim law for the regulation and control of prices was debated in the Odelsting. The bill, which perhaps has caused greater political controversy in Norway than any other event since the liberation, was characterised by Labour supporters as a long step towards economic democracy. The powers which it confers on the Government and the Price Directorate are indeed sweeping. Firms will not be permitted to cease or to curtail production or trading without Government sanction, and the starting of new enterprises or the extension of existing ones is made conditional upon the approval of the authorities. In addition manufacturers will be compelled to sell at prices determined by the State, and may be called upon to sell goods at lower prices on the home market than those obtainable abroad.

In his speech M. Brofoss, Minister of Finance, noted with satisfaction the agreement of all parties that continued control was necessary in this sphere. The Government had not, as some opposition speakers suggested, asked for the extensive authority embodied in the bill out of any passion for power or because of any desire to bypass the Storting, but merely in order to enable them to carry out an active and flexible price policy. Some persons, M. Brofoss concluded, still regarded it as revolutionary that the Norwegian workers should be granted equality also in economic matters. The time was not far distant, however, when the right of the workers to participate in the organisation and administration of business undertakings would be generally recognised. These were the fundamental rights upon which the conception of economic democracy rested.

It is perhaps significant that the opposition did not dispute the necessity of the law, but confined its criticisms to the constitutional aspect. The Storting, it was argued, ought not to delegate its powers in the manner proposed and ought to determine its attitude in each individual case. M. Brofoss brushed this aside by explaining that his department had recently dealt with the 30,000th price adjustment since the liberation.

On the whole the debate was conducted with great objectivity, and some Conservative speakers who opposed the measure even went as far as to condemn the press campaign which had been directed against M. Thargaard, the man largely responsible for framing the bill, by certain organs of the right-wing press. After being passed by the Odelsting on the 25th June, and by the Lagting three days later, the bill became law.

There can be no doubt that with the passage of this bill Norway has embarked on a daring pioneering experiment of State-controlled, though privately owned, enterprise the like of which has not previously been attempted in a free and democratic country. If strictly enforced it will make nationalisation, accompanied by the payment of huge sums in compensation, superfluous and not even desirable.

The law, it is true, is valid for one year only, but the Prime Minister has already stated that he hopes to see it superseded thereafter by a permanent price law on similar lines.

Finland

To Finland belongs the dubious distinction of being the first country "provisionally" to refuse, on "political and geographical" grounds, the invitation to participate in the Paris talks. The Diet which is in recess has naturally not been consulted, and it is doubtful even whether the Government as a whole has had a chance to consider the matter. Czechoslovakia's acceptance, announced on the 8th July, the day after the Finns had declined the invitation, may, however, cause the decision to be re-considered, and in the circumstances greater importance may perhaps be attached to the word "provisionally" than would otherwise have been warranted.

Representatives of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark are meeting in Copenhagen on the 9th July finally to determine their attitude. According to press reports all three have unofficially intimated their intentions to attend. The Icelandic Republic has unreservedly accepted the invitation.

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Belgium

Following publication of the Report on King Leopold's conduct during the war [see Summary No. 397], the King's position is further to be examined by the Belgian Government. The Cabinet discussed the question royale, on the 4th July, giving special attention to the repercussions caused by the Report. M. Spaak has now been asked by the Council of Ministers to "examine the possibility of putting into effect that part of the Ministerial declaration in which it is said that the Government should encourage agreement between the political parties to reach a solution satisfactory to the national institutions." In a conversation with H.M. Ambassador, M. Spaak said that the Christian Social Party had decided to "study" the Report. This he took to mean that they intended to shelve it. He thought it quite likely, however, that the King's Catholic adherents would assemble those parts of the Report most favourable to the King in a pamphlet for distribution in that form. In M. Spaak's view, the Report cannot be regarded as a contribution to a final solution of the question royale, which to-day was governed, not by King Leopold's behaviour in the past, but by the consequences of his return to Belgium, one of which would inevitably be the formation of a Communist and Walloon Socialist alliance—bad for Belgium, and probably for Europe.

Meanwhile Comte Pierlot, Prime Minister of the exiled Belgian Government in London during the war, has broken silence on the question royale with the first of a series of articles in Le Soir, entitled La fin d'un long silence (5th July). The publication of the Report, declares Comte Pierlot, made it "impossible" for him to remain silent. "I am certain," he goes on, that "the intentions of the King were always good, but the problem ought to be examined from the political point of view. According to the Committee's Report, the acts of the King deserve approval without reserve."

Belgo-Netherlands-Luxembourg Customs Union

After a debate lasting several days, the Belgo-Netherlands-Luxembourg Customs Union (Benelux) was ratified in the Belgian Chamber of Representatives on the 3rd July, by 135 votes to 5 (Walloon Socialists), with 21 abstentions (presumably Communists). Ratification in the Senate is expected in a few days' time. The Union has also received the approval of the Dutch Second Chamber (2nd July), and of the Luxembourg Chamber (3rd July), where it was passed unanimously, except by the four Communist Deputies, who abstained from voting. M. Useldinger, their leader, explained that they did so merely to register their disapproval of the Luxembourg Government: their action was not to be interpreted as an unfriendly gesture towards Belgium or the Netherlands. The Communist Party, said M. Useldinger, accepted Benelux in principle, but believed that it might involve politico-economic dangers from the action of foreign Powers. Moreover, there was nothing to show that the Luxembourg Government were opposed to the formation of a Western European bloc. Benelux, concluded M. Useldinger, might have a prejudicial effect on the workers, whose views upon it had never been sought.

FRANCE

In spite of widespread rumours that the Government would be reshuffled, M. Ramadier came through the trials of last week with his team of Ministers unchanged and with a still largely undefined economic policy. The economic debate (see last week's Summary) was continued on the 1st July when M. Philip, Minister of National Economy and the bête noire of the Radicals, defended the policy of controls and insisted on their necessity so long as there was a shortage of food and raw materials. M. Philip's eloquence was not, however, taken very seriously, and on the following day an inconclusive speech by M. Ramadier showed that the present coalition does not permit the adoption of any precise policy. The only concrete plan he put forward was yet another scheme for meat marketing. He made the successful if obvious political manœuvre of antagonising the Parti Républicain de la Liberté by hinting at its complicity in the conspiracy against the Government (see below), and also condemned the actions of the Communists. Having thus gathered round him the support of the centre parties he obtained from the Socialists a renunciation of their doctrinaire resolution in favour of one that simply expressed confidence in the Government. This was voted on the 4th July by 331 votes to 247, the Communists and the P.R.L. voting against.

Armed with this success M. Ramadier faced the National Council of the Socialist Party which met on the 5th–6th July, and obtained permission to remain in office by a vote of 2,576 to 2,058. This was a slightly larger majority than that which he obtained after dismissing the Communist Ministers in May; the increase is probably due partly to the deterioration in relations between the Socialist and Communist parties, and partly to the international situation. The Socialist Council, however, insisted that M. Ramadier must carry out a policy of reducing agricultural prices and stabilising the cost of living—a policy which will offend the Radicals and will not be easy to enforce. It is true that the wave of strikes is now subsiding and that the holiday season should hold up further demands for higher pay, but the Communists can be relied on to make things as difficult as possible for a Government from which they are excluded and whose foreign policy is contrary to that of the Soviet Union.

The break-down of the Paris talks caused much disappointment in Paris and some fear of the reactions that the Communists would show. Press comment, with the exception of L'Humanité whose attacks on the Marshall proposals reached the height of absurdity, blamed the Soviet Government for their attitude, and pointed out that whereas the French and British plans aimed at uniting Europe, M. Molotov had succeeded in dividing it and in creating the very Western bloc which he wished to avoid.

The conspiracy whose discovery was revealed last week appears to be the work of an armed anti-Communist organisation which has been compared with the pre-war Cagoule. Two Generals, one of them the officer in charge of inspection of the Paris gendarmerie, have been arrested. Simultaneously General de Larminat has been dismissed from his post as inspector of colonial troops and recalled to Paris but he is not as yet accused of complicity in the plot. The Minister of the Interior has denied that General de Gaulle is in any way implicated. The whole affair has been violently exploited by the Left-wing press, but moderate opinion is sceptical and accuses the Government of exaggerating its importance.

SWITZERLAND

According to a Swiss wireless report issued on the 30th June, the Political Department, after a session of the Federal Council, defined the official attitude to the Marshall proposals. The Federal Council, said the statement, took the view that Switzerland could not but ardently hope for the implementation of a plan of economic recovery, with which all European States could be associated without regard to any political considerations. If Switzerland were invited to do so, she must be ready to collaborate on a footing of equality with other States in the "Marshall Plan," which would enable Europe to reaffirm in the economic domain the solidarity destroyed by the last war. The radio commentator discussed the official statement, carefully underlining three points—the reference to a plan in which all European States could be associated; Switzerland's claim to equality with the other countries participating in the Plan; the anxiety to safeguard the national policy of neutrality, which was implied in the cautious reference to economic recovery without regard to any political considerations.

The Grand Duchess and Prince Felix of Luxembourg paid a brief visit to Switzerland at the end of June. While it was explained that the visit had no political significance, it was nevertheless fully reported in the Swiss Press, as was the broadcast speech of the Grand Duchess, in which she expressed the gratitude of her country for the many evidences of sympathy and the substantial material help accorded to her by Switzerland during the war. Her country, like other small powers, had always admired and striven to follow the example of Switzerland in her stand for national freedom and democratic ideals, but the circumstances of the war had drawn the two peoples more closely together than ever.

SPAIN

The final results of the referendum held in Spain on Sunday, 7th July, will not be published until the end of the month, but it has already been reported that more than 70 per cent. of the "eligible" voters have registered what was in fact a vote of confidence in General Franco. It was the first national poll in eleven years, and persons under the age of 32 were thus exercising for the first time the privilege of voting. That an overwhelming majority of Spaniards would declare themselves to be in favour of the Bill of Succession was a foregone conclusion. Fear was perhaps General Franco's greatest ally in the referendum—fear of reprisals, fear of the future. Though Spaniards, and employees of State or State-controlled undertakings in particular, faced the threat of reprisals if they abstained from voting, there has been no evidence yet of physical intimidation at the polling centres, which were under the control of approved Party stalwarts. Voters were permitted to ballot in secret after the necessary identification of personality, though the fact that identification papers had to be produced doubtless deterred many anti-Francoists from casting their vote.

Everything possible was done to ensure that the Referendum should be a triumph for the present régime. The Government propaganda machine had been working full out. The press took the usual line of complete subservience to the Government. With an egregious piece of logic-chopping Ya put the whole matter in a nutshell on the 17th June: the best way to grasp how necessary it was to vote "yes" was to consider what the answer "no" would imply. The Succession Bill affirmed that Spain was a Catholic and Social Kingdom. A negative vote would imply, then, that Spain was not a Kingdom but a Republic, not Catholic but masonic and marxist, not committed to social betterment, but giving up all that had been accomplished in that direction.

Towns and villages had been flooded with posters and leaflets calling Spaniards to the polling booths. Even the Church was called upon to play its part. On the 15th June all newspapers published a pastoral letter issued by the Primate of Spain. Cardinal Pla y Deniel's letter was on the lines of letters issued by the Pope or by the Cardinal Primates of other countries on similar occasions. But its great value to General Franco was that it did not question his attempt at constitution-faking, nor the principle of a referendum at which so many Spaniards were debarred from voting, thus tacitly recognising the whole arrangement as a normal procedure. It is known that pressure had to be brought to bear on the Cardinal before he would consent to issue his letter of guidance to the faithful. In it he called upon all Catholics to vote at "a transcendental moment in the history of Spain," and referred to foreign interference and to those outside the country who wished to render sterile the martyrdom of so many thousands who suffered death for their religion. General Franco himself broadcast on the 4th July, demanding a favourable vote for a measure on which he had spent ten years of thought. He, also, made a reference to foreign interference and the need for unity, and extolled the new social code which Spain was evolving; "the importance of which goes beyond her national frontiers."

In an interview with Mr. Virgil Pinkley, the Vice-President of United Press—published on the 27th June—General Franco, in answer to a suggestion of greater freedom for the press and radio and the return of full control to newspaper owners, stated: "There is no freedom to slander, to insult; no freedom for activities against the Motherland and against morals. . . ." Newspaper owners, the Caudillo asserted, were restricted only by circumstances of a moral order or of service to the nation prescribed in the laws of the Press. Whatever General Franco may say, Spanish journalism has during the last few months plumbed the depths of subserviency. A stream of directives were issued by the Press Bureau during the Referendum campaign which, in most cases, were copied slavishly. ABC, the Monarchist-owned daily, attempted to take a middle line, omitting passages or phrases insulting to the Monarchy, but fell out more than once with the censorship officials. Many of its leaders were suppressed. Diario de Barcelona and, in particular, the well-known weekly, Destino, are also in hot water, the latter for having published no article about General Franco on the day of his triumphal arrival in Barcelona. Destino merely published the Generalissimo's photograph on the front page with a simple salutation, and the following week omitted to mention the Caudillo at all. Thereupon the censorship authorities planted upon it four articles in praise of the régime, together with a number of photographs showing the crowds gathered "spontaneously" to greet the Caudillo in Catalonia. The Chief Editor was even told where the articles and photographs were to be placed. Moreover, the articles were cleverly written in a style intended to hoodwink Destino's public into thinking that they represented a recantation of the paper's principles. After the appearance of the first article the Party paper, Solidaridad Nacional, added insult to injury by publishing a front-page article congratulating the Editor of Destino on his noble exaltation of the Caudillo. The Chief Editor protested and threatened to resign, whereupon the authorities said they would in that case be forced to suppress Destino and perhaps to imprison the staff. The Editor was therefore forced to withdraw his threat of resignation lest his staff should suffer. However he did apparently secure temporary permission to refrain from further comment in his magazine during the referendum.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of El Salvador on the 16th June issued a communiqué stating that the Government of El Salvador, "without abandoning the principles of international law to which reference was made at the opportune time, in conformity with the invitation to co-operate with the United Nations Organization . . . , has withdrawn its Head of Mission from Spain." It will be remembered that El Salvador was one of the six South American Republics which voted against the Resolution of the United Nations on the 12th December last calling for the withdrawal of Heads of Missions.

VATICAN

Mr. Victor Perowne, the new British Minister to the Vatican, presented his credentials to Pope Pius XII on the 30th June. In a speech on the occasion, which has been regarded as giving approval to the Marshall proposals for the economic reconstruction of Europe, His Holiness praised the British people, who, he said, had endured what was almost beyond human endurance, not only in defence of their own lives and liberties, but as the vanguard fighting for those human ideals and freedom dear to every right-minded man. In spite of mounting burdens, their self-discipline and clear perception of reality, "which one would like to see shared by others," had enabled them to understand the urgency of initiating the work of reconstruction and the disastrous consequences which would follow further delay. Fortunately, the British people were not alone in realising these facts, for farseeing statesmen and clear thinkers in the new world had brought them to be common knowledge. The Pope expressed his ardent wish that this conception of the task of reconstruction—there was no other at once realistic, honourable and Christian—would make headway in the councils of the nations' leaders, and that Great Britain, who had the same peace aims as the Holy See, would soon be able to report perceptible progress in advancing the cause of afflicted humanity.

The Holy Father received Señora Perón, during her stay in Rome, with the ceremonial accorded to the wives of Heads of States. Food and emigration problems are said to have been discussed at the audience. To his personal expressions of gratitude for Argentina's help to Europe and to the Papal Aid Commission the Pope added a golden rosary for Señora Perón and he conferred the order of the Grand Cross of Pius IX on President Perón.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

Hungary's reply to the Anglo-French invitation to attend the Paris Conference in the Marshall Proposals has not yet come in. Her own inclinations are not in doubt. On the 1st July Népszava reported that M. Ries had authorised the Hungarian Representative in London to state that his country was definitely interested—M. Ries referred to the "Marshall Plan" as the first Peace Conference—while Party leaders, including the Communists, have repeatedly stressed that Hungary would welcome a loan if it had no political conditions attached to it. Hungary is not, however, in a position to decide independently, in spite of M. Mihalyfi's assurances to the contrary. She will no doubt attach greater importance to the attitude of the Polish and Czechoslovak Governments.

Hungarian-Czechoslovak relations are again a centre of interest. A Social Democratic Delegation, numbering MM. Ries and Böhm among its members, has gone to Prague, and M. Böhm's appointment as Minister to Czechoslovakia is considered probable. The Hungarians are said to favour close economic co-operation between the two States, to be followed later by a military pact providing for uniform armaments. The pact would be primarily pro-Soviet but also pro-British. In contrast to the general cordiality of the Czechoslovak Press towards M. Rákosi, the Slovak Democratic newspaper, Cas, treated the subject of his recent visit coldly, pointing out that he was still preoccupied with the old theme of minority rights and denying that the situation had been improved by the Hungarian Governmental changes.

The Communists claim that the National Peasant Party sympathises with their wish to present a joint election list, though no such official declaration has been issued, and M. Dinnyés, backed by the Social Democrats as well as by his own followers, here at least appears to be maintaining his ground. M. Gerö's announcement in Paris that there can at present be no question of a one-party régime is hardly reassuring from a long-term point of view, but Magyar Nemzet has stated that none of the Parties which contested the 1945 election will be debarred from doing so next time, nor in this respect will any ban be placed on M. Sulyok's Freedom Party. It is now considered unlikely that disfranchisement will extend to the families of those disqualified from voting, but the number of deputies may be reduced by as much as twenty-five per cent., and the names of candidates scrutinised with a view to eliminating the possibility of reintroducing the conspiratorial clique into the National Assembly. It is not yet known what reply will be made to Fr. Balogh's request for permission to form a new Party.

The Supreme Council of Appeal of the People's Court has confirmed the death sentence of M. Donath, but commuted the sentences pronounced on General Véress de Dalnok and Major-General Andras to 15 and 10 years' imprisonment respectively. Among other modifications M. Arany's term of life imprisonment has been reduced to 12 years' penal servitude.

It is reported that Professor Vamberi, who emigrated to the U.S.A. during the Horthy régime, will be offered the post of Minister to Washington and M. Oltvanyi that of Minister to Cairo, while the inept and irresponsible M. Gulácsy, who belongs to the extreme left wing of the Smallholders, may be asked to represent Hungary at Ankara. M. Mihalyfi will almost certainly succeed M. Jekely as chef de Cabinet.

Roumania

Roumanian comment on the Marshall plan and the break-down of the Paris Conference, has run along the expected lines, and the expected refusal of the Franco-British invitation has been issued. The Communist organ Scânteia described the Marshall offer as an endeavour to paralyse the efforts of the working masses for their own rehabilitation and thus to make them lose their self-confidence and become an easier prey to super-capitalism. The Government press has made great play with the apparently favourable terms granted by the U.S.S.R. for the grain deliveries under the agreement secured by M. Gheorghiu-Dej in Moscow (see Summary No. 398, p. 13) setting this by implication over against the Marshall plan. Through this aid given by Moscow "without hope of gain," Roumania would escape from the grasp of international trusts and could repudiate economic obligations (to America) "which would also have involved political obligations weakening her position as an independent State."

Rumours are rife concerning secret clauses of the Soviet-Roumanian railway agreement signed in Moscow on the 12th June. The fact that the negotiations had dragged on since February could in itself be taken as a sign that something more than an ordinary railway agreement was on foot. Whether the Soviet Government has acquired a mortgage on the whole Roumanian railway system or not, the fact that railway credits are to run into trillions of lei suggests that considerable development on the railways is contemplated in the near future.

A serious constitutional situation is developing over the new War Criminals Bill, which was vetoed by King Michael on its submission by the Cabinet. The King took his stand on the ground that, when the original law of the 24th April, 1945, had been extended for two further periods until October 1946, the Prime Minister, Minister of Justice and M. Gheorghiu-Dej had promised that no further legislation would be necessary. The Roumanian Government, excusing themselves for the new Bill on account of Russian pressure, are arranging to submit it again to King Michael through Parliament, which will place him in a difficult dilemma. The fact that the King opened the new Parliament, thereby according it recognition, has weakened his position for overriding its authority with a veto. The new Bill is dangerous because it contains no time-limit and provides for the reopening of cases already judged, thus giving the Government full scope for action against political opponents.

Meanwhile the arrests are continuing despite the American and British notes. The aim of the Soviet pressure exerted on the Roumanian Government is, apparently, to destroy completely the National Peasant Party or to force it to come to terms with the Communists before the ratification of the Treaty and the withdrawal of the Red Army.

The policy of purging and intimidation is being extended to the oil companies with grave consequences to output and efficiency. Key-men are being moved from some of the most important companies, and apathy and despair are prevalent among the staff, who see that their employers are unable to afford them protection.

Yugoslavia

Banditry on the Austro-Yugoslav frontier has been on the increase. The most serious of recent incidents occurred on the 27th June, when a band, about thirty strong, attacked and pillaged a farm, fatally wounding some of the occupants and killing two Austrian gendarmes. A third gendarme was kidnapped by the bandits who then absconded towards the Yugoslav frontier. The direction of their flight, and the facts that, according to an eye-witness, they wore Yugoslav uniform, and that two of the men were identified as suspected OZNA agents, indicate that this band, at any rate, was probably not of "White Guard" or D.P. composition. Hitherto, the reluctance of the local inhabitants to report these incidents immediately for fear of reprisals—or for other reasons—has made it difficult to establish the origin of the bands, although the majority of them are believed to consist of anti-Tito elements. This, of course, is the view of the Yugoslav Government, which published a statement on the 4th July disclaiming all responsibility for these incidents, which they attribute entirely to the "lenience" of Allied policy towards "war criminals."

The Yugoslav torrent of threatening abuse of the Greek Government (and of the subsidiary group of the U.N. Commission) which remained in spate for at least a fortnight after the frontier incident of the 13th June (see Summary No. 397 under "Greece"), has begun to subside. The Yugoslav Government has, however, demanded from the Greeks an indemnity of 16,000 dollars in respect of the loss of life and injuries caused on that occasion.

An article in Civilità Cattolica on religious persecution in Yugoslavia provoked retaliatory remarks in the Yugoslav press accusing the Vatican of abuse of diplomatic relations and, by implication, threatening a complete rupture. This renewal of interest in Yugoslav religious conditions may have been aroused by Mgr. Hurley's recent visit to Archbishop Stepinac and his discovery that the latter is being subjected to a more rigorous prison life, possibly in order that he may be induced to buy his freedom by resigning from his See.

The repatriation of Italian prisoners of war was declared to have been completed when a shipload of 849 left Split on the 27th June.

There is the promise of a favourable outcome to the Anglo-Yugoslav negotiations for economic and air agreements. The Yugoslav Government have agreed to send an Economic Delegation to London in August, and are prepared to receive British food experts in Belgrade immediately.

The first meeting on civil aviation was conducted very cordially, each side being aware of the advantages to be gained by the early conclusion of an agreement. The Yugoslav Government have raised no objection in principle to the four routes to the Balkans and the Middle East via Belgrade, proposed by the British Delegation, and have asked in return for facilities to operate three routes over British-controlled territory. They incidentally admitted that the Yugoslav-Soviet Air Transport concern was not yet in operation.

Nevertheless, a number of Yugoslav Notes to His Majesty's Government complaining of cases of alleged violation of Yugoslav air space by British aircraft flying from Austria and of raids carried out across the frontier by D.Ps., may serve as a warning that favourable opportunities —and Yugoslav goodwill—do not last indefinitely.

Greece

The Royal tour of Thessaly was a great success. After their enthusiastic reception in Volo, where political sympathies are notoriously left-wing, the King and Queen attended a sports meeting at Trikkala held by bandits recently captured by the Greek Army. Their Majesties were given a warm welcome by the bandits who are reported to have sung patriotic songs (including the Greek battle-song: "What business have the Bulgars in Greece?"). They also visited Kalambaka which is on the edge of bandit territory and Litokhoron at the foot of Mt. Olympus which has only just been "liberated." The King reviewed troops in the area while the Queen distributed gifts to the poor.

The operation conducted by the army to clear the Olympus–Pieria area appears to have achieved little success. Few casualties were inflicted and the majority of the bandits are believed to have escaped northwards to the Vermion mountain range. Another operation to clear the Grammos mountain area is now in progress after a delayed start. Latest reports state that the bandits are offering stiff resistance to the army in their approach march—particularly in the area west and south-west of Grevena. For these operations certain Greek troops are approaching the Albanian frontier and one incident has already been reported in which it is alleged a Greek army patrol was fired on by a band which later withdrew into Albania. Forcible recruiting for the bands continued, particularly in Evros. The Greek press asserts that most of these new recruits are being sent to Bulgaria to be armed and trained for partisan warfare and sabotage, and that bands based on Ortakoy in Bulgaria are operating in the Serres, Drama and Xanthi districts. Recently several abandoned Greek posts in Thrace were completely destroyed and the material carried off into Bulgaria.

It has now been revealed that during the last month the Salonica police have arrested 48 leading members of Opla (Organisation for the Defence of the Popular Resistance), the Communist terrorist organisation which is said to have been responsible for many of the recent political murders in Salonica. It is reported that a similar organisation has been discovered in the Greek Air Force and that all its members have been arrested. These and other arrests were followed on the 9th July by a round-up of Communists in Athens and other districts in connection with an insurrection which, it is alleged, had been planned to take place on that day. The Communist Party and its press have not, however, been suppressed.

M. Porfyroyenis's speech at Strasbourg (see last week's Summary) has drawn all the centre parties to the side of the Government against the Communists. Not only has M. Sofoulis, the leader of the Left-Centre Liberals who has so often seemed anxious to appease the Communists, now condemned K.K.E.'s anti-Greek behaviour, but E.L.D. (Professor Svolos's Socialist Party) seem to have decided that they must now sever their connection with the Communists.

The ineffectiveness of the subsidiary group of the United Nations Frontier Commission becomes increasingly apparent. Following the Yugoslav Government's refusal of facilities, it has now been decided that the group will investigate the Greek side of the Kouka and Belesh incidents, but there is considerable doubt whether more than five delegates will make the journey. The Soviet delegate has announced that, in view of the Yugoslav attitude, he is not prepared to take part in the investigation, and the Polish delegate who is now in hospital has agreed with him; the Syrian and Chinese delegates are away, the Colombian is in hospital, and the Brazilian delegate is reluctant to face the discomforts of the journey.

Sabotage has been suggested (but not proved) as the cause of the serious fire which on the 5th July destroyed part of the Metokhikon-Tameion building in Athens used as the headquarters of the British Army in Greece, the Naval, R.A.F. and Military Missions, the Embassy Information Department, the Economic Mission and part of the Police Mission. There were no fatal injuries to British personnel.

Bulgaria

Things appear to be going from bad to worse in Bulgaria, where the latest rumour is that Petkov has been carried off to Russia for "interrogation." Not unnaturally His Majesty's Government's last note to the Bulgarian Government on the subject of the continued suppression of both the Opposition newspapers (26th June) was a good deal stiffer in tone than their earlier protest dated 3rd June. The explanations offered to them by the Bulgarian Government in their reply of the 10th are dismissed this time as "entirely unsatisfactory and unconvincing": they "will not blind anyone who knows the present political structure of Bulgaria to the real facts of the situation." His Majesty's Government point out that if the Bulgarian Government really considered the action of the Opposition to be in any respect against the country's best interests, they had only to inform the people of the facts through their own press and in the Grand National Assembly. Instead of this, all they have done is to quote their press law of the 30th April, 1946, alleging that this confers upon the Minister of Information the right to determine cases in which a newspaper may be suspended either by him personally or by a decision of the Council of Ministers without any declared state of emergency, without any judicial process and for any length of time. This claim His Majesty's Government regard as most disturbing: for it "means that the Bulgarian Government may suppress any newspaper at any time simply because of criticism which they fear or find unwelcome. His Majesty's Government find it difficult to reconcile the powers which the Bulgarian Government regard themselves as possessing under the law in question with the terms of Article 2 of the Treaty of Peace. It seems, indeed, to His Majesty's Government to be a matter for consideration whether this law does not call for revision in order to bring it into conformity with the text of the Treaty."

To this fresh protest the Bulgarian Government have sent a further reply (3rd July) which does not improve matters. They merely remark that the press law in question was promulgated before the provisions of the Peace Treaty were known to them, and add that anyhow they "intend of their own free will" to revise this and certain other emergency enactments to bring them into line with the new Constitution as soon as it has been voted; "but it goes without saying that so long as this law is in force it will have to be applied." No mention is made of any attempt to revise it "in accordance with Article 2 of the Peace Treaty."

It is more satisfactory to be able to record that the person whom the Bulgarian Government have unofficially asked His Majesty's Government to agree to receive as their future political representative in London seems to be an eminently respectable gentleman. This is Professor Nikola Dolcochiev, a lawyer belonging to the Zveno party who holds a chair at the University of Sofia and has for ten years been vice-president of the Academy of Sciences. He knows some English, having in his youth spent a year in the United States as a Rockefeller Foundation scholar.

The trade delegation from Bulgaria which left for Moscow on the 18th April headed by the Minister of Commerce, M. Bozhilov, is believed to have encountered considerable difficulties. M. Bozhilov was reported over a month ago to have fallen ill there—a not unfamiliar occurrence among leaders of Bulgarian trade delegations to Russia, who have never had an easy passage; and the energetic Communist Vice-Premier, M. Kostov, who is highly thought of at the Kremlin, has since been negotiating there in his place. The Russians are said to have asked that the German credit of five milliard leva due from Bulgaria under the old clearing agreement should now be transferred to themselves. They are not proving nearly such good trade-partners as the Germans were: they accept only limited quantities of Bulgarian tobacco, and they have so far failed to provide the electrical machinery which is so urgently needed for the success of the Two-Year Plan. Meanwhile the Government must do all they can to find exports somehow or other, but no large surpluses can be expected after three years of severe drought. Like other needy Balkan countries, Bulgaria would no doubt be very glad, were she allowed, to follow Czechoslovakia in accepting the Anglo-French invitation to this Saturday's economic conference in Paris.

Turkey

It was not surprising that Turkey was among the first countries to signify an intention of accepting the Anglo-French invitation. For, in the first place, she remains true to Atatürk's policy of seeking to be European rather than Asiatic. Secondly, she could hardly fail to associate herself with a move which, in her eyes at least, is primarily designed to strengthen Europe against Russia. Turkish opinion was from the outset highly sceptical about the Russian attitude to Mr. Marshall's offer. It was seen as a momentous event which put the Soviet Union in a quandary and provided a nice acid test for the satellites. Several commentators took the line that Soviet prestige had recently declined and was now in danger of falling still further.

In recent months leading Turks have given repeated indications of their total inability to understand why the British Government should think it worth while to cultivate the friendship of the Soviet Union. Turkey's utter dependence on British and American support in the face of Russian pressure explains such Turkish criticism of British policy. But the fact that the Commander-in-Chief, Mediterranean, who is shortly to take a squadron on a courtesy visit to Istanbul, will then proceed to do the same at Sevastopol, seems to have touched the Turks on the raw. The Vatan made an unexpectedly violent attack on British policy towards Russia as one of fatal indecision, evasion and appeasement, and it condemned the Sevastopol visit as another Munich calculated to make the Kremlin persist in its evil policy. The editor, M. Ahmet Emin Yalman, is an astute person and, though a supporter of the Opposition, unlikely to have published so bitter a protest unless he were assured that it would not be altogether displeasing to the Government.

On the 28th June M. Celal Bayar, the leader of the Democratic (Opposition) party, made a speech of some importance to what seems to have been a large gathering at Sivas, a town generally regarded as a stronghold of the Republican People's (Government) Party. According to the press, after again disclaiming all connection with Communism, he dwelt on the disabilities from which his party suffered owing to the animosity of the administration, to the headship of the State being vested in the leader of the Republican People's Party, to the wireless and Halkevis (people's institutes) being unavailable for the Democratic Party and, most of all, to the unfair conduct of elections. The Prime Minister (M. Recep Peker), he said, had flatly denied to him that there was any animosity or discrimination. M. Celal Bayar had then approached the President of the Republic and thereupon President Inönü had obtained from the Prime Minister a promise that there should be no official pressure against the Opposition. President Inönü had moreover repeated his own keen desire for the existence of more than a single party. All this caused much discussion in the press, and it was stated, with some appearance of truth, that in the inner councils of the hitherto dominant Republican People's Party it had already been decided to make the concession of dissociating the two presidencies—that of the State from that of the Party.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Egyptian press on the 1st July published a report that an agreed text of Egypt's claim, to be laid before the Security Council, had been sent by air to the Egyptian Ambassador in Washington the previous day, there to remain until the Prime Minister gives instructions for its presentation. Later reports indicate that these instructions may not now be long delayed. The Mussawar alleges that a large section of the Opposition is against reference to the Security Council on the ground that once a decision has been reached there—and it might well be one unfavourable to Egypt—it might be impossible to repair the situation. Therefore, the re-opening of direct negotiations with His Majesty's Government is advocated. The same view seems to be held by responsible representatives of the other Arab States also, although it is difficult to see how Nokrashy Pasha can now avoid making an appeal to the United Nations, even though he may hope and work for a recommendation that direct discussions should be resumed. Even so, the hostility of the Wafd is not likely to be appeased, and there is little hope of reaching a workable or enduring agreement while the Wafd is in opposition. Sidky Pasha is expected back in Egypt on the 12th July, and there is an expectation in some quarters that his return may herald ministerial changes which would lead to the resumption of negotiations with His Majesty's Government. The opposition of the Wafd, however, based as it is on the "minority" status of Nokrashy's Cabinet, would not necessarily be silenced, unless Nahas Pasha could be persuaded to participate in the work of a Treaty delegation, if not in the reformed Cabinet itself. His earlier conditions (which included not only a Wafd majority in the delegation and its presidency for Nahas himself, but equally unacceptable proposals about elections) would probably be maintained, and the deadlock would continue.

Angry articles have appeared in the Egyptian press protesting against the suspension of three Sudanese newspapers for personal attacks upon the Chief Secretary. This was followed by the voluntary closing-down of all Sudanese papers at the instigation of the Sudanese Press Association, who also cabled protests to the Foreign Secretary and other addressees. The ban was later raised by the Sudan Government, and the Egyptian press have hailed this as a victory over the administration.

It is not clear whether the papers in the case against the persons arrested in connection with the riot in Alexandria on the 4th March, 1946, are to be filed, or whether the case is simply adjourned until October, as stated in one report.

The premature publication by the new Government paper Al Assas of versions of the sterling balances agreement (on which a protest is being addressed to the Prime Minister by His Majesty's Ambassador in Cairo) has provoked numerous articles in the Egyptian opposition press condemning the agreement. On the 2nd July, the Minister of Commerce told the audience at a press conference that he considered £8,000,000 sufficient to maintain Egypt's trade balance this year, and that trade conditions would not be materially affected after the 15th July.

Palestine

The Arab boycott of the United Nations Committee has been continued during their tours in Palestine throughout the past week, although they have been received politely in most places. The Committee decided on the 27th June to hear evidence from seven Jewish organisations, the Jewish Agency, the Vaad Leumi (the General Council), the Histadruth Haovdim (the General Federation of Jewish Labour), the Agudath Israel (Association of Israel —Orthodox), the Ashkenazi Jewish Community, the Central Committee of the Palestine Communist Party, and the Ihud ("Union," the small group led by Dr. Magnes.) Dr. Weizmann will be heard in an individual capacity, and also a certain Mr. J. W. Abileah, who, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, will present a plan for the union of Palestine and Transjordan "with a view to facilitating long-range immigration."

The rumour that the Chaiman and Dr. Hoo had a secret interview in Tel Aviv with leaders of the terrorists is without foundation. During a visit to Acre jail, however, the Chairman had some conversation with three prisoners from dissident groups, and two other members also interviewed some prisoners separately. These apparently complained about their status, claiming that they should be treated as prisoners-of-war.

A resolution was passed on the 29th June by the Committee (the Australian and Indian members abstaining) taking note of published reports of acts of violence committed in Palestine since their arrival, and recording a warning that such acts constitute a flagrant disregard of the appeal made in the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the 15th May, 1947. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency see in this an attempt to balance the Committee's intervention on behalf of the three members of the Irgun Zvai Leumi who were condemned to death on the 16th June (see Summary No. 397), so that the Committee may claim impartiality. Elsewhere in Agency reports are signs of anxiety about the direction in which the Committee's opinions are moving, and the local Jewish press has unremittingly but unsuccessfully attempted to poison relations between them and the Administration.

A large arms factory, which was almost certainly one of a chain of similar establishments making sten guns and ammunition for the Hagana, has been found in Tel Aviv. The discovery followed investigations into an explosion which occurred on the 18th June in a building near Military Headquarters.

The Arab Higher Committee announces four National Conferences in the near future. One, due to start in Haifa on the 6th July, will deal mainly with the boycott of Jewish goods and the prevention of the sale of land to Jews. This will be followed by a Women's and a Youth Conference, and one, intended to put an end to family and other feuds between Arabs, entitled "Peace between Brothers." This burst of activity seems to be designed as an answer to widespread criticism of the Committee and to rally public opinion to its support. The appointment of a Chief Administrative Officer in the Jerusalem office has already had some effect, and, as indicated last week, there is a growing feeling amongst Arabs who were at first opposed to the boycott of the United Nations Committee that the policy of doing so was right. Attempts by King Abdullah to get the decision reversed have been politely rejected.

Iraq

The trial of the Communist leaders arrested in January (see Summary No. 381) ended on the 24th June, three of them, including Yusuf Salman Yusuf (alias Fahad), being sentenced to death. It was later announced that they were condemned, not because they were Communists, but because they had conspired to overthrow the Government by the use of force, and had incited not only civilians, but also certain of the armed forces and the police to carry arms against the Government.

Speaking in the Senate on the 12th June in defence of the Turco-Iraqi Treaty (see Summaries Nos. 396 and 397) Nuri Said denied that the Treaty robbed Iraq of her freedom of action in the event of a conflict between Turkey and another Arab State. Iraq's obligations, he said, would be in accordance with the United Nations Charter, as laid down in Article 3 of the Treaty. He also repudiated the suggestion that the Treaty conflicted with the Charter of the Arab League, since Turkey was outside the orbit of the League.

Persia

It appears that agitation against the Prime Minister and his entourage is growing. Splits are already apparent in his Democrat Party, and it is no longer certain that he will be able to secure a vote of confidence from the Majlis when it assembles. An attack by hooligans on the printing offices of three of the Opposition newspapers on the 26th June is believed locally to have been at his instigation.

Afghanistan

The Afghan Government have reacted strongly to the provisions in the Declaration of policy on India of the 3rd June for the holding of a referendum in the North-West Frontier Province to decide whether the Province should join Pakistan or India. Representations were made in both London and Kabul on the 11th June, requesting that the inhabitants be given the opportunity of deciding whether they wished to become independent or to join themselves to Afghanistan. Extravagant claims have been made, to the accompaniment of a vociferous press and radio campaign, that the Province is inhabited by "Afghans" and was annexed by Great Britain to India during the Anglo-Afghan wars of the last century. His Majesty's Government intend to reject the Afghan demand on the grounds that the Anglo-Afghan Treaty of 1921 confirmed the Durand line, fixed in 1893, as the frontier between India and Afghanistan.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

Talking to a group of American publishers and editors on 28th June, General MacArthur is reported to have amplified his views on the Peace Treaty. He is stated to have advanced the opinion that a Peace Treaty with Japan need not necessarily wait on the conclusion of the German Treaty and that it might be signed at latest within a year or eighteen months; also he hoped that it would be drafted in such a way as not to enslave the Japanese people; and he declared that the military potential of Japan had been destroyed for at least a century. (Speaking on the same date, Mr. Atcheson, the United States Ambassador and Chairman of the Allied Council in Tokyo, also said that there was not much more that could be done by way of directive or political and social programme in Japan—the Japanese had been freed from their shackles of the past.)

Speaking of the islands adjacent to Japan, General MacArthur is reported to have said that possession of the Ryukyu and the Bonin Islands should be retained by the United States as one of her strategic frontiers; also—somewhat surprisingly, if the report is correct—that "possession by the United States of those islands and the maintenance of a United States air force there would be for Japan a guarantee against aggression." His idea was that the army of occupation should be withdrawn from the country immediately after the treaty had been signed. Thereafter

Japan would require supervision for a generation, a task he suggested might be undertaken by the United Nations, or, failing that, by such of the eleven members of the Far Eastern Commission as were willing to assume the responsibility.

The Supreme Commander also expressed the view that Japan should be permitted to build up her export trade to enable her to purchase 15 per cent. of her food abroad. In the meantime he proposed to ask the United States to supply 1,500,000 tons food for the ensuing year. Japan, he said, was also in need of fertilisers which, with the exception of some salt, were being supplied at the moment by the United States. It should be noted that this last statement is somewhat misleading as, in fact, for some time phosphates have been coming from stock piles on Angaur, the southernmost island in the Palau group of the Caroline Islands, formerly under Japanese mandate and now controlled by the United States.

Until the 1st July the phosphate rock deposits on Angaur had been mined for use in Japan by an American firm under the supervision of the United States Navy. An official announcement has now been made, however, that the Japanese Government will assume the responsibility for the complete operation of the island's phosphate rock project under the supervision of S.C.A.P. And in a further press release from S.C.A.P. Headquarters on 28th June, General MacArthur's action is defended on the ground that the phosphate is required to supply Japan with fertiliser required to increase the production of indigenous food and thus ease the strain on the United States in meeting the food deficit in Japan; that the use for this purpose of the phosphate obtained from Angaur was authorised initially by the Combined Food Board—an international body; that General MacArthur had been authorised from Washington to operate the enterprise with Japanese labour; and that the new arrangement ensures the continuance of this essential undertaking.

An entirely erroneous report from an American correspondent in London had conveyed the impression in Japan that a spokesman of the Foreign Office had criticised General MacArthur's unilateral action in permitting the Japanese Government to take over the Angaur mining enterprise. In fact, however, His Majesty's Government have made no official criticism of this operation. Nevertheless, coming but a few days after the announcement that S.C.A.P. has authorised a Japanese whaling expedition to the Antarctic again this year (see Summary No. 397)—over which there is considerable feeling in this country—it is only natural that this second surprising announcement should draw considerable unofficial comment and criticism.

About the same time as General MacArthur was giving his views on the Peace Treaty, the Japanese Premier was expressing the hope that the Government might be able to secure additional land for Japan which was over-crowded. The Foreign Minister denied that he had made a bid for the Ryukyu Islands specifically, but asked for the return to Japan of as much territory as the Cairo Declaration and subsequent Allied proclamations would permit.

Mr. Katayama also expressed the hope that a Peace Treaty might be concluded at an early date in his first administrative address to the Diet on 1st July. He dwelt mainly on the measures called for to meet the economic crisis. He warned the country of the hardships to be faced in the struggle to achieve economic stability through the promotion of exports. He went on to say that Japan desired moral and economic support from the Allies; and he emphasised the need for the importation of foreign capital. In conclusion, Mr. Katayama expressed his Government's faith in their ability to establish democracy through the new Constitution, and he appealed for popular support of a national movement for the reconstruction of Japan.

According to press reports from Tokyo Mr. Katayama's address aroused little enthusiasm in the Diet; even those political parties supporting the Government—the Democratic and People's Co-operative Parties—maintaining a stony silence as the Premier finished speaking and left the platform. His speech was followed by one from Mr. Wada, Chief of the Economic Stabilisation Board, which, as at least representing a concrete statement of economic policy, had a generally more favourable reception in the House. He asserted that the rapidly developing decline of the country's economic position could be arrested by increased industrial production, controlled distribution of raw materials, and increased foreign trade. Chinese textile industrialists, on the other hand, are reported to be disturbed at the tendency to increase the number of spindles already operating in Japan.

Indonesia

Earlier radio messages from Jogjakarta to the contrary notwithstanding, after a week of discussion Dr. Soekarno was able to announce the formation on 3rd July of a Coalition Government.

When the left-wing parties withdrew their opposition it was thought that the way had been opened to re-admit M. Sjarir to the Premiership. M. Sjarir, however, did not take the helm, being unwilling to do so unless he was given full powers to negotiate a settlement with the Dutch. Instead, the new Government, which have announced their intention of following M. Sjarir's policy, are headed by Dr. Amir Sjarifoeddin, a member of the Socialist Party and Minister of Defence in the Sjarir Cabinet, which portfolio he continues to retain. He will be assisted by two Deputy Prime Ministers, Dr. A. K. Gani, who also retains the portfolio for Economic Affairs, and M. Setiadjit, a newcomer to the Cabinet without portfolio, but, nevertheless, well known and the Indonesian representative at the World Federation of Trade Unions Congress recently held at Prague. The Ministries of Finance, Justice, Education and Labour are also filled by newcomers, while the particularly important post in the present crisis of Minister for Foreign Affairs has been given to M. Hadji Agoes Salim, formerly M. Sjarir's deputy in that Ministry, but who is at the moment out of the country, at the head of the Indonesian Delegation to the Middle East.

The new Government is representative of almost all the recognised political parties and contains more than a sprinkling of left-wing adherents, including one Communist. It is interesting to note, however, that all the more important posts have been filled by men who occupied responsible positions under M. Sjarir.

On 29th June, Dr. van Mook addressed yet another Note of considerable length and detail to President Soekarno, requiring to be furnished within a week with a clarification of a large number of points in Dr. Soekarno's letter of 27th June in reply to the aide-mémoire of the Netherlands Government.

The first task of Dr. Sjarifoeddin's new Government, therefore, was to take this matter in hand. Press reports recorded the new Prime Minister as having expressed confidence in his Government's ability to reach a final settlement with the Dutch by peaceful means. Nevertheless, the Republican reply, which was handed to Dr. van Mook on the evening of 6th July, again rejected the Dutch proposal for the formation of a joint gendarmerie. And, although it accepted all Dr. van Mook's other requirements, it did so in terms so vague that Dr. van Mook pronounced it to be entirely unacceptable and referred to The Hague for further instructions.

In the meantime an emergency Cabinet meeting was called at Jogjakarta to consider the exceedingly critical position. Dr. Sjarifoeddin also broadcast a statement on the situation on the evening of 7th July. But, although he declared that the Indonesian Republic was prepared to recognise the de jure authority of the Netherlands during the period of transition, he made it clear that the Indonesian Government were not prepared to agree to a joint gendarmerie, or to brook any interference in the authority which they held it their right to exercise. The tone of this broadcast, as reported, conveyed the impression that it was more an endeavour to justify the Republican stand than a last moment attempt at conciliation.

Meanwhile, however, M. Thamzil, the Republican Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, had seen both Mr. Mitcheson and Dr. Foote, the U.S. Consul-General, on the morning of 7th July. Both warned him in the most forthright terms of the danger of the situation and advised immediate acceptance of the Dutch proposals. M. Thamzil saw H.M. Consul-General, Mr. Mitcheson, again the following morning and said that the Republican Government were preparing a supplementary Note clarifying their previous reply and making their answer more positive, as Mr. Mitcheson and Dr. Foote had suggested.

This supplementary reply was delivered to Dr. van Mook on the evening of 8th July. It expressed clear and positive agreement on all points of the Dutch proposals, except on that for the joint gendarmerie on which it left the door open for discussion.

The Dutch consider the reply as satisfactory as could be hoped and, as a result, they have called off the military action which was to have begun on the night of 9th July, under authority from the Hague.

Negotiations to set up the Interim Government are expected to start almost at once and discussions on the question of the joint gendarmerie have already begun.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The Soviet refusal to join the other countries of Europe in drawing up the proposed recovery programme is generally taken in the United States to mean that the long-anticipated parting of the ways between East and West has at last been reached. As the New York Herald-Tribune remarks, "the rest of the world had been prepared for the Russian answer; it will now have to prepare to take the consequences." Emphasis is given to the fact that it is "by Russia's own choice" that the gulf is being permitted to widen. It is also observed that, in withdrawing from the Paris talks, M. Molotov has indicated to Europe, including the Soviet satellites, "that Russia has nothing to offer the world except sterile fears and the dry husks of an outmoded narrow nationalism." The Kremlin, it is suggested, will now make every possible use of Communist groups to sabotage the Marshall offer of assistance wherever it is accepted. It is pointed out, however, that this will be one occasion when the Soviet Union cannot hold up a beneficial international project by the formal application of its veto.

In the United States itself there is a general belief that Congress will react more favourably to the Marshall proposals now that the Soviet Union has decided to accept the "Plan" as a challenge and not as a blessing. Some members of the national legislature, like the economy-minded Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Mr. John Taber, are expected to remain obdurate when the Plan is translated into a request for the necessary funds. (On 3rd July Mr. Taber ran true to form, by intimating that, in his opinion, there had been no justification for the appropriation to finance the 400 million-dollar assistance programme for Greece and Turkey and that his Committee had not been satisfied with the evidence offered in support of the 350 million-dollar general relief Bill). Nevertheless, the brusque and abusive way in which the Soviet Government have this time rejected the possibility of co-operation with the Western Powers has helped to dramatize the Marshall offer in precisely the manner needed to arouse the more obtuse of Congressmen to an appreciation of its merits.

Speculation continues upon the likelihood of Congress being called to consider the Marshall proposition in a special session this autumn. In this connexion it is perhaps significant that the President's newly-appointed "non-partisan" Advisory Committee (see last week's Summary), which is to meet on the 24th July, hopes to complete its work in "two or three months." In making an announcement to this effect on the 30th June, Mr. Harriman, the Chairman, stated that the Committee would not confine its investigations to Europe but would include in its final report to the President recommendations regarding Japan, Latin America and other areas. In any event, if Congress is not ready to consider the project this year it will not be for the lack of the relevant information. As Mr. Marshall recently revealed, the Policy Planning Committee of the State Department is already engaged upon a study of foreign relief and rehabilitation problems. Furthermore, Congress itself is pursuing an inquiry in the same field through the medium of a sub-committee of the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee. In a preliminary report published on the 3rd July the sub-committee estimated that 9,970 million dollars would be required to meet the deficits in the international trading balances of the European countries (excluding the Soviet Union) over the next three years. It pointed out that, of these, about 7,000 million dollars were still uncovered by existing loans and credits.

An early, although not necessarily conclusive, test of the ability of Congress to grasp the lessons which the current international situation teaches is expected to be provided by the final vote on the State Department's information services. The proceedings with regard to the future of these services have thus been prominently reported by the press. For its part the State Department is not failing to draw attention to Soviet misrepresentation of American aims abroad as good reason for continuing its own information activities —particularly its much-debated "Voice of America" broadcasts—at their present volume. Mr. Marshall has made no less than four appearances before a sub-committee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which, under the Chairmanship of Senator H. A. Smith of New Jersey, has been conducting hearings on a Bill to give full legal status to this branch of the State Department's work. The Bill, which is sponsored by Representative Karl Mundt, a former isolationist from South Dakota, has already received the approval of the House of Representatives. It is passing through the Congressional mill simultaneously with the 1948 appropriation for the information services, which a Senate-House Conference Committee on the 3rd July fixed provisionally at 12·4 million dollars. (Mr. Truman originally asked for 31 million dollars, but the House of Representatives recently disallowed this item in his Budget entirely.)

At a meeting of the Senate sub-committee on the 2nd July Mr. Marshall said that it seemed evident that the United States was involved in a great world struggle and that the country was, in a sense, being disarmed if its information activities were curtailed. Reverting to the same question in its wider international aspects in his Independence Day address two days later, the President himself drew attention to the way in which some Governments had erected barriers against the flow of information and ideas into, or out of, their territories. At the same time he rebuked certain countries, not specified by name, for "withholding their support of reconstruction plans on the ground that this would mean interference by some nations in the internal affairs of others."

The prospect of the recent demonstrations of the miners against the new Taft–Hartley Labour Act developing into prolonged resistance has now receded with the news that a "tentative agreement" has been reached between Mr. John L. Lewis and a number of Northern mine-owners. This agreement is reported to involve basic pay increases of up to 44½ per cent. and, that being so, it bids fair to recover for Mr. Lewis the prestige which he lost in his fight with the Administration last winter. One clause in the agreement—and that which has apparently presented the main difficulty in the negotiations between the United Mineworkers and the employers—is said to be designed to nullify the provision in the Taft–Hartley Act which makes it possible to take the union to court if the miners break their contract by striking. Meanwhile the Administration, which handed the mines back to the owners on the 30th June, is stated to be watching the effect of Mr. Lewis's latest gains upon the wage and price position in other industries. The President once again alluded to the ever-present danger of inflation in a message on the 1947 Housing and Rent Act which he sent to Congress on the 30th June. Although, as he pointed out, he had been left with "no choice but to sign" this Act, Mr. Truman roundly condemned the measure as a "step backward" in the drive to protect tenants against unjustified rent increases. (The Act permits a 15 per cent. "voluntary" increase in rents.) At the same time he called upon Congress to investigate the "selfish and shortsighted" real-estate lobby which had allegedly constituted "one of the most stubborn obstacles in the way of any housing programme."

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

The objections of the United States Government to holding the Rio de Janeiro Conference in August (see Summary No. 397) have now been withdrawn. The Brazilian Government have accordingly issued invitations for the 15th August, now presumably the authoritative date for the opening of the Conference, which may be held in Rio instead of Petropolis, owing to difficulties of communication at the latter place.

According to broadcast reports Señor Gonzalez Videla, President of Chile, in a speech at Rio de Janeiro (see Summary No. 398), expressed hopes for the successful outcome of the Rio Conference, and stated that Chile was prepared to sign a pact which embodied the principles of the Chapultepec Act and provided for consultation for continental co-operation in case of aggression. Señor Gonzalez Videla, who is known to have discussed continental defence problems with President Dutra of Brazil, stated at a press conference that he favoured the project for a standardisation of armaments, but was opposed to a unified command, as Chile would not accept a foreign commander for her armed forces.

Nicaragua

The decree issued by the Provisional President, Señor Lacayo Sacasa, calls for elections to a Sovereign National Constituent Assembly to take place on the 3rd August, not on the 10th, as noted in Summary No. 397.

According to a statement made to H.M. Minister by the Nicaraguan Chief of Protocol, the Liberals—i.e. General Somoza and his satellites—are hoping that the projected Constituent Assembly, as representing the people, will be accepted by the other nations as a legal "solution" of the difficulty created by the coup d'état. Recently, however, there appears to have been a good deal of support for the alternative idea of Dr. Arguello's restoration as the only legal way out of the present constitutional impasse.

Meanwhile there seems to be no inclination to recognise the de facto régime of Señor Sacasa. The Guatemalan Congress has very firmly condemned the coup d'état as endangering the security of nations and recommended the Guatemalan Government to withdraw its diplomatic representative from Managua. This was followed by a statement from the Foreign Minister, which described events in Nicaragua as a threat to the peace of Central America and refused recognition of the existing régime. The Government of El Salvador has also declared that "it is not inclined to recognize the régime which has arisen in Nicaragua following acts of force." Finally, the United States Government have decided to withdraw Colonel Greco, chief of the Military Mission in Nicaragua, with his staff and equipment, pending establishment of an internationally recognized Nicaraguan Government. H.M. Government are limiting their contacts with the Sacasa régime to the necessities of routine business, while avoiding anything formal that could be interpreted as recognition.

El Salvador

Broadcast reports state that the Government of El Salvador has officially announced the discovery of a plot to overthrow President Castaneda's Government. Arms were found in the house of a certain Antonio Cornejo; arrests were made, and many persons are said to be involved.

THE FREE TERRITORY OF TRIESTE—II

As regards the Territory's external political relations, there has perhaps been a tendency in this country to an undue pessimism. Italy regards the loss of Trieste and the loss of most of her Navy as the two bitterest pills she is obliged to swallow, but she knows that she cannot attempt to retain or to regain Trieste by force of arms. For a time it seemed that Yugoslavia might take the law into her own hands and occupy the whole of the Free Territory at the earliest opportunity. There appears less reason to fear this now, and it seems likely that the Yugoslavs will aim at securing control of the constitutional machinery and so compass the annexation of Trieste by exploiting the position of the Territory's Communist party. If Trieste gets the right Governor, he may be able to counteract such activities sufficiently to allow the new State to find its feet.

Unhappily for Trieste the economic outlook is much gloomier than the political. Much of the undue optimism which has prevailed about the economic future of the Territory is due to a failure to appreciate the relative importance during the inter-war period of its industry and commerce. Before 1914 Trieste was the chief port and shipbuilding centre of the immense area lying within the Austrian customs union, and railway rates were so arranged as to make it advantageous for great parts of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy to trade through Trieste rather than through the North Sea and Baltic ports. After 1918 the Succession States in many cases found it cheaper to use these ports because of the expensive railway haul over the watershed between the Adriatic and the Danube. Thus Czechoslovak trade went by the Elbe to Hamburg to the Czechoslovak Free Zone, and is likely to continue to do so even though some trade, e.g. oil may go through Trieste (Czechoslovak trade on the Elbe is in fact already under way with the help of H.M.G.). In addition to this change in the direction of trade conditions in Central Europe were such for several years after the war of 1914–18 as to preclude any flourishing trade at all. If this was true after 1918, it is even more true now when much of Central Europe lies in ruins and when such communications as are intact or repairable are not fully available for political reasons. This is markedly the case with Trieste's overland communications, the most important of which are at the mercy of Yugoslavia.

Trieste's gradual recovery during the later 1920s, and again after the economic crisis of the early 1930s, was in the main due to the development of industry carried out by Italy. By the late thirties about 70,000 workers were engaged in industry, 20,000 in the main industry, shipbuilding, and a considerable number in the oil refineries. But industry needs raw materials, and the Territory, as constituted, has none. Even before 1939 it was estimated that 50 per cent. of the cost of a ship from the Trieste shipyards was accounted for by imported materials. Trieste will suffer from another difficulty; the Trieste–Muggia shipyards were not independent entities, but were run in connection with the Monfalcone yard now outside the Territory. All three yards were under the management of the "Cantieri Riuniti," and labour was moved from one to the other as required. The bunker trade in coal and oil was and might be again of great value to Trieste. Oil always had to be imported and this should still be possible, but much of the bunker coal came cheaply by sea from the Arsa mines in Istria. Even if Yugoslavia wished to send this coal to Trieste, it is doubtful if she could afford to do so, for reports indicate that she is short of coal, even of such poor coal as the Istrian. The annual productive capacity of the Trieste branch of the Ilva iron and steel works is estimated at 140,000 tons pig-iron, 34,000 tons steel ingots, 24,000 tons steel-plates. If metallurgical coal is available, and if the works can be re-equipped (there is great need of modernisation, and there is also serious war damage), they could meet local requirements, especially those of shipbuilding. But the amounts of coal and iron-ore required are large.

The Free Territory will not only have to import all the raw materials for industry. Apart from a certain amount of vegetable produce from north-west Istria, and from such fish as can be procured by a much depleted fishing-fleet, it will be entirely dependent for its food supplies on outside sources.

The following tentative, unofficial estimates have been made of some of the Territory's needs for the current year :—

Food—
Grain : 52,800 tons.
Sugar : 3,600 tons.
Fats : 4,560 tons.
Evaporated Milk : 13,800 tons.
Frozen meat : 6,300 tons.
Cheese : 5,040 tons.

Coal: 290,000 tons. This includes 43,000 tons for space heating of public buildings and domestic consumption, but not coal for railways, for which the present estimated consumption is 40 tons a day, i.e. over 14,500 additional tons yearly. The figure also includes 8,100 tons for small scale commercial bunkers. To rehabilitate the port it is estimated that 36,000 tons a year would be the minimum required in order to start full bunker operations.

Petroleum products
Petrol : 58,600 U.S. barrels.
Gas Oil : 62,200 U.S. barrels.
Kerosene : 7,100 U.S. barrels.
Fuel Oil : 13,600 U.S. barrels.
Solvents : 6,500 U.S. barrels.
White spirit : 1,500 U.S. barrels.
Lubricating Oils : 207,000 gallons.
Greases : 111,200 lbs.

An initial quantity of 3,000 tons of fuel oil would be needed as stock for reactivation of the bunkering business. Repair of the refineries and the resumption of refining has been taken in hand, and the prospect of development in this industry is attractive, if the crude oil is available.

These estimates are for bare minima. If the merchant fleet is to be rebuilt and replaced (90 per cent. of Italy's merchant fleet, including Trieste ships, was destroyed during the war), if existing industries are to be rehabilitated, and new ones developed on a scale bearing any sort of relation to that of the pre-war years, it is estimated that the Territory will need the following industrial raw materials :—

Coal : 300,000 tons.
Crude Oil (non-paraffin) : 456,000 tons.
Iron Ore : 320,000 tons.
Oil Seeds, 262,000 tons.
Solvents : 1,750 tons.

It must also be remembered that Trieste produces virtually no consumer goods;

there is no textile industry and no manufacture of boots and shoes. Consequently these goods will also have to be imported.

How is the Free Territory to pay for all these essential imports? and even if she obtains them what likelihood of prosperity is there for the shipbuilding industry which flourished, partly because it obtained considerable subsidies from the Italian Government, partly because it formed an integral part of Italian industry? In August 1946 Signor Cosulich of the great Trieste shipping firm made a rough estimate of what seemed to him likely to be the financial situation in the Territory in the immediate future. His estimate took due account of the importance of industry in the economic life of the Territory, and he considered that the Budget would have to reckon with about 30,000 unemployed, and with a shipping subsidy. The latest economic report from H.M.G.'s Political Adviser in Trieste corroborates this view of the shortage of work. It estimates for a "hard core unemployment figure of approximately 25,000." Signor Cosulich's estimated Budget showed a deficit of some 4,000 million lire (say, £3 million at the exchange rate in September 1946). That his view is not unduly pessimistic is suggested by the financial conclusion reached by the U.K. Working Party in October 1946. They considered that the Territory would be faced with a continuous deficit of about £5 million annually for at any rate the first five years of its existence.

The creation of the Free Territory is the result of a compromise between the Great Powers who were unable to agree on the rival claims of Italy and Yugoslavia to Trieste. The idea of such a Territory had presented itself for some time before July 1946 as a possible solution, but the actual area of the Territory seems to have been agreed upon without full consideration of the political and economic implications. The French line, proposed as a boundary between Italy and Yugoslavia, would have left comparable numbers of the nationals of each country under the rule of the other. But the Territory was cut out of the area allotted by the French to Italy—with the result that far more Italians were left in Yugoslavia than Yugoslavs in Italy, and consequently the Italian sense of an unjust decision was heightened. Undoubtedly the Statute has tried to secure the political independence of the Territory, but politics and economics are inextricably mixed up in this area, and it is difficult to see how a small State whose overland communications with the outside world are wholly commanded by its neighbours can be politically independent. Trieste's transit trade with Central Europe must be free if the city's commerce is to flourish, no matter how good the regulations are for the Free Port. But right across the main line to Austria via Postumia and Ljubljana is Yugoslavia, and it is impossible to say what Yugoslavia will do when once the port of Fiume, which is badly war-damaged, is able to function properly. Across the other big railway line to the North is Italy, and it is doubtful how much interest Italy will show in the encouragement of Trieste's trade. Economically the compromise has produced a situation which seems to have been only too accurately described as "economic nonsense."

GERMANY

A highly important agreement affecting policy towards Germany has been reached between General Robertson and General Clay for a new industrial plan which is intended primarily for the bi-zonal area but is also a plan for the whole of Germany. The announcement of this agreement has been delayed until the machinery constituted at the Paris Conference is in operation. It provides for a revision of the Four-Power Agreement made in March 1946 which had the effect of cutting German industry to some 55 per cent. of her 1938 level. The need to modify these restrictions if Germany were to become a workable economic unit, while still maintaining security safeguards, was rapidly recognised not only by the United Kingdom and the United States but also by the Soviet Union (who in particular needed big reparations from current production). The need to raise steel production was one of the few subjects on which these three Powers—but certainly not France—could agree at Moscow. For some time, the failure to secure economic unity has made it more urgent that the bi-zonal area at least should be given the means to stand on its feet, even if the limits so far imposed on her industry have often been above the output that could actually be reached. News of the revised plan has already begun to leak out and has caused considerable anxiety in French circles, but the French Government have known for some time that such a change must be faced. Despite the Russians' desire for increased steel any change in the level of industry now will presumably be used by them as propaganda against the Paris discussions, whose object, they allege, is to "put Germany first."

The plan has been awaited with keen anxiety by the Germans who want perhaps more than anything to know where they stand—what they may produce and what will be dismantled and what will be retained. The lack of a firm decision and clear explanations has been a significant factor in increasing the opposition to dismantling. Frequent protests have been made in recent weeks, particularly over the fate of the Krupps works in Essen where the population wish at least to save the buildings for peaceful production. If a firm announcement about the plants now to be removed should follow swiftly on an announcement of the higher level of industry, it would be more likely to produce co-operation among the workers than continued uncertainty coupled with the vague hope that dismantling may be dropped.

The most important feature of the new plan is steel production. It is significant of the United States changed policy towards Europe, and their anxiety that Germany shall not be an economic drag, that they reversed their earlier desire, at the time of the Moscow Conference this year, for a lower steel figure than was then proposed by the British and Russians and proposed a figure higher than the British could accept. The figure for annual production (as compared with a somewhat higher capacity) has eventually been fixed at 10·7 million ingot tons for the bi-zonal area. This is based on a figure of 11½ million tons for the whole of Germany excluding the Saar. This shows clearly the present dependence of Eastern Germany on Ruhr steel, particularly as long as she has not access to Upper Silesia. 1936 production for the whole of Germany was 19·2 million tons. Substantial increases will be allowed for other industries. Details of these increases and certain points on which there is not yet agreement will be discussed in a later Summary.

On the 11th July, agreement was provisionally reached with General Clay on a way to reorganise the management of German mines in the bi-zonal area. This does not affect the question of ownership which is to be discussed in the near future. An American proposal to postpone the question of ownership for five years and to appoint interim trustees makes careful discussion necessary. H.M. Government are, however, particularly anxious that this problem should not delay the transfer to the Germans of responsibility for coal production. This transfer is now likely to take place subject to the following provisions: a department of the bi-zonal administration shall be set up to deal with all matters essentially conducted by a Government department; eventually an organisation will be set up to manage the coal industry but for the present only the chief executive will be appointed; he will be chosen and controlled by the British and U.S. Military Governments and he will in turn choose departmental heads. The Economic Council thus has no direct say in the appointments, and Military Government control remains close. Highly misleading allegations were made by the Socialist Unity Party organ Neues Deutschland of the 9th July when it said that H.M. Government had accepted the American plan for trustees and that the Ruhr coal mines would never be socialised. Several aspects of the Ruhr coal problem are likely to be discussed shortly in an Anglo-U.S. economic conference on Germany in Washington which is being called at the suggestion of the United States Government. According to press reports, General Clay stated publicly in Berlin on the 11th July that the possibility was being considered of a loan of $300,000,000 for modernising the Ruhr mines. This loan, he suggested, might be financed by the world bank but not by national Governments.

General Clay told General Robertson on the 3rd July that, even if the money could be found, there was not enough food available to raise the normal consumer's ration in the bi-zonal area from 1,550 to 1,800 calories this year. It had originally been hoped to make this increase in October. Nevertheless, in mid-July a joint programme for imports up to June 1948 was drawn up which aims at providing for this increased ration mainly by additional supplies of food other than grain. The plan is not restricted to available financial resources, but some at least of the additional food is known to be available. On the other hand, forecasts for the German harvest are poor so that the general outlook is still uncertain. Recent visits to Germany of members of the United States Administration, including the Secretary of State of Agriculture, have, however, undoubtedly stimulated the American Government's sense of urgency with regard to the food problem. Record grain imports arrived during June and July to help make up some of the ration which has not been met during the past three months. The first fat imports since the capitulation have also been purchased. This good news is somewhat offset in the German mind by the rejection of the Bi-Zonal Administration's request that Germany might resume whaling; the refusal is based on decisions taken at Potsdam. There have been no food demonstrations in the British zone in the last week or so.

All six parties in the British Zonal Advisory Council rejected on the 9th July the Draft Land Reform Bill proposed by the British Control Commission, some like the C.D.U. and the German Party (the Lower Saxon Peasants' Group) because it is too radical, others like the S.P.D. because it is not radical enough and all partly because they were not given more say in its preparation. The counter-recommendations produced by the Z.A.C. appear to afford a satisfactory basis of agreement.

The latest act in the tragicomedy of Berlin Government took place on the 10th July. The Russian delegate to the Control Council failed to produce real evidence that Reuter was unsuitable to be Lord Mayor. Reuter was defended by the British and United States delegates who repulsed the Russian accusation that they themselves were disrupting the work of the Government. In the end it was decided that the Kommandatura must inform the Assembly that no agreement had been reached and that Reuter's election was not approved owing to Soviet objections. No fresh election, however, has been ordered since the British and U.S. representatives consider this pointless. It is believed that the S.P.D. and C.D.U. would prefer to leave the matter in abeyance rather than go through the farce of another "free" election. The Assembly has now decided, against the votes of the S.E.D., that it will confine its activities to essential administrative work (presumably that which does not require the approval of the Kommandatura) and it will, apparently, refrain from work on legislative programmes which it expects to see held up indefinitely by the Russian veto. This makeshift can obviously not suffice for long.

AUSTRIA

The Austrian Government have applied for admittance to membership of the United Nations. When the application was discussed by the Security Council on the 10th July, the Soviet Union, supported on technical grounds by Australia and Syria, objected that the application was premature in view of the fact that no agreement had yet been reached on a treaty for Austria. No formal motion to shelve the application was, however, tabled, and the Austrian request was accordingly referred to the Security Council Committee on New Members. Dr. Gruber, the Austrian Foreign Minister, has privately stated that the Austrian Government had previously been assured of strong support for the application from the U.S. Government. He has added that a further motive in pressing the application at this stage has been the possibility of lodging an appeal with the United Nations, should the next Conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers fail to produce a treaty for Austria. It will be recalled that, in the closing stages of the Moscow Conference, Mr. Marshall proposed that the whole problem of the Austrian Treaty should be referred to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Austrian pessimism in regard to an early conclusion of a treaty has been increased by the breakdown of the first Paris talks on the Marshall proposals; the consequent East-West division of Europe is reported to have produced considerable uneasiness in view of Austria's central position on that continent. According to newspaper reports in the British press, Austria's acceptance of the Anglo-French invitation to the European Reconstruction Co-operation Conference has produced a state of tension in the relations between the Austrian Government and the Soviet authorities in Vienna; the latter are reported to have warned the Austrian Government not to accept offers or plans in Paris which would involve that part of the Austrian economy which is in the Soviet zone; fears are said to be growing that the Marshall offer may lead to the division of Austria into two economic and political units. Speaking at a Socialist rally on the 13th July, the Austrian Minister of the Interior emphasised the economic character of the Paris conference, but at the same time he warned his listeners of the danger of Austria being drawn involuntarily into the maelstrom of differences between the Big Powers. Herr Helmer again stressed Austria's desire to steer a middle course politically and firmly refuted current rumours that the Austrian Government intended to transfer their seat from Vienna to Salzburg.

Further evidence of Soviet jealousy of Western influence in Austria was shown in the objections raised at the Allied Council's meeting in Vienna on the 10th July against the Austro-U.S. Relief Agreement of the 15th June. (See Summary No. 398.) According to General Kourasov the Agreement contravened the Moscow Declaration of 1943, the Zonal Agreement of 1945 and the Control Agreement of 1946. It aimed, he declared, at "a clear and unilateral infringement of international agreement regarding Allied control in Austria and attempts to create for the U.S. Element a régime of exclusive control and interference in the economic affairs of Austria." All this, the Russian member maintained, was in direct contrast to the attitude of the Soviet Government in their "relief efforts."

Discussions on the oil problem continue in the Austrian Treaty Commission, and the Soviet Delegate has on at least three occasions shown a definite tendency to stray from the straight and narrow path of the agreement on procedure which was eventually reached on the 18th June after weeks of tiresome negotiations. M. Novikov protested (most unsuccessfully) against the selection, by the French Delegate, of the Steinberg-Naphtha concern as "important and typical" for purposes of discussion of Item 3 of the Oil Agenda (the validity of the acquisition of financial interests and shares by the Germans by the process of increasing the share capital without the participation of all the shareholders). Later, when Sir George Rendel suggested that this was a clear case for examination by the Committee of Experts, which should now be set to work as agreed, M. Novikov again stalled and demanded time not only to study the case in this regard but also as to whether it should even be considered further by the Commission. Finally, and again contrary to previous agreement, M. Novikov refused to pass on to discussion of another item on the agenda before discussion on Item 3 had been exhausted. The Commission thereupon adjourned. An unsuccessful Soviet attempt at an earlier meeting to drive a wedge between the United Kingdom and United States Delegates on the subject of the validity of the Bitumen Law resulted in virtually reconciling the U.S. Delegate to the views of the U.K. Delegate on this point.

The critical shortage of oil supplies for local consumption was again brought up by the British member at the Allied Council's meeting on the 10th July. Brigadier Cooke called the attention of the Council to the wide discrepancies between the supplies promised by the Russians and the amounts actually delivered, and he declared that the Soviet action was seriously prejudicing Austria's economic recovery. In the view of the British member the Soviet action was either deliberate or due to the incompetence of the management of the Soviet-controlled oil industry to carry out orders. Though he at first tried to attribute the blame to the Austrian Government, General Kurasov eventually agreed to check the facts and figures presented by the British member.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Although the Czechoslovak Government's acceptance of the invitation to attend the Paris Conference for European Economic Co-operation had been explicitly made subject to certain conditions and reservations, the sudden reversal of the Government's earlier decision—consequent upon the visit of M. Gottwald, the Communist Prime Minister, and M. Masaryk, the non-party Foreign Minister, to Moscow—has profoundly shocked a large proportion of the Czechs. The latter, though fully conscious of their country's dependence upon its powerful next-door neighbour for reasons of national security, sincerely desire free and open relations with the democracies. The Slovak attitude, in view of the Democrat-Communist feud, needs no special explanation. To both the Czechs and Slovaks the Soviet argument that the presence of a Czechoslovak delegation at Paris would in itself constitute an act hostile to the welfare of the Slav nations must appear in the light of a Diktat: indeed, it is said that a large section of the population views the Russian attitude with grave concern, describing it as "a Munich in reverse"—strong criticism from a nation no section of which has particular cause to welcome the events of 1938.

To sweeten the pill the two States have now concluded a new Five-Year Trade Agreement whereby Czechoslovakia in return for the delivery—during 1948 alone—of 200,000 tons of wheat, 200,000 tons of feeding-stuffs, and some 85,000 tons of fertilisers, cotton, wool, and the raw materials essential to her industries, will supply Soviet Russia with finished products—railway equipment, machine tools, sugar, shoes, textiles and the like. M. Gottwald upon his return, said that these deliveries would prove "significant for the development of our economic plan and full industrial employment." It is reported that to accelerate the flow of trade to and from the Soviet Union a new frontier station has been completed near Cop on the south Slovakian–Ruthenian border.

The new Treaty, considered along with the series of multilateral and interdependent agreements already (or about to be) concluded between the Slav nations and remaining Satellite States, is intended as a powerful response to the "Western" plan for continental rehabilitation. At first sight it certainly appears an irrefutable answer: with the destruction of German industry and doubts concerning Allied intentions with that country's future, the Silesian–Moravian industrial region is destined, if only temporarily, to supersede the Ruhr. A vast market for Polish-Czech production lies ready to hand in Eastern and Balkan Europe, whilst Soviet Russia, striving to repair her shattered economy, is a gigantic field for exploitation. On the other hand, Czechoslovak trade with the "West" has been steadily increasing since the Liberation; trade returns with "other countries" far outweigh trade with Russia and other satellites. Czech industrialists are also dissatisfied with the quality of deliveries from Russia, particularly in respect of raw materials upon whose import Czech economy is so dependent. If, as now appears likely, the whole of Czechoslovakia's industrial economy must conform to the Soviet pattern and requirements, it will be interesting to see what effect it will have upon Czech recovery.

The political results of the Agreement and the Moscow visit are even more important. The next election will be held, according to M. Gottwald, in May, 1948: in the meantime a "stepping-up" of Communist propaganda is to be expected, whilst the Opposition will be cautious, though caustic critics are even now calling on the Marxists for a reckoning. President Benes and M. Masaryk, both tried friends of democratic ideology in the traditional liberalism of President Masaryk, face an unenviable future which will call upon all their resources of diplomacy. Though the Communists are generally reported to be losing ground, the two statesmen must devise a scheme which will ensure internal independence without encouraging the Kremlin to tighten the screw.

In view of the scarcity of more detailed information and the extreme delicacy of the Czechoslovak Government's situation in this matter, final judgment must still be reserved.

POLAND

The final decision of the Polish Government not to accept the invitation to take part in the Marshall discussions has been defended officially on several grounds. First, the economic aid to be given by the United States will, it is argued, be made only on the acceptance of certain political conditions, and the Marshall offer constitutes therefore merely an extension of the Truman doctrine in respect of Greece and Turkey—aid of a kind which Rzeczpospolita terms a "narcotic injection." The Polish Government find in the supposed threat to their sovereignty a danger which menaces the future of the various national and international plans undertaken by the Slav countries. Upon the success of these plans, of course, the reputation of the several governments largely depends.

With this defence of the principle of sovereignty is interwoven the deeply-seated Polish fear of a renascent Germany. The Government consider that the countries most devastated by German aggression should receive priority in any scheme of European reconstruction. "But, in the invitation issued by the French Government," said a news commentator on the 8th July, "there is not a word about observing any priority of needs. On the contrary, it is stated that the Conference will explore the problem of aid to Germany . . . the tendencies shown by the United States financial circles, on whom depends Congress's consent, imply . . . . a return to the situation before the war when Germany dictated conditions in many European markets."

The repercussions of the Marshall offer have once more underlined the differences between the Socialists and the Communists. The former, fearing more restricted freedom of action as a result of non-participation, favoured the Plan from the moment of its inception. The general attitude of the Socialists was manifested in no unmistakable manner at the meeting of the Supreme Council of the P.P.S. on the 30th June. M. Osobka-Morawski, Minister of Public Administration and Chairman of the Party's Executive Committee, who unexpectedly made a strong defence of close collaboration with the Communists, was called upon to resign, and, although the fact has not been publicly announced, he has been succeeded by M. Rusinek, Minister for Social Welfare. At the same time, it is reported that there have been further arrests of independent right-wing Socialists.

As a counterweight to the effect of the Polish refusal upon public opinion, further arguments have been produced which aim at showing that Poland, because of the importance of its food and coal to Western Europe, need not hurry to accept irksome conditions. This opinion is supported by the belief that the United States needs European help to solve the problem of their surplus wealth as much as Europe does to solve its poverty. The Government appear to feel or hope—not surprisingly with the various American and International delegations (see last week's Summary) at present in their midst, that the door has not been irrevocably closed. For their part, the Russians, who are holding discussions in Moscow with M. Grossfeld, Deputy Minister of Industry and Trade, are possibly offering more attractive conditions than have hitherto been forthcoming, as it would appear they have already raised the stakes for the Czechs.

General Zoligowski, who died in London last week at the age of 81, helped to organise Polish forces during the Russian revolution, and, in 1920, on Pilsudski's orders, led the brief campaign which led to the capture of Vilna and its later incorporation in Poland. He subsequently became interested in politics, particularly the cause of Slavonic cooperation. During the war, he supported first Sikorski, then Mikolajczyk, and finally the Warsaw Government, in their collaboration with the U.S.S.R. He had hoped to return to Poland next month. Arrangements are being made for his remains to be carried back to Warsaw.

SOVIET UNION

Since the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to be represented at Paris, the tone adopted by the Soviet press towards the European Economic Co-operation Conference has inevitably been one of aloof superiority. The most important commentary came from the pen of Viktorov, who maintained that it was clear that the proclaimed "economic co-operation" was nothing but a cloak for political plans, since the leading participants in the Conference had proved themselves utterly incapable in the economic field at home. How could the planning of Europe be undertaken by countries so inexperienced in planning as Britain, herself suffering from acute dollar hunger, or France, tottering towards economic castastrophe? He made much play with the reservations of the Swiss Government, alleging that they would have been unnecesary had the Conference possessed merely an economic character. American imperialism, according to Viktorov, was using the situation to create a Western bloc of which Western Germany would be the nucleus, and was setting in motion a new Dawes plan. He concluded that the new plan would fail like its predecessors.

Little or no publicity was given to Czechoslovakia's original acceptance of the invitation to the Conference but her subsequent refusal was quoted as an instance of a clear reply of an independent State to attempts of foreign circles to impose "plans contrary to their interests upon European States." Great satisfaction was expressed with the conclusion of the Soviet-Czechoslovak five-year Trade Agreement signed on the 11th July (see under "Czechoslovakia"). The relations between the two countries were described as a model of what relations between a great Power and a small country should be, based, as they were, on mutual respect for each other's independence and on the principle of non-interference in each other's internal affairs. M. Stalin accorded the Czechoslovak delegation the honour of entertaining them himself at dinner.

Tass, discussing Albania's refusal to go to Paris, described it as due to that country's reluctance to be confronted with accomplished facts and her deep concern about the "consolidation of democratic peace and sincere co-operation among the nations." It remains to be seen whether General Hoxha, who had the honour of being received by MM. Molotov and Vyshinsky on his arrival in Moscow on the 14th July, will receive any similar quid pro quo in the shape of grain for the lost dollars. (See under "Albania.")

Nothing final has yet emerged from the Anglo-Soviet trade negotiations now proceeding in Moscow.

On the whole this country has come in for rather less press criticism lately than the U.S.A. Two minor instances of unpleasantness have been the complaints put out by Trud of the arrangements for the visit of the Soviet metal workers' delegation which has just returned to Moscow from Great Britain and the refusal of the Soviet Book Sales Organisation, Mezhdunarodnaya Kniga to accept delivery of 3,000 copies of "Land Operations in North Africa" in Russian, ordered in March 1946. It was alleged that the Soviet metal workers had had no opportunity of contacting British workers at mass meetings but had enjoyed only official Trade Union hospitality, the impression being given that there had been a deliberate attempt to prevent the delegates from telling the truth about the U.S.S.R. to their British comrades. It was also complained that insufficient publicity had been given to the visit in the British press. As to "Land Operations in North Africa," the books did not reach Moscow until a year after the agreement to purchase, and Mezhdunarodnaya Kniga has taken advantage of this delay to wriggle out of the contract on the ground that interest in literature of this sort was now on the wane.

The Far East has recently been coming to the fore again. Tass of the 9th July issued a denial of the story put out in the Chinese paper Sin Min Wan Pao that the Soviet troops had occupied the city of Tachen in Chinese Sinkiang, and this was followed two days later by a communiqué which occupied 1½ columns in all Soviet newspapers, refuting in detail the recent allegations of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the Soviet Government had hindered the establishment of Chinese civil administration in Port Arthur and Dairen. The Chinese communiqué was branded as a statement calculated to assist the anti-Soviet campaign now being conducted in China, in which certain Chinese and foreign circles were showing particular interest in order to distract attention from the real situation. (See under "Far East.")

Izvestiya waxed sarcastic over the apparent monopoly enjoyed by American films in Japan which prevented the Japanese from seeing good Soviet anti-Fascist films. The commercial gentlemen on General MacArthur's staff should remember, the writer said, that they were not operating on the stock exchange where one could "indulge in dark machinations without fear of punishment." The recent claim of the Japanese Foreign Minister Ashida to the Kurile Islands produced a further attack on the American authorities, whose toleration of the Japanese militarists encouraged their shady doings and led them to behave as if there had been no act of unconditional surrender. The trial of the Japanese War Criminals was criticised in Krasnaya Zvezda on familiar lines.

The Gosplan results for the second quarter of 1947 which have just been published contain certain features of interest. Though the improvement shown by the published figures must be to some extent discounted by the fact that the June quarter is the easiest in the year, and though some quite serious shortcomings are admitted, nonetheless there is clearly ground for those in authority to feel more confident concerning the economic development of their country, than they did a year ago, or even in the first quarter of this year. The most encouraging feature of the report, from the Soviet point of view, was the fact that the plan for industrial output during the quarter had been fulfilled 103% and that the total industrial output of the country was 15% above that of the same period last year. Only the Ministries of Transport, Engineering, Agricultural Machinery Production and the Timber Industries fell short of their plan, but by a greatly reduced margin compared with their earlier failures. More important, however, is the fact that certain vital Ministries reached their target for the first time, namely, Iron and Steel Production, Non-Ferrous Metal Production, Coal Production in the Eastern Regions and Natural and Synthetic Rubber Production. In the case of Non-Ferrous Metals, the figures for copper, zinc and aluminium were clearly unsatisfactory; as the industry as a whole, however, fulfilled its plan 108%, the production of a number of other important non-ferrous metals—no details of which have been given anywhere—must have considerably exceeded the planned figures. Relief for the harassed consumer still seems as far away as ever, the rates of increase during the quarter in the whole range of consumption goods, particularly food and housing being lower than those fixed in the 1947 plan for the year.

In the meantime, ideology is not being neglected. The All-Union Society for the Dissemination of Scientific Knowledge is proceeding vigorously with its campaign to counteract any possible effects of the restricted liberties enjoyed anew by the Church. At a recent general meeting of founder members of the Society the Chairman of the Organising Committee announced that branches had been established in all the Union Republics and larger towns of the U.S.S.R. The June number of the Komsomol Journal, Molodoi Bolshevik, gave some evidence that even the young are still not sufficiently convinced of the folly of religion; in spite of the fact that, according to the publication, the material conditions of life in the U.S.S.R. were such as completely to eliminate the causes of religion, nevertheless some were still led astray by the difficulties of life and an incomplete appreciation of science. Molodoi Bolshevik, however, did not advocate strenuous measures to eradicate the remnants of religious feeling since religious prejudices were people's misfortunes, not their fault. Long patient work was necessary.

The new penal laws to protect property are being put vigorously into operation; a recent statement from the Public Prosecutor's Office is, apparently intended to show that even private property is being safeguarded in accordance with the law. One man received a sentence of five years in a labour camp for stealing a wallet in a tram and another one of eight years was for snatching money from a woman in the market.

Diplomats are still encountering the same difficulties as private people in getting their Russian wives out of Moscow. To the case of the Greek Ambassador is now added that of the son of the Chilean Ambassador (not himself a diplomat) and that of the Ethiopian Chargé d'Affaires.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

On the 7th July the Danish Ambassador in London handed His Majesty's Government another Note on the South Schleswig question. The contents do not in any way deviate from the policy defined in the representation made on the 19th October of last year (see Summary No. 365), and the purpose of the new Note is merely to draw attention to a number of points which at the present moment are of particular interest to the Danes. Adverting to a recent statement by Air Vice-Marshal de Crespigny concerning the removal from Schleswig-Holstein of some of the 1,250,000 East-German refugees, the Danish Government consider that such a transfer ought in the first place to be made of persons at present settled in the districts directly bordering on Denmark. The status of the South Schleswig Association is also brought up, and the Note points out that the concessions granted at the time of the elections did not confer on the Association the rights of a political party. Dissatisfaction is further voiced over the latest directive of the administration in Kiel concerning the admittance of children to Danish schools; equal rights with the German populations in this respect are demanded for the "Danish-minded" minority. The last point in the Note asks for full freedom of expression for the minority, and this, according to the Danish view, should entail the right of issuing a newspaper in German championing the cause of "Danism." Requests made for such facilities have been rejected by the Military Government, but a certain grievance may perhaps be said to exist in that the Danish Flensburg Avis is permitted to print official notices only in German.

The prolonged strike of the Copenhagen printers (see Summary No. 395) came to an end on the 4th July when with 1957 votes to 1812 the men decided to go back to work. There were 207 abstentions.

After the Swedish, Norwegian and Danish Foreign Ministers had met in Copenhagen on the 9th July a non-committal statement was made in which it was said that the three countries were unanimous on a number of measures affecting the implementation of the Marshall offer. A joint acceptance of the invitation to Paris could, however, not be announced as none of the three countries had at that time officially decided to attend.

The proceedings in Paris have already shown the extreme caution with which the Scandinavian countries have decided to participate in the work of the Committee of European Economic Cooperation, and there can be little doubt they would have preferred that the American proposals should be handled by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe. (How exactly this could have been done after M. Molotov's refusal and the consequent non-participation of the Soviet Union and her satellites remains a mystery.) The fact that these three countries are represented at the Conference not by Cabinet Ministers but merely by their respective diplomatic representatives and certain other senior officials is perhaps significant. An examination of the composition of the various committees formed in Paris rather reinforces than dispels these doubts. Sweden is not, it should be noted, a member of the iron and steel committee. In this connexion it is interesting to note that Sweden and Denmark, at any rate, received memoranda from the Soviet Government expressing the Russian views on the Marshall Plan. Reports circulating in Sweden to the effect that the Soviet Union had urged Sweden not to accept responsibilities for the reconstruction of Europe which might interfere with the fulfilment of the Swedish-Soviet trade agreement were promptly denied in Stockholm.

Finland

The Finnish "provisional refusal" of the invitation to Paris reported in last week's Summary was immediately refuted by M. Enckell, the Foreign Minister, who ascribed it to usual Communist tactics and added that at the time the Government had not even considered the question. Czechoslovakia's sudden volte face undoubtedly sealed such hope of Finnish participation as may have existed, and the Finnish people were given another demonstration of Soviet methods through learning of their country's refusal over the Moscow radio in advance of their own news reports and press.

Iceland

A strike of dockers and transport workers organised by the Communists recently broke out in Reykjavik and is threatening completely to paralyse the economy of the country. Several ships are lying in the harbour unable to discharge their cargoes, whilst others have made for Norwegian ports. M. Olafur Thors, former Prime Minister, explained that the Communist minority had through their influence in the trade union movement attained a position enabling them in this manner to terrorise the rest of the community. M. Thors' explanation of the strike was that the Communists wanted to avenge themselves for being excluded from the Government last January.

FRANCE

Mr. Bevin broadcast from Paris a message to the French people on 14th July, the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille which has been celebrated this year with pre-war pomp and merry-making. Mr. Bevin spoke of the common objectives desired by both the British and French peoples, their common aims of maintaining freedom and resisting tyranny, and their resolve to "work together, not to dominate others but to co-operate with everyone."

The conference in Paris (see under "The European Economic Co-operation Conference") is still the centre of attention and there is in fact a tendency to look upon it as a panacea for all the ills of France. The withdrawal of Czechoslovakia from the conference caused bitter comment and papers of the Right and Centre compared the pressure put on the Czech Government by the U.S.S.R. to that exercised by Hitler at the time of Munich and the Anschluss. M. Ramadier, speaking at Chambéry on the 13th July, expressed profound regret at the absence of the Soviet Union from the conference but said that Soviet reservations could not prevent the other countries from going ahead and organising their own recovery with the help of the U.S.A.

It is now generally assumed in France that the Government's acceptance of the plans for European economic co-operation has made impossible the return to office of the Communists. Opposition to the Communists is therefore becoming more outspoken and there are signs that the latent split in the trade union movement may become a definite break between the Communist-led C.G.T. and dissident organisations. This split may not, however, prove of advantage to the Socialists, and the Government have been gravely embarrassed for the last fortnight by the threatened strike of 1,200,000 civil servants, organised in the Socialist-led Union of Civil Servants. After much bargaining the strike was averted and it now seems probable that the civil servants will accept the decision of the National Assembly to which the Government have submitted their proposals. The civil servants are acknowledged to be badly paid and the Government had promised to raise their salaries by the 1st July. The re-grading which must precede these salary increases is not yet completed and the Government have therefore offered to pay an interim bonus which, although much inferior to that demanded by the union, will nevertheless be a heavy additional burden on the budget.

There is some possibility that a new level of wages and prices will be established in the next few weeks. The C.G.T. and the employers' association have arranged to negotiate directly on questions of production, wages and prices, and it is unlikely that the Government will be able to hold out against their combined demands. It is to be hoped that the new price for wheat, fixed by the Cabinet last week at a level 70 per cent. higher than last year, will not involve an increase in the prices of other foodstuffs, which have in the past risen far more than the price of wheat.

General de Gaulle spoke with approval of the Marshall proposals when he addressed the Anglo-American press association on the 9th July. He talked mainly of the need for restoring European prosperity and urged the need for the prior recovery of France herself and for real and sincere agreement between France and Britain.

North African affairs are again coming into the limelight with the announcement that the "Statute" of Algeria was at long last approved by the Cabinet on the 11th July and is due for discussion by the Assembly very shortly. Details are not yet known, but from press reports the statute does not appear to be revolutionary. It provides for an Algerian assembly with 45 members elected by the European college and 45 by the native college by universal suffrage, but this assembly will have only limited powers, mainly financial.

In Morocco there have been wild rumours that the French were about to depose the Sultan as a result of the Tangier incident (see Summary No. 393) or that they were keeping him under house arrest. The situation now appears to have improved, and the Sultan has signed three decrees embodying constitutional and administrative reforms. These reforms strengthen the Moroccan side of the administration and are designed to promote closer liaison between the Sultan's Government and the French authorities. General Juin, in an interview given to the Paris paper Combat (5th July), said that these reforms might seem elementary, but that Morocco was still a feudal country and development must take place gradually. General Juin said that his first duty was to restore order, and that he would consolidate the Sultan's Government by building up a Moroccan constitution. His statement that it was now time to replace many minor European officials by Moroccans should have a great effect if it is implemented.

SWITZERLAND

It is reported that Switzerland has accepted the invitation to the European Economic Co-operation Conference, provided that the Conference is of a purely economic character, with no political significance.

In the course of the final Parliamentary debate on the Federal budget for last year, the Minister of Finance stated that the balancing of the current year's budget was extremely problematical, unless tremendous economies were made. Expenditure of 1,500 million francs, as compared with 675 million in 1938, was much too high. The present figure included 400 million francs for interest charges and 150 million for food subsidies. Already for 1947 there was a deficit of 235 million francs, which, it was estimated, might rise to 400 million if all demands under consideration were approved.

The order of the 11th December, 1946, prohibiting the export of armaments has been prolonged for a further six months, though exceptions are permitted in the case of small arms to enable manufacturers to maintain production and be in readiness to accept Swiss orders.

A proposal by the Federal Council to establish a central organisation for the production and distribution of electricity has been rejected by Cantonal representatives.

The director of the meat section of the Swiss Food Office states that there are in the country at the present time 20,000 head of cattle less than there were a year ago, while the position regarding breeding cattle is the worst since 1931. The total meat production barely covers three-fifths of existing rations. It is estimated that production in 1948 will be about 130,000 tons, leaving 55,000 tons to be met by imports. If foreign deliveries can be assured, meat rationing might then be discontinued.

Trade unions are reported to have raised objections to the acceptance of any more foreign workers. Since the war, over 100,000 male and female workers have entered Switzerland from Italy.

An advisory commission has been formed within the Federal Department of Industry and Labour to study and report on questions submitted to it by the Federal Economic Department, such as those dealing with wage disputes, compulsory collective wage agreements, and the fixing of minimum wage rates for "home industries."

ITALY

The Italian Government accepted with alacrity the invitation to attend the Conference for European Economic Co-operation and is represented in Paris by Count Sforza. The Italians are very conscious that they have obtained in Paris the right to take part as equals with other Europeans, and Count Sforza is perhaps overzealous in his determination to put the 46 million inhabitants of Italy in the foreground of the European picture. His proposal, which has not been accepted for the present, to set up a fifth technical committee of the Conference to deal with labour and emigration questions is a natural one to come from an Italian, for the one considerable contribution which Italy can make to the needs of Europe is a supply of labour, skilled and unskilled, and her own constant problem is what to do with her surplus population. Great satisfaction will be felt by the Italians on the election of Italy as one of the five members of the executive committee of the Conference, as well as to membership of the committees on Food and Agriculture and Fuel and Power. It may be hoped that this recognition will help to dissipate part at least of Italy's sense of inferiority.

The problem of the illegal immigration into Italy of large numbers of Jews and of their subsequent departure for Palestine from Italian ports has been a cause of genuine distress to the Italian Government, who have shown anxiety to do what they can to stop these activities (see Summary No. 392 of the 14th May, 1947). They have co-operated with the British authorities in delaying the departure of suspected ships, like the President Warfield, in this particular case by arranging for an Italian warship to shadow the ship when she left Italian waters. They have now agreed on the adoption of various measures for strengthening the control of the northern Italian frontier, particularly in the area between Italy and the French Zone of Austria, a step which had been urged for some time by His Majesty's Government. The Italian frontier police will now be required to keep much stricter watch and ward on the northern frontier, particularly in the area of the Brenner and Resia Passes, and will sequestrate all vehicles, in whatever way they may be marked, found to be transporting illegal immigrants. The Italian Government have also ordered the police to arrest any illegal immigrants found in the province of Bolzano and have added the doubtful proposition to send them over the S. Candido Pass into the British zone of Austria. The Italians obviously regard this plan as a solution of the problem raised by the reluctance of the French authorities to take back the immigrants into their zone, but, apparently, take no account of the difficulties that they would cause for the British authorities in Austria. Illegal immigrants found in other Italian provinces will be arrested and confined in the small island of Ustica, which lies about 40 miles north of Palermo, Sicily. Finally the Italians have asked His Majesty's Government to appoint a liaison officer from the British zone in Austria to act in co-operation with Dr. Vargas, the Italian inspector of the frontier area. It has not been easy for the Italian Government to take action, in view of the help known to be given particularly by Jewish workers in U.N.R.R.A. and A.J.D.C. to these immigrants both inside Italy and in the French and American zones of Austria. Steady encouragement and pressure from His Majesty's Government have at last produced some results, and, though some of the proposals may be unacceptable, it is gratifying to find Signor De Gasperi's Government prepared to take action.

Italian ratification of the Peace Treaty still hangs fire. On the 9th July the Treaty Commission of the Constituent Assembly voted by 13 to 10 for its immediate ratification, and Count Sforza, who takes to himself all the credit for this favourable conclusion, expressed the view that this vote suggested that the Constituent Assembly was likely also to favour ratification, as the proportion of the political parties is the same in the Assembly and in the Commission. Count Sforza added, however, that there was still likely to be a further delay of 10 to 15 days. On the 13th he seemed to be taking a less cheerful view of the prospect. He told the Secretary of State in Paris that general opposition to ratification was growing and that he did not think Signor De Gasperi was strong enough to resist this opposition. The Socialists and Communists seem to be waiting for Russia. Signor Nenni said on the 8th that, as the Treaty only came into force when the ratification of the Big Four had been deposited, he favoured waiting until the U.S.S.R. acted, and he admitted that he had no idea when this would be. His Majesty's Government have made it clear to Count Sforza that Italy's position and influence at the meetings of the Conference in Paris will be much stronger if she carries out her obvious duty as promptly as possible.

SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE

Hungary

The refusal of Hungary to attend the European Economic Co-operation Conference, in common with all the other Russian-dominated countries, reversed her previous decision. The Communist newspaper, Szabad Nép, has attempted to justify this refusal by talk of a Western economic dictatorship. But few will believe that the Hungarian Government acted on their own initiative; and indeed, it is common knowledge that a delegation, led by M. Gerö, the Communist Minister of Communications, had been appointed when General Sviridov sought an interview with M. Dinnyés in order to impart to him the details of M. Molotov's last Paris speech. The following day the Coalition Parties rejected the Anglo-French invitation: only the Opposition voted in its favour.

The means of pressure used to bring about Hungary's change of front are said to include German and Italian assets (forfeit to the Soviet Union), Hungarian prisoners-of-war in the Soviet Union, and an indefinite delay in the ratification of the Peace Treaty. The non-Communist Press has ventured to admit disappointment, Népszava declaring that the Social Democrats "would have welcomed a decision to take part in the Conference," but that the pursuit of peace must continue to guide Hungary's policy; Soviet friendship was necessary, but Hungary should remain detached from the disputes of the Great Powers (see Summary No. 397) and mobilize her own resources. The organ of the Bourgeois Democrats, Világ, went so far as to deny that participation in the Conference would have been tantamount to joining a Western bloc. Consolation is generally derived from the thought that Czechoslovakia suffered even greater humiliation both as a former Allied country and by reason of the publicity attached to her withdrawal.

The contradiction issued by the Czechoslovak Press of the statement that schools for the Hungarian minority were to be re-opened has once more lowered the fluctuating temperature of Czechoslovak-Hungarian relations. M. Ries, on the other hand, attested to the satisfactory character of his conversations with MM. Fierlinger and Masaryk, and the two countries have concluded a three months trade agreement by which Hungary is to deliver food in return for raw materials. In addition goods to the value of $20,000,000 will be exchanged between Hungary and Yugoslavia during the current year, and Hungary expects shortly to sign a trade pact with Bulgaria.

The introduction of the Three Years' Plan on 1st August is to be accompanied by an improvement in the standard of living. Increased bread and oil rations are to become available, and extra fuel will be supplied to private houses next winter. A reduction is forecast in the cost of potatoes, shoes, textiles, gas and tram fares, and new rates of pay for the Civil Service are to be established as from 1st January of the present year.

A clash between the Communists and the Freedom Party, in which M. Vasary and other followers of M. Sulyok were injured, is alleged to have been caused by M. Vasary's criticism of the Three Years' Plan as destructive to personal liberty and the beginning of Hungary's enslavement. The Freedom Party has also hotly denied Communist accusations of responsibility for fires which have broken out in various industrial undertakings.

The Cabinet has now agreed on the final text of the new electoral bill which is to be rushed through the National Assembly during a single session. Most important of the changes is that disqualifying former deputies of Government parties under the Horthy régime from offering themselves for re-election. The bill is clearly aimed against M. Sulyok who was a member of General Gömbös' National Unity Party. Such a measure might not be unjustified if its application were wider, but even on the Left enlightened opinion unofficially deplores its timing and direction in view of M. Sulyok's otherwise uncompromised record. Those who remember that he was considered worthy to act as Public Prosecutor against the leading war criminals, and to be considered as a candidate for the Premiership find this sudden discovery of his demerits absurd. Nor will it be forgotten that there are others in high places whose past will less easily bear investigation, as, for instance, Professor Szekfü, at present Ambassador to Moscow, but once a right-wing historian and Bethlenite. Again it was M. Tildy, not M. Sulyok, who voted in favour of war with Russia and the first anti-Jewish law. It is doubtful whether this deliberate piece of victimization was justified by expediency, since not all M. Sulyok's followers are as restrained as their Conservative but sober-minded leader.

M. Sulyok's followers have so far constituted the only serious Opposition Party, a bewildering number of at present unco-ordinated small groups is distracting public attention. At one time M. Erdei, Secretary-General of the National Peasants, suggested that the Church should form a specifically clerical Party rather than attempt to influence any of those in existence, but the Freedom Party would already appear to have filled that gap. There are, moreover, the two branches of the Democratic People's Party which failed to make use of its right to contest the 1945 election, but one wing of which is reorganising under the leadership of Professor Eckhardt and the journalist, M. Barankovics. Dissident Smallholders have also the choice of joining M. Pfeiffer or M. Parragi, who in turn broke away from M. Sulyok and is said not to differ idealogically from the Government. The new Party, which Fr. Balogh appears to have received permission to organise, will presumably be Catholic in its allegiance, though at the same time anti-Mindszenty, as the Cardinal takes an unfavourable view of Fr. Balogh's activities. Finally there is talk, admittedly vague, of the formation of a Calvinist Party.

Yugoslavia

Yugoslav comments on the Paris Conference, since the Government's refusal to participate, have adhered so closely to the Soviet and satellite pattern as to be barely worthy of mention. The Minister for Foreign Affairs does not seem to have enjoyed the task of conveying his Government's point of view. This seems to have been considered a convenient moment for the republics of Slovenia and Macedonia to announce Five-Year Plans which are miniature replicas of the central Yugoslav Plan. And Albania and Yugoslavia have reaffirmed their friendship on the anniversary of their Treaty by concluding a Cultural Convention on the lines of those signed by Yugoslavia with Roumania, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

On the other hand the Anglo-Yugoslav economic and civil aviation talks do not seem to have been affected by Yugoslavia's attitude to the Marshall Plan. The Yugoslav Government have welcomed the British acceptance of their global offer in the compensation negotiations, and are prepared to send a delegation to London for further discussions.

The negotiations for a civil air agreement have been temporarily suspended pending consideration of an urgent American request for a firm Anglo-U.S. agreement not to grant overflow rights over our zones of Germany and Austria without the consent of the other, and also not commit ourselves about the Middle East until we saw what we would get in return. The State Department tell us that they now consider the evidence points to a general Soviet policy of keeping aircraft from outside the curtain out of the U.S.S.R., and operating in the West and the Middle East with disguised companies registered in, say, Poland and Yugoslavia, granting in return rights to the U.K. in those two countries and excluding the U.S. altogether. The Americans feel that if Justo (the Yugoslav-Soviet Air Transport Co.) is to operate from London to Istanbul and Cairo, we and the Americans should secure the right to operate to Bucharest, Budapest and Sofia as well as Belgrade. It may not be easy to find a formula which covers the requirements of both sides. The authorities in the British zone of Germany have agreed to accept 600 Yugoslavs from Egypt, where their presence is no longer desirable.

In Yugoslavia the irritation caused by the expulsion of a Yugoslav Repatriation Mission from the U.S. Zone of Austria was increased by the arrest in the British quarter of Vienna of Captain Kosta Kilibarda, a member of another Repatriation Mission. This arrest has nothing to do with repatriation, but is connected with recent abductions in which Captain Kilibarda, as a suspected OZNA agent, is believed to have had a hand.

The press has continued to grumble at the Vatican. The hint of a possible diplomatic rupture has been repeated and even dropped in the ear of the American Chargé d'Affaires by the Assistant Foreign Minister, but it has not yet been conveyed to the Papal Nuncio, who, sanguinely, believes it all to be part of a war of nerves.

Mr. Cannon, the new American Ambassador, arrived in Belgrade on the 9th July.

Greece

After the threat recently uttered by M. Porphyrogenis at the Communist meeting at Strasbourg that the Greek rebels would soon set up a "free" government, the idea of action against the Communists was much in the air of Athens. But the wholesale arrests of Communists in the early hours of 9th July took everyone, including the Communists, by surprise. 1,400 were arrested in Athens, 600 in Piræus and 500 in the suburbs. Among them were Partsalides, Secretary-General of EAM and leading member of the Communist Party, his wife, who is a well-known official of the party, three Communist trades unionists and the editor of the Communist paper, Rizospastis. There were no incidents and no-one was hurt. 900 people, including a number of intellectuals, were arrested at Salonica, 200 at Volo and some at Patras, Trikkala, Lamia, Verroia and Nigrita. Further arrests have since been reported. Except for a few who were very quickly released, these people were shipped off to Ikaria and other islands where their cases will be reviewed.

The Government explained that, acting on the principle of prevention being better than cure, they had nipped in the bud a plot for producing disturbances in towns all over the country as from 1 a.m. on 10th July. There was, however, no justification for the assertion that the British and American Governments had given prior approval to their proposed action. Whether a Communist coup was imminent or not, the Greek Government could not have been expected to ignore the warning that they received at Strasbourg. In effect their aim appears to have been to round up the urban part of the organisation whose military forces are challenging them in the mountains, and to forestall disturbances designed as a means of diverting the army, from pursuit of the rebels, to police duty in the towns. The attitude of the Liberals (Opposition) was somewhat reserved, but it was soon clear that the country as a whole approved of the Government's action. Well-meaning critics in Fleet Street and elsewhere who deplore the drastic measures taken, fail to see that the bitter struggle in Greece focusses a world-wide conflict and that methods of conciliation appropriate to a merely local issue may be worse than useless. So far the Government have not outlawed the Communist Party nor suppressed the Communist Rizospastis, which published on 12th July an article attributed to Zachariadis insisting that a "free" government must be set up.

The Rebels, working from Albanian territory, have continued their activities in the area of Mount Grammos, and on 13th July a force estimated at some 2,000 momentarily surrounded the little town of Konitsa, six miles inside Greece (see under "Albania"). Further towards the north-east, too, in the area of Mt. Beles where the Greek, Yugoslav and Bulgarian frontiers join, the rebels seem to be trying to establish a base with their backs to the territories from which they receive arms and reinforcements. It is scarcely surprising that the burden of M. Tsaldaris' remarks on the occasion of his visit to the State Department should have been to emphasise the need for enlarging the Greek army.

Albania

The Albanian Government's reply to the Anglo-French invitation to the Paris economic conference was given in a Tass agency despatch from Tirana on the 11th July. It was a curt refusal. One sentence read as follows: "In the light of the hostile attitude which the American Government, without any ground whatever, have persistently shown towards the Albanian People's Republic at all international conferences and meetings, whenever Albania's interests and rights have been in question, the Albanian Government doubt whether in making these proposals the American Government genuinely mean to offer any assistance to a small European country like Albania."

Further unfriendly references to the United States and to this country were made by the Prime Minister in a speech before the Assembly two days later. According to the Tirana wireless Hoxha, not for the first time, declared that the Albanian Government possessed documentary proof that the British and American representatives who left Albania in the course of last year had been spies and saboteurs engaged in preparing an armed revolution to overthrow the régime. He also repeated the fantastic charge that it was most probably the British themselves who laid the mines which damaged their own destroyers in the Corfu Channel last October.

Within a few hours of this tirade about two thousand armed men were reported to be crossing the frontier from Albania into Greece. They proceeded to attack the little border town of Konitza, evidently hoping to draw down the Greek troops from Mount Grammos, farther north. However, they met with such strong resistance that they were soon falling back beyond the Aoos river towards the frontier without having apparently accomplished more than the destruction of a bridge.

By this time (14th July) another interesting piece of information had been published: this was the sudden arrival in Moscow of Enver Hoxha, accompanied by the Deputy Prime Minister and other officials.

Turkey

The United States Ambassador at Angora signed with the Turkish Government on 12th July a short and simple agreement laying down the general conditions on which the American grant of $100 million is made and accepted. In accordance with the original stipulations of Congress provision is made for ensuring that proper use is made of American money and equipment. Details about the form in which aid is provided are to be agreed later between the two Governments.

In a statement issued on 11th July President Inönü declared that as head of the State his responsibilities towards the two rival parties—Republican People's Party and Democratic Party—were equal. This is taken as confirmation of the general view that the two-party system really is to be made more of a reality and that President Inönü will therefore shortly divest himself of the leadership of the Republican People's Party.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

The Egyptian Note was handed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on the 11th July by Muhammad Hassan Pasha, Egyptian Ambassador in Washington. The Note, signed by Nokrashy Pasha, is a general complaint of British policy towards Egypt. Dealing first with the question of the British troops, the Note states that such troops are "maintained in Egyptian territories" (a clear indication that Egypt and the Sudan are regarded as an integral whole) "against the unanimous will of the people," and adds: "the presence of foreign troops within the territory of a member of the United Nations Organisation in time of peace and without its free consent constitutes an offence to its dignity, a hindrance to its normal development, as well as an infringement of the fundamental principle of sovereign equality, and is therefore contrary to the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter, and to the resolution adopted unanimously by the General Assembly on the 14th December, 1946." The Note then refers to "the unwarranted occupation of Egypt by British troops in 1882, and, as a consequence, their occupation of the southern part of the Nile Valley, the Sudan," as having enabled "the Government of the United Kingdom since 1899 to force upon Egypt their partnership in the administration of the Sudan, and subsequently to assume exclusive authority therein. Taking advantage of this situation," the Note continues, "they have adopted a policy designed to sever the Sudan from Egypt; discrediting Egypt and the Egyptians; creating discord between them and the Sudanese, and dissension among the Sudanese themselves; and instigating and encouraging artificial separatist movements. By this policy the Government of the United Kingdom have endeavoured, and are endeavouring, to impair the unity of the Nile Valley, notwithstanding that this unity is urged by the common interest and aspirations of its people." Dealing with the Treaty negotiations, the Note states: "In conformity with Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations, and despite the fact that the presence of foreign troops is in itself incompatible with the freedom of negotiations, the Egyptian Government attempted with good faith to reach a fair settlement of this dispute by means of direct negotiations with the Government of the United Kingdom. These long and arduous negotiations having failed to achieve their end, the Government of the United Kingdom are striving to avail themselves of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936, which cannot bind Egypt any longer, having outlived its purposes, besides being inconsistent with the Charter." The Note ends by stating that the dispute with His Majesty's Government is brought up under Articles 35 and 37 of the United Nations Charter, and requests the Security Council to direct "(i) the total and immediate evacuation of British troops from Egypt, including the Sudan; (2) termination of the present administrative régime in the Sudan."

The Chairman of the Security Council has stated that, despite the fact that the Council agenda is heavily loaded with the Greek case and other important matters, the hearing of the Egyptian appeal might begin on the 21st July. It seems more likely, however, that the hearing will not take place before the end of July or early August.

The Council of Ministers announced that the following Ministers will deputise for those absent in New York: Khashaba Pasha, Minister of Justice, will deputise for Nokrashy Pasha as Premier and Minister of the Interior; Abdel Ghaffar Pasha, Agriculture, for Ibrahim Saleh Pasha, Public Works; Dessuki Abaza Pasha, Communications, for Nokrashy Pasha as Foreign Minister; Badr Pasha, Finance, for Mamduh Riax Pasha, Commerce and Industry; and Aly Abdel Bey, Waqfs, for Abdel al-Razaq al-Sanhury Pasha, Education. This was published on the 1st July and appeared to be intended as a conclusive proof of the intention to go to the Security Council, and thus to silence "critical comments on the delay."

Sidky Pasha returned to Egypt, as expected, on the 12th July (see last week's Summary). In a statement to the press on the Egyptian Appeal he said that, in the event of a decision against Egypt, he thought that the best solution would be a return to direct negotiations with Great Britain. He then stated that, in time, he could have reached agreement with Mr. Bevin, but that the talks broke down as a result of his own ill-health and "the circumstances necessitating the departure of Mr. Bevin from England." Sidky expressed the view that the text of the Appeal was "good and natural," although it contained a new item, namely the abolition of the administrative system in the Sudan.

The presence of Abdel Karim in Egypt lends additional importance to the resolutions of a conference, describing itself as "the Congress of the Arab Maghrab," held in Cairo last February. These resolutions include the abolition of the treaties imposed upon Tunisia and Morocco and the denial of all French rights in Algeria; a demand for the complete evacuation of foreign troops from the three countries, and non-participation in any form of union with France. The Congress also decided to raise the "Maghrab question" before the United Nations, and to request the Arab League to recognise the independence of the three countries. As a result of this conference, the Moroccan, Algerian and Tunisian Committees in Cairo were formed into a single organisation entitled "The Office of the Arab Maghrab." Among the members of the Committee which runs the Maghrab Office are a number of extremists, whose presence turns the organisation into a dangerous centre of agitation against the French and Spanish régimes in North Africa. Muhammad Ben Abboud, for example, a delegate from Spanish Morocco, who has been acting as an unofficial political agent with the Arab League, is reported to have been one of the emissaries who persuaded Abdel Karim to disembark at Port Said (see Summary No. 394).

There are now nominally no less than fourteen other organisations in Cairo supporting independence for the North African countries, at least two of which—the National Council for the Liberation of Libya and the Egypto-Tripolitanian Union—have been actively encouraged by Azzam Pasha, Secretary-General to the Arab League. Azzam has also been trying to weaken the position of Sayed Idris el Senussi, who has hitherto been loyal to His Majesty's Government. It seems, indeed, that King Farouk and Azzam Pasha are deliberately working to make Cairo a centre for North African agitation. Early in July a meeting of Egyptian and North African elements is reported to have been held at the premises of the Young Men's Muslim Association (a nationalist youth movement led by Saleh Harb Pasha), at which a Spanish Moroccan delegate outlined the aims of the Maghrab Office. These were the removal of French and Spanish influence from North Africa and the establishment of independent Arab Governments which would become members of the Arab League. Great Britain was then attacked in the same breath as France and Spain, but the United States praised for her policy of freedom. Another sign that the North African question is coming more to the fore is a recent statement from Damascus by Sayed al Fadhil al Warthlany, Secretary of the League for Defence of Morocco (one of the fourteen organisations mentioned above) to the effect that the North African Arabs' case, no less important or less urgent than the Palestine case, would be placed before the Security Council of the United Nations, and that the Arab League would support it fully. In this connection it may be of interest to remark that last April Azzam Pasha promised the Sultan of Morocco the full support of the Arab League in his demands for independence.

Palestine

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, speaking on the 8th July before a large audience at the Y.M.C.A. Building, Jerusalem, where the U.N.S.C.O.P. is conducting its hearings, made a moving plea for partition with enough room for 1,500,000 Jewish refugees in the Jewish State. He recommended that the area of this State should include Galilee, the coastal plain, the Negev and the Jewish area of Jerusalem. Telling the Committee that anything less than "Jewish sovereignty in the whole of Palestine" was "admittedly a compromise," Dr. Weizmann recommended partition and independence of the partitioned part as the only solution. Later he stated that the advantages of partition were, first, that it was final, second, that it helped to dispel Arab fears. "It means equality of status with our Arab neighbours," he said, "which is most important, since, as long as they consider us inferior, they are not anxious to make peace." Earlier he made a reservation that the area of the Jewish State should be so drawn as to give it accessibility to the water and electrical power resources. Other points which he made were praise for the "thoughtful" speech made at the special United Nations session on Palestine by M. Gromyko; an attack on the White Paper, and a reference to Transjordan as constituting the greater part of Palestine as defined by the Balfour Declaration. Dr. Weizmann also read a letter which he had received from Field-Marshal Smuts advocating partition. He was loudly applauded by the large audience. Asked by Judge Sandström for his opinion about dividing Palestine into federal States, Dr. Weizmann said: "All these plans have gone through our heads. They do not have the advantages of partition, which is final, definite, and crystallized."

Mr. Ben Gurion, who opened the formal presentation of the Jewish Agency case before the Committee on the 4th July, gave as his solution to the Palestine problem, "immigration and statehood for the Jews; economic development and social progress for the Arabs." On bi-nationalism Mr. Ben Gurion remarked that, for those who were satisfied with maintaining the status quo and freezing the development of the country, such a form of government might be satisfactory, but if development and immigration were the objectives, a régime of such a nature was utterly unsuitable. On the 8th July Mr. Ben Gurion explained that the Jews needed three to four years to establish an independent, democratic Jewish State under the United Nations; but he pointed out that this was only a transitional stage because the ultimate aim was a Jewish State under its own sovereignty with a Jewish majority, and democratic rights for all.

The Jewish economic case was presented on the 6th July by Mr. David Horowitz, Economic Expert of the Jewish Agency, who stated that the absorptive capacity of the country was not static, and that it was adequate for any Jewish immigration. Comparing the population density in various countries, Mr. Horowitz drew the conclusion that absorptive capacity does not depend on space but on the spirit of enterprise.

The religious case for a Jewish State in Palestine was presented on the 11th July by the Palestine Chief Rabbis, Dr. Isaac Herzog and Ben-Zion Usiel. Dr. Herzog made the charge that a survey by the Palestine Government had sought to reduce "the glorious pages of the Bible" that dealt with Jewish history to a "miserable recital of tribal worship and tribal warfare." He added that, "while the survey gives every detail of the sacred associations of Palestine for Christians and Muslims, it is completely silent on the message of the Hebrew prophets. A good deal of the failure of the Government's handling of the present problem could be explained by its unsympathetic, uncomprehending and shallow interpretation of Jewish history." Chief Rabbi Herzog then attacked those who admitted Jewish religious needs, but denied the Jews land, settlements and industry. On the same day the Agudath Israel presented a memorandum to the Committee proposing, until a final decision is reached, the granting of a monthly quota of 5,000 immigration certificates.

A non-Jewish voice was heard for the first time on the 11th July when the Bishop in Jerusalem, the Rt. Rev. W. H. Stewart, and other ecclesiastical dignitaries told the Committee that there was a bigger element of co-operative ability in Palestine than the political leaders admitted. Speaking for a unitary State, they said that it was in the interests of the whole world that there should be one land of Palestine. Co-operation should be developed along religious and cultural lines, lifting the country from the realm of politics. The purely political approach to the problem, they maintained, was bankrupt.

The Committee has appealed to the Arab Higher Committee to abandon the boycott, but no change in its attitude seems likely, and, in general, the boycott has continued to be observed. The Committee will visit Beirut from the 20th to 23rd July in order to hear evidence from representatives of the Arab countries, but it will not visit the Cyprus detention camps.

The first of the Arab Higher Committee conferences (see last week's Summary) was held at Haifa on the 6th July. Seventeen resolutions were passed, including the strengthening of the boycott of Jewish goods and the prevention of land sales. Mention was made of a scheme whereby every Arab able to do so is to buy a "dunum" of land (approximately a quarter of an acre) which will be preserved in perpetuity from Zionist purchase.

There are signs that the Arabs are preparing for more direct action, but, despite increasing tension, rumours of an approaching insurrection are probably exaggerated. Jamal al Husaini, Acting Chairman of the Palestine Arab Higher Committee, stated on the 7th July that an Arab uprising was inevitable unless Britain granted immediate independence to Palestine. The ex-Mufti made a broadcast statement on the occasion of the Usara and Miraj (the Prophet's journey from Mecca to Jerusalem). Thanking the Arabs for their expressions of joy on his return, the Mufti said that this was proof of their devotion and sincerity, and proof that the Arabs meant "to struggle in the face of the very serious Zionist invasion of our country and the imperialist conspiracy. Your efforts will be crowned with success. We have returned to our land more confident of the justice of our case and of our final victory." The Palestinian Ikhwan al Muslimin are reported to have sent a delegation to Cairo recently to convey their allegiance to the Mufti and to promise that their members would follow the Arab Higher Committee and support Mahmud Labib, the Supreme Commander of the Palestine Youth Organisation (see Summary No. 394).

On the 12th July two Military N.C.O.s of the Field Security, accompanied by a Jewish clerk, were abducted in Nathanya by a party of armed Jews. The Jewish clerk has since been recovered. As a result of these kidnappings Nathanya was declared a controlled area under the Defence Emergency Regulations on the 14th July.

The death sentences on the three Jews arrested in connection with the attack on Acre prison (see Summary No. 391) have been confirmed by the General Officer Commanding.

Transjordan

King Abdullah visited Baghdad between the 8th and 12th June. Addressing a press conference, he stated that the Arabs, by selling their land to the Jews and refusing co-operation with the Mandatory Power, were largely responsible for the present deadlock in Palestine. He then went on to deplore the Arabs' policy of boycotting the United Nations Committee. In reply to a question about the 'Iraqi-Transjordan Treaty His Majesty emphasised the fact that, at his age, he was not aiming at personal aggrandisement, but was working for the benefit of the Arab nation. Referring to the demands for Syrian unity, he stated: "I am only repeating those decisions taken in 1920, which continued to be upheld by those now in power in Syria." He then denied that there was any misunderstanding between himself and the Syrian President. He referred in warm terms to the Egyptians (a somewhat novel departure), and expressed satisfaction at the creation of Pakistan. His wish to see "one Islamic Family extending from Tibet to Casablanca" seems to hark back to the grandiloquent statements of the early Arab Nationalists.

The frontier discussions between the Transjordan and Sa'udi Arabian Governments (see Summary No. 398) have been postponed by mutual agreement until October. A meeting between King Abdullah and ibn Sa'ud is expected to take place when the negotiations are under way. King Abdullah has been favourably impressed with the wording of the latest Sa'udi Note on the negotiations, and is now more hopeful that their outcome may be successful.

The Transjordan Government have stated that they would be pleased to give evidence before the U.N.S.C.O.P., but would only do so on Transjordan territory.

Syria

Polling (except in the Jebel Druze) finished on the afternoon of the 10th July. There were a few incidents and some fatal casualties, but, on the whole, the disturbances were fewer than might have been expected. The results are not yet known, but it appears that the Opposition have done surprisingly well at the expense of the President's supporters. There is as yet no evidence of Government attempts to influence the electorate. Mindful, no doubt, of the outcry raised in the Lebanon against alleged Government interference, the Syrian Government appear to have maintained strict neutrality.

The elections in the Jebel Druze have been postponed on account of a quarrel between the Assali and Atrash factions, which is now reported to be patched up. The Amir Hassan Atrash, Governor of the Druze, has complained that the Government are pursuing a "divide and rule" policy, and has sent delegates to Amman. This is no new departure, for the Druze, mindful of the protection which King Abdullah afforded to Sultan Pasha al Atrash between 1925 and 1938, have always looked to Amman rather than to Damascus for a lead, and are, in general, supporters of the Greater Syria plan. On this occasion Abdullah appears not to have encouraged the Druze delegates, but to have confined himself to expressing sympathy with their troubles.

A preliminary agreement is reported to have been signed on the 3rd July between Syria and Lebanon on the laying of the pipe-line from Saudi Arabia through Syrian and Lebanese territory to a point on the Lebanese coast between Saida (Sidon) and Es Sur (Tyre).

Iraq

On the 9th July sentence was passed on the Communist leader, Daoud es Sayigh, and his associates in the League of Iraqi Communists, an organisation similar to, but not proved to be connected with, the Communist body whose leader, Yusuf Salman Yusuf, was sentenced to death on the 24th June (see last week's Summary). Daoud es Sayigh and one of his confederates were given sentences of life imprisonment, sixteen others sentences of varying severity, while eleven were acquitted.

The 1947–48 Budget has revealed a remarkable expansion of foreign diplomatic representation. Several new legations are to be established in Europe, and the Rome Legation, closed during the war, is being re-opened. An Iraqi Consulate has already been opened in Alexandria, and another is to be established at Deir-es-Zor in Syria.

Persia

As the result of a Cabinet crisis, both Generals Ahmedi and Aqevli, Ministers of War and the Interior respectively, have resigned. General Ahmedi's resignation appears to have been due to his withdrawing his signature from a decree reimposing military government in the capital, on the grounds that it should first be submitted to the Shah for his approval. The Prime Minister held that this was unnecessary. Ahmedi was then called upon to resign, refused, and was finally dismissed by the Shah. Aqevli's resignation, on the 10th July, was probably a gesture of sympathy. The re-imposition of military government on the 8th July, sanctioned by the Shah in an official decree, seems to have been precipitated by reports that the Opposition elements were planning to stage serious disturbances in the capital when the new Majlis assembled.

The Prime Minister made a long broadcast appeal for greater unity on the 2nd July at the anniversary celebrations of his Iran Democrat Party. "The Party," he stated, "has already proved that it symbolises Persian unity. The Party which won a victory over the separatists will smash the reactionaries. Moreover, the Party, with the help of its deputies, will do everything possible to improve the conditions of the people." This speech was followed on the 6th July by a meeting at which sixty-five newly-elected deputies swore on the Quran to support Qawam and his policy. The oath also contained the clause: "I swear to resist and fight against any foreign influence which is contrary to the independence of the country and destroys the rights of the Persian nation."

Sentence has now been passed on the mutineers in the Meshed insurrection (see Summary No. 308, of 29th August, 1945). The sentences include two death-penalties.

THE FAR EAST

China

On 4th July the State Council in Nanking adopted a proposal put forward by General Chiang Kai-shek for the enforcement of national general mobilisation to quell the Communists in China, whom he described as "an armed rebellious group" bent on impeding the Government, obstructing the progress of reconstruction and generally threatening the safety and welfare of the nation.

On the eve of the "Double Seventh," the anniversary of the Marco Polo Bridge incident which led to the outbreak of Sino-Japanese hostilities in 1937, General Chiang broadcast to the nation—for world consumption—an address in which, after dwelling on the virtuous but fruitless peace efforts of the Government, he scathingly accused the Communists of responsibility for the death of "thousands of Chinese soldiers" and promised the nation to make every effort to suppress their insurrection and to restore peace to the country.

A natural sequel to the recent order for the arrest of the Communist leader, Mao Tze-tung, there is nothing surprising either in this decision itself, or in the Generalissimo's provocative broadcast. Both may give a momentary fillip to anti-communist sentiments, and the general mobilisation order may serve to still—if not to soothe—the tongue of complaint against the Central Government and local officials for the increased activities of already active press-gangs and for an even more ruthless commandeering of foodstuffs and other materials. But, in practice, beyond locking the already closed door against any further pretence of striving for a peaceful settlement, national mobilisation can mean little change in the course that has been pursued with such scant success ever since the Communist delegates were returned to Yenan last November, and their subsequent rejection of the proposal to send a Government representative to talk matters over in Yenan.

What is surprising, however, is that the mobilisation proposal should have been adopted by the State Council, apparently without a murmur of dissent from any of the representatives of the "middle of the road" minority parties so recently persuaded to participate in the broadening of the Government—and this in the face of the final resolution passed by the People's Political Council for the immediate resumption of negotiations with the Communists. Nor does the order appear to have had any immediate reaction among the students, whose demonstrations against the continuance of civil war so recently made front-page news. A Central News report states that, through their leaders, the minority parties have pledged their support for the proposal, and quotes Carson Chang, leader of the Democratic Socialist Party, as justifying the Government's action in the absolute necessity to take strong military measures against the Communists.

So far as the Generalissimo himself is concerned there can be no doubt but that recently his general attitude has undergone a marked stiffening. He may genuinely believe—and have succeeded in convincing those about him—in his ability once again to pull a steadily deteriorating situation out of the mire by an all-out military effort. On the other hand, he may be using, as the Washington Post believes, the Government's life-or-death struggle against the Communists as an appeal to the United States in "the hope of winning all-out American aid." Alternatively some disturbing whisper may have reached his ears of a growing desire for a change of leadership, or even of a plot to overthrow his régime.

Rumours are circulating that among certain military leaders such a plot is afoot. The idea appears to be that, assisted by Li Chai-sum, now sheltering in Hongkong, the 67-years-old Anhwei General, Feng Yu-hsiang—who has held many important offices in the Kuomintang—should be invited to return from the United States and replace General Chiang Kai-shek. It is suggested that this movement can rely on the active support of some thirty divisions and quite a number of influential military leaders, including the recent victor of Kalgan, Fu Tso-yi, and the once famous Shansi war lord, Yen Hsi-shan; also that, although none of the groups in the Kuomintang are involved at the moment, General Pai Chung-hsi, the Minister for Defence, and the Generalissimo's representative in the north, Li Tsung-jen, are being kept closely informed in the hope that their support also may be obtained, once the movement has been launched and is giving promise of a reasonable certainty of success. The Communists would then be invited to discuss terms with the new Government.

Whatever reliance can be placed in these rumours—if any—it is nevertheless certain that there is considerable talk of removing Chiang Kai-shek from office. Competent observers, however, remain convinced that, were his mind really set in that direction, the Generalissimo could lead the country in the path of true democracy and, what is more, that at the moment he is the only person in China capable of doing so.

The Government continue to complain that their garrisons in Sinkiang are being subjected to repeated attacks by large numbers of Outer Mongolian troops, supported by planes bearing Soviet markings. On 11th July press reports stated that the Ministry for Foreign Affairs at Nanking had lodged fresh protests with both the Mongolian and Soviet Governments, demanding the punishment of those responsible for the attacks and reserving the right to claim damages.

On the same date all papers in Moscow carried a Tass communiqué refuting the allegations recently made to the press by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the Soviet Government had hindered the establishment of the Chinese civil administration in, and the passage of Chinese troops through, Dairen and Port Arthur (See Summary No. 398). The Tass communiqué declares that the sending of Chinese troops to the Port Arthur district and the quartering of troops in the Dairen area would be entirely contrary to the Sino-Soviet Agreement of 1945, and asserts that there are not, and never have been, any Chinese Communist troops in the whole area of the naval base, or around Dairen. Tass claims that, by liberating Manchuria from the Japanese and then withdrawing its forces, the Soviet Union has carried out its obligations to give China military support and to respect her sovereignty.

Generally speaking, the Russian press has adopted a sharper tone lately in commenting on events in China. Izvestiya advises its readers to reverse the Chinese Government "slanders" regarding Soviet intervention on the Communists' side and to regard them as a cover for large-scale United States intervention and as a bid to obtain American dollars and arms. A quotation from the New York Times on the sale of American munitions to China (see Summary No. 398) suggested that the Chinese Government might also be able to purchase arms from Britain and other countries.

In this connexion it is interesting to note that in its issue of 8th July, the Washington Post, which voices the opinion of a substantial section of the American public, although not necessarily that ruling in official circles, expresses the view that "all-out aid for Chiang against the Communists would mean that China would absorb energies and dollars of ours which we must now conserve to reconstruct our Western civilisation . . . . The job of running the sub-continent of China is beyond the genius of anybody but the Chinese."

At the same time an official communiqué in Washington has announced that Lieutenant-General A. C. Wedermeyer, former Commander of the United States forces in China, will leave for China and Korea immediately as a special representative of the President with the rank of Ambassador, to make an appraisal of the over-all situation in that region. General Wedermeyer's mission will be fact-finding and he will be accompanied by a small group of experts.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

President Truman and the leaders of the Senate and House of Representatives have now agreed that a special session of Congress should not be necessary after all this autumn to consider proposals which may emerge from the European Economic Co-operation Conference. In making an announcement to this effect after a meeting at the White House on the 14th July Senator Vandenberg explained that, if a plan for European reconstruction in response to the Marshall offer were completed by the Paris Conference, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee could be recalled late in the year to prepare legislation for "quick Congressional action" next January. At the same time he made it clear that the President reserved the right to change his mind if an emergency arose.

This decision has clearly taken some press and radio observers in Washington by surprise. Every indication so far had seemed to be that the State Department Policy Planning Committee, the President's "non-partisan" Advisory Committee and the other bodies studying foreign relief problems would have something to offer Congress from the American side by about October. When questioned on the subject at his press conference on the 10th July Mr. Truman proved evasive, although it was understood by correspondents present that he was awaiting the outcome of the Paris Conference before deciding whether a special session of Congress would be necessary or not. As commentators have pointed out, 1948 will be a Presidential election year when, even as early as January, Congressmen will be seeking to eschew controversial issues and when they may find it irksome to have a major decision put before them. There is, moreover, a danger that the sense of urgency, which Congress is apt to lack even at the best of times, may be lost entirely if the call for action is delayed too long. The supporters of the Marshall proposals emphasize that, in any event, the very fact of Russia's refusal to participate in the Paris Conference makes an early Congressional decision—to quote the New York Herald-Tribune—"highly desirable, if not absolutely essential" in that it is "easy to see how the Russians would plume themselves on refusing to take part in an American project which Americans delayed in carrying to fruition." In his address to the annual conference of State Governors in Salt Lake City on the 14th July Mr. Marshall himself pointed out that the United States now stood "at a turning-point in its relations to its traditional friends and to the nations of the old world," and he warned the country that it must protect its "incalculable stake" in Europe by enlarged economic aid or see that continent turn away from democracy. For his part Mr. Marshall has recently taken a much-needed step to bring the State Department and the national legislature into closer touch on matters of foreign policy by resuming the meetings in camera with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which Mr. Hull found so useful during his term of office.

Proponents of unlimited "free enterprise" like the Wall Street Journal sourly predict that the response of Congress will not be a favourable one if the Paris Conference merely produces "more schemes for State controls." In their view the dollar crisis in foreign countries is due largely to "mismanagement" on the part of Socialist Governments. The Left-wing Liberals, on the other hand, have clearly taken more kindly to the Marshall proposals than they did to the Truman programme for Greece and Turkey, and even Mr. Henry Wallace mildly rebukes the Soviet Union for not accepting the Paris invitation. In a recent impromptu debate on foreign aid in the House of Representatives the ideas which Mr. Marshall propounded in his Harvard speech were stoutly championed by Representative Everett M. Dirksen, an influential Republican member of the Committee on Appropriations, who had opposed the British loan, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and similar economic measures likely to benefit other countries. Senator Walter F. George, however, suggested on the 11th July that the Administration would do well not to put forward a long-term programme and intimated that he personally would vote for the Marshall proposals only on a year-to-year basis. (Senator George is a leading Democratic member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.)

In some quarters on Capitol Hill there is a growing feeling that, having forced a "showdown" with Moscow on the European economic issue, the United States and the Western nations must likewise face up to Soviet failure to co-operate in the political sphere. On the 9th July therefore a group of ten Senators, drawn equally from the Republican and Democratic parties and led by Senator Homer Ferguson (Republican, Michigan), tabled a resolution calling for the revision of the United Nations Charter to "strengthen the United Nations as an instrument to prevent war and maintain world peace." This was followed by the introduction of other resolutions in the Senate and the House of Representatives asking for specific authority for the United Nations to enact, interpret and enforce "world law to prevent war." In a statement to the press explaining the object of his resolution Senator Ferguson said that he and his colleagues had been gradually coming to the conclusion that, if Russia persisted in her refusal to co-operate, it might be necessary to re-organize the United Nations without her. The Senate resolutions have now been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. Notwithstanding the sanguine expectations of their sponsors they seem to have little chance of being put to a vote before Congress adjourns at the end of this month.

Congress still has much outstanding business to transact before the present session closes. With characteristic disregard for the express wishes of the President, Senator Taft on the 11th July brought the new 4,000 million dollar tax reduction bill to the top of the list of "essential legislation," and the measure was finally approved by the Senate on the 14th. The Bill is similar to that which Mr. Truman vetoed on the 16th June (see Summary No. 396), except that it postpones till the 1st January, 1948, the date when the tax relief becomes effective. The President has already threatened the measure with another veto.

Important legislation which may fall by the wayside includes the Stratton Bill to admit 400,000 European displaced persons into the United States over the next four years and the Bill for the unification of the United States armed forces. The Stratton Bill has been held up for some time by a House of Representatives sub-committee on immigration; the armed forces Bill was passed by the Senate on the 9th July. One signal achievement in the closing days of the session, however, has been the enactment on the 10th July of a revised Presidential Succession Bill, as urged by Mr. Truman since the summer of 1945. Under the new Bill the Presidential succession devolves, in the absence of a Vice-President, upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives, instead of upon the Secretary of State as hitherto.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

As none of the American nations have recognised the Nicaraguan Government which took over last May, a committee of eight nations—Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Haiti, Peru, El Salvador, Uruguay and Venezuela—has been appointed by the Pan American Union's Governing Board to consider the Nicaraguan situation and draft an interrogatory to the American governments. Replies to this interrogatory will determine whether Nicaragua shall be invited to the Rio de Janeiro Conference. The Brazilian Government's suggestion that Nicaragua should not be invited is under discussion by the Directorate of the Pan-American Union, though it has met with some criticism, on the ground that Nicaragua will always be at liberty to adhere to the agreements formulated at the conference. Brazil has agreed to abide by the Union's decision, without prejudice to any views which she may have on direct relations with the present Nicaraguan régime.

According to a Reuter report from Washington the State Department is hopeful that legislation now before Congress for the supply and standardisation of arms in the Western Hemisphere will be approved before the Rio conference meets in August. Washington officials are reported to be taking the view that the closest possible standardisation is desirable as the technical basis of the proposed defence treaty. On this point, General Sosa Molina, Argentine Minister for War, informed the press that Argentina was willing to have arms standardisation on condition that the arms were produced in Argentine factories, and that any proposals in connection therewith must be based on the arms which each country already has.

A broadcast report states that Señor Torres Bodet, Mexican Foreign Minister, has requested the extension of the Marshall proposals to Latin America. Continental defence, he contended, could not be achieved solely by military pacts; the American republics must also be economically strong.

Argentina

President Perón's broadcast of the 6th July hardly justified the importance attached to it in advance. The President had much to say about permanently banishing exploitation, destruction, hatred, social injustice and so on. The Argentines represented a country which had always respected the principles of liberty, the self-determination of peoples and the belief that all differences could be settled in accordance with the rules of law and justice. Argentina was fully aware of the needs of the world, and must help to replace misery by plenty, without falling into the unpardonable error of turning help into charity. She wished to tell the world that her contribution to peace consisted in adding her resources to world plans of assistance. There was much of this kind of talk, fortified by such phrases as "patriotic duty," "energy of the workers," "lofty mission," "spirit of liberty" and the rest. The general lines of action proposed by the President were: fuller respect for the sovereignty of nations; economic aid to countries in distress and association of the efforts of all to achieve the organisation of a permanent peace. This implied a closely related spiritual and material work, which might be summed up under three heads: (1) Spiritual disarmament of humanity (abolition of war psychosis); (2) a plan of action designed to achieve the ideal of peace (eradication of capitalist and totalitarian extremes, right or left, raising the level of social culture, replacing competition by co-operation) and (3) the firm purpose of working untiringly for the cause. The general impression left by the broadcast is that of well-meaning verbosity, the part to be played by Argentina in helping suffering Europe being left very vague and undefined.

On the 7th July the Argentine Government addressed a note to all American Governments and to the Holy See, inviting their support for President Perón's broadcast appeal for world peace. In the note, the other countries of the American continent were urged (1) to adhere firmly to pacifist principles laid down in the note, and (2) to make a joint approach with the Holy See to other peoples of the world to adhere to these principles and to offer to them the economic co-operation which is indispensable for their realisation. The note also urged that the American nations should undertake to proclaim and seek to put into effect these principles before international assemblies, congresses and conventions.

Sr. Gonzalez Videla, President of Chile, arrived in Buenos Aires on the 6th July on an official visit. He was welcomed by General Perón, members of the Argentine Cabinet and Service Chiefs. The President, who was the guest of the Argentine Government, visited Tucumán with General Perón on the 9th July, to watch a big military parade in commemoration of Argentine Independence Day.

Haiti

The State Department announced on the 10th July that with the acquiescence of the United States Government the Government of Haiti will soon float an internal loan of 10 million dollars. The Executive agreement signed in 1941 between the two Governments provided that the public debt of Haiti would not be increased until the amortisation of the whole of the bonds of the external debt of 1922–23 of the Government of Haiti had been completed, except by previous mutual agreement. In requesting the consent of the United States under the agreement provisions, Haiti states that the proceeds of the internal loan will be used in part for amortisation of the bond issues.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East

The first meeting of this Commission, which is a Commission of the Economic and Social Council, on the same basis as the Economic Commission for Europe, was held in Shanghai from the 16th to the 24th June.

The Commission consists of ten members at present; India, China, Siam, Philippines, U.K., U.S.S.R., U.S.A., France, Netherlands and Australia. Its territorial scope includes British and Dutch Colonial possessions in South-East Asia.

The first meeting was devoted largely to procedural matters, but a considerable period was devoted to discussing the work which would be undertaken by the Secretariat before the second meeting which would take place in November.

The Indian Delegate was anxious to formulate a vast programme of enquiries in accordance with the Commission's Terms of Reference and in expansion of the Report of the Working Group for Asia and the Far East of the temporary Sub-Commission on Economic Reconstruction of Devastated Areas. The U.K. view was that it would be premature to set out an ambitious programme, before the Secretariat had had time to settle down, and suggested that a series of limited enquiries, e.g., into coal and transport difficulties and the needs of the area as regards technical and administrative training, would be sufficient at this stage. The Russians were insistent on the need for field investigations to be carried out, primarily in India and China—a proposal which was unwelcome to both the countries concerned. In the end, a Resolution was passed which, though far too ambitious in scope, gives the Secretariat the opportunity to be selective in practice.

A point which raised some controversy was the question of associating in the work of the Commission the Nationals of the non-self-governing territories in the area. The Indian Delegate pressed for the inclusion, as full members, of all Asiatic countries such as Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia, Viet Nam. The U.K. Delegate, while expressing sympathy with this view, suggested that the needs of these territories would be more suitably met by the status of associate membership of the Commission and promised to enlarge on this at the meeting of the Committee of the Whole of the Commission, which was to take place in New York.

The Committee of the Whole met in New York on the 10th July and is still in session at the time of writing. The purpose of this Committee is to make recommendations on those terms of reference of the Commission, which were left undecided at the meeting of the Economic and Social Council in March, 1947. These include relations between the Commission and the Allied Control Authorities in Japan, the geographical scope of the Commission and the question of associate membership mentioned above. The latter subject has already been generally discussed, and the U.K. draft Resolution, suggesting that "any Territory or parts or groups of territories which is responsible for its own international relations may be proposed by the Member responsible for the international relations of such territory to be admitted as an associate Member of the Commission," has been favourably received by most Delegations, although the Indians are anxious to insert a provision that the Delegations of such Associate Members should be nationals of the territories concerned.

It will be difficult, before the next Session of the Commission in November 1947, to estimate how valuable this body is likely to be. The first Session has no doubt brought home to most Delegations the present rather nebulous character of the Commission's functions, and more constructive proposals may be expected in the future. As to the political tendencies expressed, the general line up was a majority of seven against a minority of 2; the Russians and Indians in the minority with the Siamese generally abstaining. The Russians supported the Indians on every possible occasion and the Indian Delegate frequently reciprocated this approach verbally, though in practice he appeared to have little desire to collaborate and on important occasions did oppose Russian proposals. There is little doubt that the Indians regard this Commission as a fruitful field for Asiatic collaboration under Indian direction. The Chinese Delegation having supplied the Chairman, Dr. T. F. Tsiang, entirely lacked personality and gave little indication of their ambitions, which are presumably similar to those of the Indians.

A symbol of the clashes that are likely to occur between the Asiatic Powers is the rivalry between India and China for the headquarters of the Commission. The decision on a permanent headquarters will not be taken, however, until 1948. The Siamese and Philippines (in addition to the Indians of this area) have meanwhile made a bid for the next session to take place in their capitals.

International Cereals Conference

Some forty nations were represented at the special Cereals Conference which was held at Paris between the 9th and the 13th of July. It was called by F.A.O., at the instance of the International Emergency Food Council, to assess the extent of apparent cereal shortages in the harvest year beginning on 1st July, and to impress on all consuming countries the necessity for them to arrange to collect and distribute the utmost possible from their own production, before coming to rely on imports from a limited pool of supplies.

The gravity of the world food supplies problem has been emphasised at recent meetings of the I.E.F.C. At its fourth meeting, at the end of May, its Secretary-General reported on the serious outlook. When I.E.F.C. was set up in 1946, he said, it had been hoped that the main difficulties would have been overcome by the harvest of 1947 (or of 1948 at the latest); but in spite of bumper crops in North America, this estimate has turned out over-optimistic. Another bumper wheat harvest was forecast in the U.S.A., but the maize crop was much smaller than last year and, in any case, transport difficulties would prevent greatly increased exports; the outlook for the coming crop year in Europe was not bright and the importing countries would, if they had another bad winter, find themselves less well off than even in 1946. Countries must be tided over with cereals till they could use the 1947 harvest. The moral was the need for continuation of I.E.F.C. control and a great effort everywhere to get cereals into consumption and to increase supplies. One practical proposal was that of Mr. Clinton Anderson for a cereal conference to be held in Europe. Mr. Anderson, who was present, reinforced this suggestion and emphasised that no appreciable increase in cereal exports from the U.S.A. could be expected this year, and that the conference should be a means of increasing grain collections in all areas. The U.K. delegate and some others questioned the utility of a conference, since it could only re-hash what everyone knew already; but it was finally decided to ask the Food and Agricultural Organisation to invite the Ministers of Food and Agriculture from the chief countries to meet in the third week of July.

The Conference was duly convoked and went over once more the whole topic of shortages. One country after another explained its growing and urgent need of imports. Attention was particularly drawn to the limiting effects of the shortage of nitrogenous fertilisers in holding back the desired increase of cereal production in all parts of the world.

The gist of the recommendations approved by the plenary session on 13th July was that the world as a whole was seriously short of cereals (the figure of 18 million tons as the size of the deficit was given, but this was characterized by the U.S. and Canadian delegates as quite unrealistic) and that all countries must make the greatest possible effort to collect their own crops, maintain rationing and make the best use of their own supplies.

THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION CONFERENCE

Delegations representing the 16 countries which had accepted the Anglo-French invitation began their meetings at the Quai d'Orsay on Saturday morning, the 12th July. The first meeting of the full conference at which Mr. Bevin took the chair, lasted less than an hour. Without any discussion the conference appointed an all-delegation Working Committee to define the scope of the Conference and to determine the number of technical committees to be set up and their composition. This Working Committee held a first meeting the same afternoon and another on the morning of the 13th. Within twenty-four hours it contrived to prepare a draft plan of organisation which was presented to the conference at its second meeting on Sunday afternoon by its chairman M. Hervé Alphand (France) and forthwith approved.

At the inaugural meeting M. Bidault in his speech of welcome had made allusion straightaway to the missing European nations. He declared that "everything that was in our power to do has been done to obtain a favourable answer from a unanimous Europe to the appeal made by

Soviet Union for not accepting the Paris invitation. In a recent impromptu debate on foreign aid in the House of Representatives the ideas which Mr. Marshall propounded in his Harvard speech were stoutly championed by Representative Everett M. Dirksen, an influential Republican member of the Committee on Appropriations, who had opposed the British loan, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and similar economic measures likely to benefit other countries. Senator Walter F. George, however, suggested on the 11th July that the Administration would do well not to put forward a long-term programme and intimated that he personally would vote for the Marshall proposals only on a year-to-year basis. (Senator George is a leading Democratic member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.)

In some quarters on Capitol Hill there is a growing feeling that, having forced a "showdown" with Moscow on the European economic issue, the United States and the Western nations must likewise face up to Soviet failure to co-operate in the political sphere. On the 9th July therefore a group of ten Senators, drawn equally from the Republican and Democratic parties and led by Senator Homer Ferguson (Republican, Michigan), tabled a resolution calling for the revision of the United Nations Charter to "strengthen the United Nations as an instrument to prevent war and maintain world peace." This was followed by the introduction of other resolutions in the Senate and the House of Representatives asking for specific authority for the United Nations to enact, interpret and enforce "world law to prevent war." In a statement to the press explaining the object of his resolution Senator Ferguson said that he and his colleagues had been gradually coming to the conclusion that, if Russia persisted in her refusal to co-operate, it might be necessary to re-organize the United Nations without her. The Senate resolutions have now been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. Notwithstanding the sanguine expectations of their sponsors they seem to have little chance of being put to a vote before Congress adjourns at the end of this month.

Congress still has much outstanding business to transact before the present session closes. With characteristic disregard for the express wishes of the President, Senator Taft on the 11th July brought the new 4,000 million dollar tax reduction bill to the top of the list of "essential legislation," and the measure was finally approved by the Senate on the 14th. The Bill is similar to that which Mr. Truman vetoed on the 16th June (see Summary No. 396), except that it postpones till the 1st January, 1948, the date when the tax relief becomes effective. The President has already threatened the measure with another veto.

Important legislation which may fall by the wayside includes the Stratton Bill to admit 400,000 European displaced persons into the United States over the next four years and the Bill for the unification of the United States armed forces. The Stratton Bill has been held up for some time by a House of Representatives sub-committee on immigration; the armed forces Bill was passed by the Senate on the 9th July. One signal achievement in the closing days of the session, however, has been the enactment on the 10th July of a revised Presidential Succession Bill, as urged by Mr. Truman since the summer of 1945. Under the new Bill the Presidential succession devolves, in the absence of a Vice-President, upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives, instead of upon the Secretary of State as hitherto.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

As none of the American nations have recognised the Nicaraguan Government which took over last May, a committee of eight nations—Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Haiti, Peru, El Salvador, Uruguay and Venezuela—has been appointed by the Pan American Union's Governing Board to consider the Nicaraguan situation and draft an interrogatory to the American governments. Replies to this interrogatory will determine whether Nicaragua shall be invited to the Rio de Janeiro Conference. The Brazilian Government's suggestion that Nicaragua should not be invited is under discussion by the Directorate of the Pan-American Union, though it has met with some criticism, on the ground that Nicaragua will always be at liberty to adhere to the agreements formulated at the conference. Brazil has agreed to abide by the Union's decision, without prejudice to any views which she may have on direct relations with the present Nicaraguan régime.

According to a Reuter report from Washington the State Department is hopeful that legislation now before Congress for the supply and standardisation of arms in the Western Hemisphere will be approved before the Rio conference meets in August. Washington officials are reported to be taking the view that the closest possible standardisation is desirable as the technical basis of the proposed defence treaty. On this point, General Sosa Molina, Argentine Minister for War, informed the press that Argentina was willing to have arms standardisation on condition that the arms were produced in Argentine factories, and that any proposals in connection therewith must be based on the arms which each country already has.

A broadcast report states that Señor Torres Bodet, Mexican Foreign Minister, has requested the extension of the Marshall proposals to Latin America. Continental defence, he contended, could not be achieved solely by military pacts; the American republics must also be economically strong.

Argentina

President Perón's broadcast of the 6th July hardly justified the importance attached to it in advance. The President had much to say about permanently banishing exploitation, destruction, hatred, social injustice and so on. The Argentines represented a country which had always respected the principles of liberty, the self-determination of peoples and the belief that all differences could be settled in accordance with the rules of law and justice. Argentina was fully aware of the needs of the world, and must help to replace misery by plenty, without falling into the unpardonable error of turning help into charity. She wished to tell the world that her contribution to peace consisted in adding her resources to world plans of assistance. There was much of this kind of talk, fortified by such phrases as "patriotic duty," "energy of the workers," "lofty mission," "spirit of liberty" and the rest. The general lines of action proposed by the President were: fuller respect for the sovereignty of nations; economic aid to countries in distress and association of the efforts of all to achieve the organisation of a permanent peace. This implied a closely related spiritual and material work, which might be summed up under three heads: (1) Spiritual disarmament of humanity (abolition of war psychosis); (2) a plan of action designed to achieve the ideal of peace (eradication of capitalist and totalitarian extremes, right or left, raising the level of social culture, replacing competition by co-operation) and (3) the firm purpose of working untiringly for the cause. The general impression left by the broadcast is that of well-meaning verbosity, the part to be played by Argentina in helping suffering Europe being left very vague and undefined.

On the 7th July the Argentine Government addressed a note to all American Governments and to the Holy See, inviting their support for President Perón's broadcast appeal for world peace. In the note, the other countries of the American continent were urged (1) to adhere firmly to pacifist principles laid down in the note, and (2) to make a joint approach with the Holy See to other peoples of the world to adhere to these principles and to offer to them the economic co-operation which is indispensable for their realisation. The note also urged that the American nations should undertake to proclaim and seek to put into effect these principles before international assemblies, congresses and conventions.

Sr. Gonzalez Videla, President of Chile, arrived in Buenos Aires on the 6th July on an official visit. He was welcomed by General Perón, members of the Argentine Cabinet and Service Chiefs. The President, who was the guest of the Argentine Government, visited Tucumán with General Perón on the 9th July, to watch a big military parade in commemoration of Argentine Independence Day.

Haiti

The State Department announced on the 10th July that with the acquiescence of the United States Government the Government of Haiti will soon float an internal loan of 10 million dollars. The Executive agreement signed in 1941 between the two Governments provided that the public debt of Haiti would not be increased until the amortisation of the whole of the bonds of the external debt of 1922–23 of the Government of Haiti had been completed, except by previous mutual agreement. In requesting the consent of the United States under the agreement provisions, Haiti states that the proceeds of the internal loan will be used in part for amortisation of the bond issues.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East

The first meeting of this Commission, which is a Commission of the Economic and Social Council, on the same basis as the Economic Commission for Europe, was held in Shanghai from the 16th to the 24th June.

The Commission consists of ten members at present; India, China, Siam, Philippines, U.K., U.S.S.R., U.S.A., France, Netherlands and Australia. Its territorial scope includes British and Dutch Colonial possessions in South-East Asia.

The first meeting was devoted largely to procedural matters, but a considerable period was devoted to discussing the work which would be undertaken by the Secretariat before the second meeting which would take place in November.

The Indian Delegate was anxious to formulate a vast programme of enquiries in accordance with the Commission's Terms of Reference and in expansion of the Report of the Working Group for Asia and the Far East of the temporary Sub-Commission on Economic Reconstruction of Devastated Areas. The U.K. view was that it would be premature to set out an ambitious programme, before the Secretariat had had time to settle down, and suggested that a series of limited enquiries, e.g., into coal and transport difficulties and the needs of the area as regards technical and administrative training, would be sufficient at this stage. The Russians were insistent on the need for field investigations to be carried out, primarily in India and China—a proposal which was unwelcome to both the countries concerned. In the end, a Resolution was passed which, though far too ambitious in scope, gives the Secretariat the opportunity to be selective in practice.

A point which raised some controversy was the question of associating in the work of the Commission the Nationals of the non-self-governing territories in the area. The Indian Delegate pressed for the inclusion, as full members, of all Asiatic countries such as Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia, Viet Nam. The U.K. Delegate, while expressing sympathy with this view, suggested that the needs of these territories would be more suitably met by the status of associate membership of the Commission and promised to enlarge on this at the meeting of the Committee of the Whole of the Commission, which was to take place in New York.

The Committee of the Whole met in New York on the 10th July and is still in session at the time of writing. The purpose of this Committee is to make recommendations on those terms of reference of the Commission, which were left undecided at the meeting of the Economic and Social Council in March, 1947. These include relations between the Commission and the Allied Control Authorities in Japan, the geographical scope of the Commission and the question of associate membership mentioned above. The latter subject has already been generally discussed, and the U.K. draft Resolution, suggesting that "any Territory or parts or groups of territories which is responsible for its own international relations may be proposed by the Member responsible for the international relations of such territory to be admitted as an associate Member of the Commission," has been favourably received by most Delegations, although the Indians are anxious to insert a provision that the Delegations of such Associate Members should be nationals of the territories concerned.

It will be difficult, before the next Session of the Commission in November 1947, to estimate how valuable this body is likely to be. The first Session has no doubt brought home to most Delegations the present rather nebulous character of the Commission's functions, and more constructive proposals may be expected in the future. As to the political tendencies expressed, the general line up was a majority of seven against a minority of 2; the Russians and Indians in the minority with the Siamese generally abstaining. The Russians supported the Indians on every possible occasion and the Indian Delegate frequently reciprocated this approach verbally, though in practice he appeared to have little desire to collaborate and on important occasions did oppose Russian proposals. There is little doubt that the Indians regard this Commission as a fruitful field for Asiatic collaboration under Indian direction. The Chinese Delegation having supplied the Chairman, Dr. T. F. Tsiang, entirely lacked personality and gave little indication of their ambitions, which are presumably similar to those of the Indians.

A symbol of the clashes that are likely to occur between the Asiatic Powers is the rivalry between India and China for the headquarters of the Commission. The decision on a permanent headquarters will not be taken, however, until 1948. The Siamese and Philippines (in addition to the Indians of this area) have meanwhile made a bid for the next session to take place in their capitals.

International Cereals Conference

Some forty nations were represented at the special Cereals Conference which was held at Paris between the 9th and the 13th of July. It was called by F.A.O., at the instance of the International Emergency Food Council, to assess the extent of apparent cereal shortages in the harvest year beginning on 1st July, and to impress on all consuming countries the necessity for them to arrange to collect and distribute the utmost possible from their own production, before coming to rely on imports from a limited pool of supplies.

The gravity of the world food supplies problem has been emphasised at recent meetings of the I.E.F.C. At its fourth meeting, at the end of May, its Secretary-General reported on the serious outlook. When I.E.F.C. was set up in 1946, he said, it had been hoped that the main difficulties would have been overcome by the harvest of 1947 (or of 1948 at the latest); but in spite of bumper crops in North America, this estimate has turned out over-optimistic. Another bumper wheat harvest was forecast in the U.S.A., but the maize crop was much smaller than last year and, in any case, transport difficulties would prevent greatly increased exports; the outlook for the coming crop year in Europe was not bright and the importing countries would, if they had another bad winter, find themselves less well off than even in 1946. Countries must be tided over with cereals till they could use the 1947 harvest. The moral was the need for continuation of I.E.F.C. control and a great effort everywhere to get cereals into consumption and to increase supplies. One practical proposal was that of Mr. Clinton Anderson for a cereal conference to be held in Europe. Mr. Anderson, who was present, reinforced this suggestion and emphasised that no appreciable increase in cereal exports from the U.S.A. could be expected this year, and that the conference should be a means of increasing grain collections in all areas. The U.K. delegate and some others questioned the utility of a conference, since it could only re-hash what everyone knew already; but it was finally decided to ask the Food and Agricultural Organisation to invite the Ministers of Food and Agriculture from the chief countries to meet in the third week of July.

The Conference was duly convoked and went over once more the whole topic of shortages. One country after another explained its growing and urgent need of imports. Attention was particularly drawn to the limiting effects of the shortage of nitrogenous fertilisers in holding back the desired increase of cereal production in all parts of the world.

The gist of the recommendations approved by the plenary session on 13th July was that the world as a whole was seriously short of cereals (the figure of 18 million tons as the size of the deficit was given, but this was characterized by the U.S. and Canadian delegates as quite unrealistic) and that all countries must make the greatest possible effort to collect their own crops, maintain rationing and make the best use of their own supplies.

the United States Secretary of State '' and once more gave assurances that the door was wide open for the absentees. The conference itself, so promptly convened, was he said the clearest disproof of the allegation that what they had in mind to do was a menace to the nations sovereignty and independence. The purpose was quite simply to establish a special temporary organisation which could draw up the balance sheet of the resources and needs of Europe. The united effort of the nations represented would make it possible to limit American assistance to strict necessities. Speed was of the essence of the problem. M. Bidault was at pains to refute the charge that their unavowed aim was to rebuild Germany first. In the name of the French Delegation he desired to state that that was a crass distortion of their object. The formula he offered was " the resources of Germany should be utilized for Europe, including Germany." And finally, the conference had the right to speak in the name of, and to act for, Europe as a whole.

Mr. Bevin took up this theme, declaring that the speech of Mr. Marshall had been rightly regarded as a challenge to Europe to put her own house in order with all speed. He would emphasize, he said, the voluntary nature of the arrangements now being undertaken and also that the conference was economic and not political in its conception or intention. Count Sforza, the chief Italian delegate, was the only other speaker. He made an eloquent appeal for the people of Italy—"46,000,000 men and women living in the centre of Europe . . . . they have understood that everything would be in vain failing European coordination on a large scale. We must be selfish enough to suppress our selfishness."

At the meeting of the Working Committee there was a general disposition to accept in principle the Anglo-French proposals for a main committee of cooperation to direct the work of stocktaking and four technical committees, dealing respectively with food and agriculture, fuel and power, iron and steel, and transport. Certain changes were suggested, however, in matters of detail :—

(1) that the Cooperation Committee should be enlarged to include all members of the Conference and should have power to bring in the representatives of countries that might later wish to join,
(2) that a smaller executive committee should be established to help the main committee in the detailed day to day work,
(3) that the main committee should have power to make changes in the machinery of organization as and when required.

The Netherlands delegate speaking for the Benelux group of countries placed on record their view that the four-year period of the proposed survey would present certain difficulties—his own Government, for instance, were committed to planning for a shorter period.

A number of delegations favoured the creation straightaway of additional technical committees, but in the end agreed not to press their points on the understanding that such committees could be set up as and when necessary. M. Hammerskjold (Sweden) expressed the anxieties of the Scandinavian countries about the possible effects of the work of the committees of the conference on inter-European trade arrangements. Finally, at the instance of the Swedish delegate a form of words was devised to bring out more clearly the need to keep in close touch with United Nations organisations, its specialised agencies and the existing inter-governmental economic organisations. The draft plan of organisation was in the end approved unanimously by the Working Committee. It is stipulated that the report concerning European availabilities and requirements shall be submitted to the U.S.A. before 1st September, 1947.

A third plenary session on Tuesday afternoon, 15th July, approved the Working Committee's recommendations for the membership of the technical committees. The United Kingdom and France are represented on each one, and every country has a representative on one or other of them. Members of the small executive committee are the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Norway and the Netherlands.

EUROPE

GERMANY

In the past fortnight the Western Occupying Powers have been concerned chiefly in re-examining their policies towards Germany in relation to each other and to Europe as a whole. Russia has played a more silent if none the less important rôle than of late.

The smooth progress of the Conference for European Economic Co-operation has offered hope for the future, but it has not yet made Germany's position much clearer. The Conference decided that on this matter it should seek instructions from the Control Council and that "every recommendation concerning the development of German production must conform to the decisions of the Foreign Ministers' Council and of the Control Authorities." If this means that the four control authorities must act together, there is little chance of the Conference receiving instructions. The Conference itself has lent special significance to, and in a sense complicated, the Anglo-U.S. discussions on German industry which were reported last week. There is no wish to conflict with the scope of the Conference, yet these talks have appeared to do so. Great, even excessive, publicity has been given to the disagreements which have arisen. These are first between French policy on the one hand, which is still concerned to put security before economy and to secure aid for other countries before Germany, and Anglo-U.S. policy on the other hand, which seeks to strike a balance between the demands of security and economy and to prevent Europe falling apart as the result of dry rot in her German economic core. Secondly, there are difficulties between the United Kingdom and the United States over the conflicting demands of security and economy (now largely resolved), over socialisation and over the scope of the official discussions proposed for the near future (the U.K. wanting to enlarge, the U.S. to limit, their scope).

The announcement from Berlin of U.S.–U.K. agreements on the level of industry and the management of the Ruhr mines has been temporarily suspended, and the whole subject is under review at Ministerial level. In view of French apprehensions at the impending changes Anglo-French meetings were held on the Quai D'Orsay on the 16th and 17th July at which U.S. representatives were also present. The French Government were informed fully of the proposals, which provoked in them the utmost dismay. (See under "France.") A Note of protest stated that the French Government "could not consider" that the United Kingdom and United States Governments were qualified to lay down measures for the control of the Ruhr mines and the level of industry for Germany. These were subjects for the Council of Foreign Ministers and the Peace Conference. (In particular, they fear that their plans for Allied Control of the Ruhr will be prejudiced.) By raising the industrial level now, while the details of American aid to Europe were still uncertain, the Occupying Powers would be giving Germany priority over other countries. If these measures were confirmed, the French Government would be obliged to make "a solemn and public protest." In a letter of reply Mr. Bevin wrote that he fully appreciated the difficulties of the French Government and that no announcement of new measures would be made until the matter had been considered with the United States Government. The latter had received a similar French communication.

French opposition is strengthened by the Government's internal difficulties. M. Bidault feels that if he should agree to a large increase in steel production as an immediate result of Mr. Marshall's proposals the Government would be overthrown by the combined votes of the Communists and De Gaullists. In M. Bidault's view it would be particular madness to risk this now when the Germans cannot even reach the level of production that they are allowed. As for the question of the French zone joining the economic fusion M. Bidault told H.M. Ambassador that he had always been prepared to agree to this, preferably after the November Conference, but that the latest steps threatened to destroy any such prospect. On the 19th July M. Chauvel, Permanent Secretary to the Quai D'Orsay, held out the hope that the difficulties might be overcome if the increase in industrial production were related to an overall plan for Western Europe although the French still had fundamental objections to the proposed level of steel production. It seems clear that the French would wish for preliminary Three Power discussions if it should be decided to bring the matter before a European Conference and that they no longer expect the Russians to be party to these plans. Unfortunately the inevitable delay while the matter is being considered will have a most deleterious effect on the attitude of the German population.

United States insistence on the need to revive German economy was underlined in a new Statement of Policy issued on the 15th July (see under "United States"). Most of the points add nothing to what is already known. The Statement makes it clear, however, that the question of public ownership versus private ownership must be decided by the Germans themselves. The United States also proposes to increase its dollar expenditure for Germany if this is necessary to restore normal trade relations between Germany and the rest of Europe or even to compensate the German economy though providing relief monies to other countries so that they can pay for German goods. Nevertheless, as Mr. Harriman, U.S. Secretary of Commerce, pointed out the following day, the United States has no intention of giving Germany priority in economic recovery and only intends her to share in the task of European recovery.

The keystone to this recovery is considered by the United States to be an increase in Ruhr coal production. No decision has yet been reached as to whether Anglo-U.S. talks on coal will be held shortly. The United States Government originally suggested talks between experts in Washington on coal production and mine ownership (see last week's Summary). H.M. Government, however, wished to discuss the question of ownership at Ministerial level and with other interested Governments. They also considered that there was little point in discussing coal in isolation from general German economic problems. In particular H.M. Government wish to change the financial provision of the fusion agreement, since they cannot continue to support the drain on their dollar resources. They also wish to arrange for an increase in the food ration to 1,800 calories daily and to reach decisions on the essential questions of currency reform and an exchange rate for the mark.

(It has not yet been possible to fix the latter owing to the unreal German economic situation—see also below). The United States Government refused to extend the scope of the talks, partly because they feared that they would cut across the Paris discussions, partly because of Congressional difficulties and partly because the Administration have not finally faced up to the food and financial problems. A State Department representative has told H.M. Ambassador that the United States Government could offer no additional financial assistance to Great Britain except as part of a general plan for European recovery. As a result of the United States attitude H.M. Government consider it useless to hold a meeting in Washington since the question of coal production alone can be equally well discussed in Berlin. It is felt that General Clay may be opposing most forcibly any extension of the talks unless or until he has his way over ownership of the mines. Coal production in the Ruhr has risen slightly in the last three months. The daily average in May was 215,800 tons, June 218,700, first part of July 220,740, but this is well below the March record of 238,000 tons and is little more than half the 1936 average.

Statements by a number of smaller European countries about German economic recovery have been made during the past week. The Polish Ambassador in Washington followed the Moscow line when he stated on the 20th July, according to the Press, that his country would protest against any plan which would give priority to German needs. The Netherlands delegate to the Conference for European Economic Co-operation has stated that the permitted level of Germany's industry must be revised and her resources integrated in any plan for Europe. In the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, the Belgian representative, supported by the Netherlands and Czechoslovakia, has accused the Occupying Powers of hindering the restoration of normal trade relations between Germany and the rest of Europe. He criticised bureaucratic obstacles and the failure to bring the German internal price structure into line with world market prices. The foreign buyer must be allowed, he said, to negotiate directly with German firms as to prices, and the Occupying Powers must fix an overall exchange rate for the mark instead of continuing to fix a rate of exchange for each different transaction in an attempt to reconcile German and international price patterns.

In Berlin the political obstacles to satisfactory Four-Power Government continue to provoke mingled despondency and indignation in the German administration. The case of the Lord Mayor is in abeyance. The dismissal by the Kommandatura of Nestriepke, head of the Education Department, provides an alternative subject of debate. The reasons for Nestriepke's dismissal have never been clearly explained. The Magistrat (Governments) were told that he had behaved incorrectly towards the Occupying Powers. Subsequent statements by the U.S. Commander and in the press indicate that he was "impertinent" to the French and Russian authorities and that he contravened a Control Council order—although no one has yet said which order. The Four Power Kommandatura may have had excellent reasons for dismissing Nestriepke, but the manner in which it was carried out has provoked justifiable indignation. The press were informed of the decision some days before the Government, and apparently neither the Lord Mayor nor Nestriepke himself were given any warning. The case has generally been taken by the Social Democrats and Christian Democrats as another attempt—owing to the Russian use of the veto—to undermine the rights of the German Government. Dr. Schumacher told a press conference on the 11th July that the S.P.D. "would like to take the Nestriepke case as an example to explain to the world the methods applied in Berlin . . . . We shall no longer be able to look on idly if one occupying Power 'steam-rollers' the others." The question of a successor to Nestriepke and the Assembly's right to elect him without interference will cause more fireworks in the Kommandatura.

AUSTRIA

Czechoslovakia's withdrawal of her acceptance of the invitation to the Conference for European Economic Co-operation has lent added emphasis to the avowed Austrian desire to steer a middle course in Europe. Commenting on the Czechoslovak action, the Socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung remarked that this was all the more regrettable since Czechoslovakia had an important part to play as an intermediary between East and West. In the circumstances the overall planning aimed at for Europe by European Socialists could not be achieved, and the division of Europe into two camps, each carrying out a plan of international recovery, implied a danger politically for Austria. At the same time, however, it offered her a great opportunity to act as an intermediary and to render an important service to Europe by offering points of contact between East and West and in opening practical approaches for an exchange of goods. Austrian press comment on the progress of the Conference is not yet available, though no doubt Austria's representation on the Fuel and Power Committee has caused some gratification; at the same time the Austrian Government cannot fail to be aware of the keenly watchful eye of the Soviet Government over their representatives' activities in Paris.

That the Soviet authorities have every intention of making the Austrian Government's position as uncomfortable as possible in regard to the Austro-U.S. Relief Agreement of the 25th June is indicated by the dispatch of a Note of protest by the Soviet High Commissioner in Austria to the Federal Chancellor. This Note, which advances substantially the same arguments as those employed by the Soviet member at the Allied Council's meeting on the 10th July (see last week's Summary), concludes by asserting the Soviet High Command's inability to recognise the provisions of the Agreement as legally valid or to consider themselves bound by such of the provisions as were in their view contrary to the terms of the Moscow Declaration and decisions of the Allied Powers on the restoration of Austria's independence.

Chancellor Figl's firmly-worded reply to the Soviet Note is scarcely likely to decrease Soviet displeasure with the Austrian Government. The reply makes clear that, far from being an arbitrary provision of the U.S. Government, the stipulation for U.S. supervision of the carrying out of the Agreement was included because the Austrian Government were unable to guarantee that they were in a position to control all the economic resources of Austria and to ensure that the Austrian people would benefit exclusively from the proposed relief assistance. The Austrian Government, Herr Figl pointed out, still had no control over the working or products of the Austrian factories under Soviet control; they were, however, confident that the U.S. Government would not continue to insist on their precautionary control measures once the Austrian Government was in a position to apply Austrian law to all means of production in their country. The Chancellor therefore appealed to the Soviet authorities to allow Austrian law to be fully applied to the Soviet-controlled concerns. He also denied that the Agreement infringed either the Moscow Declaration or the Control Agreement. The Austrian Communist newspaper, Volksstimme, has forthrightly condemned the Chancellor's reply as "a provocation of the Soviet Union" and has deplored the fact that "the Government have not availed themselves of the opportunity provided by the Soviet Note to bring about a cancellation of the provisions curtailing our sovereignty."

Cases of Soviet-controlled factories being obliged to export the major part of their production to the Soviet Union elsewhere have already received some considerable publicity in the Austrian press. New Soviet tactics for eliminating Austrian control over imports, exports and prices were illustrated recently by a report issued by the Austrian Ministry of Food. According to this report fruit and vegetables were being imported from Yugoslavia in Soviet military vehicles and sold at excessive prices on the Vienna market. On the proceeds from the sales, industrial equipment was purchased and exported by the same means to Yugoslavia. Surplus food from stocks imported for supplementary rations for workers in the Soviet-controlled concerns (who also receive higher wages than other Austrian workers) formed part of these supplies.

The desirability of an early discussion on the status of German assets generally under Austrian law was urged by the French delegate, with the support of the leading U.K. expert, at the Austrian Treaty Commission's meeting on the 18th July. This meeting represented the conclusion for the time being of the Commission's deliberations on the oil question. The Soviet Delegate has not relaxed his determination to delay the setting up of the Committee of Experts for the examination of specific cases; arguments at the concluding meetings on the interpretation of the terms "force," "duress" and "direct forcible action" recall the tortuous discussions on these points at the Moscow Conference. A considerable amount of factual information on the oil problem has been submitted however, by three of the delegations, and the U.K. experts have been working in the closest touch with the U.S., French and Austrian experts. Progress has thus been made towards clarifying the issues at stake and generally in assessing the situation. The Commission is now to discuss the important problem of the Danube Steam Shipping Company.

SOVIET UNION

The disparaging tone of the Soviet press towards the European Economic Co-operation Conference has been kept up, Pravda asserting that even the most ardent champions of the Marshall plan could hardly have described the atmosphere at the close as optimistic. Izvestiya ascribed the alleged gloom of the final days to the fact that American aid, even if forthcoming, would be merely a drop in the ocean, that Great Britain, with France a close second, would get the lion's share, and that in any case Congress was not apparently inclined to vote any aid at all. Much was made of differences between Great Britain, the U.S.A., and France over the Ruhr question, which were said to have made it impossible even to lay the foundations for working out a general European economic plan.

The conditions of the American loan to Great Britain were cited as an apt illustration of the onerous terms on which European countries could expect American aid. The loan bore hardly on the British consumer, but it was imposed by certain circles who, ignoring the interests of their own people, were ready for selfish reasons to allow the United States to play a decisive part in European economic recovery. The article concluded with a word of praise for the British nation, which, "like other democratic nations," was said to desire co-operation in the political and economic field between equals, with no encroachment on national sovereignty by foreign interference. Such co-operation, according to Pravda, was only truly possible between two countries which both had a planned economy, and the recent Soviet-Czechoslovak Agreement was quoted as an example of fruitful co-operation on a basis of full equality. A discussion of the Czechoslovak Two-Year Plan provided incidentally an opportunity for a dig at the Americans, who were accused of having caused more damage in Czechoslovakia than the Germans, and of only having done their bombing in the last days of the war when it had no strategic significance.

The realities of Moscow's treatment of the Czechs over the Marshall offer do not quite fit in with Pravda's picture of harmonious co-operation between equals. M. Stalin apparently made it quite clear that the Russians would regard Czechoslovakia's attendance at Paris as an unfriendly act. In the Czechoslovak view it was, however, M. Molotov, rather than M. Stalin, who was chiefly responsible for Moscow's intransigent attitude in general towards the Marshall offer.

The Soviet-Hungarian Trade and Navigation Treaty, signed in Moscow on the 11th July, provides a further example of the Soviet idea of "co-operation between equals" in practice. The Russians had apparently threatened not to ratify the Hungarian Peace Treaty unless their terms for the economic agreement were accepted. In the end the Hungarians secured agreement for a trade turnover for 1947–48 of 30,000,000 dollars, instead of the $50,000,000 for which they had hoped. The working of the Russo-Danish Commercial Agreement of July 1946 affords another illustration of the fact that "commercial co-operation between equals" does not always work out to the advantage of the secundus inter pares. Danish exports to the U.S.S.R. exceeded Russian exports to Denmark by over 49 million kroner for the first five months of the current year, and Danish efforts to get the balance settled in gold or dollars in accordance with the terms of the Agreement, have so far met with no success.

It is of interest that in spite of his sympathetic attitude towards the Russian people and attempts to secure general understanding for Soviet difficulties, the English writer, Mr. Edward Crankshaw, should have incurred the bitter displeasure of the Party magazine Culture and Life, for his alleged "slanderous, vicious fabrications" concerning the status and activities of Soviet writers. It was said to be highly disingenuous of Mr. Crankshaw, who had witnessed the "incessant labour" of Soviet writers, to shed crocodile tears over their lack of freedom when he himself was merely the slave of the gentlemen who were paying for his slanders. Trud has supplemented its recent disagreeable remarks about the reception of Soviet metal workers in this country by a criticism of the National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association for trying to compel a few Soviet workers from a Kiev prosthesis factory who had gone for six months to study production technique in their branch at a British firm, to join their union. The move was represented as being the work of London trade-union reactionaries who were forgetting their duty of proletarian solidarity. Actually the Union Secretary who wrote to the Soviet Ambassador insisting on the Russians joining the Union is said to be an open member of the Communist Party. A trickle of Soviet visitors continues to reach this country. The most notable new arrival is the delegation of scientists headed by Academician Orbeli, which has come to take part in the 17th International Physiological Congress at Oxford. These Congresses should take place every three years, but were interrupted by the war, the last being held at Zürich, in 1938. Academician Orbeli was concerned with the reception of the foreign scientific delegations which visited Moscow in June 1945. He is the representative of the U.S.S.R. on the permanent Committee for the Convocation of Congresses. Academician Palladin, President of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, is also a member of the delegation.

Soviet scientists have also been attending the International Congress of Pure and Applied Chemistry. Nesmeyanov, the leader, is a member of the Academy of Sciences and in February 1947 was appointed Secretary of the International Chemical Society.

Metropolitan Grigorii of Leningrad, the tried ecclesiastical negotiator, who is very active despite his 77 years, has just left for the U.S.A. where he has many tangles to unravel. A situation among the Russian Orthodox Church in America is developing somewhat comparable to that in Paris, several of the bishops having broken away and declared renewed allegiance to Metropolitan Anastasy in Munich after the decision of the head of the Russian American Church, Metropolitan Theophilus, to come to an agreement with Moscow, albeit on his own terms. Acute controversy is raging over the possession of the Russian Orthodox Cathedral in New York, which has just been awarded by a civil court to Metropolitan Theophilus. Metropolitan Benjamin, Exarch of the Moscow Patriarchate, who had managed to gain possession of it, has had to retire with what good grace he can muster.

Corrigendum

With reference to the third paragraph of the Soviet Union Section of No. 399, the Embassy at Moscow have commented that the Soviet public has grown accustomed to major differences revealing themselves at international conferences, and that, so far as the Embassy can judge, it has not shown any special reaction at all to events in Paris. There is certainly no reason to think that the Soviet Government is in a difficult situation or is having to impose an unpopular policy on an unwilling public.

SCANDINAVIA

Denmark

Dano-Faeroese negotiations which have been proceeding in Copenhagen during the last two months concerning the future status of the Islands were concluded on the 15th July, when details of a new Danish offer were released. The proposals include the granting of complete legislative authority to the Løgting in all internal matters, whilst the Faeroese representation in the Lower Chamber of the Danish Rigsdag will be increased from one to two members. The Faeroese will, further, have their own representative in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and will be given the right to participate in any commercial negotiations directly affecting their interests. The Faeroese national flag will receive recognition, and Faeroese will be the first language in all the schools in the Islands. Danish, however, will continue to enjoy an equal status with that of the native language for all other purposes, and the union under the Danish Crown is to be maintained.

The Danish offer, it is reported, was accepted with a few minor amendments by the Social Democrat, Unionist, and Home Rule representatives, while the extreme nationalists, the Folkaflokkur or People's Party, declared their opposition. Explaining his party's attitude M. T. Petersen said that the Folkaflokkur regarded the result of the referendum of last September as the final wish of the Faeroese population and that, therefore, nothing short of complete and unconditional independence was acceptable.

The Unionists on the other hand considered the Danish proposals too far-reaching; the present relationship between the Faero Islands and Denmark was fully satisfactory. But they approved the proposals as retaining the much valued link with Denmark.

The main difficulty during the negotiations centred upon the question of Faeroese representation on commercial delegations, and it appears that the Islanders were of the opinion that they should be allowed to conclude their own trade agreements, submitting these to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Copenhagen only for final approval.

After the conclusion of the negotiations the Faeroese representatives returned home where it is expected the Løgting will shortly consider the Danish offer. As the Social Democrats together with the Unionists have a clear majority over the Folkaflokkur since the elections to the assembly last November (see Summary No. 368) there is little reason to doubt that it will be accepted.

LOW COUNTRIES

The Netherlands

Simultaneously with the opening of local military operations in Java [see under "The Far East"], the Dutch Prime Minister, Dr. Beel, in a broadcast to the Dutch people (20th July), explained his Government's action. The Government, said Dr. Beel, had authorized the Lieut-Governor-General, Dr. van Mook, "in view of the continuation and even intensification of hostilities and demolitions" to employ the forces at his disposal for "police action" in order to do what the Republic appears incapable of doing. Dr. Beel declared that the Government had been "as accommodating as possible towards the Republic, shewing full appreciation of the healthy nationalist current in Indonesia," but that they could not "tolerate" the "daily violations" of the Linggadjati Agreement, to the principles of which they still adhered. As soon as leadership of the Republic, "capable of real co-operation in accordance with Linggadjati," had been established, a place would be found for the Republic on an equality with "that now occupied by other States of Indonesia." Up to Tuesday [15th July], continued Dr. Beel, the Government had hopes of reaching agreement with the Indonesian Prime Minister, but the Indonesian Cabinet had repudiated him. Dutch sovereignty had been rejected by the Republic, which had violated agreement after agreement. The Netherlands Government, therefore, felt no longer bound by the Linggadjati Agreement; but they were prepared to negotiate "at any moment with any Republican Government willing and able to fulfil the terms of the Agreement."

Discussing the situation with Dr. van Vredenburch, Political Director of the Dutch Foreign Office, on the eve of the military operations, H.M. Chargé d'Affaires said that he felt sure that Dr. van Vredenburch would agree that it was of the utmost importance, not only from the point of view of the Netherlands but also from that of her friends, that a solution be found which avoided the use of force. There was a possibility (which could not be ignored) that the matter might be referred to the United Nations, the result of which would be to cause embarrassment to the U.S.A. and the U.K. and to many other countries besides. There was a possibility, too, that the issue might endanger Western European and American solidarity, which would be particularly deplorable at a time when so much hope was being pinned on the outcome of the Paris Conference. Furthermore, however good a case the Dutch thought they could make out, American and British public opinion would inevitably blame whichever side fired the first shot. Dr. van Vredenburch expressed himself as being in complete agreement with these views; but asserted that, so far as the Dutch were concerned, the position —particularly from an economic point of view—was becoming untenable, with the result that an immediate solution had to be found. Hitherto not one of the Dutch proposals on paper had been agreed to by the Indonesians: they were ready enough to agree to them orally, but as soon as they returned to Jogjakarta they repudiated them. Such a state of affairs could not go on. H.M. Chargé d'Affaires then suggested that perhaps the Dutch in Java had failed sufficiently to take into account Oriental "face." In the past it might have been possible to obtain complete satisfaction for an unilateral request supported by force and ultimata; but a new era of relationship with the peoples of the East had been ushered in, of which the Indonesians were well aware. H.M. Chargé d'Affaires assured Dr. van Vredenburch of Great Britain's fullest sympathy with the Dutch need for an immediate solution, but expressed the view that, even under the strain of continued patience, it was more likely to be achieved without the use of force provided that they paid more regard to Oriental psychology.

An urgent appeal against any strike action as a result of the Indonesian crisis has been issued to Dutch workers by the Executive Board of the Dutch Association of Trades Unions, but the Unity Trade Union (Communist) has called on all transport workers, dockers and seamen to boycott all transport to Indonesia from both Dutch and foreign ports.

FRANCE

The French, from M. Bidault downwards, were thrown into considerable alarm and despondency about the possible consequences—both on the domestic situation and on the Paris Conference—of any statement at this moment on the need for raising the level-of-industry target of the Anglo-American Zone of Germany. (See under "Germany.") The French Government's point of view was expounded once again by M. Chauvel (Permanent Secretary of the Quai d'Orsay) to Sir Edmund Hall-Patch: such a statement would be a confirmation of the fears of Frenchmen of all parties—and would play into the hands of the Communists. French dismay took the form of an official Note of protest issued on the 17th July together with a personal letter in his own handwriting from M. Bidault to the Secretary of State. M. Bidault sent another communication in even stronger terms to Mr. Marshall in which he affirmed that he had "burned his boats" by associating his Government with that of the United Kingdom in the direction of the plans for European economic co-operation now being drawn up in response to the Marshall incentive. Mr. Bevin replied at once to M. Bidault's letter agreeing that the issues involved required further consideration in the light of the enterprise to which they had jointly set their hands in Paris. Incidentally the tone and substance of Mr. Bevin's speech to the Northumberland miners at Morpeth on the 20th July have gone some way towards allaying French anxieties.

The dogged determination of France's present leaders to stand their ground was reflected in a speech which M. Ramadier made the same day to the Socialist Federation of Perpignan. There was no intention, he reiterated, of denying Germany a place in the sun, of seeking to eliminate her for ever from the European community; but surely the needs of the war-time Allies should deserve and have precedence over those of their enemies. That was the message which old Europe sent to young America: "the victims must come before the butchers."

The main part of M. Ramadier's speech was devoted to an evocation of France as the traditional standard-bearer of peace continuing to do all in her power to keep the United States and Soviet Russia from lining up against one another. Russia, he said, is willy-nilly part of Europe, and it is up to us to bring her back to the fold. His conclusion was that it was only through Socialism, through the Socialist management of European affairs, that the European balance and European civilization itself could be preserved.

As foreshadowed in last week's Summary the threatened strike of the 1,200,000 civil servants and municipal and other public functionaries was averted after the Government had made a final offer of payment of interim bonuses, pending regrading and the appropriate salary increases, which made up a total of 24 milliard francs—as compared with the demands for 27 milliards put forward by the public servants' trade union organisation in the previous negotiations. M. Ramadier achieved his success by a skilful transfer of the responsibility for the final decision from the Government to the National Assembly. For, on the one hand, by the terms of the Constitution (Article 17) the Assembly has no authority to vote any increase of pay to Government servants or to approve any motion involving an addition to the item of expenditure in the budget estimates; on the other hand the civil servants' union would scarcely wish to challenge the will of the elected representatives. Thus, in the early morning of the 18th, after an eleven hours' session—which was three times suspended to allow for party discussions—the Assembly approved unanimously (600–0) a slightly amended version of the Government's scheme. But the proceedings were scarcely edifying. They began with a "suggestion" (vœu) put forward in the name of the Socialist group embodying figures considerably in excess of those constituting the Government's final offer—which themselves represent a heavy charge on the budget. This motion secured the support of the Communist spokesman. At a later stage in the debate the Communists, not to be outbid, plumped for a three milliards' increase, to be obtained from the military credits, but their amendment was defeated by 346 to 217 votes. In the meantime M. Ramadier had spoken, repeating that the amount of 24 milliard francs was the absolute limit that the Government could concede without wrecking the régime—21 milliards in respect of the 1947 budget and an additional three milliards set aside for the 1948 credits. He was very much averse, he said, to asking for a vote of confidence on a motion put forward by his own party—it would obviously embarrass considerably his Socialist colleagues in the Cabinet. All that he could suggest, as he had explained to the Finance Commission, was a book-keeping adjustment, a juggling with the figures envisaged for the various periods of the two budget years, which might offer immediate relief without serious detriment to the national finances. The leader of the Socialist group, M. André Le Trocquer, decided that honour was satisfied and promptly withdrew their "suggestion." It was patently a demagogic manœuvre, in anticipation of the municipal elections in October next; and as such it has been harshly condemned by Le Monde representing independent French opinion.

The civil servants' union accepted the Assembly's ruling under protest. The centre of interest has now shifted to the discussions on wage scales and price regulation between the C.G.T. and the Employers' Federation (in accordance with the agreement of the 8th July) which began on the 16th July. The aim is to have agreed proposals to submit to the Government before the end of the month. If by then the Government are not ready with measures providing for new wage-scales the Employers' Federation, apparently, will instruct its members to pay out a bonus "on account." The Government, it is said, are distinctly uncomfortable about this new form of syndical pressure.

While he was in Paris the Secretary of State obtained from M. Bidault a promise of full co-operation for the plan to return to France the 4,554 Jewish illegal immigrants who had been embarked on the S.S. "President Warfield" at the French port of Sète (see under "The Middle East"). Mr. Bevin had broached the matter on the 12th July to M. Ramadier, pointing out the danger for France's North African territories of the indulgence shown to Jewish immigrants by the French authorities on more than one occasion. For, in the case of Palestine, Arabs as well as Jews were affected, and a similar problem of trouble-makers being introduced into French-controlled territories might easily arise. H.M.G. had taken drastic measures to control the movements of British subjects in North Africa, and only asked that the French Government should reciprocate in this matter of the illegal Jewish traffic. The Secretary of State took occasion to remind the French Prime Minister of the written undertakings previously given to apply strictly the safety of life at sea and loadline conventions to suspect vessels. M. Ramadier professed ignorance but undertook to make an enquiry into the specific case of the S.S. "President Warfield." The outcome of subsequent discussions at the official level was an agreement, announced in London on the 21st July, that the Jewish emigrants in question would be disembarked at Villefranche-sur-Mer and would remain in France while arrangements were being made for them to proceed to Colombia. (Most of them had produced travel documents bearing Colombian visas, real or forged, before they left France.) It was made clear that their return from Haifa, where they had been trans-shipped, to the country of embarkation was in accordance with pre-War practice.

On the 16th July the establishment of an all-party French Committee for United Europe was announced with M. Herriot as President. The committee includes the names of MM. Paul Reynaud, Paul Bastid, Pierre-Henri Teitgen—a prominent member of M. Ramadier's Government—M. André Siegfried, M. Paul Claudel, Professor Edmond Vermeil and leading personalities of the Catholic and Protestant churches. Its formation coincided with a delegation of British representatives of the United Europe movement and other societies working to a similar purpose led by Lord Layton.

SWITZERLAND

His Majesty's Government have assumed responsibility for the repatriation of the Japanese—about thirty in number—who still remain in Europe—in Switzerland, Sweden and Italy. Transport difficulties, however, have so far prevented this undertaking from being carried out.

By an agreement recently concluded between the Swiss and the French Governments, German prisoners-of-war escaping into Switzerland from France will be turned over to the French Authorities in the French Zone of Germany on the condition that they are set free there. The Swiss Government have asked for a similar assurance from the other three Occupying Powers.

It is reported in the Swiss Press that a trade and payments agreement, valid for one year, was signed at Berlin on the 12th July, between Switzerland and the Soviet Zone of occupation in Germany. The new agreement would replace that of the 8th August, 1946.

According to a Swiss wireless report, conversations were opened in Berne on the 7th July with a view to a new commercial treaty with France. The present agreement expires on the 31st July.

The National Defence Commission of Switzerland has been touring the St. Gotthard region to examine questions affecting its defence in the light of experiences during the war.

Last-minute intervention by the Federal Council has induced employers and employees in the building industry to settle their current disputes (see Summary No. 396) by means of a collective wage agreement covering the whole of Switzerland. Provision is made for increased wages, paid holidays, and sickness insurance, the employer paying two-thirds of the premium. The Price Controller has authorised an increase of between 8 and 10 per cent. in building costs. The wage rate for bricklayers in Basle has been provisionally fixed at 2·67 frs., and that of labourers at 2·29 frs. per hour.

The American Bill dealing with the compensation of neutral countries which suffered damage as a result of military operations during the war has been submitted to the Senate. It is reported that the sum provided for the damage caused by the bombing of Schaffhausen amounts to about 12 million dollars.

The Federal Council have asked the Federal Assembly for a new credit of 20,000,000 frs. for the continuation of Swiss relief work abroad.

ITALY

Italian ratification of the Peace Treaty does not seem likely to take place in the immediate future. The uncertainty about ratification by the U.S.S.R. is the deciding factor in the situation. Ratification would be unpopular in Italy, and even if it was certain that the U.S.S.R. were about to ratify Signor De Gasperi would be taking a considerable risk if he went further than he and Count Sforza have already done in urging the Constituent Assembly to ratify.

The position of the Government is indeed precarious, and on this question Signor De Gasperi is faced by the likelihood of united opposition by the parties of the extreme Right and of the majority of the Left. In addition he has to fight the obstinate opposition of various Elder Statesmen, such as Signor Orlando and Signor Groce, who are bitterly opposed to the ratification by Italy of a Treaty which they consider has been forced upon her by the victors. Signor De Gasperi has also to face division in his own party, for Don Sturzo still has a certain influence on some Christian Democrats owing to his leadership after the war of 1914–18, and his opposition to ratification is violent.

Both Signor De Gasperi and Count Sforza are undoubtedly doing all they can, short of wrecking the Government, to persuade the Italians of the merits of ratification. The Messaggero of the 18th published an interview with Count Sforza in which he urged that ratification was necessary if Italy was to live up to the important part allotted to her in Paris. He pointed out also that the apparent unwillingness of the U.S.S.R. to ratify was difficult to understand in view of the fact that the Russians regarded the Treaty as equitable and in no need of revision. This argument seems perhaps a little naïve in view of the Count's next observation which was to the effect that ratification was necessary if Italy was to seek revision.

Apart from the feeling that Italian ratification is uncalled for before the Soviet Union ratifies, there are two other considerations which have some weight with the Government as well as with the opposition parties. Italy is very much aware of the situation in Greece and is watching both the extent of Western help and the attitude adopted by the U.S.S.R. to Greece's Balkans neighbours, as she feels that she may expect a similar attitude both from West and East to her own problems. The other factor in the situation is the sense that Italy is suffering yet another injustice in the attitude adopted by the International Boundary Commission in regard to the Italo-Yugoslav frontier in the neighbourhood of Gorizia (see below).

The question of ratification was expected to come before the Constituent Assembly on the 22nd of July. It was reported that the Government intended to propose a formula to the following effect:—"The Government is authorized to make the Peace Treaty effective when it becomes operative under Article 90 of the Treaty"—i.e. when the Big Four have deposited their ratifications in Paris. Apparently this proposal was expected to meet with the approval of the Communists and Socialists as well as with that of the Christian Democrats. It is an unsatisfactory solution, but it must be remembered that Italians tend to rate highly the help which they gave to the Allies in their struggle with Germany, and that they feel that it compared favourably with the help given by France, whose position as one of the "victorious powers" imposing a harsh peace on Italy is regarded as totally unjustified.

Since March of this year the International Commission for the Demarcation of a Provisional Frontier between Italy and Yugoslavia has been at work. By the 6th of May the one remaining problem was that of the demarcation of the line in the area of Monte Sabotino, Salcano and San Pietro in the immediate neighbourhood of Gorizia. The Yugoslavs claimed that the text of Article 3 of the Treaty entitled them to a frontier line giving them the crest of Monte Sabotino and part of the suburbs of Gorizia lying to the west and south of the village of Salcano. Since the Italian and Yugoslav members of the Boundary Commission were unable to reach agreement the matter was referred to the Four-Power Supervisory Commission who recommended their conclusions to the Italian and Yugoslav representatives on 8th June. On the 1st of July the Yugoslavs accepted all the recommendations, making it quite clear, however, that they regarded the present boundary as a purely temporary one liable to modification by the Demarcation Commission proper, which can only function after the Treaty comes into force (Art. 5). Hitherto the Italians have not accepted the recommendations. They maintain that they have agreed to all the other solutions proposed by the Supervisory Commission but that in the Gorizia area the line proposed not only involves further Italian sacrifice but is contrary to article 3 of the Treaty. In the last two weeks a popular campaign has been carried on in the Press, petitions have poured in from Gorizia and the Government's attitude has stiffened. In point of fact Italy's losses even in the Gorizia region are more apparent than real. The area in dispute on Monte Sabotino is uninhabited and would give very little strategic advantage to the Yugoslavs compared with the positions which they will hold in any case under the Treaty, and in the neighbourhood of the railway from Salcano to San Pietro only nine houses are affected by the Commission's proposal. But the concessions agreed to by the Supervisory Commission are mostly in favour of Yugoslavia. It is useless to suggest to the Italians that the present boundary is purely temporary and may well be altered by the definitive Demarcation Commission. Italy knows only too well what has happened to a large part of her territory which was occupied by Yugoslavia on the understanding that this occupation was entirely without prejudice to the final settlement to be reached at the Peace Conference.

SOUTH-EAST EUROPE

Roumania

The Roumanian Government have embarked upon a policy of infringing certain of the provisions of the Treaty in advance. They are not, of course, free agents, but are acting under the direction of Russia. The continued arrests of members of political parties opposed to the Government, the attempt which is in progress to liquidate the Peasant party altogether, the dismissal of personnel from the Oil companies, are all, according to Dl Tătărescu, aimed at rendering powerless all elements in the country except the Communists, before the departure of the Russian occupying forces after the ratification of the Treaty.

The wholesale arrests of members of the Opposition parties were followed by a note of protest from His Majesty's Government drawing attention to the obligations of Roumania under Article 3 of the Peace Treaty. To this the Roumanian Government sent a reply which His Majesty's Government have no hesitation in describing as "outrageous." It is an astounding document, considering that it comes from a defeated nation which has been granted an armistice pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace. The Roumanian Government, it says, "cannot undertake to examine the contents" of the protest. They "cannot consent to its legislation and administrative measure being imposed or dictated by any foreign power. . . . The treaty does not confer the right to interfere in Roumania's internal affairs." This is a familiar Russian cliché. The note goes on to say that Roumania is obliged under Article 5 of the Treaty to take measures against organisations of a "Fascist type." It is said in Bucharest that this reply is the unaided work of Bodnaras, Gheorghiu-Dej, and Teohari Georgescu, as might, in fact, be inferred from internal evidence. To this effusion His Majesty's Government have replied that Roumania is attempting to evade her obligations, and that her argument about interference with Roumanian independence is nonsense, as under article 37 of the Treaty, H.M.G. have the duty of helping to supervise its implementation. On Roumania's performance will depend our attitude to her request for entry into the United Nations.

While this exchange of notes was in progress, fourteen persons, including four leading members of the Peasant Party were arrested, "while attempting to leave the country." The setting of these arrests is distinctly reminiscent of the circumstances of the murder of Codreanu and the Iron Guard leaders in 1938, who were "shot while attempting to escape." The official communiqué to the press states that "filled with hatred for the democratic régime . . . . several peasant leaders, obeying the direct order of Iuliu Maniu, ... tried to escape to a foreign country . . . . They were arrested . . . . at the moment when they tried to board an aircraft." Dl Maniu is under close surveillance in a nursing home.

A. Dacia Româna broadcast in Russian provides sensational details of the incident, including the finding amongst the baggage of Dl Ion Mihalache of a dress suit and a top hat. (Dl Mihalache always affects peasant dress.) "The Roumanian public received this news" of the escape, the communiqué goes on, "as an unprecedented example of treachery, shamelessness and crime . . . . Thousands of workers throughout the country have demanded their severe punishment . . . . the arrest of the main instigator, Iuliu Maniu, and finally a ban on Dreptatea," the National Peasant newspaper. The truth of the details of this "escape" has not yet been established. It is possible that these people never intended to leave the country at all, and the photograph of them in front of an aeroplane proves nothing. The independent Jurnal de Diminiata has since been suspended indefinitely.

It is reported from Bucarest that there is at present under way a communist attempt to infiltrate the Orthodox Church by the introduction of party nominees. This is probably part of a much larger movement to bring the Roumanian Church under the Patriarchate of Moscow. It will not all be plain sailing, as was shown by the attitude of the Roumanian Patriarch on the occasion of the recent visit of the Russian Patriarch to Bucharest, and also by the plucky refusal of the newly elected Archbishop of Cyprus to attend the so-called "pan-Orthodox" conference at Moscow.

Yugoslavia

Since the refusal of the Slav bloc to attend the Paris conference the All-Slav Committee has added to its functions that of providing "all-out aid to the Slav countries," to quote from a statement in Belgrade by the Committee's Yugoslav Chairman. As consolation for having to forgo the sour grapes from the United States, the satellite countries are now being promised sweet ones of their own.

About once a year Marshal Tito gives a "pep talk" to the Army. On the 5th July he spoke to the officers of the Fourth Army at Ljubljana, urging them, as usual, to achieve the mastery of new weapons and new technique. But on this occasion he also laid unwonted stress on the need for a more humane attitude of the officers towards other ranks, towards new recruits especially. There must be comradeship, he said, but without loss of discipline, and, above all, no ruthlessness. This touched one of the fundamental characteristics of the Yugoslav Army, and one which seems to have had a detrimental effect on morale. Allied officers, who came into contact with the National Liberation Army during the war, particularly in the later years, remarked, more than once, on the gulf existing between officers and men, the wide discrepancy in their pay and living conditions, and the extreme consciousness of rank often exhibited by the officers. Finally, to set an example, the Marshal told his officers not to be afraid to come to him personally, as Commander-in-Chief, when they were faced by a problem they could not solve. This touching offer will undoubtedly enhance a prestige which has always been highest in the Army.

It is reported that Ante Pavelić, the head of the former puppet Croat state, is residing in the Vatican City, in the guise of a monk. This information may well prove to be a mare's nest as did several previous reports. His capture, which may not be easy owing to the efficiency of the Croat émigrés' intelligence service, should remove one more excuse for Yugoslav complaints that the British and American authorities are protecting the most notorious war criminals.

Dr. Rainer, the former Gauleiter of Carinthia, who was handed over to Yugoslavia a few months ago, is being tried in Ljubljana. This trial, in which several other German occupation officials are facing the music, has provided an opportunity for further attacks on the Church with special reference to the wartime activities of Monsignor Rožman, Bishop of Ljubljana.

Borivoje Pantelić, one of seven Yugoslavs employed by the U.S. Graves Registration Unit, and accused of espionage and of facilitating contact between American officers and a group of chetniks, has been condemned to death.

Air negotiations concurrent with the Anglo-Yugoslav air talks are being conducted with Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria. The Yugoslav Government have pointed out that the terms they are giving these countries, as likewise to Roumania and Hungary, are no more favourable than those offered to the United Kingdom. The State Department, whose attitude was described in last week's Summary, are now of the opinion that the United Kingdom and the United States are most likely to obtain the desired concessions by openly working together, since the Balkan countries will obviously operate in a bloc in civil aviation as in other matters.

Greece

On the night of 13th–14th July about 1,000 more arrests were effected in Athens and 400 in Piræus, on the orders of General Zervas, the Minister for Public Security. Most of the people arrested were employees of the utility companies. Some were trades unionists and some appear to have been unimportant people not connected with either the Communist Party or EAM. Only sixteen important Communist leaders appear to have been arrested. Two members of the central committee of EAM were immediately released. More people were arrested in Athens and Piræus on 14th and 16th July, but many of these were soon let go. Since the mass arrests began in and around the capital and Salonica a total of 6,143 persons was stated on 17th July to have been deported to Ikaria. 300 were also deported there from Volos, and 100 to Zakynthos from Missolonghi. General Zervas declared that orders had been given for the deportees to be properly housed and fed. There is apparently no intention at present of taking action against the Communist Party as such, although if a "free Government" were to be set up, it is possible that the extremist members of the Cabinet might prevail on their more moderate colleagues to outlaw the whole Communist Party.

In the mountains the situation continues to be serious. No doubt there was little but bluff in the declaration of war against American and British officers and men which the self-styled "General Markos, Commander-in-Chief of the Democratic Army," published in the Rizospastis of 15th July. But the first message which he sent out from a wireless station somewhere in the north asserting that a "democratic" government must be set up in the rebel areas, certainly represents the rebels' main immediate objective. The attack on Konitsa recorded last week was soon beaten off, but only after it had diverted troops from rounding up rebels in the Grammos area. The army continues its efforts with more or less success in other areas, but, until means can be found for sealing Greece's northern frontier, operations seem bound to be inconclusive. Thanks to clandestine assistance from Albania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria the so-called "democratic army" is better armed, equipped and organised than it has ever been. Although the Greek army succeeds in inflicting losses on the rebels and in dislodging them from various areas, the hard core of the rebel leaders escapes and re-form the rebel forces to fight in other areas.

On 14th July the Greek representative addressed a note to the Secretary-General of the United Nations describing how the situation had deteriorated while the Security Council had been engaged on its discussion, and begging the Council to hasten action. However, in spite of the best efforts of the United States and British representatives the stalling tactics of M. Gromyko have so far been successful.

Albania

On the 15th July Tirana Radio broadcast two announcements on the subject of border incidents. One complained in the usual vague way that the territorial sovereignty of Albania had been infringed three times already this month by the Greeks—twice by air and once by sea. The other strenuously denied that there had been any Albanian participation in the Konitza incident described last week, or that any "international brigade" had been involved. "The Albanian news agency states that these reports are grotesque, and that no armed force has passed into Greek territory." (This is going a little far!) The United Nations Balkans Sub-commission have been doing what they can to investigate the incident, but are as usual being hampered by the unwillingness of Greece's northern neighbours—in this case Albania—to assist them by allowing them to enter their territory for the purpose. They can thus do no more than interrogate prisoners and find out what they can from the Greek side. It need hardly be said that such evidence as they have collected does not at all bear out the Albanian contentions.

The Chief of the Yugoslav General Staff has been on a visit—ostensibly a courtesy visit—to Tirana, accompanied by two of his more prominent colleagues. According to an unconfirmed report, believed reliable, certain elements of the Yugoslav air force were recently transferred, together with their ground personnel, to an airfield in Albania.

force, the Bulgarian Government towards the end of June invited three of the surviving Agrarian leaders to confer with them with a view to reaching what they were pleased to call a better understanding. Conversations of a kind duly took place, and on the 16th July the press published a declaration by the National Committee of the Fatherland Front setting out the Communists' minimum demands. The first of these was that the Opposition should publicly repudiate the "anti-Bulgarian treacherous activity" of their former leader Dr. G. M. Dimitrov "as a foreign agent." (This refers to his association with the new "Agrarian Committee" which M. Nagy and Dr. Maček have set up in Washington.) Next, they must publicly repudiate people from their own ranks either condemned for conspiracy already, like Peter Koev, or now about to face their trial on the same charge (!) like Nikola Petkov himself and three deputies arrested on the 11th July. (These were three of the twenty-three ejected from the Assembly on the 10th June.) Moreover, they must expel from their leadership "persons who wish to continue the present course of negative and destructive activity"—or, in other words, anyone not prepared to obey the Communists; and they must prepare to merge their own large organisation with the relatively insignificant one of the pseudo-Agrarian Obbov—itself assuredly destined to be swallowed up on no distant day in its turn.

What is left of the Agrarian shadow cabinet, greatly discouraged, but still trying hard to keep their heads above water, called a party meeting on the 17th and 18th July, at which it was decided to make certain concessions—just what concessions is not yet quite clear—but to renew various demands and above all to refuse to throw over Petkov and his associates. The Party are, however, thought to be prepared to disavow Dr. Dimitrov's Washington Committee and to say they would welcome a reunion of all Agrarians under one ægis.

The Roumanian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister paid an official visit to Sofia from the 13th to the 16th July. A communiqué published there on the 17th stated that the two Governments were agreed that territorial questions between them are finally settled; that they will adopt a joint policy in connection with the "Danubian problem"; and that they are considering the preparation of a treaty of friendship, collaboration and mutual aid. At a dinner given in honour of his guests on the 14th the Bulgarian Prime Minister, according to press and wireless reports, said that the Bulgars, together with the other Danubian peoples, would act so as to "frustrate the efforts of foreign, non-Danubian countries to dominate the Danubian basin."

The Bulgarian trade delegation which had been in Moscow since the middle of April returned to Sofia on the 9th July. As in previous years, the terms of trade agreement reached have been kept rather dark (see Summary No. 399). Thirty-five members of the National Assembly, led by the deputy speaker, arrived in Moscow on the 18th.

Professor Dolapchiev's appointment to London has been made public (see Summary No. 399).

A note received by the British Political Representative on the 18th July from the Bulgarian Foreign Ministry alleged that Greek troops had violated Bulgarian territory near Svilengrad and abducted some Bulgarian nationals.

Turkey

From the text of the Turco-American agreement signed an Angora on 12th July, which is now available, it appears that the Turkish Government undertake to give the chief of the United States mission—at present the Ambassador—every facility for observing, obtaining information and reporting on the use made of United States assistance, and of the progress achieved. The Turkish Government also engage to co-operate in giving full information to the public in the United States and Turkey, so far as may be consistent with security. American press and radio representatives are to be allowed to observe freely and report fully, and the Turkish Government are to give the matter full and continuous publicity in Turkey. Under a reciprocal clause Turkey promises to provide for the security of any article, service or information furnished. Turkey may not transfer anything received to anyone else, nor may she use the dollars for the service of a foreign loan. Finally, American assistance is to be withdrawn (i) if requested by Turkey, (ii) if the Security Council (in which the United States waives its right of veto) finds it unnecessary or undesirable, and (iii) if the President of the United States thinks withdrawal to be to the interest of his country, and in certain other circumstances.

C267538

The purpose of President Inönü's statement, which was briefly mentioned last week, was evidently to moderate the bitterness of party rivalry in order to prevent it from wrecking the present experiment in two-party government. He pointed out that, as the Prime Minister had denied to him that the People's Republican Party were applying illegal pressure to the Opposition, this in itself constituted a satisfactory guarantee for the Democratic Party, and he would hold M. Recep Peker to it. What he wanted was mutual confidence, so that the Opposition should feel that the People's Republican Party had no intention of suppressing it; that the People's Republican Party should feel that the Opposition contemplated using only legal methods; and that the great mass of the people could await with equanimity the assumption of office by either party.

This declaration, which was in the end welcomed by the Democratic Party, probably means that the President intends to keep M. Recep Peker's government in office, but to insist that they shall give the Opposition a fair chance of developing along parliamentary lines.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Egypt

It has been decided that the hearing of the Egyptian case by the Security Council shall begin on 5th August. Nokrashy Pasha left Cairo for New York on 21st July accompanied by Saleh Pasha, Minister of Public Works.

The Egyptian public and press have not reacted too favourably to the text of the appeal to the Security Council. The view has frequently been expressed that the Council is not a judicial, but a political body, and that, far from forming an impartial decision, it will be swayed by the selfish, and often conflicting, interests of its members. Such a line of argument is doubtless put forward now in order that the Egyptians may impugn any unfavourable decision which the Council may make.

The Wafd have criticised the Egyptian Note in a manifesto issued by Nahas Pasha on 15th July. The Note, the manifesto states, indicates the Cabinet's weakness, since it does not mention the unity of the Nile Valley under the Egyptian crown—the principal demand upon which the Nation is agreed. The manifesto also complains that the Government only demand the substitution of one system for another and have not dared to announce the cancellation of the 1936 treaty and the 1899 agreement. These two criticisms are scarcely justified by the text of the Note (see last week's Summary) which makes no less than three references to the unity of Egypt and the Sudan, and, although not specifically mentioning the Egyptian crown, clearly implies Egyptian sovereignty over the Sudan. Furthermore, the Note denounces the 1936 treaty in plain enough terms. The manifesto then criticises Nokrashy for his refusal to allow Fuad Serag-ed-Din Pasha and two other prominent Wafdists to go to New York "to make sound propaganda for the Egyptian cause," and announces the intention of the Wafd to declare to the Security Council that "the governmental delegation is not competent to speak in the name of the people of the Nile Valley, because they neither appointed it as their agent nor approved of its departure." A report of the telegram sent by Nahas to the Security Council was summarised by the 'Progrès Égyptien' of 18th July. The telegram warns the Council against the text of the Egyptian Note, which it describes as "far from expressing the people's point of view towards the inadmissible pretensions of Great Britain," and states that the present Egyptian Government does not represent the people of the Nile Valley, the vast majority of whom support, and always have supported, the Wafd.

The Wafd, together with other sections of the press, have also taken a strongly critical line over the temporary sterling balances agreement (see this week's Special Article). Saut el Umma of 7th July sums up the disadvantages which it considers Egypt will suffer as a result of the agreement. These are, first, that Egyptian foreign trade will be subject to severe control, worse than that applied during the war; secondly, that this control will be entrusted to the British Governor of the National Bank, and, finally, that the agreement has failed to provide sufficient funds for Egypt to compensate her for the freezing of the sterling balances. Even the moderate Ahram considered that the provisions of the agreement were such as to cause anxiety over the future of the country's currency, and maintained that the success of the schemes for social reform based upon raising the standard of living were largely dependent on the solution of the sterling balances problem.

One of such schemes is reported to have been approved by the Senate on 10th July —a bill for the construction of a workers' town near Cairo to accommodate 6,000 workers and their families now living in squalid conditions in the Bulaq district. It is earnestly to be hoped that this scheme will not remain a paper project.

The decision to dissolve the Anglo-Egytian Union (see Summary No. 389) was ratified at a special general meeting on 4th July. An Egyptian Cultural Union is, however, being formed, to which foreigners will, it appears, only be admitted as supernumerary members without a share in the administration of the Union.

The Sudan

The Sudanese Independence Front, commenting on the Egyptian Note to the Security Council, is reported to have referred to the claim that the Sudan was part of Egypt as lacking historical and legal justification and as contrary to the United Nations Charter. The Umma party is also reported to have denounced the section on the Sudan in the Egyptian Note.

During the past week interest has been mainly focussed upon a railway strike, which has just been settled by mediation. The cause of the strike was ostensibly the failure of the railways administration, despite many concessions, to reach an agreement with the workers over the constitution of works committees in the mechanical departments. On 12th July a mob of some 1,000 workers marched to the general manager's office, demanding to see him. On being told to elect two spokesmen to deliver their message, they refused and a riot ensued. A strike was then called by the workers' committee and in the next few days spread from the Atbara workshops (the main workshops of the Sudanese railways) to other centres, causing a general paralysis of the system (apart from a few trains driven by volunteers). Only the mechanical staff were, however, affected by the strike. Although it is suspected that Ashigga and Egyptian influence may have been behind the strike, there is no clear evidence of this. Nevertheless, the timing of the strike on the eve of the Egyptian appeal to the United Nations, the break-down in the negotiations without apparent reason, the suspicious behaviour of certain Ashigga supporters and, finally, the strike organisation which clearly exists throughout the country lead one to conclude that the strike was not purely spontaneous. The strikers' outlook may, however, be somewhat similar to that of the Ethiopian workers who staged a strike lasting from January to March. When one of their number was asked what their demands were, he replied: "We don't know; but we listen to the radio and read the papers and realise that everywhere in Europe people are striking and getting away with it every time . . . . so clearly we must follow their example!"

Palestine

The U.N.S.C.O.P. having concluded its hearing of evidence in Palestine, left for Beirut on the 21st July to hear testimonies from representatives of the Arab States. During the past week the following bodies have given evidence before the Committee: the Communists, the Ihud (Unity Party), the Histadruth and Mr. Shertok, speaking on behalf of the Jewish Agency.

The Central Committee of the Palestine Communist Party submitted a memorandum to the Committee on the 13th July. Reviewing thirty years of British rule in the country, the memorandum states that they have been years of oppression, years of political, economic and military domination for Jews and Arabs alike. "The British police and military," the memorandum continues, "have not been instrumental in preserving peace, but, on the contrary, they have produced a state of tension between Arabs and Jews and a constant danger of disturbances." The Communists oppose partition on the grounds that Palestine should be constituted as an independent united State of both peoples, free from foreign rule and intervention. The constitutional machinery of this State should, they maintain, consist of two Chambers—one elected on a basis of proportional representation, and the other on a regional basis, composed half of Arabs and half of Jews.

A plan for a bi-national State as the only solution to the Palestine problem was put forward on the 14th July by Dr. Magnes on behalf of the Ihud. He criticised partition severely and advocated the continuation of the British Mandate during the transitional period, which, he said, should last more than five years.

The Histadruth (Federation of Jewish Labour) presented their evidence on the 16th July. Their spokesman, Mr. Rubashov, asked the Committee to sponsor free Jewish immigration and the abolition of the White Paper. He added: "Help us to establish contact with the Arab nations as an equal."

Mr. Shertok, speaking again on the 16th July, this time on behalf of the Jewish Agency, emphasised the compelling necessity for the immediate establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine. Referring to Arab-Jewish relations, Mr. Shertok stated: "Jewish developments are the main agency of Arab progress." On the following day Mr. Shertok attacked the practicability of any bi-national solution based on parity, saying that "this presupposes two collective wills acting in unity—a willingness to talk together—which does not exist."

The United Zionist Revisionists have submitted a memorandum to the Committee in which they stress that partition would be disastrous both for Jews and for Arabs, and would create a permanent irredentist problem in the Middle East. The memorandum demands a Jewish State on both sides of the Jordan with full minority rights for the Arabs, who "would probably be the happiest minority in the world, because the Jewish State would cherish them as its sole children."

The Palestine Government presented their memorandum to the U.N.S.C.O.P. on the 17th July, and followed it on the 19th with a supplementary memorandum which is largely a reply to the oral and written statements made by the Jews at their hearings, and reflects the widening rift between the Government and the Jews. The memorandum states that, whereas the Arab disturbances between 1936 and 1939 cost 4,000 lives and £1 million worth of damage, the Jewish disturbances have cost 270 lives and £1,500,000 worth of damage. The memorandum also states: "the fact that a National Home could never have been established without the direct assistance and support which Great Britain has given it, with the expenditure of British resources and British lives, apparently requires to be restated in those simple terms."

The Stern Group has described itself as "vigorously opposed to partition, and determined to fight any such decision." On the 17th July they issued a press communiqué warning that there would be no peace in Palestine before the September session of the United Nations General Assembly, because "the entire United Nations Enquiry Committee is pro-British." The Stern Group's opposition to the Committee is principally due to their having refused to meet any of the underground groups.

The Arab Youth and Women's Conferences (see Summary No. 399) were held during the week. Each passed a number of resolutions chiefly concerned with the boycott of Zionist goods and the prevention of land-sales. The dunum plan (see last week's Summary) has been inaugurated by the purchase of 10 dunums by the Mufti.

The temporary respite from illegal immigration came to an end with the arrival at Haifa on the 18th July of the s.s. President Warfield with some 4,500 illegal immigrants from France. She was intercepted during the night of the 17th/18th July and brought into harbour after stiff opposition had been encountered by the Naval boarding party. On her arrival in harbour two illegal immigrants were found to have died, and a third has since died. Twenty-seven immigrants and three Naval ratings were admitted to hospital. Transhipment into three transports was effected smoothly, and on the 19th July these ships set sail for France with 4,429 immigrants on board. The interception of the vessel has been described by the Jewish Agency as an act of senseless cruelty, and a general strike was proclaimed in Tel Aviv on the 18th July to protest against the "ramming" of the ship and the aggressive action of the Royal Naval boarding party. In fact, however, the Naval boarding party used the minimum force and would have used none if they had not encountered resistance.

There have been a large number of terrorist attacks during the week which have resulted in several casualties to the security forces.

Syria

The attitude of the Syrian Government towards the Egyptian appeal is a disappointing one. On 13th July, at a meeting between the Syrian and Lebanese Prime Ministers, it was agreed that the Syrian representative on the Security Council should be instructed to adopt a conciliatory attitude and to do his best to bring about a satisfactory solution of the dispute, for Syria was bound by "the closest ties" to Egypt and was also in excellent relations with the British Empire. The Syrian Government, it appears, view the question from two aspects—that of principle and that of tactics. In principle, they are adhering to the Arab League resolution to give full support to Egypt (see Summary No. 386 under Arab League), but the Syrian Prime Minister, who has been consistently evasive, still appears undecided as to the best tactical approach, and is consulting the other Arab States.

Meanwhile, he has stated that the Syrian Government hope to see the Anglo-Egyptian question settled amicably by means of fresh negotiations.

On the 15th July the following statement was made in the House of Commons on behalf of the Government :—

" My attention has been called to the spreading of reports that His Majesty's Government favour the ' Greater Syria ' Movement, and I am grateful to my honourable friend for giving me the opportunity to affirm most strongly that these reports are quite unfounded. His Majesty's Government consider that this subject is one which essentially and exclusively concerns the inhabitants of Syria and of the other States in that area. British officials in Middle Eastern countries have definite instructions that the attitude of His Majesty's Government on the subject is therefore one of strict neutrality. His Majesty's Government's one desire is the maintenance of stable and tranquil conditions in the Middle East."

Lebanon

The Lebanese Government have been invited to press for the inclusion in the agenda of the Special Session of the United Nations Assembly of a motion calling for the termination of the Mandate in Palestine and the recognition of her independence (see under " Sa'udi Arabia " and Summary No. 397 under " Arab League "), but have declined to do so. The Minister for Foreign Affairs is, however, most perturbed about the outcome in Palestine and has suggested that he and the Prime Minister should visit the Arab capitals, urging the various Governments to accept the status quo in Palestine—by which he is thought to mean trusteeship for Britain—for a period of ten years, provided that His Majesty's Government undertake to stop Jewish immigration. The Prime Minister is also most uneasy about the future of Palestine, and has stated to H.M. Minister that continued British occupation would be preferable to partition.

Lebanese press reaction to the U.N.S.C.O.P. has been generally unfavourable. Before its arrival in Palestine the Nationalist paper Al Yaum, carried an article urging the Arabs to boycott it.

At the beginning of the month the Syndicate of Lebanese Newspaper Owners declared a three-day strike against the non-abolition of the law entitling the Government to suspend any paper by simple administrative decree. On 8th July a strike was declared by the lawyers' union in protest against the arrest of a lawyer, Muhsen Salim, on a charge of throwing a bomb at the President's house.

In Summary No. 395 it was reported that all but one of the leading daily newspapers had informed the President of the Republic that they would boycott the proceedings of the Assembly. The report, which was from press sources, turns out to be exaggerated; in fact, at least six newspapers, including four of the principal ones, did not join in this démarche.

It is now learned that Monseigneur Mubarak's visit to Rome had been arranged long before the elections. The report of the Arab News Agency that the Government had ordered him to leave the country is, therefore, without foundation (see Summary No. 395). At the same time his absence removes a violent critic of the Government, and it is to be hoped that the atmosphere of the Holy See will have a calming effect upon him.

Saudi Arabia

The Secretariat of the United Nations have circulated a telegram from the Sa'udi Arabian Minister in Washington submitting, as an item for the agenda of the next regular session of the General Assembly, the termination of the Mandate over Palestine and the recognition of its independence as one State. It appears that other Arab States have been approached (presumably by Azzam Pasha) to put forward a similar demand (see also under " Lebanon ").

Arab League

The Iraqi, Syrian and Lebanese Governments have now followed the lead set by Egypt in recognising the Indonesian Republic. Iraq delayed longest in making up her mind, and it was hoped at one time that she would not take the plunge. She has confined herself to according de facto recognition to the Indonesian Government. Only Transjordan is pursuing a separate line. King Abdullah has agreed to inform the Indonesian delegation, which left Bagdad on 18th July for Amman, that as Transjordan's own international position is unassured, owing to her not being a member of the United Nations, the Transjordan Government will confine itself to requesting the Arab League to secure the recognition of Indonesia by the United Nations in due course.

The Syrian Prime Minister has decided to call a meeting of the Political Committee of the Arab League to be held at Beirut to coincide with the visit of the Arab representatives who will give evidence before the U.N.S.C.O.P. (see under " Palestine "). The meeting will discuss the Anglo-Egyptian dispute. The Syrian Foreign Minister has stated that he hopes that the Syrian and Lebanese Prime Ministers and the Sa'udi Arabian Foreign Minister will be able to exert a restraining influence on the Egyptian representatives.

Iraq

It is reported by the Arab News Agency that the Court of Cassation has decided to commute the death sentence of Yusuf Salman Yusuf (see Summary 399) into one of penal servitude, while the other two communists sentenced to death with him are to be given fifteen years' hard labour. There was little press comment on the original sentences. On the whole they were welcomed, although criticised as somewhat severe.

The Treasury and the Iraqi Delegation to London have settled the terms of a five-year agreement on the Iraqi sterling balances. The Iraqi Prime Minister's concurrence is awaited before the agreement can be signed.

Persia

There are signs that the Persians are attempting to bolster up Bahrein (see Summary 376). Early in June a circular was sent to all schools in Shiraz by the Department of Education in that town containing instructions that " in view of the fact that the Bahrein archipelago is a part of, and inseparable from, Persia." all pupils should be taught this.

THE FAR EAST

Japan

The question of arriving at an early peace settlement for Japan is being examined by the Allied Powers concerned. His Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa and the Government of India have, some weeks since, accepted an invitation from the Australian Government to attend a meeting in Canberra (which, it has been arranged, should begin on 26th August), for a preliminary exchange of views on the subject. On 11th July, the Far Eastern Commission, which sits at Washington and is composed of eleven of the forty-nine nations which declared war on Japan—Australia, Canada, China, France, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Philippines, Soviet Union, United Kingdom and United States—released the text of its unanimous policy decision on Basic Post—surrender Policy for Japan. This is a comprehensive statement and is the result of nearly 18 months' discussion. In the main the policy decision endorses the unilateral American directive on Initial Post-surrender Policy which was issued to General MacArthur shortly after the Japanese surrender. The " post-surrender " period, as envisaged in the Commission's policy decision, is the period up to the date when the Peace Treaty becomes operative.

On 11th July, too, the State Department invited the Heads of Missions of countries represented on the Far Eastern Commission to meet that evening to discuss the subject of a peace treaty for Japan.

The important points of policy contained in the statement released by the Far Eastern Commission are :

The complete demilitarisation and disarmament of Japan.

Encouragement of the Japanese people to form democratic and representative organisations.

Maintenance of such industries as will sustain Japan's economy and permit the exaction of just reparations in kind. (Maintenance of such industries as would enable Japan to re-arm for war, however, shall not be permitted.)

Adding that " Clauses herein on reparations and references to this subject are without prejudice to views of Governments on the overseas assets issue," the Commission also declared that :

" Reparations shall be in such a form as would not endanger the fulfilment of the programme of demilitarisation of Japan and which would not prejudice the defraying of the cost of occupation and maintenance of a minimum civilian standard of living. Shares of particular countries in the total sum of reparations from Japan shall be determined on a broad political basis, taking into due account the scope of material and human destruction and damage suffered by each claimant country as a result of preparation and execution of Japanese aggression, and taking also into due account each country's contribution, to the cause of defeat of Japan, including the extent and duration of its resistance to Japanese aggression."

Speaking in Tokyo on the following day, General MacArthur declared that, even without external controls, Japan could not re-arm to take part in a modern war within a century. He pleaded for an early peace settlement which, he said, should be "a charter of human liberty to which Japanese citizens will look for guidance and protection, rather than shun with a revulsion of shame." The Japanese press, too, welcomed the Commission's statement of policy as "a sound foundation for Japan's peace treaty."

At the meeting convened by the U.S. State Department on 11th July, the spokesman announced the desire of the United States Government to hold a Conference as soon as possible for preliminary discussions for a peace treaty for Japan. The proposal is that the Conference should be composed of representatives of the eleven countries which are members of the Far Eastern Commission, but should be outside the Commission. When these discussions had reached a sufficiently advanced stage, the results might be considered at a general conference of all the States at war with Japan. The spokesman further said that his Government would be glad to be host for such a conference, which, it was tentatively suggested, should open at Washington or San Francisco on 19th August. He added that the U.S. Government did not consider it practicable to propose that these discussions should be on a Foreign Minister level, but that in their initial stages they should be conducted by deputies and experts and that all points should be decided by a simple two-thirds majority.

H.M. Minister at Washington has informed the State Department that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, having already agreed to the Australian Government's proposal to hold a meeting of the interested British Commonwealth countries on 26th August for a preliminary exchange of views concerning a peace settlement for Japan, would find it difficult to attend a meeting in the United States on the proposed date of 19th August. His Majesty's Government, however, are not in any way opposed to the holding of an early discussion on Japanese peace terms and would gladly consider any other date the United States Government might suggest that would not conflict with the Canberra meeting or other international engagements to which they might be committed. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are also inclined to the opinion that, before deputies and experts begin to examine peace treaty provisions in detail, questions of policy and principle should be determined on a Ministerial level: in the absence of inter-Governmental agreement on the broader issues, they consider that an initial meeting of deputies and experts would be unlikely to achieve any thing more than a preliminary exchange of views.

Commenting on the U.S. Government's suggestion in conversation with H.M. Ambassador in Nanking, the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs remarked that in general the United States proposal was acceptable to the Chinese Government but that they thought it would represent a departure from the established precedent that peace treaties were drawn up in the first instance by the Foreign Ministers Conference. They felt that in dealing with Japan special consideration ought to be given to the views held by those nations which had borne the brunt of the fighting; and they proposed, therefore, to put forward a slight amendment to the United States suggestions, which would be that "all decisions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of members of the conference present and voting, including a majority of the members of the Allied Council for Japan present and voting." In expressing his Government's hope that a peace treaty with Japan might be concluded at an early date, the Chinese Foreign Minister said that he thought that some such amendment as he had just outlined might prove helpful in avoiding the difficulties which had been met on previous occasions in connexion with the veto when European peace treaties were being framed.

No member of the Soviet Mission in Washington was present at the meeting convened by the State Department on 11th July; but, remarking that the manner in which this important matter had been broached seemed to his Ambassador to be most unusual, the Soviet Minister has since intimated that the United States Government's proposal is not acceptable to the Soviet Union. In this connexion it is also significant that M. Molotov is reported to have asked the United States Ambassador to Moscow if it was not the intention that the peace treaty for Japan should be handled by the Council of Foreign Ministers.

The Australian Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for External Affairs, Dr. Evatt, is scheduled to arrive in Tokyo about 28th July on a long-postponed visit to General MacArthur. His visit is entirely unconnected with the Canberra Conference; and contrary to some entirely erroneous statements that have appeared in the American press—that the Canberra Conference is being held in an endeavour to secure British control over the international peace conference, when held—the forthcoming discussions at Canberra are, in fact, in the nature of a family conference arranged in accordance with a long-standing practice, in order that members of the British Commonwealth can exchange views on questions of common interest and importance with the object of facilitating procedure when an international conference is convened to deliberate the matter at issue.

General MacArthur has extended an invitation to a delegation of five members of the House of Commons to visit Japan towards the end of September. For the first part of their stay the delegation will be the guests of General MacArthur. They will then tour the Japanese mainland to inspect various aspects of the Allied administration and to visit units of the British Commonwealth Occupation Force. The delegates are expected to return to the United Kingdom in time for the re-opening of Parliament.

Indonesia

On the 20th July it was officially announced that the Netherlands Government had authorised the use of Dutch armed force for "police action of a limited character" in Indonesia.

This decision followed swiftly on the Republican Cabinet's rejection of the conditions provisionally accepted by the Prime Minister, M. Sjarifoeddin, on the two remaining outstanding points of difference: the establishment of a joint Dutch-Indonesian gendarmerie and the cessation of hostilities, entailing the withdrawal of Republican forces from the perimeters and the destruction of their defences.

Throughout the first two weeks of July, despite continuous threats of force from the Dutch at increasingly frequent intervals, negotiations were conducted in an atmosphere of optimism. On the 15th, subject to confirmation by the Republican Cabinet, M. Sjarifoeddin reached provisional agreement with Dr. van Mook on both points in the following terms:—

By 17th July, all propaganda and radio announcements of an anti-Dutch nature to cease;

By 19th July, Indonesians to begin withdrawal of troops from perimeters and the removal of mines and demolition charges. Republican police to replace Republican military units for the maintenance of law and order;

By 21st July, the withdrawal of Republican forces to a distance of 10 kilometres from perimeters to be completed;

Dutch to begin withdrawal of troops from perimeters and handing over to police as soon as Republicans have effectively carried out the above measures.

Although the Republican Prime Minister only accepted these conditions under considerable pressure, a message conveyed to H.M. Consul-General just before M. Sjarifoeddin left Batavia indicated that he was not without hope that he would ultimately succeed in persuading his Cabinet to endorse the provisional agreements. He felt, however, that the compromise over the joint gendarmerie, which did not exclude the possibility of Dutch troops penetrating into the interior, would present difficulties and that his Cabinet might quite likely require a firmer understanding that the presence of Dutch troops would be confined to the perimeters. In conversation with Mr. Mitcheson, Dr. van Mook, too, expressed doubt as to the final outcome and said that he thought it quite probable that the Republican Government would disintegrate, in which case it would become essential for the Dutch to intervene.

On the 16th July the Republicans did in fact create an extremely confused situation by to all intents and purposes repudiating their Prime Minister in a flat rejection of the Dutch conditions. M. Sjarifoeddin did not resign, however, and, under instructions from Dr. Soekarno, he requested from the Dutch 24 hours' grace. This was refused officially, but allowed in practice, since Dr. van Mook found it necessary to refer to The Hague for instructions. Thus the Republican Government were enabled to put forward counter-proposals, which were delivered the following evening. These, however—no doubt as the result of continuous Dutch threats of military action—showed an unwillingness to comply with the Dutch requirements for the withdrawal of Republican troops from the perimeters and the destruction of defences unless the Dutch, on their side, were prepared to make a similar gesture in a declaration of peaceful intentions and the issue of an order for the simultaneous withdrawal of their forces. The counter-proposals were rejected by Dr. van Mook as being completely unacceptable.

The Republican Ministers in Batavia then asked Mr. Mitcheson and his colleagues to help them in their distress, pointing out that in all fairness they could not be expected to submit to one-sided pacification measures at the dictation of the Dutch and so bring about a situation in which no Government could hope to survive. According to press reports a meeting was held at the residence of the Chinese Consul-General at which Mr. Mitcheson and other members of the Consular Body were present. Efforts were made to bring home to the Republican Ministers the extreme seriousness of the situation and the urgent necessity to find some means of ending the deadlock before it became too late.

The Republican Prime Minister, acting on this advice, lost no time in broadcasting a statement from Jogjakarta in which, after pointing out that they were ready to trust the Dutch so long as an endeavour was not made to exact such trust under a threat of force, he declared that the Republican Government were now prepared to issue orders for the cessation of hostilities and the lifting of the food blockade; and also that they were ready to take whatever steps might be necessary to put an end to anything that could be construed as unfriendly action. This statement was pronounced by the Dutch to be both inadequate and too late; and, on the evening of 20th July, Dr. van Mook made his official announcement of the Dutch decision to begin military action at dawn.

He confirmed this announcement in a long statement to the press in which he endeavoured to justify the use of force by stating that "after many months of patient negotiations and controlled defence against almost continuous aggression, the Netherlands Government have very reluctantly, and with great regret, come to the conclusion that the present Government of the Indonesian Republic is either unwilling, or incapable, of executing both the truce of 14th October, 1946, and the Linggadjati Agreement of 25th March, 1947." He then proceeded to enumerate the many instances in which the Indonesians had failed to keep faith and which had made it impossible for the Netherlands Government to consider themselves any longer bound by the truce and the Linggadjati Agreement. The Netherlands Government, therefore, re-assumed complete freedom of action in the discharge of their responsibilities for the restoration of order and security in sufficiently large areas to enable the realization of that co-operation between the Netherlands and the Free United States of Indonesia contained in the spirit of the Linggadjati Agreement.

At midnight on the 20th July, Dutch forces in Batavia occupied all Republican-held buildings and public utilities and took into protective custody Dr. A. K. Gani, Republican Deputy Prime Minister, and Dr. Thamzil, Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, as well as the Indonesian Mayor of Batavia and all other Republican officials. The following day Dutch military forces in Java, supported by aircraft, began large-scale operations.

On the 18th July, the Netherlands Ambassador in London was informed of the very grave concern entertained by His Majesty's Government at recent developments in the Indonesian situation; and on the morning of 21st July, His Majesty's Government issued a communiqué in London, expressing the keenest disappointment at the breakdown of their ceaseless efforts during the last eighteen months to promote a peaceful settlement of the exceptionally difficult situation which has persisted in Java and Sumatra since the Japanese surrender; and stating that His Majesty's Government, for their part, had suggested to the Netherlands Government the possibility of the appointment of a police Commissioner from some neutral country if this would assist in promoting agreement, though this had not proved acceptable. The announcement also stated that His Majesty's Government have made it plain to the Netherlands Government that they would always be ready to place at the disposal of the parties their good offices; and that "this offer to both parties is renewed. In this connexion the help afforded in Batavia by His Majesty's Consul-General, Mr. Mitcheson, towards bridging the differences between the two parties has met with great appreciation.

The action of His Majesty's Government has throughout been taken in full consultation with the United States Government.

The State Department issued an announcement in support of His Majesty's Government's endeavour to settle the dispute by mediation; and on the evening of 21st July, the United States Government released a statement of their profound regret that negotiation had been discarded as a means of achieving voluntary association between the Netherlands and the Indonesian peoples.

In a broadcast from Jogjakarta on the 21st July, the Indonesian President, Dr. Soekarno, appealed to the world to resolve the Indonesian problem without war. And he declared that the Republic was ready to place its case in the hands of the United Nations.

Speaking on the same evening, Dr. Sjarifoeddin called the Indonesian people to arms. The following day he again broadcast, appealing to all friendly nations of the world to intervene "quickly and effectively" to stop what he described as a large-scale colonial war, "not just police measures."

On the 22nd July, the Government of India issued an official statement, expressing concern at events in Indonesia; and stating that urgent representations have been made to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of the United States to make every effort to end the armed conflict and persuade both parties either to settle their differences by peaceful negotiations, or, failing that, to resort to arbitration.

On the same date M. Sjarir, the former Republican Prime Minister and now "Elder Statesman," reached Singapore from Jogjakarta on a mission to India, Great Britain, the United States and Australia to present the Indonesian case.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The "record speed and refreshing unanimity" with which the European Economic Co-operation Conference completed the first phase of its work in the absence of Soviet "obstruction" has caused general satisfaction in the United States. In view of the Soviet "challenge" a very serious view is being taken of the need to make a success of the Paris conference and of the subsequent speedy execution of American aid to Western Europe. Consequently the decision not to call a special session of Congress this autumn to act on the Marshall proposals has caused a number of internationally-minded observers to deplore the "complacency" of Congressional leaders in the face of the present world situation. The prospect now is that the necessary legislation may not be passed before the late spring or early summer of 1948, and, according to the columnists, Joseph and Stewart Alsop, "it is possible that by then it will merely be a question of slamming the barn door shut after the European horse is stolen." It is nevertheless generally recognised that from the domestic point of view the President has adopted wise tactics in allowing Congress a breathing-spell for the mending of its political fences. Arrangements have been made so that the Congressional committees affected can consider any proposals submitted by Europe during the recess, and meanwhile the campaign to educate the public about the issues involved can be pushed forward.

Mr. Marshall is proceeding with his policy of bringing the State Department and Congress into closer touch on foreign affairs. On 21st July he addressed, in secret session, a meeting of Republican and Democratic leaders of the House of Representatives and is reported to have deeply impressed them with the gravity of the international situation. Confidence in Mr. Marshall and support for a non-partisan American foreign policy dedicated to world peace were expressed in the unanimous resolution passed by the State Governors at their annual conference in Salt Lake City on 16th July, following Mr. Marshall's address to them on the 14th. (See last week's Summary) And, in private conversation the majority of the Governors, among them several aspirants for Presidential or Vice-Presidential office in 1948 expressed much more definite agreement with the principles underlying the Marshall proposals. The Governors also called for enactment by Congress of legislation to establish universal military training, as requested by President Truman. It is unlikely, however, that even this demand by the executive heads of the American States will be effective in view of the unequivocal opposition to any such legislation expressed by Senator Taft.

The importance of the United States foreign aid programme in relationship to the American economy was also stressed by Mr. Truman in his mid-year economic report submitted to Congress on the 21st July. He spoke of the high level of employment, production and income in the United States and of the smooth completion of the reconversion to a peacetime economy as a "splendid achievement." Pointing to the excess of American exports over imports, Mr. Truman said that unless further dollar assistance is extended abroad, United States net exports "must be expected to decline before the end of the year." He went on to declare that the "immediate and sole objective" of the American foreign aid programme should be "to restore a vigorous, stable and peaceful world economy."

Developments during the past week have made it clear that the State Department regards an increase in the industrial production of Western Germany as essential to any scheme for general European recovery. On the 15th July the Department announced that a new overall policy directive had been sent to Lt.-General Clay instructing the United States Military Government to encourage the German people "to rebuild a self-supporting state devoted to peaceful purposes, integrated into the economy of Europe," while maintaining safeguards against any resurgence of German militarism. German foreign trade through "normal trade channels" is to be promoted, and General Clay has been instructed to give "highest priority" to increasing the production of coal, food and export goods in order to "enable Germany to make a maximum contribution to European recovery." Nevertheless, yielding to strong protests from the French Government, the United States Government has agreed to the postponement of the execution of the Anglo-American plan to raise the permitted level of German steel production. (See under "Germany" and "France.")

At his press conference on the 16th July Mr. Marshall expressed the urgent desire of his Government to increase Ruhr coal production as a basic requirement for European recovery, and said he attached great importance to the Anglo-American conference on this subject in Washington to which the State Department had invited His Majesty's Government to send representatives. Owing to the inability of the United States Government to accede to the British desire that the agenda for these talks should be broadened to include other subjects closely related to the Ruhr coal problem, His Majesty's Government have explained that, in their view, the matter should be discussed in Berlin, where experts on the coal problem are readily available. At the same time H.M. Ambassador in Washington has been instructed to inform the United States Government that, whatever the outcome of the Paris Conference, the United Kingdom will be unable to continue to support the dollar expenditure involved in financing imports to Germany under the arrangements at present in force. Mr. Lovett, the new Under-Secretary of State, previously told H.M. Ambassador that his Government cannot at present offer any further assistance except as part of a general plan for European recovery.

A measure to provide 1,353,029,900 dollars to cover United States foreign relief programmes over the next twelve months was passed by the House of Representatives on the 18th July. This includes the full 400 million dollars requested by the President for aid to Greece and Turkey, as well as the United States contribution to the International Refugee Organization and funds for relief in the occupied areas of Germany, Japan and Korea. The sum of 350 million dollars asked for by Mr. Truman for relief to war-devastated countries was reduced, on the recommendation of the House Appropriations Committee, by 18 million dollars—on the ground that this figure represented the amount "intended to go to certain countries which have not shown a disposition to comply with the requirements of the act authorizing the appropriation." This is understood to refer to Poland and Hungary, and, on the 23rd July, the State Department announced that the United States Government had decided that it would not be necessary to send any further official relief to Poland. No decision regarding Hungary has been reported so far. In the course of the brief debate in the House, Rep. Dirksen (Republican, Illinois) proposed an amendment specifically denying aid to countries which failed to "co-operate" in the Marshall Plan"; this was shouted down by members because it was felt to imply premature approval by the House of Mr. Marshall's proposals.

The deep concern felt by political leaders regarding the importance of an American foreign aid policy directed towards the "firm containment" of Soviet expansion is particularly evident in the case of the present troubles in Greece. There has been considerable speculation as to what course the United States will adopt to carry out her new responsibilities in Greece if the U.S.S.R. should obstruct action by the United Nations. Both Mr. Marshall and Mr. Lovett, the new Under-Secretary of State, have during the past week stressed the need for the prompt shipment of adequate military supplies to that country. At his press conference on the 16th Mr. Marshall indicated that the United States Mission to Greece might advise the Greek Army "on an instructional basis" regarding methods for fighting the guerrillas.

C267548

Two days later Rep. Charles A. Eaton, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, went so far as to say: "We are in sight of a shooting war this minute in Greece."

It is typical of the manner in which foreign affairs are at present shaping the whole course of American political life that, during the past week, two further official bodies have been set up which will deal with foreign assistance problems. In addition to the State Department Policy Planning Committee and the three special committees appointed by President Truman (see Summary No. 398), a special fact-finding committee, composed of members of all standing committees of the House of Representatives concerned with foreign policy, is to be set up to study the aid requirements of foreign nations and the extent of United States resources available to meet them. This decision, which apparently took Senate leaders by surprise, was announced by the Speaker, Mr. Joseph Martin, after a meeting of the Republican Steering Committee of the House on the 14th July. Mr. Martin said it was desirable that the House of Representatives should make such a study independently from the executive branch. The Committee is expected to visit Europe during the recess. On the Administration side, the the Treasury Department has now established a new Office of International Finance under the directorship of Mr. Frank A. Southard, Jr., who will be responsible, inter alia, for all matters relating to financial assistance programmes and will advise the Secretary of the Treasury on the financial aspects of international treaties and financial problems in the United States occupation zones of Germany, Austria, Japan and Korea.

With regard to the Anglo-American Financial Agreement, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John Snyder, announced on the 15th July that the United States Government had agreed to the request of His Majesty's Government that the date for the free convertibility of sterling accounts be postponed from the 15th July to the 15th September in the case of fourteen countries. A State Department spokesman said that discussions between the two Governments were proceeding regarding the application of Article 9 (the "non-discrimination" clause) of the Agreement and it was hoped to find a "mutually satisfactory" solution.

On the home front, as already foreseen, President Truman on the 18th July vetoed and returned the second 4,000 million dollar income tax reduction bill presented to him by the present Congress. (See last week's Summary.) The House of Representatives promptly voted to override his veto, but the Senate failed by 5 votes to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority to make the bill law. There have been charges from Republican quarters that Mr. Truman was "playing politics" in again vetoing this measure against the clear wishes of the Republican-dominated Congress, and some observers have claimed that similar "political" thinking on the part of Congress "in revenge for" the President's action is at the root of the present unwillingness to speed legislative action on the proposed economic aid to Europe. Mr. Thomas A. Dewey, the Republican Governor of New York State, has taken advantage of the opportunity presented by the State Governors' Conference to make a "non-political" tour of the Western States which appears to have increased the support for his Presidential nomination next year. Mr. Dewey was the favourite candidate of Republican Governors in an unofficial poll taken at Salt Lake City and was followed by Mr. Warren and Mr. Stassen. Mr. Dewey also headed a new Gallup poll of the 15th July with 50 per cent. of the votes; Mr. Stassen was second favourite, while Mr. Taft and Mr. Vandenberg tied for third place.

LATIN AMERICA

Inter-American Affairs

According to Washington press statements, the United States War and Navy Departments are furnishing arms from war surpluses to all Latin American countries except Argentina, the Dominican Republic, Honduras and Nicaragua. Under contracts of the 15th March, Brazil, Chile, El Salvador, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, Uruguay, Mexico and Guatemala have received, since V.J. Day, planes, artillery, small arms and ammunition to the surplus sales value of $5,063,837—the original cost was $37,149,309 (see Summary No. 400).

The State Department formerly feared that any such distribution of arms would encourage revolution and dictatorship in Latin America, and actually weaken hemisphere solidarity by increasing jealousy among the republics, while at the same time giving substance to complaints about United States interference in other nations' affairs. It was also argued that communism in the Americas could more effectively be checked by economic assistance, than by show of arms. Since President Truman's expression of satisfaction with Argentina's policy towards the Nazis, however, the State Department has come nearer to the War Department's point of view, which apparently is that of Mr. Marshall and the President himself. The fact that on the 26th May, the President submitted to Congress a message requesting authorisation to train armed forces of the Latin American Republics and replace their military equipment, after Congress had failed to act on a similar request last year, shows the great importance that he attaches to the proposal.

In a press conference at Buenos Aires President Gonzalez Videla of Chile again upheld the United States policy for the standardisation of armaments in the Western Hemisphere, though he repeated his objection to the subordination of the Chilean army to foreign forces (see Summary No. 399). He did not think that the plan involved the disappearance of Chilean military traditions or uniforms.

According to a broadcast report the question of Nicaragua's invitation to the Rio de Janeiro Conference (see Summary No. 400) has now been taken up by Argentina, who, at a meeting of the Executive Council of the Pan-American Union, supported the idea of an invitation being sent to Nicaragua, but suggested that the Council should make the decision whether or not to accept the credentials of the Nicaragua delegation.

Argentina

A recent decree of the Argentine Government authorises the creation, under the direction of the National Committee for the Antarctic, of a sub-committee on the Falkland Islands and South Georgia.

In this decree South Georgia has been separated from the Antarctic region and placed on the same footing as the Falkland Islands, thereby implying that South Georgia is Argentine territory under de facto British occupation, differing from the other Antarctic territories, which are already regarded as under Argentine jurisdiction. The activities of the various British parties established in these regions by the Falkland Islands Dependencies Survey have received no local publicity, and the Argentine public has been led to believe, that apart from some minor frontier revision with Chile, the Antarctic sector is part of Argentina, and that the only outstanding territorial question is the possession of the Falkland Islands.

Argentina's case is being prepared by a well qualified and active committee, and there is little doubt that her delegations at international conferences will lose no opportunity of ventilating her territorial claim.

In the first week of July Señor Miranda, President of the Central Bank and virtual controller of Argentine economy, appeared before the Senate to answer a number of questions regarding the Bank's economic policy, irregularities in the administration of the E.M.T.A. (Argentine Mixed Telephone Company) and other unpleasantly flavoured matters. (See Summary No. 398.) His explanations were evidently satisfactory, as by a subsequent decree he was appointed Chairman of the newly-created National Economic Council, with the rank of Minister-Secretary of State. Other members of the Council are the Ministers of Agriculture, Finance and Public Works, the Secretaries of Industry and Labour and the President's technical adviser, Señor Figuerola. The persistent rumours of Señor Miranda's resignation following exposures in La Tribuna of alleged frauds and accusations by General Silva, will be scotched by his appointment to Ministerial rank.

A broadcast report states that a draft Bill has been submitted to Congress to limit all newspapers to four pages. An editorial in La Prensa protests that the adoption of such a proposal would constitute an attack on public liberties and be a threat to the economic life of the nation (La Prensa ordinarily consists of 24 pages or more, with a dozen or so pages of advertisements). The immediate consequence would be the reduction of advertisements, followed by the dismissal of a large number of workers.

The same source announces that the Minister of Justice has cancelled all interviews in order to devote himself entirely to the preparation of draft Bills on the reorganisation of the judicial system and modification of the code. The Bills will probably be sent to Congress for next month's session (see Summary No. 391).

Presidents Perón and Gonzalez Videla were present at the Argentine Independence Day celebrations at Tucumán on the 10th July, when Señor Borlenghi, Minister of the Interior, read a declaration of Argentine Economic Independence. The President of Chile said that declarations of Independence were not enough. Brazilians, Argentines and Chileans had for 130 years been colonies of foreign companies. Political freedom was achieved, but economic liberty was still mortgaged.

Bolivia

Serious unrest is reported among the Indians in Bolivia, particularly in the high land district bordering on Lake Titicaca, near the Peruvian frontier. The present outbreaks are attributed to the propaganda of a near-communist organisation, the "Local Workers' Federation," which has for some time been inciting the Indians to seize the large estates.

The party in power under Colonel Villarroel had an extensive programme for the social and economic improvement of the Indians. The Indians are regarded by knowledgeable people as part of a general movement towards social revolution which has been going on for the last ten years through the combined action of various political parties, among them the M.N.R. (Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario), the national and authoritarian movement founded by Señor Paz Estenssoro.

The Minister of Education is planning an "alphabetization" campaign, somewhat on the lines of that organised in Mexico (see Summary No. 370). Meanwhile the Government have detained the leaders of the Workers' Federation, pending trial, and have put a number of Indians to work on Government lands in the Ichilo River district.

Chile

At a press conference in Buenos Aires Sr. Gonzalez Videla, President of Chile, after referring to the harmfulness of self-sufficiency, said that he wanted to return to Chile with President Perón's assurance that Argentina would abstain from the erection of synthetic nitrate plants, and so disarm Chilean opposition to the Argentine-Chilean Treaty. On his return to Chile on the 12th July, it was announced that an agreement had been signed, by which Argentina undertook not to install synthetic nitrate factories in her territory, and Chile to supply all the sodium nitrates required. A similar agreement was reached with Brazil. Senor Gonzalez Videla stated that his visits to Brazil and Chile had been a complete success and he felt certain that Congress would ratify the Argentine-Chilean Trade Agreement (see Summary No. 380).

Guatemala

Diplomatic relations between Guatemala and the Dominican Republic were suspended on the 9th July, following President Arévalo's refusal to accept the nomination of Senor Demorizi as Dominican Ambassador. The President's decision appears to have been prompted by a reminder from the Venezuelan Minister of certain remarks made by President Bethancourt of Venezuela regarding the Dominican Republic, on the occasion of his visit to Guatemala last August.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

The Balkans Commission

The proposals of the Balkans Commission for restoring peace between Greece and her northern neighbours (see Summary No. 398) were upheld by Sir Alexander Cadogan when the Security Council met on the 3rd July. Answering the Soviet contention that the proposals were tantamount to a limitation of the sovereign rights of the Balkan States, Sir Alexander said that the United Nations Charter itself constituted a limitation of the theory of national sovereignty. "If the Council cannot apply proposals such as those submitted by the Commission, ... we had better tear up the Charter and pack up." The proposals put forward were practical, he said, and could perhaps be elaborated. When the debate was resumed on the 8th July the Soviet delegate, Mr. Gromyko, pronounced the Greek evidence untrustworthy and the verdict of guilt against Yugoslavia, Albania and Bulgaria unfounded. He submitted formal recommendations in which there was no mention of a United Nations frontier organ such as was proposed by the Balkans Commission.
